But before the high court, opponents of affirmative action argue that the compelling interest in diversity that may exist in higher education, which prepares students for a diverse workplace, may be outweighed in lower grades by the importance of teaching racial equality to young students.

"Jefferson County's schools are sending the wrong message to our children -- that racial identification is more important than respect for individual rights and liberties in today's society," the Pacific Legal Foundation argues in its brief.

The Council of the Great City Schools, in a brief filed at an earlier stage of the Kentucky case, argues by contrast that "the interests that school districts may promote by seeking racially and ethnically diverse school enrollments ... are broader and even more compelling in the context of public elementary and secondary education" than in higher education.

High Court To Examine Race-balancing Schools (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Nearly three years after its landmark ruling upholding a race-based admissions plan at the University of Michigan Law School, the US Supreme Court has agreed to consider to what extent race may be used to balance white and nonwhite enrollment in public schools.

On Monday, the high court agreed to examine cases involving two school districts attempting to maintain racially integrated schools.

One involves a school board plan in Seattle that seeks to achieve a rough balance of 40 percent white and 60 percent nonwhite enrollment at each of the city's 10 public high schools.

The second is a school district in Louisville, Ky., that set broad guidelines that the black student population of any particular school should range between 15 percent and 50 percent.

Both cases will be closely watched for indications of how the new lineup of justices - including the replacement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor with Justice Samuel Alito - may shift the court's jurisprudence on the constitutionality of affirmative action plans.

Justice O'Connor provided the key swing vote and authored the landmark 5-4 decision upholding the University of Michigan Law School's admissions plan. The majority opinion recognized that diversity in education can be a compelling interest, justifying the use of race in the student selection process.

The decision drew sharp dissents from four members of the court's conservative wing, who wrote that the Michigan plan violated the Constitution's equal protection mandate by relying too heavily on race as a factor in the admissions process.

At issue in both the Seattle and Louisville cases is how the high court's 2003 Michigan Law School decision should be applied in public school districts seeking to achieve diversity.

The Kentucky plan relies in large part on school administrators drawing boundaries for each school that extend into both white and black neighborhoods. School enrollment is then determined in part by randomly selecting students from an integrated pool of prospective students.

DOJ_NMG_0032094

As an additional boost to integration efforts, school officials tracked prospective students by classifying each as "black male," "black female," "white male," or "white female." This aspect of the Kentucky plan was struck down by a federal judge as an impermissible use of race and gender for public school admissions.

The judge and an appeals court panel upheld the rest of the Kentucky plan.

A parent filed an appeal to the Supreme Court claiming that school officials violated the constitutional guarantee of equal protection when they refused to allow her son to attend his neighborhood school and later refused to allow him to transfer to another elementary school because there were no more slots available at that school for white students.

The judge said the boy was not unduly harmed by the denial of the transfer under the racial guidelines. Because the school district maintains equal and integrated schools, prospective students enjoy no particular benefit by attending one school rather than another, the judge ruled.

But the district's schools are not all equal, argues Teddy Gordon, a Louisville lawyer who represents the mother of the student denied admission to his neighborhood school. Mr. Gordon says in his brief to the Supreme Court that the school district should be focusing on the quality of neighborhood schools rather than the skin color of children attending them.

A similar debate is under way in Seattle. Its school board plan was designed to counter the impact of racially segregated housing patterns on the city's school system. School officials were concerned that reliance on neighborhood schools would simply mirror the city's segregated housing market and translate into a similarly segregated public school system.

To try to break that cycle, the district adopted its "Open Choice" plan in which parents were permitted to send their children to any school within the city. The school board established "tiebreakers" to help determine enrollment at the most popular high schools in the system.

If a student had a sibling at a particular school, that student would be given priority to attend the same school. But if there were no siblings, the "integration tiebreaker" would kick in. In effect, students who were members of an "oversubscribed" race would be given a lower priority for admission than any students of the desired race.

At high schools in the city's largely white north side, that generally meant that minority students were given preference, while at schools in Seattle's largely minority south side, white students were given preference.

Critics of the plan formed a group called Parents Involved in Community Schools. They sued the school district, saying the plan was an unconstitutional form of racial discrimination.

The school district defended the plan as a justifiable effort to achieve racial diversity in the public school system. The plan was adopted in 1998, but has been suspended since 2002 pending the outcome of the litigation.

A federal judge, the Washington Supreme Court, and the Ninth US Circuit Court of Appeals have all upheld Seattle's Open Choice program.

The state supreme court in a 2003 decision rejected the parents' arguments, saying that a racially diverse school population provides educational benefits for all students.

Justices To Hear Cases Of Race-Conscious School Placements (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The Supreme Court announced yesterday that it will rule on the race-conscious assignment of students to public schools, in a pair of cases that could produce some of the most important decisions on school integration since the busing battles of the 1960s and '70s.

The court agreed to hear arguments in separate lawsuits by white parents in Seattle and Jefferson County, Ky., which encompasses Louisville, who say each public school system unconstitutionally discriminates based on skin color. The jurisdictions' programs differ, but each seeks to maintain racial balance with the help of numerical targets for minority enrollment.

Although the court has addressed race-conscious admissions for diversity in higher education, upholding them on a 5 to 4 vote in 2003, this would be the first time it has addressed the "diversity rationale" as it affects the country's 48 million public elementary and secondary school students. It will also be the first race-related constitutional case for President Bush's two appointees, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

The court's decision to take the cases was something of a surprise, since all three federal appeals courts to rule since 2003 sided with the school systems. The court usually intervenes to settle lower-court conflicts.

Six months ago, before Alito replaced Sandra Day O'Connor, who wrote the 2003 opinion, the court declined to hear the challenge of a parent in Lynn, Mass., to a race-conscious plan.

"It's bad news for desegregation advocates," said Goodwin Liu, a Clinton administration education official who teaches constitutional law at the University of California at Berkeley. "It looks like the more conservative justices see they have a fifth vote to reverse these cases."

DOJ_NMG_0032095

But lawyers for the Seattle and Louisville parents argued there was a circuit split because the post-2003 lower-court rulings clashed with three pre-2003 rulings against race-conscious policies.

Sharon Browne, principal attorney of the Pacific Legal Foundation, which supports the parents' lawsuits, said she "was pleased that the Court has decided to hear these cases. Together, these cases could put an end to schools using race as a factor to decide where children can attend public school."

Yesterday's decision returns the court to an area of American life that it revolutionized in 1954 with Brown v. Board Education -- and the lower-court desegregation orders, including busing in many cities, that flowed from that decision.

In the intervening years, however, direct court supervision of public school racial composition has generally lapsed, and schools face student demographics determined not only by the country's historic black-white divide, but also by immigration from around the world.

Embracing diversity not as a legal requirement but as an educational objective, school districts frequently offer alternatives to geographical assignment, including school choice and magnet school options. But these, in turn, can result in competition for spots at the most-sought-after schools.

"The decision and the opinions will be impactful," said Francisco Negron, general counsel of the National School Boards Association, which has supported the school districts in the lower courts. "We're in the post-integration era. Many desegregation lawsuits filed in the '70s have come to a natural ending point. . . . Schools are trying to implement policies that recognize the need for diversity."

Seattle and Louisville say their plans are consistent with the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling -- which allowed universities to consider race as one of many factors when assembling diverse colleges and graduate schools.

They say their use of race is necessary to meet compelling educational goals, and accounts for a modest number of school assignments.

But the plaintiffs argue that school officials have gone beyond what the court permitted in 2003, because they ultimately rely on fixed numerical targets for assigning students.

Each system adopted its plan voluntarily, but against the backdrop of different social and legal histories.

In Louisville, the 97,000-student public school population is 34 percent black, with the rest predominantly white. In 1973, a federal court ruled that it was officially, and unlawfully, segregated. This led to court-ordered busing from 1975 to 1984. The system remained under court supervision until 2000.

The current Louisville plan says that all schools, including magnets, must have a minimum black enrollment of 15 percent and a maximum of 50 percent.

The only exceptions are for pre-kindergarten, kindergarten, alternative and special schools -- and four magnet schools covered by a federal judge's ruling barring the use of race to allocate educational opportunities not widely available.

Parent Crystal D. Meredith, however, argues that the plan cost her son admission to the school in his neighborhood.

In Seattle, which has substantial Asian and Hispanic populations as well as large numbers of whites and African Americans, no court has ever found the 47,000-student school system guilty of official segregation. Instead, the school board says that diversity is a key educational value and that segregated housing patterns must be changed.

The city began busing in 1977 but stopped in 1988. Under an "Open Choice" plan adopted in 1998, the goal was to have schools close to the city's overall racial composition: 60 percent minority, 40 percent white. Children can attend any school. At schools where demand for spaces exceeds supply, however, siblings of current students have priority -- and an "integration tiebreaker" favors students whose race would tip a school toward 60-40.

The tiebreaker has not been in use since 2002 because of the litigation, which was brought by Parents Involved in Community Schools, a group of white parents who say it cost their children admission to the popular Ballard High School.

The tiebreaker was initially invalidated by a three-judge panel of the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit. But an 11-judge panel granted a new hearing and upheld it 7 to 4.

The cases are Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 , No. 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education , No. 05-915. Argument will take place in December, with decisions due by July 2007.

Court To Revisit Race In Schools (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Monday to take up two cases that could mark a historic shift in the role of race in education and spell the end of official efforts to integrate the nation's public schools.

The justices said they would hear appeals from parents in Seattle and Louisville, Ky., who say it is unconstitutional for officials to consider race when deciding which school a student will attend.

DOJ_NMG_0032096

The cities adopted voluntary integration programs in recent years that put limits on how many white or black students may be enrolled in some schools.

The Seattle and Louisville cases could put the court on the opposite side of an old issue. Having told school officials in the landmark 1954 Brown vs. Board of Education ruling that they must desegregate their classrooms, the high court will now consider whether the Constitution forbids official efforts to maintain integration.

A ruling outlawing such efforts would have a wide effect on schools that continue to use race even after desegregation orders have expired.

The Los Angeles Unified School District uses magnet schools to achieve integration, but it does so partly by enrolling students based on their race or ethnicity.

Just three years ago, the court upheld affirmative action in colleges and universities, but two new conservative justices have joined the court since then. Monday's announcement is the second this year that could indicate a shift to the right in a major area of law. The court agreed to hear a case this fall that will determine whether Congress can outlaw a late-term abortion procedure.

Beginning with the Reagan era of the 1980s, conservatives have insisted it is unconstitutional for the government to use a person's race as a factor in hiring, awarding contracts, admitting college students, or, in this instance, assigning students to public schools.

In 2003, however, the Supreme Court dealt conservatives a defeat in a University of Michigan law school case. The court, in a 5-4 decision, said higher education had a "compelling" need to consider a student's race if it was to maintain diversity in classes.

That decision was written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who retired in February.

Her replacement, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., is seen as likely to take a more conservative stand on race and affirmative action. In 1985, as a lawyer in President Reagan's Justice Department, he said he was "particularly proud" of the administration's efforts to persuade the Supreme Court that "racial and ethnic quotas should not be allowed."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who also worked in the Reagan administration, wrote memos that criticized the overt consideration of race by the government.

Lawyers for the parents in the school cases say a student's race or ethnicity should not affect their chances of attending a school.

"The issue here is: Can public schools voluntarily discriminate among students to achieve racial balance?" said Sharon L. Browne, a lawyer for the Pacific Legal Foundation in Sacramento, which had urged the court to hear both cases. "They are teaching our kids that race still matters. If they can continue to do that, we will never get to a place where the country is colorblind."

She said as many 1,000 school districts nationwide seek to integrate some schools by enrolling or not enrolling students based on their race. Last year, her group sued the Los Angeles Unified School District in state court, contending its magnet school program is unconstitutional because it seeks "a racially balanced enrollment."

Seattle has 10 high schools, and it allows students to choose which one they want to attend. The district's integration plan calls for trying to maintain a racial balance in each high school that is within 10 percentage points of its overall enrollment, which is 60% minority and 40% white. But if too many students choose a certain school and it is "over-subscribed," officials put limits on who may enroll. One factor they consider is race.

In 2001, for example, 300 students were denied their first choice of a high school because of their race. Of these, 210 were white and 90 were minorities. The minorities include students who are black, Latino, Asian and Native American.

The Seattle plan has been tied up in litigation for years. In October, the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the plan on a 7-4 vote and applauded the school system for achieving "racial diversity" despite the city's segregated housing patterns.

Harry Korrell, a lawyer for the Seattle parents, insisted the city was not segregated. "This is becoming a very diverse city. Even the whitest neighborhoods are integrated," he said. Because of this natural integration, he said, the racial balancing plan is not needed.

He said he hoped the high court would say that "absent a history of past discrimination, it is impermissible to use race in making government decisions."

Louisville had a history of official racial segregation. In 1975 it was ordered to bus students to achieve desegregation, but that court order ended in 2000.

A year later it adopted a voluntary integration plan that seeks a black enrollment of at least 15% and no more than 50% in each school. Crystal Meredith, a white parent, challenged the plan, charging that it violated her son's rights; he was blocked from attending his neighborhood elementary school because it had too many white students.

DOJ_NMG_0032097

But a federal judge and the U.S. appeals court in Cincinnati upheld the integration plan, based in part on O'Connor's opinion in the law school case.

The Supreme Court said it would hear both cases, Parents Involved in Community Schools vs. Seattle School District and Meredith vs. Jefferson County Board of Education, in the fall.

The cases are likely to attract unusual attention because of the Supreme Court's historic role in ending school segregation.

After declaring segregation unconstitutional in Brown vs. Board of Education, the court said school officials should proceed "with all deliberate speed" to end segregation.

Many chose to be deliberate, but not speedy.

In 1968, the court said it would wait no longer for schools to achieve real desegregation, and by the early 1970s, many school systems were under federal court orders to bus students across town to achieve desegregation.

That effort met strong public resistance nearly everywhere it was tried. In one Reagan-era memo, Roberts referred to busing for desegregation as a "failed experiment."

"We're glad the Supreme Court is taking an opportunity to clarify for school districts the issues around diversity and school attendance. Right now, there is a lot of uncertainty," said Francisco Negron, counsel for the National School Boards Assn.

The school cases join another that could reveal a shift to the right by the high court.

In late February, the same week that Alito took his seat as O'Connor's replacement, the court agreed to hear a case that could revive the federal law forbidding the abortion procedure known as intact dilation and extraction — which opponents label "partial-birth" abortion — performed during the second trimester of a pregnancy. That law was struck down by a lower court based on a 5-4 Supreme Court ruling, joined by O'Connor, which said the ban on this surgical method could threaten the health of some women seeking an abortion.

Court To Review School-Race Issues (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Ben Winograd

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Three years after upholding affirmative action in university admissions, the Supreme Court agreed to review whether elementary and secondary schools also may consider race in voluntary efforts to maintain desegregated classes.

Separately, the justices rolled back the reach of federal racketeering law, ruling that to prevail in a civil lawsuit, a plaintiff would have to show it was directly injured by a competitor's illegal actions, not only that such acts may have created a competitive disadvantage.

The school cases are the latest progeny of Brown v. Board of Education, the 1954 opinion declaring that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal." The Brown case opened decades of litigation to integrate U.S. schools. In the 1960s and '70s, courts ordered busing and other desegregation methods that prompted a backlash among white parents unwilling to see their children bused to black neighborhoods. Other court-ordered plans were dissolved after school officials demonstrated they had succeeded in creating the required "unitary" systems.

The two cases accepted yesterday concern whether schools can still consider race to promote desegregation after court orders have been lifted -- or if they had never been imposed at all.

One case comes from Louisville, Ky., where in 1973, a federal court required schools to eliminate "all vestiges of state-imposed segregation." A variety of court-imposed plans followed, including mandatory busing, until the decree was dissolved in 2000. School officials, seeking to promote campus integration, then adopted a plan to maintain each school's black enrollment between 15% and 50%.

The other case comes from Seattle, which never had legally imposed racial segregation, but nevertheless saw schools effectively segregated by neighborhood housing patterns. Seattle students can choose to attend any of the city's 10 high schools. Under a plan adopted in the late 1990s, race is a "tie-breaker" for admission to oversubscribed schools so that their enrollment approximates that of the city as a whole: 40% white, 60% non-white.

Several parents of white children challenged the plans, but appellate courts upheld them, finding they complied with two 2003 Supreme Court opinions involving admission policies at the University of Michigan. Those decisions found student diversity a compelling governmental interest and that race could be a factor considered by admissions officers. The court did not say, however, how its doctrine might apply to lower education.

Since those 2003 opinions, the court's composition has changed, with the arrival of conservative Justice Samuel Alito. His predecessor, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, wrote the 5-4 majority decision upholding an affirmative-action program at Michigan's law school.

(Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education; Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1)

DOJ_NMG_0032098

Separately, the justices dismissed a suit filed under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act by a New York steel-supply company alleging that a competitor had undercut prices by failing to collect sales tax. The opinion by Justice Anthony Kennedy found the scheme primarily defrauded New York state and said the plaintiff didn't establish a sufficient link to its own decline in sales.

"The decision today just knocks out a broad swath of potential claims under civil RICO," said Gene Schaerr, who filed a friend-of-the-court brief in the case for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Following the decision, the justices ordered a federal appellate court to reconsider a RICO suit alleging a Georgia carpet manufacturer depressed wages of legal employees by conspiring with a recruiter to hire illegal aliens. In light of the ruling in the steel case, the lower court must determine whether the hiring fraud was the "proximate cause" of the plaintiffs' decline in wages.

(Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply Corp. and Mohawk v. Williams)

The justices also agreed to decide whether prisoners may retroactively apply a 2004 decision preventing judges from imposing sentences far beyond established guidelines. A judge in Washington state sentenced Lonnie Burton to 47 years in prison after a 1994 conviction for robbery, burglary and rape. His lawyers said the sentence exceeded sentencing guidelines by more than 20 years. In the 2004 case, the court struck down a 7½-year sentence for a man who kidnapped his wife. His plea bargain called for a 4½-year sentence.

(Burton v. Waddington)

The school and sentencing cases will be heard in the court's next term, which begins in October.

Court Takes 2 Race-based School-assignment Cases (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

The Supreme Court said yesterday it will hear appeals of two cases that could determine if race can be used in assigning students to public schools for the purpose of enhancing enrollment diversity in situations where court orders are not involved.

The court announced that it will take up the case this fall of a Louisville, Ky., woman who says the Jefferson County Public Schools' desegregation plan is unconstitutional because it barred her son from transferring to a better school. Her son is white.

In the second case, a Seattle parents' group charges that a policy of the Seattle school district that allowed students to select their high schools but used race as a tiebreaker to decide who fills limited spots, was unfair. The district ended the policy as a result of parents' complaints, but the litigation has continued.

Both the Seattle and Kentucky cases challenge a school system's ability to desegregate schools voluntarily without a court order.

These will be the high court's first rulings on diversity plans. The outcome is likely to hinge on the vote of the newest justice, conservative Samuel A. Alito Jr. In a 5-4 decision last week, Justice Alito was the tiebreaker in a case that found that public employees -- including whistleblowers -- do not enjoy free-speech rights when they discuss work-related matters.

Last December, when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was still on the bench, the Supreme Court rejected another case involving the use of race as a factor in school admissions to achieve diversity. The case involved a small public school system in Lynn, Mass., which has a tiebreaker system similar to the one used in Seattle.

Critics of such policies said the court's announcement that it will accept the appeals of the Seattle and Kentucky cases hints at a new aggressiveness by the court under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who is also conservative, in dealing with race issues in public schools.

Either that's the case, "or the former court simply knew these other cases were in the pipeline," said Ted Gordon, the attorney for Crystal Meredith, who is suing the Jefferson County school district for denying her son the right to attend a school in his immediate neighborhood.

Mr. Gordon said he and his client are thrilled that the Supreme Court will examine the two cases.

"This is a surreal experience," he said.

The Jefferson County school district's policy allows parents and students some choice among schools. But it requires that most schools keep black enrollment from rising above 50 percent or dropping below 15 percent. The system, which has 100,000 students, is about 35 percent black.

In a telephone interview yesterday, Mr. Gordon said Jefferson County's enrollment policy is "absolutely based on racial quotas" and is "unconstitutional."

"We want kids to be admitted to schools because of merit, not race," he said.

Verizon Bias Suit Deal Sets Record (WP)

By Amy Joyce

DOJ_NMG_0032099

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Verizon Communications Inc. will pay almost $49 million to 12,326 current and former female employees as part of a landmark class-action lawsuit alleging pregnancy discrimination.

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission reached a settlement in 2002 against Verizon predecessors Nynex Corp. and Bell Atlantic Corp. But the total amount of the settlement was not made public until yesterday, when the EEOC completed its projections of how much would be paid in future benefits.

The final figure makes the case the largest pregnancy discrimination settlement in EEOC history. It covers women in 13 states and the District.

Nynex and Bell Atlantic were accused of violating federal law by denying women pension and other benefit accruals when they spent time on pregnancy or maternity leave.

The total compensation paid thus far is more than $25.3 million. The EEOC told a U.S. District Court in New York yesterday that it projected that an additional $23.6 million would be paid in future benefits. The announcement came after years of calculating which women were denied benefits when on leave.

"This comes out of a different era," said Eric Rabe, a Verizon spokesman. "The people who were here then by and large don't work for the company anymore. We think our record today is exemplary, and this was not an admission of having done anything wrong. It is simply a matter of trying to get this behind us to move on."

The suit alleged that the predecessor companies violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978 and the Equal Pay Act of 1963 by denying women service credits for leaves of absence taken between July 1965 and April 1979. The companies also denied pension credits for child-care leaves of absence until December 1983.

Pregnancy discrimination claims filed with the EEOC rose by 31 percent from 1992 to 2005, to 4,449 from 3,385. Some of that increase reflects a growing number of women working during and after their pregnancies, but not all of it. In the same period, the percentage of working women with children younger than 18 rose by about 5 percent.

"There really remain tremendous issues concerning pregnancy discrimination in the workplace," said Elizabeth Grossman, regional attorney with the EEOC in New York. "More and more women are continuing to go forward to assert their rights in a way past generations were not. Some employers are getting educated and changing practices, but many are not."

Grossman's office last year sued and won a settlement for a waitress who was removed from a managerial career track, denied work assignments and told to "consider her options" after she revealed she was pregnant. Ultimately, she was fired. The woman received $145,000 in a pregnancy discrimination settlement with her former employer. The same office last month also sued Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. on behalf of a pregnant employee at a Bridgewater, N.J., store who says she was denied modified work assignments that were given to other employees with temporary disabilities.

The EEOC was joined in filing the class-action lawsuit against the phone companies by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Communications Workers of America, unions representing Verizon workers. "This case represents an important victory for working women who should not have had to sacrifice their pension benefits because they had children," Christopher M. Shelton, a CWA vice president, said in a statement.

ANTITRUST:

Adobe Vs. Microsoft: The Battle Over The .pdf (MERCN)

By John Boudreau

The San Jose Mercury News, June 6, 2006

Adobe Systems and Microsoft have seemed to co-exist in a mutually beneficial ecosystem for years.

But their cause for common ground, a little piece of software millions have used but may have hardly noticed -- the Adobe PDF -- is now the reason the gloves are coming off.

At the core of the tension is Microsoft's move to create technology to compete with Adobe's PDF franchise, and difficult negotiations around incorporating Adobe's mostly open standard PDF software into the next generation of Office programs.

While Microsoft makes software such as Word and Excel that lets people create documents, Adobe can turn those documents you might print out on paper into digital, ready-to-be-e-mailed files through its Portable Document Format (.pdf).

Last week, behind-the-scenes friction between the two became public when Microsoft said it expected Adobe to file a lawsuit against the Redmond, Wash. company, possibly in the European Union, which recently has become more receptive to Microsoft antitrust concerns than U.S. regulators.

The dispute underscored the Silicon Valley axiom: Companies that cooperate often can end up trying to devour each other's business.

DOJ_NMG_0032100

``Adobe is one of many long-time partners of Microsoft that have now turned into competitors of Microsoft," Jupiter Research analyst Joe Wilcox said.

Adobe makes money from its business-document processing software Adobe Acrobat, which is part of its Intelligent Document division and accounted for 36 percent of its revenue, or $708 million, in 2005. A person must own a copy of Adobe Acrobat to make a PDF, but only needs to download a free version of Acrobat Reader to view a PDF that has been sent to them.

The two sides failed to reach an agreement on how the PDF would be used in the new version of Microsoft Office. As a result, Microsoft announced it was canceling plans to include an automatic ``save to PDF" feature in its new release of Office. So those who buy Office 2007 will have to download free software that will allow them to save PDF documents created in Office applications, such as Word, Excel and PowerPoint.

Microsoft indicated that negotiations broke down over fees Adobe wanted for licensing its software, which could make Office more expensive.

Observers say the larger issue is both companies view the other warily.

For Microsoft, the ubiquitous PDF format could indirectly result in fewer sales of its software updates because those who receive the digital documents can access Excel or Word without owning either. For example, a person making a resume in Word can turn that file into a PDF and send it to a colleague, who can then open and edit it in Adobe Acrobat -- without even owning Word.

``Adobe introduced very cool technology that extends PDF to other formats. You can now take documents from almost any source, mix them together, save them to a PDF, send them to your buddy. Just by using Adobe Reader, you can annotate that document and send it back," Wilcox said. ``If you are Microsoft, whose success was built on format dominance, that's a scary prospect."

Adobe, on the other hand, sees Microsoft trying to move in on its turf in multiple areas: Microsoft is launching its own version of PDF software, code-named Metro, which the software giant will be offering as an optional bundle to computer makers. (All computer makers are sure to include the application.) Microsoft is also making a move to compete with Adobe's creative software, Photoshop, and is a competitor in Internet and mobile video-playing technology.

In the recent tussle, Adobe might be concerned that Microsoft, while including its PDF technology with Office, could make the PDF less appealing than its own document-sharing software.

Microsoft ``can create a preference for their version," said Howard University law professor Andrew Gavil. ``That's the argument Google has been making." (Google has complained an upcoming update of Microsoft's Internet Explorer Web browser contains a search box that in some cases defaults to the MSN search engine.)

Adobe has said little so far. In a statement, the San Jose company said it had not decided whether to take legal action against Microsoft.

``I'll never trivialize Microsoft. They are a $40 billion company with virtually unlimited resources and they are a monopoly," Adobe chief executive Bruce Chizen said in an interview last year.

Still, Adobe has successfully protected its PDF franchise against earlier incursions by Microsoft.

``They've defended themselves really well against Metro," said Pacific Crest Securities analyst Steve Lidberg. ``One of the reasons you have seen such good acceptance of PDF is the ubiquity of the Reader -- Adobe giving that away for free and the fact they have opened up the platform to other partners to build applications around it."

The PDF, for instance, is now the standard digital document for federal agencies, from the IRS to the FDA.

``It would seem like they've pretty much won out," said Tony Henning, analyst at Future Image in San Mateo. ``There was a time, a decade-and-a-half-ago, when there were three or four contenders. They've won."

Microsoft, though, may not believe the war is over.

``Even though PDF has become a de facto document standard, Microsoft has clearly made noises in recent months about how they'd like to change that," Jupiter Research analyst Michael Gartenberg said.

Why Adobe And Microsoft Hit Delete On PDF Deal (WP)

By Rob Pegoraro

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

If you want to know why so many computer programs are so bad these days, take a look at the Adobe-Microsoft mess.

These two powerful software developers have gotten into an argument over whether Microsoft can include a new feature in its upcoming Office 2007 productivity suite -- the ability to save your work as a Portable Document Format (PDF) file.

In the process, they're showing how old-fashioned greed and the more modern ailment of lawsuit phobia can turn a promising program sour.

DOJ_NMG_0032101

Judged strictly on its merits, there's nothing to argue about that feature. It would end the worry that your Word, Excel or PowerPoint document might look weird or be unreadable on someone else's computer. PDF files preserve their appearance -- from fonts to footnotes to photos -- wherever they're read, so long as a recipient has a PDF-reader program. These programs, almost all free, are available for nearly every kind of computer, down to "smart phones" and handheld organizers.

Competing productivity suites, such as Corel's WordPerfect Office and the free and open-source OpenOffice.org, have offered this option for years. So does Apple's Mac OS X, which offers PDF output as a systemwide feature. When Microsoft announced in October that it would follow suit in its next release of Office, it seemed like a refreshing acknowledgment of reality in Redmond, Wash.

You'd think that would have delighted Adobe as well. The San Jose, Calif., firm has worked for years to establish the PDF as a standard way to share data, having written versions of its free Adobe Reader for all the major desktop and handheld operating systems. And while the company charges $299 for its Adobe Acrobat PDF-creation toolkit, it's encouraged other developers to release their own.

For some reason, however, Adobe saw things differently when Microsoft wanted to join the PDF party. As Microsoft explained, in February, Adobe asked it to sell this feature as a separate add-on for Office 2007.

"We needed to break it out, offer it separately and charge a price for it," recounted David Heiner, Microsoft's deputy general counsel, in a phone interview. Adobe also asked Microsoft to yank support for a Microsoft-developed, PDF-like format called XPS. Lastly, Adobe wanted XPS support removed from Windows Vista, the successor to Windows XP that is due in January.

If those demands were not met, the implication seemed clear: See you in court.

Adobe publicists would not answer questions about this. The company released a short, vague statement that said that Adobe's "sole motivation is to maintain a fair, competitive landscape in the software industry" but that it "has made no determination to take legal action against Microsoft."

Heiner said Microsoft wanted to avoid any legal entanglement and offered to yank the PDF-export option from Office, instead making it available as a free download (although, he added, Adobe still wants Microsoft to charge extra for it). Microsoft also would allow computer manufacturers to omit XPS software from the copies of Vista pre-loaded on new machines.

With Adobe clamming up in public, it's hard to figure out what this company is trying to accomplish. If Adobe wants to stop Microsoft's XPS from replacing its own PDF, what better way than to get PDF support in the single most-used productivity suite?

A more reasonable theory holds that Adobe is worried that Microsoft's own PDF software will produce files that aren't strictly PDF-compatible, thus poisoning this standard. But that makes little sense on examination; the best way for Microsoft to quash Adobe's format is to keep Office PDF-illiterate.

Then there's the thought that Adobe's Acrobat, at $299, will compete poorly with any free save-as-PDF option. But Adobe had to have foreseen that possibility when it issued a blanket invitation to the world to write PDF-compatible software. As its own documentation reads, "Adobe gives anyone copyright permission, subject to the conditions stated below, to . . . Write drivers and applications that produce output represented in the Portable Document Format."

Further, for any company to start telling another how it should charge for its products is at best arrogance, at worst price collusion -- a violation of basic antitrust law.

All that and more about this story refuses to add up. It doesn't help that neither company has earned much right to wear a halo.

Adobe has its own monopolistic instincts: Last year it bought what was by far its biggest competitor in the graphics-software business, Macromedia. And it's been happy to exploit the demand for its free Adobe Reader to push unrelated software on users -- the Windows version normally comes with a Yahoo toolbar and Adobe's Photoshop album photo organizer.

Microsoft, meanwhile, has a history of taking standards developed by other companies, then writing software that somehow makes them work best, or only, on Microsoft operating systems. That conduct helped Microsoft lose many of its antitrust battles in the past decade; it's easy to see why the company wants to avoid a return to those days.

Still, from what we do know, it's hard not to wish that the bad old Microsoft would reemerge for this one occasion and tell Adobe to go pound sand.

Brookfield, Blackstone To Buy Trizec (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

In a $4.8 billion deal confirming that the real-estate market for office space remains hot despite rising interest rates, Brookfield Properties Corp. and a private-equity partner agreed to buy Trizec Properties Inc.

The purchase, announced yesterday, of the Chicago-based office real-estate investment trust is one of the biggest deals yet in a continuing frenzy of mergers and acquisitions in the public real-estate world. Brookfield, based in Toronto and New York, is pairing with the Blackstone Group, a private-equity firm that has been involved in a number of high-profile acquisitions over the past few months, including a $2.8 billion buyout of CarrAmerica Realty Corp. in March.

DOJ_NMG_0032102

The Trizec acquisition gives Brookfield -- already one of the largest players in office real estate in North America -- an even bigger profile in the hot markets of Washington and Manhattan, and provides an entry into Los Angeles, another market that has caught fire in the past few quarters.

Included in the deal is the acquisition of Trizec Canada Inc., a mutual fund traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange that has a 38% interest in Trizec Properties. Brookfield will acquire the shares of Trizec Properties and Trizec Canada for a combined cash transaction of $4.8 billion and the assumption of about $4.1 billion in debt -- $29.01 a share for all Trizec Properties common stock not owned by Trizec Canada, and $30.97 a share for the Trizec Canada stock.

The cash for Trizec Properties' stock represents an 18% premium over its closing price of $24.60 Friday on the New York Stock Exchange.

The difference underscores the complaint of many REIT chief executives, including Trizec's Tim Callahan, that Wall Street undervalues their companies. Trizec Properties rose 17%, or $4.08, to $28.68 in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday. Brookfield gained 19 cents to $31.17.

Trizec Chairman Peter Munk, noting that a number of potential buyers prequalified for the deal, said the combination of historically low yields for high-quality property with so much available liquidity made this the perfect time to sell. "To find a number of competing buyers who can show you they have the ability to write a check for $8 billion, that is a very rare circumstance," he said in an interview.

Blackstone has said previously that it has raised about $10 billion to invest in real estate. Brookfield also had cash available. "They've got money burning a hole in their pocket," said John Guinee, managing director of Stifel Nicolaus & Co. of Baltimore. Executives with Brookfield didn't return calls and Blackstone declined to comment.

Jay Rosenberg, co-portfolio manager of Minneapolis-based FAF Advisors, said many private-equity funds raised their money last year when interest rates were lower. "We know there's still a lot of money on the sidelines in terms of private equity," he said.

As part of the joint venture, Brookfield will manage properties in New York, Washington, downtown Los Angeles and Houston. Blackstone will manage properties in west Los Angeles, San Diego and some of the New York City properties. Also, Blackstone "or other parties" are expected to acquire additional properties in Atlanta, Dallas, Los Angeles, San Diego, Chicago, Charlotte, N.C., and Minneapolis, according to Brookfield. Blackstone traditionally sells off weaker performing properties.

Brookfield, a real-estate operating company, already owned 9.6 million square feet of office space in downtown Manhattan. If it keeps One New York Plaza, it will add another 2.5 million. Because that building is already almost fully leased, the acquisition isn't expected to make a significant impact on downtown leasing in the short-term, said Lawrence Tannenbaum, executive director of real-estate services firm Cushman & Wakefield. However, it further entwines Brookfield in the future of downtown Manhattan, for which it has already played a prominent advocacy role.

China's Citic Makes A Play For Canadian Oil (WSJ)

By Shai Oster, Laura Santini And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

Citic Group, a state-owned conglomerate in China, is in talks to buy a closely held Canadian oil company whose main asset is a field in Kazakhstan, according to people familiar with the matter. If completed, the $2.2 billion deal would be China's third-largest overseas oil acquisition.

The talks to buy Nations Energy Co., based in Calgary, Alberta, reflect the continuing efforts of Chinese energy companies to push abroad in their quest for energy. A deal isn't certain, according to one of the people familiar with the matter.

A deal would be China's second-largest acquisition in oil-rich Kazakhstan. Last year, China National Petroleum Corp., China's biggest oil producer by output, beat out Russian rivals to acquire an oil field in Kazakhstan for $4.2 billion and built a pipeline to carry Kazakh crude to China.

In April, Cnooc Ltd., China's biggest offshore oil producer, bought a $2.7 billion stake in an oil field off the coast of Nigeria.

Nations Energy's main asset is the Karazhanbas oil field in Kazakhstan, which pumped 41,000 barrels of oil a day last year, according to the company's Web site. Both Cnooc and CNPC had passed up on buying the company.

China's need for oil is increasing, with its domestic oil fields are producing less as its growing economy and rising middle class have made China the world's second-biggest consumer of oil, after the U.S. China has been a net importer of oil since 1993.

Buying the Kazakh field would be in line with China's policy of locking in oil supplies. Analysts said oil from the field could be brought to China via a pipeline that has already been built to carry crude from an adjacent field bought by CNPC.

DOJ_NMG_0032103

Citic Group, a sprawling concern with interests that include trade and banking, has little experience in managing a project as complicated as the Kazakh field and would probably have to bring in partners.

Listed in Hong Kong, Citic Group was set up in 1979 by former Vice President Rong Yiren to function as the overseas investment arm of the government. It has interests in an oil field in China and is exploring for oil in Chad.

Nations Energy has been trying to sell itself for at least a year. It has proven reserves of 400 million barrels, according to the company's Web site, and has smaller operations in Azerbaijan. The company is owned by Indonesian investors. Production in the Karazhanbas field, discovered in the 1970s, was in decline until Nations Energy bought it in 1997.

Cathay Seeks Control Of Dragonair To Expand Access To China Routes (WSJ)

By Bruce Stanley And Laura Santini

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

HONG KONG -- Cathay Pacific Airways is in talks to acquire a controlling stake in Hong Kong Dragon Airlines, people familiar with the matter said, in a long-anticipated deal that would greatly expand Cathay's access to China's sizzling aviation market and plug the biggest hole in its global network.

A deal for Hong Kong-based Dragonair, as the company is known, could be valued at more than 8 billion Hong Kong dollars (US$1 billion) in cash and stock, according to a person knowledgeable about it. An agreement could be announced within days, but the terms aren't yet clear and the deal could still unravel, said the people familiar with the matter.

Cathay Pacific would purchase the controlling stake from two mainland Chinese companies that together own 71.8% of Dragonair, these people said. It would also purchase a 7.7% stake held by Swire Pacific Ltd., part of the London-based Swire Group and Cathay's largest shareholder. The moves would simplify the complex relationship between the companies. Cathay already owns a 17.8% stake in Dragonair.

Cathay once controlled Dragonair but lost its influence, and relations between them soured. Now, in spite of its home base in Hong Kong, Cathay operates a thin passenger service to just two Chinese cities. While Dragonair flies to 23 destinations in China, more than any other airline based outside the mainland, Cathay has had to watch from the sidelines as many of its toughest foreign competitors have started and expanded their own lucrative networks in China.

A deal would be "an historical event for Cathay Pacific...perhaps the most important corporate event for Cathay for the next five to 10 years," said Michael Wu, an analyst in Hong Kong for Fitch Ratings.

It would have the added significance of establishing much closer links, in the form of cross-shareholdings, between Cathay Pacific and Air China, which could bolster the performance and international standing of the Chinese flag carrier. Cathay Pacific already owns 10% of Air China and provides management support and training for the Beijing-based airline's cabin crew, engineers and other staff.

A person familiar with the talks said that after the deal, Cathay and Air China would each hold less than 20% in the other.

By marrying Dragonair's routes in China with Cathay's profitable long-haul network and by strengthening Cathay's ties with the strongest of China's state-run carriers, the deal could create a new powerhouse in international aviation.

The HK$8 billion price would be worthwhile for Cathay, so long as it gave the airline "meaningful access" to the mainland, said analyst Kevin O'Connor of investment bank CLSA Asia-Pacific Markets.

"The devil really is in the details here," he said, noting that the agreement might stop short of giving Cathay unfettered operational control of Dragonair's flights in China.

Cathay Pacific, Dragonair and Air China declined to comment on the talks, as did a spokeswoman for Swire Pacific. Sara Sze, an official of China National Aviation Co., or CNAC -- which has a 43.3% stake in Dragonair -- said she didn't know of a transaction. Chinese conglomerate Citic Pacific Ltd., which owns 28.5% of Dragonair and 25.4% of Cathay Pacific, didn't respond to requests for comment.

Trading in the shares of the five Hong Kong-listed companies -- Cathay, Air China, Swire Pacific, CNAC and Citic Pacific -- were suspended yesterday after publication of a report on the deal in the Hong Kong newspaper the Standard.

Cathay Pacific controlled Dragonair from 1991-96, when it scaled back its stake in the airline as part of a strategic rearrangement ahead of Britain's handover of political power in Hong Kong to China. Cathay and Dragonair have since become sometimes rancorous competitors on flights to Taiwan and other regional routes, and Cathay has had to make do in China with limited passenger service to Beijing and Xiamen and cargo service to Shanghai.

Cathay tried to widen its footprint in the mainland, first by partnering unsuccessfully with state-run China Eastern Airlines and then, in 2004, with a strategic investment in Air China. Cathay has yet to reap big benefits from its alliance with Air China, which complicated their relations by committing last month to joining the Star airline alliance instead of the oneworld group, to which Cathay belongs.

DOJ_NMG_0032104

Under the new deal, Cathay would buy the stakes that Citic Pacific and CNAC hold in Dragonair, as well as Swire's holding. In return for the loss of mainland control of Dragonair, Air China or possibly CNAC would likely receive a stake in Cathay Pacific, two people with knowledge of the deal said.

Cathay should be able to generate cost savings by integrating Dragonair's back-office departments and management with its own and by using their combined fleets more efficiently, said UBS analyst Damien Horth. Cathay probably has already lined up regulatory approval of the deal from China's aviation authorities, he added.

An official of the Civil Aviation Administration of China said that no matter what shareholding changes might occur, "Dragonair will retain its nature as a Hong Kong carrier," adding as an example, "Cathay is controlled by a British company, but it is a Hong Kong carrier."

ENVIRONMENT:

Avian Flu News Tracker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal Online, June 6, 2006

Monday, June 5

3:55 p.m.: Japan said it will nominate WHO Western Pacific chief Shigeru Omi to succeed the late Lee Jong Wook as head of the U.N. health agency, the AFP news agency reported1. 2

2:05 p.m.: Wall Street Journal Video:3 Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt and Agriculture Secretary Michael Johanns discuss the latest news regarding a person-to-person transmission of the avian flu and what it means.

11:40 a.m.: Skinvisible Pharmaceuticals4 said its new hand sanitizer was 98% effective in deactivating or killing the bird-flu virus on skin for up to four hours during a recent test at a subsidiary of London's Queen Mary School of Medicine. The Las Vegas company developed the hand sanitizer primarily for health-care professionals. The active ingredient is Chlorhexidine.

9:05 a.m.: Less than one-sixth of the $1.9 billion pledged in January by donor countries to prepare developing nations for a flu pandemic has been dispersed, despite calls for a rapid escalation of efforts, the Financial Times reported6 Monday, citing the World Bank. The news of scant fund distribution comes as U.N. bird-flu chief David Nabarro is set to call for additional bird-flu funding, according to the report.

Washington In Brief (WP)

By From News Services

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

USDA Secretary Sets Strategies for Avian Flu

The U.S. Department of Agriculture can tap an emergency fund of about $30 billion to fight an outbreak of lethal flu in poultry, Secretary Mike Johanns said yesterday.

Any colony of birds in which a positive test occurred would be destroyed and the owners would be compensated, Johanns said.

"We would quarantine that flock, and we would humanely destroy those birds," he said. "Our goal would be to eradicate. We don't want to mess around with it."

Johanns said he might use rarely exercised emergency powers to access funds without congressional intervention if a lethal form of the H5N1 avian flu began spreading through domestic U.S. flocks. Health and agriculture officials are concerned that the virus may enter the United States through migratory, smuggled or imported birds and perhaps mutate into a form contagious among people that might set off a lethal worldwide human pandemic.

"You start considering the multitude of opportunities here and it's very important to be prepared," Johanns said.

At least 127 of the 224 people confirmed to have been infected with the H5N1 avian flu have died since 2003, the World Health Organization said May 29. Although the virus has primarily infected people through contact with sick or dead birds, some possible human-to-human transmission has been reported when people have come in close contact with sick, coughing patients.Medicaid to Require Proof of Citizenship

Tens of millions of low-income Americans will soon have to show their birth certificates or U.S. passports if they want to obtain health care through their state Medicaid programs.

The requirement that beneficiaries provide proof of citizenship goes into effect July 1. It's designed to root out cases of illegal immigrants getting their health care paid for by the government.

Health analysts say they fear the provision could prevent some citizens from getting health care.

DOJ_NMG_0032105

Advocacy groups for the homeless and mentally ill have asked the Bush administration to presume that beneficiaries seeking care are eligible for the health insurance program for the poor. Then, they would be given time to get the necessary documents.

"They may not have kept the best records, particularly those with serious mental health disorders," said Kirsten Beronio, senior director of government affairs for the National Mental Health Association. "For them, there needs to be some accommodations made that other types of records could be used."Conferees Seek to Seal Deal on War Funding

Hoping to speed approval of war funds, House-Senate negotiators were to meet this evening on legislation to pay for the missions in Iraq and Afghanistan and for hurricane relief along the Gulf Coast.

After missing a Memorial Day deadline, negotiators hope to seal an agreement this week. The White House says a money crunch is threatening military operations and training accounts, especially for the Army, and could slow training and equipping of Iraqi soldiers.

"It's imperative that Congress finish its work and get this to the president to sign," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman. "This supplemental went up in February. It's now June." He said the Army will impose a civilian hiring freeze Tuesday and has cut spending on spare parts, transportation and travel.

New London Approves Evictions In Eminent Domain Dispute (BOS/AP)

By Stephen Singer, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, June 6, 2006

NEW LONDON, Conn. --City officials voted Monday night to begin eviction proceedings against residents who refuse to leave their riverfront homes, signaling the end may be near in an eminent domain dispute that reached the U.S. Supreme Court.

The City Council approved the action 5-2, authorizing the city attorney to take the necessary steps, including possible court action, to evict the remaining two families and obtain the properties. A lawyer for the families said they are considering continuing their battle with the city.

About 100 people packed the meeting room, a hallway and an adjacent room.

The small city has been trying for a decade to redevelop the once vibrant Fort Trumbull neighborhood along the Thames River. Seven homeowners challenged the city's plans to seize their properties and build a hotel, convention center and upscale condominiums, saying eminent domain can't be used to make way for private development.

But a 5-4 Supreme Court ruling last year upheld the city's right to take the homes. The court, however, said states were free to restrict eminent domain seizures, and many already have. A proposal to change Connecticut's law died in this year's state legislative session.

Since the Supreme Court ruling, all but two families have settled with the city and agreed to leave.

Michael Cristofaro, one of the Fort Trumbull holdouts, spoke out against the property seizures.

"Just give us back our deeds," Cristofaro said. "You are not being straight with us or the public. You are not listening to the general public."

Cristofaro singled out five of the seven council members who favor taking the property.

"You are a disgrace to the city, the state and the nation," he said.

One Fort Trumbull resident, William Von Winkle, agreed to a settlement with the city Monday, just minutes before the City Council meeting began, The Day of New London reported. The terms were not disclosed.

Scott Bullock, a lawyer for the Arlington, Va.-based Institute for Justice who represents the residents, said the homeowners can still fight the city. He said they'll be considering appeals to state government to ask that state funding for the development be pulled. He said they also may engage in civil disobedience.

"This is a civil rights struggle to save poor and working class people from eminent domain abuse," he said.

City Councilor Robert Perro supported the effort to remove the families. He said the issue has been through state agencies and three courts.

"This was a plan that was well thought out," he said. "The development of this peninsula needs to move forward."

But Charles Frink, one of the two councilors who opposed seizing the properties, criticized supporters, saying they should admit they made a mistake.

"I can't accept a possible reduction in taxes by having neighbors thrown out of their property," he said. "This is morally abhorrent to me. I refuse to profit from my neighbor's pain."

Gov. M. Jodi Rell had proposed letting the holdouts remain in their homes but giving the city the right of first refusal if the houses ever were sold.

New London Mayor Elizabeth Sabilia predicted before the meeting that Rell's proposal would not be approved.

"The balance of councilors are staying the course," said Sabilia, who also votes on the council.

DOJ_NMG_0032106

The vote came five days after a deadline for settlements to be reached with the remaining property owners.

One local resident who spoke Monday night, Donald Harrington, was against Rell's plan.

"What right has she got to tell the city of New London what to do?" he asked.

The eviction process, which may include another court fight, could take a month to three months. But that's negligible in a land dispute that has been up and down the court system over several years.

"You know how some things take on a life of their own?" Sabilia said. "This thing is like a cat. It's taken on nine lives."

Bullock said he didn't think the city wants the publicity that will come with razing the homes.

"It would be a disaster, evicting Susette Kelo from that pink house that nearly everybody in the nation recognizes by now, when you've got a proposal from the governor on the table," he said.

Kelo, a 49-year-old nurse who bought her home in 1997, became the lead plaintiff in the court battle and has refused to sell, as has Cristofaro.

Debate Over Wind Power Creates Environmental Rift (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

OAKLAND, Md. — Dan Boone has no doubt that his crusade against wind energy is the right way to protect the Allegheny highlands he loves. Let other environmentalists call him deluded at best, traitorous at worst. He remains undeterred.

For four years or more, Mr. Boone has traveled across the mid-Atlantic to make every argument he can muster against local wind-power projects: they kill birds and bats; they are too noisy; they are inefficient, making no more than a symbolic contribution to energy needs.

Wind farms on the empty prairies of North Dakota? Fine. But not, Mr. Boone insists, in the mountainous terrain of southwestern Pennsylvania, western Maryland or West Virginia, areas where 15 new projects have been proposed. If all were built, 750 to 1,000 giant turbines would line the hilltops, most producing, on average, enough electricity to power 600 homes.

Wind projects are in the midst of a huge growth spurt in many parts of the country, driven by government incentives to promote alternatives to fossil fuels. But Mr. Boone, who wields a botanist's trowel and a debater's knife with equal ease, wants to slow them down with community activism, regulatory action and legal challenges.

His crusade harks back to the campaigns against nuclear power plants, toxic-waste dumps and dams on scenic rivers that were building blocks of the modern environmental movement. But the times, and the climate, are changing. With fears of global warming growing more acute, Mr. Boone and many other local activists are finding themselves increasingly out of step with the priorities of the broader movement.

National groups like Greenpeace and the Sierra Club used to uniting against specific projects are now united for renewable energy in general. And they are particularly high on wind power — with the caveat that a few, but only a few, special places should be turbine-free.

"The broader environmental movement knows we have this urgent need for renewable energy to avert global warming," said John Passacantando, executive director of Greenpeace U.S.A. "But we're still dealing with groups that can't get their heads around global warming yet."

Indeed, the best winds, especially in the East, tend to blow in places that are also ideal for hiking, sailing, second homes and spirit-soothing views. These include the Green Mountains, the Adirondacks, the Chesapeake Bay, Cape Cod and the ridges of northern Appalachia. Local opposition to unwanted development remains a potent force.

So when it comes to wind, the environmental movement is riven with dissonance and accusations of elitism. Robert F. Kennedy Jr.'s very public opposition to the 130-turbine Cape Wind energy facility proposed off Nantucket Sound has driven a wedge between activists. Dan Boone's circuit riding against wind projects, while not attracting the same celebrity notice, has exasperated many Sierra Club compatriots even more.

Like Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Boone says the areas he wants to protect are uniquely vulnerable. His family owns property near the proposed projects, just as Mr. Kennedy's does near the Cape Wind site.

But Mr. Boone says that wind supporters are the ones pursuing their own agenda at the expense of the public interest.

"I'm not sure that wind turbines in this region will significantly reduce the outcome of global climate change or actually have any role," Mr. Boone said. "The very limited benefit doesn't justify the risk of wiping out a lot of interior forest habitat."

National environmental leaders reject this argument.

"There's no free lunch," said Paul Hansen, executive director of the Izaak Walton League of America, a venerable sportsmen's group. " 'Not in my backyard' is not environmentalism."

The Alleghenies are a big backyard, with views that are both spectacular and problematic. Flowering shrubs like shadbush and preening flowers like trillium are framed by oaks, maples and longleaf pines. But intermittent industrial tree farming has repeatedly denuded some mountainsides. On both sides of the border near here in far western Maryland, second-home development is booming. The air has often been fouled by the Mount Storm coal-fired power plant.

DOJ_NMG_0032107

If Ned Power, a wind-energy development company, puts up 100 or so turbines along 14 miles of ridgeline near Mount Storm, wind-energy supporters say, how much does that further spoil the landscape?

Kevin Rackstraw, a regional manager of Clipper Windpower whose proposed 40-turbine project in western Maryland has drawn Mr. Boone's fire, said opponents lacked perspective.

"Dan looks at all the impacts of a given wind project," Mr. Rackstraw said, "but doesn't say: 'If we didn't have wind, what would we have?' Coal. Think of the impact of acid rain and mountaintop removal."

The Ned Power project is just one target of Mr. Boone, 49, a former state wildlife biologist who now works as a consultant. In interviews, he said he first focused on the issue when working as a botanist on a study related to an early wind power project. The environmental-impact statements, he said, were grossly inadequate.

Now he drives from Highland County in western Virginia (where 38 turbines are proposed on Tamarack Ridge) to Bedford, Pa. (where early discussions of an unnamed project are under way) to talk to local groups or crystallize their objections for them. In Annapolis, Md., and Charleston, W.Va., he uses state utility regulators' licensing hearings to throw up roadblocks before wind projects. He is eager to argue with industry officials in any venue, questioning their facts, assumptions and motives.

"The rush is on now because a lot of the places they've targeted have no zoning, and it's easy to get in that kind of large-scale development," he said. "This part of the country has really good energy prices. Developers are keying in on that."

Mr. Boone's quiver of anti-wind arguments includes economic analyses, but his first line of attack is biological: he contends that they are a threat to bats and potentially to migratory birds and that they break up forest habitat.

Scores of raptors and other birds were killed by the first generation of wind turbines set up at Altamont Pass in Northern California. Since the Altamont Pass turbines were erected in the early 1980's, turbine design has been altered, and most subsequent studies have shown that birds tend to fly above the height of most turbines though some experts say more studies are needed.

But the turbines south of here in Thomas, W.Va., have been lethal to bats. More than 2,000 were killed in 2003 at the Mountaineer project, whose 44 turbines are owned by FPL Energy, a big power company that is the wind industry's dominant player.

Industry officials agree that the bat mortality measured at the Mountaineer site is unacceptable, and they are studying the benefits of deterrent devices and the best ways to modify turbine operations in bat-rich areas.

To Mr. Boone, wind energy will never make a big enough difference to justify its impact in the region. "You have to remember that these tax advantages are so huge," he said, "that these developers are keen to latch onto all the mythology — whether it's global warming or something else."

Asked if he thought global warming was a myth, he said: "No, I'm not calling it mythology." But industry officials, he contended, will "take things out of context."

Mike Tidwell, the director of Chesapeake Climate Action Network and one of Mr. Boone's adversaries, bristles at the attack. "Wind industry guys are the straightest-shooting people," Mr. Tidwell said. "Most got into it because they had an environmental ethic."

But Mr. Boone has plenty of allies, too. "He's the greatest naturalist I've even known," said Betsy Johnson, chairwoman of the Maryland chapter of the Sierra Club. "Dan has been very helpful in educating us with what problems there can be with an energy source like wind."

The industry Mr. Boone regards so suspiciously is on a roll. The total share of energy that wind farms generated nationwide in 2004 was tiny — about one-third of 1 percent, according to the Energy Department. But by 2020, according to industry estimates, wind's share of the county's energy portfolio could grow ten- or twentyfold.

For the environmental movement, wind supporters say, the transition from the protection of place to the protection of planet is bound to be wrenching.

"Wilderness conversations are spiritual," said David Hamilton, the Sierra Club's national director of global warming and energy programs. "We've always been a place-based organization, protecting places," but "protecting our climate" is "just looking at it from a different angle and a different elevation."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

You Trust This Guy? (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

It appears there may be an even more bizarre genesis to the FBI's already unusual attempt to seize the papers of the late journalist Jack Anderson, who was 83 when he died in December. The Senate Judiciary Committee is set to hear about the allegedly sordid past of a former Anderson reporter who tipped off the FBI when it convenes this morning to hold a hearing on the controversy.

According to a Senate Judiciary Committee source, a witness will testify that the entire Anderson investigation was triggered by a tip from a man convicted and imprisoned for sodomizing a young boy and who allegedly admitted to having a history of mental illness.

The witness who will make these charges is Mark Feldstein, a journalism professor at George Washington University, where the Anderson papers are stored.

Feldstein is working on a book titled "Poisoning the Press: Richard Nixon, Jack Anderson and the Rise of Washington's Scandal Culture," which is due out next year. So the FBI went to him to seek Anderson's papers.

The FBI reportedly said it wanted Anderson's files, going back as far as the early 1980s, as part of its criminal probe of two former lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee who are accused of violating espionage laws. The FBI came knocking even though, as The Chicago Tribune noted in an editorial last month, Anderson "had been ill with Parkinson's disease since 1986."

Don Goldberg, a veteran spinmeister for the Clinton administration who is now a managing director for Qorvis Communications, says he and other former Anderson associates find the FBI's attempt to seize Anderson's papers "outrageous."

For one, Goldberg said, Anderson had not been an active journalist for at least 15 years before his death. More importantly, he said, "the First Amendment ability of journalists to protect their confidential sources regarding legitimate issues relating to how our government works is sacred. It doesn't evaporate when a journalist dies. This is nothing more than an attempt to intimidate reporters by threatening them even in death."

Several close-knit Andersonites plan to attend today's hearing. One of them, author James Grady, whose spy novel "Six Days of the Condor" was made into the '70s suspense classic "Three Days of the Condor," has a notion to corral the Anderson gang to sing the "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the start of the session.

"I think that would be appropriate to remind people where they are," he said.

Speaking of Investigative Reporters ... Robert Redford's trip to the nation's capital next week has nothing to do with Deep Throat.

The liberal group Campaign for America's Future has snagged the one-time star of "All the President's Men" (and, as it happens, the aforementioned "Three Days of the Condor") to add a little Hollywood gleam to its "Take Back America" conference.

Toby Chaudhuri, the group's spokesman, wrote in an e-mail that Redford, who is 69, will join Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and other activists to officially launch the group's Apollo Challenge to urge the White House and Congress to "kick our nation's oil habit." The conference starts June 12 at the Washington Hilton.

Attendees will also hear from Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), John Kerry (D-Mass.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

Be Cool. Hey, softball players, keep those beers down if your team is playing down on the Mall this week. Police are out in full force in light of three recent muggings and one sexual assault.

Last week, a police officer issued a verbal warning to a couple of members of the Shays Lounge and the Swinging Johnsons — the softball team of Reps. Christopher Shays and Nancy Johnson, both Connecticut Republicans — before the start of their game last Wednesday against the Hoosier Daddys.

The two teams were warming up, and some of their players were swilling brewskis, when police on bicycle, horseback and motorcycle showed up. "I was wondering when they were going to bring in Scotland Yard," one eyewitness said dryly.

The informant said he thought some members of the Shays-Johnson team were issued a warning, but not an official ticket. He was right. Sarah Moore, a spokeswoman for Rep. Shays, says an officer simply asked them to put the beer away and gave them "a verbal warning."

Drug Czar Announces Bad Heroin Supply Bust (AP)

By Carla K. Johnson

AP, June 5, 2006

CHICAGO -- U.S. agents, working in cooperation with the Mexican government, have closed down a lab in Mexico that might be the main source of a powerful painkiller that has killed at least 100 heroin users in eight states, the federal drug czar said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0032109

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said it's still not clear whether the painkiller, fentanyl, was mixed with heroin at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the United States.

"There may be more than one source," Walters said. "We think this is the principal source."

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is testing samples of fentanyl seized in a May 28 raid of a suspected fentanyl-manufacturing operation near Guadalajara but has not yet confirmed that the drug is linked to the U.S. deaths, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said.

"We hope to have a break in the case, but we're not sure this is it," Robertson said.

Five Mexican citizens were arrested during the May bust, including one Walters described as the chemist.

Walters said that the dealers may have started using fentanyl because they were looking for a competitive advantage on the street, but that inept mixing _ or cutting _ of the drug combination made it deadly.

He also warned that millions of deadly doses of the fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on the streets. Fentanyl-laced cocaine had turned up in some cities, as well, he said.

Deaths caused by fentanyl-laced drugs have occurred in Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, Walters said.

Doctors prescribe fentanyl as a painkiller for cancer patients and others in chronic pain. It's about 80 times more potent than morphine.

The drug is also many times stronger than heroin. An overdose can slow breathing to the point of death.

Lethal Drug Likely Came To Area From Mexican Lab (AP)

By Carla K. Johnson, Of The Associated Press

AP, June 6, 2006

Authorities believe raid hit source of pain-killer used in deadly heroin

CHICAGO - U.S. and Mexican authorities have closed a Mexican lab that might have been the main source of a powerful pain-killer that has killed heroin users in the Harrisburg and Philadelphia areas and six other states.

Those authorities also warned yesterday that millions of deadly doses of fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on America's streets.

The mixture has caused at least 100 confirmed deaths from Philadelphia to Chicago in recent months. The Harrisburg area had two deaths and at least 20 overdoses from heroin cut with fentanyl in April, authorities said.

The lethal mix was sold locally in packages marked "Apollo" and was sought by users looking for powerful highs, authorities said.

Deaths caused by fentanyl-laced drugs have also occurred in Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Fentanyl, medical authorities said, is prescribed for cancer patients and others in extreme pain. The drug is considered 80 times more powerful than morphine. An overdose can cause a suffocating feeling similar to an asthma attack, slowing breathing to the point of death.

Organizations that run needle exchanges and other health programs for drug users are trying to spread the word. "Is your friend turning blue?" reads one flier that describes what to do in an emergency.

But to some drug users, seeking a more powerful high, the warnings become an advertisement.

In the Detroit area -- the apparent hub of the problem with more than 100 confirmed cases since last fall -- officials from the national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention were investigating, and community organizations were still scrambling at the end of May to get the word out to users.

Walters said it was not clear yesterday whether the fentanyl was mixed with heroin at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the United States. Fentanyl-laced cocaine also has turned up in some cities, he said.

He warned that fentanyl might be coming from other sources as well.

"There may be more than one source," Walters said. "We think this is the principal source."

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is testing samples of fentanyl seized in the raid near the western city of Guadalajara, but it does not yet have confirmation that the drug is linked to the U.S. deaths, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said.

"We hope to have a break in the case, but we're not sure this is it," Robertson said. "This is an ongoing investigation, and we're working very closely with local authorities."

Five men, all Mexican citizens, were arrested in the May 28 raid, Robertson said. Walters described one of them as "the chemist."

DOJ_NMG_0032110

"Through standard detective work we're looking to make ties into what's going on up here" in the United States, Robertson said.

Walters said the fentanyl-laced heroin might have been used by dealers looking for a competitive advantage on the street, but inept mixing -- or cutting -- of the drug into heroin made it deadly.

The DEA plans to gather police officers and drug enforcement agents for a national meeting on the fentanyl problem June 14-15 in Chicago, Robertson said.

Staff writer Tom Bowman contributed to this report.

Major Bust In Bad Heroin Supply (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Tonya Maxwell, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 5, 2006

A clandestine laboratory in Mexico capable of producing millions of doses of the potent, sometimes lethal, drug fentanyl has been shut down, the U.S. drug czar announced Monday in Chicago, but not before it may have contaminated supplies of street drugs here and across the country.

Heroin mixed with the powerful painkiller has been blamed for hundreds of deaths across the U.S. in the last year, including at least 60 in Chicago. The synthetic narcotic is being added to heroin to give a more powerful high to users, authorities have said. Some users have sought the combination and others may not have known what they were buying.

Just over the weekend in Cook County, there were 13 fatal overdoses that now are being investigated for connections to fentanyl, the county's chief medical examiner said Monday.

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said it is too soon to know if the Mexican lab was the biggest source of the illicit drug, which has killed people in eight states.

But authorities believe it may have been running long enough to push a major amount of fentanyl, used legally for pain management, into the illegal drug market, he said.

"In effect, to be quite clear, the drug traffickers have substantially poisoned the drug supply in the United States," Walters said.

"These are already dangerous substances, but obviously we're now seeing in more places the effects of this incredibly powerful drug in levels that are causing deaths."

The U.S. Embassy in Mexico City reported the lab was located May 21 by Mexican authorities in Toluca, north of the capital. The Mexican attorney general's office reported authorities found a climate-controlled room in the company's space in an industrial park, with tools and precursor chemicals used in the making of the drug.

Federal investigators said five Mexican nationals were arrested, including a man acting as the chemist for the group.

Investigators are working to determine how much fentanyl could have been made at the production site before it was discovered. And agents are seeking records on the site that might provide clues as to its production capacity and distribution channels, they said.

Deaths have been reported in Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Missouri, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland.

Testing is under way to find a common chemical signature in samples from those states that might link them to the Mexican lab, Walters said, confirming the fears of some that crime networks will move heavily into fentanyl production.

Investigators said they are working to determine if Chicago street gangs are moving the drug locally. Walters said no clear national picture had emerged that would explain which criminal networks are transporting fentanyl around the country.

Cook County Medical Examiner Edmund Donoghue said blood from 13 victims of fatal overdoses in the county over the weekend would be tested for fentanyl. The drug is among the most powerful illicit substances seen on Chicago's streets, he said. The narcotic, originally produced as a surgical anesthetic, shuts down the respiratory system, he said.

Among those suspected of overdosing over the weekend was Herman Elmore, 31, who died at the home of a family he was staying with in the 7400 block of South Morgan Street.

Vicky Love, who described herself as Elmore's godmother, said he was in and out of the house early Sunday, and then came in and said he was sleepy at about 3 p.m.

"I told him to sit down and take a nap," Love said. Several hours later children in the house tried to wake Elmore from a chair, but he was not breathing.

Donoghue said it would take weeks for testing to determine whether fentanyl was in Elmore's system. Love said she did not know Elmore to be a drug user, and said she doesn't know why anyone would try heroin now.

"They know [fentanyl] is out there, so why go out here and purchase it when it's all over the news?" she said.

Eddy Borrayo, director of substance-abuse services at the Pilsen-Little Village Mental Health Center, said many addicts do look for fentanyl-laced heroin.

DOJ_NMG_0032111

"If someone is getting a good high, such as with fentanyl, then addicts will go out and say, 'Where can I get some?'" he said. "That's what keeps them going. They're trying to find something else that gives them their first high.

"The potency is the issue," he said. "If a dope dealer says, 'I've got the good stuff,' that means it'll knock [the addict] out. It might make the addict feel tranquil and go to sleep. That's what they want. It's a pseudo-suicide, if you want to call it that."

Garrison Courtney, spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Washington, said there could be a number of illegal sources for the drug, including other laboratories. Some of it has been stolen from medical facilities where it is often used in a patch for cancer patients and others with severe pain, Courtney said.

On June 14, Chicago police and the Drug Enforcement Administration in Chicago will meet with law enforcement representatives from other states in hopes of finding patterns in how the drug is distributed.

Drug czar Walters said fentanyl also would become a focus of his office's new U.S. Synthetic Drug Control Strategy, which will target precursor materials entering the country.

Walters, speaking after a news conference in Chicago that introduced a new ad campaign to keep Hispanics from experimenting with crystal methamphetamine, said for now he could only urge users not to go looking for fentanyl.

At a treatment clinic in the mental health center, Borrayo said he was not optimistic most addicts would listen to official pleas to stay away from fentanyl. In his experience, he said, dealers will often give out free samples of a new mixture to see if they have a winning formula, and users will be in line waiting for it.

"The [dealers] will try to test it out to see if it's that good," he said. "Then they'll increase their price."

Tribune staff reporter Hugh Dellios contributed to this report.

Effects Of Fentanyl (CHIT)

By Judith Graham, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 5, 2006

Fentanyl is an extraordinarily effective drug when it comes to pain relief. But abuse it and the chance of deadly complications is high.

A synthetic medication, fentanyl belongs to a class of drugs known as opioids. Others in the class include morphine, heroin, methadone, hydrocodone (Vicodin) and oxycodone (OxyContin).

Opioids work by binding to parts of nerves responsible for perceiving and transmitting pain. These opioid receptors are found primarily in a person's brain and spinal column.

For people in distress, relief can come in a matter of seconds after a fentanyl injection. For others, a feeling of euphoria is common, said Dr. Allen Burton, an associate professor of pain medicine at M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston.

Potency is fentanyl's hallmark: It is between 80 to 100 times more powerful than morphine.

Whereas heroin and morphine are dosed in milligrams, fentanyl is dosed in micrograms—one 100th of a milligram, said Linda Bressler, a clinical associate professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago's College of Pharmacy.

Underscoring the need for caution, fentanyl has a narrower "therapeutic window"—the difference between a safe dose and a dangerous dose—than other opioids. "Overshoot the dose by just a little bit, and you can go from euphoric to unconscious or dead pretty easily," Burton said.

The greatest danger comes from fentanyl's potential to depress the central nervous system and cause breathing to shut down if it is taken in excess.

Signs of an overdose include "trouble breathing or shallow breathing, extreme sleepiness or sedation, an inability to walk or talk normally, and feeling faint, dizzy and confused," according to a recent publication from the Food and Drug Administration.

Heroin users may put themselves at extreme risk with fentanyl because doses are so different and because the drugs compound each other's effects, said Dr. Bruce Goldberger, director of toxicology at the University of Florida's College of Medicine.

Fentanyl has two legitimate purposes. In hospitals and other medical settings, anesthesiologists give it intravenously to patients undergoing surgery. The drug is also available in a skin patch or lozenge for people with severe chronic pain, such as cancer patients and patients with degenerative neurological disorders.

Recently, reports from around the country indicate growing abuse of the Duragesic skin patch and an increasing number of deaths from overdoses. Users are putting on multiple patches or stripping out the drug and injecting, drinking, eating or smoking it, Goldberger said.

Heroin Users Warned About Deadly Additive (WP)

By Peter Slevin And Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, June 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032112

CHICAGO -- The largest clue that something had changed in Chicago's vibrant heroin market came in February, when police found a dozen users sprawled unconscious in one place. One day in April, there were dozens more.

Toxicologists at the Cook County morgue discovered fentanyl, a powerful painkiller many times stronger than morphine, in the bodies of addicts who died. A small amount of fentanyl in a dose of heroin adds a pop that many users have come to crave.

"It's a new phenomenon. It's the latest high," said Chicago police spokeswoman Monique Bond, "but it's deadly. "

Since February, coroners have recorded 55 fentanyl-related deaths in Cook County, with 45 more cases suspected. Some were unsuspecting users taking pure fentanyl; others were users taking a mixture. Scores overdosed but recovered -- and not all regretted using it.

"There's this consumer arc. At first there's fear, but then when the fear is over, it's like: Hey, that's good stuff," said Greg Scott, a DePaul University sociologist who conducts government-funded research on injected drugs. "Most so-called street addicts can't afford more than what they're already doing, so fentanyl gives you that little extra bump. People are scouting for it."

Authorities have spotted the practice in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and it appears most serious in Detroit, where authorities suspect that more than 175 people have died in recent months from fentanyl-related overdoses. The national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is investigating. Federal and local authorities are convening a workshop in Chicago next week to learn more.

"It's baptism by fire here," Scott said.

The Chicago Recovery Alliance runs a weekly needle exchange and barbecue in a bus parking lot in Cicero, just outside city boundaries. At recent sessions, the organization has been warning users about the dangers and teaching them how to distinguish the mint green-tinged fentanyl-laced heroin from the typical Chicago drug, which tends to be yellowish or dusty brown.

"We tell them: If it's green, you shouldn't use it," said Cheryl Hull, the group's deputy director of operations, who reported that at least seven clients have died. Staffers have been urging users to be far more vigilant and to get high in twos or threes, never alone.

Cathy Piotrowski, who showed up for last week's barbecue, said she has overdosed four times on a fentanyl-heroin mix.

"You do it, then bam, you're just right out. You don't remember anything," said Piotrowski, 42, who reported taking three hits of heroin a day. "I'm warning people about it, saying this stuff is going around, so be careful."

Despite the obvious dangers, the quest for a bigger and better high is driving users to find the more potent fentanyl-heroin blend. Universal laws of marketing and sales are similarly driving the pushers to supply it, authorities said. Even the police unwittingly contributed to the phenomenon.

"The dealers were passing out free samples to attract users," police spokeswoman Bond said. "The police department was trying to be proactive by alerting the public about the bad heroin, but we were providing free marketing, basically providing a road map."

Scott, the DePaul sociologist, said four of the five heroin-dealing crews he is tracking are now selling the drug laced with fentanyl. They sell more dope in what is a competitive market, he said, and make more money. The users, especially those who can afford only a limited amount of heroin even as their tolerance grows through habitual use, see a way to get higher.

"For the same amount of money, you can get a product that's, let's say, 10 times more potent," Scott said.

Frankie is a 43-year-old homeless man who did not want to give his last name. He said he overdosed late last month on fentanyl-laced heroin he got for free on Chicago's Southwest Side. Police took him to the hospital. A former amateur boxer, he likened the effect to being slugged in the head and knocked out.

To him, the freebies did not make much sense.

"They were handing it out," he said, "but why kill your new customers?"

Deadly Mix Entices Drug Users (DN)

Detroit News, June 6, 2006

It's sold on the street as "Suicide," and if the name doesn't signal the risk, fears that it may have caused as many as 58 overdose deaths in Wayne County since May 18 should.

But a rise in deaths linked to heroin spiked with the painkiller fentanyl hasn't deterred some hardcore addicts from seeking the drug with the deadly nickname. Desperate for a high that gets elusive with time, a dedicated batch of users is turning to the cocktail whose effects can last all day.

Addicts told The Detroit News they're trying Suicide because they think they can manage the drug and avoid overdoses that have killed more than 130 users in Wayne County since January 2005. The News verified the identities of users, but agreed not to publish their last names.

DOJ_NMG_0032113

"This is the biggest advertisement ever for the dope man: A drug that gets you so (messed) up, you die," said Susan, a Bloomfield Hills woman who has used heroin on and off for 18 years but has been clean for a month.

That newfound high could soon end, however. Federal investigators announced Monday they may have found the source for the drugs last month during a raid that closed an underground lab in Mexico.

U.S. and Mexican authorities arrested five people for manufacturing a knockoff of the drug that's prescribed to cancer patients and described as 50 times stronger than morphine. Chemical tests will determine if the lab was the source of drugs sold as "Suicide" in Detroit and several Midwestern cities.

"There may be more than one source," said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy. "We think this is the principal source."

Authorities would not comment Monday on their evidence, however, and a Drug Enforcement Administration spokesman in Chicago, Chris Hoyt, said agents "are not ready to say the lab discovered in Mexico is directly related to what's happening here."

"The raid in Mexico is good news, but it does nothing for the lethal drug supply on our streets right now," said Robert Ficano, Wayne County executive and former sheriff. "We don't know how much of this mix is out there, and we don't know how many fentanyl sources there are."

Despite the warnings, many users have come to view Suicide as a drug they can use occasionally, said Patti, a decade-long user from Detroit.

Unlike heroin, addicts don't need to use five or more times a day while they're on fentanyl and don't need a fix as soon as they wake up.

"A lot of people are trying to get their hands on it," she said. "Some people are afraid, but most want to get as high again. … The heroin around here hasn't been great lately. It's been hit or miss. This is different. The first time I used it, I didn't know what it was. I got high. It was strong."

Part of the appeal is that longtime addicts no longer get high. Instead, heroin merely curbs nausea, tremors, diarrhea and other withdrawal symptoms, said Dr. Mark Greenwald, a Wayne State University psychiatry professor who conducts studies on addicts.

"This is used a lot by drug dealers as a kind of marketing," said Garrison Courtney, a DEA spokesman. "They give it an artificial purity. Then people see a few overdose deaths, and they're going to flock to the area to get that brand."

Some do so with deadly consequences.

Two weeks ago, Patti said she revived a friend who overdosed on fentanyl and heroin. The woman passed out immediately after injecting. Friends poured ice water on her head, then ice cubes.

She began to turn blue. Desperate, after 15 minutes of failures, Patti said she blew smoke from crack cocaine on her friend and she came to.

Patti said she still uses fentanyl.

"Everyone thinks they can take it," she said. "They're not going to be the ones who are going to go out on it (and die.) I don't think anyone is changing their habits."

The anecdotes seem to confirm the worst fears of drug counselors who worried the spate of publicity about the overdoses would increase demand. Public health officials in Wayne County have dispatched drug treatment workers and even recovering addicts into some of the city's drug-plagued neighborhoods to warn users.

"I don't see a lot of people who are nervous about this (outbreak,)" said Shirlie Arrington, a program supervisor at New Light Recovery Center methadone clinic in Detroit. "When you're doing drugs, you don't know what you're doing until you get it."

That's the fear of Dominic, a 46-year-old mechanic from Eastpointe, who started using heroin again last year in part because traditional painkillers didn't ease ongoing back problems.

Dominic said he's in such pain from withdrawal that "sometimes I just want to die" but still worries about accidentally taking fentanyl. "I don't know if someone's out to kill you," he said. "I care in that perspective, but I still do (heroin)."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

The Drug War: 'The Best High They've Ever Had' (NSWK)

Newsweek, June 12, 2006

June 12, 2006 issue - Street users call it drop dead, executioner, flat-liner, the exorcist, Al Capone, fefe, Teflon and diesel. Cops know it as a deadly mix of heroin and fentanyl, an anesthetic and painkiller far more potent than morphine. For cancer patients racked with pain, legally prescribed fentanyl can be a godsend. But for junkies, the fentanyl-heroin cocktail has become the hot new high, as lethal as it is alluring. It is being blamed for hundreds of deaths this year in big cities in the Midwest and Northeast. In Wayne County, Mich., home to Detroit, there have been 50 deaths in just the past two weeks, including 19 in one deadly day in May.

DOJ_NMG_0032114

The problem is that cops don't know who is spreading the killer junk on the streets. It might be just one big bad batch that's been widely distributed, or it could be coming from multiple sources, say law-enforcement officials, who first began noticing a spike in fentanyl-heroin overdoses in November. One promising new lead came from the arrest of five people at an underground fentanyl lab in Mexico. "We're working to see if there's a connection, if that lab was the source," says DEA spokeswoman Rogene Waite. Federal and local police are meeting in Chicago this month to compare notes and come up with a cohesive strategy to combat the growing crisis.

Dealers are not intentionally killing their customers. Instead, it appears that in their zeal to get the new product on the street, dealers haven't perfected the recipe. Users say the blend, when snorted, injected or smoked, gives them an instant feeling of extreme euphoria. After 11 people died from the drug in one day in Chicago last month, police issued a public warning. Instead of being scared off, "people flocked to the area looking for the drug," says police spokeswoman Monique Bond. "They say," says Frank Limon, a top Chicago cop, "that it's the best high they've ever had." And the deadliest.

Suspect Shot By Police Dies From Wounds (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, June 5, 2006

A man believed to be peddling a potentially deadly heroin-fentanyl combination, who was shot in a confrontation with police in University City, has died from his wounds, officials said Monday.

Maurice A. Adkins, 27, of the 1200 block of Partridge Avenue in University City, died about 10 p.m. Sunday at Barnes-Jewish Hospital.

Meanwhile, U.S. drug czar John Walters said Monday that federal agents, working in cooperation with the Mexican government, closed a lab in Mexico that could be the main source of the fentanyl that has killed heroin users in eight states, including Missouri and Illinois.

Walters, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said it's still not clear whether the fentanyl was mixed with heroin at the lab or after it entered the U.S.

Officials suspect that 20 or more deaths in the St. Louis area are linked to the potent drug combination. Federal officials say there are at least 100 confirmed deaths nationally.

There was no link indicated between Adkins and any of the overdose deaths.

He was shot by two officers about 6 p.m. Thursday following an alleged drug deal in the 7000 block of Raymond Avenue. Police said that Adkins, when told he was under arrest, started to drive off and that an officer's leg got pinned between the open door and door jamb of Adkins' van.

That officer, of the Webster Groves Police Department, was not seriously injured.

Adkins had become a priority of the St. Louis County Multi-Jurisdictional Drug Task Force, officials said, after police heard he was selling heroin-fentanyl mix.

Before he died, Adkins was charged with first-degree assault on a law enforcement officer, possession of a controlled substance and delivering a controlled substance. Police said they found heroin-fentanyl mix in his van.

Walters, the federal drug official, said fentanyl-laced cocaine also has turned up in some cities, and he warned drug users that millions of deadly doses of the fentanyl-heroin combination might still be on the streets.

"There may be more than one source," Walters said in announcing the raid May 28 near Guadalajara. "We think this is the principal source." Lab tests were pending on whether the Mexican drug can be linked to the American deaths. In addition to Missouri, fatalities have been reported in Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, Walters said.

Walters made the announcement in Chicago, where he was to release a series of anti-methamphetamine advertisements in Spanish and English.

Doctors prescribe fentanyl, a powerful narcotic, as a painkiller for cancer patients and others in chronic pain. Walters said the fentanyl-laced heroin might have been used by dealers looking for a competitive advantage on the street, but inept mixing - or cutting - of the drug into heroin made it deadly. Federal and state officials plan to confer on the problem next week in Chicago.

Lethal Form Of Heroin Takes Steep Toll Here (PPG)

By Jonathan D. Silver, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 6, 2006

Three deaths, 35 overdoses are blamed on the lethal form of drug plaguing the city. And the mixture has caused at least 100 deaths from Philadelphia to Chicago

City police detectives were working overtime to scoop up drug dealers and lean on users for information as a lethal batch of heroin snaked its way through city neighborhoods and beyond, causing at least 35 overdoses and as many as three deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0032115

The heroin, which has cropped up in at least eight Pittsburgh neighborhoods since Saturday, is likely laced with the potent painkiller fentanyl, about 80 times stronger than morphine.

As authorities tried to make a dent locally in the heroin trade, the federal government announced yesterday that it had worked with Mexico to close a lab across the border that might be the source of the fentanyl that has killed heroin users in Pennsylvania and seven other states.

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said it was still not clear whether the fentanyl was mixed with heroin at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the United States.

Mr. Walters, speaking to reporters in Chicago yesterday, warned drug users that millions of deadly doses of fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on the streets. The mixture has caused at least 100 confirmed deaths from Philadelphia to Chicago in recent months. Fentanyl might also be coming from other sources, he said.

"There may be more than one source," Mr. Walters said. "We think this is the principal source."

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is testing samples of fentanyl seized in a May 28 raid of a suspected fentanyl manufacturing operation near the western Mexico city of Guadalajara but does not yet have confirmation that the drug is linked to the U.S. deaths, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said.

City police said they have arrested five people since the outbreak began Saturday, but they declined to release any details, saying that the investigation was ongoing.

Pittsburgh police Cmdr. Thomas Stangrecki cautioned that even if officers bust the source of the bad heroin that has flooded Pittsburgh, it will take time for the batch on the streets to dwindle and finally disappear. It is not known how much of the heroin came into Pittsburgh or how it was divvied up among dealers.

"We're going to see it for a while until the supply is diminished," Cmdr. Stangrecki said yesterday during a news conference. "It's going to take more than one arrest to stop this."

Overdoses believed to be connected to the heroin, which has been found in small packets called stamp bags marked "Get High or Die Trying," have occurred in Beechview, Greenfield, Hazelwood, the Hill District, Lincoln Place, the North Side, the South Side and Squirrel Hill.

Other name brands are thought to be involved, but police have been unable to confirm that, Cmdr. Stangrecki said.

The heroin also has shown up in Bethel Park, Brentwood, Tarentum and West Mifflin. It sells for $10 to $15 a packet. Users range from 16 to 56 years old, cross socioeconomic lines, and are white. Most are men.

West Mifflin Police Chief Joseph Popovich said his department's encounter with the drug happened Sunday around 4:15 p.m. A man in his 30s who had taken heroin was found turning blue in a car parked on Lebanon Road near Miller Road.

The heroin came from Hazelwood, the man shot up in West Mifflin, and the case was turned over to Pittsburgh, Chief Popovich said.

Some arrests were made Friday involving the "Get High or Die Trying" stamp bags, but it was not until Saturday afternoon that Pittsburgh police first noticed something amiss when four overdoses were reported.

On Sunday, the number of incidents multiplied and included a fatality, Joseph Zielinski, 45, of Penn Hills, who was found in an apartment on Greenfield Avenue.

Yesterday, anyone listening to a police scanner would have heard numerous calls throughout the day for overdoses, including two fatalities in Hazelwood.

At 9:13 a.m., Lynn A. Margavo, 30, was found dead in her home in the 5200 block of Gertrude Street. And at 10:11 a.m., Dorothy Iannone, 56, of the 5100 block of Roma Way, was found dead. The cause and manner of both deaths were pending toxicology results.

A sampling of yesterday's overdoses followed the same pattern as Sunday's, with some cases involving motorists. Just after 10 a.m. yesterday, for instance, a man who had used the heroin lost consciousness and drove his Mercury Villager minivan over the curb and into a tree in the 100 block of Flowers Avenue in Hazelwood.

The driver, who was wearing his seat belt, was leaning back in his seat, unconscious. Firefighters from a nearby station house ran to the scene and began working to revive the man, who had a strong pulse but was having difficulty breathing, according to Capt. Greg Lowman.

The man regained consciousness in about five minutes, after firefighters and paramedics administered rescue breathing and a reversal agent, Capt. Lowman said.

"He claimed to be sleeping, but it was an obvious overdose," Capt. Lowman said.

About 3 p.m., the driver of a dump truck parked at a CoGo's in the 2400 block of East Carson Street was found unconscious, slumped over the truck's steering wheel.

DOJ_NMG_0032116

A store employee, who would not give her name, said paramedics pulled the man from the truck's cab and laid him on a stretcher while attempting to revive him. The man had a pulse but was struggling to breathe and appeared to be completely incoherent, with his arms flapping lifelessly at his sides, the employee said.

It could not be determined whether those incidents were linked to the potent heroin because police were unable to provide a breakdown of where and when the overdoses took place.

Late yesterday afternoon, Allegheny County's crime lab had analyzed one of three samples of heroin residue from stamp bags seized by police and determined that fentanyl was present.

Test results on the blood of the three people who died after apparently using the heroin would likely take until the end of the week, said Dr. Frederick Fochtman, director of the forensic science laboratory division and chief toxicologist of the county medical examiner's office.

"It's so very potent that it only takes a very small amount to have a toxic event," Dr. Fochtman said of fentanyl. "If somebody has this in a powdered form, how are they weighing it? How are they putting it in these packets? All you have to do is make a very little mistake and you have an overdose."

Authorities walk a thin line between the potential good of publicizing information about a heroin-fentanyl mixture and warning users of the danger, and tantalizing hard-core addicts who might seek out the bad dope for a powerful high.

"A hard-core addict, when they're using the heroin, sometimes they're only getting enough to prevent them from going into withdrawal," Dr. Fochtman said. "If they feel there is something out there they can take that will also make them high, they'll seek it out."

Drug Experts Advise Extra Precautions In Heroin Use (PPG)

By Anita Srikameswaran, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 6, 2006

The deaths of three heroin users and the emergency treatment of 35 more have prompted an overdose prevention expert to offer this advice: If you're going to use, have someone nearby in case you need help.

Alice Bell, overdose prevention project coordinator at Prevention Point Pittsburgh, the region's only needle exchange program, said there had been talk about drug users in other cities overdosing on a powerful combination of heroin and a narcotic painkiller called fentanyl.

Prevention Point staff had begun to inform its needle exchangers about the potential problem, but until two days ago no one had seen it here.

This could be it, Ms. Bell recalled thinking, when she heard news media reports of an unusually high number of overdoses. It's not yet certain that the fentanyl and heroin combination has arrived on local streets.

"What we know is that there's unusually strong heroin on the streets in various cities, including now in Pittsburgh," she said.

In a June 2 letter, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services warned public health workers that fentanyl was being added to heroin or cocaine and sold to drug users.

"In just one week, an estimated 33 individuals in the Detroit area are reported to have died after using this fatal mix of drugs," the letter says. "The same drug combination may have been responsible for over 100 deaths in the same region since last September."

Philadelphia, St. Louis and Chicago have all had clusters of drug-related deaths.

Fentanyl amplifies the potency of heroin and cocaine, the HHS letter says. Routine toxicology tests will not detect it.

Dr. Daniel Brooks, chief of the medical toxicology division at UPMC Presbyterian, said that heroin usually contains fillers to make it less potent and more economical for dealers. It's possible that the recent overdoses are the result of street drug that is "cut too rich," as he put it.

Opioids such as heroin and fentanyl can kill because they depress the respiratory and central nervous systems, Dr. Brooks explained. The unconscious user loses protective airway reflexes.

Dr. Brooks was told by an overdose patient yesterday that the heroin he had used came from Philadelphia, cost about the same as it usually did, and he had used half his usual dose. But it still turned out to be too much.

More information needs to be collected to better understand the impact of the fentanyl and heroin combination, said Dr. Sharon Stancliff, medical director for the Harm Reduction Coalition in New York.

A typical heroin overdose takes a couple of hours "because people slowly nod off and essentially forget to breathe," she explained. "I can't tell you if that's what happens with fentanyl."

Doctors use a drug called naloxone, or Narcan, to reverse opioid overdoses. It's not known if more Narcan is needed for a fentanyl overdose, or if the treatment window is briefer, Dr. Stancliff said.

DOJ_NMG_0032117

And it may not be obvious when heroin has been laced with fentanyl, Ms. Bell noted. Dealers may not know, or tell the buyer, and a stamp on a bag is not a reliable indicator.

So "it's really important for people to avoid using alone, if at all possible," Ms. Bell said. Also, "it's important for people to know what to do if you're with someone who overdoses, which means learning how to do rescue breathing and getting Narcan."

Since July 2005, Prevention Point's education program has included training in the use of Narcan, and physician volunteers have written about 65 prescriptions for it, Ms. Bell said.

Since then, "we have firsthand reports of 17 overdose reversals from people who have participated in the program," she said.

It's not surprising to Dr. Neil Capretto, medical director of Gateway Rehabilitation Center, that a person who had just been treated for an overdose might be back in the emergency room the next day with the same problem.

After Narcan treatment, "he's going to be sick and going through all these terrible physical withdrawal symptoms," Dr. Capretto said. "And the only way to counteract that is to use."

Ideally, overdose patients could immediately get into long-term, intensive treatment programs, but the demand far exceeds availability, he said.

There are more people using heroin in Western Pennsylvania than ever before, said Dr. Capretto, adding that if he had loved ones who were heroin addicts, he'd keep Narcan on hand.

For more information about Prevention Point's program, call 412-247-3404.

Heroin Claims 2 More (PTR)

By Jill King Greenwood And Jennifer Bails

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, June 6, 2006

Police across Pennsylvania are working to identify the source of a recent spate of heroin overdoses and warning users about the unusually strong drug laced with the painkiller fentanyl.

Two people died in Pittsburgh on Monday -- bringing the total fatal overdoses here to three since Sunday. At least 36 people have overdosed in Allegheny County since the drug emerged on the streets on Friday, authorities said.

"This is a very serious, major problem and we're going to be seeing it for a while, until the supply runs out," said Pittsburgh police Cmdr. Thomas Stangrecki. "We're doing all we can to get a handle on it and get it off the street."

U.S. drug czar John Walters said that federal agents, working in cooperation with the Mexican government, closed down a lab in Mexico that might be the main source of the fentanyl that has killed heroin users in Pennsylvania and seven other states.

He warned drug users that millions of deadly doses of fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on the streets.

Police are blaming the concoction for yesterday's deaths, both in Hazelwood. Dorothy Iannone, 56, was found dead inside her Roma Way home. Lynn Margavo, 30, of Greenfield, was found unconscious inside a different Hazelwood home and died at UPMC South Side hospital.

Joseph Zielinski, 45, of Verona, was found dead inside an apartment in Greenfield on Sunday, and police have linked his death to the fentanyl-laced heroin.

The heroin has been sold in stamp bags marked "Get high or die trying" and "Dynasty" and sells for $10 to $20 apiece, Stangrecki said.

While Pittsburgh seems to be the hardest hit, the drug also has surfaced in Bethel Park, West Homestead, West Mifflin, Brentwood and Tarentum, police said.

Pittsburgh police arrested five people -- dealers and users -- and investigators have seen some cases where users overdosed and were revived by paramedics only to overdose again within hours, Stangrecki said.

Pittsburgh EMS Chief Bob McCaughan said he has been talking with state and local health departments and other emergency responders in the region about the heroin crisis.

"This isn't just going to be a Pittsburgh problem," said McCaughan, who is making sure every ambulance has an adequate supply of Narcan, which is used to treat patients who have overdosed.

Five people have been treated at Mercy Hospital, Uptown, for overdoses since the deadly brand began circulating in the area, said spokeswoman Linda Ross.

Allegheny General Hospital in the North Side treated three patients Sunday and yesterday. Another patient was admitted to West Penn Hospital in Bloomfield.

Allegheny General doctors typically see one heroin-overdose patient a day during the summer, said Dr. Fred Harchelroad, chairman of the hospital's emergency medicine department.

"What happens with these people is someone will find them at home or in the street after they've been shot up," he said.

The deadlier heroin now on Pittsburgh's streets poses a risk for both recreational users and junkies, Harchelroad said.

DOJ_NMG_0032118

"It's certainly a concern anytime this happens, and people are using a street drug where they don't know what the dosage is or what the concentration is," he said. "Not everyone uses heroin on a daily basis. They can end up killing themselves when they were just trying to get a little bit of a buzz."

Drug rehabilitation programs are trying to warn their patients, but heroin dependency is complicated and drug addicts don't always think rationally, said Rich Takacs, of Mercy Behavioral Health, which provides mental health services to about 500 substance abuse patients each year.

"Even though we have evidence that this is killing people in large proportions, that is not going to be enough for people just to walk away from it," Takacs said. "I wish it were as simple as telling someone they need to stop."

Pat Valentine, deputy director of the Allegheny County Office of Behavioral Health, said the county is relying on community-based substance abuse and addiction agencies to spread the message about the dangerous heroin to those at-risk.

Stangrecki said law enforcement can only do so much.

"The warnings are out there, but if they have a problem and they're determined to get this stuff, they'll do it regardless of whether they know it could kill them," he said.

Law enforcement officials in Fayette and Westmoreland counties reported no heroin-related deaths over the weekend, although police in Latrobe have found two stamp bags.

"We know it's in the area, but we're not sure to what extent," said Latrobe police Chief Chuck Huska.

Heroin has been a problem in Westmoreland County this year. There have been 10 drug overdose fatalities and six were linked to heroin, according to the county coroner's office.

Overdoses and deaths related to heroin laced with fentanyl have spiked across the country.

Federal agents and the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are reviewing more than 100 fentanyl-related deaths in Detroit since the fall, and 15 people were hospitalized in Chicago last month after using the drug. In Missouri, more than six people have died from overdoses in St. Louis in the past three weeks.

The CDC estimates more than 200 heroin users have died because of fentanyl across the country in the past few months. The synthetic painkiller has tainted the heroin supply in Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Maryland, Delaware and New Jersey, authorities said.

This isn't the first time the Pittsburgh area has seen an outbreak of overdoses and deaths due to tainted heroin. Eighteen people died in 1988 when "China White" -- heroin laced with 3-methyl fentanyl -- surfaced in Western Pennsylvania.

In 1999, high-quality heroin labeled "Red Demon" began appearing in Pittsburgh and was blamed for two deaths in Westmoreland County.

6 More Die From Likely Overdoses (FREEP)

By Gina Damron, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, June 5, 2006

Unknown yet if fentanyl involved

Six people died from probable drug overdoses between Friday and Sunday morning, bringing the total number of likely drug-related deaths to 54 since May 18, Wayne County health officials said Sunday.

But it will take weeks to determine whether the recent deaths were related to a dangerous mix of the painkiller fentanyl and heroin or cocaine, said Teresa Blossom, a Wayne County Health Department spokeswoman.

She said that between January and April there were more than 70 deaths caused by the concoction. But toxicology results on drug-related deaths in May and June are pending.

The county issued a warning May 19 because 12 people died in a 24-hour span, likely from the deadly mix.

Blossom said there are two or three drug-related deaths in the county on any given day.

Officials at the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office could not be reached for comment Sunday.

John Roach, a spokesman for the Wayne County Sheriff's Office, said the department has received several tips about the local source of the drugs but wouldn't release information about the investigation.

Detroit's Deadly Epidemic (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), June 5, 2006

An epidemic is sweeping the Detroit-Wayne County area, and it has claimed the lives of about 50 people in the last couple weeks. Last month, 12 people were killed in one 24-hour period, and two died Wednesday. More have died in Chicago and Philadelphia.

But it's not a virus that's killing so many. It's tainted drugs, a suspected blend of the painkiller fentanyl - likely made in illegal laboratories -with heroin or cocaine.

DOJ_NMG_0032119

A task force has been created to investigate the deaths. Known as the Detroit-Wayne County Fentanyl Work Group, it is looking into where the drugs come from and how they are getting to Michigan. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are helping, and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is pursuing leads.

Given the number of confirmed overdoses - 130 in Wayne County from January, 2005, through April - the slow response is troubling.

While tracking down leads can be time-consuming and require significant manpower, particularly when labs producing these drugs may be outside the metro Detroit area, perhaps even overseas, surely more could have been done when the death toll is at such dramatic levels.

We can only imagine what the scenario would have been had the deaths been among a different demographic, perhaps in a different place. Say, 50 martini drinkers in Oakland County in the last two weeks.

That said, it is good to see that a multi-agency response is in place. While the number of deaths attributed to the tainted drugs does not approach that of homicides in Detroit - that number had risen above 100 after the first quarter this year - the fentanyl-related deaths are a public health crisis in the making.

Drug abusers share the blame, of course, and must bear a large part of the responsibility for their own fate. They understand the risks inherent in taking illegal drugs, including the obvious perils of infected needles, of uncertain purity of the drugs, and of overdosing.

But whether they deliberately sought a high delivered by a drug cocktail containing a painkiller 80 times stronger than morphine, or were unaware of the deadly mixture, they didn't deserve to die.

It's a mystery why anyone in Wayne County would risk taking an illegal drug under the present circumstances. How could they not know so many others have died? Warning flyers have been issued, so the word must be on the streets of Detroit that these drugs kill. Was their craving for the high so great that they would spin the cylinder in a terrible Russian roulette?

And what kind of people would illegally manufacture the fentanyl, knowing that when mixed with other, illegal drugs such as heroin or cocaine it would kill?

They are mass murderers and they must be hunted down and punished as such.

Colombia Says Soldiers Killed Antidrug Police (BOS)

By Indira A.r. Lakshmanan, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 6, 2006

Authorities probe colonel for link to major trafficker

BOGOTÁ -- Suspicions that a Colombian military unit assassinated a US-trained, elite antinarcotics team at the bidding of the drug mafia two weeks ago have proven true, officials say, in a case that has badly shaken public confidence in the military.

On May 22, 10 of the country's most successful antidrug police were killed by a military platoon in the outskirts of Jamundí, an area under the influence of narco-traffickers 195 miles southwest of the capital, near Cali.

Two military officers and six soldiers were arrested Thursday on the basis of incriminating cellphone text messages and crime-scene evidence that investigators say prove the eight men planned the killings. The suspects insist the shootings were a ``friendly fire" mistake.

``This was not a mistake, this was a crime; this was a deliberate decision, a criminal decision," Attorney General Mario Iguarán said last week . ``They were doing the bidding of a drug trafficker."

Authorities are investigating bank accounts allegedly containing $44,000 belonging to Army Colonel Bayron Carvajal, the most senior officer arrested, as well as his alleged links to Omar García Varela, according to Colombian newspaper El Tiempo. Varela is accused of being right-hand man of drug boss Diego Montoya, one of the United States' 10 most-wanted narco-traffickers, who is believed to control properties and drug laboratories near the site of fatal attack. The United States has offered $5 million for information leading to Montoya's capture.

Questions remain in the Jamundí case about the extent of alleged collusion with drug traffickers within the armed forces, and how high up it may go. The arrests came days after the US State Department certified Colombia's human rights record, ensuring the flow of most US military aid to this country. Last year, Congress withheld some military assistance on worries that the Colombian government, which has waged a nearly decade-long campaign against drug corruption, was ignoring extrajudicial killings or cooperation between the military and right-wing death squads.

The Jamundí case has sparked a national outcry that has reached up to President Álvaro Uribe, but Uribe on Friday said he was not ready to oust generals to hold them responsible for the killings. The best way to restore military credibility, he said, would be to clarify events and impose sanctions on the guilty.

Among the most damning evidence against the arrested soldiers are text messages allegedly sent by Carvajal on the day of the killing to the lieutenant and sergeant in charge of the platoon.

DOJ_NMG_0032120

``Pull back the ambush. . . . Everything is set for tonight," read one message leaked by authorities to El Tiempo and the newsmagazine Semana.

That afternoon, Carvajal sent another message, the media reported: ``Get ready for the group to come with the chicken so you can get it."

``Chicken" was the nickname of civilian informant Luis Eduardo Betancur, who was leading police to a suspected 440-pound stash of cocaine. Betancur was also a registered informant of Carvajal, authorities say. He was found shot in the neck, with his balaclava removed, investigators say.

Eight of the 10 police killed were shot in the back, and ``the crime scene was contaminated before investigators arrived," said an investigative official yesterday who spoke on condition of anonymity. Investigators suspect soldiers may have fired shots from the police officers' weapons after they died, in an effort to make it look like there was a confrontation, El Tiempo reported.

Fewer than half of the soldiers in the 28-man platoon fired at the police. Witnesses interviewed by telephone from Jamundí say the police identified themselves during the attack and begged the soldiers not to shoot.

More than half of the shots fired originated from a military sniper who was hidden from view, said an investigative official.

When colleagues of the slain police arrived at the scene to investigate, another text message allegedly demanded to know why they had been allowed to pass a military roadblock.

The police unit had been trained by the Drug Enforcement Administration and was responsible for more than 200 arrests of drug traffickers, including 23 wanted for extradition to the United States.

6 Officers Put On Leave In Probe Of Inmates' Escape (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The D.C. Department of Corrections yesterday put six officers on paid administrative leave while authorities investigate events leading to the escape of two inmates.

Devon Brown, the department's director, said investigators want to determine if any of the officers deliberately aided in the escape or unintentionally made mistakes that contributed to the breakout. He would not identify the officers.

Ricardo Jones and Joseph Leaks broke into the warden's empty office shortly after 10 a.m. Saturday, smashed through a reinforced glass window and slid down a canopy to freedom, officials said. Both were captured Sunday, one in Maryland and the other in Virginia.

Their escape -- from the bureaucratic errors that gave Leaks enough freedom on a work detail to execute the escape to the warning system that failed to properly notify the neighborhood of the breach -- "was a major breakdown," Brown said yesterday.

The U.S. attorney's office and D.C. police are heading the criminal investigation. The Department of Corrections is conducting an internal investigation, and Brown cited several areas of special interest.

Leaks, 32, and Jones, 25, were jailed on charges stemming from the July 6 killing of David Valentine in Northeast Washington. Brown said they should have been separated while in custody, but, he added, they apparently got together to plan the escape.

Brown said Leaks was given too much freedom in his work detail, which allowed him to roam more freely while painting the hallway near the warden's office. Because Leaks was being held in connection with a violent crime -- as an accessory after the fact to Valentine's killing -- he should not have been given such a work detail, Brown said. Also, Leaks was charged in 1993 with a prison breach. Although that charge was dismissed, Brown said it should have been considered in granting him a work detail.

Leaks, of Northeast Washington, was also awaiting trial on nine counts of assault with a dangerous weapon and other charges. Jones, of Hyattsville, was jailed pending trial on a first-degree murder charge in Valentine's death.

Corrections officials have yet to determine how Leaks and Jones met up Saturday after Leaks slipped away from his work detail. The supervisor of that work detail is among those who were put on leave.

At some point, one or both of the inmates broke into the warden's office. There were signs of forced entry on the door.

After smashing a window with office furniture, they slid down a canopy and ran. Both were wearing dark blue jumpsuits, not the bright orange attire inmates wear. The blue jumpsuits are for prisoners about to be released, and Brown said investigators are unsure how they got them.

Brown said he checked several times with jail officials to make sure that they sounded the air raid-like siren that is supposed to notify people living near the jail in Southeast Washington of an escape. Although several officials assured him that the alarm was sounded, no one could say they heard it.

Many neighbors, even those who live across the street from the jail, said they did not hear a siren. Brown said he is investigating what happened to the alarm and whether it needs repair.

DOJ_NMG_0032121

He also said that neither he nor other corrections officials were aware that thousands of neighbors in Ward 6 are part of a text alert system that coordinates with the D.C. Emergency Management Agency to notify residents of any emergency, such as a jailbreak.

D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large) said he will hold a meeting June 14 in the neighborhood to discuss the incident.

Leaks and Jones were captured by a task force led by the U.S. Marshals Service. Leaks was caught first, early Sunday, in a Fairfax County motel. Jones was captured about 11:30 p.m. Sunday after Prince George's County got a tip that he was hiding in a garage or shed in Seat Pleasant. Authorities found him in a shed in the 500 block of 71st Street, police said.

Both planned to make their way to Greensboro, N.C., said Tom Hession, chief inspector for the Marshals Service. Both men are wanted there in connection with the shooting of a security guard, according to court records.

Six Officers On Leave During Probe Of Jailbreak (WT)

By Jim McElhatton And Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

Six D.C. correctional officers have been put on leave as the U.S. Attorney's Office leads a criminal probe into the escape of two D.C. Jail inmates over the weekend, authorities said yesterday.

Inmates Joseph Leaks and Ricardo Jones were caught in separate locations in Maryland and Virginia Sunday after they broke into the warden's office and fled through a window Saturday.

D.C. Department of Corrections Director Devon Brown said yesterday that authorities are investigating "quite vigorously" the question of whether the two inmates had help in the escape.

"Everyone who may have had some knowledge of how this took place, whether it be staff or inmate, will be investigated," Mr. Brown said. "There was a major breakdown."

Leaks, 32, of Northeast, and Jones, 25, of Hyattsville, are charged in the July 6 fatal shooting of David Valentine in the District. As co-defendants awaiting trial in the same case, Mr. Brown acknowledged that the inmates should not have been allowed to have contact with each other.

Leaks had been assigned to a painting detail in the jail, which also should not have been permitted because of his criminal history, Mr. Brown said. It was not clear how Jones, who was not on the work detail, paired up with Leaks before the escape.

"It should not have happened, and we accept that," Mr. Brown said.

Thomas Hession, chief inspector for the Capital Area Regional Fugitive Task Force, which is led by U.S. Marshals Service, said a tip to the Prince George's County Police Department led authorities to catch Jones in the backyard shed of a home in Seat Pleasant late Sunday night. Leaks was caught early Sunday at a motel in Alexandria.

Detective Michael Reese, of the Metropolitan Police Department, said the U.S. Attorney's Office is leading a criminal investigation into the escape. The probe also is being conducted by city police and the U.S. Marshals Service.

Mr. Brown would not identify the six correctional officers whom he said were placed on administrative leave pending the investigation. One of the officers oversaw the work detail in which Leaks was involved.

Mr. Brown said authorities also are investigating whether a siren system designed to alert the surrounding community of a jailbreak was working properly.

D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson, at-large Democrat, said yesterday that he plans to investigate the siren system through a series of hearings.

"It will be an opportunity for the public to get a full explanation," he said. "We want to look at what procedures were not in place, what went wrong and what's being done to fix the situation. I'm sure we'll also be looking at community notification. When someone escapes into the neighborhood, the neighborhood needs to be alerted. The Department of Corrections said they sent out the alarm, and the community said they got nothing."

Mr. Mendelson, who is chairman of the council's Committee on the Judiciary, said the hearings also will investigate how the escape occurred.

"The escape is very troubling," he said. "The jail is a secure facility -- we don't put people there so they can escape."

The hearings have not been scheduled, Mr. Mendelson said.

Questions Raised About Crime Task Force's Success (SCRIPPS)

By Michael Doyle, McClatchy Newspapers

Scripps Howard/McClathcy, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal reinforcements in Fresno, Calif., have helped local police lock up bad guys, but now investigators are questioning how well one of the law enforcement programs really works.

In a high-profile blitz last year, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives deployed extra troops to Fresno and some other selected cities. Welcomed by local officers and politicians alike, the Violent Crime Impact Team targeted gangs and gun-related crimes.

Since starting last June, the Fresno-based team of eight federal agents, two prosecutors and one deputy U.S. marshal have won kudos from their local colleagues.

"It has been successful," bureau spokeswoman Nina Delgadillo said Monday, noting that "we have firearms that we've been able to take off of the streets."

A 1 p.m. news conference at Fresno's federal courthouse on Thursday will give officials a chance to elaborate on their success stories.

The federal agents, though, also confront a perennial problem in public policy: How can they prove they're making a difference? On that, the jury may still be out.

In a new report, Justice Department investigators caution they can't be sure exactly how much credit the various Violent Crime Impact Teams deserve. There are 20 such teams nationwide, initiated as a pilot program now costing a total of $20 million this year.

"ATF cannot conclusively show that the law enforcement operations it undertook during the ... pilot project were effective at reducing firearms crime in the target areas," the Office of Inspector General investigators cautioned.

The Washington-based investigators, moreover, hinted at broader shortcomings. Successes may be exaggerated, teamwork hindered and goals missed. The Violent Crime Impact Team concept itself, investigators suggest, may simply be a new brand name for an old product.

(One) special agent stated, 'really the only change is geography, but essentially I'm doing the same thing,'" the Office of Inspector General investigators reported. "One assistant special agent in charge told us, 'This is what we were (already) doing before VCIT.'"

The special teams are supposed to target the worst offenders in violent neighborhoods. Federal prosecutors get a crack at suspects, drawing longer prison sentences. Investigators are supposed to work closely with local officers, and use the latest in crime-fighting technology.

In February, for instance, the Fresno team was credited with the arrests of five suspected gang members accused of drug-dealing and illegal firearms activities.

"Any time you can add resources in town, it's always a good thing," said Jeff Cardinale, public information officer for the Fresno Police Department.

Cardinale said local officials are still compiling statistics to demonstrate progress, which will be made available Thursday.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives declared the special teams an overall success in January, citing a decline in homicides in the targeted cities over a six-month period.

In theory, the teams are supposed to focus on criminals dubbed the worst of the worst. Between June 2004 and May 2005, the various teams reported making 3,592 arrests nationwide. However, only 746 _ about 20 percent _ were targeted individuals.

"We could not determine whether these 746 targeted individuals were the 'worst of the worst' violent offender in the target areas," Justice Department investigators noted.

Some teams didn't even identify who the "worst of the worst" were for fear of being accused of racial profiling, the new report notes.

In some cases, supposed success stories fell apart under closer examination.

ATF officials, for instance, touted an impressive-sounding 50 percent decline in homicides committed with firearms in a targeted neighborhood of Albuquerque. The grand total did fall _ from four to two.

The overall program itself was dismissed by some special agents as putting old wine into new bottles.

"One special agent stated, 'As far as I know, they just gave (Project Safe Neighborhoods) a new name,' " the investigators noted.

In its official response, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives acknowledged that it "(may) be true that a direct causal relationship between ATF programs and reductions in crime can never be established." Officials stressed, though, that their agency is an "integral player" in overall Justice Department crime-fighting efforts.

"It is clear that ATF has played its part and has contributed to a safer America," the agency stated.

Agency officials further suggested the 108-page review itself was premature, with Delgadillo saying, "it's putting the cart before the horse" to evaluate a pilot program. Still, the agency substantively agreed with all of the recommendations made.

Investigators said other federal personnel assigned to the teams _ from the U.S. Marshals Service or Drug Enforcement Administration _ were found to be "often unaware of their expected roles and did not always receive clear direction" about their work.

Bush Selects U.S. Marshal For Nevada (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) -- A former state gambling regulator has been named U.S. marshal covering Nevada.

Gary Orton is due to be sworn in June 16 as U.S. Marshal for the District of Nevada after being selected by President Bush.

Orton spent 26 years as an enforcement officer and deputy chief of the Nevada state Gaming Control Board. He previously spent eight years as a North Las Vegas police officer, and served in the United States Army from 1969 to 1972.

As U.S. marshal for Nevada, Orton will oversee security at U.S. District courts in Reno and Las Vegas and the protection of 23 federal judges, direct fugitive apprehension and federal prisoner custody and transport, and oversee federal witness security.

The marshals service also administers a Justice Department asset forfeitures program.

The Nevada office has been directed since January 2002 by Fidencio Rivera, who was made acting United States marshal and chief deputy U.S. marshal for Nevada.

Defendant Pleads Guilty, Will Testify (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

One of the two remaining defendants in an arson case that strained race relations in Southern Maryland admitted his guilt in federal court yesterday and agreed to testify for the government against the sole man still charged.

Michael M. Everhart, 21, entered his plea as part of an agreement to testify against Roy T. McCann, 23, the only one of five defendants in the case who has not pleaded guilty or been convicted. Everhart entered his plea during an hour-long hearing before U.S. District Judge Roger W. Titus in federal court in Greenbelt.

Everhart and McCann were tried in March in the arson fires that devastated a subdivision under construction in Charles County in the early morning of Dec. 6, 2004. The trial ended with a hung jury March 16, and Titus declared a mistrial.

Everhart, who was charged with 36 separate counts -- one count of arson and 35 counts of conspiracy -- pleaded guilty yesterday to one count of conspiracy to commit arson. His guilty plea and testimony could significantly bolster the government's case against McCann.

According to a statement of facts that was part of Everhart's plea bargain, Everhart joined McCann, Aaron L. Speed, Jeremy D. Parady and Patrick S. Walsh in splashing flammable materials in the entranceways of the houses they targeted. They set the fires using flares, matches, lighters and propane torches, according to the statement.

Titus set Everhart's sentencing for Sept. 8.

In the March trial, federal prosecutors relied heavily on the testimony of Parady, 21, a former firefighter trainee. Parady had pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy and had admitted to driving a vehicle from house to house to help set the fires.

In their closing arguments, defense attorneys attacked Parady's credibility, pointing out that he was an admitted perjurer and arguing that he testified in exchange for a lighter sentence.

McCann's attorney, Joshua R. Treem, declined to comment on Everhart's plea agreement. McCann is scheduled to go to trial in June 2007.

By pleading guilty, Everhart could receive a sentence of three years to nearly four years in prison under complex federal sentencing guidelines. If he had gone to trial and been convicted, he could have been sentenced to nine years in prison. That term could have been increased to about 12 years if the judge determined there was evidence that Everhart had engaged in a hate crime. (None of the defendants has been charged with a hate crime or had his sentence increased for that reason.)

The fires destroyed 12 new, unoccupied houses and damaged 15 others, causing an estimated $3.2 million in damage. Many of the owners of the new houses are black, and the five men charged with setting the fires are white.

At the December sentencing of Walsh, 21, a former amusement park worker identified as the arsonists' ringleader, Titus said the fires caused "incalculable damage" to race relations in the community. Walsh was convicted by a federal jury in Baltimore of 35 counts of arson and one count of conspiracy. He was sentenced to nearly 20 years in prison.

Speed, 22, a security guard at the Hunters Brooke subdivision where the fires were set, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy and was sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

Everhart has been free, under the supervision of his parents, as he awaited his retrial. Yesterday, his attorney, William C. Brennan, told Titus that Everhart wanted to turn himself in to begin serving his sentence July 17. Titus agreed to allow the surrender.

In For Life? Not Him (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

Prisons can't seem to keep Richard McNair confined. After his third escape, the convicted murderer is still at large, leaving tantalizing clues.

POLLOCK, La. — Richard Lee McNair's job in the prison factory was mending U.S. mailbags. Thousands of the leather pouches were routinely delivered to the shop at the federal maximum-security penitentiary here, and the middle-aged convict worked quietly each day, helping to stitch them back up.

Once the bags were refurbished, they were stacked on pallets, hundreds in a pile. McNair watched for four months as forklifts scooped up the pallets and hauled them to a warehouse just outside the prison walls.

One morning they carried off McNair — hidden under the bags.

And he was free again.

Twice before, in nearly two decades in custody, McNair has tasted freedom. Once he spread lip balm on his wrist, and slipped out of handcuffs. Another time he crawled to freedom through an air vent. Two other times his breakout attempts were foiled.

His latest escape was the first from a federal maximum security prison in 13 years. McNair, a confessed murderer, had just been moved to Pollock from the Supermax prison in Florence, Colo. — the nation's most secure lockup.

The government concedes it should have known he would again try to escape.

Since his April 5 run, he has crisscrossed the United States and Canada. He has left behind intriguing clues, almost as if daring the police and federal marshals to find him.

"Oh, he's taunting us, all right," said an exasperated Vern Erck, the North Dakota lawman who first arrested him.

Soon after sneaking out of the off-site warehouse, when the prison was already in an uproar trying to find him, McNair smooth-talked his way past a police officer even though he had no ID and was running away from the prison.

Several weeks later, he jumped from a stolen car and ran off after the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pulled him over in Penticton, Canada, just north of Washington state. Inside was a digital camera full of photos he had taken of himself, along with a travelogue of scenic sites he had visited.

He was caught on video late in April at a honky-tonk called Coyote Ugly in San Antonio, sipping a beer on the bar's back patio. And he mailed, or had someone else mail, a letter to his mother in Duncan, Okla. It was postmarked Corpus Christi, Texas.

When he is caught, if he is caught, McNair is unlikely to go quietly. He was serving two life sentences — for shooting one man from behind and killing another at point-blank range during a 1987 burglary.

"He has murdered in the past," warned Deputy U.S. Marshal Richard Sansone Jr., who is based in Louisiana and is helping coordinate the manhunt. "He will do most anything he can to stay out."

What makes McNair, 47, tougher to catch and all the more dangerous is that he once worked in law enforcement. He is a stickler for detail and so methodical he used the Freedom of Information Act to obtain the FBI records on his last escape so he could study how they tracked him down.

Before hiding under the pile of mailbags and being forklifted to freedom, he swore to his cellmates: "I won't make the same mistakes next time." His wanted poster, plastered on the Internet, shows him with brown hair and blue eyes, 6 feet tall and 210 pounds. That is how he looked when he came to Pollock in December, after five years at Supermax, where many of the nation's most hardened criminals are held, locked in their cells for 23 hours a day.

No one has escaped from Supermax. The last escape from any federal maximum security prison was in August 1993, when Rick Lee Archer and Gene Michael Diulio vanished from the penitentiary in Lompoc, Calif., only to be apprehended four months later in Las Vegas. Richard Thomas, McNair's 73-year-old defense attorney, has represented numerous defendants in his long legal career. But none, he said, were as determined as McNair that he would not spend his life in prison.

"He used to send me Christmas cards every year," Thomas said. "He hoped everything was fine. He was eternally optimistic."

The county prosecutor in Minot, N.D., John Van Grinsven, notes that McNair would be eligible for parole just about now had he stayed in prison.

"If you were to meet him, you'd probably like him," the prosecutor said. "But there is a dark side."

McNair grew up the son of a jewelry store manager in Oklahoma. He joined the Air Force, was promoted to sergeant and was stationed at Minot. He worked as a military policeman and later, as his service was ending, assisted as a volunteer undercover officer with the local drug task force.

He also developed a compulsion for stealing things. Carpets. Electronics. An air compressor. He rented a storage locker and filled it up.

Police are divided over what to make of him; some call him a sociopath, others a thrill-seeker, still others see him as someone intent on proving that he is smarter than all of them.

"I think his ulterior motive was to get in with law enforcement to understand how we worked," said Van Grinsven, who was on the drug task force with McNair. "At one point, he stole a police radio and when he would go out on burglaries he'd listen in."

On a November night in 1987, when McNair was 28, he was bent over the safe at the Farmer's Union Grain Elevator when the manager, Richard Kitzman, unexpectedly showed up to assist a trucker with a late load.

McNair shot Kitzman three times from behind and left him for dead.

"I thought I was a goner, you betcha," Kitzman said, still bewildered that McNair would shoot someone who couldn't identify him.

McNair did not want to leave the trucker as a possible witness. So he reloaded the five-shot revolver, hurried outside, leaped onto the truck's running board, stuck the gun in Jerome Theis' face and emptied it.

Then McNair ran.

His undoing came when he ran behind on his rental payments at the storage locker. The owner opened it and found it full of loot, including spent shells from the grain elevator shootings.

McNair was arrested the next morning when he showed up at the offices of the drug task force.

Police handcuffed his wrist to a chair and stepped away to confer. McNair slid open a desk drawer and reached for the lip balm. After working his wrist free, he knocked down two officers and bolted past a receptionist.

He stole a car and was chased to the tallest home in Minot. He burst through the door, ran up the three flights and climbed out onto the roof. Realizing he was cornered, he shouted, "I'm not going to jail" and leaped into a tree. But the branch broke and McNair fell, practically into the arms of the police.

Awaiting trial in 1988 in the county jail in Minot, he apparently was already scheming. Somehow he hustled up a small hammer and flashlight and began loosening two cinderblocks in his cell.

When he was spotted, he was moved to tighter quarters.

"I knew right then he was pretty clever," said Erck, who is now the Ward County sheriff in Minot. "He enjoys the game."

McNair pleaded guilty to the shootings.

"He didn't have any defense," said Thomas, his lawyer. "He had given exhaustive statements to the cops about the killing. He confessed it all. And he was colder than a mackerel. He showed absolutely no remorse."

He got two life sentences and, in 1988, was dispatched to the state's maximum-security prison in Bismarck.

Three years later, McNair was about to bust out again.

He had removed many of the security fixtures from inside a prison air vent that led to the outside. He had only a few left to make it all the way out and had already stashed a jacket, a pair of glasses, food and a word-processing diskette to help in his getaway.

Another inmate snitched on him.

McNair told prison officials he had planned to head east, maybe to New York, "because it would be easy to live undetected in a large city." He also told them he did not care if a tower guard shot him, saying that, if he was spotted running, he wished to die.

A year later, he pulled off the escape — crawling through another ventilation chute with two other inmates. His accomplices were found in fairly short order. It took about 10 months to find McNair.

He stole cars. He dyed his hair blond.

Finally, in July 1993, he was caught trying to burglarize a Grand Island, Neb., car dealership. He was captured with a stolen Chevy van and was armed with a stun gun and police scanner.

With each escape and each attempt, McNair got more prison time. He eventually was transferred by North Dakota Prison Warden Tim Schuetzle under a prisoner-exchange program to a top-security facility in Oak Park Heights, Minn., that is largely underground.

Authorities thought that would be good for safe-keeping.

But McNair organized prisoner strikes and by 2001 Minnesota had had enough. So Schuetzle, under another prisoner exchange, traded him to the federal government. With his record of unruliness and escapes, federal officials sent him to Supermax.

"That's where I thought he was all this time," Schuetzle said. "Until I got the call from Pollock."

Because McNair was well-behaved in Supermax, he was transferred to Pollock, one of the newest federal prisons, in September and, in December, was assigned to the prison shop repairing postal bags. "He seemed very low key," said Jane Haschemeyer, an administrator in the warden's office. "He hadn't had any disciplinary reports. There hadn't been any issues with him at all."

Pollock also had a good record: no escapes since it opened five years ago. Asked about that now, Haschemeyer said, "Well, we're just hoping he can be captured soon."

DOJ_NMG_0032126

Somewhere between the prison shop and the outside warehouse, McNair swapped his work khakis for the white T-shirt and white shorts allowed in his cell.

As Haschemeyer put it, "he wormed his way out of the pallet and made his run for it."

Alerted to the dragnet, Carl Bordelon, a police officer in Ball, La., stopped a man running along some railroad tracks about a dozen miles from the prison.

Bordelon's brief encounter with McNair was recorded by the video camera on the dash of his patrol car.

"Do you have any form of ID on you?" Bordelon asked.

"No."

"What's your name?"

"Robert Jones. I'm not supposed to be out on the tracks?"

"What's your address?"

"I don't have an address." McNair said. "I'm at a hotel. We're working on houses and stuff like that. Roofs."

McNair shifted his feet. He giggled. He explained he was just out jogging.

Bordelon told McNair there was an escapee on the loose.

"There's a prison here?" McNair laughed.

The officer called in McNair's description and was told about the photo issued of the escapee. "You know the bad thing about it?" the officer said to McNair. "You're matching up to it."

"That sucks," said McNair, tossing in a few more laughs.

To deflect suspicion he described a nearby Wal-Mart, the building behind it and the state highway that passes through. He said he was an Army veteran, his father a reserve cop. He said he grew up in Dallas.

"I promise you, I'm not no damn prison escapee," he said. "Nope. Nope. Nope."

True, the officer agreed, "you'd-a run by now."

They laughed and shook hands.

"Be careful, buddy," the officer said.

And off McNair went.

IMMIGRATION:

More Migrants Apprehended Along Border (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, June 6, 2006

CHICAGO — The Border Patrol says apprehensions of illegal immigrants along the Mexican border are up nearly 4% so far this year because of increased enforcement.

But advocacy groups say greater numbers are crossing the border because they are confused about conflicting legislation passed by Congress and hope to qualify for legal status.

“More people are coming because they believe they'll get a crack at legalization,” says Jessica Aranda of the Latino Union of Chicago. Chicago has one of the USA's largest Mexican immigrant communities.

There is no official data on the flow of illegal immigrants. Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar said Monday there has been no surge in the number of illegal crossings since President Bush announced in May that 6,000 National Guard troops would be sent to the border. Aguilar expects a decrease as more agents and Guard members are deployed.

Border Patrol spokesman Richard Rojas says apprehensions at the southern border are up this year to 826,109, from 795,218 at this point in 2005. “We're enforcing more; therefore, we're apprehending more,” he says.

Daniel Martinez, immigration program director at Catholic Charities in Laredo, Texas, says some immigrants believe crossing is easier now than it will be when National Guard troops arrive.

Other immigrants believe “maybe they can qualify” for a “guest worker” program or citizenship if they enter the USA soon, Martinez says.

Sheriff Omar Lucio in Cameron County, Texas, says his department is getting more reports of illegal immigrants abandoned in trucks or jammed into apartments.

A House bill passed in December would make illegal immigration a felony and boost enforcement. The Senate version, passed May 25, calls for a guest-worker program proposed by Bush and giving illegal immigrants here since Jan. 7, 2004, a chance to become citizens. Both chambers will negotiate compromise legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0032127

Groups say confusion over the bills means some illegal immigrants are being ripped off. Some pay $500-$1,000 to people claiming to be lawyers who promise to expedite applications for a guest-worker program that was passed by the Senate but not the House. Applications don't exist.

"The fake lawyers disappear with the money," says Ana Maria Achila of the Latin American Integration Center in New York City. "There is definitely confusion. We're seeing a lot of people asking where they sign up."

Advocacy groups and Spanish-language media are trying to educate immigrants. Meetings were being held here Monday and today to tell immigrants that they can't apply for guest-worker status. In Alamosa, Colo., a community meeting Sunday explained that no bill has become law.

People who work with immigrants say the uncertainty and a legal crackdown are roiling communities:

·Tougher border enforcement is prompting some illegal immigrants to use crossings that are "more isolated, desolate and dangerous," says Jennifer Allen of Border Action Network, a human-rights group in Tucson.

·Workplace raids that became more frequent recently made some illegal immigrants afraid to leave home, says Mariano Espinoza of the Minnesota Immigrant Freedom Network in St. Paul: "They want to work, but they don't know if the next time they will be detained."

·"I see more fear than anything, because people just don't know what's going on," says Flora Archuleta of the San Luis Valley Immigrant Resource Center in Alamosa.

"There is fear, there is confusion," says Catherine Salgado of the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights. But the possibility of a new path to citizenship means "there is hope, too."

An Increasingly Deadly Trail (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

COVERED WELLS, Ariz. -- It was early on a May morning, still dark, when Border Patrol agent Dan McClafferty first smelled death, its rich odor piercing the desert bouquet of sage, salt cedar and creosote. Following the beam of his flashlight, McClafferty looked under the thorny branches of a paloverde tree and found what he was looking for.

The body of the 3-year-old boy lay still, covered with a jacket and his arms crossed over his chest. His mother, found wandering along a desert highway hours earlier, had carried him there as she had tried to cross into the United States illegally.

The sad discovery was not unique. Since 1993, when the Clinton administration began a crackdown on border crossings in San Diego and El Paso, more than 3,500 people have died trying to cross into the United States through desert. And, as officials work to put more patrols and fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, immigrant advocates fear there will be more deaths among the tens of thousands who attempt the trip.

Most of the deaths so far -- 959 since Oct. 1, 2001, according to local government statistics and the Mexican government -- have been in Arizona, where the landscape comprises mountains, ranches, Indian reservations, military proving grounds and endless miles of cactus-filled desert. The boy, who was found on May 16 and whose name could not be ascertained from U.S. or Mexican officials, was one of the latest additions to the list.

Border Patrol statistics show that while the death toll mounts annually, the number of those apprehended while crossing the border has not changed significantly since 1993. But because federal agencies have tightened the border in urban areas, smugglers who move the men, women and children seeking to enter the United States illegally have funneled them onto increasingly perilous trails where temperatures are high, water is scarce and danger is abundant.

"All the evidence is that increased enforcement on the border has achieved no benefit at all except in additional employment of Border Patrol agents," said John Fife, a Tucson pastor and founder of No More Deaths, a coalition of charities devoted to stopping deaths during desert border crossings. "What has changed is the devastating elements of this policy. You have a number of deaths that surpasses the number of American deaths in Iraq. And yet still we are determined to persist and redouble our efforts."

The other view is that a tipping point could be reached if the flow of agents and materiel to the border continues to increase. Since 1993, the Border Patrol has tripled in size and President Bush has pledged to add 6,000 more agents. He also has ordered the National Guard, which began deploying to the border Monday, to help build new fencing and other protections. "America has the best technology in the world, and we will ensure that the Border Patrol has the technology they need to do their job and secure our border," Bush said May 15 in a nationally televised speech.

Even as the president was speaking, McClafferty was searching the Arizona desert.A Toxic Mix

The 3-year-old's mother's name was Edith Rodreguez. She and her son crossed into the United States from Sasabe, Mexico, on May 11, said a spokesman for the Mexican consulate in Tucson. A native of the Mexican state of Veracruz, a major source for illegal immigration, the 25-year-old woman was traveling in a group of eight to 10 people, herded north by a smuggler, called a coyote.

DOJ_NMG_0032128

To keep the group moving fast, the coyote handed out a Mexican over-the-counter drug called Sedalmerk, consulate spokesman Alejandro Ramos Cardoso said after Mexican officials interviewed Rodreguez. Sedalmerk is a combination of caffeine, Tylenol and the herbal supplement ephedra -- an amphetamine precursor that is banned in the United States.

Sedalmerk may be safe to use as a pick-me-up in a normal environment but it is a toxic mix when combined with a trek through the desert because it accelerates dehydration, McClafferty said. Two days into the journey, the boy's energy was flagging and he was dehydrated. On May 13, Ramos Cardoso said, the coyote and the rest of the crossers abandoned Rodreguez and her son, leaving them to walk in the desert by themselves.

Rodreguez began carrying the child, moving north through a sliver of earth hemmed in by two mountain ranges on land belonging to the Tohono O'odham Indian reservation. Sometime that day, the boy lost consciousness, Ramos Cardoso said. But Rodreguez kept on walking, clutching him.A Search for a Child

In early January, the Border Patrol began concentrating on Arizona's Altar Valley, which had become a virtual highway into the United States for thousands of illegal immigrants and is dotted with natural water holes and water stations serviced by American charities. The renewed enforcement there resulted in traffic being diverted to the Tohono O'odham land that has less water.

Some religious and charitable groups have placed water barrels in the desert and handed out maps in Mexico showing their locations, drawing the ire of those who seek tougher enforcement along the border. One of the groups, Humane Borders, received permission to keep water barrels on land belonging to the Bureau of Land Management, the Interior Department, the city of Tucson and Pima County. But the Tohono O'odham tribe has declined to give its permission.

It was on that land that Rodreguez found herself walking with her son. She carried him for more than a day, Ramos Cardoso said, before placing him under the paloverde tree and going to look for help.

Like many who cross the border illegally, Rodreguez had been in the United States before. She worked menial jobs in Kentucky, where she met a man who apparently was married. The two had a relationship and Rodreguez got pregnant, Ramos Cardoso said. She decided to have the baby in Veracruz so her mother could help her. Returning to Mexico to have a baby was an unusual decision -- many Mexican women make the reverse trip, traveling to the United States to have their babies so their children will be U.S. citizens.

Earlier this year, Rodreguez decided to return to the United States to show the boy to his father, Ramos Cardoso said. She traveled to Sasabe, joined the coyote's group and walked across the border.

After placing her son under the tree, Rodreguez chanced upon Highway 86, which runs through the heart of Tohono O'odham. There, on the afternoon of May 15, Border Patrol agents picked her up.

Ramos Cardoso said she told the agents immediately that she had left her son in the desert, but Gustavo Soto, a Border Patrol spokesman, said they learned of a missing boy four hours later after she was sent to a processing center in the border town of Nogales before she was returned to Mexico.

McClafferty received word about the missing boy that night. He is a member of BorStar, the Border Patrol's elite search and rescue unit, established in 1998 to help save illegal immigrants lost in the desert. When McClafferty went searching for the boy, it was unclear whether he was alive. He said he was told that the mother was so distraught that Border Patrol agents understood only that her son was missing.

McClafferty and three other agents began bushwhacking through the desert scrub, looking for footprints, where Rodreguez had been found. There were thousands, making it impossible to track the boy that way.

Back at Nogales, Border Patrol agents photographed the bottom of Rodreguez's shoes and faxed the image to McClafferty. Just as the sun was setting, he found matches in the dust. For the next seven hours he and the other agents tracked them by flashlight.

"We figured she was in bad shape," McClafferty said. "She was walking around in circles. She went for help then went back to her son but couldn't find him."

In the end, McClafferty smelled the boy's remains before he found them.

"She carried her kid in the desert for four or five hours and not one of them helped her," McClafferty said of the others who walked in with Rodreguez. "I've seen a lot in six years, but this kid thing was one of those that I just couldn't file away."More Deaths Expected

After being expelled from the United States, Rodreguez was allowed back on May 18 on a short-term humanitarian visa to identify her son's body. An autopsy revealed that the probable cause of death was dehydration and exposure to the sun. The temperature had been above 100 degrees during their journey.

DOJ_NMG_0032129

Eric Peters, deputy chief medical examiner for Pima County, placed the time of death between May 13 and May 14, meaning the boy had probably died in his mother's arms.

The last time a young child died on the border, according to Pima County records, was November, when a 1-year-old girl succumbed to pneumonia. Peters said authorities told him they had seen women with babies trudging through the reservation lands, and he and his colleagues are bracing for more child deaths this summer.

The Tohono O'odham police considered charging Rodreguez with child endangerment, but the Pima County attorney's office said it had no interest in prosecuting her. Rodreguez returned to Mexico on May 20 and her son's body followed two days later.

Ramos Cardoso said he tried to persuade Rodreguez to speak to the media because the consulate hoped her story would encourage others not to follow her.

"She had been through a lot of suffering," he said. "She told us she just wanted to go home."

800 Guard Members To Be Added To Border Soon (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The National Guard will have 800 troops along the U.S.-Mexican border by mid-June, and the 6,000 troops President Bush pledged to send to the southern border will be in place by Aug. 1, Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum said Monday.

Blum, chief of the Guard, said 40% of the troops will be stationed in Arizona, where illegal migrants have overwhelmed the Border Patrol. The rest will be evenly divided among California, New Mexico and Texas.

The troops are being sent to augment the Homeland Security Department's Border Patrol while the agency recruits 6,000 additional agents. If the Border Patrol can meet that goal, set by Bush in a speech May 15, it will have 18,000 agents by the end of 2008, a doubling since the Sept. 11 attacks prompted tighter border security.

“It's going to be a very dynamic operation over the next two years,” Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar said. “As a force multiplier, it will be tremendous” to have the Guard's help, he said.

Despite the weekend arrests near Toronto of 17 terrorism suspects, Aguilar said no National Guard troops and no more border agents will be sent to the U.S.-Canadian border. Because nearly all illegal immigration is from the south, fewer than one in 10 of the Border Patrol's nearly 12,000 agents work at the Canadian border.

Aguilar said northern border agents are “at high alert” and are conducting more vigilant ID checks and car and truck inspections at border crossings.

National Guard troops have worked with the Border Patrol and the Drug Enforcement Administration for nearly 20 years along the southern border, mostly helping the Border Patrol catch drug smugglers. There are nearly 500 Guard members there now, including more than 50 from Utah and Connecticut who just arrived in Arizona. None of those are part of Bush's Operation Jump Start plan to make troops available over the next two years to try to stem illegal immigration and tighten security.

Blum said his troops will not have law enforcement duties and will not arrest people who sneak across the border. They will help border agents build roads, monitor surveillance cameras, install sensors and do other engineering and maintenance work. They'll also pick up office duties, freeing border agents to patrol the border and make more arrests.

55 Utah Guardsmen Join Border Agents In Arizona (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

The first contingent of National Guard troops -- a 55-member platoon from Utah -- has arrived in Arizona to help protect the U.S.-Mexico border and is expected to build fences, repair roads and erect better border lighting as part of President Bush's plan to crack down on illegal entry.

The soldiers arrived for the weekend in San Luis, Ariz., about 25 miles south of Yuma, which has surfaced in recent months as one of the busiest illegal alien corridors in the country. The U.S. Border Patrol's Yuma sector is responsible for 118 miles of the border with Mexico, with apprehensions of illegal aliens -- 100,000 through May -- up 13 percent from the same period last year.

The presence of National Guard troops, who are not expected to perform law-enforcement functions, is aimed at freeing up Border Patrol agents to focus on enforcement along the border. A total of 300 National Guard troops are expected in Arizona by June 15.

Mr. Bush has proposed sending 6,000 National Guard troops to Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California.

DOJ_NMG_0032130

The 55 Guard members in Arizona are from the 116th, 1457th and 489th units of the Utah National Guard and arrived Saturday aboard a C-130 cargo plane. They will help repair and expand a 12-foot-high corrugated metal fence that separates San Luis and Mexico and a chain-link fence 50 yards inside the border.

Last week, Mr. Bush said 6,000 National Guard troops will be deployed along the U.S.-Mexico border to assist the Border Patrol by operating surveillance systems, analyzing intelligence, installing fences and vehicle barriers, building patrol roads and providing training.

"In other words, they're going to be a complement to the Border Patrol. The Guard units will not be involved in direct law-enforcement activities. That's the job of the Border Patrol," he said. "The United States is not going to militarize our border. What we're going to do is support those who we hire to do the job of enforcing the border."

Mr. Bush said that as the Border Patrol hires additional agents and as new technologies become available, the Guard force will be reduced -- probably by 2008.

"The federal government's working to conclude formal agreements with California and Arizona and New Mexico and Texas that will define the roles and responsibilities of National Guard units deploying to the southern border," he said in a speech Thursday before the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "We're going to work closely with the governors of those states to secure this border."

Last year, the Tucson and Yuma sectors of the Border Patrol apprehended more than half of the 1.15 million foreigners caught trying to sneak into the United States.

On Sunday, T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents all 10,500 of the Border Patrol's nonsupervisory agents, said during a speech in Las Vegas that he doubted the deployment of 6,000 Guard troops on the border will stop the flow of illegal aliens.

"It's great to have help, but they're only going to be able to do so much," said Mr. Bonner, a 28-year Border Patrol veteran. "The answer is to turn off the employer magnet, focus on the reason people are crossing borders."

Mr. Bonner has vigorously argued that although most politicians know that the availability of jobs draws people to illegally enter the United States, few have supported legislation addressing the problem. He said the pending immigration enforcement bills in the House and Senate fail to "effectively reduce the employment magnet."

Utah Guard Unit Patrols U.S.-Mexico Border (AP-Y2)

By Arthur H. Rotstein

AP2, June 5, 2006

Military bulldozers, road graders and other heavy equipment rumbled along the Mexican border early Monday as more than 50 National Guardsmen from Utah became the first unit to get to work under President Bush's crackdown on illegal immigration.

The soldiers with the 116th Construction Support Equipment Company will hit their work sites by 5:30 a.m. during their two weeks of duty. They will improve a dirt road running parallel to the border, fill in gaps in fortified fencing and run wiring for new lighting to help the Border Patrol spot illegal crossers.

"It's exciting to do something that's relevant to the safety of the United States," said Capt. Talon Greeff, the unit's commander. "There is a sense of excitement when you are doing something real-world."

The goal is to strengthen the border and free up border agents to catch illegal immigrants.

The guardsmen are unarmed and wearing hardhats instead of Kevlar helmets — "we do not want to appear as if we're militarizing the border," Greeff said. They will not perform any law enforcement duties.

The troops arrived in Yuma on Saturday and were briefed Sunday on their mission and given tips on how to survive the triple-digit heat of the Arizona desert.

Under Bush's plan, up to 6,000 National Guardsmen will be sent to the four southern border states. Officials say 300 Guardsmen from Arizona are expected to begin arriving at the state's border in mid-June.

The Utah unit is working in San Luis, 25 miles south of Yuma, home of the nation's busiest Border Patrol station. Two sets of barriers run along the border: a 12-foot corrugated-metal fence and, about 50 yards to the north, an 8-foot chain-link fence topped with barbed wire. Surveillance cameras are mounted on towers, and stadium lights help agents spot people trying to slip across at night.

Most of the 11 soldiers assigned to operate the heavy equipment have full-time jobs in the construction business in Utah. They would normally be pulling two weeks of training duty at this time of year anyway.

Now they are working to widen the dusty dirt track used by the Border Patrol, compact it and top it with gravel so agents can get to hot spots faster.

DOJ_NMG_0032131

"They all feel pretty privileged to be out here as part of the first group," said Sgt. 1st Class James Colledge, a 52-year-old truck driver from West Valley, Utah.

In San Luis, some residents were pleased with the guard's presence.

Raymond Ruiz, a clerk at Charles and Frank Auto Parts, said the response was long overdue.

"I think we need it, because besides illegal people coming across, I know there's drugs and you never know, maybe some terrorists one of these days," Ruiz said.

Others were leery, worried that legal border crossers would stop shopping.

Alex Furniture employee Israel Escobar said the Guard's presence "scares the people. No one wants to buy in the U.S."

But his co-worker, Israel Torres, disagreed.

"It's OK. It's right, because it means more security in the houses," Torres said. "I live next to the border, and I'm afraid."

Securing The Border (Again) (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

President Bush heads to New Mexico today to visit his new favorite school, the Border Patrol Academy. He wants it to train thousands more federal agents, but they'll make little difference unless Bush can teach Republicans the lesson learned by agents like Buck Brandemuehl a half century ago — the last time anyone could seriously claim the border was under control.

In the 1950's, federal agents were initially overwhelmed by waves of Mexican farmworkers illegally crossing the border. The number of immigrants apprehended surpassed half a million in 1951 and was approaching 900,000 in 1953, a level roughly comparable to the situation now.

Back then there were fewer than 2,000 federal agents patrolling the borders, less than a fifth the size of today's force. But within two years, the flow of illegal immigrants declined so drastically that the immigration service declared in its 1955 annual report, "The border has been secured."

And it stayed that way the rest of the decade. The number of immigrants caught kept dropping until it reached 45,000 in 1959 — a decline of 95 percent in just six years.

"We really had to scratch for illegals," recalls Brandemuehl, who worked along the New Mexico border in the late 1950's. "We'd do traffic checks and freight-train checks, but we weren't apprehending many people. We'd go camp on the border and look for tracks, but in 30 days you might apprehend only 15 or 20 people, and a lot of them weren't even farmworkers. They were criminals sneaking back and forth to rob ranchers."

What stopped the farmworkers from sneaking across? It wasn't simply the get-tough measures that Republicans are calling for today. Although federal agents did intensify their efforts, conducting sweeps of farms and ranches, immigration officials realized that stricter enforcement wasn't enough.

Along with the crackdown, officials encouraged farmers and ranchers to legally hire Mexican temporary workers called braceros. As new rules made it easier to hire braceros, the number of these legal workers doubled to more than 400,000 at the same time illegal immigration was plummeting.

"We wanted people to come in the front door, not the back door," Brandemuehl says. The agents' job became simpler not only because there were fewer Mexicans to catch but also because there was more help from American employers. Once farmers and ranchers could legally get the workers they needed, they were more willing to cooperate with agents tracking down illegal immigrants.

Unfortunately, though, Congress started shutting the front door. The bracero program became controversial, partly because American labor unions objected to the competition and partly because of concerns that Mexicans were being exploited. Some of the complaints were legitimate, but Congress's response didn't leave immigrants any better off.

They ended up with even fewer rights because they were working illegally after the bracero program was restricted in 1960 and then eliminated four years later. As the number of legal workers entering from Mexico dropped during the 1960's, the number of illegal immigrants shot back up, and kept increasing after new limits were placed on other visas available to Mexicans in 1968.

The border has been out of control ever since, even though the number of agents has grown to 11,000. "Tough enforcement alone can't work unless you allow more people in legally," says Stuart Anderson of the National Foundation for American Policy, who has studied the impact of the bracero program.

Today President Bush and the Senate are trying to apply that lesson by expanding the number of legal immigrants and temporary workers. These visiting workers would have more rights than braceros, which is why the reforms are supported by the United Farm Workers and other unions.

DOJ_NMG_0032132

But Republicans in the House are resisting. They say they won't expand legal opportunities until the border is first secured — which will never happen if they have their way.

In 1958, a high-ranking immigration official named James Hennessy was quizzed by a House committee about his agency's success in controlling the border. He said it was due in large part to the increase in legal immigration. When he was asked how his agents would control the border if the bracero program ended, he gave a prescient reply that's more relevant than ever today:

"We can't do the impossible, Mr. Congressman."

Mexico Hopes Reserve Will Slow Crossings (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, June 5, 2006

Mexico is creating an environmental reserve about 30 feet wide and 600 miles long on the Texas border, a "green wall" to protect the Rio Grande from the roads and staging areas that smugglers use to ferry drugs and migrants across the frontier.

Much of this border zone is remote and inhospitable — generally too rough to hike through unless you're a black bear or a pronghorn sheep, species that have flourished in the area's deserts and mountains.

And that's the way Mexico wants to keep it.

While the proposed Rio Bravo del Norte Natural Monument is only about 30 feet wide, it will connect two large protected areas south of the river. When a third nature reserve, known as Ocampo, is created this year, the protected areas in Mexico will form a "wall" of millions of acres of wilderness, matching Texas' Big Bend parks foot-by-foot along the border.

"This stretch of border is the safest one we have. It's safe because it has wilderness on both sides," said Carlos Manterrola, who heads the environmental group Unidos Para la Conservacion.

Big Bend National Park has had some problems with migrant and drug trafficking, but superintendent John King says extending protected areas on either side of the border will likely keep the problem from getting worse.

"When you have a roadless area, you make it more difficult for these activities to happen," King said.

The strip protects a much longer stretch of riverbank, from just downstream of the Texas border town of Presidio to the outskirts of Laredo, Texas, raising the possibility of still larger reserves that will serve as biological corridors, encouraging four-footed traffic but making it exceedingly difficult for humans to pass.

In other border areas where U.S. reserves aren't fully matched in Mexico — such as Arizona's Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument — primitive roads and ramshackle hamlets have sprung up on the Mexican side to provide supplies and staging areas to illegal border crossers. They have then overrun U.S. wilderness areas.

As the U.S. puts up more fencing near cities and popular crossing zones, migrants will likely be looking for new routes in remote areas.

That happened with the Mexican hamlet of Las Chepas, which became a hub for undocumented border crossers. The problem got so bad that Mexican authorities — at the urging of New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson — bulldozed 31 buildings to discourage them from being used as a smuggling haven.

Now, Mexico is working on yet another "mirror" border reserve, to be announced this summer in an area known as the Janos grasslands, roughly west of Las Chepas and across from the Alamo Hueco Mountains and Big Hatchet Mountains Wilderness areas in New Mexico's boot heel region.

Law enforcement is a problem at many Mexican parks, but if well policed, the 1.2 million acres of the proposed Janos wilderness area could not only protect one of the largest prairie dog populations in North America, but also present a natural barrier to smugglers moving deeper into the wild as border security tightens.

Mexican ranchers and environmentalists applauded the Rio Bravo del Norte proposal, which was published Monday, starting a 30-day comment period. Along with the Ocampo wilderness, it will protect several pine- and oak-clad mountains often described as "sky islands," temperate mountaintop enclaves divided by seas of heat-seared desert or grassland.

"This would close the circle," said Jesus Armando Verduzco, a 73-year-old ranch owner from Ocampo. "Perhaps later, we could do a bit of hunting, eco-tourism, preserve it for humanity."

Some environmentalists say this policy of establishing nature preserves along the border could be a more effective alternative to the walls and "smart" fences being pondered in Congress.

"The whole idea that people are coming up through wilderness and roadless areas, and that's simply not the case," said David Hodges, policy director of the Sky Island Alliance. "People have a tendency to stay near roads, because they don't get lost and that's where they get picked up. ... It would be disastrous to put roads through these areas."

AP: Millions Of Visa Overstays Overlooked (AP-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0032133

By Will Weissert
AP2, June 5, 2006

Millions of illegal immigrants in the United States never jumped the U.S.-Mexico border where Congress wants to erect impenetrable walls and President Bush is sending National Guard troops to patrol. They never sneaked in at all.

The little-acknowledged reality is that nearly half the estimated 12 million undocumented foreigners in the United States entered on bona fide U.S. visas — and simply never left. Authorities call them "overstays" who have been largely overlooked in the vitriolic debate on immigration.

"The southwestern border gets all the attention, but it's staggering the number of people who come and overstay their visa," said Dean Boyd, a spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Washington. "It's a very large-scale problem."

A study by the Washington-based Pew Hispanic Center last month indicated that 45 percent of the undocumented migrants in the United States overstayed legal visas.

Confirming those findings or knowing the home country of those who overstay their visas is tricky because U.S. authorities don't track the problem. Immigration authorities also generally don't compare entry and exit information to see who should have left the country.

"There's no annual reports published on visa overstays because obviously these people are hiding and don't want to be found," Boyd said.

Ana Luisa certainly doesn't, so she asked that her last name not be used. The Mexico City native lives in Dallas with her husband, 13-year-old son and 5-month-old daughter — who was born in the United States and is an American citizen — and volunteers at a middle school.

When she moved to the United States, she made sure to return to Mexico every six months to renew her tourist visa. But the trip soon became a chore and she let her visa lapse a year ago. Now if she returns to Mexico again she likely won't be able to get another U.S. visa.

"I'm illegal, but I'm someone who is trying to help with my work," she said in a phone interview.

Ana Luisa said she would never have sneaked across the border to get into the United States, and didn't see the harm in overstaying her visa. In Dallas, she said, her son is able to get a better education than he would in Mexico.

"I wouldn't risk my life in the river or in the desert like thousands of others do," she said.

Many borrow the social security numbers of legal residents or use falsified documents to build what appear to be legal identities, making it difficult for employers to know when someone is undocumented. Others work informally, as maids, gardeners or in other jobs where employers rarely require paperwork, despite federal law.

The immigration reforms soon to be hashed out in a Congressional conference committee may crack down on employers who fail to make sure their workers are legal. But it's unclear whether the proposed reforms will send many "overstayers" home.

The U.S. State Department issued nearly 5.4 million temporary, nonimmigrant visas in fiscal year 2005, and about 17 percent went to Mexicans. The most common visas are for tourism, business travel and medical care.

Boyd said he couldn't pinpoint the type of visa that is overstayed the most. Thousands of foreigners who come as students remain in the United States after finishing school or dropping out, and many who come on work visas lose their jobs or stay after their papers expire.

Of course, getting a visa in the first place is a challenge. Lines at the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City form before dawn. Applicants pay $100 for an appointment, bringing proof of employment, savings and family and community roots.

Still, Embassy spokeswoman Judith Bryan said most applicants are approved — about 70 percent.

"The main thing is you have to have sufficient ties to your home country to show you are coming back," she said. "The law — not just for Mexico but everywhere — says that the burden is on the applicant to prove they aren't going to stay. In some cases that's very difficult, especially if you have a lot of family in the U.S. and you don't own property or have money in a bank at home."

Ricardo Ortiz, 55, said visitors who overstay their visas have made it harder for honest people to get visas in the first place. For each of the past 10 years, he has spent nine months working legally at a Long Island racehorse farm.

"Those who are working there and don't have papers are making trouble and holding up our visas," he said, waiting for his Embassy appointment in Mexico City. "We are legal workers, and we are being unfairly hurt."

Nasario Perez, 36, spent three hours on a bus to get to his embassy appointment. He hoped to take a landscaping job in New York state, but said there was no way he would overstay his visa.

"If I do good work and then leave, I will have a chance to get a visa the next time," he said. "That's more important than extra money I could make by staying too long."

Immigration Debate Stirs Racial Tensions (AP-Y2)

By Erin Texeira

AP2, June 5, 2006

As the fight over immigration reform drags on, an ominous undercurrent to the debate — racism — is becoming more pronounced.

From muttered ethnic slurs to violent attacks, activists say an anti-immigrant backlash seems to be growing in America's neighborhoods and workplaces. A few political leaders have called proposed immigration measures before Congress "racist."

"The climate has gotten demonstrably worse and it is racially charged," said Devin Burghart of the Center for New Community, which tracks anti-immigrant activity. "It's not simply a debate about immigration policy. ... It's about race and national identity and who and what we are as Americans."

Some activists say the House of Representatives started it.

When lawmakers passed a bill in December that would make illegal immigrants felons, many felt that was a swipe at Latinos, who make up 80 percent of the nation's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants. Former President Jimmy Carter has said the bill had "racist overtones," and that feeling helped push more than 1 million demonstrators to attend street rallies in recent months.

Some reacted the same way after the Senate passed an amendment to its immigration bill last month that declared English the national language. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat, called that "racist" and "divisive."

The amendment's sponsor, Oklahoma Republican Sen. James Inhofe (news, bio, voting record), replied that Reid's statements were "ridiculous." Republican Rep. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, who wrote much of the House bill, issued a study on six countries' immigration policies and found that five — including Mexico — make illegal entry into their nation a criminal offense.

But Luis Valenzuela, of the Long Island Immigration Alliance in New York, said the measures feel hostile to many immigrants. The bills "set (an) overall climate which is quite racist," he said. "That elicits action by extremists."

Mark Potok of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which has tracked hate crimes for decades, said that hate groups "consistently try and exploit any public discussion that has some kind of racial angle, and immigration has worked for hate groups in America better than any issue in years."

The Anti-Defamation League, a nonprofit that fights anti-Semitism and other bias, put out a report last month that said "hateful and racist rhetoric" aimed at Latino immigrants had grown "to a level unprecedented in recent years."

The report did not give an overall figure for hate speech and hate crimes, but detailed numerous examples including:

· Two men in Tennessee who were sentenced to prison in December for shattering windows and painting Nazi symbols in a local Mexican market.

· Internet video games, such as one called "Border Patrol," urge players to shoot characters drawn as Latino caricatures.

· New Jersey Internet radio talk show host Hal Turner posted an "ethnic cleansing manual" on his Web site days after the massive May 1 protests.

Near Houston, two white teenagers were arrested in April, accused of beating a Latino youth and sodomizing him with a pipe. Days later, on Long Island, a white teen was accused of threatening two Latinos with a machete and a chain saw. Police say ethnic slurs were used in each case.

In Herndon, Va., opponents of a day laborer work site regularly picket it, taking photographs of workers and threatening to follow them home, said Bill Threlkeld, director of Project Hope and Harmony, a nonprofit that runs the site.

When a man protesting the site wore a "Whites Only" T-shirt, a neighborhood controversy had become an ethnic issue, Threlkeld said.

Sociologist Gonzalo Santos of California State University at Bakersfield said immigration is just the latest example of social policy issues taking on racial overtones in America.

"People talk about immigration as if race doesn't matter, saying 'No, I don't have anything against immigrants or Mexicans, it's just the illegal part of it I don't like.' But those are code words," he said. "We experience race in this country through issues like welfare policy, anti-poverty programs and now immigration."

Cecilia Munoz of the National Council of La Raza said it's important for immigration advocates not to slip into bias themselves. Most people on the other side are engaging in civil discussions focused on public policy, not ethnicity, she said.

"The assumption is that we believe everybody who disagrees with us in this debate must be a racist but that's absolutely false," Munoz said. "But we are feeling the effects of what can only be described as racism and hatred.

"We get letters with ethnic slurs. I've personally been called 'wetback' and a word beginning with 'n' that I don't like to say. This is in the last two months."

DOJ_NMG_0032135

Increasingly, security is a concern. For the first time at its annual conference last year, La Raza offered a program to community groups on how to stay safe amid harassment.

"It was well-attended," Munoz said. "We plan to do it again this year."

___

On the Net:

Anti-Defamation League: http://www.adl.org

Southern Poverty Law Center: http://www.splcenter.org

Witness To The American Dream (USAT)

By Patrick Welsh

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Until the early '80s, the central issue at T.C. Williams High School, where I teach, was always this: How do we teach relatively well-off whites and relatively poor blacks together without shortchanging or alienating either group?

But while T.C. and the rest of the Alexandria, Va., school system wrestled with the black-white issue, another challenge surfaced. A steady influx of Hispanic students, many of them destitute Central Americans illiterate in their own language, gradually transformed the complexion of the community.

With all the recent talk of immigration reform, one thing has become clear to me: While Congress still must thrash out its differences on policy, I can put real faces on this issue. Each day, I teach students who are immigrants, probably legal and illegal, and I can tell you that when I look into the eyes of these kids, I do not feel the sort of fear or loathing that some Americans have voiced. Instead, I see on their part a yearning to learn and a motivation to succeed that I don't always see in my American-born students.

Certainly, we cannot open the door to every immigrant who wants to make this country home. But for those already here, I hope they will be given the opportunity to stay. These students not only enrich our society, but they also bring parts of the world closer together.

Magnet for immigrants

Since the early '70s, Alexandria, right across the river from Washington, D.C., has been a magnet for immigrants from trouble spots all over the world. At T.C., Alexandria's only high school, I have taught kids from such places as Korea, Iran, Vietnam, Afghanistan and Ethiopia. Getting to know these kids has given teachers and students a sense of being connected to the larger world. Though many Americans had no idea where Afghanistan was prior to the 9/11 terrorist attacks, it was very familiar to me. For years, I had been teaching students whose parents had escaped from the cities of Kabul and Kandahar after the Russian invasion in 1979.

But I'd be less than honest if I didn't say that as a teacher I am well aware of the enormous social problems many immigrant families have. In some cases, parents come here alone before sending for their children. When the kids finally do arrive, often as teenagers, they hardly know their parents and are rebellious. More common is that both parents work two jobs to survive; as a result, the kids are often left on their own. Some students are lured into gangs. Then there is the high rate of teen pregnancy, which leads many girls to drop out of school and become a burden on social services.

In the past two decades, the Hispanic population has been the only one in the school system to grow: from 5.3% in 1983 to 26.7% today. One section of the city is now called Chirilagua, after a province in El Salvador.

Alexandria, which is known for its liberal politics, reacted to this growth with disbelief, shock and anger. Many residents blamed city officials for allowing immigrant families, many of them illegal, to overcrowd apartments. Blacks primarily saw Hispanics as cutting into their jobs and benefits.

Still, what I've witnessed are the virtues of the majority of these immigrant families. Many of them have family values and a work ethic that would shame many American families. While my middle-class students work for luxuries — to pay for the tanning salon or the latest cellphone or hot accessory for their car — most Hispanic kids I see work to support their families here or those who were left back in their native country. While middle-class neighborhoods are still dormant at 5 a.m., Chirilagua is bustling as men go out to work construction throughout the area.

Successful transitions

Many immigrant families have successfully assimilated into society over generations. I recently read in our local newspaper the name of Ilryong Moon, a Harvard graduate who is chairman of the Fairfax County, Va., school board. I remembered him in my class as a 16-year-old, fresh from Korea and fiercely determined to master English.

Victor Ignacio is a highly respected Alexandria police detective. His father left the Dominican Republic to settle in America, and five years later sent for Victor, then 12 years old, and the rest of the family.

DOJ_NMG_0032136

Many of our school history books are filled with success stories of immigrants who have made significant contributions to America. But there are still more stories to be written. Take T.C. Williams senior Jeff Hernandez. He knows how different his life would have been had his mother not left war-torn El Salvador 20 years ago and made the dangerous journey through Mexico to the California border, where she slipped into the USA illegally. Eventually, she ended up as a housekeeper and was sponsored for citizenship by her employers.

On the two trips he took to El Salvador, Jeff, who was born in the United States, saw poverty that stunned him. That made him all the more determined to live his mother's American dream. The captain of T.C. Williams' Virginia state champion 4x400 relay team, Jeff will enter Virginia Commonwealth University in the fall, the first member of his family to attend college.

The transformation that has taken place in Alexandria merely represents a microcosm of what is going on across America today. As a teacher on one of the frontlines where immigration is most visible, I can assure you we have nothing to fear, and much to hope for, from these students and their families.

Patrick Welsh is an English teacher at T.C. Williams High School in Alexandria, Va., and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

TAX:

Lost IRS Laptop Stored Employee Fingerprints (MSNBC)

By Bob Sullivan

MSNBC.com, June 5, 2006

A laptop computer containing fingerprints of Internal Revenue Service employees is missing, MSNBC.com has learned.

The computer was lost during transit on an airline flight in the western United States, IRS spokesman Terry Lemon said. No taxpayer information was on the lost laptop, Lemon said.

In all, the IRS believes the computer contained information on 291 employees and job applicants, including fingerprints, names, Social Security numbers, and dates of birth. The fingerprints had been collected as part of a normal background screening process. Some job applicants' information also was also on the computer.

Story continues below ? advertisement

"Right now the laptop is classified as missing. We don't know if it was stolen," Lemon said.

Nothing on the computer would put taxpayer information at risk, Lemon said. The fingerprints and other data could be not used to falsify an IRS ID badge, he said. The matter has been turned over the to IRS inspector general's office.

"Our taxpayer data is on completely different systems," he said. "No taxpayer data is involved."

Lemon said he could not narrow the list of people who might be on the computer, other than to say they were from "western and Midwest" regions. The IRS has attempted to contact all 291 people by telephone, and will soon send a notification letter to each affected employee and applicant.

Data on the laptop was not encrypted, Lemon said, but it was "double password protected," meaning someone would have to enter two different passwords to access the data. He said there is no indication the data had been used to commit ID theft.

The story echoes news last month that a Veterans Administration employee had lost a laptop computer containing 26 million veterans' Social Security numbers. That laptop was apparently stolen during a house burglary.

Kill The 'Death Tax' (USAT)

By Sen. Jon Kyl

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Americans believe the estate tax — or "death tax" — is the most unfair tax of all.

A Gallup Poll conducted in April found that 58% of respondents said that "inheritance taxes" are unfair, contrasted with only 42% who said the dreaded Alternative Minimum Tax is unfair.

This year, the death tax rate is 46%! That means the government will take nearly half of everything you have worked for and saved, over an exemption of $2 million, even after you have paid taxes throughout your life. No wonder Americans don't think the tax is reasonable.

While this newspaper's editorial board agrees that we need to increase the exemption — a $2 million exemption will not go far with rising home prices and half of all Americans investing in the stock market — we would be foolish to ignore the economic damage that is caused by setting the rate at a punitive level.

The death tax is a tax on capital, since most of an estate's assets are capital in nature. A recent congressional Joint Economic Committee study said that this tax has reduced the amount of capital in our economy by about $847 billion over the past 60 years. Just imagine how many more jobs would have been created, and how much our economy would have grown, if that capital had been available for private investment rather than being spent by the government.

DOJ_NMG_0032137

As the 2004 Nobel Prize-winning economist Dr. Edward Prescott has explained, very high tax rates discourage people from working, saving and investing. Why bother if the government is going to take half of what you earn from the additional effort?

Ideally, we should repeal the death tax as many of our trading partners, including Canada and Australia, have done.

At the very least, we should increase the exemption and reduce the rate to the same level as the tax on capital gains, so that those who pay it can do so without being forced to sell off business assets.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., is chairman of the Senate Finance Subcommittee on Taxation and IRS Oversight.

Wealthy Can't Avoid Death — But Will They Evade Taxes? (USAT)

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Last year, Hurricane Katrina struck just as the Senate was about to vote on repealing the estate tax. Senators prudently shelved the issue, deciding it wouldn't look good to slash taxes for the wealthiest Americans when tens of thousands of poor people had lost their homes and livelihoods.

Now, with the Katrina coverage receding, the issue is back on the Senate calendar. A vote could come as early as this week. Estate-tax opponents concede they might not have the votes for outright repeal. But they still hope to reduce the tax rate on inherited wealth to as low as 15% from the current 46%.

That was a bad idea last year, and it's still a bad idea. Taxes must be paid by someone, and it is hard to think who they harm less than people who are both very rich and dead.

Ending the estate tax would reduce revenue between $290 billion and $745 billion over 10 years, depending on how the accounting is done.

How would that money be recouped? There are only two choices: Raise taxes on working Americans, or pass the cost on to future generations, already burdened by $8.3 trillion in government debt and exploding costs for Medicare and Social Security. Either approach is unacceptable.

Ironically, the same reality that led to the adoption of the estate tax in 1916 — the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few families — might bring about its repeal. Families such as the Waltons, of Wal-Mart fame, and the candy-making Mars clan have supported lobbying campaigns to end the tax. The campaigns are focusing pressure on home-state senators, several of them Democrats who ordinarily proclaim themselves champions of the middle class.

Since the rich are an influential but limited constituency, estate-tax foes have used misinformation to convince farmers and small business owners that the issue concerns them. In fact, the truth is very different:

· Generous exemptions keep the vast majority of estates from paying what the opponents call the "death tax." This year, only 12,600 estates are projected to pay. That's a tiny fraction of 1% of all estates.

· It is not "double taxation," as some critics say. Most of today's fortunes are in shares of companies that have never been taxed because they haven't been sold. Bill Gates, for example, has about $23 billion in untaxed Microsoft shares.

Estate-tax opponents argue that the rates are confiscatory. But there's no reason the tax on inherited, unearned income should be any lower than the top rate, which has varied from 38.6% to 35% in recent years, paid by highly skilled workers on their daily toil. And if there's to be any reduction, supporters have an obligation to say how they'll replace the revenue. In five years in power, Republicans have evaded that responsibility, adding more than $2 trillion in debt with tax cuts and spending increases.

Some adjustments to the estate tax may be in order. Under current law, for example, it is set to expire for one year (2010) and then return in subsequent years. This creates some perverse incentives for people who have, or stand to inherit, vast fortunes.

When the tax comes back in 2011, the exemption would be $1 million, or $2 million per couple. Keeping it at its 2009 levels of $3.5 million and $7 million would ensure that any family farm or company that could truly be called a small business would incur little or no tax.

As they prepare to vote on what would be a huge windfall for the wealthiest Americans, senators should recall the sense of shame that prompted them to hold off last summer. Nothing has changed, except for the weather.

Death And Taxes (WP)

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

THE SENATE will debate whether to repeal the estate tax today, and the first decisive vote is expected Thursday. The House has voted in favor of repeal and the administration, which has pushed a temporary suspension into law, would be delighted to support permanent abolition; the Senate's voice will therefore be decisive. But the arguments for repeal are by turns wrong, muddled and internally contradictory.

DOJ_NMG_0032138

Abolitionists say the estate tax forces the liquidation of family farms and businesses. In 2000, according to the Congressional Budget Office, 1,659 farms were liable for the tax, but fully 1,521 of these had sufficient liquid assets to pay without selling any land. In 2000, likewise, 485 taxable estates included a small business, but 321 of these could pay the tax without selling any of the firm. Moreover, heirs can spread estate tax payments over 14 years, so even those without liquid assets have plenty of time to take over the farm or firm, manage it productively, and thus generate the cash to pay the tax. So the estate tax wasn't forcing the fire sale of large numbers of family farms and businesses even in 2000, before the Bush tax cuts kicked in. Now that the amount that a couple can pass on tax-free has jumped from $1.3 million to $4 million, the mass-liquidation claim is even less accurate.

But it is also muddled. Suppose that the estate tax does force the sale of some farms and businesses; is that necessarily a bad thing? Well, it would mean that the heirs don't have the inclination or ability to manage the farm or the small business and turn a profit -- otherwise they would earn enough to pay the tax over the 14-year period. From the standpoint of job creation, it's a mistake to leave a farm or small business in the hands of heirs who don't know how to turn a profit on it; better that those assets be sold to purchasers who will maximize their value. Far from promoting a vibrant small-business and farm sector, the abolition of the estate tax would increase the number of businesses and farms that are managed by non-vibrant sons and daughters.

Meanwhile, abolitionists also claim that the tax doesn't raise much anyway, so why not kill it? Well, it's expected to raise $776 billion in the decade starting in 2012; if abolitionists view this as chump change, how can they pretend it's ravaging a sector of the economy? The abolitionists also assert that a revision in the treatment of capital gains would offset the revenue lost by repeal of the estate tax, but Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation has analyzed this claim and found it empty. Finally, the abolitionists argue that the estate tax discourages saving: If you can't leave your money to your heirs tax-free, then why not go out and spend it? But people facing the estate tax -- basically, retired couples sitting on more than $4 million -- are probably spending as much as they want to spend anyway. Besides, any small decrease in their savings is likely to be offset by the increase in government saving resulting from the tax, and by possibly higher saving by heirs, who won't spend so freely if their inheritance faces taxation.

In short, the exotic arguments in favor of abolishing the estate tax don't match the obvious ones for keeping it. The nation faces serious budget deficits, so why abolish a revenue stream? Inequality is rising, so why kill the most progressive federal tax? The competitive and meritocratic basis for the nation's economic success is under threat, so why take action that would encourage hereditary elites to entrench themselves?

The Estate Tax, Back On The Agenda (NYT)

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

Still giddy over the passage last month of a $70 billion income tax cut for affluent Americans, Senate Republicans are hoping this week to go further, and gut the federal estate tax. And they'll probably try to accomplish this gift to the super-rich under the guise of compromise.

Their fondest wish would be to permanently repeal the tax. But planning, during a time of war, to give away nearly $1 trillion over 10 years may look too radical even for this crowd. So the senators are also considering a so-called middle-of-the-road approach. Sponsored by Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, the "compromise" would drastically raise the thresholds at which the estate tax kicks in, while slashing the estate tax rate. Together, those changes would cut taxes for the wealthiest families by $652 billion between 2012 and 2021, the first full decade of the proposed cut. Because the government would need to borrow to make up for that lost revenue, the tax cut would also cost all taxpayers some $175 billion in higher interest payments.

And for what? Fully 71 percent of the additional benefits would go to people who stand to inherit more than $10 million. Almost all of the rest would apply to estates worth more than $5 million.

There is no economic justification for doing this, any more than any tax cut can be justified when the economy is growing and the government is running a big deficit, as is now the case. The notion that small businesses and family farms are unfairly targeted by the estate tax is nonsense.

There is no moral justification for cutting estate taxes. Much of the wealth taxed after death has never been taxed because profits on stocks, bonds, real estate, artwork — you name it — are not taxed until an asset is sold. Obviously, people with big estates never got around to selling their assets.

And yet, some multimillionaires, and their Congressional supporters, have the gall to say that the wealthy should not be "penalized." Estate taxes imposed after one's death are no more of a penalty than income taxes withheld from paychecks.

Any senator who votes for this bill — or to end an expected filibuster — does not care about the budget deficit or tax fairness, no matter what he or she may say to the contrary.

DOJ_NMG_0032139

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Pushing Back Against Bush's Expansion Of Presidential Authority (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republican and Democratic House leaders join forces to protest the FBI search of a congressman's office. The Senate Intelligence Committee demands fuller briefings from the CIA. The Supreme Court hears a landmark case challenging presidential war powers.

After five years of a concerted White House campaign, there are tentative signs that Congress and the courts are beginning to push back against what has been the greatest expansion of presidential powers in a generation or more.

Those pushing back include some congressional Republicans and conservative jurists who have been among President Bush's chief allies. The efforts surely would intensify if Democrats won control of the House or Senate in November's elections — and with it the power to convene hearings and issue subpoenas.

"You ask, 'Is the tide shifting?' and I say, 'Maybe, maybe,' " says Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who has pushed for stronger congressional oversight of intelligence operations. "If you ask me if I still feel like a lonely voice, I would say that I feel like a member of a small chorus."

Some examples:

·House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, usually at war, issued a joint statement denouncing the FBI search last month of Rep. William Jefferson's congressional office as a violation of the separation of powers between co-equal branches of government. Their ultimatum that seized documents be returned is now the subject of negotiations with the Justice Department, which is investigating bribery allegations against Jefferson, D-La.

·The Senate Intelligence Committee voted 9-6 two weeks ago to demand that the administration notify all members of the committees about intelligence operations. The administration has bypassed the intelligence committees to inform only eight congressional leaders about such sensitive programs as the National Security Agency's warrantless-surveillance operation.

·Congressional Republicans and Democrats in March upended plans for a Dubai-owned company to take over some U.S. port operations, forcing the firm to promise to transfer the operations to a "U.S. entity." Outraged lawmakers weren't convinced when the president dismissed their national-security concerns as unfounded, and they weren't deterred when he threatened the first veto of his presidency to protect the deal.

·The White House and Congress continue to jockey over who has the last word on the treatment of terror suspects. Congress approved an amendment banning torture over the objections of Vice President Cheney. Bush signed the legislation in December but issued a "signing statement" in which he reserved the right to waive the ban, which he suggested violated his constitutional authority as commander in chief. Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner of Virginia and Arizona Sen. John McCain of Arizona, both Republicans, then issued a joint statement vowing "strict oversight to monitor" implementation of the law.

The dispute has delayed the release of a new Army Field Manual on interrogation this spring. The Los Angeles Times reported Monday that several senators say the proposed manual sets standards for terror suspects that violate the congressional ban.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino says the administration has been able to meet Congress' concerns without conceding presidential powers. She notes that administration officials agreed to brief Intelligence Committee members last month about the NSA operation, reported in The New York Times in December, which includes wiretapping calls within the United States without warrants if one of the participants is abroad. The administration calls it the Terrorist Surveillance Program.

"There have been — and always will be by nature of our system — conflicts between Congress and the White House on the limits of executive power," Perino says. "But far from clashing, the two branches have worked well together on very difficult cases and generally made accommodations on issues, like the Terrorist Surveillance Program."

It's true that Congress generally hasn't used or even threatened to use its most potent weapons in a confrontation with the White House, such as issuing subpoenas or cutting off funding for programs.

Still, Bruce Fein, a Justice Department official in the Reagan administration, says Congress' attitude toward the White House is toughening a bit. "We're seeing, maybe, the embryonic stages of drawing the line and saying: 'Here. No more,' " he says.

In the courts, too, some judges in recent months have been more willing to scrutinize Bush's assertions of presidential power.

DOJ_NMG_0032140

Judge J. Michael Luttig of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, who had been on Bush's short list of possible Supreme Court picks, last fall wrote a key opinion endorsing the administration's argument that the president could order Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen and suspected terrorist, to be held indefinitely in a military brig without charges.

But when the administration abruptly decided to charge Padilla in civilian court — apparently to avoid a possible Supreme Court reversal — the judge objected and tried to stop the transfer. Luttig, who resigned from the bench last month, warned of a "substantial cost to the government's credibility before the courts."

The Supreme Court is expected to rule this month in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, another case that could test presidential powers. Lawyers for Salim Ahmed Hamdan, Osama bin Laden's former driver, are challenging the administration's plan to put prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba on trial for war crimes in special military tribunals.

At issue: Does Bush's claim of presidential war powers override the protections of the Geneva Conventions?

Some historians say a pattern seen after previous threats to the nation's security — during the Civil War and World War II, for instance — may be repeating itself now that five years have passed since the terror attacks on Sept. 11, 2001.

"In the first few years after a crisis emerges, the courts tend to be very deferential to the White House," says Phillip Cooper of Portland State University in Oregon, who studies separation of powers. "But what tends to happen is after two or three years of deference, then the courts may begin to take a hard look at what's going on … and remind the administration they don't have carte blanche."

On Saturday, the American Bar Association's board of governors voted to establish a bipartisan task force to investigate whether Bush has gone beyond his constitutional authority in asserting a right to ignore provisions of new laws. Bush has issued more than 750 "signing statements" — more than all previous presidents combined — that state his interpretation of new laws and sometimes declare that they infringe on his presidential powers.

Even before 9/11, Cheney had made restoring presidential authority a priority. As White House chief of staff for President Ford, Cheney found himself dealing with laws passed in the wake of the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal that constrained presidential authority. The 1973 War Powers Act, for one, restricted a president's authority to launch military action without congressional approval.

Later, as a Wyoming congressman, Cheney argued that Congress was "abusing its power" when it barred the Reagan administration from funding the Nicaraguan contras. The administration's efforts to evade the law by funneling profits from secret arms sales to Iran reflected "mistakes in judgment and nothing more," according to a minority report he helped draft.

Now, as vice president, Cheney has been in a position to resist and even reverse efforts by Congress to restrain the executive. In the administration's first months, the energy task force he chaired went to court to avoid disclosing the names of industry executives it consulted.

Recently, amid the furor over the NSA's warrantless-surveillance program, Cheney took a similarly hard line. "We have all the legal authority we need," the vice president said in an interview on PBS' NewsHour With Jim Lehrer, citing the Constitution and a congressional resolution passed soon after 9/11. And Congress' role? "We said, 'Look, if you've got suggestions, we're happy to listen to them.' "

The Bush administration has taken a series of actions to expand presidential powers: Enabling past presidents and vice presidents to restrict release of their papers after the 12-year period set in law has expired. Refusing to allow aides to testify before Congress about the federal response to 9/11 and to Hurricane Katrina, arguing that might discourage staffers from providing "unvarnished advice" in the future. Asserting wartime powers to ignore federal laws and international treaties when the president says national security is at stake.

"The administration has been very consistent," Cooper says. "At every turn the White House has issued a reading as expansive as possible for its own authority, a reading as narrow as possible of congressional authority, and in some cases pre-empted the courts."

At a rare session with reporters in December, Cheney expressed satisfaction with what the administration has achieved.

"The president of the United States needs to have his constitutional powers unimpaired," Cheney said. "I do think that, to some extent now, we've been able to restore the legitimate authority of the presidency."

Bush's actions and Congress' response matter beyond his own tenure at the White House. They set precedents for future administrations and courts, though presidential powers have surged and ebbed through U.S. history.

Legal historian Kermit Hall says Bush is "in a class" with Richard Nixon and Woodrow Wilson during World War I in extending presidential authority. Tom Mann, a congressional scholar at the Brookings Institution, says Bush has exceeded even the expansive view that Franklin Roosevelt took of the presidency during the buildup to World War II.

Analysts credit Bush's ability to prevail in large part to the aftermath of 9/11, which buttressed Americans' backing for a president with the power to battle a shadowy and terrifying foe. In the fiercely partisan climate of Washington, the Republican-controlled House and Senate generally have lined up behind Bush, not challenged him.

DOJ_NMG_0032141

"For five years, this Congress has been breathtakingly supine in the face of the most aggressive assertions of executive power we have seen in modern American history," Mann says. Even now, he says, the House "blowback" over the Jefferson search "probably wouldn't have happened if we didn't have a president whose popularity is in the low 30s."

Bush's dismal job-approval ratings have made critics in Congress and elsewhere more willing to confront him. Another factor: As time passes since 9/11, the threat of terrorism remains a potent argument but may no longer automatically trump other issues.

Now, about half of Americans surveyed by USA TODAY/Gallup from Thursday to Sunday say the Bush administration has "gone too far in expanding the power of the presidency." About one-third say it has struck the right balance. Just 14% say it hasn't gone far enough.

Congress' outrage over the search of Jefferson's office hasn't struck a sympathetic chord with the public, though. In an ABC News Poll taken last week, 86% said the FBI acted properly.

Of two dozen letters to the editor to USA TODAY on the issue, many derided Congress for countenancing corruption. Several wondered why lawmakers hadn't shown equal outrage over, say, the warrantless-surveillance program. Not one praised the institution for defending separation of powers.

Even some lawmakers are skeptical about Congress' commitment to the issue. "This is a newfound interest," says Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn. "I hope it extends beyond just protecting ourselves."

How Bush Has Asserted Powers Of The Executive (USAT)

USA Today, June 6, 2006

The Bush administration has asserted broad executive powers, among them:

·To keep deliberations private — Vice President Cheney's energy task force in 2001 refused to release the names of industry executives consulted during its deliberations. A U.S. District Court judge in December 2002 dismissed a lawsuit by the non-partisan General Accounting Office seeking the information.

·To restrict access to presidential papers — Bush signed an executive order in 2001 permitting current and former presidents and vice presidents to restrict release of their papers, which under a 1978 law become available 12 years after the end of an administration.

·To set aside laws and treaties — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in his previous job as White House counsel, issued a memo asserting that the president could violate federal laws and international treaties when he viewed it as necessary for the nation's security.

·To interpret and curtail new laws — Bush has issued more than 750 "signing statements" — more than all previous presidents combined — to state his own interpretation of new laws and in some cases to claim a presidential prerogative not to enforce provisions that he says encroach on executive authority.

·To permit warrantless surveillance on certain domestic phone calls — Bush authorized the National Security Agency to wiretap domestic phone calls of terror suspects without a court warrant if one of the participants on the call is abroad. The White House cites his constitutional powers and a congressional resolution passed within days of 9/11.

·To limit judicial oversight — The president claims the authority to designate U.S. citizens as "enemy combatants" who can be held indefinitely without charges, a stance upheld last year in a decision by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. He also has asserted the right to hold terror suspects overseas and try them before special military commissions. The Supreme Court is expected to issue a ruling this month in a case on the issue.

When Reality No Longer Matches Rhetoric (FT)

By Michael Fullilove

Financial Times, June 6, 2006

President George W. Bush is well known for his verbal awkardness. Sometimes it is hard not to be disheartened by his speeches – for example, when he told a New Hampshire audience: "I know how hard it is for you to put food on your families."

In fact, though, many of the president's speeches – in particular his foreign policy speeches after 9/11 – are beautifully written and more than competently delivered. Starting with his ad-libbed bullhorn cry atop a wrecked fire truck at Ground Zero ("I can hear you. The rest of the world hears you. And the people who knocked these buildings down will hear all of us soon!") and his address to a joint session of Congress nine days after the attack, he has generally struck a fine note. If anything, Mr Bush's foreign policy speechifying suffers from the opposite problem: he is too verbal.

Many policy wonks and diplomats are nervous nellies when it comes to foreign policy speeches. They want more matter and less art. They argue that foreign policy is technical and difficult stuff, and flashiness is fatal. Of course it is true that care must be taken, shouting avoided, pronunciations checked and all the rest of it. That does not mean that foreign policy speeches need be boring. In the end, a speech is just a speech. A speech is not a treaty and drafting a speech should not be like negotiating a diplomatic text.

DOJ_NMG_0032142

Foreign policy speeches that have flair as well as substance are able to mobilise support and crystallise intent. Franklin D. Roosevelt used his fireside chats to dramatise a distant war, convert America into "the great arsenal of democracy" and ratchet up public preparedness to enter the European conflict. Ronald Reagan assembled his words and sent them into battle against the evil empire: "Mr Gorbachev, tear down this wall!"

However, a declaratory presidency also poses dangers. Mr Bush has badly overwritten his foreign policy, in two distinct ways. For most of his first term, Mr Bush pursued a muscular grand strategy aimed at imposing America's will on the world. He was the Charles Atlas of international relations. To reinforce his seriousness he delivered speeches that were strangers to nuance. They drew an explicit link between values and coercion, between freedom and force.

The reference in the 2002 State of the Union address to the "axis of evil" formed by Iran, Iraq and North Korea was the world's worst analogy: inflammatory, operationally useless and bad history to boot. On the same occasion the following year, Mr Bush upped the ante further by making a dubious assertion about Saddam Hussein's supposed hunt for uranium in Africa.

It is hard to avoid the conclusion that the sustained power of Mr Bush's language nudged the administration (and perhaps the president himself) toward risky policies that have proved costly.

Past US presidents have used their speeches to marshal the opinion of the world. Sometimes they have honeyed their words in order to sweeten their unilateral actions. The sweeping, unqualified tone of Mr Bush's rhetoric, by contrast, actually exaggerated the defects of his policies and scared off even the most ardent Americanophiles. Not only did his speeches reveal little understanding of the dilemma of multiple and diverse audiences, they also explicitly denied that such a dilemma existed. At West Point in 2002, for instance, the president decreed: "Moral truth is the same in every culture, in every time, and in every place . . . We are in a conflict between good and evil, and America will call evil by its name."

Thankfully, in the past two years US policy has reverted to a more moderate course. The failure of foreign policy adventurism, especially in Iraq, has made diplomacy the comeback concept. Washington's conditional offer to join its European partners in negotiating directly with Tehran on the nuclear issue is the latest and clearest indicator of this shift.

Strangely, though, the old highfalutin speaking style remains in place, opening up a chasm between rhetoric and reality.

In his second inaugural address in 2005, President Bush claimed that "America's vital interests and our deepest beliefs are now one" and that US policy was to promote democracy "in every nation and culture, with the ultimate goal of ending tyranny in our world". The problem with that line is that the dream of Middle Eastern dictatorships falling like dominoes ended with Washington's rapprochement with Libya. The White House's reluctance to lean too hard on allies such as Egypt and Pakistan to democratise drains the president's words of meaning.

Even worse than double standards, though, is weakness. The tenor of this year's State of the Union address was surprising because it failed utterly to reflect either the sensible recalibration of policy that has taken place or the present results of US actions. The president boasted: "We will act boldly in freedom's cause" and committed his country to "the end of tyranny in our world". But banging on about the liberty agenda when ordinary Iraqis are not at liberty to walk to the market without being kidnapped or killed is seriously damaging to foreign policy credibility.

A diplomatic briefing note does not usually make a great foreign policy speech. Neither does a string of 10-dollar words. The best speeches are finely crafted arguments. Given America's historical and continuing contribution to global peace and prosperity, any president has a very good argument to make to the world – so long as the language is not privileged over content and effect.

The writer is programme director for global issues at the Lowy Institute for International Policy in Sydney and editor of "Men and Women of Australia!" Our Greatest Modern Speeches (Vintage, 2005)

Grassley Sees Quick Paulson Confirmation (AP-Y2)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP2, June 5, 2006

Henry Paulson Jr. met Monday with the head of the Senate Finance Committee, who predicted that President Bush's selection as Treasury secretary could be confirmed and on the job by early July.

Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said he and Paulson had a productive meeting and that he believed the nomination could win Senate approval before Congress leaves for the July 4 break.

Grassley praised Paulson, chief executive of the Wall Street investment firm Goldman Sachs, for the "vast amount of experience" he will bring to the job. The 45-minute meeting marked the beginning of a round of courtesy visits Paulson will make in coming days to hear the concerns of senators.

DOJ_NMG_0032143

With his approval rating at record lows despite strong economic growth and low unemployment, Bush announced last week that he was turning to Paulson to replace Treasury Secretary John Snow, whose departure had been rumored for more than a year.

By choosing a 32-year veteran of one of Wall Street's premier investment houses, the administration is hoping for the same economic credibility that President Clinton gained when he picked Robert Rubin, one of Paulson's predecessors at Goldman Sachs, as one of his Treasury secretaries.

Paulson's selection was the latest shake-up for Bush, who in recent weeks has tapped his budget director to become the new White House chief of staff, moved his trade negotiator to the budget job and replaced the head of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Paulson did not talk to reporters after his meeting with Grassley.

Grassley said the two covered a wide range of issues from the importance of overhauling the nation's complex tax code to the need to apply pressure to China to revalue its currency as a way of dealing with America's soaring trade deficit.

The administration's nomination of Susan Schwab to replace Rob Portman in the trade job has been held up because of unhappiness by Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y., over what Schumer sees as a failure by the administration to pressure China to allow American banks and other financial service companies to operate in China.

Schwab's nomination had cleared Grassley's committee, but a vote expected before Congress left for a weeklong Memorial Day recess was delayed because of Schumer's concerns.

Grassley told reporters he would have a better idea on whether Schwab's nomination could now go forward after Schumer and Schwab hold a planned meeting on Tuesday.

Treasury Nominee Has Ties To China (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

In an administration with just 2 1/2 years to go, Henry M. Paulson Jr., President Bush's nominee for Treasury secretary, may have little chance to make a mark on many economic issues. The administration's tax policies were pretty much set in Bush's first term, and its more recent big economic initiative, aimed at revamping Social Security, is moribund.

But one issue on which Paulson can surely exert influence is the U.S. relationship with China. The Treasury secretary has formal responsibility for some major decisions to be made in coming months, such as whether to label Beijing a "currency manipulator." And when it comes to cutting deals with Beijing, few U.S. business executives can match Paulson's record.

As chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Paulson has aggressively led the firm's foray into the Chinese market, where it has become a dominant player in selling the securities of China's biggest companies to investors abroad. He takes pride in having visited China more than 70 times since 1992 and has cultivated relationships with Chinese officials at the highest levels. President Hu Jintao, for example, chose Paulson as his host when he visited the New York Stock Exchange in 2002.

To supporters of warm relations between Washington and Beijing, a Paulson-led Treasury bears the promise of a heightened level of sophistication in dealing with thorny transpacific problems, especially China's policy concerning its currency, the yuan. The administration has had only limited success in persuading China to allow a rise in the exchange rate of the yuan, which U.S. manufacturers complain is artificially cheap, giving Chinese exporters an unfair competitive edge. With his deep knowledge of China's financial system and long experience dealing with the country's officials, Paulson is ideally suited to bring Beijing around, according to many experts.

"He knows the people. They've trusted him. He can draw on that in the national interest," said C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Institute for International Economics, who is one of the most outspoken advocates among economists for a change in China's currency system. "This is exactly why you want somebody like that for a job like this."

But the U.S. Business and Industry Council, a group with a history of agitating for tough policies toward Beijing, is arguing that Paulson's associations pose a conflict of interest. Although Paulson is expected to sever his links to Goldman by disposing of his stock in the firm -- presumably by putting the shares in a blind trust, which would then sell them -- he would still feel obligated to Chinese officials, in the view of Kevin L. Kearns, the president of the group, which represents about 1,500 small and medium-size companies.

"Mr. Paulson has actively courted Beijing during his tenure at Goldman Sachs," said Kearns in a statement. "His key clients have included the Beijing government and several state-owned Chinese firms. Are we to believe that Mr. Paulson will do a sudden about-face and crack down on many of Beijing's aggressive violations of internationally accepted trade law?"

Kearns noted that as Treasury chief, Paulson would chair the interagency task force that scrutinizes foreign acquisitions of U.S. businesses for national security problems -- the panel that drew widespread criticism during the controversy over Dubai's proposed takeover of terminal operations at U.S. ports. "Would Mr. Paulson act to block Chinese attempts to purchase strategic American assets?" Kearns asked, adding that the answer is probably not because Paulson would be inclined to "use his position in the cabinet to urge continued appeasement of China." He was on Capitol Hill yesterday, hoping to drum up opposition to the nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0032144

A Goldman spokesman, Peter Rose, said Paulson would not comment pending his Senate confirmation hearing, but he scoffed at the conflict-of-interest accusation. "When Mr. Paulson becomes secretary of the Treasury, he will have totally divorced his interests from those of Goldman Sachs," he said. "The claim that he has a conflict would mean that only the ignorant could be appointed to a Cabinet position."

Goldman officials readily acknowledge that the firm has managed -- usually together with one or two other major firms -- nearly every important international securities offering by big Chinese companies.

In 1997, the firm was lead manager for a $3 billion stock sale of the country's major cellphone company -- the first issuance of shares by a big, high-tech Chinese company to investors overseas. Another, similar-size deal in which Goldman played the lead role was the 2000 sale of shares in PetroChina, the nation's flagship oil company. Just last week, Goldman co-managed the $9.73 billion sale of shares in the Bank of China -- the world's biggest initial public offering in six years. Goldman was also the first Western firm to be allowed to gain a controlling interest in a Chinese investment bank.

Paulson's role in negotiating those transactions was "very crucial," said Robert D. Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman's international business, adding that Paulson "really immersed himself in a lot of activities in China." Those include serving as chairman of the advisory board of the management school at Tsinghua University, one of the country's most prestigious institutions.

"There's a difference between having a good relationship with the Chinese and being cozy with them," said Hormats, who said Paulson "is as good as anyone around in negotiating with them." Hormats said, "I've been going to China since the early '70s, and if there's one thing I've learned, it's that you get more progress from the Chinese if they respect you and think you understand them."

So far, there is little evidence that the issue will cause Paulson problems in his confirmation. Even Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), one of the most militant lawmakers on the currency issue and a member of the Senate Finance Committee, which will consider the nomination, said he was more impressed than bothered by Paulson's business ties.

"My view is, he will understand the need to get results," said Schumer, who has spoken many times with Paulson. "And he will have a good chance of getting it done."

Restructuring At State Department `botched,' Retiree Says (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - A reorganization of the State Department offices that are leading the fight against weapons of mass destruction was badly managed and politicized, which led to a flight of experts with decades of knowledge, according to a new account by a veteran weapons expert.

Dean Rust, who watched the reorganization unfold, charges that its "botched implementation" led many career officers to leave and "will hamper the State Department's role at home and abroad for years to come."

The account by Rust, who left the department last September, appears in the upcoming issue of Arms Control Today magazine, published by the nonpartisan Arms Control Association. It's scheduled to be posted Tuesday on the group's Web site.

Knight Ridder first reported in February about problems in State Department offices that deal with weapons proliferation, one of President Bush's national security priorities.

The reorganization, which Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced last July, ostensibly was done to strengthen the department's ability to counter 21st-century weapons threats.

But, according to numerous officials and documents, it was carried out largely in secret by a panel composed of political appointees, it denied top jobs to career officials who had clashed with former Undersecretary of State John Bolton and it ran counter to some recommendations by the department's inspector general.

Robert Joseph, Bolton's successor as the department's top arms-control official, told Arms Control Today in an interview that "the reorganization was not politically motivated," according to excerpts that the magazine provided.

The new structure, he said, will allow the United States to better address threats from Iran, North Korea and terrorists seeking mass-destruction weapons.

But a State Department official said Monday that the office that dealt with nuclear diplomacy toward Iran, North Korea and other countries had lost five of its 12 employees and two more were on their way out.

The official and others spoke on condition of anonymity, fearing retaliation.

Three senior female employees who were denied promotions in the reorganization have left or are leaving and, according to current and former officials, one has sued alleging gender discrimination.

Undersecretary of State for Management Henrietta Fore appointed a panel to review the reorganization earlier this year, the officials said. But its mandate is limited to assessing bureaus' work load under the new management structure.

Rust, a veteran with 35 years' experience, said in a telephone interview that he was "very dismayed with the decisions" made by political appointees but would have retired last year in any event.

"Undoubtedly, this is not the first time that sub-Cabinet-level political appointees have hijacked a reorganization to pursue their own agenda," Rust wrote. Rice, he said, "can still salvage some aspects of this unfortunate situation, but she needs to move quickly."

For more information online, go to the Arms Control Today Web site, at http://www.armscontrol.org/act/

Now Playing In Senate: A GOP Double Bill (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Charles Babington
The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Republican voters, are you paying attention?

Because this week's Senate agenda is all about you, with debates scheduled on same-sex marriage and a permanent repeal of the estate tax.

At least through tomorrow, the Senate will consider a proposed constitutional amendment to define marriage as the union between a man and a woman. Republican leaders, including President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), a potential 2008 White House candidate, believe Senate action is vital because of recent federal court intervention.

For Democrats, the issue is a tricky one. They recognize the issue's sensitivity, and many -- including Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) -- personally oppose same-sex marriage. Indeed, Democrats have focused their objections on changing the Constitution, which has typically been amended in order to expand rights, not restrict them.

"I am confident that the American people will see this for what it is: a mean-spirited attempt to score political points in an election year," said Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.).

Later in the week, the Senate is expected to consider a permanent repeal of the estate tax, which Bush phased out as part of his first-term tax relief package, but after a one-year hiatus, in 2010, the levy phases back into existence.

Most Democrats object to full repeal as a giveaway to the super-rich, but Republicans believe the estate tax, which they call the "death tax," is unfair because it taxes some income twice. Conservatives are considering a compromise that would shield all but the wealthiest estates, and some moderate Democrats are interested in a similar approach.

But first, business groups want to put senators on the spot with a vote on full repeal. Pro-repeal organizations are targeting possible swing votes such as Sens. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) and Susan Collins (R-Maine).

Another lobbying campaign, this one by repeal opponents, features an ad with blond woman in a slinky dress and asserts, "The last thing a rich heiress needs is a $1 trillion raise in her allowance."

In a letter to senators, a group of former advisers to President Bill Clinton notes that 997 out of 1,000 estates are not subject to the tax under current law.

The House, meanwhile, will consider legislation to expand oil refinery capacity, an overhaul of telecommunications law, and appropriations bills for foreign operations, homeland security and legislative expenses.

House and Senate negotiators also this week will try to complete a final emergency spending bill for the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina recovery costs. Sticking points include $4 billion in agriculture assistance, port security spending and subsidies to the commercial fishing industry. Another hurdle is how to spend about $2 billion in border security improvements, with Bush wanting to add National Guard troops, and Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) pressing for equipment replacements, including helicopters and patrol vehicles.Opposition to Nominee

Some retired military officers have served notice that if conservatives keep pressing for a Senate confirmation vote for judicial nominee William J. Haynes II, it won't come without a fight.

Haynes, the Defense Department's general counsel, is President Bush's choice for a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit. Democrats have opposed Haynes since 2003, and now some Republicans are joining them. They object to his role as the Pentagon's top lawyer when controversial policies were adopted regarding harsh treatment of detainees captured in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0032146

The conservative group Committee for Justice has launched a telephone and e-mail campaign against one of those Republicans, Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.). Last week, some retired military lawyers came to Graham's defense, sending letters to the Judiciary Committee that call Haynes unfit for a lifetime appointment to the appellate court.

Haynes's "unwillingness to listen to others caused him to preside over the DOD legal system during the time of its greatest debacle in memory, the abuse of detainees by military personnel around the world," wrote John D. Hutson, a retired rear admiral who was a senior Navy lawyer. Donald J. Guter, who held the same rank, wrote that he doubted Haynes would have the independence or judgment to oppose unwise policies being pushed by his superiors.

Among those praising Haynes in letters to the committee is Bernard D. Meltzer, a retired law professor and former assistant trial counsel in the trials before the International Military Tribunal in Nuremberg. Meltzer wrote that he got to know Haynes while consulting with the Pentagon and that "I was impressed by his informed and sensitive concern for the rights and legitimate interests of those who might be tried before a military commission."

Spending Bill Still Includes Extra Katrina Aid (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A $92.2 billion wartime spending bill taking shape in Congress has been cut substantially since passing the Senate last month but still provides at least $2 billion more in Katrina aid than the White House first requested.

House-Senate negotiators will meet tonight in hopes of expediting passage by Congress this week, and Republicans are confident they can avoid a veto fight with President Bush. But the deal rests heavily on borrowing against Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster funds, and that means FEMA will have to come back sooner to Congress for more money, quite possibly this fall.

More than two-thirds, or $67 billion, of the bill would pay for defense and intelligence activities, including military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Tentative agreements would spend more than the White House requested to buy armored Bradley fighting vehicles and V-22 Osprey and KC-130J aircraft.

Disputes remain over the precise makeup of a $1.9 billion border-security initiative proposed by Mr. Bush. But the more protracted fight has been over Katrina aid and how much flexibility to give states struggling to recover.

The bill is expected to provide $5.2 billion in community-development block grants or $1 billion more than the president's request. An estimated $250 million in additional educational funds would be included as well as about $500 million in agriculture-related assistance. Within FEMA accounts, up to $400 million is proposed to help build "Katrina cottages" -- more resilient temporary housing than the trailers now used.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R., Miss.), who first proposed to add more than $4.6 billion in extra hurricane aid, has dropped a $700 million request to relocate a CSX Corp. rail line in his state. But over the objections of the House, he is still pursuing federal funds to move a Coast Guard station in Gulfport, Miss., thereby opening up the nearly three-acre waterfront site for commercial development.

The idea of Coast Guard funds being used for a renewal project is controversial -- especially if casinos might be involved.

Mississippi state officials said they are offering a larger four-acre site for the Coast Guard and hope to better rationalize the distribution of big and small craft in the harbor. Brent Warr, Gulfport's mayor, and Gray Swoope of the Mississippi Development Authority said there no plans for a casino on the station's site. But Mayor Warr acknowledged that one goal is to give more latitude to a private developer assembling a larger Gulfport land package for renewal.

"There could be casinos in the area but not on that site," he said.

Mr. Bush waited until the middle of last month before announcing his $1.9 billion border-security initiative, which has complicated the talks on two fronts.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), who oversees the Department of Homeland Security's budget, has complained that the president's plan is tilted too heavily toward personnel and shortchanges capital needs for new equipment. At the same time, Mr. Bush has insisted that the $1.9 billion be absorbed within his prior defense request, requiring House and Senate negotiators to go back and recalculate their own proposals.

For example, the House had approved $250 million for Bradley fighting vehicles, but that's now expected to be scaled back to $175 million. The additional House and Senate aircraft purchases -- two of the KC-130J and three V-22 Ospreys -- were preserved. But $100 million to buy the Army's improved recovery vehicle -- able to tow damaged tanks -- is expected to be dropped.

Negotiators To Meet On Iraq, Relief Funds (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

DOJ_NMG_0032147

AP, June 5, 2006

Hoping to speed approval of war funds, House-Senate negotiators were to meet Tuesday evening on legislation to pay for the missions in Iraq and Afghanistan and for hurricane relief along the Gulf Coast.

After missing a Memorial Day deadline, negotiators hope to seal agreement this week. The White House says a money crunch is threatening military operations and training accounts, especially for the Army, and could slow training and equipping of Iraqi soldiers.

"It's imperative that Congress finish its work and get this to the president to sign," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman. "This supplemental went up in February. It's now June." He said the Army will impose a civilian hiring freeze Tuesday and has cut spending on spare parts, transportation and travel.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., and Senate counterpart Thad Cochran, R-Miss., are leading the talks and have agreed to live within a White House demand that the emergency funding bill be limited to $92.2 billion for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars and hurricanes — plus $2.3 billion to combat bird flu.

The underlying bill would provide about $66 billion for Pentagon costs such as military operations and maintenance, weapons procurement, personnel and an initiative to locate and disarm roadside bombs. Another approximately $20 billion would go for hurricane relief and reconstruction, including new and rebuilt flood control projects for New Orleans, housing aid for Louisiana and replenishing the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Disaster Relief Fund.

The overall limit has meant dumping or dramatically scaling back Senate initiatives like $4 billion in agriculture disaster assistance to farmers to help them deal with high fuel prices and damage from floods and droughts last year. The move promises to dismay Senate GOP sponsors of the farm aid such as Conrad Burns of Montana, embroiled in a very difficult re-election bid.

An additional $648 million obtained by Sen. Robert Byrd (news, bio, voting record), D-W.Va., to beef up security at U.S. ports is to be dropped, while $1.2 billion in aid for the Gulf Coast fishing and seafood industry obtained by Sen. Richard Shelby (news, bio, voting record), R-Ala., will be sharply scaled back.

Meanwhile, a conservative group announced an ad campaign in three states aimed at pressuring Senators to drop several controversial homestate projects from the bill. Top among the targets of Americans for Prosperity is a $700 million Senate plan to pay CSX Transportation to abandon a recently repaired freight rail line to Mississippi to use the right of way for a new East-West highway.

"A bill to fund our war against terrorism is held hostage to pork-barrel spending," Duane Sand, a veteran of Iraq, says in the ad, to be run in Rhode Island, Michigan and West Virginia.

In fact, negotiators are expected to eventually drop the Mississippi rail line relocation as well as the bulk of more than $14 billion in Senate add-ons unrequested by President Bush. Still, FEMA funding would be cut below the White House's $7.2 billion request to fund lawmaker priorities, which could mean FEMA might need another infusion of cash before Election Day.

A key remaining challenge for negotiators is devising a compromise border security plan.

Bush's $1.9 billion border security plan is focused on hiring 1,000 new Border Patrol officers and sending 6,000 National Guard troops to help secure the Mexican border. A rival Senate plan, sponsored by Judd Gregg, R-N.H., and also budgeted for $1.9 billion, focuses on capital needs such as helicopters, Coast Guard vessels and vehicles.

House, Senate Tension Fuels Impasse (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Ben Pershing

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

As Congress gets back to work this week, the Republican majority faces the daunting task of trying to advance several big-ticket legislative items amid a sometimes strained relationship between the two chambers.

House and Senate Republicans will not only wrestle with their Democratic opponents, but in some cases with each other, as they look to complete an emergency supplemental spending bill for Iraq and Hurricane Katrina recovery, as well as a pension bill, immigration reform and a lobby overhaul package.

The majority views passage of these as key to bolstering its chances in the November elections, along with consideration of several other measures important to the GOP base, including an anti-gay-marriage amendment, abolition of the estate tax and energy legislation.

GOP tensions have risen in both chambers over some of the most hotly contested bills this year, leaving some to wonder whether the party can come together quickly enough to pass them in the time that remains in this Congress. Immigration and the emergency spending bill are the most high-profile measures on which Republicans have faced internal battles over how far to go in this election year.

DOJ_NMG_0032148

"From the inside, it looks completely as if we are in a free-fall, chaotic mix," acknowledged one GOP Senate aide. "We are debating amongst ourselves for competing proposals. We do have some differences, but ours are only visible because we have the spotlight on us."

But this aide said: "Without a doubt, we need to realize that we need to be fighting the Democrats and not ourselves."

"There's always this natural tension between the House and the Senate that is almost imprinted on everyone's DNA," added a House Republican leadership aide. "That always tends to create a tough work environment."

At the same time, the House aide said, "for as many House folks as there are who hold grudges, there are other folks who 30 seconds later forget they're mad at the Senate. The bottom line is we have to put points on the board. We'll be judged at the polls."

In part, the GOP infighting can be attributed to the inherent differences between the two chambers: The House is known for striking a more conservative tone, while the Senate is viewed as more of a consensus-building body.

But beyond that, Republicans say they currently lack the powerful mediator they once enjoyed in President Bush, whose poll numbers continue to lag and who lacks the political capital he had just a year ago.

And the GOP is facing pressure from a conservative base seeking to move it to the right while trying to appeal to a broader electorate.

Another House Republican leadership aide described the current state of House-Senate relations as "decent" and said the attitude of House leaders toward their Senate counterparts was "trust but verify."

GOP Senate sources said Republicans in both chambers know they must spend the next couple of months working together to try to get as much done as possible. The closer to November they get, the more difficult it will become to advance legislation against a Democratic Party looking to deny the GOP any victories to take to the voters.

"Most people recognize that accomplishment on good bills is important to Republicans in both houses," another well-placed Senate GOP aide said. "We've got enough gridlock coming from the Democrats. We don't need to create any of our own."

Added another Republican aide: "We're joined at the hip, so it's imperative that we pass legislation that is going to give our guys ammo when they head back home and campaign this fall."

Republicans in both chambers agreed that they can set aside their differences on most of the major items, with the exception of immigration reform, where the parties in the two bodies are in starkly different camps. Republicans privately concede that it could be an impossible task to advance a comprehensive bill this year. Instead, they may have to settle for a watered-down version that can meet the test of both chambers.

"Immigration will prove if we can all pull in the same direction or not," a Republican Senate staffer said.

The path to completion for an immigration bill also is complicated by differing opinions over whether a mediocre bill is better than no bill at all.

House Republicans are convinced that the public — and particularly the GOP's base — supports their enforcement-only bill more than the Senate's comprehensive approach, leading some lawmakers to say privately that they would rather run in November on the House-passed bill than on a potentially weaker conference report.

But other Members and aides believe Republicans will be punished at the polls even more if no bill makes it to the president's desk.

Separately, conferees are currently hammering out a compromise on the supplemental spending bill — the Senate version of which came out nearly $14 billion bigger than the House version. President Bush has threatened to veto the measure if it comes to his desk much above the $94 billion mark.

But appropriators, known for their bipartisan approach to working through spending bills, are expected to come up with a conference report within the coming days. Those lawmakers will be called on again when some of the regular appropriations bills come up, although few are expected to advance before Nov. 7.

As for other pending bills, immigration conferees should be named within the coming days, while lawmakers in both chambers are seeking to strike final deals on the pension bill and lobbying reform. Republicans also say they may be able to advance legislation targeted at gas prices as well as small-scale health care reforms this year.

One GOP Senate aide said that even while Republicans struggle among each other on some of the pending legislation, there are areas where the party can and will continue to agree.

Expect Republicans, led by Bush, to continue to talk up the country's economic success and to press for heightened fiscal discipline — an area that has produced electoral gains for the party in the past but has been overshadowed by a ballooning federal deficit in recent years.

"You are going to hear a lot more about spending — and that's something most of us in both houses can agree on," a Republican aide said.

DOJ_NMG_0032149

Study Finds Thousands Of Trips Taken By Lawmakers, Staff (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - Join Congress, see the world. Join a congressman's staff, see more of it.

Private groups, corporations or trade associations - many with legislation that could affect them pending before Congress - paid nearly $50 million since 2000 to send members of Congress and their staffers on at least 23,000 trips overseas and within the United States, according to a study released Monday.

The trips included at least 200 journeys to Paris and 150 to Hawaii, room rates of up to $500 a night and some high-flying on corporate jets that cost up to $25,000 a trip, according to a report by the Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service.

"Some trips seem to have been little more than pricey vacations - often taken in the company of spouses or other relatives - wrapped around speeches or seminars," the report said. "In many instances, trip sponsors appeared to be buying access to elected officials or their advisers."

Congressional aides took more than 70 percent of the trips, the study found.

While the travel isn't illegal, the report shines a light on how business is often done in Washington. It comes in a congressional election year when one of the biggest issues is corruption.

The findings also emerged as Congress remains deadlocked on legislation that would restrict contacts with lobbyists and impose new ethics standards on members. As scandals have emerged over the past two years, lawmakers moved to ban privately financed travel and do away with meals and gifts from lobbyists. Eventually, both the House of Representatives and Senate passed versions of ethics legislation, though neither banned privately financed travel. Negotiations to reconcile differences in the bills haven't begun.

Under current law, lobbyists are prohibited from paying for congressional travel. But a federal investigation into former lobbyist Jack Abramoff uncovered a scheme in which Abramoff used nonprofit groups to pay for extravagant Scottish golf outings for members and staffers.

A separate study by Political Money Line, a nonpartisan Washington watchdog group, has found that the number of privately financed trips by members of Congress declined this year. Between 2000 and 2005, members of Congress logged an average of 1,100 trips a year. As of April of this year, members had reported 291 trips.

Advocates of tighter ethics rules said the recent travel decline reflects public attention to the Abramoff scandal and others.

"As soon as the attention starts to fade, the travel will start to increase," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a watchdog group.

The study released Monday found that Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and his aides accepted about $500,000 in trips since 2000. DeLay is resigning from Congress on Friday under a cloud cast by the investigation into Abramoff, who arranged trips for him.

The top 10 travelers identified in the study are all members of the House of Representatives and include House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. Spokesman Kevin Madden said Boehner met all congressional requirements for his travel, including prompt and public disclosure.

"Travel funded by private interests relieves taxpayers of having to cover the costs of educational travel," Madden said.

According to the study, among the top corporate sponsors of travel was General Atomic, a San Diego-based high-tech firm that has developed surveillance aircraft as well as wireless and laser technologies. The company spent $660,000 on 86 trips for lawmakers, staff and spouses from 2000 to mid-2005, the study said.

The company, which developed the Predator spy plane, didn't immediately comment.

The private organization that spent the most on travel is the Aspen Institute, an educational organization that paid about $3.5 million to send lawmakers and their spouses to high-level conferences around the globe.

The institute's congressional program began in 1983 and is run by former Sen. Dick Clark, D-Iowa. It is nonpartisan and accepts money only from foundations, not corporations. The institute defended its travel policy, noting that by getting out of Washington, members can concentrate on subjects that are likely to come before Congress.

"The idea behind this is that senators are so distracted they never give enough focus to one issue," Aspen Institute spokesman James Spiegelman said.

Watchdog groups say groups such as Aspen generally fulfill a useful purpose and that lawmakers should try to write legislation that distinguishes between non-corporate educational travel and that paid for by corporations or industry groups.

"The lines are hard to draw because some of the fact-finding trips give people access to special interests," said Dennis Thompson, director of Harvard's Edmond J. Safra Foundation Center for Ethics.

DOJ_NMG_0032150

Trip Study Finds More Was Spent On Aides Than Lawmakers (NYT)

By Kate Phillips

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — Congressional aides took $30 million in trips paid for by private groups from 2000 through mid-2005, surpassing the privately sponsored travel of their bosses by nearly $10 million over the same time, according to a new analysis of publicly disclosed travel expenses.

Together, aides and members of the House and Senate filed 23,000 public disclosure forms on their individual trips, the survey found, for an estimated price tag of about $50 million. Among the most popular destinations were Paris (at least 200 times), Hawaii (150) and Italy (140).

Congressional travel paid for by outside organizations like trade groups and corporations has been under intense scrutiny following scandals involving the lobbyist Jack Abramoff. While much attention has been focused on elected officials and corporate jet travel with lobbyists, the new study, conducted by the Center for Public Integrity, Medill News Service of Northwestern University and American Public Media programs, is the most extensive in recent years because it tallied the costs, purpose and destinations of trips by Congressional aides and politicians.

The study concluded that about 90 of the trips were paid for by lobbyists, which is an ethical violation, during the five and a half years examined. About 500 trips cost $10,000 or more each, and 16 cost $25,000 or more apiece, the study showed. About $20 million was spent on overseas travel.

Wendell Rawls, acting executive director of the Center for Public Integrity, a nonpartisan group that has conducted many investigations of money and politics over the years, said Monday that some trips could be considered legitimate for educational purposes. But he pointed out that the study found multiple ethics violations from members of both political parties, and that many trips were paid for by corporations that had business interests before Congress.

Mr. Rawls also questioned the amount of spending on some trips. For example, he said, former Representative Thomas Bliley, Republican of Virginia, and his wife went to London at a cost of $31,171 for four days in July 2000. Their air travel tickets were valued at $11,938.49 each, and were paid for by the Brown and Williamson tobacco company. The former congressman's public filings listed the purpose of the trip as meetings with officials from British American Tobacco and other trade officials.

"I would ask if every constituent for Representative Bliley had the same access as the people at Brown, Williamson," Mr. Rawls said of the former chairman of the House Commerce Committee. Mr. Bliley could not be reached for comment.

The study turned up other interesting educational travel and irregularities. Congressman Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, has amended his forms for a trip in 2000 to Cuba, where he met with Fidel Castro. He first violated ethics rules by accepting travel expenses for his son and his wife, on a trip that was supposed to address the plight of endangered birds. But confronted with the center's findings, Mr. Rangel recently reimbursed and identified additional sponsors for his son's travel and for the trip; the sponsors included one of his longtime fund-raisers, John Catsimatidis of Gristede's Foods in New York, and the Cuban government. George A. Dalley, Mr. Rangel's chief of staff, said he erred in not knowing the reporting rules.

The study singled out General Atomics, a company based in San Diego that developed the Predator, the unmanned spy plane, because it spent more — $660,000 — on Congressional travel than any other corporation on lone-sponsor trips. The study noted that General Atomics seemed to favor trips for Congressional staff members and aides. Among those on trips to Turkey in 2004 or to Australia in 2005 were aides to Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican who has since been convicted of bribery and other crimes, and an aide to Senator Harry Reid, the Nevada Democrat who is minority leader.

The study said that some aides sat in on sales meetings that company officials held with foreign government officials, although the aides later told the survey's interviewers that they did not engage in sales pitches.

Gary Hopper, a vice president for General Atomics' Washington offices, said: "We wouldn't mix any kind of sales situation with Congressional staff there. I know that's a bone of contention with a lot of people out there but there was not in any way a quid pro quo."

Democrats, Republicans and lobbying associations all say that travel has slowed since the scandals over the Scotland golfing trips by Representative Tom DeLay received headlines last year and put a spotlight on Congressional travel.

Paul A. Miller, the president of the American League of Lobbyists, defended travel by lobbyists and elected officials. "Since the scandal, a lot of the travel has ceased to exist or members of Congress have been very diligent by what trips we go on," Mr. Miller said. "These trips are valuable experiences for members of Congress and their staffs. If the public doesn't pay for it and the private sector doesn't pay for it, the government isn't going to pick up the tab for it."

The House and Senate have passed legislation that would require additional disclosure for lobbying, but neither bill would place a permanent ban on privately sponsored travel. It is unclear what will emerge from a House-Senate conference committee.

DOJ_NMG_0032151

The Center for Public Integrity was forced last year to withdraw a study it conducted on White House travel because of a flawed database that inflated the amount of money spent as well as the number of staff members. To avoid such errors this time, Mr. Rawls said the center pored over the 26,000 pages of travel documents individually, hired outside consultants to comb the data and the findings, and made conservative estimates of the data tallies.

Privately Funded Trips Add Up On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Over 5 1/2 years, Republican and Democratic lawmakers accepted nearly $50 million in trips, often to resorts and exclusive locales, from corporations and groups seeking legislative favors, according to the most comprehensive study to date on the subject of congressional travel.

From January 2000 through June 2005, House and Senate members and their aides were away from Washington for more than 81,000 days -- a combined 222 years -- on at least 23,000 trips, according to the report, issued yesterday by the nonpartisan Center for Public Integrity. About 2,300 of the trips cost $5,000 or more, at least 500 cost $10,000 or more, and 16 cost $25,000 or more.

"While some of these trips might qualify as legitimate fact-finding missions," the study said, "the purpose of others is less clear." In addition, the lawmakers' financial reports that disclose the details of the trips are routinely riddled with mistakes and omissions.

Lawmakers and their staffers were treated to $25,000 corporate-jet rides and $500-a-night hotel rooms, the study showed. Lawmakers accepted thousands of costly jaunts -- one worth more than $30,000 -- to some of the world's choicest destinations: at least 200 trips to Paris, 150 to Hawaii and 140 to Italy.

"Congressional travelers gave speeches in Scotland, attended meetings in Australia and toured nuclear facilities in Spain," the study reported. "They pondered welfare reform in Scottsdale, Ariz., and the future of Social Security at a Colorado ski resort."

Many congressional offices have voluntarily curtailed their privately funded travel since disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to bribe public officials, in part with lavish overseas trips. But lawmakers and their aides still may accept travel for official purposes from private interests without limit.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) proposed banning such travel soon after Abramoff's plea. But lawmakers of both parties and in both chambers of Congress quickly resisted imposing significant new restrictions on the trips, which are a much-prized perk of office. Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) won election to the post of House majority leader this year by running on a platform that included opposing the travel ban.

Boehner and members of his office were among the top beneficiaries of privately funded travel, according to the study, taking more than 200 trips during the 5 1/2 -year period reviewed. Others included the offices of Rep. Joe Barton (R-Tex.), Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), Rep. Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio), Rep. Gregory Meeks (D-N.Y.) and Rep. Robert Wexler (D-Fla.).

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Boehner, said yesterday that privately funded travel by members of Congress is fully disclosed and "leads to greater understanding of the issues" at no cost to taxpayers.

One of the largest corporate sponsors of lawmakers' travel was General Atomics, a relatively small San Diego-based defense contractor that makes the Predator, an unmanned spy plane now in wide use by the United States and other countries. The study reported that the company "largely targeted congressional staff members, spending roughly $660,000 on 86 trips for legislators, aides and their spouses from 2000 to mid-2005." Some of the trips were valued at more than $25,000.

General Atomics' spending on congressional travel was more than that of many larger companies and was considerably higher than what other defense contractors spent. Microsoft, for instance, funded nearly $395,000 in trips during the period; SBC Communications Inc. spent about $205,000. Among General Atomics' defense competitors, Northrop Grumman spent about $12,000 on congressional junkets and Boeing spent about $13,000.

On trips paid for by General Atomics to Turkey and Australia, congressional staffers attended meetings with foreign government officials that the company was soliciting to buy the Predator.

"[It's] useful and very helpful, in fact, when you go down and talk to the government officials, to have congressional people go along and discuss the capabilities of [the plane] with them," Tom Cassidy, chief executive of General Atomics Aeronautical Systems, the company's aircraft-manufacturing subsidiary, told the center.

The center's study illustrates how widespread the practice has become, for both Democrats and Republicans. Of the 25 individual lawmakers who accepted more than $120,000 worth of travel during the period, 17 were Democrats. Of the two dozen congressional offices on which private trip sponsors spent the most money, 15 were Republican, the study said.

DOJ_NMG_0032152

At least 150 of the disclosure forms scrutinized by the center did not list a sponsor. After the center contacted her, Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.), a candidate for Senate, amended her 2003 form to fill in the name of the group that paid for her two-day visit in November to the Breakers in Palm Beach, Fla. -- the Center for the Study of Popular Culture. A spokesman for Harris called the omission "a staff error."

After he was contacted by the Center for Public Integrity, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) reimbursed the Cuban government and John A. Catsimatidis, a grocery store owner, $1,922 for expenses incurred by his son, Steven, during a trip that Rangel, his wife and his son took to Cuba to study the ecology there in 2002. House rules permit sponsors of lawmakers' trips to cover the cost of only one accompanying relative. A Rangel spokesman said the office had not been aware of the rule.

The House had more frequent fliers than did the Senate during the period. The 10 congressional offices that accepted more than 200 privately sponsored trips each were all in the House, as were the 11 offices that had travel expenses exceeding $350,000 each. The 10 most expensive trips were taken by members of the House or, in one instance, a House aide.

The study, which took nine months to complete, found many instances in which, the center said, "trip sponsors appeared to be buying access to elected officials or their advisers." Several of the sponsoring organizations defended their trips, saying they provide lawmakers with an opportunity to discuss issues in a relaxed setting.

"If you try to talk to a member for any great length of time about your issues while they're in Washington, they're simply too busy," Tom White, a spokesman for the Association of American Railroads, told the center.

The center's study was co-sponsored by American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service.

Study Finds $50M In Privately Funded Travel By Lawmakers (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen And Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 6, 2006

If voters find industry-sponsored junkets objectionable, a study out today could be bad news for globetrotting lawmakers. Private sponsors paid nearly $50 million over five and a half years to send members of Congress and their staffs on at least 23,000 trips, according to a review of travel records by the Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University journalism students.

The study is the first time that researchers have pinpointed the full cost of privately funded congressional travel. An earlier tally of about $15 million counted only travel by lawmakers themselves and neglected more numerous trips for staff.

The researchers kept tabs on which offices filed incomplete, incorrect or late reports disclosing details of their travels. They singled out two lawmakers, Reps. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio), for failing to disclose until six weeks ago that the Cuban government and a New York grocery mogul paid for their April 2002 trip to Havana to meet President Fidel Castro. Earlier disclosure reports had specified only a Minneapolis-based conservation group, the Sian Ka'an Conservation Foundation, as the sponsor.

Rangel also took fire for allowing the sponsors to pay travel costs for his wife and son, a violation of House rules that allow only one family member to be reimbursed.

Rangel, who organized the trip for himself and Kaptur, has since reimbursed the Cuban government and the New York businessman, John Catsimatidis, for his son's portion of the $5,766 trip.

Rangel's chief of staff, George Dalley, called the filing an honest mistake. "We believe we have now adequately corrected what I admit was a mistake. We weren't trying to hide it. ... Our practice has always been that we try to abide by whatever laws and regulations exist at the time," he said.

Rangel has been a frequent traveler to Cuba and a vocal opponent of the U.S. embargo against the country.

Supporters of privately funded congressional travel say that such trips provide opportunities for lawmakers and aides to learn more about issues before them without forcing taxpayers to foot the bill.

Critics argue that the trips give wealthy interests unchecked access to power and can lead to corruption.

Golf trips to Scotland are at the center of an expansive federal investigation of congressional corruption that has netted plea agreements from lobbyists Jack Abramoff and Michael Scanlon. Scanlon was once a senior aide to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

During the five and a half years ending in 2005, DeLay's office spent about $500,000 of other people's money on travel, topping the report's list. That total is nearly three times the annual salary of a party leader in the House.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard Lugar (R-Ind.) accounted for $150,000 in trips — his yearly salary is $165,200 — in five years, mostly paid for by the nonprofit Aspen Institute. Nearly 3,000 of the 23,000 privately sponsored trips identified in the report cost $5,000 or more, including 500 that cost at least $10,000 and more than a dozen amounting to at least $25,000 apiece.

DOJ_NMG_0032153

Destinations included Australia, Grand Cayman, Paris, Rome, Hawaii and Pebble Beach, Calif., home of one of the nation's top golf courses.

Lawmakers in both parties and in both chambers have reason to be nervous about how the public perceives privately funded jaunts to prime vacation spots. Recent polls show that less than one-third of the public approves of the job Congress is doing.

Attentive challengers can turn incumbents' travel patterns into potent political issues.

Two years ago, Rep. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.) found travel to be a powerful weapon in her successful bid to unseat longtime Republican Rep. Phil Crane (R), a senior member of the Ways and Means Committee and onetime presidential candidate. Bean labeled the well-traveled Crane the "Junket King" to portray him as out of touch with his constituents after more than three decades in Washington.

In other cases, voters have been more forgiving, at least for a while.

The House refused to seat Adam Clayton Powell Jr. (D-N.Y.) in 1967 after he took lavish, publicly funded trips to exotic locales while spending little time legislating in Washington.

"He is a study in contrasts," fellow Rep. Mo Udall (D-Ariz.) wrote of Powell that year. "Brilliant but erratic; a self-styled 'poor parish priest' but living like a member of the jet set; working hard for a few days to finalize a major bill, then flitting off to Europe or the Bahamas for weeks."

But Powell's constituents fired back at the House, electing the oft-vacationing Powell to fill the vacancy caused by the House's refusal to seat him. He won another two-year term after that.

Powell's lifestyle eventually caught up to him at the ballot box: In 1970, he lost a primary to Rangel, now the ranking Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee.

Candidates across the country already are grappling with the question of whether they would vote to ban privately funded travel. The House voted to block privately funded trips through the end of the year, but the two chambers have yet to complete action on the legislation.

Right Just Doesn't Get Sen. Frist (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 6, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has both pleased and outraged conservatives with his Senate schedule this week, and they are once again left scratching their heads over what to make of him.

Is he one of them? Does he want to be president?

The Senate will vote this week on cutting off debate on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriages, an issue conservatives have clamored for since the 2004 election. It will also vote to quash a potential filibuster of the estate-tax repeal, another high priority for conservatives.

But Frist has also brought a skunk to what otherwise would be a conservative garden party by also scheduling the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act, sponsored by Democratic Sen. Daniel Akaka (Hawaii).

Conservative senators and activists hate that bill, which would allow native Hawaiians to establish their own government entity to "safeguard their welfare," according to a description by the Congressional Research Service.

This month, Frist will give conservatives a floor vote on an amendment that would ban burning the American flag, but he will also likely let stem-cell legislation reach the chamber floor for a vote before the July recess, GOP aides say.

A lobbyist for one prominent socially conservative group said Frist's staff has called the stem-cell vote "unavoidable," but some conservatives are skeptical because Frist determines the schedule. One conservative GOP aide said Frist has not yet agreed to allow Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) an accompanying vote on a bill favored by social conservatives that would ban embryonic cloning.

Conservatives such as former Reagan Attorney General Edwin Meese and Todd Gaziano, director of the Center for Legal and Judicial Studies at the conservative Heritage Foundation, call Akaka's legislation unconstitutional and say it could allow native Hawaiians to exempt themselves from "whatever aspects of the United States Constitution and state authority [they] thought undesirable." The Family Research Council, an influential group representing Christian conservatives, also opposes it, saying it could open the door to legalized gambling in the Aloha State.

Aides to conservative senators say they are discussing ways to tie the bill up on the floor, possibly by offering anti-abortion amendments. But, nevertheless the bill has a good chance of passing, and if it does it will likely be with the support of almost every Senate Democrat and a minority of the Senate Republican Conference.

If conservative GOP senators such as Lamar Alexander (Tenn.), Jeff Sessions (Ala.), John Ensign (Nev.), Tom Coburn (Okla.) and John Cornyn (Texas) square off against the Hawaii bill, as they are expected to, it would be the second time in a month that the conservative heart of the Senate GOP conference has rebelled against a bill Frist has brought to the floor. Passage would begin to establish a trend in which bills pass the Senate floor with overwhelming Democratic support and the backing of few Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0032154

"Frist is the leader of what may be a Republican majority but isn't a conservative majority," said Michael Franc, vice president of government relations for the Heritage Foundation.

He explained that because chamber rules often require the support of 60 lawmakers and Republicans control only 55 seats, coalitions are sometimes a mix of Democrats and liberal Republicans. The discipline that Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) has imposed on his caucus has made it more difficult for Frist to pass bills amenable to the majority of Republicans with the support of a handful of Democratic defectors. Immigration was an example of that.

"The Democrats have been very effective at turning that majority into a dysfunctional one," Franc said. "You have to give credit to Reid and others for sowing this kind of discontent among Republicans in the Senate."

One veteran GOP aide wondered whether past majority leaders would have allowed major legislation to pass with a minority of Republicans supporting it. "The thing I keep hearing is if [Sen.] Trent Lott [R-Miss.] was still majority leader that would never have seen the floor," the aide said.

On Fox News last month, Frist acknowledged that the immigration bill was not popular but argued that the Senate had to address the problem of nearly 12 million illegal immigrants living in the U.S., and of what he called the hemorrhaging of immigrants across the U.S.-Mexican border. A Frist aide said the problems could not be addressed if the Senate did not pass legislation and send a bill to negotiations with the House.

The Senate majority may have seemed dysfunctional lately, but Frist has had successes. He helped pass the 2003 Medicare act, which many congressional observers thought would be difficult. Many conservatives still grumble about the cost of that vote. Frist also navigated Democratic opposition to pass long-stalled energy and transportation reauthorization legislation last year.

While the tactics of passing bills on the Senate may be easy for Frist and his staff to justify in Washington, it is more difficult for them to make their case outside the Beltway.

"Senator Frist in some instances has been a strong advocate for certain issues that are of importance to conservatives such as his work on passing the Bush tax cut, his continuing efforts to try to repeal the death tax, his work to assist the administration in getting their political appointees approved particularly on the judiciary, but at the same time he's been disappointing to conservatives on issues involving federal spending, and immigration," said William Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union, who served as deputy campaign manager on Frist's first Senate campaign, in 1994. "If the senator's future political ambitions encompass a run for the presidency he will not be able to position himself as a true conservative."

Laudenbach said that Frist was regarded as a leader of very high integrity and that Republican and Democratic senators respect him, but that, in the final analysis, "he's not been a strong majority leader. In some instances he's been disappointing."

Amy Call, Frist's spokeswoman, defended her boss. "Senator Frist has been a strong advocate throughout his time in the Senate for the things he believes in and will continue to be," she said. "He is guided by what he feels is the right thing to do and will continue to be guided by that."

Kennedy Back On Job After Month In Rehab (USAT)

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Rep. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I., back to work Monday after his second stint at a drug rehabilitation clinic, said that after struggling for two decades with addiction he knows he can no longer take any "mood-altering" substances including alcohol.

Kennedy, 38, checked into the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., a day after a May 4 incident in which he crashed his car near the U.S. Capitol. He told police he was rushing to vote at the House, but Congress was not in session. He also said he was taking medication to help him sleep.

The experience "reaffirmed for me that the challenge of mental illness is a part of everyone's experience," Kennedy said in a speech at Brown University in Providence.

It was his first public appearance since he left the clinic Friday. He said his month-long treatment left him confident about his mental health.

Kennedy, the son of Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., had also been in a clinic over the Christmas holiday.

President Bush's job-approval rating has rebounded slightly to 36% in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday. That's 5 percentage points higher than his record low in early May.

Bush's standing improved by 10 percentage points or more among Republicans (up to 78%) and men (42%). The survey of 1,002 adults has an error margin of +/-3 percentage points. — Susan Page

DOJ_NMG_0032155

The Federal Aviation Administration will impose new contract terms on more than 14,500 air-traffic controllers after it failed to reach an agreement with the union, officials said.

Base salaries and premiums for living in high-cost areas would be preserved, but new controllers would earn 30% less than current workers, the agency said in a statement Monday. The FAA also will phase in new rules to boost worker productivity.

The FAA hopes the contract will save it nearly $2 billion over five years. National Air Traffic Controllers Association officials could not be reached for comment.

After contract talks broke off April 5, the FAA sent its proposal, along with the union's proposal and objections, to Congress. Lawmakers had 60 days to intercede, after which the FAA could impose its offer.

The House of Representatives is scheduled today to debate legislation that would nullify that 60-day deadline in hopes of pushing the FAA and the union back to the bargaining table.

Patrick Kennedy Is 'Better' After Treating Dependency (NYT)

By John Holusha

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

Representative Patrick J. Kennedy said yesterday that he felt much better after almost a month's treatment in the Mayo Clinic for drug dependency, and that he was looking forward to resuming his duties.

But he said that he continued to suffer from bipolar disorder and a tendency toward addiction, and will need help from a support group to avoid a relapse.

"The key to recovery will be a small group of people who will watch over me," he said at a televised news conference.

Mr. Kennedy said, as he has before, that he had not been drinking before an early-morning car accident near the Capitol in Washington on May 4, even though the police on the scene said he appeared to be intoxicated. Mr. Kennedy said the police had canvassed bars in the District of Columbia seeking evidence of his drinking but were unable to find any. Rather, he said, he was under the influence of prescription antinausea and sleep medications, which he had taken at the "prescribed amount."

The question-and-answer session came after Mr. Kennedy, Democrat of Rhode Island, helped to open a conference on the future of mental health care and addiction treatment at Brown University in Providence.

"I can tell you today, I feel confident of my health," he said at the health conference, adding that he was "positive about my future."

He was discharged from the clinic, in Rochester, Minn., on Friday and spent the weekend with relatives in Washington before returning to Rhode Island on Sunday night. His private medical insurance policy paid for the stay in the clinic, he said.

The event was Mr. Kennedy's first public appearance since checking himself into the clinic on May 5, the day after the auto accident. Mr. Kennedy has said he has no memory of the crash or of his subsequent encounter with the Capitol Police, who charged him with three traffic violations.

Mr. Kennedy, the son of Senator Edward M. Kennedy, put his drug taking in the larger context of mental illness. "I didn't know how miserable I was until I started to be feeling better," he said of his time at the clinic.

Kennedy Finds Recovery Sponsor In Ramstad (RC)

By Bree Hocking

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

Twenty-five years ago, Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.) woke up to find himself in a Sioux Falls, S.D., jail cell after an alcohol-induced blackout.

Ramstad, who credits that experience with helping him to realize he was an alcoholic and needed to seek help, said that his own struggle with substance abuse forged the strong bond he shares with Rep. Patrick Kennedy (D-R.I.). Kennedy entered a drug rehabilitation program May 5 in the wake of a middle-of-the-night car crash near Capitol Hill that occurred after he had taken two prescription drugs, Phenergan and Ambien. He was released from the clinic Friday.

“If anyone can identify with Patrick’s experience, it’s me,” Ramstad said. “I absolutely think this is a wake-up call for Patrick similar to the wake-up call I had 25 years ago.”

Every Saturday for a month, Ramstad drove an hour and a half from his house in Minnetonka, Minn., to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester to visit Kennedy while he was in rehab.

“We had a lot of good heart-to-heart talks about my experience and his experience like recovering people do. That’s how we stay sober. We do a lot of talking and a lot of listening. ... I know he’s going to be participating in meetings with other recovering people on a regular basis.”

The Rhode Island Congressman has named Ramstad as a sponsor in his recovery efforts, said Kennedy spokesman Robin Costello. “He’s a key person in the support network [and aftercare plan] he’s put together of close friends and colleagues and medical experts," she said. According to Kennedy's Mayo Clinic discharge statement, his physicians have put him on a "stringent system of aftercare that may include periodic visits to the Mayo Clinic for continued health care consultation."

DOJ_NMG_0032156

On Monday, Kennedy made his first public appearance since getting out of rehab, speaking at a mental health care and addiction treatment conference at Brown University. Afterward, he held a press conference in which he said medical issues related to his rehab stay were "between me and my doctor" and pledged to continue his fight for medical privacy legislation. Kennedy, who has bipolar disorder, also said his mental illness has led to his addiction.

Despite Kennedy's pending legal issues, colleagues on both sides of the aisle predict he will be welcomed back to Congress with open arms when he returns to Capitol Hill today.

"We all recognize that Patrick has been through a very difficult time, and my sense is that most people in Congress as well as most Rhode Islanders are impressed, as I am, that he was forthcoming about his problems and he sought professional help," said Rep. James Langevin (D-R.I.), who was with Kennedy at the Brown conference. "There's important work that we need to do together for the people of the state of Rhode Island, and I know Patrick is up to the challenge."

Langevin added that Kennedy had in his speech "acknowledged this is a struggle. This will always be with him, and he's going to take it day by day."

Other Members echoed Langevin's words.

"Rep. Kennedy has demonstrated tremendous courage through this process. I welcome him back, and look forward to working with him as he continues to advocate on mental health issues in Congress," said Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.).

Ramstad added, "Alcoholism and drug addiction are equal-opportunity diseases that don't discriminate between Republicans and Democrats, rich and poor, educated and uneducated."

Support for Kennedy appears to be holding firm in his home state.

Kennedy received a standing ovation for his speech at Monday's conference. That same day, members of the Rhode Island mental health and medical communities took out a full-page ad in The Providence Journal thanking Kennedy for coming forward with his problem and supporting mental health parity issues, said his close friend Jack McConnell, a trial attorney in Providence who has done legal work for Kennedy in the past. (Kennedy has taken the lead in facilitating the concept of the Rhode Island Institute for Mental Health Excellence, a partnership of leading researchers and practitioners in the areas of mental health and addiction, Costello noted.)

Rhode Island political observers do not believe Kennedy's run-in with the law will have an adverse effect on his electoral viability.

"I don't anticipate there will be a negative political fallout because he's very popular and he did seek help," said Darrell West, a political science professor at Brown University and the author of the 2000 biography "Patrick Kennedy: The Rise To Power." "I don't think voters see a legal issue."

Only one politically unknown Republican has filed so far for the race.

Still, West added: "If it becomes a recurring problem, that's a bigger political problem for him."

On the legislative front, Ramstad said the two have discussed redoubling their efforts to get mental health and chemical dependency treatment parity legislation passed in the House, where their bill, which would provide for equal coverage for mental health benefits, currently has 228 sponsors. Ramstad and Kennedy are also co-founders of the Addiction, Treatment and Recovery Caucus, which was formed to educate Congress about addiction problems and the need for treatment and recovery.

Meanwhile, Rep. Ralph Regula (R-Ohio), who chairs the Appropriations subcommittee on labor, health and human services, education and related agencies — of which Kennedy is a member — said he did not anticipate Kennedy's legal and personal troubles would distract him from his work.

"He's probably not the only Member of Congress that's got things he's dealing with outside of his role as Congressman," Regula said, adding that he expected Kennedy to be on hand for the markup of the panel's spending bill on Wednesday. "I think he can handle it."

SNOW SHOW (WP)

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

White House press secretary Tony Snow' s response at yesterday's White House briefing to a question from radio talk show host Lester Kinsolving:

Kinsolving : The New York Times has just reported, "This White House, like all White Houses, is obsessed with the press." My question: Will you admit to this alleged obsession, or is this just one more New York Times exaggeration?

Snow : It's more a love affair than an obsession, Lester.

Controllers Have A New Contract, But Fight Isn't Over (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The Federal Aviation Administration imposed a controversial new contract yesterday on the nation's 15,000 air traffic controllers that will slow the rate of pay increases for current workers and cut starting salaries for new hires by 30 percent.

Marion C. Blakey , the FAA administrator, said a 60-day period for review by Congress of contract deadlocks at the agency had ended without any action. "The FAA's proposed change takes effect as of today, and we will begin the process of implementing our proposal," she said in a statement.

Blakey's announcement came on the eve of a House debate on a bill that would have set aside the 60-day deadline and sent the labor-management dispute back to the bargaining table. The bill, sponsored by Rep. Steven C. LaTourette (R-Ohio), would apply retroactively to the controller contract.

The FAA's move was faulted by John S. Carr , president of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association. "One can only surmise that the current rush to implementation is an attempt to circumvent the legislation that is scheduled for a vote in Congress this week," Carr said.

The FAA is one of the few places in government where unions can bargain over salaries. A 1996 change in FAA law that permitted bargaining over pay also stipulated that impasses would go to Congress rather than to a panel of presidential appointees that normally rules in such cases.

Two years after that law took effect, the controllers union negotiated a generous contract that Blakey says the FAA can no longer afford as it prepares to undertake costly technology upgrades and bring on a new generation of controllers.

When the old contract came up for renewal, the FAA and the union embarked on nine months of talks that the agency says cost taxpayers $2.3 million. Both sides have accused the other of grandstanding and spreading misleading information, and in April, the agency declared an impasse in the negotiations, triggering the congressional review period.

The dispute comes 25 years after President Ronald Reagan fired about 11,000 controllers who went on strike over working conditions. There is no talk of a strike in this dispute, but union officials contend that a substantial number of controllers will take a cut in take-home pay under the contract, prompting them to enter into retirement at a faster rate than normal.

The FAA faces a large wave of retirements as controllers hired after the mass firing reach the mandatory retirement age of 56. The FAA estimates about 12,500 new controllers will have to be hired and trained through fiscal 2014 -- a big challenge that will require careful planning.

Under the new five-year contract, which the agency estimates will save $1.9 billion, controllers would keep their salaries and benefits and retain about 80 percent of supplemental pay, known as premium pay. According to the FAA, the average compensation package worth $165,900 today would grow to $187,000 over the life of the contract.

However, controllers would lose incentive pay that encourages them to take jobs in hard-to-staff locations. The FAA said that the extra pay costs $30 million annually and that inspector general audits had determined it has not worked as intended.

Controllers also would lose "controller in charge" differentials that are paid when they take on temporary duties as a supervisor. That differential had cost the FAA $11 million annually and also been faulted by the inspector general as unnecessary.

New controllers will take a 30 percent cut in starting pay, compared with the terms under the 1998 contract. FAA officials said that as new hires advance in training and skills, salaries will rise to $127,000 on average over the five years of the contract.

Blakey said the agency would continue to operate under the terms of the prior contract during the transition to new pay scales and workplace rules. The FAA did not have an estimate for how long the transition would take.

"The phase-in will be handled in a deliberate and orderly manner, and we will ensure that air traffic managers and supervisors are well trained to implement these provisions and to answer questions from the workforce as they arise," she said.

LaTourette's bill will be brought up today under a suspension of normal rules, which will require a two-thirds margin to pass. Carr said he believed that members of Congress "will take a dim view of the FAA's brazen actions today." In a similar union dispute a few years ago, he said, Blakey waited about 19 months before moving to impose a contract.

Geoff Basye , an FAA spokesman, said further delay in resolving the dispute was not in the interest of taxpayers. The negotiations were carried out under current law, and "the FAA will stay true to the process that has been governing this from the beginning," he said.

Although the union hopes to win some sort of congressional intervention, the dispute may end up in federal court. The union has launched a challenge to the law that permits Blakey to impose contracts.

DOJ_NMG_0032158

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Chief Startles Markets (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke suggested Monday that the central bank might have to keep raising interest rates to combat "unwelcome" inflation, even though the economy has started slowing. His comments rattled stock markets, which had one of their worst days of the year.

In a speech to a banking conference here, Bernanke said the economy is entering "a period of transition" to less robust growth. But he also implied that inflation, pressured by high energy prices, is now the bigger threat.

He vowed the Fed "will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern" of rising prices doesn't take permanent root. The inflation outlook for the next six to 12 months will receive "particular scrutiny" as the Fed sets policy, he said.

Bernanke's language, suggesting that the central bank could raise short-term rates yet again when it meets June 28-29, shook up financial markets. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 199 points, or 1.8%, to 11,049. That's the third-worst one-day sell-off of the year for the Dow, which has lost 594 points since May 10. Small stocks fared even worse, with the Russell 2000 small-stock index falling 3.2%, its biggest drop this year.

That's because some traders and economists had anticipated that the Fed, which has boosted rates 16 times since mid-2004, might take a breather in June, given last week's gloomy employment report showing businesses created 75,000 jobs in May — far fewer than expected. A private report Monday showed the service sector expanding at a less rapid clip.

The Fed wants to move its target for short-term rates, now 5%, to a level that keeps prices under control but is not so high that it unduly chokes off growth.

Mark Zandi of Moody's Economy.com says he was surprised by the hawkish tone of Bernanke's speech, given that the economy is cooling faster than expected. He said a good case could be made for the Fed to pause, though he expects a rate increase if inflation remains elevated.

"(Bernanke) laid out a strong case why stable inflation is vital to long-term growth," Zandi says. "He's new in his term and has to establish inflation-fighting credentials."

Bernanke said an "anticipated moderation of economic growth seems now to be underway," adding that at such a time, interest rate "policy must be conducted with great care and with close attention to the evolution of the economic outlook."

The Fed chairman pointed to slowing consumer spending, a softening housing market and cooling job creation. The interest rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage has risen from about 5.6% in January 2005 to about 6.7% today, largely due to Fed action. At the same time, Bernanke noted, business investment is accelerating and the global economy is strong.

But Bernanke made it clear that, from the Fed's point of view, the main ingredient for stable, sustained growth was stable inflation and inflation expectations.

The Fed chairman pointed out that core consumer inflation, a measure that excludes food and energy prices, has risen at a 3.2% annual rate in the past three months and a 2.8% rate in the past six months. That's above the Fed's informal comfort range of 1% to 2%.

"The (Fed) must continue to resist any tendency for increases in energy and commodity prices to become permanently embedded in core inflation," he said.

The economy expanded at a rapid 5.3% annual pace in the first three months of the year, a rate the Fed expects to slow but not stall.

Bernanke Talks Tough On Inflation (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — Ben S. Bernanke, chairman of the Federal Reserve, warned Monday that recent inflation trends were "unwelcome developments," indicating that he was far less worried about signs of weaker economic growth than about the danger of higher prices.

In his toughest comments yet about the risks of inflation, Mr. Bernanke said consumer prices were rising faster than he would like. He gave short shrift to evidence of a slowdown in hiring, and he conspicuously avoided repeating his earlier suggestion that the Fed might consider a "pause" in its two-year program of steady interest rate increases.

Investors, increasingly convinced that the central bank will raise rates at its two-day policy meeting at the end of this month, immediately began selling stocks.

DOJ_NMG_0032159

The Dow industrials and the broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index each fell about 1.75 percent, and the Nasdaq index tumbled more than 2 percent. Bond prices also fell and interest yields edged up, particularly for two-year Treasury securities.

The dollar rose slightly as traders in the Fed funds futures market sharply increased their bets that the central bank would lift its benchmark short-term interest rate another 0.25 percentage point from its current 5 percent.

Speaking to a conference here on international monetary issues with other central bankers, Mr. Bernanke said inflation had climbed to the upper limits of his acceptability.

"Core inflation, measured over the past three to six months, has reached a level that, if sustained, would be at or above the upper range that many economists, including myself, would consider consistent with price stability," Mr. Bernanke said.

Core inflation refers to the increase in prices for consumer goods and services other than food and energy, whose prices are more volatile and are considered not as important as others in determining whether inflation becomes embedded in the economy.

Mr. Bernanke has previously said that core inflation should ideally remain between 1 and 2 percent a year. In his speech, he noted that it had been running at 3 percent over the last six months and 2.3 percent over the last 12 months.

"These are unwelcome developments," the Fed chairman said.

Jan Hatzius, chief United States economist at Goldman Sachs, said Mr. Bernanke was signaling that the Fed was likely to raise interest rates for a 17th time in two years when its policy-making committee meets on June 28-29.

"He's trying to send a pretty fair message that he's going to err on the side of doing more rather than doing less," Mr. Hatzius said. But Mr. Hatzius, who had been predicting that the Fed would not raise rates in June, said the decision was not yet signed, sealed and delivered.

Fed officials will take a close look at the coming report on consumer price increases in May, which is scheduled to be released on June 14, he said. And they will be watching for additional evidence that the economy is slowing more abruptly than previously thought.

But with Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials sounding increasingly hawkish on inflation, many analysts contend that the Fed faces less risk of slowing the economy too much by "overshooting" in its rate increases than it would if it let inflationary expectations take hold among consumers and businesses.

"They know that if they are perceived to have gone too far, they can change things fairly quickly by reducing rates," said Nigel Gault, a forecaster at Global Insight in Lexington, Mass. "They probably also know that credibility on inflation, once lost, may be difficult to get back."

Mr. Bernanke made clear that he thought the economy was now in a "transition" to slower economic growth, but he took little solace from data showing that wages had climbed only modestly, that the housing market appeared to be cooling and that job creation appeared to have slowed markedly.

On Friday, the Labor Department reported that the nation added an estimated 75,000 nonfarm jobs in May, only about half as many as most economists consider necessary to absorb the normal increase in the labor force.

Instead of highlighting signs of a cooling economy, which would ease inflationary pressures, Mr. Bernanke placed top emphasis on the need for vigilance against rising prices.

"Given recent developments, the medium-term outlook for inflation will receive particular scrutiny," Mr. Bernanke said. "There is a strong consensus among the members of the Federal Open Market Committee that maintaining low and stable inflation is essential" for achieving the central bank's dual goals of price stability and full employment.

The Fed, he continued, "will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core inflation readings is not sustained."

Despite the sharp sell-off in stock markets after Mr. Bernanke spoke, some analysts cautioned that the Fed had not necessarily closed the door to a pause.

"Mr. Bernanke's speech is more nuanced than the headlines at first suggest," wrote Ian C. Shepherdson, who tracks the American economy for High Frequency Economics, noting that the Fed chairman had been his most emphatic yet in stating that the economy was indeed starting to cool off.

But Mr. Bernanke's tough tone on Monday contrasted starkly with his testimony in late April before the Senate Banking Committee. In those remarks, Mr. Bernanke explicitly broached the idea of refraining from a rate increase at a Fed meeting to take more time to evaluate incoming economic information, and he said that the Fed might pause even if data pointed to lingering inflation pressure.

In the days that followed, bond investors began selling off Treasury bonds and pushing up yields amid rising suspicions that Mr. Bernanke was soft on inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0032160

Those concerns have since abated. Yields on 10-year Treasury notes, which are closely tied to rates on home mortgages, peaked at about 5.19 percent in mid-May but have since declined to about 5 percent.

On Monday, Mr. Bernanke also avoided any recitation of the Fed's statement after its last rate increase on May 10, when it said that the "extent and timing" of additional increases would depend on how incoming information affects the economic outlook.

He also continued to leave his options open but characterized low and stable inflation as a prerequisite for sustainable economic growth.

And while he noted that the recent surge in energy prices was likely to abate, he warned that oil prices might have contributed to the rise in core inflation and that volatile prices for oil and other commodities "remain a risk" to the inflation outlook.

"The best way to prevent increases in energy and commodity prices from leading to persistently higher rates of inflation," Mr. Bernanke said, "is by anchoring the public's long-term inflation expectations."

Dow Falls 1.77% As Fed Chief Adds To Investor Jitters (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning And Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

A surprisingly frank inflation warning from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke stoked fears of further interest-rate increases, adding to investor jitters and knocking the Dow Jones Industrial Average down almost 200 points to its lowest finish since March 9.

Speaking at an international bankers' conference in Washington, Mr. Bernanke warned that inflation in recent months has been running "at or above the upper end of the range that many economists, including myself, would consider consistent with price stability." He said Fed policy makers would remain "vigilant" to ensure that recent inflation readings don't become the norm.

Although other parts of Mr. Bernanke's speech indicated that he sees signs economic growth is slowing, investors quickly concluded that the odds have increased that the Fed will raise target short-term interest rates at its policy meeting on June 28-29.

Stocks, which already were down earlier in the day on worries about the outlook for oil prices and interest rates, fell further in the wake of Mr. Bernanke's speech. The Dow Jones industrials tumbled 199.15 points, or 1.77%, to 11048.72.

Fears of more interest-rate increases have been spreading since the Fed warned of that possibility at its last policy meeting on May 10. The industrial average now is down 593.93 points, or 5.1%, from its May 10 six-year high of 11642.65. That close was less than 100 points short of the industrial average's record finish of 11722.98 in January 2000.

Since mid-May, inflation fears also have roiled a variety of international markets. The prices of many industrial commodities, such as metals, have fallen sharply, as have stock markets in developing countries and in developed nations from Japan to Europe.

Despite yesterday's declines in the U.S., the Dow Jones industrials are still up 3.1% for the year. The Nasdaq Composite Index, full of volatile technology stocks, fell 2.24%, or 49.79 points, yesterday to 2169.62. It is down 1.6% for the year.

The concern among investors is that inflation is proving more resilient than expected, despite the Fed's campaign of interest-rate increases that began two years ago. Over that time, the Fed has raised its target rate for overnight bank lending to 5% from 1%.

Investor attention now will focus on the government's next release of consumer-price data, due on Wednesday of next week. If the pace of inflation doesn't show signs of slowing, fears of more interest-rate increases will spread. Higher rates are bad news for stocks because they weigh on corporate profits and make alternative investments, such as money-market accounts, more attractive.

The prospect of higher short-term rates also is bad news for bonds, because it suggests that future bond yields probably will be higher, making existing bonds, with their lower yields, less attractive. In response to Mr. Bernanke's speech, Treasury-bond prices fell, pushing the yield of the 10-year Treasury note up to 5.024%.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks were unexpectedly hawkish. He called a recent rise in inflation "unwelcome," and his comments overall suggested the Fed is more concerned about recent price developments than by signs of slowing economic growth, such as the sharp slowdown in job growth in May.

The May jobs report had prompted many economists to speculate that the Fed would finally pause in its tightening of monetary policy, with the idea that a slowing economy would ultimately keep a lid on inflation pressure.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks yesterday, however, sent a different signal. They dwelt heavily on the risks of higher inflation. By contrast, he called signs of a weaker economy, including the soft jobs data, part of an "anticipated moderation of economic growth." He made it clear that the Fed's preoccupation, at least for now, will be keeping inflation down, not supporting economic growth.

DOJ_NMG_0032161

"Given recent developments, the medium-term outlook for inflation will receive particular scrutiny," Mr. Bernanke said. Fed policy makers "will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core inflation readings is not sustained."

Inflation, measured by the consumer-price index, was 3.5% in April. By the Fed's preferred measure, which uses a different basket of goods and services and excludes food and energy, it was 2.1%, just above the 1% to 2% "comfort zone" of many Fed officials. Mr. Bernanke noted yesterday that in the past three months, inflation by the latter measure has been running at a 3% annualized rate.

After Mr. Bernanke spoke, futures markets raised their odds to 74% that the Fed would further increase its target for short-term interest rates to 5.25% from the current 5%. They had put those odds at 48% before his speech.

While one more rate increase is unlikely to weaken the economy much, it does, at the margin, raise the odds of a sharper economic slowdown than investors had so far been betting on.

Expectations of the Fed's actions have swung wildly in the past month. In late April, Mr. Bernanke told Congress the Fed might pause in its rate increases, even if inflation remained a risk, to assess the impact of previous rate increases. He indicated that a pause need not mean a halt. But some investors questioned the wisdom of signaling a pause when the economy still appeared strong and inflation data had turned worrisome. Higher inflation data a few weeks later further cemented those concerns, and some analysts said Mr. Bernanke's anti-inflation credentials were being tested.

While Fed officials don't believe their credibility is in danger, Mr. Bernanke's remarks yesterday may have been aimed in part at putting to rest any doubts about his commitment to low inflation.

But the remarks don't guarantee another rate increase later this month. If the inflation data reported next week are tame, or there are signs of a more pronounced slowing in the economy, the Fed could decide to leave rates alone.

Among investors, meanwhile, worries are spreading that they have gone too far in their pursuit of stocks related to economic growth and industrial commodities. Shares of equipment maker Caterpillar fell 4.8% yesterday and aluminum maker Alcoa shed 3.7%.

Some analysts thought investors overreacted to the Bernanke speech. They noted that Mr. Bernanke pointed to signs of a cooling economy, which could suggest that, if data show inflation relenting, the Fed might be prepared to pause soon in its rate increases.

"We're still leaving the June hike penciled in, lightly," wrote Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics, after the Bernanke speech. "But the key point for medium-term investors is that a real slowdown is here; a June hike will be the last hike."

But not everyone was so optimistic yesterday.

Financial markets began the day lower in reaction to soaring crude-oil futures. Futures rose as high as $73.40 a barrel after a speech Sunday in which Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said Iranian oil shipments could be "seriously jeopardized" if the West tried to punish Iran for its nuclear program. By day's end, those worries dissipated, and oil finished up just 27 cents at $72.60. But by then, Mr. Bernanke's speech had seized center stage.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index suffered its second-heaviest decline of 2006 in percentage terms, falling within 11 points of its low for the year, which it hit in February. The S&P 500 declined 1.78%, or 22.93 points, to 1265.29, still up 1.4% this year.

The Nasdaq composite's decline also was its second-heaviest of the year, while the Dow's was its third-worst. Although the Dow Jones industrials still are less than 700 points off their record, the S&P and Nasdaq composite, which fell harder in the bear market, remain far from records.

The dollar, which becomes a more attractive investment when interest rates rise, gained 0.1% yesterday against the euro and 0.5% against the yen. It remains down against both currencies for the year.

Gold rose $7.70 to $643.20 a troy ounce.

Inflation Above Fed's 'Comfort Zone' (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke yesterday signaled more interest-rate increases are likely because underlying inflation has spiked to "unwelcome" levels, touching off a nearly 200-point drop in the Dow Jones Industrial Average.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks before a gathering of international bankers here came as oil prices surged on a threat from Iran's supreme leader to withhold energy supplies if the United States attempts to punish the Middle Eastern oil producer for pursuing nuclear research -- a development that also troubled the markets because it adds to inflation and weakens economic growth.

Mr. Bernanke blamed high energy prices for zapping consumer spending and confidence this year as well as pushing the underlying, or "core," level of inflation above levels that the Fed will tolerate. Core inflation, which excludes energy prices but reflects moves to pass on higher energy costs by businesses, has been running between 2.3 percent and 3.2 percent, he said, above the Fed's 1 percent to 2 percent "comfort zone."

"These are unwelcome developments," he said. The Fed's rate-setting committee "will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core-inflation readings is not sustained."

The economy is in a transition to substantially slower growth under the weight of four percentage points of interest-rate increases the Fed has ordered in 16 actions in the past two years, Mr. Bernanke said. The economy from now on should grow no faster than its average potential growth rate -- estimated at about 2.5 percent to 3 percent -- to ensure that inflation does not get out of hand, he said.

His remarks caused markets to plunge not only at the prospect of higher rates but also on fears that the Fed may go too far and induce a severe slowdown or recession by raising rates too much. Mr. Bernanke has proven to be far more hawkish on inflation than Wall Street expected when he took office in February, and his remarks yesterday were among his toughest yet on the need to stamp out the inflation threat.

Stocks plunged across the board, with the Dow falling 199 points to end at 11,049, and other major indexes posting declines in the 2-percent range. Market interest rates and the dollar rose in anticipation of higher short-term rates, retracing declines they posted Friday when a report showing weak job growth convinced many on Wall Street that the Fed would pause at its next meeting June 29 and not raise rates.

Mr. Bernanke noted that job gains have tailed off this year and said that was "consistent with the softening in the pace of overall economic activity that seems to be under way." He added that the low unemployment rate of 4.6 percent, however, suggests that wage growth that so far has been subdued could start to pick up and add to inflation pressures.

"He's telling you inflation concerns are tipping the scale toward raising rates," said Raymond Remy, head of fixed income at Daiwa Securities America Inc.

Mr. Bernanke held out hope that inflation pressures will ease later this year if oil prices come down -- a possibility that seemed remote yesterday as worries about the nuclear standoff between Iran and the United States continued to roil the markets. By some estimates, the Iran affair has added $15 to the price of premium crude, which landed at $72.31 a barrel at the end of New York trading yesterday.

As yesterday's developments showed, the Fed has little control over crude prices despite its efforts to keep inflation low. Oil prices in recent years have been driven higher by strong demand in the United States and China that has barely been matched by the growth in supplies worldwide because of persistent geopolitical tensions in the Middle East and elsewhere.

The Fed's rate increases have mostly failed to temper demand among Americans consumers, who use a quarter of the world's oil supplies primarily to fuel their cars and sport utility vehicles. To the extent that consumers have cut back on spending in response to higher prices and interest rates, it has been in other areas, such as eating out. Consumers also have maintained their spending patterns despite high prices by going deeper into debt -- a trend that the Fed also seeks to stop.

Fed Chief's Fears Fuel Talk Of Rate Hike (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Richard Beales

Financial Times, June 6, 2006

Stocks tumbled on Monday after Ben Bernanke, chairman of the Federal Reserve, expressed strong personal concern about the recent rise in inflation, raising expectations that the Fed will raise interest rates again this month.

The S&P 500 index and the Nasdaq Composite index had their worst day since January, with the S&P 500 down 1.78 per cent at 1265.29 and the Nasdaq down 2.24 per cent at 2169.62. The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 1.77 per cent to 11,048.72. Treasury bonds also fell, while the dollar benefited from the expectation of higher US rates, rebounding against the yen and the euro.

The Fed chairman told a conference organised by the American Bankers Association that core inflation - excluding energy and food prices - had reached a level that "if sustained, would be at or above the upper end of the range that many economists, including myself, would consider consistent with price stability."

He pledged that the Fed would be "vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core inflation readings is not sustained." In the futures market, the probability of a rate rise this month jumped to more than 70 per cent, up from about 50 per cent at the close on Friday, when weak jobs data suggested the Fed might pause this month.

Mr Bernanke also called for "greater flexibility of exchange rates" in order to moderate global economic imbalances. This is generally regarded as code for dollar depreciation against at least some other currencies.

The Fed chairman's tough talk on inflation may, in part, reflect a desire to strengthen perceptions of his own inflation-fighting commitment, amid some concern in the markets that the Fed has been slow to react to inflation data.

DOJ_NMG_0032163

Mr Bernanke said the Fed would pay close attention to inflation expectations, which have risen recently. He said “the best way to prevent increases in energy and commodity prices from leading to persistently higher rates of inflation is by anchoring the public’s inflation expectations.” He said this required both a strong commitment to fighting inflation, and a predictable response to economic developments.

However, in a sign that the June rate decision remains finely poised, the Fed chairman emphasised that there is growing evidence that the economy is slowing, as required to cool overall inflationary pressures.

Mr Bernanke said “the anticipated moderation of economic growth seems now to be under way.” He said consumer spending had “decelerated noticeably” and the housing market was cooling. The weak jobs data was “consistent with the softening in the pace of overall economic activity.”

The Fed chairman also pledged to take “full account of the lags with which monetary policy affects the economy.” Mr Bernanke said the economy was in a “period of transition” during which policy had to be “conducted with great care and with close attention to the evolution of the economic outlook as implied by incoming information.” But he added that “given recent developments, the medium term outlook for inflation will receive particular scrutiny.”

Fed Chief Raises Inflation Concern (WP)

By Nell Henderson And Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke expressed more concern about rising inflation than the cooling U.S. economy yesterday, sending his strongest signal yet that interest rates are probably headed higher.

Stocks plunged after Bernanke vowed to combat the recent "unwelcome" pickup in inflation, even as he told an international bankers' conference that an economic slowdown "seems now to be underway."

The combination of high inflation and sluggish growth causes pain throughout an economy: Rising prices reduce the purchasing power of workers' wages, erode savings and diminish the returns on investment. Slow growth pushes up unemployment, squeezes corporate profit and discourages businesses from expanding.

Like many economists, Bernanke argues that keeping inflation low is vital to promoting a strong economy because it allows people to make purchases, borrow money, plan for retirement, invest and make other financial decisions without worrying about rising prices. But beating inflation means raising interest rates, which crimps consumer spending by raising borrowing costs.

"He came right out and said we're worried about inflation," said Arthur Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies & Co. "Just what the market didn't need to hear."

Major U.S. stock market indicators fell about 2 percent on the day as Bernanke's comments deflated hopes that the Fed was near the end of two years of steady interest rate increases.

After taking over as Fed chief in February, Bernanke's first public speech was on the importance of low inflation, or "price stability" in central bank jargon. Yet many analysts and investors in financial markets questioned his inflation-fighting credentials in recent weeks, particularly after he told Congress in late April that the Fed might leave interest rates unchanged at an upcoming meeting even if there were risks of higher inflation.

Bernanke's comments yesterday left much less doubt. "He laid down a marker -- that inflation is the primary issue" for the Fed, said David Shulman, a senior economist with the UCLA Anderson Forecast produced by the University of California at Los Angeles Anderson School of Management.

Consumer price inflation has risen this year, largely because of climbing energy prices, Bernanke said. Moreover, he added, measures of "core" inflation, which exclude traditionally volatile food and energy prices, have also moved higher in recent months. The Labor Department's core consumer price index rose at a 3.2 percent annual rate over the past three months and at a 2.8 percent pace over the past six months, he said.

"These are unwelcome developments," Bernanke said, deflating financial market hopes that the central bank would soon stop raising interest rates. Fed officials "will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core inflation readings is not sustained."

Many analysts forecast the economy to slow as the housing market cools and dampens consumer spending, which would cause employers to pull back on hiring. That process has begun, Bernanke said.

Still, he did not sound too worried about the economy's health, noting other sources of strength in rising U.S. exports, increased business investment, low unemployment and generally healthy consumer finances.

Fed economists have expected consumer prices to rise temporarily this year, as businesses pass on some of their higher costs for energy, metals and other raw materials. But Bernanke expressed concern that inflation might persist at an unacceptably high level, particularly if it causes businesses and consumers to expect bigger price increases.

DOJ_NMG_0032164

Fed policymakers "must continue to resist any tendency for increases in energy and commodity prices to become permanently embedded in core inflation," Bernanke said.

Before his warning, many investors believed there was a 50-50 chance the Fed might leave its benchmark short-term rate unchanged at its policymaking meeting June 28-29, taking a pause after two years of steady increases. After his remarks, futures markets traders boosted their bets that Fed officials will increase the rate to at least 5.25 percent from 5 percent, for a 17th consecutive increase.

"The markets see [interest] rates going up and staying high for a while," while the economy slows and profits get squeezed, Shulman said.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.8 percent, its steepest one-day drop since January. The Dow Jones industrial average dropped 1.8 percent, to its lowest level since early March. The Nasdaq composite index shed 2.2 percent, erasing any gain this year. Meanwhile, oil closed at more than $72 a barrel yesterday after Iran's leader threatened to reduce production in response to Western pressure to curtail that nation's nuclear technology program.

Global financial markets have been volatile for more than a month, largely because of uncertainty about inflation, interest rates, oil prices and the pace of U.S. economic growth.

The markets' reaction yesterday reversed the gains recorded Friday, when a weak labor-market report encouraged many investors to think the Fed would not raise interest rates this month for fear of "overshooting," or raising rates too high and triggering a sharper economic slump.

But, Bernanke said, a single economic report, such as one month's employment figures, would not by itself change the Fed's interest rate policy. Rather, because interest rate changes take effect over many months, the Fed would study how such a report affects its forecast for the economy six to 12 months down the road.

"He seemed to have greater concern for inflation than a slowing economy," said Stephen Massoca, co-chief executive of the boutique investment bank Pacific Growth Equities LLC.

Fears Of Stagflation Leave Dow Battered (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, June 6, 2006

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average suffered its fifth triple-digit loss in less than a month Monday after Federal Reserve chief Ben Bernanke said the central bank would keep fighting against still-worrisome inflation despite signs of a slowing economy.

The Dow cratered 199 points to 11,049 for a 1.8% loss that was its third worst this year. But stocks of all types fell sharply. The biggest losses came in areas that had been market leaders before the recent slide began after May 10, when the Fed raised interest rates a 16th time and gave no sign it would stop boosting soon. The small-stock Russell 2000 index, for example, slumped 3.2%, as investors continued to reduce risk in their portfolios.

Bernanke's comments unnerved investors because they raise fears of stagflation, an environment of rising prices and stagnating economic growth. His tough talk on inflation also increased concerns that the Fed will raise its target for short-term interest rates, currently 5%, again at the end of June, dashing hopes it would pause in its two-year-long rate-tightening campaign.

The sell-off was the latest example of sharp volatility in reaction to Bernanke's comments. Bernanke, who took over for longtime Fed chief Alan Greenspan in January, continues to take a tough stance on inflation in an effort to enhance his inflation-fighting credentials. But like past new Fed chairmen, analysts say he has had trouble earning credibility with Wall Street and has had mixed success communicating Fed policy.

“Here we have some suspicion the economy may be weakening … and a struggling stock market,” says Jim Paulsen, strategist at Wells Capital Management. “And the Fed chairman chooses (Monday) to inform everyone he has decided to get tough on inflation.” That suggests the Fed will fight inflation even as the economy falters — “sort of a sense of stagnation,” he says. “That's always a bad word for the stock market.”

Prior to Bernanke's comments, stocks were already deep in negative territory due to soaring crude prices sparked by threats from Iran that it would reduce oil exports to serve its political needs in the controversy with the West over its nuclear program.

Gary Kaltbaum, a money manager at Kaltbaum & Associates, says the Fed has been sending mixed messages. “Monday, Bernanke states inflation is ‘at or above expectations.' But last week, all the other Fed (officials) said inflation was ‘well contained.' What changed in a week?”

DOJ_NMG_0032165

What's making the Fed officials' job more difficult is they told the market that they will make rate decisions based on economic data. But so-called data dependency creates an awful lot of short-term volatility, says John Caldwell, strategist at McDonald Financial.

Iran Rumblings Push Oil Prices Up (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Oil prices climbed to the highest in nearly a month Monday after Iran warned over the weekend that any efforts to punish the major oil producer could lead to a reduction in world supply.

Average U.S. retail gasoline prices, meanwhile, edged higher.

After jumping more than $1 in trading early in the day, oil ended the day up 27 cents at $72.60 a barrel. That was the highest since May 11 and marked the second-consecutive trading day of increases.

Prices are less than $3 from the all-time high hit in April.

"Today's price spikes may well be yet another ominous sign of higher prices to come, at least for the short- to medium-term," Moody's Economy.com senior economist Matthew Cairns said in a note to clients from London.

Cairns estimated the war of words between several countries, including the USA and Iran, the world's fourth-largest oil producer, has added 20% to the price of oil this year. Oil prices are likely to stay high in the near term, "as heightened geopolitical tensions will continue to spook markets," he said.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Sunday denied that Iran is seeking nuclear weapons and said attempts to punish the country would jeopardize the world oil supply. Although Cairns, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and others have noted that Iran relies too much on oil revenue to cut off supplies, the Iranian leader's comments still shook investors.

Bill Ferer, president of W.H. Reaves, a Jersey City investment management company that focuses on energy, says such statements have a big impact because the balance between supply and demand is so tight.

"At a different time, at a different place, this would be a source of concern, but not nearly as much as it is today," Ferer says. "The market is right to be concerned, given the clear lack of surplus producing capacity in lots of places. We just don't have it."

Although the USA does not import oil from Iran, there is concern that should sanctions be imposed on that country, there would be less oil on the world market.

In other energy news, after falling for two consecutive weeks, the average retail gasoline price rose to $2.89 a gallon Monday, up more than 2 cents from a week ago and 78 cents higher than a year ago, the Energy Department said. Prices rose in such cities as Boston, Chicago and Cleveland, but fell in others, such as San Francisco and Seattle.

Oil accounts for about half of the cost of gasoline at the pump.

High Cost Of Oil Could Put Many Jobs At Risk (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 6, 2006

DARLINGTON, S.C. — Gazing out at the thousands of bales of fluffy, white polyester filling Wellman's factory, it's hard to imagine that the man-made fiber has the same origins as a gallon of gasoline.

But it does.

Of the 2.3 billion pounds of materials Wellman produces at its several factories around the world each year, 2 billion are derived from oil or natural gas. The company's polyester is used to make numerous products, including sports apparel, diapers and pillows.

The rising cost of oil has put a squeeze on the companies that use oil as an ingredient for their products. Although they are down from the records seen recently, oil prices are up more than 20% from a year ago and are more than 150% higher than they were five years ago. Natural gas prices have also risen.

Chemicals made from oil are used by companies to manufacture many products consumers rely on every day, such as plastic bottles, aspirin, lipstick and deodorant.

"It's used in pretty much everything," Wachovia economist Jason Schenker says. "I cannot look at my desk and see things that are not petroleum-based."

Even though oil-based products are so pervasive, the direct impact of the rise in the cost of making such goods on consumers has been — and likely will continue to be — minimal. That's because manufacturers, faced with strong global competition, are unable to pass along all of the added costs to customers. That means prices for most oil-derived products will likely barely budge as a result of higher energy costs.

DOJ_NMG_0032166

But the impact on manufacturers and other companies that use oil-based ingredients could be significant, causing a ripple effect throughout the economy. As firms are faced with rising prices and see their margins cut, they may have to cut back on production, reduce pay increases or maybe even cut jobs or shut down.

"There's a squeeze going on," Wellman CEO Tom Duff says. High oil prices are "an issue that extends beyond just the gas pump. But that's all anybody really pays any attention to."

Says John Hodgson, chief marketing and sales officer at DuPont, "This is about jobs."

At some companies, job losses are already hitting.

Continental Tire announced last month that 481 employees will lose their jobs July 7 when it will drastically reduce production at its plant in Charlotte. The cutbacks are in part a response to higher raw material costs as well as declining demand for the company's tires in North America, Continental Tire says in a news release. The company has warned it may close the plant entirely. Tires are made with synthetic rubber produced with a chemical derived from oil.

Although pink slips have not been given out, Angela Keener, 44, and her husband, Doug, 47, expect they will be part of the July 7 layoffs because they work on lines at the factory that are set to be cut. They have both worked at the tire plant for 25 years. They met on the factory floor and have been married for 21 years. Her sister and brother-in-law also work at the tire plant.

"It's really upsetting to think that you have put that much time in, and then you have to start over," says Angela of High Shoals, N.C. "I could lose everything I have worked for 25 years."

The layoffs are not unexpected. Angela began taking accounting classes in the fall, and Doug has been taking welding courses. They have also been saving money.

Local governments across the country are warning they may have to let planned road projects lapse because prices for asphalt, an oil-based product, are skyrocketing. That means fewer hours for road workers.

Lynn Kading, president of Hills Materials, a highway contracting company in Rapid City, S.D., says his asphalt costs have doubled in the last year. He figures he has lost $3 million because governments, balking at the asphalt tab, have suspended projects that he has bid on recently.

"It's a big industry concern," Kading says. "It affects how much work we've got. Consequently, it affects how many hours our employees can get. And they have families to feed."

Wachovia's Schenker says the squeeze on companies could become more severe if oil prices exceed $70 a barrel for a considerable period.

Making matters worse, many companies are being hit with higher energy prices on a number of fronts. Not only are prices of oil-based goods increasing, but so are transportation costs and electricity prices.

But an extremely competitive market limits price increases. As the product gets processed further, the price increases typically get smaller because of strong competition at that level. By the time the product is in the hands of the average U.S. consumer, the gains are barely noticeable.

"The further out you get from the initial increases, the less you see them," says Stephen Brown, director of energy economics at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas.

Don Norman, economist at industry group Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, says U.S. companies are at a distinct disadvantage compared with companies in other parts of the world.

"While the price of oil may be the same in the U.S. and China, the other cost of production, namely labor … gives foreign competitors that much more of an advantage," he says.

At Wellman, oil and natural gas account for approximately three-quarters of the company's total costs — including payroll and health care, typically the biggest costs for companies. In addition to making polyester, Wellman manufactures a BB-sized material made from energy-derived chemicals used to produce plastic containers made to hold everything from water to shampoo to peanut butter.

"We like to say we control costs well, and we cut costs and we do all the things that we are supposed to do, but when you have that big a piece of it that gets controlled by the price of oil and natural gas, it's much more difficult to be able to keep your costs under control," CEO Duff says. So the company tries to save on energy-related costs anywhere it can.

At its 760-acre factory in Darlington, just a few minutes from the famous NASCAR racetrack, Wellman has installed new software to maximize the efficiency of the company's boilers. The software has reduced energy use in that area by 5%, says plant manager Ian Shaw.

The factory, which operates 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, also cuts some production during peak hours in the summer, when the local utility charges more to encourage conservation during what is typically a two-hour window in late afternoon. And throughout the million-square-foot plant, workers save every scrap — including small, wayward strands of polyester — to be recycled.

Recycling is a way the company has tried to reduce the impact of higher energy costs.

DOJ_NMG_0032167

The company is stepping up its use of recycled plastic bottles to make fiber products rather than manufacturing the products using chemicals. Using recycled materials is typically far more expensive than manufacturing with the energy-derived chemicals. But that is no longer a given.

Wellman is also promoting its product that is made from recycled carpeting fibers.

For decades, auto companies have been using the chemicals for "under the hood" applications, Duff says. Wellman in recent years has been working to make the process of separating out the fibers more efficient.

The company has also raised prices several times in recent months. But the increases do not come close to offsetting the gain in the company's energy costs, Duff says.

"The margins have been tightening because you just haven't been able to pass everything through," he says.

Companies — big and small — that depend on oil as a key ingredient are trying to cope with the higher costs:

·Wilmington, Del.-based DuPont announced May 17 its intent to raise prices for a variety of its products. The company previously increased prices 5% in the fourth quarter and 3% in the first quarter.

But the increases won't completely cover the higher costs. Raw material costs have risen 85% in four years and hit a record in the first quarter, the company says.

"The cost increases have been so significant, so rapid and so sustained, you have a triple whammy," DuPont's Hodgson says. "There comes a point where you say, 'I just can't absorb it anymore.' "

·Profit margins at Erie Molded Plastics in Erie, Pa., have been reduced. Phil Tredway, president of the firm that makes plastic caps for soda and water bottles, says the price of oil-based plastic resin is up as much as 70% from a year ago. He says his suppliers are announcing price changes weekly, making it hard to draw up contracts with his clients.

Tredway says he can pass some of those added costs along to his customers, but not all.

"It makes a difficult business even more difficult," he says.

·Paraffin wax, an oil-based product, is one of the key ingredients in Crayola crayons. Paraffin costs have risen 60% since 2004 and are up 80% from five years ago, Crayola spokesman Eric Zebley says.

But the company has not raised prices. Crayola is taking a number of steps to make its factory in Easton, Pa., more efficient, including reusing more scrap materials.

"We are doing everything we can to keep our crayons affordable and not raise prices," Zebley says.

·Akron, Ohio-based Goodyear Tire and Rubber has raised tire prices five times, 5% to 6% each time, since the start of 2005 in response to the higher raw materials prices.

Approximately two-thirds of Goodyear's raw material costs are related to oil, spokeswoman Tricia Ingraham says. The company's raw materials prices nearly doubled from 2004 to 2005 to $5.6 billion. Raw materials now account for more than two-thirds of Goodyear's total costs.

In addition to raising prices, the company is focusing on higher-end tires, which bring in more money. "Our main focus has been on the higher-margin, higher-technology tire," Ingraham says.

Wellman's Duff warns that high energy costs will likely pose a challenge to companies for many years. And although consumers might not be paying now for the increased costs, they may end up paying for it later, in the form of lost jobs when companies start losing money and are forced to shut down, he says.

"The consumer doesn't want to pay more for the end product," Duff says. "But at the end of the day, (the high cost of energy) gets pushed back to that consumer, whether they recognize it or not."

Runoff For Disgraced Congressman's Seat May Be Bellwether (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, June 6, 2006

A special election today in San Diego to fill the seat of a congressman imprisoned for bribery has become a test of voter discontent with Republican leadership and frustration over the porous border with Mexico.

In the race to replace disgraced Republican former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, Republican nominee Brian Bilbray, a former three-term congressman from a neighboring district, would in any other time be a heavy favorite against a Democratic opponent.

California's 50th Congressional District tilts heavily Republican in registration. A Democrat hasn't won here in modern times, and President Bush twice carried the district by 10 percentage points.

Yet the race between Bilbray and Francine Busby, a relative newcomer to politics, appears to be coming down to a tight finish. Both candidates have said their private polling shows each with a very slight lead.

"If Republicans lose a district that is this Republican, they ought to be real worried," says Gary Jacobson, political scientist at the University of California, San Diego. "It's driven by unhappiness with the state of the nation."

DOJ_NMG_0032168

The winner will serve out the remaining seven months of Cunningham's term. Whoever wins, Jacobson says, will prevail for reasons that transcend "local politics or local issues."

Bilbray has focused on illegal immigration, criticizing Bush for what he says is amnesty for illegal immigrants and Busby for supporting a bill that would permit those who got into the country illegally to qualify for legal status. Bilbray calls for a crackdown on employers who hire illegal immigrants, thousands of whom have used the area as a port of entry from Mexico.

"The choice between Busby and Bilbray is between benefits for illegals and amnesty, or no benefits," Bilbray says.

With Bush's popularity low in polls in California as well as nationally, Bilbray has made a point of separating himself from the president even as Vice President Cheney visited recently to help Bilbray raise campaign money.

On immigration, Bilbray says of Bush: "We don't casually disagree. We strongly disagree."

Busby has tried to capitalize on voter discontent on issues such as gas prices, deaths of servicemembers in Iraq, and a lobbying scandal in Washington she ties to the Republicans.

"I think people are looking at me as a messenger of hope and a symbol of change in Congress," she says. "People are dissatisfied both with his direction and that of Congress. They see Congress rubber-stamping everything."

She calls Cunningham the personification of corruption and has tried to tie Bilbray to it by pointing to his work as a Washington lobbyist. After losing his House seat in 2000, Bilbray lobbied for clients including an anti-illegal-immigration group and a utility company.

A TV ad she is airing charges Bilbray "flip-flopped on a guest-worker program" and plugs a third candidate — independent anti-illegal-immigration hard-liner William Griffith — as an alternative for conservatives.

"Don't expect lobbyist Brian Bilbray to fix Washington or fix our borders," her ad says.

A school board member who lost overwhelmingly to Cunningham two years ago, Busby has been catapulted to contender status by Cunningham's bribery convictions and Bush's difficulties. She has raised more campaign money, $2.25 million to Bilbray's $1 million as of May 17 federal reports.

Bilbray says his victory would dampen national Democrats' hopes for a House majority.

"Mrs. Pelosi," he says, referring to the House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi who hopes to be elevated out of the minority, "shouldn't be measuring the speaker's office just yet."

All Eyes On California-50 (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan And Patrick O'connor

The Hill, June 6, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Trying to leave nothing to chance, Republicans sought to ensure victory in today's runoff election to replace imprisoned Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), while Democrats sought to shape the post-election spin by arguing that even losing is winning.

Hoping to push former Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) into office, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) paid for automated phone calls recorded by President Bush, Laura Bush and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and kept up its television advertising campaign.

After today's vote, the NRCC will have spent $5 million on the race. Over the weekend, the Republican National Committee (RNC) paid to send approximately 160 "deployed volunteers" to San Diego to help the Bilbray campaign turn out supporters, an RNC official said. An estimated 65 of those volunteers, working 10- to 12-hour days making phone calls and knocking on doors, are Republican staff members on Capitol Hill.

RNC spokesman Josh Holmes said the national party also has from six to eight field staffers in San Diego, including some of their regional directors from other parts of the country.

The RNC's deployment of Hill staff marks a planning shift from at least the past two cycles, when the NRCC was responsible for sending volunteers to the tightest races. The NRCC will no longer operate its Strategic Taskforce for Organizing and Mobilizing People (STOMP) this cycle and instead will allow the RNC to organize those efforts.

Without a presidential election to dominate the national committee's planning efforts this cycle, the RNC has more flexibility than either of the two congressional campaign committees to coordinate the flow of money, staff and volunteers for these get-out-the-vote drives in the days before an election, the RNC official said.

That means the RNC is in a better position to focus partywide efforts while the congressional committees can focus their planning on individual races.

"It's a more streamlined process," the official said. "There are not as many moving parts."

Carl Forti, spokesman for the NRCC, said, "Bush-Cheney '04 ran one of the best turnout operations in history. [RNC Chairman] Ken Mehlman ran that effort, and it makes total sense for him to be in charge of turnout in November."

As Californians began voting early for today's special general election in the heavily Republican 50th District, Bilbray spent the overcast morning at home with his family while Democrat Francine Busby shook hands with voters at a commuter train station in Encinitas.

Political observers expected the race to be close, although they disagreed on whether it would be a harbinger of Democrats' fortunes for winning the House in November's midterm elections.

If Busby upsets Bilbray, political experts expect that K Street PAC money will flow to Democrats and that it will shape the national media's storyline in a way that is favorable to Democrats.

"This is a psychological race," said former House Democratic Whip Tony Coelho (Calif.). "If the Democrats won it's a foregone conclusion" of a Democratic sweep in November.

Coelho added, "If they lose closely, it will continue the paranoia among Republicans to separate themselves from President Bush."

But Republican strategists said the race to fill Cunningham's seat is a function of circumstance: Cunningham's corruption and the difficulties of motivating voters in a midterm election without a competitive statewide GOP primary.

"Of course the seat itself is a prize, but a win for Democrats would give them drip-drip press coverage for the next couple of months," said a GOP lobbyist. "Republicans can't let that happen."

But the fashion in which the candidates spent the morning could foreshadow tomorrow's results. Bilbray's confidence appeared to grow — his northern San Diego suburban campaign office was relatively quiet as campaign aides listened to Rush Limbaugh and ridiculed Busby for misspeaking about the voting rights of illegal immigrants.

He later appeared, in a dark suit and blue tie, his wife and college-aged daughter in tow, at the San Diego County office building to cast his vote and take a few questions from reporters.

A Survey USA poll released yesterday found that Bilbray led Busby, 47-45 percent. The poll had a five-point margin of error. Busby had led in previous polls.

"It's too close to call," said Jon Fleischman, former executive director of the California state GOP and editor of FlashReport.com. "There's a slight edge to Bilbray because of the numbers in the district, and he's benefiting from Busby's last-minute gaffe."

The potential spoiler in the race, anti-immigration independent candidate William Griffith, spent the day teaching geometry to students in a Carlsbad high school. He started campaigning when school let out late yesterday afternoon, he said.

While Bilbray might have some breathing room, the final days of his campaign have not been easy. McCain pulled out of a fundraiser because he and Bilbray disagree on whether to grant a form of amnesty to illegal immigrants.

And Bill Hauf, a conservative Republican whom Bilbray faces in the GOP primary to run for a full two-year term in November, continued to pummel him on the immigration issue.

"The question is whether Hauf's $1 million will further suppress the conservative vote," Fleischman said, noting that Hauf has sent out several hard-hitting direct-mail pieces criticizing Bilbray and carefully explaining to voters that they do not have to vote for the same person in the special general election and in the primary.

As Republicans ran scared in the final day before the election, Democrats worked overtime to shape the storyline about what a victory or loss would mean — or would not mean — about the Democrats' shot at winning the House in November, or coming up short.

Strategists argued that, win or lose, they have triumphed because they forced Republicans to spend millions to win Cunningham's overwhelmingly GOP district — the equivalent of their spending millions to save Rep. Barney Frank's seat in Massachusetts. They suggested that Busby, who lost to Cunningham in 2004 and would likely win the Democratic nomination to run again for a full two-year term in November, has been a less-than stellar candidate who nonetheless has turned a race that should have been a GOP rout into a nail biter.

That an inexperienced candidate could run a close race in a heavily GOP district, a Democratic source said, should worry Republican incumbents running against seasoned politicians in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Florida and Connecticut.

Since the April primary, Democrats have spent $2 million on phone banks, direct-mail pieces and television advertisements attacking Bilbray or encouraging conservative voters to support Griffith.

Bilbray downplayed the national implications of the race and complained to reporters that the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and Busby had distorted his 25-year record in public service, adding that it was "unheard of" for a candidate of one party to run ads supporting a candidate of another party.

Conducting morning drive time radio interviews by cell phone and shaking hands with voters in the coastal town of Encinitas, Busby agreed that the race would be a harbinger for November even if she lost.

"Yes, absolutely," Busby said. "When I first ran I was dismissed as a sacrificial lamb, but I am where I am in such a tight race because people in this district have a desire for change."

Parties On Edge In California (RC)

By David Drucker

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

The wild special election to replace former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R) in California's 50th district comes to a head today, and the outcome will have broad implications in the battle for the House and on the role issues such as illegal immigration and ethics might play in the fall.

In a normal year, the race probably wouldn't be close.

But Cardiff school board member Francine Busby (D) has pushed ex-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R) to the limit in the special election runoff that was forced by Cunningham's resignation and subsequent incarceration after he admitted to taking bribes. Republicans acknowledge that she effectively has exploited Bilbray's post-legislative career as a lobbyist in a San Diego-area district that has experienced multiple corruption scandals of late, including at the local government level.

But Bilbray, a longtime, staunch opponent of illegal immigration despite other views considered moderate by Republican standards, successfully has nailed Busby on that subject. His support for the hardline House immigration bill — and his opposition to the Senate bill — has been well-received by voters and the local newspapers.

The race also has enabled national organizations to give the strategies they plan to use in the fall a trial run.

"This election, five months out, has given both parties a chance to test the messages they will use in November," said Martha McKenna, campaign services director for EMILY's List, which is playing heavily in the race on Busby's behalf.

Republicans, who have been apprehensive about their chances for weeks despite the 50th district's solid GOP tilt (there are about 50,000 more registered Republicans there than Democrats), now feel cautiously optimistic that Bilbray will squeak out the victory.

Republican sources both in the district and in Washington, D.C., said that Bilbray turned the corner in the past five days, partly because for the past two weeks of the campaign the main topic of debate had been illegal immigration.

Although the GOP base there has been described as unhappy with the party's leadership on Capitol Hill and ambivalent toward Bilbray, one Republican said that the GOP has returned to the fold in recent days.

"Bilbray's camp is now super energized — just where you want to be the day before a tight election," a Republican House aide with knowledge of the race said Monday.

Even if Busby loses today, some Democrats believe the race will have helped them toward their goal of taking back the House

this November. The National Republican Congressional Committee will end up spending up to $4.8 million to defend a GOP seat, said one Democratic strategist, giving Republicans less money to use in the fall to either defend more vulnerable Republican seats or target Democratic seats. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had spent $2 million on this race as of Friday.

That Busby has benefited in this campaign from the fact that Bilbray has worked as a lobbyist since losing his House seat to now-Rep. Susan Davis (D) in 2000 also has buoyed Democrats. This proves, the Democratic strategist indicated, that a message centered around the need to send "change" candidates to Washington to address the lobbying scandals — many of which have been associated with GOP lawmakers — could be a potent strategy.

If Busby wins, look to hear one word spouted by Democrats over and over again: momentum; as in, positive momentum for fundraising, volunteer recruitment, media coverage and overall excitement about November.

McKenna, of EMILY's List, believes Busby's message of clean government has resonated with the district's voters in the wake of the Cunningham scandal and said Bilbray's move to change the subject to illegal immigration has failed. But conservative activist Grover Norquist said the jury's still out on that claim.

Norquist argued there is no better district to test the effectiveness of the Democrats' "culture of corruption" message, at least as one that can help Democrats pick up the 15 seats they need to take control of the House.

If Busby loses in a district whose former Congressman went to jail for taking bribes, Norquist said it effectively eliminates "culture of corruption" as a Democratic trump card in November.

"If you're going to have tsunami in November, you're going to have to surf a wave in San Diego in June," he said.

Ron Nehring, chairman of the San Diego County Republican Party and vice chairman of the state GOP, cautioned against reading too much into the results of this race.

Nehring said the race revolves around a number of issues, and he predicted that individuals and political factions looking for evidence to support a particular point of view will cherry-pick from the election's results and spin those results to prove the point that suits them.

DOJ_NMG_0032171

"This special election is awash in externalities: Duke Cunningham, national mood, national issues, and forces outside the 50th, all acting on this special election — so I think it's easy to overestimate the impact of those externalities," Nehring said. "I think we're looking at a confluence of factors that is unlikely to be repeated in any Congressional district."

As they have for weeks, both parties are playing heavily in this race. Estimates peg the number of Democratic volunteers on the ground for Busby at around 400, with at least 160 Republican volunteers under the supervision of about seven Republican National Committee staffers on the ground for Bilbray.

The RNC is coordinating the get-out-the-vote effort for Bilbray, and in recent days volunteers have logged about 105,000 phone calls and knocked on nearly 20,000 doors. Meanwhile, both the DCCC and the NRCC have been on television and radio for weeks with independent expenditure campaigns.

With the polls closing at 8 p.m. PST tonight, a number of wildcards remain that could affect the outcome of this race.

The regular statewide primary is also being held today, and voters in the 50th district essentially will have two ballots. One is for the special election and features Bilbray, Busby, a Libertarian candidate and an Independent; the other is for the regular primary and includes the party primaries for the 50th district race for the right to run for a full term in November.

The winner of the special election earns the privilege of serving only the remainder of Cunningham's term. In addition to fending off Busby from the left, Bilbray has had to deal with multimillionaire Bill Hauf (R) on the right, running against the former Congressman on the regular primary ballot for the GOP nomination to the November election.

The Independent candidate on the runoff ballot, William Griffith, was endorsed by the San Diego Minuteman, the local chapter of an outspoken, anti-illegal immigration group whose volunteers have patrolled the Mexican border.

Busby has had the luxury of a unified Democratic Party behind her candidacy and might also benefit from the gubernatorial primary on the ballot today between state Treasurer Phil Angelides (D) and state Controller Steve Westly (D). Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) is not being contested in his primary.

But Busby's biggest problem might be of her own making. She was recorded at a campaign event Friday telling a group of supporters, many of whom were Latino and spoke Spanish as a first language, that "you don't need papers to vote." Busby said she simply meant to say that non-citizens were allowed to volunteer on her campaign, but Republicans have used the recording against her.

The NRCC went up with radio ads about the recording Monday morning, and it has been playing repeatedly on conservative talk radio. Republicans monitoring the race credit this statement with sending undecided voters and unenthusiastic Republicans into Bilbray's camp.

GOP Seeks To Capitalize On Busby Remarks (AP-Y2)

By Allison Hoffman

AP2, June 5, 2006

Republicans seized on Democrat Francine Busby's comments that sounded like encouragement for illegal immigrants to help her campaign as the GOP sought an edge in the final hours of a surprisingly close House race.

Immigration looms large in the runoff election Tuesday in the San Diego-area district some 30 miles from the U.S.-Mexico border. Busby's remarks, and her subsequent explanation that she misspoke, has drawn much of the attention in the race's last days.

Speaking to a largely Hispanic audience last Thursday, Busby faced a Spanish-speaking questioner who said he wanted to help her campaign but lacked voting papers. The question was translated into English and she responded, "Everybody can help. You can all help. You don't need papers for voting, you don't need to be a registered voter to help."

Busby's GOP rival, Brian Bilbray, criticized the Democrat, saying she was encouraging possible illegal immigrants to volunteer for the campaign. On Monday, the GOP launched a radio ad that said, "That's right. Francine Busby says you don't need papers to vote."

Busby said repeatedly throughout the weekend that she misspoke. She said she had been trying to encourage underage high school students or people who weren't registered — but are in the country legally — to participate in the political process.

"I had a slip of the tongue and I corrected it immediately," Busby said. "I want to make it unequivocal that I do not support anyone who is here illegally voting or working on campaigns."

In the traditional GOP stronghold, registered Republicans outnumber Democrats, 3-to-2. But the downfall of convicted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, doing time for accepting bribes, has given Democrats hope of capturing the seat.

The winner of Tuesday's runoff will serve the remaining seven months of Cunningham's term. The prevailing party will play up the outcome as an early barometer of the November midterm elections.

Reflecting the high stakes, the two parties have spent more than $6 million combined on the contest. President Bush and first lady Laura Bush recorded automated telephone messages for Bilbray. A mass e-mailing from Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., the party's 2004 presidential nominee, was sent last week to more than 100,000 supporters urging them to help get out the vote. Early voting began this weekend at county registrars' offices, with several hundred casting ballots. Busby and Bilbray voted on Monday.

Busby, a local school board member, has focused her campaign on an anti-corruption theme and assailed Bilbray, a former congressman, for his time working as a lobbyist. On immigration, she backs the Senate-passed bill that combines enhanced border security with a guest worker program and a shot at citizenship for many of the 11 million illegal immigrants in the country.

Bilbray, who highlights his congressional experience, favors construction of a fence "from the Pacific Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico," and barring "illegal aliens from any access to Social Security benefits."

On his Web Site, he offers no plan for treatment of the illegal immigrants currently in the country.

A fractious Republican Party base and the presence of a third candidate are the wild cards in the race.

Some conservatives consider Bilbray too liberal on social issues and even on immigration. The ultraconservative San Diego Minutemen have endorsed William Griffith, an American Independent on the runoff ballot who won less than 1 percent in the April special election that led to the runoff.

Griffith has spent only a few thousand dollars on his campaign, but last week got a boost from Busby's campaign, which ran ads on conservative talk stations encouraging listeners concerned about immigration to vote for Griffith.

Bilbray also faces a primary challenge from self-financed candidate Bill Hauf, who backs Bilbray in the runoff but has recently spent more than $100,000 on radio ads running to his right for the Republican berth in November's election.

"The Republican Party is splitting 14 ways from Sunday on border issues, along with fiscal issues and social issues," said Carl Luna, a political scientist at Mesa College. "The real conservatives may just take their jacks and go home."

8 States Hold Primaries For Some Offices (AP-Y2)

By Robert Tanner

AP2, June 5, 2006

The old adage says all politics are local. But challengers this year are convinced that national dissatisfaction with Iraq, immigration and political corruption give them an unusual chance to topple sitting governors, senators and House members.

Primaries on Tuesday for governor in Alabama and California, a Senate seat in Montana and a handful of House contests, among other races, will put their faith to the test.

The most-watched congressional contest is the only one that will actually put someone in office — a special election in southern California to replace jailed former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham. Democrats hope to win in what has long been a conservative, GOP stronghold, and the race is seen as a bellwether for fall midterm elections.

In all, eight states are holding primaries, with polls also open in Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, South Dakota and Iowa, where there is an open governor's seat.

In Montana, revelations of three-term Republican Sen. Conrad Burns (news, bio, voting record)' ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff have made him one of the most vulnerable members of Congress, inspiring a vigorous contest among Democrats for the right to face him this November.

The issues in Alabama include tax policy, social conservatism and immigration, as GOP Gov. Bob Riley's failed tax increases have spurred both a Republican primary and a heated contest among Democrats. Former Judge Roy Moore is challenging Riley for the GOP nomination, after gaining social conservatives' notice for his unsuccessful fight to put a Ten Commandments monument in his courthouse.

Among the Democrats hoping to get Riley's job is former Gov. Don Siegelman, who will likely be in federal court on racketeering and bribery charges. His toughest opponent is Democratic Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley.

In California, early polls that showed a drop in GOP Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's popularity raised Democratic hopes. But he's benefited from a mean-spirited Democratic primary campaign between Treasurer Phil Angelides and Controller Steve Westly. Schwarzenegger faced no major primary competition.

"It seems clearly to be a time when people are not real happy and not thrilled with incumbents almost anywhere," said Norm Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. "There's no doubt you're getting highly attractive (challengers) running because of the peculiar circumstances."

It's always uncertain whether national dismay will trickle down when people vote for their own members of Congress, and the connection is even harder to make to governors.

But already this year, possible signs of anti-incumbent sentiment have emerged in Oregon, where Democratic Gov. Ted Kulongoski won a hard-fought primary with only 54 percent support; GOP Rep. Don Sherwood (news, bio, voting record), a

DOJ_NMG_0032173

Pennsylvania congressman, faced a surprisingly strong challenge from a poorly funded, little-known opponent; and voters threw out more than a dozen Pennsylvania state legislators over a legislative pay raise.

Polls track the discontent: An AP-Ipsos poll last month found the electorate's mood souring, with 73 percent of those polled saying the nation is on the wrong track. That poll had President Bush's approval ratings down to a low of 33 percent, with Congress even lower at 25 percent.

The efforts to highlight discontent over national issues pops up in primary campaigns everywhere. Immigration has been argued in Alabama, California and New Mexico; Iraq in California and New Mexico; political corruption in Montana; ties to oil companies and complaints about gas prices in California; abortion in Iowa.

California's special election pits Republican former House Rep. Brian Bilbray against Democrat Francine Busby for Cunningham's former seat in a conservative San Diego-area district. It's brought national money and speculation that a Democratic win would be a taste of bigger victories in the fall.

Their ads: Bilbray featured his fight against illegal immigration, while Busby promised higher ethical standards.

Democrats also are hoping for a critical autumn victory in Montana, where Burns, seeking a fourth term, has denied that Abramoff or his money ever influenced him. He has blamed the "Eastern liberal press" for his troubles and predicted that Montana voters "will make the right judgment call."

Among other races that Tuesday's primaries will sort out for the fall:

· An open governor's seat in Iowa brought out four Democrats hoping to face GOP Rep. Jim Nussle (news, bio, voting record).

· Republican Tom Kean Jr., son of the former governor, was favored in the GOP primary to challenge New Jersey Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez.

· Former California governor and presidential candidate Jerry Brown, term-limited from staying on as Oakland mayor, is running for state attorney general.

In many cases, Democrats are hoping to capitalize on anti-incumbency sentiment — a reflection on the GOP control of the House, the Senate and a majority of the nation's governorships.

"All the short-term factors are working in the Democrats' favor," said Merle Black, an expert at presidential and Southern politics at Emory University. "To the extent that these elections are nationalized, the Democrats ought to come out better. But I don't know if the national thing really plays out in state contests."

Up For Grabs Midterm Tea Leaves Signal Hot Water For Republicans (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As a bad year for Republicans keeps getting worse, expectations are growing that Democrats could capture at least one house of Congress, ending one-party dominance of the nation's capital and crippling President Bush for his final years.

If the current mood holds, Democrats are in a position to win the 15 seats they need to take control of the House. They have a harder task, however, snagging the six seats needed in the Senate. As the list of vulnerable Republicans grows, all sides are scouting for signs of an electoral wave like that of 1994, which swept away the Democrats' four-decade control of Congress.

A key factor is the president's approval ratings, which are even lower in states featuring key battles than they are nationally. A recent poll had him at 23% in New York, home to as many as six endangered Republicans. Particularly threatened are Republican moderates in Democratic-leaning areas, including the Northeast, the Ohio River Valley and Florida.

In all these areas, seniors are disgruntled about the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit and the administration's now-dead proposal to remake Social Security. In midterm elections, with their low turnouts, seniors account for roughly 40% of the vote.

Two elections being held today are being closely watched as potential barometers for the fall: a special election in California to replace former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who has pleaded guilty to bribery charges; and a Senate primary in Montana, where scandal-touched Sen. Conrad Burns faces a Republican challenge.

Democrats are hoping that Iraq, gas prices, immigration and the environment will boost turnout for their side just as conservatives demoralized by spending and scandals opt to stay home. (See related article1.)

Much can change between now and the elections. Democrats are sparring over what agenda, if any, to put forward and their leaders don't have the tactical vision of former Rep. Newt Gingrich, who inspired the 1994 Republican revolutionaries. Scandals have embroiled two of their House members and voters appear to be turning against all incumbents, putting some Democrats at risk, too.

DOJ_NMG_0032174

Recent polls and primaries, however, suggest voters are gunning for the party in power. If the elections were held today, "Democrats would take at least one of the houses," says analyst Bernadette Budde, senior vice president of the Business Industry Political Action Committee, which typically favors Republicans.

Republicans won't lose for lack of funds. Mr. Bush may be a drag on his party, but he remains a money magnet. He recently raised $860,000 at one Florida event for endangered Rep. Clay Shaw -- nearly as much as many House members spend in a whole campaign.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois and Sen. Chuck Schumer of New York, who head the Democrats' House and Senate campaign committees, have raised more than ever before. Yet Democrats fear -- and Republicans hope -- that the minority party could fall short when it comes to buying costly TV ads in suburban battlegrounds later this year. The House

For Democrats to net 15 seats for a bare majority of 218 is harder than the number suggests. The remapping of the 435 districts after the 2000 census leaves no more than several dozen seats up for grabs. Currently Republicans have 231 to Democrats' 202, which includes one Independent ally. (Two seats are currently vacant.)

Democrats have one big advantage: few vulnerable seats of their own. The anti-Bush climate has a lot to do with that. Also, Democrats have few seats in the conservative South, reflecting the Republican realignment since the civil-rights era.

Stuart Rothenberg, an independent analyst once skeptical of Democrats' chances, now says: "Although I can't count the seats right now to get Democrats to 218, my gut tells me that by November they'll be there."

The Northeast

With a big wave of support, Democrats could plausibly reach a majority without leaving the Northeast and Mid-Atlantic, home to about a third of the 40 to 50 hottest races.

Mr. Bush's approval rating is in the low 30s nationally. In these states it is generally lower. Half of the 18 House districts with Republican representatives that picked Al Gore or John Kerry for president are located here. The Iraq war is especially unpopular as are Mr. Bush's environmental policies. Many voters, including moderate, suburban Republicans, also dislike the party's emphasis on cultural issues such as gay marriage, as well as its fiscal record.

Even the head of Republicans' House campaign committee, Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, now is on some handicappers' watch lists. Republican turnout in New York could be particularly low because the party doesn't have strong candidates to excite voters running against Democrats Sen. Hillary Clinton and gubernatorial aspirant Eliot Spitzer.

On election night, northwest Connecticut's Rep. Nancy Johnson will be "my canary in the coal mine," says Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report. In a normal year, the 12-term Republican congresswoman would be safe, even though Mr. Bush twice failed to carry her district. If Mrs. Johnson loses, Ms. Walter says expect a national Republican wipe-out. Mrs. Johnson is a popular, well-funded moderate who is already running TV ads.

The Midwest

In the Ohio River Valley, home to economic troubles and scandals both local and national, nine House Republicans are targets. They include Ohio Rep. Bob Ney, who faces possible indictment in the widening corruption scandal relating to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Mr. Bush twice carried Ohio, Kentucky and Indiana, but polls show that only a third of their residents approve of his performance. All three states have unpopular Republican governors.

Central Ohio's seven-term Rep. Deborah Pryce is threatened as never before. With Congress so unpopular, her status as the fourth-ranking House leader could become a liability. Mr. Bush easily carried her Columbus-based district in 2000, but nearly lost it in 2004 after a Democratic voter-registration drive.

Republicans take heart that Democrats failed to recruit strong challengers to face other vulnerable incumbents, such as Kentucky's Anne Northup -- whose district went for Gore and Kerry -- or even the embattled Mr. Ney. Republicans also seem prepared for the challenge. That is a contrast, says Carl Forti, communications director of the National Republican Congressional Committee, with the complacency of many Democrats in 1994.

"Anyone who could potentially be in trouble is already paying attention," Mr. Forti says. "That makes it harder to sneak up and beat them."

Florida and the Southwest

While Florida and the southwest have been friendly areas to Republicans, Democrats have made inroads. Republican seats from Florida to California could now be at risk as a potential Hispanic backlash to the House's hard-line immigration bill combines with seniors' worries about Social Security and Medicare, as well as well as voters' vexation generally with war, scandal and deficits.

That dynamic threatens conservative Rep. J.D. Hayworth, the firebrand from suburban Phoenix, and New Mexico's Heather Wilson. Democrats hope to pick up the Texas seat of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who is officially stepping down this week to face trial on corruption charges.

DOJ_NMG_0032175

In Florida, five of 18 Republican-held seats are at risk -- none more so than that of 13-term Rep. Clay Shaw. The district, which Mr. Bush lost twice, includes more voters over the age of 65 than any other and Mr. Shaw was a prominent backer of the administration's Medicare and Social Security policies. Such issues have been used against him before, but not in a year so hostile to Republicans. The Senate

Democrats' chance for a Senate majority is limited by the lineup of races. Democrats already hold 18 of 33 seats up for grabs. Seven of the Republicans' 15 seats are considered safe, putting eight Republican seats in play. Handicappers say three of those are reachable only in the event of a Democratic landslide.

That leaves five. And with the Senate divided 55 Republicans to 45 Democrats, counting one Vermont Independent, Democrats need six to get to a majority of 51. Moreover, the minority party has several seats of their own to protect.

Top Targets

In most danger are two Republicans from opposite ends of the party's spectrum -- liberal Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and conservative Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania. Both states twice went for Democrats over Mr. Bush. In Rhode Island, Mr. Bush's 21% approval rating in one poll has been his worst anywhere.

Democrats say the two-term Mr. Santorum, the third-ranking Senate leader, is too conservative for the state. Unlike other Republicans, he didn't flinch last year from supporting Mr. Bush on Social Security. Democrats recruited state Treasurer Bob Casey, son of the popular late governor, to run against him, over the objection of women's groups. The Democrat, like Mr. Santorum, opposes abortion rights.

Mr. Chafee is doubly threatened. He faces an intraparty challenge from a conservative backed by the antitax Club for Growth, which seeks to punish Mr. Chafee for opposing the Bush tax cuts. If Mr. Chafee survives the September primary, he has just weeks to campaign against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, a former prosecutor and state attorney general. Normally Mr. Chafee would be favored to win a second full term. He didn't vote for the president in 2004 and his opposition to Mr. Bush may provide some protection in November, if it doesn't cost him the primary.

Ohio's Mike DeWine and Missouri's Jim Talent are also big targets. Mr. DeWine has upset social conservatives for his position on judicial nominations, among other issues, and is also facing scandals within the Ohio Republican party, in addition to national ones. In Missouri, Mr. Talent has a conservative base unhappy with his vacillation on a stem-cell research issue that will be on November's ballot.

Montana's Mr. Burns was fairly well prepared to run for a fourth term -- until his contacts with Mr. Abramoff drew Justice Department scrutiny. He has denied any wrongdoing. He faces several challengers in today's primary. Although he is expected to survive, some Republicans still hope he will drop out by August. Democrats have made gains in the populist state and have a couple of credible candidates. A poll that ran in some Montana newspapers recently suggested either could beat Mr. Burns.

Other Notable Battles

In the case of a big swing to Democrats, Republicans could lose seats in Tennessee and Arizona. Democrats are even targeting a Virginia seat long thought safe.

Three Tennessee Republicans, including two former House members, are vying for the nomination to succeed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who is retiring and weighing a 2008 presidential campaign. The winner will face Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., who would be the state's first black senator. Mr. Ford has a moderate record and has already run TV ads, although he would have to overcome the state's Republican tilt.

Arizona's Jon Kyl is favored for a third term but he could be hurt by a Hispanic backlash. Mr. Kyl wants a tougher approach to illegal immigrants than either Mr. Bush or Arizona's better-known Republican senator, John McCain.

Virginia's George Allen once was considered a shoe-in, but he is now on handicappers' watch lists. As he focused on a possible 2008 presidential campaign, two potent opponents emerged. Some national Democratic leaders support Vietnam veteran James Webb, a former Republican and Reagan administration Navy secretary who opposes the Iraq war.

Democrats on the Defensive

Half of Democrats' 18 seats are safe and in several red states, Republicans failed to recruit strong challengers. Democrats are indeed being tested -- but in blue states, such as Maryland, New Jersey, Michigan and Washington.

In Maryland, Republicans are united behind Lt. Gov. Michael Steele to be the state's first black senator. Democrats won't pick their nominee until Sept. 12. Rep. Ben Cardin is favored over Kweisi Mfume, former head of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and Democrats fear disgruntled black voters might jump to Mr. Steele.

Michigan's Debbie Stabenow is weakened by local conditions. Michigan has missed the nation's economic recovery and its unpopular Democratic governor heads the party ticket.

In New Jersey, Robert Menendez is facing his first election for a seat to which he was appointed. His Republican foe, Tom Kean, has a valuable name: His father was a popular former Republican governor and recent co-chairman of the 9/11 commission.

DOJ_NMG_0032176

House At Stake, Midterm Election Gets Early Start (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — Congressional campaigns have begun early and with unusual intensity this year in many districts across the country, reflecting a consensus in both parties that Republicans could lose control of the House and perhaps the Senate.

A special election in a bedrock Republican Congressional district in San Diego on Tuesday — for the seat left vacant when Representative Randy Cunningham resigned after pleading guilty to corruption charges — has sharpened the early intensity and could provide the clearest evidence so far about whether Democrats can capitalize on the unsettled political climate.

The National Republican Congressional Committee, fearful that a loss or meager victory could further rattle the party and give Democrats a huge boost, has poured at least $4.5 million into the district. And it has enlisted President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Laura Bush to make automated telephone calls to voters, putting the prestige of the White House on the line.

But even for candidates who will not face the voters for five months, the campaign is shaping up as not only the most contested midterm election in over a decade, but also the most substantive.

In a typical election year, intense campaign activity normally does not begin until around Labor Day.

Democrats and Republicans said they were struck by the level of political activity now going on. Television advertisements have been shown by candidates in at least five districts, party officials said, and there are radio and Internet advertisements popping up around the country. Moveon.org, the liberal advocacy group, began broadcasting hard-hitting advertisements attacking Republican incumbents in four states nearly three months ago and is about to start a second round on Thursday, officials with the organization said.

Visits last week to three competitive districts — encompassing an endangered Republican in Pennsylvania, an endangered Democrat in Illinois and a race for an open seat in upstate New York — found incumbents and their challengers locked in debates over a strikingly wide range of issues, including the war in Iraq, tax cuts, immigration, stem cell research and raising the minimum wage.

If this early pattern holds, it could undercut Republican efforts to prevent this election from becoming a national referendum on Mr. Bush and Republican policies.

In New York's highly contested 24th District, left vacant by the retirement of Representative Sherwood Boehlert, a Republican, the Democratic candidate, Michael A. Acuri, called for the United States to get out of Iraq as soon as possible.

"We shouldn't have been there in the first place," Mr. Acuri said, "and we really need to start bringing the troops home."

His opponent, Ray Meier, speaking over coffee before holding a news conference with Republican supporters in Seneca Falls, N.Y., said that the United States should stay until the situation there stabilized, and that Mr. Bush had been correct in taking the country to war.

"History will judge this as having been the right thing to have done," Mr. Meier said. "Saddam Hussein was a regional security threat for well over a decade before we went in."

In the suburbs of Philadelphia the other day, Lois Murphy, a Democratic challenger to Representative Jim Gerlach, one of the Democrats' top targets, called a news conference to attack Mr. Gerlach for not supporting an increase in the minimum wage. "The minimum wage hasn't been raised in a decade by the U.S. Congress," Ms. Murphy said. "In that period of time, Congress has given itself a raise five times."

And sitting in his campaign headquarters in Lake Zurich, Ill., outside Chicago, David McSweeney, a Republican challenger to Representative Melissa Bean, said Ms. Bean's re-election would lead to the repeal of Mr. Bush's tax cuts and legislation that would permit some illegal immigrants to gain citizenship, something he has campaigned against.

"Melissa Bean has voted with Democrats in Congress 83 percent of the time," Mr. McSweeney said. "Her first vote would be to make Nancy Pelosi speaker of the House. I'm talking about the implications of what happens if Democrats take control of the House."

The contours of the gathering debate became clear in interviews in these three districts, along with others during a Memorial Day recess that took candidates to V.F.W. halls, parades and news conferences. After a decade in which Congressional elections have been derided as often being free of issues, or characterized by personal attacks, there seems to be an abundance of things for the candidates to talk about. And they are talking about them.

Mr. Acuri is drawing a contrast with Republicans on stem cell research. "Ray Meier and George Bush both oppose stem cell research — and I think that's where we should be going," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0032177

In Illinois, Tammy Duckworth, a Democrat given a strong chance of winning a Republican seat being left vacant by the retirement of Henry J. Hyde, attacked Republicans on earmarks, a budgetary process used by members of Congress to send federal dollars to favored projects.

"Earmarks can have some benefit, but I just think that approaching $9 trillion in debt, where we are borrowing millions of dollars from China, there has got to be a line," Ms. Duckworth said at a V.F.W. picnic in Addison, outside Chicago.

Abortion rights are emerging as an issue, on both sides of the divide. In Pennsylvania, Ms. Murphy said of her opponent: "That's one way that Congressman Gerlach is out of step with this district. He opposes the right to choose, and that's not what this district supports."

Mr. Meier, seeking the seat of Mr. Boehlert, who supported abortion rights, said he would emphasize his own opposition to abortion. "You'll find that my record is consistent, and I'm strong on the issue," he said. "I won't dodge or waver if it is raised."

Candidates from both parties are battling over whether Mr. Bush's tax cuts should be made permanent. Mr. McSweeney called them essential for the nation's prosperity. Ms. Bean said she would support making the tax cuts permanent only "so long as we're cutting spending," adding, "Otherwise it's not a tax cut; it's just a deferred tax increase."

Mr. Acuri, the Democrat running in New York, said Congress should roll back tax cuts for the upper-income taxpayers. "We have these record deficits," he said, "and we are mortgaging our country to reduce the taxes on the top 1 percent."

Ms. Murphy attacked Mr. Gerlach for supporting the strict House immigration bill sponsored by Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Republican of Wisconsin. "He voted for the Sensenbrenner bill — he's a hard-liner," she said. "I would not. Making it a felony for clergy to assist people in need? I think that's totally inappropriate."

Mr. Gerlach said: "I do not support amnesty. I think we need to continue to work through this issue of guest workers."

Not surprisingly, Mr. Bush is hovering over the races in these early days. When Ms. Murphy campaigned in Pottstown, Pa., the other night, she told a small crowd, "You probably know that President Bush came in and did a fund-raiser for Congressman Gerlach, and Congressman Gerlach has been very close to the administration."

Mr. Gerlach said he was not concerned by such criticism. "We're not running away from the president," he said. "We're not running to the president. We're running for the House of Representatives. When we agree with the president, we talk about that, and when we disagree with the president, we'll talk about that."

Democrats Advised On Military Relations (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

Democrats are seeking ways to reach out to military families, hosting a discussion yesterday to help congressional staffers better communicate with men and women serving in the armed forces.

Kathy Roth-Douquet and Frank Schaeffer, authors of "AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes from Military Service -- and How it Hurts Our Country," spoke in a Capitol basement office filled with Democratic staffers who shared their personal stories of military service and examples of being part of a military family while trying to relate to "elite" colleagues who "dismissed" their experiences.

"To trivialize this doesn't win any friends or sense of understanding," Mrs. Roth-Douquet said of the "great disconnect" between liberal and military culture.

Mrs. Roth-Douquet and Mr. Schaeffer presented their "top 10 mistakes people make when dealing with the military" as a what-not-to-do list when communicating with those in the military.

While it was noted that those in attendance were already likely to be "sensitive to the disconnect," Mrs. Roth-Douquet and Mr. Schaeffer said it would be beneficial to have military officers visit congressional offices.

Yesterday's discussion was sponsored by the Truman National Security Project, a Washington think tank that declares its aim is to boost Democrats' "national security credentials" through an "innovative, distinctly Democratic approach to national security."

Mr. Schaeffer described himself as someone "from Massachusetts who usually votes for the Republicans," adding that he thinks the disconnect he and Mrs. Roth-Douquet describe comes from "a guilty relationship between Democrats and the military" after Vietnam

"It wasn't necessarily Democrats spitting on the troops when they returned home," Mr. Schaeffer said. "But those events are certainly more associated with the left."

An unidentified Democratic staffer in attendance said, "When you get down to it, most military values are really Democratic values," which received a warm applause from the estimated two dozen fellow staffers in attendance. Mrs. Roth-Douquet said she agreed with the statement -- but when asked if politicizing military values was dangerous, added, "The military shouldn't be an institution that belongs to either party."

Mr. Schaeffer said he thinks "Congress would be better served" if it was more representative of the American population in the percentage of its members who have served in the military. Mr. Schaeffer, whose son served in the Marines, said part of his motivation for writing the book was to "take it to my rich friends and stick it in their faces."

Mrs. Roth-Douquet, who is the wife of a Marine and has worked on every presidential campaign of the past 20 years, said that Sen. John Kerry, Democrat from Massachusetts, made two mistakes in communicating with veterans during his 2004 presidential campaign.

"He talked about how he was a war hero," Mrs. Roth-Douquet said. "That's not received well in the military. He should have let other people do the talking." Mrs. Roth-Douquet said Mr. Kerry's second mistake was in never publicly apologizing for accusing fellow Vietnam veterans of war crimes.

Webb's Support Of Affirmative Action At Issue (WP)

By Rosalind S. Helderman

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

RICHMOND -- Democratic Senate candidate James Webb has a childhood memory of relatives living hard lives in southwest Virginia communities with no electricity.

That's why when he started studying affirmative action programs as a law student, he came to a question: Why was preferential treatment given on the job to all kinds of ethnic groups that were considered disadvantaged -- Latinos, Asians, blacks, Native Americans -- but not to working-class whites struggling to overcome poverty?

"The original intent of affirmative action expanded, and a lot of different ethnic groups who never suffered state-sponsored discrimination at all came under the rubric of affirmative action," he said recently. "The assumption that everyone who was white had a benefit and anyone who was not white didn't have a benefit, it was not a fair assumption."

If there was ever proof that Webb, who served as secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, is not a typical candidate for a Democratic Party nomination, it is his nuanced -- and, opponents charge, shifting -- position on affirmative action, which has been endorsed by the party establishment for decades.

Webb, a former Marine who joined the Republican Party after the Vietnam War and has returned to the Democratic Party over the Iraq war, said he has been writing and thinking about the issue for years.

On the one hand, he argues that diversity programs that were once intended to help African Americans have been extended to benefit everyone except whites. On the other, he recently has made a point of singling out hardships faced by African Americans, who he said still experience lingering effects of government-sponsored oppression and discrimination.

So Webb comes to an unusual view among candidates in either major party: He supports affirmative action for blacks but otherwise thinks preferential job and education programs should be awarded based on economic conditions or eliminated altogether.

"I think it's time to either open this thing up to poor white groups or just go back to a level playing field -- while keeping an eye on African Americans," said Webb, who is white. "I'm a strong supporter of affirmative action in its original intent, which is to help African Americans."

His opponent in next Tuesday's primary -- to determine who will face Sen. George Allen (R) in the November general election -- is longtime Democratic operative Harris Miller, a former technology industry lobbyist. Miller has characterized Webb's views as out of step with most party members, using affirmative action as a prime example.

"Webb is a Republican disguised as a Democrat," said Del. Lionell Spruill Sr. (D-Chesapeake), a Miller supporter and one of seven members of the Virginia Legislative Black Caucus to endorse the former Fairfax Democratic Committee chairman. "Harris Miller and I go way back, and he has always been for affirmative action."

In a low-turnout primary, Webb's position could cost votes in critical black communities. At the same time, his criticism of diversity programs intended to help groups other than blacks could jeopardize support among such constituencies as women and Latinos who also have benefited from diversity initiatives.

"He's essentially articulated a position on affirmative action that almost no one articulates today," said Robert D. Holsworth, a professor of government at Virginia Commonwealth University who has written a book on affirmative action. "It's not an indefensible position, but it's not a position that fits comfortably into the normal debate."

Webb acknowledges his textured stand is not ready-made for a stump speech and hardly a "30-second sound bite."

For opponents, it's not the issue's complexity but Webb's writings on the topic that are problematic. Webb, a journalist and novelist, wrote a highly complimentary book review in 2000 of the autobiography of Ward Connerly, a prominent opponent of affirmative action who was then a University of California regent.

DOJ_NMG_0032179

"Affirmative action, which originally sought to repair the state-induced damage to blacks from slavery and its aftermath, has within one generation brought about a permeating state-sponsored racism that is as odious as the Jim Crow laws it sought to countermand," Webb wrote in the Wall Street Journal.

Nowhere in the column did he suggest that he would support continued affirmative action programs for African Americans, as he has on the campaign trail in recent days.

"I'm not sure where the real Jim Webb is," said state Sen. Henry L. Marsh III (D-Richmond), a longtime civil rights leader and the first black mayor of Richmond. "Why doesn't he just do the manly thing and retract his statement, admit he was wrong, rather than trying to come up with these bizarre explanations?"

Webb insists that his position has not changed since he started thinking deeply on the issue as a Georgetown law student -- shortly after the decorated veteran ended the Marine Corps stint that has formed the backbone of his campaign. He said his ultimate goal has always been to ensure an equal shot at success for everybody.

As for the different emphasis in his Wall Street Journal writing, he said he covered as much ground as he could in a short piece: "How much can you do in a book review?" he said. "Give me a break."

Last week, Webb countered the criticism by announcing he has the backing of Del. A. Donald McEachin (D-Richmond), also a member of the Legislative Black Caucus and the Democratic nominee for attorney general in 2001.

On Monday, Webb added the support of civil rights leader Milton A. Reid, a former chairman of the Virginia unit of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. McEachin said he had discussed the issue fully with Webb and pronounced himself more than satisfied.

"It just doesn't get any better than that from an African Americans perspective on affirmative action," he said.

N.H. Democrats Warm To Feingold, Warner (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Democrats here love to bash President Bush, and cheered wildly for their prominent political visitors over the weekend, when they took aim at the administration.

But while Wisconsin Sen. Russ Feingold fired up the crowd by urging his party to stand up and fight against the Iraq war, former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner gave a broad speech focused mostly on domestic issues, prompting some Democrats to say the Virginian seemed a more likely contender to make it all the way to the White House.

"Senator Feingold spoke to the Democrats, and I felt that Governor Warner spoke to everybody," said Kermit Williams of Wilton, one of about 800 at the New Hampshire Democratic Convention. "It's great to be very focused on a philosophy, but winning in the end is the important thing."

Mr. Feingold and Mr. Warner advised the crowd Saturday on how the party can regain congressional majority and win back the presidency in 2008.

Mr. Feingold, who has called for censuring Mr. Bush, threw the audience political red meat with lines like: "The Constitution and the Bill of Rights were not repealed on 9/11" and "We have got to show that we will stand up to the mistakes of this administration." He also called for universal health care.

Mr. Warner kept the Bush-bashing to a minimum and instead espoused centrist themes of deficit reduction, better math and science education, and ensuring localities have adequate infrastructure to avoid catastrophes like the flooding during Hurricane Katrina.

"We have an administration and Congress that is more interested in building a bridge to nowhere than it is about laying any kind of foundation for future success," he said.

He called for funding alternative-energy research, adding the applause line: "Of course, that would require an administration that believes in science."

The starkest contrast between the Wisconsin senator and the former Virginia governor was their positions on the war in Iraq.

"Why are so many Democrats too timid to say what everybody in America wants? It's time to redeploy the troops. ... I say bring them home by the end of 2006," Mr. Feingold said, bringing most in the crowd to their feet.

Mr. Warner opposes a fixed timetable for troop withdrawal, but said the Bush administration has created a haven for al Qaeda and a frightening situation in Iran with its botched foreign-policy decisions.

"Going out without a plan is just as bad as going in without a plan," Mr. Warner said. "This government has months, not years, to demonstrate its willingness to step up, eliminate the militias and stabilize the country."

DOJ_NMG_0032180

Judging by applause and standing ovations, the Democrats were more excited by Mr. Feingold's breakfast keynote than Mr. Warner's lunch speech, but the differing impressions the two men left behind were clear, with most saying the former governor had a better shot at winning the Democratic nomination.

State Sen. Joe Foster of Nashua said Mr. Warner has an impressive record and his speech was well-received by delegates.

Patty Giguere of Goffstown liked both men, but thinks Mr. Warner "is going to go a little farther, that he is maybe a stronger leader."

State Rep. Jackie Cilley of Strafford said many Democrats will say Mr. Feingold is not "electable" because he is outspoken, but rejects that notion.

"It is well past the time that we should be settling for mediocrity in this country, the lowest common denominator, the safest bet, the candidate that won't get us into trouble," said Mrs. Cilley, 54. "Senator Feingold challenges me. He makes me want to be a better Democrat. He makes me want to be a better citizen of this country."

Both men made their records known -- Mr. Feingold proudly outlined his votes against the Iraq war, USA Patriot Act and NAFTA, while Mr. Warner showed a slick video outlining how he worked with Virginia's Republican legislature to improve education and the state budget.

Clinton Is The Life Of The Democratic Party (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — In what promises to be his most intensive campaign season since he left office, former President Bill Clinton is scheduled to appear at more than two dozen fund-raisers for Democrats around the country, hoping to collect at least $20 million for his party's drive to recapture Congress.

"In contrast to Republican candidates who are running away from George Bush, our candidates are clamoring for him in every part of the country," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

But a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, Tracey Schmitt, said President Bush was very much in demand this campaign season, noting that he had appeared at 37 fund-raising events that had raised nearly $125 million since the beginning of 2005.

Ms. Schmitt also took a jab at Democrats, criticizing them as relying on the assistance of a politician no longer in office. "Given the current lineup of Democratic leaders in Washington," she said, "it's no surprise that many Democrats would turn to Bill Clinton for help."

Mr. Clinton's advisers say he is entirely motivated by his desire to resurrect his party's political fortunes.

"President Clinton's goal here is helping Democrats win in 2006 to put Congress in the hands of the party that will get the country back on the right track," said Jay Carson, a spokesman for Mr. Clinton.

Yet there is another potential beneficiary of his largess: his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who is running for re-election in New York this year. Should Mrs. Clinton decide to run for president in 2008, some Democrats who reap the benefits of her husband's fund-raising this fall may feel a loyalty to him that could extend to her.

In the coming weeks, for example, Mr. Clinton plans to appear at a fund-raiser for Democrats in New Hampshire, an important presidential primary state that his wife has avoided so as not to fuel speculation about any presidential ambitions.

Mr. Clinton has already made a series of appearances on behalf of other Democrats. One was at an event in New York a few weeks ago that raised $1.5 million for the Democratic National Committee, whose fund-raising lags behind that of the Republican National Committee by about $72 million in the current campaign season.

In the last week, Mr. Clinton made five appearances, collecting $3.5 million in visits to Arizona, California and Maine. He has also taken time to help his wife, appearing at several events for her in recent weeks that brought in $1.5 million, his office said. (In all, he has raised $3.4 million for Mrs. Clinton in the current election cycle.)

That said, Mrs. Clinton is a fund-raising machine in her own right, and her efforts on behalf of the Democratic Party have made her a popular headliner among Democrats nationwide. She has helped the party and its candidates raise about $55 million since taking office in 2001.

Mr. Clinton's office says he also intends to appear on behalf of Democratic candidates for governor around the nation. He is scheduled to appear in nine states but is likely to add more as the campaign season heats up, his office says.

Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to win control of the House and six to capture the Senate. Mr. Clinton's aides say he believes the Democrats are in their best position in years to retake control of Congress. But Republicans and many analysts say his emergence in the 2006 campaign also comes at a time when Democrats are still trying to find galvanizing themes to pull together the disparate elements of their party.

DOJ_NMG_0032181

Mr. Clinton was a tireless fund-raiser throughout his time in the White House. And despite his busy summer schedule, his office said, he also plans to continue focusing his energies on the Clinton Foundation, the nonprofit organization he set up to work on issues including AIDS, poverty, childhood obesity, and religious and racial reconciliation.

In some places, Mr. Clinton plans to squeeze political and foundation work into the same trips. He will appear at the New Hampshire fund-raiser, for instance, after attending an event highlighting childhood obesity with Dr. Susan Lynch, a pediatrician and the wife of Gov. John Lynch.

Mr. Clinton's fund-raising schedule has included states with competitive races, like Arizona, where Democratic efforts to unseat Senator Jon Kyl, the two-term incumbent Republican, could prove crucial to the party's goal of recapturing the Senate.

Mr. Kyl's Democratic challenger, Jim Pederson, a wealthy shopping mall developer, said in an interview that Mr. Clinton's presence in the state had helped elevate the profile of his campaign.

"I think people will stand up and take notice," said Mr. Pederson, whose campaign collected $500,000 at a recent event featuring Mr. Clinton.

The former president also plans to appear in Denver at a June 16 fund-raiser for Senator Robert Menendez, who faces a strong challenge in New Jersey. Mr. Menendez said in an interview that he had asked Mr. Clinton to headline the event — which was being set up by his colleague from Colorado, Senator Ken Salazar — when he learned that Mr. Clinton would be in town that day.

Mr. Menendez estimated that the former president's presence would increase the total proceeds of the event by about 50 percent. "He is of enormous value to Democrats," Mr. Menendez said.

A Little More Clinton At Clinton Library (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

LITTLE ROCK -- Welcome to the William J. Clinton Presidential Center. Your personal tour guide: President Bill Clinton.

"There were lots of times when Republicans thought I was right about an issue but they were determined not to let anything happen," Clinton says in a new audio tour of his presidential library. "I know that when I got elected president, a lot of those folks just went into denial."

The library, along the Arkansas River in downtown Little Rock, will begin offering the audio tour Saturday. The tour was Clinton's idea and is the first narrated by a former president for a presidential library, said Jordan Johnson, spokesman for the William J. Clinton Foundation.

Visitors pay an extra $3 for a device shaped like an oversize cordless phone. For each exhibit, Clinton recounts his thoughts on and memories of the topic.

He describes the impeachment hearings, for example, as an ideological battle that went overboard.

"So when I won, it was a profound sort of psychological shock to a lot of them," he says of his opponents, with a chuckle. "Then they went into overdrive fighting me. They weren't accomplishing anything, just banging away. Then they did what people who care too much about power do: They overdid it."

Clinton's commentary also addresses his childhood as well as issues such as crime, foreign affairs and the economy. He speaks of hosting state dinners for foreign leaders and his wife's role as first lady.

He describes choosing a running mate as one of the most important decisions for a presidential hopeful. He says he chose Al Gore because the Tennessee Democrat complemented him and provided a more moderate perspective.

Although Clinton says the Oval Office was "the best place in the world to work," he had another favorite spot in the White House: his private office. "I restored it to look the way it did after the Civil War, and I brought in a desk, which was Ulysses Grant's Cabinet table," Clinton says.

"And I would go in there, often after Hillary went to bed, or late at night, play my music, and that's where I did my reading and thinking and that's where my daughter would find me late at night when she called me from Stanford. I had a lot of happy times there."

Johnson said Clinton spent hours walking through the library while aides followed with a tape recorder. He recorded his thoughts in a handful of visits.

"Hopefully, visitors will go away with an experience that sheds some light on the personal experience of being president," Johnson said.

Kansas Political Shifts Sign Of Things To Come? (USAT)

By DeWayne Wickham

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Mark Parkinson thinks it's time Thomas Frank wrote a sequel to his 2004 best seller, What's the Matter with Kansas?, which explains how the descendants of abolitionists, free-soilers and trustbusters became the backbone of the conservative movement in U.S. politics.

Frank made his home state the focus of his contention that cultural issues have been used by conservatives to get Midwesterners (and other Americans) to vote against their economic and political interests. But Parkinson says a lot has changed in the Sunflower State and Frank's new book should be called "What's Right with Kansas."

He ought to know. A Republican for 30 years, Parkinson is a former GOP state party chairman. In that job, he spearheaded the unsuccessful effort to derail the 2002 gubernatorial campaign of moderate Democrat Kathleen Sebelius. Sebelius made funding for public education — not hot-button social issues — a major plank in her campaign. She won with 53% of the vote in a state where Democrats are just 28% of registered voters.

Last week, Sebelius named Parkinson her running mate in this year's gubernatorial campaign. He replaces John Moore, the current lieutenant governor, who decided not to seek re-election. Like Moore, Parkinson is a Republican-turned-Democrat.

No joking matter

When Moore bolted the GOP four years ago to become Sebelius' running mate, Parkinson called his selection a "gimmick." Now he says what the Democratic Party has to offer is no joke.

Republicans have branded Parkinson a traitor, but he told me he didn't break with the GOP, it broke with him. It became more interested in cultural warfare than improving schools, economic development "for everyone" and the idea that government should not be involved in people's personal lives.

"What's happened in Kansas, and what's attracted me and excited me about serving on this ticket is that the person that's captured (the political middle) of Kansas is Gov. Sebelius," Parkinson said.

And that's got to worry Republicans all over this country. Just as Kansas was once a bellwether state for the ascendancy of Republican power, what's happening there now may be evidence of its decline.

Party hopping

Johnson County prosecutor Paul Morrison also became a Democrat and is now challenging Phill Kline, Kansas' GOP attorney general.

When key members of the dominant political party jump ship, there's good reason to believe the ship has sprung a serious leak — in Kansas and elsewhere.

In Virginia, one-time Republican and former Reagan administration Navy secretary Jim Webb is seeking the Democratic Senate nomination. He says he split with the GOP after deciding Democrats care more about working-class people.

In February, South Carolina prosecutor Barney Giese, a moderate Republican, joined the Democrats. His defection was the result of frayed relations with conservatives.

In states such as New York, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and New Hampshire, moderate Republicans are struggling to hold onto elected offices at a time when the party's conservative leaders have been hurt by self-inflicted wounds.

President Bush's approval rating now hovers around 33%. Dogged by high-profile scandals and the dissatisfaction of moderate Republicans, conservative leaders are now scrambling to avoid losing control of Congress in November.

"Kansas is ready to lead us singing into the apocalypse," Frank wrote in his 2004 book. "It invites us all to join in, to lay down our lives so that others might cash out at the top; to renounce forever our middle-American prosperity in pursuit of a crimson fantasy of middle-American righteousness."

That Kansas doesn't exist anymore, Parkinson said.

While it's too soon to say whether he is right, Sebelius' election and Parkinson's defection suggest that it may well be time for Frank to consider penning another book about the effects that politics in Kansas have on this nation.

DeWayne Wickham writes weekly for USA TODAY.

In Echo Of A Murder, Two $1 Million Gifts Stir School Protests (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

The headmaster of Archmere Academy in Wilmington, Del., called his teachers together last year for a surprise champagne reception.

A former student had pledged $1 million for a new student center at the Roman Catholic high school. But not everybody shared The Rev. John Zagarella's enthusiasm. Some looked stunned, two people who were there say. Two people walked out after learning the identity of the donor: a wealthy property developer who played a pivotal role in one of the state's most infamous murder trials.

DOJ_NMG_0032183

Almost exactly a decade ago, Louis Capano Jr. helped his older brother cover up a murder -- a case that riveted Delaware for years. Now his philanthropy -- two $1 million donations to put his family's name on buildings at elite Catholic schools he attended -- is triggering a debate over whether charity can help earn forgiveness.

The murder generated two books and a television movie. Thomas Capano, a Wilmington attorney who had been a state prosecutor and a governor's counsel, had an extramarital affair with Anne Marie Fahey, scheduling secretary for then-Gov. Tom Carper. After she tried to end it, Thomas Capano shot and killed her in his home on June 27, 1996.

A state-court jury convicted him three years later, after authorities unraveled a coverup engineered with two brothers. Gerard Capano helped Thomas Capano dump the body in the ocean. Louis Capano disposed of a bloody sofa, tampered with a witness and lied to a grand jury. Threatened with prison, both pleaded guilty to crimes, testified against their brother and were put on probation. Thomas Capano initially was sentenced to death but appealed and got life in prison without parole.

The family has had its share of brushes with the law. Louis Capano Jr., head of a property-development company founded by his father, also named Louis, bribed a county councilman in 1989 to get a favorable rezoning ruling. He escaped prosecution by cooperating in a federal sting to catch the official.

Another brother, Joseph, was charged with rape in 1991 and pleaded guilty to charges of misdemeanor assault, unlawful sexual contact and criminal mischief.

A fund-raiser at Archmere says Louis Capano, 54 years old, said he wanted to make amends for his family's past. The donation was to be in the name of his parents: Louis Capano Sr., who died in 1980, and 82-year-old Marguerite Capano.

"I have got to make an attempt to show the younger kids there's a better way to go," Mr. Capano said, according to John E. Healy III, a construction-company chief who is helping spearhead Archmere's fund-raising campaign. "He's making an effort to walk to the light," Mr. Healy says.

Mr. Capano didn't respond to interview requests. In a statement issued through his attorney, Mr. Capano says the schools approached him as part of a fund-raising campaign, and that he appreciated the education he received and wanted to honor his parents. He says he is sorry for the suffering his brother Thomas caused, and that his donation is an attempt "to do something positive for the community."

When the fund-raising committee at Mr. Capano's old elementary school, St. Edmond's Academy, informed its board of directors of his $1 million donation for a new gymnasium in March 2005, several members expressed dismay.

One of St. Edmond's directors was Louis Freeh, who headed the Federal Bureau of Investigation during the Clinton administration and assigned agents to investigate the Fahey murder.

"This is a school for boys, and what message do we send to them when we take $1 million and put his name on the building?" Mr. Freeh asked at a board meeting last spring, according to someone who attended the meeting.

St. Edmond's headmaster Michael Marinelli responded that the building would bear the parents' name, not Mr. Capano's. Another member argued that good Catholics believe in forgiveness.

"I am a good Catholic, but there is a difference between forgiveness and honoring someone," Mr. Freeh shot back, according to a person who attended the meeting.

Mr. Marinelli says he doesn't recall the specifics of the conversation.

Delaware U.S. Attorney Colm F. Connolly also urged representatives of the schools not to name buildings for the Capanos. Mr. Connolly led the prosecution of Thomas Capano and became a close Fahey family friend. He is also an Archmere alumnus, and briefed St. Edmond's board of directors on the Capano brothers' legal troubles.

"The schools are naming the buildings after a family that has not one, not two, not even three, but four criminals," says Mr. Connolly.

St. Edmond's approached Mr. Capano to see if he would consider naming the building after a religious figure, people familiar with the matter say. Mr. Capano rejected the idea, and suggested doubling Archmere's donation instead, Archmere's Mr. Healy recalls.

After learning that Archmere might get all the money, St. Edmond's board reversed course. The majority of its 18 directors felt the decision followed the Church's teaching of "fairness and forgiveness," says Mr. Marinelli, St. Edmond's headmaster. "At what point do you continue to punish and at what point do you begin to heal?" he asks.

St. Edmond's board member Brian Gimlett, head of the U.S. Secret Service's New York office before moving to Delaware, quit in protest. "My action speaks for itself," he says.

Mr. Freeh, his board term at St. Edmond's expiring, declined another term. "I love the schools; they just got this one wrong," says Mr. Freeh, who has children at both schools.

DOJ_NMG_0032184

Archmere's board also voted to accept Mr. Capano's donation. Construction begins this month. "We're a family here," says Thomas Mallon, Archmere's public-relations director. "We embrace everyone. Not everyone is perfect. We accepted this as a heartfelt gift."

The school had originally planned to name the building for another well-known alumnus, Democratic Senator Joseph Biden, who co-chairs the school's fund-raising committee. Bishop Michael Saltarelli of Wilmington, however, invoked a Church directive that opposes honoring politicians who support abortion rights.

A Biden spokeswoman says the episode "hasn't diminished his affection for the school," and that "he continues to work on the capital campaign knowing that the building will be named after the Capano family."

As word of Mr. Capano's donations spread, some parents spoke up, including Marybeth Phillips, who has one son who graduated from Archmere and another going into his senior year there.

"This is immoral and dead wrong," Ms. Phillips recalls telling Father Zagarella, the Archmere headmaster, last year as she waited at an airport for one of her sons to fly to Rome for a school trip. "You're selling out Christ for a lousy million bucks."

"That's a lot of money -- I wish parents like you would give me $1 million," the headmaster replied before walking off, according to Ms. Phillips. She says he apologized minutes later. Mr. Mallon says Father Zagarella recalls the conversation but not his exact words. Father Zagarella declined to comment.

The late Ms. Fahey's family also is upset. "We have to live with the hurt every day," says Debbie Gioffre, mother of Ms. Fahey's nephew Brian, 14, a St. Edmond's eighth grader who plans to attend Archmere next year. "It's not fair to have to live with other reminders."

Ms. Fahey's sister, Kathleen Fahey-Hosey, says "it was like a kick in the stomach" when she heard about Mr. Capano's donation. Her children are on another school's basketball team that competes against St. Edmond's.

"My kids play basketball there, and if they are going to put that name on the gym, I don't want to go in there," she says.

Apparent Victory By Islamists In Somalia Poses Questions For U.S. (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Muslim militias claimed Monday to have routed warlords allegedly backed by the United States after weeks of fighting for control of the Somali capital, Mogadishu, dealing a setback to U.S. efforts to contain the spread of militant Islam.

U.S. officials and other experts warned that if the militias consolidated their victory they would establish an Islamist state where al-Qaida could secure bases from which it could spread its violent ideology to other East African and Horn of Africa nations.

The Islamists' claim of victory in Mogadishu comes as the United States and its allies struggle to contain growing Islamic violence in Iraq and some of the fiercest attacks in Afghanistan by the Taliban since that Islamic militia was driven from power in 2001.

Al-Qaida-inspired extremists might be allowed to use Somalia as a refuge from which to support and mount operations against Yemen and Saudi Arabia, the world's No. 1 oil producer, located a boat ride away across the Red Sea, said U.S. officials and other experts.

Somalia "can be a platform for further action," warned Bruno Schiemsky, the chairman of a group of experts appointed by the U.N. Security Council to monitor Somalia, in a telephone interview from Nairobi, Kenya.

With Mogadishu under their control, the Islamist militias are expected to quickly move on other cities, he said.

"If they can grab control and maintain it, Somalia becomes a little place that becomes important to al-Qaida and other Islamists," agreed Michael Scheuer, who was the first chief of the CIA unit that tracks Osama bin Laden and his network.

John Prendergast of the International Crisis Group, a conflict prevention organization, said it's too early to predict what could happen. The secular warlords could rebuild their forces with outside aid and launch a counteroffensive for Mogadishu.

Territory has frequently traded hands since central government rule collapsed in 1991, plunging Somalia into anarchy and civil strife that has claimed tens of thousands of lives.

But a U.S. counterterrorism official, who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said that the Islamic militias' apparent seizure of Mogadishu is "certainly not a positive development in terms of (U.S.) efforts to fight terrorism. It's worrisome."

U.S. officials said the Islamists are already hosting the al-Qaida planner of the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania and two organizers of a failed 2002 attempt to down an Israeli passenger jet in Kenya with a missile.

The Somali Islamists also have received training from militants from Pakistan, Indonesia and Arab countries, including Syria and Algeria, said Schiemsky.

The United States hasn't been directly involved in Somalia since 18 U.S. troops were killed in Mogadishu in 1993 during vicious street fighting depicted in the film "Black Hawk Down."

But the Bush administration has deployed about 1,500 U.S. troops in the tiny nation of Djibouti, on Somalia's northern border, as part of a regional strategy of preventing al-Qaida and other radical Islamic groups from operating in the rugged, poverty-stricken and largely lawless Horn of Africa.

The United States has been secretly supporting a coalition of secular Somali warlords, the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism, according to leaders of a largely powerless transitional central government restricted to the city of Baidoa, according to regional observers and news reports.

Prendergast said that three alliance leaders recently told him that they were receiving funds from the CIA.

"Our assessment is between $100,000 and $150,000 per month," said Prendergast, who served on the National Security Council staff in the Clinton administration.

The CIA declined to comment.

Other countries, including Italy, Ethiopia, Eritrea and Saudi Arabia, also have been backing various Somali factions, according to a May 4 report to the U.N. Security Council by the experts group led by Schiemsky.

The bloodiest fighting in more than a decade erupted in February between the alliance and the Islamic militias. The militias are associated with Islamic courts that have succeeded in the past several years in bringing order to some areas by enforcing Islamic law.

The violence escalated last month as the Islamic militias moved to take control of Mogadishu, with hundreds of people dying in fierce street battles.

Princeton Lyman, a former senior State Department official, likened the emergence of the Islamic militias to the Taliban's takeover of Afghanistan during the mid-`90s. The Taliban gave refuge to bin Laden and his followers.

In both cases, he said, the Islamists won support from ordinary people weary of years of violence, corrupt warlords and the absence of a functioning government.

"For the United States, this is a serious problem," said Lyman, a former ambassador to South Africa and Nigeria who's with the Council on Foreign Relations, a foreign policy organization.

He said the Bush administration should begin working urgently with regional governments and Somaliland, an unrecognized self-declared independent nation in northern Somalia, to contain Somalia's Islamic militias.

Somali Islamists Declare Victory; Warlords On Run (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, June 5 — After months of fierce fighting, Islamic militias declared Monday that they had taken control of Somalia's capital, Mogadishu, defeating the warlords widely believed to be backed by the United States and raising questions about whether the country would head down an extremist path.

The battle for Mogadishu has been a proxy war, of sorts, in the Bush administration's campaign against terrorism, with the warlords echoing Washington's goal of rooting out radical Islam and the presence of Al Qaeda in the region.

But as the warlords who have ruled over Mogadishu for the last 15 years went on the run on Monday, it appeared that Washington had backed the losing side, presenting the administration with a major setback at a time of continued sectarian violence in Iraq and the resurgence of the Taliban in Afghanistan.

One of the warlords, Muse Sudi Yalahow, was holed up in a hospital north of the city on Monday, surrounded by his enemies. Others fled the capital after their forces had been pushed from the strategic center, diplomats and local journalists said.

The heavily armed militias driving them back are allied with the Islamic courts that have grown in influence throughout Somalia in recent years, filling a void left by the lack of a central government since 1991. The courts are made up of a loose coalition of religious leaders who have put forward Islam, the predominant religion in Somalia, as the way out of the country's long decline into anarchy.

On Monday, at least, the capital appeared to be calm, after hundreds of civilian deaths there in recent months.

"The people of Mogadishu have finally gotten some peace today," Ali Mohammed, 32, a schoolteacher, said in a telephone interview from the capital on Monday night. "We've had war for so long, and we're tired of it."

But he also said he and others feared that the Islamic courts might clamp down and impose a stricter form of Islam on residents. "We don't know what's next," he said.

The United States has been widely reported to have secretly financed the capital's warlords, who fashioned themselves into a counterterrorism alliance to track down and apprehend Al Qaeda elements in Mogadishu.

DOJ_NMG_0032186

American officials have said they fear that the country may descend into a situation similar to that of Afghanistan, where a hard-line Islamist group, the Taliban, seized control of the country and then gave safe haven to Al Qaeda. Already American officials have said that a handful of foreign fighters with links to Al Qaeda are being shielded by Mogadishu's Islamist leaders.

The spokesman for the State Department, Sean McCormack, appeared to repeat those concerns at a news briefing on Monday when asked about the takeover in Mogadishu. "We don't want to see Somalia turn into a safe haven for foreign terrorists," he said. "We do have very real concerns about that."

But some analysts were not surprised that the battle for Mogadishu turned out as it did. "The so-called Islamists provided a sense of stability in Somalia, education and other social services, while the warlords maimed and killed innocent civilians," said Ted Dagne, the Africa analyst at the Congressional Research Service in Washington.

He expressed doubt that the takeover indicated the rise of extremists in the capital. "Somalis are secular Muslims, and the presence of the so-called Islamists is not an introduction of new ideology or religion," Mr. Dagne said in an e-mail message.

Administration officials have not said whether American intelligence agents have made payments to the warlords, though academics, security analysts, politicians in the region and other Africa experts assert that they have. Many in Mogadishu said the common belief that the United States was taking sides only strengthened the Islamists, who accused the warlords of being puppets of Washington.

According to one Somalia expert, the amount of payments to the warlords has increased significantly in the past year. "By our own estimates, the payments have been between $100,000 and $150,000 per month," said John Prendergast, who monitors Somalia for the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit research organization.

Initial statements from the Islamists emphasized a need for dialogue instead of warfare. Since February more than 300 people have been killed and more than 1,700 injured in what was called the fiercest fighting Mogadishu had seen in the 15 years since Somalia's central government collapsed.

"We want to restore peace and stability to Mogadishu," Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the alliance of Islamists, known as the Islamic Courts Union, said Monday on a radio broadcast, according to The Associated Press. "We are ready to meet and talk to anybody and any group for the interest of the people."

Still, he made clear the religious nature of the rule to come. "We won the fight against the enemy of Islam," he said.

Backing the Islamists have been business leaders eager to end the arbitrary rule of the warlords, as well as freelance gunmen willing to work for anyone who pays them a salary and supplies them with a daily fix of khat, the leaf that is widely chewed among Somalis for its stimulant effect.

Now that the Islamists have taken over, it remains to be seen how they will choose to govern and whether infighting among them may send the city back into the chaos it has long known.

"We have to appeal to the moderates in this Islamist movement," said Mario Raffaelli, the Italian special envoy for Somalia. "We have to make clear that we are supporting the government."

The outcome in Mogadishu has occurred as a transitional government created after two years of peace talks struggles to establish a toehold in the country. Based in Baidoa, 155 miles from Mogadishu, because it lacked the strength to take on the warring gunmen based in the capital, the government finds itself negotiating with a new center of power.

In a late-night cabinet meeting on Sunday, as the victory by the Islamic courts became clear, the government decided to open talks with the new rulers of Mogadishu. It also fired the four Mogadishu warlords who held cabinet positions in the transitional government but had flouted calls by their colleagues to stop the fighting.

The four men are Mohamed Qanyare Afrah, who was national security minister; Muse Sudi Yalahow, commerce minister; Botan Isse Alin, demobilization minister; and Omar Mohamed Mohamud, religious affairs minister.

The Islamist militias had been slowly gaining control over the capital for weeks. On Sunday they took over the strategic town of Balad, 20 miles north of Mogadishu, in fighting that killed 18 people. That cut off the warlords' northern supply route. Then on Monday the Islamic fighters took Davniile, the stronghold of Mr. Qanyare, a major warlord who left the area two days ago after elders in his clan criticized the heavy civilian casualties that fighting by his men had caused.

Somalia has been without a central government since the country slipped into civil war more than a decade ago. An American-led relief effort in 1993, which metamorphosed into a hunt for one of the warlords whose fighting with one another interfered with food distribution, ended tragically after 18 American soldiers were killed in a battle made famous by the film "Black Hawk Down."

The United States has largely kept the country at diplomatic arm's length ever since, viewing with skepticism the 14 failed rounds of peace negotiations over the years. The latest one produced an interim government carefully balanced by clan representation, which has been urging Washington to back it more vigorously.

U.S. Has Somalia Terrorism Concerns As Islamists Take Mogadishu (BLOOM)

By Paul Tighe

Bloomberg, June 6, 2006

June 6 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. government said it is concerned that Somalia will become a haven for terrorists after an Islamist militia said its forces seized control of the capital, Mogadishu, after weeks of fighting.

``We don't want to see Somalia turned into a safe haven for foreign terrorists," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington yesterday, according to a transcript. ``We do have very real concerns about that."

The Joint Islamic Courts said militiamen from an alliance of warlords were driven from the capital, Agence France-Presse reported yesterday, citing a statement broadcast by local radio stations from Sheikh Sharif Sheikh Ahmed, the group's chairman. The militia declared Islamic or Sharia law in areas of Mogadishu it controls.

Somalia, an East African country slightly smaller than the U.S. state of Texas and with a population of almost 9 million, has been divided by factional fighting since the regime of President Siad Barre was ousted in 1991. The U.S. hasn't confirmed reports that it supports the warlords' Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism, which has accused the Islamists of sheltering al-Qaeda members.

The U.S. wants to see Somalia build government institutions and end the factional fighting, McCormack said. Such institutions need to be responsive to the Somali people and become ``democratic institutions that respect the rights of all individuals there," he said.

Warlord Control

Ahmed, in his statement, said 15 years of warlord control of Mogadishu is over, AFP reported. More than 300 people were killed in fighting in the past month in the city that had an estimated population of 1.2 million people in 2000.

``The JIC will take care of the safety of the people and freedom of individuals and will eradicate any sort of hostilities brought about by inter-clan fighting," Ahmed said.

Many of the warlords left the city after Islamist fighters took control of a main supply route north of the capital at the weekend, AFP reported.

The fighting in Mogadishu is fueled by arms, military material and financial support that ``flow like a river" to militia groups, the United Nations monitoring group said in a report to the Security Council last month.

Forces of Somalia's Transitional Federal Government, the Mogadishu-based opposition alliance, the Islamist militia, the business elite and feuding clans are among the groups fighting in the city, the monitors said.

Somalia's transitional government is working with the UN and the African Union to try to establish a plan for national security, Francois Lonseny Fall, the UN special representative for Somalia, said last month. For the first time in 15 years, Somalia's parliament has been meeting in Baidoa, about 240 kilometers (149 miles) to the west of Mogadishu.

UN Appeal

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan yesterday appealed to all groups to stop fighting and begin talks, the UN said on its Web site. Thousands of people have been displaced from their homes in Mogadishu, the UN said.

An estimated 1.4 million people in Somalia are in ``urgent" need of aid, including about 400,000 displaced people in 34 sites across the nation, the UN said June 2. The world body is seeking $326 million from international donors this year to support aid projects in the country in the Horn of Africa.

Islamic Militia Seizes Somalia's Capital (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, June 5, 2006

An Islamic militia with alleged links to al-Qaida seized Somalia's capital Monday after weeks of fighting with U.S.-backed secular warlords, raising fears that the nation could fall under the sway of Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization.

The advance unified the city for the first time in more than a decade and after 15 years of anarchy in this Horn of Africa nation. But it also posed a direct challenge to a fledging U.N.-backed Somali government.

"We won the fight against the enemy of Islam. Mogadishu is under control of its people," Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, chairman of the Islamic Courts Union, said in a radio broadcast. The militia, which has formed an alliance that transcends clan, controls a 65-mile radius around the capital after fighting off a secular alliance of warlords.

The Islamic militia is gaining ground just as the U.N.-backed interim government struggles to assert control outside its base in Baidoa, 155 miles from Mogadishu. The prices of weapons soared there Monday as fears grew that the militia could head to Baidoa next.

The militia is the first group to consolidate control over all of Mogadishu's neighborhoods since the last government collapsed in 1991 and warlords took over, dividing this impoverished country of 8 million people into a patchwork of rival fiefdoms.

Omar Jamal, director of the Somali Justice Advocacy Center in St. Paul, Minn., said the Islamic militia's victory in Mogadishu was a turning point in the country's history.

"It is exactly the same thing that happened with the rise to power of the Taliban" in Afghanistan, he said, adding that the extremists are "using the people's weariness of violence, rape and civil war" to gain support for a government based on Islamic law.

The battle between the militia and the secular alliance has been intensifying in recent months, with more than 300 people killed and 1,700 wounded — many of them civilians caught in the crossfire of grenades, machine guns and mortars.

Alliance leaders could not be reached for comment Monday and had likely fled Mogadishu. One of them, warlord Mohamed Dheere, was believed to be in neighboring Ethiopia seeking reinforcements.

The United States is backing the secular alliance in an attempt to root out any al-Qaida members operating in the Horn of Africa. U.S. officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, have confirmed cooperating with the warlords. Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, president of Somalia's transitional national government, has said Washington is funding the alliance.

The Bush administration has not confirmed or denied backing the alliance, saying only that they support those who fight terror.

On Monday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said he could not offer any details about Monday's advance by the militia.

"We do have real concerns about the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia, and that informs an important aspect of our policy with regard to Somalia," he said.

The United States has not carried out any direct action in Somalia since the deaths of 18 servicemen in a 1993 battle depicted in the film "Black Hawk Down."

The U.S. officials said recently that Islamic leaders in Mogadishu are sheltering three al-Qaida leaders indicted in the deadly 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. The same al-Qaida cell is believed responsible for the 2002 suicide bombing of an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya that killed 15 people and a simultaneous attempt to shoot down an Israeli airliner over Kenya.

The Islamic militants and their secular rivals began competing for influence in earnest after a U.N.-backed interim government slowly began to gain international recognition. The government, weak and wracked by infighting, has not even been able to enter the capital because of the violence.

Interim Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi recently fired four ministers who were part of the secular alliance, leaving the alliance without any support in the government.

Mogadishu residents expressed relief at Monday's relative peace, but had mixed responses to the Islamic militia's advance.

"The victory of Islamic courts is a major step toward a lasting peaceful settlement in Mogadishu," said Somali economist Abdinasir Ahmed. "We are tired of the deception and rhetoric of the warlords."

Abdulqaadir Bashir, a computer engineer, disagreed. "The Islamic clerics want to be like Taliban regime in Afghanistan," he said. "People have no hope at all."

Jamal said it will take time for the militants to consolidate their power in Mogadishu, and that the struggle to control the country will not end there. He called on the international community to do everything possible to support the U.N.-backed government to keep the Islamic radicals from expanding their power base any farther.

"This war will not stop in Mogadishu," Jamal said.

Islamic Militias Claim Seizure Of Mogadishu (FT)

By Andrew England And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, June 6, 2006

Islamic militias claimed on Monday to have seized control of the Somali capital, Mogadishu, after months of fighting against an alliance of warlords alleged to have been backed by the US as proxies in the war on terror.

Several hundred people are reported to have been killed in recent months in the worst violence in Mogadishu for a decade.

The capture of Somalia's war-ravaged capital, if enduring, would mark another US policy failure in the Horn of Africa nation, which has been without an effective government for 15 years and is cited by the Bush administration as a potential haven for terrorists.

The Union of Islamic Courts proclaimed their victory on local radio stations. Their chairman, Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, urged residents to accept the new leadership and said they were ready for dialogue with any group. Local journalists said the city was in Islamic hands after 15 years under warlord control, and that some had fled.

DOJ_NMG_0032189

Visiting the White House, the head of the African Union, President Denis Sassou-Nguesso of the Republic of Congo, discussed the crisis with President George W. Bush and Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state.

Mr Sassou-Nguesso indirectly expressed concerns over US policy, telling reporters that more should be done to support the transitional government that emerged from a peace process in Kenya in 2004 but has not been able to establish its authority. "All these different groups and warlords are not the answer," he said.

Sean McCormack, the US State Department spokesman, said he could not confirm that Mogadishu had fallen to the Islamic militias. "We do have real concerns about the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia and that informs an important aspect of our policy with regard to Somalia," he said.

The US, which does not deny allegations that it has funded the alliance of warlords, alleges that a small number of suspected al-Qaeda members, including some suspected of having taken part in attacks in Kenya in 1998 and 2002, have used Somalia as a hideout and transit centre.

Most Somalis follow a moderate form of Islam, and Islamic courts, which the militias are loyal to, have operated for years, providing services the state would normally provide.

However, analysts say a number of courts have become dominated by extremists. The US suspects that some have sheltered foreign terror suspects. Allegations that the US backed the unpopular warlords increased local support for the Islamic militias.

The transitional government sits in Baidoa, a central town, plagued by divisions and with little power.

Islamist Militias Declare Victory In Somali Capital (USAT)

By Rob Crilly

USA Today, June 6, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya — Islamist militias that the United States suspects have links to terrorists claimed victory Monday in Mogadishu after months of fighting with Somalia's secular warlords.

More than 350 people have been killed in clashes this year between militias that want to establish an Islamic state based on sharia law and a coalition of warlords who receive U.S. financial support, according to a human rights group and a member of the transitional government.

In a statement read over local radio stations, the chairman of the city's Joint Islamic Courts, Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, declared victory and urged residents to accept the new leadership. "The Joint Islamic Courts are not interested in a continuation of hostilities and will fully implement peace and security," he said.

Mogadishu has been the scene of intense fighting this year — its worst since a United Nations peacekeeping mission that included U.S. forces withdrew in 1995. Two years earlier, 18 U.S. soldiers died trying to detain a warlord. The incident was recounted in the book and movie Black Hawk Down. The country has been without a functioning government since 1991.

Fighting intensified in February with the formation of the secular Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism. Suleiman Baldo, Africa program director of the International Crisis Group, says his organization has evidence from warlords that they received cash from U.S. agents. Ahmed Mohamen Suleiman, a member of Somalia's transitional government in Baidoa, says he believes U.S. support for the warlords "is tipping the balance to the (Islamist) militias."

After meeting at the White House on Monday with President Bush, African Union chief and Congo Republic President Denis Sassou-Nguesso asked the United States to help end the crisis in Somalia but urged Washington not to give aid to warlords.

The State Department has declined to comment on whether warlords have received U.S. support. Spokesman Sean McCormack said only that the United States was working with individuals and the transitional government to oppose terrorists. A recent department report said al-Qaeda members responsible for the bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998 "continue to operate in Somalia."

In a letter published last week in Kenya's Daily Nation newspaper, U.S. Ambassador to Kenya William Bellamy said, "The U.S. has encouraged a variety of groups in Somalia … to oppose the al-Qaeda presence in Somalia and reject the Somali militants who shelter and protect these terrorists."

In a telephone interview shortly before he fled Mogadishu, warlord Mohamed Qanyare Afrah denied receiving U.S. funding. He said his fighters were the only way to stop Islamic fundamentalists from spreading their influence.

Omar Jamal, director of the Somali Justice Advocacy Center in St. Paul, called the Islamist militias' victory a turning point. "It is exactly the same thing that happened with the rise to power of the Taliban," he said. The extremists are "using the people's weariness of violence, rape and civil war" to gain support for a government based on Islamic law.

DOJ_NMG_0032190

Mohamed Abdi Hayir, information minister in the transitional government, said Monday that ministers agreed to offer Cabinet seats to the sharia court leaders if they would agree to peace. “We have some extremist elements in this country, but there are also many more moderate Islamists,” he said. “We hope that we can work with the moderates.”

Militia Seizes Somali Capital (WP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, June 5 -- An Islamic militia with alleged links to al-Qaeda seized the Somali capital Monday after weeks of fighting with secular warlords covertly backed by the United States. The victory raised concerns that Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization could gain new influence in the impoverished Horn of Africa country.

The militia's advance unified battle-scarred Mogadishu for the first time in 15 years of anarchy that followed the collapse of national government.

"We won the fight against the enemy of Islam. Mogadishu is under control of its people," Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamic Courts Union, said in a radio broadcast. The militia, whose membership transcends the clan lines that traditionally dominate Somali politics, appears to control a 65-mile radius around the capital.

The group has gained ground as a U.N.-backed interim government struggles to assert control outside its base in Baidoa, 155 miles from Mogadishu. The price of weapons soared there as fears grew that the militia could try to capture Baidoa next.

This country of about 8 million people has been divided into a patchwork of rival fiefdoms since 1991, when clan-based warlords drove President Mohamed Siad Barre from power and promptly began fighting one another. U.S. troops landed in 1992 to help ensure delivery of food aid. They withdrew after 18 troops were killed in a Mogadishu gun battle depicted in the book and film "Black Hawk Down."

Omar Jamal, director of the Somali Justice Advocacy Center in St. Paul, Minn., called the Islamic militia's victory in Mogadishu a turning point in the country's history. "It is exactly the same thing that happened with the rise to power of the Taliban" in Afghanistan in the 1990s, he said, adding that the extremists are "using the people's weariness of violence, rape and civil war" to gain support for a government based on Islamic law.

When in power in Afghanistan, the Taliban allowed al-Qaeda to operate training camps.

[Bush administration officials say they believe that several al-Qaeda associates, including Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who has been tagged as an organizer of the 1998 bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi and a 2002 suicide bombing at an Israeli-owned hotel in Mombasa, Kenya, have found refuge in Somalia, Washington Post staff writer Karen DeYoung reported from Washington.

[But officials are uncertain of the relationship between what they describe as an East African terrorist cell directed by Mohammed and the Islamic fighters now in control of Mogadishu. "It's worrisome and a matter of concern, no doubt about it," one counterterrorism official said of events in the Somali capital, speaking on condition of anonymity. "But it's too early to tell" their importance.

["In terms of the terrorist angle, there has been concern about Somalia all along, well before today's developments," a senior administration official said. Recalling Osama bin Laden's establishment of al-Qaeda headquarters in Afghanistan after the Taliban takeover there, the militia taking power in Somalia "certainly doesn't make anyone feel any better about that situation," the official said.]

The battle between the militia and the secular alliance has been intensifying in recent months. More than 300 people have been killed in fighting, many of them civilians caught in the crossfire of grenades, machine guns and mortars. About 1,700 people have been wounded.

Islamic Militia Storms Capital (WT/AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- An Islamic militia said to have links to al Qaeda seized Somalia's capital yesterday after weeks of fighting with U.S.-backed secular warlords, raising fears that the nation could fall under the sway of Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization.

The advance unified the city for the first time in more than a decade and after 15 years of anarchy in this Horn of Africa nation. But it also posed a direct challenge to a fledging U.N.-backed Somali government.

"We won the fight against the enemy of Islam. Mogadishu is under control of its people," Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, chairman of the Islamic Courts Union, said in a radio broadcast. The militia controls a 65-mile radius around the capital after fighting off a secular alliance of warlords.

DOJ_NMG_0032191

The Islamic militia is gaining ground just as the U.N.-backed interim government struggles to assert control outside its base in Baidoa, 155 miles from Mogadishu. The prices of weapons soared there yesterday as fears grew that the militia could head to Baidoa next.

The militia is the first group to consolidate control over all of Mogadishu's neighborhoods since the last government collapsed in 1991 and warlords took over, dividing this impoverished country of 8 million people into a patchwork of rival fiefdoms.

Omar Jamal, director of the Somali Justice Advocacy Center in St. Paul, Minn., said the Islamic militia's victory in Mogadishu was a turning point in the country's history.

"It is exactly the same thing that happened with the rise to power of the Taliban" in Afghanistan, he said, adding that the extremists are "using the people's weariness of violence, rape and civil war" to gain support for a government based on Islamic law.

The battle between the militia and the secular alliance has been intensifying in recent months, with more than 300 people killed and 1,700 wounded -- many of them civilians caught in the crossfire of grenades, machine guns and mortars.

Alliance leaders could not be reached for comment yesterday and had likely fled Mogadishu.

The United States is backing the secular alliance in an attempt to root out any al Qaeda members operating in the Horn of Africa. U.S. officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, have confirmed cooperating with the warlords. Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, president of Somalia's transitional national government, has said Washington is funding the alliance.

The Bush administration has not confirmed or denied backing the alliance, saying only that they support those who fight terror.

The United States has not carried out any direct action in Somalia since the deaths of 18 servicemen in a 1993 battle depicted in the film "Black Hawk Down."

The U.S. officials said recently that Islamic leaders in Mogadishu are sheltering three al Qaeda leaders indicted in the deadly 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. The same al Qaeda cell is thought responsible for the 2002 suicide bombing of an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya that killed 15 persons and a simultaneous attempt to shoot down an Israeli airliner over Kenya.

Congo President Assails US Backing For Somali Warlords (AFP)

AFP, June 6, 2006

Congo's president and current African Union head Denis Sassou Nguesso hit out at US support for Somali warlords and expressed hope Washington would work to establish a government in Mogadishu.

"We think, and what we told president (George W.) Bush, that most important is to establish a government that must help the Somali people to have a real government," Sassou Nguesso told journalists after meeting Bush and US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"We think that if this effort is needed, we have to move in this direction, in order that the Somali government can truly be established in Mogadishu," he said, referring to the exiled government in Kenya.

"The presence of various groups, the warlords, is not a permanent solution."

Washington has given financial support to Somalian warlords in their fight against militias controlled by Islamist judges, who are strongly suspected by Western intelligence services of protecting suspected terrorists linked to Al-Qaeda's network.

On Monday the Joint Islamic Courts claimed victory in the four-month battle to seize control of Mogadishu from warlords who ruled the city for 15 years.

U.S. Is Offering Deals On Trade To Entice Iran (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — The European Union's foreign policy director, Javier Solana, arrived in Tehran on Monday night with incentives intended to resolve the nuclear crisis with Iran, including a proposal to allow Iran to upgrade its aging civilian air fleet through the purchase of aircraft parts from an American company, Boeing.

The package, to be presented Tuesday to Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki and to Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, is to include waiving trade sanctions against Iran to allow the purchase of American agricultural technology, said European diplomats and a senior Bush administration official.

The five permanent members of the Security Council — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — plus Germany, agreed on the package last week in Vienna, but declined to make the proposal public.

Officials first wanted to present the package to Iranian authorities. But with Mr. Solana's arrival in Tehran, several European and American diplomats described parts of the proposal, speaking anonymously because they were not authorized to comment publicly.

The offer includes a commitment from the six nations to support Iran's plan for a nuclear energy program for civilian use, including building light-water reactors through joint projects with other countries, the diplomats said.

The United States and Europe also agreed to back Iran's membership in the World Trade Organization.

The package is aimed at encouraging Iran to return to a freeze of its nuclear activities, including turning off the fast-spinning centrifuges that enrich uranium.

The most compelling item, though, may be the American offer to end its nearly three-decade policy against direct talks with Iran and to join in the negotiations over Iran's nuclear program.

That proposal is the centerpiece of the administration's recent shift in strategy toward Iran, which President Bush views as the No. 1 state sponsor of terrorism.

The decision to include the sale of Boeing aircraft parts, along with aircraft and parts from Airbus, is a huge step, particularly for the United States.

Since the 1979 revolution, Iran has been subject to American sanctions that hinder the purchase of spare parts for nearly all the planes in its air force, the civilian carrier Iran Air and domestic airlines. The sanctions cover not only American-made airplanes and parts, but also European planes like Airbus, when they use parts made in the United States.

Because Iran can shop only for used Airbus or Boeing planes, its civilian fleet is notorious for the age of planes and parts. Iranian officials regularly blame the sanctions for plane crashes.

The offers that Mr. Solana is to make are contingent on an agreement by Iran to suspend its enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, which the United States contends are a cover for developing nuclear arms.

If Iran does not agree to suspend those activities, the package includes possible "disincentives," as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has described them in the past.

They include a travel ban against Iran's ruling religious leaders and government officials involved in the nuclear program, and a freeze of Iranian financial assets abroad.

The package does not include any specific threat of military action should Iran refuse to suspend its uranium activities. If Iran rejects the offer, differences are likely to re-emerge among the six nations as they consider more specific punishments.

It was unclear whether the package includes a guarantee that the United States will not attack Iran if it agrees to suspend uranium enrichment.

An earlier version of the proposal contained three sentences to that effect, but they were a matter of intense debate in Vienna, and the diplomats would not say whether the wording remained in the final package. The United States has resisted giving those guarantees, while France and Russia have pushed for them.

A resolution is currently before the Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which invokes the Council's power to demand compliance of member countries and threaten punishment if they refuse.

But the emphasis of the package brought to Tehran by Mr. Solana is less on how to punish Iran than on how to reward it for agreeing to freeze its enrichment-related activities.

Before traveling to Tehran, Mr. Solana stopped in Israel, where he discussed the package with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Western diplomats say Israel backs the package.

"The proposal we bring along, the one that we carry, we think that will allow us to get engaged in that negotiation, based on trust and respect and confidence," Mr. Solana said at the airport in Tehran.

Shortly after his arrival, Mr. Mottaki, the foreign minister, told reporters, "If their aim is not politicizing the issue, and if they consider our demand, we can reach a logical agreement with them."

Iran has said it considers its nuclear program, which it insists is for peaceful purposes, a national right.

Hopeful US Urges Patience On Iran (AFP)

AFP, June 6, 2006

The White House pleaded for patience with overtures to Iran, saying "there is hope" that Tehran will accept an internationally brokered compromise on its nuclear programs.

"I would counsel patience," spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. "At this point, as we've said all along, let's give it time. Let's let the Iranians take a look at what the offers are, at the incentives and disincentives."

The United States charges that Iran is using its nuclear program to hide a quest for atomic weapons. Tehran denies the accusation.

DOJ_NMG_0032193

Snow said that the package crafted by the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany has yet to be formally presented to Tehran, and he again discounted early Iranian rejections of a call to freeze sensitive nuclear activities.

With European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana due to present the offer in Tehran, Snow said "there's neither optimism nor pessimism; there is hope" that Iranian leaders will accept.

"The condition for getting to the negotiating table is to suspend enrichment-related and reprocessing activities. That's the first step. Should that happen, then the whole series of other things can take place," he said.

"What's going to happen is that the Iranians are going to have to determine for themselves how seriously they want to take the proposition from the EU-3 (Britain, France and Germany) and the United States," he said.

"And I think that sometimes goes through several iterations before we get a final answer. So we're not quite ready to give the final answer," said Snow.

A Legal Case Against Iran (WP)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Speaking last October at a Tehran conference on "The World Without Zionism," Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, referred to Israel as a "disgraceful blot" and called for it to be "wiped off the map." This was not an isolated or idle threat. In the same speech, he defended Iran's determination to press ahead with its nuclear program -- which would give it the practical ability to achieve this result.

Although Ahmadinejad's bellicose statements were condemned by the United States and a number of its European allies, the condemnation was not followed up by a concerted diplomatic and legal effort in the U.N. Security Council. It ought to be, especially given the uncertain prospects of the council's current consideration of Iran's nuclear activities, further complicated by the just-announced offer of direct negotiations between Tehran and Washington.

There is a good legal basis for such action. Ahmadinejad's words clearly violate Article 2.4 of the U.N. Charter. This provision, to which Iran has agreed, requires all U.N. member states to "refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state." Ahmadinejad's specific formulation -- wiping Israel off the map and prophesying a coming nuclear conflagration in which much of humanity would expire -- also clearly entails a threat of committing genocide, which member nations are obliged, under the Genocide Convention, to prevent.

Both the nature and context of Ahmadinejad's manifesto set it apart from such harsh but legally permissible rhetoric as President Bush's talk of an "axis of evil" or President Ronald Reagan's reference to the Soviet Union as an "evil empire." Such statements do not threaten the existence of a sovereign member of the international community. Likewise, expressing a view that a particular undemocratic regime or an otherwise odious government would not survive the rising anger of its people, or will fall prey to certain forces of history, does not amount to a legally proscribed challenge.

But Ahmadinejad's rant features a direct and unequivocal threat, and it gives Israel a valid casus belli -- under both Article 51 (self-defense) of the U.N. Charter and customary international law -- to use preemptive force as a means of ensuring that Iran cannot make good on its stated intentions.

Indeed, the International Court of Justice, in a 1996 opinion analyzing the legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons, found that use-of-force threats that violated Article 2.4 and were not otherwise justified under Article 51 also posed a threat to international peace and security, thereby further infringing the U.N. Charter. Since Israel has not committed aggression against Iran, Ahmadinejad's statements cannot be justified as self-defense. They have, in fact, created a legally cognizable threat that can, and should, be addressed by the Security Council under its Chapter VII powers, which are concerned with threats to peace.

So far U.S.-led efforts to have the Security Council directly condemn and impose sanctions on Iran under Chapter VII for its nuclear ambitions have not succeeded. That's why seeking the council's intervention on Iran's illegal threats to use force makes excellent diplomatic sense. Such an approach would provide multiple and reinforcing benefits.

First, it would broaden the international dialogue beyond Tehran's breach of nonproliferation obligations, focusing on the real underlying problem: the bellicose nature of the Iranian regime and the use it might make of nuclear weapons. And since Tehran's violations of the U.N. Charter are, by their nature, issues that can be handled only by the Security Council, bringing them to the council would counter Iran's efforts to displace the U.N. framework in favor of direct negotiations with the European Union and the United States. Indeed, a serious debate on Ahmadinejad's illegal threat would give the United States a unique opportunity to focus the Security Council on the shrill anti-Israeli rhetoric emanating not just from Iran but also from numerous other Islamic countries. This rhetoric fosters regional tensions and nurtures the dangerous "jihadist" sentiments.

Second, demands that Iran withdraw its threat and acknowledge its obligation to peacefully resolve any dispute it may have with Israel would be firmly grounded in international law -- so much so that Security Council members Russia and China would be hard-pressed to oppose the effort. Both of those countries have routinely cloaked their objections to E.U.-U.S. policy toward

DOJ_NMG_0032194

Iran in the language of international law, arguing, for example, that Iran has a legal right to pursue civilian nuclear activities. No country, of course, is entitled to violate the U.N. Charter.

Not to put too fine a point on it, but this is how the U.N. system was, and is, supposed to work. When a clear threat to peace arises, it is incumbent upon the Security Council to act in defense of the threatened party to head off the unilateral use of force and to advance "collective security." This imperative is particularly compelling when the very legitimacy of the threatened party and its right to independent national existence have been challenged. Such a challenge goes beyond the violation of Article 2.4 and raises the specter of the most heinous international crimes, including genocide.

If Iran genuinely desires the peaceful atom as an energy source, then it should have no problem retracting its threats against Israel and reaffirming its commitment to resolve any differences it may have with Jerusalem through peaceful means. If it refuses, it will provide compelling evidence that Iran's current government cannot be expected to act as a responsible member of the international community. Then the world can take stock of its true intentions and act accordingly.

The writers are Washington lawyers who served in the Justice Department during the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Rumsfeld, Visiting Vietnam, Seals Accord To Deepen Military Cooperation (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

HANOI, Vietnam, June 5 — The United States and Vietnam agreed Monday to increase their military contacts and to discuss additional ways to broaden their defense cooperation, American officials said.

The understanding was sealed in talks between senior Vietnamese officials and Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was making his first visit to Vietnam as defense secretary.

The two nations, he declared Monday evening with evident satisfaction, had decided to step up "exchanges at all levels of the military."

Vietnam was an important stop on an Asian swing that has already taken Mr. Rumsfeld to a meeting of defense experts in Singapore. During the Singapore sessions, Mr. Rumsfeld denounced Iran as a "terrorist" nation, complained that Russia was bullying its neighbors and criticized China for being secretive about its level of military spending.

In contrast, here in Vietnam's capital he heaped praise on his hosts. He lauded Vietnam's economic development, which he inspected Sunday night with a walk through the city's streets.

"I was and remain struck by the economic success that you can see and the activity and the change in this city," said Mr. Rumsfeld, who noted that he had previously visited the country as a congressman and as a private citizen.

During a visit to the Temple of Literature, which was established in 1070 as Vietnam's first university, Mr. Rumsfeld enthusiastically struck a ritual gong. When the university was founded, Mr. Rumsfeld told Vietnam's defense minister, Pham Van Tra, American Indians were still living in "mud huts."

"That's impressive," Mr. Rumsfeld added.

The Vietnamese greeted their guest with a resplendent military honor guard, which played "The Star-Spangled Banner" before the talks began at the Defense Ministry.

The Vietnam War still casts a long shadow. There are 1,805 American troops unaccounted for from the war, including 1,376 in Vietnam, according to United States military officials. A small team is based in Vietnam to carry out the accounting and excavating in the search for the lost Americans, efforts that have been complicated by Vietnam's building boom and the dwindling ranks of witnesses from the war era. Vietnam has generally been cooperative, and Mr. Rumsfeld encouraged the government to provide additional support.

But it is China, a subject that Mr. Rumsfeld said went unmentioned Monday during his talks with Mr. Tra and Prime Minister Phan Van Khai, that has added impetus for the new courtship.

The Pentagon has been increasingly concerned over China's growing military strength. Vietnam has its own reasons for trying to establish more balance with its neighbor to the north.

Still, the Vietnamese have moved deliberately. "They have China next door to them and they're careful to keep good relations with China and they want a balance in relations with us and relations with China," said a senior Pentagon official, who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to comment publicly on the talks.

One step in the still evolving relationship is to be taken later this month when two Vietnamese officers are scheduled to begin English language classes at a military language school in San Antonio. The instruction, which was previously agreed upon, is being financed by the Pentagon's program for International Military Education and Training.

A likely next step is the expansion of that effort to include medical training for Vietnamese officers, a Pentagon official suggested.

DOJ_NMG_0032195

American officials also said Monday that there had been discussion of expanded cooperation in clearing mines left over from the war. One American official said Vietnamese officials expressed interest in acquiring American mine-clearing equipment and military spare parts. A request for military equipment is likely to stir debate in Congress, where Vietnam's record on human rights has undergone close scrutiny.

During his discussions with Mr. Tra, Mr. Rumsfeld suggested that Vietnam might play a role in international peacekeeping. But Mr. Tra noted that the Vietnamese military could not take part in any operation that was not specifically approved by the United Nations, according to an American official who said he did not want to be identified because he was explaining what had occurred in private talks.

Access to Vietnamese ports and bases for American military forces was not on the agenda, Mr. Rumsfeld indicated before his visit.

Mr. Rumsfeld was not the first American defense secretary to visit Vietnam since the end of the Vietnam War — William S. Cohen, President Bill Clinton's defense secretary, made the trip, as did Mr. Clinton.

Mr. Khai visited the United States last June, the first such visit since the end of the Vietnam War. Vietnam, which signed an important trade agreement with the United States in 2000, has been pushing for membership in the World Trade Organization. President Bush is expected to visit Vietnam when it will be the host of an Asian economic summit meeting in November.

Still, the visit of the hard-line Mr. Rumsfeld was noteworthy, as was his enthusiasm. He noted that during the prime minister's meeting last year with President Bush, the two leaders talked about their desire to raise the relationship between the countries to a new level.

"And certainly that has happened," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

Rumsfeld Presses Vietnam On Finding MIAs (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, June 5, 2006

The U.S. is pressing Vietnam for underwater searches and access to aging witnesses in stepped-up efforts to recover remains of Americans missing from the Vietnam War, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Monday.

"We still have work to do," Rumsfeld said, though he added that he was pleased Vietnamese military officials had pledged in meetings with him to do more to help recover the remains. "As we all agree, we don't want to forget the importance of this."

Rumsfeld told reporters U.S. officials will work to see if the U.S. can provide technical assistance with underwater recovery efforts.

There are 1,805 American troops unaccounted for from the war, including 1,376 in Vietnam, according to Marine Maj. Jay Rutter, deputy commander of the Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command, which heads the recovery efforts here.

Of those still missing, 453 were lost at sea or over water, according to the Pentagon data.

For Angela Cooke, whose father was missing in Vietnam for 34 years, the MIA recovery work is personal. Just six weeks ago, U.S. military officials in Hanoi notified family members that the remains of Staff Sgt. Calvin Cooke — whose C-130 Hercules cargo plane was shot down over An Loc City in what was then South Vietnam — had been identified.

Later this month, Cooke will finally bury her father at Arlington Cemetery, with full military honors.

"This means a whole lot to all of us — finally being able to say goodbye," Angela Cooke said in a recent phone call from her home in Everett, Wash. And she said the Pentagon's efforts to recover the soldiers' remains in Vietnam must continue. "It's important that they still do this."

Cooke will travel with the remains from the POW/MIA office in Hawaii to Arlington Cemetery, where they will bury her father by her mother's grave.

"It feels so good to finally have closure," Cooke said.

With increased Vietnamese help, more families may get that closure.

According to Rutter, the Vietnamese have agreed to allow U.S. teams to conduct longer searches — for 45 days rather than the previous 33.

U.S. officials are hoping to get access to restricted sites, as well as more archives. He said the U.S. is also hoping to gain broader access to the western highlands, where a large number of losses took place.

"It's getting harder," he said, in part because villagers who were witnesses to many of the crashes during the war are getting older. "The age of the witnesses is a huge issue."

The U.S. also wants greater access to information about MIAs lost in Laos and Cambodia.

Critics of the current Iraq war and Rumsfeld's leadership have likened it to the Vietnam War, noting that in both, public support eroded as time went on with little to show for the loss of American lives.

DOJ_NMG_0032196

Despite their bitter history, relations between the U.S. and Vietnam have steadily improved. The U.S. has become Vietnam's top trading partner since the two established diplomatic ties a decade ago, with two-way trade worth $6.4 billion last year.

"I think that it is, it ought not to be surprising, it seems to me, that the United States is developing a very good relationship with Vietnam, just as it ought not to have been surprising that we did so with countries that were engaged on the other side in previous conflicts, whether World War II or Korea," Rumsfeld said.

Rumsfeld, making his first trip to Vietnam as defense secretary, told Vietnamese defense minister Gen. Pham Van Tra that he took a walk around Hanoi and could "feel the energy, the vibrancy of the city."

In another sign of changing times, Rumsfeld stayed only a few blocks away from what was called the Hanoi Hilton, where U.S. prisoners of war, including Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., were held.

___

On the Net:

Defense Department POW/MIA Office: http://www.dtic.mil/dpmo/

Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command: http://www.jpac.pacom.mil/

Defense Department: http://www.defenselink.mil

"A Pacific Nation" (WSJ)

By Donald H. Rumsfeld

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

The historic shifts taking place in Asia-Pacific security cooperation were highlighted at the "Shangri La Dialogue" in Singapore last week -- a gathering of senior defense representatives from more than 20 Asia-Pacific nations, including the United States, to discuss security issues of mutual concern. The meeting was an important reminder of just how far many nations of this region have come in building new relationships and arrangements to address the challenges that have emerged since the end of the Cold War.

These security concerns range from violent extremism to piracy, narcotics and infectious diseases, in addition to traditional geopolitical challenges such as the situation on the Korean Peninsula and the Taiwan Strait. In such an environment, cooperation among free nations is not simply desirable, but critical. And that has led to major changes -- both in America's approach to long-standing allies, and in the emergence of new U.S. partnerships in Asia that involve multiple nations working together on shared security concerns.

In the past five years, the U.S. has done more things, in terms of defense and security cooperation in Asia, with more nations, and in more constructive ways, than at any other time in its history. Relationships which, in some cases, stretch as far back as World War II have been updated and modernized to meet the new challenges of the 21st century. For example, we are working with the Philippines -- one of America's oldest allies -- to transform its armed forces. We have cultivated security relationships -- with Mongolia, Vietnam, India, and Indonesia -- that barely existed a few years ago, but are growing in importance today. And we have welcomed the emergence of Japan, South Korea and Australia -- longstanding treaty allies -- as important players in global, as well as regional, security.

There is another historic and welcome shift taking place in the Pacific region. For much of my adult life, security arrangements and stability in the Pacific were rooted in a network of bilateral defense relationships between the U.S. and its allies and partners. This contrasted with the situation in Europe, where the U.S. participates in a relatively large, formal alliance -- the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Now, we see an expanding network of security cooperation in this region, both bilaterally between nations and multilaterally among nations -- often with the U.S. as a partner.

The U.S. and Thailand, for instance, were able to respond quickly and work together seamlessly after the catastrophic tsunami that killed tens of thousands in December 2004 because the two countries have shared several decades of joint military training and collaboration. These programs include the annual Cobra Gold exercises, which have been expanded in recent years to include Singaporean, Indonesian and Japanese forces. The exercises now have a new focus on peacekeeping and humanitarian disaster response -- a focus validated by recent events such as Indonesia's latest earthquake.

We also see this kind of cooperation at work in the Straits of Malacca, where Singapore, Malaysia, Thailand and Indonesia are coordinating patrols to combat the ancient scourge of piracy on the high seas. Since this effort began two years ago, there has been a decrease in reported criminal incidents in the area.

Multilateral institutions and activities, such as last week's meeting in Singapore -- organized by the International Institute for Strategic Studies, as well as the Association of Southeast Asian Nations' Regional Forum and the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation -- are leading the way. These institutions are not military alliances or signatories to treaties such as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or the World Trade Organization, carrying with them binding commitments. Uniquely, they provide arenas for dialogue where diverse nations with shared interests can engage each other in different and flexible ways, and fashion constructive approaches to common problems.

DOJ_NMG_0032197

With regard to the small minority of violent extremists in the region, America's friends and partners face a set of challenges and choices: whether to openly combat the messages of hate, intolerance, and incitement -- that can, in some cases, gain traction -- or to try to placate and accommodate those whose vision of the future deems that it is acceptable, even desirable, to kill innocent men, women and children to promote their goals.

In addition to the choices made by other countries, there are choices to be made by America. From time to time, in past decades and even today, some Americans have questioned whether the U.S. should be actively engaged in the world.

But the U.S. is -- and always will be -- a Pacific nation. The American people have expended no shortage of blood and treasure in this region over the past century. And the U.S. must, and we will, stay engaged here to address a range of traditional, as well as unconventional, security concerns. By continuing to work together in constructive ways -- while respectful of different perspectives and different interests -- we can ensure that in this uncertain new century, this hemisphere will be freer, more peaceful and more prosperous for our citizens, as well as for the citizens of Asia.

Mr. Rumsfeld is the U.S. secretary of defense.

Bush, President Of Congo Discuss Darfur (AP)

AP, June 5, 2006

President Bush said Monday that it's important for United Nations forces to take over peacekeeping as soon as possible in the Darfur region of Sudan where nearly 200,000 people have died in a three-year conflict.

Bush met at the White House with Denis Sassou-Nguesso, president of the Republic of Congo and head of the 53-nation African Union, to discuss Darfur, AIDS and other issues.

"We talked about our common commitment to help end the genocide in Darfur," Bush said in the Oval Office. "I appreciate the president's leadership in helping negotiate a peace agreement, and I appreciate his leadership in working with the United Nations so we can get the AU forces blue-helmeted as quickly as possible."

The African Union has a 7,300-member peacekeeping force in Darfur and is mediating the conflict. The AU troops are getting support from NATO and the European Union and are due to hand this responsibility over to a United Nations force in September.

This is the second time that Sassou-Nguesso was at the White House. He met with former President George H.W. Bush in 1990.

The African leader said the two talked about terrorism, Iran's nuclear ambitions, African development issues, the situation in the Gulf of Guinea, the Congo Basin and the New Partnership for African Development, known as NEPAD.

The concept of NEPAD is that in return for African efforts to fight corruption and modernize their economies, the international community agrees to forgive debts and expand trade opportunities and aid for projects developed by Africans for Africans. Critics of NEPAD say the ideas are not new and that passing out cash is not the answer.

"I was happy to see President Bush give his entire support to the development of Africa," Sassou-Nguesso said. "We discussed a lot of issues that we're all interested in: Peace, security, and not just in Africa, but beyond Africa, in the world."

Bush Hears Concerns From Honduran Leader (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, June 5, 2006

President Bush heard concerns about immigration reform from south-of-the-border ally Honduras on Monday and offered assurances that he was committed to a bill that treats foreigners with respect while upholding U.S. laws.

Bush met in the Oval Office with Honduran President Manuel Zelaya, who took office in January with promises to create jobs in the Central American nation that has been mired in poverty and unemployment. Zelaya has backed the Central American Free Trade Agreement that eliminates trade barriers with the United States but has provoked protests throughout the region.

Bush said he and Zelaya discussed ways to expand commercial opportunities between their nations and to make sure democracies in Latin America are strong. He said they also talked about the immigration bill being negotiated on Capitol Hill.

"I assured him that my administration supports a comprehensive immigration bill that treats people with respect, and at the same time upholds our laws," Bush said. "And over lunch, I will give him our strategy to continue to press for a comprehensive bill that will enforce our borders but allow people to come to our country in a legal way to work on a temporary basis."

Zelaya, speaking through a translator to reporters brought in at the end of the meeting, thanked Bush for "the frankness with which he has spoken about the solutions to the common problems we face in the Western Hemisphere."

DOJ_NMG_0032198

Abbas To Call National Referendum On Israel (USAT)

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said Monday that attempts to get the Hamas-led government to implicitly recognize Israel have failed to produce agreement and that he will call a national referendum on the issue. “President Abbas will set a date for the referendum after the meeting Tuesday of the PLO Executive Committee and parliamentary caucuses,” his office said in a statement.

The move sets Abbas on a collision course with Hamas. Hamas' hard-line stance has landed it in a violent power struggle with Abbas and his Fatah Party, and its refusal to recognize Israel has led Western countries to impose crippling economic sanctions. But passing the referendum could give Abbas an important boost in the standoff. “It would bolster his legitimacy and give him power to go ahead with negotiations with Israel,” said Azam al-Ahmad, a top Fatah official.

Alan Garcia capped a remarkable comeback in Peru's runoff election, beating a fiery nationalist to regain control 16 years after his first presidential term ended in economic ruin and rebel violence. U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick hailed Garcia's win: “His own policy statements as he ran for office suggested that he learned from some of the mistakes of the '80s.”

Garcia, 57, said voters sent a clear message to Venezuela's leftist president Hugo Chvez: Stay out of Peru. Chvez had endorsed Ollanta Humala, a former army officer. “It's a huge slap in the face for Chvez,” political analyst Hugo Neira said.

Garcia led 53.1% to 46.9% with 93% of the vote counted, Peru's electoral authority said Monday.

Argentina's government expressed concern for the first time in years about discontent in the ranks of the military, which ruled the country in a bloody dictatorship from 1976 to 1983. Alberto Fernandez, the Cabinet chief, said the presence of six officers at an event in May to honor people killed by rebels in the early 1970s “is serious enough to warrant attention.” The killings were used to justify a 1976 coup.

Up to 30,000 people were killed by the dictatorship, according to human rights groups.

The first African country led by a democratically elected woman began recruiting women into its new postwar army. Liberia's army will initially number 2,000 troops, and roughly 400 of them will be women, said Edith Bawn, spokeswoman for the government body responsible for overseeing its creation. “Women bring a special sensitiveness to the military,” she said. “And they're very good at support roles.”

Abbas To Call Referendum On Israel (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, June 5, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said Monday he will call a referendum on a plan implicitly recognizing Israel after he failed to persuade Hamas to agree to the idea.

The Islamic militant Hamas, which heads the Palestinian government, strongly opposes a referendum.

"President Abbas will set a date for the referendum after the meeting Tuesday of the PLO Executive Committee and parliamentary caucuses," his office said in a statement.

Abbas had set a midnight deadline for agreement. But a participant in late-night talks with Palestinian factions said the president determined they had failed an hour before that.

The Hamas-led government is facing international isolation over its refusal to renounce violence and recognize Israel. The United States, European Union and Israel have cut off cash transfers to the Palestinian government since Hamas won legislative elections earlier this year.

Its hardline stance has landed it in an increasingly violent power struggle with Abbas and his Fatah party, the other main Palestinian faction. Since Hamas was sworn into office in March, Abbas has taken steps to curb its authorities.

The plan under discussion was formulated by Hamas and Fatah prisoners held in Israeli jails. But Hamas' exiled leaders, who make final decisions on policy, have refused to accept the proposal.

Hamas has been calling for more time to discuss the proposal and suggested changes in the language. But Abbas, who has avoided confrontation since taking office early last year, rejected Hamas' demands on Monday.

"If anyone wants to amend this document, then we will not reach any results," Abbas told reporters after meeting with European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

Abbas has endorsed the plan as a way to end the crushing sanctions against the Palestinians and allow him to resume peace talks with Israel.

Hamas reacted angrily to Abbas' threats Monday.

Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri insisted that the talks must continue.

DOJ_NMG_0032199

"You cannot raise the sword of ultimatum, you cannot raise the issue of a referendum while you are talking about dialogue," he told reporters in Gaza. He said calling a referendum meant circumventing the elected government, led by Hamas.

Many Palestinians are uneasy about the referendum, though polls show the document would be approved easily.

In Gaza, Mohammed Abu Seido, 30, a coffee shop cashier, said he would vote for the document, but he worried that Hamas would react with violence if it is approved.

"Hamas is already failing," he said.

The Palestinians have never held a referendum before, and officials said the vote would not be binding. But passing the referendum could give Abbas an important boost in his standoff with Hamas.

"It would bolster his legitimacy and give him power to go ahead with negotiations with Israel," said Azam al-Ahmad, a top Fatah official. Al-Ahmad also said Abbas, who wields considerable powers, would consider calling elections for president and parliament if Hamas did not abide by the results of a referendum.

Hamas says that accepting the plan would mean abandoning its principles. It also says a referendum is not necessary because Palestinian voters chose its political program in legislative elections just over four months ago.

The Palestinian infighting has turned deadly in recent weeks. Sixteen people have died in clashes between Hamas and Fatah loyalists, including five killed on Sunday. Five Palestinians were wounded in two clashes in the southern city of Khan Younis on Monday, security officials said.

Hamas has stuck to its tough line on Israel despite the crushing international boycott, which has left the government unable to pay the salaries of tens of thousands of civil servants for three months.

Hamas officials promised over the weekend to begin paying overdue salaries. But on Monday, the government failed to meet its pledge, causing widespread confusion in the Palestinian areas and prompting angry workers to storm one Gaza City bank.

Some banks advanced money to unpaid civil servants to help calm the situation. In some cases, people received money. In others, the promised payments failed to materialize. And tens of thousands of workers remained without paychecks, with the government as far away as ever from ending the boycott.

"These are people who don't have money to buy milk," said policeman Raed Abu Ghoneima, one of the protesters who stormed a Gaza City branch of the Arab Bank. "It has nothing to do with politics; it's about wages."

Also Monday, Israeli aircraft fired missiles at a car in the Jebaliya refugee camp next to Gaza city, the military said, killing two militants and wounding two bystanders, according to Palestinian hospital officials.

Israel said the main target, a militant from the renegade Popular Resistance committees, was involved in firing rockets at Israel. He died of his wounds.

Abbas Will Call For Palestinian Vote On Two-State Plan (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger And Greg Myre

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

JERUSALEM, Tuesday, June 6 — The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, intends to call a referendum on a proposal developed by prisoners for a unified Palestinian political program that the governing Hamas faction opposes.

Talks on the proposal ended without agreement late Monday night, and early Tuesday morning Mr. Abbas's office said in a statement that he intended to live up to his ultimatum to Hamas, the militant Islamic faction that heads the government, and announce a referendum later on Tuesday after meeting with the executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

"In light of recent contacts, President Abbas will decide the date of the referendum after a meeting of the P.L.O. executive committee," the statement said.

The referendum is expected to be called for July and will be seen as a vote of confidence in Hamas, which won legislative elections in late January but has been isolated internationally and financially because of its refusal to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

The vote, if it takes place, will be a kind of showdown between Hamas and Mr. Abbas, who has insisted from the beginning of Hamas's rule that it accept the idea of a negotiated two-state solution, with an independent Palestine living in peace alongside Israel.

There is no precedent for a referendum among the Palestinians, and it is not clear that Mr. Abbas has the power to call one. Nor is it clear what would happen if the Palestinian parliament, where Hamas holds a majority, votes against a referendum or decides on wording different from that which Mr. Abbas might favor.

Hamas has rejected portions of the prisoners' document, which implicitly recognizes Israel by calling for a Palestinian state within the boundaries that existed before the 1967 Middle East war.

DOJ_NMG_0032200

Khalida Jarar, a delegate from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, told reporters after factions held talks with Mr. Abbas in Ramallah late on Monday that Mr. Abbas felt he had no option but to call the referendum.

Ms. Jarar said Mr. Abbas also had a 70-minute phone conversation with Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, about the proposal, which she said also ended without agreement.

"The document has to be accepted as it is," Mr. Abbas said at a news conference in the West Bank city of Ramallah after talks with the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, on Monday. "If we begin to change it, we will never reach a result."

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas government, said Monday that Hamas opposed a referendum, but believed a compromise could be worked out.

"I think there is an opportunity for us to reach an understanding on the prisoners' document," Mr. Hamad told Israel radio. "But if we hold a referendum, there will be a lot of problems, I think."

Mr. Abbas said on May 25 that he would hold a referendum within two months if Hamas did not accept the prisoners' plan within 10 days, a period that ended Sunday.

The prisoners' plan is in line with positions held by Fatah, and recent opinion polls show that a large majority of Palestinians support it.

Hamas has never recognized Israel and does not accept its existence on any territory in the region, contending that all the land belongs to Muslims.

The prisoners' document calls for negotiations based on the United Nations resolutions and other international proposals that call for two states existing side by side.

The political confrontation comes as violence continued both among Palestinians and between Israel and the Palestinians.

Five Palestinians were killed in the Gaza Strip overnight Sunday in internal Palestinian clashes.

The dead included a member of Hamas's military wing, who was killed when a large bomb went off near his home in the Jabaliya refugee camp, outside Gaza City. In southern Gaza, a pregnant woman and her brother were shot dead, Palestinian security officials said.

A Palestinian described by witnesses as a militant was killed and four people were wounded in a missile strike on a car in northern Gaza on Monday. The Israeli Army confirmed that it had carried out the strike.

During the day, Hamas gunmen stormed into a Palestinian television broadcasting center and smashed computers and other equipment in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis, employees said. But Hamas officials denied the group was involved. The gunmen said Palestinian television supported Fatah at the expense of Hamas, the employees said. No injuries were reported.

Marwan Barghouti, a hugely popular Fatah leader, was the driving force behind the plan supported by Mr. Abbas, though prisoners from other groups, including Hamas, also signed it. Mr. Barghouti was convicted in 2004 of orchestrating the killings of five people, and is serving five life sentences in an Israeli prison.

Mr. Barghouti and other Palestinian prisoners are seen as heroes by many Palestinians, and their opinions carry substantial weight.

The plan contains a number of provisions that Israel adamantly opposes. It says Palestinian refugees dating from the 1948-49 Arab-Israeli war must be allowed to return to their homes in what is now Israel. The plan also calls for Palestinian "resistance" in areas occupied by Israel, which effectively means the West Bank.

But Israel in response continues to insist that the way forward is through the stalled internationally backed Middle East peace plan, known as the road map, which calls on the Palestinian leadership to dismantle armed factions.

In general, though, Israeli officials have sought to distance themselves from the Palestinian debate over the prisoners' plan.

"Any move that occurs in the Palestinian Authority will be evaluated carefully, but this is an internal Palestinian process and it's preferable for Israel not to interfere," said Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz, said Monday.

In another development, some Palestinian Authority workers were able to withdraw salaries from their banks on Monday for the first time in three months. The government has not been able to meet its payroll since Western governments cut off aid when Hamas took over the government.

U.S. And S. Korea Launch Free Trade Talks (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, June 5, 2006

The United States and South Korea held their first round of talks Monday aimed at achieving a free trade agreement between the two nations before the end of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0032201

An agreement with South Korea, America's seventh-largest trading partner, would be the most economically significant such pact the United States has reached since it tore down barriers with Mexico and Canada more than a decade ago.

Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Wendy Cutler, who is heading the U.S. delegation, expressed optimism that the talks can be concluded before the end of the year even though the negotiators will have to deal with such tough issues as removing barriers to American farm products, pharmaceuticals and U.S. autos.

"I remain optimistic about our ability to conclude a high-quality, comprehensive agreement," Cutler told reporters during a conference call Monday. "The political will is clearly there on both sides."

Cutler praised Kim Jong-hoon, the head of the South Korean negotiating team, and said both countries had put in a great amount of preparatory work that should speed the effort.

But as the two sides began negotiations at the U.S. Trade Office near the White House the sounds of protesters could be plainly heard.

About 40 South Korean farmers and laborers and their American supporters have planned a weeklong series of demonstrations and rallies to coincide with the talks. South Korean rice farmers have engaged in a number of violent demonstrations in their own country to highlight their opposition.

For American consumers, a free trade agreement with South Korea would hold out the prospect of lower U.S. tariffs and thus cheaper prices on such South Korean products as cell phones and automobiles.

Highlighting the complexity of the discussions, the negotiating teams, which for the first round numbered between 100 and 150 experts, will split into subgroups covering 19 different areas.

After this week's opening round in Washington, the teams will resume work in Seoul the week of July 10 with plans to meet every six to eight weeks after that time until the end of the year.

The administration next week will launch separate free trade talks with Malaysia, all part of its push to raise America's profile in Southeast Asia as a counter to the growing economic power of China.

President Bush has aggressively pursued free trade agreements since taking office but most of them were designed to bolster foreign policy goals, such as promoting democracy in the Middle East, and had little economic impact.

But U.S. industry has been pushing for an agreement with South Korea, seeing it as a fast-growing market in Southeast Asia.

"We are bullish that a free trade agreement provides an opportunity for the two countries to forge an even closer economic relationship," said Myron Brilliant, vice president for Asian affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Our country will benefit from an agreement that ensures that Korea's markets are open."

Flouting Syria's Martial Law, Bold Students Advocate Democracy (CSM)

By James Brandon

The Christian Science Monitor, June 6, 2006

ALEPPO, SYRIA - Two years ago, Syrian student Muhammad Arab was imprisoned for calling for reform of his country's political system. Now released and back studying at the Faculty of Medicine in the University of Aleppo, he is determined to continue promoting democracy.

"Prison wasn't great, but living without freedom is worse," says Mr. Arab, a broad-shouldered young medical student.

Arab is one of a handful of students agitating for reform and struggling to build a pro-democracy student movement in Syria, where martial law imposed in 1963 forbids unofficial political gatherings or groups.

"The student movements are not very significant in terms of being able to change things now," says Joshua Landis, professor of Middle Eastern studies at the University of Oklahoma. "But here is the very genesis of a new Syrian effervescence. This is the start of a 10- to 15-year transformation of society."

While no organized student movement exists at present, one may be emerging. A small number of students are loosely linked but have no official names, leaders, or organization. They simply come together to organize political debates, spread democratic ideas, and take opinion polls.

"We're talking about little groups of 10 or 15 students," says Dr. Landis, who spent 2005 in Damascus and is the author of the blog Syriacomment.com. "They just appeared in the past two years. Every now and again, the government tries to smash them. When there are demonstrations, the police beat them up and their leaders are sent to prison for lengthy terms.

"Most of the time this is enough to convince most students not to get involved in politics," adds Landis. "But there are always some who are prepared to carry on."

Arab is a case in point. At his university in Aleppo, Syria's second-largest city, he ran against a candidate from Syria's Baath Party in student elections in March 2004. When he won, the university suspended him and 80 other students.

DOJ_NMG_0032202

Undeterred, he traveled to Damascus, five hours south, to join a protest against the university's decision. There he was arrested and put on trial in Syria's State Security Court. "I saw my lawyer for only a few minutes before the trial, so there was no chance to prepare a defense," he says.

Then the court, Syria's highest, sentenced Arab to three years imprisonment. He served only eight months, but was regularly beaten and threatened, he says.

"The government is more afraid of secular opposition groups than religious ones," points out Ayman Abdul-Nour, a prominent reformist member of the Baath Party in Damascus. "Because any time the government wants to get rid of the Islamists, it can just call them terrorists and bomb them. The government also knows that the US will not seek to replace the regime with Islamic people."

But students face pressure not only from the government and the university authorities but also from their friends and parents. "Becoming involved in politics, I was aware that I might cross some of the regime's 'red lines,' but I suppressed my fear," says Nasser Babinsy, a friend of Arab and a fellow activist. "And 43 years of dictatorship teaches you a lot of fear."

But analysts point out that activists hoping to spread democracy must not only overcome official harassment, they must work against an educational and social system designed to support the regime.

"Syrian society is fighting against so many layers of authoritarianism," says Landis. "Arab nationalism is like a religion in Syria; it's not something that you can debate."

In addition, President Bashar al-Assad's limited economic reforms have removed some of the pressure for political reform. "Eighty percent of Syrians don't care about political freedoms," says Sami Moubayed, a writer and independent political analyst in Damascus. "They want jobs and more money."

But others argue that even religiously observant and less-educated Syrians are starting to see democracy as the best option. "Our country is tired of totalitarianism," says Mohammad Deeb Khor, a member of the opposition Revolutionary Workers Party, which formerly followed communist-style ideology. "People are thirsty for basic freedoms. Democracy is not paradise but it is a stage from which to meet society's interests."

As democratic ideas spread, Syrian democrats are also discovering the power of nonviolent protest. "Earlier this [year], a group of people demonstrated in Damascus, calling for an end to the martial laws," says Najib Dadam from the opposition Socialist Arab Democratic Union Party.

The regime sent 2,000 security men to beat them up, he says. "These things will continue to happen, and we will continue to build support, until this becomes a massive public movement."

While a mass movement might be some time off, analysts say exposure to satellite TV and the Internet is alerting Syrians to the possibilities of democracy. "If Iraq had been a success, the domino effect would have toppled all the dictatorships in the region," says Dr. Moubayed. "But America has lit a real interest in democracy in this region; the dominos are starting to fall, but slowly."

Ford Foundation To Announce Africa Initiative (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

The Ford Foundation will announce today the creation of a new philanthropic venture, led by Africans and based in Dakar, Senegal. The project, Trust Africa, aims to strengthen an expanding network of nonprofit groups across the continent that seek to hold governments accountable, whether elected or dictatorships.

Ford has committed $30 million to this new foundation. Half the money will finance a permanent endowment, and the other half will be used to provide grants to many groups over the next five years.

Trust Africa's executive director, Akwasi Aidoo, a Ghanaian who formerly headed Ford's offices in Senegal and Nigeria, said it would strive to build links among civil society groups that could tackle regional problems of violent conflict, economic development and social justice.

The new foundation will bolster such groups, often vocal critics of those in power, in a period when Africa has been becoming more democratic. At the same time, some elected leaders — Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia, for example — have become intolerant of dissent.

"Left to themselves, many of these countries fall back into old habits," Mr. Aidoo said in an interview. He added later, "The best antidote is to amplify the voices of those for peaceful change."

Thomas O. Melia, deputy director of Freedom House, a research group that monitors political liberty, said efforts like those of Trust Africa represent the next frontier in deepening democracy in Africa and elsewhere.

"What has been missing, even in places establishing electoral democracy, is independent voices — think tanks, nongovernmental organizations, university centers — able to monitor government performance," he said. "It is the next step."

DOJ_NMG_0032203

Mr. Aidoo said credible local groups capable of attracting international attention are needed to check repression, corruption and other ills.

Groups in one country also should be connected to like-minded outfits in other countries.

If dissenters are intimidated in one place, those in neighboring nations can speak up.

In addition to providing grants, Trust Africa plans to hold a series of workshops in Africa in the coming year to bring together scholars, business people, artists, government officials and rights advocates.

Over the past five years, as this new, Africa-focused foundation was developed, it financed a variety of groups to test its approach. It provided small grants to dozens of groups to strengthen them institutionally. It also gave $200,000 to Urgent Action Fund, Africa, which supported women agitating for peace talks in Liberia, as well as an investigation into accusations that women were being detained at a prison in Cameroon without justification.

Trust Africa hopes to build a base of support that goes well beyond the Ford Foundation. It plans to raise donations from the African diaspora. Millions of African migrants live and work in Europe, the United States and Canada, sending home billions of dollars annually in remittances, Ford says.

The United States has sizable communities of African-born immigrants in New York, Washington, Boston, Houston, Chicago and Los Angeles.

"Typically, they're helping their families and hometowns, but they're interested in what's happening in the rest of the continent," Mr. Aidoo said. "They want an effective vehicle that's African." Asked how the new foundation would avoid being seen as an arm of the Ford Foundation, with its deep American roots, Mr. Aidoo and Ford's president, Susan V. Berresford, said in the interview that Trust Africa would be an independent foundation governed solely by Africans.

Mr. Aidoo said the new foundation would establish "the connections among actors who can carry the work forward on their own feet."

In Praise Of The Maligned Sweatshop (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WINDHOEK, Namibia

Africa desperately needs Western help in the form of schools, clinics and sweatshops.

Oops, don't spill your coffee. We in the West mostly despise sweatshops as exploiters of the poor, while the poor themselves tend to see sweatshops as opportunities.

On a street here in the capital of Namibia, in the southwestern corner of Africa, I spoke to a group of young men who were trying to get hired as day laborers on construction sites.

"I come here every day," said Naftal Shaanika, a 20-year-old. "I actually find work only about once a week."

Mr. Shaanika and the other young men noted that the construction jobs were dangerous and arduous, and that they would vastly prefer steady jobs in, yes, sweatshops. Sure, sweatshop work is tedious, grueling and sometimes dangerous. But over all, sewing clothes is considerably less dangerous or arduous — or sweaty — than most alternatives in poor countries.

Well-meaning American university students regularly campaign against sweatshops. But instead, anyone who cares about fighting poverty should campaign in favor of sweatshops, demanding that companies set up factories in Africa. If Africa could establish a clothing export industry, that would fight poverty far more effectively than any foreign aid program.

Namibia was supposed to be a pioneer in Africa's garment industry, for it is stable, pleasant and safe, and its government has tried hard to entice foreign investors. On the edge of Windhoek are a series of low factories set up to produce garments for the American marketplace.

The biggest is the Ramatex Textile Factory, a Malaysian investment that employs 6,000 people. But the owners say they are losing money and will pull out, and other factories have stopped operating as well.

In Windhoek's Chinatown, I met Sun Zhimei, a Chinese woman who operates a small factory employing Namibians. "I'd like to help this country, by boosting its garment industry," she said. But on the day I visited, her factory was deserted. "It's cheaper to import goods all the way from China than to make them here," she complained.

The problem is that it's still costly to manufacture in Africa. The headaches across much of the continent include red tape, corruption, political instability, unreliable electricity and ports, and an inexperienced labor force that leads to low productivity and quality. The anti-sweatshop movement isn't a prime obstacle, but it's one more reason not to manufacture in Africa.

Imagine that a Nike vice president proposed manufacturing cheap T-shirts in Ethiopia: "Look, boss, it would be tough to operate there, but a factory would be a godsend to one of the poorest countries in the world. And if we kept a tight eye on costs and paid 25 cents an hour, we might be able to make a go of it."

The boss would reply: "You're crazy! We'd be boycotted on every campus in the country."

DOJ_NMG_0032204

So companies like Nike, itself once a target of sweatshop critics, tend not to have highly labor-intensive factories in the very poorest countries, but rather more capital-intensive factories (in which machines do more of the work) in better-off nations like Malaysia or Indonesia. And the real losers are the world's poorest people.

Some of those who campaign against sweatshops respond to my arguments by noting that they aren't against factories in Africa, but only demand a "living wage" in them. After all, if labor costs amount to only $1 per shirt, then doubling wages would barely make a difference in the final cost.

One problem — as the closure of the Namibian factories suggests — is that it already isn't profitable to pay respectable salaries, and so any pressure to raise them becomes one more reason to avoid Africa altogether. Moreover, when Western companies do pay above-market wages, in places like Cambodia, local managers extort huge bribes in exchange for jobs. So the workers themselves don't get the benefit.

One of the best U.S. initiatives in Africa has been the African Growth and Opportunity Act, which allows duty-free imports from Africa — and thus has stimulated manufacturing there. But last year, partly because of competition from China, textile and clothing imports under the initiative fell by 12 percent.

The Congo Republic's president, Denis Sassou-Nguesso, told me that he would love to have more factories. It's incredibly frustrating, he noted, to see African countries export cotton, timber and other raw materials but rarely have the chance to process them. The American initiative "is a step in the right direction," he said. "But it needs more of a push."

One push needs to come from African countries themselves: a crackdown on corruption and red tape. But another useful step would be for American students to stop trying to ban sweatshops, and instead campaign to bring them to the most desperately poor countries.

Chinese Official Sees Private Role On Environment (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

BEIJING, June 5 (AP) — China's pollution problems cost the country more than $200 billion a year, a top official said Monday, as he called for better legal protection for grass-roots groups so they could help clean up the environment.

Zhu Guangyao, deputy chief of the State Environmental Protection Agency, said that the importance of private environmental groups in China had lagged behind their role in other countries, and that his agency wanted to play a more important role in developing "legislation to secure their interests and existence in China."

Despite the efforts of half a million environmental officials in his agency and other organizations, China's environmental picture is worsening and "allows for no optimism," Mr. Zhu said, as he released a report that described China's environmental situation as "grave."

"Water, land and soil pollution is serious," the report said. "The Chinese government will mobilize all forces available to solve the pollution problems that are causing serious harm to people's health."

Damage to China's environment is costing the government roughly 10 percent of the country's gross domestic product, the total value of the goods and services produced in the country. The gross domestic product for 2005 was $2.26 trillion. Mr. Zhu said some local officials were reluctant to help — and sometimes even worked against — the central government's environmental protection efforts.

After more than 25 years of breakneck growth, China is in the midst of an environmental crisis that has continued to worsen, as the local authorities have failed to enforce regulations meant to counter severe air and water pollution.

Environmental groups cautioned that the environmental agency did not have the power to create or pass such a law without the support of top leaders, which was far from certain.

"China has not had the political environment" for the private groups to work independently, said Zhu Chunqian, the head of conservation operations at World Wildlife Fund China.

Greenpeace's government and public affairs officer, Yu Jie, said outspoken environmental advocates had risked retaliation, adding that if a group "has legal status, then it can use legal weapons to protect itself."

Biotech Food Tears Rifts In Europe (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

ATHENS — In this famously fractious country, there is one thing on which almost all Greeks agree: They do not want genetically modified crops grown, sold or eaten here.

"All political parties are opposed," said Theodore Koliopanos, a legislator and former deputy environment minister, "which is odd because we disagree on everything else."

DOJ_NMG_0032205

Greece and a few other countries in the European Union that have banned genetically modified organisms are on the front lines of a war over the future of modified food in Europe, the only large swath of the world that does not already grow or buy the crops. Facing international pressure and a lawsuit brought by the United States, Canada and Argentina at the World Trade Organization, the union said this year that all member states must open their doors to genetically engineered crops and prepare practical and legal regulations to ensure safety for health and the environment.

But five countries have imposed eight different types of bans. Many others use their votes in Europe's Council of Ministers to block the crops from entering.

The battle does more than pit the World Trade Organization against the European Union. It also creates a divide across the Atlantic, between European allies on the one hand, and the United States and Canada, which produce the vast majority of such seeds and crops, on the other. The United States is not shy about enlisting its diplomats to push European countries to admit the modified crops, European politicians say.

But European consumers and farmers generally do not want them, leaving the European Union to try to steer a Solomonic course between conflicting interests. The basic problem is that Europeans, whose food culture has developed over centuries, balk at putting biotech crops in their fields or their mouths.

"We think we have a good policy but we have discovered extreme reluctance among consumers and many member states to move forward with G.M.O.'s, who again and again block the approvals," said Barbara Helferrich, a spokeswoman for the union's Environment Directorate.

Since the union is a common market, lawmakers in Brussels demand a unified solution. So a seed that is sold in Britain has to be sold in Poland and Greece as well. But critics say that countries should be permitted to decide if they will accept a risk, however small, noting, for example, that unpasteurized milk is legal in France but not in Britain.

But while there is little, if any, scientific evidence that genetically modified foods are harmful, in much of Europe they are so unpopular that mainstream supermarket giants like Migros will not stock them. In surveys, consumers say they are unconvinced that genetically modified crops are safe, particularly for the environment.

"The environment minister who gives in and allows G.M.O.'s into this country will never be minister again," said Nikos Lappas, head of Greece's largest farmers' union. "For farmers, forcing G.M.O.'s would be economic suicide, since our market doesn't want them."

But producers of genetically modified products (and the countries they represent) are aggressively pursuing their case at the W.T.O. and with individual governments, spurred by an untapped European market.

"The first visit any new minister in Greece gets is from the U.S. ambassador saying, 'You need to have G.M.O.'s,' " said Mr. Koliopanos. "The pressure is incredible."

Biotech companies like Monsanto and Syngenta insist that the crops should be immediately admitted to Europe, because genetically engineered foods have been consumed in much of the world for a decade without obvious ill effects. Their safety, said Christopher Horner, a Monsanto spokesman, has been "ratified by numerous credible regulatory and scientific authorities."

Simon Barber, of EuropaBio, an industry group in Brussels, said: "The E.U. has put systems in place to deal with G.M.O.'s, and now the market has to be allowed to operate. If member states are breaking E.U. law, we expect the commission to take action."

The office of the United States trade representative maintains that "the E.U. is imposing undue delays on biotech approvals, resulting in delays and preventing the marketing of many crops grown in the U.S." The United States grows 220 million acres of genetically modified crops — by far the world's leader — and almost none of it is sold to the European Union. From 1998 to 2004, the European Union imposed a de facto moratorium on farming of genetically modified crops while its officials studied the issue and mulled ways to keep biotech crops and other crops distinct.

Genetically engineered seeds and plants contain genes that were inserted in a laboratory that give them special advantages, like resisting common pests. But pollen from those crops can spread in the air from field to field, intermixing with pollen from conventional crops.

Once genetically modified crops enter a country's food production, it can be difficult and costly to keep the food chain free of them because there is mixing of plants from farms in milling and in production.

Greece and other European Union members say such issues make any cultivation of biotech plants impossible because they would quickly infiltrate both agriculture and the food supply. In much of Europe, where small farms are the norm, it is hard to create "buffer zones" between fields on adjacent farms.

"I would guess we may be able to keep them apart in U.K., but it would be difficult in Greece because of the issue of size," said Julian Kinderlerer of the Institute of Biotechnical Law and Ethics at the University of Sheffield in England.

Europe's agricultural insurers will not cover farmers for liability should their genetically modified crops contaminate adjacent fields.

DOJ_NMG_0032206

"I started with an open mind on this but now I think the answers are clear," said Mr. Lappas, of the Greek farmers' union. "If our market doesn't buy it, and insurers won't insure us, how can we grow it?" Indeed, in many areas that have blocked genetically engineered crops, small farmers survive by producing niche food, like unique, high-quality vegetables and grain; there is a premium for food that is not genetically modified.

"This is a cutthroat global market, and if all we do is cultivate mass-produced G.M. corn, we're finished, since other nations will be able to provide that cheaper," Mr. Lappas said.

In Poland, 1.5 million farms are still mostly farmed without pesticides, giving that nation the opportunity to become an important producer of natural foods, according to the International Coalition to Protect the Polish Countryside, which has lobbied for a national ban.

To the biotech industry and major producers, the issue is simple: genetically modified corn is just corn, genetically modified wheat is just wheat and there is no scientific reason to differentiate.

Industry groups argue that products should not even be labeled modified or free of modification because the labels are unfair trade barriers.

"Labeling has turned out to be a stigma because the public is so frightened, and retailers have become easy targets," said Mr. Barber, of EuropaBio. "Look at the Greenpeace Web site with its list of brands that use G.M.'s. We're O.K. with consumers making a choice, but we're leery because they're scared, and we're labeling identical products."

Genetically modified seeds are approved case by case, and once the European Commission has approved a seed for planting, the only legal reason that a country can enforce a ban is if "new scientific evidence" shows it would be harmful.

But recently, each time the commission has approved a new product, the Council of Ministers (representing the member states) has voted against it, creating an impasse.

In addition, some countries still say modified seeds are unsafe, invoking the so-called scientific exception.

"They haven't provided any new evidence," said Michael J. Phillips, a vice president of the Biotechnology Industry Organization in Washington.

The European Food Safety Authority of the European Union provides scientific judgments on matters like new evidence. The European Commission and the Council of Ministers have also referred their impasses to the safety agency.

But this agency's core mandate concerns food safety, and even the union's environment commissioner, Stavros Dimas, said recently that it had not looked adequately at the long-term effects of biotech crops on issues like biodiversity.

At a recent meeting with disgruntled member states in Brussels, Harry A. Kuiper, chairman of the agency's panel on genetically modified crops, defended its work, noting that its experts had just six months to review each submission.

The European Union still hopes to win over reluctant members, and so far has taken none to court. But environmental groups vow to resist any pressure from Brussels.

"The E.U. policy of just pushing forward with the technology is utter blindness," said Helen Holder, a spokeswoman for Friends of the Earth in Europe. "Genetic contamination is unavoidable and irreversible and will only increase over time."

Ahead Of World Cup, U.S. Warns Germany About Sex Trafficking (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — On the eve of the World Cup in Germany, the State Department's big concern is not over whether the American soccer team has a prayer of getting past the Czech Republic and Italy, but rather over the flood of prostitutes expected into Germany from Eastern Europe, Asia and Africa.

The United States, in its annual report on forced labor and trafficking in persons, called Germany, which has legalized prostitution, "a source, transit and destination country" for sex workers, the more so during the soccer tournament.

"Due to the sheer size of the event, the potential for human trafficking surrounding the games remains a concern," the State Department said in its report. It called on the German government to increase police enforcement during the games.

The warning to Germany was a rare slap at a close American ally.

The report did not include Germany in a list of 14 more serious offenders that the State Department says make little effort to control serious problems with trafficking in persons.

Some groups criticized the report, noting that most of the countries cited as the worst offenders — which can lead to economic sanctions — are not American allies. They include Iran, North Korea, Myanmar, Sudan, Venezuela, Syria, Cuba and Zimbabwe. The only countries on the list that are close American allies are Saudi Arabia and Belize.

India, Mexico and China were on a separate "watch list" for the second year, prompting complaints that the State Department was trying not to alienate them.

DOJ_NMG_0032207

"What we want is for the United States to implement this law without any political considerations at play," said Jessica Neuwirth, president of Equality Now, an international women's rights organization.

In 2000, Congress passed the Trafficking Victim Protection Act, which set out new penalties for slave traffickers and required the State Department to publish an annual report on slave trafficking worldwide. The sanctions are subject to the president's discretion.

Germany legalized prostitution in 2002, and German brothels have been gearing up for the confluence of legal sex and the World Cup, which is expected to bring 3.5 million tourists to the country for the monthlong tournament, which begins Friday. Berlin, Cologne and Hamburg have all expanded their red light districts for the tournament, and sex-trade entrepreneurs have opened mobile brothels.

The American World Cup team is staying in walking distance from Hamburg's red light district, known in Germany as the Sinful Mile.

German officials, while defending the country's policy of legalized prostitution, say they nonetheless do not condone human trafficking, and have intensified efforts to rein in the flow of prostitutes into their country in advance of the World Cup. But Rep. Christopher Smith of New Jersey, the chairman of the House subcommittee on global human rights, said that Chancellor Angela Merkel needed to do more.

"It's within her power to initiate some moves to protect these women," he said.

The fight against human trafficking is "a great moral calling of our time," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday.

The report says that between 600,000 and 800,000 people, most of them women and children, are trafficked across international borders every year. It cited Saudi Arabia, which it said "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so." In Uzbekistan, the report said, "the majority of convicted traffickers received prison sentences of less than 10 years, were granted amnesty, and thus served no time in prison."

Countries that fail to crack down can be subject to a variety of economic and security sanctions. Since 2003, when the sanctions provision took effect, only two countries — Venezuela and Equatorial Guinea — have been cited.

Tourism Suffers In Indonesian City Caught Between Quake And Volcano (NYT)

By Peter Gelling

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

YOGYAKARTA, Indonesia, June 5 — In the southern part of this city a short street once alive with guest houses, restaurants, travel agencies and souvenir shops now sits quiet, with barely a soul to be found, just weeks before the onset of the tourist season.

The early morning earthquake on May 27 reduced the quaint street, Prawirotaman, to ruins. Throngs of half-awake, panicked tourists who were here that day and managed to survive relatively unharmed crawled out of rubble, wondering what to do and where to go.

The 15 guests at Hotel Prambanan, a two-story inn with about 30 rooms in the popular low-budget backpacking district, were all spared serious injury, as were the other visitors staying nearby.

"Blessed be to God that no one was hurt," said Jahyanto, 39, the manager of Hotel Prambanan, who like many Indonesians uses only one name. "They were confused and scared. I just tried to help them find the fastest way out of Yogyakarta."

Yogyakarta Province is the second most popular tourist destination in Indonesia, Bali being the first. Ancient temples, palaces and a vibrant artists' community draw hundreds of thousands of foreign tourists a year to this area. Tourism accounts for about 20 percent of the province's income and is second only to agriculture as a source of revenue.

Handicraft villages in Bantul, the hardest-hit district, supplied 40 percent of the souvenirs sold throughout Indonesia. Three thousand family kilns for pottery were destroyed in the quake, and most of the villages were nearly leveled.

On Monday, an official from Indonesia's Social Affairs Ministry announced that the death toll from the quake had been revised to 5,782 from 6,234, saying that some victims had been found alive and that others had been counted twice, The Associated Press reported.

Even before the quake, tourism here was threatened by fears of an eruption at Mount Merapi, just north of Yogyakarta. A marketing campaign to show tourists that Yogyakarta, 20 miles south of the volcano, is out of Merapi's reach began several weeks ago and included organized visits to the mountain's slopes.

Two days after the program began, and the first tourists arrived at Mount Merapi, the quake struck.

Yet tourism officials are optimistic that they can recover. Most of Yogyakarta's major tourist sites were undamaged and remain open, including the city's biggest draw, the Borobudur Buddhist temple, which is more than 1,000 years old and is a Unesco World Heritage site.

DOJ_NMG_0032208

"Re-establishing the tourism industry here won't be easy," said Wiendu Nuryanti, secretary general of Yogyakarta's International Center for Culture and Tourism. "But we are working together with a lot of different agencies to help the tourism industry."

Along with local and national government officials, Ms. Nuryanti has created a task force to help rehabilitate tourism in Yogyakarta.

The office of the task force, the Java Crisis Tourism Media Center, is busy with volunteers collecting data on damaged tourist areas. Regular meetings are held to discuss strategies for recovery.

Indonesia's minister of culture and tourism, Jero Wacik, has already indicated that the government will provide subsidized loans to ruined businesses, and tax incentives for struggling hotels and tourist agencies.

Condroyono, the provincial director of tourism, said strategies were being developed to use the earthquake and volcano as a way of diversifying tourism. Though Javanese culture will always be the primary reason tourists come here, he said, there are plans for tours to areas of geological significance, like massive fissures in the Gudung Kidul district, caused by the quake, or the ash-stained slopes of Mount Merapi.

"There is the potential for a kind of adventure tourism here now," he said. Indeed, in the last few weeks a large number of domestic and foreign tourists have brushed aside danger, driving to evacuated areas to take pictures in front of Merapi.

Ms. Nuryanti said her task force planned a major campaign for Mount Merapi, trying to capitalize on the recent international news coverage. The volcano is an important symbol in Javanese culture. Its spirits are believed to protect the ancient kingdom of Yogyakarta, and the designs of many of the temples are modeled after the volcano's shape.

Mr. Condroyono admitted that it would be a long time before most potential tourists saw Yogyakarta as something other than a disaster area. "This will take a long time, more than two years probably, before tourism can start growing here again," he said.

Standing alone among the remains of his former business, Mr. Jahyanto, the hotel manager, said all he needed was a little money to start again. "Maybe it's a dream," he said. "But it is the dream of everyone on this street to rebuild and reopen our businesses."

How To Beat The Muslim Brotherhood (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

MANSOURA, Egypt -- No sooner does Mostafa El Gendy emerge from the governor's office in this provincial city in the Nile Delta than he is besieged by a small crowd of petitioners. A woman with a four-hour daily commute seeks a government job closer to home. Mr. El Gendy hands her an approval form, signed by the governor. A local official wants to drain and fill a fouled canal. Mr. El Gendy has the governor's signature for that, too. There's paperwork authorizing a mile of country road here, a few hundred yards there.

"It sounds like nothing," he says. "But farmers burn rice husks because that's the only way to get rid of it, and it creates pollution. A few hundred meters of road can make a huge difference."

Mr. El Gendy, a dapper man of 45 who made a fortune operating luxury cruise ships on the Nile, represents the nearby Temay district as an independent member of parliament. Last November, he won a landslide victory against candidates of both the Muslim Brotherhood (which elsewhere scored massive parliamentary gains) and President Hosni Mubarak's ruling National Democratic Party. Mr. Mubarak used those results as an excuse to cancel planned local elections, even as he imprisoned liberal opponents such as Ayman Nour. Now Mr. El Gendy is one of the few remaining third-party figures active in Egyptian politics. How he fares will be one indicator of whether a democratic Egypt, should it ever come about, will have a liberal or fundamentalist character.

So far the portents are good for Mr. El Gendy, but he faces an uphill battle. Driving from Mansoura to his ancestral village of Hagaiza along rutted roads and garbage-strewn irrigation canals, Mr. El Gendy makes repeated stops to meet constituents, who seem genuinely pleased to see him. "These people want services," he says. "The nation will follow the party that gives them services."

For years, the only group outside government that has reliably provided broad-based social services has been the Muslim Brotherhood, which, although officially banned, exists as a kind of parallel state within Egyptian society. Medical clinics operated by the Brotherhood, as well as schools and orphanages, can frequently be found alongside mosques throughout the country. Were a free and fair election held tomorrow, the Brotherhood would probably win about 40% of the vote according to Gamal al-Banna, the leading scholarly authority on the group.

This is all the more true because the Brotherhood isn't quite the jihadist, Khomeini-type movement frequently portrayed in the West. "They're less radical, and therefore more dangerous, than outsiders suppose," says an Egyptian journalist. Though the Brotherhood supports Hamas -- on the view that Muslims are religiously obliged to resist what they see as the military occupation of Palestine -- they otherwise forswear violence as a means of achieving or maintaining power, and their leaders do what they can to distance themselves ideologically from the Salafism of Osama bin Laden. "The thought of the Brotherhood doesn't have the tendency to condemn society as apostates, to take violent measures," says Muhammad Habib, the Brotherhood's deputy supreme guide.

DOJ_NMG_0032209

None of this is to say the Brotherhood isn't a threat to Egypt's future. But it is a more subtle threat, more conservative than radical, and therefore more appealing to the Egyptian public. Mr. El Gendy speaks of the Brotherhood almost compulsively, as if the ruling party didn't exist and it was his only serious political opposition.

"The Brotherhood think the people voted for them because of them," he says. "I think they're wrong. The people voted for them because they were organized and because they were the 'alternative.' But they will be very strong if there is no third party in the game. If we do not exist they will do the same thing they did in Palestine."

Mr. El Gendy's formula for defeating the Brotherhood involves three ingredients. The first is public services, with a businessman's twist. In addition to doing the bidding of his constituents, he has launched a personal campaign to raise money for civic projects. "I tell people, I am one man, I have one million pounds [about $175,000]. You are a million; each of you give one pound [about 18 cents]." Approaching his village, he points to the shell of a hospital he's building using matching funds. "In Egypt, we have a heritage of people expecting they'll be taken care of" -- by their elders, by the state, by God. "That's wrong," he says. "We need to change the mentality."

The second ingredient is nationalism. In a recent interview, Muhammad Mahdi Akef, the Brotherhood's supreme guide, expressed his feelings about Egypt thus: "Screw Egypt and the Father of Egypt." For Mr. El Gendy, the quote exposed the Brotherhood's Achilles' Heel: Ultimately, it is more interested in the Muslim nation than the Egyptian one. Mr. El Gendy has introduced a bill in parliament to liberalize the display of the Egyptian flag, which had been strictly regulated since the days of Gamal Abdel Nasser and prohibits its use as, say, a bumper sticker. "You have to get people to look in the mirror and say, 'I'm Egyptian, that's fantastic,'" he says.

Finally, there is Islam, or Mr. El Gendy's version of it. "I'm one of those guys who represents 90% of Muslims who are looking for the right way." He proposes opposing the Muslim Brotherhood with what he calls the "Believer Brotherhood," the belief's particulars being less significant to him than the act of belief itself. "Whenever the prophet speaks of the believers in the Holy Koran, he also speaks of love. If you attack a believer, the first thing he'll ask is, 'What did I do wrong?'"

Whether this syncretic, tolerant and expansive form of religiosity has a fighting chance in today's Egypt is an open question, but Mr. El Gendy is convinced it better represents the country's history than the strict and humorless version represented by the Muslim Brotherhood.

Then, too, there's something to be said for starting traditions of one's own. "There is a concept called Sunna Hassana -- good imitation," he explains. "I had my life, my family, my business. I had my boat. When I went to elections, I jumped. Maybe now others like me will jump, too."

Anybody But Chávez (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

Governments that produce hyperinflation and unchecked terrorism have a way of ending political careers. So how then to explain the victory in Sunday's Peruvian presidential elections of Alan Garcia, whose 1985-1990 term included all that and more?

The answer is that Mr. Garcia's opponent was Ollanta Humala, a protégé of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez. By electing Mr. Garcia, Peruvian voters sent a message that they don't want to follow Venezuela over the cliff. The same concerns have been evident in Brazil, Chile and Uruguay for some time, as left-of-center leaders have refused to join Hugo in his attempt to isolate the region. Now Mr. Chávez has lost another potential satellite.

Mr. Garcia is no free-market reformer, though he does claim to have learned from his mistakes. Yet many Peruvians found themselves voting for him because the prospect of Mr. Humala was so much worse. Mr. Humala had promised to copy the Chávez pattern of making threats against foreign investors. He also has some anti-democratic credentials in common with Mr. Chávez, such as having led a failed military coup. The Peruvian electorate may have also noted that since the Chávez-like candidate won the presidency in Bolivia in late 2005, that country has increasingly fallen under Venezuelan sway.

Late last month right-of-center Colombian President Alvaro Uribe won a landslide re-election against a pro-Chávez candidate. Mr. Uribe could point to four years of antiterror accomplishments, but his victory and Mr. Garcia's are hopeful signs that most of Latin America does not want to return to the isolationism and authoritarianism of the 1970s and early '80s.

DOJ_NMG_0032210

Ames, Andrew

From: Ames, Andrew
Sent: Tuesday, June 06, 2006 10:56 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brett Gerry; Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennifer Brosnahan; Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 6/6/06 Civil Division News

Veterans groups sue government over data theft

Mobster Taking Stand In Wrongful Death Case; Family Suing Federal Government For $50 Million

A victim's family seeks $50 million

The Supreme Court Monday vacated a lower-court ruling that limited federal employees' ability to take their claims against agencies to court.

Judge Should Throw Out Sarbanes-Oxley Suit, U.S. Says

News Orgs Defend Wen Ho Lee Settlement

Judges Say Tax-Funded Groups Have 'Right' to Promote Prostitution

Judge will weigh suit over lab for biosafety

EDITORIAL: Liberty's Librarians

AP

June 6, 2006

Veterans groups sue government over data theft

By HOPE YEN

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_A coalition of veterans' groups charged in a lawsuit Tuesday that their privacy rights were violated after thieves stole personal data on 26.5 million military personnel from a Veterans Affairs employee.

The class-action lawsuit against the federal government, filed in U.S. District Court in Washington, is the second suit since the VA disclosed the May 3 burglary two weeks ago.

It demands that the VA fully disclose which military personnel are affected by the data theft and seeks $1,000 in damages to each person _ up to $26.5 billion total. The veterans are also asking for a court order barring VA employees from using sensitive data until independent experts determine proper safeguards.

"VA arrogantly compounded its disregard for veterans' privacy rights by recklessly failing to make even the most rudimentary effort to safeguard this trove of the personally identifiable information from unauthorized disclosure," the complaint states.

A spokesman for the VA did not have an immediate comment Tuesday.

Veterans groups have criticized the VA for a three-week delay in publicizing the May 3 burglary at a VA data analyst's Aspen Hill, Md., home. The VA initially disclosed the burglary May 22, saying it involved the names, birthdates and Social Security numbers _ and in some cases, disability codes _ of veterans discharged since 1975.

Since then, it also has acknowledged after an internal investigation that the data could also include phone numbers and addresses of those veterans, as well as the personal information for up to 50,000 active Navy and National Guard personnel.

In their lawsuit, the veterans groups say VA Secretary Jim Nicholson and other VA officials were at fault for the theft, which occurred even though the agency's inspector general warned every year since 2001 that access controls were weak.

The suit also said the VA acted irresponsibly by failing to publicize the burglary after the data analyst promptly told his supervisors on May 3. During congressional hearings last month, VA Inspector General George Opfer said his office didn't learn of the crime until May 10 _ and only through office gossip.

The veterans cite in part violations of a 1974 federal privacy law, which generally requires agencies to have protections to prevent the unauthorized disclosure of personal information. The VA has said the data analyst violated its established procedures by taking the data home without permission.

Nicholson has said he was angry that employees did not notify him of the burglary until May 16. Since then, the VA has fired the data analyst, and his boss, VA deputy assistant secretary Michael McLendon, has stepped down.

There have been no reports that the stolen data have been used for identity theft in what has become one of the nation's largest security breaches.

The five veterans groups involved in the lawsuit are Citizen Soldier in New York; National Gulf War Resource Center in Kansas City; Radiated Veterans of America in Carson City, Nev.; Veterans for Peace in St. Louis; and Vietnam Veterans of America in Silver Spring, Md.

Separately, a Democratic activist also has sued the VA in federal court in Cincinnati.

END

AP

June 6, 2006

Mobster Taking Stand In Wrongful Death Case; Family Suing Federal Government For $50 Million

BOSTON -- John McIntyre thought he was going to a house party on Nov. 30, 1984.

Instead, he was chained to a chair, interrogated, strangled, then shot in the head.

McIntyre's family is suing the federal government for $50 million, alleging that McIntyre was killed by fugitive crime boss James "Whitey" Bulger after former FBI Agent John Connolly tipped him that McIntyre was cooperating with authorities in an investigation of Bulger.

As the McIntyre family's wrongful death lawsuit went to trial Monday, attorney Steven Gordon gave chilling details of McIntyre's killing.

Gordon said McIntyre was lured to a house by Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, leaders of the notorious Winter Hill Gang.

After he arrived carrying a case of beer, McIntyre was handcuffed and chained to a chair, then interrogated by Bulger, who asked him if he was talking to authorities about Bulger's failed plan to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army on a Gloucester fishing boat.

"It did not take much time for John McIntyre to say he was," Gordon said.

Gordon said Bulger tied a boat rope around McIntyre's neck and tried to strangle him, but when that took too long, he decided to shoot him.

Gordon said Bulger asked McIntyre, "Do you want one to the head?"

"The last words spoken on this earth by John McIntyre was a plaintive, 'Yes, please,' " Gordon said.

Then Bulger shot him in the head, Gordon said.

Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, Bulger's former right hand man, who pleaded guilty to participating in McIntyre's death, is expected to be a key witness for the McIntyre family.

Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence in 10 killings as part of a plea deal that spared him the death penalty, testified in a deposition last year that Connolly told Bulger that McIntyre had begun talking to federal authorities about Bulger's criminal activities.

Flemmi testified only briefly Monday before the trial recessed for the day. He is scheduled to resume his testimony Tuesday.

Connolly was convicted in 2002 on racketeering and other charges for tipping Bulger - who himself was an FBI informant - that he was about to be indicted. Bulger fled on the eve of his 1995 indictment and remains a fugitive on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list.

Gordon said the government acknowledged in the criminal case against Connolly that he is the one who revealed McIntyre's identity. Kevin Weeks, Bulger's former enforcer, testifying for the government at Connolly's trial, described McIntyre's killing in gruesome detail and said Bulger learned of McIntyre's identity from Connolly.

"McIntyre's cooperation was a direct threat to Bulger's group and a direct threat to Bulger's relationship with the FBI," said Gordon, who also said he plans to call Weeks as a witness.

But Bridget Bailey Lipscomb, an attorney for the Justice Department, said that there is no direct evidence that Connolly revealed McIntyre's name to Bulger. She said Flemmi, in his deposition, said only that Connolly told Bulger that one of two people who were arrested on the fishing boat was an informant. She also said that Bulger had other law enforcement sources who could have given him McIntyre's identity.

She said that McIntyre, who was acting as an informant for U.S. Customs agents, had declined the agency's offer to place him in the witness protection program.

Lipscomb said the McIntyre case had been unfairly portrayed in the media as part of a wave of negative publicity surrounding the FBI's use of criminal informants.

Bulger and Flemmi were longtime informants who provided the FBI with information on the mafia, which the Bulger gang considered its main rival for criminal rackets in the Boston area, including gambling, drugs and loan-sharking.

Connolly's case and others prompted an uproar and Congressional hearings into the relationship between the FBI and its criminal informants.

Lipscomb said the media had depicted the Boston FBI office as "a bunch of renegade agents" who allowed its informants to commit murder so that it could achieve its goal of dismantling the Mafia.

"We believe that this is a case about fact and fiction," Lipscomb said. "It's fiction that the federal government did not protect John McIntyre and intentionally had him killed."

Connolly, who has not been charged in McIntyre's killing, is now serving a 10-year sentence and is currently awaiting trial in Florida in connection with the 1982 slaying of Miami gambling executive John Callahan.

McIntyre's mother, Emily, who filed the lawsuit, did not attend the trial Monday. Gordon said Emily McIntyre did not want to see Flemmi, who has admitted pulling out McIntyre's teeth after he was killed.

END

Boston Globe

June 6, 2006

A victim's family seeks $50 million

By Shelley Murphy

In the 11 years since James ``Whitey" Bulger fled Boston to avoid racketeering charges, his legend has grown: He was outed as an FBI informant and was charged with 19 murders, and his FBI handler was sent to prison for protecting him from prosecution and helping him to evade capture.

But yesterday, a Justice Department trial lawyer, Bridget Bailey Lipscomb , accused the media of spreading rumor and folklore about the Bulger case and of unfairly tarnishing the reputation of the FBI, the nation's ``premier law enforcement agency."

She was defending the government against a $50 million wrongful-death lawsuit that was filed by the family of one of Bulger's alleged victims, John McIntyre of Quincy.

``We believe that this is a case about fact and fiction," Lipscomb said in her opening statement before US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay in Boston.

``It's fiction that the federal government did not protect John McIntyre and intentionally had him killed," Lipscomb added.

She added that it was fiction that the FBI had protected Bulger and his longtime sidekick and fellow informant, Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi, from prosecution.

But in his opening remarks, Steven M. Gordon, a New Hampshire lawyer who represents McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, said the FBI had viewed Bulger and Flemmi ``more as colleagues than criminals," and had let them get away with crimes because they were providing information about local mob members.

McIntyre, 32, was killed on Nov. 30, 1984, six weeks after he began cooperating with the FBI and the US Customs Service. He admitted that he had been aboard the trawler Valhalla, based in Gloucester, a vessel that was part of an unsuccessful plot to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army, and implicated Bulger.

Flemmi, who has admitted to having teamed up with Bulger to kill McIntyre and nine other people, testified briefly yesterday. He is expected to return to the stand today to provide details of McIntyre's slaying.

Flemmi was sentenced to life in prison under an agreement that spared him the death penalty. He testified during a deposition last year that Bulger had killed McIntyre after an FBI agent, John J. Connolly Jr., warned him that McIntyre had been cooperating against him.

When asked yesterday about Bulger's reputation, Flemmi, a slender man with graying hair who will turn 72 on Friday, said: ``He was known as a violent person in the Boston area. His mere presence alone would intimidate people."

In opening remarks, Gordon described in gruesome detail how McIntyre had been lured to a South Boston home.

Once there, Bulger, Flemmi, and another associate, Kevin J. Weeks, handcuffed him and tied him to a chair , Gordon said. McIntyre was questioned for hours, strangled, and then shot by Bulger, he said.

McIntyre believed he had chosen a path to redemption by cooperating, said Gordon, adding: ``But his trust in his government and our government was betrayed."

However, Lipscomb said McIntyre was an informant for US Customs agents who invited the FBI to sit in on two meetings with McIntyre. She said McIntyre had turned down an offer from the Customs Service for 24-hour protection.

While denying that Connolly had alerted Bulger to McIntyre's cooperation, Lipscomb said that even if he had issued the alert, the FBI could not be found liable because Connolly had previously pocketed money from Bulger and Flemmi and was not acting within the scope of his employment as an agent.

Connolly was convicted in 2002 on federal racketeering charges for protecting Bulger and Flemmi from prosecution, and for warning Bulger to flee in advance of Bulger's 1995 racketeering indictment.

Connolly is serving a 10-year sentence and is awaiting trial in Florida on state murder charges in a 1982 gangland slaying involving Bulger and Flemmi. Bulger is on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list.

END

Government Executive Magazine

June 5, 2006

By Tom Shoop

The Supreme Court Monday vacated a lower-court ruling that limited federal employees' ability to take their claims against agencies to court.

In its decision, the high court rejected the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling that federal courts lack jurisdiction over claims brought by employees who are covered by federal laws and regulations governing workplace grievances.

The case, Terry L. Whitman v. Department of Transportation, involves a Federal Aviation Administration employee who works at the Alaska Regional Air Traffic Control Center. In 2001, Whitman filed a grievance with the Federal Labor Relations Authority, alleging that he had been unfairly singled out for repeated random drug and alcohol tests.

The FLRA's regional director said the case was outside its jurisdiction. Whitman then filed a suit in federal court charging that the agency had violated his constitutional rights.

The case hinged largely on a minor wording change to the 1978 Civil Service Reform Act that was enacted in 1994. The act had stated that its procedures "shall be the exclusive procedures for resolving grievances within its coverage." Under the amendments, the wording was changed to "exclusive administrative procedures." Whitman and his supporters say the new wording indicates that Congress intended to allow for judicial review of cases like his.

A federal district court, however, ruled that under the CSRA, it lacked jurisdiction to hear Whitman's grievances. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals agreed, saying that since the CSRA "does not expressly confer jurisdiction over employment-related claims," the courts can't assume they have it.

But the Supreme Court ruled that the appeals court's logic was backward. "The question, then, is not whether [the amended section of the CSRA] confers jurisdiction, but whether [it] (or the CSRA as a whole) removes the jurisdiction given to the federal courts..." the justices stated in their decision. They sent the case back to the appeals court to address that issue.

Pamela Karlan, the attorney who represented Whitman in arguments before the Supreme Court in December 2005, said she considered the court's ruling a victory for her client, but acknowledged that it was ambiguous.

"Some parts of what the Supreme Court did are quite clear, others are obscure," Karlan said.

For example, the justices ordered that the lower court consider whether the agency's actions in Whitman's case constitute a "prohibited personnel practice" under federal law. Both Karlan and attorneys for the government agreed that they do not. But "because the ultimate question may be jurisdictional, this concession ought not to be accepted out of hand," the justices ruled.

The National Treasury Employees Union hailed the Supreme Court's broader ruling. "This decision is a major step toward keeping the courthouse door open to all federal employees," said NTEU president Colleen M. Kelley. She said the union will "continue to participate" in the case as the Ninth Circuit takes it up again.

END

Bloomberg

6/5/2006

Judge Should Throw Out Sarbanes-Oxley Suit, U.S. Says

By Robert Schmidt

June 5 (Bloomberg) -- The Bush administration, weighing in on a lawsuit seeking to overturn the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate accounting law, asked a federal judge to dismiss the case on procedural grounds.

The Justice Department filing in U.S. District Court in Washington said the challenge was ``brought at the wrong time, in the wrong court.'' The U.S., while not a party in the case, filed a so-called statement of interest in support of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, the regulatory agency created by the law.

Judge James Robertson later this month will hear arguments in the oversight board's bid to dismiss the case. The Free Enterprise Fund, a policy group that advocates free markets and small government, sued in February. The group has been a leader in the four-year campaign to scale back the law, passed in 2002 after accounting scandals caused the collapse of Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc.

Mallory Factor, a New York banker and chairman of the Free Enterprise Fund, accused the government of trying to win the case on ``disingenuous administrative grounds.'' The group is filing court papers today arguing that the case should proceed.

``What it basically shows is they have very little interest in debating the merits of the lawsuit,'' Factor said.

Opponents contend the law stifles innovation and saddles companies with burdensome regulation. Kenneth Starr, the independent counsel whose investigation led to former President Bill Clinton's impeachment, heads the legal team that is trying to have the auditing regulator declared unconstitutional.

Stiffer Penalties

Along with creating the oversight board to police accounting firms, the law stiffened penalties for corporate fraud and required top executives to certify that their company books are in order.

The Free Enterprise Fund suit claims that the accounting oversight board violates the Constitution because its members are named by the Securities and Exchange Commission and not by the president, who has the responsibility to appoint ``principal'' officers of the government.

The Justice Department filing on June 2 is the first time the U.S. has taken a side in the case. The government doesn't address the constitutional questions, arguing instead that the suit should be dismissed because the Free Enterprise Fund didn't follow procedures that require complaints against the board first be filed administratively before the SEC. The SEC oversees the board and must approve its rules.

Legal Standing

The government argued in its 30-page brief that the Free Enterprise Fund and the Nevada accounting firm that also filed the suit, Beckstead & Watts, don't have legal standing to bring the case.

President George W. Bush, who signed the Sarbanes-Oxley law after it passed Congress with almost no opposition, called it the ``most far-reaching reforms of American business practice since the time of Franklin Delano Roosevelt."

The case is Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, 06-217, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

END

Editor & Publisher

June 5, 2006

News Orgs Defend Wen Ho Lee Settlement

NEW YORK The New York Times' attorney who was among those mediating the unusual settlement with Wen Ho Lee last week that will pay the former government scientist $1.6 million, including $750,000 from media outlets, does not believe the payoff will set a bad precedent for news organizations' future sourcing battles.

George Freeman, assistant general counsel for the Times, was among several lawyers who brokered the settlement, in which Lee agreed to drop his civil suit against the federal government in exchange for the monetary payment. The Times was one of five news outlets, including the Los Angeles Times, The Washington Post, Associated Press and ABC News, which will jointly pay $750,000 of the settlement amount.

"The fact of the matter is that the money the plaintiffs spent in this case dwarfs the $750,000 that the media entities put up as part of the settlement," Freeman told E&P Monday. "I don't see this as any type of incentive for attorneys to get money out of the media."

Editors at some of the other news outlets involved in the settlement also defended the decision, pointing out that the case had been battled in the courts for years with reporters, whose sources were sought, at grave risk. "We had fought this at every step of the way, through the courts for years, so it is not like we could find a way out as soon as it came up," said Mike Silverman, AP managing editor. "We had lost conclusively in the courts and we had asked the Supreme Court to take the case and if it had rejected that appeal, we would have been in a difficult position."

Silverman said one positive outcome is that none of the news outlets had to give up their sources, or see reporters jailed in protection of those sources. "I would hope that any potential sources would take heart that we are determined to protect them in any way," he said.

None of the news outlets involved in the settlement was a defendant in the suit, in which Lee accused the government of leaking information to news outlets related to a federal investigation into Lee's alleged spying activities. The investigation found no evidence of spying, but it resulted in Lee's lawsuit.

While the news outlets were not defendants, they were drawn into the case when Lee's attorneys subpoenaed reporters from each news organization to testify about their sources for stories written about Lee. Each had declined and most had faced contempt of court charges, including James Risen of the Times.

Freeman said the settlement was the best way for the Times to avoid hefty fines and possible jail for its reporters. "It was the best outcome given the realities of the situation. It did succeed in protecting our sources and our journalists," Freeman said. "But it is not something we would do as a first option."

He noted that the type of lawsuit that prompted the subpoenas is not likely to come up again soon, so such a settlement is not expected to be more common. "I don't think it is a precedent because I don't think that situation is going to come up often," Freeman said. "In the future, this doesn't bind anyone. This is just one way of resolving this case. The alternative was either a very hefty fine or jail. It is not like the subpoena was issued and we turned money over the next day."

Leonard Downie Jr., executive editor of the Post, declined to comment on the specifics of the settlement. But he also praised the outcome as a way of protecting sources.

"I am pleased that we were able to protect our confidentiality agreements with our sources and that we will always do that," he said. When asked how the deal might impact future source protection battles, he said "I have no idea."

END

National Catholic Register (Canada)

June 4-10, 2006

Judges Say Tax-Funded Groups Have 'Right' to Promote Prostitution

by STEVE WEATHERBE WASHINGTON — Two federal court judges have ruled that the White House can't stop federal tax dollars from flowing to organizations that advocate the legalization of prostitution.

The decisions have thrown into question two 2003 laws that require non-governmental organizations (NGOs) seeking federal money for AIDS-prevention programs to pledge opposition to prostitution.

On May 9, U.S. Federal District Judge Victor Marrero issued an interim injunction in New York against the regulation requiring NGOs to pledge to oppose prostitution, on the grounds that it infringes their First Amendment free speech rights by mandating how they spend even the funding they receive from private sources.

On May 18, U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan delivered a similar judgment, the Washington Post reported. The regulation against supporting prostitution "casts too wide a net and is not narrowly tailored," Sullivan said, forcing non-government organizations to "parrot the government's policies."

Austin Ruse, president of the Catholic Family & Human Rights Institute, called the decisions in favor of funding pro-prostitution groups "outrageous."

Said Ruse, "This means U.S. funds may go to those who aid in sex trafficking. That's problematic for us because it's precisely prostitution that is instrumental in the spread of HIV/AIDS."

The rulings affect the Global AIDS Act and the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act. While the court decisions do not challenge directly the provision that no federal funds may be used to promote prostitution, they find unconstitutional the requirement that non-governmental organizations receiving anti-AIDS funding adopt a policy that no programming, even privately funded, "promote, support or advocate" the legalization of prostitution.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said May 16 that no decision has been made about appealing the interim ruling issued by Judge Marrero. Unless the administration does so, Marrero was to hold a second hearing before the end of May where he was to decide on a permanent order. At that hearing all parties to the dispute would be able to offer proposed orders.

Left-Wing Lobbies

Pro-prostitution groups hailed Marrero's decision.

"We're delighted that the court recognizes the pledge requirement as unconstitutional," said Ricardo Castro, spokesman for the Open Society Institute, one of the organizations that sought the injunction. "The provision not only violates the First Amendment, but also hampers organizations in the front lines of the AIDS epidemic."

The Open Society Institute is funded by billionaire investor George Soros. Along with promoting the legalization of prostitution, the institute supports abortion, condom distribution, distribution of the abortifacient "morning-after" pill, and the relaxation of drug laws.

Soros is also a major contributor to the Moveon.org lobby group.

Castro said that the suit against the anti-prostitution pledge was launched after the United States Agency for International Development, known as USAID, refused requests for clarification of how it would enforce the legislation.

"We produced a policy saying we were opposed to the harmful effects of prostitution and asked them if that was good enough," Castro said.

The Open Society Institute spokesman said that USAID refused to say, instead advising that the proof of the acceptability of the institute's policy would be in the programming it funded.

Castro declined to respond directly to the question of whether his organization supported prostitution.

"We work for harm reduction through outreach to the most marginalized groups most affected by AIDS, including sex workers," he said. Open Society Institute staffer Sarah Miller-Davenport added, "If we are working with sex workers, it's not effective for us to be condemning the people we are trying to help."

The problem with USAID's regulation, according to Miller-Davenport, is that it has a "chilling effect" on all of a non-governmental organization's programming, partly because the agency has refused to clarify its scope. However, Miller-Davenport knew of no instances of the Open Society Institute's being challenged by USAID on any of its programs.

Wendy Wright of Concerned Women of America suggested that Open Society and the other groups that are challenging the USAID regulation are far more supportive of prostitution than they admit.

"This regulation didn't come from nowhere," Wright said. "Groups like OSI have actively lobbied governments for legalization of prostitution."

Wright cited the case of one USAID-funded non-governmental organization in Southeast Asia that sent a worker into a women's shelter to persuade staff there to let in a pimp to persuade a prostitute who had fled there to return to the sex trade.

"These NGOs ignore the fact that women are coerced into prostitution," Wright said. "It is not a choice."

Wright said the Open Society Institute had used USAID money to produce AIDS prevention pamphlets aimed at third-world sex workers that de-stigmatized prostitution, "then distributed them in schools."

'Harmful Effects'

Wright's complaints are heartily endorsed by a women's studies professor at the University of Rhode Island who has been researching non-governmental organizations' programs for sex workers for years. Donna Hughes confirms that "a number of NGOs, including OSI, have consistently treated prostitution as an economic opportunity for women without any discussion of harmful effects."

The Open Society Institute, Hughes said, "put on several conferences for sex workers that were about empowerment and community building and said not a word in their agendas about helping these women get out of prostitution." One USAID-funded program in Russia spent seven years, she said, "trying to build relations with pimps to get them to distribute condoms."

Groups supporting legalization of prostitution are "very clever propagandists, and they claim they have to approach women in the sex trade in a non-judgmental way in order to get the AIDS-prevention message across," Hughes said. "But in fact they want to de-stigmatize prostitution. They want to empower the prostitutes to negotiate with pimps for higher wages and clients for condom use. They are utopians who believe they can transform prostitution into a job like any other."

The problem with that, Hughes said, is that prostitution destroys women's lives. Quite apart from the risk of disease and assault by pimps and customers, she said, prostitutes are at great risk of depression and suicide.

"They can't have sex with five to 40 men a day any more than you can without it doing permanent psychological damage," Hughes said. "As for negotiating with pimps for better wages, it's like negotiating with the Mafia."

END

CONTRA COSTA TIMES

June 6, 2006

Judge will weigh suit over lab for biosafety

By Betsy Mason

A federal judge will consider Lawrence Livermore Lab's plans to build a new "hotlab" to study anthrax, plague and other deadly pathogens.

The hearing, scheduled for June 13 in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, is the latest development in a battle over the "Biosafety Level 3" facility.

Livermore-based Tri-Valley Communities Against a Radioactive Environment, and other watchdog groups, claim the Department of Energy didn't do an adequate assessment of the potential environmental impacts of locating such a facility in Livermore.

"It is outrageous that the DOE granted itself the go-ahead to operate this facility without conducting thorough analyses of the risks to workers and neighbors," said Marylia Kelley, executive director of Tri-Valley Communities Against a Radioactive Environment.

The group's main concerns are potential for damage to the lab by terrorist attacks and earthquakes. They argue that combining nuclear materials and biowarfare agents in the same facility would make the lab an even more attractive target for terrorists, and two active earthquake faults lie within two miles of the proposed facility.

Tri-Valley CAREs originally sued the Energy Department over proposed hotlabs at Livermore and Los Alamos national Laboratories in August 2003. The following December, a federal judge barred shipments of biological agents including botulism, anthrax, plague, valley fever and Q fever until a final decision on the lawsuit was made. In September 2004, the judge gave Livermore's biosafety lab the go-ahead.

"We felt that that decision was proper," said Livermore lab spokesman Steve Wampler.

"We consider the siting of a new biosafety facility to be critical to our efforts to rapidly develop biodetection technologies for fighting terrorism and for public health uses," Wampler said.

The watchdog groups appealed the decision to the 9th Circuit Court in November 2004, which resulted in the upcoming hearing.

In November 2005, the DOE announced it would do a full environmental report for the proposed hotlab at Los Alamos.

The Livermore facility is expected to be ready to open in two months pending safety and readiness reviews.

END

Hartford Courant

June 6, 2006

EDITORIAL: Liberty's Librarians

Jun. 6--It's good to know that the four Hartford-area librarians who led the nation in the first challenge of an FBI order to turn over patrons' Internet records under the USA Patriot Act finally have faces.

Without the benefit of a court order, the FBI used its sweeping powers under the Patriot Act to demand the records. That's unsettling enough. That the FBI also interpreted the post-9/11 anti-terrorism statute to mean it could "cloak" those orders - preventing the librarians from even discussing the matter with colleagues or their own library boards - is creepy and, ultimately, un-American.

So with the aid of the American Civil Liberties Union, the librarians fought back. They won in U.S. District Court with a ruling from Judge Janet C. Hall, who rightly found that the gag order violated the First Amendment right to free speech. But the federal government\l "l" resisted, taking the case to the U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals. In the meantime, members of Congress (using their First Amendment freedoms) argued the question whether the act, which had sunset provisions, should be extended. In the course of that debate, it adopted amendments that, in the opinion of the appeals court, rendered the librarians' case moot.

Case dismissed.

And so last week, during a press conference in the ACLU's New York City offices, Connecticut's four librarians were free to emerge from the shadowy constraints of the Patriot Act and into the limelight. They are George Christian, executive director of Library Connection; Peter Chase, director of the Plainville Public Library; Janet Nocek, director of the Portland Public Library; and Barbara Bailey, director of Welles-Turner Memorial Library in Glastonbury.

They spoke of their frustration at not being able to discuss the personal aspects of the Patriot Act even as Congress debated it in the abstract. They described the stunning impact of being ordered by the government to violate their own professional duties, the confidences of the people they serve, their principles and their constitutional rights (Library Connection, the inter-library organization that was the target of the FBI's order, is still holding fast to the records). On Tuesday, though, they did accomplish one thing. They gave freedom a face.

END

McKenzie, Peggy (CIV)

From:	McKenzie, Peggy (CIV)
Sent:	Tuesday, June 06, 2006 11:39 AM
To:	Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Bahr, Dorothy (CIV); Baxter, Felix (CIV); Bordeaux, JoAnn (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Fishback, David (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Fowler, Liane (SMO); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Goldberg, Arthur (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gray, Towanda (CIV); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hudson, Lewis (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennings, Geraldine (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keener, Donald (CIV); Kent, Alexander (CIV); Kohl, Christine (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Liner, Linda (CIV); Lloyd, Shirley (CIV); Lucas, Regina E. (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Shannen Coffin; Shaw, Aloma A; Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Williams, Angela (CIV); Williams, Toni (CIV); Willis, Kerry (CIV); Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject:	6/6 CIV Weekly Report to the AG
Attachments:	CivDivWkly0606.wpd

U.S. Department of Justice

Civil Division

Assistant Attorney General Washington, D.C. 20530

June 6, 2006

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Peter D. Keisler
Assistant Attorney General

SUBJECT: Civil Division Weekly Report to the Attorney General

A. NEXT WEEK

- No items to report.

B. THIS WEEK

- Supreme Court Vacates and Remand for Further Consideration Case Involving Employment-Related Complaints under the Federal Aviation Administration's Personnel Management System
  Whitman v. Department of Transportation. On June 5, the Supreme Court vacated and remanded the Ninth Circuit's decision, which held that the Federal Aviation Administration Personnel Management System provides the exclusive remedy for employee grievances. The Supreme Court directed the Ninth Circuit to consider a variety of issues, including "where Whitman's claims fit within the statutory scheme," whether Whitman's claims are precluded, and whether Whitman must exhaust administrative remedies prior to seeking judicial review of any surviving constitutional claims.

- Boston-FBI Informant Case Goes to Trial
  McIntyre v. United States, et al. [District of Massachusetts] (Judge Reginald Lindsey). On June 5, the first trial in a series of cases arising out of the Boston-Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI's) handling of notorious criminal informants started in Boston, with the trial expected to last two weeks. The court bifurcated the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) and Bivens claims, with the FTCA claims being tried first. This case is based on the death of John McIntyre who was a drug dealer and a gunrunner for the IRA. He became an informant for the Customs Service several weeks before his death. The plaintiffs alleged that he was killed by Bulger, an FBI informant who is now on the FBI's Most Wanted List, and Flemmi, his cohort. They contend that the United States is liable because: (1) the FBI failed to arrest and prosecute Bulger and Flemmi and thus "emboldened" them to commit numerous crimes, including murder; and, alternatively, (2) an FBI agent leaked McIntrye's cooperation to Bulger, knowing McIntyre would be killed.

- Eleventh Circuit to Hear Oral Argument in Federal Tort Claims Act Appeal Concerning the Elian Gonzalez Incident
  Dalrymple v. United States. On Wednesday, June 7, the Eleventh Circuit will hear argument in this Federal Tort Claims Act case concerning the Immigration Naturalization Service raid in April 2000 that recovered Elian Gonzalez, the six-year-old Cuban boy, from his uncle's Miami home. The plaintiffs – more than one hundred bystanders and demonstrators who were near the house at the time of the raid -- seek damages for the Immigration Naturalization Service's allegedly tortious use of tear gas to control the crowd during the operation. The district court ruled in favor of the government after a bench trial, concluding that the federal officers' conduct was objectively reasonable.

- Government Opposes Motion by Guantanamo Bay Detainee to Obtain Advance Notice of Release
  Zakirjan v. Bush [District of Columbia]. On June 8, the government will file its opposition to a motion by counsel for a Guantanamo Bay detainee classified as "no longer an enemy combatant" to obtain an order requiring the government to provide counsel thirty days' advance notice of any release of the detainee from Guantanamo. The court previously ordered the government to provide advance notice of any transfer of the detainee from Guantanamo Bay unless the transfer was being made for the purpose of release. Counsel have now moved to amend the order, claiming advance notice is necessary for counsel to assist in the detainee's resettlement, especially in light of the government's willingness to send other detainees classified as no longer enemy combatants to countries such as Albania.

C. LAST WEEK

- Court Bars Discrimination Claim Against Department of Agriculture on Sovereign Immunity Grounds
  Abercrombie v. United States Department of Agriculture [Eastern District of Kentucky]. On May 18, Judge William O. Bertelsman granted defendant's motion to dismiss. This action appealed an administrative decision denying plaintiff's claim for damages as a result of the Department of Agriculture's alleged discrimination against her in the administration of farm loan programs on the basis of her gender. The court held that an oral discrimination complaint offered in conjunction with an otherwise defective written complaint cannot constitute an "eligible [written] complaint" under the statute.

- District Court Dismisses FTCA Action Where Claim Was for Economic Loss with No Injury to Plaintiff's Person Or Property
  Laine v. United States [Northern District of California] (Judge Richard Seeborg). On May 19, the United States District Court for the Northern District of California dismissed plaintiff's Federal Torts Claim Act (FTCA) suit, where plaintiff (a commercial shrimp fisherman) alleged that the United States negligently discharged oxygen-depleted waters from an environmental restoration project along south San Francisco Bay, reducing the number of shrimp in the Bay and thus causing him to lose business profits. The court agreed with our contention that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction under the FTCA because plaintiff suffered no damage or loss to his "property." Under California law, plaintiff had no inherent property interest in shrimp while they remained in the wild, and the common law has never treated purely economic interests of the type asserted by plaintiff as cognizable under the FTCA.

- Sixth Circuit Concludes that Alleged Incompetence Is not a Bar to Denaturalization Proceedings
  United States v. Mandycz [6th Cir.]. On May 22, the Sixth Circuit affirmed a district court decision revoking the alien's naturalized citizenship on the basis that his service as a forced labor camp guard during World War II rendered him ineligible for a visa under the Displaced Persons Act of 1948. The Court held that the alien's Alzheimer's disease and alleged mental incompetence was not a bar to the denaturalization proceeding, but, as a general rule, in such cases, the trial court should appoint a guardian pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 17(c). The Court left open the possibility that future cases might require exceptions to this rule. The Court rejected the alien's argument that a defendant in a denaturalization proceeding could assert laches as a defense against the United States.

- Government Moves to Dismiss Challenge to Deficit Reduction Act
  On May 22, the government filed a motion to dismiss in Zeigler v. Gonzales (Southern District of Alabama), a challenge to the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005 (the DRA). Jim Zeigler, an attorney who represents senior citizens in obtaining eligibility for Medicaid nursing home coverage, seeks a declaratory judgment that the DRA is unconstitutional under Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution, alleging that the legislation passed by the Senate and signed by the President differs in one respect from the bill that the House passed. In our motion to dismiss, we argued that Zeigler lacks standing to pursue this case in his capacity as a lawyer representing clients who are affected by the DRA, in his capacity as an alleged frequent filer of lawsuits in federal district court, and in his capacity as a taxpayer. We also argued that the complaint is barred by the enrolled bill rule, which precludes a court from looking behind an enrolled, certified bill to evaluate the inner workings of Congress.

- Appeal from Order Permitting Recipient of National Security Letter to Publicly Identify Itself Dismissed as Moot
  Doe v. Gonzales. On May 23, the Second Circuit dismissed as moot the government's appeal from a grant of preliminary injunction that would have allowed the John Doe plaintiff to publicly identify itself as the recipient of a national security letter (NSL), an act otherwise prohibited by 18 U.S.C. § 2709(c). While the appeal was pending, Congress passed two statutes that substantially amended the NSL statute. Using new discretion granted by the legislation, the government determined that it would not oppose disclosure of Doe's identity. The parties now are awaiting the return of the case to the district court for the revelation of Doe's identity and continued proceedings on plaintiffs' remaining claims challenging the FBI's authority to issue NSLs.

- Second Challenge to Bankruptcy Reform Law Dismissed on Jurisdictional Grounds
  In re David Cantor [Western District of Kentucky Bankruptcy Court]. On May 23, Judge David T. Stosberg dismissed plaintiff's petition, which challenged several provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA). Plaintiffs argued that BAPCPA would violate the First and Tenth Amendments and the separation-of-powers doctrine if the challenged provisions were interpreted to apply to lawyers. The court, explicitly adopting the reasoning of In re McCartney (Middle District of Georgia Bankruptcy Court), decided that there was no case or controversy; Judge Robert F. Hershner, Jr. had decided in In re McCartney that an attorney did not have standing to raise a pre-enforcement challenge to the BAPCPA because he had not suffered an injury in fact.

- Second Circuit Remands Chinese Unmarried Father's Asylum Case for Further Adjudication
  Pan v. Att'y General [2d Cir.]. On May 23, the Second Circuit remanded the alien's claim for further proceedings before the Board to determine in the first instance whether the alien's status as a boyfriend and father of an out-of-wedlock child would allow him to qualify as a refugee because the mother had been subjected to Chinese coercive population control techniques. The Court upheld the agency's adverse credibility finding regarding the alien's claims of marital status, but remanded for a definitive general credibility finding regarding the alien's testimony on other aspects of his claim, chastising the Board for failing to address the dispositive issue. The Court retained jurisdiction to rule upon the petition and decide the issues on appeal following disposition of the remand.

- Fifth Circuit Denies Molina-Camacho Challenge to Board's Order of Removal
  Delgado-Reynua v. Gonzales [5th Cir.]. On May 23, the Fifth Circuit vacated the district court's grant of habeas relief and converted the habeas petition into a petition for review under the REAL ID Act. The Court held that it lacked jurisdiction to review the Board of Immigration Appeal's discretionary reversal of the Immigration Judge's grant of a waiver of inadmissibility. The Court determined that it had jurisdiction over the alien's challenge to the Board's authority to order his removal, but rejected the Ninth Circuit's ruling in Molina-Camacho v. Ashcroft, 393 F.3d 937 (9th Cir. 2004) that the Board lacks authority to order removal.

- Katrina Related Class Action Dismissed for Failure to File Administrative Claims
  In the Matter of Complaint of Ingram Barge Company [Eastern District of Louisiana] (Judge Helen G. Berrigan). On May 24, Judge Berrigan granted the United States' motion to dismiss one set of Hurricane Katrina flooding related class action claims, alleging negligent design and construction of the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, negligent failure to maintain levees and waterways, and negligent failure to "look after" a privately-owned barge that allegedly breached a levee wall. The court adopted the United States' reasoning that, whether the jurisdictional basis of the claims was the Federal Tort Claims Act or the Admiralty Extension Act (for damage ashore caused by a vessel in navigable waters), an administrative claim was required. As no claims had been filed, dismissal was mandated. Perhaps more significantly, the court noted explicitly that admiralty jurisdiction was lacking for claims related to flooding from levee breaches that were not directly caused by impact of a vessel (a barge) on the levee, as levees are land-based structures without a substantial connection to maritime commerce.

- Federal Circuit Holds that Court of International Trade Lacks Jurisdiction to Entertain Certain Claims Related to Displaced Worker Benefits
  Former Employees of Quality Fabricating, Inc. v. United States Secretary of Labor (Fed. Cir.) [Newman, Rader, Prost]. On May 24, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit reversed an interlocutory order of the Court of International Trade, concluding that that court lacks jurisdiction to entertain claims concerning certain Trade Adjustment Assistance benefits. The Court of International Trade had asserted jurisdiction to review a claim stemming from the provision of benefits to workers indirectly affected by imports, based upon language in the legislative history of the statute providing that court with jurisdiction to entertain claims by directly-affected workers. The appellate court rejected the trial court's reasoning that it possessed jurisdiction due to its expertise in international trade and the intertwined nature of the benefits provided to both directly- and indirectly-affected workers. The court vacated and remanded the matter with instructions to dismiss because no statute waives sovereign immunity for the Court of International Trade to entertain the claims at issue.

- Reconsideration Sought of Magistrate Judge Orders Requiring Counsel Access to Guantanamo Bay Detainee Without Showing of Counsel's Authority to Represent Detainee
  Said v. Bush [District of Columbia] (Judge Richard Roberts); Kabir (Sadar Doe) v. Bush [District of Columbia] (Judge James Robertson). On May 25, the government filed motions for reconsideration of two recent orders of Magistrate Judge Alan Kay interpreting the governing protective order and counsel access procedures in the Guantanamo Bay habeas corpus cases to require the government to permit any counsel who purports to represent a Guantanamo Bay detainee to meet with the detainee to determine if the detainee wants the lawyer to represent him and pursue a habeas corpus action on his behalf. The Magistrate Judge's orders rely upon a similar recent decision by Judge Richard Roberts in another Guantanamo habeas case, Adem v. Bush [District of Columbia], and rejects the government's longstanding interpretation of the protective order in the Guantanamo Bay detainee cases that an attorney must provide evidence that the lawsuit has been directly authorized by a detainee or an appropriate "next friend" petitioner prior to being permitted direct, privileged access to the detainee.

- Court Rejects Complaints about Agency Payment Process in Disproportionate Share Cases
  Portland Adventist v. Leavitt [D. Oregon]. On May 25, the district court denied plaintiffs' motions to enforce judgment in three related cases challenging a Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) regulation as unlawful to the extent it precluded Medicare disproportionate share (DSH) payments based on days attributable to expansion waiver populations before the regulation was amended in January 2000. We had previously lost Portland I in the Ninth Circuit and had stipulated that the judgment in that case would apply in the two subsequent cases. On remand, the district court retained jurisdiction during the payment process. First, contrary to plaintiffs' unsupported contention, the court agreed that the judgment's retention-of-jurisdiction provision never contemplated that defendant suspend its ordinary administrative process in order to make the DSH payments at issue. Second, the court agreed that because plaintiffs' administrative appeal was limited solely to expansion waiver populations, defendant need not consider other new data regarding the DSH calculation and the court lacked jurisdiction to order it to do so. Third, the court denied plaintiffs' request for fees under the Equal Access to Justice Act.

- District Court Denies Contractor's Challenge to ASBCA Decision
  Southwest Marine, Inc. v. United States [S.D. Ca.] (Hayes). On May 25, the district court denied a challenge by Southwest Marine, Inc., to a decision of the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals which held that Southwest was not entitled, under its government contracts, to reimbursement of certain costs for legal fees and related services incurred by Southwest in the unsuccessful defense of a citizen's suit for violation of the Clean Water Act, 33 U.S.C. § 1365(a).

- Federal Circuit Reduces Damages Award in Winstar-Related Case by $118 Million
  Old Stone Corp. v. United States [Federal Circuit]. On May 25, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit (Linn, J., Dyk, J., Prost, J.), affirmed, in part, and reversed, in part, a $192.5 million judgment in favor of a thrift holding company for breach of contract arising from the passage of the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act of 1989 (FIRREA). The plaintiff holding company claimed that it was a party to a contract under which the government promised that goodwill arising out of its thrift's mergers with two insolvent thrifts could be counted toward regulatory capital requirements. When FIRREA prohibited the inclusion of goodwill in regulatory capital and the holding company's thrift ultimately failed, the holding company brought suit seeking $118 million it allegedly contributed to the mergers and $74.5 million that it spent recapitalizing the thrift after the breach. The Federal Circuit affirmed the trial court's award of the $74.5 million as mitigation damages, but reversed the award of $118 million. The court held that the $118 million: (1) could not be awarded as restitution because the holding company elected to continue performance of the contract after the breach; and (2) could not be awarded as reliance damages because it was unforeseeable that the loss of approximately $80 million in regulatory capital would cause the holding company to lose its $118 million contribution, particularly given that the holding company had recapitalized the thrift with $74.5 million in post-breach contributions.

- Court of International Trade Determines It Lacks Jurisdiction Over False Claims Action to Recover Duties and Penalties Against Importer
  United States v. Universal Fruits And Vegetables Corp., et al No. 04-00431 (CIT May 25) (Carman J.). On May 25, the Court Of International Trade (CIT) dismissed for lack of jurisdiction the government's action to recover damages and penalties against an importer for mis-marking the country of origin of fresh garlic shipments to avoid Customs duties. The CIT had initially agreed with the government that the action, brought under the False Claims Act, 31 U.S.C. § 3729, could proceed in the CIT pursuant to the CIT's jurisdictional statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1582(3), and permitted the government to file a motion for summary judgment in the matter. In response to defendants' motion to dismiss, however, the CIT revisited its jurisdictional decision and concluded that the CIT lacked jurisdiction over this matter because 28 U.S.C. § 1582(3) permits the CIT to entertain only the government's efforts to recover duties and not damages as referenced by duties, which the government sought under the False Claims Act. The case had been transferred to the CIT from the United States District Court for the Central District of California after the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that the district court lacked jurisdiction to entertain the matter because the government's damages were measured by reference to duties, the recovery of which are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the CIT under 28 U.S.C. § 1582(3).

- Court Orders Expedited Processing of Records Request Concerning Terrorist Activity Reporting Program
  American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California v. U.S. Department of Defense [Northern District of California]. On May 25, Judge William Alsup granted the plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment and ordered expedited processing of their Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request. Plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had improperly denied plaintiffs' request for expedited processing of their FOIA request concerning the Threat and Local Observation Notice program. Under the program, members of the military and civilians file reports concerning potential terrorist activity that are collected in a centralized database. Various media outlets reported in December that numerous reports had been submitted that involved non-violent protests concerning the war or the "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy. Two agency components granted plaintiffs' request for expedited processing of their FOIA request, while three others denied the request. In the same order, the Court denied plaintiffs' request for attorney's fees and the production of documents because, according to the Court, their summary judgment motion had not justified the complaint's request for such relief. The Court then issued a judgment closing the case.

- Court Largely Upholds Refusal to Disclose Certain Records Pertaining to Border Patrols
  ACLU v. United States Customs and Border Protection [Central District of California]. On May 25, Judge Christina A. Snyder granted in part and denied in part the government's motion for summary judgment. Plaintiff brought this action under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) seeking documents relating to immigration enforcement actions taken by mobile patrol groups of Customs and Border Protection agents in cities in Southern California, as opposed to at the border or border checkpoints. Most of the documents were withheld under FOIA exemptions (b)(2) and (b)(7)(E), which protect information that could be used to circumvent the law; some were also withheld under FOIA exemption (b)(5), which protects attorney-client communications and attorney work product. The court held that all of the material was properly withheld except for 13 pages of legal training materials. The court ordered each party to bear its own attorneys's fees and costs.

- $76 Million Award in Winstar-Related Case
  Fifth Third Bank v. United States (Ct. Fed. Cl.). On May 26, the Court of Federal Claims

(Christine Miller, J.) awarded expectation damages of $52.704 million and a tax gross up of $23.819 million in this Winstar-related case. A complaint filed in 1996 contended that plaintiff had entered into five supervisory goodwill contracts in the mid-1980s and sought in excess of $120 million in expectation, reliance and restitutionary damages. We were awarded summary judgment on the "leveraging" lost profits, reliance, and restitution claims. At a trial in 2003, the trial court ruled there were no contracts to be breached. However, this was reversed by the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit. After a two-week trial in 2006, the trial court rejected the claim for lost profits relating to the sale of Cincinnati branches but awarded $8.469 million for a lost deposit premium. The trial court found the thrift would have converted into a stronger market in the absence of Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act of 1989 and awarded $44.235 million for "reduced conversion proceeds." Finally the court awarded a tax gross up on the conversion proceeds of $23.819 million.

- Court of Federal Claims Finds No Fifth Amendment Taking As a Result of Low-Income Housing Regulations
  City Line Joint Venture v. United States, No. 96-738 (Fed. Cl.). On May 26, the Court of Federal Claims (Wiese, J.) issued an opinion, concluding that no regulatory taking resulted from legislation limiting the owner's right to prepay and exit the low-income housing program regulated by the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). Initially, the court concluded that plaintiff's claims were ripe for review because it would have been futile for plaintiff to apply to prepay and exit the HUD program and because the sale option available under the preservation statutes did not provide just compensation. The court next examined the factors set forth in Penn Central Transportation Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104 (1978), and concluded that the economic impact of the government's action "did not occasion a serious financial loss." Thus, the court found that the limitations placed upon plaintiff by the preservation statutes did not constitute a taking of plaintiff's property.

- Government Seeks Dismissal of Suit Challenging Bar on Financial Aid to Students Convicted of Drug-Related Offenses
  Students for Sensible Drug Policy Foundation v. Spellings [District of South Dakota]. On May 26, the government filed a motion to dismiss this case in which plaintiffs challenge a provision of the Higher Education Act of 1965 that suspends eligibility for federal financial aid for students who have been convicted of drug-related offenses. Plaintiffs contend that this provision violates the Equal Protection component of the Due Process Clause and the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment. In our motion, we argue that the statute is constitutional because it has a rational basis and does not constitute criminal punishment.

- Government Opposes Motion by Guantanamo Bay Detainee to Permit Foreign Attorney Access to the Detainee
  Salahi v. Bush [District of Columbia]. On May 26, the government will file its opposition to a motion by counsel for a Guantanamo Bay detainee in a pending habeas corpus case to require the government to permit a Mauritanian attorney who possesses neither a security clearance nor membership in a bar in the United States access to the detainee at Guantanamo. The opposition noted the requirement in the governing protective order that only United States counsel with security clearance be permitted access to habeas petitioner-detainees. The opposition also noted that petitioner's request was inconsistent with the authority of the commander of Guantanamo Bay to control access to the military facility under his control.

- District Court Refuses to Issue Temporary Injunction in Case Challenging Management of Hurricane Relief
  Carolyn Watson et al. v. FEMA [Southern District of Texas]. On May 30, the Court denied plaintiffs' request for a temporary restraining order (TRO) against the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and, on June 1, the court denied reconsideration. Plaintiffs filed suit on behalf of a putative nationwide class of Hurricane Katrina evacuees, alleging that FEMA acted in violation of the Stafford Act, the Due Process Clause, and the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) in administering housing relief to Hurricane Katrina evacuees. Plaintiffs sought a TRO prohibiting FEMA from continuing to transition recipients of emergency shelter from a program in which FEMA reimburses city and state grantees for renting apartments for Katrina evacuees under Section 403 of the Stafford Act, to providing eligible individuals and households with direct financial assistance under Section 408 of the Act. Judge David Hittner denied the TRO after finding that plaintiffs failed to demonstrate a likelihood of success on their claims that FEMA: (1) failed to provide putative class members with housing in an "equitable, non-arbitrary, and non-discriminatory manner"; (2) acted arbitrarily and discriminatorily by adjusting the "fair market rent" rate used to reimburse evacuees for renting in New Orleans or Baton Rouge upward from the Department of Housing and Urban Development's calculated "fair market rates" while not making a similar upward adjustment for other locations; (3) violated the Stafford Act and the APA by failing to allow recipients of Section 408 assistance to pay for utilities with their housing assistance money; (4) violated the APA, Stafford Act, and Due Process Clause by failing to provide ascertainable standards governing evacuees' interest in temporary housing assistance. The Court also expressed reluctance to enter a TRO because it would have required state and local governments, which are FEMA grantees but are not parties to the suit, to take action.

- Farmers Exchange Bancorporation, Inc. Settles Agricultural Loan Fraud Case for $2,127,004
  United States ex rel. Jenlink and Boruff v. Farmers Exchange Bancorporation, Inc. and Farmers Exchange Bank, (Russell, J.) [W.D. Okla.]. On May 30, the parties finalized a settlement agreement between the United States and Cherokee, Oklahoma-based defendants Farmers Exchange Bancorporation, Inc. and Farmers Exchange Bank. The complaint alleged that the defendants defrauded the Farm Service Agency of the United States Department of Agriculture by charging excessive fees and by improperly inflating interest rates on federally-guaranteed agricultural loans.

- Second Circuit Dismisses Petition for Review for Lack of Jurisdiction
  Guyadin v. Gonzales [2d Cir.]. On May 30, the Second Circuit dismissed the petition for review, holding that the Immigration Judge's decision to deny adjustment of status was made pursuant to his discretionary authority and thus beyond the Court's jurisdiction. The Court also held that it lacked jurisdiction to review the Board's decision to unilaterally affirm the case instead of referring the appeal to a three-member panel. The Court praised the efforts of Immigration Judges and the Board, stating that they "should be applauded for their continuing diligence, their integrity, [] and -- as is shown in the records of nearly all immigration cases we encounter in this Court -- their earnest desire to reach fair and equitable results under an almost overwhelmingly complex legal regime. . . . [They] are to be commended for their efforts, in which the 'streamlining' policy plays an important role."

- Supreme Court Holds that when Public Employees make Statements Pursuant to their Official Duties, they are not Speaking as Citizens for First Amendment Purposes, and the Constitution does not Insulate their Communications from Employer Discipline
  Garcetti v. Ceballos. On May 30, tracking the arguments in our amicus brief, the Supreme Court (5-4) held that a prosecutor in a district attorney's office who prepared a memorandum to his supervisor recommending dismissal of a case "spoke as a prosecutor fulfilling a responsibility to advise his supervisor about how best to proceed with a pending case" and not as a citizen for whom the First Amendment provides protection against discipline by a public employer. The Court recognized, however, that "[e]mployees who make public statements outside the course of performing their official duties retain some possibility of First Amendment protection because that is the kind of activity engaged in by citizens who do not work for the government." The Court wrote that "[t]he same goes for writing a letter to a local newspaper . . . or discussing politics with a co-worker."

- Court Dismisses Post-Award Bid Protest
  Comprehensive Health Services, Inc. v. United States and Wyle Laboratories, Inc. [Fed. Cl.] (Braden, J.). On May 31, the Court of Federal Claims dismissed plaintiff's post-award bid protest challenging the award of an occupational and health services contract by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. The court rejected plaintiff's claims that: (a) the award of the contract was based upon factors not announced in the solicitation; (b) the agency did not properly consider probable costs in evaluating the offerors' price proposals; (c) the agency erred in re-evaluating an aspect of the offerors' proposals; and (d) the agency breached the implied duty of good faith, fair dealing, and honest consideration of the offers.

- Government Seeks Dismissal or Transfer to the Court of Appeals of Guantanamo Bay Detainee Case Challenging Enemy Combatant Designation
  Feghoul v. Bush [District of Columbia]. On June 1, in one of the first cases filed by a Guantanamo Bay detainee challenging his enemy combatant designation after enactment of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, the government filed a motion to dismiss the case or transfer it to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The motion argues that the Detainee Treatment Act removed district court jurisdiction to hear or consider applications for writs of habeas corpus and other actions brought by or on behalf of aliens detained at Guantanamo Bay, and vested exclusive jurisdiction in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to consider the validity of a detainee's designation as an enemy combatant.

- Court Denies Preliminary Injunction to Intelligence Agency Employee Seeking to Publish Uncleared Manuscript
  Waters v. Central Intelligence Agency [District of Columbia]. Following the denial on May 31 of plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction, the parties stipulated on June 2 to the dismissal. Waters, an ex-employee of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), had submitted a book-length manuscript to the agency for prepublication review. Told by the CIA that only four words needed to be changed, Waters submitted the manuscript to a literary agent and sold the publication rights. When advised by the CIA shortly before the scheduled publication date that additional changes needed to be made, Waters brought suit on First Amendment grounds to permit publication of the manuscript without the requested changes. Though voicing dismay at the allegedly cavalier attitude that the CIA had taken to the protection of classified information, Judge Reggie B. Walton denied from the bench Waters' motion for a preliminary injunction on the ground that the CIA had never given final approval to the publication of the manuscript.

- Government Supports Dismissal of Challenge to Accounting Oversight Board
  Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Board [District of Columbia]. On June 2, we filed a Statement of Interest, a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board ("Board"). The Board is a nonprofit corporation created by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act that oversees audits of public companies subject to the securities laws. The sole issue at the current stage is whether there are threshold jurisdictional and procedural issues that require dismissal of plaintiffs' claims without reaching the merits. Our Statement of Interest, supporting the Board's motion to dismiss, argues that the lawsuit should be dismissed because plaintiffs have not complied with the exclusive statutory review mechanism in the Sarbanes-Oxley Act and the securities laws.

- Motion to Dismiss Filed in Challenge to Chaplain Program at Veterans' Hospitals
  Freedom From Religion Foundation v. Nicholson [Western District of Wisconsin]. On June 2, we moved to dismiss, a taxpayer suit filed on April 26 alleging that the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) inappropriately integrated spiritual and pastoral care into its health care treatment plan for all patients in VA's medical system, in violation of the Establishment Clause. Plaintiffs alleged that VA's holistic approach is intended to promote religion and belief, rather than to accommodate the free exercise rights of veterans who otherwise could not get to religious services due to hospitalization. We argued in our motion that the government is obligated to accommodate the religious needs of those under its care and control, and in providing health care to those who have served in the armed forces, it may need to meet the free exercise demands of those veterans who believe that a holistic model of medical care is necessary to their recovery. We also argued that, even assuming VA's holistic model exceeds that demanded by the veterans' free exercise rights, it is by now firmly established that the government may accommodate religion beyond what the Free Exercise Clause mandates, without violating the Establishment Clause.

- Court Postpones Consideration of Class Certification in Challenge to Administration of Medicare Prescription Drug Benefit
  Sito v. Leavitt [Northern District of California]. On June 2, Judge Thelton E. Henderson vacated plaintiffs' motion for class certification. Plaintiffs seek to represent a nationwide class of "every full benefit dual eligible Medicare beneficiary who is unable to receive the full benefits of the Part D Drug Benefit and/or the Low Income Subsidy program due to the actions or failure to act of the Secretary of Health and Human Services." We argued that the Court should postpone ruling on class certification until it has decided the government's forthcoming motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, should deny class certification because plaintiffs have not met the requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23. Because the government's motion will likely raise jurisdictional issues, the court agreed that it should resolve that motion before considering class certification.

Contact: August Flentje, Counsel, 514.3309

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, June 7, 2006 8:06 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, June 07, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060607.pdf; agnb060607.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Cheney Reaches Deal With Specter Over NSA Phone Data Oversight ... 3
Canadian Terror Suspects Plotted To Behead Lawmakers, Prime Minister ... 3
US Military To Forego Using Psychiatrists In Interrogations, Rely On Psychologists ... 4
Last Member Of "Virginia Jihad" Convicted ... 5
Business Leader Calls For Creation Of Homeland Security Agency In UK ... 5

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Says NYC "Still No. 1" Under Urban Areas Initiative ... 5
9/11 Commissioners Say Government Falling Short On Homeland Security ... 5
Study Finds Katrina Increased Percentage Of Whites In New Orleans, Blacks In Mississippi ... 6

War News:

Warner Pledges To Hold Hearings On Haditha As Soon As Possible ... 6
Maliki To Release 2500 Prisoners, Establish Baathist Reconciliation Process ... 7
Baghdad Morgue Reports 1400 Slain In May ... 8
Iraqi Minister Criticizes Spending By Foreign Aid Donors ... 9
Family Of American Kidnapped In Iraq Profiled ... 9
Fear Of Kidnappers Drives Baghdad Residents To Hide Wealth. 9
Car Bombings Kill Two US Soldiers In Afghanistan, Wound Four ... 9
Thousands Of US Soldiers Suffer From Undiagnosed Brain Injuries ... 9

Corporate Scandals:

SEC Chair Concerned About Widening Options Probe ... 9
Lawmakers Blast Former Fannie Mae CEO Over Fraud Allegations ... 10

Criminal Law:

DOJ Official's Silence On Leak Prosecutions Angers Senators. 10
FBI Raided Nigerian Official's Home In Search Of Jefferson Bribe Money ... 11
Former Lewis Aide Acknowledges Military Contractor Helped Buy House ... 12
Former Aide Paid For DeLay's Wife's Retirement Account ... 12
Prosecutors Reportedly Seeking Deal With McKinney ... 13
Gambino Capo Convicted Of Racketeering Charges ... 13
Former Tennessee Senator Denies Taking Bribes As Trial Goes To Jury ... 13
Chicago Water Official Testifies Sorich Make Him Hire Drunken Campaign Worker ... 13
FBI Investigating New Angle To Alleged Fumo Link With Non-Profit ... 14
Mississippi County Official Charged With Bribery, Witness Tampering ... 14
Suicidal Prosecution Witness Returns To Stand In New Jersey Corruption Trial ... 14
Bulger Associate Testifies About Corrupt Relationship Between FBI, Informants ... 14
Arrest Of Connecticut Garbage Magnate In Crime Probe Could Be Imminent ... 15
New York Hedge Fund Scam Artist Pleads Guilty ... 15
Wisconsin Law Will Require Sex Offenders To Wear GPS Tracking Devices ... 15
Man Who Served 18 Years On Rape Charge Freed By DNA Evidence ... 15

Civil Law:

DOJ Reaches Deal With Gabelli On Cell Phone License Lawsuit ... 15

Civil Rights:

Special Prosecutor Rules Ohio Police Shootings Justifiable ... 16
Gay Marriage Amendment Headed For Defeat In Senate ... 16
EEOC Reaches Settlement With Verizon On Pregnancy Bias Lawsuit ... 17
Blanco To Sign Restrictive Louisiana Abortion Bill ... 17
LOC Transgender Discrimination Case Moves To Discovery Phase ... 17
Senate To Consider Bill Of Hawaiian Self-Government ... 17
Facing Receivership Threat, Williams Fires DC's Mental Health Director ... 18
Friedman Praises US Diversity ... 18

Westmoreland Says Voting Rights Act Should Be Modernized . 18
NYTimes Criticizes Ohio Voter Registration Regulations 18

Antitrust:

ACLU Asks FCC To Pause ATT-Bell South Merger 18
EU Officials Says Microsoft's Reputation Is At Stake 19
UK Airports Operator OKs Takeover Bid From Spain's Ferrovial19
Chirac Seeks To Boost German Bid For Euronext Merger 19
Mittal Executive Questions Arcelor Shareholder Voting Procedure 20
Merged Airline Faces Increased Customer Complaints 20

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Lawmakers Make Case For ANWR Exploration 20
Johanns Says Bird Flu Easily Detected 20
SCOTUS Refuses To Hear Appeal Of Seneca Tribe's New York Land Claim 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Announces $2.75 Million Grant To Fight Gangs In Cleveland Area 21
Wanted Bay-Area Hells Angels Leader Surrenders To FBI..... 21
Violent New Jersey Drug Dealer Sentenced To Life In Prison ... 21
Federal "Weed & Seed" Money Will Help Charlotte, NC, Fight Crime 21
Guns, Drugs Seized In New Jersey, 3 Arrested 22
Pittsburgh Police Confiscate Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Packets ... 22
Maryland AG's Office Denies Approving Release Of Security Information 22
Former Doctor Investigated By DEA Accused Of Malpractice ... 22
Arizona Reliever's House Searched In Baseball's Steroid Investigation 22
Montel Williams To Back Medicinal Use Of Marijuana In New Jersey 23

Immigration:

Bush Says Immigration Reform Incomplete Without Guest Worker Program 23
Six Arrested By Immigration Agents In North Carolina To Be Deported 26

Tax:

Frist Rejects Estate Tax Compromise 26
Grassley Outlines Effect Of Tax Code Change On Expatriates . 27

Congress-Administration:

White House Reenergizes Defense Of Bush Judicial Nominees27
Hecht Admonished For Vocal Support Of Miers Nomination 27
Congress Fighting Administration Effort To Consolidate Foreign Aid Programs 27
White House Deployed Gingrich To Influence Congressional Oversight 28
Democrats Seek To Curb Bush Use Of Signing Statements 28
VA Says Personal Information Of 80% Of Active Duty Troops Stolen 28
House Leadership Said To Be Working To Keep Pledge On Earmark Reform 29
Hoyer Says Pelosi Will Lead House Democrats Regardless Of Election Outcome 29
Senate GOP Focus On Social Issues Worries Some Republican Members 29
Laura Bush Visits Minnesota Community Center 29
OPM Director Launches "Career Patterns" Initiative..... 29
White House Threatens To Veto Intervention In FAA Contract Dispute 29
Samuelson Says Paulson Needs Economic Crisis To Excel At Treasury 29
WPost Hits Reid Over Acceptance Of Boxing Tickets..... 30

Other News:

Stock Markets Continue To Lose Ground 30
Bilbray Leading In CA50; Filner Turns Back Primary Challenge 31
Angelides To Face Schwarzenegger As Westly Concedes Primary 31
Riley Easily Defeats Moore In Alabama Gubernatorial Primary . 31
Burns, Tester Easily Win Primary Contests 31
Menendez, Kean Cruise To Primary Wins, Intensify Rhetoric.... 31
At-Risk Lawmakers, Governors Listed 32
GOP Incumbents' Perks Pose Difficult Challenge To Democratic Challengers 32
Harris Undeterred By Opposition From Within Party To Senate Run 33
Weld Exits New York Gubernatorial Race 33
Tie To Bush Seen As Key To Frist's '08 Hopes 33
Brownback's 2008 Aspirations Examined 33
Tancredo Wins Presidential Straw Poll In Michigan 33
US Scientists Cleared To Clone Human Embryos..... 33
Study Finds 43% Aren't Saving Enough For Retirement..... 34
Program Shows Progress Housing Homeless..... 34
Documents Show CIA Knew Eichmann's Whereabouts 34
Vanderkam Says Government Should Get Out Of States' Way On Health Care 34
Marcus Says Works On Negativity, Disclosure Are "Useful." 35
Bush Cautiously Optimistic On Initial Iranian Response To Incentives 35
Bush Concerned Over Somalia Unrest 36
Extending Deadline, Abbas Asks Hamas To Reconsider Deal .. 37
Indonesian Minister Rebukes US Approach To War On Terror . 38
Exercise Suggests Taiwan Could Defend Itself For Two Weeks Without US Help 38
Poll Shows Muslim Women Disaffected By US Focus On Western Values 38
Peru's New President Wants To Revisit US Trade Pact 38
US Angling To Prevent Venezuela From Getting Security Council Seat 38
Mexican Candidates Focus On Middle-Class Voters 39
Oil Concerns May Affect Cuba Trade Policy..... 39
European, African Officials Unveil New Plan To Interdict Illegal Migrants 39

DOJ_NMG_0032240

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 39

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington..... 40

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Reaches Deal With Specter Over NSA Phone Data Oversight. Sen. Arlen Specter has dropped plans to call for testimony from phone company officials after Vice President Dick Cheney agreed the Administration would consider his bill to allow the FISA court oversight of the NSA terrorist monitoring program. USA Today (6/7, Diamond, 2.31M) reports, "The deal prompted protests from Democratic lawmakers, who said the Republican-controlled Congress had refused to challenge the administration's expansion of presidential authority. 'Why don't we just recess for the rest of the year, and the vice president will just tell the nation what laws we'll have?' said Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, ranking Democrat on the committee." But "Specter said his hand had been forced by the telephone companies' refusal to discuss classified programs." Meanwhile, Sen. Orrin Hatch said President Bush "is willing to work with us as long as it doesn't detract from the president's constitutional powers.'"

CNN (6/7) reports, "The potential for a showdown over subpoenas was averted when Republicans, led by former committee chairman Orrin Hatch of Utah, outmaneuvered Specter in advance of the hearing. … Hatch disclosed he had won assurances from Vice President Cheney that the White House would at least review proposed legislation to restrict aspects of NSA surveillance programs. In exchange, the committee would not press the phone companies to divulge their cooperation with the government." CNN adds, "In a dissent, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., announced she would oppose subpoenas for the phone companies. Feinstein, who is on the Intelligence Committee, said she had been fully briefed on the secret NSA programs and believes if the phone companies should be summoned at all, it should be from the intelligence panel, which conducts its business behind closed doors." CNN notes, "Justice Department officials acknowledge they are bracing for a potentially stormy hearing, but probably not as soon as Specter would like. … A senior Justice official who asked not to be identified said it was likely they would be able to arrange for Gonzales to testify before the committee 'in the next two months.'"

The AP (6/7, Shrader) reports, "Specter had threatened to subpoena executives of the major phone companies to get them to testify about their cooperation with the NSA. But in an informal conversation, one company lawyer told Specter the executives wouldn't be able to testify about any classified information. Specter said Cheney told the committee the restriction would apply to everyone the senators want to question. … Specter rejected suggestions that he was letting the White House dictate the committee's agenda, and he said he plans to have Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before the committee later this month. … 'I yield to no man or woman on pressing this administration on these issues,' he said."

Canadian Terror Suspects Plotted To Behead Lawmakers, Prime Minister. As the 15 of the 17 suspected terrorists arrested last week made their first appearance in court, details of their alleged plots emerged yesterday. Among the schemes was a plan to storm the Canadian parliament and behead hostages, including Prime Minister Steven Harper.

The story was the lead on CBS and NBC last night, and ran second on ABC. The CBS Evening News (6/6, lead story, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "If the allegations are correct, this is no small-time local operation but a ruthless band with connections to terrorist cells around the world and including the United States who were bent on taking over Canadian media outlets and beheading the Canadian prime minister." CBS (Bowers) added, "One of the accused, 25-year-old Steven Chand, was part of a plot that included plans to storm the Canadian Parliament in Ottawa and take politicians hostage, behead the hostages, including Prime Minister Stephen Harper if Canadian troops weren't withdrawn from Afghanistan, and take over the headquarters of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to gain control of the country's airwaves. Prosecutors gave defense attorneys an eight-page document that CBS News was told outlined the general organization and operations of what they call the terror cell."

NBC Nightly News (6/6, lead story, 2:55, Tibbles, 9.87M) reported "investigators here are saying there may be more arrests, as those already charged appeared in court." Other "potential targets" include "the Toronto Stock Exchange, and a senior US counter-terror official tells NBC News the group also planned to open fire on pedestrians on one of the city's busy streets, newspapers now filled with stories about who these men were, many Canadian citizens of East Asian background living in a nation that prides itself on its ethnic tolerance and relative security."

DOJ_NMG_0032241

ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 2, 2:00, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "Some of the suspects smirked, and others appeared defiant in court here today as the chilling, new details of their alleged plot emerged. The most dramatic part of the plot included the plan to attack and storm the parliament building in Ottawa." The Prime Minister "has defended the role of Canada's 2300 troops in Afghanistan, and that clearly was a big issue for the suspected terrorists."

The Washington Post (6/7, A1, Struck, 744K) reports Prime Minister Stephen Harper "brushed aside the news with a joke. 'I can live with all these threats as long as they are not from my caucus,' he quipped as he walked into his office."

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Williams, 958K) reports, "The accusations delivered to several of the defendants' attorneys in a one-page investigation summary included no evidence to substantiate the charges, said the attorney for 25-year-old Steven Vikash Chand." Batasar "complained that he had not been allowed to meet privately with Chand and later said to reporters outside the courthouse: 'This is not Guantanamo, this is Toronto, Canada.'" The New York Times (6/7, Depalma, 1.19M) also reports "several lawyers complained that extraordinary security had prevented them from speaking to their clients in private." The men, "all residents of Canada, have been held in isolation at a maximum-security prison since shortly after they were arrested over the weekend. They have been prohibited from talking to their families or one another." The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Cherney, 2.11M) runs a similar report under the headline "Defense Lawyers In Canada Fault Terror Case Data."

Canadian Terror Suspects' Links To US, Other Countries Examined. The Washington Times (6/7, 90K) and USA Today (6/7, 2.31M) run an AP story reporting, "A US law enforcement official said investigators were looking for ties between the Canadian detainees and Islamic militants held in the USA, Britain, Bangladesh, Bosnia, Denmark and Sweden."

The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 2, 1:55, Stewart, 7.66M) reported, "US law enforcement officials say the investigation of the Canadian cell is something they've been knowing about for months and it was the subject of a global counterterrorist summit meeting that took place in Washington this spring. The meeting took place shortly after the arrest in April of two Atlanta men charged with videotaping potential bombing targets in Washington including the Capitol." Given the "global scope of the plot, investigators from all the affected countries met in Washington and agreed to 'run the string out to see if other conspirators unknown to them might surface.' The case was unique because of the global cooperation it took to unravel it, but law enforcement officials admit that the scary thing is that this case suggests how easy it is for homegrown terrorists to seek out global partners as well. And as we reported last night, officials fear it's just that kind of cooperation that may soon lead to another attack inside the United States."

NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 2, 2:00, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The FBI, meantime, is following up on information found during searches of the homes of the Canadian suspects; including names of some Americans they were in contact with. It's not clear yet, investigators say, what those contacts were about. The FBI remains intensely interested in two Atlanta area men who met with some of the Canadians last year. The meeting in Toronto was, investigators tell NBC News, a kind of terrorist workshop which may have included paramilitary training in this rural area north of Toronto. But what worries the FBI even more about the two, Ehsanul Sadequee and Syed Ahmed, is that both traveled overseas -- Ahmed to Pakistan hoping to get terror training and Sadequee to Bangladesh, where his family is from. Several US sources tell NBC News that Sadequee went there to meet leaders of al Qaeda in Bangladesh, a country where the terror organization is still robust and easily approached."

ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 2, 2:00, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "US and Canadian authorities say this was at heart a Website plot, with fellow jihadists online in the US, London, and Bosnia serving as kind of armchair commanders. Making suggestions on methods of operation, and targets."

WSJournal Says Arrests Highlight Importance Of Electronic Surveillance. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) editorializes that the arrests highlight "the crucial role electronic surveillance plays in uncovering potentially catastrophic terrorist attacks. Question: Did that surveillance require a warrant? Do you care?" The Journal adds, "Meantime, the important thing is to praise the work of Canadian authorities in foiling what could have been another 9/11. We can only hope their American counterparts are as good."

US Military To Forego Using Psychiatrists In Interrogations, Rely On Psychologists. In response to a vote by the American Psychiatric Association stating its opposition to the participation of psychiatrists in military interrogations, the US military announce it would attempt to use only psychologists. The New York Times (6/7, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, told reporters that the new policy favoring the use of psychologists over psychiatrists was a recognition of differing positions taken by their respective professional groups." American Psychological Association director of ethics Stephen Behnke "said psychologists knew not to participate in activities that harmed detainees. But Dr. Behnke also said the group believed that helping military interrogators made a valuable contribution because it was part of an effort to prevent terrorism." The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Barnes, 958K) runs a similar report.

DOJ_NMG_0032242

Last Member Of "Virginia Jihad" Convicted. Ali Asad Chandia, the eleventh and final man accused in the "Virginia jihad network," was convicted of providing material support to terrorists. The Washington Post (6/7, A12, Markon, 744K) reports, "Federal officials have long described the case as one of the most important domestic terrorism prosecutions since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Yesterday, they hailed Chandia's conviction and said it underscored the importance of cooperating with foreign law enforcement agencies in the battle against terrorism." U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said, "This case demonstrates our relentless commitment to bringing to justice those who provide support to terrorist organizations." But local Muslims have "criticized the investigation as overzealous and the prison terms of those convicted as excessive. Muslims flocked to the courthouse to show support for Chandia. … About 100 supporters attended closing arguments Monday."

Business Leader Calls For Creation Of Homeland Security Agency In UK. London Chamber of Commerce and Industry president Michael Cassidy in an op-ed in the Financial Times (6/7) advocates taking additional steps to prepare against terrorist attacks including improving baggage checks, increasing police visibility and building ties with the Asian business community. But in addition, "We need a government department focused on what has been loosely called 'homeland security'. Separate this vital responsibility from the rag bag of Home Office duties, some of which involve inherent conflicts when it comes to judging how best to protect the public. That might be more fit for purpose than the present arrangement, which seems bogged down in traditional thinking and is over-reliant on the chancy business of intelligence gathering."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says NYC "Still No. 1" Under Urban Areas Initiative. DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff, in an op-ed in the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M) titled "New York, You're Still No. 1," writes that while readers might not "know it based on the news media reaction," Urban Area Security Initiative grants announced last week "continue a financing stream that places New York and Washington at the very top of the list in terms of money received." New York's $124 million "is 50 percent more than the next-highest area, Los Angeles, and represents almost a threefold increase over the $46 million the city received in 2004." Meanwhile, rather than list the city's "significant landmarks" as icons, DHS placed sites like the Empire State Building and Brooklyn Bridge in categories that would "generate a higher complete risk grade for New York's financing proposal." Chertoff adds that DHS "has made every effort to rely on measurable facts and to take politics out of the process."

House Approves Homeland Security Appropriations Bill. The AP (6/7, Jordan) reports House Republicans voting yesterday on the Homeland Security appropriations bill "blocked a vote…on restoring millions of dollars in counterterror funds to big-city targets, including New York, refusing to bust budget targets over slashed grants to emergency first responders." They rejected a request from New York City-area Democrats to add $750 million, "even as they vowed anew to investigate how Homeland Security could justify cutting funding to New York and Washington." The overall $32 billion spending bill, which "bolsters protections at seaports by $448 million more than in 2006, adds 1,200 Border Patrol agents and boosts the Hurricane Katrina-beleagured Federal Emergency Management Agency by $6.5 billion for disaster preparedness," was approved 389-9.

Bloomberg Says City Will Not Change Application Strategy. The New York Times (6/7, Chan, Hu, 1.19M) reports, "Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said yesterday that the city would not alter its strategy in future applications for federal antiterror money to comply with the Department of Homeland Security's preference for semipermanent safeguards like new technology over recurring costs like police overtime." At a Staten Island news conference, Bloomberg said the city has "a very different philosophy than what the federal government does," adding that it was "wrong" that the federal government "typically" does not cover labor costs." Bloomberg said Secretary Chertoff "had promised to help the city to maximize the money that was awarded."

9/11 Commissioners Say Government Falling Short On Homeland Security. The leaders of the 9/11 Commission yesterday testified before a House panel on the continuing terrorist threat to US homeland security, giving the government poor grades on making improvements in several key areas: Airport security, funding for targeted cities such as New York and Washington, DC, FBI reform, and nuclear terrorism ABC World News Tonight (6/6, lead story, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Almost five years after those attacks, the leaders of the 9/11 Commission said that the US and its security is being compromised by technical, financial and political problems that should have long since been solved. They were on Capitol Hill. And they certainly did not mince words." ABC (Thomas) added, "Stinging criticism from

DOJ_NMG_0032243

9/11 Commissioners. The government, they say, is still failing to protect the country." On airport security, "the Transportation Security Administration, they say, is plagued by poor management. The terrorism watch list, designed to weed out potential terrorists before they board planes, is woefully inadequate." On "money to secure the homeland, commissioners were stunned by the government's recent decision to reduce funding for New York and Washington. Decisions are made, they say, based more on politics than on risk." On the FBI, "it has made some progress in reforming itself but is moving much too slowly. After investigating tens of millions of dollars, FBI computers remain antiquated. Its ability to share critical information is limited. Its ability to assess threats fallen short. And too many of its key leaders are retiring." And "on the threat of nuclear terrorism, commissioners say the government's efforts get a failing grade."

Study Finds Katrina Increased Percentage Of Whites In New Orleans, Blacks In Mississippi. The Washington Post (6/7, A12, Whoriskey, 744K) reports a Census Bureau report to be released today finds that "Hurricane Katrina displaced more than 400,000 people from the New Orleans area," while "those who remained were more prosperous and were far more likely to be white." Meanwhile, the Mississippi coast, which "lost 41,000 people from before Katrina to January," saw its percentage of non-Hispanic black grow from 17 percent to 27 percent. "Census officials warned that some of the figures are subject to larger than normal margins of error and, moreover, that the figures are already at least five months old."

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Simmons, 958K) reports, "Louisiana state officials said that while the data was useful, it was just 'a snapshot.' 'It's a partial picture of the changes,' said Karen Paterson, a demographer at the Louisiana State Census Data Center."

WPost Says Corps' Admission Of Error On Levees Shows Need For More Oversight. Under the headline "Katrina's Unlearned Lessons," the Washington Post (6/7, A22, 744K) editorializes that though one "might think" that the "mea culpa" from the US Army Corps of Engineers, whose own inquiry found last week that "the agency committed numerous mistakes of design" in constructing New Orleans' levee system, "would fuel efforts to reform the agency." However, while Sens. John McCain and Russell Feingold are supporting a measure that would require future Corps proposals to "be subject to technical review by an independent agency," a "stronger current in Congress" backs a measure written by Sens. James M. Inhofe (and Christopher S. Bond that "would loosen oversight of the Corps." The Post states, "The Corps' admission of its own technical shortcomings points to the need for tougher oversight, not less."

Weather Channel President Says Hurricane Focus Should Be On Preparedness, Not Predictions. Debora Wilson, president of The Weather Channel, in an op-ed in USA Today (6/7, 2.31M) writes that the "higher degree of interest" the 2005 hurricane season generated "among the general public in understanding and predicting what's going to happen this year" has created "a new wave of individuals and organizations who bill themselves as experts, publicly issuing predictions that not only speculate on the number of hurricanes the USA will experience this season but also the specific regions where the storms will make landfall." Such predictions "provide a misdirected focus. The question should not be 'How many?' but, instead, 'Are you prepared?'" Wilson states that while "these unfounded predictions do raise awareness in the forecasted areas, they also lull residents in other coastal regions into a false sense of security."

Hurricanes Seen As "New Uninsurable." Holman W. Jenkins, Jr., in his column for the Wall Street Journal (6/7, A15, 2.11M) writes that hurricanes have displaced terrorism as "the new 'uninsurable.'" Factors, including government payouts in the wake of 9/11 and Katrina, have been "unraveling the insurance industry's ability to help society control its risk-taking by properly pricing risk." To restore this ability, one would have to assume "that property owners would be willing to pay 'actuarially sound' rates rather than just skipping insurance and relying on a federal bailout in the wake of a big storm. Here's the real crux of the claim by some industry watchers that hurricanes have become effectively uninsurable." Jenkins adds that while there is growing support for a federal disaster insurance program, the federal flood insurance program "was instituted in 1968…to make property owners bear the cost of their own recurrent bailouts," but "became a subsidy to increased risk-taking" instead.

WAR NEWS:

Warner Pledges To Hold Hearings On Haditha As Soon As Possible. The AP (6/7, Sidoti) reports Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he hold hearings on allegations that "Marines killed up to 24 Iraqi civilians last November in the town of Haditha without cause and then engaged in a cover-up." Warner "told reporters he wanted to hold the first of what he expected to be a series of hearings on the allegations as soon as Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell finishes his investigation into whether military personnel lied about what occurred at Haditha. Warner said Bargewell likely would be the first witness called. Congressional aides say Bargewell's report could be completed within the week but that the military's separate criminal investigation is not expected to be finished anytime soon." Warner is quoted as saying, "We've got our duty and we'll do it. We'll go wherever the facts lead."

DOJ_NMG_0032244

CNN's The Situation Room (6/6, Bash) reported Warner "said he is concerned about the fact that there's public discussion about this without much official word from the Pentagon, and he says that is increasingly harmful." AFP (6/7) says Warner urged Defense Secretary Rumsfeld "to quickly make public the findings" of the Bargewell investigation. Warner warned, "Delays in getting out the official findings of fact due to a protracted review process will mean a mixture of information, misinformation and unconfirmed facts will continue to spiral in the public domain."

Levin Criticizes Pace Of Pentagon Disclosures. The New York Times (6/7, Cloud, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee "expressed growing frustration that the Pentagon was not sharing details about the inquiries since Time magazine published an article in March challenging the military's explanation of the deaths. 'They were very slow in notifying the committee, just like they were very slow in doing everything else,'" said Sen. Carl Levin. Levin "added that military officials in Iraq 'knew there was something amiss' but did not start the two investigations until March 9."

"Voluminous" Pentagon Report On Haditha "Virtually Completed." The New York Times (6/7, Cloud, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports Rep. John Kline "said in a telephone interview that he and three other lawmakers were told by the officer, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, that General Bargewell's inquiry was voluminous and 'virtually completed.'"

Haditha Incident Invoked In Report On Dedication Of Islamic Center At Quantico. The Washington Post (6/7, B1, Vargas, 744K) reports an "Islamic Prayer Center" at the Marine Corps Base in Quantico was dedicated yesterday. The Post's piece tries to make the ceremony relevant to the current scandals surrounding the deaths of civilians in Iraq, noting "no one mentioned Haditha," but" it "was on the mind of some." According to the Post, "Several who attended the ceremony described it as a positive step in relations with the Muslim community in the United States after a series of reported missteps recently in Iraq, such as the alleged atrocity in Haditha."

Rumsfeld's Image Could Affect Perception Of Haditha Investigation. In a column largely critical of Donald Rumsfeld's track record as Secretary of Defense, New York Times/International Herald Tribune (6/7) columnist Roger Cohen takes aim the Secretary's capacity to handle the ongoing investigation into allegations US marines killed civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha last November. Cohen writes, "Haditha is not My Lai. But it may resemble it at least in this respect: the suggestion of a cover-up in the aftermath of the killing is strong. Rumsfeld is promising clarity: 'There's an investigation going on as to what took place. There's an investigation going as to what took place after whatever took place.' ... I don't doubt Rumsfeld wants a thorough investigation. But there's a problem: when swagger and cavalier lack of preparation and disregard for facts have been your hallmarks, things tend to happen in your image. That's a truth Rumsfeld may ultimately have to face."

Administration Critics Accused Of "Cynically Leveraging" Haditha Killings. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) David Rivkin and Lee Casey, Washington lawyers who served in the Justice Department under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush, write, "The unfolding investigation of last November's events in Haditha reveals much more about the Bush administration's critics than it does about the U.S. armed forces. Although the inquiry is ongoing, it appears that 24 unarmed Iraqi civilians were deliberately murdered, allegedly by American Marines seeking revenge for a fallen comrade. If true, the episode was a war crime, something that must be -- and no doubt will be -- severely punished. However, the administration's critics are already cynically leveraging the Haditha killings as a means of undercutting the president, heedless of the effect this may have on American national interests."

Media Accused Of Highlighting Abuses By US, Ignoring Abuses By Terrorists. Douglas MacKinnon, a former press secretary to former Sen. Bob Dole and a former White House and Pentagon official, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (6/7, 90K) faults the US media of overreacting to abuses by the US military in the war against terrorism while ignoring abuses by terrorists. MacKinnon writes, "The liberals in the media understand that with each news report on the new My Lai, each case where a U.S. soldier is punished for letting a dog bark in the face of a war prisoner, with every story that equates dunking a terrorist in water with chopping off a human head, they tell these Islamist terrorists that political correctness is weakening our foreign policy and military and robbing us of our will to prosecute the war or defend our nation. They know but don't care. For them, the real enemy is Mr. Bush and conservative beliefs."

Maliki To Release 2500 Prisoners, Establish Baathist Reconciliation Process. The New York Times (6/7, Burns, 1.19M) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki announced that his government will "release 2,500 detainees, nearly 10 percent of those held in Iraqi and American detention centers, and that it would adopt a 'national reconciliation' plan to reintegrate former members of Saddam Hussein's ruling Baath Party into society." Maliki, "compared it to South Africa's 'truth and reconciliation' process in the 1990's, which, he said, 'sent some criminals to the courts and reinstated other people in society.'" According to the Times, the release of detainees, "though sweeping, seemed likely to fall far short of the demands of Sunni politicians." Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, a spokesman for the American military command, "said the decision to free the detainees…had been agreed to in a joint review by Iraqi and American officials. He said those freed would not include any deemed 'guilty of serious crimes such as bombings, torture, kidnapping and murder.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032245

The Washington Post (6/7, A19, Fekeiki, Hernandez, 744K) reports Maliki "called the move a 'positive message and a chance for those who want to rethink their strategy.' He specifically excluded detainees connected to violent attacks and supporters of the former government of Saddam Hussein from his amnesty. The people to be released 'are not Saddamists or terrorists,' Maliki said. … 'They weren't involved in the bloodshed or imposing the sectarian mentality and cleansing. They are people who made mistakes.'"

Haditha Allows Maliki To Assert Independence From US. The Christian Science Monitor (6/7, LaFranchi, 61K) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki "is showing no…reticence" about referring to the alleged massacre at Haditha. According to the Monitor, Maliki's "tough stance suggests a new assertion of sovereignty by the Iraqi government, something that actually works to the US's favor. But the allegations, coming as the new government tries to demonstrate control, are likely to complicate both US-Iraq relations and Maliki's task of leading the Iraqi people."

Baghdad Morgue Reports 1400 Slain In May.

ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 5, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that in Iraq, "it's been another tough day. 30 deaths, reported, including 9 people whose severed heads were found northeast of Baghdad. Eight heads were found in the same village over the weekend. Meanwhile, Iraq's health ministry released numbers that provide a snapshot of how much more dangerous Iraq has become. The bodies of nearly 1,400 people who died violently were taken to Baghdad's central morgue last month, the highest monthly total of this year."

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Roug, 958K) reports Baghdad "continues to be the epicenter of violence. On Tuesday, authorities reported that a car bomb went off near a funeral in a southwestern neighborhood, killing six people and injuring 18. In a different part of town, a roadside bomb exploded at a bus stop, killing one woman and wounding two men. Earlier in the day, the principal of Hamza primary school, Amer Azzawi, a Sunni Muslim, was driving with his Shiite Muslim assistant, Suaad Rubaie, when a drive-by gunman killed them."

Baqubah Sees Surge In Attacks, Atrocities. The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Roug, 958K) reports Baqubah residents have found boxes in their streets containing "he decomposing heads of nine men, each inside a black plastic bag. … In Baqubah…slayings and attacks against Iraqi security forces have recently soared. On Saturday, eight other heads were found in banana crates near the city. One of the heads was wrapped like a present. None of the bodies have been found.

Red Crescent Claims Violence In Iraq Has Displaced At Least 100,000. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 6, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The surge of sectarian violence responsible for the spiraling death toll is having another profound impact. It is driving Iraqis from their homes. The Iraqi Red Crescent Society says at least 100,000 people have been displaced, creating one more crisis for the Iraqi government." ABC (Berman) added, "The Iraqi Red Crescent says more than 1,000 people are fleeing their homes every week. But it is a hard number to track. Many people are afraid to ask for help and simply go into hiding. Even in the camps, some do not feel safe."

Violence Leaves Many Iraqi Children Orphaned. NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 6, 4:25, Engel, 9.87M) re-ran an updated Memorial Day weekend report on Iraqi orphans: "They are some of the forgotten children of the war, 56 girls ages 6 to 13. Home for them is Baghdad's Alwiya Orphanage." The girls can't play outside. It's too dangerous. They can only go as far as the courtyard. Since we've been here, it's clear that these girls are really starved for affection. They've been coming up all day and just taking our hands. One girl called our cameraman Daddy. The director of this orphanage says what they miss most is tenderness, their mother's touch."

Deteriorating Situation In Basra Said To Portend Iraq's Future. USA Today (6/7, 2.31M), in an editorial titled, "Basra's Descent Bodes Poorly For Allied Mission In Iraq," writes, "Three years ago, as the initial military victory in Iraq teetered into chaos, the southern, mainly Shiite city of Basra stood out as a hopeful symbol of how the country could recover. … Three years later, what's happening in Basra is far more ominous. The British occupiers are no longer so welcome or as much in control. Rival militias duke it out on the streets. There has been ethnic cleansing of Sunnis." USA Today adds, "The situation in Basra raises a question: Does it make more sense to stay to try to quell increasing sectarian and terrorist violence, or leave and let Iraqis fight it out?"

Ignatius Claims US "Project In Iraq Is Unraveling." In his column for the Washington Post (6/7, 744K) David Ignatius writes, "The American project in Iraq is unraveling. The president continues to talk about staying the course, and the White House still issues upbeat predictions of victory, but the course we are on is not working. The election of Iraq's first permanent government in December was the last good chance to put the pieces together. Nearly seven months after the elections, Iraqi politicians still can't agree on who should run the two key ministries, defense and interior."

DOJ_NMG_0032246

Iraqi Minister Criticizes Spending By Foreign Aid Donors. The Financial Times (6/7, Biedermann) reports Ali Baban, Iraq's new minister of planning, has complained that foreign donors "spend too much of their aid to Iraq outside the country and ordinary Iraqis do not feel they are being helped by the international community." Baban "said he would push for a comprehensive review of the way aid to Iraq was being spent. He also warned against pressure from the likes of the International Monetary Fund on his country to scrap subsidies on oil products and food, which currently run at" $8 billion annually. Baban "also committed his ministry – responsible for development aid and investment – to creating a special division to woo foreign investors."

Family Of American Kidnapped In Iraq Profiled. In a front-page article, the Washington Post (6/7, Slevin, 744K) profiles the family of Indiana resident Jeff Ake, who was kidnapped last year while repairing machines in Iraq. According to the Post, "More than 430 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq since the war began in March 2003. … At last count, at least 13 Americans, including Ake, were among 42 foreigners still missing, their fate unknown." The article notes that Ake's youngest brother "joined the Army and recently received deployment orders for Iraq."

Fear Of Kidnappers Drives Baghdad Residents To Hide Wealth. Knight Ridder (6/6, Youssef) reports that fear of kidnapping is changing the habits of wealthy Baghdadis. According to the piece, "Those who can afford the best have replaced their nice cars for clunkers, don plain clothes, carry second-rate cell phones and no longer wear gold jewelry. … According to police estimates, at least 60 people are kidnapped in Baghdad every day, often by thugs seeking ransom. But paying thousands of dollars doesn't guarantee one's release; many bodies are found daily in alleys and fields, some beheaded. Most were kidnapped."

Car Bombings Kill Two US Soldiers In Afghanistan, Wound Four. The New York Times/Bloomberg (6/7) reports two US soldiers "were killed in a roadside bombing in Nangarhar Province, east of Kabul, a United States military spokeswoman said. A third soldier and an Afghan interpreter were wounded in the blast, she said. The military also said three American soldiers were wounded in a car bombing south of Kabul."

Thousands Of US Soldiers Suffer From Undiagnosed Brain Injuries. USA Today (6/7, 1a, Zoroya, 2.31M), in a front-page article titled, "Troops Risk Undetected Brain Injury: Researchers: Concussions from blasts often missed," reports, "Thousands of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan may be risking permanent brain damage by returning to combat with relatively minor but undiagnosed concussions, often caused by bomb blasts, military researchers say. Doctors say they are only now understanding the scope of the problem. Researchers screening returning soldiers and Marines at four military bases found that about 10% suffered at least a minor brain injury during combat. About 20% of troops in front-line infantry units suffered such injuries. The injuries frequently go undiagnosed because troops have no visible wounds or may not know they suffered a concussion, doctors say."

In an accompanying piece, USA Today (6/7, Zoroya, 2.31M) reports that screenings of the patients admitted to Walter Reed Army Medical Center show "almost 30%...have brain injuries," but Michael Kilpatrick, deputy director of deployment health support for the Pentagon "questions the accuracy of the screening. 'Multiple head injuries can lead to permanent brain damage that is irreversible, and you want to avoid that,' he says. 'But we don't have any criteria today that if you get X number of concussions, that you can't serve anymore.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Chair Concerned About Widening Options Probe. The AP (6/7) reports, "The growing number of public companies under investigation for possible backdating of stock options to boost top executives' compensation is a matter of 'serious concern' to the Securities and Exchange Commission, its chairman said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The number of public companies being investigated by the SEC or federal prosecutors has grown to more than 30 and executives at several companies have been fired in recent weeks. … 'We've already learned that the problems are more than episodic,' the SEC Chairman Christopher Cox told The Associated Press in response to questions. 'The apparently widespread nature of the problems is of serious concern' to the agency." The AP adds, "Among the companies that have disclosed receiving subpoenas or SEC requests for documents are big, well-known names like UnitedHealthGroup Inc. and Caremark Rx Inc. … Many are from the high-tech world, where stock options have long been a prized perk and incentive for executives and employees alike: Affiliated Computer Services Inc., Juniper Networks Inc., KLA-Tencor Corp., OpenWave Systems Inc., Vitesse Semiconductor Corp., McAfee Inc., Quest Software Inc., Rambus Inc., Sycamore Networks Inc. and others. … The SEC investigations have been ongoing for several months, and subpoenas have been issued by U.S. attorneys' offices in several cities, including New York."

DOJ_NMG_0032247

Lawmakers Blast Former Fannie Mae CEO Over Fraud Allegations. The AP (6/7, Gordon) reports, "The ousted former chief executive of Fannie Mae, Franklin Raines, was criticized by lawmakers and a federal regulator on Tuesday as a House panel aired government allegations of a six-year accounting fraud at the mortgage giant." The AP continues, "The regulator who oversees Fannie Mae blamed Raines and other senior company officials for the massive accounting failures and alleged manipulations designed to enrich executives. And the chairman of the subcommittee holding Tuesday's hearing, Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., contended that Raines probably lied to Congress when he testified about the debacle in October 2004." The AP adds, "Lawmakers, some of whom had been beneficiaries of Fannie Mae's campaign money, denounced the accounting misconduct, likened the company to Enron Corp. and urged legislative action to tighten the government's hand over Fannie Mae and its smaller government-sponsored sibling, Freddie Mac. … As a huge housing finance company chartered by Congress, "Fannie Mae has a special mandate and position of public trust. The previous management team, led by chairman and chief executive officer Franklin Raines, violated that trust," James B. Lockhart, acting director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, testified. 'By encouraging rapid growth, unconstrained by proper internal controls, risk management and other systems, they did serious harm to Fannie Mae while enriching themselves through earnings manipulation.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Official's Silence On Leak Prosecutions Angers Senators. The Washington Post (6/7, Pincus) reports, "Senior Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee sharply criticized a Justice Department official yesterday for refusing to say whether the Bush administration has ever considered prosecuting journalists for publishing leaked national security information." The Post continues, "The senators also bristled when Deputy U.S. Attorney Matthew W. Friedrich declined to answer questions about the rationale for the FBI's attempts to review the papers of the late columnist Jack Anderson. … 'You're basically taking what would be called a testifying Fifth Amendment. You should be ashamed of yourself, or your superiors should be ashamed of themselves,' Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) told Friedrich after he declined to answer questions from committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa)." The Post adds, "The purpose of the hearing, Specter said in opening the session, was to examine Justice Department efforts to control leaks, explore suggestions that newspapers and their reporters can be prosecuted under the 1917 Espionage Act and take comment on legislation that would protect reporters through a shield law. The law would provide an exception if national security matters were involved. … Friedrich, in his opening statement, confirmed that the Justice Department was prepared to investigate and prosecute leaks, but referred to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales's recent statement that the 'primary focus is on the leakers of classified information, as opposed to the press.' … When Friedrich confirmed that the department thought that journalists or 'anyone' could be prosecuted under the Espionage Act for publishing classified information, Specter asked specifically about whether the law could be applied to reporter James Risen of the New York Times, the newspaper that published an article in December about the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program. … 'Obviously, Senator, I can't comment as to any particular case or specific matter,' Friedrich said. He added that espionage laws 'do not exempt . . . any class of professional, including reporters, from their reach.'"

Knight Ridder (6/7, Hutcheson, Portillo) reports, "Professor Mark Feldstein was stunned when two FBI agents came to his house in March hoping to rummage through files that once belonged to deceased journalist Jack Anderson. … The agents left empty-handed, but the aborted search was one of several incidents that have raised concerns about the Bush administration's efforts to stamp out government leaks. At a Senate hearing Tuesday, administration critics accused the Justice Department of trampling press freedom in its zeal to protect secrets." Knight Ridder adds, "At stake is the public's right to know what its government is doing versus the need for secrecy to protect national security. The tension between these principles is as old as the republic. … Senators from both parties vented frustration over the administration's lack of openness. Tensions erupted at the Judiciary Committee hearing when Matthew Friedrich, chief of staff of the Justice Department's criminal division, declined to answer questions about the effort to search Anderson's old files. … 'I would think the department would send somebody up here to testify that could answer our questions, if they had any respect for this committee,' complained Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa. … 'They don't have any respect for this committee,' Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said to Friedrich. 'Why on earth were you sent up here? ... Is there any question you're allowed to answer?' … Friedrich said he couldn't discuss the matter because doing so could hinder efforts to prosecute Steven Rosen and Keith Weissman, pro-Israel lobbyists who have been accused of passing classified information to an Israeli diplomat and a journalist. Their indictment focused on activities from April 1999 to August 2004."

DOJ_NMG_0032248

Voice of America (6/7, Tate) reports, "U.S. lawmakers, concerned about recent federal investigations of journalists who publish classified information, are considering legislation to protect reporters from revealing information learned under the promise of confidentiality. The Senate Judiciary Committee is holding a series of hearings on the issue. On Tuesday, the panel focused on the case of the late investigative reporter Jack Anderson, whose archive of papers is being sought by the Federal Bureau of Investigation." VOA continues, "The FBI probe comes as the federal government is threatening to prosecute journalists who publish classified information and refuse to reveal their sources. The Justice Department is investigating several leaks that led to the publication of a CIA officer's name and news reports that the National Security Agency is wiretapping communications between people in the United States and suspected terrorists overseas." VOA adds, "At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Matthew Friedrich, chief of staff for the criminal division at the Justice Department, defended his agency's actions: 'Our primary focus is on prosecuting the leakers as opposed to other options, and our much preferred path would be to attempt to work with reporters voluntarily to convince them not to publish classified information, which could lead to compromise of our most sensitive technologies, harm our young men and women who serve in the service of our country, and cause damage,' he said. … But Friedrich refused to discuss the Anderson case, to the anger of Republican and Democratic senators alike."

The AP (6/7, Kellman) reports, "Friedrich refused to comment on the Anderson case, in which the FBI is seeking 50 years' worth of papers from the investigative journalist who exposed government scandals and earned a place on President Nixon's 'enemies list.' … Friedrich's response echoed deferrals by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other Justice Department officials in previous hearings on the administration's domestic wiretapping, phone tapping and other policies. Specter and other committee members grew exasperated." The AP adds, "Anderson's son Kevin, a lawyer, told the panel that he and his mother are prepared to face contempt charges if the FBI's effort to search the papers ever produces a subpoena or is upheld in court. … 'The family has met and decided that we would not abide by a subpoena if one were issued by the FBI,' Anderson said."

Utah Professor Denounces FBI Request As "Fishing Expedition." The Salt Lake Tribune (6/7, Gehrke) reports, "University of Utah political scientist Tim Chambless, who years ago cataloged 85 boxes of Jack Anderson's papers for use in his research, calls the FBI's demands 'a fishing expedition.' The documents he reviewed included some that 'were politically embarrassing to a few people.' But he said, 'There was nothing in there with regard to national security.' Chambless also wonders how much trolling the government has done in Anderson-related documents that had been in the public domain." In a recent visit to the National Archives to review declassified Anderson documents, Chambless "said he was concerned to find a number that had been removed from the file."

Salt Lake Tribune Denounces Friedrich's "Stonewalling" Of Senators. In a editorial, the Salt Lake Tribune (6/7) writes that "the FBI has tried to bully Anderson's blood and literary heirs into surrendering" the journalist's papers, and "Tuesday, when appropriate members of the U.S. Senate wanted to know the reason why, they were thoroughly stonewalled by one of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' assistants who, as Sen. Patrick Leahy was heard to fume, wasn't allowed to answer questions any more sensitive than his title and the time of day. … Any meaningful questions asked by senators, representatives or anyone else are turned away with the excuse that it would compromise anti-terror intelligence operations." The Tribune adds that "Gonzales is way off base, and we can only hope that the Congress will rein him in. It is espionage to steal secrets and keep them for your own advantage. It is freedom to expose dirty secrets and tell the American people what your government is doing, in your name and with your money."

FBI Raided Nigerian Official's Home In Search Of Jefferson Bribe Money. The New York Times (6/7, Shenon, 1.19M) reports the Federal Bureau of Investigation "raided the Maryland home of the vice president of Nigeria last summer in search of bribe money that the bureau believed had been paid to him by Representative William Jefferson, according to documents released on Tuesday." The documents "included an affidavit signed by an F.B.I. agent who said that the Nigerian vice president, Atiku Abubakar, now a candidate for president of that oil-rich West African nation, asked for at least half of the profits of a technology company controlled by Mr. Jefferson that was seeking to do business in Nigeria." The documents also say that "about the same time last year," Jefferson "told colleagues of his plans to bribe Nigerian officials, including Mr. Abubakar, in exchange for their help in winning business in Nigeria, and that Mr. Abubakar would be paid as much as $500,000 in cash."

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Meyer, 958K) reports Rep. Jefferson "allegedly told the FBI informant that in order to secure the Nigerian official's help with the technology project, Jefferson needed to deliver an upfront payment of $100,000 to Atiku while he was in the United States." Some time "after that, the informant provided Jefferson with the cash in a briefcase, according to one of the documents, an affidavit by FBI Special Agent Edward S. Cooper. The congressman later indicated that he had delivered the cash to Atiku on a late-night visit to the Potomac house, Cooper's affidavit said."

DOJ_NMG_0032249

The AP (6/7, Manning) reports Rep. Jefferson "called the package he allegedly delivered at midnight to the suburban Maryland home of Nigeria's vice president 'African art.' Authorities say the 'art' was meant to be cash — lots of it." Court documents "filed in the bribery probe of the Louisiana Democrat allege that Jefferson told an FBI informant he took the 'art,' which authorities believe was code for $100,000 in $100 bills, to the Potomac home of Atiku Abubakar on July 31."

Gonzales Defends FBI Search Of Jefferson's Office. The AP (6/7, Kropko) reports Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "defended the FBI's search of a congressman's office last month, saying it was an 'unusual step' but a necessary one." Gonzales "compared the May 20-21 search of Rep. William Jefferson's office to past investigations of federal lawmakers and searches of their homes and vehicles." Gonzales said, "There have been searches before by the executive branch of the legislative branch. We've searched before the homes of members of Congress. We've searched before the cars of members of Congress, even when they are parked in the garage on Capitol Hill."

Hoyer Criticizes Jefferson Over Refusal To Leave Ways and Means Committee. The Hill (6/7, Hearn) reports the "chances that Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) will keep his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee grew slimmer yesterday as House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) issued a stinging assessment of the embattled Louisianan's legal situation." Asked if "Democrats would seek to oust Jefferson forcibly from the panel even though he has yet to be charged with a crime," Hoyer said, "He sits on a tax-writing committee, and he had $90,000 found in his freezer. I think he's got a tax problem if nothing else." The Hill adds that on Tuesday night, "members of the House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee were expected to discuss Jefferson's dilemma at a members-only meeting. If Pelosi were to remove Jefferson forcibly, she would first have to put the issue to a vote of that body, which has jurisdiction over Democrats' committee assignments. That vote was not expected to occur last night, but she could pursue it at a later date."

LATimes Says Congress Should "Tread Softly" When Setting Rules For Judicial Branch. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/7, 958K) that Congress' "reverence for the separation of powers, so flagrantly on display in its continuing snit over the FBI's search of a House member's offices, goes by the wayside when it's Congress trespassing on someone else's turf. Take the repeated attempts by Congress to micromanage the work of the federal courts." The Times adds that "even in areas in which Congress can set rules for the judicial branch, it's the better part of wisdom for legislators to tread softly."

Former Lewis Aide Acknowledges Military Contractor Helped Buy House. The New York Times (6/7, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports Letitia Hoadley White, "a former top aide to the House defense appropriations subcommittee," acknowledged Tuesday "that the president of a military contractor had paid half the cost of a $1 million town house that they bought 11 months after she left the Congressional job." White, "now a prominent lobbyist, is already under scrutiny by federal prosecutors investigating the possibility that lawmakers and members of their staffs directed federal money to contractors in exchange for illicit payments. A spokesman for Ms. White said the purchase was a private arrangement between close friends." White was "for many years the top aide in charge of inserting pet projects, known as earmarks, into spending bills for Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California, when he led the House defense appropriations subcommittee." The person "who paid $500,000 toward the purchase of her house was Nicholas Karangelen, president of Trident Systems Inc., one of many companies that benefited from earmarks. In 2002, for example, the company received part of an $8 million joint contract for technology to survey battlefields."

Former Aide Paid For DeLay's Wife's Retirement Account. The Washington Post (6/7, A4, Smith, 744K) reports a "registered lobbyist opened a retirement account in the late 1990s for the wife of then-House Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and contributed thousands of dollars to it while also paying her a salary to work for him from her home in Texas, according to sources, documents and DeLay's attorney, Richard Cullen." The account "represents a small portion of the income that DeLay's family received from entities at least partly controlled by lobbyist Edwin A. Buckham. But the disclosure of its origin adds to what was previously known about the benefits DeLay's family received from its association with Buckham, and it brings the total over the past seven years to about half a million dollars." Buckham was "DeLay's chief of staff before he became a lobbyist at the end of 1998, shortly before the account was opened and the flow of funds began." Besides "financing the retirement account, Buckham played a role in two other streams of income that indirectly benefited DeLay."

DeLay "Disappointed" With Former Associates Over Guilty Pleas To Corruption Charges. USA Today (6/7, Kiely, 2.31M) reports former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay "said he's 'disappointed' in three ex-associates who pleaded guilty in a federal probe of political corruption, but he said their admissions 'doesn't mean I knew' of their efforts to bribe Congress." DeLay "told USA TODAY that he was surprised by revelations that Tony Rudy, a former top aide, and Jack Abramoff, a former lobbyist and longtime political supporter, tried to buy influence with lawmakers." DeLay said, "The Tony Rudy and Jack Abramoff I'm reading about in the papers are not the people I knew."

DOJ_NMG_0032250

Prosecutors Reportedly Seeking Deal With McKinney. The Atlanta Journal Constitution (6/7, Kemper) reports, "Federal prosecutors investigating the confrontation between Rep. Cynthia McKinney of Georgia and a Capitol police officer have been talking privately with McKinney's office in hopes of resolving the case without the spectacle of an indictment and trial, officials familiar with the talks say." Meanwhile, "prosecutors have subpoenaed at least six witnesses to appear before the jury over the last two months." And "McKinney's office rejected claims that there have been discussions of a plea agreement, saying the congresswoman has not been charged with anything and may never be, so there's no plea to negotiate." The Journal Constitution notes, "Negotiated settlements in cases as controversial and politically sensitive as McKinney's are common, according to former federal prosecutors and lawyers with experience in Washington's Superior Court. They said there is often pressure on the prosecutors from higher-ups at the Justice Department and possibly the White House to resolve such cases quickly and quietly." Meanwhile, "Capitol Hill police said they were dismayed that the investigation into McKinney's confrontation with the police officer is taking so long to resolve. They said failure to charge McKinney would send the message that it is all right to hit a police officer."

Gambino Capo Convicted Of Racketeering Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/7, Neumeister) reports Gambino capo Gregory DePalma "was convicted Tuesday of racketeering -- a verdict his lawyer said almost guarantees he will die in prison. … Joaquin Garcia, an FBI agent who posed as 'Big Jack' Falcone, had cozied up to DePalma and recorded thousands of hours of conversations that helped land the mobster. The FBI planted a cell phone on DePalma that picked up conversations even when it was off. Defense lawyer Martin Geduldig said after the verdict that it 'was just too difficult to overcome all of these tapes.'" The New York Daily News (6/7, Zambito, 729K) adds, "As the verdict was read, DePalma…groused about the FBI agents who took him down. … 'Maybe instead of them buying TVs from P.C. Richards, they should go out and get some terrorists,' he told lawyer John Meringolo. It was a reference to the six 'stolen' wide-screen sets given to him by FBI agent Joaquin Garcia." The New York Post (6/7, Cornell, 624K) notes, "The verdict was a notch in the belt of…Garcia, who has been called the 'modern-day Donnie Brasco' for his stunning two-year infiltration of the Gambino crime family."

Former Tennessee Senator Denies Taking Bribes As Trial Goes To Jury. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/7, Baird) reports, "A former Tennessee legislator charged with extortion took the stand in his own defense Tuesday and denied ever accepting payoffs from two FBI informants. Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon testified that he had supported legislation for E-Cycle Management…as a favor to friends and not for money. Dixon was the only defense witness, and jurors were to begin deliberations Wednesday." In his closing argument, "defense lawyer Coleman Garrett said Dixon is the victim of a government conspiracy based on a fake company that offered bribes for support of a proposed law that was never intended to pass." But "Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza said Dixon was not pressured into taking bribe money — 'He just took it.'"

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/7, Buser) notes that "Dixon was faced with explaining his words and actions on secret audio and video recordings that prosecutors say depict him selling his political influence by accepting cash payments from FBI informant Tim Willis." Dixon told jurors, "Tim Willis was my friend at the time and he knew he didn't have to pay me to get things done. I assumed it was to keep me doing the things I could do. I was under financial strain and obligations."

Chicago Water Official Testifies Sorich Make Him Hire Drunken Campaign Worker. The Chicago Tribune (6/7, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley's patronage chief ordered the hiring of a politically connected man who was 'somewhat of a drinker,' and he repeatedly engineered the promotions of workers with clout over more qualified candidates, the former No. 2 official in the city Water Department testified Tuesday." Donald Tomczak "said he complained vehemently when…Robert Sorich directed him to accept the transfer of the man with the drinking problem," telling "Sorich that the man, a political worker under Ald. Edward Burke…could cause injuries on Water Department job sites as a result of his drinking. But Tomczak said Sorich insisted: 'Work it out, Don.' Tomczak hired the man and put him to work near his office at the Jardine Filtration Plant, where he could 'keep an eye on him,' Tomczak said." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/7, Warmbir, Korecki) adds that when Tomczak testified "he could decide to award overtime on his own to city employees who took part in his political army. But Tomczak made clear that he did not have final say over hiring or promotions in his department. … Sorich's attorney, Thomas Durkin, took umbrage over the overtime question and appeared concerned that the prosecution was trying to link Sorich and his three co-defendants to the overtime scam -- although the prosecution never made any direct links."

DOJ_NMG_0032251

FBI Investigating New Angle To Alleged Fumo Link With Non-Profit. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/7, Lounsberry, Shiffman, Fitzgerald, McCoy, 423K) reports, "Federal authorities are exploring whether State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, to help pay for renovations at his mansion, directed a nonprofit to purchase a warehouse owned by the contractor, sources said. … A lawyer for the nonprofit defended the warehouse purchase, saying the group paid 'fair market value' after obtaining an appraisal. The FBI's new line of inquiry in its sprawling, three-year Fumo investigation began after agents raided electrical contractor Donald 'Gus' Dougherty's South Philadelphia home as part of a separate tax-fraud case." The Inquirer notes that one "person familiar with the renovations said that Dougherty's workers spent a year or more toiling within the mansion."

FBI Surveillance Tapes Played At Philadelphia Ticket-Fixing Trial. The Philadelphia Daily News (6/7, Hinkelman) reports, "Federal prosecutors portrayed Molden David Faison yesterday as a man who never met a concert ticket he didn't want -- or wasn't willing to fix parking tickets to get. The feds allege that Faison, a former hearing officer for the Bureau of Administrative Adjudication, used his job in August 2004 to extort $169 worth of tickets to a Prince concert. Prosecutor Judy Goldstein Smith played damning FBI audiotapes of conversations" in which informant John Florio "can be overheard giving Faison, who heard parking ticket appeals, the tag numbers and models of the vehicles with parking tickets he wanted dismissed."

Mississippi County Official Charged With Bribery, Witness Tampering. The AP (6/7) reports, "Bolivar County administrator Adrian Brown has been indicted on federal charges of accepting a kickback and tampering with a witness, authorities said Tuesday." Brown's arrest "was announced by the FBI, the U.S. attorney's office and the Bolivar County Sheriff's Department. Brown was indicated May 24 on the charges, officials said." FBI Jackson SAC John G. Raucci "said Brown is accused of soliciting and accepting a kickback for work for Bolivar County, which was to be reimbursed by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said Brown is also accused of attempting to intimidate a witness in the investigation." The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (6/7) also reports on Brown's indictment.

Suicidal Prosecution Witness Returns To Stand In New Jersey Corruption Trial. The New York Times (6/7, Mansnerus, 1.19M) reports the prosecution of former Middletown Township committeeman Raymond J. O'Grady "is the culmination of years of work by federal investigators, a tale opening a window on small-town graft that brought down more than a dozen public officials in a New Jersey county run by old-fashioned patronage politics. Now the trial has turned out to be a story of its own: the pivotal government witness — one day into his testimony last week against Mr. O'Grady, a longtime friend from Monmouth County politics — swallowed 60 to 80 blood-pressure pills in a suicide attempt. But on Tuesday, the government salvaged its case," as witness Anthony J. Palughi "took the stand again…despite objections by the defense to allowing the testimony to continue so soon after what Mr. O'Grady's lawyer called 'a miraculous recovery.'" The Times notes that O'Grady "is charged with taking $8,000 in cash to help steer municipal work to contractors, including two men who turned out to be agents from the F.B.I."

Bulger Associate Testifies About Corrupt Relationship Between FBI, Informants. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/7, Lavoie) reports, "Convicted gangster Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi, testifying Tuesday in a wrongful death lawsuit against the federal government" by the family of murdered informant John McIntyre, "described a corrupt relationship of favors, gifts and tip-offs between the FBI and its criminal informants. Flemmi said he and fugitive crime boss James 'Whitey' Bulger gave the FBI information about the Mafia, and in exchange, the FBI protected them from prosecution. Members of the Bulger gang also showered several FBI agents with cash as gifts to make sure that protection continued, Flemmi said." The AP adds, "Gail Marcinkiewicz, a spokeswoman for the Boston FBI office, would not comment on Flemmi's testimony directly, but said the U.S. attorney general and the FBI have revised their guidelines on criminal informants 'to minimize the chance that unchecked behavior could occur.' 'There have been changes over the course of time and increased oversight,' she said."

The Boston Globe (6/7, Murphy, 484K) reports Flemmi "offered a stark portrait yesterday of the days when he and…Bulger ruled Boston's underworld, getting away with murder after murder," as "one corrupt former FBI supervisor, John Morris, 'treated us like we were FBI agents,' Flemmi testified. His longtime FBI handler, John J. Connolly Jr., 'didn't treat me like I was a criminal, that's for sure. He didn't look down on me because I was an informant. He treated me like an equal, in my eyes.'" The Globe adds, "Flemmi testified for the first time yesterday that he and Bulger gave retired FBI agent Dennis Condon a gold ring with his initials on it. But Boston lawyer Michael Meyer, who represents Condon, flatly denied that allegation." The Boston Herald (6/7, Sweet, 220K) notes Flemmi "claimed…that the more blood he spilled with…Bulger, the bigger their FBI fan club grew. Former Boston FBI supervisor James Ring 'was aware of what we were doing. He condoned it,' Flemmi, 72, testified…explaining how Ring fawned over the two crime bosses, who also were the agency's prized informants."

DOJ_NMG_0032252

Arrest Of Connecticut Garbage Magnate In Crime Probe Could Be Imminent. The AP (6/7, Apuzzo) reports, "With the threat of indictments looming in a multistate investigation into organized crime in the garbage industry, the Justice Department recently told one of Connecticut's largest trash haulers: Don't come to us. We'll come to you." The AP continues, "James Galante, a Danbury garbage magnate and the acknowledged target of the FBI racketeering investigation, recently asked prosecutors to let him surrender if indicted, heading off a public arrest, his attorney said. … But prosecutors rejected the request, defense attorney Hugh Keefe said, leaving Galante waiting for a possible visit from the FBI and the region's garbage haulers wondering whether a series of arrests is imminent." The AP adds, "The industry has been on edge since federal agents raided dozens of homes and businesses in New York and Connecticut last summer, seizing truckloads of documents in an investigation into the so-called 'property rights' system. That system, in which garbage companies carve out and enforce exclusive territories, has led to violence and higher prices for customers, prosecutors in similar investigations have said. … With a grand jury meeting this week and attorneys expecting indictments soon, Keefe and others have asked that their clients be allowed to voluntarily show up for court rather than face arrest by the FBI."

New York Hedge Fund Scam Artist Pleads Guilty. The AP (6/7) reports former NYU student Hakan Yalincak "pleaded guilty to bank and wire fraud Tuesday, admitting he used his student ID and expertly forged documents to pose as the heir to a billionaire Turkish family and trick investors into pouring millions into a nonexistent hedge fund." Prosecutors "spent hours Tuesday describing how" Yalincak "charmed his way into the exclusive world of Greenwich high finance, shuttled counterfeit checks across the world and brokered deals with a Kuwaiti financier." Yalincak's fund, "the Daedalus Capital Relative Fund I, wasn't a legitimate investment and prosecutors said investors lost more than $7 million - a figure Yalincak said is overstated. Prosecutors say the money was spent on a Porsche, a Tiffany diamond and a $1.25 million donation to NYU."

Wisconsin Law Will Require Sex Offenders To Wear GPS Tracking Devices. USA Today (6/7, Koch) reports, "Hundreds of convicted sex offenders will have to wear a two-piece electronic tracking device for the rest of their lives under a new Wisconsin law." States are increasingly using GPS devices and "Congress may accelerate such efforts. The House and Senate have each passed sex offender bills this year that approve funding for GPS tracking. They need to craft a final bill."

Man Who Served 18 Years On Rape Charge Freed By DNA Evidence. The New York Times (6/7, Yardley) reports, "Eighteen years ago, James Calvin Tillman was arrested on charges of raping and kidnapping a woman after she left a bar in downtown Hartford. For 18 years, he insisted that he was innocent. And on Tuesday, he was freed." Tillman "had refused a plea deal, his family said, and was convicted and sentenced to 45 years in prison. His appeals failed. Distraught, he underwent psychiatric treatment in prison. He read the Bible and urged other inmates to read it, too. And, finally, in February 2005, he wrote to the Connecticut Innocence Project, which helps inmates who claim that they have been wrongly convicted." The Times continues, "The two public defenders who head the Connecticut Innocence Project located the victim's dress and pantyhose, which were collected as evidence in 1988, and had new DNA tests conducted. They found no match between Mr. Tillman and semen on the clothing. Based on that test, a judge in State Superior Court vacated his conviction on Tuesday and ordered a new trial. After the court session, Mr. Tillman's lawyers speculated that the charges would be dropped. The chief state's attorney, Christopher L. Morano, said, 'There are still some loose ends that need to be tied up and need to be examined,' a reference to an additional DNA test, and would not say whether he thought the case would go to trial again."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Reaches Deal With Gabelli On Cell Phone License Lawsuit. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Davies, Wilke) reports, "The Justice Department has reached a deal with Mario Gabelli in a civil-fraud suit that alleged the famed money manager was at the center of an effort to deceive the Federal Communications Commission in auctions of cellphone licenses." The Journal continues, "Assistant U.S. Attorney David Kennedy announced the settlement Tuesday during a hearing before U.S. District Judge Paul Crotty in Manhattan. Terms of the deal weren't disclosed but are expected to include a payment to the government of more $100 million, according to others briefed on the negotiations." He "also said in court that the government reached a settlement with Russell Taylor III, the private plaintiff who brought the initial civil suit against Mr. Gabelli, Lynch Interactive Corp. and other Gabelli affiliates. Mr. Taylor said he witnessed the alleged fraud while working as a paralegal and attorney at a law firm."

DOJ_NMG_0032253

USA Today (6/7, Davidson) notes, "Critics of the Federal Communications Commission's auction system" had "seized on the case as proof that deep-pocketed bidders set up sham companies to win discounts reserved for small businesses." It "comes three months after the Justice Department intervened in a civil fraud lawsuit, filed five years ago by a citizen under a law that lets an individual sue on the government's behalf." USA Today adds, "The lawsuit alleges Gabelli set up about a dozen sham companies in auctions from 1995 to 2000 to snare airwave licenses. The entities were formed a few days before each auction, often were dissolved shortly afterward and never used the licenses, many of which were later sold for huge profits, the lawsuit claims. The lawsuit seeks up to $370 million in damages."

Bloomberg (6/7, Glovin) reports, "The settlement, though not the terms, was announced today at a hearing in Manhattan federal court, Heather Tasker, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, said. Garcia's office recently sought permission to join the suit, which was filed in 2001 by attorney Rufus Taylor III under the federal False Claims Act. … Taylor's suit stemmed from Gabelli's role in Federal Communications Commission auctions in the 1990s. The government set aside cellular phone licenses to be sold to small businesses. Gabelli, 63, bankrolled ``sham'' startups that would qualify under the rules to get access to discounts, the suit claims."

The AP (6/7) reports, "The deal came after the government sought to intervene in a 5-year-old lawsuit brought by private parties alleging Gabelli and others should pay hundreds of millions of dollars in damages for their participation in auctions conducted by the Federal Communications Commission between 1995 and 2000. … The lawsuit, initially filed in Washington, accused Gabelli of rigging the system by creating phony companies which bid for wireless phone licenses at a discount under rules favoring minority and small businesses. He then resold the licenses at a profit, according to the government."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Special Prosecutor Rules Ohio Police Shootings Justifiable. News Net 5, Cleveland, OH (6/7) reports, "A special prosecutor ruled that five cases of the use of deadly force by Cleveland police officers were justifiable." News Net 5 continues, "The five fatal shootings took place in 2004 and 2005. The city appointed retired Judge Ellen Connally to investigate the cases and to make a decision about whether they were justified. … Connally ruled that all the officers involved in the shooting followed the guidelines outlined for the use of deadly force, and no charges will be filed in any of the cases, NewsChannel5 reported." News Net 5 adds, "Before making her decision, Connally reviewed the evidence, interviewed witnesses, looked over photographs and talked with the coroner. … She ruled four of the shootings justifiable. But one of the shootings included a confrontation between Cleveland police and 14-year-old Brandon McCloud. … All five cases are still being reviewed by the U.S. Justice Department."

Gay Marriage Amendment Headed For Defeat In Senate. The AP (6/7, Kellman) reports, "The constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage is headed toward certain defeat Wednesday despite a fresh appeal for passage by President Bush. While a majority of Americans oppose gay marriage, an equal majority oppose amending the Constitution to prohibit it, according to a poll this week by ABC News." And, "according to one Republican, Americans do not yet buy the warning that traditional marriage is under attack by renegade judges. 'Most Americans are not yet convinced that their elected representatives or the judiciary are likely to expand decisively the definition of marriage to include same sex couples,' said Sen. John McCain." The Washington Times (6/7, Fagan, 90K) says "sponsors of the marriage proposal expect about 52 votes today on a motion to cut off debate and force a final vote. The motion would need 60 votes to pass, and the amendment itself would need two-thirds, or 67 votes, to be approved."

Under the headline "For Foes Of Same-Sex Marriage, It's The Thought That Counts," the Washington Post (6/7, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports, "There's violence in Iraq, corruption in the House and anxiety in the markets. Somebody needs to create a diversion. 'The gays are aggressive! Gays have called war! Gays are attacking traditional marriage!' Bishop Harry Jackson was shouting these words outside the Capitol yesterday morning, at a rally for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage." The "urgency" of the amendment supporters' "alarm is a bit suspect to anybody with an eye on the electoral calendar."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/7, Ward, 90K) reports "black pastors and civil rights leaders yesterday held separate rallies on Capitol Hill, staking opposite positions on a constitutional amendment aimed at banning homosexual 'marriage.'"

Dowd Says Administration Is "Hatemongering" Over Gay Marriage. Maureen Dowd writes in the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M), "The Bushes have always been good at using bogeymen to their political advantage. … W. prefers tactical bêtes noires to real ones. … W. ignored the gay marriage issue in the 19 months after he used it to help him stay in the White House. To reprise it now, knowing it has no chance of passing, is so transparent that surely even the most blinkered 'values' voters see through it." Dowd adds, "I know Republicans are desperate. But does it make sense to use gay love to hatemonger here when we have so much real hate coming at us from abroad?"

DOJ_NMG_0032254

WSJournal Says Activist Judges Created Gay Marriage Anxiety. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) editorializes, "We remain opposed to federal interference in" the issue of same sex marriage, "believing that issues of family life and law are best settled in state legislatures. Yet given the way activist courts have turned gay marriage into a national issue, it's no surprise that Congress joined the fray." The amendment vote "can't be understood outside of the anxiety created by activist courts. Justice Kennedy wrote the majority opinion in the 2003 Lawrence case that banned state anti-sodomy laws. So sweeping was his 'privacy right' language that it took only a few months for the Massachusetts Supreme Court to use Lawrence to justify its decision to impose a right to gay marriage there. … So here we go again with another values issue about to become an endlessly polarizing national debate."

EEOC Reaches Settlement With Verizon On Pregnancy Bias Lawsuit. The Washington Post (6/6, Joyce) reports, "Verizon Communications Inc. will pay almost $49 million to 12,326 current and former female employees as part of a landmark class-action lawsuit alleging pregnancy discrimination." The EEOC "reached a settlement in 2002 against Verizon predecessors Nynex Corp. and Bell Atlantic Corp. But the total amount of the settlement was not made public until yesterday, when the EEOC completed its projections of how much would be paid in future benefits." The Post notes, "The final figure makes the case the largest pregnancy discrimination settlement in EEOC history. It covers women in 13 states and the District." The companies "were accused of violating federal law by denying women pension and other benefit accruals when they spent time on pregnancy or maternity leave."

Blanco To Sign Restrictive Louisiana Abortion Bill. The New York Times (6/7, Alford, 1.19M) reports Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco's office "said Tuesday that she would shortly sign into law a strict ban on abortion that would permit abortion only in the case where a woman's life was threatened by pregnancy." The bill, "approved by both houses of the Legislature and sent to the governor on Monday, would go into effect only if the United States Supreme Court overturned Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision establishing a constitutional right to abortion, and allowed states to criminalize abortion."

LOC Transgender Discrimination Case Moves To Discovery Phase. Roll Call (6/7, Mcardle) reports, "A full year after filing a discrimination lawsuit against the Library of Congress, Diane Schroer, who is preparing for surgery to complete her transition as a male-to-female transsexual, has only now seen her civil rights case move into the discovery phase. But in the 12 months since the case was brought, Schroer's suit already has forced the U.S. District Court to take a hard look at how sexual discrimination laws apply to the Congressional workplace." Roll Call explains that Schroer filed the Title VII suit last June 2 after being denied a position as an analyst within the Congressional Research Service. LOC lawyers, Roll Calls says, "argued in their response last fall that transsexual individuals are not considered members 'of a protected class as required by Title VII' and thus the case should be dismissed. … 'The term sex, as used in Title VII, prohibits discrimination based on the biological state of a male or female,' the U.S. Attorney's office argued in its response last fall. 'District Courts in this Circuit, as well as in many other circuits, have never held that transsexuals are a protected group under Title VII.'" Denying the motion to dismiss ten weeks ago, the judge noted that "the failure of numerous attempts to broaden Title VII to cover sexual orientation says nothing about Title VII's relationship to sexual identity. ... There are facts that Schroer could prove which would support her claim that the Library refused to hire her solely because of her sexual identity, and that in so doing, the Library discriminated against her 'because of ... sex.'"

Senate To Consider Bill Of Hawaiian Self-Government. The Senate this week is expected to consider a measure that would allow Hawaiians to govern themselves as Native Americans and Alaskans do. The Washington Times (6/7, Debose, 90K) reports that Sen. Daniel K. Akaka "says the bill is a way to give 'indigenous' Hawaiians a sense of pride and a chance for sovereignty for the first time since 1893, when Queen Liliuokalani was deposed and lands were illegally seized by US Marines and a cadre of sugar-plantation businessmen." The bill "calls for an Office of Native Hawaiian Relations in the Department of the Interior, and a Native Hawaiian Interagency Coordinating Group to administer programs, a commission that would certify who are indigenous Hawaiians, and provides a process of reorganization of the Native Hawaiian governing entity."

NYTimes Says Concerns About Hawaii Bill Are Misplaced. An editorial in the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M) says concerns that the bill to extend federal recognition to Native Hawaiians as indigenous people that Hawaii "will become a balkanized banana republic" are "misplaced." The measure "explicitly forbids casinos, a touchy subject in Hawaii. Any changes a Hawaiian government seeks would have to be negotiated with state or federal authorities. As has always been the case on those eight little islands, everyone will have to find a way to get along."

DOJ_NMG_0032255

Facing Receivership Threat, Williams Fires DC's Mental Health Director. On its front page today, the Washington Post (6/7, A1, Montgomery, Barker) reports District of Columbia Mayor Anthony Williams "fired the director of the District agency that cares for the mentally retarded yesterday in hopes of averting a court takeover of the troubled bureaucracy, which is facing fresh allegations of abuse and neglect in city-funded group homes." Marsha Thompson, who had been on the job "barely a year," will be replaced by retired Alabama mental health commissioner Kathy Elmore Sawyer, who "will work under a six-month contract that ends shortly before Williams (D) leaves office in January." The Post notes, "Several advocates called Sawyer a respected administrator with a sterling reputation," however, "the move will not stave off a push to have a receiver take control of the agency, the target of a 1976 class action lawsuit over care of the mentally disabled." The Post says such a federal takeover "would mark a major embarrassment for Williams during his final year in office." The Post adds, "Two weeks ago, as plaintiffs requested a receiver, the U.S. Justice Department urged the judge to hold the District in contempt of court because, it said, the city had not met promises to improve health care and other services at group homes and because of 14 preventable and questionable deaths since January 2003. The papers gave vivid and startling details about the extent of the abuse, which ranged from severe scaldings to fatal starvation."

In an editorial today, the Washington Post (6/7, A22) notes Sawyer will be the District's 19th head of mental health services since 1994. "If the mayor is seeking immediate stability in that agency through the appointment of one individual, albeit a highly qualified professional, his search will more than likely be in vain. The problem at the [agency] is not that it hasn't been led by a reformer with dedication, compassion and a vision. The problem rests below the agency head. It can be found within the agency and the group homes it oversees. Those places have more than their share of unqualified workers" who "should be nowhere near vulnerable people… Unless the mayor has the fortitude and is willing to wade in with the administrator and stand down the bureaucracy and special interests, i.e., contractors; unless he is prepared to rid the payroll of incompetents, and clean house from top to bottom, then director No. 19 will soon give way to Nos. 20 and 21 and 29." The Post concludes, "Cleaning up that mess requires more than hiring an outsider with a good reputation. It needs the backing of a mayor who places reform of a critical and much-neglected agency ahead of a trip to South Korea, where Mr. Williams is heading today."

Friedman Praises US Diversity. Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M), "I went to a high school graduation Monday and a United Nations meeting broke out. … There were some 700 kids receiving their diplomas, and as I sat there for two hours listening to each one's name pronounced, I became both fascinated and touched by the stunning diversity — race, religion, ethnicity — of the graduating class." If there is "one reason to still be optimistic about America it is represented by the stunning diversity of the Montgomery Blair class of 2006. America is still the world's greatest human magnet. We are not the only country that embraces diversity, but there is something about our free society and free market that still attracts people like no other."

Westmoreland Says Voting Rights Act Should Be Modernized. Rep. Lynn Westmoreland writes in The Hill (6/7) that the Voting Rights Act should be modernized ""to reflect the reality of today — a reality strongly shaped by the successes of the original legislation." Despite Georgia's "revolutionary strides in voter equality, the Voting Rights Act still treats Georgia as if it's a backward society governed by the laws of Jim Crow. … Renewing the law as it is would keep Georgia in the penalty box for 25 more years." Westmoreland concludes, "The Voting Rights Act has served our nation well. We dishonor the accomplishments of the law if we pretend nothing's changed since 1965."

NYTimes Criticizes Ohio Voter Registration Regulations. The New York Times (6/7, 1.19M) editorializes, "The latest sign that Republicans have an election-year strategy to shut down voter registration drives comes from Ohio. As the state gears up for a very competitive election season this fall, its secretary of state, J. Kenneth Blackwell, has put in place 'emergency' regulations that could hit voter registration workers with criminal penalties for perfectly legitimate registration practices. The rules are so draconian they could shut down registration drives in Ohio." The Times adds, "Decisions about who can vote are being made by a candidate for governor. Mr. Blackwell should hand over responsibility for elections to a decision maker whose only loyalty is to the voters and the law."

ANTITRUST:

ACLU Asks FCC To Pause ATT-Bell South Merger. The New York Times (6/7, Belson) reports the American Civil Liberties Union "asked the Federal Communications Commission yesterday to withhold approval of AT&T's acquisition of BellSouth until it reviews allegations that the companies gave customer records to the government without warrants." Arguing that the Telecommunications Act requires an evaluation of the costs and benefits of the merger, the ACLU "said the F.C.C. should determine if AT&T and BellSouth handed over phone records to the National Security Agency's surveillance program and, if so, whether that violated any privacy laws." FCC Chairman Kevin Martin "said last month that the commission could not investigate reports of the companies' cooperation with the security agency because the agency's activities were classified," and yesterday an FCC spokeswoman "declined to comment on the filing."

DOJ_NMG_0032256

Telecom Firms Seek To Block AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The San Antonio Business Journal (6/7) reports, "A group of seven telecommunications companies have filed comments with the Federal Communications Commission asking regulators to block the planned $67 billion merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp." The Journal continues, "San Antonio-based AT&T needs approvals from 18 states, the U.S. Justice Department and the FCC in order to proceed with the merger -- which could close by the end of the year. The merger already has been approved in eight states and two foreign countries. … The group of companies claim the AT&T-BellSouth merger will only create a dominant player that will be able to thwart competition through its increased control over local networks and other communications services." The Journal adds, "Through its acquisition of Atlanta-based BellSouth, AT&T -- already the nation's largest provider of local voice, long-distance and broadband DSL services -- will only further move the company toward monopoly status, the companies claim. … The companies that are asking the FCC to block the merger are Cbeyond Communications in Atlanta; Grande Communications in San Marcos; NuVox Communications in Greenville, S.C.; Supra Telecom in Orlando; Talk America in New Hope, Pa.; XO Communications in Reston, Va. and Xspedius Communications LLC in O'Fallon, Mo. … They say the AT&T-BellSouth merger would extend the company's footprint to 22 states and further cement its standing as the nation's largest wireless provider by controlling all the stock of Cingular Wireless."

Broadcasting & Cable (6/7, Eggerton) reports, "In a conference call with reporters discussing their filings with the FCC in opposition to the merger, several of the groups argued that, unless the FCC requires AT&T to spin-off wireless company Cingular after the merger and to divest itself of wireless spectrum they argue has been warehoused, the 'best case' scenario from the merger would be an 'entrenched DSL cable monopoly for Internet access. That's because they said the merged company would likely sit on spectrum that could be used for wireless Internet access in competition to DSL. … 'If the FCC doesn't "do the right thing,"' said Jonathan Rubin of the American Antitrust Institute, 'there is potential for some kind of major litigation.'"

EU Officials Says Microsoft's Reputation Is At Stake. Bloomberg (6/7) reports, "European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said Tuesday that Microsoft Corp. should be concerned about its reputation as well as the financial impact of antitrust rulings." Bloomberg continues, "Kroes, who will decide before the end of July whether to impose daily fines of $2.6 million on Microsoft, said the software maker should take account of its image. … 'It's not only a matter of financial aspects in such cases, it's also a matter of reputation,' Kroes said at a European Parliament meeting in Brussels, Belgium." Bloomberg adds, "The European Commission, the European Union's antitrust regulator, is threatening to fine Microsoft unless it licenses information on the way its Windows operating system shares printers and files to rival software developers. The regulator says the company hasn't provided 'complete and accurate' information to rivals. … Microsoft, whose Windows operating system runs on about 95 percent of the world's personal computers, was fined in March 2004 for abusing its dominant market position by failing to make technical information available and for bundling its media player with Windows."

UK Airports Operator OKs Takeover Bid From Spain's Ferrovial. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Johnson, Singer) reports, "United Kingdom airports operator BAA PLC approved a £10.1 billion ($18.9 billion) takeover offer from Spanish builder Grupo Ferrovial SA, paving the way for a mammoth European infrastructure deal that highlights investors' appetite for companies with stable returns." The deal "appears to have trumped a rival bid by a consortium led by Goldman Sachs Group Inc." Yet "questions remain over how Ferrovial can boost profitability at BAA's regulated businesses enough to justify the bid's hefty premium. Some airlines expressed concern that the deal could lead to higher expenses."

The New York Times/IHT (6/7, Clark) adds that a BAA spokesman said it "had chosen the bid from Ferrovial over the one from Goldman because it offered the greatest certainty for shareholders in the near term." The Times notes, "BAA controls two-thirds of Britain's airports, and its dominant position has long been a source of concern for airlines, which complain that the company has the power to set arbitrarily high fees for landing rights and other airport services."

Chirac Seeks To Boost German Bid For Euronext Merger. Reflecting the concerns of some French banks about the impact of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance law, the Wall Street Journal (6/7, MacDonald, Taylor) reports, "French President Jacques Chirac said he would rather see financial-exchange operator Euronext NV merge with Deutsche Börse AG than with NYSE Group Inc., giving some heart to the German exchange operator as it seeks to win Euronext despite last week's merger agreement between the European and U.S. exchanges." Encouraged, "by Mr. Chirac's remarks, Deutsche Börse Chief Executive Reto Francioni and Chairman Kurt Viermetz are on a lobbying trip to Paris today to sound out ways Deutsche Börse can make its offer 'more attractive' to shareholders without making significant changes from what has been offered up until now, a person familiar with the matter said."

DOJ_NMG_0032257

The New York Times (6/7, Kanter) reports, "Speaking in Germany alongside the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, Mr. Chirac said that he preferred a European merger and would 'regret if this solution is not adopted in the end.'" Yet "he made clear that his priority was to preserve jobs in Paris, even if it meant tying the knot with the Americans rather than Deutsche Börse, based in Frankfurt." He "also acknowledged that he had only 'very limited ways to intervene' in the deal." And "Merkel was even more circumspect, saying that governments like those in France and Germany could not exert influence over merging companies, even if she were 'of the opinion that it is good to build up strong economic units within Europe.'"

Mittal Executive Questions Arcelor Shareholder Voting Procedure. Wilbur Ross, a nonexecutive director of Mittal Steel Company and CEO of W.L. Ross and Co., in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/7) argues that Arcelor steel company's attempt to block a merger with Mittal by agreeing to a deal with Russian steel producer Severstal is unfair because "it will pass unless more than 50% of the entire share capital of the company votes against it. This is most unusual. Normally when contemplating such a move, a company would seek the approval of its shareholders, and the threshold would be 66% of the capital either present or represented at the meeting. This is a deliberately prohibitive barrier. The percentage of the capital normally represented at an Arcelor general meeting is below 35%. There has never been a case in which 50% of the shares were represented at such a meeting -- never mind them all voting in the same direction."

Merged Airline Faces Increased Customer Complaints. In a detailed report of escalating traveler complaints, the Wall Street Journal (6/7, Trottman) reports, "US Airways Group Inc. faces substantial challenges in integrating operations following last year's merger between the old US Airways and America West Holdings Corp. Among them, it has to keep inevitable technology glitches from alienating its customers. … The outcome has been far less than perfect." The Journal explains a serious of technical problems related to the merged airline's combined web site, and notes "customer calls are pouring into the airline's 24-hour Internet help desk" with significant answer delays. However, "the site does have some improvements. Users of the old USAirways.com will now have an improved booking engine with a feature that helps them determine which travel days have lower fares, for example. And users of the old America West site will be able to book United Airlines flights online through a code-share agreement."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Lawmakers Make Case For ANWR Exploration. Reps. Greg Walden and Marsha Blackburn, members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, write in the Washington Times (6/7, 90K) that the "flurry of hearings, markups and energy policy debates that ensued" following Hurricane Katrina "produced bills that, taken together, contemplate a strategy of energy security." The House "recently voted, yet again, to open a sliver of the Alaskan tundra, the Alaskan National Wildlife Refuge, to exploration. Some of the upcoming Senate debate will be a replay of what we've heard for decades from the anti-energy crowd. … The list of silly, flimsy or fact-free objections goes on and on, and it has the uncanny ability to survive dramatic advances in technology and safety, not to mention repeated applications of truth." They add, "The House majority has said no to fear and politics and yes to providing American energy for American workers at a price they can afford to pay. Now it's the Senate's turn."

Johanns Says Bird Flu Easily Detected. In an interview with the AP (6/7, Neergaard), Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said, "Scientists have a new test that can tell within four hours if a bird is possibly infected with bird flu—but it still will take about a week to know if that suspect case is really sick with the deadly Asian strain." Meanwhile, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt told the AP, "Four hours also is how long it takes to get preliminary results in people infected with the H5N1 virus." However, if bird flu ever begins spreading easily among people, Leavitt said "that's too long," so US researchers are working to develop "faster human tests for the disease as well as vaccines and treatments."

SCOTUS Refuses To Hear Appeal Of Seneca Tribe's New York Land Claim. The Buffalo News (6/7, Buckham, Cardinale) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday refused to reinstate the Seneca Nation of Indians' claim over the properties of 18,000 residents (in Grand Island,

DOJ_NMG_0032258

NY), ending a 13-year fight that had many residents fearing that they would be forced from their homes." The News continues, "The Senecas sued in 1993 to 'recover' Grand Island and about 40 other islands in the Niagara River, claiming they had been illegally taken in an 1815 treaty with New York State. … U.S. District Judge Richard J. Arcara ruled in 2002 that the Senecas had never lived on the islands and, if they had any right to them, had negotiated them away before 1815. His ruling was upheld by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in September." The News adds, "Town Supervisor Peter McMahon applauded Monday's refusal by the Supreme Court to hear the Senecas' last appeal. … McMahon said he found it interesting that the U.S. Justice Department, whose intervention on the Senecas' behalf enabled them to sue in the first place, filed a last-minute brief contending that the appeal had no merit. … But Joseph F. Crangle, who represented the Seneca Nation when the case was filed, said: "m disappointed. There is no question that the treaty [of 1815] included islands in the Niagara River, and I think Grand Island is in the Niagara River. This is a good example of how people can rewrite history.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Announces $2.75 Million Grant To Fight Gangs In Cleveland Area. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (6/7, Tobin) reports, "Greater Cleveland will get $2.75 million from the Justice Department to help fight street gangs, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday during a visit to the area. … 'Obviously, the fact that Cleveland was selected shows there is a gang problem,' Gonzales said during a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse downtown." The Plain Dealer continues, "Most of the money - $2.5 million - will be spent in Cleveland over three years and focus on prevention, law enforcement and prison re-entry. A committee focused on the gang problem will determine by autumn exactly how the money will be spent. … An additional $250,000 will pay for six suburban police officers to work in schools. The officers will help oversee projects to keep students out of gangs. Chagrin Falls, East Cleveland, Parma and Warrensville Heights were selected for the Gang Resistance Education and Training grants. … 'It gives the children a law enforcement officer they can call 24/7,' said U.S. Marshal Peter Elliot, whose office started the program in Greater Cleveland. 'It helps break down stereotypes and distrust of law enforcement.'" The Plain Dealer adds, "In Cleveland, more than 90 gangs are involved in drug dealing and street violence. The gangs are no longer nationally organized, like the Crips and Bloods. … Instead, they are looser groups of kids hanging on the streets, according to the Cleveland Unified Gang Task Force. … Cleveland was selected for the money along with Los Angeles, Milwaukee, Tampa, Dallas and the corridor in Pennsylvania between Lancaster and Easton. … Gonzalez said those cities were chosen because the government felt the money would have the most impact there. … 'These are gangs who are involved in very serious crime,' Gonzales said. 'They are robbing our youth of productive futures.' … Assistant U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said law enforcement, community and church groups will meet over the summer to determine how to best spend the money."

Wanted Bay-Area Hells Angels Leader Surrenders To FBI. KPIX-TV San Francisco (6/6) reports on its Web site, "The leader of the Santa Rosa Hells Angels motorcycle club chapter turned himself into the FBI Tuesday and was placed under arrest for suspicion of drug possession and distribution, officials said. Federal agents had been searching for…Raymond Foakes since last week when law enforcement officers raided six locations around Santa Rosa, including the Hells Angels headquarters there, as part of an ongoing drug probe." KPIX notes, "He was one of 42 Hells Angels members indicted in the United States District Court in Las Vegas on federal racketeering and firearms charges." The AP (6/7) also reports on the arrest and adds, "Another Hells Angels associate, Michael Vargas, remained at large Tuesday, FBI spokeswoman LaRae Quy said."

Violent New Jersey Drug Dealer Sentenced To Life In Prison. The Camden Courier Post (6/3) reported, "Bernard Murray of Camden, convicted almost exactly a year ago for his participation in a large-scale drug operation that relied on murder as an enforcement tool, was sentenced…to life plus 85 years in a federal prison" on Friday. Representatives of three murder victims spoke at the sentencing hearing, asking for a harsh term for Murray," and "the sentence is the longest that court officials could recall." WPVI-TV Philadelphia (6/2) also reported on Murray's sentence, adding, "Meanwhile, his partner…Enrique Perez, another leader of the gang, got 25 years in prison. … Perez received a lesser sentence due to his cooperation with authorities."

Federal "Weed & Seed" Money Will Help Charlotte, NC, Fight Crime. News 14, Charlotte, NC (6/7) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department is committing about $1 million to revitalize a crime-ridden area of east Charlotte." News 14 continues, "It is partnering with local businesses and the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Police Department to implement the 'Weed and Seed' program in the Central Avenue corridor. … The money will pay for community and faith-based initiatives that are designed to

DOJ_NMG_0032259

"weed out" crime, gangs and drugs while "seeding" economic development." News 14 adds, "The Central Avenue corridor is one of more than 300 'Weed and Seed' sites in the country. .. 'We're going to measure success if we see a decline of truancy in the schools,' U.S. Attorney Gretchen Shappert said Tuesday. 'We're going to measure success if we see a decrease in gang activity. We're going to measure success if we see increased economic development.'"

Guns, Drugs Seized In New Jersey, 3 Arrested. The Trenton (NJ) Times (6/6, Ratcliffe) reports, "Guns, ammunition and drugs were seized and three men were arrested on related charges when authorities raided three residences in Trenton and Hamilton on Sunday night. … The raids…were the result of a three-month investigation by Trenton detectives, the Mercer County Prosecutor's Office and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. Police said the probe began after neighborhood residents tipped authorities to a suspected drug distribution ring operating from the three residences."

Pittsburgh Police Confiscate Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Packets. According to the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/7, Silver), Pittsburgh police "have confiscated more than 1,000 packets of the type of fentanyl-laced heroin suspected of causing up to six overdose deaths in Allegheny County since Sunday, but it was unclear how much of a dent the seizure would put in the supply on the street. During a news conference yesterday, police revealed few details about their activities -- including a large bust Monday in Hazelwood that netted 1,050 stamp bags of the deadly brand of heroin marked 'Get High or Die Trying.' … Three drug dealers have been arrested, but police would not provide their names. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is also involved, but DEA Special Agent Rick McGoldrick in Philadelphia declined to provide specifics."

In a separate story, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/7, Toland) reports that at one point, "It was apparent that lots of street brands were mixed with fentanyl (and in some cases, investigators now believe, doses contained no heroin at all, just fentanyl). In the Philadelphia and South Jersey region, 'fefe' was complemented by bags labeled 'flatline,' 'exorcist' and 'Al Capone,' references to the packages' dangerous contents. In Harrisburg and elsewhere, the bags were labeled 'apollo.'"

The Pittsburgh Tribune Review (6/7, Greenwood) reports, "Pittsburgh police seized 21 bricks of fentanyl-laced heroin, putting a 'serious dent' in the flow of the concoction that city detectives Tuesday blamed for six deaths in Allegheny County."

Addicts Seek Out Lethal Mixture, More Overdoses Reported. In Pittsburgh, KDKA-TV (6/7) reports on its Web site, "Addicts are now purposely seeking out the deadly drug laced with the pain killer fentanyl. They want to try it, despite its potential to be lethal."

KDKA-TV (6/6) also reports, "The fourth reported death from a heroin overdose happened in the Oakland section of the city [Monday] night. … Police were called to another drug overdose early Tuesday morning at a home…on the South Side. The person survived."

Newspaper Seeks List Of Victims. The Detroit Free Press (6/7) editorializes, "Authorities have not responded to a Free Press request for the names of the victims, other than to ask for more time. If there is not a master list of the victims, the sleuths charged with tracing the drugs are not doing a very good job, since the list would be the basis for finding commonalities that might lead someplace."

Maryland AG's Office Denies Approving Release Of Security Information. The Baltimore Sun (6/7, Dresser) reports the Maryland Attorney General's Office "is denying an assertion that Maryland Transportation Authority Police Chief Gary W. McLhinney received the approval of state lawyers before releasing sensitive security information last month. The documents McLhinney released included the names of Secret Service agents and other security officers providing executive protection to state and federal officials and their families - details government agencies generally resist disclosing." The Sun says it was "seeking forms detailing police escorts to 'private citizens (non-government employees).' Nevertheless, McLhinney released 305 pages that included details of travel through BWI by U.S. Cabinet secretaries, National Security Agency and Drug Enforcement Administration officials and other officials."

Former Doctor Investigated By DEA Accused Of Malpractice. The Tucson (AZ) Citizen (6/6) reports, "One week after being sentenced to life in prison and having his medical license yanked, Bradley Alan Schwartz was expected in court today for the start of a malpractice trial. … Laurie Espinoza, Schwartz's former office manager, is expected to say that Schwartz appeared drugged at the time he operated on Garrett Hoxie, then a high school student, in November 2001. Espinoza says Schwartz didn't kick his drug habit until early 2002, after learning that the Drug Enforcement Administration was investigating him."

Arizona Reliever's House Searched In Baseball's Steroid Investigation. The AP (6/7) reports federal investigators "searched Arizona Diamondbacks reliever Jason Grimsley's house Tuesday as part of their investigation of steroid use in baseball. Thirteen agents searched Grimsley's house in Scottsdale, Ariz., for six hours, according to Internal Revenue Service Agent Mark Lessler, who would not say what they found." Grimsley "allegedly made 'extensive statements' about illegal drug use, 'for the purpose of performance enhancement,' according to the court documents. … According to Novitsky, Grimsley told him the names of other players he believed were using, but the names of those players were blacked out of the court records."

DOJ_NMG_0032260

The Arizona Republic (6/7) writes, "Grimsley admitted taking illegal performance-enhancing drugs and said that amphetamines were used 'like aspirin' in major league clubhouses, according to an affidavit filed by the lead federal investigator in baseball's steroid investigation. The affidavit…said Grimsley agreed to cooperate with U.S. Internal Revenue Service agents after Grimsley received a package containing two kits of human growth hormone April 19 at his Scottsdale home."

Cable TV Coverage. ESPN (6/7, 12:00 a.m.) reported, "Diamondback pitcher Jason Grimsley [is] embroiled in the BALCO scandal. He admitted to using illegal performance-enhancing drugs and said amphetamines were used like aspirin in major league clubhouses. He also provided details of his knowledge of other major leaguers using steroids. "

Local TV Coverage. KSAZ-TV, Phoenix (6/6, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "The baseball drug scandal hits close to home as 13 federal investigators search the house of Diamondback pitcher Jason Grimsley for over six hours today. According to an affidavit filed in US district court, Grimsley admitted to using growth hormones, amphetamines, and steroids. Apparently cooperated with the feds, naming names of other players that may have used performance-enhancing drugs."

KOLD-TV, Tucson-Sierra Vista, Arizona (6/6, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "Federal investigators have searched the home of Arizona Diamondbacks reliever Jason Grimsley today as part of their investigation of steroid use in baseball. IRS agent Mark Lessler says 13 agents searched Grimsley's Scottsdale home for six hours. Lessler wouldn't say what they found."

Montel Williams To Back Medicinal Use Of Marijuana In New Jersey. The AP (6/7) reports television personality Montel Williams "plans to tell a New Jersey Senate panel on Thursday how marijuana relieves his chronic pain caused by multiple sclerosis, and urge New Jersey lawmakers to enact medical marijuana laws, as 11 other states already have. … Williams, a registered medical marijuana user in California, said he became an activist pushing for medical marijuana laws after being stopped at a Detroit airport by an Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms officer for carrying drug paraphernalia. The charge was later dropped." Gov. Jon S. Corzine "said last year that he would sign a medical marijuana bill into law."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Says Immigration Reform Incomplete Without Guest Worker Program. The AP (6/7, Loven) reports from Artesia, NM, that President Bush "declared progress Tuesday in tightening the nation's southern border and pushing major immigration changes through Congress despite widespread skepticism that lawmakers can find a compromise." The President "brushed aside bitter divisions over the issue, saying the fact that there is active debate at all is cause for optimism." After visiting New Mexico, the President "took in a video surveillance operation at the Border Patrol headquarters in Laredo, Texas, also hot and dry, and a busy crossing point near Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, where warring drug cartels have been blamed for more than 140 murders this year." The AP adds, "The visuals of Bush's two border-state stops focused on enforcement," but "the emphasis of the president's spoken message was agreement."

Likewise, Fox News' Special Report (6/6, Baier) reported that Bush "insisted three times that lawmakers are, quote, making progress towards a comprehensive immigration bill, merging the stricter House bill that focuses on border security, and the Senate bill that provides a way for illegal immigrants to become citizens." The President "acknowledged tough negotiations lie ahead, but tried to stress the common ground already achieved."

Along the same lines, the Los Angeles Times (6/7, Neuman, 958K) reports Bush "sought to minimize the differences that have divided the House and Senate over immigration," while the New York Times (6/7, Stolberg, 1.19M) says the President "tried…to win back the trust of conservatives who have distanced themselves from him on immigration, promising to 'get this border enforced' and warning those who enter the country illegally that 'if you get caught, you get sent home.' … The image of Mr. Bush, his collar open and his starched blue shirt sleeves rolled up, surrounded by Border Patrol agents and trainees clad in olive drab uniforms in the dusty New Mexico desert, was carefully calibrated to sell the president's plan to the American people -- and, by extension, their representatives in Washington."

The Houston Chronicle (6/7, Mason, 581K), however, reports from Laredo that Bush "accused his opponents in the immigration battle of stirring up fear with false claims about amnesty. 'Look, if you're one of these types of people that basically say, you know, throw them out, then you just use the word "amnesty," just toss it around,' Bush said. 'In order to frighten people, you just say "amnesty."'" Standing with Gov. Rick Perry, Bush "stepped up his criticism of lawmakers back in Washington balking at his call to create a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants who have lived in the country for years."

DOJ_NMG_0032261

All three networks last night noted the New Mexico leg of Bush's visit in brief segments. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 3, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush made two stops to focus attention on immigration. Mr. Bush is sending 6,000 National Guard troops there to help secure the border. He said today that unless Congress includes a guest worker plan in its legislation, the immigration issue will not be solved." The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 8, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported the President "said the United States must control its borders, but he also called on Congress to pass a comprehensive bill, including a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for some illegal immigrants." NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 10, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) Bush "was urging Congress to pass a comprehensive reform bill."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/6, Quijano) reported Bush "watched as the new commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, Ralph Basham, was sworn in by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. Again, the image intended to convey the message and demonstrate his commitment to border enforcement."

The San Antonio Express-News (6/7, Castillo, Martin) notes Bush said in Texas that "a long-term solution to reduce the number of illegal crossings is to find work for them in Mexico." Also, "asked by a local reporter if his immigration reform plan included raising the number of immigrants who can legally enter the country, Bush said he would leave that up to Congress." Bush also "traveled to Omaha, Neb., where he was scheduled to visit a Catholic charity and speak at a college."

The Washington Times (6/7, Dinan, 90K) says Bush "seemed to float the idea of decreasing legal immigration overall by increasing the line for green cards and citizenship. 'If Congress is worried about the number of people getting in, they can decrease the number of green cards,' he said."

The Washington Post (6/7, A5, Abramowitz, 744K) reports Bush broke "little ground substantively," but "aides say he is trying to build grass-roots support in advance of negotiations aimed at reconciling House and Senate bills that take sharply different approaches toward undocumented workers." The President is also "trying quiet diplomacy. Joining Bush on Air Force One on the trip from Washington were two New Mexico representatives who have been critical of the president for various aspects of his plan, Democrat Tom Udall and Republican Steve Pearce. During the trip, Pearce said, the two received a briefing from David Aguilar, chief of the Border Patrol, who outlined a more aggressive approach to keeping illegal immigrants from entering New Mexico."

Local television stations across the country included coverage of the President's visit to the border region in at least 700 broadcasts yesterday. The brief "national round-up" type of coverage merely provided an outline of the President's itinerary and showed him interacting with Border Patrol agents. Most of the more in-depth reports noted that the President's appearance at the border coincided with the arrival of the first few National Guard troops assigned to assist the Border Patrol in apprehending illegal immigrants. While a small minority of the broadcasts played up the notion that the President's visit to the southwest was intended to reassure conservatives whose primary concern is border security, the much more common narrative contended that Bush was "on the move to get Congress to pass an immigration overhaul that includes a guest worker program." Notably, stations in border states tended to characterize the Senate's immigration bill as identical to the President's guest-worker proposal. KPHO TV Phoenix, for example, reported Bush "went to the border today to help rally support for his immigration plan. That plan already passed by the Senate still needs clearance in the House." And KCAL TV Los Angeles: "The Senate shares the President's vision, a guest worker program and a path to citizenship."

Typical of the coverage across the nation was WJW TV Cleveland (6/6, 5 PM), which reported that Bush's "plan to secure the border with Mexico is underway tonight. A few dozen National Guard troops arrived in Arizona today, the first of what will be thousands in the border region." KPHO TV Phoenix (6/6, 5 PM) said the President "dispatched the troops to show he's tough on border security, as he tries to push broad immigration reforms thru congress -- including a guest worker program."

WFLA TV Tampa-St. Petersburg (6/6, 5 PM) reported the President "made another push for his guest worker proposal."

WPVI TV Philadelphia (6/6, 12 PM) reported, "President Bush is on the move to get congress to pas an immigration overhaul that includes a guest worker program."

WAGA TV Atlanta (6/6, 10 PM) reported that "an optimistic President Bush is touring the southern border."

KCAL TV Los Angeles (6/6, 12 PM) reported, "Critics wonder what this push has to do with the upcoming elections. … There's also something else driving Mr. Bush's stops in Texas and New Mexico today, a chance to appeal to local voters on an issue they care deeply about, at a time when polls show Congressional Republicans could do poorly in November elections."

KABC TV Los Angeles (6/6, 5 PM) reported that the President "looked comfortable in shirt sleeves in the hot New Mexico sun. Bush "visited the law enforcement training center in Artesia where the border patrol has a 19 week agent program. They demonstrated a mock take down and a freight train inspection as students and instructors checked under cars where immigrants hide."

DOJ_NMG_0032262

The Hill (6/7, Blake) reports on "several Senate candidates across the country" who are "using the finer points of the immigration debate as campaign fodder in advertisements and press releases. Their efforts are working to varying degrees of success to differentiate them from their opponents, who are firing back in much the same manner. Only two Republicans facing tough reelection campaigns -- Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio) -- were among the 23 in their party voting for final passage of the bill, and three of the four Democratic no votes were cast by vulnerable candidates."

"Bush's Own Pollster" Says President Moving In Wrong Direction. The Washington Times (6/7, Dinan, 90K) reports, "Bush has been making a strong push for illegal aliens to assimilate as he stumps for passage of a plan to legalize most of them, but a new poll shows that voters actually want less immigration and more security. And even Mr. Bush's own pollster, in another recent poll, failed to ask about a pathway to citizenship, instead focusing on temporary legal status for illegal aliens -- a concept Mr. Bush no longer endorses." The Times adds," About half of those surveyed in the new poll by MWR Strategies said the immigration problem facing the US is 'too much immigration,' while just 29 percent identified the problem as 'not enough assimilation.'" Michael McKenna, "who conducted the poll of 1,000 registered voters, said it suggests that Mr. Bush is moving in the wrong direction by embracing a path to citizenship."

House Republicans Threaten To "Blue-Slip" Senate Bill. The Hill (6/7, Allen) reports, "Lawmakers are shrouding themselves in a thin slip of blue paper as deep divisions on immigration policy are again being laid bare." House Republicans "have threatened to deliver a 'blue slip' rejection of the Senate immigration bill, and Senate Democrats are blocking efforts to circumvent that maneuver." The result is "a procedural paralysis that has prevented the two chambers from even naming conference negotiators, a clear sign of the difficulties facing proponents of an immigration overhaul." The Senate-written immigration bill "contains tax provisions, violating the Constitution's requirement that all revenue measures originate in the House. Any House member could object to the Senate bill on that basis, forcing debate and a vote on whether to reject the measure outright. … To avoid that fate, Senate Republican leaders want to bring up a separate House-passed tax bill, gut it and replace its provisions with the Senate immigration bill. But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has objected to that maneuver." Reid "said he is concerned that using a House-passed tax vehicle could invite the introduction of unrelated tax cuts into House-Senate conference negotiations."

The Washington Times (6/7, Hurt, 90K) reports Reid said yesterday that Republicans "think there's a problem because they want a problem. … They don't want to go to conference." But "he also added that he's at least willing to consider the idea. 'I've got another idea for them,' Mr. Reid told reporters yesterday. 'If they want to use another bill, a tax bill, instead of the House-passed immigration bill, then let them come to me with how they're going to not have this as a Christmas tree of tax measures. It's up to them. If they want use a tax bill, let's see what they can come up with to protect the Senate's position on immigration.'"

Napolitano Vetoes Illegal Immigration Legislation. The New York Times (6/7, Archibold, 1.19M) reports, "Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona has vetoed a bill that would have punished employers who hire illegal immigrants and authorized the police to arrest illegal immigrants on trespassing charges merely for being in the state." Napolitano, a Democrat who "is running for a second term and is doing well in public opinion polls," said yesterday in a letter to legislators that "parts of the bill would have violated the federal government's power to enforce immigration law under the Constitution and were opposed by many law enforcement groups and leaders in border communities."

Schools Recruiting Teachers From Abroad. The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 9, 3:00, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "This team of top officials from Baltimore has traveled to Manila to conduct an immigration raid, specifically a raid to hire Filipino teachers." Baltimore has "recruited more than 200 teachers from the Philippines so far, and while administrators say they're pleased with the quality of these teachers, they are recruiting overseas because they have to. There is a shortage of teachers, not just in Baltimore but nationwide. Clark County, Nevada, imports math and science teachers from Canada. Topeka brings in teachers from India and Spain. Dallas brings in bilingual teachers from Chile and Mexico. At least 10,000 teachers are needed from abroad every year. America's shortage is so well known Philippine colleges offer special courses in education." Reg Weaver, "the head of the National Education Association, the nation's largest teachers' union, calls the importing of teachers a Band-Aid. He says low salaries and heavy workloads are driving American teachers out of the classroom and that school systems should be solving that."

Immigrants Seen As Setting Citizenship As Goal. NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 11, 2:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported from Queens, New York that "community activist Ana Maria Archilla sees something else" in a diverse community of immigrants, "a new desire to stay and fight for citizenship." Ana Maria Archilla: "Leaving is not an option, and it's especially not an option for people that have spent a large portion of their lives here that have really given their labor to this country and have raised families here." Gregory:

DOJ_NMG_0032263

"The immigrants in this neighborhood, legal and illegal, are mobilizing, with tactics big and small."

Illegal Immigrant Graduates Near Top Of Princeton Class. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 7, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "65,000 undocumented immigrant children will graduate this spring from American high schools. They will not be able to work, legally. They will not qualify for most college aid. Only 10% to 20% will be able to continue their studies. We are going to take 'A Closer Look' at a young man who graduated from Princeton University today, near the top of his class." ABC (Muir) added Dan-el Padilla Peralta "stood before his fellow Princeton graduates today and delivered the salutatory address, in Latin no less, it was a remarkable feat in itself." But he is "an illegal immigrant, which comes very important because he's been invited to study at Oxford. And if he goes, US immigration law says because he is illegal, he can't come back for a least a decade." Padilla's attorney "is asking for a waiver. But there are tens of thousands of undocumented students in the US and some argue it could set a precedent."

NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 12, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Twenty-one- year-old Dan-el Padilla Peralta was selected as Princeton salutatorian. He gave the traditional speech in Latin but he also got over a major hurdle today. He graduated from the Ivy League-despite living in the US Illegally. He moved here from the Dominican Republic when he was 4. His mother was sick. A wealthy benefactor guided him through prep school. He's been accepted to Oxford in England to study, but the secret he and Princeton kept for quite some time is now out."

Americans Have More Positive View Of Immigrants Than Europeans, Poll Finds. The AP (6/7, Lester) reports, "Immigration anxiety has been fueling a fierce political debate in the United States, but attitudes about immigrants in this country are considerably more positive than in several European countries, AP-Ipsos polling found. People in Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Spain are much more inclined than those in the U.S. to think immigrants are likely to get involved in criminal activity. … More than a third of Germans, Italians and Spaniards say they think immigrants are more likely to be involved in criminal activity than people born in their countries. A fourth in France and Britain feel that way." Those European countries are "about evenly divided on whether immigrants are a good influence." In the US, "about one in 10 thinks immigrants are more likely to be involved in crimes. And a majority, 52 percent, say they think immigrants are a good influence on the country."

Inhofe Makes Case For English As "National Language." GOP Sen. James Inhofe, who sponsored the English language amendment, writes in USA Today (6/7, 2.31M), "My amendment, passed by the Senate last month, clarifies that, unless specified by other laws, there are no entitlements to federal services and documents in foreign languages. This nation decided long ago that you must know English to become a citizen. Thus, there is no reason to offer government's citizen services in foreign languages. … The U.S. courts' position is unmistakable, and America's citizens and immigrants have spoken. Why aren't liberals listening?"

In an editorial, meanwhile, USA Today (6/7, 2.31M) asks, "So should English be designated the USA's 'national language'? Sixty-three senators have voted to make it so. They might as well have voted to make apple the national pie or American Idol the national TV show. In practice, English already is the national language, even among the children of immigrants: 93% of second-generation Hispanic Americans are bilingual or speak primarily English, according to a 2002 national survey by the Pew Hispanic Center and the Kaiser Family Foundation. By the third generation, hardly anyone speaks only Spanish, and just 22% of Latinos are bilingual."

Six Arrested By Immigration Agents In North Carolina To Be Deported. The Raleigh (NC) News & Observer (6/7, Brevorka) reports, "Six men arrested by federal immigration agents at Carter-Finley Stadium (in Raleigh, NC) last month have pleaded guilty to entering the country illegally and will be deported, according to the U.S. Department of Justice." The N&O continues, "Federal immigration agents accompanied troopers from the state Highway Patrol to a construction site at the stadium May 23 in hopes of finding a driver who had fled from an auto accident. When federal agents arrived, more than 50 workers in hard hats ran. Seven, including one juvenile, were arrested. … Federal agents later found the suspected driver, Reynalda Guitierres, 28, in Durham and charged him with illegal entry." The N&O adds, "Justice Department officials said that the following men pleaded guilty to illegal entry and will remain in federal custody while they undergo the deportation process: Victorino Marquez-Hernandez of Mexico; Antolin Contreras-Maldonado of Honduras; Armando Hernandez-Penaloza of Mexico; Melvin Jovel-Hernandez of Honduras; Omar Miguel Barbosa of Mexico and Demetrio Huerta-Ordonez of Mexico. Agents also charged Marquez-Hernandez with possession of false immigration documents."

TAX:

Frist Rejects Estate Tax Compromise. The New York Times (6/7, Andrews, 1.19M) reports Senate majority leader Bill Frist and other GOP Senators "vowing to schedule a vote for full repeal" of the estate tax "on Thursday, have yet to line up the 60 votes they need to prevent a Democratic filibuster. … In what is either a shrewd game of chicken or an effort to inflame the passions of crucial Republican constituencies…Frist…has made little effort to strike a compromise with conservative Democrats that would greatly reduce but not fully abolish the tax." According to the Times, "The strategy has divided Republicans." Sen. Charles Grassley "told reporters on Monday that the Senate could easily pass a bill that eliminated the estate tax for all but a tiny slice of the nation's richest families."

DOJ_NMG_0032264

Kyl Pitches Graduated Repeal Proposal. The AP (6/7, Dalrymple) reports, "GOP leaders on Tuesday put abolition of the federal estate tax on the Senate's election-year agenda as other senators weighed ideas to shrink, but not erase, the tax." Sen. Jon Kyl "told other GOP senators Tuesday that common ground might be found by increasing the size of an estate exempt from taxation to $5 million per person or $10 million per couple, according to GOP aides familiar with the proposal speaking on condition of anonymity while negotiations continued. His idea would tax estates between $5 million and $30 million equal to the top tax rate for most capital gains. The remainder of the largest estates would be taxed at 30 percent, those aides said."

Grassley Outlines Effect Of Tax Code Change On Expatriates. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley writes in a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) that the paper is "confused about how a recent change to the federal tax code will affect some Americans working overseas. The change concerned the foreign earned income exclusion under section 911 of the tax code. You imply 4.1 million Americans could be affected, but according to the most recent available IRS data, 306,393 tax returns claimed the benefits of section 911 in 2003. Of those returns, only 125,894 actually had any U.S. tax liability after the benefits." Expatriates "will continue to have a better deal than their domestic counterparts. Through section 911, individuals can still exclude a sizable amount of income that those living and working in the U.S. cannot exclude. Also, American workers abroad who claim section 911 benefits will be taxed at the same rates as domestic workers with the same income."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

White House Reenergizes Defense Of Bush Judicial Nominees. The Hill (6/7, Bolton) reports White House officials "are making a concerted effort to cooperate with outside conservative groups to support and defend President Bush's nominees to the federal bench, and they are also planning to work more closely with the Senate on confirming the nominees. The greater focus on judges comes in the wake of privately expressed criticism from conservative leaders that the White House and the GOP-controlled Senate were doing little to defend high-profile nominees such as William 'Jim' Haynes and Terrence Boyle, both picked for the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, from attacks by liberals." The White House "has begun to take a more active role in defending the nominees. For example, talking points circulated at the end of last week defending Boyle from accusations that he did not recuse himself from cases where he may have had conflicts of interest were written in the signature style of the White House and its ally the Republican National Committee. And administration officials are also working more closely with conservative activists to defend the nominees."

WSJournal Says Senate Should Confirm Haynes To Fourth Circuit Court. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/7, A14, 2.11M) says the nomination of William 'Jim' Haynes II to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals is being held up, but "don't blame this delay only on Democrats. Two Republicans -- Senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham -- are also causing the holdup." Haynes is the Pentagon's general counsel, "and his transgression is to have offered legal advice on the treatment of detainees in the war on terror. The big point of contention is his role in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's decision in December 2002 to allow 'coercive' interrogation techniques against al Qaeda detainees at Guantanamo. Haynes' critics "say he was instrumental in forging a policy that could be used to justify 'torture.' But there is no evidence that anyone condoned torture." The Journal adds, "With Republicans in danger of losing Senate seats, if not their majority, now is the time to honor one of their campaign pledges from 2004 by confirming Mr. Bush's judicial nominees."

Hecht Admonished For Vocal Support Of Miers Nomination. The Washington Post (6/7, A21, Weiss, 744K) reports the Honorable Nathan L. Hecht, is "a justice of the Supreme Court of Texas and a well-known conservative jurist. A longtime friend of White House counsel Harriet Miers, Hecht gave more than 120 media interviews during her failed Supreme Court nomination. Hecht coordinated strategy with White House aides and agreed to take media calls straight from the White House, according to a recent investigation." But the Texas State Commission on Judicial Conduct "last month admonished Hecht for his activities on behalf of Miers. The Texas Code of Judicial Conduct prohibits judges from doing anything to 'advance the private interests of the judge or others.'"

Congress Fighting Administration Effort To Consolidate Foreign Aid Programs. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Phillips, Rogers, 2.11M) reports the Bush administration and Congress "are headed for a clash over how to spend U.S. aid for the developing world. President

DOJ_NMG_0032265

Bush's decision to consolidate billions of dollars in foreign-aid programs under the State Department puts him at odds with Congress's age-old prerogative of earmarking foreign-aid funds for favorite issues." The Journal notes that at "the center of the struggle" is Randall Tobias, "a former Eli Lilly & Co. chief executive who is now the country's first director of foreign assistance. With marching orders from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Mr. Tobias is remodeling $16.6 billion in U.S. foreign-assistance programs." Sen. Sam Brownback "is drafting legislation that would require the administration to spend 50% of aid to Africa on such items as water wells, immunizations and teacher training. Mr. Brownback says he became disenchanted with how the administration is delivering foreign aid during a December trip to the Democratic Republic of Congo."

White House Deployed Gingrich To Influence Congressional Oversight. The Hill (6/7, Cusack) reports former House Speaker Newt Gingrich and the OMB's Clay Johnson "urged Republican investigators on Capitol Hill to change how they conduct probes of the executive branch in a private meeting earlier this spring. The unusual request infuriated some of the GOP aides, who countered that the administration has repeatedly failed to cooperate with their requests for information. The staffers expressed outrage that the meeting was even taking place, calling it inappropriate for a White House policymaker to tell investigators how to scrutinize the Bush administration. … Others thought the forum was somewhat productive, but acknowledged it was bizarre." However, "Some came away from the meeting believing there was an implied, unstated message: Ease up on oversight this election year." The Hill adds, "Democrats are seizing on the meeting as proof of the cozy relationship between the GOP-led Congress and the administration."

Democrats Seek To Curb Bush Use Of Signing Statements. Roll Call (6/7, Yachnin) reports, "Angered over recent media reports that President Bush has effectively disavowed hundreds of laws enacted during his tenure, a handful of House Democrats are now pushing measures to shore up Congress' legislative authority. Citing concerns over maintaining a clear Separation of Powers between the legislative and executive branches," Reps. Barney Frank and Sheila Jackson Lee "introduced separate bills shortly before Memorial Day." Roll Call notes Democrats "have criticized White House use of 'signing statements,' a practice that allows the president to attach an official declaration to newly enacted laws, and one historically used as a legal interpretation for executive branch agencies."

VA Says Personal Information Of 80% Of Active Duty Troops Stolen. The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 4, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported the case of the "personal records of so many people at the Veterans Administration allowed to be stolen took another bizarre turn late today." CBS (Orr) added, "The Pentagon now tells CBS News that the recent theft of personnel information affects not only veterans but more than two million active duty military troops, National Guard and Reserves. The government's story keeps changing." The VA "said up to 50,000 names, Social Security numbers and birthdates for active duty Navy personnel and National Guard and Reservists were also among the missing data. Now, another announcement: The IDs of 1.1 of the 1.4 million active duty personnel may be among the missing data, as well as the IDs for nearly 780,000 National Guard and Reservists. The bottom line here is the government really isn't sure how much data has been lost and can't say with any certainty the information won't be used to defraud veterans and soldiers. VA Secretary Jim Nicholson will face new blistering questions when he testifies for a second time on the Hill on Thursday, questions like how long has the VA known about his latest information and why does it seem that details keep dribbling out."

NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 3, 0:55, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Pentagon officials confirm tonight that the critical personal data of more than two million active duty National Guard and Reserve forces may have been on those same computer disks stolen from the home of a Veterans Affairs employee just over a month ago. That includes the names, birthdates, and Social Security numbers of 80% of the entire active US military. It was first reported the stolen disks contained only information on 26.5 million veterans. Now, warning letters are going out tonight to those active forces, telling them, keep a close eye on your credit."

Information Loss May Compromise Troop Safety. The Washington Post (6/7, A1, Tyson, Lee, 744K) reports, "Defense officials said the loss is unprecedented and raises concerns about the safety of U.S. military forces. But they cautioned that law enforcement agencies investigating the incident have not found evidence that the stolen information has been used to commit identity theft. … Army spokesman Paul Boyce said: 'Obviously there are issues associated with identity theft and force protection.' For example, security experts said, the information could be used to find out where military personnel live."

Veterans' Coalition Files Class-Action Lawsuit. USA Today (6/7, 2.31M) reports, "a coalition of veterans groups charged in a federal class-action lawsuit in Washington that their privacy rights were violated by the theft. The suit demands that the VA fully disclose which military personnel are affected and seeks $1,000 in damages for each."

DOJ_NMG_0032266

House Leadership Said To Be Working To Keep Pledge On Earmark Reform. Roll Call (6/7, Ackley) reports House leaders "have yet to appoint Members from their chamber to smooth out differences between House and Senate lobbying reform bills," but "they are working to make good on their pledge to appropriators that any new earmark disclosures apply equally to all committees." In order "to get enough support to pass the lobbying and ethics reform legislation, House leaders pledged that any bill would contain disclosure of earmarks, including those in tax-writing and authorizing measures — not just in appropriations bills." Kevin Smith, "a spokesman for House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said that the commitment on earmarks remains." But several "sources in Congress and on K Street said they have not detected a sense of urgency from House leaders on appointing conferees."

Hoyer Says Pelosi Will Lead House Democrats Regardless Of Election Outcome. The Hill (6/7, Hearn) reports House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer "says he has only unalloyed endorsements for the minority leader and her ability to unify the caucus." Hoyer said, "Nancy has worked harder in my opinion than anybody I have seen in my 26 years in Congress. [Former Minority Leader] Dick Gephardt [D-Mo.] I thought was the hardest worker I could find. Nancy works harder than Dick. She travels more. She raises more money. She works harder than message. She's doing a wonderful job. If we lose, it will not be Nancy Pelosi's fault. She's done everything she possibly could to insure our victory. ... Win, lose or draw, she's going to be our leader." The Hill adds Hoyer was "responding to a recent report that Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, may mount a challenge to Pelosi if Democrats fall short of taking control of the House."

Senate GOP Focus On Social Issues Worries Some Republican Members. The New York Times (6/7, Hulse, 1.19M) reports that while some Republican candidates "may relish the Senate's current concentration on same-sex marriage and other ideologically charged topics, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island is not among them." Chafee said, "It may stir up my primary voters a little bit against me." The Times adds Chaffee "opposes the push for a constitutional amendment to prohibit same-sex marriage and is under intense pressure to back a proposed amendment that would forbid flag burning." Other Republicans, "including some conservatives, say Mr. Chafee may not be the only potential victim of what they see as a misguided effort to appeal to social conservatives by staging votes intended primarily to make a point about the party's values. They say that voters are more concerned about the economy, health care and immigration, and that replaying the marriage debate in particular could do as much damage as good as Republicans fight to retain control of Congress." Club for Growth President Pat Toomey said, "The problem I see is with economic conservatives who see out-of-control spending, huge deficits and that Republicans can't make the tax cuts permanent. The problem is on a different field."

Laura Bush Visits Minnesota Community Center. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (6/7, Coleman, 200K) reports First Lady Laura Bush "brought her get-involved message to Minnesota on Tuesday, visiting a community center that's been serving at-risk children for years." Bush spoke "to more than 20 children in the library at the Meadowbrook Collaborative, then examined crafts and played a game that gathered people in a circle to flap the edges of a large sheet. The brief visit was intended to promote the federal program known as Helping America's Youth." Mrs. Bush "capped her visit by sharing refreshments and cookies before heading to a fundraiser for Minnesota GOP Senate candidate Mark Kennedy."

OPM Director Launches "Career Patterns" Initiative. The Washington Post (6/7, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that OPM Director Linda Springer yesterday "launched a 'career patterns' initiative aimed at making the government a more attractive employer by offering increased flexibility and better work-life balance to potential hires who are less interested in the traditional 9-to-5 job and 30-year federal career. The initiative seeks to take many workplace practices in use across government -- telecommuting, nonstandard work hours, part-time work -- and treat them as natural employment options rather than as exceptions."

White House Threatens To Veto Intervention In FAA Contract Dispute. The Washington Post (6/7, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Any legislation to change the rules for resolving contract disputes at the Federal Aviation Administration is strongly opposed at the White House, the administration said in a written statement. If Congress sends such a bill to the president, senior advisers will recommend a veto, the statement said."

Samuelson Says Paulson Needs Economic Crisis To Excel At Treasury. Robert J. Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (6/7, A23, 744K), "Unless he blunders badly, [Henry] Paulson's role as chief economic spokesman doesn't matter much. Most Americans don't know the name of the Treasury secretary and don't care. What they care about is $3-a-gallon gasoline and 6.5 percent mortgage rates." Samuelson adds, "To excel as Treasury secretary, Paulson needs something no one wants: an economic crisis that enables him to act as hero." Samuelson adds, "As Treasury secretary, Paulson may be frustrated by long-standing problems that elude solution. Or he may grapple with a surprising crisis to prevent some greater calamity."

DOJ_NMG_0032267

WPost Hits Reid Over Acceptance Of Boxing Tickets. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/7, A22, 744K) says, "The most disturbing thing isn't that Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) accepted free ringside tickets to Las Vegas boxing matches, worth between several hundred and several thousand dollars each. It's that even when pressed the senator didn't see anything wrong with taking the freebies at the same time he was pushing federal legislation to oversee the industry." Reid "first declared that he would continue to take free tickets, then reversed course the next day 'to avoid even the faintest appearance of impropriety.' Maybe he got an inkling: It's this culture of entitlement that offends ordinary Americans -- who don't get free ringside seats and who have to settle for pay-per-view."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Continue To Lose Ground. The stock markets yesterday fell again on investors' fears of inflation and slow economic growth. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "After sinking 200 points yesterday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell again today, for a time even slipping below 11,000 for the first time in 3 months. The Dow ended off 46 points [to close at 11,002.14], investors rattled apparently by the double-whammy of slow, economic growth and the prospect of more interest rate hikes." NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 8, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) noted the Nasdaq "lost about seven points on the day [to close at 2,162.78]." The New York Times (6/7, Holusha, 1.19M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "lost 1.44 points, or 0.1 percent, to 1,263.85."

The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 7, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) also reported, "Continuing worries about an economic slowdown and rising interest rates sent stock prices still lower today." The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Browning, 2.11M) also reports the stock numbers.

The Wall Street Journal (6/7, lp, 2.11M) reports, "Inflation alarms at the Federal Reserve rang louder yesterday as a top official said slowing economic growth may not be enough to contain inflation if the public's inflationary psychology intensifies. 'If inflation turns out to exceed...our target range, I do not believe we can count on a slowing economy to bring inflation down, by itself, quickly,' William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, said in an interview." If inflation expectations rose in "a persistent way...we could expect to see that show up in measured inflation in fairly short order."

The Washington Post (6/7, D1, Masters, 744K) reports, "Now that the Dow Jones industrial average has slid 246 points in two days and shed 5.5 percent since mid-May, it's time to ask the question: How do you distinguish a short-term stock market correction from a full-blown bear market? You wait awhile, of course." But "already there are clues in technical market data, such as who is doing the buying and selling, the price of stocks relative to corporate earnings, inflation data, and the length of time since the last recession. … Interviews with nearly a dozen economists and market analysts turned up widely varying views on whether this particular market correction will develop fur and claws. That's partly because each one looks at different signals to determine where the equity markets are going."

Bernanke Under Fire. The Washington Post (6/7, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports, "Bernanke rattled world financial markets Monday with his tough talk about combating inflation, but he also buffed up his image as a strong Federal Reserve chairman committed to the fight, analysts said yesterday." Meanwhile, under the headline "Fed, Bernanke Take Blistering Flak," USA Today (6/7, Kirchhoff, Shell, 2.31M) reports Bernanke "is finding out the hard way that openness is not the same thing as clarity." Bernanke "took office in February promising to make central bank policy more transparent. Four months later, a number of economists and traders say the Fed chairman and other central bank officials have stumbled by making too many contradictory statements, muddying the outlook and spooking markets." The complaints "got louder Monday after Bernanke told a banking group inflation was at an 'unwelcome' level, raising the specter of further Fed interest rate increases." That "appeared counter to April congressional testimony in which Bernanke suggested the central bank could pause from its two-year campaign of interest rate increases, even if inflation was a risk." USA Today (6/7, Krantz, 2.31M) runs a second, similar piece titled "Unease Over Fed Policy Has Markets In A Tizzy."

Brian S. Wesbury, chief economist of First Trust Advisors L.P. in Lisle, Ill, defends Bernanke in the Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M), saying the chairman "is doing a fine job. The inflationary pressures he is fighting today were baked in the cake before he arrived. Monetary policy was overly accommodative for too long, and even after 16 rate hikes the Fed has not yet reached neutral." He adds, "Weaning investors, home builders, hedge funds and proprietary trading desks from 50-year low interest rates is like forcing them to quit smoking: It's good for the health of the economy, but it hurts and they are complaining loudly."

DOJ_NMG_0032268

Realtors Urge Fed To Pause Rate Hikes. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Walsh, 2.11M) reports, "The National Association of Realtors lowered slightly its forecast for existing and new home sales this year, while the group's chief economist called for the Federal Reserve to pause its interest rate increases. The slowdown from the previously hot housing market is positive because the economy needs a solid housing sector, and slower price appreciation will improve affordability, said NAR Chief Economist David Lereah." The group "lowered slightly its previous forecast for a slowdown this year in home sales and construction. Existing home sales are now projected to decline 6.8% from last year's record to 6.60 million in 2006, while new home sales are seen down 13.4% from last year's record to 1.11 million. Housing starts are forecast to decline 6.2% to 1.94 million this year."

Gasoline Prices Down Slightly. USA Today (6/7, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Although gasoline prices will likely dip a bit in the near-term, families hitting the road this summer will still pay record prices at the pump, the government said Tuesday. Nationwide, retail gasoline prices will average a record $2.76 a gallon over the April-September summer period for regular." That's "up 39 cents from last summer and a nickel higher than the Energy Information Administration, the Energy Department's statistical arm, forecast a month ago."

Bilbray Leading In CA50; Filner Turns Back Primary Challenge. The San Diego Union-Tribune (6/7, LaVelle, Dodge, 353K) reports Republican Brian Bilbray "appeared headed toward a win over Democrat Francine Busby last night in the race to replace imprisoned former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham in the 50th Congressional District, a contest seen as a gauge of voter attitudes for the national midterm elections." In another "closely watched race, Rep. Bob Filner easily defeated Assemblyman Juan Vargas in the 51st Congressional District Democratic primary. It was their third face-off in what has become a long and bitter rivalry."

According to the tally in the website of the San Diego News-Tribune, with 451 of 500 precincts or 90.2% reporting, 56,016 or 49.49% voted for Republican Brian Bilbray, while 51,202 or 45.24% voted for Democrat Francine Busby.

Before any election results were announced, the CBS Evening News (6/6, story 6, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Democrats believe they have a chance to take back control of Congress from the Republicans this year, and they're looking to a special election tonight for a sign that they may be right." CBS (Bowen) added, "It's a race that's seen as a referendum on both the Republican Congress and the Republican President whose popularity is sinking. Recent polls show Busby even or slightly ahead of former Republican congressman turned lobbyist Brian Bilbray."

Angelides To Face Schwarzenegger As Westly Concedes Primary. The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Finnegan, Barabak) reports on its website this morning that Steve Westly conceded the California Democratic gubernatorial primary to Phil Angelides at 1:15 a.m. PDT. Angelides has led Westly by about four percentage points throughout the evening. Angelides will now face Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) in the fall.

LATimes Says Democratic Gubernatorial Candidate Hurt Self. The Los Angles Times (6/7) says in an editorial, "The primary did little to boost the enthusiasm Democrats feel for their state candidates, and voters were also skeptical about two ballot measures to increase public spending on preschool and libraries. Regardless of whether the Democratic gubernatorial candidate is state Treasurer Phil Angelides or state Controller Steve Westly — and the race was too close to call even hours after the polls closed — he will have plenty of work to do before the final contest against Schwarzenegger on Nov. 7. In the next five months, the Democratic candidate must show that he can repair the damage done to himself, his party and electoral politics in general by the recent weeks of cynical and self-defeating campaigning."

Riley Easily Defeats Moore In Alabama Gubernatorial Primary. The Washington Post (6/7, A7, Weisman, 744K) reports Alabama Gov. Bob Riley "easily won the Republican primary contest last night against former state Supreme Court chief justice Roy S. Moore, once regarded as a formidable challenger because of his support from social conservatives who cheered his refusal to remove a monument to the Ten Commandments from the state judicial building." Riley "probably will face Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley, who in early returns in the Democratic primary was burying the comeback attempt of former governor Don Siegelman, who hoped to use a November contest against Riley to showcase his contention that his ongoing corruption trial is a political vendetta by the Republican who unseated him."

Burns, Tester Easily Win Primary Contests. The AP (6/7) reports that Montana Sen. Conrad Burns (R) will face state Senate President Jon Tester (D) in Montana's U.S. Senate race, after both men won their respective primary contests on Tuesday. The AP notes, "With 53 percent of the precincts reporting," Tester was leading State Auditor John Morrison (D) 61% to 36%. Also, "with 52 percent of the precincts reporting," Burns led state Sen. Bob Keenan (R) 72% to 23%.

Menendez, Kean Cruise To Primary Wins, Intensify Rhetoric. The AP (6/7, de la Cruz) reports that New Jersey Sen. Robert Menendez (D) and state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R) cruised to victory in their U.S. Senate primary races on Tuesday. The AP notes, "With 90 percent of precincts reporting, Menendez had 84 percent of the Democratic vote. Kean had about 76 percent of the GOP vote with 95 percent of precincts reporting." GOP candidate John Ginty had been "counting on his supporters voting in droves to show their disapproval of Kean's support of abortion and embryonic stem-cell research. With 95 percent of precincts reporting, Ginty had about 24 percent of the GOP vote." Ginty, in an interview, "would not say whether he would support Kean in November. 'Mr. Kean is going to have to be able to give conservatives and pro-life voters some incentive to support his candidacy,' Ginty said. 'That's up to him.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032269

The Newark Star-Ledger (6/7, Howlett, Donohue, 420K) notes, "In his acceptance speech last night, Menendez referred to Kean by name nine times. The only name he invoked more often -- and not by coincidence -- was the president's. 'This campaign will be about who will side with New Jerseyans against the Bush status quo,' Menendez said. 'Tom Kean Jr.'s record shows he cannot be trusted to make the right choices. On issue after issue, the facts are clear: Tom Kean Jr. and George Bush are perfect together -- perfectly wrong.'" Meanwhile, in his acceptance speech, Kean "rebuffed Menendez's effort to link him to the president: 'I've got news for Bob Menendez. He's not running against George Bush, he's running against Tom Kean.' He also mentioned Menendez by name nine times, harping on Menendez's 30 years of political affiliation with Hudson County. 'Fourteen years ago, Bob Menendez brought his party-boss tactics to Washington. … Today he is working to expand that machine across New Jersey,' Kean said. 'The people of New Jersey can no longer afford party bosses who put politics first and people second.'"

The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/7, Burton, 423K) relates that Kean "accused Menendez of being more interested in using power to benefit himself than the citizens. 'Is there anyone who thinks Bob Menendez is fighting for us?' Kean asked. 'Bob Menendez lives off the public and not for it. Ladies and gentlemen, enough is enough.' Kean promised to 'bring a true moral compass to office' and attacked Menendez for voting against tax cuts." Menendez, meanwhile, "said Kean had voted against raising the state's minimum wage while supporting cuts in federal taxes for millionaires and oil companies, supported embryonic stem-cell research but voted against state financing of a research center, and supported the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq."

At-Risk Lawmakers, Governors Listed. Roll Call (6/7, Jacobson) lists several lawmakers and governors who have been "grappling with" allegations of ethical misconduct and rates their "'risk factor'…to gauge how vulnerable the politician's career is right now, or, if the politician is retiring, how difficult the seat will be for his or her party to hold." Sen. Conrad Burns (R-MT) faces "medium" risk, noting "despite recent Democratic gains in the state, Burns' good-ol'-boy persona has carried him through tough races in the past, and it could again this time." Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle (D) is also rated "medium," and he is "embattled, but not as much for the ethical questions as for his record as governor and the strong challenge he faces from Rep. Mark Green (R)." Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich also faces "medium" risk, and "still faces a tough race, but at least for now, ethical problems seem less likely to doom his candidacy than they once did." Sen. Bob Menendez's (D-NJ) risk factor is "medium-low. While Menendez's vulnerability has risen since he was appointed to the Senate, that has mainly stemmed from a frustration with newly elected Gov. Jon Corzine (D) and the attractiveness of his GOP opponent, state Sen. Tom Kean Jr." Others who face "medium-low" risk include Georgia lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed (R) and Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.), while Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) faces "low" risk, as do Reps. Cynthia McKinney, Jerry Lewis, and John Conyers.

GOP Incumbents' Perks Pose Difficult Challenge To Democratic Challengers. The Washington Post (6/7, A1, VandeHei, Babington, 744K) reports in a front page story that in "one of the lesser-known perks of power on Capitol Hill, lawmakers are using taxpayer-funded databases to cultivate constituents more attentively than ever. Chabot -- a six-term legislator from Cincinnati who finds himself imperiled this year after years of easy races -- has a list of e-mail addresses of people who are most interested in tax cuts. His office recently hit the send button on a personal message to alert them to the congressman's support for extending tax breaks on dividends and capital gains." The access to information is "one factor to keep in mind when assessing the odds that Republicans will get evicted this November from their 12-year majority in the House." Although "anti-incumbent sentiment, as measured by polls and voter interviews, is stronger than it has been in years," so "too, are certain structural advantages that overwhelmingly favor incumbents." Some are "well known, such as the superior ability of incumbents to raise campaign funds and the fact that most lawmakers come from districts that have been carefully drawn to favor one party. Other benefits -- including the ways that lawmakers are using the latest 'micro-targeting' techniques in their official communications -- are more obscure, virtually unheralded beyond the people who use them." Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), "head of the House Democrats' reelection efforts, said that the party faces a 'rigged system' and that only a pitched level of public discontent gives them a 'fighting chance' to overcome it."

DOJ_NMG_0032270

Harris Undeterred By Opposition From Within Party To Senate Run. The New York Times (6/7, Leibovich, 1.19M) reports Rep. Katharine Harris is "undaunted by a run of horrific poll numbers, staff turmoil and public doubts from leaders of her party," and she is "thinking confidently beyond November." Once Harris "wins her race for a Senate seat, she says, she plans to travel everywhere with a guide dog." Harris "explains that she intends to participate in a program that provides guide dogs for volunteers to train. While cynics may assign unflattering symbolism to a politician who is not blind being led around the Capitol by a guide dog, Ms. Harris is undeterred — by this or by the perception that her role in 2000 makes her too divisive to lure the swing voters necessary to defeat the incumbent Democrat, Bill Nelson." In her "insistence on running, Ms. Harris has become something of a pariah among many of the people whose power she indirectly helped ensure five and a half years ago, as overseer of the recount that sealed George W. Bush's victory."

Weld Exits New York Gubernatorial Race. The New York Times (6/7, Healy, 1.19M) reports William F. Weld, "the former governor of Massachusetts who undertook a rare bid to lead another state, dropped out of the race for governor of New York yesterday. He had been deserted by Republicans who once supported him as their best hope against Attorney General Eliot Spitzer in the November election." Weld, "a moderate Republican in the mold of Gov. George E. Pataki, ran a lackluster campaign and was never able to convert his early advantages into real campaign muscle. At the same time, Mr. Pataki's behind-the-scenes effort to help Mr. Weld last month proved too late and too thin to do any good." Weld's "departure sets the stage for an ideological clash between the presumptive Republican candidate, former Assemblyman John Faso — a conservative intent on cutting taxes — and the likely Democratic nominee, Mr. Spitzer, who is backed by a unified Democratic establishment that is determined to regain the governor's mansion after 12 years."

Tie To Bush Seen As Key To Frist's '08 Hopes. Roll Call (6/7, Stanton, Billings) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) "has thrown his legacy chips in with President Bush, inextricably aligning himself with the White House on key domestic and international issues, even as many in his own party distance themselves from the unpopular president." Frist will "face significant challenges in winning the 2008 presidential nomination — from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) as well as from such Senators as George Allen (R-Va.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) who are darlings of the conservative movement." Given the "already crowded field of potential GOP White House aspirants, Frist's decision to firmly tie his political fate to Bush's could result in a boon to his presidential hopes, despite Bush's current weakened state." Frist could "benefit if Bush rewards his loyalty by handing off his substantial political and fundraising operations to Frist. In addition, having the backing of Bush — who remains personally popular with much of the GOP's base despite their concerns about how he has handled his job — could be Frist's ticket to undercutting McCain's early frontrunner status and the natural support among conservatives for Allen and Brownback."

Brownback's 2008 Aspirations Examined. The Washington Post (6/7, C1, Copeland, 744K) reports Sen. Sam Brownback "thinks 2008 might be his moment, though in interviews he emphasizes his humility. He calls himself a 'flawed man,' and says the longer he pursues his faith, the more he finds his own sin. It seems contradictory -- all that ego and all that modesty." Brownback, "sounding way too mellow for a wannabe president," said, "I could be the right person with the right message at the right moment. And I could be completely wrong and I'll still be happy about it." The Post adds, "In the meantime, amid the fundraising and the visits to Iowa and New Hampshire, Brownback is focused on spreading light when he enters a room. He has said he tries to see Jesus in his fellow senators."

Tancredo Wins Presidential Straw Poll In Michigan. The Washington Times (6/7, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo, perhaps Congress' most visible foe of illegal border crossing, won a Republican presidential straw poll Monday night. Mr. Tancredo captured about 18 percent of 325 votes cast at the Lincoln Day Dinner in Macomb County, Mich., located in the Detroit metro area. Although it was only a plurality on a fractured Republican ballot, Mr. Tancredo beat out heavyweights former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (13.8 percent), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (12.3 percent) and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice (12 percent), according to the conservative publication Human Events."

US Scientists Cleared To Clone Human Embryos. USA Today (6/7, Vergano, 2.31M) reports, "Scientists at Harvard and Children's Hospital Boston announced Tuesday they have the green light to clone human embryos that could generate stem cell lines for specific diseases. … Two research teams led by Douglas Melton and Kevin Eggan of Harvard and George Daley of Children's Hospital will attempt to create cells cloned from patients with juvenile diabetes and blood disorders such as sickle cell anemia."

DOJ_NMG_0032271

The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 5, 2:25, Alfonsi, 7.66M) reported, "The work at Children's Hospital Boston is aimed at eventually creating stem cells for treating blood diseases like leukemia and sickle cell anemia. Researchers are already working with stem cells taken from donated embryos. What's new here is creating embryos to both match disease and patient." What's "being done at Harvard is another step along the way towards producing real treatments for illnesses like Parkinson's and leukemia. But critics object to the creation of human embryos just to be destroyed. Researchers counter that the eggs they use to create the embryos are from women undergoing in vitro fertilization, but that they aren't high enough quality to produce a pregnancy. They insist those eggs and embryos would have been disposed of as medical waste anyway." It "is against the law to use Federal funds, so this is being entirely funded by private donations and is expected to be funded that way for at least the next decade."

The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Westphal, 2.11M) reports that Harvard's effort "lends clout to renewed U.S. efforts to master the technology."

The New York Times (6/7, Wade, 1.19M) reports that scientists at the University of California, San Francisco will also try to develop embryonic stem cells from the adult cells of patients suffering from certain diseases. The University of California, San Francisco announced their plans a month ago, "resuming a program abandoned in 2001. Both universities, having received required approvals, will at first obtain the human eggs needed for cloning from fertility clinics, starting with eggs deemed too low quality to produce a successful pregnancy. Both programs are privately financed because federal support for human stem cell research is available only for cell lines made before August 9, 2001."

Study Finds 43% Aren't Saving Enough For Retirement. A new study from Boston College almost one in two US families are headed toward financial struggles in retirement. The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Peterson, 958K) reports that the study "presumes that most people need to replace 65 percent to 85 percent of their annual income in their working years to stay secure in retirement. But 43 percent of US households will fall at least 10 percent short of that range, the study found, using what it said were conservative projections." The Times adds, "Saying it hoped to draw attention to the issue, Boston College unveiled a new National Retirement Risk Index based on survey data from 4,500 households in the Federal Reserve's 2004 Survey of Consumer Finances. Researchers calculated that the risk index has risen from 31 percent in 1983 to 43 percent in 2004."

USA Today (6/7, Chu, 2.31M) reports, "The percentage of 'at risk' households has surged in the past two decades, from 31% in 1983, according to the center's analysis, which was funded by Nationwide Mutual Insurance. … The index, which uses data from the Federal Reserve, is part of a stream of recent sobering conclusions about workers' abilities to finance their golden years. The studies come as the first of 79 million baby boomers — the generation born from 1946 to 1964 — are turning 60 this year."

Program Shows Progress Housing Homeless. The New York Times (6/7, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports on an "accelerating national movement that has reduced the numbers of the chronically homeless…in more than 20 cities. In this campaign, promoted by a little-known office of the Bush administration, 219 cities, at last count, have started ambitious 10-year plans to end chronic homelessness." The Times adds, "Many of the early starters are reporting turnarounds. In Philadelphia, street dwellers have declined 60 percent over five years. In San Francisco, the number of the chronic homeless is down 28 percent in two years, in Dallas 26 percent and in Raleigh-Durham, N.C., 15 percent."

Documents Show CIA Knew Eichmann's Whereabouts. Documents released yesterday show the CIA knew the pseudonym and whereabouts of fugitive Holocaust administrator Adolf Eichmann in 1958 but took no action. The New York Times (6/7, Shane, 1.19M) reports, "The CIA was told by West German intelligence that Eichmann was living in Argentina under the name Clemens…but did not share the information with Israel, which had been hunting for him for years, according to Timothy Naftali, a historian who examined the documents. Two years later, Israeli agents abducted Eichmann in Argentina and flew him to Israel, where he was tried and executed in 1962." The Eichmann papers "are among 27,000 newly declassified pages released by the CIA to the National Archives under Congressional pressure to make public files about former officials of Hitler's regime later used as American agents."

The Washington Post (6/7, A21, Lee, 744K) reports, "In a March 1958 memo to the CIA, the West German foreign intelligence services (BND) wrote that Eichmann, a top Gestapo official who helped orchestrate the mass murder of Jews, 'is reported to have lived in Argentina under the alias CLEMENS since 1952.' The memo also mentioned a rumor that Eichmann lived in Jerusalem. In fact, Eichmann was in Argentina and was using the name Ricardo Klement -- but apparently neither the CIA nor the West Germans acted on the information."

Vanderkam Says Government Should Get Out Of States' Way On Health Care. Laura Vanderkam

DOJ_NMG_0032272

writes in USA Today (6/7, 2.31M), "A third of Americans ages 21-24 lack health insurance, more than any other demographic. A quarter of those ages 25-34 do without." Vanderkam adds that "if this country truly wants to cover the uninsured, we should remember that rates aren't high everywhere. Insurance companies have come up with cheap ways to get young people covered in states that don't tie insurers' hands. The answer is not to pass more laws. The answer is to get government out of the way." It is "bad news for older folks, too. Not only do all taxpayers foot hospital bills for uninsured people who can't pay, shoving young people out of insurance pools also raises rates for everyone else. If states truly want people covered, that's something to keep in mind."

Marcus Says Works On Negativity, Disclosure Are "Useful." Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (6/7, A23, 744K) about "assaults on two pillars of the conventional political wisdom: that negative attack ads are bad and that disclosure of campaign finance information is good. Neither argument is ultimately convincing, but both serve as provocative warnings against the complacent repetition of accepted verities." A book by Vanderbilt University political science professor John G. Geer, 'In Defense of Negativity: Attack Ads in Presidential Campaigns,' "disputes the notion that rampant negativity is a new phenomenon. … If negativity's negatives are part of the received wisdom, the value of disclosure is a veritable article of faith. In a recent paper, Democratic election lawyer Robert F. Bauer…takes on the popular view of disclosure as an 'efficient, relatively innocuous method of managing concerns about money in politics.'" Geer and Bauer "proffer useful heresies. Negativity isn't an unadulterated evil. Disclosure isn't a panacea. But when it comes to these tenets, at least, the conventional hymnal contains a good deal of wisdom."

Bush Cautiously Optimistic On Initial Iranian Response To Incentives. President's Bush's guarded optimism over Tehran's preliminary reaction to an incentives plan presented to Iranian negotiators by European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana on Tuesday garners heavy coverage in US print media and was picked up by all three national network news broadcasts last night. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 4, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There are some signs tonight...that a deal to end the deadlock over Iran's nuclear program might be possible. Might be. Iran's chief nuclear negotiator said the latest proposal by the US and other world powers contained some positive steps. President Bush said he was encouraged by that reaction." ABC (Karl) added a "draft copy of the proposal made by the US, Europe, China, and Russia" would give Iran "help building new nuclear power plants and a new facility in Iran to hold a five-year supply of fuel. The deal would also open the door to guarantees for Iran's territorial integrity, words meant to assure Iran there would be no invasion by the US or Israel."

NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 4, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported President Bush "called Iran's initial response to a package of incentives and threats positive." NBC (Mitchell) added, "In Texas, the President called it a positive response and said he wants to solve the issue diplomatically." President Bush: "We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously. The choice is theirs to make. I have said the United States will come and sit down at the table with them, so long as they are willing to suspend their enrichment in a verifiable way. Sounds like a positive response to me." The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 3, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Iran's chief negotiator called parts of the package positive and President Bush echoed that, saying the Iranian response 'sounds like a positive step.'"

Meanwhile, USA Today (6/7, Nichols, 2.31M) characterizes the Bush administration as "cautiously upbeat Tuesday about Iran's initial reaction to incentives aimed at persuading it to freeze its efforts to make nuclear fuel. 'It sounds like a positive step to me,' President Bush told reporters in Texas after visiting a Border Patrol facility."

The AP (6/7, Gearan) goes on to quote the President as saying, "I have said the United States will come and sit down at the table with them so long as they are willing to suspend their enrichment in a verifiable way." The AP notes that the EU's Solana "later told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice by phone that the Iranians had said they would need time to consider the proposal, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. Solana called the discussions 'very useful and constructive,' McCormack said."

Offer Includes Possibility Of Uranium Enrichment Inside Iran, Officials Say. The Washington Post (6/7, A1, Vick, Linzer, 744K) adds, "The confidential diplomatic package backed by Washington and formally presented to Iran on Tuesday leaves open the possibility that Tehran will be able to enrich uranium on its own soil, US and European officials said. That concession, along with a promise of US assistance for an Iranian civilian nuclear energy program, is conditioned on Tehran suspending its current nuclear work until the UN's International Atomic Energy Agency determines with confidence that the program is peaceful." That said, "the Bush administration and its European allies have withdrawn their demand that Iran abandon any hope of enriching uranium for nuclear power, according to several European and US officials with knowledge of the offer. The new position, which has not been acknowledged publicly by the White House, differs significantly from the Bush administration's stated determination to prevent Iran from mastering technology that could be used to develop nuclear weapons." One unnamed US official is quoted as saying, "We are basically now saying that over the long haul, if they restore confidence, that this Iranian regime can have enrichment at home. ... But they have to answer every concern given all that points to a secret weapons program."

DOJ_NMG_0032273

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Rubin, Naji, Richter, 958K) adds that among the incentives "is a guarantee that the United States would facilitate a European offer to provide Iran with a light water reactor and other civilian nuclear technology. Much of the light water nuclear technology originates in the United States and without American government approval, the Europeans could not provide it to Iran. The decision to offer Iran help with a nuclear reactor is bound to be especially controversial because it is possible to harvest spent plutonium from such a plant and use it to manufacture material for an atomic bomb, according to scientists." Former UN weapons inspector David Albright is quoted as saying, "Spent fuel from a light water reactor is harder to process...but nothing is proliferation proof."

According to the Washington Times (6/7, Sands, 90K), State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "declined to comment on whether the United States has offered to share at least some forms of nuclear technology with Iran. 'I've seen a lot of reports flying around the past couple of days about what may or may not be in this package,' he said, cautioning that such reports should be taken 'with a grain of salt.'"

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (6/7, Smyth, Dombey) notes that the package also has a significant trade component, reporting, "The US...has reportedly revived last year's offer to lift a ban on the sale of spare parts for Iran's ageing civilian aircraft which could include components from Boeing and Airbus." That said, "Western diplomats emphasize Iran faces the prospect of 'disincentives' should it decide not to suspend enrichment, which can produce weapons-grade material."

The New York Times (6/7, Fathi, Sciolino, 1.19M) adds, "The United States gave crucial heft to the package by offering to remove certain economic sanctions against Iran that date from more than two decades ago, and to talk directly with Iran if the country agrees to an enrichment freeze." Although "the United States has not ruled out military action against Iran," it has instead "committed itself in the incentives package only to support the creation of a vague regional forum to discuss issues of mutual concern, officials said."

Meanwhile, in a story headlined, "US Risks Political Backlash In Iran Nuclear Offer," the Wall Street Journal (6/7, King, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "Some of the nuclear provisions could stir opposition both on Capitol Hill and among conservatives in President Bush's own party," and "some conservatives also drew parallels to a similar Clinton administration-led effort to stem North Korea's development of nuclear weapons by agreeing to provide Pyongyang with nuclear fuel and advanced reactor technology. That agreement later fell apart as North Korea moved ahead on developing nuclear warheads. 'Having finally killed the reactor deal with Pyongyang, we can't seem to control our urge to cut another similar deal with Iran,' said Henry Sokolski, an expert on the North Korean nuclear program."

Bolton Downplays Iran's Threat To Cut Oil Supplies. John Bolton, US Ambassador to the UN was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/6) how concerned he is that the Iranians could stop selling oil on the international market and raise the price per barrel. Bolton said, "I think Secretary Rice addressed that a couple of days ago. This is not something that -- that we see them doing, because of the harm that it would cause themselves. And I must say, I mean, to be completely honest, it is tempting to respond to that kind of rhetoric, but I think to be serious and responsible now, we have put an important proposition to the government of Iran. It's important that we get a definitive response back from that government. And despite the temptation to respond to what this or that Iranian official is saying, I think it's important that we just stay put here for awhile and see what they come back and say."

Once Burgeoning Iranian Reform Movement Falters. The New York Times (6/7, Slackman, 1.19M) profiles Iran's current domestic political situation, which has swung from the cautiously reform-minded era of President Mohammad Khatami during the late 1990s to the current firebrand President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. The Times reports, "Many people here are now realizing that real reform in Iran, such as it is, will be driven from the bottom up, slowly, stubbornly, no matter how repressive or punitive the rulers choose to be. It is a cliché, for sure, but the phrase on the lips of weary Iranians in Tehran is 'evolution, not revolution.' No one seems to have the stomach for starting over again. The change is glacial in pace but forward moving." Emadedin Baghi, who directs an Iranian prisoners' rights group, is quoted as saying, "It is not possible to make a very big jump. ... Some reformers thought that they could make a big jump. But it is an evolution that will proceed millimeter by millimeter."

Bush Concerned Over Somalia Unrest. The AP (6/7, Pickler) reports President Bush "expressed concern on Tuesday that volatile conditions in Somalia could lead al-Qaeda to use it as a staging ground to plan attacks. 'There's instability in Somalia,' Bush said in Texas where he was traveling. 'The first concern, of course, is to make sure that Somalia does not become an al-Qaeda safe haven.'" The president added that "he talked on Monday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice about the instability in Somalia where Islamic militiamen have claimed control of Mogadishu.

DOJ_NMG_0032274

'We're watching very carefully the developments there, and we will strategize more when I get back to Washington as to how to best respond to the latest incident there in Somalia,' Bush said."

A separate AP (6/7, Tomlinson) story led with the characterization that "the success of Islamic extremists fighting for control of Somalia's capital is an important setback in the US war on terrorism," and that the "the defeat of a counterterrorism alliance providing hope for militants elsewhere in the region. ... Since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, US officials have expressed concerns that Somalia could become a haven for terrorists, a concern State Department spokesman Sean McCormack repeated on Monday. 'We do have real concerns about the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia, and that informs an important aspect of our policy with regard to Somalia,' McCormack said in Washington."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (6/7, Lacey, 1.19M) adds, "Tensions remained high in" Mogadishu "as the Islamic militants…vowed to set up a religious state, while thousands of protesters allied with one of the country's largest clans pledged to challenge the effort. The warlords who have been pushed from their strongholds in Mogadishu said they would fight back against the Islamists. ... Bashir Rageh, a warlord who lost control of a key airstrip and port in March, and Muse Sudi Yalahow, another important Mogadishu leader who has lost ground to the Islamic militias, joined thousands of their backers from the Abgal clan at a stadium north of the capital to denounce the Islamic courts and militias that have taken the city." Rageh is quoted as saying, "Our clan has agreed to defend our land, and we will fight the courts hiding under the cloak of Islam and trying to fool our people."

Analyst Alleges US Anti-Terror Policy Bolsters Islamist Militias. Writing in the Washington Post (6/7, A22, 744K), Clinton-era National Security Council analyst John Prendergast takes aim at alleged US support for Somalia's secular warlord alliance. He writes, "In recent trips to the capital, Mogadishu, I have seen evidence of US support to warlord militia leaders in the name of counterterrorism operations. ... Now 'our' warlords -- and by extension our counterterrorism strategy -- have been dealt a crushing defeat by the Islamists, as the latter have consolidated control of Mogadishu. Our short-term interest in locating al-Qaeda suspects has thus been undermined, and the risk of a new safe haven being created for international terrorists has been greatly increased." Prendergast goes on to posit that only a "functioning government that could ensure security would be a win-win scenario for Somalis and the United States, enabling the state apparatus to address the criminality and extremism that undermine progress in the country. This would provide a real partner for the war on terrorism in an area that has a track record for exporting trouble."

In an editorial, the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M) agrees that current US policy could be deficient, noting, "The immediate concern among many Somalis is a forcible imposition of harsh Islamic law, Taliban style. The larger international concern is that Mogadishu's new rulers may follow the Taliban's example in another way, sheltering international terrorist operations in a region within tempting striking distance of vulnerable countries on the Arabian peninsula and in East Africa." The Times concludes, "With good luck, perhaps a new battlefront with international terrorism may yet be avoided. Luck, however, is no substitute for a more supple and effective American strategy against a highly mobile foe like multinational Islamist terrorism. Washington needs to develop more agile responses of its own. It especially has to avoid getting drawn into quagmires that force it to fight on the terrorists' terms and timetable."

Extending Deadline, Abbas Asks Hamas To Reconsider Deal. The AP (6/7, Daraghmeh) reports, "Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas stepped back from a political showdown with his Hamas rivals, giving the Islamic militants several days to recognize Israel or face the voters in a referendum on the idea." Yasser Abed Rabbo, a top officer of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which Abbas also heads, is quoted as saying, "We are giving enough time, about three days, for our brothers in Hamas to reconsider their position." The AP goes on to note, "A new survey released Tuesday showed 77 percent of Palestinians would vote in favor of the proposal. The survey of 1,200 Palestinians was conducted by Bir Zeit University in the West Bank and had a margin of error of 3 percentage points." AFP (6/7) adds, "The White House welcomed Palestinian Authority president Mahmud Abbas' call for holding a referendum on implicitly recognizing Israel. 'Abbas has demonstrated that he's somebody who wants to work toward a two-state solution' to the Middle East conflict, spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. 'I think it's important for Palestinians to wrestle with the issue of whether they want to have a two state solution,' he said."

In its coverage, the Washington Post (6/7, A19, Wilson, 744K) reports, "The delay also reflects the logistical difficulties Abbas would face in staging a referendum that Hamas, now running the Palestinian Authority's day-to-day operations, opposes in principle. Hamas officials have warned that they would not allow the vote to proceed, even though it could give them cover to moderate their hard-line position toward Israel at a time when foreign donors are demanding they do so in return for future aid." The Post goes on to quote chief Palestinian negotiator and Fatah lawmaker Saeb Erekat as saying, "At the end of the day, we are heading toward a vote. ... I think the only option now, even if the date was not set today, is for the Palestinians to vote."

DOJ_NMG_0032275

Indonesian Minister Rebukes US Approach To War On Terror. The New York Times (6/7, Gordon, 1.19M) reports, "Indonesia's defense minister warned the Bush administration on Tuesday that its approach to fighting terrorism was perceived as overbearing, and that the United States needed to be sensitive to local concerns. 'It's best that you leave the main responsibility of antiterrorist measures to the local government in question, and not be too overly insistent about immediate results arising from your perception about terrorists,' the minister, Juwono Sudarsono, told reporters as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld stood nearby. 'It's important to us because, as the world's largest Muslim country, we are very aware of the perception, or misperception, that the United States is overbearing and overpresent and overwhelming in every sector of life in many nations and cultures." The Times goes on to note, "Mr. Sudarsono's remarks prompted a quick reply by Mr. Rumsfeld, who insisted he had been sensitive to other nations' concerns from the start. 'I have never indicated to any country that they should do something that they were uncomfortable doing,' Mr. Rumsfeld said." According to the Times, "The discussion over political perceptions had affected deliberations over one of the Bush administration's major efforts: the Proliferation Security Initiative, which calls for an international arrangement that would enable the United States and its allies to search cargo ships suspected of transporting biological, chemical and nuclear arms, as well as the missiles to deliver them."

Exercise Suggests Taiwan Could Defend Itself For Two Weeks Without US Help. The Washington Times (6/7, Halloran, 90K) reports, "Taiwan could fend off a concerted attack by China for at least two weeks before it would need help from the United States, according to the results of an unprecedented high-level exercise. For the first time, the Ministry of National Defense ran the weeklong war game for President Chen Shui-Bian of the Republic of China and other political leaders in April to test their ability to respond to a military assault from the mainland." According to the Times, "The findings are important to the United States: Under the Taiwan Relations Act, often cited by the Bush administration as the basis for the US posture on Taiwan, the United States would be obliged in most circumstances to come to the island's aid." Meanwhile, the Times notes, "US officials have been in what one called 'a grumpy mood' toward Taipei over what they have seen as a provocative posture toward China and a failure to complete an $18 billion arms purchase from the United States. Bush administration officials have suggested that Taiwan is unwilling to defend itself and relies too much on the United States to prevent it from being seized by China, which claims sovereignty over the island."

Poll Shows Muslim Women Disaffected By US Focus On Western Values. The Washington Times (6/7, Stuhldreher, 90K) reports, "Muslim women are potentially important allies in the war on terrorism, but the United States must avoid pushing Western values to win their support, according to data presented yesterday at the Gallup Organization. The Bush administration has promoted women's rights throughout the Muslim world to gain support in the region, especially in Iraq and Afghanistan. But a worldwide Gallup project found that many Muslim women are not as concerned about changing their status as Westerners might think." The Times goes on to note, "Dalia Mogahed, a Gallup Organization analyst, said a majority of men and women expressed opposition to extremism and terrorism and said they were conscious of the rights that women deserved. The key, she said, is how the United States approaches the issue." Mogahed is quoted as saying, "The imposition of Western values alienates both men and women, because it is strongly associated with colonialism, like the British policies of unveiling in Egypt. ... Westerners need to understand how to reach Muslim women through their own value systems, by using the positive aspects of their own beliefs to encourage increased rights."

Peru's New President Wants To Revisit US Trade Pact. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) reports, "Peruvian President-elect Alan García said he expects to renegotiate a free-trade agreement with the US that was signed by the outgoing president in April but has yet to be ratified. He said he would revise the agreement line by line. The agreement 'is just a first draft, which can be improved and broadened if this government decides to approve it,' Mr. García said. He suggested the pact should include language to discourage the import of subsidized US crops." The Journal goes on to note that during a news conference, "Mr. García said that though he had received congratulatory phone calls from many world leaders, he hadn't heard from President Bush."

US Angling To Prevent Venezuela From Getting Security Council Seat. The Washington Times (6/7, Kralev, 90K) reports, "The United States is urging Latin American nations to deny Venezuela a seat on the UN Security Council when the region chooses a replacement for the rotating seat held by Argentina, whose term expires at the end of the year. Reluctant to campaign openly against Venezuela, the Bush administration instead has been boosting the rival candidacy of Guatemala, a US ally." If Venezuela were to win the seat, "at some point it would chair the council for a month, setting the agenda and giving President Hugo Chavez an opportunity to use the highest UN forum to advance his anti-American agenda. ... Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick made an impassioned pitch in support of Guatemala's candidacy at a meeting Monday of the Organization of American States (OAS), but failed to convince several of the region's major players." Zoellick is quoted as saying, "I know that the European democracies are supportive of Guatemala. Many of the East Asian countries are supportive of Guatemala, so we hope that it'll find broad-based support here [in Latin America]."

DOJ_NMG_0032276

Mexican Candidates Focus On Middle-Class Voters. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Lyons, 2.11M) reports, "Poll takers say the 15% of Mexico's voters who have yet to make up their minds -- some 11 million voters in all -- are massed among the lower-middle-class residents of the urban enclaves ringing Mexico City, Guadalajara, Monterrey and other large cities. These are the small businessmen, salesmen and housewives who have climbed a few rungs out of poverty in recent years -- but fear they will lose it all should Mexico stumble into crisis, as it has so often in the past." According to the Journal, "Conservative candidate Felipe Calderón has pulled virtually even with liberal front-runner Andrés Manuel López Obrador by running a sophisticated, high-tech campaign with one primary goal: targeting the burgeoning ranks of the lower-middle class, a long-overlooked group in a nation of extreme wealth and poverty." Moreover, "the outcome of the vote may determine whether Mexico will continue to tie itself tightly to the US and the global economy or follow some other Latin American nations in making a turn leftward."

Oil Concerns May Affect Cuba Trade Policy. The Hill (6/7, Schor) reports, "The imminent release of a new Bush administration status report on US-Cuban relations is re-energizing the anti-embargo lobby, which believes the skyrocketing price of oil could provide a winning angle in its fight to relax trade sanctions on the communist island nation. When the Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba issued its first policy recommendations at the president's behest two years ago, it resulted in stricter curbs on educational travel and Cuban-Americans' ability to send money home. But the National Foreign Trade Council (NFTC), its affiliated business coalition USA Engage and the newly independent Freedom to Travel Campaign are stumping for a milder report this time around." According to the Hill, "The groups have found a new weapon for their campaign to loosen the trade embargo that has stood against Havana since the Kennedy administration. Oil companies from Norway, India, Spain and China (whose government-controlled petroleum group set off protectionist alarms last year with its bid to purchase Unocal) recently have signed drilling deals to explore Cuba's offshore waters." USA Engage director Jake Colvin is quoted as saying, "The embargo has the effect of turning our entire back yard over to other countries — China, India. ... CUPEC [Cuba's state-owned oil company] is certainly looking for partners, and it's better that we are there than that we are not."

European, African Officials Unveil New Plan To Interdict Illegal Migrants. The Washington Times (6/7, 90K) reports, "Authorities in Europe and Africa yesterday drew up a joint plan to fight illegal migration that will combine tougher prevention measures with more aid to persuade young Africans to stay in their homelands. ... Hundreds are thought to die in the perilous sea voyages of more than 600 miles organized from Mauritania and Senegal by traffickers who run a lucrative business carrying would-be migrants seeking a better life in Europe." Top officials "from more than 50 countries of Europe and Africa" are meeting this week in Dakar, Senegal, to finalize an action plan, which is "expected to be adopted by European and African ministers at a summit on migration July 10 and 11 in the Moroccan capital, Rabat. 'This is a political initiative of the highest importance that aims to combine both managing migrant flows and managing development,' said Alvaro Iranzo, a senior Spanish Foreign Ministry official."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Angelides Claims Primary Victory."
"GOP Candidate Leads In Pivotal House Race."
"Governor Swiftly Turns Campaigner."
"Slain Teen Was Trying To Protect His Brother."
"Bullied By The Eunuchs."
"In Mexico, Candidates Go Toe To Toe Before Futbol."

USA Today:
"Troops Risk Undetected Brain Injury."
"Circus Gets A Makeover."
"Harvard, Boston Hospital To Attempt Embryo Cloning."
"DeLay: GOP's 'Panic, Depression' Risk Losing Elections."

New York Times:
"Iraqi To Release Detainees In Bid To Ease Tensions."
"Senate Emphasis On Ideology Has Some In G.O.P. Anxious."
"Canada Saw Plot To Seize Officials."
"A Shack, Be It Ever So Humble, Gets A Fancy South Africa Price."
"New Campaign Shows Progress For Homeless."
"Senate Contender In Florida Presses On Despite Doubters."

Washington Post:
"Bomb Plot Allegations Detailed In Canada."

DOJ_NMG_0032277

"Data Theft Hit 80% Of Active Military."
"'We Have Your Husband.'"
"Proposal Would Let Iran Enrich Uranium."
"Technology Sharpens The Incumbents' Edge."
"D.C. Mayor Fires Director Of Agency For The Disabled."

Washington Times:
"Upbeat Iran Finds 'Positive Steps' In Offer."
"Public, Bush Split On Illegals."
"Plan Targets African Migration."
"U.S. Tries To Keep Seat From Caracas."
"Fans With World Cup Fever Won't Hesitate To Call In Sick."
"Senate To Consider Letting Hawaiians Pursue Sovereignty."
"Hispanics Flock To Gulf Coast For Work Opportunities."

Detroit Free Press:
"Stockholders Rise Up, Push GM Changes."
"Partying Like Hell."
"Doctor Charged In Wife's 1968 Death."
"Hard To Hide."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Germans Gripe: This Bud's Not For Us."
"Details Of Plot Shock Canada."
"Stopping To Help? Be Careful."
"Boy, 9, Hacked To Death; Was Right Man Shot?"
"Fragile Digital Data In Danger Of Fading Past History's Reach."

Houston Chronicle:
"Gang Attack Kills Teen Rival In Park."
"Schools Might Get To Make The Call On Cell Phones."
"First-Class Night Down In Class A."
"Baby's Body At The Center Of Alleged Corpse Scam."
"Report: Storms Left New Human Landscape."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: 9/11 Commission-Homeland Security; Canada Terror Plot; Bush-Immigration; US-Iranian Nuclear Program; Iraq Violence; Iraq-Displaced Civilians; Illegal Immigrant-Princeton; Stock Markets; Weather Satellite Boondoggle; Preston Obit; June 6, 2006.
CBS: Canada Terror Plot; Terror Suspects-US Contacts; US-Iranian Nuclear Program; VA Data Theft; Harvard-Stem Cell Research; 50th CD Election; Stock Markets; Bush-Immigration; US Teacher Shortage-Immigrants; Preston Obit; Intermittent Explosive Disorder.
NBC: NBC: Canada Terror Plot; Terror Suspects-US Contacts; VA Data Theft; US-Iranian Nuclear Program; Weather Satellite Boondoggle; Iraqi Orphans; D-Day Anniversary; Stock Markets; Preston Obit; Bush-Immigration; NYC-Immigrants; Illegal Immigrant-Princeton.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: SC-Murder Suspect Captured; VA-Data Theft; Bush-Iran; CA50 Election.
CBS: SC-Murder Suspect Captured; Primary Elections; Canada-Terror Suspects In Court; Car Theft List.
NPR: Primary Elections; Bush-Iran; Senate-Gay Marriage; WI-Storms; Canada-Terror Suspects In Court; Bush-Somalia; Preston Obit.; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in swearing in ceremony for Interior Secretary Kempthorne, White House; visits the Juan Diego Center run by Catholic Charities, Omaha; speaks on immigration reform, Omaha.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the economics of oil. Former FRB Chairman Alan Greenspan. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on S.3274 - Fairness in Asbestos Injury Resolution Act. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Hearing on agriculture conservation programs. Bruce Knight, chief, Natural Resources Conservation Service, USDA; John Johnson, deputy administrator for Farm Programs, Farm Service Agency, USDA; James Earl Kennamer, National Wild Turkey Federation, Edgefield, S.C.; Olin Sims, president elect, National Association of Conservation Districts, McFadden, Wyo.; James O. Andrew, Andrew Farms, Jefferson, Iowa; Randall Spronk, Spronk Brothers III, chairman, Environmental Policy Committee, National Pork Producers Council. Location: Room 328A, Russell.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Commerce, Justice, Science and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the 2006 hurricane season. NOAA Administrator Conrad Lautenbacher; National Hurricane Center Director Max Mayfield. Location: Room 192, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Science and Space Subcommittee. Hearing on the NASA budget and programs. Dr. Roy B. Torbet, Director, Space Science Center; Dr. Peter Vorhees, Professor, MCC Materials Science and Engineering, Northwestern University; Dr. Jim Pawelczyk, Associate Professor of Physiology and Kinesiology, Penn State University; Maj. General Charles Bolden USMC (Ret.), Chief

DOJ_NMG_0032278

Executive Officer, Jack and Panther, LLC. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Meeting on pending business. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets but immediately adjourns for a security sweep. Reconvenes at 10:40 a.m. for the 11 a.m. Joint Meeting with the Senate for the address by Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga. Highlights: Suspensions (5 bills): 1) H.Con.Res. 421 - Expressing the sense of Congress and support for Greater Opportunities for Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics (GO-STEM) programs; 2) H.Res. 699 - Supporting the goals and ideals of National Entrepreneurship Week and encouraging the implementation of entrepreneurship education programs in elementary and secondary schools and institutions of higher education through the United States; 3) H.R. 5117 - To exempt persons with disabilities from the prohibition against providing section 8 rental assistance to college students; 4) H.Res. 828 - Commending the people of Mongolia, on the 800th anniversary of Mongolian statehood, for building strong, democratic institutions, and expressing the support of the House of Representatives for efforts by the United States to continue to strengthen its partnership with that country; 5) H.Con.Res. 409 - Commemorating the 60th anniversary of the ascension to the throne of His Majesty King Bhumibol Adulyadej ofThailand. H.R. 5521 - Legislative Branch Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007. H.R. 5254 - Refinery Permit Process Schedule Act.

8:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Defense Subcommittee. Markup of the defense appropriations bill. Location: Room H-140, Capitol.

9:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Labor, HHS, Education and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Markup of the Labor, HHS, Education appropriations bill. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on legislation providing for a reduction in the number of boutique fuels. Assistant Energy Secretary Karen Harbert; Robert Meyers, EPA; Edward Murphy, American Petroleum Institute; Bob Dinneen, Renewable Fuels Association; Bob Slaughter, National Petrochemical and Refiners Association; S. William Becker, State and Territorial Air Pollution Program Administrators/Association of Local Air Pollution Control Officials; Sonja Hubbard, E-Z Mart Stores, Texarkana, Texas. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

12:30 p.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the VA's medical and prosthetic research programs. VA Undersecretary Jonathan B. Perlin; Joel Kupersmith, chief research and development officer, DVA; Robert L. Ruff, acting director, Rehabilitation Research and Development Service; Matthew J. Friedman, executive director, National Center for Post Traumatic Stress Disorder; Michael S. Watson, American College of Medical Genetics; Carl Blake, Paralyzed Veterans of America; Rick Weidman, Vietnam Veterans of America; Dennis E. Niewoehner, American Thoracic Society. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

1:30 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Middle East and Central Asia Subcommittee. Hearing on the Syria Accountability and Lebanese Sovereignty Restoration Act. Theodore Khattouf, president and CEO, Amideast; Farid Ghadry, president, Reform Party of Syria; Fouad Ajami,SAIS. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on protecting children from violent and explicit video games. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Energy and Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on maintaining the Gulf oil supply and the current hurricane season. National Weather Service Director Davied Johnson; Energy Information Administration Administrator Guy Caruso; Brigham McCown, Acting Administrator, Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration, DOT; Robert Greco, American Petroleum Institute. Location: Room 2203. Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Government Management, finance and Accountability Subcommittee. Hearing on financial management challenges at the GSA. GSA CFO Kathleen Turco; Assistant Inspector General Eugene Waszily, Jr. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Highways, Transit and Pipelines Subcommittee. Oversight hearing on implementation of SAFETEA LU. Richard Capka - administrator, Federal Highway Administration; Sandra Bushue, acting administrator, Federal Transit Administration; Jacqueline Glassman, acting administrator, National Highway Traffic Safety Administration; John H. Hill, acting administrator, Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration; Ashok G. Kaveeshwar, administrator, Research and Innovative Technology Administration. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the ICANN/VeriSign agreement and its impact on small business. John Jeffrey, ICANN; former Rep. Richard White, VeriSign's Internet Advisory Board; W.G. Champion Mitchell, CEO, Network Solutions; Steven DelBianco, NetChoice; attorney J. Bekwith Burr. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

3:30 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting on rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

Other: AFRICA-INVESTMENT _ The inaugural AGOA Investment Summit takes place to discuss investment in

DOJ_NMG_0032279

Africa. Highlights: 10:30 a.m. World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz discusses opportunities for accelerating private capital flows to Africa. Location: Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Maryland Ave. SW.

IRAQ _ Iraqi Americans hold events to protest the loss of all Assyrian government ministry positions from their elected representatives. Highlights: 10 a.m. Protest in front of the Iraqi Embassy. 12 p.m. Protest on the West Front of the Capitol. 2 p.m. News conference. National Press Club.

HEALTH IT _ 8:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. Health IT industry leaders participate in the inaugural National Health IT Day. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. 9:20 a.m. CMMS Administrator Mark McClellan. 10:15 a.m. Keynote address: Carolyn Clancy, Director, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. 12:30 p.m. Myrl Weinberg, President, National Health Council. Location: Washington Renaissance Hotel, 999 9th St. NW.

CHINA-INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY _ 8:30 a.m. - 5 p.m. The US-China Economic and Security Review holds a public hearing on ``China's Enforcemenmt of Intellectual Property Rights; and the Dangers of Movement and Counterfeited and Pirated Goods into the United States." Location: Room 385, Russell Senate Office Building.

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE _ 8:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. Sen. John Conyers, D-Mich., hosts the National Health Insurance Day Breakfast And the Kickoff of the New ``National Health Insurance Caucus." Brief presentations on the importance of national health insurance will be given by physicians, economists and grassroots health care leaders. Speakers include: Dr. Harvey Fernbach: Physicians For A National Health Plan; Dr. Jaime Torres: Latinos For National Health Insurance; and Dr. Rudolph Mueller, Author of ``As Sick As It Gets." Location: Room 2226, Rayburn House Office Building.

BLIX-WMD _ 8:30 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Hans Blix, head of the Swedish government's international, independent WMD Commission, which has spent two years exploring ways to reduce threats posed by biological, chemical, and nuclear weapons, holds a news briefing on the commission's findings and recommendations. Also speaking will be: Robert Einhorn, Senior Advisor, International Security Program at the Center for Strategic & International Studies; Jonathan Tucker, Senior Fellow, Monterey Institutes Center for Nonproliferation Studies; and John Burroughs, Executive Director, Lawyers Committee on Nuclear Policy. Location: Choate Room, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts, Ave. NW.

BIOFUELS _ 9 a.m. The Worldwatch Institute, the German Development Cooperation, and the Germany government hold an event to discuss the results of the new landmark global study, ``Biofuels for Transportation: Global Potential and Implications for Sustainable Agriculture and Energy in the 21st Century." This report is the first-ever to assess the global potential and implications of the large-scale use of biofuels for transportation. Location: Room 2168, Rayburn. Notes: German Amb. Klaus Scharioth at 9:30 a.m. World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz at 10 a.m.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 9 a.m. Closed meeting of the House GOP Conference. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

SAMPSON-AFRICA _ 9 a.m. Commerce Deputy Secretary David Sampson will address the African Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA) Forum 2006 Opening Plenary Session to discuss how the Department of Commerce has worked to expand commercial ties between the United States and the African nations. Location: State Department, Henderson Auditorium, 500 C St NW. Note: Enter at 23rd Street Entrance.

ECONOMIC OUTLOOK _ 10 a.m. The Business Roundtable holds a telephone briefing to release the results of its latest CEO Economic Outlook Survey, with Hank McKinnell, Chairman of the roundtable and CEO of Pfizer, Inc. Contacts: Jennifer Handt, 202-496-3288.

EMERGECNY PREPARDENESS-DISABLED _ 10 a.m. Department of Homeland Security Officer for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Dan Sutherland will hold an employer roundtable on emergency preparedness and people with disabilities. Location: Commission Meeting Room, 1801 L St. NW.

ENERGY FUTURE _ 10 a.m. A coalition of farm, forestry and enviornmental groups and companies holds a news conference to announce a new effort to secure the nation's energy future, with Bill Richards of 25 x 25, Sens. Chuck Grassley and Ken Salazar, Reps. Bob Goodlatte and Collin Peterson, others. Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

GIAMBASTIANI-WAR COLLEGE _ 10 a.m. Vice Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, Adm. Edmund Giambastiani addresses the National Defense University, Industrial College of the Armed Forces and the National War College graduation. Location: Fort McNair.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS _ 10 a.m. The House Democratic Leadership holds a news conference directly following their caucus meeting to discuss what they belive are American prioritiesproviding affordable health care, bringing down energy costs, strengthening the economy, and addressing rising war costs and deficits. Location: Cannon Rotunda, outside Room 345.

KOREA TRADE _ 10 a.m. Rep. Dennis Kucinich holds a news conference on the Korean trade agreement. Location: Cannon Terrace.

SECURITY _ 10 a.m. House Republican leadership holds a news briefing on ``securing America's future." Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

DEMOCRATS-ESTATE TAX _ 10:15 a.m. Democratic Senators Kent Conrad, Joe Lieberman, and Barack Obama will discuss what they say are the wrong priorities of Bush Republicans in pursuing full repeal of the estate tax. Sponsors say the estate tax repeal will provide a $1 trillion tax break to the wealthiest Americans while ignoring the issues facing most average Americans. Location: Senate Radio/TV Gallery.

DOJ_NMG_0032280

CHINA TRADE _ 10:30 a.m. Sens. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., meet with U.S. Trade Representative Nominee Susan Schwab to discuss the Administrations willingness to press for reciprocity for financial firms that want to invest in China. Last, week, Schumer objected to the unanimous consent request to approve her nomination without a vote or debate. However, Graham strongly supports the Schwab nomination and has encouraged the Senate to allow a quick vote. Location: Room 313, Hart Senate Office Building.

CENSORSHIP _ 11 a.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion on policies and technologies to give parents control over children's media consumption, with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Mary Landrieu and Rick Santorum, and FCC Commissioners Michael Cops and Deborah Taylor Tate. Location: Jordan Conference Center, 1330 G St. NW.

MARKEY-BLIX _ 11 a.m. US Representative Edward J. Markey will be meeting at 11:00am with former UN chief weapons inspector Hans Blix. Location: Markey's office, Room 2108, Rayburn House Office Building.

CITIZENSHIP _ 12 p.m. Reps. Luis Gutierrez, Grace Napolitano, others, hold a news conference to announce National Citizenship Day, a national network of citizenship workshops on July 1. Location: Cannon Terrace.

SERBIA _ 12 p.m. The Center for International Private Enterprise and the International Forum for Democratic Studies holds a discussion, ``Democratic and Economic Transition in Serbia: Capturing Lessons Learned," with Boris Begovic, Vice President, Center for Liberal-Democratic Studies, Belgrade, Serbia. Location: Federal City Council, Suite 600, 1156 15th St. NW.

DEMOCRATS-CONSERVATISM _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) will host Ted Nordhaus and Michael Shellenberger, partners at American Environics, and co-directors of the Breakthrough Institute, to discuss their cutting-edge research into social values trends that underlie today's conservative majority. Location: Phoenix Park Hotel, 520 North Capitol St. NW.

LATINO PARTICIPATION _ 12:30 p.m. The Tomas Rivera Policy Institute (TRPI) in conjunction with the Metropolitan Center, Florida International University, will hold a symposium titled ``New Dimensions of Latino Participation." The forum will explore the dynamics of Latino political engagement, such as the recent immigrant protests, and the impact on immigration policy and the 2006 and 2008 Latino vote. Sponsorship for this event is provided by the Carnegie Corporation of New York with additional funding provided by Comcast and the Latino Policy Coalition. Attendees include: Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo.; Harry Pachon, president, Tomas Rivera Policy Institute at USC; Roberto Suro, director, Pew Hispanic Center; Mark Krikorian, executive director, Center for Immigration Studies; Maria Echaveste, principal, Nueva Vista Group; Robert DePosada, president, The Latino Coalition; Clarissa Martinez de Castro, director of state/local public policy, NCLR; and Joe Garcia, vice president, Hispanic Project, NDN. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

ASBESTOS BILL _ 1 p.m. Public Citizen holds a briefing on the amended Specter-Leahy asbestos trust fund bill. Location: Room 512, Hart.

ECONOMIC SECURITY _ 1 p.m. The Center for American Progress holds a presentation, ``Pulling Together: Re-Building Economic Security in the 21st Century," with Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, Gene Sperling of the center, others. Location: 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

HURRICANES-ELECTORATE _ 1 p.m. The National Coalition on Black Civic Participation holds a symposium on questions about the current hurricane season and lessons learned from last year's season, with Rick Pogue of the Red Cross, Steven Jones of the First Response Coalition, Maj. George Hood of the Salvation Army, Janet Johnson of the Weather Channel, others. Location: National Press Club.

FEDERAL SPENDING _ 2 p.m. Rep. Frank Wolf holds a news conference to announce a bill creating a national commission aimed at dealing with federal spending and entitlements. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

NATIVE HAWAIIANS _ 2 p.m. Sens. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., hold a press conference to discuss their opposition to legislation that would create a racially-separate government for native Hawaiians living across the United States, the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act of 2005, S.147. Cornyn and Alexander will be joined by native Hawaiians who are in Washington to express their opposition to the legislation, and the Chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Gerald A. Reynolds. Location: Room S-219, Capitol.

ESTATE TAX _ 2 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. The 60 Plus Assocation delivers ``Kill The Death Tax, Don't Wound It," to members of Congress to call for repeal of the Estate Tax. Location: Room SC-4, Capitol.

LIBERALS-TERRORISM _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a forum, ``The Good Fight: Liberals, Conservatives and the War on Terror." Peter Beinart, Brookings nonresident senior fellow and editor-at-large of The New Republic, will present a historical perspective on liberalism and fighting totalitarianism, as well as his views on how today's liberals ought to approach today's fight against terror. Focus is on Beinart's book, ``The Good Fight: Why Liberals -- and Only Liberals -- Can Win the War on Terror and Make America Great Again." Tod Lindberg of the Hoover Institution also will participate. Location: The Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0032281

FOREIGN POLICY _ 6 p.m. Reps. Mark Kirk and Rick Larsen give the keynote address at the 4th annual U.S. Foreign Policy Colloquium, cosponsored by George Washington University and the National Committee on U.S.-China Relations. Location: Room 213, Harding Auditorium, 1957 E St. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0032282

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Cheney Reaches Deal With Specter Over NSA Phone Data Oversight ... 3
Canadian Terror Suspects Plotted To Behead Lawmakers, Prime Minister ... 3
US Military To Forego Using Psychiatrists In Interrogations, Rely On Psychologists ... 4
Last Member Of "Virginia Jihad" Convicted ... 4
Business Leader Calls For Creation Of Homeland Security Agency In UK ... 5

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Says NYC "Still No. 1" Under Urban Areas Initiative ... 5
9/11 Commissioners Say Government Falling Short On Homeland Security ... 5
Study Finds Katrina Increased Percentage Of Whites In New Orleans, Blacks In Mississippi ... 6

War News:

Warner Pledges To Hold Hearings On Haditha As Soon As Possible ... 6
Maliki To Release 2500 Prisoners, Establish Baathist Reconciliation Process ... 7
Baghdad Morgue Reports 1400 Slain In May ... 8
Iraqi Minister Criticizes Spending By Foreign Aid Donors ... 8
Family Of American Kidnapped In Iraq Profiled ... 9
Fear Of Kidnappers Drives Baghdad Residents To Hide Wealth ... 9
Car Bombings Kill Two US Soldiers In Afghanistan, Wound Four 9
Thousands Of US Soldiers Suffer From Undiagnosed Brain Injuries ... 9

Corporate Scandals:

SEC Chair Concerned About Widening Options Probe ... 9
Lawmakers Blast Former Fannie Mae CEO Over Fraud Allegations ... 9

Criminal Law:

DOJ Official's Silence On Leak Prosecutions Angers Senators ... 10
FBI Raided Nigerian Official's Home In Search Of Jefferson Bribe Money ... 11
Former Lewis Aide Acknowledges Military Contractor Helped Buy House ... 12
Former Aide Paid For DeLay's Wife's Retirement Account ... 12
Prosecutors Reportedly Seeking Deal With McKinney ... 12
Gambino Capo Convicted Of Racketeering Charges ... 13
Former Tennessee Senator Denies Taking Bribes As Trial Goes To Jury ... 13
Chicago Water Official Testifies Sorich Make Him Hire Drunken Campaign Worker ... 13
FBI Investigating New Angle To Alleged Fumo Link With Non-Profit ... 13
Mississippi County Official Charged With Bribery, Witness Tampering ... 14
Suicidal Prosecution Witness Returns To Stand In New Jersey Corruption Trial ... 14
Bulger Associate Testifies About Corrupt Relationship Between FBI, Informants ... 14
Arrest Of Connecticut Garbage Magnate In Crime Probe Could Be Imminent ... 14
New York Hedge Fund Scam Artist Pleads Guilty ... 15
Wisconsin Law Will Require Sex Offenders To Wear GPS Tracking Devices ... 15
Man Who Served 18 Years On Rape Charge Freed By DNA Evidence ... 15

Civil Law:

DOJ Reaches Deal With Gabelli On Cell Phone License Lawsuit15

Civil Rights:

Special Prosecutor Rules Ohio Police Shootings Justifiable ... 16
Gay Marriage Amendment Headed For Defeat In Senate ... 16
EEOC Reaches Settlement With Verizon On Pregnancy Bias Lawsuit ... 16
Blanco To Sign Restrictive Louisiana Abortion Bill ... 17
LOC Transgender Discrimination Case Moves To Discovery Phase ... 17
Senate To Consider Bill Of Hawaiian Self-Government ... 17
Facing Receivership Threat, Williams Fires DC's Mental Health Director ... 17
Friedman Praises US Diversity ... 18
Westmoreland Says Voting Rights Act Should Be Modernized ... 18
NYTimes Criticizes Ohio Voter Registration Regulations ... 18

Antitrust:

ACLU Asks FCC To Pause ATT-Bell South Merger ... 18
EU Officials Says Microsoft's Reputation Is At Stake ... 19

UK Airports Operator OKs Takeover Bid From Spain's Ferrovial 19
Chirac Seeks To Boost German Bid For Euronext Merger 19
Mittal Executive Questions Arcelor Shareholder Voting Procedure 19
Merged Airline Faces Increased Customer Complaints 20

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Lawmakers Make Case For ANWR Exploration 20
Johanns Says Bird Flu Easily Detected 20
SCOTUS Refuses To Hear Appeal Of Seneca Tribe's New York Land Claim 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Announces $2.75 Million Grant To Fight Gangs In Cleveland Area 20
Wanted Bay-Area Hells Angels Leader Surrenders To FBI 21
Violent New Jersey Drug Dealer Sentenced To Life In Prison 21
Federal "Weed & Seed" Money Will Help Charlotte, NC, Fight Crime 21
Guns, Drugs Seized In New Jersey, 3 Arrested 21
Pittsburgh Police Confiscate Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Packets 21
Maryland AG's Office Denies Approving Release Of Security Information 22
Former Doctor Investigated By DEA Accused Of Malpractice 22
Arizona Reliever's House Searched In Baseball's Steroid Investigation 22
Montel Williams To Back Medicinal Use Of Marijuana In New Jersey 23

Immigration:

Bush Says Immigration Reform Incomplete Without Guest Worker Program 23
Six Arrested By Immigration Agents In North Carolina To Be Deported 26

Tax:

Frist Rejects Estate Tax Compromise 26
Grassley Outlines Effect Of Tax Code Change On Expatriates .. 26

Congress-Administration:

White House Reenergizes Defense Of Bush Judicial Nominees 27
Hecht Admonished For Vocal Support Of Miers Nomination 27
Congress Fighting Administration Effort To Consolidate Foreign Aid Programs 27
White House Deployed Gingrich To Influence Congressional Oversight 27
Democrats Seek To Curb Bush Use Of Signing Statements 27
VA Says Personal Information Of 80% Of Active Duty Troops Stolen 28
House Leadership Said To Be Working To Keep Pledge On Earmark Reform 28
Hoyer Says Pelosi Will Lead House Democrats Regardless Of Election Outcome 28
Senate GOP Focus On Social Issues Worries Some Republican Members 29
Laura Bush Visits Minnesota Community Center 29
OPM Director Launches "Career Patterns" Initiative 29
White House Threatens To Veto Intervention In FAA Contract Dispute 29
Samuelson Says Paulson Needs Economic Crisis To Excel At Treasury 29
WPost Hits Reid Over Acceptance Of Boxing Tickets 29

Other News:

Stock Markets Continue To Lose Ground 29
Bilbray Leading In CA50; Filner Turns Back Primary Challenge . 30
Angelides To Face Schwarzenegger As Westly Concedes Primary 31
Riley Easily Defeats Moore In Alabama Gubernatorial Primary .. 31
Burns, Tester Easily Win Primary Contests 31
Menendez, Kean Cruise To Primary Wins, Intensify Rhetoric 31
At-Risk Lawmakers, Governors Listed 32
GOP Incumbents' Perks Pose Difficult Challenge To Democratic Challengers 32
Harris Undeterred By Opposition From Within Party To Senate Run 32
Weld Exits New York Gubernatorial Race 32
Tie To Bush Seen As Key To Frist's '08 Hopes 33
Brownback's 2008 Aspirations Examined 33
Tancredo Wins Presidential Straw Poll In Michigan 33
US Scientists Cleared To Clone Human Embryos 33
Study Finds 43% Aren't Saving Enough For Retirement 33
Program Shows Progress Housing Homeless 34
Documents Show CIA Knew Eichmann's Whereabouts 34
Vanderkam Says Government Should Get Out Of States' Way On Health Care 34
Marcus Says Works On Negativity, Disclosure Are "Useful." 34
Bush Cautiously Optimistic On Initial Iranian Response To Incentives 34
Bush Concerned Over Somalia Unrest 36
Extending Deadline, Abbas Asks Hamas To Reconsider Deal ... 37
Indonesian Minister Rebukes US Approach To War On Terror .. 37
Exercise Suggests Taiwan Could Defend Itself For Two Weeks Without US Help 37
Poll Shows Muslim Women Disaffected By US Focus On Western Values 38
Peru's New President Wants To Revisit US Trade Pact 38
US Angling To Prevent Venezuela From Getting Security Council Seat 38
Mexican Candidates Focus On Middle-Class Voters 38
Oil Concerns May Affect Cuba Trade Policy 38
European, African Officials Unveil New Plan To Interdict Illegal Migrants 39

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 39

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 40

DOJ_NMG_0032284

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney Reaches Deal With Specter Over NSA Phone Data Oversight. Sen. Arlen Specter has dropped plans to call for testimony from phone company officials after Vice President Dick Cheney agreed the Administration would consider his bill to allow the FISA court oversight of the NSA terrorist monitoring program. USA Today (6/7, Diamond, 2.31M) reports, "The deal prompted protests from Democratic lawmakers, who said the Republican-controlled Congress had refused to challenge the administration's expansion of presidential authority. 'Why don't we just recess for the rest of the year, and the vice president will just tell the nation what laws we'll have?' said Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, ranking Democrat on the committee." But "Specter said his hand had been forced by the telephone companies' refusal to discuss classified programs." Meanwhile, Sen. Orrin Hatch said President Bush "is willing to work with us as long as it doesn't detract from the president's constitutional powers.'"

CNN (6/7) reports, "The potential for a showdown over subpoenas was averted when Republicans, led by former committee chairman Orrin Hatch of Utah, outmaneuvered Specter in advance of the hearing. … Hatch disclosed he had won assurances from Vice President Cheney that the White House would at least review proposed legislation to restrict aspects of NSA surveillance programs. In exchange, the committee would not press the phone companies to divulge their cooperation with the government." CNN adds, "In a dissent, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., announced she would oppose subpoenas for the phone companies. Feinstein, who is on the Intelligence Committee, said she had been fully briefed on the secret NSA programs and believes if the phone companies should be summoned at all, it should be from the intelligence panel, which conducts its business behind closed doors." CNN notes, "Justice Department officials acknowledge they are bracing for a potentially stormy hearing, but probably not as soon as Specter would like. … A senior Justice official who asked not to be identified said it was likely they would be able to arrange for Gonzales to testify before the committee 'in the next two months.'"

The AP (6/7, Shrader) reports, "Specter had threatened to subpoena executives of the major phone companies to get them to testify about their cooperation with the NSA. But in an informal conversation, one company lawyer told Specter the executives wouldn't be able to testify about any classified information. Specter said Cheney told the committee the restriction would apply to everyone the senators want to question. … Specter rejected suggestions that he was letting the White House dictate the committee's agenda, and he said he plans to have Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before the committee later this month. … 'I yield to no man or woman on pressing this administration on these issues,' he said."

Canadian Terror Suspects Plotted To Behead Lawmakers, Prime Minister. As the 15 of the 17 suspected terrorists arrested last week made their first appearance in court, details of their alleged plots emerged yesterday. Among the schemes was a plan to storm the Canadian parliament and behead hostages, including Prime Minister Steven Harper.

The story was the lead on CBS and NBC last night, and ran second on ABC. The CBS Evening News (6/6, lead story, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "If the allegations are correct, this is no small-time local operation but a ruthless band with connections to terrorist cells around the world and including the United States who were bent on taking over Canadian media outlets and beheading the Canadian prime minister." CBS (Bowers) added, "One of the accused, 25-year-old Steven Chand, was part of a plot that included plans to storm the Canadian Parliament in Ottawa and take politicians hostage, behead the hostages, including Prime Minister Stephen Harper if Canadian troops weren't withdrawn from Afghanistan, and take over the headquarters of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to gain control of the country's airwaves. Prosecutors gave defense attorneys an eight-page document that CBS News was told outlined the general organization and operations of what they call the terror cell."

NBC Nightly News (6/6, lead story, 2:55, Tibbles, 9.87M) reported "investigators here are saying there may be more arrests, as those already charged appeared in court." Other "potential targets" include "the Toronto Stock Exchange, and a senior US counter-terror official tells NBC News the group also planned to open fire on pedestrians on one of the city's busy streets, newspapers now filled with stories about who these men were, many Canadian citizens of East Asian background living in a nation that prides itself on its ethnic tolerance and relative security."

ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 2, 2:00, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "Some of the suspects smirked, and others appeared defiant in court here today as the chilling, new details of their alleged plot emerged. The most dramatic part of the plot included the plan to attack and storm the parliament building in Ottawa." The Prime Minister "has defended the role of Canada's 2300 troops in Afghanistan, and that clearly was a big issue for the suspected terrorists."

The Washington Post (6/7, A1, Struck, 744K) reports Prime Minister Stephen Harper "brushed aside the news with a joke. 'I can live with all these threats as long as they are not from my caucus,' he quipped as he walked into his office."

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Williams, 958K) reports, "The accusations delivered to several of the defendants' attorneys in a one-page investigation summary included no evidence to substantiate the charges, said the attorney for 25-year-old Steven Vikash Chand." Batasar "complained that he had not been allowed to meet privately with Chand and later said to reporters outside the courthouse: 'This is not Guantanamo, this is Toronto, Canada.'" The New York Times (6/7, Depalma, 1.19M) also reports "several lawyers complained that extraordinary security had prevented them from speaking to their clients in private." The men, "all residents of Canada, have been held in isolation at a maximum-security prison since shortly after they were arrested over the weekend. They have been prohibited from talking to their families or one another." The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Cherney, 2.11M) runs a similar report under the headline "Defense Lawyers In Canada Fault Terror Case Data."

Canadian Terror Suspects' Links To US, Other Countries Examined. The Washington Times (6/7, 90K) and USA Today (6/7, 2.31M) run an AP story reporting, "A US law enforcement official said investigators were looking for ties between the Canadian detainees and Islamic militants held in the USA, Britain, Bangladesh, Bosnia, Denmark and Sweden."

The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 2, 1:55, Stewart, 7.66M) reported, "US law enforcement officials say the investigation of the Canadian cell is something they've been knowing about for months and it was the subject of a global counterterrorist summit meeting that took place in Washington this spring. The meeting took place shortly after the arrest in April of two Atlanta men charged with videotaping potential bombing targets in Washington including the Capitol." Given the "global scope of the plot, investigators from all the affected countries met in Washington and agreed to 'run the string out to see if other conspirators unknown to them might surface.' The case was unique because of the global cooperation it took to unravel it, but law enforcement officials admit that the scary thing is that this case suggests how easy it is for homegrown terrorists to seek out global partners as well. And as we reported last night, officials fear it's just that kind of cooperation that may soon lead to another attack inside the United States."

NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 2, 2:00, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The FBI, meantime, is following up on information found during searches of the homes of the Canadian suspects; including names of some Americans they were in contact with. It's not clear yet, investigators say, what those contacts were about. The FBI remains intensely interested in two Atlanta area men who met with some of the Canadians last year. The meeting in Toronto was, investigators tell NBC News, a kind of terrorist workshop which may have included paramilitary training in this rural area north of Toronto. But what worries the FBI even more about the two, Ehsanul Sadequee and Syed Ahmed, is that both traveled overseas -- Ahmed to Pakistan hoping to get terror training and Sadequee to Bangladesh, where his family is from. Several US sources tell NBC News that Sadequee went there to meet leaders of al Qaeda in Bangladesh, a country where the terror organization is still robust and easily approached."

ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 2, 2:00, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "US and Canadian authorities say this was at heart a Website plot, with fellow jihadists online in the US, London, and Bosnia serving as kind of armchair commanders. Making suggestions on methods of operation, and targets."

WSJournal Says Arrests Highlight Importance Of Electronic Surveillance. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) editorializes that the arrests highlight "the crucial role electronic surveillance plays in uncovering potentially catastrophic terrorist attacks. Question: Did that surveillance require a warrant? Do you care?" The Journal adds, "Meantime, the important thing is to praise the work of Canadian authorities in foiling what could have been another 9/11. We can only hope their American counterparts are as good."

US Military To Forego Using Psychiatrists In Interrogations, Rely On Psychologists. In response to a vote by the American Psychiatric Association stating its opposition to the participation of psychiatrists in military interrogations, the US military announce it would attempt to use only psychologists. The New York Times (6/7, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, told reporters that the new policy favoring the use of psychologists over psychiatrists was a recognition of differing positions taken by their respective professional groups." American Psychological Association director of ethics Stephen Behnke "said psychologists knew not to participate in activities that harmed detainees. But Dr. Behnke also said the group believed that helping military interrogators made a valuable contribution because it was part of an effort to prevent terrorism." The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Barnes, 958K) runs a similar report.

Last Member Of "Virginia Jihad" Convicted. Ali Asad Chandia, the eleventh and final man accused in the "Virginia jihad network," was convicted of providing material support to terrorists. The Washington Post (6/7, A12, Markon, 744K) reports, "Federal officials have long described the case as one of the most important domestic terrorism prosecutions since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0032286

Yesterday, they hailed Chandia's conviction and said it underscored the importance of cooperating with foreign law enforcement agencies in the battle against terrorism." U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said, "This case demonstrates our relentless commitment to bringing to justice those who provide support to terrorist organizations." But local Muslims have "criticized the investigation as overzealous and the prison terms of those convicted as excessive. Muslims flocked to the courthouse to show support for Chandia. … About 100 supporters attended closing arguments Monday."

Business Leader Calls For Creation Of Homeland Security Agency In UK. London Chamber of Commerce and Industry president Michael Cassidy in an op-ed in the Financial Times (6/7) advocates taking additional steps to prepare against terrorist attacks including improving baggage checks, increasing police visibility and building ties with the Asian business community. But in addition, "We need a government department focused on what has been loosely called 'homeland security'. Separate this vital responsibility from the rag bag of Home Office duties, some of which involve inherent conflicts when it comes to judging how best to protect the public. That might be more fit for purpose than the present arrangement, which seems bogged down in traditional thinking and is over-reliant on the chancy business of intelligence gathering."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says NYC "Still No. 1" Under Urban Areas Initiative. DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff, in an op-ed in the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M) titled "New York, You're Still No. 1," writes that while readers might not "know it based on the news media reaction," Urban Area Security Initiative grants announced last week "continue a financing stream that places New York and Washington at the very top of the list in terms of money received." New York's $124 million "is 50 percent more than the next-highest area, Los Angeles, and represents almost a threefold increase over the $46 million the city received in 2004." Meanwhile, rather than list the city's "significant landmarks" as icons, DHS placed sites like the Empire State Building and Brooklyn Bridge in categories that would "generate a higher complete risk grade for New York's financing proposal." Chertoff adds that DHS "has made every effort to rely on measurable facts and to take politics out of the process."

House Approves Homeland Security Appropriations Bill. The AP (6/7, Jordan) reports House Republicans voting yesterday on the Homeland Security appropriations bill "blocked a vote…on restoring millions of dollars in counterterror funds to big-city targets, including New York, refusing to bust budget targets over slashed grants to emergency first responders." They rejected a request from New York City-area Democrats to add $750 million, "even as they vowed anew to investigate how Homeland Security could justify cutting funding to New York and Washington." The overall $32 billion spending bill, which "bolsters protections at seaports by $448 million more than in 2006, adds 1,200 Border Patrol agents and boosts the Hurricane Katrina-beleagured Federal Emergency Management Agency by $6.5 billion for disaster preparedness," was approved 389-9.

Bloomberg Says City Will Not Change Application Strategy. The New York Times (6/7, Chan, Hu, 1.19M) reports, "Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said yesterday that the city would not alter its strategy in future applications for federal antiterror money to comply with the Department of Homeland Security's preference for semipermanent safeguards like new technology over recurring costs like police overtime." At a Staten Island news conference, Bloomberg said the city has "a very different philosophy than what the federal government does," adding that it was "wrong" that the federal government "typically" does not cover labor costs." Bloomberg said Secretary Chertoff "had promised to help the city to maximize the money that was awarded."

9/11 Commissioners Say Government Falling Short On Homeland Security. The leaders of the 9/11 Commission yesterday testified before a House panel on the continuing terrorist threat to US homeland security, giving the government poor grades on making improvements in several key areas: Airport security, funding for targeted cities such as New York and Washington, DC, FBI reform, and nuclear terrorism ABC World News Tonight (6/6, lead story, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Almost five years after those attacks, the leaders of the 9/11 Commission said that the US and its security is being compromised by technical, financial and political problems that should have long since been solved. They were on Capitol Hill. And they certainly did not mince words." ABC (Thomas) added, "Stinging criticism from 9/11 Commissioners. The government, they say, is still failing to protect the country." On airport security, "the Transportation Security Administration, they say, is plagued by poor management. The terrorism watch list, designed to weed out potential terrorists before they board planes, is woefully inadequate." On "money to secure the homeland, commissioners were stunned by the government's recent decision to reduce funding for New York and Washington. Decisions are made, they say, based more on politics than on risk." On the FBI, "it has made some progress in reforming itself but is moving much too slowly. After investigating tens of millions of dollars, FBI computers remain antiquated. Its ability to share critical information is limited. Its ability to assess threats fallen short. And too many of its key leaders are retiring." And "on the threat of nuclear terrorism, commissioners say the government's efforts get a failing grade."

DOJ_NMG_0032287

Study Finds Katrina Increased Percentage Of Whites In New Orleans, Blacks In Mississippi. The Washington Post (6/7, A12, Whoriskey, 744K) reports a Census Bureau report to be released today finds that "Hurricane Katrina displaced more than 400,000 people from the New Orleans area," while "those who remained were more prosperous and were far more likely to be white." Meanwhile, the Mississippi coast, which "lost 41,000 people from before Katrina to January," saw its percentage of non-Hispanic black grow from 17 percent to 27 percent. "Census officials warned that some of the figures are subject to larger than normal margins of error and, moreover, that the figures are already at least five months old."

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Simmons, 958K) reports, "Louisiana state officials said that while the data was useful, it was just 'a snapshot.' 'It's a partial picture of the changes,' said Karen Paterson, a demographer at the Louisiana State Census Data Center."

WPost Says Corps' Admission Of Error On Levees Shows Need For More Oversight. Under the headline "Katrina's Unlearned Lessons," the Washington Post (6/7, A22, 744K) editorializes that though one "might think" that the "mea culpa" from the US Army Corps of Engineers, whose own inquiry found last week that "the agency committed numerous mistakes of design" in constructing New Orleans' levee system, "would fuel efforts to reform the agency." However, while Sens. John McCain and Russell Feingold are supporting a measure that would require future Corps proposals to "be subject to technical review by an independent agency," a "stronger current in Congress" backs a measure written by Sens. James M. Inhofe (and Christopher S. Bond that "would loosen oversight of the Corps." The Post states, "The Corps' admission of its own technical shortcomings points to the need for tougher oversight, not less."

Weather Channel President Says Hurricane Focus Should Be On Preparedness, Not Predictions. Debora Wilson, president of The Weather Channel, in an op-ed in USA Today (6/7, 2.31M) writes that the "higher degree of interest" the 2005 hurricane season generated "among the general public in understanding and predicting what's going to happen this year" has created "a new wave of individuals and organizations who bill themselves as experts, publicly issuing predictions that not only speculate on the number of hurricanes the USA will experience this season but also the specific regions where the storms will make landfall." Such predictions "provide a misdirected focus. The question should not be 'How many?' but, instead, 'Are you prepared?'" Wilson states that while "these unfounded predictions do raise awareness in the forecasted areas, they also lull residents in other coastal regions into a false sense of security."

Hurricanes Seen As "New Uninsurable." Holman W. Jenkins, Jr., in his column for the Wall Street Journal (6/7, A15, 2.11M) writes that hurricanes have displaced terrorism as "the new 'uninsurable.'" Factors, including government payouts in the wake of 9/11 and Katrina, have been "unraveling the insurance industry's ability to help society control its risk-taking by properly pricing risk." To restore this ability, one would have to assume "that property owners would be willing to pay 'actuarially sound' rates rather than just skipping insurance and relying on a federal bailout in the wake of a big storm. Here's the real crux of the claim by some industry watchers that hurricanes have become effectively uninsurable." Jenkins adds that while there is growing support for a federal disaster insurance program, the federal flood insurance program "was instituted in 1968…to make property owners bear the cost of their own recurrent bailouts," but "became a subsidy to increased risk-taking" instead.

WAR NEWS:

Warner Pledges To Hold Hearings On Haditha As Soon As Possible. The AP (6/7, Sidoti) reports Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he hold hearings on allegations that "Marines killed up to 24 Iraqi civilians last November in the town of Haditha without cause and then engaged in a cover-up." Warner "told reporters he wanted to hold the first of what he expected to be a series of hearings on the allegations as soon as Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell finishes his investigation into whether military personnel lied about what occurred at Haditha. Warner said Bargewell likely would be the first witness called. Congressional aides say Bargewell's report could be completed within the week but that the military's separate criminal investigation is not expected to be finished anytime soon." Warner is quoted as saying, "We've got our duty and we'll do it. We'll go wherever the facts lead."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/6, Bash) reported Warner "said he is concerned about the fact that there's public discussion about this without much official word from the Pentagon, and he says that is increasingly harmful." AFP (6/7) says Warner urged Defense Secretary Rumsfeld "to quickly make public the findings" of the Bargewell investigation. Warner warned, "Delays in getting out the official findings of fact due to a protracted review process will mean a mixture of information, misinformation and unconfirmed facts will continue to spiral in the public domain."

DOJ_NMG_0032288

Levin Criticizes Pace Of Pentagon Disclosures. The New York Times (6/7, Cloud, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee "expressed growing frustration that the Pentagon was not sharing details about the inquiries since Time magazine published an article in March challenging the military's explanation of the deaths. 'They were very slow in notifying the committee, just like they were very slow in doing everything else,'" said Sen. Carl Levin. Levin "added that military officials in Iraq 'knew there was something amiss' but did not start the two investigations until March 9."

"Voluminous" Pentagon Report On Haditha "Virtually Completed." The New York Times (6/7, Cloud, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports Rep. John Kline "said in a telephone interview that he and three other lawmakers were told by the officer, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, that General Bargewell's inquiry was voluminous and 'virtually completed.'"

Haditha Incident Invoked In Report On Dedication Of Islamic Center At Quantico. The Washington Post (6/7, B1, Vargas, 744K) reports an "Islamic Prayer Center" at the Marine Corps Base in Quantico was dedicated yesterday. The Post's piece tries to make the ceremony relevant to the current scandals surrounding the deaths of civilians in Iraq, noting "no one mentioned Haditha," but" it "was on the mind of some." According to the Post, "Several who attended the ceremony described it as a positive step in relations with the Muslim community in the United States after a series of reported missteps recently in Iraq, such as the alleged atrocity in Haditha."

Rumsfeld's Image Could Affect Perception Of Haditha Investigation. In a column largely critical of Donald Rumsfeld's track record as Secretary of Defense, New York Times/International Herald Tribune (6/7) columnist Roger Cohen takes aim the Secretary's capacity to handle the ongoing investigation into allegations US marines killed civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha last November. Cohen writes, "Haditha is not My Lai. But it may resemble it at least in this respect: the suggestion of a cover-up in the aftermath of the killing is strong. Rumsfeld is promising clarity: 'There's an investigation going on as to what took place. There's an investigation going as to what took place after whatever took place.' ... I don't doubt Rumsfeld wants a thorough investigation. But there's a problem: when swagger and cavalier lack of preparation and disregard for facts have been your hallmarks, things tend to happen in your image. That's a truth Rumsfeld may ultimately have to face."

Administration Critics Accused Of "Cynically Leveraging" Haditha Killings. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) David Rivkin and Lee Casey, Washington lawyers who served in the Justice Department under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush, write, "The unfolding investigation of last November's events in Haditha reveals much more about the Bush administration's critics than it does about the U.S. armed forces. Although the inquiry is ongoing, it appears that 24 unarmed Iraqi civilians were deliberately murdered, allegedly by American Marines seeking revenge for a fallen comrade. If true, the episode was a war crime, something that must be -- and no doubt will be -- severely punished. However, the administration's critics are already cynically leveraging the Haditha killings as a means of undercutting the president, heedless of the effect this may have on American national interests."

Media Accused Of Highlighting Abuses By US, Ignoring Abuses By Terrorists. Douglas MacKinnon, a former press secretary to former Sen. Bob Dole and a former White House and Pentagon official, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (6/7, 90K) faults the US media of overreacting to abuses by the US military in the war against terrorism while ignoring abuses by terrorists. MacKinnon writes, "The liberals in the media understand that with each news report on the new My Lai, each case where a U.S. soldier is punished for letting a dog bark in the face of a war prisoner, with every story that equates dunking a terrorist in water with chopping off a human head, they tell these Islamist terrorists that political correctness is weakening our foreign policy and military and robbing us of our will to prosecute the war or defend our nation. They know but don't care. For them, the real enemy is Mr. Bush and conservative beliefs."

Maliki To Release 2500 Prisoners, Establish Baathist Reconciliation Process. The New York Times (6/7, Burns, 1.19M) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki announced that his government will "release 2,500 detainees, nearly 10 percent of those held in Iraqi and American detention centers, and that it would adopt a 'national reconciliation' plan to reintegrate former members of Saddam Hussein's ruling Baath Party into society." Maliki, "compared it to South Africa's 'truth and reconciliation' process in the 1990's, which, he said, 'sent some criminals to the courts and reinstated other people in society.'" According to the Times, the release of detainees, "though sweeping, seemed likely to fall far short of the demands of Sunni politicians." Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, a spokesman for the American military command, "said the decision to free the detainees…had been agreed to in a joint review by Iraqi and American officials. He said those freed would not include any deemed 'guilty of serious crimes such as bombings, torture, kidnapping and murder.'"

The Washington Post (6/7, A19, Fekeiki, Hernandez, 744K) reports Maliki "called the move a 'positive message and a chance for those who want to rethink their strategy.' He specifically excluded detainees connected to violent attacks and supporters of the former government of Saddam Hussein from his amnesty. The people to be released 'are not Saddamists or terrorists,' Maliki said. … 'They weren't involved in the bloodshed or imposing the sectarian mentality and cleansing. They are people who made mistakes.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032289

Haditha Allows Maliki To Assert Independence From US. The Christian Science Monitor (6/7, LaFranchi, 61K) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki "is showing no…reticence" about referring to the alleged massacre at Haditha. According to the Monitor, Maliki's "tough stance suggests a new assertion of sovereignty by the Iraqi government, something that actually works to the US's favor. But the allegations, coming as the new government tries to demonstrate control, are likely to complicate both US-Iraq relations and Maliki's task of leading the Iraqi people."

Baghdad Morgue Reports 1400 Slain In May. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 5, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that in Iraq, "it's been another tough day. 30 deaths, reported, including 9 people whose severed heads were found northeast of Baghdad. Eight heads were found in the same village over the weekend. Meanwhile, Iraq's health ministry released numbers that provide a snapshot of how much more dangerous Iraq has become. The bodies of nearly 1,400 people who died violently were taken to Baghdad's central morgue last month, the highest monthly total of this year."

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Roug, 958K) reports Baghdad "continues to be the epicenter of violence. On Tuesday, authorities reported that a car bomb went off near a funeral in a southwestern neighborhood, killing six people and injuring 18. In a different part of town, a roadside bomb exploded at a bus stop, killing one woman and wounding two men. Earlier in the day, the principal of Hamza primary school, Amer Azzawi, a Sunni Muslim, was driving with his Shiite Muslim assistant, Suaad Rubaie, when a drive-by gunman killed them."

Baqubah Sees Surge In Attacks, Atrocities. The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Roug, 958K) reports Baqubah residents have found boxes in their streets containing "he decomposing heads of nine men, each inside a black plastic bag. … In Baqubah…slayings and attacks against Iraqi security forces have recently soared. On Saturday, eight other heads were found in banana crates near the city. One of the heads was wrapped like a present. None of the bodies have been found.

Red Crescent Claims Violence In Iraq Has Displaced At Least 100,000. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 6, 2:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The surge of sectarian violence responsible for the spiraling death toll is having another profound impact. It is driving Iraqis from their homes. The Iraqi Red Crescent Society says at least 100,000 people have been displaced, creating one more crisis for the Iraqi government." ABC (Berman) added, "The Iraqi Red Crescent says more than 1,000 people are fleeing their homes every week. But it is a hard number to track. Many people are afraid to ask for help and simply go into hiding. Even in the camps, some do not feel safe."

Violence Leaves Many Iraqi Children Orphaned. NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 6, 4:25, Engel, 9.87M) re-ran an updated Memorial Day weekend report on Iraqi orphans: "They are some of the forgotten children of the war, 56 girls ages 6 to 13. Home for them is Baghdad's Alwiya Orphanage." The girls can't play outside. It's too dangerous. They can only go as far as the courtyard. Since we've been here, it's clear that these girls are really starved for affection. They've been coming up all day and just taking our hands. One girl called our cameraman Daddy. The director of this orphanage says what they miss most is tenderness, their mother's touch."

Deteriorating Situation In Basra Said To Portend Iraq's Future. USA Today (6/7, 2.31M), in an editorial titled, "Basra's Descent Bodes Poorly For Allied Mission In Iraq," writes, "Three years ago, as the initial military victory in Iraq teetered into chaos, the southern, mainly Shiite city of Basra stood out as a hopeful symbol of how the country could recover. … Three years later, what's happening in Basra is far more ominous. The British occupiers are no longer so welcome or as much in control. Rival militias duke it out on the streets. There has been ethnic cleansing of Sunnis." USA Today adds, "The situation in Basra raises a question: Does it make more sense to stay to try to quell increasing sectarian and terrorist violence, or leave and let Iraqis fight it out?"

Ignatius Claims US "Project In Iraq Is Unraveling." In his column for the Washington Post (6/7, 744K) David Ignatius writes, "The American project in Iraq is unraveling. The president continues to talk about staying the course, and the White House still issues upbeat predictions of victory, but the course we are on is not working. The election of Iraq's first permanent government in December was the last good chance to put the pieces together. Nearly seven months after the elections, Iraqi politicians still can't agree on who should run the two key ministries, defense and interior."

Iraqi Minister Criticizes Spending By Foreign Aid Donors. The Financial Times (6/7, Biedermann) reports Ali Baban, Iraq's new minister of planning, has complained that foreign donors "spend too much of their aid to Iraq outside the country and ordinary Iraqis do not feel they are being helped by the international community." Baban "said he would push for a comprehensive review of the way aid to Iraq was being spent. He also warned against pressure from the likes of the International Monetary Fund on his country to scrap subsidies on oil products and food, which currently run at" $8 billion annually. Baban "also committed his ministry – responsible for development aid and investment – to creating a special division to woo foreign investors."

DOJ_NMG_0032290

Family Of American Kidnapped In Iraq Profiled. In a front-page article, the Washington Post (6/7, Slevin, 744K) profiles the family of Indiana resident Jeff Ake, who was kidnapped last year while repairing machines in Iraq. According to the Post, "More than 430 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq since the war began in March 2003. … At last count, at least 13 Americans, including Ake, were among 42 foreigners still missing, their fate unknown." The article notes that Ake's youngest brother "joined the Army and recently received deployment orders for Iraq."

Fear Of Kidnappers Drives Baghdad Residents To Hide Wealth. Knight Ridder (6/6, Youssef) reports that fear of kidnapping is changing the habits of wealthy Baghdadis. According to the piece, "Those who can afford the best have replaced their nice cars for clunkers, don plain clothes, carry second-rate cell phones and no longer wear gold jewelry. … According to police estimates, at least 60 people are kidnapped in Baghdad every day, often by thugs seeking ransom. But paying thousands of dollars doesn't guarantee one's release; many bodies are found daily in alleys and fields, some beheaded. Most were kidnapped."

Car Bombings Kill Two US Soldiers In Afghanistan, Wound Four. The New York Times/Bloomberg (6/7) reports two US soldiers "were killed in a roadside bombing in Nangarhar Province, east of Kabul, a United States military spokeswoman said. A third soldier and an Afghan interpreter were wounded in the blast, she said. The military also said three American soldiers were wounded in a car bombing south of Kabul."

Thousands Of US Soldiers Suffer From Undiagnosed Brain Injuries. USA Today (6/7, 1a, Zoroya, 2.31M), in a front-page article titled, "Troops Risk Undetected Brain Injury: Researchers: Concussions from blasts often missed," reports, "Thousands of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan may be risking permanent brain damage by returning to combat with relatively minor but undiagnosed concussions, often caused by bomb blasts, military researchers say. Doctors say they are only now understanding the scope of the problem. Researchers screening returning soldiers and Marines at four military bases found that about 10% suffered at least a minor brain injury during combat. About 20% of troops in front-line infantry units suffered such injuries. The injuries frequently go undiagnosed because troops have no visible wounds or may not know they suffered a concussion, doctors say."

In an accompanying piece, USA Today (6/7, Zoroya, 2.31M) reports that screenings of the patients admitted to Walter Reed Army Medical Center show "almost 30%...have brain injuries," but Michael Kilpatrick, deputy director of deployment health support for the Pentagon "questions the accuracy of the screening. 'Multiple head injuries can lead to permanent brain damage that is irreversible, and you want to avoid that,' he says. 'But we don't have any criteria today that if you get X number of concussions, that you can't serve anymore.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Chair Concerned About Widening Options Probe. The AP (6/7) reports, "The growing number of public companies under investigation for possible backdating of stock options to boost top executives' compensation is a matter of 'serious concern' to the Securities and Exchange Commission, its chairman said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The number of public companies being investigated by the SEC or federal prosecutors has grown to more than 30 and executives at several companies have been fired in recent weeks. … 'We've already learned that the problems are more than episodic,' the SEC Chairman Christopher Cox told The Associated Press in response to questions. 'The apparently widespread nature of the problems is of serious concern' to the agency." The AP adds, "Among the companies that have disclosed receiving subpoenas or SEC requests for documents are big, well-known names like UnitedHealthGroup Inc. and Caremark Rx Inc. … Many are from the high-tech world, where stock options have long been a prized perk and incentive for executives and employees alike: Affiliated Computer Services Inc., Juniper Networks Inc., KLA-Tencor Corp., OpenWave Systems Inc., Vitesse Semiconductor Corp., McAfee Inc., Quest Software Inc., Rambus Inc., Sycamore Networks Inc. and others. … The SEC investigations have been ongoing for several months, and subpoenas have been issued by U.S. attorneys' offices in several cities, including New York."

Lawmakers Blast Former Fannie Mae CEO Over Fraud Allegations. The AP (6/7, Gordon) reports, "The ousted former chief executive of Fannie Mae, Franklin Raines, was criticized by lawmakers and a federal regulator on Tuesday as a House panel aired government allegations of a six-year accounting fraud at the mortgage giant." The AP continues, "The regulator who oversees Fannie Mae blamed Raines and other senior company officials for the massive accounting failures and alleged manipulations designed to enrich executives. And the chairman of the subcommittee holding Tuesday's hearing, Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., contended that Raines probably lied to Congress when he testified about the debacle in October 2004." The AP adds, "Lawmakers, some of whom had been beneficiaries of Fannie Mae's campaign money, denounced the accounting misconduct, likened the company to Enron Corp. and urged legislative action to tighten the government's hand over Fannie Mae and its smaller government-sponsored sibling, Freddie Mac. … As a huge housing finance company chartered by Congress, "Fannie Mae has a special mandate and position of public trust. The previous management team, led by chairman and chief executive officer Franklin Raines, violated that trust," James B. Lockhart, acting director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, testified. 'By encouraging rapid growth, unconstrained by proper internal controls, risk management and other systems, they did serious harm to Fannie Mae while enriching themselves through earnings manipulation.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032291

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Official's Silence On Leak Prosecutions Angers Senators. The Washington Post (6/7, Pincus) reports, "Senior Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee sharply criticized a Justice Department official yesterday for refusing to say whether the Bush administration has ever considered prosecuting journalists for publishing leaked national security information." The Post continues, "The senators also bristled when Deputy U.S. Attorney Matthew W. Friedrich declined to answer questions about the rationale for the FBI's attempts to review the papers of the late columnist Jack Anderson. … 'You're basically taking what would be called a testifying Fifth Amendment. You should be ashamed of yourself, or your superiors should be ashamed of themselves,' Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) told Friedrich after he declined to answer questions from committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa)." The Post adds, "The purpose of the hearing, Specter said in opening the session, was to examine Justice Department efforts to control leaks, explore suggestions that newspapers and their reporters can be prosecuted under the 1917 Espionage Act and take comment on legislation that would protect reporters through a shield law. The law would provide an exception if national security matters were involved. … Friedrich, in his opening statement, confirmed that the Justice Department was prepared to investigate and prosecute leaks, but referred to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales's recent statement that the 'primary focus is on the leakers of classified information, as opposed to the press.' … When Friedrich confirmed that the department thought that journalists or 'anyone' could be prosecuted under the Espionage Act for publishing classified information, Specter asked specifically about whether the law could be applied to reporter James Risen of the New York Times, the newspaper that published an article in December about the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program. … 'Obviously, Senator, I can't comment as to any particular case or specific matter,' Friedrich said. He added that espionage laws 'do not exempt . . . any class of professional, including reporters, from their reach.'"

Knight Ridder (6/7, Hutcheson, Portillo) reports, "Professor Mark Feldstein was stunned when two FBI agents came to his house in March hoping to rummage through files that once belonged to deceased journalist Jack Anderson. … The agents left empty-handed, but the aborted search was one of several incidents that have raised concerns about the Bush administration's efforts to stamp out government leaks. At a Senate hearing Tuesday, administration critics accused the Justice Department of trampling press freedom in its zeal to protect secrets." Knight Ridder adds, "At stake is the public's right to know what its government is doing versus the need for secrecy to protect national security. The tension between these principles is as old as the republic. … Senators from both parties vented frustration over the administration's lack of openness. Tensions erupted at the Judiciary Committee hearing when Matthew Friedrich, chief of staff of the Justice Department's criminal division, declined to answer questions about the effort to search Anderson's old files. … 'I would think the department would send somebody up here to testify that could answer our questions, if they had any respect for this committee,' complained Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa. … 'They don't have any respect for this committee,' Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said to Friedrich. 'Why on earth were you sent up here? ... Is there any question you're allowed to answer?' … Friedrich said he couldn't discuss the matter because doing so could hinder efforts to prosecute Steven Rosen and Keith Weissman, pro-Israel lobbyists who have been accused of passing classified information to an Israeli diplomat and a journalist. Their indictment focused on activities from April 1999 to August 2004."

Voice of America (6/7, Tate) reports, "U.S. lawmakers, concerned about recent federal investigations of journalists who publish classified information, are considering legislation to protect reporters from revealing information learned under the promise of confidentiality. The Senate Judiciary Committee is holding a series of hearings on the issue. On Tuesday, the panel focused on the case of the late investigative reporter Jack Anderson, whose archive of papers is being sought by the Federal Bureau of Investigation." VOA continues, "The FBI probe comes as the federal government is threatening to prosecute journalists who publish classified information and refuse to reveal their sources. The Justice Department is investigating several leaks that led to the publication of a CIA officer's name and news reports that the National Security Agency is wiretapping communications between people in the United States and suspected terrorists overseas." VOA adds, "At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Matthew Friedrich, chief of staff for the criminal division at the Justice Department, defended his agency's actions: 'Our primary focus is on prosecuting the leakers as opposed to other options, and our much preferred path would be to attempt to work with reporters voluntarily to convince them not to publish classified information, which could lead to compromise of our most sensitive technologies, harm our young men and women who serve in the service of our country, and cause damage,' he said. … But Friedrich refused to discuss the Anderson case, to the anger of Republican and Democratic senators alike."

DOJ_NMG_0032292

The AP (6/7, Kellman) reports, "Friedrich refused to comment on the Anderson case, in which the FBI is seeking 50 years' worth of papers from the investigative journalist who exposed government scandals and earned a place on President Nixon's 'enemies list.' … Friedrich's response echoed deferrals by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other Justice Department officials in previous hearings on the administration's domestic wiretapping, phone tapping and other policies. Specter and other committee members grew exasperated." The AP adds, "Anderson's son Kevin, a lawyer, told the panel that he and his mother are prepared to face contempt charges if the FBI's effort to search the papers ever produces a subpoena or is upheld in court. … 'The family has met and decided that we would not abide by a subpoena if one were issued by the FBI,' Anderson said."

Utah Professor Denounces FBI Request As "Fishing Expedition." The Salt Lake Tribune (6/7, Gehrke) reports, "University of Utah political scientist Tim Chambless, who years ago cataloged 85 boxes of Jack Anderson's papers for use in his research, calls the FBI's demands 'a fishing expedition.' The documents he reviewed included some that 'were politically embarrassing to a few people.' But he said, 'There was nothing in there with regard to national security.' Chambless also wonders how much trolling the government has done in Anderson-related documents that had been in the public domain." In a recent visit to the National Archives to review declassified Anderson documents, Chambless "said he was concerned to find a number that had been removed from the file."

Salt Lake Tribune Denounces Friedrich's "Stonewalling" Of Senators. In a editorial, the Salt Lake Tribune (6/7) writes that "the FBI has tried to bully Anderson's blood and literary heirs into surrendering" the journalist's papers, and "Tuesday, when appropriate members of the U.S. Senate wanted to know the reason why, they were thoroughly stonewalled by one of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' assistants who, as Sen. Patrick Leahy was heard to fume, wasn't allowed to answer questions any more sensitive than his title and the time of day. … Any meaningful questions asked by senators, representatives or anyone else are turned away with the excuse that it would compromise anti-terror intelligence operations." The Tribune adds that "Gonzales is way off base, and we can only hope that the Congress will rein him in. It is espionage to steal secrets and keep them for your own advantage. It is freedom to expose dirty secrets and tell the American people what your government is doing, in your name and with your money."

FBI Raided Nigerian Official's Home In Search Of Jefferson Bribe Money. The New York Times (6/7, Shenon, 1.19M) reports the Federal Bureau of Investigation "raided the Maryland home of the vice president of Nigeria last summer in search of bribe money that the bureau believed had been paid to him by Representative William Jefferson, according to documents released on Tuesday." The documents "included an affidavit signed by an F.B.I. agent who said that the Nigerian vice president, Atiku Abubakar, now a candidate for president of that oil-rich West African nation, asked for at least half of the profits of a technology company controlled by Mr. Jefferson that was seeking to do business in Nigeria." The documents also say that "about the same time last year," Jefferson "told colleagues of his plans to bribe Nigerian officials, including Mr. Abubakar, in exchange for their help in winning business in Nigeria, and that Mr. Abubakar would be paid as much as $500,000 in cash."

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Meyer, 958K) reports Rep. Jefferson "allegedly told the FBI informant that in order to secure the Nigerian official's help with the technology project, Jefferson needed to deliver an upfront payment of $100,000 to Atiku while he was in the United States." Some time "after that, the informant provided Jefferson with the cash in a briefcase, according to one of the documents, an affidavit by FBI Special Agent Edward S. Cooper. The congressman later indicated that he had delivered the cash to Atiku on a late-night visit to the Potomac house, Cooper's affidavit said."

The AP (6/7, Manning) reports Rep. Jefferson "called the package he allegedly delivered at midnight to the suburban Maryland home of Nigeria's vice president 'African art.' Authorities say the 'art' was meant to be cash — lots of it." Court documents "filed in the bribery probe of the Louisiana Democrat allege that Jefferson told an FBI informant he took the 'art,' which authorities believe was code for $100,000 in $100 bills, to the Potomac home of Atiku Abubakar on July 31."

Gonzales Defends FBI Search Of Jefferson's Office. The AP (6/7, Kropko) reports Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "defended the FBI's search of a congressman's office last month, saying it was an 'unusual step' but a necessary one." Gonzales "compared the May 20-21 search of Rep. William Jefferson's office to past investigations of federal lawmakers and searches of their homes and vehicles." Gonzales said, "There have been searches before by the executive branch of the legislative branch. We've searched before the homes of members of Congress. We've searched before the cars of members of Congress, even when they are parked in the garage on Capitol Hill."

DOJ_NMG_0032293

Hoyer Criticizes Jefferson Over Refusal To Leave Ways and Means Committee. The Hill (6/7, Hearn) reports the "chances that Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) will keep his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee grew slimmer yesterday as House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) issued a stinging assessment of the embattled Louisianan's legal situation." Asked if "Democrats would seek to oust Jefferson forcibly from the panel even though he has yet to be charged with a crime," Hoyer said, "He sits on a tax-writing committee, and he had $90,000 found in his freezer. I think he's got a tax problem if nothing else." The Hill adds that on Tuesday night, "members of the House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee were expected to discuss Jefferson's dilemma at a members-only meeting. If Pelosi were to remove Jefferson forcibly, she would first have to put the issue to a vote of that body, which has jurisdiction over Democrats' committee assignments. That vote was not expected to occur last night, but she could pursue it at a later date."

LATimes Says Congress Should "Tread Softly" When Setting Rules For Judicial Branch. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/7, 958K) that Congress' "reverence for the separation of powers, so flagrantly on display in its continuing snit over the FBI's search of a House member's offices, goes by the wayside when it's Congress trespassing on someone else's turf. Take the repeated attempts by Congress to micromanage the work of the federal courts." The Times adds that "even in areas in which Congress can set rules for the judicial branch, it's the better part of wisdom for legislators to tread softly."

Former Lewis Aide Acknowledges Military Contractor Helped Buy House. The New York Times (6/7, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports Letitia Hoadley White, "a former top aide to the House defense appropriations subcommittee," acknowledged Tuesday "that the president of a military contractor had paid half the cost of a $1 million town house that they bought 11 months after she left the Congressional job." White, "now a prominent lobbyist, is already under scrutiny by federal prosecutors investigating the possibility that lawmakers and members of their staffs directed federal money to contractors in exchange for illicit payments. A spokesman for Ms. White said the purchase was a private arrangement between close friends." White was "for many years the top aide in charge of inserting pet projects, known as earmarks, into spending bills for Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California, when he led the House defense appropriations subcommittee." The person "who paid $500,000 toward the purchase of her house was Nicholas Karangelen, president of Trident Systems Inc., one of many companies that benefited from earmarks. In 2002, for example, the company received part of an $8 million joint contract for technology to survey battlefields."

Former Aide Paid For DeLay's Wife's Retirement Account. The Washington Post (6/7, A4, Smith, 744K) reports a "registered lobbyist opened a retirement account in the late 1990s for the wife of then-House Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and contributed thousands of dollars to it while also paying her a salary to work for him from her home in Texas, according to sources, documents and DeLay's attorney, Richard Cullen." The account "represents a small portion of the income that DeLay's family received from entities at least partly controlled by lobbyist Edwin A. Buckham. But the disclosure of its origin adds to what was previously known about the benefits DeLay's family received from its association with Buckham, and it brings the total over the past seven years to about half a million dollars." Buckham was "DeLay's chief of staff before he became a lobbyist at the end of 1998, shortly before the account was opened and the flow of funds began." Besides "financing the retirement account, Buckham played a role in two other streams of income that indirectly benefited DeLay."

DeLay "Disappointed" With Former Associates Over Guilty Pleas To Corruption Charges. USA Today (6/7, Kiely, 2.31M) reports former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay "said he's 'disappointed' in three ex-associates who pleaded guilty in a federal probe of political corruption, but he said their admissions 'doesn't mean I knew' of their efforts to bribe Congress." DeLay "told USA TODAY that he was surprised by revelations that Tony Rudy, a former top aide, and Jack Abramoff, a former lobbyist and longtime political supporter, tried to buy influence with lawmakers." DeLay said, "The Tony Rudy and Jack Abramoff I'm reading about in the papers are not the people I knew."

Prosecutors Reportedly Seeking Deal With McKinney. The Atlanta Journal Constitution (6/7, Kemper) reports, "Federal prosecutors investigating the confrontation between Rep. Cynthia McKinney of Georgia and a Capitol police officer have been talking privately with McKinney's office in hopes of resolving the case without the spectacle of an indictment and trial, officials familiar with the talks say." Meanwhile, "prosecutors have subpoenaed at least six witnesses to appear before the jury over the last two months." And "McKinney's office rejected claims that there have been discussions of a plea agreement, saying the congresswoman has not been charged with anything and may never be, so there's no plea to negotiate." The Journal Constitution notes, "Negotiated settlements in cases as controversial and politically sensitive as McKinney's are common, according to former federal prosecutors and lawyers with experience in Washington's Superior Court. They said there is often pressure on the prosecutors from higher-ups at the Justice Department and possibly the White House to resolve such cases quickly and quietly." Meanwhile, "Capitol Hill police said they were dismayed that the investigation into McKinney's confrontation with the police officer is taking so long to resolve. They said failure to charge McKinney would send the message that it is all right to hit a police officer."

DOJ_NMG_0032294

Gambino Capo Convicted Of Racketeering Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/7, Neumeister) reports Gambino capo Gregory DePalma "was convicted Tuesday of racketeering -- a verdict his lawyer said almost guarantees he will die in prison. … Joaquin Garcia, an FBI agent who posed as 'Big Jack' Falcone, had cozied up to DePalma and recorded thousands of hours of conversations that helped land the mobster. The FBI planted a cell phone on DePalma that picked up conversations even when it was off. Defense lawyer Martin Geduldig said after the verdict that it 'was just too difficult to overcome all of these tapes.'" The New York Daily News (6/7, Zambito, 729K) adds, "As the verdict was read, DePalma…groused about the FBI agents who took him down. … 'Maybe instead of them buying TVs from P.C. Richards, they should go out and get some terrorists,' he told lawyer John Meringolo. It was a reference to the six 'stolen' wide-screen sets given to him by FBI agent Joaquin Garcia." The New York Post (6/7, Cornell, 624K) notes, "The verdict was a notch in the belt of…Garcia, who has been called the 'modern-day Donnie Brasco' for his stunning two-year infiltration of the Gambino crime family."

Former Tennessee Senator Denies Taking Bribes As Trial Goes To Jury. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/7, Baird) reports, "A former Tennessee legislator charged with extortion took the stand in his own defense Tuesday and denied ever accepting payoffs from two FBI informants. Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon testified that he had supported legislation for E-Cycle Management…as a favor to friends and not for money. Dixon was the only defense witness, and jurors were to begin deliberations Wednesday." In his closing argument, "defense lawyer Coleman Garrett said Dixon is the victim of a government conspiracy based on a fake company that offered bribes for support of a proposed law that was never intended to pass." But "Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza said Dixon was not pressured into taking bribe money — 'He just took it.'"

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/7, Buser) notes that "Dixon was faced with explaining his words and actions on secret audio and video recordings that prosecutors say depict him selling his political influence by accepting cash payments from FBI informant Tim Willis." Dixon told jurors, "Tim Willis was my friend at the time and he knew he didn't have to pay me to get things done. I assumed it was to keep me doing the things I could do. I was under financial strain and obligations."

Chicago Water Official Testifies Sorich Make Him Hire Drunken Campaign Worker. The Chicago Tribune (6/7, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley's patronage chief ordered the hiring of a politically connected man who was 'somewhat of a drinker,' and he repeatedly engineered the promotions of workers with clout over more qualified candidates, the former No. 2 official in the city Water Department testified Tuesday." Donald Tomczak "said he complained vehemently when…Robert Sorich directed him to accept the transfer of the man with the drinking problem," telling "Sorich that the man, a political worker under Ald. Edward Burke…could cause injuries on Water Department job sites as a result of his drinking. But Tomczak said Sorich insisted: 'Work it out, Don.' Tomczak hired the man and put him to work near his office at the Jardine Filtration Plant, where he could 'keep an eye on him,' Tomczak said." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/7, Warmbir, Korecki) adds that when Tomczak testified "he could decide to award overtime on his own to city employees who took part in his political army. But Tomczak made clear that he did not have final say over hiring or promotions in his department. … Sorich's attorney, Thomas Durkin, took umbrage over the overtime question and appeared concerned that the prosecution was trying to link Sorich and his three co-defendants to the overtime scam -- although the prosecution never made any direct links."

FBI Investigating New Angle To Alleged Fumo Link With Non-Profit. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/7, Lounsberry, Shiffman, Fitzgerald, McCoy, 423K) reports, "Federal authorities are exploring whether State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, to help pay for renovations at his mansion, directed a nonprofit to purchase a warehouse owned by the contractor, sources said. … A lawyer for the nonprofit defended the warehouse purchase, saying the group paid 'fair market value' after obtaining an appraisal. The FBI's new line of inquiry in its sprawling, three-year Fumo investigation began after agents raided electrical contractor Donald 'Gus' Dougherty's South Philadelphia home as part of a separate tax-fraud case." The Inquirer notes that one "person familiar with the renovations said that Dougherty's workers spent a year or more toiling within the mansion."

FBI Surveillance Tapes Played At Philadelphia Ticket-Fixing Trial. The Philadelphia Daily News (6/7, Hinkelman) reports, "Federal prosecutors portrayed Molden David Faison yesterday as a man who never met a concert ticket he didn't want -- or wasn't willing to fix parking tickets to get. The feds allege that Faison, a former hearing officer for the Bureau of Administrative Adjudication, used his job in August 2004 to extort $169 worth of tickets to a Prince concert. Prosecutor Judy Goldstein Smith played damning FBI audiotapes of conversations" in which informant John Florio "can be overheard giving Faison, who heard parking ticket appeals, the tag numbers and models of the vehicles with parking tickets he wanted dismissed."

DOJ_NMG_0032295

Mississippi County Official Charged With Bribery, Witness Tampering. The AP (6/7) reports, "Bolivar County administrator Adrian Brown has been indicted on federal charges of accepting a kickback and tampering with a witness, authorities said Tuesday." Brown's arrest "was announced by the FBI, the U.S. attorney's office and the Bolivar County Sheriff's Department. Brown was indicated May 24 on the charges, officials said." FBI Jackson SAC John G. Raucci "said Brown is accused of soliciting and accepting a kickback for work for Bolivar County, which was to be reimbursed by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said Brown is also accused of attempting to intimidate a witness in the investigation." The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (6/7) also reports on Brown's indictment.

Suicidal Prosecution Witness Returns To Stand In New Jersey Corruption Trial. The New York Times (6/7, Mansnerus, 1.19M) reports the prosecution of former Middletown Township committeeman Raymond J. O'Grady "is the culmination of years of work by federal investigators, a tale opening a window on small-town graft that brought down more than a dozen public officials in a New Jersey county run by old-fashioned patronage politics. Now the trial has turned out to be a story of its own: the pivotal government witness — one day into his testimony last week against Mr. O'Grady, a longtime friend from Monmouth County politics — swallowed 60 to 80 blood-pressure pills in a suicide attempt. But on Tuesday, the government salvaged its case," as witness Anthony J. Palughi "took the stand again…despite objections by the defense to allowing the testimony to continue so soon after what Mr. O'Grady's lawyer called 'a miraculous recovery.'" The Times notes that O'Grady "is charged with taking $8,000 in cash to help steer municipal work to contractors, including two men who turned out to be agents from the F.B.I."

Bulger Associate Testifies About Corrupt Relationship Between FBI, Informants. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/7, Lavoie) reports, "Convicted gangster Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi, testifying Tuesday in a wrongful death lawsuit against the federal government" by the family of murdered informant John McIntyre, "described a corrupt relationship of favors, gifts and tip-offs between the FBI and its criminal informants. Flemmi said he and fugitive crime boss James 'Whitey' Bulger gave the FBI information about the Mafia, and in exchange, the FBI protected them from prosecution. Members of the Bulger gang also showered several FBI agents with cash as gifts to make sure that protection continued, Flemmi said." The AP adds, "Gail Marcinkiewicz, a spokeswoman for the Boston FBI office, would not comment on Flemmi's testimony directly, but said the U.S. attorney general and the FBI have revised their guidelines on criminal informants 'to minimize the chance that unchecked behavior could occur.' 'There have been changes over the course of time and increased oversight,' she said."

The Boston Globe (6/7, Murphy, 484K) reports Flemmi "offered a stark portrait yesterday of the days when he and…Bulger ruled Boston's underworld, getting away with murder after murder," as "one corrupt former FBI supervisor, John Morris, 'treated us like we were FBI agents,' Flemmi testified. His longtime FBI handler, John J. Connolly Jr., 'didn't treat me like I was a criminal, that's for sure. He didn't look down on me because I was an informant. He treated me like an equal, in my eyes.'" The Globe adds, "Flemmi testified for the first time yesterday that he and Bulger gave retired FBI agent Dennis Condon a gold ring with his initials on it. But Boston lawyer Michael Meyer, who represents Condon, flatly denied that allegation." The Boston Herald (6/7, Sweet, 220K) notes Flemmi "claimed…that the more blood he spilled with…Bulger, the bigger their FBI fan club grew. Former Boston FBI supervisor James Ring 'was aware of what we were doing. He condoned it,' Flemmi, 72, testified…explaining how Ring fawned over the two crime bosses, who also were the agency's prized informants."

Arrest Of Connecticut Garbage Magnate In Crime Probe Could Be Imminent. The AP (6/7, Apuzzo) reports, "With the threat of indictments looming in a multistate investigation into organized crime in the garbage industry, the Justice Department recently told one of Connecticut's largest trash haulers: Don't come to us. We'll come to you." The AP continues, "James Galante, a Danbury garbage magnate and the acknowledged target of the FBI racketeering investigation, recently asked prosecutors to let him surrender if indicted, heading off a public arrest, his attorney said. … But prosecutors rejected the request, defense attorney Hugh Keefe said, leaving Galante waiting for a possible visit from the FBI and the region's garbage haulers wondering whether a series of arrests is imminent." The AP adds, "The industry has been on edge since federal agents raided dozens of homes and businesses in New York and Connecticut last summer, seizing truckloads of documents in an investigation into the so-called 'property rights' system. That system, in which garbage companies carve out and enforce exclusive territories, has led to violence and higher prices for customers, prosecutors in similar investigations have said. … With a grand jury meeting this week and attorneys expecting indictments soon, Keefe and others have asked that their clients be allowed to voluntarily show up for court rather than face arrest by the FBI."

DOJ_NMG_0032296

New York Hedge Fund Scam Artist Pleads Guilty. The AP (6/7) reports former NYU student Hakan Yalincak "pleaded guilty to bank and wire fraud Tuesday, admitting he used his student ID and expertly forged documents to pose as the heir to a billionaire Turkish family and trick investors into pouring millions into a nonexistent hedge fund." Prosecutors "spent hours Tuesday describing how" Yalincak "charmed his way into the exclusive world of Greenwich high finance, shuttled counterfeit checks across the world and brokered deals with a Kuwaiti financier." Yalincak's fund, "the Daedalus Capital Relative Fund I, wasn't a legitimate investment and prosecutors said investors lost more than $7 million - a figure Yalincak said is overstated. Prosecutors say the money was spent on a Porsche, a Tiffany diamond and a $1.25 million donation to NYU."

Wisconsin Law Will Require Sex Offenders To Wear GPS Tracking Devices. USA Today (6/7, Koch) reports, "Hundreds of convicted sex offenders will have to wear a two-piece electronic tracking device for the rest of their lives under a new Wisconsin law." States are increasingly using GPS devices and "Congress may accelerate such efforts. The House and Senate have each passed sex offender bills this year that approve funding for GPS tracking. They need to craft a final bill."

Man Who Served 18 Years On Rape Charge Freed By DNA Evidence. The New York Times (6/7, Yardley) reports, "Eighteen years ago, James Calvin Tillman was arrested on charges of raping and kidnapping a woman after she left a bar in downtown Hartford. For 18 years, he insisted that he was innocent. And on Tuesday, he was freed." Tillman "had refused a plea deal, his family said, and was convicted and sentenced to 45 years in prison. His appeals failed. Distraught, he underwent psychiatric treatment in prison. He read the Bible and urged other inmates to read it, too. And, finally, in February 2005, he wrote to the Connecticut Innocence Project, which helps inmates who claim that they have been wrongly convicted." The Times continues, "The two public defenders who head the Connecticut Innocence Project located the victim's dress and pantyhose, which were collected as evidence in 1988, and had new DNA tests conducted. They found no match between Mr. Tillman and semen on the clothing. Based on that test, a judge in State Superior Court vacated his conviction on Tuesday and ordered a new trial. After the court session, Mr. Tillman's lawyers speculated that the charges would be dropped. The chief state's attorney, Christopher L. Morano, said, 'There are still some loose ends that need to be tied up and need to be examined,' a reference to an additional DNA test, and would not say whether he thought the case would go to trial again."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Reaches Deal With Gabelli On Cell Phone License Lawsuit. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Davies, Wilke) reports, "The Justice Department has reached a deal with Mario Gabelli in a civil-fraud suit that alleged the famed money manager was at the center of an effort to deceive the Federal Communications Commission in auctions of cellphone licenses." The Journal continues, "Assistant U.S. Attorney David Kennedy announced the settlement Tuesday during a hearing before U.S. District Judge Paul Crotty in Manhattan. Terms of the deal weren't disclosed but are expected to include a payment to the government of more $100 million, according to others briefed on the negotiations." He "also said in court that the government reached a settlement with Russell Taylor III, the private plaintiff who brought the initial civil suit against Mr. Gabelli, Lynch Interactive Corp. and other Gabelli affiliates. Mr. Taylor said he witnessed the alleged fraud while working as a paralegal and attorney at a law firm."

USA Today (6/7, Davidson) notes, "Critics of the Federal Communications Commission's auction system" had "seized on the case as proof that deep-pocketed bidders set up sham companies to win discounts reserved for small businesses." It "comes three months after the Justice Department intervened in a civil fraud lawsuit, filed five years ago by a citizen under a law that lets an individual sue on the government's behalf." USA Today adds, "The lawsuit alleges Gabelli set up about a dozen sham companies in auctions from 1995 to 2000 to snare airwave licenses. The entities were formed a few days before each auction, often were dissolved shortly afterward and never used the licenses, many of which were later sold for huge profits, the lawsuit claims. The lawsuit seeks up to $370 million in damages."

Bloomberg (6/7, Glovin) reports, "The settlement, though not the terms, was announced today at a hearing in Manhattan federal court, Heather Tasker, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, said. Garcia's office recently sought permission to join the suit, which was filed in 2001 by attorney Rufus Taylor III under the federal False Claims Act. … Taylor's suit stemmed from Gabelli's role in Federal Communications Commission auctions in the 1990s. The government set aside cellular phone licenses to be sold to small businesses. Gabelli, 63, bankrolled ``sham'' startups that would qualify under the rules to get access to discounts, the suit claims."

DOJ_NMG_0032297

The AP (6/7) reports, "The deal came after the government sought to intervene in a 5-year-old lawsuit brought by private parties alleging Gabelli and others should pay hundreds of millions of dollars in damages for their participation in auctions conducted by the Federal Communications Commission between 1995 and 2000. … The lawsuit, initially filed in Washington, accused Gabelli of rigging the system by creating phony companies which bid for wireless phone licenses at a discount under rules favoring minority and small businesses. He then resold the licenses at a profit, according to the government."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Special Prosecutor Rules Ohio Police Shootings Justifiable. News Net 5, Cleveland, OH (6/7) reports, "A special prosecutor ruled that five cases of the use of deadly force by Cleveland police officers were justifiable." News Net 5 continues, "The five fatal shootings took place in 2004 and 2005. The city appointed retired Judge Ellen Connally to investigate the cases and to make a decision about whether they were justified. … Connally ruled that all the officers involved in the shooting followed the guidelines outlined for the use of deadly force, and no charges will be filed in any of the cases, NewsChannel5 reported." News Net 5 adds, "Before making her decision, Connally reviewed the evidence, interviewed witnesses, looked over photographs and talked with the coroner. … She ruled four of the shootings justifiable. But one of the shootings included a confrontation between Cleveland police and 14-year-old Brandon McCloud. … All five cases are still being reviewed by the U.S. Justice Department."

Gay Marriage Amendment Headed For Defeat In Senate. The AP (6/7, Kellman) reports, "The constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage is headed toward certain defeat Wednesday despite a fresh appeal for passage by President Bush. While a majority of Americans oppose gay marriage, an equal majority oppose amending the Constitution to prohibit it, according to a poll this week by ABC News." And, "according to one Republican, Americans do not yet buy the warning that traditional marriage is under attack by renegade judges. 'Most Americans are not yet convinced that their elected representatives or the judiciary are likely to expand decisively the definition of marriage to include same sex couples,' said Sen. John McCain." The Washington Times (6/7, Fagan, 90K) says "sponsors of the marriage proposal expect about 52 votes today on a motion to cut off debate and force a final vote. The motion would need 60 votes to pass, and the amendment itself would need two-thirds, or 67 votes, to be approved."

Under the headline "For Foes Of Same-Sex Marriage, It's The Thought That Counts," the Washington Post (6/7, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports, "There's violence in Iraq, corruption in the House and anxiety in the markets. Somebody needs to create a diversion. 'The gays are aggressive! Gays have called war! Gays are attacking traditional marriage!' Bishop Harry Jackson was shouting these words outside the Capitol yesterday morning, at a rally for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage." The "urgency" of the amendment supporters' "alarm is a bit suspect to anybody with an eye on the electoral calendar."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/7, Ward, 90K) reports "black pastors and civil rights leaders yesterday held separate rallies on Capitol Hill, staking opposite positions on a constitutional amendment aimed at banning homosexual 'marriage.'"

Dowd Says Administration Is "Hatemongering" Over Gay Marriage. Maureen Dowd writes in the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M), "The Bushes have always been good at using bogeymen to their political advantage. … W. prefers tactical bêtes noires to real ones. … W. ignored the gay marriage issue in the 19 months after he used it to help him stay in the White House. To reprise it now, knowing it has no chance of passing, is so transparent that surely even the most blinkered 'values' voters see through it." Dowd adds, "I know Republicans are desperate. But does it make sense to use gay love to hatemonger here when we have so much real hate coming at us from abroad?"

WSJournal Says Activist Judges Created Gay Marriage Anxiety. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) editorializes, "We remain opposed to federal interference in" the issue of same sex marriage, "believing that issues of family life and law are best settled in state legislatures. Yet given the way activist courts have turned gay marriage into a national issue, it's no surprise that Congress joined the fray." The amendment vote "can't be understood outside of the anxiety created by activist courts. Justice Kennedy wrote the majority opinion in the 2003 Lawrence case that banned state anti-sodomy laws. So sweeping was his 'privacy right' language that it took only a few months for the Massachusetts Supreme Court to use Lawrence to justify its decision to impose a right to gay marriage there. … So here we go again with another values issue about to become an endlessly polarizing national debate."

EEOC Reaches Settlement With Verizon On Pregnancy Bias Lawsuit. The Washington Post (6/6, Joyce) reports, "Verizon Communications Inc. will pay almost $49 million to 12,326 current and former female employees as part of a landmark class-action lawsuit alleging pregnancy discrimination." The EEOC "reached a settlement in 2002 against Verizon predecessors Nynex Corp. and Bell Atlantic Corp. But the total amount of the settlement was not made public until yesterday, when the EEOC completed its projections of how much would be paid in future benefits." The Post notes, "The final figure makes the case the largest pregnancy discrimination settlement in EEOC history. It covers women in 13 states and the District." The companies "were accused of violating federal law by denying women pension and other benefit accruals when they spent time on pregnancy or maternity leave."

DOJ_NMG_0032298

Blanco To Sign Restrictive Louisiana Abortion Bill. The New York Times (6/7, Alford, 1.19M) reports Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco's office "said Tuesday that she would shortly sign into law a strict ban on abortion that would permit abortion only in the case where a woman's life was threatened by pregnancy." The bill, "approved by both houses of the Legislature and sent to the governor on Monday, would go into effect only if the United States Supreme Court overturned Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision establishing a constitutional right to abortion, and allowed states to criminalize abortion."

LOC Transgender Discrimination Case Moves To Discovery Phase. Roll Call (6/7, Mcardle) reports, "A full year after filing a discrimination lawsuit against the Library of Congress, Diane Schroer, who is preparing for surgery to complete her transition as a male-to-female transsexual, has only now seen her civil rights case move into the discovery phase. But in the 12 months since the case was brought, Schroer's suit already has forced the U.S. District Court to take a hard look at how sexual discrimination laws apply to the Congressional workplace." Roll Call explains that Schroer filed the Title VII suit last June 2 after being denied a position as an analyst within the Congressional Research Service. LOC lawyers, Roll Calls says, "argued in their response last fall that transsexual individuals are not considered members 'of a protected class as required by Title VII' and thus the case should be dismissed. … 'The term sex, as used in Title VII, prohibits discrimination based on the biological state of a male or female,' the U.S. Attorney's office argued in its response last fall. 'District Courts in this Circuit, as well as in many other circuits, have never held that transsexuals are a protected group under Title VII.'" Denying the motion to dismiss ten weeks ago, the judge noted that "the failure of numerous attempts to broaden Title VII to cover sexual orientation says nothing about Title VII's relationship to sexual identity. ... There are facts that Schroer could prove which would support her claim that the Library refused to hire her solely because of her sexual identity, and that in so doing, the Library discriminated against her 'because of ... sex.'"

Senate To Consider Bill Of Hawaiian Self-Government. The Senate this week is expected to consider a measure that would allow Hawaiians to govern themselves as Native Americans and Alaskans do. The Washington Times (6/7, Debose, 90K) reports that Sen. Daniel K. Akaka "says the bill is a way to give 'indigenous' Hawaiians a sense of pride and a chance for sovereignty for the first time since 1893, when Queen Liliuokalani was deposed and lands were illegally seized by US Marines and a cadre of sugar-plantation businessmen." The bill "calls for an Office of Native Hawaiian Relations in the Department of the Interior, and a Native Hawaiian Interagency Coordinating Group to administer programs, a commission that would certify who are indigenous Hawaiians, and provides a process of reorganization of the Native Hawaiian governing entity."

NYTimes Says Concerns About Hawaii Bill Are Misplaced. An editorial in the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M) says concerns that the bill to extend federal recognition to Native Hawaiians as indigenous people that Hawaii "will become a balkanized banana republic" are "misplaced." The measure "explicitly forbids casinos, a touchy subject in Hawaii. Any changes a Hawaiian government seeks would have to be negotiated with state or federal authorities. As has always been the case on those eight little islands, everyone will have to find a way to get along."

Facing Receivership Threat, Williams Fires DC's Mental Health Director. On its front page today, the Washington Post (6/7, A1, Montgomery, Barker) reports District of Columbia Mayor Anthony Williams "fired the director of the District agency that cares for the mentally retarded yesterday in hopes of averting a court takeover of the troubled bureaucracy, which is facing fresh allegations of abuse and neglect in city-funded group homes." Marsha Thompson, who had been on the job "barely a year," will be replaced by retired Alabama mental health commissioner Kathy Elmore Sawyer, who "will work under a six-month contract that ends shortly before Williams (D) leaves office in January." The Post notes, "Several advocates called Sawyer a respected administrator with a sterling reputation," however, "the move will not stave off a push to have a receiver take control of the agency, the target of a 1976 class action lawsuit over care of the mentally disabled." The Post says such a federal takeover "would mark a major embarrassment for Williams during his final year in office." The Post adds, "Two weeks ago, as plaintiffs requested a receiver, the U.S. Justice Department urged the judge to hold the District in contempt of court because, it said, the city had not met promises to improve health care and other services at group homes and because of 14 preventable and questionable deaths since January 2003. The papers gave vivid and startling details about the extent of the abuse, which ranged from severe scaldings to fatal starvation."

DOJ_NMG_0032299

In an editorial today, the Washington Post (6/7, A22) notes Sawyer will be the District's 19th head of mental health services since 1994. "If the mayor is seeking immediate stability in that agency through the appointment of one individual, albeit a highly qualified professional, his search will more than likely be in vain. The problem at the [agency] is not that it hasn't been led by a reformer with dedication, compassion and a vision. The problem rests below the agency head. It can be found within the agency and the group homes it oversees. Those places have more than their share of unqualified workers" who "should be nowhere near vulnerable people… Unless the mayor has the fortitude and is willing to wade in with the administrator and stand down the bureaucracy and special interests, i.e., contractors; unless he is prepared to rid the payroll of incompetents, and clean house from top to bottom, then director No. 19 will soon give way to Nos. 20 and 21 and 29." The Post concludes, "Cleaning up that mess requires more than hiring an outsider with a good reputation. It needs the backing of a mayor who places reform of a critical and much-neglected agency ahead of a trip to South Korea, where Mr. Williams is heading today."

Friedman Praises US Diversity. Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M), "I went to a high school graduation Monday and a United Nations meeting broke out. … There were some 700 kids receiving their diplomas, and as I sat there for two hours listening to each one's name pronounced, I became both fascinated and touched by the stunning diversity — race, religion, ethnicity — of the graduating class." If there is "one reason to still be optimistic about America it is represented by the stunning diversity of the Montgomery Blair class of 2006. America is still the world's greatest human magnet. We are not the only country that embraces diversity, but there is something about our free society and free market that still attracts people like no other."

Westmoreland Says Voting Rights Act Should Be Modernized. Rep. Lynn Westmoreland writes in The Hill (6/7) that the Voting Rights Act should be modernized ""to reflect the reality of today — a reality strongly shaped by the successes of the original legislation." Despite Georgia's "revolutionary strides in voter equality, the Voting Rights Act still treats Georgia as if it's a backward society governed by the laws of Jim Crow. … Renewing the law as it is would keep Georgia in the penalty box for 25 more years." Westmoreland concludes, "The Voting Rights Act has served our nation well. We dishonor the accomplishments of the law if we pretend nothing's changed since 1965."

NYTimes Criticizes Ohio Voter Registration Regulations. The New York Times (6/7, 1.19M) editorializes, "The latest sign that Republicans have an election-year strategy to shut down voter registration drives comes from Ohio. As the state gears up for a very competitive election season this fall, its secretary of state, J. Kenneth Blackwell, has put in place 'emergency' regulations that could hit voter registration workers with criminal penalties for perfectly legitimate registration practices. The rules are so draconian they could shut down registration drives in Ohio." The Times adds, "Decisions about who can vote are being made by a candidate for governor. Mr. Blackwell should hand over responsibility for elections to a decision maker whose only loyalty is to the voters and the law."

ANTITRUST:

ACLU Asks FCC To Pause ATT-Bell South Merger. The New York Times (6/7, Belson) reports the American Civil Liberties Union "asked the Federal Communications Commission yesterday to withhold approval of AT&T's acquisition of BellSouth until it reviews allegations that the companies gave customer records to the government without warrants." Arguing that the Telecommunications Act requires an evaluation of the costs and benefits of the merger, the ACLU "said the F.C.C. should determine if AT&T and BellSouth handed over phone records to the National Security Agency's surveillance program and, if so, whether that violated any privacy laws." FCC Chairman Kevin Martin "said last month that the commission could not investigate reports of the companies' cooperation with the security agency because the agency's activities were classified," and yesterday an FCC spokeswoman "declined to comment on the filing."

Telecom Firms Seek To Block AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The San Antonio Business Journal (6/7) reports, "A group of seven telecommunications companies have filed comments with the Federal Communications Commission asking regulators to block the planned $67 billion merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp." The Journal continues, "San Antonio-based AT&T needs approvals from 18 states, the U.S. Justice Department and the FCC in order to proceed with the merger -- which could close by the end of the year. The merger already has been approved in eight states and two foreign countries. … The group of companies claim the AT&T-BellSouth merger will only create a dominant player that will be able to thwart competition through its increased control over local networks and other communications services." The Journal adds, "Through its acquisition of Atlanta-based BellSouth, AT&T -- already the nation's largest provider of local voice, long-distance and broadband DSL services -- will only further move the company toward monopoly status, the companies claim. … The companies that are asking the FCC to block the merger are Cbeyond Communications in Atlanta; Grande Communications in San Marcos; NuVox Communications in Greenville, S.C.; Supra Telecom in Orlando; Talk America in New Hope, Pa.; XO Communications in Reston, Va. and Xspedius Communications LLC in O'Fallon, Mo. … They say the AT&T-BellSouth merger would extend the company's footprint to 22 states and further cement its standing as the nation's largest wireless provider by controlling all the stock of Cingular Wireless."

DOJ_NMG_0032300

Broadcasting & Cable (6/7, Eggerton) reports, "In a conference call with reporters discussing their filings with the FCC in opposition to the merger, several of the groups argued that, unless the FCC requires AT&T to spin-off wireless company Cingular after the merger and to divest itself of wireless spectrum they argue has been warehoused, the 'best case' scenario from the merger would be an 'entrenched DSL cable monopoly for Internet access. That's because they said the merged company would likely sit on spectrum that could be used for wireless Internet access in competition to DSL. … 'If the FCC doesn't "do the right thing,"' said Jonathan Rubin of the American Antitrust Institute, 'there is potential for some kind of major litigation.'"

EU Officials Says Microsoft's Reputation Is At Stake. Bloomberg (6/7) reports, "European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said Tuesday that Microsoft Corp. should be concerned about its reputation as well as the financial impact of antitrust rulings." Bloomberg continues, "Kroes, who will decide before the end of July whether to impose daily fines of $2.6 million on Microsoft, said the software maker should take account of its image. … 'It's not only a matter of financial aspects in such cases, it's also a matter of reputation,' Kroes said at a European Parliament meeting in Brussels, Belgium." Bloomberg adds, "The European Commission, the European Union's antitrust regulator, is threatening to fine Microsoft unless it licenses information on the way its Windows operating system shares printers and files to rival software developers. The regulator says the company hasn't provided 'complete and accurate' information to rivals. … Microsoft, whose Windows operating system runs on about 95 percent of the world's personal computers, was fined in March 2004 for abusing its dominant market position by failing to make technical information available and for bundling its media player with Windows."

UK Airports Operator OKs Takeover Bid From Spain's Ferrovial. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Johnson, Singer) reports, "United Kingdom airports operator BAA PLC approved a £10.1 billion ($18.9 billion) takeover offer from Spanish builder Grupo Ferrovial SA, paving the way for a mammoth European infrastructure deal that highlights investors' appetite for companies with stable returns." The deal "appears to have trumped a rival bid by a consortium led by Goldman Sachs Group Inc." Yet "questions remain over how Ferrovial can boost profitability at BAA's regulated businesses enough to justify the bid's hefty premium. Some airlines expressed concern that the deal could lead to higher expenses."

The New York Times/IHT (6/7, Clark) adds that a BAA spokesman said it "had chosen the bid from Ferrovial over the one from Goldman because it offered the greatest certainty for shareholders in the near term." The Times notes, "BAA controls two-thirds of Britain's airports, and its dominant position has long been a source of concern for airlines, which complain that the company has the power to set arbitrarily high fees for landing rights and other airport services."

Chirac Seeks To Boost German Bid For Euronext Merger. Reflecting the concerns of some French banks about the impact of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance law, the Wall Street Journal (6/7, MacDonald, Taylor) reports, "French President Jacques Chirac said he would rather see financial-exchange operator Euronext NV merge with Deutsche Börse AG than with NYSE Group Inc., giving some heart to the German exchange operator as it seeks to win Euronext despite last week's merger agreement between the European and U.S. exchanges." Encouraged, "by Mr. Chirac's remarks, Deutsche Börse Chief Executive Reto Francioni and Chairman Kurt Viermetz are on a lobbying trip to Paris today to sound out ways Deutsche Börse can make its offer 'more attractive' to shareholders without making significant changes from what has been offered up until now, a person familiar with the matter said."

The New York Times (6/7, Kanter) reports, "Speaking in Germany alongside the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, Mr. Chirac said that he preferred a European merger and would 'regret if this solution is not adopted in the end.'" Yet "he made clear that his priority was to preserve jobs in Paris, even if it meant tying the knot with the Americans rather than Deutsche Börse, based in Frankfurt." He "also acknowledged that he had only 'very limited ways to intervene' in the deal." And "Merkel was even more circumspect, saying that governments like those in France and Germany could not exert influence over merging companies, even if she were 'of the opinion that it is good to build up strong economic units within Europe.'"

Mittal Executive Questions Arcelor Shareholder Voting Procedure. Wilbur Ross, a nonexecutive director

DOJ_NMG_0032301

of Mittal Steel Company and CEO of W.L. Ross and Co., in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/7) argues that Arcelor steel company's attempt to block a merger with Mittal by agreeing to a deal with Russian steel producer Severstal is unfair because "it will pass unless more than 50% of the entire share capital of the company votes against it. This is most unusual. Normally when contemplating such a move, a company would seek the approval of its shareholders, and the threshold would be 66% of the capital either present or represented at the meeting. This is a deliberately prohibitive barrier. The percentage of the capital normally represented at an Arcelor general meeting is below 35%. There has never been a case in which 50% of the shares were represented at such a meeting -- never mind them all voting in the same direction."

Merged Airline Faces Increased Customer Complaints. In a detailed report of escalating traveler complaints, the Wall Street Journal (6/7, Trottman) reports, "US Airways Group Inc. faces substantial challenges in integrating operations following last year's merger between the old US Airways and America West Holdings Corp. Among them, it has to keep inevitable technology glitches from alienating its customers. … The outcome has been far less than perfect." The Journal explains a serious of technical problems related to the merged airline's combined web site, and notes "customer calls are pouring into the airline's 24-hour Internet help desk" with significant answer delays. However, "the site does have some improvements. Users of the old USAirways.com will now have an improved booking engine with a feature that helps them determine which travel days have lower fares, for example. And users of the old America West site will be able to book United Airlines flights online through a code-share agreement."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Lawmakers Make Case For ANWR Exploration. Reps. Greg Walden and Marsha Blackburn, members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, write in the Washington Times (6/7, 90K) that the "flurry of hearings, markups and energy policy debates that ensued" following Hurricane Katrina "produced bills that, taken together, contemplate a strategy of energy security." The House "recently voted, yet again, to open a sliver of the Alaskan tundra, the Alaskan National Wildlife Refuge, to exploration. Some of the upcoming Senate debate will be a replay of what we've heard for decades from the anti-energy crowd. … The list of silly, flimsy or fact-free objections goes on and on, and it has the uncanny ability to survive dramatic advances in technology and safety, not to mention repeated applications of truth." They add, "The House majority has said no to fear and politics and yes to providing American energy for American workers at a price they can afford to pay. Now it's the Senate's turn."

Johanns Says Bird Flu Easily Detected. In an interview with the AP (6/7, Neergaard), Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said, "Scientists have a new test that can tell within four hours if a bird is possibly infected with bird flu—but it still will take about a week to know if that suspect case is really sick with the deadly Asian strain." Meanwhile, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt told the AP, "Four hours also is how long it takes to get preliminary results in people infected with the H5N1 virus." However, if bird flu ever begins spreading easily among people, Leavitt said "that's too long," so US researchers are working to develop "faster human tests for the disease as well as vaccines and treatments."

SCOTUS Refuses To Hear Appeal Of Seneca Tribe's New York Land Claim. The Buffalo News (6/7, Buckham, Cardinale) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday refused to reinstate the Seneca Nation of Indians' claim over the properties of 18,000 residents (in Grand Island, NY), ending a 13-year fight that had many residents fearing that they would be forced from their homes." The News continues, "The Senecas sued in 1993 to 'recover' Grand Island and about 40 other islands in the Niagara River, claiming they had been illegally taken in an 1815 treaty with New York State. … U.S. District Judge Richard J. Arcara ruled in 2002 that the Senecas had never lived on the islands and, if they had any right to them, had negotiated them away before 1815. His ruling was upheld by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in September." The News adds, "Town Supervisor Peter McMahon applauded Monday's refusal by the Supreme Court to hear the Senecas' last appeal. … McMahon said he found it interesting that the U.S. Justice Department, whose intervention on the Senecas' behalf enabled them to sue in the first place, filed a last-minute brief contending that the appeal had no merit. … But Joseph F. Crangle, who represented the Seneca Nation when the case was filed, said: 'I'm disappointed. There is no question that the treaty [of 1815] included islands in the Niagara River, and I think Grand Island is in the Niagara River. This is a good example of how people can rewrite history.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Announces $2.75 Million Grant To Fight Gangs In Cleveland Area. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (6/7, Tobin) reports, "Greater Cleveland will get $2.75 million from the Justice Department to help fight street gangs, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday during a visit to the area. … 'Obviously, the fact that Cleveland was selected shows there is a gang problem,' Gonzales said during a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse downtown." The Plain Dealer continues, "Most of the money - $2.5 million - will be spent in Cleveland over three years and focus on prevention, law enforcement and prison re-entry. A committee focused on the gang problem will determine by autumn exactly how the money will be spent. … An additional $250,000 will pay for six suburban police officers to work in schools. The officers will help oversee projects to keep students out of gangs. Chagrin Falls, East Cleveland, Parma and Warrensville Heights were selected for the Gang Resistance Education and Training grants. … 'It gives the children a law enforcement officer they can call 24/7,' said U.S. Marshal Peter Elliot, whose office started the program in Greater Cleveland. 'It helps break down stereotypes and distrust of law enforcement.'" The Plain Dealer adds, "In Cleveland, more than 90 gangs are involved in drug dealing and street violence. The gangs are no longer nationally organized, like the Crips and Bloods. … Instead, they are looser groups of kids hanging on the streets, according to the Cleveland Unified Gang Task Force. … Cleveland was selected for the money along with Los Angeles, Milwaukee, Tampa, Dallas and the corridor in Pennsylvania between Lancaster and Easton. … Gonzalez said those cities were chosen because the government felt the money would have the most impact there. … 'These are gangs who are involved in very serious crime,' Gonzales said. 'They are robbing our youth of productive futures.' … Assistant U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said law enforcement, community and church groups will meet over the summer to determine how to best spend the money."

DOJ_NMG_0032302

Wanted Bay-Area Hells Angels Leader Surrenders To FBI. KPIX-TV San Francisco (6/6) reports on its Web site, "The leader of the Santa Rosa Hells Angels motorcycle club chapter turned himself into the FBI Tuesday and was placed under arrest for suspicion of drug possession and distribution, officials said. Federal agents had been searching for…Raymond Foakes since last week when law enforcement officers raided six locations around Santa Rosa, including the Hells Angels headquarters there, as part of an ongoing drug probe." KPIX notes, "He was one of 42 Hells Angels members indicted in the United States District Court in Las Vegas on federal racketeering and firearms charges." The AP (6/7) also reports on the arrest and adds, "Another Hells Angels associate, Michael Vargas, remained at large Tuesday, FBI spokeswoman LaRae Quy said."

Violent New Jersey Drug Dealer Sentenced To Life In Prison. The Camden Courier Post (6/3) reported, "Bernard Murray of Camden, convicted almost exactly a year ago for his participation in a large-scale drug operation that relied on murder as an enforcement tool, was sentenced…to life plus 85 years in a federal prison" on Friday. Representatives of three murder victims spoke at the sentencing hearing, asking for a harsh term for Murray," and "the sentence is the longest that court officials could recall." WPVI-TV Philadelphia (6/2) also reported on Murray's sentence, adding, "Meanwhile, his partner…Enrique Perez, another leader of the gang, got 25 years in prison. … Perez received a lesser sentence due to his cooperation with authorities."

Federal "Weed & Seed" Money Will Help Charlotte, NC, Fight Crime. News 14, Charlotte, NC (6/7) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department is committing about $1 million to revitalize a crime-ridden area of east Charlotte." News 14 continues, "It is partnering with local businesses and the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Police Department to implement the 'Weed and Seed' program in the Central Avenue corridor. … The money will pay for community and faith-based initiatives that are designed to "weed out" crime, gangs and drugs while "seeding" economic development." News 14 adds, "The Central Avenue corridor is one of more than 300 'Weed and Seed' sites in the country. .. 'We're going to measure success if we see a decline of truancy in the schools,' U.S. Attorney Gretchen Shappert said Tuesday. 'We're going to measure success if we see a decrease in gang activity. We're going to measure success if we see increased economic development.'"

Guns, Drugs Seized In New Jersey, 3 Arrested. The Trenton (NJ) Times (6/6, Ratcliffe) reports, "Guns, ammunition and drugs were seized and three men were arrested on related charges when authorities raided three residences in Trenton and Hamilton on Sunday night. … The raids…were the result of a three-month investigation by Trenton detectives, the Mercer County Prosecutor's Office and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. Police said the probe began after neighborhood residents tipped authorities to a suspected drug distribution ring operating from the three residences."

Pittsburgh Police Confiscate Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Packets. According to the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/7, Silver), Pittsburgh police "have confiscated more than 1,000 packets of the type of fentanyl-laced heroin suspected of causing up to six overdose deaths in Allegheny County since Sunday, but it was unclear how much of a dent the seizure would put in the supply on the street. During a news conference yesterday, police revealed few details about their activities -- including a large bust Monday in Hazelwood that netted 1,050 stamp bags of the deadly brand of heroin marked 'Get High or Die Trying.' … Three drug dealers have been arrested, but police would not provide their names. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is also involved, but DEA Special Agent Rick McGoldrick in Philadelphia declined to provide specifics."

DOJ_NMG_0032303

In a separate story, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/7, Toland) reports that at one point, "It was apparent that lots of street brands were mixed with fentanyl (and in some cases, investigators now believe, doses contained no heroin at all, just fentanyl). In the Philadelphia and South Jersey region, 'fefe' was complemented by bags labeled 'flatline,' 'exorcist' and 'Al Capone,' references to the packages' dangerous contents. In Harrisburg and elsewhere, the bags were labeled 'apollo.'"

The Pittsburgh Tribune Review (6/7, Greenwood) reports, "Pittsburgh police seized 21 bricks of fentanyl-laced heroin, putting a 'serious dent' in the flow of the concoction that city detectives Tuesday blamed for six deaths in Allegheny County."

Addicts Seek Out Lethal Mixture, More Overdoses Reported. In Pittsburgh, KDKA-TV (6/7) reports on its Web site, "Addicts are now purposely seeking out the deadly drug laced with the pain killer fentanyl. They want to try it, despite its potential to be lethal."

KDKA-TV (6/6) also reports, "The fourth reported death from a heroin overdose happened in the Oakland section of the city [Monday] night. … Police were called to another drug overdose early Tuesday morning at a home…on the South Side. The person survived."

Newspaper Seeks List Of Victims. The Detroit Free Press (6/7) editorializes, "Authorities have not responded to a Free Press request for the names of the victims, other than to ask for more time. If there is not a master list of the victims, the sleuths charged with tracing the drugs are not doing a very good job, since the list would be the basis for finding commonalities that might lead someplace."

Maryland AG's Office Denies Approving Release Of Security Information. The Baltimore Sun (6/7, Dresser) reports the Maryland Attorney General's Office "is denying an assertion that Maryland Transportation Authority Police Chief Gary W. McLhinney received the approval of state lawyers before releasing sensitive security information last month. The documents McLhinney released included the names of Secret Service agents and other security officers providing executive protection to state and federal officials and their families - details government agencies generally resist disclosing." The Sun says it was "seeking forms detailing police escorts to 'private citizens (non-government employees).' Nevertheless, McLhinney released 305 pages that included details of travel through BWI by U.S. Cabinet secretaries, National Security Agency and Drug Enforcement Administration officials and other officials."

Former Doctor Investigated By DEA Accused Of Malpractice. The Tucson (AZ) Citizen (6/6) reports, "One week after being sentenced to life in prison and having his medical license yanked, Bradley Alan Schwartz was expected in court today for the start of a malpractice trial. … Laurie Espinoza, Schwartz's former office manager, is expected to say that Schwartz appeared drugged at the time he operated on Garrett Hoxie, then a high school student, in November 2001. Espinoza says Schwartz didn't kick his drug habit until early 2002, after learning that the Drug Enforcement Administration was investigating him."

Arizona Reliever's House Searched In Baseball's Steroid Investigation. The AP (6/7) reports federal investigators "searched Arizona Diamondbacks reliever Jason Grimsley's house Tuesday as part of their investigation of steroid use in baseball. Thirteen agents searched Grimsley's house in Scottsdale, Ariz., for six hours, according to Internal Revenue Service Agent Mark Lessler, who would not say what they found." Grimsley "allegedly made 'extensive statements' about illegal drug use, 'for the purpose of performance enhancement,' according to the court documents. … According to Novitsky, Grimsley told him the names of other players he believed were using, but the names of those players were blacked out of the court records."

The Arizona Republic (6/7) writes, "Grimsley admitted taking illegal performance-enhancing drugs and said that amphetamines were used 'like aspirin' in major league clubhouses, according to an affidavit filed by the lead federal investigator in baseball's steroid investigation. The affidavit…said Grimsley agreed to cooperate with U.S. Internal Revenue Service agents after Grimsley received a package containing two kits of human growth hormone April 19 at his Scottsdale home."

Cable TV Coverage. ESPN (6/7, 12:00 a.m.) reported, "Diamondback pitcher Jason Grimsley [is] embroiled in the BALCO scandal. He admitted to using illegal performance-enhancing drugs and said amphetamines were used like aspirin in major league clubhouses. He also provided details of his knowledge of other major leaguers using steroids. "

Local TV Coverage. KSAZ-TV, Phoenix (6/6, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "The baseball drug scandal hits close to home as 13 federal investigators search the house of Diamondback pitcher Jason Grimsley for over six hours today. According to an affidavit filed in US district court, Grimsley admitted to using growth hormones, amphetamines, and steroids. Apparently cooperated with the feds, naming names of other players that may have used performance-enhancing drugs."

DOJ_NMG_0032304

KOLD-TV, Tucson-Sierra Vista, Arizona (6/6, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "Federal investigators have searched the home of Arizona Diamondbacks reliever Jason Grimsley today as part of their investigation of steroid use in baseball. IRS agent Mark Lessler says 13 agents searched Grimsley's Scottsdale home for six hours. Lessler wouldn't say what they found."

Montel Williams To Back Medicinal Use Of Marijuana In New Jersey. The AP (6/7) reports television personality Montel Williams "plans to tell a New Jersey Senate panel on Thursday how marijuana relieves his chronic pain caused by multiple sclerosis, and urge New Jersey lawmakers to enact medical marijuana laws, as 11 other states already have. … Williams, a registered medical marijuana user in California, said he became an activist pushing for medical marijuana laws after being stopped at a Detroit airport by an Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms officer for carrying drug paraphernalia. The charge was later dropped." Gov. Jon S. Corzine "said last year that he would sign a medical marijuana bill into law."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Says Immigration Reform Incomplete Without Guest Worker Program. The AP (6/7, Loven) reports from Artesia, NM, that President Bush "declared progress Tuesday in tightening the nation's southern border and pushing major immigration changes through Congress despite widespread skepticism that lawmakers can find a compromise." The President "brushed aside bitter divisions over the issue, saying the fact that there is active debate at all is cause for optimism." After visiting New Mexico, the President "took in a video surveillance operation at the Border Patrol headquarters in Laredo, Texas, also hot and dry, and a busy crossing point near Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, where warring drug cartels have been blamed for more than 140 murders this year." The AP adds, "The visuals of Bush's two border-state stops focused on enforcement," but "the emphasis of the president's spoken message was agreement."

Likewise, Fox News' Special Report (6/6, Baier) reported that Bush "insisted three times that lawmakers are, quote, making progress towards a comprehensive immigration bill, merging the stricter House bill that focuses on border security, and the Senate bill that provides a way for illegal immigrants to become citizens." The President "acknowledged tough negotiations lie ahead, but tried to stress the common ground already achieved."

Along the same lines, the Los Angeles Times (6/7, Neuman, 958K) reports Bush "sought to minimize the differences that have divided the House and Senate over immigration," while the New York Times (6/7, Stolberg, 1.19M) says the President "tried…to win back the trust of conservatives who have distanced themselves from him on immigration, promising to 'get this border enforced' and warning those who enter the country illegally that 'if you get caught, you get sent home.' … The image of Mr. Bush, his collar open and his starched blue shirt sleeves rolled up, surrounded by Border Patrol agents and trainees clad in olive drab uniforms in the dusty New Mexico desert, was carefully calibrated to sell the president's plan to the American people -- and, by extension, their representatives in Washington."

The Houston Chronicle (6/7, Mason, 581K), however, reports from Laredo that Bush "accused his opponents in the immigration battle of stirring up fear with false claims about amnesty. 'Look, if you're one of these types of people that basically say, you know, throw them out, then you just use the word "amnesty," just toss it around,' Bush said. 'In order to frighten people, you just say "amnesty."'" Standing with Gov. Rick Perry, Bush "stepped up his criticism of lawmakers back in Washington balking at his call to create a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants who have lived in the country for years."

All three networks last night noted the New Mexico leg of Bush's visit in brief segments. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 3, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush made two stops to focus attention on immigration. Mr. Bush is sending 6,000 National Guard troops there to help secure the border. He said today that unless Congress includes a guest worker plan in its legislation, the immigration issue will not be solved." The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 8, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported the President "said the United States must control its borders, but he also called on Congress to pass a comprehensive bill, including a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for some illegal immigrants." NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 10, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) Bush "was urging Congress to pass a comprehensive reform bill."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/6, Quijano) reported Bush "watched as the new commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, Ralph Basham, was sworn in by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. Again, the image intended to convey the message and demonstrate his commitment to border enforcement."

The San Antonio Express-News (6/7, Castillo, Martin) notes Bush said in Texas that "a long-term solution to reduce the number of illegal crossings is to find work for them in Mexico." Also, "asked by a local reporter if his immigration reform plan included raising the number of immigrants who can legally enter the country, Bush said he would leave that up to Congress." Bush also "traveled to Omaha, Neb., where he was scheduled to visit a Catholic charity and speak at a college."

DOJ_NMG_0032305

The Washington Times (6/7, Dinan, 90K) says Bush "seemed to float the idea of decreasing legal immigration overall by increasing the line for green cards and citizenship. 'If Congress is worried about the number of people getting in, they can decrease the number of green cards,' he said."

The Washington Post (6/7, A5, Abramowitz, 744K) reports Bush broke "little ground substantively," but "aides say he is trying to build grass-roots support in advance of negotiations aimed at reconciling House and Senate bills that take sharply different approaches toward undocumented workers." The President is also "trying quiet diplomacy. Joining Bush on Air Force One on the trip from Washington were two New Mexico representatives who have been critical of the president for various aspects of his plan, Democrat Tom Udall and Republican Steve Pearce. During the trip, Pearce said, the two received a briefing from David Aguilar, chief of the Border Patrol, who outlined a more aggressive approach to keeping illegal immigrants from entering New Mexico."

Local television stations across the country included coverage of the President's visit to the border region in at least 700 broadcasts yesterday. The brief "national round-up" type of coverage merely provided an outline of the President's itinerary and showed him interacting with Border Patrol agents. Most of the more in-depth reports noted that the President's appearance at the border coincided with the arrival of the first few National Guard troops assigned to assist the Border Patrol in apprehending illegal immigrants. While a small minority of the broadcasts played up the notion that the President's visit to the southwest was intended to reassure conservatives whose primary concern is border security, the much more common narrative contended that Bush was "on the move to get Congress to pass an immigration overhaul that includes a guest worker program." Notably, stations in border states tended to characterize the Senate's immigration bill as identical to the President's guest-worker proposal. KPHO TV Phoenix, for example, reported Bush "went to the border today to help rally support for his immigration plan. That plan already passed by the Senate still needs clearance in the House." And KCAL TV Los Angeles: "The Senate shares the President's vision, a guest worker program and a path to citizenship."

Typical of the coverage across the nation was WJW TV Cleveland (6/6, 5 PM), which reported that Bush's "plan to secure the border with Mexico is underway tonight. A few dozen National Guard troops arrived in Arizona today, the first of what will be thousands in the border region." KPHO TV Phoenix (6/6, 5 PM) said the President "dispatched the troops to show he's tough on border security, as he tries to push broad immigration reforms thru congress -- including a guest worker program."

WFLA TV Tampa-St. Petersburg (6/6, 5 PM) reported the President "made another push for his guest worker proposal."

WPVI TV Philadelphia (6/6, 12 PM) reported, "President Bush is on the move to get congress to pas an immigration overhaul that includes a guest worker program."

WAGA TV Atlanta (6/6, 10 PM) reported that "an optimistic President Bush is touring the southern border."

KCAL TV Los Angeles (6/6, 12 PM) reported, "Critics wonder what this push has to do with the upcoming elections. … There's also something else driving Mr. Bush's stops in Texas and New Mexico today, a chance to appeal to local voters on an issue they care deeply about, at a time when polls show Congressional Republicans could do poorly in November elections."

KABC TV Los Angeles (6/6, 5 PM) reported that the President "looked comfortable in shirt sleeves in the hot New Mexico sun. Bush "visited the law enforcement training center in Artesia where the border patrol has a 19 week agent program. They demonstrated a mock take down and a freight train inspection as students and instructors checked under cars where immigrants hide."

The Hill (6/7, Blake) reports on "several Senate candidates across the country" who are "using the finer points of the immigration debate as campaign fodder in advertisements and press releases. Their efforts are working to varying degrees of success to differentiate them from their opponents, who are firing back in much the same manner. Only two Republicans facing tough reelection campaigns -- Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio) -- were among the 23 in their party voting for final passage of the bill, and three of the four Democratic no votes were cast by vulnerable candidates."

"Bush's Own Pollster" Says President Moving In Wrong Direction. The Washington Times (6/7, Dinan, 90K) reports, "Bush has been making a strong push for illegal aliens to assimilate as he stumps for passage of a plan to legalize most of them, but a new poll shows that voters actually want less immigration and more security. And even Mr. Bush's own pollster, in another recent poll, failed to ask about a pathway to citizenship, instead focusing on temporary legal status for illegal aliens -- a concept Mr. Bush no longer endorses." The Times adds," About half of those surveyed in the new poll by MWR Strategies said the immigration problem facing the US is 'too much immigration,' while just 29 percent identified the problem as 'not enough assimilation.'" Michael McKenna, "who conducted the poll of 1,000 registered voters, said it suggests that Mr. Bush is moving in the wrong direction by embracing a path to citizenship."

House Republicans Threaten To "Blue-Slip" Senate Bill. The Hill (6/7, Allen) reports, "Lawmakers are shrouding themselves in a thin slip of blue paper as deep divisions on immigration policy are again being laid bare." House Republicans "have threatened to deliver a 'blue slip' rejection of the Senate immigration bill, and Senate Democrats are blocking efforts to circumvent that maneuver." The result is "a procedural paralysis that has prevented the two chambers from even naming conference negotiators, a clear sign of the difficulties facing proponents of an immigration overhaul." The Senate-written immigration bill "contains tax provisions, violating the Constitution's requirement that all revenue measures originate in the House. Any House member could object to the Senate bill on that basis, forcing debate and a vote on whether to reject the measure outright. … To avoid that fate, Senate Republican leaders want to bring up a separate House-passed tax bill, gut it and replace its provisions with the Senate immigration bill. But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has objected to that maneuver." Reid "said he is concerned that using a House-passed tax vehicle could invite the introduction of unrelated tax cuts into House-Senate conference negotiations."

DOJ_NMG_0032306

The Washington Times (6/7, Hurt, 90K) reports Reid said yesterday that Republicans "think there's a problem because they want a problem. … They don't want to go to conference." But "he also added that he's at least willing to consider the idea. 'I've got another idea for them,' Mr. Reid told reporters yesterday. 'If they want to use another bill, a tax bill, instead of the House-passed immigration bill, then let them come to me with how they're going to not have this as a Christmas tree of tax measures. It's up to them. If they want use a tax bill, let's see what they can come up with to protect the Senate's position on immigration.'"

Napolitano Vetoes Illegal Immigration Legislation. The New York Times (6/7, Archibold, 1.19M) reports, "Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona has vetoed a bill that would have punished employers who hire illegal immigrants and authorized the police to arrest illegal immigrants on trespassing charges merely for being in the state." Napolitano, a Democrat who "is running for a second term and is doing well in public opinion polls," said yesterday in a letter to legislators that "parts of the bill would have violated the federal government's power to enforce immigration law under the Constitution and were opposed by many law enforcement groups and leaders in border communities."

Schools Recruiting Teachers From Abroad. The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 9, 3:00, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "This team of top officials from Baltimore has traveled to Manila to conduct an immigration raid, specifically a raid to hire Filipino teachers." Baltimore has "recruited more than 200 teachers from the Philippines so far, and while administrators say they're pleased with the quality of these teachers, they are recruiting overseas because they have to. There is a shortage of teachers, not just in Baltimore but nationwide. Clark County, Nevada, imports math and science teachers from Canada. Topeka brings in teachers from India and Spain. Dallas brings in bilingual teachers from Chile and Mexico. At least 10,000 teachers are needed from abroad every year. America's shortage is so well known Philippine colleges offer special courses in education." Reg Weaver, "the head of the National Education Association, the nation's largest teachers' union, calls the importing of teachers a Band-Aid. He says low salaries and heavy workloads are driving American teachers out of the classroom and that school systems should be solving that."

Immigrants Seen As Setting Citizenship As Goal. NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 11, 2:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported from Queens, New York that "community activist Ana Maria Archilla sees something else" in a diverse community of immigrants, "a new desire to stay and fight for citizenship." Ana Maria Archilla: "Leaving is not an option, and it's especially not an option for people that have spent a large portion of their lives here that have really given their labor to this country and have raised families here." Gregory: "The immigrants in this neighborhood, legal and illegal, are mobilizing, with tactics big and small."

Illegal Immigrant Graduates Near Top Of Princeton Class. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 7, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "65,000 undocumented immigrant children will graduate this spring from American high schools. They will not be able to work, legally. They will not qualify for most college aid. Only 10% to 20% will be able to continue their studies. We are going to take 'A Closer Look' at a young man who graduated from Princeton University today, near the top of his class." ABC (Muir) added Dan-el Padilla Peralta "stood before his fellow Princeton graduates today and delivered the salutatory address, in Latin no less, it was a remarkable feat in itself." But he is "an illegal immigrant, which comes very important because he's been invited to study at Oxford. And if he goes, US immigration law says because he is illegal, he can't come back for a least a decade." Padilla's attorney "is asking for a waiver. But there are tens of thousands of undocumented students in the US and some argue it could set a precedent."

NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 12, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Twenty-one- year-old Dan-el Padilla Peralta was selected as Princeton salutatorian. He gave the traditional speech in Latin but he also got over a major hurdle today. He graduated from the Ivy League-despite living in the US Illegally. He moved here from the Dominican Republic when he was 4. His mother was sick. A wealthy benefactor guided him through prep school. He's been accepted to Oxford in England to study, but the secret he and Princeton kept for quite some time is now out."

Americans Have More Positive View Of Immigrants Than Europeans, Poll Finds. The AP (6/7, Lester) reports, "Immigration anxiety has been fueling a fierce political debate in the United States, but attitudes about immigrants in this country are considerably more positive than in several European countries, AP-Ipsos polling found. People in Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Spain are much more inclined than those in the U.S. to think immigrants are likely to get involved in criminal activity. … More than a third of Germans, Italians and Spaniards say they think immigrants are more likely to be involved in criminal activity than people born in their countries. A fourth in France and Britain feel that way." Those European countries are "about evenly divided on whether immigrants are a good influence." In the US, "about one in 10 thinks immigrants are more likely to be involved in crimes. And a majority, 52 percent, say they think immigrants are a good influence on the country."

DOJ_NMG_0032307

Inhofe Makes Case For English As "National Language." GOP Sen. James Inhofe, who sponsored the English language amendment, writes in USA Today (6/7, 2.31M), "My amendment, passed by the Senate last month, clarifies that, unless specified by other laws, there are no entitlements to federal services and documents in foreign languages. This nation decided long ago that you must know English to become a citizen. Thus, there is no reason to offer government's citizen services in foreign languages. … The U.S. courts' position is unmistakable, and America's citizens and immigrants have spoken. Why aren't liberals listening?"

In an editorial, meanwhile, USA Today (6/7, 2.31M) asks, "So should English be designated the USA's 'national language'? Sixty-three senators have voted to make it so. They might as well have voted to make apple the national pie or American Idol the national TV show. In practice, English already is the national language, even among the children of immigrants: 93% of second-generation Hispanic Americans are bilingual or speak primarily English, according to a 2002 national survey by the Pew Hispanic Center and the Kaiser Family Foundation. By the third generation, hardly anyone speaks only Spanish, and just 22% of Latinos are bilingual."

Six Arrested By Immigration Agents In North Carolina To Be Deported. The Raleigh (NC) News & Observer (6/7, Brevorka) reports, "Six men arrested by federal immigration agents at Carter-Finley Stadium (in Raleigh, NC) last month have pleaded guilty to entering the country illegally and will be deported, according to the U.S. Department of Justice." The N&O continues, "Federal immigration agents accompanied troopers from the state Highway Patrol to a construction site at the stadium May 23 in hopes of finding a driver who had fled from an auto accident. When federal agents arrived, more than 50 workers in hard hats ran. Seven, including one juvenile, were arrested. … Federal agents later found the suspected driver, Reynalda Guitierres, 28, in Durham and charged him with illegal entry." The N&O adds, "Justice Department officials said that the following men pleaded guilty to illegal entry and will remain in federal custody while they undergo the deportation process: Victorino Marquez-Hernandez of Mexico; Antolin Contreras-Maldonado of Honduras; Armando Hernandez-Penaloza of Mexico; Melvin Jovel-Hernandez of Honduras; Omar Miguel Barbosa of Mexico and Demetrio Huerta-Ordonez of Mexico. Agents also charged Marquez-Hernandez with possession of false immigration documents."

TAX:

Frist Rejects Estate Tax Compromise. The New York Times (6/7, Andrews, 1.19M) reports Senate majority leader Bill Frist and other GOP Senators "vowing to schedule a vote for full repeal" of the estate tax "on Thursday, have yet to line up the 60 votes they need to prevent a Democratic filibuster. … In what is either a shrewd game of chicken or an effort to inflame the passions of crucial Republican constituencies…Frist…has made little effort to strike a compromise with conservative Democrats that would greatly reduce but not fully abolish the tax." According to the Times, "The strategy has divided Republicans." Sen. Charles Grassley "told reporters on Monday that the Senate could easily pass a bill that eliminated the estate tax for all but a tiny slice of the nation's richest families."

Kyl Pitches Graduated Repeal Proposal. The AP (6/7, Dalrymple) reports, "GOP leaders on Tuesday put abolition of the federal estate tax on the Senate's election-year agenda as other senators weighed ideas to shrink, but not erase, the tax." Sen. Jon Kyl "told other GOP senators Tuesday that common ground might be found by increasing the size of an estate exempt from taxation to $5 million per person or $10 million per couple, according to GOP aides familiar with the proposal speaking on condition of anonymity while negotiations continued. His idea would tax estates between $5 million and $30 million equal to the top tax rate for most capital gains. The remainder of the largest estates would be taxed at 30 percent, those aides said."

Grassley Outlines Effect Of Tax Code Change On Expatriates. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley writes in a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) that the paper is "confused about how a recent change to the federal tax code will affect some Americans working overseas. The change concerned the foreign earned income exclusion under section 911 of the tax code. You imply 4.1 million Americans could be affected, but according to the most recent available IRS data, 306,393 tax returns claimed the benefits of section 911 in 2003. Of those returns, only 125,894 actually had any U.S. tax liability after the benefits." Expatriates "will continue to have a better deal than their domestic counterparts. Through section 911, individuals can still exclude a sizable amount of income that those living and working in the U.S. cannot exclude. Also, American workers abroad who claim section 911 benefits will be taxed at the same rates as domestic workers with the same income."

DOJ_NMG_0032308

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

White House Reenergizes Defense Of Bush Judicial Nominees. The Hill (6/7, Bolton) reports White House officials "are making a concerted effort to cooperate with outside conservative groups to support and defend President Bush's nominees to the federal bench, and they are also planning to work more closely with the Senate on confirming the nominees. The greater focus on judges comes in the wake of privately expressed criticism from conservative leaders that the White House and the GOP-controlled Senate were doing little to defend high-profile nominees such as William 'Jim' Haynes and Terrence Boyle, both picked for the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, from attacks by liberals." The White House "has begun to take a more active role in defending the nominees. For example, talking points circulated at the end of last week defending Boyle from accusations that he did not recuse himself from cases where he may have had conflicts of interest were written in the signature style of the White House and its ally the Republican National Committee. And administration officials are also working more closely with conservative activists to defend the nominees."

WSJournal Says Senate Should Confirm Haynes To Fourth Circuit Court. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/7, A14, 2.11M) says the nomination of William 'Jim' Haynes II to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals is being held up, but "don't blame this delay only on Democrats. Two Republicans -- Senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham -- are also causing the holdup." Haynes is the Pentagon's general counsel, "and his transgression is to have offered legal advice on the treatment of detainees in the war on terror. The big point of contention is his role in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's decision in December 2002 to allow 'coercive' interrogation techniques against al Qaeda detainees at Guantanamo. Haynes' critics "say he was instrumental in forging a policy that could be used to justify 'torture.' But there is no evidence that anyone condoned torture." The Journal adds, "With Republicans in danger of losing Senate seats, if not their majority, now is the time to honor one of their campaign pledges from 2004 by confirming Mr. Bush's judicial nominees."

Hecht Admonished For Vocal Support Of Miers Nomination. The Washington Post (6/7, A21, Weiss, 744K) reports the Honorable Nathan L. Hecht, is "a justice of the Supreme Court of Texas and a well-known conservative jurist. A longtime friend of White House counsel Harriet Miers, Hecht gave more than 120 media interviews during her failed Supreme Court nomination. Hecht coordinated strategy with White House aides and agreed to take media calls straight from the White House, according to a recent investigation." But the Texas State Commission on Judicial Conduct "last month admonished Hecht for his activities on behalf of Miers. The Texas Code of Judicial Conduct prohibits judges from doing anything to 'advance the private interests of the judge or others.'"

Congress Fighting Administration Effort To Consolidate Foreign Aid Programs. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Phillips, Rogers, 2.11M) reports the Bush administration and Congress "are headed for a clash over how to spend U.S. aid for the developing world. President Bush's decision to consolidate billions of dollars in foreign-aid programs under the State Department puts him at odds with Congress's age-old prerogative of earmarking foreign-aid funds for favorite issues." The Journal notes that at "the center of the struggle" is Randall Tobias, "a former Eli Lilly & Co. chief executive who is now the country's first director of foreign assistance. With marching orders from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Mr. Tobias is remodeling $16.6 billion in U.S. foreign-assistance programs." Sen. Sam Brownback "is drafting legislation that would require the administration to spend 50% of aid to Africa on such items as water wells, immunizations and teacher training. Mr. Brownback says he became disenchanted with how the administration is delivering foreign aid during a December trip to the Democratic Republic of Congo."

White House Deployed Gingrich To Influence Congressional Oversight. The Hill (6/7, Cusack) reports former House Speaker Newt Gingrich and the OMB's Clay Johnson "urged Republican investigators on Capitol Hill to change how they conduct probes of the executive branch in a private meeting earlier this spring. The unusual request infuriated some of the GOP aides, who countered that the administration has repeatedly failed to cooperate with their requests for information. The staffers expressed outrage that the meeting was even taking place, calling it inappropriate for a White House policymaker to tell investigators how to scrutinize the Bush administration. … Others thought the forum was somewhat productive, but acknowledged it was bizarre." However, "Some came away from the meeting believing there was an implied, unstated message: Ease up on oversight this election year." The Hill adds, "Democrats are seizing on the meeting as proof of the cozy relationship between the GOP-led Congress and the administration."

Democrats Seek To Curb Bush Use Of Signing Statements. Roll Call (6/7, Yachnin) reports, "Angered over recent media reports that President Bush has effectively disavowed hundreds of laws enacted during his tenure, a handful of House Democrats are now pushing measures to shore up Congress' legislative authority. Citing concerns over maintaining a clear Separation of Powers between the legislative and executive branches," Reps. Barney Frank and Sheila Jackson Lee "introduced separate bills shortly before Memorial Day." Roll Call notes Democrats "have criticized White House use of 'signing statements,' a practice that allows the president to attach an official declaration to newly enacted laws, and one historically used as a legal interpretation for executive branch agencies."

DOJ_NMG_0032309

VA Says Personal Information Of 80% Of Active Duty Troops Stolen. The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 4, 2:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported the case of the "personal records of so many people at the Veterans Administration allowed to be stolen took another bizarre turn late today." CBS (Orr) added, "The Pentagon now tells CBS News that the recent theft of personnel information affects not only veterans but more than two million active duty military troops, National Guard and Reserves. The government's story keeps changing." The VA "said up to 50,000 names, Social Security numbers and birthdates for active duty Navy personnel and National Guard and Reservists were also among the missing data. Now, another announcement: The IDs of 1.1 of the 1.4 million active duty personnel may be among the missing data, as well as the IDs for nearly 780,000 National Guard and Reservists. The bottom line here is the government really isn't sure how much data has been lost and can't say with any certainty the information won't be used to defraud veterans and soldiers. VA Secretary Jim Nicholson will face new blistering questions when he testifies for a second time on the Hill on Thursday, questions like how long has the VA known about his latest information and why does it seem that details keep dribbling out."

NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 3, 0:55, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Pentagon officials confirm tonight that the critical personal data of more than two million active duty National Guard and Reserve forces may have been on those same computer disks stolen from the home of a Veterans Affairs employee just over a month ago. That includes the names, birthdates, and Social Security numbers of 80% of the entire active US military. It was first reported the stolen disks contained only information on 26.5 million veterans. Now, warning letters are going out tonight to those active forces, telling them, keep a close eye on your credit."

Information Loss May Compromise Troop Safety. The Washington Post (6/7, A1, Tyson, Lee, 744K) reports, "Defense officials said the loss is unprecedented and raises concerns about the safety of U.S. military forces. But they cautioned that law enforcement agencies investigating the incident have not found evidence that the stolen information has been used to commit identity theft. … Army spokesman Paul Boyce said: 'Obviously there are issues associated with identity theft and force protection.' For example, security experts said, the information could be used to find out where military personnel live."

Veterans' Coalition Files Class-Action Lawsuit. USA Today (6/7, 2.31M) reports, "a coalition of veterans groups charged in a federal class-action lawsuit in Washington that their privacy rights were violated by the theft. The suit demands that the VA fully disclose which military personnel are affected and seeks $1,000 in damages for each."

House Leadership Said To Be Working To Keep Pledge On Earmark Reform. Roll Call (6/7, Ackley) reports House leaders "have yet to appoint Members from their chamber to smooth out differences between House and Senate lobbying reform bills," but "they are working to make good on their pledge to appropriators that any new earmark disclosures apply equally to all committees." In order "to get enough support to pass the lobbying and ethics reform legislation, House leaders pledged that any bill would contain disclosure of earmarks, including those in tax-writing and authorizing measures — not just in appropriations bills." Kevin Smith, "a spokesman for House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said that the commitment on earmarks remains." But several "sources in Congress and on K Street said they have not detected a sense of urgency from House leaders on appointing conferees."

Hoyer Says Pelosi Will Lead House Democrats Regardless Of Election Outcome. The Hill (6/7, Hearn) reports House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer "says he has only unalloyed endorsements for the minority leader and her ability to unify the caucus." Hoyer said, "Nancy has worked harder in my opinion than anybody I have seen in my 26 years in Congress. [Former Minority Leader] Dick Gephardt [D-Mo.] I thought was the hardest worker I could find. Nancy works harder than Dick. She travels more. She raises more money. She works harder than message. She's doing a wonderful job. If we lose, it will not be Nancy Pelosi's fault. She's done everything she possibly could to insure our victory. ... Win, lose or draw, she's going to be our leader." The Hill adds Hoyer was "responding to a recent report that Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, may mount a challenge to Pelosi if Democrats fall short of taking control of the House."

DOJ_NMG_0032310

Senate GOP Focus On Social Issues Worries Some Republican Members. The New York Times (6/7, Hulse, 1.19M) reports that while some Republican candidates "may relish the Senate's current concentration on same-sex marriage and other ideologically charged topics, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island is not among them." Chafee said, "It may stir up my primary voters a little bit against me." The Times adds Chaffee "opposes the push for a constitutional amendment to prohibit same-sex marriage and is under intense pressure to back a proposed amendment that would forbid flag burning." Other Republicans, "including some conservatives, say Mr. Chafee may not be the only potential victim of what they see as a misguided effort to appeal to social conservatives by staging votes intended primarily to make a point about the party's values. They say that voters are more concerned about the economy, health care and immigration, and that replaying the marriage debate in particular could do as much damage as good as Republicans fight to retain control of Congress." Club for Growth President Pat Toomey said, "The problem I see is with economic conservatives who see out-of-control spending, huge deficits and that Republicans can't make the tax cuts permanent. The problem is on a different field."

Laura Bush Visits Minnesota Community Center. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (6/7, Coleman, 200K) reports First Lady Laura Bush "brought her get-involved message to Minnesota on Tuesday, visiting a community center that's been serving at-risk children for years." Bush spoke "to more than 20 children in the library at the Meadowbrook Collaborative, then examined crafts and played a game that gathered people in a circle to flap the edges of a large sheet. The brief visit was intended to promote the federal program known as Helping America's Youth." Mrs. Bush "capped her visit by sharing refreshments and cookies before heading to a fundraiser for Minnesota GOP Senate candidate Mark Kennedy."

OPM Director Launches "Career Patterns" Initiative. The Washington Post (6/7, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that OPM Director Linda Springer yesterday "launched a 'career patterns' initiative aimed at making the government a more attractive employer by offering increased flexibility and better work-life balance to potential hires who are less interested in the traditional 9-to-5 job and 30-year federal career. The initiative seeks to take many workplace practices in use across government -- telecommuting, nonstandard work hours, part-time work -- and treat them as natural employment options rather than as exceptions."

White House Threatens To Veto Intervention In FAA Contract Dispute. The Washington Post (6/7, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Any legislation to change the rules for resolving contract disputes at the Federal Aviation Administration is strongly opposed at the White House, the administration said in a written statement. If Congress sends such a bill to the president, senior advisers will recommend a veto, the statement said."

Samuelson Says Paulson Needs Economic Crisis To Excel At Treasury. Robert J. Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (6/7, A23, 744K), "Unless he blunders badly, [Henry] Paulson's role as chief economic spokesman doesn't matter much. Most Americans don't know the name of the Treasury secretary and don't care. What they care about is $3-a-gallon gasoline and 6.5 percent mortgage rates." Samuelson adds, "To excel as Treasury secretary, Paulson needs something no one wants: an economic crisis that enables him to act as hero." Samuelson adds, "As Treasury secretary, Paulson may be frustrated by long-standing problems that elude solution. Or he may grapple with a surprising crisis to prevent some greater calamity."

WPost Hits Reid Over Acceptance Of Boxing Tickets. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/7, A22, 744K) says, "The most disturbing thing isn't that Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) accepted free ringside tickets to Las Vegas boxing matches, worth between several hundred and several thousand dollars each. It's that even when pressed the senator didn't see anything wrong with taking the freebies at the same time he was pushing federal legislation to oversee the industry." Reid "first declared that he would continue to take free tickets, then reversed course the next day 'to avoid even the faintest appearance of impropriety.' Maybe he got an inkling: It's this culture of entitlement that offends ordinary Americans -- who don't get free ringside seats and who have to settle for pay-per-view."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Continue To Lose Ground. The stock markets yesterday fell again on investors' fears of inflation and slow economic growth. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "After sinking 200 points yesterday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell again today, for a time even slipping below 11,000 for the first time in 3 months. The Dow ended off 46 points [to close at 11,002.14], investors rattled apparently by the double-whammy of slow, economic growth and the prospect of more interest rate hikes." NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 8, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) noted the Nasdaq "lost about seven points on the day [to close at 2,162.78]." The New York Times (6/7, Holusha, 1.19M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "lost 1.44 points, or 0.1 percent, to 1,263.85."

DOJ_NMG_0032311

The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 7, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) also reported, "Continuing worries about an economic slowdown and rising interest rates sent stock prices still lower today." The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Browning, 2.11M) also reports the stock numbers.

The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Ip, 2.11M) reports, "Inflation alarms at the Federal Reserve rang louder yesterday as a top official said slowing economic growth may not be enough to contain inflation if the public's inflationary psychology intensifies. 'If inflation turns out to exceed...our target range, I do not believe we can count on a slowing economy to bring inflation down, by itself, quickly,' William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, said in an interview." If inflation expectations rose in "a persistent way...we could expect to see that show up in measured inflation in fairly short order."

The Washington Post (6/7, D1, Masters, 744K) reports, "Now that the Dow Jones industrial average has slid 246 points in two days and shed 5.5 percent since mid-May, it's time to ask the question: How do you distinguish a short-term stock market correction from a full-blown bear market? You wait awhile, of course." But "already there are clues in technical market data, such as who is doing the buying and selling, the price of stocks relative to corporate earnings, inflation data, and the length of time since the last recession. … Interviews with nearly a dozen economists and market analysts turned up widely varying views on whether this particular market correction will develop fur and claws. That's partly because each one looks at different signals to determine where the equity markets are going."

Bernanke Under Fire. The Washington Post (6/7, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports, "Bernanke rattled world financial markets Monday with his tough talk about combating inflation, but he also buffed up his image as a strong Federal Reserve chairman committed to the fight, analysts said yesterday." Meanwhile, under the headline "Fed, Bernanke Take Blistering Flak," USA Today (6/7, Kirchhoff, Shell, 2.31M) reports Bernanke "is finding out the hard way that openness is not the same thing as clarity." Bernanke "took office in February promising to make central bank policy more transparent. Four months later, a number of economists and traders say the Fed chairman and other central bank officials have stumbled by making too many contradictory statements, muddying the outlook and spooking markets." The complaints "got louder Monday after Bernanke told a banking group inflation was at an 'unwelcome' level, raising the specter of further Fed interest rate increases." That "appeared counter to April congressional testimony in which Bernanke suggested the central bank could pause from its two-year campaign of interest rate increases, even if inflation was a risk." USA Today (6/7, Krantz, 2.31M) runs a second, similar piece titled "Unease Over Fed Policy Has Markets In A Tizzy."

Brian S. Wesbury, chief economist of First Trust Advisors L.P. in Lisle, Ill, defends Bernanke in the Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M), saying the chairman "is doing a fine job. The inflationary pressures he is fighting today were baked in the cake before he arrived. Monetary policy was overly accommodative for too long, and even after 16 rate hikes the Fed has not yet reached neutral." He adds, "Weaning investors, home builders, hedge funds and proprietary trading desks from 50-year low interest rates is like forcing them to quit smoking: It's good for the health of the economy, but it hurts and they are complaining loudly."

Realtors Urge Fed To Pause Rate Hikes. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Walsh, 2.11M) reports, "The National Association of Realtors lowered slightly its forecast for existing and new home sales this year, while the group's chief economist called for the Federal Reserve to pause its interest rate increases. The slowdown from the previously hot housing market is positive because the economy needs a solid housing sector, and slower price appreciation will improve affordability, said NAR Chief Economist David Lereah." The group "lowered slightly its previous forecast for a slowdown this year in home sales and construction. Existing home sales are now projected to decline 6.8% from last year's record to 6.60 million in 2006, while new home sales are seen down 13.4% from last year's record to 1.11 million. Housing starts are forecast to decline 6.2% to 1.94 million this year."

Gasoline Prices Down Slightly. USA Today (6/7, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Although gasoline prices will likely dip a bit in the near-term, families hitting the road this summer will still pay record prices at the pump, the government said Tuesday. Nationwide, retail gasoline prices will average a record $2.76 a gallon over the April-September summer period for regular." That's "up 39 cents from last summer and a nickel higher than the Energy Information Administration, the Energy Department's statistical arm, forecast a month ago."

Bilbray Leading In CA50; Filner Turns Back Primary Challenge. The San Diego Union-Tribune (6/7, LaVelle, Dodge, 353K) reports Republican Brian Bilbray "appeared headed toward a win over Democrat Francine Busby last night in the race to replace imprisoned former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham in the 50th Congressional District, a contest seen as a gauge of voter attitudes for the national midterm elections." In another "closely watched race, Rep. Bob Filner easily defeated Assemblyman Juan Vargas in the 51st Congressional District Democratic primary.

DOJ_NMG_0032312

It was their third face-off in what has become a long and bitter rivalry."

According to the tally in the website of the San Diego News-Tribune, with 451 of 500 precincts or 90.2% reporting, 56,016 or 49.49% voted for Republican Brian Bilbray, while 51,202 or 45.24% voted for Democrat Francine Busby.

Before any election results were announced, the CBS Evening News (6/6, story 6, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Democrats believe they have a chance to take back control of Congress from the Republicans this year, and they're looking to a special election tonight for a sign that they may be right." CBS (Bowen) added, "It's a race that's seen as a referendum on both the Republican Congress and the Republican President whose popularity is sinking. Recent polls show Busby even or slightly ahead of former Republican congressman turned lobbyist Brian Bilbray."

Angelides To Face Schwarzenegger As Westly Concedes Primary. The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Finnegan, Barabak) reports on its website this morning that Steve Westly conceded the California Democratic gubernatorial primary to Phil Angelides at 1:15 a.m. PDT. Angelides has led Westly by about four percentage points throughout the evening. Angelides will now face Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) in the fall.

LATimes Says Democratic Gubernatorial Candidate Hurt Self. The Los Angles Times (6/7) says in an editorial, "The primary did little to boost the enthusiasm Democrats feel for their state candidates, and voters were also skeptical about two ballot measures to increase public spending on preschool and libraries. Regardless of whether the Democratic gubernatorial candidate is state Treasurer Phil Angelides or state Controller Steve Westly — and the race was too close to call even hours after the polls closed — he will have plenty of work to do before the final contest against Schwarzenegger on Nov. 7. In the next five months, the Democratic candidate must show that he can repair the damage done to himself, his party and electoral politics in general by the recent weeks of cynical and self-defeating campaigning."

Riley Easily Defeats Moore In Alabama Gubernatorial Primary. The Washington Post (6/7, A7, Weisman, 744K) reports Alabama Gov. Bob Riley "easily won the Republican primary contest last night against former state Supreme Court chief justice Roy S. Moore, once regarded as a formidable challenger because of his support from social conservatives who cheered his refusal to remove a monument to the Ten Commandments from the state judicial building." Riley "probably will face Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley, who in early returns in the Democratic primary was burying the comeback attempt of former governor Don Siegelman, who hoped to use a November contest against Riley to showcase his contention that his ongoing corruption trial is a political vendetta by the Republican who unseated him."

Burns, Tester Easily Win Primary Contests. The AP (6/7) reports that Montana Sen. Conrad Burns (R) will face state Senate President Jon Tester (D) in Montana's U.S. Senate race, after both men won their respective primary contests on Tuesday. The AP notes, "With 53 percent of the precincts reporting," Tester was leading State Auditor John Morrison (D) 61% to 36%. Also, "with 52 percent of the precincts reporting," Burns led state Sen. Bob Keenan (R) 72% to 23%.

Menendez, Kean Cruise To Primary Wins, Intensify Rhetoric. The AP (6/7, de la Cruz) reports that New Jersey Sen. Robert Menendez (D) and state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R) cruised to victory in their U.S. Senate primary races on Tuesday. The AP notes, "With 90 percent of precincts reporting, Menendez had 84 percent of the Democratic vote. Kean had about 76 percent of the GOP vote with 95 percent of precincts reporting." GOP candidate John Ginty had been "counting on his supporters voting in droves to show their disapproval of Kean's support of abortion and embryonic stem-cell research. With 95 percent of precincts reporting, Ginty had about 24 percent of the GOP vote." Ginty, in an interview, "would not say whether he would support Kean in November. 'Mr. Kean is going to have to be able to give conservatives and pro-life voters some incentive to support his candidacy,' Ginty said. 'That's up to him.'"

The Newark Star-Ledger (6/7, Howlett, Donohue, 420K) notes, "In his acceptance speech last night, Menendez referred to Kean by name nine times. The only name he invoked more often -- and not by coincidence -- was the president's. 'This campaign will be about who will side with New Jerseyans against the Bush status quo,' Menendez said. 'Tom Kean Jr.'s record shows he cannot be trusted to make the right choices. On issue after issue, the facts are clear: Tom Kean Jr. and George Bush are perfect together -- perfectly wrong.'" Meanwhile, in his acceptance speech, Kean "rebuffed Menendez's effort to link him to the president: 'I've got news for Bob Menendez. He's not running against George Bush, he's running against Tom Kean.' He also mentioned Menendez by name nine times, harping on Menendez's 30 years of political affiliation with Hudson County. 'Fourteen years ago, Bob Menendez brought his party-boss tactics to Washington. … Today he is working to expand that machine across New Jersey,' Kean said. 'The people of New Jersey can no longer afford party bosses who put politics first and people second.'"

The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/7, Burton, 423K) relates that Kean "accused Menendez of being more interested in using power to benefit himself than the citizens. 'Is there anyone who thinks Bob Menendez is fighting for us?' Kean asked. 'Bob Menendez lives off the public and not for it. Ladies and gentlemen, enough is enough.' Kean promised to 'bring a true moral compass to office' and attacked Menendez for voting against tax cuts." Menendez, meanwhile, "said Kean had voted against raising the state's minimum wage while supporting cuts in federal taxes for millionaires and oil companies, supported embryonic stem-cell research but voted against state financing of a research center, and supported the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0032313

At-Risk Lawmakers, Governors Listed. Roll Call (6/7, Jacobson) lists several lawmakers and governors who have been "grappling with" allegations of ethical misconduct and rates their "'risk factor'…to gauge how vulnerable the politician's career is right now, or, if the politician is retiring, how difficult the seat will be for his or her party to hold." Sen. Conrad Burns (R-MT) faces "medium" risk, noting "despite recent Democratic gains in the state, Burns' good-ol'-boy persona has carried him through tough races in the past, and it could again this time." Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle (D) is also rated "medium," and he is "embattled, but not as much for the ethical questions as for his record as governor and the strong challenge he faces from Rep. Mark Green (R)." Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich also faces "medium" risk, and "still faces a tough race, but at least for now, ethical problems seem less likely to doom his candidacy than they once did." Sen. Bob Menendez's (D-NJ) risk factor is "medium-low. While Menendez's vulnerability has risen since he was appointed to the Senate, that has mainly stemmed from a frustration with newly elected Gov. Jon Corzine (D) and the attractiveness of his GOP opponent, state Sen. Tom Kean Jr." Others who face "medium-low" risk include Georgia lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed (R) and Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.), while Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) faces "low" risk, as do Reps. Cynthia McKinney, Jerry Lewis, and John Conyers.

GOP Incumbents' Perks Pose Difficult Challenge To Democratic Challengers. The Washington Post (6/7, A1, VandeHei, Babington, 744K) reports in a front page story that in "one of the lesser-known perks of power on Capitol Hill, lawmakers are using taxpayer-funded databases to cultivate constituents more attentively than ever. Chabot -- a six-term legislator from Cincinnati who finds himself imperiled this year after years of easy races -- has a list of e-mail addresses of people who are most interested in tax cuts. His office recently hit the send button on a personal message to alert them to the congressman's support for extending tax breaks on dividends and capital gains." The access to information is "one factor to keep in mind when assessing the odds that Republicans will get evicted this November from their 12-year majority in the House." Although "anti-incumbent sentiment, as measured by polls and voter interviews, is stronger than it has been in years," so "too, are certain structural advantages that overwhelmingly favor incumbents." Some are "well known, such as the superior ability of incumbents to raise campaign funds and the fact that most lawmakers come from districts that have been carefully drawn to favor one party. Other benefits -- including the ways that lawmakers are using the latest 'micro-targeting' techniques in their official communications -- are more obscure, virtually unheralded beyond the people who use them." Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), "head of the House Democrats' reelection efforts, said that the party faces a 'rigged system' and that only a pitched level of public discontent gives them a 'fighting chance' to overcome it."

Harris Undeterred By Opposition From Within Party To Senate Run. The New York Times (6/7, Leibovich, 1.19M) reports Rep. Katharine Harris is "undaunted by a run of horrific poll numbers, staff turmoil and public doubts from leaders of her party," and she is "thinking confidently beyond November." Once Harris "wins her race for a Senate seat, she says, she plans to travel everywhere with a guide dog." Harris "explains that she intends to participate in a program that provides guide dogs for volunteers to train. While cynics may assign unflattering symbolism to a politician who is not blind being led around the Capitol by a guide dog, Ms. Harris is undeterred — by this or by the perception that her role in 2000 makes her too divisive to lure the swing voters necessary to defeat the incumbent Democrat, Bill Nelson." In her "insistence on running, Ms. Harris has become something of a pariah among many of the people whose power she indirectly helped ensure five and a half years ago, as overseer of the recount that sealed George W. Bush's victory."

Weld Exits New York Gubernatorial Race. The New York Times (6/7, Healy, 1.19M) reports William F. Weld, "the former governor of Massachusetts who undertook a rare bid to lead another state, dropped out of the race for governor of New York yesterday. He had been deserted by Republicans who once supported him as their best hope against Attorney General Eliot Spitzer in the November election." Weld, "a moderate Republican in the mold of Gov. George E. Pataki, ran a lackluster campaign and was never able to convert his early advantages into real campaign muscle. At the same time, Mr. Pataki's behind-the-scenes effort to help Mr. Weld last month proved too late and too thin to do any good." Weld's "departure sets the stage for an ideological clash between the presumptive Republican candidate, former Assemblyman John Faso — a conservative intent on cutting taxes — and the likely Democratic nominee, Mr. Spitzer, who is backed by a unified Democratic establishment that is determined to regain the governor's mansion after 12 years."

DOJ_NMG_0032314

Tie To Bush Seen As Key To Frist's '08 Hopes. Roll Call (6/7, Stanton, Billings) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) "has thrown his legacy chips in with President Bush, inextricably aligning himself with the White House on key domestic and international issues, even as many in his own party distance themselves from the unpopular president." Frist will "face significant challenges in winning the 2008 presidential nomination — from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) as well as from such Senators as George Allen (R-Va.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) who are darlings of the conservative movement." Given the "already crowded field of potential GOP White House aspirants, Frist's decision to firmly tie his political fate to Bush's could result in a boon to his presidential hopes, despite Bush's current weakened state." Frist could "benefit if Bush rewards his loyalty by handing off his substantial political and fundraising operations to Frist. In addition, having the backing of Bush — who remains personally popular with much of the GOP's base despite their concerns about how he has handled his job — could be Frist's ticket to undercutting McCain's early frontrunner status and the natural support among conservatives for Allen and Brownback."

Brownback's 2008 Aspirations Examined. The Washington Post (6/7, C1, Copeland, 744K) reports Sen. Sam Brownback "thinks 2008 might be his moment, though in interviews he emphasizes his humility. He calls himself a 'flawed man,' and says the longer he pursues his faith, the more he finds his own sin. It seems contradictory -- all that ego and all that modesty." Brownback, "sounding way too mellow for a wannabe president," said, "I could be the right person with the right message at the right moment. And I could be completely wrong and I'll still be happy about it." The Post adds, "In the meantime, amid the fundraising and the visits to Iowa and New Hampshire, Brownback is focused on spreading light when he enters a room. He has said he tries to see Jesus in his fellow senators."

Tancredo Wins Presidential Straw Poll In Michigan. The Washington Times (6/7, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo, perhaps Congress' most visible foe of illegal border crossing, won a Republican presidential straw poll Monday night. Mr. Tancredo captured about 18 percent of 325 votes cast at the Lincoln Day Dinner in Macomb County, Mich., located in the Detroit metro area. Although it was only a plurality on a fractured Republican ballot, Mr. Tancredo beat out heavyweights former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (13.8 percent), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (12.3 percent) and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice (12 percent), according to the conservative publication Human Events."

US Scientists Cleared To Clone Human Embryos. USA Today (6/7, Vergano, 2.31M) reports, "Scientists at Harvard and Children's Hospital Boston announced Tuesday they have the green light to clone human embryos that could generate stem cell lines for specific diseases. … Two research teams led by Douglas Melton and Kevin Eggan of Harvard and George Daley of Children's Hospital will attempt to create cells cloned from patients with juvenile diabetes and blood disorders such as sickle cell anemia."

The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 5, 2:25, Alfonsi, 7.66M) reported, "The work at Children's Hospital Boston is aimed at eventually creating stem cells for treating blood diseases like leukemia and sickle cell anemia. Researchers are already working with stem cells taken from donated embryos. What's new here is creating embryos to both match disease and patient." What's "being done at Harvard is another step along the way towards producing real treatments for illnesses like Parkinson's and leukemia. But critics object to the creation of human embryos just to be destroyed. Researchers counter that the eggs they use to create the embryos are from women undergoing in vitro fertilization, but that they aren't high enough quality to produce a pregnancy. They insist those eggs and embryos would have been disposed of as medical waste anyway." It "is against the law to use Federal funds, so this is being entirely funded by private donations and is expected to be funded that way for at least the next decade."

The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Westphal, 2.11M) reports that Harvard's effort "lends clout to renewed U.S. efforts to master the technology."

The New York Times (6/7, Wade, 1.19M) reports that scientists at the University of California, San Francisco will also try to develop embryonic stem cells from the adult cells of patients suffering from certain diseases. The University of California, San Francisco announced their plans a month ago, "resuming a program abandoned in 2001. Both universities, having received required approvals, will at first obtain the human eggs needed for cloning from fertility clinics, starting with eggs deemed too low quality to produce a successful pregnancy. Both programs are privately financed because federal support for human stem cell research is available only for cell lines made before August 9, 2001."

Study Finds 43% Aren't Saving Enough For Retirement. A new study from Boston College almost one in two US families are headed toward financial struggles in retirement. The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Peterson, 958K) reports that the study "presumes that most people need to replace 65 percent to 85 percent of their annual income in their working years to stay secure in retirement. But 43 percent of US households will fall at least 10 percent short of that range, the study found, using what it said were conservative projections." The Times adds, "Saying it hoped to draw attention to the issue, Boston College unveiled a new National Retirement Risk Index based on survey data from 4,500 households in the Federal Reserve's 2004 Survey of Consumer Finances. Researchers calculated that the risk index has risen from 31 percent in 1983 to 43 percent in 2004."

DOJ_NMG_0032315

USA Today (6/7, Chu, 2.31M) reports, "The percentage of 'at risk' households has surged in the past two decades, from 31% in 1983, according to the center's analysis, which was funded by Nationwide Mutual Insurance. … The index, which uses data from the Federal Reserve, is part of a stream of recent sobering conclusions about workers' abilities to finance their golden years. The studies come as the first of 79 million baby boomers — the generation born from 1946 to 1964 — are turning 60 this year."

Program Shows Progress Housing Homeless. The New York Times (6/7, Eckholm, 1.19M) reports on an "accelerating national movement that has reduced the numbers of the chronically homeless…in more than 20 cities. In this campaign, promoted by a little-known office of the Bush administration, 219 cities, at last count, have started ambitious 10-year plans to end chronic homelessness." The Times adds, "Many of the early starters are reporting turnarounds. In Philadelphia, street dwellers have declined 60 percent over five years. In San Francisco, the number of the chronic homeless is down 28 percent in two years, in Dallas 26 percent and in Raleigh-Durham, N.C., 15 percent."

Documents Show CIA Knew Eichmann's Whereabouts. Documents released yesterday show the CIA knew the pseudonym and whereabouts of fugitive Holocaust administrator Adolf Eichmann in 1958 but took no action. The New York Times (6/7, Shane, 1.19M) reports, "The CIA was told by West German intelligence that Eichmann was living in Argentina under the name Clemens…but did not share the information with Israel, which had been hunting for him for years, according to Timothy Naftali, a historian who examined the documents. Two years later, Israeli agents abducted Eichmann in Argentina and flew him to Israel, where he was tried and executed in 1962." The Eichmann papers "are among 27,000 newly declassified pages released by the CIA to the National Archives under Congressional pressure to make public files about former officials of Hitler's regime later used as American agents."

The Washington Post (6/7, A21, Lee, 744K) reports, "In a March 1958 memo to the CIA, the West German foreign intelligence services (BND) wrote that Eichmann, a top Gestapo official who helped orchestrate the mass murder of Jews, 'is reported to have lived in Argentina under the alias CLEMENS since 1952.' The memo also mentioned a rumor that Eichmann lived in Jerusalem. In fact, Eichmann was in Argentina and was using the name Ricardo Klement -- but apparently neither the CIA nor the West Germans acted on the information."

Vanderkam Says Government Should Get Out Of States' Way On Health Care. Laura Vanderkam writes in USA Today (6/7, 2.31M), "A third of Americans ages 21-24 lack health insurance, more than any other demographic. A quarter of those ages 25-34 do without." Vanderkam adds that "if this country truly wants to cover the uninsured, we should remember that rates aren't high everywhere. Insurance companies have come up with cheap ways to get young people covered in states that don't tie insurers' hands. The answer is not to pass more laws. The answer is to get government out of the way." It is "bad news for older folks, too. Not only do all taxpayers foot hospital bills for uninsured people who can't pay, shoving young people out of insurance pools also raises rates for everyone else. If states truly want people covered, that's something to keep in mind."

Marcus Says Works On Negativity, Disclosure Are "Useful." Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (6/7, A23, 744K) about "assaults on two pillars of the conventional political wisdom: that negative attack ads are bad and that disclosure of campaign finance information is good. Neither argument is ultimately convincing, but both serve as provocative warnings against the complacent repetition of accepted verities." A book by Vanderbilt University political science professor John G. Geer, 'In Defense of Negativity: Attack Ads in Presidential Campaigns,' "disputes the notion that rampant negativity is a new phenomenon. … If negativity's negatives are part of the received wisdom, the value of disclosure is a veritable article of faith. In a recent paper, Democratic election lawyer Robert F. Bauer…takes on the popular view of disclosure as an 'efficient, relatively innocuous method of managing concerns about money in politics.'" Geer and Bauer "proffer useful heresies. Negativity isn't an unadulterated evil. Disclosure isn't a panacea. But when it comes to these tenets, at least, the conventional hymnal contains a good deal of wisdom."

Bush Cautiously Optimistic On Initial Iranian Response To Incentives. President's Bush's guarded optimism over Tehran's preliminary reaction to an incentives plan presented to Iranian negotiators by European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana on Tuesday garners heavy coverage in US print media and was picked up by all three national network news broadcasts last night. ABC World News Tonight (6/6, story 4, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There are some signs tonight...that a deal to end the deadlock over Iran's nuclear program might be possible. Might be. Iran's chief nuclear negotiator said the latest proposal by the US and other world powers contained some positive steps. President Bush said he was encouraged by that reaction." ABC (Karl) added a "draft copy of the proposal made by the US, Europe, China, and Russia" would give Iran "help building new nuclear power plants and a new facility in Iran to hold a five-year supply of fuel. The deal would also open the door to guarantees for Iran's territorial integrity, words meant to assure Iran there would be no invasion by the US or Israel."

DOJ_NMG_0032316

NBC Nightly News (6/6, story 4, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported President Bush "called Iran's initial response to a package of incentives and threats positive." NBC (Mitchell) added, "In Texas, the President called it a positive response and said he wants to solve the issue diplomatically." President Bush: "We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously. The choice is theirs to make. I have said the United States will come and sit down at the table with them, so long as they are willing to suspend their enrichment in a verifiable way. Sounds like a positive response to me." The CBS Evening News (6/6, story 3, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Iran's chief negotiator called parts of the package positive and President Bush echoed that, saying the Iranian response 'sounds like a positive step.'"

Meanwhile, USA Today (6/7, Nichols, 2.31M) characterizes the Bush administration as "cautiously upbeat Tuesday about Iran's initial reaction to incentives aimed at persuading it to freeze its efforts to make nuclear fuel. 'It sounds like a positive step to me,' President Bush told reporters in Texas after visiting a Border Patrol facility."

The AP (6/7, Gearan) goes on to quote the President as saying, "I have said the United States will come and sit down at the table with them so long as they are willing to suspend their enrichment in a verifiable way." The AP notes that the EU's Solana "later told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice by phone that the Iranians had said they would need time to consider the proposal, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. Solana called the discussions 'very useful and constructive,' McCormack said."

Offer Includes Possibility Of Uranium Enrichment Inside Iran, Officials Say. The Washington Post (6/7, A1, Vick, Linzer, 744K) adds, "The confidential diplomatic package backed by Washington and formally presented to Iran on Tuesday leaves open the possibility that Tehran will be able to enrich uranium on its own soil, US and European officials said. That concession, along with a promise of US assistance for an Iranian civilian nuclear energy program, is conditioned on Tehran suspending its current nuclear work until the UN's International Atomic Energy Agency determines with confidence that the program is peaceful." That said, "the Bush administration and its European allies have withdrawn their demand that Iran abandon any hope of enriching uranium for nuclear power, according to several European and US officials with knowledge of the offer. The new position, which has not been acknowledged publicly by the White House, differs significantly from the Bush administration's stated determination to prevent Iran from mastering technology that could be used to develop nuclear weapons." One unnamed US official is quoted as saying, "We are basically now saying that over the long haul, if they restore confidence, that this Iranian regime can have enrichment at home. ... But they have to answer every concern given all that points to a secret weapons program."

The Los Angeles Times (6/7, Rubin, Naji, Richter, 958K) adds that among the incentives "is a guarantee that the United States would facilitate a European offer to provide Iran with a light water reactor and other civilian nuclear technology. Much of the light water nuclear technology originates in the United States and without American government approval, the Europeans could not provide it to Iran. The decision to offer Iran help with a nuclear reactor is bound to be especially controversial because it is possible to harvest spent plutonium from such a plant and use it to manufacture material for an atomic bomb, according to scientists." Former UN weapons inspector David Albright is quoted as saying, "Spent fuel from a light water reactor is harder to process...but nothing is proliferation proof."

According to the Washington Times (6/7, Sands, 90K), State Department spokesman Sean McCormack "declined to comment on whether the United States has offered to share at least some forms of nuclear technology with Iran. 'I've seen a lot of reports flying around the past couple of days about what may or may not be in this package,' he said, cautioning that such reports should be taken 'with a grain of salt.'"

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (6/7, Smyth, Dombey) notes that the package also has a significant trade component, reporting, "The US...has reportedly revived last year's offer to lift a ban on the sale of spare parts for Iran's ageing civilian aircraft which could include components from Boeing and Airbus." That said, "Western diplomats emphasize Iran faces the prospect of 'disincentives' should it decide not to suspend enrichment, which can produce weapons-grade material."

The New York Times (6/7, Fathi, Sciolino, 1.19M) adds, "The United States gave crucial heft to the package by offering to remove certain economic sanctions against Iran that date from more than two decades ago, and to talk directly with Iran if the country agrees to an enrichment freeze." Although "the United States has not ruled out military action against Iran," it has instead "committed itself in the incentives package only to support the creation of a vague regional forum to discuss issues of mutual concern, officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0032317

Meanwhile, in a story headlined, "US Risks Political Backlash In Iran Nuclear Offer," the Wall Street Journal (6/7, King, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "Some of the nuclear provisions could stir opposition both on Capitol Hill and among conservatives in President Bush's own party," and "some conservatives also drew parallels to a similar Clinton administration-led effort to stem North Korea's development of nuclear weapons by agreeing to provide Pyongyang with nuclear fuel and advanced reactor technology. That agreement later fell apart as North Korea moved ahead on developing nuclear warheads. 'Having finally killed the reactor deal with Pyongyang, we can't seem to control our urge to cut another similar deal with Iran,' said Henry Sokolski, an expert on the North Korean nuclear program."

Bolton Downplays Iran's Threat To Cut Oil Supplies. John Bolton, US Ambassador to the UN was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/6) how concerned he is that the Iranians could stop selling oil on the international market and raise the price per barrel. Bolton said, "I think Secretary Rice addressed that a couple of days ago. This is not something that -- that we see them doing, because of the harm that it would cause themselves. And I must say, I mean, to be completely honest, it is tempting to respond to that kind of rhetoric, but I think to be serious and responsible now, we have put an important proposition to the government of Iran. It's important that we get a definitive response back from that government. And despite the temptation to respond to what this or that Iranian official is saying, I think it's important that we just stay put here for awhile and see what they come back and say."

Once Burgeoning Iranian Reform Movement Falters. The New York Times (6/7, Slackman, 1.19M) profiles Iran's current domestic political situation, which has swung from the cautiously reform-minded era of President Mohammad Khatami during the late 1990s to the current firebrand President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. The Times reports, "Many people here are now realizing that real reform in Iran, such as it is, will be driven from the bottom up, slowly, stubbornly, no matter how repressive or punitive the rulers choose to be. It is a cliché, for sure, but the phrase on the lips of weary Iranians in Tehran is 'evolution, not revolution.' No one seems to have the stomach for starting over again. The change is glacial in pace but forward moving." Emadedin Baghi, who directs an Iranian prisoners' rights group, is quoted as saying, "It is not possible to make a very big jump. ... Some reformers thought that they could make a big jump. But it is an evolution that will proceed millimeter by millimeter."

Bush Concerned Over Somalia Unrest. The AP (6/7, Pickler) reports President Bush "expressed concern on Tuesday that volatile conditions in Somalia could lead al-Qaeda to use it as a staging ground to plan attacks. 'There's instability in Somalia,' Bush said in Texas where he was traveling. 'The first concern, of course, is to make sure that Somalia does not become an al-Qaeda safe haven.'" The president added that "he talked on Monday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice about the instability in Somalia where Islamic militiamen have claimed control of Mogadishu. 'We're watching very carefully the developments there, and we will strategize more when I get back to Washington as to how to best respond to the latest incident there in Somalia,' Bush said."

A separate AP (6/7, Tomlinson) story led with the characterization that "the success of Islamic extremists fighting for control of Somalia's capital is an important setback in the US war on terrorism," and that the "the defeat of a counterterrorism alliance providing hope for militants elsewhere in the region. ... Since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, US officials have expressed concerns that Somalia could become a haven for terrorists, a concern State Department spokesman Sean McCormack repeated on Monday. 'We do have real concerns about the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia, and that informs an important aspect of our policy with regard to Somalia,' McCormack said in Washington."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (6/7, Lacey, 1.19M) adds, "Tensions remained high in" Mogadishu "as the Islamic militants…vowed to set up a religious state, while thousands of protesters allied with one of the country's largest clans pledged to challenge the effort. The warlords who have been pushed from their strongholds in Mogadishu said they would fight back against the Islamists. ... Bashir Rageh, a warlord who lost control of a key airstrip and port in March, and Muse Sudi Yalahow, another important Mogadishu leader who has lost ground to the Islamic militias, joined thousands of their backers from the Abgal clan at a stadium north of the capital to denounce the Islamic courts and militias that have taken the city." Rageh is quoted as saying, "Our clan has agreed to defend our land, and we will fight the courts hiding under the cloak of Islam and trying to fool our people."

Analyst Alleges US Anti-Terror Policy Bolsters Islamist Militias. Writing in the Washington Post (6/7, A22, 744K), Clinton-era National Security Council analyst John Prendergast takes aim at alleged US support for Somalia's secular warlord alliance. He writes, "In recent trips to the capital, Mogadishu, I have seen evidence of US support to warlord militia leaders in the name of counterterrorism operations. ... Now 'our' warlords -- and by extension our counterterrorism strategy -- have been dealt a crushing defeat by the Islamists, as the latter have consolidated control of Mogadishu. Our short-term interest in locating al-Qaeda suspects has thus been undermined, and the risk of a new safe haven being created for international terrorists has been greatly increased." Prendergast goes on to posit that only a "functioning government that could ensure security would be a win-win scenario for Somalis and the United States, enabling the state apparatus to address the criminality and extremism that undermine progress in the country. This would provide a real partner for the war on terrorism in an area that has a track record for exporting trouble."

DOJ_NMG_0032318

In an editorial, the New York Times (6/7, 1.19M) agrees that current US policy could be deficient, noting, "The immediate concern among many Somalis is a forcible imposition of harsh Islamic law, Taliban style. The larger international concern is that Mogadishu's new rulers may follow the Taliban's example in another way, sheltering international terrorist operations in a region within tempting striking distance of vulnerable countries on the Arabian peninsula and in East Africa." The Times concludes, "With good luck, perhaps a new battlefront with international terrorism may yet be avoided. Luck, however, is no substitute for a more supple and effective American strategy against a highly mobile foe like multinational Islamist terrorism. Washington needs to develop more agile responses of its own. It especially has to avoid getting drawn into quagmires that force it to fight on the terrorists' terms and timetable."

Extending Deadline, Abbas Asks Hamas To Reconsider Deal. The AP (6/7, Daraghmeh) reports, "Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas stepped back from a political showdown with his Hamas rivals, giving the Islamic militants several days to recognize Israel or face the voters in a referendum on the idea." Yasser Abed Rabbo, a top officer of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which Abbas also heads, is quoted as saying, "We are giving enough time, about three days, for our brothers in Hamas to reconsider their position." The AP goes on to note, "A new survey released Tuesday showed 77 percent of Palestinians would vote in favor of the proposal. The survey of 1,200 Palestinians was conducted by Bir Zeit University in the West Bank and had a margin of error of 3 percentage points." AFP (6/7) adds, "The White House welcomed Palestinian Authority president Mahmud Abbas' call for holding a referendum on implicitly recognizing Israel. 'Abbas has demonstrated that he's somebody who wants to work toward a two-state solution' to the Middle East conflict, spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. 'I think it's important for Palestinians to wrestle with the issue of whether they want to have a two state solution,' he said."

In its coverage, the Washington Post (6/7, A19, Wilson, 744K) reports, "The delay also reflects the logistical difficulties Abbas would face in staging a referendum that Hamas, now running the Palestinian Authority's day-to-day operations, opposes in principle. Hamas officials have warned that they would not allow the vote to proceed, even though it could give them cover to moderate their hard-line position toward Israel at a time when foreign donors are demanding they do so in return for future aid." The Post goes on to quote chief Palestinian negotiator and Fatah lawmaker Saeb Erekat as saying, "At the end of the day, we are heading toward a vote. ... I think the only option now, even if the date was not set today, is for the Palestinians to vote."

Indonesian Minister Rebukes US Approach To War On Terror. The New York Times (6/7, Gordon, 1.19M) reports, "Indonesia's defense minister warned the Bush administration on Tuesday that its approach to fighting terrorism was perceived as overbearing, and that the United States needed to be sensitive to local concerns. 'It's best that you leave the main responsibility of antiterrorist measures to the local government in question, and not be too overly insistent about immediate results arising from your perception about terrorists,' the minister, Juwono Sudarsono, told reporters as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld stood nearby. 'It's important to us because, as the world's largest Muslim country, we are very aware of the perception, or misperception, that the United States is overbearing and overpresent and overwhelming in every sector of life in many nations and cultures." The Times goes on to note, "Mr. Sudarsono's remarks prompted a quick reply by Mr. Rumsfeld, who insisted he had been sensitive to other nations' concerns from the start. 'I have never indicated to any country that they should do something that they were uncomfortable doing,' Mr. Rumsfeld said." According to the Times, "The discussion over political perceptions had affected deliberations over one of the Bush administration's major efforts: the Proliferation Security Initiative, which calls for an international arrangement that would enable the United States and its allies to search cargo ships suspected of transporting biological, chemical and nuclear arms, as well as the missiles to deliver them."

Exercise Suggests Taiwan Could Defend Itself For Two Weeks Without US Help. The Washington Times (6/7, Halloran, 90K) reports, "Taiwan could fend off a concerted attack by China for at least two weeks before it would need help from the United States, according to the results of an unprecedented high-level exercise. For the first time, the Ministry of National Defense ran the weeklong war game for President Chen Shui-Bian of the Republic of China and other political leaders in April to test their ability to respond to a military assault from the mainland." According to the Times, "The findings are important to the United States:

DOJ_NMG_0032319

Under the Taiwan Relations Act, often cited by the Bush administration as the basis for the US posture on Taiwan, the United States would be obliged in most circumstances to come to the island's aid." Meanwhile, the Times notes, "US officials have been in what one called 'a grumpy mood' toward Taipei over what they have seen as a provocative posture toward China and a failure to complete an $18 billion arms purchase from the United States. Bush administration officials have suggested that Taiwan is unwilling to defend itself and relies too much on the United States to prevent it from being seized by China, which claims sovereignty over the island."

Poll Shows Muslim Women Disaffected By US Focus On Western Values. The Washington Times (6/7, Stuhldreher, 90K) reports, "Muslim women are potentially important allies in the war on terrorism, but the United States must avoid pushing Western values to win their support, according to data presented yesterday at the Gallup Organization. The Bush administration has promoted women's rights throughout the Muslim world to gain support in the region, especially in Iraq and Afghanistan. But a worldwide Gallup project found that many Muslim women are not as concerned about changing their status as Westerners might think." The Times goes on to note, "Dalia Mogahed, a Gallup Organization analyst, said a majority of men and women expressed opposition to extremism and terrorism and said they were conscious of the rights that women deserved. The key, she said, is how the United States approaches the issue." Mogahed is quoted as saying, "The imposition of Western values alienates both men and women, because it is strongly associated with colonialism, like the British policies of unveiling in Egypt. ... Westerners need to understand how to reach Muslim women through their own value systems, by using the positive aspects of their own beliefs to encourage increased rights."

Peru's New President Wants To Revisit US Trade Pact. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, 2.11M) reports, "Peruvian President-elect Alan García said he expects to renegotiate a free-trade agreement with the US that was signed by the outgoing president in April but has yet to be ratified. He said he would revise the agreement line by line. The agreement 'is just a first draft, which can be improved and broadened if this government decides to approve it,' Mr. García said. He suggested the pact should include language to discourage the import of subsidized US crops." The Journal goes on to note that during a news conference, "Mr. García said that though he had received congratulatory phone calls from many world leaders, he hadn't heard from President Bush."

US Angling To Prevent Venezuela From Getting Security Council Seat. The Washington Times (6/7, Kralev, 90K) reports, "The United States is urging Latin American nations to deny Venezuela a seat on the UN Security Council when the region chooses a replacement for the rotating seat held by Argentina, whose term expires at the end of the year. Reluctant to campaign openly against Venezuela, the Bush administration instead has been boosting the rival candidacy of Guatemala, a US ally." If Venezuela were to win the seat, "at some point it would chair the council for a month, setting the agenda and giving President Hugo Chavez an opportunity to use the highest UN forum to advance his anti-American agenda. ... Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick made an impassioned pitch in support of Guatemala's candidacy at a meeting Monday of the Organization of American States (OAS), but failed to convince several of the region's major players." Zoellick is quoted as saying, "I know that the European democracies are supportive of Guatemala. Many of the East Asian countries are supportive of Guatemala, so we hope that it'll find broad-based support here [in Latin America]."

Mexican Candidates Focus On Middle-Class Voters. The Wall Street Journal (6/7, Lyons, 2.11M) reports, "Poll takers say the 15% of Mexico's voters who have yet to make up their minds -- some 11 million voters in all -- are massed among the lower-middle-class residents of the urban enclaves ringing Mexico City, Guadalajara, Monterrey and other large cities. These are the small businessmen, salesmen and housewives who have climbed a few rungs out of poverty in recent years -- but fear they will lose it all should Mexico stumble into crisis, as it has so often in the past." According to the Journal, "Conservative candidate Felipe Calderón has pulled virtually even with liberal front-runner Andrés Manuel López Obrador by running a sophisticated, high-tech campaign with one primary goal: targeting the burgeoning ranks of the lower-middle class, a long-overlooked group in a nation of extreme wealth and poverty." Moreover, "the outcome of the vote may determine whether Mexico will continue to tie itself tightly to the US and the global economy or follow some other Latin American nations in making a turn leftward."

Oil Concerns May Affect Cuba Trade Policy. The Hill (6/7, Schor) reports, "The imminent release of a new Bush administration status report on US-Cuban relations is re-energizing the anti-embargo lobby, which believes the skyrocketing price of oil could provide a winning angle in its fight to relax trade sanctions on the communist island nation. When the Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba issued its first policy recommendations at the president's behest two years ago, it resulted in stricter curbs on educational travel and Cuban-Americans' ability to send money home. But the National Foreign Trade Council (NFTC), its affiliated business coalition USA Engage and the newly independent Freedom to Travel Campaign are stumping for a milder report this time around." According to the Hill, "The groups have found a new weapon for their campaign to loosen the trade embargo that has stood against Havana since the Kennedy administration. Oil companies from Norway, India, Spain and China (whose government-controlled petroleum group set off protectionist alarms last year with its bid to purchase Unocal) recently have signed drilling deals to explore Cuba's offshore waters." USA Engage director Jake Colvin is quoted as saying, "The embargo has the effect of turning our entire back yard over to other countries — China, India. ... CUPEC [Cuba's state-owned oil company] is certainly looking for partners, and it's better that we are there than that we are not."

DOJ_NMG_0032320

European, African Officials Unveil New Plan To Interdict Illegal Migrants. The Washington Times (6/7, 90K) reports, "Authorities in Europe and Africa yesterday drew up a joint plan to fight illegal migration that will combine tougher prevention measures with more aid to persuade young Africans to stay in their homelands. ... Hundreds are thought to die in the perilous sea voyages of more than 600 miles organized from Mauritania and Senegal by traffickers who run a lucrative business carrying would-be migrants seeking a better life in Europe." Top officials "from more than 50 countries of Europe and Africa" are meeting this week in Dakar, Senegal, to finalize an action plan, which is "expected to be adopted by European and African ministers at a summit on migration July 10 and 11 in the Moroccan capital, Rabat. 'This is a political initiative of the highest importance that aims to combine both managing migrant flows and managing development,' said Alvaro Iranzo, a senior Spanish Foreign Ministry official."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Angelides Claims Primary Victory."
"GOP Candidate Leads In Pivotal House Race."
"Governor Swiftly Turns Campaigner."
"Slain Teen Was Trying To Protect His Brother."
"Bullied By The Eunuchs."
"In Mexico, Candidates Go Toe To Toe Before Futbol."

USA Today:
"Troops Risk Undetected Brain Injury."
"Circus Gets A Makeover."
"Harvard, Boston Hospital To Attempt Embryo Cloning."
"DeLay: GOP's 'Panic, Depression' Risk Losing Elections."

New York Times:
"Iraqi To Release Detainees In Bid To Ease Tensions."
"Senate Emphasis On Ideology Has Some In G.O.P. Anxious."
"Canada Saw Plot To Seize Officials."
"A Shack, Be It Ever So Humble, Gets A Fancy South Africa Price."
"New Campaign Shows Progress For Homeless."
"Senate Contender In Florida Presses On Despite Doubters."

Washington Post:
"Bomb Plot Allegations Detailed In Canada."
"Data Theft Hit 80% Of Active Military."
"'We Have Your Husband.'"
"Proposal Would Let Iran Enrich Uranium."
"Technology Sharpens The Incumbents' Edge."
"D.C. Mayor Fires Director Of Agency For The Disabled."

Washington Times:
"Upbeat Iran Finds 'Positive Steps' In Offer."
"Public, Bush Split On Illegals."
"Plan Targets African Migration."
"U.S. Tries To Keep Seat From Caracas."
"Fans With World Cup Fever Won't Hesitate To Call In Sick."
"Senate To Consider Letting Hawaiians Pursue Sovereignty."
"Hispanics Flock To Gulf Coast For Work Opportunities."

Detroit Free Press:
"Stockholders Rise Up, Push GM Changes."
"Partying Like Hell."
"Doctor Charged In Wife's 1968 Death."
"Hard To Hide."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Germans Gripe: This Bud's Not For Us."
"Details Of Plot Shock Canada."
"Stopping To Help? Be Careful."
"Boy, 9, Hacked To Death; Was Right Man Shot?"
"Fragile Digital Data In Danger Of Fading Past History's Reach."

Houston Chronicle:
"Gang Attack Kills Teen Rival In Park."
"Schools Might Get To Make The Call On Cell Phones."
"First-Class Night Down In Class A."
"Baby's Body At The Center Of Alleged Corpse Scam."
"Report: Storms Left New Human Landscape."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: 9/11 Commission-Homeland Security; Canada Terror Plot; Bush-Immigration; US-Iranian Nuclear Program; Iraq Violence; Iraq-Displaced Civilians; Illegal Immigrant-Princeton; Stock Markets; Weather Satellite Boondoggle; Preston Obit; June 6, 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0032321

CBS: Canada Terror Plot; Terror Suspects-US Contacts; US-Iranian Nuclear Program; VA Data Theft; Harvard-Stem Cell Research; 50th CD Election; Stock Markets; Bush-Immigration; US Teacher Shortage-Immigrants; Preston Obit; Intermittent Explosive Disorder.
NBC: NBC: Canada Terror Plot; Terror Suspects-US Contacts; VA Data Theft; US-Iranian Nuclear Program; Weather Satellite Boondoggle; Iraqi Orphans; D-Day Anniversary; Stock Markets; Preston Obit; Bush-Immigration; NYC-Immigrants; Illegal Immigrant-Princeton.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: SC-Murder Suspect Captured; VA-Data Theft; Bush-Iran; CA50 Election.
CBS: SC-Murder Suspect Captured; Primary Elections; Canada-Terror Suspects In Court; Car Theft List.
NPR: Primary Elections; Bush-Iran; Senate-Gay Marriage; WI-Storms; Canada-Terror Suspects In Court; Bush-Somalia; Preston Obit.; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in swearing in ceremony for Interior Secretary Kempthorne, White House; visits the Juan Diego Center run by Catholic Charities, Omaha; speaks on immigration reform, Omaha.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the economics of oil. Former FRB Chairman Alan Greenspan. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on S.3274 - Fairness in Asbestos Injury Resolution Act. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Hearing on agriculture conservation programs. Bruce Knight, chief, Natural Resources Conservation Service, USDA; John Johnson, deputy administrator for Farm Programs, Farm Service Agency, USDA; James Earl Kennamer, National Wild Turkey Federation, Edgefield, S.C.; Olin Sims, president elect, National Association of Conservation Districts, McFadden, Wyo.; James O. Andrew, Andrew Farms, Jefferson, Iowa; Randall Spronk, Spronk Brothers III, chairman, Environmental Policy Committee, National Pork Producers Council. Location: Room 328A, Russell.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Commerce, Justice, Science and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the 2006 hurricane season. NOAA Administrator Conrad Lautenbacher; National Hurricane Center Director Max Mayfield. Location: Room 192, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Science and Space Subcommittee. Hearing on the NASA budget and programs. Dr. Roy B. Torbet, Director, Space Science Center; Dr. Peter Vorhees, Professor, MCC Materials Science and Engineering, Northwestern University; Dr. Jim Pawelczyk, Associate Professor of Physiology and Kinesiology, Penn State University; Maj. General Charles Bolden USMC (Ret.), Chief Executive Officer, Jack and Panther, LLC. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Meeting on pending business. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets but immediately adjourns for a security sweep. Reconvenes at 10:40 a.m. for the 11 a.m. Joint Meeting with the Senate for the address by Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga. Highlights: Suspensions (5 bills): 1) H.Con.Res. 421 - Expressing the sense of Congress and support for Greater Opportunities for Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics (GO-STEM) programs; 2) H.Res. 699 - Supporting the goals and ideals of National Entrepreneurship Week and encouraging the implementation of entrepreneurship education programs in elementary and secondary schools and institutions of higher education through the United States; 3) H.R. 5117 - To exempt persons with disabilities from the prohibition against providing section 8 rental assistance to college students; 4) H.Res. 828 - Commending the people of Mongolia, on the 800th anniversary of Mongolian statehood, for building strong, democratic institutions, and expressing the support of the House of Representatives for efforts by the United States to continue to strengthen its partnership with that country; 5) H.Con.Res. 409 - Commemorating the 60th anniversary of the ascension to the throne of His Majesty King Bhumibol Adulyadej ofThailand. H.R. 5521 - Legislative Branch Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2007. H.R. 5254 - Refinery Permit Process Schedule Act.

8:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Defense Subcommittee. Markup of the defense appropriations bill. Location: Room H-140, Capitol.

9:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Labor, HHS, Education and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Markup of the Labor, HHS, Education appropriations bill. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on legislation providing for a reduction in the number of boutique fuels. Assistant Energy Secretary Karen Harbert; Robert Meyers, EPA; Edward Murphy, American Petroleum Institute; Bob Dinneen, Renewable Fuels Association; Bob Slaughter, National Petrochemical and Refiners Association;

DOJ_NMG_0032322

S. William Becker, State and Territorial Air Pollution Program Administrators/Association of Local Air Pollution Control Officials; Sonja Hubbard, E-Z Mart Stores, Texarkana, Texas. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

12:30 p.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the VA's medical and prosthetic research programs. VA Undersecretary Jonathan B. Perlin; Joel Kupersmith, chief research and development officer, DVA; Robert L. Ruff, acting director, Rehabilitation Research and Development Service; Matthew J. Friedman, executive director, National Center for Post Traumatic Stress Disorder; Michael S. Watson, American College of Medical Genetics; Carl Blake, Paralyzed Veterans of America; Rick Weidman, Vietnam Veterans of America; Dennis E. Niewoehner, American Thoracic Society. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

1:30 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Middle East and Central Asia Subcommittee. Hearing on the Syria Accountability and Lebanese Sovereignty Restoration Act. Theodore Khattouf, president and CEO, Amideast; Farid Ghadry, president, Reform Party of Syria; Fouad Ajami,SAIS. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on protecting children from violent and explicit video games. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Energy and Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on maintaining the Gulf oil supply and the current hurricane season. National Weather Service Director Davied Johnson; Energy Information Administration Administrator Guy Caruso; Brigham McCown, Acting Administrator, Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration, DOT; Robert Greco, American Petroleum Institute. Location: Room 2203. Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Government Management, finance and Accountability Subcommittee. Hearing on financial management challenges at the GSA. GSA CFO Kathleen Turco; Assistant Inspector General Eugene Waszily, Jr. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Highways, Transit and Pipelines Subcommittee. Oversight hearing on implementation of SAFETEA LU. Richard Capka - administrator, Federal Highway Administration; Sandra Bushue, acting administrator, Federal Transit Administration; Jacqueline Glassman, acting administrator, National Highway Traffic Safety Administration; John H. Hill, acting administrator, Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration; Ashok G. Kaveeshwar, administrator, Research and Innovative Technology Administration. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the ICANN/VeriSign agreement and its impact on small business. John Jeffrey, ICANN; former Rep. Richard White, VeriSign's Internet Advisory Board; W.G. Champion Mitchell, CEO, Network Solutions; Steven DelBianco, NetChoice; attorney J. Bekwith Burr. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

3:30 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting on rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

Other: AFRICA-INVESTMENT _ The inaugural AGOA Investment Summit takes place to discuss investment in Africa. Highlights: 10:30 a.m. World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz discusses opportunities for accelerating private capital flows to Africa. Location: Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Maryland Ave. SW.

IRAQ _ Iraqi Americans hold events to protest the loss of all Assyrian government ministry positions from their elected representatives. Highlights: 10 a.m. Protest in front of the Iraqi Embassy. 12 p.m. Protest on the West Front of the Capitol. 2 p.m. News conference. National Press Club.

HEALTH IT _ 8:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. Health IT industry leaders participate in the inaugural National Health IT Day. Highlights: 8:30 a.m. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. 9:20 a.m. CMMS Administrator Mark McClellan. 10:15 a.m. Keynote address: Carolyn Clancy, Director, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. 12:30 p.m. Myrl Weinberg, President, National Health Council. Location: Washington Renaissance Hotel, 999 9th St. NW.

CHINA-INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY _ 8:30 a.m. - 5 p.m. The US-China Economic and Security Review holds a public hearing on ``China's Enforcemenmt of Intellectual Property Rights; and the Dangers of Movement and Counterfeited and Pirated Goods into the United States." Location: Room 385, Russell Senate Office Building.

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE _ 8:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. Sen. John Conyers, D-Mich., hosts the National Health Insurance Day Breakfast And the Kickoff of the New ``National Health Insurance Caucus." Brief presentations on the importance of national health insurance will be given by physicians, economists and grassroots health care leaders. Speakers include: Dr. Harvey Fernbach: Physicians For A National Health Plan; Dr. Jaime Torres: Latinos For National Health Insurance; and Dr. Rudolph Mueller, Author of ``As Sick As It Gets." Location: Room 2226, Rayburn House Office Building.

BLIX-WMD _ 8:30 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Hans Blix, head of the Swedish government's international, independent WMD Commission, which has spent two years exploring ways to reduce threats posed by biological, chemical, and nuclear weapons, holds a news briefing on the commission's findings and recommendations. Also speaking will be: Robert Einhorn, Senior Advisor, International Security Program at the Center for Strategic & International Studies; Jonathan Tucker, Senior Fellow, Monterey Institutes Center for Nonproliferation Studies; and John Burroughs, Executive Director, Lawyers Committee on Nuclear Policy. Location: Choate Room, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts, Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0032323

BIOFUELS _ 9 a.m. The Worldwatch Institute, the German Development Cooperation, and the Germany government hold an event to discuss the results of the new landmark global study, ``Biofuels for Transportation: Global Potential and Implications for Sustainable Agriculture and Energy in the 21st Century." This report is the first-ever to assess the global potential and implications of the large-scale use of biofuels for transportation. Location: Room 2168, Rayburn. Notes: German Amb. Klaus Scharioth at 9:30 a.m. World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz at 10 a.m.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 9 a.m. Closed meeting of the House GOP Conference. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

SAMPSON-AFRICA _ 9 a.m. Commerce Deputy Secretary David Sampson will address the African Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA) Forum 2006 Opening Plenary Session to discuss how the Department of Commerce has worked to expand commercial ties between the United States and the African nations. Location: State Department, Henderson Auditorium, 500 C St NW. Note: Enter at 23rd Street Entrance.

ECONOMIC OUTLOOK _ 10 a.m. The Business Roundtable holds a telephone briefing to release the results of its latest CEO Economic Outlook Survey, with Hank McKinnell, Chairman of the roundtable and CEO of Pfizer, Inc. Contacts: Jennifer Handt, 202-496-3288.

EMERGECNY PREPARDENESS-DISABLED _ 10 a.m. Department of Homeland Security Officer for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Dan Sutherland will hold an employer roundtable on emergency preparedness and people with disabilities. Location: Commission Meeting Room, 1801 L St. NW.

ENERGY FUTURE _ 10 a.m. A coalition of farm, forestry and enviornmental groups and companies holds a news conference to announce a new effort to secure the nation's energy future, with Bill Richards of 25 x 25, Sens. Chuck Grassley and Ken Salazar, Reps. Bob Goodlatte and Collin Peterson, others. Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

GIAMBASTIANI-WAR COLLEGE _ 10 a.m. Vice Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, Adm. Edmund Giambastiani addresses the National Defense University, Industrial College of the Armed Forces and the National War College graduation. Location: Fort McNair.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS _ 10 a.m. The House Democratic Leadership holds a news conference directly following their caucus meeting to discuss what they belive are American prioritiesproviding affordable health care, bringing down energy costs, strengthening the economy, and addressing rising war costs and deficits. Location: Cannon Rotunda, outside Room 345.

KOREA TRADE _ 10 a.m. Rep. Dennis Kucinich holds a news conference on the Korean trade agreement. Location: Cannon Terrace.

SECURITY _ 10 a.m. House Republican leadership holds a news briefing on ``securing America's future." Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

DEMOCRATS-ESTATE TAX _ 10:15 a.m. Democratic Senators Kent Conrad, Joe Lieberman, and Barack Obama will discuss what they say are the wrong priorities of Bush Republicans in pursuing full repeal of the estate tax. Sponsors say the estate tax repeal will provide a $1 trillion tax break to the wealthiest Americans while ignoring the issues facing most average Americans. Location: Senate Radio/TV Gallery.

CHINA TRADE _ 10:30 a.m. Sens. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., meet with U.S. Trade Representative Nominee Susan Schwab to discuss the Administrations willingness to press for reciprocity for financial firms that want to invest in China. Last, week, Schumer objected to the unanimous consent request to approve her nomination without a vote or debate. However, Graham strongly supports the Schwab nomination and has encouraged the Senate to allow a quick vote. Location: Room 313, Hart Senate Office Building.

CENSORSHIP _ 11 a.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion on policies and technologies to give parents control over children's media consumption, with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Mary Landrieu and Rick Santorum, and FCC Commissioners Michael Cops and Deborah Taylor Tate. Location: Jordan Conference Center, 1330 G St. NW.

MARKEY-BLIX _ 11 a.m. US Representative Edward J. Markey will be meeting at 11:00am with former UN chief weapons inspector Hans Blix. Location: Markey's office, Room 2108, Rayburn House Office Building.

CITIZENSHIP _ 12 p.m. Reps. Luis Gutierrez, Grace Napolitano, others, hold a news conference to announce National Citizenship Day, a national network of citizenship workshops on July 1. Location: Cannon Terrace.

SERBIA _ 12 p.m. The Center for International Private Enterprise and the International Forum for Democratic Studies holds a discussion, ``Democratic and Economic Transition in Serbia: Capturing Lessons Learned," with Boris Begovic, Vice President, Center for Liberal-Democratic Studies, Belgrade, Serbia. Location: Federal City Council, Suite 600, 1156 15th St. NW.

DEMOCRATS-CONSERVATISM _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) will host Ted Nordhaus and Michael Shellenberger, partners at American Environics, and co-directors of the Breakthrough Institute, to discuss their cutting-edge research into social values trends that underlie today's conservative majority. Location: Phoenix Park Hotel, 520 North Capitol St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0032324

LATINO PARTICIPATION _ 12:30 p.m. The Tomas Rivera Policy Institute (TRPI) in conjunction with the Metropolitan Center, Florida International University, will hold a symposium titled ``New Dimensions of Latino Participation.'' The forum will explore the dynamics of Latino political engagement, such as the recent immigrant protests, and the impact on immigration policy and the 2006 and 2008 Latino vote. Sponsorship for this event is provided by the Carnegie Corporation of New York with additional funding provided by Comcast and the Latino Policy Coalition. Attendees include: Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo.; Harry Pachon, president, Tomas Rivera Policy Institute at USC; Roberto Suro, director, Pew Hispanic Center; Mark Krikorian, executive director, Center for Immigration Studies; Maria Echaveste, principal, Nueva Vista Group; Robert DePosada, president, The Latino Coalition; Clarissa Martinez de Castro, director of state/local public policy, NCLR; and Joe Garcia, vice president, Hispanic Project, NDN. Location: Hyatt Regency-Washington on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

ASBESTOS BILL _ 1 p.m. Public Citizen holds a briefing on the amended Specter-Leahy asbestos trust fund bill. Location: Room 512, Hart.

ECONOMIC SECURITY _ 1 p.m. The Center for American Progress holds a presentation, ``Pulling Together: Re-Building Economic Security in the 21st Century,'' with Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, Gene Sperling of the center, others. Location: 10th floor, 1333 H St. NW.

HURRICANES-ELECTORATE _ 1 p.m. The National Coalition on Black Civic Participation holds a symposium on questions about the current hurricane season and lessons learned from last year's season, with Rick Pogue of the Red Cross, Steven Jones of the First Response Coalition, Maj. George Hood of the Salvation Army, Janet Johnson of the Weather Channel, others. Location: National Press Club.

FEDERAL SPENDING _ 2 p.m. Rep. Frank Wolf holds a news conference to announce a bill creating a national commission aimed at dealing with federal spending and entitlements. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

NATIVE HAWAIIANS _ 2 p.m. Sens. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., hold a press conference to discuss their opposition to legislation that would create a racially-separate government for native Hawaiians living across the United States, the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act of 2005, S.147. Cornyn and Alexander will be joined by native Hawaiians who are in Washington to express their opposition to the legislation, and the Chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Gerald A. Reynolds. Location: Room S-219, Capitol.

ESTATE TAX _ 2 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. The 60 Plus Assocation delivers ``Kill The Death Tax, Don't Wound It,'' to members of Congress to call for repeal of the Estate Tax. Location: Room SC-4, Capitol.

LIBERALS-TERRORISM _ 2 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a forum, ``The Good Fight: Liberals, Conservatives and the War on Terror.'' Peter Beinart, Brookings nonresident senior fellow and editor-at-large of The New Republic, will present a historical perspective on liberalism and fighting totalitarianism, as well as his views on how today's liberals ought to approach today's fight against terror. Focus is on Beinart's book, ``The Good Fight: Why Liberals -- and Only Liberals -- Can Win the War on Terror and Make America Great Again.'' Tod Lindberg of the Hoover Institution also will participate. Location: The Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

FOREIGN POLICY _ 6 p.m. Reps. Mark Kirk and Rick Larsen give the keynote address at the 4th annual U.S. Foreign Policy Colloquium, cosponsored by George Washington University and the National Committee on U.S.-China Relations. Location: Room 213, Harding Auditorium, 1957 E St. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, June 07, 2006 8:07 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, June 07, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060607.pdf; dojclips060607.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Senators Won't Grill Phone Companies (USAT) 5
Specter Won't Ask Telcos To Testify On Taps (CNN) 5
Specter Won't Subpoena Telecom Executives (AP)....6
Bomb Plot Allegations Detailed In Canada (WP)....7
Prosecutors: Terror Plot Included Bombs, Beheadings (LAT) .8
Canada Saw Plot To Seize Officials (NYT) 9
Defense Lawyers In Canada Fault Terror Case Data (WSJ).. 11
Prime Minister Said To Be Target (WT/AP) 12
New Details Of Canadian Terror Charges Come To Light (USAT/AP).... 13
Praise Canada (WSJ).... 13
Military Alters The Makeup Of Interrogation Advisers (NYT) .. 14
Pentagon Limits Medical Role In Questioning (LAT) 14
Md. Teacher Accused Of Aiding Terror Group (WP) 16
Why More Must Be Done To Protect London (FT) 17

Homeland Response:

New York, You're Still No. 1 (NYT) 18
House Blocks More Funding For New York, Other High-risk Cities (AP) 19
City Will Not Change Its Strategy For Dealing With Terror (NYT) 20
Katrina Displaced 400,000, Study Says (WP) 21
Storms Also Shifted Demographics, Census Finds (LAT) 21
Katrina's Unlearned Lessons (WP) 22
Hurricane Forecasts: Good Headlines, Bad Science (USAT)23
Are Hurricanes Uninsurable? (WSJ) 24

War News:

Senate To Hold Hearings On Iraq Massacre (AP) 25
Rumsfeld Pressed To Disclose Findings Of Haditha Probe (AFP).... 26
Senators Press Pentagon On Haditha Hearings (NYT) 27
Quantico Islamic Center Dedicated (WP).... 27
Rumsfeld Is Correct - The Truth Will Get Out (NYT/IHT) 28
"Lawfare" Over Haditha (WSJ) 30
Torture As Defined By The Media (WT) 31
Iraqi To Release Detainees In Bid To Ease Tensions (NYT) 32
Iraq's Premier Planning To Free 2,500 Detainees (WP) 34
Iraq's Tougher Stance Toward US (CSM) 35
Another Grisly Discovery In Iraq (LAT) 36
Basra's Descent Bodes Poorly For Allied Mission In Iraq (USAT) 37
Salvaging Iraq (WP)....37
Donors Accused Of Spending Aid Outside Iraq (FT) 38
'We Have Your Husband' (WP) 39
Baghdad's Wealthy Are Careful To Hide Their Riches (PHI) .42
Afghanistan: Roadside Blast Kills 2 G.I.'s (NYT/BLOOM) 43
Troops Risk Undetected Brain Injury (USAT) 43
Even Mild Injuries To Brain Add Up (USAT) 44

Corporate Scandals:

SEC: Investigations Into Options A Concern (AP)....45
Lawmakers Criticize Former Fannie Mae CEO (AP) 46

Criminal Law:

Silence Angers Judiciary Panel (WP) 47
Senators Question Bush Administration's Openness (KRT) ..48
US Lawmakers Concerned About FBI Probes Of Journalists (VOA)....49
Senators Seek Answers In Probe Of Reporter (AP) 50
U. Political Scientist Calls Probe 'fishing Expedition' (SLT)....51
Getting Stonewalled: Administration Out To Keep Us In The Dark (SLT) 52
Documents Point To Bribes Of Nigerian By Congressman (NYT)....52
Affidavit Outlines Alleged Scheme In Jefferson Case (LAT) ...53
Rep. Accused Of Trying To Bribe Nigerian (AP)....54
Gonzales Defends Jefferson Office Search (AP-Y2) 55

Hoyer Backs Pelosi, Smacks Rep. Jefferson (HILL) 56
Separation Hypocrisy (LAT) 57
Lobbyist Says Client Paid Half The Cost Of Town House (NYT) 58
Retirement Account Of DeLay's Wife Traced (WP) 59
DeLay: GOP's 'panic, Depression' Risk Losing Elections (USAT) 61
McKinney Deal May Be In Works Lawyer Rejects Talk Of Any Negotiations (AJC) 61
Gambino Captain Convicted Of Racketeering (AP) 62
Fat Lip Gets Mobster Life (NYDN) 63
GABBY CAPO IS KAPUT (NYPOST) 63
Ex-Tenn. Lawmaker Denies Taking Payoffs (AP) 64
Dixon Tells Of 'network' (MCA) 65
Corruption Trial Witness: I Had To Hire A Drunk (CHIT) 66
Sorich's Lawyer: 'Not One Red Cent Changed Hands' (CHIST) 67
FBI Probing Fumo In Warehouse Sale (PHI) 68
Feds Say Bureaucrat Fixed Tickets For Tickets (PHI) 70
Bolivar Co. Administrator Faces Federal Charges (BSH) 71
Bolivar County Administrator Indicted On Federal Charges (JCL) 71
Witness Recovers From Overdose To Describe New Jersey Graft (NYT) 72
Flemmi Describes Gang's Relationship With The FBI (BOS/AP) 73
FBI Handler Treated `me Like An Equal,' Flemmi Testifies (BOS) 74
Most Popular Flemmi Details Why Victims Had To Go (BOSH) 75
In Galante Garbage Investigation, Surrender Is Not An Option (AP) 76
NYU Whiz Kid Pleads Guilty In $7 Million Hedge Fund Scam (STAMADV/AP) 77
More Sex Offenders Tracked By Satellite (USAT) 77
Inmate Freed After 18 Years On Basis Of DNA Evidence (NYT) 79

Civil Law:

Gabelli, Justice Department Settle Suit Over Cellphone Licenses (WSJ) 80
Gabelli Reaches Tentative Deal On Cellphone Licenses (USAT) 81
Gabelli Reaches Pact With Justice Department Over Cell Licenses (BLOOM) 81
DOJ Announces Settlement In Gabelli Case (AP) 82

Civil Rights:

Use-Of-Deadly-Force Police Shootings Ruled Justifiable (NEWSNET5) 82
Gay Marriage Amendment Faces Senate Defeat (AP-Y2) 83
Marriage Measure Doomed In Senate (WT) 84
For Foes Of Same-Sex Marriage, It's The Thought That Counts (WP) 84
Same-sex 'Marriage' Splits Black Leaders (WT) 86
Damien, Demons And Dubya (NYT) 86
Justice Kennedy's Culture War (WSJ) 88
Verizon Bias Suit Deal Sets Record (WP) 88
Louisiana Governor Plans To Sign Anti-Abortion Law (NYT) . 89
Transsexual Discrimination Suit Enters Discovery Phase (RC) 90
Senate To Consider Letting Hawaiians Pursue Sovereignty (WT) 91
A Chance For Justice In Hawaii (NYT) 92
D.C. Mayor Fires Director Of Agency For The Disabled (WP) 93
Comes Now No. 19 (WP) 94
A Well Of Smiths And Xias (NYT) 95
Georgia Has Changed For The Better, And The Voting Rights Act Should Too (HILL) 96
Block The Vote, Ohio Remix (NYT) 96

Antitrust:

A.C.L.U. Raises Surveillance As Issue In Big Phone Merger (NYT) 97
Telecom Firms Ask FCC To Stop AT&T-BellSouth Merger (SANANTBIZ) 98
AT&T/BellSouth Opponents Talk Litigation (B&C) 98
Microsoft's Reputation At Stake, EU Says (BLOOM) 99
BAA Backs Ferrovial's Latest Offer (WSJ) 99
Airport Operator Accepts $19 Billion Spanish Bid (NYT) 100
Street Sleuth Chirac Frowns On NYSE-Euronext (WSJ) 101
Struggle Over Continental Stock Exchanges Takes Political Turn (NYT) 102
Who Does Arcelor Belong To? (WSJ) 103
US Air, After Merger, Wrestles With Frequent Ire (WSJ) 104

Environment/Indian Affairs:

How To Say Yes To Energy (WT) 105
Ag Secretary Says Bird Flu Easily Found (AP) 106
Seneca Claim To Island Rebuffed (BUFFNEWS) 107

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

$2.75 Million Is Poured Into War On Gangs (CLPD) 108
Santa Rosa Hells Angels Leader Surrenders To FBI (KPIX-TV) 108

DOJ_NMG_0032328

News In Brief From California's North Coast (MERCN) 109
Camden Man Sentenced In Drug/murder Operation Case (CAMCP) 109
2 Drug Ring Leaders Sentenced (WPVI-TV) 109
Feds Hope To 'weed Out' Local Crime (NEWS14) 109
Guns, Drugs Are Seized In Reaids (TTNJ) 110
1,000-plus Doses Netted In City Sweep (PPG) 110
Killer Heroin Coursed Through Philadelphia, Too (PPG) 112
Police Claim Bust Slows Heroin Flow (PTR) 114
Heroin Overdoses Decline, New Problem Arises (KDKA).....115
More Victims Added To Heroin OD Tally (KDKA) 116
Names Can Help End Drug Plague (FREEP) 116
Office Denies Approving Documents' Release (BSUN) 117
Stidham Deposition May Help Schwartz (TC).....118
Feds Search House Of Arizona Reliever (AP) 118
Diamondbacks' Grimsley Implicated In Steroids Probe (AR)119
Montel To Urge N.J. On Medical Marijuana (AP) 120

Immigration:

Bush Confident Immigration Deal Possible (AP) 121
Nation Ahead Of Congress On Immigration, Bush Says (LAT) 122
Bush Turns To House In Immigration Debate (NYT) 123
Bush Defends Planned Path To Citizenship (HC) 124
Bush Visits Laredo To Plug Reform Plan (SAEN).....126
Bush Sees Support For Immigration Plan (WT) 126
Bush Pushes Immigration Plan In New Mexico (WP).....127
Senate Candidates Choose Their Battles On Immigration Debate (HILL).....128
Public, Bush Split On Illegals (WT) 130
House GOP Threatens To 'blue-slip' Bill (HILL).....131
Reid Proposes Deal On Reform Bill (WT) 132
Arizona Governor Vetoes Illegal Immigration Bill (NYT) 133
Poll: U.S. Public Warmer Toward Immigrants (AP-Y2).....133
Our Language Unites Us (USAT) 134
Press 2 For Pointless (USAT).....135
Carter-Finley Workers Plead, Will Be Deported (RN&O).....135

Tax:

Estate Tax Showdown Is Splitting The G.O.P. (NYT).....136
Frist Wants Estate Tax Repeal On Agenda (AP).....138
How Tax Code Change Affects Overseas Workers (WSJ)....139

Congress-Administration:

White House Renews Push For Nominees (HILL) 139
A Different Judicial Battle (WSJ).....140
Boom Of The Judicial Canon (WP).....141
Battle Over Foreign-Aid Spending Heats Up (WSJ) 142
Advice Is Not Well Taken (HILL).....143
Democrats Guard Legislative Power (RC).....145
Data Theft Affected Most In Military (WP) 146
Stolen Computer Had Data On More Troops (USAT).....147
House GOP Seeks To Keep Promise On Earmarks (RC)....148
Senate Emphasis On Ideology Has Some In G.O.P. Anxious (NYT).....149
Bush Chats With Children In Twin Cities Suburb (AP).....150
Government Opens Drive To Offer New Hires Flexibility In Work Locations And Schedules (WP).....151
Hank's Likely Headaches (WP).....152
Rope-a-Senator (WP) 153

Other News:

Stocks Slide Further After Monday's Sell-Off (NYT).....153
Stocks Take Hit As Dow Finishes At 3-Month Low (WSJ).....154
Inflation Fears Mount At Fed As Poole Toughens Rate Posture (WSJ).....155
Pondering The Bear Necessities (WP).....156
Ben Bernanke: Tough Guy (WP).....158
Fed, Bernanke Take Blistering Flak (USAT) 159
Unease Over Fed Policy Has Markets In A Tizzy (USAT).....160
Economic Rehab (WSJ) 161
Realtors Lower Sales Forecast, Seek Pause In Fed Rate Increases (WSJ).....162
Gas Prices May Fall A Bit, But Summer Costs Still High (USAT).....163
Bilbray Close To Victory (AP).....163
Angelides To Face Schwarzenegger In November (LAT) 165
On To November (LAT) 168
State Elections Are A Midterm Bellwether (WP) 169
Senate Race '06-Tester Vs. Burns (AP) 170
Menendez, Kean Win Primary Elections (AP).....170
Menendez And Kean Sail Past Primary (NSL).....171
Menendez, Kean Clear Party Rivals To Face Off (PHI).....173
They've Been Nicked By Scandal, But No Signs Of Bleeding Yet (RC) 174
Technology Sharpens The Incumbents' Edge (WP) 176
Senate Contender In Florida Presses On (NYT).....178
His Support Waning, Weld Quits New York Governor's Race (NYT).....180
Frist Cementing Bush Alliance (RC).....182
Faith-Based Initiative (WP).....184
Harvard, Boston Hospital To Attempt Embryo Cloning (USAT) 187
Harvard Joins New U.S. Push In Stem Cells (WSJ).....187
2 New Efforts To Develop Stem Cell Line For Study (NYT)..189

DOJ_NMG_0032329

Many Americans Headed For Money Struggles In Retirement (LAT) 190
Study: 43% Not Saving Enough To Retire Well (USAT) 191
New Campaign Shows Progress For Homeless (NYT) 192
C.I.A. Knew Where Eichmann Was Hiding, Documents Show (NYT) 194
CIA Ties With Ex-Nazis Shown (WP) 196
Health Insurance Doesn't Have To Hurt (USAT) 197
A Positive In Going Negative? (WP) 198
Bush Optimistic About Iran's Reaction To Nuke Plan (USAT) 199
Bush: Iran's Initial Response Positive (AP) 200
Proposal Would Let Iran Enrich Uranium (WP) 201
Diplomacy Moves To The Fore Over Iranian Nuclear Issue (LAT) 202
Upbeat Iran Finds "Positive Steps" In Offer (WT) 204
Iran To Study EU Incentive Plan On Nuclear Issue (FT) 204
Iran Open To Incentives On Nuclear Talks, With A Hedge (NYT) 205
U.S. Risks Political Backlash In Iran Nuclear Offer (WSJ) 207
Those Were The Days, When Reform Was In Flower (NYT) 208
Bush Worried About Instability In Somalia (AP) 209
Somalia's Islamic Extremists Set U.S. Back (AP) 210
Protesters Rally To Challenge Islamists In Somalia (NYT) 211
Our Failure In Somalia (WP) 212
Somalia, Revisited (NYT) 213
Abbas Extends Hamas Deadline On Israel (AP) 213
US Welcomes Abbas Referendum Proposal (AFP-Y2) 215
Abbas Delays Setting Date For Referendum (WP) 215
Indonesian Scolds U.S. On Terrorism Fight (NYT) 217
War Game Finds Two-week Capability (WT) 218
US Values Push Alienates Muslim Women (WT) 219
Peru's New President Looks To Renegotiate Trade Pact With U.S. (WSJ) 220
US Tries To Keep Seat From Caracas (WT) 220
Retail Politics In Mexican Race, 'Wal-Mart' Voters May Hold The Key (WSJ) 221
Oil May Grease Attitudes Toward Cuba Trade Policy (HILL) 224
Plan Targets African Migration (WT) 225

DOJ_NMG_0032330

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senators Won't Grill Phone Companies (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — A last-minute deal Tuesday with Vice President Cheney averted a possible confrontation between the Senate Judiciary Committee and U.S. telephone companies about the National Security Agency's database of customer calling records.

The deal was announced by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman, and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. They said Cheney, who plays a key role supervising NSA counterterrorism efforts, promised that the Bush administration would consider legislation proposed by Specter that would place a domestic surveillance program under scrutiny of a special federal court.

In return, Specter agreed to postpone indefinitely asking executives from the nation's telecommunication companies to testify about another program in which the NSA collects records of domestic calls.

If passed, Specter's legislation would give the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court power to oversee the NSA program and render an opinion on the constitutionality of conducting domestic surveillance without a warrant. The court, established by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), normally considers case-by-case requests by intelligence agencies to conduct surveillance inside the USA.

The deal prompted protests from Democratic lawmakers, who said the Republican-controlled Congress had refused to challenge the administration's expansion of presidential authority. "Why don't we just recess for the rest of the year, and the vice president will just tell the nation what laws we'll have?" said Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, ranking Democrat on the committee.

Specter has challenged the administration to justify the legality of intelligence programs inside the country.

After the hearing, Specter said his hand had been forced by the telephone companies' refusal to discuss classified programs. Representatives of more than one company — which ones were not specified in the meeting — agreed to appear, Specter said, but told the panel they would not talk about classified information. Hatch said President Bush "is willing to work with us as long as it doesn't detract from the president's constitutional powers."

At least one Democrat shared Republican concerns about forcing telephone officials to discuss classified programs. "Companies that are trying to be good citizens shouldn't be held out to dry," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.

Feinstein said there were two programs at issue: the NSA surveillance of international calls with one end in the USA and in which one participant is suspected of terrorist activity; and a program that "does not involve content" of conversations.

The surveillance program was disclosed in December by The New York Times and then acknowledged by the administration. The other program, which has not been formally acknowledged by the White House, was disclosed last month by USA TODAY. The program involves the collection of domestic calling data — the numbers and times of calls — by the NSA for use in tracking calling patterns by people suspected of terrorist activities.

In the wake of the USA TODAY story, Specter, who had proposed legislation to give the FISA court power over NSA's warrantless surveillance program, said he wanted phone company executives to testify about any involvement they had with the NSA.

Specter Won't Ask Telcos To Testify On Taps (CNN)

CNN, June 7, 2006

Senate Judiciary panel chairman backs off from questioning executives on cooperation with secret program, angering Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0032331

WASHINGTON (CNN) - Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter reversed course Tuesday, announcing he will not call on phone company executives to testify on their cooperation with the government in a secret eavesdropping program run by the National Security Agency.

The senator from Pennsylvania acknowledged his reversal was forced upon him by his Republican colleagues in a private session prior to the afternoon hearing. The announcement was promptly decried by several Democrats, who accused Specter of caving in to the Bush administration.

"We have abdicated our responsibility," shouted Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts.

"You have given up the store," complained Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., in denouncing the move. "You're just walking away."

Democrats were unable to muster enough members to force a vote on issuing subpoenas to the telecommunications giants AT&T (Research), Verizon Communications (Research) and Bell South (Research).

The potential for a showdown over subpoenas was averted when Republicans, led by former committee chairman Orrin Hatch of Utah, outmaneuvered Specter in advance of the hearing.

Hatch disclosed he had won assurances from Vice President Cheney that the White House would at least review proposed legislation to restrict aspects of NSA surveillance programs. In exchange, the committee would not press the phone companies to divulge their cooperation with the government.

"We have a good-faith effort they'll work with us on this," Hatch said. "The offer is a good one."

"Why don't we just recess for the rest of the year and Cheney will just tell us what laws this nation will have?" fumed ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont.

"I categorically reject the idea I'm backing off," Specter replied.

In a dissent, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., announced she would oppose subpoenas for the phone companies. Feinstein, who is on the Intelligence Committee, said she had been fully briefed on the secret NSA programs and believes if the phone companies should be summoned at all, it should be from the intelligence panel, which conducts its business behind closed doors.

"The phone companies, they're just trying to be good citizens and shouldn't be held out to dry," Feinstein said.

Specter said he would continue to vigorously challenge the White House claims of executive power on several fronts.

Specter announced he had won a promise from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to testify "within the next two weeks" on a range of hotly debated issues on executive branch powers over which some Republicans and nearly all Democrats on the panel are bitterly at odds with the White House.

Justice Department officials acknowledge they are bracing for a potentially stormy hearing, but probably not as soon as Specter would like.

A senior Justice official who asked not to be identified said it was likely they would be able to arrange for Gonzales to testify before the committee "in the next two months."

Specter Won't Subpoena Telecom Executives (AP)

By Katherine Shrader, The Associated Press

AP, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Phone company executives won't be grilled by a Senate panel anytime soon about their roles in the Bush administration's eavesdropping program.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Tuesday he will hold off subpoenaing the telecommunications chiefs while he works with the White House on his legislation that would ask a secretive federal court to review the constitutionality of Bush's surveillance operations.

Democrats accused Specter of abdicating Congress' oversight responsibilities.

"Why don't we just recess for the rest of the year?" the committee's top Democrat, Sen. Pat Leahy of Vermont, asked sarcastically. "Vice President Cheney will just tell the nation what laws we'll have."

DOJ_NMG_0032332

Bush has acknowledged that the National Security Agency monitored — without court approval — the communications of terror suspects when one person was in the United States and another was overseas. Until Bush ordered the operations shortly after 9/11, a judge had to sign off on such monitoring.

Following a report last month in USA Today, lawmakers have said the government is also using general information on Americans' telephone calls — such as the number called, and the number dialed from — to analyze calling patterns to detect and track suspected terrorist activity.

Specter had threatened to subpoena executives of the major phone companies to get them to testify about their cooperation with the NSA. But in an informal conversation, one company lawyer told Specter the executives wouldn't be able to testify about any classified information. Specter said Cheney told the committee the restriction would apply to everyone the senators want to question.

"I cannot make them talk," said Specter, who later acknowledged that the executives have access to more information than senators.

In exchange for deferring action on the phone companies, Specter said Cheney has specifically agreed to work with him on his legislation.

Specter rejected suggestions that he was letting the White House dictate the committee's agenda, and he said he plans to have Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before the committee later this month.

"I yield to no man or woman on pressing this administration on these issues," he said.

Bomb Plot Allegations Detailed In Canada (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

TORONTO, June 6 -- Suspects arrested last weekend in an alleged terrorism plot planned to storm the Canadian Parliament and hold politicians hostage, and at least one wanted to behead the prime minister if demands to withdraw Canada's troops from Afghanistan were not met, according to a summary of prosecutors' allegations read in court Tuesday.

According to authorities, the group also planned to bomb power plants in Ontario and invade the downtown Toronto studios of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp., according to the written statement submitted to the court by defense attorney Gary Batasar and read into the record at his request.

The statement, which the lawyer said was a summary of the government's planned charges, indicated that the men had planned to demand the removal of Canada's 2,300 troops from Afghanistan and the release of all Muslim prisoners held in Afghanistan and Iraq. Politicians including Prime Minister Stephen Harper were to be killed if the demands were refused, according to the government allegations, Batasar told reporters outside the courthouse. Prosecutors did not comment on the statements.

The statements offered the first details of the plot that police and intelligence agencies said they disrupted in a series of raids overnight Friday. Twelve men and five youths were arrested.

Fifteen of the suspects appeared in a courthouse in suburban Brampton on Tuesday morning, shackled together and wearing prison T-shirts. Most were remanded for a bail hearing on Monday.

"The allegations are very serious, including storming and bombing of various buildings," Batasar, who represents Steven Vikash Chand, 25, told reporters outside the courthouse. "There is an allegation apparently that my client personally indicated that he wanted to behead the prime minister of Canada."

In the capital, Ottawa, Harper brushed aside the news with a joke. "I can live with all these threats as long as they are not from my caucus," he quipped as he walked into his office.

The reaction of other lawmakers ranged from disbelief to worry.

"There were certainly some grandiose plans being made," Joseph Cordiano, a Liberal in Ontario's provincial Parliament, told reporters. "I have serious, serious doubts about their capacity to carry it out."

"The plot was a very serious one," said Peter Van Loan, a Conservative in Parliament representing Ontario. "I don't expect this is the only threat out there. The thing we can take comfort in is that Canada's security measures worked."

DOJ_NMG_0032333

The arrests, carried out by hundreds of police officers, have added tension to the issue of U.S.-Canada border security. Canadian politicians have become rankled over comments by some U.S. legislators that the charges are evidence of the danger of terrorism coming south across the long, lightly guarded border.

"I'm very concerned about the amount of play in the U.S. that the threat Canada poses as a 'gateway to terrorism,' " Parliament member Mark Holland, a Liberal representing a Toronto suburb, told CBC television. "It's certainly not true."

Batasar portrayed the sensational allegations as an attempt by the government to frighten the public.

"It appears to me that whether you are in Toronto or Ottawa or Crawford, Texas, or Washington, D.C., what is wanting to be instilled in the public is fear," he said.

Batasar said his client had not spoken to him about the charges. "He said nothing about that. My client retains the right to silence." In the packed courtroom, the accused nodded or waved to relatives, but said little on their own. Several defense attorneys protested that they had been unable to meet their clients individually and that the suspects had not been permitted to see their families.

"Counsel would like to have that right" to talk to their clients personally, not through a plexiglass shield, said defense attorney Donald McLeod.

Several women in black Islamic dress came to watch the proceedings, but would not talk to reporters outside the courthouse. Missing from the hearing was the huge presence of heavily armed police that had guarded the courthouse Saturday when the suspects made an initial appearance.

In announcing the raids, police said the arrests were the result of the largest anti-terrorism investigation in Canada since Sept. 11, 2001. They said the suspects had procured three tons of an explosive fertilizer, intending to set it off at a public target.

Prosecutors: Terror Plot Included Bombs, Beheadings (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

BRAMPTON, Canada — Some of the 17 men and youths arrested in a suspected terrorism plot had planned to storm the nation's Parliament, take politicians hostage and behead Prime Minister Stephen Harper unless their demands for a withdrawal of Canadian troops from Afghanistan and the release of Muslim prisoners were met, prosecutors said Tuesday.

The accusations delivered to several of the defendants' attorneys in a one-page investigation summary included no evidence to substantiate the charges, said the attorney for 25-year-old Steven Vikash Chand.

"There's an allegation, apparently, that my client personally indicated that he wanted to behead the prime minister of Canada," attorney Gary Batasar said of the synopsis of the crown's case against his client, which he had received just minutes before the proceedings.

Batasar complained that he had not been allowed to meet privately with Chand and later said to reporters outside the courthouse: "This is not Guantanamo, this is Toronto, Canada."

In his comments before the judge, Batasar said the prosecution was contending the defendants planned to invade the Parliament building in Ottawa and take hostages to demand that Canadian forces leave Afghanistan; about 2,300 serve under international mandate with the Kabul government's consent. The defendants, according to prosecutors, planned to demand the release of unspecified Muslim prisoners and to bomb the Parliament building and decapitate Harper and other political leaders if their demands were rejected.

The prosecution synopsis mentioned plans to seize or blow up the CBC broadcasting headquarters in Toronto, the attorney said.

Harper brushed off the purported plot against him, joking to reporters, "I can live with these threats as long as they're not from my caucus."

Batasar and two other defense lawyers protested the conditions of their clients' detention. Chand and 21-year-old Ahmad Mustafa Ghany surveyed the courtroom and smirked as the charges were read against them. Their hands were cuffed, and they were each shackled to a third defendant, an 18-year-old who was a juvenile at the time of the alleged crimes and appeared confused about the proceedings.

DOJ_NMG_0032334

A chaotic parade of handcuffed and manacled defendants in white T-shirts and gray trousers was escorted into the small, packed courtroom of Judge Maurice Hudson at the Ontario Court of Justice in this Toronto suburb. Outside, hundreds of reporters swarmed lawyers and defendants' relatives, eager for details of a case that has jolted Canadians and led to criticism of the nation's liberal immigration policies.

Heeding federal prosecutor Jim Leising's appeal for maximum-security confinement, Hudson ordered the 12 adult and five juvenile defendants held in isolation.

Ghany's attorney, Rocco Galati, protested the harsh conditions, saying he had been unable to meet with his client without security guards listening in.

Bail hearings were postponed until later in the month for all 15 defendants who appeared in court. Two of the 17 charged after provincewide raids Friday and Saturday did not appear Tuesday, because they are serving sentences at an Ontario prison for trying in August to smuggle weapons into Canada across the Peace Bridge between Buffalo, N.Y., and Fort Erie.

Few details of the crown's case against the purported terrorist cell have come to light, but the specific plot to attack those in power mentioned by Batasar suggested prosecutors had either clandestinely acquired communications or had an inside source providing information, veteran national-security analyst David Harris said.

"One possibility is that they used bugs or wiretaps," said Harris, former chief of strategic planning for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and now head of a security think tank. The summary of the prosecution's case might have been deliberately vague to "leave the defense side with questions of what else the prosecutors might know," Harris said.

Hudson ordered the juveniles -- at least one as young as 16 -- held in a facility for youth offenders instead of the Maplehurst prison, where the defendants were taken after their arrests. During the raids, 400 officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and CSIS stormed homes and gathering places frequented by the suspects.

"My client is a very frightened young man," attorney Michael Block said of a 16-year-old defendant, who was not identified because of Canadian law protecting the names of those younger than 18 accused of committing crimes.

Seven of the 17 defendants are teenagers and all but two -- 43-year-old Qayyam Abdul Jamal and 30-year-old Shareef Abdelhaleen -- are 25 or younger.

All 12 adult suspects have been charged with terrorism under a December 2001 amendment to the nation's Criminal Code in reaction to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States. That charge carries a maximum sentence of 10 years.

Nine of the men are charged with training for the purpose of terrorist activity, which can bring another 10-year sentence, and six face accusations that they sought to bomb public targets, which can result in life sentences. Four, including Chand, stand accused of recruiting or training others for terrorism, an offense that also can draw a 10-year term.

Canada Saw Plot To Seize Officials (NYT)

By Anthony DePalma

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

BRAMPTON, Ontario, June 6 — Prosecutors here assert that some of the men charged in a terror plot last week planned a series of violent attacks that included seizing Parliament and beheading Prime Minister Stephen Harper and other lawmakers if Canadian troops were not withdrawn from Afghanistan, a defense lawyer said in court Tuesday.

The accusations were part of a government summary that was given to a lawyer for one of the suspects and other defense lawyers just before preliminary hearings began. The document was not made public, but the lawyer disclosed part of its content because he said he wanted to force the government to disclose its evidence.

Jim Leising, the government prosecutor in the terror case, did not comment on the accusations in the summary.

The new accusations, if true, would disclose a startling new aspect of the case against 12 Muslim men and 5 youths. Previously, investigators have said only that the men intended to use homemade explosives to bomb unidentified targets in southern Ontario.

Although they expressed doubts about the capacity of the suspects to pull off such bold attacks, Canadians, in interviews with various news outlets, said the latest disclosures only heightened their current alarm about the possibility of violence by homegrown terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0032335

"Canadians have to understand and appreciate that we are citizens of a world where danger is everywhere," Peter Van Loan, a member of Parliament from Ontario, told the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. "We're not exempt from that, much as we might wish we were."

More than 100 journalists gathered outside the A. Grenville and William Davis Courthouse on Tuesday morning as 10 of the 12 men accused in the terrorist plot appeared in court for preliminary hearings. They were handcuffed and wore white T-shirts and gray prison pants. The five who have been charged as minors also appeared.

All the suspects asked for bail proceedings to be postponed while their lawyers prepared their defense. The bail hearings are not expected to be held for several weeks.

In the Canadian court system, prosecutors in major cases present evidence at the bail hearing as they argue against suspects being released on bail.

Two suspects did not appear in court because they are already serving prison sentences for trying to bring guns into Canada illegally.

Several lawyers complained that extraordinary security had prevented them from speaking to their clients in private. The men, all residents of Canada, have been held in isolation at a maximum-security prison since shortly after they were arrested over the weekend. They have been prohibited from talking to their families or one another.

According to court documents, all have been charged with belonging to a terrorist group. Six are accused of plotting to bomb several unidentified buildings in Canada. Others are charged with running training camps, receiving terrorist training and trying to smuggle weapons across the border from the United States.

On Tuesday, there were details for the first time about another reported plan for an attack, this one intended to cripple Canada's government and disrupt its economy. Gary Batasar, the lawyer for one of the suspects who read the accusations in court, said that if prosecutors were going to make such claims they should disclose their evidence so defense lawyers can respond adequately.

Mr. Batasar said he read the accusations for the first time when he received the government summary on Tuesday morning. He said one page of the eight-page document referred specifically to his client, Steven Vikash Chand, 25, of Toronto. Mr. Chand, who appeared in court with long black hair and a full beard, listened intently to the accusations against him, then rolled his eyes.

Mr. Chand is charged with belonging to a terrorist group and recruiting and training people to join the group. He is not charged with participating in the bomb plot.

Another suspect, Qayyum Abdul Jamal, 43, is the eldest of the men and is considered by the authorities to be their leader. Mr. Jamal, one of those charged with planning the bombings, could be seen directing one of the lawyers to ask the judge for special medical attention for the youth the lawyer represented.

Mr. Batasar said the government papers laid out a plot to storm the Gothic Revival buildings of Parliament in Ottawa and take hostages. The hostages would be beheaded if the terrorists' demands that Canadian troops to be pulled out of Afghanistan were not met.

Mr. Chand was said to have remarked that he would "personally like to behead Prime Minister Stephen Harper," Mr. Batasar said. The document also said the men intended to attack power lines and news media offices, including the CBC building in Toronto.

Mr. Harper, in the main Parliament building, took the threat in stride. "I can live with these threats, as long as they're not from my caucus," he told reporters.

Jack Layton, an opposition leader in Parliament, said the terror investigation had turned up nothing to convince him that it is time to severely restrict access to government buildings or "turn an accessible institution of democracy into a bunker."

Security at Parliament Hill in Ottawa has been tightened since 9/11, but pedestrians still can walk up to most of the buildings without passing through security gates.

Investigators have said little about the evidence they have gathered against the suspects. At a news briefing on Saturday they showed a computer tower, a crude cellphone detonator and other electronic equipment they had seized. They also showed a bag of ammonium nitrate fertilizer that they said was like the three tons of material the suspects had planned to use to make bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0032336

American officials, who have acknowledged being involved in the yearlong investigation, said Canadian authorities had monitored Internet chat rooms, e-mail messages and telephone conversations to learn of the activities of the suspects.

Defense Lawyers In Canada Fault Terror Case Data (WSJ)

By Elena Cherney

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

BRAMPTON, Ontario -- Lawyers representing men arrested on terror-related charges last week complained they have been given scant information about their clients' alleged plot, which prosecutors now say included plans to storm Parliament and behead Canada's prime minister.

Lawyers for some of the 17 suspects said at a bail hearing in the Ontario Court of Justice yesterday that they were being given too little information to counter charges against their clients. Government lawyers provided few details about the alleged plot, and little information about the evidence gathered by police and security forces. Defense lawyers were given only a brief "synopsis" of the allegations, which wasn't made public.

Defense lawyers said the synopsis was sketchy and didn't give them enough material to prepare for bail hearings, which were postponed until later this month. "It's a very general document," defense attorney Gary Batasar said of the government summation. "Do they have wiretaps? Do they have video? Do they have informants? When you have bald-faced allegations such as these, obviously, hysteria mounts."

A spokesman for Canada's Department of Justice declined to comment on the complaints, noting that the case is before the court.

The synopsis of the case against Mr. Batasar's client, 25-year-old Steven Vikash Chand, includes a description of a plot to attack Ottawa's Parliament Hill and take politicians hostage in a bid to force Canada to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan and release political prisoners, Mr. Batasar said.

He said one document states that Mr. Chand "has indicated he personally would like to behead Prime Minister Stephen Harper."

Among the formal charges against six of the suspects -- issued under Canada's new antiterror laws -- is "doing anything with intent to cause an explosion of an explosive substance." The men were arrested in police raids Friday night after allegedly attempting to buy three tons of ammonium nitrate -- ostensibly to be used to build a bomb -- and security officials said the group of mostly Canadian-born young men adhered to an ideology "inspired by al Qaeda."

Other charges against the men include participating in terrorist-training activity in the countryside north of Toronto. Smuggling of guns into Canada from the U.S. was also allegedly part of the plot.

Families and friends of the men gathered outside the courtroom, talking to each other, reading the Quran and praying, while outside scores of photographers and reporters clustered around lawyers and anyone wearing a burkha.

Since the arrests, contradictory reports about the accused have surfaced, with some people who know the men and one of the mosques they attended claiming that the oldest of the suspects, Qayyum Abdul Jamal, 43, was an extremist who sought to influence younger men. Others in the community say they are shocked by the arrests because they knew the young men to be focused on working, studying and raising families.

Mr. Jamal and six of the men, including Zakaria Amara and Fahim Ahmad, who are among those facing explosives charges, all prayed at the Al-Rahman center in Mississauga, a bedroom community west of Toronto that is home to many of the greater Toronto area's Muslim community, which numbers more than 250,000. Messrs. Amara, Ahmad and Jamal, along with a few others, were part of a regular Saturday prayer group, said a friend of the men.

The friend described the men as religious, funny and "very smart" -- and not interested in terrorism. Mr. Jamal, who hails from Karachi, Pakistan, "was not a violent person," he added.

Yet other community members say Mr. Jamal was known for his extremist views. "He was totally against association with any non-Muslims," said Fahim Bukhari, director of the Mississauga Muslim Center.

DOJ_NMG_0032337

Mohammad Attique, who several months ago began renting his basement apartment to Mr. Chand -- the man accused of wanting to behead Prime Minister Harper -- said his tenant was "very nice," worked in a nearby restaurant and created no problems, though he acknowledged they haven't talked much. They met at the local mosque in the Scarborough area of Toronto, which was attended by several of the accused. Mr. Chand had changed his faith to Muslim from Hindu some years ago, and goes by the name Abdul Shakur, Mr. Attique said. On Saturday, the day after the suspects were detained, about 10 police cars pulled up to Mr. Attique's house and searched the basement apartment for hours, he said.

Mr. Bukhari and Tarek Fatah, a spokesman for the Muslim Canadian Congress, say their community needs to acknowledge that there are "firebrands" among them. Some mosques don't do enough research when they invite guest speakers to meet with youth and may accidentally be helping the "small fraction" of the community that holds extreme view to win more adherents, Mr. Bukhari said. "The Muslim community has failed to acknowledge or even recognize that we have radicals in our midst," he said. "We have to find out who these guys are."

Prime Minister Said To Be Target (WT/AP)

By Beth Duff-Brown, The Asociated Press

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

BRAMPTON, Ontario -- At least one member of a group of terror suspects plotted to storm Canada's parliament and behead officials, including the prime minister, if Muslim prisoners in Canada and Afghanistan were not released, according to charges made public yesterday.

Authorities also charged that Steven Vikash Chand plotted to take over media outlets such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.

"There's an allegation, apparently, that my client personally indicated that he wanted to behead the prime minister of Canada," lawyer Gary Batasar said. "It's a very serious allegation. My client has said nothing about that."

Mr. Chand is a 25-year-old restaurant worker from Toronto. Charges were expected to be read against at least some of the other suspects yesterday.

Mr. Batasar spoke outside the courthouse, where bail hearings for 10 of the 17 suspects were postponed. He said the charges were based on fearmongering by government officials.

"It appears to me that whether you're in Ottawa or Toronto or Crawford, Texas, or Washington, D.C., what is wanting to be instilled in the public is fear," he said.

The Ontario Court of Justice in Brampton, a small city just west of Toronto, said Monday that the suspects faced charges including participating in a terrorist group, importing weapons and planning a bombing. Details of the charges were not made public until yesterday.

Police expect more arrests, and intelligence officers are probing possible ties between the Canadian suspects -- 12 men and five teenagers -- and Islamic terror cells in six nations, including the United States.

A Muslim leader who knew the oldest suspect, 43-year-old Qayyum Abdul Jamal, said his sermons at a local mosque were "filled with hate" against Canada.

"These youth were very fun-loving guys, soccer-loving guys, and then all of sudden they were not associating with guys they used to," said Faheem Bukhari, a director of the Mississauga Muslim Community Center.

He said Mr. Jamal gave hateful, intolerant sermons at a storefront mosque in Mississauga, a city near Toronto, where six of the suspects lived.

"People around him knew he was very extreme," Mr. Bukhari said, adding that Mr. Jamal once told "the audience that the Canadian forces were going to Afghanistan to rape women."

Canada has about 2,300 soldiers in southern Afghanistan to bolster Afghan reconstruction and combat Taliban militants.

The adult suspects all are charged with one count of participating in a terrorist group. Three of them also are charged with importing weapons and ammunition for the purpose of terrorist activity.

Nine face charges of receiving training from a terrorist group, while four are charged with providing training. Six are charged with intending to cause an explosion that could cause serious bodily harm or death.

DOJ_NMG_0032338

No information was released on the five teenagers who were arrested, owing to privacy laws that protect minors.

New Details Of Canadian Terror Charges Come To Light (USAT/AP)

By Beth Duff-Brown, The Asociated Press

USA Today, June 7, 2006

BRAMPTON, Ontario — Some of the 17 Mulsim men accused of plotting terrorist bombings in Canada also planned to storm Parliament, take hostages and behead the prime minister if Muslim prisoners in Canada and Afghanistan were not released, according to charges made public Tuesday.

Authorities also alleged that Steven Vikash Chand — one of 17 suspects in the case — plotted to take over media outlets such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.

The new details of the charges added a dramatic dimension to a case that already has prompted tighter security along the U.S.-Canadian border and unsettled Canada's large Muslim community.

Police say they expect more arrests, and intelligence officers are probing possible ties between the Canadian suspects — 12 men and five teenagers — and Islamic terrorist cells in six nations, including the USA.

Chand, 25, a restaurant worker from Toronto, was one of 15 suspects who made brief court appearances Tuesday. They were arrested over the weekend. Bail hearings were postponed until at least Monday.

"There's an allegation apparently that my client personally indicated that he wanted to behead the prime minister of Canada," said Chand's lawyer, Gary Batasar. "My client has said nothing about that."

Batasar said the charges were based on fear-mongering officials. He also suggested that Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who expressed happiness at the arrests, should "keep out of the case."

The Ontario Court of Justice in Brampton, a small city west of Toronto, had said the suspects faced charges that included participating in a terrorist group, importing weapons and planning a bombing.

On Monday, Mike McDonell, deputy commissioner for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, said there are "foreign connections" but wouldn't elaborate.

A U.S. law enforcement official said investigators were looking for ties between the Canadian detainees and Islamic militants held in the USA, Britain, Bangladesh, Bosnia, Denmark and Sweden.

U.S. authorities have established that two men from the state of Georgia who were charged this year in a terrorism case had been in contact with some of the Canadian suspects via computer, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing.

The U.S. Border Patrol put agents on high alert along the 4,000-mile border and stepped up inspections of traffic from Canada.

The adults are charged with participating in a terrorist group. Three also are charged with importing weapons and ammunition for terrorist activity.

Nine face charges of receiving training from a terrorist group, while four are charged with providing training. Six are charged with intending to cause an explosion that could cause serious bodily harm or death. No information was released on the five teens because of privacy laws that protect minors.

Praise Canada (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

Canadians are still digesting the news of the arrest of 17 Muslims caught trying to purchase three tons of ammonium nitrate, the equivalent of three Oklahoma City bombs. Reports suggest that among their targets were the iconic CN Tower in Toronto and the parliament building in Ottawa. Police say they expect to make more arrests, and there appear to be links between the group and at least two Georgia-based U.S. Muslims.

We'll count the milliseconds before somebody tells us this is more evidence of the evils of immigration -- er, never mind, New York Republican Peter King just did that. So instead we'll point out that this terrorist cell seems to have been entirely composed of citizens and legal residents of Canada. As interesting is that the cell was identified through the work of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, which monitored Internet chat rooms frequented by Islamic extremists. This again reminds us of the crucial role electronic surveillance plays in uncovering potentially catastrophic terrorist attacks. Question: Did that surveillance require a warrant? Do you care?

DOJ_NMG_0032339

No less telling is that, while 2,000 Canadian soldiers are currently deployed in Afghanistan, Ottawa was a conspicuous dissenter against the war in Iraq and the concept of regime change generally. "If we change every government we don't like in the world, where do we start?" asked then-Prime Minister Jean Chretien in March 2003. This opposition would apparently not have spared Canada from the wrath of these home-grown jihadis, yet when Spain was hit by a terrorist atrocity in 2004 its support for the Iraq war was widely described as the principal reason. Ditto for Britain and the London bombings in 2005.

Meantime, the important thing is to praise the work of Canadian authorities in foiling what could have been another 9/11. We can only hope their American counterparts are as good.

Military Alters The Makeup Of Interrogation Advisers (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — Pentagon officials said Tuesday that they would try to use only psychologists, and not psychiatrists, to help interrogators devise strategies to get information from detainees at places like Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The new policy follows by little more than two weeks an overwhelming vote by the American Psychiatric Association discouraging its members from participating in those efforts.

Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, told reporters that the new policy favoring the use of psychologists over psychiatrists was a recognition of differing positions taken by their respective professional groups.

The military had been using psychiatrists and psychologists alike on behavioral science consultation teams, called "biscuit" teams because of the acronym, to advise interrogators on how best to obtain information from prisoners.

But Dr. Steven S. Sharfstein, recent past president of the American Psychiatric Association, noted in an interview that the group adopted a policy in May unequivocally stating that its members should not be part of the teams.

The counterpart group for psychologists, the American Psychological Association, has endorsed a different policy. It said last July that its members serving as consultants to interrogations involving national security should be "mindful of factors unique to these roles and contexts that require special ethical consideration."

Stephen Behnke, director of ethics for the organization, said psychologists knew not to participate in activities that harmed detainees. But Dr. Behnke also said the group believed that helping military interrogators made a valuable contribution because it was part of an effort to prevent terrorism.

Former military interrogators at Guantánamo told The New York Times last year that some psychiatrists and psychologists had advised them on how to "break" detainees to make them more cooperative. The former interrogators said they had been counseled on how to use a detainee's fears and longings to increase distress. One example was their taking advantage of a prisoner's fear of the dark, known from his medical records.

Dr. Winkenwerder, the Pentagon official, disputed those assertions Tuesday, saying he did not believe that such counseling had occurred. He said the biscuit teams gave interrogators advice only on how to establish a positive rapport with detainees.

Pentagon Limits Medical Role In Questioning (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon on Tuesday placed new restrictions on how doctors can be involved in interrogations of detainees, but critics deplored any policy that gives medical professionals a role, saying it can lead questioners to use harsher tactics than they would without medical advice.

The military's use of medical professionals in interrogations has drawn fire from human rights groups and medical ethicists. They have charged that doctors have been used unethically at the prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, to force-feed detainees on hunger strikes and provide medical advice to help interrogators.

William Winkenwerder Jr., the assistant secretary of Defense for health affairs who approved the new policy, said it was written to ensure that healthcare professionals play an appropriate role. The policy attempts to draw a clear distinction between medical personnel who care for the health of detainees and mental health professionals, called "behavioral science consultants," who assist interrogators.

Winkenwerder, in a conference call with reporters, said the "consultants" did not take part in interrogations. They make psychological assessments of prisoners, he said, but are not allowed to shape interrogations with their knowledge of a subject's phobias or medical vulnerabilities.

Leonard S. Rubenstein, executive director of Physicians for Human Rights, said the military should prohibit psychologists or doctors from aiding in the questioning of detainees. "They are using their professional knowledge to hurt people," he said. "The bottom line is health professionals should not be involved in interrogations."

The guidelines are part of a policy directive for medical personnel that was originally due to be released with the Army Field Manual and another directive on the treatment of detainees.

But the Field Manual has been held up by objections from members of Congress, who are worried that it might not go far enough to ensure prisoners are treated humanely. The Times reported Monday that the Pentagon has decided to leave out a key part of the Geneva Convention that bans "humiliating and degrading treatment."

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) on Tuesday sent a letter to President Bush, saying such an omission would "make our troops and our country less safe."

"Given the current situation in Afghanistan and Iraq," he wrote, "it is an especially bad time to send a signal to the world that we no longer abide by internationally accepted norms for the treatment of prisoners."

The medical directive released Tuesday also makes no mention of international law or treaties.

"It is outrageous that there is no reference to Geneva," said M. Gregg Bloche, a Georgetown University law professor and one of the first to disclose the work of the behavioral consultants in an article in the New England Journal of Medicine.

The most controversial of the new rules for medical personnel are likely to be those governing the "behavioral science consultants," psychologists or other experts who advise interrogators.

The American Psychiatric Assn.'s guidelines prohibit its members from taking part in interrogations. Professional guidelines for psychologists are less clear.

The new policy notes that physicians, such as psychiatrists, are not ordinarily used as behavioral consultants, "but may be so assigned" when qualified psychologists are unavailable.

Critics have said the consultants give interrogators information that helps them to increase the discomfort, stress or ill-treatment of detainees, giving tacit approval that allows harsher treatment.

Under the guidelines, the consultants are permitted to "make psychological assessments of the character, personality, social interactions, and other behavioral characteristics of detainees." They can also train military personnel on "safe and effective interrogation methods" and advise them on the "potential effects of cultural and ethnic characteristics of subjects."

The rules, however, bar them from "the use of physical or mental health information regarding any detainee in a manner that would result in inhumane treatment or not be in accordance with applicable law."

"These words speak to humane behavior," Winkenwerder said. "And if you have observed our personnel in action … I can tell you they act humanely and they act with humane principle and they are ethical people."

He said the new rules consolidated existing policies and added new details. "They reaffirm what has been a tradition that goes back decades and decades and decades," he said.

Rubenstein, with Physicians for Human Rights, said anything short of a complete ban on the use of psychologists or physicians in interrogations would result in medical personnel helping interrogators use ever-tougher tactics.

"They have adopted the same policy and dressed it up in what purports to be safeguards," he said. "Once you get sucked into interrogations, the likelihood of violating ethical obligations and hurting people is high."

Many doctors and psychologists argue it is ethical to give classes on human behavior or other general instruction to interrogators. But giving advice on how to break an individual subject and make him or her talk crosses an ethical line, they say. The new rules allow such individualized advice, if the interrogators use lawful techniques.

DOJ_NMG_0032341

Stephen Xenakis, a psychiatrist and former Army brigadier general in the medical corps, has criticized the use of doctors and psychologists in interrogations. He said he once supported the kind of wall the Pentagon is trying to create between caring for detainees and aiding in their interrogation.

But he now says such a distinction will be impossible. "You are always a healthcare provider," Xenakis said. "You can't be an interrogator in one job and a doctor in another."

The new guidelines may also tighten the use of medical records. At Guantanamo Bay, there was for a time no restriction on interrogators looking at medical records. The new directive does not restrict access to records but mandates that such disclosures are recorded.

The new rules also offer guidance on force-feeding. They say that medical personnel may assist in force-feeding detainees on a hunger strike "without the consent of the detainee to prevent death or serious harm." The directive says the treatment must be medically necessary.

The International Committee on the Red Cross prohibits force-feeding.

Xenakis argues that doctors should take steps, short of force-feeding, to try to keep patients alive, or persuade them to stop hunger strikes. But he said if patients were mentally competent, and rationally decide to starve themselves, medical personnel must let them do it.

"Patients have the right to exercise autonomy and starve themselves," he said.

Winkenwerder said the new directive adhered to the policy of the Federal Bureau of Prisons: to keep anyone under detention alive.

He said healthcare was provided "with the consent of the detainees," with the exception of those who are refusing nourishment. "We have a policy that is to preserve life," he said. "That policy is an ethical policy," he said.

Md. Teacher Accused Of Aiding Terror Group (WP)

By Matthew Barakat

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

A third-grade teacher at a Muslim school in Maryland traveled to Pakistan shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, trained with a terrorist organization there and later served as chauffeur for one of that group's leaders during his U.S. travels, prosecutors say.

Defense attorneys argue that the government has no evidence the man was ever at the terror camp and say he was in Pakistan to arrange his brother's wedding.

Tuesday morning, jurors began their first full day of deliberations in the trial of Ali Asad Chandia, 29, who is charged with providing material support to Lashkar-e-Taiba, an organization that supports Muslim control of the disputed Kashmir territory on the India-Pakistan border.

Prosecutors have said Lashkar was a potential gateway for Americans and others who wanted to join the Taliban in neighboring Afghanistan in its fight against U.S. troops. The U.S. government declared it a terrorist organization in December 2001.

The charges against Chandia stem from a government investigation of what prosecutors called a "Virginia jihad network," a group of young Muslim men who used paintball games in 2000 and 2001 as paramilitary training for holy war around the globe. Ten people have been convicted in that investigation, including the group's spiritual leader, Ali al-Timimi, who was sentenced to life in prison for soliciting treason and urging group members to fight U.S. troops in Afghanistan.

Prosecutors do not allege that Chandia intended to take up arms against U.S. troops, but they say he received jihad training at a Lashkar camp in late 2001. Then, after returning to the U.S. in 2002, they say he helped Lashkar by assisting one of its officers, Mohammed Ajmal Khan, in his U.S. travels.

Specifically, Chandia served as a driver for Khan and picked him up at various airports. He also helped Khan obtain and ship equipment from the United States to Pakistan, including a remote-controlled aircraft and 50,000 paintballs, according to the government.

Prosecutor John Gibbs said the defense sought to portray Khan as an eccentric, largely innocuous character.

DOJ_NMG_0032342

"He is not cute. He is a terrorist," Gibbs said of Khan, who was convicted in Great Britain of supporting Lashkar and sentenced earlier this year to nine years in prison.

Defense attorney Marvin Miller said prosecutors had no evidence that Chandia attended a Lashkar camp, only testimony from a witness who reported seeing Chandia at a Lashkar office in Lahore. Miller said Chandia traveled to Pakistan to help arrange his brother's wedding there in January 2002.

Miller argued that Chandia didn't know of Khan's connections to Lashkar. Chandia only agreed to help Khan because he was asked to by a friend, Masoud Khan of Gaithersburg, Md. Masoud Khan is currently serving a life sentence for his role in the Virginia jihad group.

Prosecutor David Laufman responded by putting a sinister-looking picture of Khan in front of the jury, and ridiculing the idea that Chandia had been an unwitting dupe.

Why More Must Be Done To Protect London (FT)

By Michael Cassidy

Financial Times, June 7, 2006

New thinking is needed on how to protect the public against terrorism. The ordinary citizen is in the front line when it comes to suicide attacks. The first duty of government is to provide that protection and yet, nearly a year on from last July's attacks in London, some simple measures are being sidelined. The London Assembly report into 7/7 reveals communication shortcomings as well as equipment deficiencies and one detects a lack of urgency in responding to these types of concerns. Furthermore, coverage surrounding the arrests in east London highlights the extent to which our transport infrastructure is a prime area of vulnerability.

My own experience in this area is as one who had to deal with the aftermath of the 1993 IRA attack at Bishopsgate in the City in my capacity as chairman of the policy and resources committee at Guildhall. I apply many of the lessons learned in that period to the situation today and find part of the official response inadequate. Then, as with last July, some improvisation was -necessary and volunteer support is always impressive on the day. The police and emergency services undertake heroic efforts in difficult circumstances. Yet a residue of concern permeates one's reaction to recent terrorist incidents.

One feature of the IRA campaign on the mainland was that warnings (not always accurate) were often given. Not so the modern terrorist. The perpetrators then sought to avoid being caught; not so the modern suicide bomber. CCTV is of only limited use in today's circumstances. If you are going to die anyway, what sort of deterrent is a camera at the scene?

The City's response at the time of the IRA campaign was the so-called "ring of steel" – vehicle checks at the eight entry points into the Square Mile. This was radical in its conception, was at the edge of available technology and was in some quarters criticised as an intrusion. In fact, it has proved to be a valuable tool in solving serious crimes. With the capability of tracking and photographing a moving vehicle after an alert given only four seconds after it has passed the entry point, it is an effective and efficient system to protect our principal financial district. But today we need random pedestrian checks in addition to examining vehicles. These should be targeted at what people are carrying rather than their likely ethnic origin. The public will respond positively to sensitive use of stop-and-search powers. However, very few of these have been apparent on the streets of London since July 7.

Most business people welcome baggage checks at stations despite objections in the media last year when we advocated them to protect rail travellers. Technology will evolve to minimise delay to passengers, so that every Underground station will have a "loop" capable of setting off an alert that can be responded to in different ways if explosives are detected. There should also be more sniffer dogs on trains.

There is no adequate reason why police officers should not be required to be in uniform when travelling free on public transport. They can wear an "off-duty" badge if they want to avoid being pestered with trivia. But the main objection is based on possible confusion with British Transport Police. Can this stand in the way of a simple and cheap measure that would reassure the public in a busy metropolis which relies on public transport?

The Chamber of Commerce is working with Scotland Yard to build ties with the Asian business community to improve the flow of information that may frustrate terrorist attacks. On the one hand, the police are showing responsiveness to crimes that particularly affect that community and, on the other, business leaders are asked to encourage a better dialogue on likely threats from terrorist sources.

DOJ_NMG_0032343

We also support the idea of government grants to give smaller businesses training and advice on resilience to attack. They should be encouraged to have half-day seminars on practical and sensible measures to help swift recovery from an attack, protecting their staff and customers and sustaining their systems. Look at the potential hazards arising from a chemical or biological attack and the imposition of an exclusion zone right where a business is located. Most small business proprietors would not know where to start.

The police have a tough job and resources are limited. But it seems that the political will is lacking to implement some of these practical ideas, despite the very positive response I received at Downing Street last October when they were first mooted.

So, if the politics is not right for new thinking to be brought to bear, let me come to my final thought. We need a government department focused on what has been loosely called "homeland security". Separate this vital responsibility from the rag bag of Home Office duties, some of which involve inherent conflicts when it comes to judging how best to protect the public. That might be more fit for purpose than the present arrangement, which seems bogged down in traditional thinking and is over-reliant on the chancy business of intelligence gathering. People want to see action on the streets and, this time, before the attack and not after it.

The writer is president of the London Chamber of Commerce and Industry

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York, You're Still No. 1 (NYT)

By Michael Chertoff

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Washington

LAST week, the Department of Homeland Security announced $1.7 billion in new spending for state and local governments, including more than $700 million under our Urban Areas Security Initiative. Few readers may know it based on the news media reaction, but these 2006 grants continue a financing stream that places New York and Washington at the very top of the list in terms of money received.

The terrorists who struck us on Sept. 11, 2001, and their allies continue to view New York and Washington as among America's prime targets. Therefore we have put our money where the threat is. Since the creation of my department, the New York and Washington areas, along with Los Angeles, Chicago and the San Francisco Bay Area, have received 45 percent of overall financing from the urban areas initiative.

New York has received more than $528 million of this money, which is more than Los Angeles and Washington combined. The $124 million that New York will receive this year is 50 percent more than the next-highest area, Los Angeles, and represents almost a threefold increase over the $46 million the city received in 2004.

It is true that, in real dollar terms, New York is receiving less this year than in 2005, when it got more than $200 million. Why? In large part because Congress gave us about $600 million less for our grant programs, including approximately $125 million less for the urban areas initiative. Still, this year New York will receive just under 18 percent of the total funds in the urban areas initiative. This falls in line with the city's average over the last three years of receiving 19 percent of the program's funds.

There is a more fundamental point about these security grants. The Urban Areas Security Initiative awards are designed as capacity building investments. We are looking to pay for new equipment and projects that increase the nation's overall preparedness. They are not for routine and recurring operating expenses like salaries and overtime.

Therefore, while New York and Washington will continue to receive the majority of the money because of the heightened threat they face, future grants will also go to other, less populated areas that have not received much help in building even basic security capacities.

DOJ_NMG_0032344

Besides, when we improve the overall level of security nationwide, it helps New York, too. The 2003 blackout clearly demonstrated that loss of critical infrastructure in parts of the country outside New York can have a direct impact on the safety of city residents.

Finally, I would like to clear up two other misunderstandings. First, contrary to news media reports, significant landmarks like the Empire State Building and the Brooklyn Bridge were included in our deliberation over where money would go. It is true that they were not classified as national monuments and icons. Why? To help New York's application.

We purposely placed these structures into other categories: the Empire State Building into the large office building category and the Brooklyn Bridge into the bridges category. We did so because those categories generate a higher complete risk grade for New York's financing proposal than icons like Mount Rushmore that, while important symbolically, would have fewer human and economic consequences in case of an attack.

Second, the Homeland Security Department has made every effort to rely on measurable facts and to take politics out of the process. State and local emergency management agencies — including those in New York — selected more than 100 local homeland security directors, fire chiefs, law enforcement officials and other experts to serve as peer reviewers of applicant-proposed solutions. When surveyed, 96 percent of the local and state agencies agreed that the panels that made the spending decisions included balanced representation, and 83 percent agreed that the peer review resulted in objective scores and results.

New York, Washington and a few other major urban centers face significant risks and rightly get most of the federal investment. But they are not the only cities at risk. Because the federal government cannot equally protect every single American at every moment in every place against every threat, we must manage the risk in the most effective way possible. And while we have significant resources, they are not unlimited. We have the obligation to ensure that those resources are invested wisely and fairly across the entire nation.

Michael Chertoff is the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security.

House Blocks More Funding For New York, Other High-risk Cities (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Republicans blocked a vote Tuesday on restoring millions of dollars in counterterror funds to big-city targets, including New York, refusing to bust budget targets over slashed grants to emergency first responders.

New York City-area Democrats pleaded to add $750 million to spending plans to fund the Homeland Security Department in the 2007 fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. But Republicans rejected the measure even as they vowed anew to investigate how Homeland Security could justify cutting funding to New York and Washington _ the two targets of the Sept. 11 attacks _ by 40 percent.

The House approved the overall $32 billion spending blueprint, 389-9, shortly afterward.

"Short memories," said Rep. Nita Lowey, D-Westchester. "Such a cut is unconscionable. ... Reducing funding to New York and Washington, D.C., the two targets of the Sept. 11 attacks, is a slap in the face to every first responder who rushed to the emergency scene that morning and every individual living in those regions."

But Republicans worried about increasing the federal deficit noted that the Democratic plan would have only applied to spending in the 2007 fiscal year beginning in October and would not help this year. Still, they joined Democrats in promising to investigate how Homeland Security divided $710 million among 46 high-threat urban areas nationwide. The department's grant program took a $829 million cut from 2005, although some smaller cities, like Omaha, Neb., saw their funding increase.

"It's tough to understand, considering New York City remains the highest target for terrorism," said Rep. John Sweeney, R-Clifton Park. Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., who chairs the House Appropriations panel that oversees homeland security spending, told lawmakers he supported efforts to "further look into the matter."

Addressing another Homeland Security controversy, lawmakers agreed to shift $4.2 million from a department contract with a limousine company to fund firefighting grants. The owner of Shirlington Limousine has numerous felony convictions, and other clients used the Virginia-based company to chauffeur people to poker parties attended by House members, CIA officials and, allegedly, prostitutes.

DOJ_NMG_0032345

In all, the House bill would give Homeland Security $1.8 billion more in 2007 than this year. It bolsters protections at seaports by $448 million more than in 2006, adds 1,200 Border Patrol agents and boosts the Hurricane Katrina-beleagured Federal Emergency Management Agency by $6.5 billion for disaster preparedness.

For the second straight year, the bill also eliminates a $1.3 billion administration plan to raise fees for airline passengers.

The Senate has yet to write a similar bill.

City Will Not Change Its Strategy For Dealing With Terror (NYT)

By Sewell Chan And Winnie Hu

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said yesterday that the city would not alter its strategy in future applications for federal antiterror money to comply with the Department of Homeland Security's preference for semipermanent safeguards like new technology over recurring costs like police overtime.

"We're not here to change our strategy to suit anybody," the mayorsaid. "We're going to do what we think is right, and if the burden falls solely on the taxpayers of New York City, that's not good. But in the end, our No. 1 priority is to provide security, and I would argue that the level of expertise in the city, in all of the different first-responder agencies, is as good as anyplace you'll find in the world."

While expressing disappointment about the 40 percent cut in annual antiterror money for the city announced last week, Mr. Bloomberg has made it clear since Sunday that he does not expect Washington to change its mind. "We have a very different philosophy than what the federal government does," he said in a news conference on Staten Island.

"While technology is important," he added, "it's really shoe leather that counts" in fighting crime and terrorism. "And so a very big portion of the monies that we always ask for are to cover labor costs, which typically the federal government does not do," he said. "We think they're wrong in that."

Last night, the House of Representatives approved an appropriations bill for the Department of Homeland Security for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, after Republicans blocked a vote on a proposal to restore $115 million in grants for New York City and $40 million for Washington, according to The Associated Press.

In a related development, the city's Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, which has received about $14 million in federal funds for health and bioterrorism preparedness, said yesterday that the reduction in federal aid could hurt those efforts.

"This cut is likely to have an effect on our planning for radiation events, including subway detection and response projects, as well as on critical emergency response information systems," the deputy commissioner for disease control, Dr. Isaac B. Weisfuse, said at a budget hearing before the City Council.

He said that the department's request, as part of the city's grant application, included more than $5 million for radiation monitoring, $4.5 million for emergency response computer technology and $1 million on preparations for distributing vaccinations or treatments.

At the hearing, Dr. Weisfuse told Councilman David I. Weprin of Queens that the ultimate effect of the cuts was not yet certain. "Since this has happened relatively recently, we need to regroup and look at all our projects and see how we can attempt to fund them," Dr. Weisfuse said.

Despite Mr. Bloomberg's position, some New York politicians continued to push for the Bush administration to reconsider the grant allocation to New York.

Representative Vito J. Fossella of Staten Island, the only Republican to represent New York City in Congress, said yesterday that he had spoken with the White House chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, and urged President Bush to intervene.

"One, it's the right policy to do in the short term," Mr. Fossella said, "but over the long term I think the president really needs to set the example that when it comes to allocating homeland security funding it is going to be truly risk-based, it's going to be threat-based."

Mr. Fossella said that Mr. Bolten had called him in response to a letter the congressman wrote to President Bush on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0032346

Mr. Bloomberg, however, stopped short of calling for the president to step in, saying, "I've dealt with the secretary, and I think that's the level that I should be dealing with."

Mr. Bloomberg said that the secretary of homeland security, Michael Chertoff, had promised to help the city to maximize the money that was awarded. The city still needs to document the proper use of the money before it can receive it.

The under secretary for preparedness, George W. Foresman, will try to expedite the process of securing the grant money, said Russ Knocke, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security.

Katrina Displaced 400,000, Study Says (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Hurricane Katrina displaced more than 400,000 people from the New Orleans area and the Mississippi Gulf Coast, according to a Census Bureau report to be released today, one of the most comprehensive looks at the hurricane-induced migration.

The figures show that the New Orleans metropolitan area, and not just the city, remains vastly shrunken in population four months after the storm, having lost 378,000 people, and that those who remained were more prosperous and were far more likely to be white.

Whereas the population of the New Orleans region was 54 percent non-Hispanic white before the storm, that proportion had grown to 68 percent in the months after the storm, the figures show.

"We knew the city was becoming whiter and less poor, but now we know the entire New Orleans region was," said William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution who analyzed the new figures. "This is the first real numbers on this. Everything else has been guesswork."

The figures show that the Gulfport-Biloxi region lost 41,000 people from before Katrina to January, ranking it second among metropolitan areas for population loss.

But in contrast to the New Orleans region, the Mississippi coast has become less white, the figures show. The proportion of non-Hispanic blacks in Mississippi's coastal counties has risen from 17 percent to 27 percent.

Exactly how many people have returned to the hurricane-ravaged areas and who they are has been a matter of intense speculation among public officials and businesses planning the rebuilding effort.

The new figures will not end the debate, however.

Census officials warned that some of the figures are subject to larger than normal margins of error and, moreover, that the figures are already at least five months old.

"The population estimates were from back in January, and back then the situation was a lot more volatile," said David Bowman, a researcher for the Louisiana Recovery Authority.

His estimates suggest that the population of New Orleans has grown from 156,000 in January to 192,000 in May. About 450,000 people lived there before Katrina.

The recovery has been far slower than many had expected, and the new figures only underscored the vast challenges ahead.

"Those who sit and speculate that the city will have 350,000 people next year are doing it on certain innate beliefs -- that people want to return, that there will be jobs," said Rob Couhig, one of the leaders of a rebuilding commission arranged by Mayor C. Ray Nagin.

Couhig said he expects that many who have left will never return.

Storms Also Shifted Demographics, Census Finds (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — In the four months following Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, the population of the New Orleans metropolitan area became substantially whiter, older and less poor, and it shrank to less than half its size, according to statistics released today by the Census Bureau.

DOJ_NMG_0032347

The figures were drawn from estimates of the hurricane-affected areas along the Gulf Coast as of Jan. 1, and cover 117 counties initially designated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency for individual or public assistance. Separate data from the Census Bureau's 2005 American Community Survey, or ACS, analyzed demographic, socioeconomic and housing characteristics of the population in those counties.

Census officials and demographers said the new statistics provided the most comprehensive post-Katrina population and demographic figures to date.

"The data from the ACS provides the first quantitative data in support of anecdotal stories we have read and seen on television for the past nine months," said Lisa Blumerman, deputy chief of the ACS, which typically produces annual estimates of population and housing characteristics after a full year of data collection. This time, however, ACS divided the 2005 data into an eight-month period before Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and a four-month period after the storms.

Census officials acknowledged that because of the survey's shorter time period, and the smaller sample size because of difficulties in conducting interviews immediately after the storms in flood-ravaged areas such as Orleans and St. Bernard parishes, "the reliability of the estimates is reduced."

Parishes and counties were combined into metropolitan statistical areas, and the margin of sampling error is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The biggest population loss was experienced in metropolitan New Orleans, which includes seven parishes, and in the Mississippi Gulf Coast counties of Harrison and Hancock, and part of the Gulfport-Biloxi area also in Mississippi.

The population of Orleans fell from 437,186 in July 2005 to 158,353 after the storms. Nearby St. Bernard Parish lost 95% of its residents.

The New Orleans metro area's population was 37% black between January and August 2005 and fell to 22% between September and December 2005. The percentage of white residents grew from 60% to 73%. Households earning between $10,000 and $14,999 annually dropped from 8.3% to 6.5%; while those with a yearly income of between $75,000 and $99,999 rose from 10.5% to 11.4%.

"It's become substantially whiter, less poor, and there is a greater percentage of the area's people who have high-valued homes, or who are paying higher values of rent," said William H. Frey, a demographer and visiting fellow at Washington's Brookings Institution Metropolitan Policy Program, which analyzed the new census figures. "The changes also tend to impact the family structure and household. There is a decline in poverty."

Frey added that the disproportionate out-migration of lower-income and black residents to destinations farther away from New Orleans had likely slowed the return of such residents, because they lacked the finances, did not own their property, or if they did, the property might have been destroyed.

The percentage of households that were renters dropped from 36% to 27%, Frey said.

While population numbers have drastically decreased in Orleans and St. Bernard parishes, a dramatic rise has occurred in cities such as Houston and Baton Rouge, which absorbed large numbers of displaced people.

Harris County, where Houston is located, gained some 92,000 people in the last six months of 2005, according to the Brookings analysis of the census data. East Baton Rouge saw a population spike of about 4% in four months.

"Blacks tended to move to where they had relatives and friends or where they were first evacuated to," Frey said. People who relocated to nearby towns such as Baton Rouge tended to be middle class and own cars.

Blumerman, the census official, said other significant findings for the New Orleans area in the four months after Katrina included: The number of people who were living in a different home rose from 13% a year ago to 21% in January; the median age of residents had increased from 38 to 42; and, in Louisiana's federally designated hurricane-related assistance zones, the number of people in need of food stamps went from 12% to 31%.

Louisiana state officials said that while the data was useful, it was just "a snapshot."

"It's a partial picture of the changes," said Karen Paterson, a demographer at the Louisiana State Census Data Center.

Katrina's Unlearned Lessons (WP)

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032348

LAST WEEK the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers admitted responsibility for much of the destruction of New Orleans. It was not true, as the Corps initially had claimed, that its defenses failed because Congress had authorized only Category 3 protection, with the result that Hurricane Katrina overtopped the city's floodwalls. Rather, Katrina was no stronger than a Category 2 storm by the time it came ashore, and many of the floodwalls let water in because they collapsed, not because they weren't high enough. As the Corps' own inquiry found, the agency committed numerous mistakes of design: Its network of pumps, walls and levees was "a system in name only"; it failed to take into account the gradual sinking of the local soil; it closed its ears when people pointed out these problems. The result was a national tragedy.

You might think that the Corps' mea culpa would fuel efforts to reform the agency. Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) are pushing a measure that would do just that, requiring that future Corps proposals be subject to technical review by an independent agency. But the stronger current in Congress goes in the opposite direction. A measure urged by Louisiana senators and written by Sens. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) and Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) would loosen oversight of the Corps. Billions of dollars may be spent in ways that ignore the most basic lessons from Katrina.

Congress has already passed laws with language directing the Corps to design a new flood-protection plan for Louisiana. The language encourages the construction of Category 5 protections for the whole state, a project that could cost tens of billions of dollars; it advertises its own profligacy by laying down that the flood-protection plan should be exempt from cost-benefit analysis. The new measure, which is reportedly part of a revised version of a water projects bill that will be unveiled shortly, would lower the bar for congressional approval of whatever Louisiana defenses the Corps sees fit to propose. Rather than requiring full votes in both chambers of Congress, the Corps' plan could be authorized by votes in two committees that tend to rubber-stamp such projects.

In the wake of Katrina, this is almost beyond belief. The Corps' admission of its own technical shortcomings points to the need for tougher oversight, not less. And the New Orleans disaster has illustrated the folly of building flood defenses for vulnerable low land: Some of the worst-hit areas would not have been developed in the first place if the Corps hadn't decided to build "protections" for them. Encouraging the Army Corps of Engineers to build Category 5 defenses for all of Louisiana, including parts that are sparsely populated for good reason, would not merely cost billions that would be better spent on defending urban areas. It would encourage settlement of more flood-prone land and set the stage for the next tragedy.

Hurricane Forecasts: Good Headlines, Bad Science (USAT)

By Debora Wilson

USA Today, June 7, 2006

The 2005 hurricane season was clearly unprecedented and took a huge toll on our country and those whose lives and livelihoods were impacted. The only silver lining was raising the level of awareness among consumers, the news media and policymakers as well as local, state and federal governments.

One byproduct of this growing awareness is a much higher degree of interest among the general public in understanding and predicting what's going to happen this year. Unfortunately, this is spawning a new wave of individuals and organizations who bill themselves as experts, publicly issuing predictions that not only speculate on the number of hurricanes the USA will experience this season but also the specific regions where the storms will make landfall.

The news media love pre-season predictions, but they provide a misdirected focus. The question should not be "How many?" but, instead, "Are you prepared?"

Predictions are fraught with inaccuracy. While there is skill in forecasting whether a particular season will be active overall, there are no definitive scientific methods for predicting the exact number of hurricanes that will form during a particular year. Despite claims to the contrary, no verified means exist to pinpoint an area or region a hurricane will impact. For example, one prediction made shortly before Hurricanes Katrina and Rita devastated the central Gulf Coast claimed the East Coast would be the region most threatened during the peak of the hurricane season.

New predictions

In the past few weeks, another prediction that the Northeast is likely to be hit by a strong hurricane has garnered national headlines. Is the Northeast due for one? Absolutely. In fact, The Weather Channel recently highlighted the possible fallout from a Category 3 hurricane striking Manhattan in an episode of It Could Happen Tomorrow. But acknowledging that a potentially disastrous scenario exists is far different from predicting the timing of it.

DOJ_NMG_0032349

Although these unfounded predictions do raise awareness in the forecasted areas, they also lull residents in other coastal regions into a false sense of security. None of these claims would pass as legitimate peer-reviewed research in the scientific community.

Is there a way to predict where a hurricane will make landfall?

According to our experts, steering patterns for major hurricane landfalls persist in multiple consecutive years and even tend to be predominant throughout a particular decade, leading to multiple regional strikes — such as the Florida Peninsula in the 1920s and '40s, the East Coast in the '50s, and the western and central Gulf Coast in the '10s and '60s. This would suggest that perhaps, continuing from 2004 and '05, Florida and the central-eastern Gulf Coast are the ones "staring down the barrel of a gun" once again.

Fickle patterns

Nonetheless, hurricanes do not always stick to one particular pattern or region. In the 1930s, hurricanes made landfall in locations spread widely from New England all the way to South Texas.

This is why experts should never jump on the bandwagon to issue seasonal hurricane forecasts. The fact is that nobody knows at this juncture what regions, states and communities will get hit this year. The same logic can be applied to recent claims that global warming is linked to the increased number of hurricanes. Until scientists can study additional hurricane seasons, it is impossible to validate these claims.

So the bottom line for the East Coast, the Gulf Coast and all coastal residents: Until science makes a lot more progress and enables us to credibly home in on who is going to get hit — months in advance — be equally prepared everywhere every year. Period.

Debora Wilson is president of The Weather Channel.

Are Hurricanes Uninsurable? (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins, Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

It wasn't so long ago that insurers were pronouncing terrorism "uninsurable." But ask any insurer: Aon's Paul Bassett recently noted that the global war on terror had greatly reduced the threat of megaplots on the scale of Sept. 11, 2001.

Yes, suicide bombers and car bombs remain a threat, but not to the industry's capital base. Hurricanes are the new "uninsurable" now.

Here's a complicated story that only begins with warming ocean temperatures thought to justify an expectation of increased hurricanes. One risk modeler, Risk Management Solutions Inc., chucked out 100 years of hurricane data and brought together four climate scientists who probably wouldn't agree about much else but agreed that the next five years would see a higher-than-average number of hurricanes. Presto, a risk model employed by many insurers to set rates suddenly implies a 40% hike for Gulf Coast property owners.

A second factor: More hurricanes meet more people and property. Regionally speaking, Katrina came ashore in a low-rent neighborhood. Florida, a hurricane highway, represents an agglomeration of coastal property worth $2 trillion. New York City and Long Island offer a similar target. The Texas coast represents about $750 billion worth of bowling pins.

These scenic vicinities experienced building booms in the '70s and '80s, when hurricane activity was at low ebb. Beginning in the early 1990s, a series of devastating storms swept through, especially in Florida. Enter factor three: The willingness of the federal government to rush in with rebuilding aid far above even the billions in subsidized flood insurance already provided to coastal homeowners. Coastal development only quickened when it should have slowed.

Upping the ante were 9/11 and Katrina, which demonstrated to high rollers the federal government was incapable of not shelling out infinite sums to ease personal tragedies when bad things happen on a large scale (if you lose your house or loved one in an everyday mishap, of course, you're still on your own).

DOJ_NMG_0032350

As anyone might have predicted, this dynamic is now unraveling the insurance industry's ability to help society control its risk-taking by properly pricing risk. Lloyd's Julian James put it this way late last year: "It seems to me that with $400,000 per family [paid out in the wake of the terrorist attacks and Katrina], if the government hands out checks, do people need insurance?"

In olden times, robber barons built their seaside mansions a safe distance from the ocean. Today's yuppies build their palaces right on the beach: FEMA reckons that a quarter of coastal dwellings will be destroyed in the next half century. The solution seems obvious: Restore the incentive for yuppies to behave responsibly like the robber barons.

This assumes two things: Insurers would have to be free to charge realistic rates, which is problematic given that rates in most states are approved by elected or appointed insurance commissioners, most of whom have their eyes on higher office.

It also assumes state courts will uphold insurance contracts -- a principle being tested in Mississippi, where Attorney General Jim Hood likens insurers to "Nazis in lockstep" and is pursuing civil and criminal complaints against them for refusing to pay for flood damage explicitly not covered in the policies they sold to homeowners.

The riskiest assumption of all is that property owners would be willing to pay "actuarially sound" rates rather than just skipping insurance and relying on a federal bailout in the wake of a big storm. Here's the real crux of the claim by some industry watchers that hurricanes have become effectively uninsurable.

In this camp is Robert Litan, a Brookings Institution economist who says bailouts have become politically mandatory and property owners expect them. So the only rational course now is to fund them in advance, with taxes borne mainly by those who benefit. Coming to a similar conclusion is Allstate CEO Ed Liddy, a one-man band who's been trying to drum up enthusiasm for a federal disaster insurance program.

He was a voice alone but lately has acquired allies in the form of State Farm and a few others. Mr. Liddy lays out an approach that, he claims, would tap all business and property owners in Florida who presumably benefit from coastal development even if their own property is inland. Folks in Peoria and Dubuque wouldn't be milked, as they are now, to subsidize the lifestyle of beach dwellers.

He also says his plan would mandate realistic insurance rates and impose damage mitigation measures to reduce the cost of hurricanes and discourage high-risk development.

Don't hold your breath for this part. Federal flood insurance was instituted in 1968 with the same good intentions -- to make property owners bear the cost of their own recurrent bailouts. Instead it became a subsidy to increased risk-taking. That program today is $21 billion in the hole, its shortfalls financed by taxpayers in Peoria and Dubuque.

Where's Al Gore when you need him? Mr. Liddy's plan may be a defensible concession to political realities, i.e., the inevitability of the federal government continuing to pay people to rebuild what storms knock down (see New Orleans). But it also makes an undesirable peace with over-development of coastal areas. The harder road of imposing market insurance rates on coastal property owners and ending taxpayer handouts would mean a lot of coastal development would come to a halt -- as it should.

In any case, all agree the debate won't be settled in an election year, and probably not until another hurricane forces the country to face up to how the rest of us have been taxed again and again to subsidize the high-risk lifestyles of those who plant themselves in the paths of hurricanes.

WAR NEWS:

Senate To Hold Hearings On Iraq Massacre (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, June 6, 2006

The Senate will hold hearings soon into an alleged Marine massacre of Iraqi civilians, a committee chairman said Tuesday as Republicans and Democrats voiced serious concerns about the accusations.

"We've got our duty and we'll do it. We'll go wherever the facts lead," Sen. John Warner (news, bio, voting record), the Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, said of the allegations that U.S. Marines killed up to 24 Iraqi civilians last November in the town of Haditha without cause and then engaged in a cover-up.

DOJ_NMG_0032351

The Virginia Republican told reporters he wanted to hold the first of what he expected to be a series of hearings on the allegations as soon as Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell finishes his investigation into whether military personnel lied about what occurred at Haditha. Warner said Bargewell likely would be the first witness called.

Congressional aides say Bargewell's report could be completed within the week but that the military's separate criminal investigation is not expected to be finished anytime soon.

In a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Tuesday, Warner requested the Pentagon tell him "the earliest possible date that the department could provide witnesses" for the first hearing. Warner stressed that delaying the results of such investigations will mean that "a mixture of information, misinformation and unconfirmed facts will continue to spiral in the public domain."

"We must do everything possible to prevent our military personnel, and indeed the values of all our military services, from being judged on unofficial information in the court of public opinion prior to the conclusion of official investigations," Warner wrote.

His counterpart in the House, Rep. Duncan Hunter (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., also has pledged to hold hearings in the House Armed Services Committee. But he, too, has said he wants to wait until the military completes its investigations to ensure Congress doesn't interfere with potential criminal proceedings.

Over the past week, more details have emerged about the November incident and a senior U.S. defense official said military investigators have evidence that points toward unprovoked murders by Marines.

Politically, the alleged murders in Haditha — as well as unsubstantiated claims of unprovoked civilian deaths by U.S. troops elsewhere in Iraq — threaten to further drag down support for the Iraq war and could turn into a political problem for President Bush and Republicans five months before congressional elections. Polls show voters increasingly uncomfortable with the direction of the war as well as more inclined to see Democrats leading Congress.

Returning to Washington after a weeklong Memorial Day break, lawmakers expressed grave concerns about Haditha and said the allegations could further tarnish the U.S. image abroad and hurt efforts to curb terrorism worldwide.

But Republicans and Democrats alike in both the House and the Senate also urged caution, saying that Congress and the public still didn't have all the facts and shouldn't prejudge the outcome of the military investigations.

"While it's too early to pass judgment on what happened, things don't look good," said Sen. James Inhofe (news, bio, voting record), R-Okla.

Added Sen. Ben Nelson (news, bio, voting record), D-Neb.: "If the initial reports are true ... clearly it's an atrocity."

"What we do know is pretty ugly stuff," said Rep. Adam Putnam (news, bio, voting record), R-Fla., who returned from Iraq just days ago. "I fear that Haditha can have even greater negative consequences in perception than Abu Ghraib," where U.S. soldiers abused Iraqi prisoners in 2004.

Rep. C.A. "Dutch" Ruppersberger, D-Md., who also recently returned from Iraq, said that if substantiated, what happened at Haditha "hurts our reputation in the world."

Rumsfeld Pressed To Disclose Findings Of Haditha Probe (AFP)

AFP, June 6, 2006

The top US senator on military affairs pressed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to quickly make public the findings of a probe into the alleged killing of Iraqi civilians by US Marines.

Senate Armed Services Committee chairman John Warner, in a letter to the defense secretary, also vowed to hold a "series of hearings" on the alleged atrocities in the Iraqi town of Haditha on November 19.

"Congress and the American people are entitled to a timely disclosure of the official findings and recommendations of these inquiries," the influential Republican wrote in the June 6 letter.

"Delays in getting out the official findings of fact due to a protracted review process will mean a mixture of information, misinformation and unconfirmed facts will continue to spiral in the public domain," he said.

"Given the alleged seriousness of these events ... these hearings are the first priority of our committee," the senator wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0032352

The Pentagon is investigating whether US Marines killed 24 civilians in Haditha, a town northwest of Baghdad, after a marine was killed by a roadside bomb.

A separate inquiry is looking into whether there was a military coverup of the killings.

Pentagon officials have said the investigations are nearing completion but not given an indication when findings will be released.

Senators Press Pentagon On Haditha Hearings (NYT)

By David S. Cloud And Eric Schmitt

New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — The Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee told the Pentagon on Tuesday that he planned to hold hearings "at the earliest possible date" into the reports of killings of civilians by marines in Haditha, Iraq. Other senators complained that the Defense Department had been slow to share details about the case.

In a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the chairman, John W. Warner of Virginia, asked the Pentagon to make available Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell, the Army general who is conducting one of two investigations into the incident. The inquiries are expected to find that marines killed at least some of the 24 civilians slain without provocation after a roadside bomb killed a lance corporal in their squad.

Democrats on the committee expressed growing frustration that the Pentagon was not sharing details about the inquiries since Time magazine published an article in March challenging the military's explanation of the deaths.

"They were very slow in notifying the committee, just like they were very slow in doing everything else," said Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the committee's senior Democrat. He added that military officials in Iraq "knew there was something amiss" but did not start the two investigations until March 9.

In his letter, Mr. Warner warned Mr. Rumsfeld not to delay making witnesses available to Congress. "Delays in getting out the official findings of fact due to a protracted review process will mean a mixture of information, misinformation and unconfirmed facts will continue to spiral in the public domain," Mr. Warner wrote.

Speaking to reporters after dedicating a new Islamic prayer center at the Marine base in Quantico, Va., the deputy defense secretary, Gordon R. England, and the Marine Corps commandant, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, pledged thorough inquiries. "If we find people who have violated our standards, they'll be held accountable," General Hagee said.

General Bargewell's inquiry is expected to be sent to the second-ranking general in Iraq within the next few days, said a House Republican who received a briefing on Saturday from the officer in Baghdad.

Representative John Kline, a Minnesota Republican and a former marine, said in a telephone interview that he and three other lawmakers were told by the officer, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, that General Bargewell's inquiry was voluminous and "virtually completed."

But General Chiarelli told the lawmakers that before he approved the inquiry's conclusions, he wanted to ensure that it contained any major findings from the criminal inquiry.

Quantico Islamic Center Dedicated (WP)

By Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

In the official speeches, no one mentioned Haditha. But as the Islamic Prayer Center was dedicated yesterday at the Marine Corps Base in Quantico, recent violence in Iraq, including the killing of 24 civilians in the western Iraqi town, allegedly by Marines, was on the mind of some.

Aisha Greenleaf Abdul-Mateen sat in a folding chair behind rows of other folding chairs, listening as Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England and Gen. Michael W. Hagee, commandant of the Marine Corps, spoke about the significance of the day -- the first Muslim prayer center for the Marines. She sat there as they pointed to the small white building behind them as a symbol of America's religious tolerance. And she remained there after they finished their speeches, took off their shoes and walked inside the center with a gaggle of journalists in tow.

DOJ_NMG_0032353

"If they would have asked someone like me to say something, they would have got the truth," said Abdul-Mateen, a Muslim and wife of a veteran.

She would have stood at the podium and said that the Islamic Prayer Center was a "beautiful, beautiful thing" but long overdue. She would have said that it shows "equality" and "justice" and "respect," but that those qualities were being lost in the bigger picture of the Iraq war. That the leaders weren't following what God wants.

"If they were," she said, "we wouldn't be in Iraq doing what we're doing -- hurting innocent people, having them take their clothes off and siccing dogs on them, and even what they're doing in Cuba."

Yesterday's ceremony marked the dedication of the building that has been in use by the base's Muslim community since the end of last year. The plan is to build a larger facility by 2009 to serve as a religious activities and family support center. Several who attended the ceremony described it as a positive step in relations with the Muslim community in the United States after a series of reported missteps recently in Iraq, such as the alleged atrocity in Haditha.

"The event was timely," said Ghayth Nur Kashif, an imam who served in the Korean war. "It's not going to be enough, but it's a start."

Lt. Abuhena Saifulislam, a U.S. Navy chaplain and religious adviser to the U.S. Marines, said the idea for the center came last July when he was assigned to the base. Muslim service members and international students came to him for help.

"They started asking me, 'Can we get a place to pray?' " he said, adding that they had been going off the base to Woodbridge and Stafford.

Saifulislam estimates that 30 people use the center, but he's confident that the number will grow.

"As it is known, they will come," he said.

England said 4,000 Muslim Americans are serving in all branches of the U.S. military. He said the center will be not only a space for them but also a place to educate people about Islam. Inside the center, which is mostly a large, empty room, the walls are decorated with educational posters topped with such questions as "Who is Allah?" and "What do Muslims believe?"

"At the end of the day, we are all brothers and sisters," England said.

Hagee said he believes that everyone shares the basic values of respect for human life, for the truth and for personal property.

"The Islamic Prayer center is really an extension of our ethos, this ethos we take care of one another," he said. "We are a family."

Even those at yesterday's ceremony who did not agree with the war and were solemn when talking about recent events under investigation in Haditha agreed that the center was a positive symbol of religious respect.

"This couldn't happen in any other country except America. It wouldn't happen in the Middle East," said Christopher Bell, a Vietnam veteran who started the Muslim-American Veteran Association. "We have our problems, but this is the greatest country as far as freedom goes."

Rumsfeld Is Correct - The Truth Will Get Out (NYT/IHT)

By Roger Cohen

New York Times/International Herald Tribune, June 7, 2006

NEW YORK "Ultimately the truth gets out, notwithstanding people's efforts to the contrary."

This sentence was uttered last week by Donald Rumsfeld, the U.S. defense secretary, during a visit to Singapore. He was irritated at the time, as he often is, by what he regarded as a boneheaded question from a journalist about whether the Pentagon was too obsessed with Iraq to watch China's military.

But of course the words have a wider relevance to the Rumsfeldian universe. Indeed, in the mouth of their author they amount to a gem. The defense secretary, by design or despite himself, and more often the latter, is a master of the bon mot. Alas, he is not a master of self-criticism.

This, after all, is the same man who, back in 2002, tried to argue that the absence of evidence for Iraqi weapons of mass destruction needed some perspective. "Simply because you do not have evidence that something exists does not mean that you have evidence that it doesn't exist," he declared.

Or, as he put it in attempting to elaborate: "Absence of evidence is not evidence of absence." Or, trying again: "There are things we know that we know. There are known unknowns; that is to say there are things that we now know we don't know. But there are also unknown unknowns. There are things we do not know we don't know."

It seems Rumsfeld has a French side. Where is Descartes when you need him?

Unraveling all this was never simple. The unknown unknown: that's deep. But ultimately the truth gets out and lends itself to a simple declarative sentence. There were no Iraqi weapons of mass destruction.

This is also the man who responded to the wholesale looting in the wake of Saddam Hussein's downfall in 2003 by saying, "Freedom's untidy, and free people are free to make mistakes and commit crimes and do bad things." Or, in a more succinct exegesis: "Stuff happens."

Yes, stuff does, and ultimately the truth gets out.

The truth, in this case, that Rumsfeld was so focused on the plan of attack in Iraq and securing Saddam's overthrow with a lean force, he had no time for any plan for the aftermath. So there was no post-invasion plan worth its name, to stop looting or a gathering insurgency.

Nor did Rumsfeld have time for the senior commander who questioned his nonplan. General Eric Shinseki, the former chief of staff of the army, was humiliated after suggesting "several hundred thousand troops" would be needed to secure Iraq. Rumsfeld didn't even bother to attend his retirement ceremony.

All this braggadocio ended up leaving the troops on the ground in Iraq exposed. Staff Sergeant Christopher Bush told me patrols in 2003 were known as "suicide runs." Humvees had no armor or turret shields.

Bush would remove the fiberglass doors so that it was easier to shoot; the doors were useless anyway. "Nobody told us to expect or prepare for that warfare," Bush said.

Least of all the defense secretary, whose lapidary comment was: "As you know, you go to war with the army you have, not the army you might want or wish to have at a later time."

But ultimately the truth gets out. You go to a war of choice, when you are the U.S. military, in the strength you opt to deploy, and if your calculation of that deployment - its nature, challenges and duration - is erroneous, you pay the price in the form of more than 2,400 dead Americans.

Or, as marine Lieutenant General Gregory Newbold, one of the retired generals who called for Rumsfeld's departure earlier this year, put it: decisions were made "with a casualness and swagger that are the special province of those who have never had to execute these missions - or bury the results."

On the subject of such burials, by the way, Rumsfeld has another bon mot: "Death has a tendency to encourage a depressing view of war."

Yes, Mr. Secretary, it does.

Another truth about death is now coming out. It concerns what happened on Nov. 19, 2005, in the farming town of Haditha, in Iraq's troubled Anbar Province. On that day, 24 Iraqi civilians were killed, as first reported by Time magazine.

An initial statement from the marines said 15 had been killed by a roadside bomb, and others by marines returning fire when their convoy was attacked.

It now appears, on the contrary, that a military investigation will confirm that, as Representative John Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, has said, "Our troops overreacted because of the pressure on them, and they killed innocent civilians in cold blood."

Stuff happens. People lose it on Los Angeles freeways or in the New York subway. They lose it more often, and more devastatingly, when they're in a war against a shadowy enemy moving seamlessly through a sympathetic civilian population. We all remember My Lai.

Haditha is not My Lai. But it may resemble it at least in this respect: the suggestion of a cover-up in the aftermath of the killing is strong. Rumsfeld is promising clarity: "There's an investigation going on as to what took place. There's an investigation going as to what took place after whatever took place."

That French side, again.

DOJ_NMG_0032355

I don't doubt Rumsfeld wants a thorough investigation. But there's a problem: when swagger and cavalier lack of preparation and disregard for facts have been your hallmarks, things tend to happen in your image. That's a truth Rumsfeld may ultimately have to face.

He said something else in Singapore, about Iraq. "Suddenly they are going to have a constitution - a piece of paper - that's going to have to hold the country together; not repression by a vicious dictator, but a piece of paper. And that is a big thing."

It sure is. And it needed more nurturing than Rumsfeld had patience for. Which is not a reason to cut and run now. Ultimately the truth gets out.

"Lawfare" Over Haditha (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

The unfolding investigation of last November's events in Haditha reveals much more about the Bush administration's critics than it does about the U.S. armed forces. Although the inquiry is ongoing, it appears that 24 unarmed Iraqi civilians were deliberately murdered, allegedly by American Marines seeking revenge for a fallen comrade. If true, the episode was a war crime, something that must be -- and no doubt will be -- severely punished. However, the administration's critics are already cynically leveraging the Haditha killings as a means of undercutting the president, heedless of the effect this may have on American national interests.

Here is an outline of the emerging anti-Bush thesis: Haditha was the fault not of a handful of Marines, but of an administration that has refused to honor international law. As support, critics point to the administration's refusal to grant Geneva Convention rights to al Qaeda or the Taliban, to the use of aggressive interrogation techniques to obtain intelligence from terrorist detainees, and to a determination not to treat these individuals as ordinary criminal defendants. All of this is claimed despite the fact that the most fundamental aspects of administration policy -- that the U.S. is at war, that individuals captured in this war can be held without trial as "enemy combatants" or tried by a military commission -- have been vindicated so far by the courts.

Nevertheless, the killings at Haditha and a handful of other incidents in which U.S. troops have violated the laws of war (and are in the process of being punished) are already being cited as evidence of a systematic problem with American forces abroad and American leadership at home. In fact, although scores of atrocities have been alleged in Iraq and Afghanistan, the vast majority have been false claims. Most recently, for example, charges that U.S. forces executed civilians during a March 15 night-time raid on an al Qaeda safe house in Ishaqi proved to be groundless.

To put things in perspective, it is worth noting that abuses and violations of the laws of war have occurred in every armed conflict in human history, regardless of how well-led or disciplined were the troops involved. Indeed, by the standards of past conflicts, U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan have behaved in exemplary fashion, using force in combat with unprecedented precision, minimizing collateral damage and civilian deaths -- often at risk to themselves and to their mission. In Iraq, this has been the case even though American forces are fighting in the toughest possible urban insurgency environment.

Overall, all U.S. forces, including the Marines, have used deadly force in a proportionate and discriminate manner, fully in accord with the laws and customs of war. By contrast, our enemies engage in war crimes on a daily basis as a matter of policy. For them, targeting civilians is not the exception but the rule -- it is the essence of the "asymmetrical" warfare they practice.

Throughout history, irregular forces have used the surrounding civilian population in two distinct ways. First, guerrilla fighters do not wear uniforms or carry their arms openly -- critical elements of lawful warfare -- so as to hide among the civilian population. In effect, they use civilians as shields. Second, like the insurgents in Iraq, they seek to goad opponents into mistakenly, or deliberately, attacking civilians -- as a means of mobilizing the population against the regulars. The killings at Haditha show how this strategy can work.

However, the advent of modern media coverage -- coupled with a growing and valid concern among democracies about humanitarian norms during warfare -- has provided a new tactical innovation, increasingly known as "lawfare." Al Qaeda and the Iraqi insurgents thus routinely claim that American forces systematically violate the laws of war by targeting civilians and abusing prisoners. These claims are not targeted at the Iraqi people (although similar claims regarding insults to Islamic believers are so directed) but at public and, especially, elite opinion in the U.S. and other democracies. With Vietnam as its model, the Iraqi insurgency well understands that it can win only by undermining America's political will to win, and the center of gravity in this conflict lies in Washington, not Baghdad or the Sunni Triangle.

DOJ_NMG_0032356

These lawfare tactics have several other important consequences. If the Pentagon's investigation of Haditha was delayed, it was most likely because similar massacre allegations are made virtually every time American forces take to the field. The fact that, in Iraq, IED explosions are so often followed by insurgent attacks launched from civilian structures also clearly gave credence to the initial -- and evidently incorrect -- reports from Haditha. When civilian buildings are used in insurgent operations, civilians often are killed in the crossfire, and so the report that a number of civilians had been killed by small arms in Haditha would not have appeared exceptional to the U.S. commanders.

Ultimately, the Haditha incident must remind American policy makers -- and the American people -- of the challenges of modern warfare. Although the individual actions of U.S. forces on that day may have been exceptional, the surrounding circumstances are not -- and our enemies will look more and more to such irregular tactics. The Pentagon's emphasis on exhaustively training American troops in the laws of war is a good first step. U.S. forces already are the best equipped and trained in history, and it is only through a constant emphasis on duty, discipline and American values that our armed forces will prevail in Iraq and similar conflicts.

At the same time, should the Haditha incident mature into a full-fledged war crimes drama prompting a premature U.S. withdrawal, the damage would not be limited to Iraq. If the U.S. cannot fight and win against a brutal urban insurgency in Iraq today, its ability to defeat any determined foe willing to sacrifice the civilian population in irregular warfare will be in question. This can only benefit the most vicious regimes and movements. The Bush administration's critics should pause a moment, and reflect, on whether this would really be worth it.

Messrs. Rivkin and Casey, lawyers in Washington, served in the Justice Department under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Torture As Defined By The Media (WT)

By Douglas MacKinnon

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

In case you have been the least bit curious as to why al Qaeda and other Islamist terrorist organizations are convinced -- beyond a mushroom-cloud shadow of a doubt -- that they can defeat the United States, the evidence is no further away than your newspaper, radio, network or cable news outlet. If all else fails, the twisted leadership of these evil terrorist organizations know they can always count on the liberals in the mainstream media, as well as the liberals in Congress and Europe, to act as their unquestioning propaganda ministers. To prove that what we once believed to be up is now down, and what we thought to be right is now wrong, we have several examples that embolden al Qaeda with every news report or printed word.

First, is the case of Army Sgt. Santos A. Cardona. Don't recognize the name of this very honorable man? Maybe it will ring a bell if I said he was the "dog handler" recently found guilty of using a dog to unlawfully threaten a former high-ranking Baath Party member. Or, as some liberals in the press have maintained, found guilty of "torture." How hard must murderer Abu Musab Zarqawi be laughing with that news. He brutally beheads Nicholas Berg and then reads that some in our country equate a distinguished soldier holding a barking dog in front of a prisoner with "torture." Of course, let us not forget why Nicholas Berg was killed. Zarqawi said it was to avenge the "abuse" of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison. A story that CBS News proudly broke with apparently no thoughts as to the consequences of its action. Would Nick Berg be alive today had CBS not run the story? No one will ever know. But as a Pentagon source told me with regard to Abu Ghraib, "the liberal media turned what was really nothing more than a fraternity prank gone bad into 'torture,' and as an instrument to dishonor the U.S. military."

Next on the list of "torture" as defined by the liberals in the media, Congress and Europe is something called "waterboarding." Not familiar with this brand of "torture"? It's a method that may be employed by the CIA in which terrorists who harbor information about future attacks against the U.S. or U.S. forces are strapped to a board and dunked into water so as to prod their faulty memories.

DOJ_NMG_0032357

To say the New York Times, The Washington Post, the major networks, and every other liberal news organization is outraged by this alleged treatment of terrorists would be an understatement. Never mind that such tactics may save thousands of lives in the U.S. or hundreds of U.S. troops. As far as the liberals are concerned, it is an evil beyond comprehension.

Again, if dunking a known terrorist into water for a few seconds is "torture," what word would the Times, Post or networks use to describe what the insurgents do to the young Iraqi policemen they capture? Young men who are only trying to feed their families and help their nation. Young men who, before they are shot to death or beheaded, have their teeth ripped out with pliers, have their fingernails torn out, are burned with cigarettes, have their fingers sliced off, and are electrocuted. The liberals in the media don't seem too worked up about this real torture.

Don't take my word for it. Do an online search and compare how many words the New York Times and Washington Post use to condemn our nation and "waterboarding," as opposed to the unthinkable torture these young Iraqi policemen endure.

Finally, we have the case of Haditha -- a town in Iraq where U.S. Marines may have knowingly killed innocent civilians. If in fact this happened, it's a disgrace and those guilty must pay the highest price possible. That said, these Marines are U.S. citizens who deserve every right granted to them under our laws--innocent until proven guilty being paramount.

Of course, as far as the left-of-center media is concerned, these Marines are already war criminals. And, if truth be told, the media could care less about their guilt or innocence. The media are just grateful that they have the Haditha case with which to hammer the Bush administration and tarnish the 99.9 percent of U.S. soldiers who have not only served honorably, but many of whom have lost their lives to save Iraqi civilians. The liberals in the media understand that with each news report on the new My Lai, each case where a U.S. soldier is punished for letting a dog bark in the face of a war prisoner, with every story that equates dunking a terrorist in water with chopping off a human head, they tell these Islamist terrorists that political correctness is weakening our foreign policy and military and robbing us of our will to prosecute the war or defend our nation. They know but don't care. For them, the real enemy is Mr. Bush and conservative beliefs.

Down is now up. Wrong is now right. And the terrorists are not only grateful, but on the way.

Douglas MacKinnon served as press secretary to former Sen. Bob Dole and as a White House and Pentagon official.

Iraqi To Release Detainees In Bid To Ease Tensions (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 6 — Iraq's new government said Tuesday that it would release 2,500 detainees, nearly 10 percent of those held in Iraqi and American detention centers, and that it would adopt a "national reconciliation" plan to reintegrate former members of Saddam Hussein's ruling Baath Party into society.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said the first 500 detainees would be released Wednesday, with others following in the next few days. An American military spokesman said the decision to free the detainees, the largest group to be released in the 38 months since the American-led invasion, had been agreed to in a joint review by Iraqi and American officials. He said those freed would not include any deemed "guilty of serious crimes such as bombings, torture, kidnapping and murder."

Mr. Maliki, in his third week in office, gave few details of the reconciliation program. But he compared it to South Africa's "truth and reconciliation" process in the 1990's, which, he said, "sent some criminals to the courts and reinstated other people in society after promising not to try and rebuild" the country's apartheid system. The Iraqi leader said his government's plan, like South Africa's, would involve a national commission, and others in Iraq's 18 provinces, that would work to "an agreed timetable and program."

At a news conference here, the 56-year-old prime minister drove home the carrot-and-stick approach he outlined in a visit last week to the southern oil city of Basra. There, he vowed to use "an iron fist" to crush Sunni Arab insurgents and sectarian militias terrorizing Basra, but promised that his government would rule in ways that would make a priority of rebuilding Iraq on the basis of justice for the communities of Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds now engaged in a bitter struggle for economic and political power.

On Tuesday, Mr. Maliki's focus was on the Sunni Arab minority that was the mainstay of Mr. Hussein's rule. "We are ready to turn a new page with those who so desire it, and we will respond with force to those who want to pursue violence," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0032358

"Those who want to end the bitterness of the past have the way open through the process of national reconciliation, but those who choose bloodshed will find us ready to deal with them."

The detainee release, though sweeping, seemed likely to fall far short of the demands of Sunni politicians who have joined in the uneasy partnership with the dominant Shiites in the new government, the first with a full, four-year tenure since Mr. Hussein's overthrow. The Interior Ministry said Tuesday that a total of 27,800 people were being held in Iraqi and American prisons across the country — a figure that included criminals and former Baathists as well as insurgents and members of their support network.

A spokesman for the American military command, Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, said there were about 14,500 detainees in the detention centers run by the American-led forces, including several thousand at Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad.

Colonel Curry said the terms of the detainees' release included a pledge to renounce violence "and to be good citizens of Iraq." He added, "All of these detainees selected for release have been found to be relatively low threats."

Similar pledges have been made by other detainees released since Iraq resumed sovereignty after the formal period of American occupation ended two years ago, including a group of nearly 1,000 men who were freed from Abu Ghraib last August. Some of those have since been killed in clashes with American and Iraqi troops, or rearrested on suspicion of involvement in the insurgency. The August release was ordered as a concession to Sunni Arab leaders then engaged in tense negotiations with Shiite and Kurdish leaders over the new Constitution.

Mr. Maliki's message on Tuesday offered assurances to Shiites and Kurds who were Mr. Hussein's principal victims, and, implicitly, to American and Iraqi troops, who with Shiites have borne the brunt of the Sunni-led insurgency that has gripped the heartland of Iraq.

The detainees being freed, he said, "are not Saddamists, terrorists or people with the blood of the Iraqi people on their hands, but people who have committed certain mistakes, cooperated in a certain manner or played some kind of role" in Mr. Hussein's repression and what has followed.

But the Iraqi leader's emphasis on reconciliation, and the detainee releases, seemed to signal a breakthrough for American officials, who have been pressing hard for new measures to placate the Sunni Arab minority. In effect, Mr. Maliki's announcements signaled to Shiites, whose religious parties secured a dominant role in the government after last December's election, that there needs to be a softening in the "de-Baathification" process that has marginalized thousands of Sunni Arabs who worked in Mr. Hussein's government and armed forces.

Strongly backed by Shiite leaders, the process won eager backing from the American occupation authority after the 2003 invasion. But American officials have all but disavowed the process now, seeing it as one of the prime causes of Sunni discontent that feeds the insurgency.

"We know that there are a lot of Baathists who want to put the heavy burden of having joined this ugly party behind them," Mr. Maliki said, and the mechanism for their doing so would lie in the reconciliations commissions and the opportunity to pledge "not to return to the party and rejoin society."

In a move that underscored the tide of violence that has many Iraqis saying they preferred life under Mr. Hussein's harsh dictatorship, the Health Ministry confirmed figures on Tuesday that showed 6,002 bodies, most victims of violence, were delivered to Baghdad's main morgue in the first five months of this year.

The figure for May, 1,375, was more than double the figure for May last year. Morgue officials have said that as many as 20 of the daily average of more than 40 bodies that arrive every day, many of them blindfolded, with tied wrists and showing signs of torture, remain unclaimed.

On Tuesday, police reported at least 25 new victims, most of them in Baghdad and in Diyala Province, east and north of the capital, which has been the center of some of the most brutal sectarian killings involving Sunnis and Shiites in recent weeks.

The death toll in one of the most grisly recent attacks, in the village of Hadid, near the Diyala provincial capital of Baquba, rose to 17 on Tuesday when the police delivered nine severed heads to the Baquba morgue in the fruit boxes in which they were found in the village.

On Saturday, eight other heads were found in the village. Notes found with the bodies indicated that the victims were Sunnis killed in retaliation for the killings of five Shiites, four of them doctors, in a earlier attack.

DOJ_NMG_0032359

On Sunday, 20 people traveling in two minibuses and a car were stopped on a highway near Baquba, pulled from their vehicles and shot. The victims included seven students on their way to final exams in the city. Mr. Maliki, at his news conference, spoke angrily of the "flood of blood" that had been spilled in similar attacks in and around Baghdad since he came to office.

He said his government had approved a plan for a security crackdown by Iraqi and American troops that would concentrate on Baghdad and Diyala, which he described as "a launching pad for terrorists and former regime elements," meaning Baathists, who use the province as a base for attacks in Baghdad.

His comments tallied with those of American military commanders, who have identified Baghdad, Diyala and Anbar Province, to the west of the capital, and particularly the provincial capital of Ramadi, where insurgents have mounted some of their boldest attacks of the war in the past month, as priorities in the next phase of the war.

Mr. Maliki's first weeks as Iraq's leader have been burdened by his failure to win approval from rival factions in the government for nominees to the cabinet's top security posts.

He told reporters that he would try again at a meeting of Parliament on Thursday, and that he would be submitting the same names — Farouk al-Araji, a Shiite who was an officer in Mr. Hussein's army until 1993, as interior minister, and Gen. Abdel Qader Mohammed Jassim, a Sunni who is a commander in the new army, as defense minister. Their names were to have been put to Parliament on Sunday, but disagreement within the government caused the session to be canceled.

Iraq's Premier Planning To Free 2,500 Detainees (WP)

By Omar Fekeiki And Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, June 6 -- The Iraqi prime minister announced Tuesday that he would release 2,500 detainees from jail in an effort to calm tensions between Iraq's sectarian and ethnic groups and head off spreading violence.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called the move a "positive message and a chance for those who want to rethink their strategy." He specifically excluded detainees connected to violent attacks and supporters of the former government of Saddam Hussein from his amnesty.

The people to be released "are not Saddamists or terrorists," Maliki said at a news conference. "They weren't involved in the bloodshed or imposing the sectarian mentality and cleansing. They are people who made mistakes."

The first group of 500 detainees will be released Wednesday, Maliki said. About 28,700 detainees are being held at U.S. and Iraqi detention facilities in Iraq, according to a U.N. human rights report issued last month.

Iraq's Interior Ministry, which controls the police force, holds about 5,000 of those detainees, even though the ministry is not supposed to keep detainees in custody for a long time. Sunni Arabs critical of the Shiite-dominated police force have regularly demanded the release of detainees, saying they are often tortured in police custody. The U.N. report also reported the accusations.

Leaders of the Association of Muslim Scholars, an influential Sunni Arab organization, said Monday that they wouldn't participate in a broad-based national reconciliation conference on June 20 unless all detainees were released. The Arab League, which is organizing the conference, hopes to attract a broad range of political, religious and tribal leaders, as well as some leaders of armed groups willing to lay down their arms.

Maliki said the planned release of the 2,500 detainees wasn't an answer to the Sunni association's demands. But he said it proved the government's commitment to moving ahead with Iraq's future by creating "a positive environment" for peace.

"It is not a compromise," Maliki said. "Whoever wants to reconcile shouldn't make conditions. They should come to discuss and talk. Conversation is the main factor for reconciliation."

Maliki said the move did not mean Iraq was changing its strategy for dealing with an epidemic of violence that has escalated since his government was formed 2 1/2 weeks ago.

"There is no change," Maliki said. "Using force against the terrorists will continue. Releasing detainees who weren't involved in the shedding of Iraqi blood will continue. And the national reconciliation process will continue."

DOJ_NMG_0032360

So far, however, Maliki's government has been hamstrung by his inability to gain a consensus on who should run three security ministries with control of the police and army. At the news conference, he said the candidates will be presented at the next session of parliament; a session scheduled for last Sunday was postponed because of last-minute bickering.

"The government alone cannot deal with the security issue," Maliki said. "The role of the people is very important in maintaining security."

Meanwhile, military authorities reported Tuesday night that a bomb killed a U.S. soldier of the 49th Military Police Brigade on Monday. Iraqi police and news services also reported the deaths of more than 30 Iraqis, including nine whose severed heads were discovered in Diyala province, north of Baghdad.

Iraq's Tougher Stance Toward US (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

Christian Science Monitor, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Abu Ghraib prison scandal was a contentious topic when Iyad Allawi became Iraq's interim prime minister in June 2004. But Mr. Allawi, appointed by the occupying power, resisted domestic pressure to conduct an Iraqi investigation.

Now, amid charges of violence by US troops against Iraqi civilians, including an alleged massacre in the Sunni village of Haditha, elected Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is showing no such reticence. A critic of the US occupation before taking office, he has charged that such violence by coalition forces is a "daily phenomenon" and "a terrible crime," and demanded that the US turn over to Iraqis information on the Haditha case.

Mr. Maliki's tough stance suggests a new assertion of sovereignty by the Iraqi government, something that actually works to the US's favor. But the allegations, coming as the new government tries to demonstrate control, are likely to complicate both US-Iraq relations and Maliki's task of leading the Iraqi people.

Already, some Sunni religious and political leaders, in particular, are criticizing Maliki, a Shiite, for not being strong enough with the Americans. If his response falls short in their eyes, political relations with the minority Sunni population, already fragile, could become more difficult - and anti-American sentiment could intensify.

"Maliki is being hammered by the Sunnis. He has to worry about the rising fortunes of people like [radical Shiite cleric Moqtada] al-Sadr. So he needs to be able to show some sovereignty," says Iraq expert Henri Barkey, a former State Department analyst now at Lehigh University in Bethlehem, Pa. "The trick for the US is to boost this guy, because there may not be another one after him."

A year ago, a minority of members in Iraq's interim national assembly sought a timetable for US troop withdrawal. In the new parliament, Mr. Sadr's supporters are even stronger. That, coupled with the parliamentary presence of a Sunni bloc, has added to pressure for a US withdrawal.

Maliki has a "soft spot" for that viewpoint, says one Iraqi former official who refused to be named because of the sensitive nature of US-Iraq relations. But the prime minister also knows he needs US troops to cope with a worsening security situation in Baghdad and other areas of Iraq, the former official says. As a result, Maliki is likely to seek compromise measures short of withdrawal - including establishing zones that are off limits to US troops and requiring joint US-Iraqi patrols - to try to placate public concerns.

Incidents like the one alleged in Haditha, which can feed Iraqi resentment about living in insecurity, only make Maliki's task harder, some experts say.

"Incidents like Haditha have the effect of widening the gap further between the people and the government, because they leave them feeling like they are totally on their own," says Juan Cole, an Iraq expert at the University of Michigan. Iraqis see their new elected officials operating from inside Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, he says, while they remain "outside" in the crossfire of a counterinsurgency battle and a "civil war."

In that environment, threats to civilians are not uniquely or primarily from US forces. Just this week, more than 50 civilians were kidnapped midday just north of the Green Zone. A Sunni political group accused militias associated with the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry of carrying out the operation.

DOJ_NMG_0032361

On Tuesday, Maliki pledged to implement a new security plan for Baghdad that he said will address mounting sectarian and militia-generated violence.

With such worries, Maliki can't be too tough with the Americans, Mr. Cole says. "The government is in a difficult position because it's not able to tell the Americans to leave or what to do, but at the same time it needs to mollify a public that accuses it of letting American troops operate around the country marauding at will."

Simply "demanding the Haditha file" from the US "is a symbolic gesture that only reveals his dependence on the American side," Cole says. What could begin to remedy that is a formal status of forces agreement, or SOFA, between the US and Iraq that would lay out the functions and limits of US forces, he adds.

"The problem is they have what is essentially a hung parliament" - unable to fill the key defense and interior minister positions - "and that hardly puts them in a position to demand a SOFA," Cole says.

If the Iraqi public comes to see its government as weak or atrophied, that would spell trouble ahead, especially as officials begin to tackle major constitutional issues.

Divisive matters - including the formation of autonomous regions, the dividing of oil revenues, and the status of the northern oil-rich hub of Kirkuk - are slated to be settled by the end of the year. Resolving them was supposed to be facilitated by the inclusion of Sunnis in the new parliament and government, but mounting Sunni criticism of Maliki is just one indication of how difficult progress will be to achieve.

For one thing, Maliki - and his US backers - are discovering that the proudly proclaimed "national unity government" that represents all major population groups may actually be more unwieldy and less able to act.

In a recent report, Iraq expert Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies notes: "Rising participation did not reflect acceptance of the new government or political process, it reflected a steady sharpening of political division along sectarian and ethnic lines."

Some experts calculate that Maliki has fewer than 120 supporters in a 275-seat parliament. "If the Maliki government does not make real headway on security and the constitutional issues," says the former Iraqi official, "then it could go down."

Another Grisly Discovery In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

BAGHDAD — When they saw the boxes in the street, villagers feared the worst: bombs or props for an ambush. The boxes' content, however, was grisly, not explosive. Inside, officers found the decomposing heads of nine men, each inside a black plastic bag.

The discovery Tuesday was the second of its kind near the city of Baqubah in recent days, according to police.

As Iraqi politicians have continued to bicker over who should be named to the new government's top security jobs, killings and brutality have escalated across the country, claiming thousands of lives since December elections.

In Baqubah, a mixed city north of the capital, slayings and attacks against Iraqi security forces have recently soared. On Saturday, eight other heads were found in banana crates near the city. One of the heads was wrapped like a present. None of the bodies have been found.

But Baghdad continues to be the epicenter of violence.

On Tuesday, authorities reported that a car bomb went off near a funeral in a southwestern neighborhood, killing six people and injuring 18. In a different part of town, a roadside bomb exploded at a bus stop, killing one woman and wounding two men.

Earlier in the day, the principal of Hamza primary school, Amer Azzawi, a Sunni Muslim, was driving with his Shiite Muslim assistant, Suaad Rubaie, when a drive-by gunman killed them. They were slain in the vast Shiite slum of Sadr City in the eastern part of the capital.

On the west side of Baghdad, police found the body of a young woman who had been shot several times.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military announced that an American soldier with the 49th Military Police Brigade was killed Monday evening when insurgents attacked his convoy with an improvised explosive device in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0032362

In a news conference Tuesday, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki promised to implement a new security plan for Baghdad soon but refused to provide details. Maliki instead focused on the release of 2,500 detainees from Iraqi- and U.S.-run prisons as part of a campaign of "national reconciliation."

However, the country has seemingly continued to splinter since the parliamentary elections.

Basra, a key port city in the south close to the Iranian and Kuwaiti borders, has recently become a problem area, with violence exploding between competing Shiite factions. After a recent visit, Maliki imposed a monthlong state of emergency in the city.

West of Baghdad, in Ramadi, described as the "philosophical heart of the insurgency" by U.S. commanders, insurgents continue to attack U.S. troops on a daily basis. Several neighborhoods are controlled by insurgents, according to residents. The U.S. military recently deployed 1,500 additional troops to Al Anbar province, of which Ramadi is the capital.

On Tuesday, the U.S. military announced that Iraqi soldiers had taken over from American troops in Habbaniya, a town in Al Anbar province between Fallouja and Ramadi.

It was the first division-level transfer of authority in the western province, according to the military.

However, there as elsewhere, American-led troops will continue to provide logistical aid to the Iraqi soldiers, including medical evacuation and aerial support.

Basra's Descent Bodes Poorly For Allied Mission In Iraq (USAT)

USA Today, June 7, 2006

As Basra goes, so goes Iraq?

It certainly, and worryingly, seems that way.

Three years ago, as the initial military victory in Iraq teetered into chaos, the southern, mainly Shiite city of Basra stood out as a hopeful symbol of how the country could recover. The British, who controlled it, put decades of colonial know-how to work.

They made friends with local leaders, patrolled on foot without helmets and fixed problems on the spot.

It seemed to work. Basra was touted as a hopeful showcase for coaxing Iraq into a stable democracy.

Three years later, what's happening in Basra is far more ominous. The British occupiers are no longer so welcome or as much in control. Rival militias duke it out on the streets. There has been ethnic cleansing of Sunnis, who held power when Saddam Hussein was in charge.

Last week, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki imposed a state of emergency there — but to little effect. Violence since then has included a weekend car bombing that left 28 dead and more than 60 injured.

Major Rob Yuill, a British official who trains Basra's police, told The (London) Times the city was becoming like sectarian Bosnia, and "we're stuck in the middle." Though security forces are being trained, most are loyal to one of the militias.

What happens in Basra could well set the agenda for the rest of the country. The city of 1.3 million people is Iraq's main port and center for the country's 60% Shiite majority. It sits on large oil reserves. Some Shiites want to form a quasi-independent superstate with Basra at its center. They want to abandon the minority Sunnis, leaving them with no oil.

Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, a revered Shiite cleric, has tried to hold Iraq together and ethnic bloodshed down, but his influence has seemed to wane lately. The elected unity government in Baghdad — the last best hope for quelling the insurgency and a slide into civil war — is so weak it hasn't even managed to appoint ministers of interior and defense, the two most important posts.

The situation in Basra raises a question: Does it make more sense to stay to try to quell increasing sectarian and terrorist violence, or leave and let Iraqis fight it out? British officials have talked of drawing down troops soon — while insisting that their mission has been more success than failure.

Their decision is likely to foreshadow the U.S. endgame in Iraq. Perhaps some uneasy calm can first be achieved. But right now, Basra seems more to reinforce Lawrence of Arabia's cautionary words in 1920 about British involvement in Iraq. Mesopotamia (as Iraq used to be known) was, Lawrence said, "a trap from which it will be hard to escape with dignity and honor."

Salvaging Iraq (WP)

By David Ignatius

DOJ_NMG_0032363

Washington Post, June 7, 2006

The images from Iraq are of hell on earth: On Sunday 12 Iraqi students traveling to Baqubah to take their final exams were dragged from a bus and killed because they practiced the wrong religion. The next day gunmen dressed in police uniforms kidnapped 56 people near the bus station in central Baghdad and hauled them off in pickup trucks.

This is an Iraqi nightmare, and America seems powerless to stop it. What would you think if you were the parent of one of those dead Iraqi children? You would want the United States, the nation that broke the fragile bonds that once held Iraq together, to act more effectively to control this violence. And you would want Iraq's so-called government of national unity to behave like one and stop the killers who are devouring the decent people of Iraq. And if neither the Americans nor the Iraqi government could protect your children, you would turn to the militias.

The American project in Iraq is unraveling. The president continues to talk about staying the course, and the White House still issues upbeat predictions of victory, but the course we are on is not working. The election of Iraq's first permanent government in December was the last good chance to put the pieces together. Nearly seven months after the elections, Iraqi politicians still can't agree on who should run the two key ministries, defense and interior.

An American friend wrote me this week from Iraq: "The civil war rages in Baghdad, regardless of what the PC word currently being used in Washington to describe the killing is these days. Each morning when the sun comes up, the bodies of the killings from the night before are gathered up and sent to the hospitals where they try to figure out who they are. While the new government, all of the ministries, the coalition and the bloated embassy bureaucracy all sit frozen in the Green Zone, this civil war rages on just outside the wire and concrete barriers."

A devastating summary of America's mistakes is contained in the latest installment of the Pentagon's quarterly report to Congress, "Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq." In every part of the country, fewer people than a year ago think the situation is better now than before the war. In the Baghdad area, pollsters found the percentage of optimists had fallen by half since March 2005, to about 30 percent.

And the violence grinds on: The rate of insurgent attacks is higher now than it was in 2004, with an average of more than 600 a week since the new government took over in February. U.S. military commanders talk of their success in splitting the Sunni insurgency, but the attack numbers don't reflect any lessening of its lethality. Meanwhile, the Shiites are fighting back with equal viciousness, and the Pentagon numbers show a sharp rise in sectarian killings over the past year.

What we're seeing in Iraq is a mismatch between ends and means: between a political strategy of unity and the reality of feuding factional leaders; between a military strategy of "clear, hold and build" counterinsurgency and the reality that most American soldiers remain hunkered down every day; between the goal of stabilizing the country and the daily reality of physical intimidation.

What can America do to mitigate the Iraq disaster? Certainly it doesn't need more strategy papers. The political and military strategies now in place talk the right language of unity and counterinsurgency, but this is still mostly Green Zone talk. Marine Capt. Scott A. Cuomo argues in the June edition of Marine Corps Gazette that the U.S. military should make "embedded training teams," living and fighting with the Iraqi security forces, its main effort. He says frankly of his own combat experience in Iraq: "We did very little to truly help indigenous security forces protect the populace from the insurgency."

A bold proposal comes from my friend in Iraq, who knows the security situation there intimately. He argues that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki should move his government's 27 ministries, which increasingly are operating in the Green Zone, out into the city. The Iraqi army would protect each outpost of the government, aided by U.S. teams. "The population needs to see there is a government that has the courage to reclaim the city, one district at a time."

My friend likens the current frantic pace in the Green Zone to people in socks trying to run on a slick linoleum floor. "There is a lot of activity, but very little forward motion," he writes. "Hope is not a strategic plan, and the status quo is unacceptable."

Donors Accused Of Spending Aid Outside Iraq (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032364

Foreign donors spend too much of their aid to Iraq outside the country and ordinary Iraqis do not feel they are being helped by the international community, the country's new minister of planning has told the Financial Times.

Ali Baban said he would push for a comprehensive review of the way aid to Iraq was being spent. He also warned against pressure from the likes of the International Monetary Fund on his country to scrap subsidies on oil products and food, which currently run at $8bn (€6bn, £4bn) annually.

In one of his first salvos since taking office just over two weeks ago, Mr Baban said: "The donor countries must listen to Iraqi needs and to the views of Iraqi officials."

But he also committed his ministry – responsible for development aid and investment – to creating a special division to woo foreign investors. "We will give them all the guarantees they need," he said in Baghdad.

Some 40 to 50 per cent of all foreign aid ends up outside Iraq, says Mr Baban. He accused donor countries of spending the money on foreign advisers and security personnel "usually from the same country that makes the donation. Iraqi people receive very little."

The donor community has long been familiar with the complaint. But one foreign official in Baghdad said that under the current security situation it was inevitable that much training was done outside the country. Similarly, it could not be helped that every infrastructure project has to spend 30 per cent of its budget on security.

Mr Baban warned that the economy could only improve if the security situation was tackled first. But the security situation alone did not account for the "ineffective" way the aid was being spent, he said. Donors put too much emphasis on training courses and capacity building. "When the Iraqi government and the ministries give a list of their needs and requirements, of equipment, buildings, hardware, often this list will be neglected."

The US, with a current aid programme of more than $18bn, has been responsible for most of the larger infrastructure-related projects. But of the more than $10bn that has already been spent, the largest single outlay has been on security and law enforcement, which has been more than $4bn, according to the Washington-based Brookings Institution.

Donors other than the US had pledged $14bn to Iraq, as of December 2005, notes the report. Of this, just over $3bn has been disbursed.

International institutions, meanwhile, thought the country would need $56bn in reconstruction and stabilisation aid from 2004 to 2007, a number that Brookings says is probably too low.

But rebuilding the country's infrastructure was ultimately up to the Iraqis, said the aid official in Baghdad, noting that the country was potentially very rich. "They have to get their own house in order, with the allocation of oil resources and the priorities for their ministries."

Mr Baban warned that Iraq might not be able to enact economic reform soon, or reduce subsidies as envisioned by the International Monetary Fund.

"I hope the IMF will take into consideration the situation in Iraq and not pressure us to do what will be hard for our people, especially cancelling subsidies," he said.

Iraq spends large amounts on subsidies for oil products and food that is still distributed through a state network.

Mr Baban said that lifting these subsidies now would undermine confidence in the government.

He was worried about the impact on foreign investment of provisions in the country's new federalist constitution that allocate oil resources to regional authorities. "It will make foreign companies hesitate to invest a dollar in new Iraqi fields," he said. He feared it might threaten the future of the Iraqi petroleum industry. The constitution would have to be amended, he said.

'We Have Your Husband' (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

LaPORTE, Ind. -- A sign stands outside the KarMel Coffee House.

NEW HOURS

7 AM--5 PM

TUNA SALAD

DOJ_NMG_0032365

$4.25

PRAY FOR

JEFF AKE

Jeffrey J. Ake is 48 now, if he is alive. He is also a husband and son and the father of four children who miss him terribly. He is a storyteller, a Rotarian and a small-business owner who thrived in distant capitals.

He traveled to Iraq, tools in hand, on a private contract to repair machines at a water-bottling plant. Early one morning in April 2005, the telephone rang at a lakeside rambler in LaPorte, 80 miles east of Chicago. An Iraqi man, talking fast in poor English, told Liliana Ake, "We have your husband."

Fourteen months later, nothing is known about his whereabouts, while his family waits and neighbors wonder what to expect after so much silence. No American has been held captive longer in Iraq and come out alive.

Many other kidnappings in Iraq carried political motivations, but the Iraqi man who called LaPorte demanded only money. He said he wanted $1 million and he wanted it the very next day, in Baghdad.

Liliana Ake pleaded for Jeff's life.

"Don't cry, lady," he said. "Everything is fine."

She reacted quickly enough to ask questions that only Jeff -- in Iraq for just three days when he was seized -- could answer, including one about his dog. The man called back with the right answers. But three weeks later, the telephone stopped ringing.

"Nothing at all. For over a year, we haven't heard anything," Liliana Ake explained in her first newspaper interview since her husband's abduction. "We pray every night. My little boy says, 'Bad people in Iraq have my dad. It's not fair.' "

She believes he is alive, perhaps because she must. At the same time, she is bothered by the sense in LaPorte, where people have been supporting her and rooting for her husband, that Jeff is becoming mostly a memory. Signs like the one at the KarMel are fewer. It is as though Jeff Ake is slipping away.

"I pray for his faith, that he is in God's hands and he will be back when it's time," she said. "Maybe he was killed a year ago and we will not find him for 15 years. But if you let yourself ask these questions, there is no hope. These are very practical, cynical questions. I know he will be back."

More than 430 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq since the war began in March 2003. Among the most famous, Christian Science Monitor reporter Jill Carroll made it out. So did Roy Hallums, a U.S. contractor who escaped after 10 months. Job seeker Nick Berg did not. His beheading was shown on television.

At last count, at least 13 Americans, including Ake, were among 42 foreigners still missing, their fate unknown. U.S. authorities continue to look for clues, a State Department spokesman said.

When the first call came, Liliana Ake could barely believe her ears. Jeff was the smooth and gregarious world traveler she had met 12 years ago while studying in Chicago, the Midwestern businessman who had willingly moved to her native Russia to be with her and her daughter. When he left for Baghdad, he had carried crayons and coloring books for the children of Iraqi workers.

Al-Jazeera broadcast video images of Ake controlled by men carrying assault rifles. Television crews began to camp outside the family's modest house in LaPorte, population 22,000. Gov. Mitch Daniels (R) helped Liliana's mother come from Kamchatka. Neighbors brought food. Strangers offered to baby-sit.

The churches in town began to prepare a joint prayer vigil, which Mayor Leigh Morris said would be a "community outpouring." But he said the Akes passed word to keep a lower profile lest the kidnappers conclude Jeff Ake was a prominent citizen and raise the stakes.

Morris said, "We didn't want to do anything that could have been disadvantageous to Jeff."

Meanwhile, U.S. investigators were working the case in Baghdad and in LaPorte, focusing on the telephone calls to the Akes' house. As Liliana pleaded for time, a kidnapper, in no mood for delay, named a Baghdad hotel where he expected to collect the money.

"We said, 'We have the money. Just tell us how to get it there,' " said James Ake, Jeff's father, who also lives in LaPorte. "He said, 'That's your problem.' "

DOJ_NMG_0032366

Within an hour of the abduction in Taji, 12 miles north of Baghdad, the U.S. Hostage Working Group was alerted. A team escorted by a U.S. Army patrol interviewed workers at the bottling plant. Group coordinator Dan O'Shea went to Ake's hotel to talk with the staff and gather his belongings.

"We assumed Jeff's kidnapping was criminally motivated by money and not political," O'Shea wrote in an e-mail interview. "There is a hostage-trading market for kidnap victims who are sold up the chain to insurgent groups who are going after significant sums of money or to send a political message. In Jeff's case, the information just went cold relatively early in the case."

The Akes continued to lie low, waiting for word. Following the advice of FBI negotiators, they chose not to speak to the media, contrary to the approach used by Carroll's parents and Hallums's family.

Earlier this year, the Ake family agreed to the posting of fliers in Iraq, offering a $280,000 reward for information. Still nothing.

"You just have to rely on the advice that they're giving you, which is what we did," said James Ake, who said it is "harder and harder to believe" Jeff will return. "Just think of trying to find someone in Chicago who didn't want to be found."

Loretta Ake, Jeff's stepmother, said the youngest Ake son joined the army and recently received deployment orders for Iraq.

"He just told us he was going," she said. "I told him the only good thing to come out of it: Find Jeff."

Morris begins every meeting of the city council and the board of public works with a prayer for Ake. He looks each day at notepaper in a box. One each sheet, his wife has written a date and the corresponding number of days Ake has been missing. The total has passed 400. There are 545 sheets in the box.

"We're hoping to throw many of them away unused," said Morris, who called his fellow Rotarian "just an all-around solid person." He acknowledged that, after so many months, Ake's captivity is "not a front-burner, constant conversational item," but he is not surrendering hope.

"The fact that we have had no definitive bad news may be good news in itself," Morris said. "At least we would prayerfully hope so."

A sign at a LaPorte laundromat still reads "God Bless Jeff Ake and His Family." At the Temple News Agency, a coffee shop, Angela Stone believes Ake is "always in the back of people's minds."

"This is a small town. Nobody is used to having anyone in the national spotlight," Stone said. "It makes people not know how to react. The protocol is really up in the air."

At the KarMel Coffee House, Dianne Allen said the "Pray for Jeff Ake" sign stays out during the week, as a measure of warmth and respect for Liliana, a regular often called Lilly. Customers sometimes ask if there is any fresh news.

"I think the customers are wanting to know something so they can continue their prayers or just move on," Allen said. "People say, 'Because we haven't heard anything in so long, he's gone.' Our thoughts are, 'Well, nobody knows that.' If Lilly knew how much the community cared, she might give a public comment in the paper or a news conference and announce he's still with us or he's not."

Ake said she would give information if she had it.

"The people who know me understand that I don't have any information, except I truly believe Jeff is alive," she said. "I know he's alive. It can be a matter of time."

She follows other cases closely and traded e-mails with Carroll's twin sister.

"When she was released," she said, "I cried with joy."

While she waits, Ake does her best to manage the water-bottling-equipment firm and to pay the bills. She takes strength from fellow parishioners at LaPorte Missionary Church and generous volunteers from the Service League and Rotary Club. She has slept through the night only twice in nearly 14 months, typically waking up in fear at 1 a.m. and not falling asleep again until 5:30. She often sees Jeff in her dreams, where "he is always different, more quiet."

"I don't feel isolated, just that life is going on and it becomes a side issue [for others]. For me, it intensifies. I don't want to cry," Ake said, tears forming. "I'm trying to be strong, but you can't always be strong. I do feel sorry for myself many times. I'm without my husband, and my kids are without their father."

DOJ_NMG_0032367

Ake shuttles her children to their grandparents' house and an array of activities, including dance and piano lessons. She says she wants Jeff to be proud of his children when he sees them again. She keeps a big plastic tub for him, packed with articles about his kidnapping and cards sent by well-wishers.

"Unfortunately, there are not many more cards coming," she said. "Time goes by."

Ake wears a bracelet, given to her by the sister of a fellow church member who died of cancer. It says "Miracles happen."

Baghdad's Wealthy Are Careful To Hide Their Riches (PHI)

By Nancy A. Youssef

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Baghdad's al-Rashid Street, one of the city's oldest, was once full of intellectual and commercial life. Poets and scholars traded ideas over tea in small cafes where men played dominoes. Young men shopped for affordable fashions.

Now, it's desolate, and shops such as Abu Haider's are empty. Most of his customers have fled the country; the rest are afraid to be seen in his shop, where fine suits hang. Walking out could make one susceptible to kidnapping. Only the rich shop there, the kidnappers might conclude.

Indeed, in a country whose populace is undeniably richer now than during Saddam Hussein's regime, keeping up with the Joneses means not showing wealth because kidnapping has become so rampant. Those who can afford the best have replaced their nice cars for clunkers, don plain clothes, carry second-rate cell phones and no longer wear gold jewelry.

"The rich man pays the cost of what he owns," said Abu Haider, who declined to give his full name, instead offering a name he's known by. Abu Haider knows. He commutes to his shop by motorcycle, because only the poorest ride them.

According to police estimates, at least 60 people are kidnapped in Baghdad every day, often by thugs seeking ransom. But paying thousands of dollars doesn't guarantee one's release; many bodies are found daily in alleys and fields, some beheaded. Most were kidnapped.

In a flagrant move even by current standards, about 50 people were kidnapped Monday in central Baghdad, pulled from their cars or off the streets by armed men who everyone suspects were police. Witnesses said those who appeared wealthy were the ones snatched.

Saad al-Qasi, 27, owns a cell phone shop. But he washes the shop's windows himself and helps workers at neighboring shops carry in merchandise so that no one will figure out that he's the owner. Outside his shop sits a beat-up Toyota Corona.

"The kidnappers base how rich you are on your phone and car," al-Qasi said.

Al-Qasi, who comes from an upper-class family, said he knows of 15 people who've been kidnapped, including his father-in-law. All were released, but none for less than $30,000. Because of that, his family worries about him if he isn't home by 7:30 p.m.

Car dealers, such as Ali Nawar, 48, have traded in their BMWs and Mercedes-Benzes for less ostentatious models, and they have customers who've done the same.

Nawar said he bought six cell phones - one for each member of his family, including his young children - so he could keep track of everyone.

"We call each other every hour," said Nawar, who has decided to move his family out of the country in July, when school lets out.

Middle-class parents fear that someone will nab their children for money. Enrollment at some of the more expensive kindergartens, such as the Children of Iraq School in east Baghdad, has dropped because parents fear their children will be snatched. Who else but Baghdad's wealthy would spend $50 a month on school?

Instead, they enroll their children in schools such as Noor Kindergarten, which charges $30 a month.

Shamar Faraj is the Noor headmistress. She wears simple clothes and no gold. Her school is equally modest. All around the neighborhood, there are checkpoints, in part to prevent kidnappings. She said some parents have come to her school out of fear. Despite all the security measures, she can't promise them that their children are safer at her school.

"I am scared to tell them one thing and then something happens. It's a big responsibility," Faraj said.

DOJ_NMG_0032368

Mohammed Hassan al-Kazzaz, chairman of the Iraqi Chamber of Commerce, used to buy a new car every six months and sport fancy clothes. But after a group of men stole his car at gunpoint, he switched to a 1992 Volkswagen. Because he can't resist, he keeps one Mercedes hidden in the garage. His best suits come out only for important meetings. Often, he changes in the car on the way.

"If someone sees me in my nice clothes, they will kill my guards and kidnap me," he said.

Shops in the Baghdad neighborhood of Arasat once served the country's wealthiest, among them Saddam's son Odai, for whom the area was a favorite. Today, most shops are closed, and the others are struggling.

Some shop owners have started selling more conservative clothing or slashing prices. But they said the biggest challenge is getting people to walk through their doors.

At the Simma women's clothing shop, a woman who wanted to be identified only as Umm Ali said she sometimes sells only three pieces of clothing a week. She said she stopped sending her son to school after kidnappers learned she was a shop owner. They kidnapped his friend by mistake.

A few weeks later, a man walked in and demanded money. "I couldn't give him any because I simply didn't have any," she said.

Instead of fretting about his inability to live the good life here, al-Qasi said he's planning a month-long trip to Syria. He said he would rent the best car - maybe a sports car - and buy the best clothes. When he runs out of money, he'll return to Iraq, sans his new purchases. He'll keep them in Syria instead.

"I just want to buy," al-Qasi said.

Al-Kazzaz, whose family lives outside of Iraq, said he remains in the country despite having the resources to leave - and the pleas of his family - for a reason:

"I prefer to stay in my country. Eventually, it will improve. It has to."

Knight Ridder Newspapers special correspondents Huda Ahmed, Shatha al Awsy and Mohammed al Awsy contributed to this report.

Afghanistan: Roadside Blast Kills 2 G.I.'s (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Two American soldiers were killed in a roadside bombing in Nangarhar Province, east of Kabul, a United States military spokeswoman said. A third soldier and an Afghan interpreter were wounded in the blast, she said. The military also said three American soldiers were wounded in a car bombing south of Kabul.

Troops Risk Undetected Brain Injury (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Thousands of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan may be risking permanent brain damage by returning to combat with relatively minor but undiagnosed concussions, often caused by bomb blasts, military researchers say.

Doctors say they are only now understanding the scope of the problem. Researchers screening returning soldiers and Marines at four military bases found that about 10% suffered at least a minor brain injury during combat. About 20% of troops in front-line infantry units suffered such injuries.

The injuries frequently go undiagnosed because troops have no visible wounds or may not know they suffered a concussion, doctors say. Medics and field doctors often aren't aware of what happened during fighting.

More than 500,000 soldiers and Marines have served in or near Iraq and Afghanistan since Sept. 11, 2001, sometimes more than once.

“This blast group is going to be potentially huge,” says Angela Drake, a neuropsychologist with the Defense and Veterans Brain Injury Center, a research arm of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Pentagon. “We're looking at thousands of potential patients.”

DOJ_NMG_0032369

Military doctors describe brain injuries as a signature wound of these wars. That's because advances in body armor save soldiers who might have died in previous conflicts, but blast waves from roadside bombs can cause brain damage.

U.S. troops in Iraq are exposed to hundreds of bombings each month. "We've seen patients who have had three deployments and have had some (head) injury on every single one," Drake says.

The damage from multiple concussions can be irreversible. "Repeated concussions can be quite serious and even lethal," says Air Force Maj. Gerald Grant, a neurosurgeon who treated troops in Iraq.

The Brain Injury Center is urging the military to track the number of concussions troops suffer. A handful of military bases use the screening procedures developed by the center, but the Pentagon has declined to mandate the survey.

Pentagon health official Michael Kilpatrick questioned the accuracy of the screening and whether soldiers even remember information they're asked for: "Most people, when they get knocked out, don't really know it."

Military researchers, however, say the two-question survey has proved highly accurate.

"I think they're afraid," Drake says of the Pentagon's decision not to screen for concussions. "The sheer numbers are overwhelming. This is a worrisome thing. It's like opening a can of worms."

The Pentagon is developing a simple mental exam that medics can use on troops who may have suffered a brain injury. If the test shows evidence of a mild concussion, a servicemember could be kept from combat until the injury heals. Kilpatrick says this test could be used in Iraq within a few months.

Even Mild Injuries To Brain Add Up (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, June 7, 2006

After a land mine exploded under his armored vehicle last October in Barwana, Iraq, Marine Sgt. Devon Bradley remembers a deafening noise and a flash. Then nothing.

Seconds later, when he came to, Bradley grabbed his weapon and went back into the fight. He led his team for the next two months in efforts to clear insurgents from Barwana.

"We're hard dogs, and I kept pushing to be with my Marines," says Bradley, 29, who was on his third combat tour.

But something was wrong. In the weeks that followed the blast, he began forgetting what other Marines had just told him. He struggled to handle more than one task at once. Taste and smell disappeared. Worst of all, so did the name of his soon-to-be-born daughter, Addison. Bradley says he had to dig through letters from home to remember it.

He was eventually flown to a battlefield hospital where he was diagnosed with a concussion — his second in the Iraq war and the third of his life. Bradley learned that what he thought was post-nasal drip was actually leaking spinal fluid. By January, he was back at Camp Pendleton in California. Doctors told him his brain may never fully recover, and his career in the Marine Corps is in doubt.

After more than three years of war in Iraq, where bombs are the biggest threat to U.S. troops, military doctors are seeing a growing number of brain injuries among soldiers and Marines caught too close to a blast. The vast majority are mild concussions that cannot be detected even with a CT scan or MRI.

Mild brain injuries can heal in days or even months. Additional concussions can cause permanent damage. "This is a real issue, and people are … taking it very seriously," says Deborah Warden, director of the Defense and Veterans Brain Injury Center, a research arm of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Pentagon.

The ramifications are broad. How do field surgeons and medics diagnose a wound they can't see? What can be done when soldiers and Marines try to shake off the blast effects, unaware of the concussion, and keep fighting? Should the Pentagon keep tabs on how many concussions each servicemember suffers? And if so, how many concussions is too many before someone is kept from combat?

"We're not at the Star Trek point where we can run a phaser over everybody and determine their exact problem. Closed-head injuries are very hard to assess," says Michael Kilpatrick, deputy director of deployment health support for the Pentagon.

The number of concussions keeps rising. Almost 30% of the patients admitted to Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., have brain injuries.

DOJ_NMG_0032370

Doctors fear that thousands of others go undiagnosed. A two-question survey developed by the Brain Injury Center shows that about 10% of troops returning from Iraq and Afghanistan suffered a concussion during their combat tour. About half still had symptoms that could be related to a concussion, including slowed thinking, headaches, memory loss, sleep disturbance, attention and concentration deficits, and irritability, says Air Force Lt. Col. Michael Jaffee, a neurologist with the center. More than 500,000 soldiers and Marines have served in combat since Sept. 11, 2001, many more than once.

During the screening, troops are first asked whether they were hurt in a blast, fall or vehicle accident. Then they are asked whether they felt dazed, were confused or saw "stars" afterward; do not remember what happened; or lost consciousness. If any of those symptoms occurred, the servicemember probably suffered a concussion, Warden says.

The screening offers a way to document brain injuries. The ability to count the injuries also has prompted disagreement about what to do with the information.

Warden urges that all returning troops be screened to build a concussion database. But today the screenings — which began about two years ago — are done at only a few military installations, including the Marine Corps' Camp Pendleton and the Army's Fort Carson in Colorado, Fort Bragg in North Carolina and Fort Irwin in California.

Kilpatrick, the Pentagon official, questions the accuracy of the screening. "Multiple head injuries can lead to permanent brain damage that is irreversible, and you want to avoid that," he says. "But we don't have any criteria today that if you get X number of concussions, that you can't serve anymore."

Neurologist Jaffee says settling on one number that applies to every servicemember is impossible because of the many variables, among them the size of the blast and the severity of the concussion. That's why concussion histories and better battlefield diagnoses are needed, he says.

The military is developing ways to diagnose with tests that examine short-term memory, reaction time and attention deficit, key indicators of concussion. The tests are similar to those used on athletes who suffer head injuries. The Brain Injury Center is also creating a short exam Kilpatrick says could soon be introduced into war zones.

Computerized testing programs, used to monitor combat troops at Fort Bragg, are being tested for the battlefield. In April, the military approved a battlefield study by Air Force neurologist Gerald Grant for developing an online test for troops in Iraq.

During preliminary field tests, about 60 soldiers and Marines exposed to blasts were examined. In one case, a 25-year-old man caught near a roadside bomb struggled to process information and quickly answer questions. Two weeks later, before returning to combat, he continued to score below average or worse in both areas.

A second man, age 37, took the exam 15 hours after a rocket exploded on the other side of the wall from where he was standing guard. He showed attention-deficit problems and scored poorly in short-term memory.

"We need a field test to be able to practically assess the safety of sending people back to duty," Grant says.

Marine Sgt. Bradley says he suffered his first concussion in high school sports. His second concussion came during a rocket-propelled grenade attack in Iraq. After his third brain injury, doctors told him a fourth could kill him. He and his wife, Megan, have three young daughters and say they face an uncertain future leaving the military. Bradley still experiences dizzy spells, bad headaches and back problems.

"Most of them are pretty much every day," he says. "I have one right now."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC: Investigations Into Options A Concern (AP)

AP, June 7, 2006

SEC Chair: Widening Investigations of Possible Options Backdating Cause for Concern

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The growing number of public companies under investigation for possible backdating of stock options to boost top executives' compensation is a matter of "serious concern" to the Securities and Exchange Commission, its chairman said Tuesday.

The number of public companies being investigated by the SEC or federal prosecutors has grown to more than 30 and executives at several companies have been fired in recent weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0032371

"We've already learned that the problems are more than episodic," the SEC Chairman Christopher Cox told The Associated Press in response to questions. "The apparently widespread nature of the problems is of serious concern" to the agency.

Among the companies that have disclosed receiving subpoenas or SEC requests for documents are big, well-known names like UnitedHealthGroup Inc. and Caremark Rx Inc.

Many are from the high-tech world, where stock options have long been a prized perk and incentive for executives and employees alike: Affiliated Computer Services Inc., Juniper Networks Inc., KLA-Tencor Corp., OpenWave Systems Inc., Vitesse Semiconductor Corp., McAfee Inc., Quest Software Inc., Rambus Inc., Sycamore Networks Inc. and others.

The SEC investigations have been ongoing for several months, and subpoenas have been issued by U.S. attorneys' offices in several cities, including New York.

At issue is whether company insiders manipulated the timing of stock option grants to bring big payoffs to executives by improperly backdating the grants to coincide with low points in stock prices.

Stock options become more valuable as the market price rises above the exercise price, so backdating widens the spread -- and executives' payoff when they eventually sell shares.

Lawmakers Criticize Former Fannie Mae CEO (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, AP Business Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The ousted former chief executive of Fannie Mae, Franklin Raines, was criticized by lawmakers and a federal regulator on Tuesday as a House panel aired government allegations of a six-year accounting fraud at the mortgage giant.

The regulator who oversees Fannie Mae blamed Raines and other senior company officials for the massive accounting failures and alleged manipulations designed to enrich executives. And the chairman of the subcommittee holding Tuesday's hearing, Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., contended that Raines probably lied to Congress when he testified about the debacle in October 2004.

Lawmakers, some of whom had been beneficiaries of Fannie Mae's campaign money, denounced the accounting misconduct, likened the company to Enron Corp. and urged legislative action to tighten the government's hand over Fannie Mae and its smaller government-sponsored sibling, Freddie Mac.

As a huge housing finance company chartered by Congress, "Fannie Mae has a special mandate and position of public trust. The previous management team, led by chairman and chief executive officer Franklin Raines, violated that trust," James B. Lockhart, acting director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, testified. "By encouraging rapid growth, unconstrained by proper internal controls, risk management and other systems, they did serious harm to Fannie Mae while enriching themselves through earnings manipulation."

Fannie Mae is the largest U.S. buyer and guarantor of home mortgages.

A blistering report issued by the OFHEO examiners last month, the product of a three-year investigation, details what the agency describes as an arrogant and unethical corporate culture, calling the image of company prestige and excellence at Fannie Mae a sham. It said Fannie Mae employees manipulated accounting so senior executives could collect tens of millions in bonuses from 1998 to 2004.

Baker, referring to Raines' 2004 testimony before the panel, the House Financial Services subcommittee on capital markets, said Tuesday, "There seems to be clear evidence to my mind that Mr. Raines perjured himself."

Raines' attorney, Robert Barnett, declined to comment. After the OFHEO report was released last month, Barnett said that "Mr. Raines has repeatedly stated that he never authorized, encouraged or was aware of violations of generally accepted accounting principles at Fannie Mae for the purpose of smoothing earnings, reaching bonus targets or for any other improper reason. The facts on the record and conclusions from previous reports support this statement."

Raines, a prominent Washington figure who was a White House budget director in the Clinton administration, is one of 30 current and former Fannie Mae executives and employees who are being reviewed for possible disciplinary action, termination or forfeiture of their bonuses. Also being reviewed is the current president and CEO, Daniel Mudd.

DOJ_NMG_0032372

The OFHEO regulators in September 2004 first brought to light Fannie Mae's accounting-rule violations and alleged earnings manipulation to meet Wall Street targets - disclosures that stunned the financial markets. That December, the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered the company to restate its earnings back to 2001 - a correction expected to reach $11 billion. The Justice Department has been pursuing a criminal investigation.

In last month's action, Washington-based Fannie Mae was fined $400 million by OFHEO and the SEC_ one of the biggest penalties ever in an accounting fraud case, according to the SEC. The company also agreed to limit the growth of its multibillion-dollar mortgage holdings, at least temporarily, capping them at $727 billion, and to make top-to-bottom changes in its corporate culture, accounting procedures and ways of managing risk.

"Senior management manipulated accounting, reaped maximum, undeserved bonuses and prevented the rest of the world from knowing about it," Lockhart said at Tuesday's hearing. "They co-opted their internal auditors and other managers. They stonewalled OFHEO. The executive compensation program at Fannie Mae sent senior executives the message to focus on increasing earnings rather than controlling risk."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Silence Angers Judiciary Panel (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Senior Republican and Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee sharply criticized a Justice Department official yesterday for refusing to say whether the Bush administration has ever considered prosecuting journalists for publishing leaked national security information.

The senators also bristled when Deputy U.S. Attorney Matthew W. Friedrich declined to answer questions about the rationale for the FBI's attempts to review the papers of the late columnist Jack Anderson.

"You're basically taking what would be called a testifying Fifth Amendment. You should be ashamed of yourself, or your superiors should be ashamed of themselves," Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) told Friedrich after he declined to answer questions from committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa).

The purpose of the hearing, Specter said in opening the session, was to examine Justice Department efforts to control leaks, explore suggestions that newspapers and their reporters can be prosecuted under the 1917 Espionage Act and take comment on legislation that would protect reporters through a shield law. The law would provide an exception if national security matters were involved.

Friedrich, in his opening statement, confirmed that the Justice Department was prepared to investigate and prosecute leaks, but referred to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales's recent statement that the "primary focus is on the leakers of classified information, as opposed to the press."

When Friedrich confirmed that the department thought that journalists or "anyone" could be prosecuted under the Espionage Act for publishing classified information, Specter asked specifically about whether the law could be applied to reporter James Risen of the New York Times, the newspaper that published an article in December about the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program.

"Obviously, Senator, I can't comment as to any particular case or specific matter," Friedrich said. He added that espionage laws "do not exempt . . . any class of professional, including reporters, from their reach."

Specter then asked, without specifying a particular case, whether the department, under Gonzales or former attorney general John D. Ashcroft, ever considered prosecuting a newspaper or reporter for publishing leaked classified information.

"I don't think it would be appropriate for me to give an indication one way or another, and I hope people don't read anything into my answer one way or another," Friedrich said. But after a short lecture from Specter, he added that it was his "understanding" that there were historical examples of officials considering whether to prosecute journalists.

"I'm not interested in history this morning," Specter responded. "I'm interested in current events."

DOJ_NMG_0032373

Grassley sought to follow up on questions he had posed to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III at a hearing last month about the bureau's attempts to access Anderson's files. Friedrich declined to answer but said that "hopefully the bureau will be submitting some type of factual submission to you on that."

Grassley responded: "I would think that the department would send somebody here to testify that could answer our questions if they [had] any respect for this committee whatsoever."

Friedrich told Specter that the department is studying a policy on issuing subpoenas for documents from the estate of a deceased reporter such as Anderson. He also said that Justice continues to maintain that no new legislation is needed to protect reporters, but said he will "take a closer look" at a bill now before the committee that would shift the decision to subpoena journalists from the executive branch to a judge.

Yesterday afternoon, Specter also put off a vote on issuing subpoenas for executives of three telephone companies to testify on whether they cooperated in the NSA warrantless surveillance program by providing records of millions of phone calls.

Senators Question Bush Administration's Openness (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Ely Portillo

Knight Ridder, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - Professor Mark Feldstein was stunned when two FBI agents came to his house in March hoping to rummage through files that once belonged to deceased journalist Jack Anderson.

The agents left empty-handed, but the aborted search was one of several incidents that have raised concerns about the Bush administration's efforts to stamp out government leaks. At a Senate hearing Tuesday, administration critics accused the Justice Department of trampling press freedom in its zeal to protect secrets.

At stake is the public's right to know what its government is doing versus the need for secrecy to protect national security. The tension between these principles is as old as the republic.

Senators from both parties vented frustration over the administration's lack of openness. Tensions erupted at the Judiciary Committee hearing when Matthew Friedrich, chief of staff of the Justice Department's criminal division, declined to answer questions about the effort to search Anderson's old files.

"I would think the department would send somebody up here to testify that could answer our questions, if they had any respect for this committee," complained Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa.

"They don't have any respect for this committee," Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said to Friedrich. "Why on earth were you sent up here? ... Is there any question you're allowed to answer?"

Friedrich said he couldn't discuss the matter because doing so could hinder efforts to prosecute Steven Rosen and Keith Weissman, pro-Israel lobbyists who have been accused of passing classified information to an Israeli diplomat and a journalist. Their indictment focused on activities from April 1999 to August 2004.

The FBI agents told Feldstein they wanted to look for evidence that Rosen and Weissman had supplied classified documents to Anderson, a muckraking journalist who died in December at age 83.

The explanation made little sense to Feldstein, a George Washington University professor who's writing a book about Anderson, because Anderson scaled back his reporting after he was diagnosed with Parkinson's in 1986. Most of his notable work had been published in previous decades. He relied on assistants to provide fodder for his nationally syndicated column, which was published until July 2004. He donated his files to the university at Feldstein's urging before he died.

"As bizarre as it sounded, I could only conclude that the Justice Department had decided that it wanted to prosecute people who might have whispered national security secrets decades ago to a reporter who is now dead," Feldstein testified.

Kevin Anderson, the columnist's son, said some of his father's sources had expressed fears that their exposure "would result in political, financial and even physical harm."

To Feldstein and other critics, the FBI's interest was part of an administration pattern of intimidating journalists and government whistleblowers. They cited other developments that trouble them:

DOJ_NMG_0032374

-Attorney General Alberto Gonzales suggested last month that the government could prosecute journalists for publishing classified information. Friedrich declined to say whether the department is planning any prosecutions, but said "our primary focus is on the leakers themselves."

-New York Times reporter Judith Miller spent 85 days in jail last year for refusing to reveal the identity of then-confidential source I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney. She was freed when Libby released her from their agreement, clearing the way for her testimony in an investigation into a leak that disclosed the identity of CIA employee Valerie Plame.

-CIA analyst Mary O. McCarthy was fired in April because she allegedly had unauthorized contacts with the news media and disclosed classified information.

-Last month, the Supreme Court ruled that the First Amendment doesn't protect government employees who are punished for exposing wrongdoing.

"By itself, what happened with the Anderson papers is a small and I think extreme case," Feldstein said. "But it is troubling because it appears to be part of a larger effort by the government to crack down on the media and the public's right to know."

Not everyone shares that view.

Gabriel Schoenfeld, editor of Commentary magazine, which bills itself as "the intellectual home of the neoconservative movement," said the Justice Department should charge reporters who revealed classified information with espionage.

He called for prosecuting the New York Times reporters who exposed the Bush administration's warrantless eavesdropping.

"It is imperative that our government and our intelligence agencies preserve the ability to conduct counterterrorism operations in secret," Schoenfeld told the committee. "The First Amendment is not a suicide pact."

Anderson, sitting next to Schoenfeld, said he'd rather go to jail than give his father's files to the FBI.

Feldstein said the agents who came to his house offered no clues as to their next move. "We're still waiting in fear to see if they come back," he said.

US Lawmakers Concerned About FBI Probes Of Journalists (VOA)

By Deborah Tate

Voice of America, June 7, 2006

U.S. lawmakers, concerned about recent federal investigations of journalists who publish classified information, are considering legislation to protect reporters from revealing information learned under the promise of confidentiality. The Senate Judiciary Committee is holding a series of hearings on the issue. On Tuesday, the panel focused on the case of the late investigative reporter Jack Anderson, whose archive of papers is being sought by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Jack Anderson spent his career exposing corrupt politicians and government scandals, from a CIA plan to assassinate Fidel Castro to the Reagan administration's secret arms-for-hostages deal with Iran.

The FBI has long sought Anderson's papers, saying that any documents that contain classified information belong to the government. Their effort has continued, even after Anderson's death last December at the age of 83.

The FBI probe comes as the federal government is threatening to prosecute journalists who publish classified information and refuse to reveal their sources. The Justice Department is investigating several leaks that led to the publication of a CIA officer's name and news reports that the National Security Agency is wiretapping communications between people in the United States and suspected terrorists overseas.

At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Matthew Friedrich, chief of staff for the criminal division at the Justice Department, defended his agency's actions: "Our primary focus is on prosecuting the leakers as opposed to other options, and our much preferred path would be to attempt to work with reporters voluntarily to convince them not to publish classified information, which could lead to compromise of our most sensitive technologies, harm our young men and women who serve in the service of our country, and cause damage," he said.

But Friedrich refused to discuss the Anderson case, to the anger of Republican and Democratic senators alike.

Senators made their frustration over that refusal clear.

"I would think the department would send somebody here to testify that could answer our questions if they had any respect for this committee whatsoever," said Senator Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican.

"That basically answers it. They do not have any respect for this committee. Why in heaven's name were you sent up here?," said Senator Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat.

Friedrich said the Senate panel was notified that he would not be able to respond directly to the Anderson probe before the hearing began, but said the FBI is preparing to answer the committee's questions.

Anderson's son Kevin, who is a lawyer in Utah, also testified before the committee. "Dad often said that documents that came across his desk were classified as national security secrets, but he characterized them as really political security secrets. They showed the misdeeds and manipulations of government employees who had abused the public trust, and then tried to sweep the evidence under the secrecy stamp. Such information should not be hidden from the people. Ours is a government of the people. Dad taught us that the people are sovereign. Those who work in government are our servants," he said.

He said he and his mother are prepared to face contempt charges if the FBI's effort to search the papers produces a subpoena or is upheld in court.

Mark Feldstein, the director of the Journalism Program at George Washington University who is writing a book about Jack Anderson, says FBI agents came to his home in search of some 200 boxes containing Anderson's papers on grounds of national security.

Allowing the FBI access to the records, he says, would have what he calls a chilling effect on both journalists and academics. "For journalists, the concern would be that their source notes, confidential sources, would be revealed to law enforcement authorities, and that that would produce a chilling effect, making other whistleblowers reluctant to come forward out of fear that their identities would become known. For academics, historians are always very concerned about trying to keep historical archives in order and not have them rifled through, because often order matters, and also it may discourage people from donating their papers in the future," he said.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Republican Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, acknowledged that national security must be protected, but he expressed concern about the federal probes of journalists. "The national security interests are enormous. They have to be balanced with the constitutional rights. But when you have a criminal statute where you can send people to jail and have a chilling effect on newspapers, it is really the congressional role to define it, and to establish standards. I think clearly the ball is in our court [the issue is the responsibility of Congress]," he said.

Specter has introduced legislation that would protect journalists and their employers from having to reveal information that a journalist learns under the promise of confidentiality.

Under the bill, a federal prosecutor in a criminal case could not compel a journalist to reveal protected information unless certain criteria are met, including that a court finds clear and convincing evidence that the prosecutor has exhausted alternative sources and that the public interest favors disclosure. The measure would require a journalist to disclose any information that would be needed to prevent an act of terrorism or harm to national security. E-mail This Article

Senators Seek Answers In Probe Of Reporter (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate Judiciary Committee gave the Bush administration a new lashing Tuesday over its use of executive power, citing the FBI's posthumous probe of columnist Jack Anderson and questioning the notion that espionage laws might allow the prosecution of journalists who publish classified information.

"It's highly doubtful in my mind that that was ever the intent of Congress," Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter said.

The World War I-era espionage laws, countered Justice Department criminal division chief Matthew Friedrich, "do not exempt any class of professionals, including reporters, from their reach."

"I believe that's an invitation to Congress to legislate on the subject," replied Specter, R-Pa. "Clearly, the ball is in our court."

Friedrich refused to comment on the Anderson case, in which the FBI is seeking 50 years' worth of papers from the investigative journalist who exposed government scandals and earned a place on President Nixon's "enemies list."

DOJ_NMG_0032376

Friedrich's response echoed deferrals by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other Justice Department officials in previous hearings on the administration's domestic wiretapping, phone tapping and other policies. Specter and other committee members grew exasperated.

"Why in heaven's name were you sent up here?" ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont fumed. "Are there any questions you guys are allowed to answer other than your title, time of day?"

Friedrich responded that Judiciary Committee was advised of this limit before the hearing opened. He added that the FBI was preparing answers to the committee's questions about the Anderson case.

With the administration considering prosecuting journalists who publish classified information and refuse to reveal their sources, the committee wants the full story of the effort to obtain Anderson's archive months after his death at age 83.

Anderson's son Kevin, a lawyer, told the panel that he and his mother are prepared to face contempt charges if the FBI's effort to search the papers ever produces a subpoena or is upheld in court.

"The family has met and decided that we would not abide by a subpoena if one were issued by the FBI," Anderson said.

Specter asked if Anderson would risk a contempt citation.

"I would and I've spoken with my mother and she would as well," Anderson said.

"It's not an irrelevant question," Specter observed.

Anderson and Mark Feldstein, a former investigative reporter who is writing a book about Anderson, say FBI agents have appeared at their homes seeking the roughly 200 boxes of Anderson's papers to which the family had granted Feldstein access. The agents, Feldstein has said, cited national security concerns.

The FBI has said that if the papers contain classified information, they belong to the government.

The FBI had long sought Anderson's papers after he published stories exposing the Keating Five, a CIA plan to assassinate Fidel Castro and details of the Iran-Contra affair.

Anderson's son said the FBI contacted his mother shortly after his father's funeral, expressing interest in documents that would aid the government's case against two former lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee who have been charged with disclosing classified information.

In addition, the agents told the family they planned to remove from the columnist's archive — which had yet to be catalogued — any document they came across that was stamped "secret" or "confidential," or was otherwise classified.

The family refused.

"They flashed their badges and said they needed access to the papers," said Feldstein. Anderson donated his papers to the university, but the family had not yet formally signed them over.

FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko, a spokesman in Washington, said in an April interview that the bureau wants to search the Anderson archive and remove classified materials before they are made available to the public. "It has been determined that, among the papers, there are a number of U.S. government documents containing classified information," Kolko said, declining to say how the FBI knows.

The documents contain information about sources and methods used by U.S. intelligence agencies, he said.

U. Political Scientist Calls Probe 'fishing Expedition' (SLT)

The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, June 7, 2006

University of Utah political scientist Tim Chambless, who years ago cataloged 85 boxes of Jack Anderson's papers for use in his research, calls the FBI's demands "a fishing exped- ition." The documents he reviewed included some that "were politically embarrassing to a few people." But he said, "There was nothing in there with regard to national security." Chambless also wonders how much trolling the government has done in Anderson-related documents that had been in the public domain. When he was in Maryland recently, Chambless spent two days at the National Archives looking through declassified documents dealing with Anderson. He said he was concerned to find a number that had been removed from the file. "No reason was given as to why the documents were pulled, no date was given as to when they were pulled or by what agency or individual. This is very troubling to me," Chambless said Tuesday. "I asked specifically [who removed the documents], and that information was not provided to me." He declined to speculate whether the missing papers were part of a seven-year-old secret program, disclosed in news reports earlier this year, to reclassify thousands of documents at the National Archives. The New York Times reported the effort by the CIA and five other agencies had removed from public access more than 55,000 previously declassified pages. - Robert Gehrke

Getting Stonewalled: Administration Out To Keep Us In The Dark (SLT)

Salt Lake Tribune, June 7, 2006

There are two ways to succeed in government. Do the right thing. Don't let the people know you've done the wrong thing.

In the case of the Bush administration, it is difficult to know if it is doing the right thing or the wrong thing. That's because it is working very hard to make sure we don't know anything.

This desire to sit on the details about what the government is doing does not apply only to the controversial things the Bush administration is up to today. It reaches beyond current questions of secret prisons, indefinite detentions, torture, wiretapping and data mining.

It reaches back about half a century, through CIA plots to kill Fidel Castro, Watergate and the Iran-Contra affair. Those are just a few of the juicy tidbits that would be found in the archives of the late Jack Anderson, investigative reporter extraordinare, papers which the FBI has tried to bully Anderson's blood and literary heirs into surrendering.

Tuesday, when appropriate members of the U.S. Senate wanted to know the reason why, they were thoroughly stonewalled by one of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' assistants who, as Sen. Patrick Leahy was heard to fume, wasn't allowed to answer questions any more sensitive than his title and the time of day.

Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, is just as frustrated as Chairman Arlen Specter by the Justice Department's maddening refrain that it is keeping within the law but that we will just have to take their word for that. Any meaningful questions asked by senators, representatives or anyone else are turned away with the excuse that it would compromise anti-terror intelligence operations.

Advertisement

This is the same argument Gonzales has used to suggest that reporters who performed their constitutional duty by telling the American people about secret prisons, unwarranted wiretaps and the like are potentially subject to prosecution under the 1917 Espionage Act. But Gonzales is way off base, and we can only hope that the Congress will rein him in.

It is espionage to steal secrets and keep them for your own advantage. It is freedom to expose dirty secrets and tell the American people what your government is doing, in your name and with your money.

Documents Point To Bribes Of Nigerian By Congressman (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — The Federal Bureau of Investigation raided the Maryland home of the vice president of Nigeria last summer in search of bribe money that the bureau believed had been paid to him by Representative William Jefferson, according to documents released on Tuesday.

The documents included an affidavit signed by an F.B.I. agent who said that the Nigerian vice president, Atiku Abubakar, now a candidate for president of that oil-rich West African nation, asked for at least half of the profits of a technology company controlled by Mr. Jefferson that was seeking to do business in Nigeria.

About the same time last year, the documents said, Mr. Jefferson told colleagues of his plans to bribe Nigerian officials, including Mr. Abubakar, in exchange for their help in winning business in Nigeria, and that Mr. Abubakar would be paid as much as $500,000 in cash.

The F.B.I. affidavit, which was dated Aug. 2, and other documents were made public over the objections of Mr. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who is the target of a wide-ranging corruption investigation. He has denied wrongdoing and has said the information in the court papers would unfairly damage his reputation.

In the affidavit, an F.B.I. agent, Edward S. Cooper, said cellphone records suggested that Mr. Jefferson visited a home owned by Mr. Abubakar and his wife in Potomac, Md., an affluent suburb of Washington, around midnight last July 31 with the intention of delivering money to the Nigerian leader while he was on a visit to the United States. The next day, the F.B.I. said, Mr. Jefferson told a confidential informant that he had delivered "African art" — which the agent described as code for a cash payment — and that Mr. Abubakar "was very pleased."

The documents, which were released by a federal court in Greenbelt, Md., do not show what was seized by F.B.I. in the search of the Maryland home, nor do they show if the Nigerian leader ever received any money from Mr. Jefferson. A separate search of Mr. Jefferson's home in Washington in August turned up $90,000 in cash that, F.B.I. documents suggest, had been intended for the Nigerian leader. A bureau affidavit stated that the money had been hidden by Mr. Jefferson in his home freezer.

The Nigerian Embassy in Washington had no comment Tuesday on the disclosures in the documents about Mr. Abubakar, whose name had emerged previously in news reports about the investigation of Mr. Jefferson. The Associated Press quoted a spokesman for Mr. Abubakar in Abuja, the Nigerian capital, as declining comment Tuesday "until we have seen these reports or allegations." Mr. Jefferson's Congressional office referred questions to his lawyer, who has not returned repeated phone calls seeking comment.

Bush administration officials have been reluctant to speculate publicly about the effect of the investigation of Mr. Jefferson on American relations with Nigeria, which is one of largest exporters of oil to the United States.

Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term House member whose district includes most of New Orleans, has refused to discuss the detailed accusations against him in earlier court filings, including why so much money was in his home freezer.

The documents suggest that Mr. Jefferson was aggressive in seeking to lobby officials in Nigeria and other West African nations to promote business for a small technology company in which his family had a stake. A former top aide and the founder of the technology company have already pleaded guilty to criminal charges.

"With regard to the Nigerian business venture, Jefferson has discussed the making of payments to high-ranking government officials there, including the vice president of Nigeria," Mr. Cooper wrote in the affidavit last August intended to persuade a judge to allow the search of Mr. Abubakar's Maryland home.

"The vice president agreed to help secure the necessary approvals for the participants in the Nigerian business venture" in exchange for "at least 50 percent of the profits," it continued, adding that Mr. Jefferson had also discussed "the payment of a substantial monetary sum" to Mr. Abubakar "in the range of up to $500,000."

Affidavit Outlines Alleged Scheme In Jefferson Case (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), the target of a federal bribery probe, told an FBI informant that the vice president of Nigeria wanted at least $500,000 upfront and a stake in a lucrative technology venture in that country in order to help it gain approval, according to newly released documents in the investigation.

Jefferson's alleged statements help explain why FBI agents were so eager last summer to search the residence of the congressman and a Potomac, Md., mansion owned by the wife of Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar. Atiku, who visits the United States frequently, had been staying at the Potomac residence and allegedly met with Jefferson there to discuss the deal.

The congressman, who has insisted he is innocent of accepting bribes, allegedly told the FBI informant that in order to secure the Nigerian official's help with the technology project, Jefferson needed to deliver an upfront payment of $100,000 to Atiku while he was in the United States.

Some time after that, the informant provided Jefferson with the cash in a briefcase, according to one of the documents, an affidavit by FBI Special Agent Edward S. Cooper. The congressman later indicated that he had delivered the cash to Atiku on a late-night visit to the Potomac house, Cooper's affidavit said.

"Ah, I gave him the African art that you gave me, and he was very pleased," Jefferson told the informant, according to Cooper's affidavit. In his 39-page affidavit, Cooper said that "African art" was code for the cash payoff. The FBI has said the informant, a Virginia businesswoman, was wearing a microphone.

The affidavit was unsealed Monday by the federal court in Greenbelt, Md., and was made available Tuesday by the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0032379

A Washington lawyer for Atiku on Tuesday strongly denied wrongdoing by his client, who is running for president of Nigeria.

"There is no relationship between the vice president and Congressman Jefferson other than meetings occasioned by the professional courtesy a public official extends to another public official through diplomatic channels," the lawyer, Edward Weidenfeld, said.

"The vice president has done nothing wrong, and we've been cooperating with the Justice Department and the FBI from the beginning" of the long-running investigation, Weidenfeld said.

In one of his conversations with the FBI informant, Jefferson said Atiku had "more deals going than the goddamn man in the moon," the affidavit said. "Jefferson then said, 'He's a very, well, the word might be … corrupt.' "

The affidavit contained extensive new details of the alleged plot by Jefferson to win the Nigerian government's approval of a plan to provide new telecommunications services in the oil-rich African nation. It is alleged that the congressman would have had a large but hidden financial stake in the project.

The informant was described in court documents as a northern Virginia businesswoman identified by law enforcement officials as Lori Mody. Authorities said she went to the FBI in March 2005 when she decided Jefferson and others were defrauding her on the business deal.

During one meeting with Mody, Jefferson allegedly estimated that the telecommunications venture could earn as much as $200 million annually by its fifth year.

It was not clear from the affidavit whether any of the $100,000 in the briefcase had been delivered to the vice president's home, or whether Atiku had engaged in negotiations for a piece of the deal. FBI officials have said, in fact, that nearly all of the $100,000 was subsequently found during a search of Jefferson's home, stashed in his freezer.

But the FBI agent said that Jefferson's cellphone records suggested he had gone to the Nigerian official's home the night he said he had dropped off the cash.

Cooper also said that security cameras at the Potomac mansion probably would have recorded a visit by Jefferson on the night in question, but the affidavit did not say whether agents were successful in obtaining such camera footage.

In a new twist in the case, Cooper said that the security camera was observed by an undercover FBI agent who was posing as Jefferson's driver on one trip to the house.

Some sections of the affidavit remained sealed, and it did not mention Atiku by name. But the document identified the Potomac residence as being owned by Jennifer E. Douglas, Atiku's wife. And Atiku's lawyer confirmed that he was the Nigerian official cited in the court filing. Douglas could not be reached for comment.

Jefferson has said that he never benefited personally from any corrupt deals. But the affidavit suggested that he had taken pains to distance himself from any illegal transactions in part by having payments go to his children.

Jefferson and the informant negotiated what kind of compensation he should receive if the deal were to go through, the affidavit said. At one point, he wrote down a "c," and then said, "the 'c' is like for children," the affidavit said. "I wouldn't show up in there."

"Say that again. I'm sorry," the informant responded, knowing that the conversation was being taped.

"I make a deal for my children. It wouldn't be me," the affidavit said Jefferson replied.

Atiku's involvement began when Jefferson wrote a letter to him dated June 21, 2005, alerting him to "a U.S. company" that wanted to invest $50 million to provide high-speed Internet access in Nigeria using Nigerian telecom company Nitel's lines.

Atiku then met with Jefferson July 18 in Potomac and, according to the congressman, "agreed to help secure the necessary approvals." But in return, he said, Abubakar wanted at least $500,000 for himself.

Jefferson, who represents most of New Orleans, has served in Congress since 1990 and is head of an Africa trade task force.

Rep. Accused Of Trying To Bribe Nigerian (AP)

By Stephen Manning

AP, June 6, 2006

Rep. William Jefferson called the package he allegedly delivered at midnight to the suburban Maryland home of Nigeria's vice president "African art." Authorities say the "art" was meant to be cash — lots of it.

Court documents filed in the bribery probe of the Louisiana Democrat allege that Jefferson told an FBI informant he took the "art," which authorities believe was code for $100,000 in $100 bills, to the Potomac home of Atiku Abubakar on July 31.

The money was allegedly part of $500,000 the Nigerian vice president sought in return for helping smooth the way for a technology venture in Nigeria that was arranged by Jefferson. Abubakar also reportedly wanted a large stake of the profits from the new business.

The day after he was to have delivered the money, provided by an FBI informant, Jefferson was recorded telling the informant: "I gave him the African art that you gave me and he was very pleased."

The conversation and details of the alleged deal were included in an affidavit filed in August in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt to secure a warrant to search Abubakar's house. The affidavit was unsealed Monday.

It is unclear whether any money was given to Abubakar, who is identified only as "the vice president of Nigeria" in the affidavit.

According to another search warrant affidavit for Jefferson's congressional office, released last month in Washington, $90,000 in cash was found in a freezer at Jefferson's Washington home. A briefcase similar to the one Jefferson is alleged to have used to carry the money was found in a later search of his New Orleans home, according to federal court documents filed there.

The 39-page affidavit released Monday in Maryland, some sections of which remain sealed, identifies the Potomac home as the residence of Jennifer Douglas, Abubakar's wife. Although the search of the residence was mentioned in documents previously released by the courts, names and titles were blacked out to keep them secret.

A lawyer for Abubakar, who is running for president of Nigeria, said Abubakar is cooperating with authorities. Edward L. Weidenfeld said Abubakar's relationship with Jefferson did not extend beyond standard diplomatic meetings.

"There is no relationship or any kind of arrangement of any sort between them," Weidenfeld said.

In Nigeria, where Abubakar kicked off his campaign last week, his spokesman Mohammed Yakubu said they have yet to see details of the allegations. "We don't have anything to say until we have seen these reports or allegations," he said by telephone from Abuja.

Jefferson has strongly denied wrongdoing in the alleged scheme.

The informant was a northern Virginia businesswoman identified by law enforcement officials as Lori Mody. She is said to have gone to the FBI when she believed Jefferson and others were defrauding her on the business deal. Jefferson discussed with her the "payment of bribes to high-ranking foreign government officials," including Abubakar, according to the affidavit.

Jefferson approached Abubakar, claiming he wanted to help an American firm invest $50 million to run Internet services over the wires of Nigerian telecom company Nitel. The venture was to include Mody, a Kentucky telecommunications company called iGate Inc., and the Nigerian firm Rosecom.Net.

The affidavit states Jefferson wanted a stake of 5 percent to 7 percent in the Nigerian venture for his five daughters and one of them, lawyer Jamila Jefferson, to be retained to help set it up.

The congressman met July 18 with Abubakar in Potomac and the vice president "agreed to help secure the necessary approvals" for iGate to begin work in Nigeria, Jefferson said. In return, Abubakar wanted at least 50 percent of the profits from Rosecom.Net and a payment of up to $500,000 before the deal was completed, the documents alleged.

Jefferson, who represents most of New Orleans, has served in Congress since 1990. The raid on his Capitol Hill office sparked outrage from congressional leaders who claimed the Bush administration was violating the separation of powers doctrine. President Bush later sealed FBI files on the raid for 45 days.

Former Jefferson aide Brett Pfeffer has pleaded guilty and was given an eight-year term for his role in the bribery scandal. He is cooperating with authorities. Vernon Jackson, chief executive of iGate, also pleaded guilty to paying more than $400,000 in bribes to Jefferson.

Gonzales Defends Jefferson Office Search (AP-Y2)

By M.r. Kropko

AP2, June 6, 2006

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday defended the FBI's search of a congressman's office last month, saying it was an "unusual step" but a necessary one.

Gonzales compared the May 20-21 search of Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record)'s office to past investigations of federal lawmakers and searches of their homes and vehicles.

The late-night search, part of a months-long bribery investigation of the Louisiana Democrat, was the first time in the history of Congress that a search warrant had been executed on a House member's Washington office.

"There have been searches before by the executive branch of the legislative branch," Gonzales said. "We've searched before the homes of members of Congress. We've searched before the cars of members of Congress, even when they are parked in the garage on Capitol Hill."

Among the lawmakers most recently served with search warrants were then-Sen. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J., in connection with the United Nations oil-for-food program, and then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican whose homes and boat were searched. In August, the FBI raided Jefferson's homes in Washington and New Orleans, and his personal vehicle.

Last month's search of Jefferson's Capitol Hill office sparked outrage from congressional leaders, who claimed the Bush administration was violating the separation of powers doctrine. President Bush ordered the documents sealed until mid-July to allow congressional leaders and the Justice Department to discuss what to do with them.

Gonzales, in Cleveland to award an anti-gang grant, said the search did not violate the Constitution because there was evidence of a crime in Jefferson's office and FBI agents had obtained a court-issued search warrant.

"I understand this was an unusual step that was taken, but it was an unusual step taken in response to an unusual set of circumstances," Gonzales said. Investigators tried for months to get the evidence in other ways, he said, "and we ultimately concluded that this was something that we needed to do."

FBI agents carted away computer and other records in their pursuit of evidence that Jefferson accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in exchange for helping set up business deals in Africa. Jefferson, who represents most of New Orleans, has denied any wrongdoing.

"I understand the sensitivities," Gonzales said. "We anticipated that this would create some concerns. We worked hard to allay those concerns in the way the search was conducted."

Hoyer Backs Pelosi, Smacks Rep. Jefferson (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 7, 2006

The chances that Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) will keep his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee grew slimmer yesterday as House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) issued a stinging assessment of the embattled Louisianan's legal situation.

"He sits on a tax-writing committee, and he had $90,000 found in his freezer. I think he's got a tax problem if nothing else," Hoyer said, responding to reporters' questions about whether Democrats would seek to oust Jefferson forcibly from the panel even though he has yet to be charged with a crime.

Jefferson pointedly declined a recent request from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) for him to step down, reasserting his innocence and implying that she should ask the same of Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.) who has faced ethics questions about earmarks he obtained on the Appropriations Committee.

"If members are to be treated equally, I think Mr. Mollohan has an appropriations problem," a Democratic aide sympathetic to Jefferson fumed.

Last night, members of the House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee were expected to discuss Jefferson's dilemma at a members-only meeting. If Pelosi were to remove Jefferson forcibly, she would first have to put the issue to a vote of that body, which has jurisdiction over Democrats' committee assignments. That vote was not expected to occur last night, but she could pursue it at a later date.

DOJ_NMG_0032382

Last night's meeting was convened to discuss Democratic message crafting, with Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) acting as chairman. Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) typically chairs meetings in which committee assignments are decided.

Hoyer said yesterday that he hoped the committee would seek to oust Jefferson.

"I personally believe that Mr. Jefferson should step down from the Ways and Means Committee, and if he doesn't step down our caucus should take action."

If Democratic leaders do put the issue to a vote, Jefferson will have few allies on the committee. It is stocked with Pelosi loyalists.

Even among the committee's 10 members from the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC), Jefferson would be hard-pressed for friends. Reps. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), chairman of the Democratic caucus, and Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.), senior Democrat on Ways and Means, have not rushed to his aid.

Several more junior CBC members, however, may speak out on his behalf. Rep. Donald Payne (D-N.J.) has been supportive, even though he occupies one of the 15 slots appointed by Pelosi on the steering committee.

Rep. Gregory Meeks (D-N.Y.) sits on the panel as a regional representative. He may harbor some lingering ill will against Pelosi because she backed Rep. Mike Honda (D-Calif.) when the two were vying to become a vice chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

A spokesperson for Meeks could not immediately comment.

Hoyer's call for Jefferson to step aside marks only the latest time he has vociferously supported a Pelosi decision. The whip has at times been at odds with Pelosi, his onetime leadership rival. Pelosi bested Hoyer in a race for Democratic whip in 2002.

These days, however, Hoyer says he has only unalloyed endorsements for the minority leader and her ability to unify the caucus.

"Nancy has worked harder in my opinion than anybody I have seen in my 26 years in Congress," Hoyer averred yesterday. "[Former Minority Leader] Dick Gephardt [D-Mo.] I thought was the hardest worker I could find. Nancy works harder than Dick. She travels more. She raises more money. She works harder than message. She's doing a wonderful job.

"If we lose, it will not be Nancy Pelosi's fault. She's done everything she possibly could to insure our victory. ... Win, lose or draw, she's going to be our leader."

Hoyer was responding to a recent report that Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, may mount a challenge to Pelosi if Democrats fall short of taking control of the House.

Emanuel said, "Congresswoman Pelosi is the leader. I'm not interested in [challenging her], and I support her."

In a moment of levity, Hoyer quipped that the question may be a "moot point."

"If we don't take back the House after the situation we're in now, we're all going to shoot ourselves in the head!" he quipped, then added, "I didn't mean it literally. Put your hopes aside."

Pelosi is virtually assured of becoming Speaker unopposed if Democrats take control. Despite some concerns among Democrats that she is a poor spokeswoman for the party, the caucus is unlikely to miss the chance to elect the first female Speaker or to reward her for ending a dozen years in the political doldrums.

Even if Democrats do fall short of taking power, it is unclear who would challenge Pelosi. Hoyer has said time and again that he has no desire to take her on again. Emanuel, while seen as hardworking, smart and effective, has little seniority and has engendered ill will in some factions of the caucus with his colorful and direct language.

Separation Hypocrisy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

CONGRESS CAN BE PERSNICKETY about its prerogatives, real and imagined. But its reverence for the separation of powers, so flagrantly on display in its continuing snit over the FBI's search of a House member's offices, goes by the wayside when it's Congress trespassing on someone else's turf.

Take the repeated attempts by Congress to micromanage the work of the federal courts. Conservatives have tried without success to strip courts of jurisdiction over hot-button issues such as same-sex marriage and the constitutionality of a federal law against it. More recently, some members have threatened to prohibit the Supreme Court from citing the decisions of foreign courts in its opinions.

DOJ_NMG_0032383

Fortunately, a member of the court who might be expected to welcome the last proposal has come out against it. Justice Antonin Scalia recently delivered a lecture on the separation of powers that applies to other misguided initiatives in Congress.

"No one is more opposed to using foreign law than I am," Scalia told a Capitol Hill luncheon last month. "But I'm darned if I think it's up to Congress to direct the Supreme Court how to make its decisions." He asked Congress to "let us make our mistakes, just as we let you make yours."

Congressional dissatisfaction with the judicial branch is old news in Washington. It ranges from complaints voiced by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that the court has questioned Congress' "method of reasoning" to griping by other members of Congress about requests for judicial pay raises. The latest attempt to muscle the courts is a proposal by Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) to create an inspector general for the judiciary who would watchdog judicial ethics at all levels. A similar House bill by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) would apply only to lower-court judges. The inspector general idea would unnecessarily entangle the legislative branch in the day-to-day supervision of the judiciary.

The Supreme Court is not above criticism, and Congress has the authority to define the jurisdiction of various federal courts, to decide how much money should be appropriated for their operation and even to impeach and remove judges who abuse their public trust. Congress also is free to regulate or even outlaw some of the practices that have given rise to the inspector general idea — such as the attendance by judges at lavish "seminars" paid for by foundations linked to special-interest groups.

But even in areas in which Congress can set rules for the judicial branch, it's the better part of wisdom for legislators to tread softly. Conservatives in Congress have dismissed that advice when it has come from "good government" groups and liberal lawyers; maybe it will sink in when it comes from their hero, Justice Scalia.

Lobbyist Says Client Paid Half The Cost Of Town House (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — A former top aide to the House defense appropriations subcommittee acknowledged Tuesday that the president of a military contractor had paid half the cost of a $1 million town house that they bought 11 months after she left the Congressional job.

The former aide, Letitia Hoadley White, now a prominent lobbyist, is already under scrutiny by federal prosecutors investigating the possibility that lawmakers and members of their staffs directed federal money to contractors in exchange for illicit payments. A spokesman for Ms. White said the purchase was a private arrangement between close friends.

Ms. White was for many years the top aide in charge of inserting pet projects, known as earmarks, into spending bills for Representative Jerry Lewis, Republican of California, when he led the House defense appropriations subcommittee.

The person who paid $500,000 toward the purchase of her house was Nicholas Karangelen, president of Trident Systems Inc., one of many companies that benefited from earmarks. In 2002, for example, the company received part of an $8 million joint contract for technology to survey battlefields.

Ms. White left Capitol Hill in January 2003 for a partnership in the lobbying firm of Copeland Lowery Jacques Denton & White. Trident retained her as a lobbyist the next month, and she bought the house with Mr. Karangelen in December of that year. Ms. White reported that Trident paid her firm $80,000 in fees for the year, and the firm continued to receive earmarked money.

If Mr. Karangelen's $500,000 contribution to the house benefited Ms. White as compensation for her services, lobbying laws would require her to disclose his contribution.

Patrick Dorton, a spokesman for Ms. White, said: "She purchased the house as a private citizen. She went in 50-50 with a friend. And it is absolutely not connected to any fee arrangement or work for Trident."

Mr. Karangelen and a Trident spokeswoman did not return calls seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0032384

The federal prosecutors looking at Ms. White's work are investigating possible ties between Mr. Lewis, her former boss, and Bill Lowery, her lobbying partner. Mr. Lowery's firm represents many clients who have received money earmarked by the defense subcommittee, and the firm and its clients account for a large part of Mr. Lewis's campaign fund-raising.

Mr. Karangelen and other Trident executives are major contributors to Republicans, to Mr. Lewis and to other members of the House Appropriations Committee.

Friends of Ms. White say she sometimes stays in the town house and uses it for fund-raisers and events related to her lobbying business. A political action committee that Mr. Karangelen runs, Small Biz Tech Pac, also lists the town house as its address.

On Tuesday, a researcher for the liberal Web site Talking Points Memo turned up a deed showing Mr. Karangelen as a second owner of the town house.

Retirement Account Of DeLay's Wife Traced (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

A registered lobbyist opened a retirement account in the late 1990s for the wife of then-House Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and contributed thousands of dollars to it while also paying her a salary to work for him from her home in Texas, according to sources, documents and DeLay's attorney, Richard Cullen.

The account represents a small portion of the income that DeLay's family received from entities at least partly controlled by lobbyist Edwin A. Buckham. But the disclosure of its origin adds to what was previously known about the benefits DeLay's family received from its association with Buckham, and it brings the total over the past seven years to about half a million dollars.

Buckham was DeLay's chief of staff before he became a lobbyist at the end of 1998, shortly before the account was opened and the flow of funds began. He has come under scrutiny from federal investigators because his lobbying firm received hundreds of thousands of dollars in revenue from clients of indicted Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Buckham's financial ties to DeLay's family -- and the retirement account in particular -- have recently attracted the interest of FBI agents and others in the federal task force probing public corruption by lawmakers and lobbyists, according to a source who was questioned in the course of the government's investigation.

Cullen said the retirement account was required for Buckham's employees under Internal Revenue Service rules. But investigators are looking at Buckham's role in establishing the account and at whether the lawmaker may have performed official acts in return for any of the income arranged by Buckham, according to the source. DeLay denies any wrongdoing.

Another lawmaker, Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.), has similarly come under Justice Department scrutiny in the past year because of fees paid to his wife's consulting firm -- in that instance as compensation for soliciting corporate campaign contributions.

Abramoff, who was friendly with both DeLay and Doolittle, put Julie Doolittle's firm on his lobbying firm's payroll to plan a fundraising event for a nonprofit group he created. A nonprofit organization that Buckham created also hired her firm to keep its books; the organization subsidized a $28,000 trip to South Korea by DeLay and his wife.

Laura Blackann, a spokeswoman for John Doolittle, confirmed that a grand jury investigating Abramoff's lobbying activities subpoenaed Julie Doolittle's firm in 2004 to obtain some of its records. In February, the FBI subpoenaed another nonprofit group created by Buckham, seeking records of any dealings with DeLay, his wife and his daughter, according to a copy of the subpoena.

From 1998 until recently, Buckham, an evangelical minister, met regularly with DeLay, occasionally attended staff meetings in his office, made scheduling recommendations or decisions for the office, and served as DeLay's chief political and spiritual adviser, even though he was not formally employed by him. At the time, Buckham's clients included a host of companies with regulatory and legislative business before Congress, and whose interests DeLay supported.

Under congressional ethics rules, lobbyists such as Buckham are barred from providing gifts or gratuities with a total value exceeding $50 to lawmakers in a single year. No similar prohibition exists for payments to a lawmaker's family members, but the pay must be a reasonable wage for real work and not be meant to influence a lawmaker's votes. Nothing in pending House and Senate lobbying reform legislation addresses the issue of such lobbyist payments to lawmaker's families.

DOJ_NMG_0032385

DeLay, who was indicted in October 2005 on charges of money laundering related to the 2002 elections in Texas, announced in April that he would resign from Congress on June 9. He stepped down as House majority leader after the indictment, relinquishing a post he held from 2002 to 2005. DeLay has not disclosed his future employment plans but has said he plans to continue to promote conservative causes in Washington.

Buckham, who co-owned his lobbying firm with his wife, initially opened the retirement account for Christine DeLay at First Union bank. In 2001, he transferred it to the Charles Schwab & Co. office near his home in Frederick, according to a source with direct knowledge of the matter. From 1999 to 2000, DeLay listed the account as a spousal asset on his financial disclosure forms without specifying its value.

In his 2001 disclosure, DeLay said for the first time that the account was valued at between $15,000 and $50,000. Beginning in 2003, he listed it as a joint asset, though Cullen said in an interview that it remained in Christine DeLay's name and that such a listing was not required. "I believe the IRA has remained in Christine's name since the inception and that [the joint] designation must have been an error," Cullen said.

DeLay's salary from the House during this period ranged from $136,700 to $180,100. He will receive a pension starting at about $56,000 annually, and he is eligible for a defined-contribution retirement program, according to the National Taxpayers Union.

Cullen said that the Schwab account was a routine way for Buckham to contribute to an employee's retirement needs and that Christine DeLay, like others who worked at Buckham's now-defunct lobbying firm, received funds for the account as a percentage of her income during her employment. Charles Wm. McIntyre, a colleague of Cullen's at the McGuireWoods law firm, said DeLay and his office are unaware of any particular interest in the retirement account by federal investigators.

Besides financing the retirement account, Buckham played a role in two other streams of income that indirectly benefited DeLay.

One involved payments to DeLay's family by his principal political action committee, Americans for a Republican Majority (ARMPAC), which drew its largest donations from corporations. Three former DeLay staffers with firsthand knowledge of Buckham's activities have described him as a decision maker for the group, even though it was formally run by its executive director.

An arm of the group paid Buckham a monthly consulting fee, and Buckham in turn employed its executive director as a consultant to his lobbying firm. The two of them shared a single office on the top floor of a townhouse owned by a nonprofit organization that Buckham created and directed. Buckham's role is relevant because from 2001 to Jan. 31, 2006, ARMPAC paid Christine DeLay; DeLay's daughter, Dani DeLay Ferro; and Ferro's Texas firm a total of $350,304 in political consulting fees and expenses, according to public records.

The Washington Post previously disclosed that from 1998 to 2002, Buckham's lobbying firm, Alexander Strategy Group, paid Christine DeLay a monthly salary averaging between $3,200 and $3,400. Cullen initially said the payments were for telephone calls she made periodically to the offices of certain members of Congress seeking the names of their favorite charities. Christine DeLay then forwarded that information to Buckham, along with some information about those charities.

Last week, Cullen said the payments were also for general political consulting Christine DeLay provided to her husband. Cullen said he does not have complete records of the salary payments or the dates when Christine DeLay performed the work from the couple's home in Sugar Land, Tex. But a source familiar with the pay records said the total she received from the Alexander Strategy Group was about $115,000.

Together with the retirement account worth about $25,000, this means the family's total financial benefits from entities at least partly controlled by Buckham exceeded $490,300.

Before being paid by ARMPAC for political consulting, Christine DeLay, a homemaker and advocate for foster care, had not done paid work of that type. That circumstance has figured in government investigations of payments to other lawmakers' spouses, on the grounds that, if the compensation began after a lawmaker's election, it might have been meant to influence official acts.

DOJ_NMG_0032386

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a group that has criticized payments to lawmakers' spouses, said that "the real scandal in Washington is what is legal."

"This is a prime example of that," she said. "But there is a distinction between what is legal and what is right. . . . What was DeLay doing for all that money? Even Ed Buckham was not paying DeLay and his family out of the goodness of his heart."

Buckham's lobbying clients during the period in question included Enron, AT&T, the American Bankers Association, the National Association of Convenience Stores, Freddie Mac, Nextel, United Parcel Service, Time Warner, Microsoft, BellSouth, the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America and the Coalition to Preserve Dietary Supplements.

Several groups represented by Buckham also helped sponsor lavish overseas travel by DeLay and his family.

"Tom DeLay has never taken an official act that was not based on his strongly held principles," Cullen said. Buckham and his attorney did not return several telephone calls seeking comment.

DeLay: GOP's 'panic, Depression' Risk Losing Elections (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former House majority leader Tom DeLay said he's "disappointed" in three ex-associates who pleaded guilty in a federal probe of political corruption, but he said their admissions "doesn't mean I knew" of their efforts to bribe Congress.

The Texas Republican, who is resigning his House seat Friday, told USA TODAY that he was surprised by revelations that Tony Rudy, a former top aide, and Jack Abramoff, a former lobbyist and longtime political supporter, tried to buy influence with lawmakers.

"The Tony Rudy and Jack Abramoff I'm reading about in the papers are not the people I knew," DeLay said Tuesday. His former press secretary, Michael Scanlon, also pleaded guilty.

Nicknamed "The Hammer" for his hard-charging style, DeLay is leaving Congress with more of a bang than a whimper.

The former No. 2 House leader criticized his Republican colleagues for "panic, depression and woe-is-me-ism," and predicted they will lose control in November "if they continue the attitude they have right now."

DeLay's career embodies the GOP's ascendancy. He was swept into Congress by President Reagan's second-term landslide in 1984 and was a member of the leadership team in 1995 when the GOP took control of the House for the first time in 40 years.

DeLay said the Justice Department has not questioned him in the corruption probe, and he has offered to cooperate.

He blamed his political exit on Ronnie Earle, the Austin district attorney who indicted DeLay on charges of violating state campaign-finance laws. DeLay insists he did nothing wrong, but said Earle, a Democrat, indicted him to force him out of House leadership.

"Their campaign of character assassination and criminalization of politics was effective," he said. Earle denies partisanship.

DeLay, 59, said his plans include establishing a private legal defense fund — unsupervised by the Federal Election Commission — to help pay his lawyers. He said he owes more than $2.5 million. He can also use political contributions to defray the debt. As of March 31, DeLay had $1.4 million in his campaign treasury.

McKinney Deal May Be In Works Lawyer Rejects Talk Of Any Negotiations (AJC)

By Bob Kemper, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal prosecutors investigating the confrontation between Rep. Cynthia McKinney of Georgia and a Capitol police officer have been talking privately with McKinney's office in hopes of resolving the case without the spectacle of an indictment and trial, officials familiar with the talks say.

Prosecutors for several weeks have been carrying on confidential discussions with the DeKalb County Democrat in what they characterized as an effort to reach a plea agreement, even as they were presenting evidence in the March 29 incident to a grand jury, said the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The grand jury has not yet decided whether McKinney should be charged, an official familiar with the proceedings said, and no decision is expected this week. The prosecutors have subpoenaed at least six witnesses to appear before the jury over the last two months.

McKinney's office rejected claims that there have been discussions of a plea agreement, saying the congresswoman has not been charged with anything and may never be, so there's no plea to negotiate.

"At this time, I have no comment as I am unaware of any 'legal case' regarding Ms. McKinney and [the] March 29 incident," William Moffitt, one of McKinney's lawyers, said in an e-mailed statement.

A spokesman for U.S. Attorney Ken Wainstein's office and a Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on the talks or even confirm they were occurring.

Negotiated settlements in cases as controversial and politically sensitive as McKinney's are common, according to former federal prosecutors and lawyers with experience in Washington's Superior Court. They said there is often pressure on the prosecutors from higher-ups at the Justice Department and possibly the White House to resolve such cases quickly and quietly.

The Justice Department declined to comment on McKinney's case. A White House spokesman said he had no information on whether McKinney's case had been discussed in the West Wing.

Capitol Hill police said they were dismayed that the investigation into McKinney's confrontation with the police officer is taking so long to resolve. They said failure to charge McKinney would send the message that it is all right to hit a police officer.

The incident occurred as McKinney was entering a House office building and started to skirt a security checkpoint, as members of Congress and their aides are allowed to do. When a police officer who did not recognize McKinney tried to stop her McKinney, struck him in the chest with her fist, according to the police report.

McKinney was not wearing a special lapel pin that would have identified her as a congresswoman, but House members are not required to wear the pins. She also had changed her hairstyle since posing for her official House photo, which guards can consult to confirm her identity.

McKinney and her lawyers said she was acting in self-defense after the officer touched her inappropriately. After the incident, McKinney held a news conference in which she said she was the victim of racial profiling by Capitol police, stopped only because she was a "female, black congresswoman."

Under pressure from fellow Democrats and black lawmakers, McKinney eventually apologized for the incident on the House floor.

— Scott MacFarlane of Cox Broadcasting contributed to this article.

Gambino Captain Convicted Of Racketeering (AP)

By Larry Neumeister

AP, June 7, 2006

NEW YORK -- A Gambino family captain done in by the testimony of an undercover FBI agent and hours of government tapes was convicted Tuesday of racketeering _ a verdict his lawyer said almost guarantees he will die in prison.

Gregory DePalma, 74, had an oxygen tube in his nose and gauze on his face because of a weekend biopsy as the verdict was read in U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

The verdict resulted from a government assault on what remains of the Gambino crime family after the Gotti era appeared to end with the death of John Gotti in 2002 and prosecutions of his brother, Peter Gotti, and son, John "Junior" Gotti.

Joaquin Garcia, an FBI agent who posed as "Big Jack" Falcone, had cozied up to DePalma and recorded thousands of hours of conversations that helped land the mobster.

The FBI planted a cell phone on DePalma that picked up conversations even when it was off. Defense lawyer Martin Geduldig said after the verdict that it "was just too difficult to overcome all of these tapes."

Sentencing was set for Aug. 29. Geduldig said he doubted DePalma would live beyond five years, so anything more would be a life sentence.

Prosecutors depicted DePalma as an energetic hustler from 2003 to 2005, when he extorted restaurants, construction companies and a topless nightclub where he was introduced to the undercover agent.

DOJ_NMG_0032388

DePalma called in favors from anyone who feared his mob muscle. He described getting a former manager for Liza Minnelli to finance a $12,000 trip for mob wives to Las Vegas.

The jury also heard him boast that he made a restaurant owner get an $11,000 bottle of wine and provide as much as $4,000 in free food for two dozen Gambino guests.

U.S. District Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein had rejected defense requests that DePalma rest at trial on a gurney or wheelchair because of his missing lung, heart problems, cancer and diabetes.

Prosecutors told jurors he had boasted after a 1999 racketeering guilty plea that he had duped the judge with an illness act worthy of an Academy Award.

They played tapes of him bragging that he wore an oxygen mask and did not shave for a week before sentencing, leading the judge to say he had never sentenced a man so sick.

Fat Lip Gets Mobster Life (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, June 7, 2006

He talked too much.

Motor-mouth mobster Greg DePalma blabbed his way into a life prison sentence yesterday after a jury convicted him of racketeering charges based on hours of incriminating government tapes.

The verdict ended a three-week trial highlighted by the testimony of an undercover FBI agent who got so cozy with the ailing 74-year-old Gambino capo that he earned an invitation to join the Mafia.

DePalma's foul mouth filled more than 5,000 hours of tapes and his trial featured "Sopranos"-like scenes, including grub-gorging goodfellas, bloody beatings and whining wiseguy wives.

As the verdict was read, DePalma, hooked throughout the trial to an oxygen tank, groused about the FBI agents who took him down. He was found guilty on 27 of 36 counts, many involving violent extortion.

"Maybe instead of them buying TVs from P.C. Richards, they should go out and get some terrorists," he told lawyer John Meringolo.

It was a reference to the six "stolen" wide-screen sets given to him by FBI agent Joaquin Garcia, the undercover veteran DePalma was introduced to in the fall of 2002 as Miami jewelry fence "Jack Falcone."

DePalma kept one and passed the others to mob bosses.

Considering his criminal history and failing health, "any sentence of five years or more is probably a life sentence," said Martin Geduldig, another defense lawyer.

DePalma's ghostly pale figure in court was in stark contrast to that of the carefully coiffed man who had Frank Sinatra's arm draped over his shoulder in an infamous 1976 photo.

Garcia was DePalma's constant companion for two years and played such a convincing role that the veteran gangster wanted to put him up for membership in the mob family once headed by the Dapper Don, John Gotti.

Using Gambino family muscle as leverage, DePalma forced the owner of Valbella's, a Greenwich, Conn., restaurant which has attracted the likes of Joe Torre and Regis Philbin, to pick up the tab so two dozen of his mob pals could belly up to a multicourse meal.

Prosecutors say DePalma forced Gary Labriola, Liza Minnelli's former manager, to pay for a $12,000 spending spree at Las Vegas' Venetian Hotel for the wives of his mob bosses in 2003.

And DePalma put the arm on contractors big and small for weekly protection payments of $500 or more as well as a Christmas "tribute." He forced one to buy poorly made suits from a tailor friend and to purchase signed Leroy Neiman prints that cost thousands.

Federal prosecutors Christopher Conniff and Scott Marrah pointed jurors to DePalma's own words, and his attorneys conceded that the tapes were too much to overcome.

"He was a walking bug," Geduldig said.

GABBY CAPO IS KAPUT (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, June 7, 2006

Loose-lipped Gambino capo Gregory DePalma will likely spend the rest of his life behind bars after jurors found the sickly gangster guilty of a slew of mob crimes yesterday.

Jurors deliberated three days before convicting DePalma on 27 of the 36 charges he faced at a trial in Manhattan federal court, where prosecutors played numerous tapes of the gangster on his cellphone and blabbing at mob meetings.

The verdict was a notch in the belt of undercover FBI agent Joaquin Garcia, who has been called the "modern-day Donnie Brasco" for his stunning two-year infiltration of the Gambino crime family.

DePalma, 74, who breathes through an oxygen tube, quietly shook his head as the jury foreman announced the verdict on multiple extortions, receipt of stolen property, illegal gambling, racketeering and other charges.

"I think any sentence over five years is a life sentence," defense lawyer Martin Geduldig said outside of court, estimating the sentencing guidelines would call for a prison term of more than 10 years. "It was too difficult to overcome all if these tapes . . . He was a walking bug."

"Greg's been around the block a couple of times. He knew what he was battling here," said Geduldig, who added that he would ask Manhattan federal Judge Alvin Hellerstein for leniency at an Aug. 29 sentencing because of DePalma's poor health.

The ailing wiseguy, who has heart disease, diabetes and is missing a lung due to cancer, relied on the help of EMTs to get in and out of his wheelchair during the trial.

Meanwhile, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Christopher Conniff and Scott Marrah have repeatedly accused DePalma of feigning illness in order to curry favor with the court.

Testifying in a closed courtroom, Garcia told jurors how he ingratiated himself to DePalma by posing as gangster wannabe and jewel thief "Jack Falcone."

The agent, who weighs upwards of 300 pounds, joked that he packed on the weight while secretly recording hundreds of meetings with DePalma at restaurants around the city and in Westchester.

Prior to his March 2005 arrest, DePalma was taped boasting about his influence in the Gambino crime family and supposed brushes with celebrity, including a dinner with pop star Mariah Carey.

He also bragged of strong-arming movie star Armand Assante, who played "Dapper Don" John Gotti in an HBO movie.

kati.cornell@nypost.com

Ex-Tenn. Lawmaker Denies Taking Payoffs (AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

(06-06) 18:52 PDT Memphis, Tenn. (AP) -- A former Tennessee legislator charged with extortion took the stand in his own defense Tuesday and denied ever accepting payoffs from two FBI informants.

Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon testified that he had supported legislation for E-Cycle Management, a bogus company set up by the FBI, as a favor to friends and not for money.

Dixon was the only defense witness, and jurors were to begin deliberations Wednesday.

In final arguments to the jury, defense lawyer Coleman Garrett said Dixon is the victim of a government conspiracy based on a fake company that offered bribes for support of a proposed law that was never intended to pass.

"Don't treat this like it's real," Garrett said. "This is a joke. This man was set up."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim DiScenza said Dixon was not pressured into taking bribe money — "He just took it."

Under questioning from his attorney, Dixon said he had long known and tried to help the government's chief witnesses against him, Barry Myers and Tim Willis. Myers was Dixon's assistant at a community development center and Willis had been active in Memphis politics for years.

Dixon, a Democratic lawmaker for 22 years, said he had tried to help the two establish careers as lobbyists.

He acknowledged accepting $1,000 during a meeting that Willis secretly videotaped in 2004 for the FBI. But he said he thought the total of $6,000 that Willis laid out on a table was intended for Myers for helping lobby on behalf of E-Cycle.

On the tape, Dixon tells Myers: "Throw me one of those stacks, man."

He told jurors he thought Myers intended for that money to go to the financially struggling development center where they both worked.

Myers has pleaded guilty to splitting bribes totaling $9,500 with Dixon and is cooperating with the government.

Dixon was one of five sitting or former state lawmakers arrested in 2005 in an investigation the government called Tennessee Waltz and is the first to go to trial. One of the five, Republican Chris Newton, pleaded guilty, resigned his state House seat and is serving a one-year prison term. The other three are awaiting trial.

Dixon Tells Of 'network' (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 7, 2006

But didn't sell influence, ex-lawmaker testifies

Former state senator Roscoe Dixon acknowledged Tuesday that he accepted cash from a government informant portraying a lobbyist seeking favors, but denied that it was a bribe for his legislative help.

Dixon's testimony came at the end of his six-day federal bribery trial in which he was the only defense witness. The jury will begin deliberating this morning in what is the first local trial in the Tennessee Waltz public corruption investigation.

In his first public comments about the five-count indictment, Dixon was faced with explaining his words and actions on secret audio and video recordings that prosecutors say depict him selling his political influence by accepting cash payments from FBI informant Tim Willis.

"Tim Willis was my friend at the time and he knew he didn't have to pay me to get things done," Dixon told a federal court jury that saw him accepting a $1,500 payment in a tape made March 5, 2004. "I assumed it was to keep me doing the things I could do. I was under financial strain and obligations."

In closing arguments, federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza noted, however, that in the only conversation on the brief tape, Willis reminds Dixon to withdraw legislation for the FBI's undercover company called E-Cycle Management, Inc., which wants it revised.

"Oh, yeah, we'll kill it," Dixon replies as he walks out of E-Cycle's Downtown office with the money. "That's a done deal."

Dixon was charged with conspiracy to commit extortion and bribery by accepting $9,500 in cash payments for handling special legislation for the fictitious E-Cycle company that purportedly wanted to recycle the state's surplus computers.

His attorney, Coleman Garrett, argued that Dixon was "tricked" into accepting money and that government informants and undercover agents entrapped him.

"Why is the government doing this to Senator Dixon?" Garrett said in a voice with the volume and cadence of a fiery preacher. "Tim Willis was the main conspirator. E-Cycle was a lie. E-Cycle wasn't a real company. The government created this scam."

Dixon, 56, resigned from the Senate in January of last year after serving 22 years in the legislature to become the assistant chief administrative officer to Shelby County Mayor A C Wharton. He resigned the $101,856-a-year position when he was indicted five months later.

The Tennessee Waltz investigation netted 10 indictments in all, including four other past or present state lawmakers.

Awaiting trial are John Ford and Kathryn Bowers from Memphis and Ward Crutchfield from Chattanooga.

Former state representative Chris Newton from East Tennessee pleaded guilty to accepting bribes and is serving a one-year prison sentence at a federal facility in Atlanta.

Another guilty plea came from Barry Myers, Dixon's codefendant and former aide who testified last week that he was the former senator's "bag man" who collected payoffs on his behalf.

He said Dixon usually avoided accepting payoffs directly, but instead told suitors to "take care of Barry. Keep Barry happy."

Dixon testified Tuesday that he used the phrase only to encourage Willis to help his aide get consulting work if he could.

"I was just sharing the thought to help someone else out," Dixon said, adding that he tried to promote the careers of both Willis and Myers. "Both of these guys were like children to me. Barry was very, very helpful to me and I couldn't afford to pay him."

DOJ_NMG_0032391

When his attorney suggested the phrase "keep Barry happy" might sound damaging, Dixon agreed. "It was a poor choice of words," he said.

In a video recording made Feb. 12, 2004, at Willis' Mud Island home, Willis places $6,000 cash on a table, Myers counts out six stacks of $1,000 each and Dixon tells Myers to give him one stack. He denied Myers' earlier allegation that he, Myers, took more of the money to Dixon later that evening.

"That was all I needed and I just saw it as a way of Barry giving me money to keep things going," said Dixon, emphasizing his financial strain. "It takes a toll on you."

In May of last year, Dixon agreed to be interviewed by the FBI and denied receiving any money that night in 2004 at Willis' home.

Dixon said his memory was blurred by his nervousness.

"I was scared as heck and kind of lost track of things," Dixon said in explaining the discrepancy between his denial and the video recording. "I get scared if I get stopped for a traffic ticket. I've always had the highest respect for the FBI and for police officers ... but I'm just a human being like anyone else."

U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla said he found little evidence of entrapment in the case, but that out of an abundance of caution, he still would give instructions for the jury to consider it as a defense.

Corruption Trial Witness: I Had To Hire A Drunk (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 7, 2006

Mayor Richard Daley's patronage chief ordered the hiring of a politically connected man who was "somewhat of a drinker," and he repeatedly engineered the promotions of workers with clout over more qualified candidates, the former No. 2 official in the city Water Department testified Tuesday.

Donald Tomczak, a key prosecution witness in the City Hall corruption trial, said he complained vehemently when Daley aide Robert Sorich directed him to accept the transfer of the man with the drinking problem, who had been working for the Transportation Department.

Tomczak said he warned Sorich that the man, a political worker under Ald. Edward Burke (14th), could cause injuries on Water Department job sites as a result of his drinking.

But Tomczak said Sorich insisted: "Work it out, Don." Tomczak hired the man and put him to work near his office at the Jardine Filtration Plant, where he could "keep an eye on him," Tomczak said.

Prosecutors hope the testimony supports their contention that political ties mattered more than ability in many City Hall hiring and promotion decisions. Sorich and three other former Daley administration officials are accused of participating in a scheme to fix personnel decisions in favor of pro-Daley political workers and other applicants favored by the mayor's office.

Under cross-examination, Sorich's defense lawyer prodded Tomczak into conceding that Sorich was only one of several players in the "exact same system" that has existed since Daley became mayor in 1989.

Before Sorich began working in the mayor's office in 1993, Tomczak said then-Daley aides Timothy Degnan and Mike Broderick arranged jobs for pro-Daley political workers. Degnan and Broderick have not been charged with crimes.

"Certainly Robert didn't start this, did he?" attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin asked Tomczak.

"No," Tomczak replied.

In four weeks of testimony, federal prosecutors have presented many of their key witnesses. Tomczak's testimony was very similar to that of former Streets and Sanitation Deputy Commissioner Daniel Katalinic.

Katalinic and Tomczak—who both have admitted taking bribes from city trucking contractors—described how they built campaign forces of city workers who did the bidding of the mayor's office. The patronage armies were sustained through rigged jobs and promotions, they testified.

Former personnel directors in the city's Sewers, Water and Streets and Sanitation Departments told jurors that they received "blessed lists" of political workers from Sorich and Timothy McCarthy, Sorich's aide and co-defendant.

DOJ_NMG_0032392

Two of the directors testified that they falsified ratings forms to ensure the hiring of favored applicants. They and other prosecution witnesses said the city's interview process for many blue-collar union jobs was a charade.

The fraud allegedly was designed to get around decades-old legal restrictions against City Hall patronage. The prosecution is expected to rest in two to three weeks after presenting testimony about hiring in the city's Aviation and Buildings Departments.

McCarthy's lawyer, Patrick Deady, sent a subpoena to the city Monday demanding documents related to the 2004 hiring of two building inspectors who allegedly were hired because their fathers are union leaders. Deady wants memos of meetings involving top Daley administration officials, including Corporation Counsel Mara Georges, former Chief of Staff Sheila O'Grady and retired Personnel Commissioner Glenn Carr.

Defense lawyers have argued that the mayor's office recommended job applicants but that nobody was guaranteed a job or a promotion.

Durkin also has tried to emphasize that Sorich answered to higher-level officials in the mayor's office. Under cross-examination Tuesday, Tomczak acknowledged that former top Daley aides Victor Reyes and John Doerrer had the final say on hires. Neither Doerrer nor Reyes has been charged.

Tomczak agreed with Durkin's assertion that "not one red cent" changed hands in the alleged hiring scheme. Durkin contrasted that point with Tomczak's guilty plea last year, when he admitted taking almost $400,000 in bribes from companies in the city's Hired Truck Program.

"You're not equating taking $400,000 to this hiring nonsense?" Durkin asked Tomczak, who replied that he was not doing so.

Hundreds of jobs in the Water Department were filled with more concern for politics than merit, Tomczak told jurors. Getting promoted as a reward for political campaign work was widely referred to as "getting made," he said.

He said he went to Sorich to arrange the promotion of a political worker who was not the best candidate for a district foreman job. The man's promotion required Tomczak to "bring in an extra person with more experience to back him up," he testified.

Tomczak's testimony blunted another defense argument: that the mayor's office got involved in hiring to promote racial diversity. He said most beneficiaries of the rigged hiring process were white. Some minorities were promoted, he said, because "it would help the political group," which was divided into white, Latino and African-American branches.

Also Tuesday, a former assistant commissioner in the Water Department testified that she regularly met with Sorich from 1993 to 2002 to receive names of people that the mayor's office wanted hired or promoted.

But on cross-examination, Phyllis Bergthold said she told government agents that the names were "recommendations or preferred candidates." Bergthold, who grew up in the Daley family's 11th Ward power base, later acknowledged that the vast majority of people endorsed by the mayor's office were hired or promoted.

rrbush@tribune.com

dmihalopoulos@tribune.com

Sorich's Lawyer: 'Not One Red Cent Changed Hands' (CHIST)

By Steve Warmbir And Natasha Korecki, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 7, 2006

In a burst of courtroom drama, a federal prosecutor and the defense attorney for Mayor Daley's former patronage chief clashed on Tuesday over testimony of the prosecution's star witness in the most fiery day so far in the trial.

Donald Tomczak, the former city Water Department honcho turned government informant, was on the witness stand wrapping up his second day of testimony when Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins asked how Tomczak rewarded some of the city employees who did political work for Tomczak on the side.

Tomczak said he could decide to award overtime on his own to city employees who took part in his political army. But Tomczak made clear that he did not have final say over hiring or promotions in his department. Final say came from the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, or IGA.

HIGHLIGHTS

PROSECUTION: Courtroom fireworks go off as a federal prosecutor and a defense attorney for the mayor's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich, knock heads over the testimony of a star prosecution witness.

DEFENSE: In other testimony, a former personnel director at the city's Water Department says she considered names given to her by the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs just recommendations for hirings or promotions. But the witness acknowledges that the vast majority of those recommendations got the spots.

UP NEXT: Prosecutors are expected to call a former city transportation worker who ran his own political army.

Clout on Wheels

The scandal of the city's Hired Truck Program - a Chicago Sun-Times investigation.

The mayor's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, who is on trial, was a top IGA official. Sorich and three other men are accused of running a hiring scheme in which officials rigged job interviews to ensure political workers for the Daley organization got city jobs or promotions.

'Pretty odd scheme, isn't it?'

Sorich's attorney, Thomas Durkin, took umbrage over the overtime question and appeared concerned that the prosecution was trying to link Sorich and his three co-defendants to the overtime scam -- although the prosecution never made any direct links.

"Overtime didn't have a thing to do with Robert Sorich or any of the young men at this table, did it?" Durkin asked Tomczak, his voice rising.

"No," Tomczak said.

Durkin also underscored that none of the men on trial ever took any money in exchange for getting people city jobs or promotions.

"Not one red cent changed hands," Durkin asked Tomczak.

"No," Tomczak agreed.

"Pretty odd scheme, isn't it?" Durkin said.

Collins loudly objected to Durkin's remark, and the judge sustained the objection.

Prosecutors say taxpayers were hurt in the scheme because people were hired or promoted in city jobs because of politics, not because they were the best people for the jobs or even qualified. Collins went through example after example with Tomczak on Tuesday where Tomczak said the most qualified person wasn't picked for a job.

Twice, Tomczak was told by Sorich to accept people with drinking problems for Water Department jobs, Tomczak said.

Also Tuesday, a former Water Department personnel director, Phyllis Bergthold, testified that Rosemarie Andolino, now executive director of the O'Hare Modernization Program, was present in some IGA meetings where Bergthold got names from Sorich of political workers who should get jobs or promotions. Andolino worked in IGA then.

Andolino's attorney, Michael Ettinger, declined to comment other than to say that prosecutors have assured him Andolino is not a target of the investigation.

FBI Probing Fumo In Warehouse Sale (PHI)

By Emilie Lounsberry, John Shiffman, Thomas Fitzgerald And Craig R. Mccoy

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 7, 2006

Federal authorities are exploring whether State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, to help pay for renovations at his mansion, directed a nonprofit to purchase a warehouse owned by the contractor, sources said.

Fumo's attorney declined to comment yesterday. A lawyer for the nonprofit defended the warehouse purchase, saying the group paid "fair market value" after obtaining an appraisal.

The FBI's new line of inquiry in its sprawling, three-year Fumo investigation began after agents raided electrical contractor Donald "Gus" Dougherty's South Philadelphia home as part of a separate tax-fraud case.

This aspect of the inquiry - whether there is a link between the home renovation and the warehouse purchase - is in its earliest stages.

DOJ_NMG_0032394

In recent days, prosecutors have subpoenaed permits from city records about the work done at Fumo's mansion in the city's Fairmount section, according to City Hall sources.

Investigators have been examining whether Fumo controls the nonprofit organization, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, and, if so, whether he has used it for personal and political gain.

Fumo purchased his 29-room, four-story brownstone on Green Street for $175,000 in 1994 and then embarked on an ambitious five-year effort.

"It was a big job," said Brian Burrows, a city electricians' union official, who said yesterday that he worked on the home and recently was interviewed by FBI agents about it.

He said he began working at the mansion in late 1999. Burrows said he was told that Dougherty pulled out of the job after not being paid. He said the work done by Dougherty's crews, plus his own, probably cost about $100,000, the same estimate given by another source.

"When I got there, it was tying all the odds and ends together on the project - for instance, the dining room was finished, except the chandeliers and wall sconces were coming in from Italy," Burrows said. "We hooked them up."

He says he wired Fumo's hot tub and the lighting and exhaust fans for his basement shooting range. The four-story building also has its own elevator.

Another person familiar with the renovations said that Dougherty's workers spent a year or more toiling within the mansion.

Though a Fumo spokesman declined to comment yesterday, his office told the Philadelphia Daily News earlier this year that Dougherty had done only a "small amount of work" and had been paid for it.

In December 1999, after Dougherty finished working in the mansion, he sold his warehouse at Second and Tasker Streets to Citizens' Alliance for $310,000 - $95,000 more than he had paid for it two years earlier.

The warehouse is about a dozen blocks from the Passyunk Avenue corridor where Citizens' Alliance has concentrated much of its activity, buying and fixing storefronts.

According to someone who took part in the talks over buying the warehouse, Fumo led the purchase negotiations for the nonprofit.

William J. Winning, a lawyer for Citizens' Alliance, said he did not know whether Fumo had directed the warehouse purchase.

Winning said the nonprofit obtained an appraisal that valued the warehouse at $310,000. "Fair market value was set, and that's what it was sold for," Winning said, adding that it's now "probably worth 10 times that much."

He said Citizens' Alliance now rents the warehouse to a limousine service and another tenant.

David Glancey, chairman of the city board that sets real estate assessments, said yesterday that the price paid by Citizens' Alliance seemed fair in light of rising property values in the neighborhood.

Fumo has never held a formal position at Citizens' Alliance.

Nevertheless, in an affidavit released last week, the FBI says that it has obtained e-mails showing that Fumo was "directly involved in and managing and controlling" its operations - including real estate purchases.

"I will decide" which buildings are bought, he wrote in one e-mail. Those e-mails were written after the warehouse purchase.

For a time, prosecutors were rebuffed in their recent attempt to subpoena city records pertaining to Fumo's home.

The subpoena sought all city records on renovations to Fumo's house from 1995 to 2000.

Such permits are normally public records. But city lawyers at first refused to turn them over, citing a 1995 court order obtained by Fumo's family sealing all city records related to the house.

To obtain it, a lawyer for Fumo's then-wife argued that Fumo had received unspecified threats and that release of his records would "seriously jeopardize the personal security of the plaintiff and her family."

The secrecy edict is highly unusual, possibly unprecedented in the city's history. Common Pleas Court Judge Albert W. Sheppard Jr., who issued the order, noted in an interview yesterday that at the time the city lawyers had not opposed it.

Saying that federal law trumped state law, federal prosecutors obtained a new order on Monday from a federal judge ordering the city to turn over the records. The city is expected to comply.

Richard Manieri, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, said yesterday he could not comment on an active investigation.

Fumo, an influential Democrat who has served in the state Senate since 1979, has defended Citizens' Alliance's work in the community and suggested the FBI investigation is a Republican vendetta.

Geoffrey Johnson, one of Fumo's lawyers, declined to comment yesterday. Ken Snyder, a Fumo spokesman, referred reporters to Winning.

Fumo has been responsible for the bulk of Citizens' Alliance's funding.

As The Inquirer first disclosed, Fumo reached secret agreements with Peco Energy under which it gave Citizens' Alliance $17 million and Fumo dropped his opposition to Peco's business plans.

Authorities have also opened a parallel investigation into whether Fumo or his aides destroyed e-mails to thwart the federal investigation.

The probe marked a milestone of sorts last week when the FBI arrested two computer technicians on Fumo's legislative payroll and charged them with deleting e-mails to protect Fumo.

The FBI affidavit quotes e-mails in which the workers say Fumo ordered the e-mails destroyed. Fumo has also denied wrongdoing in that matter.

Now the Fumo probe is intersecting with another corruption investigation - the one involving Donald Dougherty's business. Sources have said this probe is examining, in part, whether Dougherty illegally avoided paying payroll taxes and union dues.

They have also been examining Dougherty's ties to John Dougherty, who is leader of Local 98 of the electrical workers' union, and whether officials at the union knew Donald Dougherty was avoiding paying union dues.

Financial dealings between labor leaders and contractors are closely regulated. Among other issues, the authorities have been looking into a sale of a Shore house by Donald Dougherty to John Dougherty, who are unrelated but friends since childhood. John Dougherty has said he paid a fair price.

To complicate matters further, John Dougherty and Fumo are rival political bosses who have an on-again, off-again political feud.

John Dougherty declined to comment yesterday. Donald Dougherty's attorney, Nicholas Nastasi, said this week: "I will not comment on any questions relating to Donald Dougherty."

Feds Say Bureaucrat Fixed Tickets For Tickets (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 7, 2006

Federal prosecutors portrayed Molden David Faison yesterday as a man who never met a concert ticket he didn't want - or wasn't willing to fix parking tickets to get.

The feds allege that Faison, a former hearing officer for the Bureau of Administrative Adjudication, used his job in August 2004 to extort $169 worth of tickets to a Prince concert.

Prosecutor Judy Goldstein Smith played damning FBI audiotapes of conversations between Faison and a government informant yesterday at the start of Faison's trial.

On the tapes, the government informant, John Florio, can be overheard giving Faison, who heard parking ticket appeals, the tag numbers and models of the vehicles with parking tickets he wanted dismissed.

The tapes reveal Faison keeping Florio informed about the disposition of the tickets and repeatedly asking him about getting tickets to concerts by Phil Collins, Prince, Barry Manilow and sports events. Florio also thanks Faison for "taking care" of him.

The tapes were played as corroborating evidence to support Florio, who took the stand yesterday as the government's main witness against Faison.

Florio, an admitted drug dealer with a gruff manner and South Philly accent, pleaded guilty on May 26 to three counts of possession of cocaine, crack and heroin with intent to distribute.

He testified that Faison agreed to reduce or dismiss his own parking tickets at a meeting on June 4, 2004, in exchange for $200.

After that meeting, Florio became a cooperating witness and wore a wire during subsequent meetings.

The feds allege the key meeting between Florio and Faison occurred on Aug. 18, 2004.

That day, Florio told Faison in a taped telephone call: "You're gonna be a happy camper. I got you two Prince tickets, up front, seats 1 and 2."

"Oh, man, what a deal," Faison says.

Florio told Faison that a cousin who worked for the plumbing company whose parking tickets Faison allegedly agreed to fix had paid for the concert tickets.

That same day, the feds say, Florio met Faison at a parking lot at 9th and Arch streets and gave him the Prince tickets.

"Oh, you the man... ," Faison tells Florio.

"I'm going to talk to my supervisor... and try to knock 'em all down," Faison says, referring to the plumbing company's parking tickets, but admits he may be able to get only "80 percent" dismissed.

Smith displayed copies of BAA disposition statements for the plumbing company vehicles that showed most of the tickets had either been dismissed or reduced.

During cross-examination, Faison's attorney, Edson A. Bostic, attacked Florio's credibility, getting him to admit that he used at least one and maybe two aliases while he was dealing drugs and that he had been convicted of assault charges in two separate cases.

Florio also confessed that he smokes pot to soothe his nerves and that his recent guilty plea was to a lesser charge than that lodged against him in 2002.

Faison is the second BAA official charged with corruption. He was terminated from his $31,415-a-year job in September 2004 for reasons unrelated to the extortion charge.

A federal jury convicted former bureau Director Joseph F. Hoffman Jr. of mail fraud in February 2005 in connection with a ticket-fixing scheme.

Bolivar Co. Administrator Faces Federal Charges (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, June 7, 2006

CLEVELAND, Miss. - Bolivar County administrator Adrian Brown has been indicted on federal charges of accepting a kickback and tampering with a witness, authorities said Tuesday.

The arrest of Brown, 29, of Cleveland, was announced by the FBI, the U.S. attorney's office and the Bolivar County Sheriff's Department. Brown was indicated May 24 on the charges, officials said.

John G. Raucci, special agent in charge of the FBI in Mississippi, said Brown is accused of soliciting and accepting a kickback for work for Bolivar County, which was to be reimbursed by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said Brown is also accused of attempting to intimidate a witness in the investigation.

If convicted, Brown faces a $500,000 fine and 20 years in prison. An initial court appearance was pending.

Brown has been administrator in Bolivar County since April 2004. He previously was project administrator for South Delta Planning and Development District Inc. in Greenville.

Bolivar County Administrator Indicted On Federal Charges (JCL)

The Clarion-Ledger

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, June 7, 2006

Bolivar County Administrator Adrian Brown has been charged with defrauding the federal government and tampering with a witness.

The FBI announced Brown's arrest today, following a federal grand jury indictment on May 24, on one count each of theft or bribery concerning programs receiving federal funds and tampering with a witness.

If convicted, Brown, 29, faces a $500,000 fine and 20 years in federal prison.

DOJ_NMG_0032397

Brown of Cleveland is accused of soliciting and accepting a kickback for work for Bolivar County and the county was to be reimbursed by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Witness Recovers From Overdose To Describe New Jersey Graft (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

NEWARK, June 6 — The case of Raymond J. O'Grady is the culmination of years of work by federal investigators, a tale opening a window on small-town graft that brought down more than a dozen public officials in a New Jersey county run by old-fashioned patronage politics.

Now the trial has turned out to be a story of its own: the pivotal government witness — one day into his testimony last week against Mr. O'Grady, a longtime friend from Monmouth County politics — swallowed 60 to 80 blood-pressure pills in a suicide attempt.

But on Tuesday, the government salvaged its case, which a prosecutor, Ricardo Solano, had described in his opening statement last week as "an inside look at how public office is sold."

The prosecution witness, Anthony J. Palughi, took the stand again in Federal District Court here despite objections by the defense to allowing the testimony to continue so soon after what Mr. O'Grady's lawyer called "a miraculous recovery."

Mr. O'Grady, 56, a former committeeman in Middletown Township, N.J., is charged with taking $8,000 in cash to help steer municipal work to contractors, including two men who turned out to be agents from the F.B.I.

Mr. O'Grady was among 15 local officials arrested in February and March 2005 in a continuing investigation called Operation Bid Rig, which started in 1998. He is the first to go to trial; most have pleaded guilty, and two have died.

Mr. Palughi, 70, who recently retired as the Monmouth County superintendent of bridges, agreed to tape conversations with Mr. O'Grady, among other officials, when he was arrested in December 2004. He pleaded guilty in August 2005 to setting up bribes to local officials and pocketing money for himself.

On Tuesday, jurors heard nothing of Mr. Palughi's attempted suicide last Friday morning before he was to resume his testimony. In arguments before Judge William J. Martini, Mr. O'Grady's lawyer, Kevin Roe, said that Mr. Palughi was surrounded in the hospital by F.B.I. agents.

"They had to patch this guy up or their case tanks," Mr. Roe said in a courthouse hallway during a brief break.

But Judge Martini, citing a psychiatrist's report that deemed the crucial witness lucid and able to testify, brought in the jury.

No sooner did Mr. Palughi answer a few questions than he offered an apology for his apparent confusion. "I'm not a professional informant, and not really that bright," he said.

But he forged ahead, testifying about tapes of his conversations with Mr. O'Grady that the prosecutors played for the jury.

Along with other recordings that the jury heard when the trial opened last week, the tapes track the two men discussing their "deals," all in dialogue that could have been lifted from a "Sopranos" script — accents and expletives included.

In the first conversation, which was recorded in October 2004, Mr. Palughi was at Carmela's, a restaurant in Neptune Township, with two federal agents posing as employees of a construction and demolition company. They were conferring about Mr. O'Grady, whom they were about to meet. Mr. Palughi advised them to give him no more than $1,000, adding, "I don't know why I'm telling you this, but I love you guys."

At lunch that day, the agents recorded their conversation with Mr. O'Grady, who was the director of the county motor pool at the time. Mr. O'Grady accepted their offer of "a little early Christmas gift or whatever."

Then, in a taped conversation of a subsequent meeting in February, Mr. O'Grady told the two agents that he would look for small jobs for them, as they had asked, to avoid bidding requirements.

In several tapes played on Tuesday, Mr. O'Grady and Mr. Palughi worried aloud that investigators might be closing in on them, finding out about the payments from the construction company as well as previous dealings involving fake and inflated invoices from a trucking company that Mr. Palughi said had also passed cash to Mr. O'Grady through him.

Mr. Palughi, who was questioned by James Nobile, an assistant United States attorney, also described Mr. O'Grady's badgering of one owner of the trucking company for contributions to the Monmouth County Republican Organization.

DOJ_NMG_0032398

Yet Mr. Palughi volunteered that it was his own idea to call the owner, a man named Matty, to ask for money when he and Mr. O'Grady found themselves broke in Atlantic City one night.

"We wanted to gamble," Mr. Palughi said, "So I said, 'Let's call Matty and see what he can do.' He wired it down to the hotel."

The defense contends that Mr. Palughi lied to investigators and cooperated with them in part to save his county pension.

Under cross-examination by Mr. Roe, Mr. Palughi conceded that with a ninth-grade education he had no apparent qualifications for the county jobs he held for more than 20 years. In his $92,000-a-year job as superintendent of bridges, he said, he worked mostly as a chauffeur for Freeholder Director Harry W. Larrison Jr., one of the two arrested officials who died.

"Basically, my job was driving Mr. Larrison around," he said.

But Mr. Palughi disputed the lawyer's accusations that he had defrauded taxpayers or lied to get his jobs.

"That's how the system worked for years and years, no matter what party was in," he said. "It's a sin that it had to work that way, but it did."

Flemmi Describes Gang's Relationship With The FBI (BOS/AP)

By Denise Lavoie, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, June 7, 2006

BOSTON --Convicted gangster Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, testifying Tuesday in a wrongful death lawsuit against the federal government, described a corrupt relationship of favors, gifts and tip-offs between the FBI and its criminal informants.

Flemmi said he and fugitive crime boss James "Whitey" Bulger gave the FBI information about the Mafia, and in exchange, the FBI protected them from prosecution. Members of the Bulger gang also showered several FBI agents with cash as gifts to make sure that protection continued, Flemmi said.

"It was kind of like a quid pro quo situation," he said.

Flemmi took the stand in a lawsuit by the family of John McIntyre, 32, a fisherman who was killed by Bulger and Flemmi after they learned he was cooperating with authorities. McIntyre's family claims that former FBI Agent John Connolly Jr. tipped off Bulger and Flemmi to McIntyre's identity.

Flemmi's testimony this week is his first since agreeing to cooperate with federal authorities in 2003. Flemmi is serving a life sentence in 10 killings -- including McIntyre's -- as part of a plea deal that spared him the death penalty.

About six weeks before his death, McIntyre had started talking to U.S. Customs agents in an investigation of Bulger and Flemmi's involvement in a failed plan to send guns to the Irish Republican Army aboard a Gloucester fishing boat.

In response to questions from the McIntyre family's attorney, William Christie, Flemmi testified that McIntyre was killed after Connolly told them that one of the two people who were aboard the fishing boat was cooperating with authorities.

In opening statements at the trial Monday, another attorney for the McIntyre family said McIntyre was lured to a party on Nov. 30, 1984, then chained to a chair, interrogated, strangled and shot in the head by Bulger.

Flemmi was asked only a few questions about the McIntyre case.

Instead, Christie asked Flemmi to describe his relationship with the FBI, which began in the 1960s when he first became a criminal informant. Flemmi said his FBI handlers were eager for any information that would help them bring down the Mafia.

"It was the FBI priority," Flemmi said repeatedly.

Flemmi said he and Bulger set up a slush fund that was used to make cash payments to FBI agents and to buy them gifts. Flemmi said Connolly received cash payments totalling about $250,000 during the time they were informants, from 1975 to 1990.

Flemmi said the gifts were given to FBI agents to ensure "good will and protection."

Flemmi said Connolly treated him and Bulger with respect.

"He didn't treat me like a criminal, that's for sure," Flemmi said. "He didn't look down on me as an informant."

Connolly was convicted in 2002 on racketeering and other charges for tipping Bulger that he was about to be indicted. Bulger fled on the eve of his 1995 indictment and remains a fugitive on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list.

DOJ_NMG_0032399

Christie walked Flemmi through a long list of crimes he and Bulger committed while they were FBI informants, including the murders of three other people the McIntyre family claims were killed after Connolly tipped the Bulger gang that they were talking to authorities about the gang's crimes.

Connolly was acquitted of playing any role in those deaths during his racketeering trial.

Gail Marcinkiewicz, a spokeswoman for the Boston FBI office, would not comment on Flemmi's testimony directly, but said the U.S. attorney general and the FBI have revised their guidelines on criminal informants "to minimize the chance that unchecked behavior could occur."

"There have been changes over the course of time and increased oversight," she said.

Flemmi said he was repeatedly assured by Connolly and his FBI supervisors that he and Bulger would not be prosecuted for their crimes.

Flemmi is scheduled to resume his testimony Wednesday.

FBI Handler Treated `me Like An Equal,' Flemmi Testifies (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 7, 2006

Tells of bribes, series of killings

Notorious gangster Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi offered a stark portrait yesterday of the days when he and James ``Whitey" Bulger ruled Boston's underworld, getting away with murder after murder while working as FBI informants.

All the while, one corrupt former FBI supervisor, John Morris, ``treated us like we were FBI agents," Flemmi testified.

His longtime FBI handler, John J. Connolly Jr., ``didn't treat me like I was a criminal, that's for sure. He didn't look down on me because I was an informant. He treated me like an equal, in my eyes."

Flemmi, who turns 72 on Friday and is serving a life sentence for killing 10 people, spent his second day on the stand yesterday in US District Court in Boston, testifying in a $50 million wrongful death suit filed against the government by the family of John McIntyre of Quincy.

The trial marks the first time Flemmi has testified publicly since he began cooperating with federal authorities three years ago, after striking a deal that spared him the death penalty.

Flemmi testified that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, because Connolly warned them that McIntyre had implicated them in an unsuccessful effort to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army. He and Bulger also blamed McIntyre for leaks that led to the seizure of the Ramsland, a vessel caught smuggling marijuana into Boston Harbor, he said. He and Bulger would have raked in about $1 million in drug profits, if the Ramsland hadn't been intercepted, he said.

Flemmi testified only briefly about McIntyre, then went through a litany of other murders and bribes given to FBI agents.

He said he and Bulger paid about $250,000 between 1975 and 1990 to Connolly.

New Hampshire lawyer William Christie, who represents McIntyre's mother, Emily, and brother, Christopher, tried to establish a pattern of FBI negligence by questioning Flemmi about his informant relationship that stretched from 1964 to 1990.

Elaborating on claims he made in a deposition last year, Flemmi said that during the 1980s, he and Bulger gave cash payoffs to the following agents, who are now retired: $5,000 to Morris, $5,000 to John Newton, $2,500 to John Cloherty, $2,500 to Nicholas Gianturco, and $2,500 to Michael Buckley.

Morris, who was later granted immunity, admitted to taking bribes from the gangsters. The other agents, who have never been charged, have vehemently denied taking any cash from Bulger and Flemmi.

When the allegations surfaced last year, Gianturco said, ``Years later, it's very easy for these guys to sit in a cell with nothing to lose and make allegations to even the score."

Flemmi testified for the first time yesterday that he and Bulger gave retired FBI agent Dennis Condon a gold ring with his initials on it.

But Boston lawyer Michael Meyer, who represents Condon, flatly denied that allegation. ``It did not happen," he said. He noted that Condon has been dismissed from an unrelated lawsuit filed against the government.

DOJ_NMG_0032400

Flemmi also reiterated his contention yesterday that he and Bulger gave an expensive pipe to James Ring, a retired FBI supervisor.

Boston lawyer Alan Rose, who represents Ring and was in the courtroom, also denied that. ``Jim Ring never received a pipe or anything else" from Bulger or Flemmi, he said.

Rose noted that US District Judge Mark Wolf rejected Flemmi's allegations against Ring as untrue during court hearings in 1998.

The McIntyres' suit is the first of 17 civil suits filed against the government by victims of Flemmi and Bulger to make it trial. Ten have been dismissed. Lawyers representing some of the other victims' families took notes yesterday as Flemmi testified about other slayings.

Describing how he watched Bulger strangle 26-year-old Deborah Hussey with a rope in early 1985, after luring her to a home in South Boston, Flemmi said, ``Bulger is a pretty powerful person. . . . I don't know how long she lasted.

Hussey was the daughter of Marion Hussey, Flemmi's longtime girlfriend who had three children with him.

Flemmi testified that Hussey accused him, in front of her mother, of having a sexual relationship with him when she was a teenager, which he admitted was true.

But Hussey was killed, Flemmi said, because she was involved in drugs and was dropping his name and Bulger's name around town.

``Bulger was the driving force in that because she was using his name, as well as mine, but I'm not diminishing my role in it either," Flemmi said.

He wasn't asked, and didn't volunteer, many details about how he and Bulger killed Flemmi's former girlfriend, Debra Davis, 26, in September 1981. Flemmi agreed under questioning that they strangled her at his mother's South Boston home because she knew too much about their activities.

Flemmi acknowledged that he extracted the teeth from some of his victims after they were dead, to make it difficult to identify them.

He also offered details of other murders, and said Connolly had provoked the 1974 slaying of Richard Castucci and the 1982 murders of Edward ``Brian" Halloran and John Callahan by warning Bulger that they were informants or potential witnesses against Bulger or other members of the Winter Hill Gang.

Roger Wheeler, World Jai Alai president, was gunned down in Tulsa, Okla., in May 1981 because he refused to sell his company to Callahan, a Boston accountant who had promised Bulger's gang they could skim $10,000 a week from one of the company's parking concessions once he acquired the business, according to Flemmi. He said he and Bulger helped arrange the murder.

Connolly, who was convicted in 2002 of racketeering, is serving 10 years in prison in Florida.

Bulger, who fled to evade a 1995 racketeering indictment after being warned in advance by Connolly, remains a fugitive.

Most Popular Flemmi Details Why Victims Had To Go (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, June 7, 2006

In the same blase tone he used to describe how lovers and rats were routinely butchered and buried, gangster Stephen Flemmi claimed yesterday that the more blood he spilled with his partner in crime James “Whitey” Bulger, the bigger their FBI fan club grew.

Former Boston FBI supervisor James Ring “was aware of what we were doing. He condoned it,” Flemmi, 72, testified in federal court, explaining how Ring fawned over the two crime bosses, who also were the agency’s prized informants.

Ring’s partner, John Morris, “treated us like we were FBI agents,” the man nicknamed “The Rifleman” added.

As for the crime duo’s longtime handler, John Connolly - the only G-man convicted of blurring the lines with Bulger, Flemmi and the rest of the Winter Hill Gang - he “didn’t treat me like a criminal,” Flemmi boasted. “It’s like we were equals.”

Between 1981 and 1990, Flemmi said Ring, Morris, Connolly and other Boston agents lapped up cash bonuses, jewelry, jukeboxes and cases of wine purchased from the kitty the gangsters kept for that purpose, dubbed “the X fund.”

The gifts, Flemmi explained, bought him and Bulger, 76, on the lam for 11 years now, “protection” from those sworn to sweep their ilk off the streets.

Instead, Flemmi said, murder indictments vanished and those trying to tell authorities what was going on were whacked. And all Flemmi and Bulger had to do in return was help the FBI bring down their North End competitors, the Sicilian Mafia.

“It was a quid-pro-quo situation,” Flemmi said.

Flemmi was the first witness to be called in a $50 million wrongful death suit brought against the federal government by a Quincy mother whose son, John McIntyre, was tortured to death by Bulger and The Rifleman in 1984 for telling the FBI they were trying to smuggle guns to Ireland.

Yesterday, Emily McIntyre’s attorney, William Christie, his voice spiced with contempt, took Flemmi on a lurid trip down memory lane to explain why certain people were executed, including:

Richard Castucci, an FBI informant Connolly warned Bulger had given up the hiding place of two top Winter Hill members. “It was kind of a revenge thing,” Flemmi said.

Roger Wheeler, the Tulsa, Okla., owner of World Jai Alai who refused to sell his company to a Winter Hill associate. “He was a difficult person to deal with,” Flemmi said.

Debra Davis, Flemmi’s longtime girlfriend, who was strangled by Bulger. She knew too much about their intimate arrangement with the FBI.

Brian Halloran, an informant who could implicate Bulger in Wheeler’s slaying. After Halloran’s murder, Flemmi testified, Connolly called Bulger and offered to provide him with an alibi.

Arthur “Bucky” Barrett, a bank robber. Bulger shot Barrett in the back of the head. “Bulger knew he had a lot of money,” Flemmi said, “and he wanted some of it.”

In Galante Garbage Investigation, Surrender Is Not An Option (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

NEW HAVEN (AP) — With the threat of indictments looming in a multistate investigation into organized crime in the garbage industry, the Justice Department recently told one of Connecticut’s largest trash haulers: Don’t come to us. We’ll come to you.

James Galante, a Danbury garbage magnate and the acknowledged target of the FBI racketeering investigation, recently asked prosecutors to let him surrender if indicted, heading off a public arrest, his attorney said.

But prosecutors rejected the request, defense attorney Hugh Keefe said, leaving Galante waiting for a possible visit from the FBI and the region’s garbage haulers wondering whether a series of arrests is imminent.

The industry has been on edge since federal agents raided dozens of homes and businesses in New York and Connecticut last summer, seizing truckloads of documents in an investigation into the so-called "property rights" system. That system, in which garbage companies carve out and enforce exclusive territories, has led to violence and higher prices for customers, prosecutors in similar investigations have said.

With a grand jury meeting this week and attorneys expecting indictments soon, Keefe and others have asked that their clients be allowed to voluntarily show up for court rather than face arrest by the FBI.

"If they want to be cowboys, it’s up to them," said attorney John Pollok, who represents Galante’s former business associate, Thomas Milo, who is named in FBI search records.

Pollok said he does not know whether Milo will be arrested or indicted.

"It’s an outrageous and unnecessary tactic that serves no useful purpose," Keefe said, arguing that Galante has not fled in the year since the case became public.

He said agents want to make a show of Galante’s arrest.

U.S. Attorney Kevin O’Connor, the state’s top federal prosecutor, wouldn’t discuss the case or confirm Keefe’s account. His office prohibits "perp walks" in which defendants are paraded before television cameras.

"Arresting somebody does not equate to a perp walk," O’Connor said.

O’Connor said decisions about arrests are left to FBI agents and the prosecutors running the case.

DOJ_NMG_0032402

"We make those decisions on a case-by-case basis and generally we make the right decision," he said.

Keefe would not recount the specifics of his discussions with prosecutors but said he routinely promises to deliver his clients to court the day of an indictment.

Sometimes, as when former gubernatorial aide Peter Ellef surrendered on corruption charges, prosecutors accept the offer. Other times, like when the FBI chased former Waterbury Mayor Joseph Santopietro through the street, they don't.

NYU Whiz Kid Pleads Guilty In $7 Million Hedge Fund Scam (STAMADV/AP)

Associated Press

The Stamford Advocate, June 7, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A former New York University student pleaded guilty to bank and wire fraud Tuesday, admitting he used his student ID and expertly forged documents to pose as the heir to a billionaire Turkish family and trick investors into pouring millions into a nonexistent hedge fund.

Prosecutors spent hours Tuesday describing how Hakan Yalincak, 22, charmed his way into the exclusive world of Greenwich high finance, shuttled counterfeit checks across the world and brokered deals with a Kuwaiti financier.

Yalincak's fund, the Daedalus Capital Relative Fund I, wasn't a legitimate investment and prosecutors said investors lost more than $7 million - a figure Yalincak said is overstated. Prosecutors say the money was spent on a Porsche, a Tiffany diamond and a $1.25 million donation to NYU.

The donation was used to reassure worried investors that the Yalincaks were investors who could be trusted, prosecutors said. Yalincak's mother, who also faces fraud charges, even persuaded NYU's development director to meet with prospective investors, prosecutors said.

NYU spokesman Josh Taylor said the development director spoke with two investors only to confirm that the Yalincaks had paid the first installment of what was to have been a $21 million gift.

The Kuwaiti businessman told the FBI that Yalincak's mother claimed to be part of one of the world's richest families. Other investors said they received financial statements showing the family's net worth at more than $1 billion.

"This was all an attempt by the Yalincaks to establish their bona fideness to investors as a wealthy Turkish family," prosecutor Calvin Kurimai said.

In reality, most of the money in the Yalincak accounts belonged to investors. When a few got suspicious and demanded their money back, prosecutors said they were paid with other people's investments.

When he came up short, prosecutors said, Yalincak forged multimillion-dollar checks and passed them quickly through banks in Greenwich, New York and Switzerland, hoping to cash out before they caught on. When they froze the accounts, prosecutors said Yalincak blamed it on a mistake by the executor of his family's estate.

"I just want to apologize to my family," Yalincak said in court. "My actions during the course of this thing really hurt my mother, father and my sister."

Yalincak's plea deal with prosecutors does not recommend a specific sentence. He faces up to 50 years in prison when he is sentenced Sept. 19. Yalincak's mother, Ayferafet, is scheduled for a fraud trial next month.

NYU said it will return the donation once a court determines whom the money belongs to.

"True philanthropy, like good business dealings, requires good faith," the university said in a prepared statement. "Clearly that was lacking here."

Yalincak, who has been detained since his arrest last year, was denied bail for a third time Tuesday.

More Sex Offenders Tracked By Satellite (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Hundreds of convicted sex offenders will have to wear a two-piece electronic tracking device for the rest of their lives under a new Wisconsin law.

Ankle bracelets and a pager-sized unit, often attached to a belt, will use Global Positioning System (GPS) technology to follow their every step. If they enter restricted areas, such as schools, officials will be alerted.

GPS programs will track 285 offenders the first year, beginning July 2007, and up to 400 by the second year, says Dan Leistikow, spokesman for Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle.

In May, Wisconsin joined a rapidly rising number of states using GPS to monitor convicted sex offenders. At least 23 states are doing so, according to a survey in February by the Pennsylvania Board of Probation and Parole. Others have since begun or expanded GPS programs.

"In the last several months, it's been exponential growth," says Steve Chapin, president of Pro-Tech, a Florida-based firm that provides GPS services to 27 statewide agencies. He says his business has doubled in the past three months.

As of January, 13 states had laws requiring or allowing GPS tracking, says the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Aside from Wisconsin, governors in at least six states (Arkansas, Georgia, Kansas, Virginia, Washington and Michigan) have signed such bills this year. New Hampshire Gov. John Lynch plans to do so soon. Similar bills are pending elsewhere.

"It's the law you can't vote against," says Chapin.

Several of the laws are named after Jessica Lunsford, a 9-year-old Florida girl who was kidnapped, raped and killed in February 2005. The man charged with killing her was a convicted sex offender who hadn't reported that he lived across the street from her family. After he fled, it took almost a month to find him.

Even states without specific GPS laws, including Minnesota and Texas, are testing the technology and expanding its use.

Congress may accelerate such efforts. The House and Senate have each passed sex offender bills this year that approve funding for GPS tracking. They need to craft a final bill.

The surge in GPS use coincides with the technology's dramatic advancements. The devices have become smaller and more accurate, often pinpointing a person's position within 30 feet. They are more precise than older devices that use radio frequencies and detect only when the wearer leaves a certain area, such as home if under house arrest.

GPS units can be programmed to have "exclusion zones" where offenders are not allowed and "inclusion zones" where they should be.

States are spending $5 to $10 daily to track each sex offender. Some require offenders, unless indigent, to pay the tab. They can choose the costlier "active" tracking, which gives real-time reports, or "passive" monitoring, which sends one report daily that lists where the offender went that day.

States have tried both:

•California uses GPS to track 430 sex offenders and has funds to follow 2,500 offenders by 2009, says Elaine Jennings of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation.

Since the program began in July 2005, 45 offenders have been arrested for violating parole and no new crimes have been committed, she says.

"It's an excellent supervision tool" but doesn't supplant human supervision, says Jennings.

•Massachusetts has issued eight arrest warrants for violations by the 192 high-risk offenders it has tracked since its "active" GPS program began in May 2005, says Paul Lucci, one of the state's deputy probation commissioners. The state has officers who constantly watch a computer screen recording offenders' whereabouts and who can respond immediately.

•Michigan finished three pilot programs in 2003 and plans this summer to begin tracking up to 1,000 sex offenders, says Steve Bock of the Michigan Department of Corrections' Electronic Monitoring Center.

Bock says the state will use "passive" monitoring, because "active" GPS is too labor-intensive. He says real-time tracking generates "a ton of messages" that necessitate a 24/7 response team. He says it's problematic if offenders are barred from many areas, because GPS allows only a certain number of exclusion zones. "It can become a nightmare to enforce," Bock says.

Jake Goldenflame, 68, a convicted sex offender released 15 years ago, opposes lifetime GPS tracking. "If a man is so dangerous he needs it, he shouldn't be released," he says. Goldenflame says such monitoring may provide a "false sense of security," because it tells where the offender is, not what he's doing.

"It is not an effective way to prevent sexual assaults," says Richard Wright, a professor of criminal justice at Bridgewater State College. He says many serious sex offenders evade police by failing to register and others may re-offend regardless of tracking. He says no definitive study proves GPS deters crime.

DOJ_NMG_0032404

Chapin says GPS reduces recidivism because offenders can't get away as easily. He says a December 2004 analysis by the Florida Department of Corrections found 3.8% of offenders tracked with GPS committed a new felony within two years, compared with 7.7% of those supervised without it.

Offenders tracked by GPS were 90% less likely to abscond or re-offend than those not electronically monitored, says a February study by Florida State University of 75,661 offenders placed on home confinement. GPS did about as well as radio frequency, which costs four times less. “It's not a cost-free device,” says Mark Carey, president of the American Probation and Parole Association. “It's an augmentation of what we do. It's not a replacement.”

Inmate Freed After 18 Years On Basis Of DNA Evidence (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

HARTFORD, June 6 — Eighteen years ago, James Calvin Tillman was arrested on charges of raping and kidnapping a woman after she left a bar in downtown Hartford. For 18 years, he insisted that he was innocent. And on Tuesday, he was freed.

He had refused a plea deal, his family said, and was convicted and sentenced to 45 years in prison. His appeals failed. Distraught, he underwent psychiatric treatment in prison. He read the Bible and urged other inmates to read it, too. And, finally, in February 2005, he wrote to the Connecticut Innocence Project, which helps inmates who claim that they have been wrongly convicted.

The two public defenders who head the Connecticut Innocence Project located the victim's dress and pantyhose, which were collected as evidence in 1988, and had new DNA tests conducted. They found no match between Mr. Tillman and semen on the clothing. Based on that test, a judge in State Superior Court vacated his conviction on Tuesday and ordered a new trial. After the court session, Mr. Tillman's lawyers speculated that the charges would be dropped. The chief state's attorney, Christopher L. Morano, said, "There are still some loose ends that need to be tied up and need to be examined," a reference to an additional DNA test, and would not say whether he thought the case would go to trial again.

Mr. Morano said the case was the first in the state in which DNA evidence had "cast doubt" upon a conviction.

At least for now, Mr. Tillman is out of prison. Less than two hours after Judge Thomas P. Miano ordered that he be released without bail, the elevator doors in the lobby of the criminal courthouse on Lafayette Street opened and there was Mr. Tillman, 44, stepping out slowly, leaning on a cane as he made his way to an ecstatic woman in white, his mother, who called out to him and to Jesus.

"Thank the Lord!" said his mother, Catherine Martin, swallowing Mr. Tillman in her arms in front of his brother, a cousin, a couple of friends, his lawyers and a few reporters. "Thank you, thank you, thank you, Father! Jesus! Thank the Lord!"

Moments later, Mr. Tillman, stocky and bald, with a silver cross hanging from a chain around his neck, walked out of the courthouse and faced a wall of cameras and microphones. The first words he said were: "Praise the Lord. Thank you, Jesus."

Faith, he said, got him from 1988 to 2006. Science, he said, got him out.

"I was innocent all along so I just kept my faith and let science be science," he said, after thanking the public defenders, Karen A. Goodrow and Brian S. Carlow.

Mr. Tillman was arrested after a woman identified him from a photo as the man who abducted her as she was getting into her car not far from the Arch Street Tavern in downtown Hartford. The woman said Mr. Tillman drove her a short way, then stopped the car, beat her, raped her and ran away.

A chemical analysis of semen found on the woman's clothing — done before DNA testing was available — showed a match to certain characteristics of Mr. Tillman's semen, and prosecutors used that to support the victim's account. But the technology is not as sophisticated as DNA testing, Mr. Carlow said Tuesday, noting that the semen could have matched that of up to 20 percent of the male population.

Mr. Tillman protested his innocence. At one point, according to his mother and his brother, Willie Lee Tillman, 45, he rejected a plea deal that would have sent him to prison for eight years. In 1989, Mr. Tillman was convicted and sentenced to 45 years in prison for rape, kidnapping and other charges.

DOJ_NMG_0032405

Mr. Carlow and Ms. Goodrow said it took them several months to track down the evidence collected in 1988. New DNA testing this spring showed no link to Mr. Tillman, although one more test has been ordered on a sample from the dress. Ms. Goodrow said the DNA on the clothing has not been matched to anyone else.

Judge Miano emphasized that the new DNA evidence did not suggest that a crime had not been committed by someone, only that eyewitness accounts can be devastatingly inaccurate.

"The court finds that if this new evidence were proffered in a new trial that it's likely to produce a different result at such trial," the judge said.

The prosecutor in the 1988 case, Edward R. Narus, also represented the state in court on Tuesday. Mr. Morano, the chief state's attorney, praised Mr. Narus for cooperating with the defense by agreeing to the request for a new trial.

Mr. Carlow and Ms. Goodrow did not criticize the way prosecutors handled the case. "In 1988, it was much more compelling evidence then than it is today," Mr. Carlow said of the semen testing.

Leaving the courthouse, Mr. Tillman stepped carefully over curbs and medians on his way to his mother's car, which blasted gospel music the moment she turned the key. His family said that he hurt his leg in prison, and that it became infected.

Asked how the green grass and fully leafed trees looked, after his more than 18 years behind bars, Mr. Tillman said, "Just beautiful."

CIVIL LAW:

Gabelli, Justice Department Settle Suit Over Cellphone Licenses (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

The Justice Department has reached a deal with Mario Gabelli in a civil-fraud suit that alleged the famed money manager was at the center of an effort to deceive the Federal Communications Commission in auctions of cellphone licenses.

Assistant U.S. Attorney David Kennedy announced the settlement Tuesday during a hearing before U.S. District Judge Paul Crotty in Manhattan. Terms of the deal weren't disclosed but are expected to include a payment to the government of more $100 million, according to others briefed on the negotiations.

"We have reached a settlement in principle," Mr. Kennedy said. "We are moving forward."

The terms of the deal are expected to be made public during a court hearing on June 29. Mr. Kennedy declined to comment on the amount of the settlement.

Mr. Kennedy also said in court that the government reached a settlement with Russell Taylor III, the private plaintiff who brought the initial civil suit against Mr. Gabelli, Lynch Interactive Corp. and other Gabelli affiliates. Mr. Taylor said he witnessed the alleged fraud while working as a paralegal and attorney at a law firm.

Under the False Claims Act, Mr. Taylor stands to receive about 25% of the settlement. This windfall will be split with his two Washington law firms that worked on the case, Phillips & Cohen LLP, which specializes in whistleblower cases, and the litigation powerhouse Williams & Connolly LLP.

The settlement terms are also expected to permit Mr. Gabelli to continue to own and buy FCC telecommunications licenses, according to people close to the case. Had the suit gone to trial and gone against him, Mr. Gabelli might have lost that right. These and other terms are expected to be finalized at the court hearing at the end of the month.

The Justice Department joined the case in March, backing the allegations in the suit, which was filed under seal in 2001 in Washington, D.C., and later transferred to Manhattan federal court. The suit alleged Mr. Gabelli was at the center of a scheme to defraud the FCC of more than $160 million in bidding credits and other benefits intended for small businesses, and that he then earned profits of more than $205 million in the sale of some of those licenses.

Mr. Gabelli, who wasn't present in court Tuesday, runs Gamco Investors Inc., a mutual-fund empire in Rye, N.Y., that has become one of the best-known brands on Wall Street. Gamco isn't a party to the lawsuit, which focuses on Mr. Gabelli's role as chairman of Lynch Interactive, a telecommunications firm.

DOJ_NMG_0032406

Lanny Breuer, an attorney for Lynch Interactive and other Gabelli affiliates, said that there were a number of parties involved and still some issues to sort out, but he expected the matter to be resolved in the next three weeks. "We remain very optimistic," he said in court. A spokesman for Mr. Gabelli had no comment Tuesday.

The settlement resolves the latest legal headache for Mr. Gabelli. Early last month, Gabelli Group Capital Partners Inc. settled claims by two shareholders that Mr. Gabelli had blocked them from selling shares in the closely held company. That settlement, valued at more than $80 million, resolved a suit by former partners who alleged Mr. Gabelli received exorbitant fees and compensation from the company. His reported earnings in 2005 were $55 million.

Gabelli Reaches Tentative Deal On Cellphone Licenses (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Mutual fund mogul Mario Gabelli has reached a tentative settlement in a civil lawsuit charging him with defrauding the federal government of hundreds of millions of dollars in auctions of cellphone licenses, according to the Justice Department.

Critics of the Federal Communications Commission's auction system seized on the case as proof that deep-pocketed bidders set up sham companies to win discounts reserved for small businesses.

A settlement in principle in the Gabelli case was announced Tuesday by Assistant U.S. Attorney David Kennedy at a hearing in New York, said Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller.

Terms of the agreement were not disclosed. Details are expected to be revealed at a June 29 court hearing.

Neither Gabelli nor representatives of his telecom company, Lynch Interactive, could be reached for comment Tuesday.

The deal comes three months after the Justice Department intervened in a civil fraud lawsuit, filed five years ago by a citizen under a law that lets an individual sue on the government's behalf.

The lawsuit alleges Gabelli set up about a dozen sham companies in auctions from 1995 to 2000 to snare airwave licenses. The entities were formed a few days before each auction, often were dissolved shortly afterward and never used the licenses, many of which were later sold for huge profits, the lawsuit claims. The lawsuit seeks up to $370 million in damages.

In previous statements, Lynch has called the lawsuit “frivolous” and said it “adhered to both the letter and spirit” of FCC rules. In a March interview with USA TODAY, Gabelli welcomed the government's participation in the lawsuit, saying he was “delighted to deal with an entity that knows the facts.”

Gabelli is a Wall Street luminary whose money management firm, Gamco Investors, advises private accounts and the Gabelli family of mutual funds. Gamco manages about $28 billion in assets.

The legal battle was largely borne of controversial FCC rules aimed at encouraging small businesses to participate in multibillion-dollar airwave auctions. Because the licenses are so expensive, larger companies might financially back the small players, but they can't control company operations.

The FCC has found it challenging to determine if bigger companies exert control. The lawsuit alleges that fraud in the Gabelli case was blatant, adding that “ ‘bidders' existed on paper only.”

In April, the FCC modified its auction rules in response to critics such as the Minority Media and Telecommunications Council. Small businesses are now barred from leasing or selling their spectrum for 10 years, up from the current five-year holding period.

The council says the new rules go too far and will discourage lenders and investors from backing small businesses.

Gabelli Reaches Pact With Justice Department Over Cell Licenses (BLOOM)

By David Glovin

Bloomberg, June 7, 2006

June 6 (Bloomberg) -- Money manager Mario Gabelli has settled a civil suit alleging he defrauded the U.S. government by using ``sham" companies to win cellular phone licenses.

The settlement, though not the terms, was announced today at a hearing in Manhattan federal court, Heather Tasker, a spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, said. Garcia's office recently sought permission to join the suit, which was filed in 2001 by attorney Rufus Taylor III under the federal False Claims Act.

Taylor's suit stemmed from Gabelli's role in Federal Communications Commission auctions in the 1990s. The government set aside cellular phone licenses to be sold to small businesses. Gabelli, 63, bankrolled ``sham'' startups that would qualify under the rules to get access to discounts, the suit claims.

Gabelli's publicly traded Gamco Investors Inc., a Rye-based money manager with $27 billion in assets, isn't a defendant in the suit.

DOJ Announces Settlement In Gabelli Case (AP)

AP, June 7, 2006

DOJ Announces Settlement in Civil Fraud Case Against Money Manager Gabelli

NEW YORK (AP) -- The Justice Department has agreed to settle a civil fraud lawsuit accusing prominent money manager Mario Gabelli in a scheme to gain unfair advantage in cell-phone spectrum auctions, a government spokeswoman said Tuesday.

The deal -- announced at a hearing Tuesday in U.S. District Court -- would include a $100 million payment from Gabelli to the government, The Wall Street Journal reported on its Web site, citing people briefed on the negotiations.

No information about the terms of the settlement were immediately announced, though they may be released at a hearing June 29, said Heather Tasker, the spokeswoman.

The deal came after the government sought to intervene in a 5-year-old lawsuit brought by private parties alleging Gabelli and others should pay hundreds of millions of dollars in damages for their participation in auctions conducted by the Federal Communications Commission between 1995 and 2000.

The lawsuit, initially filed in Washington, accused Gabelli of rigging the system by creating phony companies which bid for wireless phone licenses at a discount under rules favoring minority and small businesses. He then resold the licenses at a profit, according to the government.

Tim Metz, a spokesman for Lynch Interactive Corp., where Gabelli is board chairman, said he did not know terms of the settlement.

He said he also did not know if the deal would permit Gabelli to continue to participate in auctions.

"I know there's an application pending for the client, Lynch Interactive, to continue to participate in these auctions," Metz said.

At a hearing in federal court several weeks ago, Gabelli lawyer William P. Frank said prosecutors were treating his client unfairly.

Frank did not immediately return a call Tuesday seeking comment.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Use-Of-Deadly-Force Police Shootings Ruled Justifiable (NEWSNET5)

News Net 5, Cleveland, OH, June 7, 2006

Special Prosecutor Says Guidelines Followed In 5 Police Shootings

CLEVELAND -- A special prosecutor ruled that five cases of the use of deadly force by Cleveland police officers were justifiable.

The five fatal shootings took place in 2004 and 2005. The city appointed retired Judge Ellen Connally to investigate the cases and to make a decision about whether they were justified.

Connally ruled that all the officers involved in the shooting followed the guidelines outlined for the use of deadly force, and no charges will be filed in any of the cases, NewsChannel5 reported.

Before making her decision, Connally reviewed the evidence, interviewed witnesses, looked over photographs and talked with the coroner.

She ruled four of the shootings justifiable. But one of the shootings included a confrontation between Cleveland police and 14-year-old Brandon McCloud.

DOJ_NMG_0032408

McCloud was shot and killed by police in his bedroom in August 2005. Police said McCloud, who was suspected in a string of armed robberies, lunged at them with a knife.

Connally called the shooting tragic. She did not use the term "justifiable," but said that it is within the bounds of the use of deadly force guidelines.

Mayor Frank Jackson promised accountability on the streets, and wants all cases of the use of deadly force to be investigated.

All five cases are still being reviewed by the U.S. Justice Department.

The other cases Connally made rulings on were the March 2004 death of Eren Y. Beyah, the September 2005 death of Larry Renshaw, the October 2005 death of David Crenshaw, and the December 2005 death of Angelo Ferguson.

Gay Marriage Amendment Faces Senate Defeat (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, June 6, 2006

The constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage is headed toward certain defeat Wednesday despite a fresh appeal for passage by President Bush.

While a majority of Americans oppose gay marriage, an equal majority oppose amending the Constitution to prohibit it, according to a poll this week by ABC News. And, according to one Republican, Americans do not yet buy the warning that traditional marriage is under attack by renegade judges.

"Most Americans are not yet convinced that their elected representatives or the judiciary are likely to expand decisively the definition of marriage to include same sex couples," said Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., a possible presidential candidate in 2008. He told the Senate on Tuesday he does not support the amendment.

The measure's looming defeat in the Senate is by no means its last stand, said its supporters.

"Whether it passes or not this time, I do not believe the sponsors are going to fall back and cry about it," said Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record), R-Utah. "I think they are going to keep bringing it up."

The House plans a redux next month, said Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

"This is an issue that is of significant importance to many Americans," Boehner told reporters. "We have significant numbers of our members who want a vote on this, so we are going to have a vote."

Some of those closely watching the Senate's three-day debate on the proposed amendment are engaging that argument as if the measure stands a chance of passage.

Bush, his popularity sagging and his conservative base dissatisfied with Republicans' efforts on social issues, issued a fresh appeal for passage Tuesday for the third time in as many days.

"The administration believes that the future of marriage in America should be decided through the democratic constitutional amendment process, rather than by the court orders of a few," a White House statement said.

The Vatican also weighed in Tuesday, naming gay marriage as one of the factors threatening the traditional family as never before.

Despite the big names advocating it, the amendment was expected to fail a test vote early Wednesday after three days of floor time in which debate over the definition of marriage touched on issues ranging from child welfare to bigotry.

Democrats, all of whom except Sen. Ben Nelson (news, bio, voting record) of Nebraska oppose the amendment, say the debate is a divisive effort to energize social conservatives this election year.

"The Republican leadership is asking us to spend time writing bigotry into the Constitution," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record) of Massachusetts, which legalized gay marriage in 2003. "A vote for it is a vote against civil unions, against domestic partnership, against all other efforts for states to treat gays and lesbians fairly under the law."

More than half of the 100-member Senate is likely to support the amendment on the test vote Wednesday, even if the vote fails to win the required 60 votes, said Hatch.

"Does he really want to suggest that over half of the United States Senate is a crew of bigots?" he fumed.

DOJ_NMG_0032409

More than half of Americans, 58 percent, said in an ABC News poll released Monday that same-sex marriages should be illegal. But only 40 percent said they support amending the Constitution to ban gay marriage. A majority said states should make their own laws on gay marriage.

Forty-five of the 50 states have acted to define traditional marriage in ways that would ban same-sex marriage — 19 with constitutional amendments and 26 with statutes.

The amendment would prohibit states from recognizing same-sex marriages. To become law, it would need two-thirds support in the Senate and House, and then would have to be ratified by at least 38 state legislatures.

Marriage Measure Doomed In Senate (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Senators will vote today on a constitutional marriage amendment that doesn't have enough support to pass, and Democrats yesterday tried to force a vote on gas prices to show that other issues are more pressing and that Republicans are playing politics.

"This is not what the American people want to talk about," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said of the marriage amendment, which would define marriage as the union of one man and one woman.

The Nevada Democrat interrupted the marriage debate by trying to call up a bill to prevent price gouging at the gas pumps. He was blocked by Republicans.

Republican leaders and President Bush, facing sagging poll numbers and a restless conservative base, have been pushing hard for the constitutional marriage amendment, which is a top priority for conservative groups. A House vote is expected soon.

Sponsors of the marriage proposal expect about 52 votes today on a motion to cut off debate and force a final vote. The motion would need 60 votes to pass, and the amendment itself would need two-thirds, or 67 votes, to be approved.

"It's not about the preservation of marriage. It's about the preservation of the majority, the Republican majority. That's the 'M' word that's behind this debate," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat. He cited a Gallup Poll in April that found Americans ranked same-sex "marriage" 33rd on a list of most important issues facing the country.

Supporters said it is a fundamental concern when courts are trying to force states to accept same-sex "marriage."

"This issue is going to be defined by either the courts or the legislative bodies, period," said Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican. "We seek to have it defined by legislative bodies."

In response to Democrats' attack, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, issued a statement saying a majority of Americans support traditional marriage and that his party has "a record of accomplishments and meaningful solutions" on the economy, prescription drug coverage and other issues.

Nineteen states have constitutional amendments defining marriage as the union of a man and woman, and 26 states have similar statutes. Nine states face lawsuits challenging their traditional marriage laws. Four of these states have had their laws overturned and are awaiting state Supreme Court decisions.

Polls show a majority of Americans oppose same-sex "marriage." The public is more evenly split on whether a constitutional amendment is the solution. A Gallup Poll released last month shows 50 percent favoring an amendment and 47 percent opposing.

Regardless of the outcome of the vote today, some groups say they will make sure the marriage issue remains a priority in the Senate. The Family Research Council plans to campaign against senators who vote against the proposed amendment. The group has begun attacking Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, and John McCain, Arizona Republican, both of whom are expected to oppose the measure.

For Foes Of Same-Sex Marriage, It's The Thought That Counts (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

There's violence in Iraq, corruption in the House and anxiety in the markets. Somebody needs to create a diversion.

DOJ_NMG_0032410

"The gays are aggressive! Gays have called war! Gays are attacking traditional marriage!"

Bishop Harry Jackson was shouting these words outside the Capitol yesterday morning, at a rally for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

"Marriage is under attack!" cried out Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.), also at the rally.

"We can have anarchy!" warned Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.).

No doubt Jackson, Allard and Harris are sincere in their views about marriage. But the urgency of their alarm is a bit suspect to anybody with an eye on the electoral calendar.

With President Bush's encouragement, the Senate this week is taking up the marriage amendment even though everybody knows it will be roundly defeated, most likely in a vote today. Proponents are hoping to add perhaps four votes to the 48 they got in 2004 -- at the same time in the previous election cycle. At this pace, it will be 2014 before the amendment has a shot at getting the 67 votes it needs to pass.

What the marriage amendment indisputably does, though, is delight social conservatives, whose turnout in November will be crucial if Republicans are to retain their majorities in the House and Senate. And conservative activists have burst back on the scene to show their gratitude -- even if they know it's a losing cause.

"If we didn't believe in miracles, we wouldn't have spent our vacation money to come here," said Sandra Rodrigues of Utah, who with her family has been standing outside the Russell Senate Office Building all week, shouting at senators and displaying signs urging "Stop Same Sex Marriage: It Endorses Masturbation." "If same-sex marriage is endorsed," she explained, "then you're going to have children think it's just another option to have pleasure."

Rodrigues and family have plenty of allies in their effort to stir up the GOP base. A group backed by the Heritage Foundation and the Family Research Council scheduled an all-day event Monday at the National Press Club featuring Robert Bork and Alan Keyes. Allard has held two events in as many days. And the activists are vying to outdo one another in hysteria.

"This is in many ways the crucial question of our time," Heritage's Matthew Spalding submitted at a Press Club event.

Said Karen England of the Capitol Resource Institute: "We have boys who are going to be in with your girls in the locker room and the restrooms."

Added Exodus International's Alan Chambers, who said he quit homosexuality 14 years ago: "Our children are being raped every day of school by what's being taught. Are you mad? I'm mad. I'm so mad. God have mercy."

Chambers is likely to be angrier still if he checks out the results of last month's Washington Post-ABC News poll. When voters were asked about the most important issue in November's election, they chose the economy, Iraq, immigration, gas prices, terrorism and health care. Same-sex marriage merited only an asterisk, meaning it rated below 0.5 percent of responses.

With that in mind, Senate Democrats have tried furiously to keep the debate on topics more likely to depress Republican turnout in November. Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) brought a list to the floor Monday. "High gas prices, the war in Iraq, the national debt, health care, senior citizens, education, crime, trade policy, stem cell research: Each issue begging for the president's attention, each issue being ignored."

But liberal advocacy groups fell into the conservatives' trap, holding at least four events of their own to treat the doomed amendment as if it were an imminent threat. "It has come to a point in this country," Rabbi Joui Hessel said at a National Press Club event dueling with the conservatives, "where our government is poised to legalize a lesser status to gay and lesbian people."

Poised? It's not the first word that comes to mind when listening to proponents try to explain urgency for a same-sex-marriage ban this week.

When White House press secretary Tony Snow, at Monday's briefing, likened the amendment to efforts to enact civil rights laws, CBS News's Bill Plante challenged him.

"You would equate that with civil rights?" Plante asked.

"No, I'm just saying that I think -- well, I don't know. How do you define civil rights?"

"Up to you," Plante offered.

"Okay," Snow said. "Well, no, it's your question. So I -- if I -- . . . I need to get a more precise definition."

Likewise, Allard held a news conference Monday at which the speakers said they wanted to reduce the "epidemic level of fatherlessness in America."

DOJ_NMG_0032411

"How would outlawing gay marriage encourage heterosexual fathers to stick around?" was the first question.

Allard skirted the question by saying that "laws send a message to our children."

The moderator, Matt Daniels of the Alliance for Marriage, tried to find a question on another subject. But when reporters continued to press Allard on the link between same-sex marriage and deadbeat dads, Daniels blurted out: "All right, you know what? We're going to call this press conference to a close."

Same-sex 'Marriage' Splits Black Leaders (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Black pastors and civil rights leaders yesterday held separate rallies on Capitol Hill, staking opposite positions on a constitutional amendment aimed at banning homosexual "marriage."

"This is a moral issue that brings us to the table, and I'm a Democrat. We're not the right-wing Republicans that are just trying to make you do what our political agenda says. We have a legitimate concern about the deterioration of our community," said Bishop Harry Jackson, a pastor from Hope Christian Church in Bowie, who opposes homosexual "marriage."

The Senate is expected to vote on the measure today. The bill is not expected to pass, but opponents of homosexual "marriage" say they will mobilize election votes for or against lawmakers depending on how they vote.

Mr. Jackson's national group, the High Impact Leadership Coalition, organized a morning rally in favor of the amendment, which defines marriage as the union of one man and one woman.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, and Sen. Wayne Allard, Colorado Republican, the bill's sponsor, spoke to the crowd of about 100 in the park next to the Russell Senate Office Building.

Mr. Jackson and other leaders then descended on the offices of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat; Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat; and Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, to argue their case.

Later in the day, the Human Rights Campaign, the country's top homosexual rights lobbying group, rallied in the same park in opposition to the amendment.

"We must decide if liberty is just for all straight white men, or if in fact God has endowed all persons with the right to enjoy committed, loving relationships," said the Rev. Nathan A. Harris, of Lincoln Congregational Temple, in the District. "As a heterosexual man, as a Christian pastor ... I stand in solidarity with the community of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered persons."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and Rep. John Lewis, Georgia Democrat, spoke to the crowd of about 50.

The Rev. William Owens, chairman of the Memphis, Tenn.-based Coalition of African-American Pastors, said the homosexual rights movement is trying to "hijack civil rights." He said he marched for black civil rights in the 1960s.

"I did not march one step for people of the same sex to marry," Mr. Owens said.

Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, called Mr. Owen's remarks a "somewhat hysterical interpretation of the facts."

"Our fears about cultural changes in this country have been hijacked and portrayed as a legitimate issue of concern," Mr. Henderson said.

Conservative black pastors and civil rights leaders say homosexual "marriage" will further diminish the number of black children without a mom and a dad, in a community that has already felt the negative consequences of single-parent families.

"If we don't do something, we may face an America in 10 years where only one out of every 10 children is born to an intact family. We may face an America where the problems that are in the black community are in every community in the land. We don't want an America like that," Mr. Jackson said.

Liberal black pastors such as Mr. Harris, however, said that "heterosexual marriage has done a good job on its own of falling apart."

Damien, Demons And Dubya (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

DOJ_NMG_0032412

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Washington

As I write this on 6-6-06, with a new Damien demonically wheeling through movie theaters trying to kill his mom in a remake of "The Omen," let us now speak of famous bogeymen.

The Bushes have always been good at using bogeymen to their political advantage.

Lee Atwater, the devilish strategist for Bush Senior, turned an obscure criminal named Willie Horton into the Candyman in 1988, whipping up the fear that if Michael Dukakis were elected, hordes of swarthy skels would be freed on weekend parole and swarm into your neighborhood.

W.'s supporters beat back the McCain threat in the 2000 South Carolina primary by spreading gossip that the Arizona senator had fathered a black baby — a creepy distortion of the fact that he and his wife had adopted a little girl from Bangladesh.

Karl Rove, an Atwater acolyte, had a closetful of bogeymen whisking W. past the finish line in 2004: terrorists who might strike again, gays who wanted to get hitched, stem cell research, Darwin, Dan Rather, and a Swift-boated John Kerry.

W. prefers tactical bêtes noires to real ones. (Hillary followed his lead by joining conservatives to support a constitutional ban on flag burning.)

The president had a truly terrifying bogeyman in Osama but instead conjured up a fake nuclear villain in Saddam. He has played down bin Laden, first diverting the resources needed to capture him and now diverting the money needed to protect against his likely targets, letting homeland security funds be moved from New York and Washington. (Jon Stewart has said that Omaha got a lot of homeland security money because it was under threat by the "renowned Midwestern terrorist Omaha bin Laden.")

As Mike Crowley of The New Republic notes, the F.B.I. does not even mention 9/11 in its "Ten Most Wanted Fugitives" profile of Osama. The poster, updated in November 2001, says bin Laden is wanted in the bombings of the United States Embassies in Tanzania and Kenya that killed 200 in 1998, and "is a suspect in other terrorist attacks." No word of the nearly 3,000 killed on Sept. 11.

Fearing that their monopoly on Washington power could be coming to an end, with voters grumpy at Republicans over Iraq, gas prices, Medicare, Social Security, corruption, wild spending and general incompetence, Bush strategists have revived the gay marriage Frankenstein to scare the base into turning out for midterms. (That bride of Frankenstein had better be female.)

Same-sex marriage is far less spooky than the 17 severed heads recently found in a village northeast of Baghdad, or the terror suspect accused of conspiring to behead the Canadian prime minister.

W. ignored the gay marriage issue in the 19 months after he used it to help him stay in the White House. To reprise it now, knowing it has no chance of passing, is so transparent that surely even the most blinkered "values" voters see through it.

When pollsters ask Americans their top priorities, gay marriage does not leap onto the list. In a new ABC News poll, only four in 10 surveyed were in favor of rewriting the Constitution.

Even as W. gave a speech here promoting a constitutional amendment designed to demonize and discriminate against a group of Americans who have done nothing wrong, his heart did not seem in it. A Democratic strategist noted on CNN that the president looked as cowed as "a long-tailed cat in a room full of rocking chairs."

Wrestling with Iraq and Iran have worn down W., and he knows, as we do, that a couple of middle-aged guys who want to tie the knot in Provincetown is not the worst threat America faces.

With our marines needing refresher courses in "core values" and with Dick Cheney promoting values like torture, government snooping and pre-emptive war, it rings hollow to opportunistically proselytize on family values. (Mary Cheney, the gay daughter of the vice president, told interviewers recently that her father opposed the marriage amendment.)

As a Times reader who sometimes e-mails me put it: "The 'values' voters turn out to be opinion voters. They believe that God hates homosexuals, that superstition trumps science every time, that all those foreigners ought to be sent back where they came from, and that all government programs are wasteful and immoral, except, of course, for the government programs which benefit them. Those are opinions, not values, and willfully ignorant opinions at that."

I know Republicans are desperate. But does it make sense to use gay love to hatemonger here when we have so much real hate coming at us from abroad?

DOJ_NMG_0032413

Justice Kennedy's Culture War (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

The Supreme Court is busy this week, but Justice Anthony Kennedy should take a moment to tune into the Senate debate on gay marriage. As the man who enabled this latest front in the culture wars, it's the least he can do.

That's the most efficient way to think about the Senate debate this week on the Marriage Protection Amendment, which would create a national definition of marriage as a "union of a man and a woman." We remain opposed to federal interference in this issue, believing that issues of family life and law are best settled in state legislatures. Yet given the way activist courts have turned gay marriage into a national issue, it's no surprise that Congress joined the fray.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist knows he's unlikely to get many more than the 48 votes he got the last time he brought up this amendment, in 2004. Constitutional amendments require a two-thirds majority, and only one Democrat, Nebraska's Ben Nelson, is publicly on board. So some of this is about rallying a demoralized conservative base.

But the amendment vote can't be understood outside of the anxiety created by activist courts. Justice Kennedy wrote the majority opinion in the 2003 Lawrence case that banned state anti-sodomy laws. So sweeping was his "privacy right" language that it took only a few months for the Massachusetts Supreme Court to use Lawrence to justify its decision to impose a right to gay marriage there. Politicians in New York and San Francisco began issuing gay marriage licenses, never mind state law.

So here we go again with another values issue about to become an endlessly polarizing national debate. Beltway politicians can posture knowing nothing much will change. This is the history of abortion since Roe v. Wade, with both sides at the same barricades 30 years on. The Founders left such thorny social issues to the states precisely to allow the democratic give and take that can reach a rough consensus, as well as adjust as social mores change.

That's what the states have been doing in recent years. Some 19 states now have constitutional amendments protecting "traditional" marriage; another 26 have statutes doing the same. Alabama voters yesterday endorsed such an amendment, and six more states will have the question on November ballots.

States have also devised a range of policies for civil partnerships or other legal rights for gay couples. These innovations reflect the reality that most Americans oppose extending the term "marriage" to gays but are open to other legal arrangements. Colorado voters may face ballot initiatives this fall dealing with both a definition of marriage and domestic partnership rights.

Supporters of the national ban say an amendment is necessary because willful courts won't honor those voter verdicts. They have a point. A federal court struck down Nebraska's ban on gay marriage last year even though 70% of the state's residents voted for it. Bans have been overturned in Washington, California, Maryland and New York.

But it's far from clear that a Constitutional amendment is necessary to stop this just now. Congress passed the Defense of Marriage Act in the 1990s, and sooner or later the Supreme Court will decide if this clashes with the Constitution's "full faith and credit" clause that applies one state's laws to the other 49 (i.e., easy Nevada divorce). If the High Court overturns the Defense of Marriage Act, there'd be a much stronger case for something as rare, and politically difficult, as passing a Constitutional amendment. Meantime, this is another argument for confirming President Bush's judicial nominees (see below).

As for liberals, they might consider that their best chance to change minds is through open state debate, not coercive courts. Polls show Americans are becoming more comfortable with civil unions and other gay rights. In fact, the best thing gay activists could do for themselves at the federal level would be to support repeal of the death tax, since under current law gay couples often lack inheritance rights. That would accomplish more than anything that will emerge from this week's political spectacle over amending the Constitution.

Verizon Bias Suit Deal Sets Record (WP)

By Amy Joyce

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Verizon Communications Inc. will pay almost $49 million to 12,326 current and former female employees as part of a landmark class-action lawsuit alleging pregnancy discrimination.

DOJ_NMG_0032414

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission reached a settlement in 2002 against Verizon predecessors Nynex Corp. and Bell Atlantic Corp. But the total amount of the settlement was not made public until yesterday, when the EEOC completed its projections of how much would be paid in future benefits.

The final figure makes the case the largest pregnancy discrimination settlement in EEOC history. It covers women in 13 states and the District.

Nynex and Bell Atlantic were accused of violating federal law by denying women pension and other benefit accruals when they spent time on pregnancy or maternity leave.

The total compensation paid thus far is more than $25.3 million. The EEOC told a U.S. District Court in New York yesterday that it projected that an additional $23.6 million would be paid in future benefits. The announcement came after years of calculating which women were denied benefits when on leave.

"This comes out of a different era," said Eric Rabe, a Verizon spokesman. "The people who were here then by and large don't work for the company anymore. We think our record today is exemplary, and this was not an admission of having done anything wrong. It is simply a matter of trying to get this behind us to move on."

The suit alleged that the predecessor companies violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978 and the Equal Pay Act of 1963 by denying women service credits for leaves of absence taken between July 1965 and April 1979. The companies also denied pension credits for child-care leaves of absence until December 1983.

Pregnancy discrimination claims filed with the EEOC rose by 31 percent from 1992 to 2005, to 4,449 from 3,385. Some of that increase reflects a growing number of women working during and after their pregnancies, but not all of it. In the same period, the percentage of working women with children younger than 18 rose by about 5 percent.

"There really remain tremendous issues concerning pregnancy discrimination in the workplace," said Elizabeth Grossman, regional attorney with the EEOC in New York. "More and more women are continuing to go forward to assert their rights in a way past generations were not. Some employers are getting educated and changing practices, but many are not."

Grossman's office last year sued and won a settlement for a waitress who was removed from a managerial career track, denied work assignments and told to "consider her options" after she revealed she was pregnant. Ultimately, she was fired. The woman received $145,000 in a pregnancy discrimination settlement with her former employer. The same office last month also sued Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. on behalf of a pregnant employee at a Bridgewater, N.J., store who says she was denied modified work assignments that were given to other employees with temporary disabilities.

The EEOC was joined in filing the class-action lawsuit against the phone companies by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Communications Workers of America, unions representing Verizon workers. "This case represents an important victory for working women who should not have had to sacrifice their pension benefits because they had children," Christopher M. Shelton, a CWA vice president, said in a statement.

Louisiana Governor Plans To Sign Anti-Abortion Law (NYT)

By Jeremy Alford

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La., June 6 — Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco's office said Tuesday that she would shortly sign into law a strict ban on abortion that would permit abortion only in the case where a woman's life was threatened by pregnancy.

The bill, approved by both houses of the Legislature and sent to the governor on Monday, would go into effect only if the United States Supreme Court overturned Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision establishing a constitutional right to abortion, and allowed states to criminalize abortion.

In March, South Dakota enacted a law criminalizing abortion, hoping to create a case that would lead the Supreme Court to overturn Roe. Eleven other states are considering similar measures. Six other states have bans, similar to the Louisiana bill, that would be put into effect by the end of Roe.

A sponsor of the Louisiana bill, Senator Ben Nevers, Democrat of Bogalusa, said he had led the effort because the Supreme Court had grown more conservative and the time was ripe for change.

DOJ_NMG_0032415

"I had a strong belief that we could finally protect the innocent life of an unborn child," Mr. Nevers said. "This is about the U.S. Constitution granting every person the right to life."

Jacqueline Payne, assistant director of government relations for Planned Parenthood, a nationwide provider of abortion services, said the trigger provision allowed the Legislature and Ms. Blanco to inflict policy on future generations they had no authority to represent, since Roe could take several years to overturn, if ever.

"We think Louisiana is hiding behind South Dakota, which took more of a direct affront," Ms. Payne said.

Roderick K. Hawkins, deputy press secretary to the governor, said that the abortion bill had not yet reached Ms. Blanco, but that she planned to sign it as soon as possible.

Although Ms. Blanco, a Democrat, has supported exceptions for rape and incest in the past, Mr. Hawkins said she found solace in the bill's "safety measures" that protect the life of the pregnant woman.

"The governor has always been a pro-life person," Mr. Hawkins said, "and this fits into her beliefs of supporting life and being anti-abortion. Plus, this had overwhelming bipartisan support of the Legislature."

If signed by the governor, Louisiana's measure would allow the prosecution of any person who performed or aided in an abortion. The penalties include up to 10 years in prison and a maximum fine of $100,000.

Transsexual Discrimination Suit Enters Discovery Phase (RC)

By John McArdle

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

A full year after filing a discrimination lawsuit against the Library of Congress, Diane Schroer, who is preparing for surgery to complete her transition as a male-to-female transsexual, has only now seen her civil rights case move into the discovery phase.

But in the 12 months since the case was brought, Schroer's suit already has forced the U.S. District Court to take a hard look at how sexual discrimination laws apply to the Congressional workplace.

While lawyers for Schroer are preparing this week to serve the LOC with its first document requests and interogitories, lawyers with the U.S. Attorney's office, which is representing the Library, have about two weeks left to decide whether to appeal a decision by U.S. District Judge James Robertson denying their initial request to dismiss the case.

"It is unfortunate that litigation moves as slowly as it does, and it's unfortunate that it took Judge Robertson a long time to rule on the motion to dismiss," Arthur Spitzer, a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union who is representing Schroer, said this week. "On the other hand it was clear from his opinion that he had done a lot of research and a lot of thinking about the issue, and we were obviously pleased with his opinion."

Born David John, Schroer is a 25-year Army veteran who filed suit against the LOC on June 2, 2005, after being rejected for a position as a terrorism and international crime research analyst with the Congressional Research Service, a division of the LOC, because she was beginning the transition process to become Diane. She expects to complete the transition through surgery later this year.

Schroer brought the case under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits employment discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex and national origin. But lawyers for the Library argued in their response last fall that transsexual individuals are not considered members "of a 'protected class' as required by Title VII" and thus the case should be dismissed.

Lawyers for the LOC have argued in court filings that applying Title VII to transsexuals would create an improper precedent in the workplace.

"The term 'sex,' as used in Title VII, prohibits discrimination based on the biological state of a male or female," the U.S. Attorney's office argued in its response last fall. "District Courts in this Circuit, as well as in many other circuits, have never held that transsexuals are a protected group under Title VII."

In late March, Robertson denied the LOC's dismissal request, noting in his opinion that "the failure of numerous attempts to broaden Title VII to cover sexual orientation says nothing about Title VII's relationship to sexual identity. ... There are facts that Schroer could prove which would support her claim that the Library refused to hire her solely because of her sexual identity, and that in so doing, the Library discriminated against her 'because of ... sex.'"

DOJ_NMG_0032416

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office, said this week that "we are in the process of deciding whether or not to seek to have the case certified to the Court of Appeals for a decision" and that "if we were going to seek an appeal we have to notify Judge Robertson by the 19th of June."

But, Phillips said, "I can't and won't get into what the grounds would be assuming we do seek an appeal."

Spitzer, though, was willing to speculate on what argument the U.S. Attorney's office might use: "Their view is simply that Congress did not intend to cover that back in 1964 when they prohibited discrimination based on sex. That's their basic argument."

However, Spitzer said, "The odds are that there is not going to be an immediate appeal either because the government doesn't ask for it or because Judge Robertson doesn't give them permission or because the Court of Appeals doesn't give them permission. And if there isn't an appeal then the discovery should move forward promptly and hopefully it won't be too many months until we are in a position either to file motions for summary judgment or to schedule a trial."

When Schroer initially interviewed for the job at CRS in October 2004, the name on her application was David J. Schroer and she dressed in traditionally masculine attire. Schroer — a retired colonel who served in the Army Rangers, earned several medals for distinguished service and fought in the war on terror as a member of the Special Operations Command — claims she was told she was the most qualified candidate for the analyst position. She argues that by December of that year the Library had offered her the job and was happy to employ her as a man.

However, she claims, Library officials changed their mind when Schroer informed them that she was under a doctor's care for gender dysphoria and that, in accordance with her doctor's instructions, she would begin using a feminine name and presenting a traditional female appearance by the time she started work as a research analyst.

Senate To Consider Letting Hawaiians Pursue Sovereignty (WT)

By Brian DeBose

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Hawaii Sen. Daniel K. Akaka thinks Hawaiians should be allowed to govern themselves as Native Americans and Alaskans do, and after seven years of pushing a bill to start the process, the Senate is expected to take it up this week.

Mr. Akaka says the bill is a way to give "indigenous" Hawaiians a sense of pride and a chance for sovereignty for the first time since 1893, when Queen Liliuokalani was deposed and lands were illegally seized by U.S. Marines and a cadre of sugar-plantation businessmen.

"For the first time, if it passes, Hawaiians will have parity and be able to form a government entity to address their concerns, since the overthrow," Mr. Akaka said.

Republican senators annually have blocked the legislation, saying it would violate the Constitution by establishing a sovereign race-based government. It is only coming up now through a deal worked out between Democratic and Republican leaders to move other bills.

Opponents, including many native Hawaiians, say the bill opens up a "Pandora's box" of new race classifications and called the bill ambiguous as to what benefits it will bring.

The bill calls for an Office of Native Hawaiian Relations in the Department of the Interior, and a Native Hawaiian Interagency Coordinating Group to administer programs, a commission that would certify who are indigenous Hawaiians, and provides a process of reorganization of the Native Hawaiian governing entity.

"The bill will not authorize gaming in Hawaii. The bill will not allow private lands to be taken. The bill will not create a reservation in Hawaii," Mr. Akaka said.

The legislation is supported by both Republican and Democratic senators, primarily those from states with substantial Native American and Eskimo populations, as well as the American Bar Association and Alaska Federation of Natives.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, who has kept the bill from coming to the floor, said the creation of a native Hawaiian government -- composed only of redefined natives and whose members can only be voted in by native Hawaiians -- could divide Hawaii's people.

DOJ_NMG_0032417

"Unlike reservation Indians, Native Hawaiians do not live in one area of the State that is set aside for Indians; they live in the same cities and neighborhoods and on the same streets, as other Hawaiians do," Mr. Kyl said.

Reservation Indian tribes have the power to tax, regulate and make laws for members. There are an estimated 400,000 Native Hawaiians living throughout the United States.

Native Hawaiians also say it "too narrowly" redefines who is indigenous.

"It is only for people of Native Hawaiian blood," said 'Ehu Kekahu Cardwell, director of the Koani Foundation, a grass-roots group dedicated to restoring the Hawaiian nation.

"We want it to be for any descendants of kingdom nationals who were loyal to the queen during the time she was deposed. We want everyone to be able to have a say in how this turns out," Mr. Cardwell said.

Leon Siu, a Chinese Hawaiian lobbying against the bill on Capitol Hill, said it has already caused division in Hawaii.

"We reject a race issue being brought into our community; the bill will change the definition of who we are," he said. "Native Hawaiian is not a pure bloodline and ... this bill will introduce a new concept of racial apartheid."

Mr. Siu's father fled China in search of a better life and settled in Hawaii 70 years ago, as did hundreds of thousands of foreign nationals from America, Japan, China, Vietnam, and the Philippines who became Hawaiian citizens.

The Hawaiian monarchy historically never kept anyone from participating in its government structure and did not have a race-specific citizenship definition.

One of the most salient points in the debate will be a history lesson on how Hawaii became a U.S. territory and a state, which Native Hawaiians say was an "illegal annexation."

Queen Liliuokalani, the last Hawaiian monarch, was deposed in 1893 by a collection of sugar exporters doing business on the island with the complicity of the U.S. government.

Hawaii became a U.S. territory under a congressional resolution passed in the late 1890s, but the Constitution states that the U.S. can only acquire land held by sovereign foreign nations through a formal treaty.

The treaty authorized by the Safety Commission -- an illegitimate government established by the sugar plantation owners -- failed in Congress after 38,000 of the 40,000 natives living on the island in 1897 petitioned the Congress to reject it.

Congress formally acknowledged that the coup was unlawful in an apology resolution in 1993.

"This is just the next step in that process of acknowledging the wrong committed against the Native Hawaiian people and recognize them as a sovereign entity," said Donalyn Dela Cruz, spokeswoman for Mr. Akaka.

A Chance For Justice In Hawaii (NYT)

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

For Native Hawaiians, the last two centuries have been a struggle against extinction. Not long after Captain Cook sailed up in 1778, disease, poverty and political and economic exploitation began pushing their culture toward the vanishing point. One harsh milestone came in 1893, when American and European businessmen backed by United States marines overthrew the Hawaiian kingdom. Annexation by the United States quickly followed.

Hawaii has since thrived as a multiracial society, and its native language and arts have undergone a rebirth in the last generation or two. But if there is a common theme in this resurgent culture, it is an abiding sense of loss. The wrongs done to Native Hawaiians are a wound that never healed.

A tiny minority in the islands dreams, madly, of correcting this injustice by becoming an independent country. But Hawaii's broad mainstream — its Legislature, its current governor and her three living predecessors, its United States senators and two House members, and a solid majority of residents — has lined up behind something far more sensible.

It's a bill sponsored by Senator Daniel Akaka that would extend federal recognition to Native Hawaiians as indigenous people. It would create a governing body for the estimated 400,000 Native Hawaiians that would negotiate with the state and federal governments over land and other resources.

After languishing for years, the bill is heading for a Senate vote. This has prompted outraged editorials and op-ed articles warning that a Pacific paradise will become a balkanized banana republic.

DOJ_NMG_0032418

Those worries are misplaced. The bill's central aim is protecting money and resources — inoculating programs for Native Hawaiians from race-based legal challenges. It is based on the entirely defensible conviction that Native Hawaiians — who make up 20 percent of the state's population but are disproportionately poor, sick, homeless and incarcerated — have a distinct identity and deserve the same rights as tribal governments on the mainland.

The Akaka bill does not supersede the Constitution or permit Zimbabwe-style land grabs. It explicitly forbids casinos, a touchy subject in Hawaii. Any changes a Hawaiian government seeks would have to be negotiated with state or federal authorities. As has always been the case on those eight little islands, everyone will have to find a way to get along.

D.C. Mayor Fires Director Of Agency For The Disabled (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Karylyn Barker

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams fired the director of the District agency that cares for the mentally retarded yesterday in hopes of averting a court takeover of the troubled bureaucracy, which is facing fresh allegations of abuse and neglect in city-funded group homes.

After barely a year on the job, Marsha H. Thompson was dismissed as administrator of the city's Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities Administration. Williams said it was the first firing of an agency head in years.

In her place, Williams appointed Kathy Elmore Sawyer, retired commissioner of Alabama's mental health department and an experienced advocate for the mentally disabled. Sawyer now serves as a consultant to the D.C. agency. She will work under a six-month contract that ends shortly before Williams (D) leaves office in January.

During a news conference, Williams introduced Sawyer as "a nationally recognized expert who I believe can make an immediate impact on the staff, on the operations, on the mission and strategy of this important agency. . . . We believe she is the ideal, really the perfect person to get this job done."

Williams said he hopes Sawyer's appointment "can reassure the court and the lawyers for our clients that receivership is not the right choice at this time."

Several advocates called Sawyer a respected administrator with a sterling reputation. But the move will not stave off a push to have a receiver take control of the agency, the target of a 1976 class action lawsuit over care of the mentally disabled. University Legal Services, a group representing the plaintiffs, recently asked a federal judge to appoint a receiver, and a hearing is set for June 29.

"It isn't as simple as shuffling people and removing an administrator to fix 30 years of problems," said Sandy Bernstein, legal director of University Legal Services. The agency has had nine administrators in seven years, she said. Sawyer "will be the 10th."

A court takeover of the mental retardation agency would mark a major embarrassment for Williams during his final year in office. When he became mayor in 1999, five agencies were in receivership, including those responsible for housing, child welfare and mental health. Williams made it a priority to regain control, doing so by 2002. The District has not lost control of any city function during his administration.

Problems at the mental retardation agency -- which employs more than 200 people to oversee 90 residential and day program contractors, as well as 360 group homes -- have persisted.

Two weeks ago, as plaintiffs requested a receiver, the U.S. Justice Department urged the judge to hold the District in contempt of court because, it said, the city had not met promises to improve health care and other services at group homes and because of 14 "preventable and questionable" deaths since January 2003. The papers gave vivid and startling details about the extent of the abuse, which ranged from severe scaldings to fatal starvation.

In its court filing, the Justice Department criticized Williams, saying he has known about problems for more than 10 years, dating to his tenure as the city's chief financial officer.

Meanwhile, agency officials reluctantly revealed to council members that they had run out of money to pay the private providers who run the city's network of group homes. Last week, the mayor asked the council to approve an additional $18 million for the fiscal year that ends in September.

DOJ_NMG_0032419

Amid demands for Thompson's firing from Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), the chairman of the council committee that oversees the agency, Deputy Mayor Brenda Donald Walker, said she approached Sawyer about two weeks ago and asked her to expand her role with the city.

"There was a culmination of issues that signaled serious management deficiencies that could not be overcome," Walker said, adding that her "knees are scarred not just from praying but from begging" a reluctant Sawyer to take the job.

Yesterday, Fenty and council member Vincent C. Gray (D-Ward 7) joined Williams at the news conference to praise the mayor's action and welcome Sawyer to the city.

Sawyer, of Montgomery, Ala., retired last year as commissioner of the Alabama Department of Mental Health and Mental Retardation. During her first year in office, she negotiated the settlement of a 33-year-old lawsuit that established the right of the mentally ill to leave institutions and receive treatment in less-restrictive settings. She has since served as a consultant to several state agencies and was recommended to the District by a court-appointed special master.

She described herself as "an advocate first" and promised to restructure the agency and get a handle on its budget. She starts work June 19. Other details of her contract are being finalized.

Thompson, whom Williams named interim administrator in April 2005, was informed of her dismissal early yesterday. Williams had given her the job outright six months ago, even after a judge warned that people were dying because of poor care in group homes.

Thompson said she expected the mayor to make changes in light of the receivership request, "but I didn't know I was going to get fired." She said that no major progress can take place until the agency has sufficient staff and authority, including the ability to secure federal Medicaid funding for expensive services paid for with local tax money.

Tina Campanella, executive director of Quality Trust for Individuals With Disabilities Inc., an advocacy group, said Sawyer has the background and experience for the job -- but warned that "the fix is bigger than the administrator."

"It's sad we're going to go through another change because this creates a disruption of services and support for people with disabilities," Campanella said.

Comes Now No. 19 (WP)

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

MARSHA H. Thompson, head of the city's Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities Administration (MRDDA), told The Post last month that by her count, she was the agency's 17th or 18th administrator in the past dozen years. Yesterday, having lasted about a year, her tenure came to an abrupt halt with Mayor Anthony A. Williams's announcement that he has appointed Kathy Elmore Sawyer to serve as the MRDDA's acting administrator. By his own admission, the mayor yanked Ms. Thompson and called in Ms. Sawyer because the city faces the prospect of a U.S. District Court judge placing the beleaguered agency in receivership. As he said in a statement, "My hope is that Ms. Sawyer will be able to provide immediate stability to MRDDA and can reassure the court and the lawyers for our clients that receivership is not the right choice at this time."

If the mayor is seeking immediate stability in that agency through the appointment of one individual, albeit a highly qualified professional, his search will more than likely be in vain. The problem at the MRDDA is not that it hasn't been led by a reformer with dedication, compassion and a vision. The problem rests below the agency head. It can be found within the agency and the group homes it oversees. Those places have more than their share of unqualified workers. They should be nowhere near vulnerable people who are mentally retarded or have developmental disabilities. Unless the mayor has the fortitude and is willing to wade in with the MRDDA administrator and stand down the bureaucracy and special interests, i.e., contractors; unless he is prepared to rid the payroll of incompetents, and clean house from top to bottom, then director No. 19 will soon give way to Nos. 20 and 21 and 29.

Look at the record: former group home employees prosecuted for physical and sexual abuse of MRDDA clients; benchmarks in work plans negotiated with the court unmet on every count; vulnerable clients abused and dying in MRDDA's care; the agency's budget overspent by more than $18 million; a new petition pending for federal court receivership. Cleaning up that mess requires more than hiring an outsider with a good reputation. It needs the backing of a mayor who places reform of a critical and much-neglected agency ahead of a trip to South Korea, where Mr. Williams is heading today. It needs a mayor as dedicated to improving the agency as he is to building a new baseball stadium or traveling the globe. Ms. Sawyer and, more to the point, the people in her care deserve no less. The court, in deciding on receivership, should seek the same assurance.

A Well Of Smiths And Xias (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Muhammad Waqar, Avi Wolfman-Arent, Yiran Xia, Victoria Sandoval, Jacqueline Orellana-Flores, Elizabeth Packer, Ramona Singh, Anuja Shah, Mayra Ramos, Emily-Kate Hannapel, Natasha Perez, Samir Paul, Ekta Taneja, Linden Vongsathorn, Michael Tsai, Nardos Teklebrahan, Matiwos Wondwosen ...

I went to a high school graduation Monday and a United Nations meeting broke out.

The commencement was my daughter Natalie's, the high school was Montgomery Blair in Silver Spring, Md. There were some 700 kids receiving their diplomas, and as I sat there for two hours listening to each one's name pronounced, I became both fascinated and touched by the stunning diversity — race, religion, ethnicity — of the graduating class. I knew my daughter's school was diverse, but I had no idea it was this diverse.

The names above, which I just pulled from the graduation book, were typical of her entire class, which included exactly five people named "Smith." In my high school in Minnesota it seemed like there were only five people not named "Smith."

My daughter told me that the names in her class can be so difficult to pronounce that for graduation the school had all the students write their names phonetically on a card so the announcer would not mangle them in front of family and friends.

There is a lot to be worried about in America today: a war in Iraq that is getting worse not better, an administration whose fiscal irresponsibility we will be paying for for a long time, an education system that is not producing enough young Americans skilled in math and science, and inner cities where way too many black males are failing. We must work harder and get smarter if we want to maintain our standard of living.

But if there is one reason to still be optimistic about America it is represented by the stunning diversity of the Montgomery Blair class of 2006. America is still the world's greatest human magnet. We are not the only country that embraces diversity, but there is something about our free society and free market that still attracts people like no other. Our greatest asset is our ability to still cream off not only the first-round intellectual draft choices from around the world but the low-skilled-high-aspiring ones as well, and that is the main reason that I am not yet ready to cede the 21st century to China. Our Chinese will still beat their Chinese.

This influx of brainy and brawny immigrants is our oil well — one that never runs dry. It is an endless source of renewable human energy and creativity. Congress ought to stop debating gay marriage and finally give us a framework to maintain a free flow of legal immigration.

What is so striking about Blair is that it is just a neighborhood public high school. It was not designed to be diverse. Yes, it has some magnet programs, but for the most part it just reflects its surroundings — about one-third black, one-third Hispanic and one-third Noah's Ark of everyone else.

As I mingled with the other parents afterward, waiting for our kids to emerge from the ceremony, I found myself at one point surrounded by families in which no one was speaking English.

The only familiar voice that came through the din was one that made me laugh — an African-American mom, gripping her child's diploma, saying: "This diploma is mine! I'm keeping this!" She said she had worked as hard as her kid for this day. Bless her heart, as I am sure she spoke for many parents.

It is hard to watch a graduation like this and not think about our enemies in Iraq and Afghanistan — the Taliban, Islamo-totalitarians like bin Laden and Zarqawi, and the retrograde regimes that support them. Their whole mind-set is about how to purify their world from "the other," from diversity, from "infidels." With enough brutality, they may win in Iraq. I still hope not.

But they will never win the future — because as soon as their oil wells run dry, their societies will be as barren, bland and unproductive as their deserts.

Our oil wells, by contrast, will still be pumping. They're right there, hiding in plain sight, in the Blair commencement book:

DOJ_NMG_0032421

Yueyang Li, Kenia Lopez-Reyes, Lucy Fromyer, Raya Steinberg, Zahra Gordon, Sreva Ghosh, Juan-Jesus Louis, Yendil Furcal, Yenusa Eke, Sofonias Frezghi, Yohanes Dejen, Edra Comegys-Brisbane, Yoel Castillio-Ortiz, Elijah Zuares, Placido Zelaya, Mimi Zou. And Jessica Smith.

Georgia Has Changed For The Better, And The Voting Rights Act Should Too (HILL)

By Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.)

The Hill, June 7, 2006

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 worked. It changed Georgia dramatically for the better.

Now, as Congress considers a 25-year extension of the law, we need to modernize the Voting Rights Act to reflect the reality of today — a reality strongly shaped by the successes of the original legislation.

In 1965, the Voting Rights Act overturned the institutionalized discrimination embedded in the laws of Georgia and other Southern states. The law unshackled a significant portion of our state's residents and launched them into the political process by guaranteeing their right to vote. As a result, Georgia today represents a model of voter equality for states with diverse populations.

In fact, an academic study documents that black Georgians vote at higher rates than white Georgians. There are nine black statewide elected officials — most of whom defeated white opponents — including our state attorney general, the labor commissioner and three state Supreme Court justices, one of whom is chief justice. Black representation in statewide offices almost exactly parallels their proportion in the state's population. Four of our state's 13 members of the U.S. House are African-Americans — two of whom represent majority-white districts. It would be difficult to find a state with a more diverse group of elected officials.

Georgia is home to some of the most prosperous majority black communities in the United States. Today, our nation's best and brightest African-Americans flock to Georgia not for Freedom Rides but for great opportunities and a high quality of life.

Yet, despite Georgia's revolutionary strides in voter equality, the Voting Rights Act still treats Georgia as if it's a backward society governed by the laws of Jim Crow.

Let me explain. The original Voting Rights Act created a formula to determine which states were denying minority citizens their right to vote. Congress applied the formula to the 1964 election turnout numbers, and Georgia was one of several states that essentially failed the test. The law allowed the federal government to approve or disapprove all election-law changes, from redistricting to moving voting precincts, in those states.

Since then, Congress has renewed the Voting Rights Act several times without looking at changes in the states affected by the law.

Renewing the law as it is would keep Georgia in the penalty box for 25 more years. It doesn't make sense to subjugate Georgia to the whims of federal bureaucrats until 2031 based on the turnout of an election featuring Barry Goldwater and Lyndon Johnson.

If Georgia's sins can never be forgiven, shouldn't there be an Accused Witch Protection Act that applies only to Massachusetts? Shouldn't our foreign policy treat South Africa as if it's still governed by a racist apartheid regime?

It's not simply a matter of fairness and common sense. There's a legal issue too. The Supreme Court ruled in 1966 that singling out states in the Voting Rights Act was constitutional only because it was narrowly tailored to address a specific problem and "temporary." We're already well past "temporary."

I do think there's a solution that will bring consensus. I'm proposing that Congress modernize the Voting Rights Act by applying the formula to the 2004 election. That way federal oversight would no longer apply to states that have corrected past problems. It would also allow the federal government to expand oversight to states where new problems have developed.

The Voting Rights Act has served our nation well. We dishonor the accomplishments of the law if we pretend nothing's changed since 1965.

Westmoreland represents Georgia's 8th Congressional District.

Block The Vote, Ohio Remix (NYT)

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

If there was ever a sign of a ruling party in trouble, it is a game plan that calls for trying to win by discouraging voting.

The latest sign that Republicans have an election-year strategy to shut down voter registration drives comes from Ohio. As the state gears up for a very competitive election season this fall, its secretary of state, J. Kenneth Blackwell, has put in place "emergency" regulations that could hit voter registration workers with criminal penalties for perfectly legitimate registration practices. The rules are so draconian they could shut down registration drives in Ohio.

Mr. Blackwell, who also happens to be the Republican candidate for governor this year, has a history of this sort of behavior. In 2004, he instructed county boards of elections to reject any registrations on paper of less than 80-pound stock — about the thickness of a postcard. His order was almost certainly illegal, and he retracted it after he came under intense criticism. It was, however, in place long enough to get some registrations tossed out.

This year, Mr. Blackwell's office has issued rules and materials that appear to require that paid registration workers, and perhaps even volunteers, personally take the forms they collect to an election office. Organizations that run registration drives generally have the people who register voters bring the forms back to supervisors, who can then review them for errors. Under Mr. Blackwell's edict, everyone involved could be committing a crime. Mr. Blackwell's rules also appear to prohibit people who register voters from sending the forms in by mail. That rule itself may violate federal elections law.

Mr. Blackwell's rules are interpretations of a law the Republican-controlled Ohio Legislature passed recently. Another of the nation's most famous swing states, Florida, has been the scene of similar consternation and confusion since it recently enacted a law that is so harsh that the Florida League of Women Voters announced that it was stopping all voter registration efforts for the first time in 67 years.

Florida's Legislature, like Ohio's, is controlled by Republicans. Throughout American history both parties have shown a willingness to try to use election law to get results they might otherwise not win at the polls. But right now it is clearly the Republicans who believe they have an interest in keeping the voter base small. Mr. Blackwell and other politicians who insist on making it harder to vote never say, of course, that they are worried that get-out-the-vote drives will bring too many poor and minority voters into the system. They say that they want to reduce fraud. However, there is virtually no evidence that registration drives are leading to fraud at the polls.

But there is one clear way that Ohio's election system is corrupt. Decisions about who can vote are being made by a candidate for governor. Mr. Blackwell should hand over responsibility for elections to a decision maker whose only loyalty is to the voters and the law.

ANTITRUST:

A.C.L.U. Raises Surveillance As Issue In Big Phone Merger (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

The American Civil Liberties Union asked the Federal Communications Commission yesterday to withhold approval of AT&T's acquisition of BellSouth until it reviews allegations that the companies gave customer records to the government without warrants.

In its filing, the A.C.L.U. cited a provision in the Telecommunications Act that says that in considering a merger, the commission must "weigh the public-interest harms of the proposed transaction against the potential public-interest benefits."

The group said the F.C.C. should determine if AT&T and BellSouth handed over phone records to the National Security Agency's surveillance program and, if so, whether that violated any privacy laws.

The A.C.L.U. action comes after USA Today reported last month that AT&T, BellSouth and Verizon provided the agency with call records on millions of Americans in surveillance done after the Sept. 11 attacks.

"The F.C.C. is in a position to determine whether the USA Today story is true and can bring the companies to the table and figure out whether they are providing customer information to the N.S.A. and what is the lawful authority for doing so," said Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty project at the A.C.L.U.

Kevin J. Martin, the F.C.C. chairman, said last month that the commission could not investigate reports of the companies' cooperation with the security agency because the agency's activities were classified.

DOJ_NMG_0032423

Mr. Martin made the statement in response to a letter from Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, the ranking minority member of the House Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet. At that time, however, the matter was not linked to AT&T's deal for BellSouth, which was announced in March.

Tamara Lipper, an F.C.C. spokeswoman, declined to comment on the filing.

Selim Bingol, an AT&T spokesman, said, "We don't have anything to say without having seen the paperwork." He also said, "We are vigorous protectors of our customers' privacy and when we're asked to help law enforcement agencies, we do so strictly within the law."

BellSouth has denied providing phone records to the security agency and said the A.C.L.U.'s request did not affect the company. "The claims made in the USA Today story about BellSouth are false, so any assertions by the A.C.L.U. would be moot for BellSouth," said Jeff Battcher, a company spokesman.

In its letter to the commission, the A.C.L.U. noted that BellSouth had denied participating in the surveillance program. But it voiced concern about what would happen if the company linked up to AT&T.

"It would be a cruel irony if BellSouth had not participated in the program but as a result of this merger, BellSouth customers became unwilling surveillance targets," it said.

Telecom Firms Ask FCC To Stop AT&T-BellSouth Merger (SANANTBIZ)

San Antonio Business Journal, June 7, 2006

A group of seven telecommunications companies have filed comments with the Federal Communications Commission asking regulators to block the planned $67 billion merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp.

San Antonio-based AT&T (NYSE: T) needs approvals from 18 states, the U.S. Justice Department and the FCC in order to proceed with the merger -- which could close by the end of the year. The merger already has been approved in eight states and two foreign countries.

The group of companies claim the AT&T-BellSouth merger will only create a dominant player that will be able to thwart competition through its increased control over local networks and other communications services.

Through its acquisition of Atlanta-based BellSouth (NYSE: BLS), AT&T -- already the nation's largest provider of local voice, long-distance and broadband DSL services -- will only further move the company toward monopoly status, the companies claim.

The companies that are asking the FCC to block the merger are Cbeyond Communications in Atlanta (NASDAQ: CBEY); Grande Communications in San Marcos; NuVox Communications in Greenville, S.C.; Supra Telecom in Orlando; Talk America (NASDAQ: TALK) in New Hope, Pa.; XO Communications (OTCBB: XOHO) in Reston, Va. and Xspedius Communications LLC in O'Fallon, Mo.

They say the AT&T-BellSouth merger would extend the company's footprint to 22 states and further cement its standing as the nation's largest wireless provider by controlling all the stock of Cingular Wireless.

AT&T already is the incumbent local phone company in 13 states. BellSouth's territory extends to nine states.

However, the company has long maintained that there is sufficient competition in the marketplace.

"There are always those who try to use these proceedings for their own special interests. These are our competitors. What do you expect?" AT&T spokesman Dave Pacholczyk says. "We're confident that the FCC will see through their agenda and grant us a prompt review and speedy approval."

Company officials have also argued that the merger should proceed because the two telephone companies don't compete directly for residential service.

AT&T/BellSouth Opponents Talk Litigation (B&C)

By John Eggerton, Broadcasting & Cable

Broadcasting & Cable, June 7, 2006

Opponents of the proposed merger of AT&T and BellSouth said that if the FCC does not block or put strong conditions on the deal, "some parties" will likely sue.

In a conference call with reporters discussing their filings with the FCC in opposition to the merger, several of the groups argued that, unless the FCC requires AT&T to spin-off wireless company Cingular after the merger and to divest itself of wireless spectrum they argue has been warehoused, the "best case" scenario from the merger would be an "entrenched DSL cable monopoly for Internet access. That's because they said the merged company would likely sit on spectrum that could be used for wireless Internet access in competition to DSL.

"If the FCC doesn't "do the right thing," said Jonathan Rubin of the American Antitrust Institute, "there is potential for some kind of major litigation."

Jonathan Lee of telco lobby Comptel pointed out that his group was already in litigation against the Justice Department for what it thought were insufficient conditions on the AT&T/SBC and Verizon/MCI mergers.

Andrew Schwartzman of the Media Access Project said his filing on behalf of the Center for Digital Democracy emphasized the threat to net neutrality of the merger, homing in on the issue of removing a potential competitor for wireless Internet access.

Mark Cooper emphasized the issues of 1) net neutrality--"saying that AT&T is "leading the charge to put a toll booth and a tire shredder on the Internet"--2) potential red-lining of video and broadband service (only serving the more profitable areas of a franchise), and 3) the reconstitution of the old Ma Bell that the merger, following AT&T's earlier merger with SBC, suggests. Throw in the issue of phone record privacy, Cooper said, and it will make for "an interesting conversation."

Craig Aaron of anti-consolidation group Free Press said that its Web Site had generated 15,000 comments to the FCC opposing the merger.

June 5 was the deadline in the initial round of comments on the deal, which was announced in March.

Microsoft's Reputation At Stake, EU Says (BLOOM)

BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, June 7, 2006

European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said Tuesday that Microsoft Corp. should be concerned about its reputation as well as the financial impact of antitrust rulings.

Kroes, who will decide before the end of July whether to impose daily fines of $2.6 million on Microsoft, said the software maker should take account of its image.

"It's not only a matter of financial aspects in such cases, it's also a matter of reputation," Kroes said at a European Parliament meeting in Brussels, Belgium.

The European Commission, the European Union's antitrust regulator, is threatening to fine Microsoft unless it licenses information on the way its Windows operating system shares printers and files to rival software developers. The regulator says the company hasn't provided "complete and accurate" information to rivals.

Microsoft, whose Windows operating system runs on about 95 percent of the world's personal computers, was fined in March 2004 for abusing its dominant market position by failing to make technical information available and for bundling its media player with Windows.

As part of the antitrust decision, the commission ordered Microsoft to license so-called network protocols, which would allow developers to make competing products. Rivals and the EU have said Microsoft has resisted complying.

Microsoft, which is appealing the antitrust decision, has maintained that it is already meeting the EU's demands.

BAA Backs Ferrovial's Latest Offer (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson And Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

United Kingdom airports operator BAA PLC approved a £10.1 billion ($18.9 billion) takeover offer from Spanish builder Grupo Ferrovial SA, paving the way for a mammoth European infrastructure deal that highlights investors' appetite for companies with stable returns.

The approval by BAA's board yesterday, after four months of haggling between the two companies, appears to have trumped a rival bid by a consortium led by Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

But questions remain over how Ferrovial can boost profitability at BAA's regulated businesses enough to justify the bid's hefty premium. Some airlines expressed concern that the deal could lead to higher expenses.

DOJ_NMG_0032425

Ferrovial's bid is valued at 950.25 pence a share, including a 15.25-pence-a-share special dividend that BAA promised shareholders in May. BAA rebuffed two earlier approaches by Ferrovial for 810 pence and 900 pence. If the latest bid goes ahead, Ferrovial will be paying 45% more than BAA was valued at when takeover rumors began swirling in February.

In accepting Ferrovial's offer, BAA's board rejected a slightly higher bid by the Goldman consortium, valued at 955 pence a share, because the group would have taken significantly longer to close a deal, said people close to the matter.

Ferrovial hamstrung the rival consortium's efforts with a "dawn raid" purchase of 14% of BAA's shares at 950 pence a share early yesterday. That gives the Spanish group a stake big enough to deter a new rival bid emerging from the Goldman group, because takeovers in the U.K. are typically conditional on receiving 90% or more of the shares.

The Goldman team, which is likely to proceed only with a friendly deal, said it was seriously considering returning with a new bid, possibly slightly higher than its latest offer. Regulators yesterday extended a Friday deadline and gave the Goldman group an extra week, until June 16, to make a formal offer or walk away.

If the U.K. airports operator accepts another bid, Ferrovial will receive a penalty fee of £115.5 million.

The challenge for Ferrovial's consortium -- which includes Caisse de Dépôt et Placement du Québec and a Singapore-based investment fund owned by GIC Special Investments Pte. Ltd. -- will be to squeeze returns out of BAA. BAA operates seven U.K. airports, including Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted in London, and is heavily regulated. The U.K. Civil Aviation Authority is reviewing prices BAA can charge airlines for the 2008-2013 period.

BAA was advised by N.M. Rothschild & Sons and UBS AG. Ferrovial was advised by Citigroup Inc. and Macquarie Bank Ltd.

Airport Operator Accepts $19 Billion Spanish Bid (NYT)

By Nicola Clark, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

PARIS, June 6 — BAA, the operator of some of the world's busiest airports, said today that it had accepted a new takeover offer from the Spanish construction group Ferrovial, ending a nearly four-month fight to remain independent.

Grupo Ferrovial's latest bid values BAA at about £10.2 billion, or $19 billion. "The board believes that an offer at this level represents an attractive price," BAA said in a statement.

Ferrovial's move appeared to frustrate a possible 11th-hour rival bid from the investment bank Goldman Sachs. During negotiations with BAA on Monday night, Goldman said it had proposed a nonbinding cash offer that would value BAA at £10.3 billion.

BAA acquiesced to Ferrovial's advances late Monday after a consortium led by the Spanish group succeeded in acquiring around 14 percent of BAA's shares on the open market.

The Ferrovial bid valued BAA at 950.24 pence a share, compared with Goldman's proposed offer of 955.25 pence.

A BAA spokesman said the company, which operates Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports, had chosen the bid from Ferrovial over the one from Goldman because it offered the greatest certainty for shareholders in the near term.

"Under Ferrovial's offer, shareholders will get their money sooner," said Duncan Bonfield, a BAA spokesman. "Goldman's has made a proposal. But as long as it is just a proposal, then there are clear risks involved."

Ferrovial's bid, which includes a 15.25-pence-a-share dividend, has already received approval from European Union and British antitrust authorities. The offer from Goldman would likely need two to three months to complete due diligence procedures and secure regulatory approval, according to BAA.

BAA controls two-thirds of Britain's airports, and its dominant position has long been a source of concern for airlines, which complain that the company has the power to set arbitrarily high fees for landing rights and other airport services.

Last month, the British Office of Fair Trading said it was considering an investigation into whether the company has abused its market position to the detriment of consumers.

Robert Milton, chairman of the board of the International Air Transport Association, worried that airlines could be charged even more to use BAA's airports in the near term as the airport operator seeks to recoup its financing costs.

"It's hard to paint a happy picture at this time," Mr. Milton, who is also chief executive of Air Canada, said at an industry conference in Paris.

DOJ_NMG_0032426

BAA's decision to accept Ferrovial's offer followed a series of overtures by the Spanish group that began in March, with a hostile takeover offer valued at 810 pence a share.

BAA's board swiftly rejected that approach, arguing that it significantly undervalued BAA's assets, which include airport stakes in Budapest and Naples, as well as restaurant and retail services concessions at several American airports, including Logan International in Boston. Ferrovial sweetened its bid to 900 pence last week, but BAA insisted that the company was worth at least 940 pence a share.

In a statement, Goldman Sachs urged BAA shareholders to take no action on Ferrovial's offer and said it would make a further announcement in the coming days. British market regulators have given the Goldman Sachs consortium until June 16 to make a firm offer for BAA, extending an earlier deadline by a week.

Mr. Bonfield, the BAA spokesman, said the company would not rule out negotiations with Goldman Sachs if it were to submit a formal bid. "We know our duty to shareholders," he said. "If there were an offer, then we definitely would have to look at it."

Ferrovial has until June 19 to revise its offer, while BAA shareholders have until June 26 to accept or reject the new Ferrovial bid.

BAA has said it plans to spend more than £9.5 billion over the next 10 years upgrading facilities at its three London airports. Major projects include a fifth terminal at Heathrow as well as modifications to runways and terminals to accommodate the new Airbus A380 "superjumbo" jet, which is scheduled to enter commercial service next year.

Given such large investments, combined with the added debt that BAA is expected to take on as a result of the Ferrovial deal, Standard & Poor's cut its credit ratings on the company to BBB+ from A and said it may cut them again.

BAA had £5.34 billion of debt on its books as of March 31, up from £3 billion at the end of 2005.

Street Sleuth Chirac Frowns On NYSE-Euronext (WSJ)

By Alistair MacDonald And Edward Taylor

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

French President Jacques Chirac said he would rather see financial-exchange operator Euronext NV merge with Deutsche Börse AG than with NYSE Group Inc., giving some heart to the German exchange operator as it seeks to win Euronext despite last week's merger agreement between the European and U.S. exchanges.

Buoyed by Mr. Chirac's remarks, Deutsche Börse Chief Executive Reto Francioni and Chairman Kurt Viermetz are on a lobbying trip to Paris today to sound out ways Deutsche Börse can make its offer "more attractive" to shareholders without making significant changes from what has been offered up until now, a person familiar with the matter said.

Some of the French banks that might play a role in the long-running exchange-consolidation saga are less concerned about having a European outcome. Rather, they want to ensure that if NYSE Group, operator of the New York Stock Exchange, and Euronext merge, they can rest assured that U.S. corporate regulation will stay out of Europe, according to a person familiar with the matter.

To that end, some of these banks want Euronext and NYSE Group, which have agreed to a roughly $20 billion merger, to insert a statute into the combined company's rules that would make it easier for investors to insist on a breakup if U.S. regulation creeps into Europe, according to a person familiar with the matter. How such a proposal might work remains unclear. A Euronext spokesman declined to comment. A group of French banks and a separate loose federation of companies listed on Euronext control more than 15% of Euronext's shares.

While there is disagreement, with some still not wishing to see a U.S. exchange handed the keys to Euronext, many in the French banking and business communities say they believe the NYSE-Euronext combination is attractive.

The banks' concern underscores the challenge NYSE Chief Executive John Thain and Euronext CEO Jean-François Théodore face in convincing some European investors that regulation won't be an issue. Some in Europe fear that a trans-Atlantic exchange merger might lead to European companies being subject to strict corporate regulation such as the Sarbanes-Oxley U.S. corporate-governance law. Indeed, the banks' worries come primarily from their role as trading customers that also list their shares on Euronext. The NYSE-Euronext deal requires the approval of at least half of Euronext shareholders.

DOJ_NMG_0032427

Messrs. Thain and Theodore have said repeatedly that regulation of the various exchanges under the combined company would remain largely unchanged, although the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission would regulate the parent company, which will be known as NYSE Euronext. "A core aspect of the structure being proposed is complete respect for the federal model of Euronext, which envisions only local regulation of the marketplaces," says David C. Karp, a partner representing NYSE Group at law firm Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz. "That is the structure being presented to regulators in each of the jurisdictions."

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said late last month the SEC is in talks with regulators from the Netherlands and France about how to respond to the proposed Euronext-NYSE merger.

Concern about the political and regulatory consequences of the deal may provide Deutsche Börse some hope it can still wrest Euronext away. "The consolidation of the European stock-exchange landscape clearly has a European strategic and therefore political dimension, because it concerns the integration of European financial markets and their efficiency," Mr. Francioni said in an interview with German financial daily Handelsblatt yesterday. "I know that policy makers understand the significance of this -- on both sides."

Mr. Chirac, in Germany with German Chancellor Angela Merkel yesterday, said he favors a Franco-German alliance "out of principle" and that he would "regret if such a solution weren't definitively adopted." Ms. Merkel's government has said already it favors partnerships between European exchanges. Both, however, have acknowledged they don't have the power to influence the decision.

"Euronext is not France...it is four exchanges together," Mr. Chirac said, referring to the fact that Euronext runs the stock exchanges of Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon, as well as a derivatives exchange in London.

Mr. Théodore met with his counterpart at Borsa Italiana, Massimo Capuano, in Milan yesterday to discuss bringing the Italian exchange into Euronext. Borsa Italiana said the meetings had been "extremely positive" and the sides will meet again.

Struggle Over Continental Stock Exchanges Takes Political Turn (NYT)

By James Kanter

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

PARIS, June 6 — The struggle for control over continental stock exchanges took a political turn today, as President Jacques Chirac of France said he preferred an all-European alliance of exchanges over a proposed acquisition of Euronext by the New York Stock Exchange. But he backed away from the overt protectionism that has characterized French economic policy in recent months.

The New York Stock Exchange reached an agreement last week to buy Euronext, a four-country exchange with roots in Paris, for about $10.2 billion. The deal would turn Paris into the headquarters for N.Y.S.E./Euronext share trading in Europe, and close out a rival suitor, Deutsche Börse of Germany.

Speaking in Germany alongside the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, Mr. Chirac said that he preferred a European merger and would "regret if this solution is not adopted in the end."

But he made clear that his priority was to preserve jobs in Paris, even if it meant tying the knot with the Americans rather than Deutsche Börse, based in Frankfurt.

The president also acknowledged that he had only "very limited ways to intervene" in the deal.

Ms. Merkel was even more circumspect, saying that governments like those in France and Germany could not exert influence over merging companies, even if she were "of the opinion that it is good to build up strong economic units within Europe."

Deutsche Börse had no immediate comment on Mr. Chirac's remarks, but officials at the German exchange were likely to be pleased. They are seeking to persuade Euronext shareholders — whose approval is required for either deal — that their offer, spurned by Euronext's management, should nevertheless prevail.

Even so, the comments by Mr. Chirac and Ms. Merkel indicated that European political leaders may be less willing to interfere in cross-border deals involving stock exchanges than they have been recently in the energy and steel industries.

DOJ_NMG_0032428

This year, the French government has helped to block Enel of Italy from buying the French utility Suez, and has expressed opposition to a hostile bid for Arcelor, a giant Luxembourg-based steelmaker with roots in France, by Mittal Steel, a giant rival based in the Netherlands whose roots are in India.

Even the German government has flexed some protectionist muscles, preferring to keep a sonar equipment manufacturer, Atlas Elektronic, in German hands rather than allowing the company to be sold to Thales of France for far more money.

On the other hand, a deal between two telephone equipment makers, Lucent of the United States and Alcatel of France, was arranged with minimal political outcry. The merged companies will have an American chief executive, but be based in Paris.

Likewise, the N.Y.S.E. offer for Euronext calls for Paris to become the combined entity's operational headquarters for equity trading in Europe. By contrast, under the most recent Deutsche Börse offer, most top executives would be obliged to move to Frankfurt.

From France's perspective, that may have made the Deutsche Börse offer much less attractive.

"There are sound economic reasons for having an all-European exchanges deal," said Stefan Jaecklin, a stock exchanges expert and managing director at Mercer Oliver Wyman, a consulting firm. But "integrating potentially competing managements in Germany and France and their operations would be far from a frictionless affair," he said.

In a sign of what Euronext executives say is the preference of other bourses for its business model, talks began in Milan today about bringing Italy into the Euronext club. The chief executive of Euronext, Jean-François Théodore, and a member of the board, Olivier Lefebvre, met with Angelo Tantazzi, president of the Borsa Italiana.

Even Mr. Chirac seemed to say today that Euronext's current business plan was on the right track. "Euronext isn't France," Mr. Chirac said. "It is four exchanges that all work together and decide together."

Who Does Arcelor Belong To? (WSJ)

By Wilbur Ross

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

It is the dream of the autocrat everywhere. No longer need you seek the support of the electorate to stay in office. Instead, the onus is on the voters to throw you out. And 50% of those voters who turn out is not enough: It would take 50% of the entire electorate. Consider what this might mean if applied to U.S. presidential elections! Yet this autocratic dream might not be so fanciful in one case. For this is the proposal the Luxembourg-based steel company Arcelor is putting to its shareholders as a way of giving consent on its deal with the Russian steel producer, Severstal.

Arcelor has been fiercely resisting Mittal Steel's proposal that the two companies should merge. So far, so conventional. We did not agree with the steps Arcelor was taking to defend itself -- notably promising a huge cash return to shareholders, on a scale which would have threatened the financial stability and growth prospects of the company going forward. But shareholders will get to vote on this proposal, so one must accept that a democratic process is at work here.

What happened on May 26, however, introduced a completely different complexion. Arcelor announced a deal with Severstal whereby Arcelor will issue 295 million shares to take control of all Severstal's mining and steel assets. In exchange, Severstal gets a 32% stake in Arcelor -- rising to 38% after the capital-return exercise. While Arcelor sought to portray this as the culmination of years of cooperation between the two parties, it was clearly motivated by a desire to defeat the Mittal Steel offer.

There are three aspects of this transaction which raise concern. First, the question of price and control. Mittal Steel has made an offer to all Arcelor shareholders which represents a 70% premium over the stock's highest closing price prior to the announcement of our deal on Jan. 27. Naturally, shareholders expect a premium when ceding control, and 70% is by any standard a very generous number. The market apparently agrees: Our very competitive offer has driven up Arcelor's share price from €22 to €32.80. In the Severstal deal, by contrast, Arcelor shareholders are not made any offer at all. Worse, they are effectively ceding control to Severstal and its majority owner, Alexei Mordashov, at a 25% discount to the price Mittal is offering shareholders (based on a one-month average share price).

The second concern is that Mr. Mordashov should be required to make an offer for the entire share capital of Arcelor when his shareholding reaches 33%. However, the self-tender process would enable him to hold 38% without making any such offer to minorities. The third point concerns governance. It is one thing to be offered a controversial deal when you are given a say in the outcome. But this is not the case.

DOJ_NMG_0032429

At the extraordinary general meeting that Arcelor has scheduled for June 28, the deal will be voted on. But it will pass unless more than 50% of the entire share capital of the company votes against it. This is most unusual. Normally when contemplating such a move, a company would seek the approval of its shareholders, and the threshold would be 66% of the capital either present or represented at the meeting. This is a deliberately prohibitive barrier. The percentage of the capital normally represented at an Arcelor general meeting is below 35%. There has never been a case in which 50% of the shares were represented at such a meeting -- never mind them all voting in the same direction.

So what Arcelor is offering is a vote that appears to offer a choice, but in reality points to only one outcome. This process offends the norms of good corporate governance. That is why Mittal Steel is delighted that the shareholder initiative -- requiring 20% investor support to achieve an orthodox shareholder approval vote -- has got the necessary support. Indeed, the extent of the success of this initiative -- getting around 30% of Arcelor shareholders, in only four days, to petition the Arcelor board to hold a meeting -- must be unprecedented in Europe, and demonstrates their strength of feeling on this issue. Apparently more than 191 million shares were pledged in support of this initiative. That's 19 million more than the number that reelected Arcelor Chairman Joseph Kinsch in April, an event he declared "a vote of confidence and a real mandate."

We must be clear what this vote is about. It is a request by these dissenting shareholders for a proper vote of approval on the Severstal deal. It is not an expression of preference for Mittal, or against Severstal. The opportunity for that will come later. A Mittal/Arcelor combination would have unique strategic advantages, and would fairly compensate Arcelor shareholders. We are more than happy to go to shareholders with this proposition. In the meantime, all we are asking for is a level playing field.

Mr. Ross is a nonexecutive director of Mittal Steel Company and CEO of W.L. Ross and Co.

US Air, After Merger, Wrestles With Frequent Ire (WSJ)

By Melanie Trottman

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

When road warrior Steve Bessellieu tried to get through to US Airways' customer-service desk for top-status frequent fliers by phone last month, the automated system didn't recognize his personal identification number and transferred his call to the lower-tiered Gold desk after three tries. Frustrated, he sent an email to the airline but has yet to hear back, he said.

"If this is how they're treating me, how are they treating the people who don't have status?" Mr. Bessellieu said.

US Airways Group Inc. faces substantial challenges in integrating operations following last year's merger between the old US Airways and America West Holdings Corp. Among them, it has to keep inevitable technology glitches from alienating its customers. Last month, the merged airline launched a combined Web site and merged frequent-flier programs by migrating more than 10 million records from one airline's technology platform to another. The outcome has been far less than perfect.

"This is one of the things that makes airline mergers really hard," said Travis Christ, US Airways' vice president of sales and marketing. "One of the frustrations that our customers feel sometimes -- and we do, too -- is that this just takes time. You can't measure it in hours and days."

While the merged airline's Web site now appears uniform to users, there are still two separate reservations systems in the backdrop. That means those two systems, both antiquated, must communicate with each other behind the scenes to process bookings properly. Even bigger potential troubles could come from merging the two systems, which is planned for the first quarter of next year.

US Airways officials concede there have been problems with the Web site. It has had trouble booking tickets and doing online check-in, a feature the airline touts as a customer convenience. The site has been slow -- functions like moving from page to page have taken up to twice as long during high-volume periods.

The airline said complaints to its call centers rose the day after the May 21 launch of the new Web site. But airline officials say problems were more the exception than the rule, and have since been largely corrected. On the fifth day after launch, for example, officials addressed slowness issues by reconfiguring servers to run off of some very fast disk drives. That change sped things up online by about 50%, the company said.

DOJ_NMG_0032430

"Every hour, we're finding things and getting them knocked out," US Airways' Mr. Christ said. He said the company purposely opted to do a "soft launch" of the site, which means it didn't announce the unveiling to customers. If it had, the site might have crashed amid traffic overload. Chief Information Officer Joe Beery said a team of 60 to 70 people are onsite near the company's Tempe, Ariz., headquarters managing the process.

Mr. Bessellieu, the frequent flier, complained last week that he still couldn't look up his current frequent-flier account online, something the company says it knew in advance might occur until updates are completed June 9. He had further problems Memorial Day weekend viewing the seat map for a flight he was trying to book, and says airline staffers haven't been much help. "The agents that I've spoken to seem as lost as I do," he said.

Meantime, customer calls are pouring into the airline's 24-hour Internet help desk. On a recent afternoon, a call to the desk required holding for 30 minutes before getting an actual person to pick up the phone. An airline spokesman said many of the calls are from people inquiring about why their frequent-flier accounts aren't updating. Others are customers calling in to get help logging in to the new Web site for the first time, since frequent fliers have to create a new user profile for their accounts. The company said it increased staffing by 20% ahead of launch to handle higher call volume.

For its part, US Airways says it has received compliments on the new site as well. And the site does have some improvements. Users of the old USAirways.com will now have an improved booking engine with a feature that helps them determine which travel days have lower fares, for example. And users of the old America West site will be able to book United Airlines flights online through a code-share agreement.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

How To Say Yes To Energy (WT)

By Greg Walden And Marsha Blackburn

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

You can't say much good about Hurricane Katrina, but maybe it woke up Congress to America's need for energy at prices our people can afford to pay.

The flurry of hearings, markups and energy policy debates that ensued were encouraging, and they produced more than just heat and light. They produced bills that, taken together, contemplate a strategy of energy security.

One of them, legislation to streamline the permitting of refineries, is up today. Another, limiting the complex government requirement for so-called boutique fuels, is on deck.

Here's what we want:

• First, to explore for domestic energy to lessen our dependence on risky foreign sources.

• Second, to conserve energy without harming our economy or disrupting our way of life.

• Third, new technologies for fuels and for vehicle and electric plant design.

• Fourth, commonsense rules that eliminate needless delay in bringing critically needed energy projects on line.

We are pressing ahead with new technologies, from hybrids to plug-ins to hydrogen powered cars. And today's refinery-permitting reform bill may finally crack the barrier to new entrants in the refinery business, whether it's crude oil, coal-to-liquid or biofuels that need refining. In the long run, the "H-prize" may do more than anything else to accelerate the shift to cars that run on hydrogen.

The biggest challenge we face, however, is conquering fear. The country must find ways to unlock the energy that politicians and political activists keep trapped in our own country beneath layers of phobia.

The House is moving to deal with the fear by unlocking our own potential. We recently voted, yet again, to open a sliver of the Alaskan tundra, the Alaskan National Wildlife Refuge, to exploration.

Some of the upcoming Senate debate will be a replay of what we've heard for decades from the anti-energy crowd: The caribou will stop calving, there's no oil in ANWR, there's not enough oil in ANWR, our oil will be pumped into ships headed for Japan. The list of silly, flimsy or fact-free objections goes on and on, and it has the uncanny ability to survive dramatic advances in technology and safety, not to mention repeated applications of truth.

DOJ_NMG_0032431

The caribou will thrive, just as they do all over the Alaskan North Slope oilfields. The oil in ANWR is abundant, and none of it may be exported.

The larger truth is that ANWR could be the single largest conventional energy resource in America. The mean estimate of recoverable oil from 2,000 acres in ANWR is 10.4 billion barrels. That's more than double the proven reserves of Texas and could increase America's total proven reserves -- currently 21 billion barrels -- by nearly 50 percent.

At peak production, development on ANWR's northern coastal plain could deliver an additional 1.5 million barrels of oil per day. That is an amount equal to the daily supply America lost in the Gulf of Mexico due to Hurricane Katrina; it is more than the daily excess supply in today's global market; and it is nearly equal to the amount we import from Saudi Arabia.

ANWR thrives as a political issue instead of an energy source because it is the last stand for those who want us to huddle together in the cold and dark, praying for rescue after we've run out of both resources and ideas. They've been saying no and voting no for nearly 30 years, but it's time that we took charge and started saying yes.

Another big job ahead is to recognize and deal with the fear that originates abroad. Witness after witness before our committee has commented on the percentage of today's crude oil price that is directly caused by "geopolitical risk."

The uncertainty caused by civil unrest in Nigeria and the bellicose, anti-American governments of Venezuela and Iran causes markets to fret that supply disruptions will drive prices higher. The consequence is that traders react by bidding up oil prices as much as 20 percent more than might otherwise be the case.

What if all the products that a barrel of oil produces, especially gasoline, were that much less expensive?

The House majority has said no to fear and politics and yes to providing American energy for American workers at a price they can afford to pay. Now it's the Senate's turn.

Rep. Greg Walden, Oregon Republican and Rep. Marsha Blackburn, Tennessee Republican, are members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Ag Secretary Says Bird Flu Easily Found (AP)

By Lauran Neergaard

AP, June 7, 2006

Scientists have a new test that can tell within four hours if a bird is possibly infected with bird flu — but it still will take about a week to know if that suspect case is really sick with the deadly Asian strain, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said Tuesday.

Bird flu hasn't yet reached North America, but testing of migrating wild birds has begun in an attempt to catch it early if it does. There have been no worrisome discoveries yet, Johanns told The Associated Press.

Four hours also is how long it takes to get preliminary results in people infected with the H5N1 virus, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said in the joint interview. But if bird flu ever begins spreading easily among people, that's too long, he warned.

"If it occurs anywhere in the world, it's just a matter of weeks until it appears in the United States," Leavitt said, stressing U.S. preparations that include research into faster human tests for the disease as well as vaccines and treatments. Previously, officials have said that tests allowed them to tell within a day of testing whether a bird was possibly infected with bird flu.

Bird flu has killed at least 127 people worldwide since it began spreading in Asia in late 2003, and tens of millions of poultry and other birds have died of it or been destroyed to stem outbreaks. It is difficult for people to catch — most infections so far have been linked to close contact with infected birds or their droppings.

But experts fear the virus could mutate into a form easily spread between people, potentially sparking a worldwide outbreak.

It's considered likely that an infected bird eventually will wing its way to North America, perhaps mingling with native birds on breeding grounds in Alaska who then could bring H5N1 south to infect other birds.

An infected bird isn't a threat to the average American: "That will not be a crisis," Leavitt stressed.

Instead, Ag officials will work closely with farmers to protect poultry from getting sick, destroying entire flocks if the disease appears, quarantining farms and ensuring a disease-free perimeter of about six miles, Johanns said.

Indeed, the world got a scare last month when an Indonesian family apparently spread the virus to one another, killing at least six relatives and probably a seventh and sickening one more. There have been a handful of such in-family cases before, but this was the largest familial cluster ever counted. Genetic testing showed the virus hasn't mutated, and it didn't spread beyond blood relatives.

DOJ_NMG_0032432

But Johanns and Leavitt said the situation illustrates the cultural difficulties in battling bird flu: how to educate impoverished families that the backyard chickens responsible for their livelihoods could sicken, even kill them.

In Cambodia, Leavitt said, a health minister told him it was "difficult to get farmers to think a few dead chickens are a serious problem" when 14,000 people there die of rabies in a given year.

Given such stark realities, what's the chance that health workers could contain a bird flu pandemic in its country of origin?

"We'll do all we can to help other nations," he said. But, "the chance of actually being there when the spark happens so you control it is very low."

Seneca Claim To Island Rebuffed (BUFFNEWS)

By TOM BUCKHAM And ANTHONY CARDINALE, News Staff Reporters

Buffalo News, June 7, 2006

High Court refusal ends 13-year fight

That sound coming from Grand Island was a sigh of relief.

The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday refused to reinstate the Seneca Nation of Indians' claim over the properties of 18,000 residents, ending a 13-year fight that had many residents fearing that they would be forced from their homes.

"Is it finally over?" said Liz AuClair-Smith, who has lived on Love Road for 36 years. "I'm delighted. It's been quite a burden to have that hanging over our heads - whether to sell or to stay. You wouldn't get your price."

"This lawsuit was mischief-making that somebody took seriously and that got entirely out of hand," said Douglas M. Smith, who has lived on Hennepin Road since 1967. "I agree that we have probably given the Indians a bad deal from the beginning. But to try to find a loophole from 250 years ago?"

The Senecas sued in 1993 to "recover" Grand Island and about 40 other islands in the Niagara River, claiming they had been illegally taken in an 1815 treaty with New York State.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Arcara ruled in 2002 that the Senecas had never lived on the islands and, if they had any right to them, had negotiated them away before 1815. His ruling was upheld by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in September.

Town Supervisor Peter McMahon applauded Monday's refusal by the Supreme Court to hear the Senecas' last appeal.

"There's no higher court," he said, "so it's over."

McMahon said he found it interesting that the U.S. Justice Department, whose intervention on the Senecas' behalf enabled them to sue in the first place, filed a last-minute brief contending that the appeal had no merit.

But Joseph F. Crangle, who represented the Seneca Nation when the case was filed, said: "I'm disappointed. There is no question that the treaty [of 1815] included islands in the Niagara River, and I think Grand Island is in the Niagara River. This is a good example of how people can rewrite history."

John Blanton, a senior from Grand Island High School, was told the news at Town Hall.

"I was very young when the suit started," he said. "I have very mixed feelings. Being a resident of Grand Island, I have to say they really don't own it. My grandparents were somewhat afraid they were going to lose their house. But I can see the Indians were here [in Western New York] first."

Jim Tomkins, president of the Quality Quest Coalition in Grand Island, an environmental group, said he had ambivalent feelings about the case.

"Historically, the Indians have gotten the short end of the stick for a very long time," said Tomkins, who has lived on West River Road for 44 years. "But from a selfish point of view, if I were trying to sell my property I'd have had a lot different attitude."

When the Senecas filed their land claim in 1993, they said they intended to reclaim all 18,660 acres of Grand Island and evict more than 6,000 homeowners. Later, in some of their public remarks about the case, Seneca leaders softened their stance, saying they had no intention of forcing residents out of their homes.

During settlement talks in 2000, Seneca officials indicated they hoped to receive more than $176 million from the state and federal governments to drop the Grand Island lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0032433

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

$2.75 Million Is Poured Into War On Gangs (CLPD)

By Mike Tobin, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, June 7, 2006

Greater Cleveland will get $2.75 million from the Justice Department to help fight street gangs, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday during a visit to the area.

"Obviously, the fact that Cleveland was selected shows there is a gang problem," Gonzales said during a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse downtown.

Most of the money - $2.5 million - will be spent in Cleveland over three years and focus on prevention, law enforcement and prison re-entry. A committee focused on the gang problem will determine by autumn exactly how the money will be spent.

An additional $250,000 will pay for six suburban police officers to work in schools. The officers will help oversee projects to keep students out of gangs. Chagrin Falls, East Cleveland, Parma and Warrensville Heights were selected for the Gang Resistance Education and Training grants.

"It gives the children a law enforcement officer they can call 24/7," said U.S. Marshal Peter Elliot, whose office started the program in Greater Cleveland. "It helps break down stereotypes and distrust of law enforcement."

In Cleveland, more than 90 gangs are involved in drug dealing and street violence. The gangs are no longer nationally organized, like the Crips and Bloods.

Instead, they are looser groups of kids hanging on the streets, according to the Cleveland Unified Gang Task Force.

Cleveland was selected for the money along with Los Angeles, Milwaukee, Tampa, Dallas and the corridor in Pennsylvania between Lancaster and Easton.

Gonzalez said those cities were chosen because the government felt the money would have the most impact there.

"These are gangs who are involved in very serious crime," Gonzales said. "They are robbing our youth of productive futures."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said law enforcement, community and church groups will meet over the summer to determine how to best spend the money.

That includes determining which neighborhoods to target for enforcement.

"We'll be assessing where there is the greatest problem and where we can make the greatest impact," Morford said.

But keeping kids from joining gangs, and helping former members avoid the gangs after getting out of prison, will also be a focus.

"If done right, this could have an incredible impact on the community," Morford said.

To reach this Plain Dealer reporter:

mtobin@plaind.com, 216-999-4128

Santa Rosa Hells Angels Leader Surrenders To FBI (KPIX-TV)

KPIX-TV, June 7, 2006

(CBS 5) SANTA ROSA The leader of the Santa Rosa Hells Angels motorcycle club chapter turned himself into the FBI Tuesday and was placed under arrest for suspicion of drug possession and distribution, officials said.

Federal agents had been searching for 42-year-old Raymond Foakes since last week when law enforcement officers raided six locations around Santa Rosa, including the Hells Angels headquarters there, as part of an ongoing drug probe.

Foakes was previously arrested in 2003 in connection with a violent confrontation between members of the Hells Angels and Mongols motorcycle club at Harrah's Casino in Laughlin, Nevada in 2002.

He was one of 42 Hells Angels members indicted in the United States District Court in Las Vegas on federal racketeering and firearms charges.

Up until Tuesday's arrest, Foakes had been free on bond pending a September trial on the Nevada charges.

DOJ_NMG_0032434

News In Brief From California's North Coast (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, June 7, 2006

SANTA ROSA, Calif. - The president of the Sonoma County chapter of the Hells Angels who was wanted on federal drug charges turned himself into authorities in San Francisco on Tuesday, an FBI spokeswoman said.

Raymond Michael Foakes, 42, had been sought since Friday when federal agents and local officers raided his home and the motorcycle group's clubhouse. He was wanted under a sealed federal warrant alleging illegal possession and distribution of drugs.

Foakes was arrested in 2003 in connection with a violent confrontation between members of the Hells Angels and Mongols motorcycle club at Harrah's Casino in Laughlin, Nev., in April 2002.

Another Hells Angels associate, Michael Vargas, remained at large Tuesday, FBI spokeswoman LaRae Quy said.

Camden Man Sentenced In Drug/murder Operation Case (CAMCP)

Camden Courier Post, June 7, 2006

Bernard Murray of Camden, convicted almost exactly a year ago for his participation in a large-scale drug operation that relied on murder as an enforcement tool, was sentenced today to life plus 85 years in a federal prison.

Representatives of three murder victims spoke at the sentencing hearing, asking for a harsh term for Murray, 29.

In response, U.S. District Judge Robert B. Kugler told them, "I can't solve the problems of Camden, nor can this court. But I will make sure you're safe from people like Murray."

The sentence is the longest that court officials could recall.

According to testimony at the eight-week trial last May and June, Murray and his co-defendants were involved in the killing of Rutgers-Camden student Hiram Rosa in February 2000.

Murray also was a participant in the March 2001 slaying of Kenneth Allen, an associate of their drug operation, and the October 2001 killing of Troy James.

One of the cooperating defendants in the criminal investigation, Enrique Perez, is to be sentenced by Kugler later today.

2 Drug Ring Leaders Sentenced (WPVI-TV)

WPVI-TV, June 7, 2006

Two leaders of a notorious Camden drug distribution ring were sentenced Friday.

29-year-old Bernard Murray was sentenced to life plus 85 years in federal prison on weapons and drug charges and ordered to pay a 250-thousand dollar fine.

Meanwhile, his partner, 39-year-old Enrique Perez, another leader of the gang, got 25 years in prison. He will have to pay a 20-thousand dollar fine.

Perez received a lesser sentence due to his cooperation with authorities.

Feds Hope To 'weed Out' Local Crime (NEWS14)

News 14, Charlotte, NC, June 7, 2006

The federal money will also be used to "seed" economic development in the Central Avenue corridor.

CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- The U.S. Justice Department is committing about $1 million to revitalize a crime-ridden area of east Charlotte.

It is partnering with local businesses and the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Police Department to implement the “Weed and Seed” program in the Central Avenue corridor.

The money will pay for community and faith-based initiatives that are designed to “weed out” crime, gangs and drugs while “seeding” economic development.

The Central Avenue corridor is one of more than 300 "Weed and Seed" sites in the country.

"We're going to measure success if we see a decline of truancy in the schools,” U.S. Attorney Gretchen Shappert said Tuesday. “We’re going to measure success if we see a decrease in gang activity. We’re going to measure success if we see increased economic development."

DOJ_NMG_0032435

The Central Avenue corridor is one of more than 300 “Weed and Seed” sites in the country.

“I hear a lot of people talking about they don’t feel like it’s as safe as it used to be,” one local resident said.

Authorities hope the new program will help change that perception.

Guns, Drugs Are Seized In Reaids (TTNJ)

By Michael Ratcliffe

Trenton Times, June 6, 2006

Guns, ammunition and drugs were seized and three men were arrested on related charges when authorities raided three residences in Trenton and Hamilton on Sunday night, city police announced yesterday.

Those arrested were identified by police as Deon Williams, 29, James McCrary, 28, and Randal Williams, 44-year-old uncle to Deon Williams.

The raids on Indiana Avenue and Washington Street in Trenton and East State Street in Hamilton were the result of a three-month investigation by Trenton detectives, the Mercer County Prosecutor's Office and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, police said.

Police said the probe began after neighborhood residents tipped authorities to a suspected drug distribution ring operating from the three residences.

Raids were conducted simultaneously about 9:40 p.m. Sunday by federal agents, state troopers and law enforcement officials from throughout Mercer County, police said.

Randal Williams was arrested after officers found a loaded Smith & Wesson .40 caliber pistol, a loaded .25 caliber Beretta pistol, .25 caliber hollow-point ammunition and a large amount of other types of ammunition in a house in the 1600 block of East State Street, police said. In addition to the weapons and ammunition, $150 cash and a sport utility vehicle were seized by authorities, police said.

Police said Deon Williams and McCrary were arrested during the raid of a house in the 1300 block of Indiana Avenue. Officers seized from that home 30 grams of crack cocaine, $628 cash, a digital scale and an SUV, police said.

The raid of a second-floor apartment on Washington Street yielded no arrests but did result in the seizure of a sawed-off shotgun, police said.

Deon Williams is on federal parole and faces a minimum of three years in federal prison for his parole violation alone, said Detective Capt. Carlo Orsini, commander of Trenton police's Special Operations Bureau.

1,000-plus Doses Netted In City Sweep (PPG)

By Jonathan D. Silver, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 6, 2006

Pittsburgh police have confiscated more than 1,000 packets of the type of fentanyl-laced heroin suspected of causing up to six overdose deaths in Allegheny County since Sunday, but it was unclear how much of a dent the seizure would put in the supply on the street.

During a news conference yesterday, police revealed few details about their activities -- including a large bust Monday in Hazelwood that netted 1,050 stamp bags of the deadly brand of heroin marked "Get High or Die Trying" -- but said a dramatic slowdown since Monday evening in 911 calls for heroin overdoses might be related.

However, some investigators believe the confiscation of 1,131 stamp bags overall of the potent heroin and two other types that have appeared in recent days might represent only a drop in the bucket of the lethal supply.

Despite the seizures, the street price remains at $10 to $15 a stamp bag, which could indicate that the amount of "Get High or Die Trying" available in Pittsburgh has not dried up.

With intense police scrutiny in Hazelwood and the Hill District, where the heroin has been concentrated, dealers are going underground, making it a bit more complicated for users to score their next fix.

Authorities cannot be certain that any deaths this week are related to overdoses of heroin until toxicology tests are completed to show the presence of drugs in the blood. That process could take weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0032436

However, based on circumstances, it is believed that at least five fatalities among more than 40 people who have overdosed in Allegheny County since Sunday are related to a batch of heroin that police first became aware of Friday.

On Sunday, Joseph Zielinski, 45, of Penn Hills, was found dead in his Greenfield apartment. The next morning, Lynn A. Margavo, 30, was found dead in her home in the 5200 block of Gertrude Street in Hazelwood. An hour later, Dorothy Iannone, 56, of the 5100 block of Roma Way, also in Hazelwood, was found dead.

Yesterday at 12:25 a.m., Diane Pless, 20, of the 4700 block of Centre Avenue in Oakland was found dead by her boyfriend in her apartment. And at 1:20 a.m., Lawrence Jordan, 48, of Ravine Street in Munhall was pronounced dead in his bathroom after being discovered by his girlfriend.

In Mr. Jordan's case, investigators recovered a stamp bag. The name of the brand was unreadable, but it was in red ink, a hallmark of how "Get High or Die Trying" is packaged.

A sixth death in Aspinwall from yesterday was being looked at in connection with the heroin overdoses, but the Allegheny County Police are not convinced the case is linked.

The county's crime lab has concluded that fentanyl -- a painkiller 80 times stronger than morphine -- was present in one sample of "Get High or Die Trying." A sample of another brand called "Dynasty" also linked to recent overdoses tested positive only for heroin, said Dr. Frederick Fochtman, the county's chief toxicologist.

A third brand of heroin has come up in the investigation of the overdoses, but narcotics Cmdr. Maurita Bryant would not name it.

Police yesterday revised the number of suspected heroin overdoses being investigated. As of yesterday afternoon, there were 33 in the city and nine in the rest of Allegheny County. Two more possible cases emerged late yesterday. One involved an inmate at the intake area of the county jail yesterday afternoon. Last night, around 11 p.m., police and paramedics responded to an apartment in the 5700 block of Phillips Avenue in Squirrel Hill for a reported overdose. A white male in his 20s was taken to Mercy Hospital where he was expected to recover, paramedics said.

Overdose cases spreading

Non-fatal overdoses possibly connected to the laced heroin continued to spread to additional communities outside the city, including Clairton, Mt. Oliver and West Homestead. All the victims have been white and between 16 and 56 years old.

In the West Homestead case, a 20-year-old man from Castle Shannon was found Monday at 2:15 a.m. after shooting up in his car in a KFC parking lot on Eighth Avenue, West Homestead police Chief Christopher Deasy said.

The man was hospitalized, and two stamp bags were found. A woman in the car said the heroin was bought in Homestead, Chief Deasy said.

Homestead police Chief Jeff DeSimone said his officers have not encountered any overdose victims from the batch of heroin making the rounds -- yet.

"We're keeping our fingers crossed," Chief DeSimone said. But, he added, "It's kind of inevitable."

Dr. David Murray, senior policy analyst with the Office of National Drug Control Policy in Washington, said the fentanyl-laced heroin has turned up in eight states and caused between 150 to 350 deaths nationwide.

He said the pattern of deaths, which started in Chicago and Philadelphia, is following known routes of heroin distribution.

The drugs flow into major cities like Chicago, which become hubs, and then trail out to smaller cites like spokes on bicycle wheels.

Dr. Murray said it would be hard to say what effect the closing of a drug lab in Mexico, which might be the source of the fentanyl, would have on the current overdose outbreak.

"We are trying to put out as much of a public health alert out there that says 'look there is something very risky out there,' " said Dr. Murray.

Fentanyl side effects

One of the side effects of fentanyl is that the body's muscles often instantaneously stiffen when it is injected into the bloodstream.

"It is so rapid acting that the addict is often found dead with the needle still stuck in their arm," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0032437

Tom McElree, director of the regional Emergency Medical Services Institute, an agency that provides training and other services to emergency medical services in 10 counties in southwestern Pennsylvania, said the Pennsylvania Department of Health received a notice April 25 of "opioid" overdoses that had occurred that month in New Jersey.

Those overdoses involved some heroin and a mixture of fentanyl or methylfentanyl and procaine, a version of the anesthetic lidocaine.

He said his office is working to get a handle on overdoses in the region and statewide so it can help paramedics and emergency service professionals react properly to the outbreak.

Pittsburgh narcotics and homicide detectives on Saturday launched a joint investigation of the new brand of lethal heroin. Detectives are interviewing overdose survivors. Three drug dealers have been arrested, but police would not provide their names.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is also involved, but DEA Special Agent Rick McGoldrick in Philadelphia declined to provide specifics.

Although there is an awareness among drug users that "Get High or Die Trying" might prove fatal, many are enticed by the prospect of an incredible high rather than scared away by the potentially lethal consequences.

"Individuals who are addicted to heroin are actively seeking this drug," Cmdr. Bryant said. "The word is out on the street that it's pretty much the ultimate high."

Lt. Kevin Kraus said hardcore users seem to be shrugging off efforts to steer them away from the powerful heroin.

"It doesn't seem that any warning is successful at all," Lt. Kraus said. "It's a very addictive drug, and it's in great demand right now."

Heroin addicts often lose the ability to get high on their normal doses and long for the euphoria that first drew them in. The increased potency of the fentanyl-laced heroin is nearly irresistible for serious users, who need more and more of the drug to satisfy their addiction and avoid pain, said Dr. Neil Capretto, medical director of Gateway Rehabilitation Center.

"They're looking for a stronger effect," he said. "Many people say, 'I started using to get high, and now I use to get by.' "

Even after they are treated for an overdose, users will often immediately return to the drug and even overdose again, trying to alleviate the withdrawal symptoms caused by reversal agents.

"It feels like the worse case of the flu you've ever had, times 10," Dr. Capretto said of withdrawal. "It's like having your head in a vise and knives in your stomach."

People who elect to use the new heroin are essentially playing Russian roulette, Dr. Capretto said, because it is impossible to determine whether the heroin has been laced with anything and how strong the drug will be.

"Addiction is not logical," said Dr. Capretto. "People will keep using. They say, 'I know I'll lose my job, my wife, my family, but I just can't stop.'"

Killer Heroin Coursed Through Philadelphia, Too (PPG)

By Bill Toland, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 6, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- In mid-April, dealers dropped shipments of additive-laced heroin on Philadelphia's streets. They might as well have dropped a bomb.

At least eight people were dead of overdoses by April 22, a Saturday night. The next day, city police arranged a news conference to warn users about the killer batch, a haphazard mix of heroin and fentanyl, a powerful painkiller that is like morphine, only many times stronger.

"We wrestled long and hard whether to go on TV," said police Capt. Len Ditchkofsky, head of the city's east division, epicenter for the outbreak. Announcing the existence of heroin so strong that it was killing the people who used it might well serve as free advertising for dealers.

But in the end, "we had a legal and moral obligation to let people know," Capt. Ditchkofsky said.

So police told users to stay away from the Kensington and Port Richmond neighborhoods, northeast of the city center. What came next was a lesson in junkie behavior. Users flocked to the area, buying up the $10 doses. They came from the city, and they came from the suburbs.

DOJ_NMG_0032438

And, in the process, they may have given Pittsburgh a preview of what to expect over the coming days and weeks, as the lethal drug mixture spreads among dealers and users, propelled by the buzz that accompanies sensational overdose deaths and news reports.

"It just brought them down here in droves," the captain said. "They just started dropping like flies ... you're not dealing with normal people here."

Within a month, 30 people in Philadelphia and Camden County, N.J. -- just across the river from Philadelphia -- had been claimed by the potent cocktail. Hundreds more were admitted to hospitals with overdoses, and who knows how many recovered from their overdoses without the benefit of medical treatment.

In the days that followed the news conference, police and federal investigators moved to simultaneously trace and stop the flow. First, they focused on a single strain of the heroin, which came in bags marked "Fefe." Confiscate that strain, and they'd stop some of the flow, they hoped.

But within a week or so, it was apparent that lots of street brands were mixed with fentanyl (and in some cases, investigators now believe, doses contained no heroin at all, just fentanyl).

In the Philadelphia and South Jersey region, "fefe" was complemented by bags labeled "flatline," "exorcist" and "al capone," references to the packages' dangerous contents. In Harrisburg and elsewhere, the bags were labeled "apollo."

It wasn't one dealer, one brand name or one shipment. "It was the whole supply" line, from Chicago to Philadelphia, said Capt. Ditchkofsky.

When an entire supply line is affected, it takes a while for the drugs to run their course. Philadelphia's outbreak began in mid-April, and two months later, straggler doses are probably still on the street, despite a $250,000 seizure that took a half-pound of heroin out of the supply chain. A half-pound, when divided into individual doses, translates into 25,000 packets.

"There's so many ways that heroin can come into a major city like Philadelphia. Same as Pittsburgh," said Capt. Chris Werner, head of Philadelphia's narcotics field unit. "It would be almost impossible to identify one main source of that particular drug."

If they could do it over again, Philadelphia police would have carried out their "moral obligation" by notifying the public that deadly heroin was on the streets, but would have purposely omitted the parts of the city where it was selling. In the same week, Chicago learned the same lesson -- police canvassed the neighborhoods where the heroin was being sold and where overdoses had occurred, passing out informational pamphlets that were supposed to scare away buyers.

But instead of following police advice, addicts followed the heroin to its source.

"What heroin users are looking for is that high that they got when they first used heroin," Capt. Werner said. "But it's almost impossible to find. So they look for stronger types of heroin."

And heroin so strong that it kills -- even if it's the additive that's providing the deadly strength -- is irresistible to some addicts.

Users sought out by The Philadelphia Inquirer confirmed the odd allure. One user told the paper: "If people die, other people think the heroin is good." An addict recovering at a treatment center in Camden told the paper that the deaths are the best kind of advertising. "It's like saying, 'We got the good stuff that's really kicking.'"

"It's a very panicky situation," said Oscar Hernandez, an administrator at My Brother's Keeper, a homeless shelter and drug treatment clinic in Camden. Longtime users can go through eight, 10, even a dozen doses a day, and any one of them could be the high that kills.

But even as longtime addicts seek more intense highs, others are frightened by it. "In the midst of that, there's people that want to get out, want to seek recovery," Mr. Hernandez said. "They said, '100 people are dead, I want to get out ... That's a good time to take the opportunity to reach out."

In Camden, a spokesman for the county prosecutor's office said that some users were scared away when they learned the source of the heroin's potency. Pure heroin is one thing, but an unknown mixture can be scary, even for longtime users.

"I think when word started getting around that there was fentanyl laced into this stuff, people started to realize that it wasn't just really good heroin," said Bill Shralow.

Another way to combat the scourge, at least on the distribution end, is by tacking new penalties onto typical drug charges for anyone caught dealing the more potent mix.

DOJ_NMG_0032439

Philadelphia police threatened dealers with charges of attempted murder, reckless endangerment and risking a catastrophe, in addition to possession and distribution charges. So far, they have yet to make good on that threat, a police spokeswoman said. In Camden, the prosecutor has the ability to charge dealers with a first-degree homicide felony if one of the buyers ends up dead.

But of the eight heroin deaths reported in South Jersey from April 14 until the end of May, none could be traced to a specific dealer.

Camden was caught off guard by the two-week spike in fentanyl-heroin overdoses, unaware of January and February deaths in Chicago. But Pittsburgh, months behind the other outbreaks, can observe the mistakes and successes other cities experienced in dealing with the drug.

And yet it might not matter. Undercover buys, dealer arrests and media publicity about the dangers of the shipment go only so far. If users are warned against a certain label and those warnings begin to hurt sales, dealers with excess stock can easily repackage the heroin and stamp it with a different street name.

So Pittsburgh might have to wait for the bad heroin to flush its way out of the drug pipeline, just as Philadelphia and Camden did. The good, if obvious, news: Eventually, the highly potent supply will be used up. What isn't used in its most potent form will be cut and diluted by lower-level dealers, rendering the heroin -- though still dangerous -- less deadly.

Philadelphia's overdose numbers leveled off by the end of May, and Camden, following the two-week spike, is now seeing normal levels of heroin overdoses -- one every week or so.

Police Claim Bust Slows Heroin Flow (PTR)

By Jill King Greenwood

Pittsburgh Tribune Review, June 7, 2006

Pittsburgh police seized 21 bricks of fentanyl-laced heroin, putting a "serious dent" in the flow of the concoction that city detectives Tuesday blamed for six deaths in Allegheny County.

The seizure Monday night represented about 1,050 of the 1,131 stamp bags marked with "Get high or die trying" seized since the drug surfaced in the city on Friday.

City detectives said four people have died in the city, one in Aspinwall and one in Munhall. Thirty-seven others have overdosed but survived -- including one yesterday in the county jail.

"There's no doubt that seizure (of drugs) probably helped save some lives and prevent overdoses," city police Cmdr. Maurita Bryant said. "That's our goal here."

Police have been working around the clock to find out how large quantities of the drug wound up in Hazelwood, which they believe is the center of the crisis.

"We have detectives working 18- to 20-hour shifts, going home for three or four hours of sleep and then coming back," said city police Lt. Kevin Kraus "It's extremely draining, but we're continuing to run on full tilt."

Narcotics and vice detectives seized the 21 bricks -- each containing 50 stamp bags of the drug -- from someone in Hazelwood. Authorities wouldn't identify those who have been arrested -- both users and dealers -- as they pressure those suspects for information about the source of the drugs, which investigators say likely came from New York City.

Bryant said the increasing police presence in Hazelwood has run some of the drug dealers underground.

"They're not as visible, out on the street, like they were before," she said. "Now it seems to be that if you want some of this heroin, you have to make a phone call and meet somewhere."

Kraus said medical calls for overdose victims have decreased significantly since Monday.

Police are being tight-lipped about their investigation -- refusing to say specifically where each of the city and county overdoses occurred -- other than to note that several city neighborhoods from the North Side to Greenfield have been affected.

Three people died of suspected drug overdoses yesterday, and the Allegheny County Medical Examiner's Office is trying to determine if the same batch of heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl is responsible.

Diane Pless, 20, was pronounced dead shortly after midnight in her Shadyside apartment. Lawrence Jordan, 48, was found dead shortly after 1 a.m. in his Munhall home. Harold Bradley, 50, died at 2:30 a.m. at his home in Aspinwall.

DOJ_NMG_0032440

The three who died earlier in the week were Dorothy Iannone, 56, of Hazelwood, an ex-waitress; Joseph Zielinski, 45, of Verona, an electrician; and Lynn Morgavo, 30, of Greenfield, who had a history of arrests for drug possession and distribution.

Residue or stamp bags, some without lettering, were found near five of the victims; Bradley had a history of heroin and alcohol abuse.

Betty Zielinski said her son battled a drug problem for years, but she was still shocked when she learned of his overdose.

"I didn't even know he was shooting up," she said.

Her son, who grew up in Greenfield and Squirrel Hill and attended Minadeo Elementary School and Taylor Allderdice High School, began smoking marijuana around age 12, she said.

"As long as he was on drugs, he was in a good mood," she said. "He told me before that he didn't even like to work unless he was on drugs."

Mary Jean Tudi, who lived across the street from the Zielinskis in Greenfield, said she knew Joseph Zielinski had drug problems but that he posed no problems.

"When you think of drug addicts, you think of them hitting people up for money," she said. "He wasn't like that. He was quiet and didn't bother anyone. It's really sad and I feel so bad for his mother."

Jordan was on disability, having suffered three heart attacks since age 26, and struggled with his addiction for years, said his girlfriend, Diane Pristas.

"He would give you the shirt off his back if you needed it. If you needed a place to stay, there was always a spare cot in the house," Pristas said.

Ruth Seybold, 60, of Hazelwood, recounted a phone call she received one day from Iannone.

"I don't know what to do," Iannone told her. "I just want to die."

Heroin Overdoses Decline, New Problem Arises (KDKA)

By Ralph Iannotti

KDKA-TV, June 7, 2006

(KDKA) PITTSBURGH Pittsburgh police say in the past 24 hours, there's been a significant decline in the number heroin overdose cases being reported.

But, now, there's another problem.

Addicts are now purposely seeking out the deadly drug laced with the pain killer Fentanyl.

They want to try it, despite its potential to be lethal.

Meanwhile, police continue to search for the supplier of the drug that has flooded several Pittsburgh neighborhoods.

One of the latest heroin overdoses was at the Allegheny County Jail.

Pittsburgh police say a prisoner in the jail's intake area showed signs of an overdose and was taken to a hospital for treatment.

According to police, investigators believe the inmate somehow got a dose of the "get high, or die trying" heroin.

Hours earlier, police were called to the Centre Tower Apartments in Oakland where 20-year old Diane Pless died from a heroin overdose.

Pless was one of three heroin overdose victims on Tuesday: 49-year old Lawrence Jordan died of an overdose in Munhall; and 50-year old Harold Bradley was found dead in Aspinwall -- heroin was again the suspected killer.

Overall, police say the reports of overdoses have declined.

However, now there's another potential danger.

“A problem that we're having, that we're noticing, is that individuals who are addicted to heroin are actively seeking this drug,” said Commander Maurita Bryant of the Pittsburgh Police. “Word on the street is that it's pretty much the ultimate high, and we have individuals coming in, actually looking for it.”

Nearly 20 city and suburban neighborhoods have reported the potent heroin overdoses.

Police believe there have been six deaths related to the drug: two in Hazelwood and one each in Greenfield, Oakland, Munhall, and what police call a suspected heroin overdose death in Aspinwall.

DOJ_NMG_0032441

A seizure of 21 bricks of heroin by the city narcotics unit may ultimately be cutting down on the overdose numbers.

There's little doubt this investigation is taking a toll on police.

"We've had detectives working 18 or 20 hour shifts," said Lt. Kevin Kraus of the Pittsburgh Police. "They would come back after three or four hours sleep. We're trying to combine resources, from other detective squads in the investigation branch."

Those 21 bricks of heroin seized by police break down into more than 1,000 individual $10 or $15 "get high or die trying" stamp bags.

A news conference has been scheduled for Wednesday by U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan.

She'll be joined by a DEA official, and Pittsburgh's mayor and police chief.

More Victims Added To Heroin OD Tally (KDKA)

KDKA-TV, June 6, 2006

(KDKA) PITTSBURGH The fourth reported death from a heroin overdose happened in the Oakland section of the city late last night.

A deadly batch of heroin first surfaced over the weekend and has claimed another life and affected dozens of victims.

Four fatalities have been reported among 36 total overdoses - 31 in the city and five outside of the city.

Just after midnight, police were called to an apartment building in the 4700-block of Centre Avenue in Oakland. It was described as another DOA from a drug overdose.

It was the fourth person to die since Saturday in connection with the heroin likely to be laced with the potent painkiller fentanyl.

Police were called to another drug overdose early Tuesday morning at a home on Eleanor Street on the South Side.

The person survived and was taken to South Side hospital for treatment. Police say they found some drugs inside the home.

City police commander Tom Stangrecki says he expects things could get worse before they get better.

"We believe this heroin has been distributed to other dealers in the area," Commander Stangrecki said. "It's going to take more than one arrest to stop this. Until the supply runs out, we may see more over doses."

Allegheny County authorities say a potent form heroin is to blame for more deaths and overdoses in and around Pittsburgh.

Police commander Tom Stangrecki says until the supply runs out, there may be more overdoses.

Police are arresting dealers as they try to find the source of the heroin.

Detroit, Philadelphia, Harrisburg, Chicago and other cities have all seen drug users die from heroin combined with fentanyl, which is considered 80 times more powerful than morphine.

Authorities have confirmed more than 100 deaths because of the fentanyl-laced drugs.

There will be a press briefing at 3:30 pm today.

Names Can Help End Drug Plague (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, June 7, 2006

Wayne County has a plague on its hands, but county officials are inexplicably refusing to identify its victims.

About 60 people have succumbed since mid-May to a deadly cocktail of heroin and fentanyl, a pain-killing drug developed for cancer patients. The Detroit area has by far the most deaths from this mix of any place in the country. Federal, state and local medical and law enforcement officials have been assembled in Detroit for weeks trying to find the source of the drugs. Public warnings have been issued, but the deaths continue. Yet authorities have not responded to a Free Press request for the names of the victims, other than to ask for more time.

If there is not a master list of the victims, the sleuths charged with tracing the drugs are not doing a very good job, since the list would be the basis for finding commonalities that might lead someplace. If there is a list, keeping it secret serves no useful purpose. Someone might know something about one or more of the victims -- relatives, suspicious acquaintances, usual hangouts -- that could be a lead for investigators.

Beyond that, keeping the victims anonymous serves only to minimize the impact of this epidemic. It makes people care less when they know only that drug users are dying -- nameless, faceless people who made bad choices and were probably a burden.

DOJ_NMG_0032442

The truth is, each of these victims was someone's son or daughter and very likely had friends and family who tried at some point to stop their slide into the hell of addiction. Some kin may not even know of a death; others may have some useful information for police.

The county has no legal basis for withholding the names. It is well-settled law in Michigan that autopsy results are public information. It is well-established investigative procedure that an informed public can be an important source of information. Wayne County is doing a disservice to the public and to the victims of this scourge by failing to release fundamental information about a mounting crisis.

Office Denies Approving Documents' Release (BSUN)

By Michael Dresser, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, June 7, 2006

The Maryland attorney general's office is denying an assertion that Maryland Transportation Authority Police Chief Gary W. McLhinney received the approval of state lawyers before releasing sensitive security information last month.

The documents McLhinney released included the names of Secret Service agents and other security officers providing executive protection to state and federal officials and their families - details government agencies generally resist disclosing.

The statement that McLhinney had acted on the advice of state lawyers came in an e-mail from another state transportation department law enforcement officer, Maryland Transit Administration Police Chief Douglas DeLeaver, to The Sun's public editor. In it, DeLeaver defended McLhinney, who on May 16 released the documents to the media - an action that was the subject of a May 28 article in The Sun.

DeLeaver wrote: "The Maryland Attorney General's Office reviewed and approved the dissemination of the documents before the release."

But Kevin Enright, a spokesman for Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., denied that McLhinney sought state lawyers' advice.

"If Chief DeLeaver is under the impression that this Office approved Chief McLhinney's document dissemination to The Sun and other news organizations on May 16, he is mistaken," Enright wrote. "As the custodian of the records, Chief McLhinney elected to produce the documents with the knowledge that we did not have the opportunity to perform more than a cursory review and despite our concerns about their contents. That was his right."

DeLeaver and state Transportation Secretary Robert L. Flanagan were at conferences out of the country and did not return calls. McLhinney did not return a call seeking his comment. But Trent Kittleman, executive secretary of the Maryland Transportation Authority, dismissed the matter as "a dead issue."

McLhinney released the documents at a news conference he called to criticize a reporter who sought to speak with one of his officers on an executive protective detail at Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport.

The Sun had filed a public records request as part of an investigation of the Transportation Authority Police practice of providing armed escorts for celebrities passing through BWI, an unusual perk at a major U.S. airport.

In his e-mail, DeLeaver criticized The Sun for failing to mention in its May 28 article that "the Maryland Public Information Act requires Chief McLhinney to release the requested documents."

The Sun's request stated that it was seeking forms detailing police escorts to "private citizens (non-government employees)." Nevertheless, McLhinney released 305 pages that included details of travel through BWI by U.S. Cabinet secretaries, National Security Agency and Drug Enforcement Administration officials and other officials.

"The Public Information Act does not require the release of records that are not requested or that are excluded from a request," Enright said.

In many cases, the documents show signs that they were not fully reviewed before release. In some cases, information is redacted on one document but disclosed on another. On some, material that is usually withheld - such as cell phone numbers and license plate numbers of cars transporting a protected person - is disclosed.

DOJ_NMG_0032443

In the May 28 article, experts on executive protection and law enforcement criticized McLhinney for what they called a security violation and a breach of the trust between law enforcement agencies. The Transportation Security Administration said he had not broken federal law by releasing its forms.

Stidham Deposition May Help Schwartz (TC)

By A.J. FLICK

Tucson (AZ) Citizen, June 6, 2006

One week after being sentenced to life in prison and having his medical license yanked, Bradley Alan Schwartz was expected in court today for the start of a malpractice trial.

Among the evidence expected to be presented are words from the man Schwartz was convicted of conspiring to kill, Dr. Brian Stidham.

Stidham told attorneys in a deposition that he never saw Schwartz act as if he were impaired by drugs, said Schwartz's civil attorney, Tom Slutes.

"Dr. Stidham almost never saw Dr. Schwartz," said attorney Thomas Zlaket, who represents the family suing Schwartz.

Stidham went to work for Schwartz in October 2001, shortly before Schwartz stopped taking prescription drugs, Zlaket said.

Schwartz, 41, was convicted May 2 of conspiracy to commit first-degree murder in the Oct. 5, 2004, stabbing death of Stidham.

Prosecutors say Schwartz hired Ronald Bruce Bigger, 40, to kill Stidham, 37, over professional jealousy. Bigger has yet to be tried.

Pima County Superior Court Judge Michael Alfred on Monday refused Slutes' request to move the malpractice trial out of town.

Alfred also ruled that Zlaket may introduce testimony and evidence that Schwartz was indicted in federal court for writing illegal prescriptions for Vicodin and Ritalin.

Laurie Espinoza, Schwartz's former office manager, is expected to say that Schwartz appeared drugged at the time he operated on Garrett Hoxie, then a high school student, in November 2001. Espinoza says Schwartz didn't kick his drug habit until early 2002, after learning that the Drug Enforcement Administration was investigating him.

Espinoza was listed as a witness for both the prosecution and defense in Schwartz's criminal trial, but neither called her to the stand.

Slutes said Schwartz kicked his drug habit in September 2001 after he had treatment that relieved the pain for which he self-prescribed Vicodin. He also self-prescribed Ritalin, a stimulant.

After Schwartz was indicted, Slutes said, Espinoza embezzled from his practice. Schwartz's wife, Joan, caught the embezzlement and sued her.

Espinoza settled the case before it went to trial, he said.

Slutes said Schwartz may testify, depending on how the trial goes.

A week ago, Judge Nanette Warner sentenced Schwartz to life in prison with the possibility of parole after 25 years.

Jurors deadlocked on a first-degree murder charge. Warner dismissed the charge without prejudice, meaning prosecutors can refile it.

Schwartz's criminal attorney, Brick P. Storts III, is asking the Arizona Court of Appeals to force Warner either to drop the charge permanently or retry Schwartz immediately on the murder charge.

Another malpractice suit against Schwartz is set for trial in October.

Feds Search House Of Arizona Reliever (AP)

AP, June 7, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Federal investigators searched Arizona Diamondbacks reliever Jason Grimsley's house Tuesday as part of their investigation of steroid use in baseball.

Thirteen agents searched Grimsley's house in Scottsdale, Ariz., for six hours, according to Internal Revenue Service Agent Mark Lessler, who would not say what they found.

In seeking a judge's permission for the search, investigators who cracked the BALCO steroid scandal here said Grimsley initially cooperated in the probe. He withdrew his assistance in April, but not before he allegedly made "extensive statements" about illegal drug use, "for the purpose of performance enhancement," according to the court documents.

IRS Agent Jeff Novitsky told the federal judge that investigators wanted to search the right-hander's house for "any and all records showing contact or relationship with any and all amateur or professional athletes, athletic coaches or athletic trainers" regarding illicit drug use and purchases.

According to Novitsky, Grimsley told him the names of other players he believed were using, but the names of those players were blacked out of the court records.

"I have no comment about that and no idea about that," Grimsley told the Arizona Republic on Tuesday, hours before the Diamondbacks played the Philadelphia Phillies.

Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick said in a statement the team learned of "this situation late this afternoon," but declined further comment.

Grimsley began his big league career with Philadelphia in 1989 and has pitched for Cleveland, California, the New York Yankees, Kansas City, Baltimore and Arizona. He has a career record of 42-58 with a 4.77 ERA.

According to court documents, Grimsley failed a league drug test in 2003. Authorities said when he was cooperating, he admitted to using human growth hormone, amphetamines and steroids.

He added that amphetamine use was prevalent in pro baseball, and that it was placed in coffee in clubhouses, marked "leaded" or "unleaded," Novitsky wrote.

After the BALCO investigation, Major League Baseball toughened its testing program for performance enhancing drugs and included testing for amphetamines for the first time this season.

Word of the Grimsley investigation comes nearly two months after an Illinois-based scientist prominent in the field of sports nutritional supplements pleaded guilty to supplying the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative with the performance-enhancing drug known as "the clear."

A federal grand jury in San Francisco is also investigating whether San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds lied under oath about using "the clear." A separate federal grand jury is probing who leaked Bonds' testimony from the BALCO investigation to the San Francisco Chronicle.

So far, the BALCO probe has netted guilty pleas from Illinois-based nutritional supplement scientist Patrick Arnold, BALCO president Victor Conte, Bonds' personal trainer Greg Anderson, BALCO vice president James Valente and track coach Remi Korchemny.

Diamondbacks' Grimsley Implicated In Steroids Probe (AR)

Arizona Republic, June 7, 2006

Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley admitted taking illegal performance-enhancing drugs and said that amphetamines were used "like aspirin" in major league clubhouses, according to an affidavit filed by the lead federal investigator in baseball's steroid investigation.

The affidavit, filed in U.S. District Court in Phoenix, said Grimsley agreed to cooperate with U.S. Internal Revenue Service agents after Grimsley received a package containing two kits of human growth hormone April 19 at his Scottsdale home.

The affidavit, obtained by The Arizona Republic, comes nearly four years after the IRS began its probe of BALCO, the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, near San Francisco. The original goal was to investigate a drug ring that distributed steroids and other illegal performance-enhancing drugs to elite athletes.

advertisement

Thirteen special federal agents, including 10 from the IRS, searched Grimsley's home for nearly six hours Tuesday. They were seeking performance-enhancing drugs, financial records, address books and phone records, according to Mark Lessler, an IRS special agent.

Lessler, a special agent for criminal investigation in the IRS Oakland, Calif., office, declined to say what was obtained, or why the government waited nearly seven weeks to search Grimsley's home after knowing the pitcher had been in possession of human growth hormone.

It is the first time an Arizona Diamondbacks player has been linked publicly to the scandal, which has implicated San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds, New York Yankees first baseman Jason Giambi and others.

Grimsley provided "extensive statements regarding his receipt and use of anabolic steroids, amphetamines and human growth hormone over the last several years," the affidavit said.

Grimsley also provided "details about his knowledge of other Major League Baseball players" using illegal performance-enhancing drugs, including several close acquaintances.

An hour before Tuesday night's game against Philadelphia, Grimsley told The Republic, "I have no comment about that and no idea about that."

Diamondbacks managing general partner Ken Kendrick released a statement on the matter Tuesday night, saying: "We were first informed of this situation late this afternoon. This is a federal investigation, and as long as it is active and ongoing, we are prohibited from making any further comments."

Jeff Novitzky, the IRS special agent in charge of the BALCO case, filed the affidavit, which also said agents were anticipating the shipment of human growth hormones to Grimsley's home. In a two-hour interview with federal investigators on April 19, Grimsley told investigators:

• Until last year, major league clubhouses had coffee pots labeled "leaded" and "unleaded" for the players, indicating coffee with amphetamines and without. He did not specify how many.

• Latin players were a major source for the amphetamines within baseball.

• Amphetamines also came from players on California teams that could easily go into Mexico and get them.

Names of other players he suspected of using anabolic steroids or human growth hormone were redacted from the document.

In September 2003, the IRS and Food and Drug Administration agents raided the offices of BALCO and at an off-site facility found containers labeled as steroids, testosterone and human-growth hormones, which can make athletes stronger and faster.

No professional athlete has been charged in the BALCO investigation, although Bonds and Giambi testified before a federal grand jury in 2003.

Baseball Commissioner Bud Selig this spring appointed former U.S. Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell to investigate players who were alleged to have used illegal steroids.

Mitchell's appointment came after pressure from Congress and the release this spring of Game of Shadows, a book written by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who describe how Bonds and other players used illegal performance-enhancing drugs provided by BALCO.

Until 2003, baseball didn't conduct drug tests for steroids. The following year, it began imposing penalties.

Last July, BALCO founder Victor Conte Jr, the central figure in the investigation, pleaded guilty to distributing steroids and money laundering in a plea-bargain deal. He was sentenced to four months in prison and four months of house arrest.

Three others, including Greg Anderson, Bonds' personal trainer, have negotiated deals with federal prosecutors for their roles in providing illegal performance-enhancing drugs to roughly 30 athletes.

Montel To Urge N.J. On Medical Marijuana (AP)

AP, June 7, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- Television personality Montel Williams plans to tell a New Jersey senate panel on Thursday how marijuana relieves his chronic pain caused by multiple sclerosis, and urge New Jersey lawmakers to enact medical marijuana laws, as 11 other states already have.

Williams, 49, who was diagnosed with MS seven years ago, said he turned to marijuana to relieve debilitating knee and foot pain after trying Oxycontin and a variety of other drugs to no avail.

DOJ_NMG_0032446

Williams, a registered medical marijuana user in California, said he became an activist pushing for medical marijuana laws after being stopped at a Detroit airport by an Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms officer for carrying drug paraphernalia. The charge was later dropped.

"For me, marijuana eases the pain in my feet -- on a scale of 1 to 10, brings it from a 6 down to a 4 and keeps it there -- makes it manageable so I can deal with the rest of my day," said Williams. "Why should it not be available?"

Williams also plans to speak Wednesday at a Drug Policy Alliance-sponsored news conference supporting the New Jersey Compassionate Use Medical Marijuana Act. He said he was also hoping to discuss the issue with Gov. Jon S. Corzine, though the governor's office said as of Tuesday Williams hadn't requested a meeting.

Corzine said last year that he would sign a medical marijuana bill into law.

Reiterating the administration's position Tuesday, Corzine spokesman Anthony Coley said, "All individuals should receive the best possible medical care available. If a doctor prescribes medical marijuana, we should honor his or her judgment and do what is in the best interest of the patient."

The proposal would allow certain chronically ill patients to use marijuana medicinally by smoking it, eating it or taking it in tablets. The drug would be prescribed by a doctor and the program would be monitored by the state Health Department. Under the proposal, the amount of marijuana a patient would be allowed to possess would be capped at one ounce and patients would be issued cards identifying them as registered medical marijuana users.

The bill, sponsored by state Sen. Nicholas Scutari, lists cancer, glaucoma, HIV and AIDS, wasting syndrome, chronic pain, severe nausea, seizures and persistent muscle spasms as among the conditions eligible for medical marijuana usage.

Terrence P. Farley, an Ocean County assistant prosecutor and spokesman for two state law enforcement groups, told The Associated Press last month that the bill is a veiled attempt to legalize drugs.

"This is how they're trying to get marijuana legalized," said Farley, who also is director of the county anti-narcotics force.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Confident Immigration Deal Possible (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

The AP, June 6, 2006

President Bush declared progress Tuesday in tightening the nation's southern border and pushing major immigration changes through Congress despite widespread skepticism that lawmakers can find a compromise.

The president brushed aside bitter divisions over the issue, saying the fact that there is active debate at all is cause for optimism.

"I know when you watch your television or listen to the radio, it seems like there's nothing but disagreement on immigration policy in Washington," Bush said, a blazing sun beating down on him and the barn behind him used to simulate armed encounters in Border Patrol training exercises.

"Yet there's a growing consensus among all parties and all regions of the country that fundamental reforms are needed," he said.

Bush spoke after watching trainees in the dusty heat role-play in ways to protect the U.S.-Mexico border against illegal crossings — boarding buses to check IDs, aiming pretend guns at a vehicle under suspicion, interviewing car occupants at checkpoints and scouring freight cars.

As the Border Patrol's only training ground, the 2,000-acre facility in this unforgiving corner of southeastern New Mexico has been increasingly busy. The number of agents nationwide has grown to nearly 12,000 from 9,000 at the beginning of Bush's presidency, and Bush is proposing to add another 6,000 agents by 2008.

Later Tuesday, the president took in a video surveillance operation at the Border Patrol headquarters in Laredo, Texas, also hot and dry, and a busy crossing point near Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, where warring drug cartels have been blamed for more than 140 murders this year.

DOJ_NMG_0032447

The visuals of Bush's two border-state stops focused on enforcement — a key theme as the president woos recalcitrant conservatives in his party to abandon a get-tough-only approach and support comprehensive reform. Bush says that, to be effective, any legislation should include a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants that meet certain criteria and create a new program allowing legal work permits for foreigners. He has been promoting his seriousness about stepped-up enforcement to sweeten that argument.

But the emphasis of the president's spoken message was agreement.

He claimed "widespread agreement" on broad philosophical points such as the need to better control the border and stiffen penalties on companies that hire illegal immigrants. The implication was that, as congressional negotiators prepare for difficult talks over the radically different bills passed by the House and Senate, there is more to work with than it appears.

"While the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking," Bush said.

He pressed the point again outside the Laredo headquarters. Appearing eager to dispel doubts, Bush engaged in an impromptu question-and-answer session with reporters that extended over an unusually lengthy time despite temperatures over 100 degrees.

With dozens of Border Patrol vehicles behind him, Bush said it is important for congressional negotiations to get started.

"That will give us a pretty good feel for whether or not attitudes are hardened to the point nothing can get done," he said. "I don't think so."

The president's statements belied passionate differences on Capitol Hill, where even routine matters are getting bogged down. The Senate has not yet sent its bill to the House, so that talks can begin, because of a procedural disagreement.

The House bill generally is limited to increased border enforcement, making all illegal immigrants subject to felony charges and advocating extensive fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. The Senate version includes more money for border security, but it creates a guest worker program that would legally bring in new foreign workers and provides a shot at citizenship for many already here.

Bush acknowledged the sharp divide over the status of the country's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants.

"This is the toughest part of the bill for the Congress," he said.

Bush's appearance is one of a series as he pushes his top domestic priority of the year.

"A photo-op in New Mexico won't make Republicans in Washington, D.C., support comprehensive reform," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said. "The president must convince his party to enact the comprehensive immigration reform our nation deserves."

Also while in Laredo, the former Texas governor made two unscheduled stops to mingle with locals. He shook hands outside an elementary school and pulled up to Cotulla Pit-Style Barbeque, where he greeted surprised diners in Spanish and English and bought nachos for a long table of border agents who just happened to be assembled there.

The president was spending Tuesday night in Omaha, Neb., where he planned on Wednesday to visit a community center that offers bilingual counseling, food aid, legal services and business training to immigrants.

Nation Ahead Of Congress On Immigration, Bush Says (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M. — President Bush today sought to minimize the differences that have divided the House and Senate over immigration, and said that consensus was growing across the country for changes in immigration policy, as he focused on the need for strict law enforcement in a speech to Border Patrol recruits.

"It seems like there's nothing but disagreement on immigration policy in Washington," Bush said. "Yet there's a growing consensus among all parties and all regions of the country that fundamental reforms are needed."

"In other words, people are coming to the conclusion we got to do something about a system that isn't working," he said at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, in southeastern New Mexico about 100 miles from the Mexican border. "And while the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking."

DOJ_NMG_0032448

The center is a 2,540-acre campus ringed with barbed wire. Recruits undergo a 19 1/2-week training schedule that features intense physical workouts, vehicle pursuits, firearms use, self-defense and Spanish language classes.

"Our failure rate is 30-to-1," said Maria Valencia, spokesperson for the U.S. Border Patrol, explaining that the center graduates one border agent for every 30 applicants.

In May, Bush called for an increase of 6,000 in the Border Patrol by 2008 — a 50% increase over current levels.

The facility here, where all the agents are trained, can graduate 1,700 a year.

With Bush looking on, recruits demonstrated scenarios for capturing illegal immigrants, among them a checkpoint, halting a vehicle, and checking a train.

Recruits use three rail cars, deployed on tracks in the middle of their campus, to learn how to look for illegal immigrants smuggled in boxcars.

With temperatures nearing 100 degrees, Bush emphasized that despite the angry debate over immigration, there was agreement over the need to control the nation's borders "so that every illegal immigrant caught at the border" is sent home.

"We agree that the government needs to crack down on businesses that hire illegal workers," he said. "In other words, in order to help you do your job, we all agree that if someone's hiring somebody who's an illegal immigrant, they've broken the law and we need to crack down on that."

"We agree that it's unacceptable to have millions of illegal immigrants living in our country beyond the reach of law and the protection of law," he said, adding: "And we all agree that immigrants to America must assimilate into our society. They must embrace our values and learn to speak the English language."

With the Congress far from beginning work on reconciling the immigration measures passed by the House and Senate, Bush is seeking to minimize the differences, and encouraging the yet-to-be-named conferees representing each chamber to find common ground.

The House bill focuses exclusively on law enforcement measures; the Senate bill, more to Bush's liking, takes a broader approach, addressing law enforcement efforts as well as paths that could legally approved work in the United States for foreign residents and to eventual citizenship.

Pressing for steps that could appeal to both those favoring a crackdown on illegal border-crossing and those seeking access to the American job market for immigrants, the president noted that he had asked Congress "to increase the number of detention facilities along our borders" and also said the nation needed to acknowledge that it was a magnet for job-seekers.

"It seems to me if we want to protect this border, we ought to recognize they're coming, and give them a temporary worker card," the president said.

Bush Turns To House In Immigration Debate (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M., June 6 — President Bush tried on Tuesday to win back the trust of conservatives who have distanced themselves from him on immigration, promising to "get this border enforced" and warning those who enter the country illegally that "if you get caught, you get sent home."

After weeks of embracing "comprehensive immigration reform" — Washington shorthand for a Senate bill that includes a temporary guest-worker program and a promise of citizenship for some illegal immigrants — Mr. Bush shifted his tone in remarks at the Border Patrol training academy here. Having nudged the Senate into action, Mr. Bush is turning his attention to the House, where Republicans deride the Senate plan as amnesty and are balking at the idea of compromise.

After watching Border Patrol trainees conduct mock security stops under a blistering 100-degree sun, Mr. Bush told the agents "I want the country to pay attention to what you're doing."

He promised to add 6,000 agents by 2008 — bringing the total to 18,000 — to build high-tech fences and new patrol roads, and "to end 'catch and release' once and for all on the southern border of the United States," a reference to the practice of releasing those who enter illegally and are not immediately sent home.

DOJ_NMG_0032449

The image of Mr. Bush, his collar open and his starched blue shirt sleeves rolled up, surrounded by Border Patrol agents and trainees clad in olive drab uniforms in the dusty New Mexico desert, was carefully calibrated to sell the president's plan to the American people — and, by extension, their representatives in Washington.

But the president's tough talk failed to persuade at least one House Republican, Representative Steve Pearce, who represents Artesia. Mr. Pearce said he was "not on board with the comprehensive plan," even after flying here with Mr. Bush on Air Force One — a flight that included a private briefing from the chief of the Border Patrol, David V. Aguilar, with the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, hovering nearby. Mr. Pearce said he was encouraged that "the idea of securing the border is beginning to be a more dominant theme," but he warned that Congress was in danger of repeating a failed 1986 amnesty law.

"I trust him," Mr. Pearce said of the president, "but I'm not going to vote for the bill as it currently stands. Out here, we have a saying, 'Trust your neighbor, but brand your cattle,' and the president will understand that."

Mr. Bush's midday appearance here was the first stop on a two-day three-state swing, and came on the day of New Mexico's primary election. Later, he stopped on the border in Laredo, Tex., where he toured a video surveillance office at the local Border Patrol headquarters.

On Wednesday, Mr. Bush plans to visit a Catholic relief organization in Omaha, where he intends to emphasize that immigrants must learn English and assimilate into American society. Here again, his intent is to assuage conservatives, many of whom were put off by the sight of demonstrators for immigrants rights waving the Mexican flag.

But with more than half the American public disapproving of Mr. Bush's job performance and a midterm election in which Republicans are far more concerned with their own political futures than that of the president, Mr. Bush's powers of persuasion are not what they once were. Even the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, acknowledged that the hurdles to reaching a compromise were high.

"It's going to be a considerable amount of work, yes," Mr. Snow said.

And while Mr. Bush is trying to pitch his plan out in the country, some on Capitol Hill say he needs to get to work behind the scenes in Washington to bring the House and the Senate together.

"This is more than an Oval Office speech, and it's more than going to New Mexico," Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said in an interview on Monday. Mr. Specter added, "I think he's got to get involved in the negotiations, in the nuts and bolts."

Even on that score, Mr. Bush must tread lightly; his relations with Republicans in Congress have soured in recent months over issues like port security and a raid by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on a congressman's office.

"That's a touchy issue," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas and a member of the Judiciary Committee, who said Mr. Specter told him, too, that the president needed to get involved. "Under the Constitution, the president doesn't write the legislation. Depending on how he were to handle it, I think it could well result in some pushback from members of the House who weren't on the same page."

One House Republican who has been a staunch foe of Mr. Bush on immigration, Representative Tom Tancredo of Colorado, said there was not much the president could do to bring the two sides together. "I don't think there's a thing he can say," Mr. Tancredo said.

But Mr. Bush struck an optimistic note, insisting that there is a "a growing consensus" toward compromise.

"I know when you watch your televisions or listen to the radio it seems like there's nothing but disagreement on immigration policy in Washington," he said. He added, "While the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking."

House Passes Security Budget

By The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 6 — Spending on port and border security would increase by about 9 percent in the coming year, as part of a $32.08 billion budget for the Department of Homeland Security that the House approved Tuesday by a 389-to-9 vote.

The plan includes money to hire 2,400 new border patrol and immigration agents and screen more ship containers entering the United States for radioactive threats.

Bush Defends Planned Path To Citizenship (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, June 7, 2006

LAREDO - In a parking lot of the Border Patrol headquarters three miles from the dividing line with Mexico, President Bush on Tuesday accused his opponents in the immigration battle of stirring up fear with false claims about amnesty.

"Look, if you're one of these types of people that basically say, you know, throw them out, then you just use the word 'amnesty,' just toss it around," Bush said. "In order to frighten people, you just say 'amnesty.' "

Standing with Gov. Rick Perry after a tour of the Laredo Border Patrol Sector's video surveillance program, Bush stepped up his criticism of lawmakers back in Washington balking at his call to create a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants who have lived in the country for years.

It was a fine line Bush tried to walk. Earlier in the day, at a tour of the Border Patrol training facility in New Mexico, Bush struck conciliatory tones and said both sides in the debate have more common ground than differences.

"I know when you watch your television or listen to the radio it seems like there's nothing but disagreement on immigration policy in Washington," Bush told Border Patrol agents in Artesia, N.M. "Yet there's a growing consensus ... that fundamental reforms are needed."

Looking for middle ground

Bush was in Laredo as part of a two-day trip highlighting immigration issues, as Congress prepares to iron out the differences between somewhat contradictory measures passed in the House and Senate.

"There's no question this is a difficult issue for some in Washington, D.C., but my job is to continue calling people to account," Bush said.

He supports a Senate bill that includes a guest worker program, tougher border enforcement and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants who have spent years in the U.S., with a requirement that they pay fines and back taxes and show a proficiency in English.

Both of Texas' Republican senators, Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn, voted against the legislation.

"The failures of the 1986 amnesty live on today, and we will need to work very hard to avoid a repeat of those mistakes," Cornyn said Tuesday as lawmakers returned to Capitol Hill. "My hope is that this summer we'll find a middle ground solution that controls illegal immigration and addresses the 12 million illegal immigrants without granting amnesty."

Last December, the House passed a bill that would make it a felony to enter the country illegally or to help those that do. The bill would also increase border security and strictly enforce immigration laws.

To build support for his guest worker and citizenship proposals, Bush has taken a tough stand on the law and order aspects of border enforcement, including calling for more walls and fencing along heavily trafficked areas of the border.

Rep. Henry Cuellar, a Democrat from Laredo, said residents in his community want protection — but not a wall.

"I think people feel that, when it comes to border security, we say 'heck yes,' " Cuellar said. "But when the discussion turns to building a wall, that's a big no."

Chatting with the locals

Laredo, with a population that is 94.9 percent Hispanic, is the most Hispanic city in the United States, according to the Census Bureau.

Cuellar said that generally, he hears support from his constituents for a requirement that new immigrants learn English. There is also concern, he says, about a threat to jobs from continued illegal immigration.

"They want a guest worker plan, but with controls," he said. "They want security, but they don't want to see Minutemen."

While in Laredo, Bush made two unscheduled stops, pulling the motorcade over on a main commercial street to visit briefly with schoolchildren, and stopping at a Mexican-style barbecue joint to meet with residents and border guards.

"¿Como estas?" Bush greeted patrons at Cotulla's, a restaurant decorated with deer heads. "You know your governor?" he asked, gesturing at Perry.

"Howdy," Perry said, greeting a family having dinner.

Such encounters, carefully planned but unannounced, are part of a larger White House strategy to remind Americans why they once liked him so much and use his personal popularity to help sell a controversial immigration program.

Ray Keck, president of Texas A&M University International in Laredo, said he supports much of Bush's plan, but thinks more economic help for Mexico also would ease illegal immigration woes.

"We are heartened by the president's plan. We must look for a policy that would allow these people to become legal, tax-paying residents, a profitable part of our national workforce," Keck said.

Bush Visits Laredo To Plug Reform Plan (SAEN)

By Mariano Castillo And Gary Martin

San Antonio Express-News, June 7, 2006

LAREDO — In an effort to push an immigration bill through Congress that would secure the borders and allow for a guest worker program, President Bush toured a Border Patrol facility here during a brief visit Tuesday.

Bush's visit was the first to this city by a U.S. president since Richard Nixon in 1970.

It was part of a three-city tour to promote a bill that would increase security along the border and give undocumented immigrants who've lived in the United States for several years a path to citizenship.

In Laredo, Bush toured a video surveillance facility at Border Patrol headquarters with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Gov. Rick Perry.

In the surveillance room, the president observed more than a dozen screens displaying various points along the border.

"The Guard's going to help Border Patrol agents, so they can get out and do their job," Bush said, referring to 6,000 National Guard troops slated for deployment to the border.

Bush said a long-term solution to reduce the number of illegal crossings is to find work for them in Mexico.

"One of the interesting things about the border here that I don't think a lot of Americans are aware, but I know that those of us who grew up in Texas are aware of it, is that this part of the world used to be really poor," Bush said.

The North American Free Trade Agreement has started the process of producing jobs and wealth on both sides of the border, the president said, making Laredo a "booming town."

Asked by a local reporter if his immigration reform plan included raising the number of immigrants who can legally enter the country, Bush said he would leave that up to Congress.

Bush is trying to build momentum for an immigration bill that passed the Senate with bipartisan support. It faces stiff opposition in the House, which passed its own bill calling for strict border enforcement.

Hundreds of Laredoans lined Bush's motorcade route and gave him a mixed welcome.

"I've been waiting for this for a long time," David Bustamente, 18, said as he and some friends held up black poster boards with pro-gay-rights messages criticizing Bush support for a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage.

Only a few feet away, a group of middle school teachers cheered Bush and his immigration plan.

"Instead of the extreme, he's in the middle," said Nancy Chamberlain, a retired teacher.

Earlier, Bush toured a Border Patrol training facility in Artesia, N.M., reiterating the thin line he weaves between his vision for border enforcement and that of some in his party who want stricter measures, including a provision that would make a first-time undocumented entry a felony.

Bush also traveled to Omaha, Neb., where he was scheduled to visit a Catholic charity and speak at a college.

Bush Sees Support For Immigration Plan (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M. -- President Bush yesterday said he sees a consensus building in Congress for the major elements of his immigration proposal, including a path to citizenship, and said the gap between the House and Senate is not that broad.

"While the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking," Mr. Bush said. He was speaking at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in eastern New Mexico, which is where all U.S. Border Patrol agents train and which is the key to his making good on his promise to hire 6,000 new Border Patrol agents by 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0032452

The president said everyone in the immigration debate agrees that the border needs to be secured, that the government needs to crack down on businesses that hire illegal aliens and that something must be done about the estimated 12 million illegal aliens in the country.

"There's a consensus, and we need to act on that broad consensus and deliver comprehensive reform that makes our system orderly, secure and fair," he said.

House Republicans said Mr. Bush has made headway in convincing them he is serious about border security, but he has failed to sway them on granting citizenship to some illegal aliens.

After Mr. Bush in mid-May announced plans to increase the Border Patrol and deploy the National Guard, Rep. Steve Pearce, whose district includes the training academy, said the president didn't go far enough. But yesterday, after flying with the president on Air Force One and being briefed by Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar, he said he thinks the administration has become serious about border security.

"They actually have begun to develop a comprehensive plan for securing the border, which we haven't been able to see before," Mr. Pearce, New Mexico Republican, said.

Despite Mr. Bush's view that compromise is in the air, Mr. Pearce said he is still adamantly opposed to amnesty, which he described as when illegal aliens are given any path to citizenship.

"Sorry, but that's the wrong message," he said, adding that he would vote against a bill such as the one that came out of the Senate and includes the same path to citizenship Mr. Bush backs.

The Border Patrol academy in Artesia will determine whether Mr. Bush makes good on his pledge to hire 6,000 new Border Patrol agents by 2008. Currently there are about 11,300.

For the past few years, as members of Congress have tried to increase substantially the number of agents, they were told the academy simply couldn't train that many. But the administration has announced it is ramping up operations here to handle Mr. Bush's request, though a spokeswoman couldn't say how much it has asked for in next year's budget.

The academy currently can train 1,700 agents a year, and at peak capacity two years from now plans to be able to train 3,000 agents annually.

Only one in 30 applicants will make it to becoming a Border Patrol agent.

Before speaking yesterday, Mr. Bush reviewed part of the training in the 19½-week course, including mock traffic stops. He then traveled to Laredo, Texas, to visit the Border Patrol sector headquarters there.

Also yesterday Mr. Bush seemed to float the idea of decreasing legal immigration overall by increasing the line for green cards and citizenship.

"If Congress is worried about the number of people getting in, they can decrease the number of green cards," he said.

"You can control the size of the line by the number of green cards you issue. If you want a longer line for people, issue fewer green cards. If you want to shorten the line, issue more green cards," he said.

Bush Pushes Immigration Plan In New Mexico (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M., June 6 -- President Bush returned to the U.S.-Mexico border region Tuesday to tout what he described as a growing consensus around proposed immigration reforms and see firsthand how new border agents are being taught to keep people from entering the country illegally.

In Washington, House Republicans are showing little sign of meeting the president's demands on a comprehensive immigration plan. But appearing at the training facility here for border agents, Bush sounded an optimistic note that agreement is possible on plans to increase border security, crack down on employers hiring illegal immigrants and help immigrants assimilate into U.S. society.

"People are coming to the conclusion we got to do something about a system that isn't working," said Bush, clad in shirt sleeves in the searing sun. "And while the differences grab the headlines, the similarities in approaches are striking."

DOJ_NMG_0032453

Bush broke little ground substantively in his speech to border agents and agents in training, repeating many of the same points he had made since announcing his general approach to immigration in a nationally televised address last month. But aides say he is trying to build grass-roots support in advance of negotiations aimed at reconciling House and Senate bills that take sharply different approaches toward undocumented workers.

The president is also trying quiet diplomacy. Joining Bush on Air Force One on the trip from Washington were two New Mexico representatives who have been critical of the president for various aspects of his plan, Democrat Tom Udall and Republican Steve Pearce. During the trip, Pearce said, the two received a briefing from David Aguilar, chief of the Border Patrol, who outlined a more aggressive approach to keeping illegal immigrants from entering New Mexico.

"They actually have begun to develop a comprehensive plan for securing the border which we have not seen before," Pearce said.

A key sticking point for Pearce and other House Republicans is the president's plan for resolving the status of millions of illegal immigrants already in this country. The bill approved by the Senate would allow illegal immigrants who have been here at least five years a way to become citizens if they pay fines and back taxes and learn English; the House plan would make illegal presence in this country a felony.

The president has been supportive of the Senate approach, and in his speech Tuesday indicated that he does not regard such an approach as "amnesty" because illegal immigrants would have to get behind legal immigrants in line for citizenship. He added: "If Congress is worried about the number of people getting in, they can decrease the number of green cards. . . . If you want a longer line for people, issue fewer green cards."

Despite Bush's growing emphasis on border security, House conservatives remain wary of any final bill that would make undocumented immigrants legal. Despite the president's statement, "most Americans" consider his plan to be amnesty, said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), a leading conservative. "There's just no support at home or in my heart."

But New Mexico's Democratic governor, Bill Richardson, who attended the speech here and met privately with Bush, said the president indicated he would deploy even more assets to overcome such doubts. "I came away with two strong impressions -- that he is sincerely eager to get a comprehensive bill, and that at the appropriate time he will weigh in heavily," Richardson said.

Before his speech here, Bush watched as agents in training staged various scenes depicting what it is like to work on the border. First was a document check of passengers on a bus, followed by agents scrambling over three train cars, yelling statements such as "All clear on the bottom" as lids and doors clanged. Bush also watched as agents staged a routine traffic stop, speaking in Spanish to a suspect who had his hands up while they trained on him what appeared to be plastic guns. He later flew to Laredo, Tex., to visit a regional Border Patrol facility. He watched screens monitoring different points on the border.

Earlier, he made an unannounced stop at Cotulla Style Pit Bar-B-Q, where he greeted diners in Spanish and English before sitting down with a dozen or so border agents around a long table. "Why don't we bring a couple of plates of nachos?" he asked.

Senate Candidates Choose Their Battles On Immigration Debate (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, June 7, 2006

In a new radio ad, Republican challenger John Raese criticizes Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) for opposing the deployment of troops to secure the U.S. border.

But Byrd's campaign notes that, during debate on the Senate immigration bill two weeks ago, the senator actually voted for an amendment that would have done just that. Raese's camp said the ads are based on an earlier newspaper article in which Byrd expresses reservations about the troops' being overworked.

Raese is one of several Senate candidates across the country using the finer points of the immigration debate as campaign fodder in advertisements and press releases. Their efforts are working to varying degrees of success to differentiate them from their opponents, who are firing back in much the same manner.

Only two Republicans facing tough reelection campaigns — Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio) — were among the 23 in their party voting for final passage of the bill, and three of the four Democratic no votes were cast by vulnerable candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0032454

When asked about Byrd's vote on the National Guard amendment, Raese spokesman Gary Abernathy said Byrd's final no vote on the entire immigration package represents an example of a senator voting for a bill before voting against it, a reference to Sen. John Kerry's infamous comments during the 2004 presidential campaign about his voting preliminarily for a bill funding the war in Iraq and Afghanistan and later voting against the measure.

But Abernathy said Raese would also have voted against the overall bill.

The Associated Press article Abernathy is referring to says that Byrd "questioned whether the National Guard is stretched too thin for such duty" and quotes Byrd saying that West Virginia National Guardsmen have "taken on two, three, sometimes four tours of duty in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Byrd spokesman Mark Ferrell said the senator simply wanted to make sure that the troops' mission was clear and that it wasn't a political stunt, and he was satisfied in both regards.

"Anybody with access to the Internet can look up any member of Congress's votes, and I would assume that the Raese campaign has that ability," Ferrell said. "So it beats the heck out of me — I don't know where they're basing that."

Though in recent months several campaign ads have been taken off the air for accuracy reasons, Ferrell said the Byrd campaign would rather get the truth out instead of challenge the ads.

In Rhode Island, Republican primary challenger Steve Laffey has singled out Chafee for being the only Republican to vote for an amendment to the immigration bill that would have allowed 12 million illegal immigrants to remain in the country and streamlined the legalization process.

He said Chafee's votes on that amendment and against another amendment, which would have prevented legalized immigrants from collecting Social Security benefits for work they did as illegal immigrants, show just how far left Chafee has shifted.

Laffey spokeswoman Nachama Soloveichik said Laffey would have voted against the overall bill.

Chafee spokesman Ian Lang countered by noting that Chafee's stance on immigration is similar to President Bush's and that the final bill makes the legalization process sufficiently difficult.

He said Laffey's past actions on immigration contrast with his recent statements, referring specifically to the Cranston, R.I., mayor's support for allowing the use of identification cards issued by the Guatemalan and Mexican embassies — a practice that a Center for Immigration Studies report says is useful only for illegal immigrants. Lang also cited a Providence Journal article from early 2005 in which Laffey advocated having American companies like Wal-Mart set up employment centers at the border to recruit illegal crossers, and then the U.S. government, in turn, give them short-term visas.

Lang said Chafee doesn't outright oppose the foreign-embassy ID cards but has major concerns about them.

Soloveichik pointed out that the Justice Department has permitted the use of the cards, and she said they can be useful for temporary legal immigrants and also for police identifying illegal immigrants. She said the practice of sending recruiters to the border would promote legal immigration, which is consistent with Laffey's stance.

In Arizona, Democratic challenger Jim Pederson criticized Sen. Jon Kyl's (R) no vote on the final bill, charging that the vote was the culmination of his work to kill the legislation. In ads and releases, Pederson cites Arizona Republican colleague Sen. John McCain as saying that Kyl's immigration plan "borders on fantasy."

McCain said he was disappointed that Pederson used him to attack Kyl. Kyl's campaign said his plan is oriented toward striking some middle ground between the Senate and House bills and that Kyl and McCain worked closely together to get the Senate bill through important votes.

In New Jersey, Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr. criticized Sen. Robert Menendez (D) for opposing the amendment that would cut off legalized immigrants from getting Social Security benefits and others amendments that would make English the official language and would build a fence along the Mexican border.

Menendez, who voted for final passage, has charged Kean with flip-flopping by first supporting a path to citizenship and then asking for deportation of all illegal immigrants. Kean clarified his position in the local Herald News that people who are unable to return to their home countries and apply for citizenship should pay fines.

Around the country, other candidates are making emphatic statements as well.

DOJ_NMG_0032455

In Montana, Sen. Conrad Burns (R) has aired an ad that calls out both of his Democratic opponents for not taking firm stances on the immigration debate.

In Pennsylvania, Democratic challenger Bob Casey Jr. said the bill wasn't perfect but noted that he would have voted for it and that it does not provide amnesty, as his opponent, Sen. Rick Santorum (R), contends.

And in Tennessee, all three major Republican candidates running to replace Sen. Bill Frist (R) and the likely Democratic candidate, Rep. Harold Ford, denounced the bill as too lenient because it provides a path to citizenship. Frist voted for the bill.

Public, Bush Split On Illegals (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M. -- President Bush has been making a strong push for illegal aliens to assimilate as he stumps for passage of a plan to legalize most of them, but a new poll shows that voters actually want less immigration and more security.

And even Mr. Bush's own pollster, in another recent poll, failed to ask about a pathway to citizenship, instead focusing on temporary legal status for illegal aliens -- a concept Mr. Bush no longer endorses.

About half of those surveyed in the new poll by MWR Strategies said the immigration problem facing the U.S. is "too much immigration," while just 29 percent identified the problem as "not enough assimilation."

Michael McKenna, who conducted the poll of 1,000 registered voters, said it suggests that Mr. Bush is moving in the wrong direction by embracing a path to citizenship.

"The practical import of it is, all this yak-yak about path to citizenship -- more than half the population looks at it and says there's just too much. We need less of it," he said.

"If you think the problem is just too much immigration, you don't care about path to citizenship or any of that other stuff."

When asked the best way to address immigration, 36 percent said penalize businesses for hiring illegal aliens, while 35 percent said create a path to citizenship and 17 percent said build a wall.

The Bush administration has been trying to convince skeptical Republicans in Congress that voters prefer a comprehensive solution to immigration and back Mr. Bush, who yesterday said a consensus is building in Congress for the major elements of his immigration proposal, including a path to citizenship.

A recent memo by Matthew Dowd, Mr. Bush's pollster and a senior adviser to the Republican National Committee (RNC), argues that "the comprehensive approach that emphasizes both security and compassion is unifying, not polarizing -- it is supported by Republicans, independents, and Democrats."

But Mr. Dowd didn't ask about a path to citizenship, which opponents call "amnesty," in his most recent survey, taken after Mr. Bush made his Oval Office address to the nation arguing for that proposal. Instead, Mr. Dowd asked about temporary workers, who would return home.

Mr. Dowd is advising Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign in California and was unavailable, according to the RNC. But a party official, who asked not to be named, said they simply didn't ask about that part of Mr. Bush's plan.

"The survey clearly asks about a comprehensive approach to immigration. We did not ask support questions regarding path to citizenship in this particular poll," the official said.

Mr. McKenna criticized Mr. Dowd's memo, saying it's "not inaccurate as far as it goes, but it's sure misleading."

"The questions themselves are clearly skewed, don't come to the heart of the issue in any important kind of way and are clearly biased in favor of one side," he said. "The weight of the numbers and the weight of the evidence suggests that people's main concern is border security and they view most of these proposals as amnesty."

Those who support a middle-ground route of giving illegal aliens temporary status but not a path to citizenship said Mr. Dowd's polling actually supports their plan.

"What is clear from this poll is that a work-and-return program, a bill that has not passed the Senate, can receive significant support," said Don Stewart, spokesman for Sen. John Cornyn, the Texas Republican who supports a temporary program but opposes a path to citizenship. "That's the third way in this whole debate."

Dan Bartlett, senior counselor to the president, says the public is behind Mr. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0032456

In a memo Monday, Mr. Bartlett said proposals to allow long-time illegal aliens a path to citizenship scored 79 percent in a CNN poll taken right after Mr. Bush's speech last month and 77 percent in a CBS News poll.

"The president is leading the country and the Republican Party in a direction he thinks is right, and opinion polls show Americans strongly support a comprehensive approach," he said.

Those who support a path to citizenship have made some headway in public opinion on how voters see the people who are the subject of the debate.

When Mr. McKenna polled in 2004, after Mr. Bush made his first major immigration speech detailing a guest-worker program, 73 percent saw the noncitizens as "illegal aliens," while 25 percent saw them as "undocumented workers." In his new poll, 62 percent said they are "illegal aliens" and 30 percent said they are "undocumented workers."

Sergio Bendixen, considered one of the top pollsters of Hispanic voters and immigration issues, said the difference between asking about "illegal immigrant" and "undocumented worker" can mean a swing of 20 percentage points in the answers.

Mr. Bendixen said Mr. Bush still has a chance to influence the debate but said he's having only a slight impact on the debate.

"I think the president is very weak right now politically. I don't think he's got a lot of credibility," he said.

House GOP Threatens To 'blue-slip' Bill (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 7, 2006

Lawmakers are shrouding themselves in a thin slip of blue paper as deep divisions on immigration policy are again being laid bare.

House Republicans have threatened to deliver a "blue slip" rejection of the Senate immigration bill, and Senate Democrats are blocking efforts to circumvent that maneuver.

The result is a procedural paralysis that has prevented the two chambers from even naming conference negotiators, a clear sign of the difficulties facing proponents of an immigration overhaul.

The Senate-written immigration bill contains tax provisions, violating the Constitution's requirement that all revenue measures originate in the House. Any House member could object to the Senate bill on that basis, forcing debate and a vote on whether to reject the measure outright.

Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) is considered the most likely to raise such an objection, but any number of House conservatives would be happy to kill the Senate bill. To avoid that fate, Senate Republican leaders want to bring up a separate House-passed tax bill, gut it and replace its provisions with the Senate immigration bill. But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has objected to that maneuver.

Reid said he is concerned that using a House-passed tax vehicle could invite the introduction of unrelated tax cuts into House-Senate conference negotiations. If President Bush wants progress on the bill, he should tell House Republicans, "Don't raise the blue-slip issue," Reid said.

But Republicans say the problem is Reid, not the blue slip.

"Unfortunately, the minority leader over there, Harry Reid, continues to stand in the way," House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said yesterday. "I think he ought to quit playing politics."

As lawmakers engaged a new round of finger-pointing yesterday, one thing remained clear: The immigration bill is stuck.

Conservative Republicans are dead-set against the Senate bill, which would beef up border security, establish a temporary-worker program and allow many of the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country now to become citizens eventually.

The House version focuses solely on border security, and many House Republicans say the Senate bill would grant amnesty to millions of immigrants who broke the law to get here.

DOJ_NMG_0032457

But proponents of the Senate bill say the blue-slip threat is merely a distraction, one of a number of tools the bill's critics could use to thwart its progress if they chose to do so. If the will exists to strike a deal, they say, procedural roadblocks will not be a problem.

"Some technical blue slip is not going to stop any resolution that we come to," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a chief proponent of the Senate bill, said yesterday. "Let's not get caught up in the minutiae and the weeds."

McCain was among the leaders of a bipartisan core of senators who struck a deal on the immigration bill and then shepherded it through the Senate last month. Sixty-two senators, most of them Democrats, voted for the final bill.

The legislation drew harsh criticism from Senate conservatives, many of whom voted against it. Even if Reid were to allow GOP leaders to move forward, there is no guarantee that Republican senators would not use procedural weapons to stop action.

Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) tried to kill the bill on its first trip through the Senate.

Sessions sent a "Dear Colleague" letter yesterday in which he urged colleagues to study the details of the immigration bill, particularly the number of legal immigrants it would allow into the country in future years.

"It remains deeply flawed," he wrote.

Republicans hinted yesterday that they have other options for getting around the blue-slip problem.

"There's always a Plan B," said Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

In 2000, House and Senate leaders circumvented a similar problem by appointing "shadow" conferees to a bankruptcy bill and attaching their work product to the conference report on a separate bill, according to Walter J. Oleszek's Congressional Procedures and the Policy Process.

But alternatives and timelines were in short supply yesterday.

"Things can break loose at any time," Ueland said.

Reid Proposes Deal On Reform Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Immigration reform remained mired in the Senate yesterday, but Minority Leader Harry Reid indicated there may be some room for compromise.

Legislation has been stalled for weeks on constitutional grounds that prevent the Senate from writing bills that raise revenue. Because the Senate legislation includes a requirement that illegal aliens pay back taxes, it must originate in the House.

Majority Leader Bill Frist offered a solution by attaching the bill to tax legislation that had already passed the House. Mr. Reid has rejected that solution.

Republicans "think there's a problem because they want a problem," Mr. Reid said yesterday. "They don't want to go to conference."

But, he also added that he's at least willing to consider the idea.

"I've got another idea for them," Mr. Reid told reporters yesterday. "If they want to use another bill, a tax bill, instead of the House-passed immigration bill, then let them come to me with how they're going to not have this as a Christmas tree of tax measures. It's up to them. If they want use a tax bill, let's see what they can come up with to protect the Senate's position on immigration."

House Republican leaders accuse Mr. Reid of sitting on the bill to prevent the Republican Congress for taking credit for reforming the country's immigration laws in an election year.

"Unfortunately, the minority leader over there, Harry Reid, continues to stand in the way of getting to a conference," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said yesterday. "And I think he ought to quit playing politics with this issue and let us get to work on solving this problem of illegal immigration."

The House, meanwhile, approved an amendment by Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, to bar any Department of Homeland Security money from being used to alert the Mexican government about the location or activities of the volunteer Minutemen patrolling the border.

DOJ_NMG_0032458

In a letter to colleagues, Mr. Kingston urged support "in ensuring our U.S. Border Patrol does not tip off the Mexican government about the location of Minutemen Civil Defense Corps patrols. This amendment will send a message that we will not tolerate such actions."

The letter cites press reports from earlier this year suggesting that the Border Patrol had been tipping off Mexican officials about Minutemen activities.

Arizona Governor Vetoes Illegal Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona has vetoed a bill that would have punished employers who hire illegal immigrants and authorized the police to arrest illegal immigrants on trespassing charges merely for being in the state.

Ms. Napolitano, a Democrat who is running for a second term and is doing well in public opinion polls, said yesterday in a letter to legislators that parts of the bill would have violated the federal government's power to enforce immigration law under the Constitution and were opposed by many law enforcement groups and leaders in border communities.

Ms. Napolitano said that although she supported holding employers accountable for hiring illegal workers, the bill provided "amnesty" because it let them avoid penalties and fines by simply firing the workers after receiving a warning from the state authorities. She said she opposed charging illegal immigrants with trespassing because law enforcement groups and municipal leaders said it would overwhelm the police.

Ms. Napolitano said the determination of lawmakers to push a bill that she had made clear she would reject "confirms that you view this bill more as a political game than as a serious effort to protect our border."

Ms. Napolitano and the Republican-dominated Legislature have had a contentious relationship. This veto was her 115th — a record for an Arizona governor — since taking office in 2003. None have been overturned.

A spokeswoman for the governor, Jeanine L'Ecuyer, said, however, that 26 of the vetoes involved the same legislation offered multiple times by lawmakers. Some of the bills, Ms. L'Ecuyer said, included what the governor considered outrageous ideas, including one that would allow patrons to carry guns in bars and restaurants.

Arizona, where a majority of illegal immigrants crossing from Mexico enter, is one of several states where lawmakers have passed bills or are considering measures to fill in what they view as gaps in the federal enforcement of immigration law.

Ms. Napolitano has sought to appear tough on border issues while not playing into the hands of hard-line Republican legislators.

Last summer, she declared a state of emergency over border security. Last week, she authorized 300 National Guard troops from her state to participate in President Bush's plan to deploy 6,000 of them to the Mexican border by August to help the Border Patrol.

State Representative Russell Pearce, a Mesa Republican and the immigration bill's chief sponsor, said in an interview after the veto that he would try to put a similar measure on the November ballot.

Mr. Pearce said Ms. Napolitano's veto showed that she was not serious about reducing illegal immigration. "She is the best friend an illegal alien has in this country," Mr. Pearce said.

Poll: U.S. Public Warmer Toward Immigrants (AP-Y2)

By Will Lester

AP2, June 6, 2006

Immigration anxiety has been fueling a fierce political debate in the United States, but attitudes about immigrants in this country are considerably more positive than in several European countries, AP-Ipsos polling found.

People in Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Spain are much more inclined than those in the U.S. to think immigrants are likely to get involved in criminal activity.

"Often the immigrants come here and can't find work, they are forced to become criminals," said Leonardo Delogu, a doctor from Sardinia who was visiting Rome.

DOJ_NMG_0032459

More than a third of Germans, Italians and Spaniards say they think immigrants are more likely to be involved in criminal activity than people born in their countries. A fourth in France and Britain feel that way.

Those European countries are about evenly divided on whether immigrants are a good influence. In general, people who make higher incomes and have had more education are more likely to say immigrants are a good influence.

In the U.S., about one in 10 thinks immigrants are more likely to be involved in crimes. And a majority, 52 percent, say they think immigrants are a good influence on the country.

After many years, a steady flow over the Mexican border into the United States has left about 11 million illegal immigrants or more in this country.

Lawmakers are under pressure to bring immigration under control and are trying to agree on legislation that would tighten security on the borders while deciding the legal fate of millions of people in this country illegally.

President Bush was in New Mexico Tuesday trying to build support for his preferred approach of securing the borders, providing a new guest worker program and giving many illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship.

Public support of immigrants often depends on their legal status.

"In a nutshell, legal immigrants are helpful, illegals are not," said Don Bick, a home builder from Pittsburgh, Pa.

Many people in this country are alarmed about the changing ethnic nature of their communities and the added burden illegal immigrants can place on public services like schools and hospitals.

For Europeans, attitudes on immigrants have been shaped by more dramatic experiences.

• In France, young people in depressed suburbs rioted in November, burning thousands of cars and some public buildings.

• Spanish officials are trying to deal with boatloads of destitute Africans arriving at Spain's Canary Islands on rickety fishing boats nearly every day.

• An estimated 30 percent of Italy's prison population is made up of foreigners, often illegal immigrants convicted of crimes.

People in all eight countries in the polling — Australia, Britain, Canada, France, Italy, Germany, Spain and the United States — felt that immigrants work as hard or harder than people born in those countries. The polls, which questioned about 1,000 adults in each country, were conducted between May 1-22 and have a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

"Working hard is the only way they're going to survive, isn't it," said Sunny Siddiq, a liquor store owner in London who moved to Britain from Pakistan nine years ago. "They don't have luxuries in their home country, so when they come here, they only have one mission: to work hard and to support families back home."

"The population of immigrants is increasing dramatically," said Fred Bemak, a George Mason University professor who studies the impact of immigration. "When it's the person next door, it changes the tone."

Our Language Unites Us (USAT)

By Sen. James Inhofe

USA Today, June 7, 2006

To our nation's great credit and advantage, we have advanced English worldwide. It is the official language of 51 nations and 27 states in the USA. Last March, a Zogby International poll of likely voters found that 84% support making English the official language of government operations. Among Democrats, 82% supported that idea, and among Hispanics, 71%. This is nothing new: Over the years, many polls reflect similar numbers.

Speaking English well enough for everyday life is a guaranteed way for new immigrants to increase their earning potential, lift academic achievement and enhance their career options. That's the clear, compassionate message we need to send.

My amendment, passed by the Senate last month, clarifies that, unless specified by other laws, there are no entitlements to federal services and documents in foreign languages. This nation decided long ago that you must know English to become a citizen. Thus, there is no reason to offer government's citizen services in foreign languages.

In the same way the Pledge of Allegiance and the National Anthem bring this nation together, English is something we share and should promote. Yet Senate liberals voted against English as our national language and against the will of our constituents. Instead, they kowtowed to radical leftist groups, such as the National Council of La Raza.

DOJ_NMG_0032460

Multilingual entitlements distress American unity and cost billions even though courts have consistently ruled that similar entitlements, provided under one of President Clinton's executive orders, are baseless.

In 2001, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Martha Sandoval, who had lived in America for 10 years without learning English, could not sue Alabama because it didn't offer foreign-language driver's license tests. Similarly, federal courts have held that there's no right to foreign-language government forms, deportation notices or civil service exams.

The U.S. courts' position is unmistakable, and America's citizens and immigrants have spoken. Why aren't liberals listening? The message is loud and clear: Unite America behind our proud national language, help new immigrants advance by learning it and save taxpayer dollars by making English the national language. If liberals do not open their ears, people might just stop talking to them.

Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., sponsored the English language amendment.

Press 2 For Pointless (USAT)

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Sometimes it may seem that English is under attack. Dial a credit card company, and you're greeted in two languages. Order coffee at a convenience store, and the clerk might not understand you. Hit the wrong button at the ATM, and the screen flashes Spanish.

So should English be designated the USA's "national language"? Sixty-three senators have voted to make it so. They might as well have voted to make apple the national pie or American Idol the national TV show.

In practice, English already is the national language, even among the children of immigrants: 93% of second-generation Hispanic Americans are bilingual or speak primarily English, according to a 2002 national survey by the Pew Hispanic Center and the Kaiser Family Foundation. By the third generation, hardly anyone speaks only Spanish, and just 22% of Latinos are bilingual.

As in earlier generations, today's immigrants recognize that speaking English is their ticket to a better life. There are long waits for English classes — from one month to a couple of years — in cities from Boston to Phoenix. Legislating a "national language" is, at best, meaningless and, at worst, harmful.

Look at Miami-Dade County, which adopted an ordinance in 1980 that barred the county from doing business in any language other than English. Thirteen years later, the county commission unanimously repealed it. According to news accounts, public hospitals couldn't give written instructions in Spanish on how patients should take medications, and the county couldn't print some warning signs in Spanish.

Now Congress, rushing to score political points in the immigration debate roiling the nation, might be inviting similar mischief. The Senate measure, sponsored by Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., declares that no one is entitled to federal services or information in a language other than English, except where it's guaranteed by law.

Asked the measure's impact, an Inhofe aide offered this example: The White House website would no longer have to translate presidential speeches into Spanish. Quips about President Bush's command of English aside, leaving newcomers in the dark about presidential pronouncements is hardly a way to help them learn more about their adopted home.

More troubling is the measure's potential impact on other services. The IRS, for example, offers a Spanish version of its website. If the measure became law, immigrants would be discouraged from paying taxes.

It certainly would erect new barriers to citizenship. Currently, an applicant must understand the fundamentals of U.S. history and government. That's as it should be. Inhofe's measure would require that applicants also understand major legislation, court cases, the Federalist Papers and the Emancipation Proclamation. How many of today's Americans would pass that test?

To be sure, employers shouldn't put people who barely speak English into customer service positions. But as the immigration debate rages on, politics is trumping common sense. That's true in any language.

Contributing: This is one of an occasional series of editorials on immigration issues. View the previous editorials at editorialpage.usatoday.com.

Carter-Finley Workers Plead, Will Be Deported (RN&O)

By Jennifer Brevorka, Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0032461

Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, June 7, 2006

RALEIGH - Six men arrested by federal immigration agents at Carter-Finley Stadium last month have pleaded guilty to entering the country illegally and will be deported, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Federal immigration agents accompanied troopers from the state Highway Patrol to a construction site at the stadium May 23 in hopes of finding a driver who had fled from an auto accident. When federal agents arrived, more than 50 workers in hard hats ran. Seven, including one juvenile, were arrested.

Federal agents later found the suspected driver, Reynalda Guitierres, 28, in Durham and charged him with illegal entry.

Justice Department officials said that the following men pleaded guilty to illegal entry and will remain in federal custody while they undergo the deportation process: Victorino Marquez-Hernandez of Mexico; Antolin Contreras-Maldonado of Honduras; Armando Hernandez-Penaloza of Mexico; Melvin Jovel-Hernandez of Honduras; Omar Miguel Barbosa of Mexico and Demetrio Huerta-Ordonez of Mexico. Agents also charged Marquez-Hernandez with possession of false immigration documents.

A Guatemalan teenager also was charged with illegal entry and possession of false immigration documents, but his case was continued, officials said. They did not release his name.

TAX:

Estate Tax Showdown Is Splitting The G.O.P. (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — Senate Republicans, pushing once again to abolish the estate tax on inherited wealth, are split about whether to push for a full repeal that would probably fail, or seek a more cautious compromise with Democrats that could pass.

Permanently repealing the estate tax, or what Republicans have branded the "death tax," is a priority for President Bush and many Republican lawmakers.

But Senate leaders, vowing to schedule a vote for full repeal on Thursday, have yet to line up the 60 votes they need to prevent a Democratic filibuster. Indeed, with public approval ratings declining for Mr. Bush and the Republicans, party leaders face at least as much opposition from Democrats today as they did last summer.

In what is either a shrewd game of chicken or an effort to inflame the passions of crucial Republican constituencies, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, has made little effort to strike a compromise with conservative Democrats that would greatly reduce but not fully abolish the tax.

"Senator Frist is for full repeal, first and foremost," a spokeswoman for Mr. Frist, Carolyn Weyforth, said. "Until we've had the cloture vote, any talk of a compromise is premature."

The strategy has divided Republicans. Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, told reporters on Monday that the Senate could easily pass a bill that eliminated the estate tax for all but a tiny slice of the nation's richest families.

Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, has been trying for more than a year to woo Democrats from conservative states.

On Tuesday, Mr. Kyl circulated a proposal that would eliminate the tax for any estate worth less than $5 million and reduce the current rate for bigger estates.

Proponents said that repeal of the tax would promote savings and investment and eventually create jobs, as Americans would have more incentive to build businesses if they could keep the wealth within their families.

Critics say the estate tax as it is now reduces some of the nation's economic inequality, and they insist that its repeal would benefit the very wealthiest families at a time when the government is running large budget deficits.

Most polls show that a slim majority of voters support a repeal of the tax, especially when it is called the "death tax." But the tax affects less than 2 percent of all estates — most of which belong to very rich families — and repeal would be expensive.

Full repeal would cost more than $600 billion over 10 years, according to the Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation, although supporters insist the actual cost would be much lower.

DOJ_NMG_0032462

The full cost would start to hit the Treasury in 2011 — the same year that the nation's oldest baby boomers will turn 65 and start a sharp rise in spending on Social Security and Medicare.

But opponents of the estate tax, including hundreds of thousands of small-business owners and a well-financed national network of grass-roots advocates, are running television ads in states with Democratic senators like Montana, Louisiana and North Dakota. They have also been campaigning in Maine, whose two moderate Republican senators are reluctant to support full repeal.

The issue could be crucial to the political career of Mr. Frist, who is weighing the possibility of running for president in 2008. He vowed to force a vote last summer, but retreated after it became clear that he could not prevent a filibuster.

Mr. Frist now appears to be going for broke: instead of seeking a compromise that might win over a handful of crucial Democrats, he is pushing for a permanent repeal of the estate tax.

Though Republican aides say Mr. Frist has not closed off the possibility of a compromise, the senator has pointedly refused to schedule any floor time for debate about alternatives in the event that his own effort fails.

As part of Mr. Bush's tax cut of 2001, the estate tax is scheduled to gradually phase out and disappear altogether in 2010 but then return in full the very next year.

Mr. Bush has long called for making his tax cuts permanent, but the estate tax has generated an emotional intensity far greater than most other issues.

"The president's position has been clear, and it is that we should eliminate it altogether," said Edward P. Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, in an interview on Tuesday.

"Keeping tax rates down on estates is just another way of not impeding the incentives to save and invest," Mr. Lazear said. "We're already consuming at very high rates, and our savings rate is very low. We don't want to bias the system any more than we already are."

Business groups are pushing hard to make the repeal permanent, focusing on a handful of Democratic senators from states that lean Republican.

The targets are the two Democrats from Arkansas, Senator Blanche L. Lincoln and Senator Mark L. Pryor, as well as Senator Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana and Senator Max Baucus of Montana.

Mr. Baucus, the senior Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, has offered his own proposal for scaling back the inheritance tax. Under one proposal he circulated — which was rejected by Republicans as too modest — estates worth less than $3.5 million would be exempt from any tax.

Mr. Baucus has been quiet in recent days, but aides said he was still open to proposals for a compromise that he could sell to other Democrats.

A handful of moderate Republican senators are likely to oppose a full and perhaps even a partial repeal of the estate tax. They include John McCain of Arizona, George V. Voinovich of Ohio, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and the two senators from Maine, Olympia Snowe and Susan M. Collins.

Ardent opponents of the estate tax, who have campaigned for more than a decade on the issue, say their time is hand.

"We're going for full repeal and we're pushing hard," said Dick Patten, executive director of the American Family Business Institute. "I'm very optimistic."

Mr. Patten's group, which claims 1,900 members who own family companies, is spending more than $1 million on television ads in 11 states. Some ads try to strike a bipartisan feel, quoting Republicans, Democrats and the economist Milton Friedman on how the estate tax hurts family-owned companies.

Another ad aims to pressure Mr. McCain, who voted against a permanent repeal of the estate tax in 2001.

"American family business owners and farmers are counting on John McCain, counting on him to keep his promise," said one television commercial that was broadcast in Arizona.

Aides to Senator Snowe of Maine said they had been under heavy pressure from both sides. On Tuesday, even as Mr. Patten's group was still running ads in favor of repeal, a group called the Maine People's Alliance brought a giant replica of a silver spoon and staged a news conference opposing repeal just outside her Senate office.

DOJ_NMG_0032463

Frist Wants Estate Tax Repeal On Agenda (AP)

By Mary Dalrymple

The Associated Press, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - GOP leaders on Tuesday put abolition of the federal estate tax on the Senate's election-year agenda as other senators weighed ideas to shrink, but not erase, the tax.

President Bush's tax cuts eliminated the estate tax in 2010, but that temporary law expires, and the tax comes back to life, one year later.

Republicans have been unable to maneuver a bill permanently repealing the tax past Democratic objections. That has prompted Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and others to broker a compromise aimed at curbing the tax during the next decade.

The effort has attracted interest, and generated a flurry of ideas, from a small group of Republicans and Democrats interested in curbing the tax and getting rid of the quirky law that repeals and resurrects the levy.

"I think it's important that we put this issue to rest so that people will know what the rules are," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine.

Kyl told other GOP senators Tuesday that common ground might be found by increasing the size of an estate exempt from taxation to $5 million per person or $10 million per couple, according to GOP aides familiar with the proposal speaking on condition of anonymity while negotiations continued.

His idea would tax estates between $5 million and $30 million equal to the top tax rate for most capital gains. The remainder of the largest estates would be taxed at 30 percent, those aides said.

Kyl offered the idea as senators, Republican and Democratic, said proposals for progressively taxing estates were gaining more support than plans taxing all estates at one, lower rate.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said talks among senators interested in a compromise seemed to be moving toward a structure that includes at least two different estate tax brackets.

Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., said "stair-stepping" the rates "brings on folks who otherwise would think that was too much of a giveaway."

"Of course, the question arises, what are the numbers?" he said.

This year, the first $2 million of a person's estate, or $4 million per couple, is exempt from taxation and the remainder is taxed at rates as high as 46 percent.

The first step toward considering either a complete repeal, or a compromise shrinking the tax, would come Thursday. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., planned a pivotal vote to test support for moving ahead with a bill, already passed by the House, to repeal the tax. He would need 60 votes to succeed.

Vote-counters on both sides express optimism they will prevail but caution that some senators probably will not commit until required to cast a vote.

Proposals to shrink instead of repeal the estate tax have gained some traction among senators worried about budget deficits amid spending on the war in Iraq.

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., who has supported repealing the tax in the past, is interested in a compromise given pressing demands on federal spending, including cleanup and reconstruction after Hurricane Katrina.

At least two GOP senators, George Voinovich of Ohio and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, say the government's finances cannot support any reduction in estate taxes at this time. Both plan to vote against Frist's effort to start debate.

Some groups lobbying to completely repeal the tax say the effort to compromise gives up the fight before testing the waters for abolishing the tax.

"It disappoints me that they want to compromise before we've actually had the vote on repeal," said Dick Patten, executive director of the American Family Business Institute.

—

On the Net:

U.S. Senate: http://www.senate.gov

DOJ_NMG_0032464

How Tax Code Change Affects Overseas Workers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

In your May 24 editorial "Lost in Taxation," you are confused about how a recent change to the federal tax code will affect some Americans working overseas. The change concerned the foreign earned income exclusion under section 911 of the tax code. You imply 4.1 million Americans could be affected, but according to the most recent available IRS data, 306,393 tax returns claimed the benefits of section 911 in 2003. Of those returns, only 125,894 actually had any U.S. tax liability after the benefits.

Like all U.S. citizens and taxpayers, expatriates are protected from double taxation primarily by the foreign tax credit mechanism. The section 911 exclusion, on which you focus, is secondary. In fact, to gain the benefits of excluding all or a portion of their foreign income from their taxable income in the U.S., section 911 beneficiaries opt out of foreign tax credit relief on the excluded income. For those working in countries that impose little or no tax on this income, section 911 actually allows expatriates to avoid taxes altogether on this income. Prior to the change enacted recently, those working in countries with higher taxes would elect section 911 not to avoid double taxation on their foreign income, but to have their other income, including U.S. income, taxed at lower marginal tax rates than taxpayers living and working in the U.S. with the same economic income.

Expatriates will continue to have a better deal than their domestic counterparts. Through section 911, individuals can still exclude a sizable amount of income that those living and working in the U.S. cannot exclude. Also, American workers abroad who claim section 911 benefits will be taxed at the same rates as domestic workers with the same income. And the subsidy for housing costs is brought in line with other U.S. government-sponsored housing programs.

Sen. Chuck Grassley (R., Iowa)
Chairman, Committee on Finance
Washington

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

White House Renews Push For Nominees (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 7, 2006

White House officials are making a concerted effort to cooperate with outside conservative groups to support and defend President Bush's nominees to the federal bench, and they are also planning to work more closely with the Senate on confirming the nominees.

The greater focus on judges comes in the wake of privately expressed criticism from conservative leaders that the White House and the GOP-controlled Senate were doing little to defend high-profile nominees such as William "Jim" Haynes and Terrence Boyle, both picked for the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, from attacks by liberals.

The White House and Senate Republicans offered spirited defenses of prior embattled nominees, such as Priscilla Owen, who now sits on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, and Janice Rogers Brown, who is a member of the D.C. Circuit Court. But since their confirmations and the Supreme Court confirmations of Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, GOP leaders have done little to defend other controversial nominees.

The lack of an organized defense of languishing nominees such as Haynes, Boyle and William Myers, a nominee to the 9th Circuit, prompted former clerks of the nominees and conservative activists to take matters into their own hands. Boyle's former clerks, many of whom are now prominent lawyers, joined together on their own accord to defend him from accusations that he acted improperly while a district-court judge.

Conservative activists and intellectual leaders, such as Sean Rushton, executive director of the Committee for Justice, and Professor John Yoo of the University of California at Berkeley, also began laying plans to form committees to defend other embattled nominees. Yoo was in the national spotlight earlier this year during the Alito hearings because of his writings on the legal theory of the unitary executive, which Bush has used to justify his wartime powers.

DOJ_NMG_0032465

But since the Senate confirmation of Brett Kavanaugh to the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals two weeks ago, the White House has begun to take a more active role in defending the nominees. For example, talking points circulated at the end of last week defending Boyle from accusations that he did not recuse himself from cases where he may have had conflicts of interest were written in the signature style of the White House and its ally the Republican National Committee. And administration officials are also working more closely with conservative activists to defend the nominees. Also, the Department of Justice is crafting a memo on Boyle's conduct as a judge and activists close to the White House such as Edward Whelan, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center who authored a recent article in the conservative Weekly Standard, are stepping up their advocacy on behalf of the judicial nominees.

"I sense that," said Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, when asked yesterday if he noticed more effort by the White House to support the judicial nominees. He added that he met with Boyle and a White House aide Monday in a meeting he said he assumed was set up by the administration.

"I guess that represents a stepping up and talking about judges," Sessions acknowledged.

Sessions also said that conservatives are right to be concerned about the lack of action by Senate Republicans to defend the nominees, something he attributed to distractions caused by the busy schedule and big political issues such as immigration reform.

"I think it's time to get more serious in defending the nominees," he said.

Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), a rising star in the upper chamber's conservative circles, said that the White House is working more closely with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) on the judicial nominees.

"We've got to get moving faster on judicial nominees," said DeMint, who added that Frist has told him judicial nominees are a priority.

A White House official said that several of the nominees have sat in the Senate for a long time and that the administration is asking senators to make a decision about whether to confirm them or not, whether to "fish or cut bait."

The greater cooperation between the White House and conservative groups comes several weeks after White House political adviser Karl Rove and counsel Harriet Miers told conservatives in a private meeting that they would begin sending more judicial nominees to the Hill. But so far few nominees have been sent.

The White House official said that to the extent there is a push on judges it is an effort to wrap up background checks on judicial nominees and send them to the Senate more quickly. The effort is a direct recognition that the window of opportunity for getting nominees confirmed in the Senate may be closing as Election Day and the end of the 109th Congress approaches.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a member of the Judiciary Committee, has come under heavy fire from conservatives for blocking Haynes's nomination.

Yesterday, nearly 80 prominent conservative leaders including David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union; Paul Weyrich, chairman of Coalitions for America; Manuel Miranda, chairman of the Third Branch Conference; and Saul Anuzis, chairman of the Michigan Republican Party, delivered a letter to Graham rebuking him for "effectively blocking" Haynes's nomination in the Judiciary Committee.

"We understand that you and Senator [John] McCain [R-Ariz.] have concerns about the Bush Administration's policies on prisoners captured in the War on Terror, and about Mr. Haynes's role in implementing those policies at the Defense Department," the conservative leaders wrote.

Graham defended himself yesterday by saying that he is not blocking Haynes in committee and arguing that the conservative leaders who signed the letter do not represent all conservatives. But Graham refused to say whether he would cast a crucial vote to pass Haynes out of committee.

A Different Judicial Battle (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

The Senate is back in session, and we'll soon see if Republicans are serious about confirming President Bush's nominees for the appeals courts. Majority Leader Bill Frist kept his promise to confirm Brett Kavanaugh to the D.C. Circuit before Memorial Day, after he'd waited three years for a vote.

DOJ_NMG_0032466

So who's next? Mr. Frist wanted to move Fourth Circuit nominee Terrence Boyle by Memorial Day too, but no go. A federal judge in North Carolina, Mr. Boyle has the honor of waiting longer than any appeals-court nominee in history for a floor vote. He was in Mr. Bush's first group of nominees announced on May 9, 2001 and was first nominated by Mr. Bush's father in 1991, though Democrats denied him a vote.

Democrats now say they'll filibuster his nomination. They are distorting a couple of Judge Boyle's civil rights decisions and making conflict-of-interest allegations that add up at worst to minor infractions. But Republicans don't want a fight in an election year over race or ethics. And Judge Boyle's onetime Senate champion -- Jesse Helms -- has long since retired. A controversial nominee without an angel to guide him through today's polarized Senate is in trouble.

Which brings us to William "Jim" Haynes II, another stalled Fourth Circuit nominee. Mr. Haynes was named on September 29, 2003, had a hearing two months later, and was voted out of committee in March 2004. But don't blame this delay only on Democrats. Two Republicans -- Senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham -- are also causing the holdup.

Mr. Haynes is the Pentagon's general counsel, and his transgression is to have offered legal advice on the treatment of detainees in the war on terror. The big point of contention is his role in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's decision in December 2002 to allow "coercive" interrogation techniques against al Qaeda detainees at Guantanamo.

The Pentagon says Mr. Haynes offered legal analysis; his critics distort this to say he was instrumental in forging a policy that could be used to justify "torture." But there is no evidence that anyone condoned torture, and it was the CIA, not the Pentagon, that used "waterboarding" that critics cite as the most coercive sanctioned technique.

In any case, Mr. Rumsfeld rescinded his decision within six weeks after Pentagon lawyers took their concerns to Mr. Haynes, who then took them to Mr. Rumsfeld. Even if you believe the "coercive" techniques policy was a mistake, its reversal was due in no small part to Mr. Haynes, who did his duty of providing legal analysis. Mr. Haynes met with Senator McCain for an hour last month and agreed to answer written questions about the issue.

Senator McCain's anger over the Air Force's tanker deal with Boeing also unfairly extends to Mr. Haynes. As general counsel, Mr. Haynes had the job of reviewing and, in some cases, redacting the small library's worth of documents the Senator demanded. A McCain spokeswoman tells us that the Senator has not made a decision about whether to support the nomination.

It's hard to see how opposing Mr. Haynes would achieve anything except win the Senators some fleeting praise in the establishment media. It wouldn't impress GOP primary voters in Mr. Graham's home state of South Carolina, an important Presidential primary state in 2008 and home to many Haynes supporters. In defeating Mr. Haynes, Mr. McCain would mainly be validating those critics who want to punish anyone associated with the war in Iraq. Is this how a President McCain would treat his appointees who come under political fire for offering honest counsel?

There are 18 vacancies on the appeals-court bench -- 10% of the total -- and not many weeks left to fill them before election-year campaigning makes judicial confirmations next to impossible. Seven nominees are currently waiting for a hearing or vote. With Republicans in danger of losing Senate seats, if not their majority, now is the time to honor one of their campaign pledges from 2004 by confirming Mr. Bush's judicial nominees.

Boom Of The Judicial Canon (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

In Texas, calling someone a "spokesman" comes close to fighting words.

Take the case of the Honorable Nathan L. Hecht, a justice of the Supreme Court of Texas and a well-known conservative jurist. A longtime friend of White House counsel Harriet Miers, Hecht gave more than 120 media interviews during her failed Supreme Court nomination. Hecht coordinated strategy with White House aides and agreed to take media calls straight from the White House, according to a recent investigation.

He even joked to the Texas Lawyer newspaper that he was acting as "PR for the White House."

But a "spokesman?" No way, he told the Texas State Commission on Judicial Conduct, which last month admonished Hecht for his activities on behalf of Miers. The Texas Code of Judicial Conduct prohibits judges from doing anything to "advance the private interests of the judge or others."

DOJ_NMG_0032467

Hecht said his actions did not promote Miers's nomination. He called a New York Times headline that described him as Miers's "spokesman" inaccurate and misleading, saying he had been "simply providing information to people who called."

(Some in Washington might argue that "providing information" is the opposite of what spokesmen for this administration do.)

Earlier this year, a panel of current federal appellate judges testified before Congress on behalf of then-Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said there was no conflict of interest, even though a future Justice Alito could review the rulings of the same judges. At the time, Specter said Alito and the judges have "a confluence of interests," not a conflict.

Hecht said he will "vigorously contest" the admonition. "I believe that my statements on matters of national public interest did not offend canons of judicial ethics and were fully protected by the First Amendment," he said in a prepared statement.

Hecht, who said he and Miers have dated over the years, told the commission that his close relationship with the top White House lawyer "made it impossible for him to remain silent when asked by reporters to provide factual information about Miers' background, experience and views on religion and abortion."

Hecht told the commission he had not been speaking for his friend but had merely been "swept up in the task of providing information about [Miers] to those who asked for it."

So don't go calling him a "spokesman."

Battle Over Foreign-Aid Spending Heats Up (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration and Congress are headed for a clash over how to spend U.S. aid for the developing world.

President Bush's decision to consolidate billions of dollars in foreign-aid programs under the State Department puts him at odds with Congress's age-old prerogative of earmarking foreign-aid funds for favorite issues, such as immunizing children or encouraging sexual abstinence for AIDS control.

"Both Congress and the executive branch want to decide where the money goes, and there's a struggle between the two," says Steve Radelet, senior fellow at the Center for Global Development, a Washington think tank.

The brewing storm over foreign aid is the latest fight this year between a weakened White House and congressional Republicans eager to show independence going into November's elections. Lawmakers can't be too assertive, since lobbying scandals have called into question the practice of inserting earmarks into spending bills. But because foreign aid helps define the U.S. image overseas, Congress believes it must retain a major say.

At the center of the struggle is Randall Tobias, a former Eli Lilly & Co. chief executive who is now the country's first director of foreign assistance. With marching orders from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Mr. Tobias is remodeling $16.6 billion in U.S. foreign-assistance programs to give the State Department more power to use aid to further American foreign-policy goals.

Under Ms. Rice's plan, State Department officials in Washington will identify their strategic priorities -- such as fighting terrorism and promoting economic growth -- in the 154 countries that receive U.S. aid. The U.S. ambassador in each country will determine which projects the U.S. will fund to achieve those goals. Mr. Tobias plans to have ambassadors in 35 countries test the approach this summer.

The administration is "trying to ensure we're bringing all U.S. government foreign aid into a strategic package," Mr. Tobias says. Right now, he says, foreign-aid decisions seem almost haphazard, a product of mandates from Congress and on-the-ground judgments by half a dozen U.S. agencies and departments.

Lawmakers, however, are loath to cede control. Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.), a member of the Appropriations Committee, is drafting legislation that would require the administration to spend 50% of aid to Africa on such items as water wells, immunizations and teacher training. Mr. Brownback says he became disenchanted with how the administration is delivering foreign aid during a December trip to the Democratic Republic of Congo.

DOJ_NMG_0032468

"It was like you were just taking a lot of money and scattering it around, and there was nothing real at the end of the day," says Mr. Brownback, who is part of a growing pro-aid movement among American Christian conservatives.

Mr. Tobias's team recently assembled a two-page internal analysis of spending patterns in U.S. aid, which jumped to $27.5 billion in fiscal 2005 from $10 billion in fiscal 2000. The patterns, they found, imply that the five major priorities of American policy are promoting security interests in the Middle East, fostering post-Cold War partnerships with Eastern Europe, fighting AIDS in Africa, countering narcotics in the Andes and providing humanitarian relief.

Mr. Tobias and his team say that while those issues are important, together they don't seem to reflect a coherent strategy of leveraging aid into foreign-policy achievements. "Aside from Iraq and Afghanistan, our foreign-assistance priorities haven't changed at all" since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, says one administration official. Mr. Tobias says the solution is to concentrate more authority with the executive branch. The administration's overarching goal, according to State Department documents, should be "helping to build and sustain democratic, well-governed states that will respond to the needs of their people and conduct themselves responsibly in the international system."

The administration's approach has rattled the private charities that distribute much U.S. aid in the field. While officials at the charities are careful not to appear opposed to the idea of overhaul, many were upset that Ms. Rice didn't seek their views.

Behind the charities' concern is a suspicion that the administration might direct more aid to foreign allies in the fight against Islamic extremism, and away from the world's neediest. "Poverty alleviation and long-term development approaches should not be the casualties of shorter-term strategic objectives," says Todd Shelton, director of public policy for InterAction, an umbrella group representing more than 160 development charities.

Meantime, prominent lawmakers continue to force the administration's hand by earmarking aid money. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) helped set aside $200 million this year to be used for drinking-water supply projects, at least $50 million of which must be spent in Africa. Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) has set aside money for matters such as human-rights and refugee causes in Burma, as well as a small Kentucky-based nonprofit, Voice for Humanity, which has received millions of dollars over the years and is represented by a former McConnell aide.

The practice is a bipartisan one. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.), had a hand in setting aside $15 million for "neglected diseases" that get less attention than AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis.

Mr. Tobias, who gets good marks from both parties, says he will gradually win Congress over as he did in his last job, running the president's huge AIDS initiative.

"My hope is Congress will see this strategic approach as a good substitute for a number of the earmarks we're dealing with today," he says.

Advice Is Not Well Taken (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, June 7, 2006

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and a top Bush administration official urged Republican investigators on Capitol Hill to change how they conduct probes of the executive branch in a private meeting earlier this spring.

The unusual request infuriated some of the GOP aides, who countered that the administration has repeatedly failed to cooperate with their requests for information. The staffers expressed outrage that the meeting was even taking place, calling it inappropriate for a White House policymaker to tell investigators how to scrutinize the Bush administration.

“The meeting did not go well,” a GOP source said.

Others thought the forum was somewhat productive, but acknowledged it was bizarre.

While Republican aides expressed different reactions, the pleas by Gingrich and Office of Management and Budget (OMB) representative Clay Johnson have raised new separation-of-powers questions as lawmakers and White House officials iron out their differences over the FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson’s (D-La.) office last month.

Democrats are seizing on the meeting as proof of the cozy relationship between the GOP-led Congress and the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0032469

Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), laughed when asked about congressional investigations of the administration, stating, "The GOP-led Congress has completely abdicated its oversight responsibility, and the American people are paying the price."

Gingrich set up the meeting and asked Johnson, OMB's deputy director for management, to attend. The former Speaker, who has not ruled out a presidential bid in 2008, communicates regularly with lawmakers and staffers on a wide range of policy issues.

Some Republicans defend their oversight activities, noting their critical reviews of how the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) reacted in the wake of Hurricane Katrina as well as other investigations that showed poor performances by other federal agencies.

Johnson and Gingrich spoke at length about Congress's important oversight role but stressed that the focus should be on solving problems, not issuing press releases.

A few Capitol Hill officials say it is inconsistent for Gingrich to recommend that investigators move away from a "gotcha" mentality when he, as Speaker, ordered Republican lawmakers to hold rigorous oversight of the Clinton administration, adding that those probes were designed to embarrass the Democratic president.

Gingrich did not comment for this article.

Investigators asked Johnson about the timing of the meeting, but sources say those questions were not directly answered.

Some came away from the meeting believing there was an implied, unstated message: Ease up on oversight this election year.

In an interview yesterday, Johnson said, "It never occurred to me that it would be interpreted that way. We want more oversight, not less. We are for transparency."

But Johnson made clear to The Hill and to GOP aides that he believes oversight activities should be done differently. He favors monthly, collaborative meetings between the OMB and oversight officials instead of lawmakers' holding "gotcha" hearings.

"Let's set up an action plan to solve the problem," Johnson said. "Let's not just leave it at 'I've embarrassed these [administration] people, and that's my only goal.'"

Johnson also took issue with how lawmakers pose questions to administration officials during congressional hearings, saying that some the questions "are not constructive in their wordings."

James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University, called Johnson's advice strange and comical.

"I find it interesting to have an administration official lecturing people that are overseeing what they are doing," Thurber said.

Thurber, a critic of GOP oversight of the administration, said Republican investigators "get nothing out of OMB."

Asked for comment about how aides described his advice as bizarre, Johnson said, "If they took offense, I'm sorry they took offense. … I would suggest they're wrong."

Johnson cited testimony from Comptroller General David Walker criticizing congressional oversight of the executive branch and similar testimony from former House Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas).

Congressional investigators "should talk to Walker and Armey," Johnson said.

Congressional aides say that Johnson meant well but that they are frustrated by what they perceive to be his view that the OMB can adequately oversee the activities of all federal agencies.

"The whole attitude of 'We're good' is annoying," a congressional aide said.

Capitol Hill aides say that if the Bush administration is sensitive about oversight now it could be in for a rude awakening in the 110th Congress. Political analysts predict that there is a decent chance that Democrats may take control of at least one of the chambers in the next Congress and the House is more likely to flip than the Senate.

A Democratic-controlled House is one of the administration's worst fears because Democrats would likely issue dozens, if not hundreds, of subpoenas in the course of their oversight investigations of the Bush administration. The minority party in each chamber lacks subpoena authority.

Republican investigators from the House and Senate attended the Gingrich-Johnson meeting. No lawmakers were present, and Democratic staffers were not invited. Some investigators in both chambers said they were unaware of the meeting.

Staffers for Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), regarded as the most aggressive oversight-oriented lawmaker, did not attend the Johnson-Gingrich meeting.

In a 2004 interview with The Hill, Grassley said the administration regularly gets irked by his oversight initiatives: "They see it as a Republican picking on a Republican. It's no different [from] when [former President] Clinton was in. The difference is that when I did it in the Clinton administration, I didn't get help from Democrats. When I do it with a Republican president, I get a lot of help out of Democrats, and that compounds [the administration's anger]."

Democrats Guard Legislative Power (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

Angered over recent media reports that President Bush has effectively disavowed hundreds of laws enacted during his tenure, a handful of House Democrats are now pushing measures to shore up Congress' legislative authority.

Citing concerns over maintaining a clear Separation of Powers between the legislative and executive branches, Reps. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) and Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Texas) introduced separate bills shortly before Memorial Day.

Both Democrats, as well as Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.), who co-authored Frank's bill, have criticized White House use of "signing statements," a practice that allows the president to attach an official declaration to newly enacted laws, and one historically used as a legal interpretation for executive branch agencies.

But in those statements, printed in the Federal Record, Bush also has asserted that he holds the power to ignore provisions of law that he believes are in conflict with the Constitution, essentially setting aside at least portions of those laws.

According to a late-April report in the Boston Globe, Bush has issued more than 750 such statements during his six years in office, more than the total number issued by all other commanders in chief in the nation's history.

On Monday, Frank criticized the use of signing statements and characterized the declarations as "a line-item veto over legislation."

"Bills are often carefully worked out so they modify provisions and how they operate," as well as to win support from lawmakers, Frank said. "What's he's doing is basically saying, 'I'll take the parts that I want, and I'll disregard the other parts.'"

While it is not possible for Congress to prohibit the president from issuing signing statements — under the Constitution the president is charged with the execution of laws — Frank said he would like to curb the process.

"We would like to try and stop them," Frank said. "It is not constitutionally possible for [Congress] to prevent them."

Under the Massachusetts lawmaker's proposal, any time the president issues a signing statement setting aside a newly enacted law, the White House would be required to notify Congress within 10 days and include an explanation for the decision. In addition, the proposal would require the White House to provide lawmakers with the text of those statements issued before the passage of Frank's bill.

The measure also would create a series of expedited procedures for Members to introduce a bill or resolution responding to the signing statement. "If [the president] gets what he wants with modifications ... we should then have a chance to take back what he wants," Frank said.

Members also could request a report from the office of the House general counsel outlining any legal challenges that could be raised by an individual lawmaker.

An alternate proposal introduced by Jackson Lee in late May, the Congressional Lawmaking Authority Protection Act, also aims to reduce the use of signing statements, but it would do so by essentially refusing the proclamations of any authoritative power.

Under the Texas lawmaker's legislation, federal, state and independent agencies, as well as federal and state courts, would be prohibited from giving any legal significance to signing statements when interpreting federal laws.

In addition, the measure would bar the use of federal funds for signing statements that contradict "the intent of Congress" in enacting the law.

DOJ_NMG_0032471

"Presidential signing statements seek to alter Congress' primacy in the legislative process by giving the President's intention in signing the bill equal or greater standing to Congress' intention in enacting the bill," Jackson Lee said in a May statement. "This would be a radical, indeed revolutionary, change to our system of separated powers and checks and balances."

Jackson Lee's measure effectively would force the White House to issue a veto, rather than resort to a signing statement. Bush has yet to issue a veto well into his second term in office.

While Frank's legislation has been assigned to the House Rules and Judiciary panels, and Jackson Lee's measure has been assigned to the House Government Reform Committee, no hearings are scheduled yet on either proposal.

In the Senate, Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has suggested his panel could hold a hearing on the use of presidential signing statements, but similar legislation has yet to be introduced in that chamber.

Frank noted: "Given the contempt this administration has shown for the process, hearings are a good first step if there's a likelihood they will lead to something."

Data Theft Affected Most In Military (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Christopher Lee

Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Social Security numbers and other personal information for as many as 2.2 million U.S. military personnel -- including nearly 80 percent of the active-duty force -- were among the data stolen from the home of a Department of Veterans Affairs analyst last month, federal officials said yesterday, raising concerns about national security as well as identity theft.

The department announced that personal data for as many as 1.1 million active-duty military personnel, 430,000 National Guard members and 645,000 reserve members may have been included on an electronic file stolen May 3 from a department employee's house in Aspen Hill. The data include names, birth dates and Social Security numbers, VA spokesman Matt Burns said.

Defense officials said the loss is unprecedented and raises concerns about the safety of U.S. military forces. But they cautioned that law enforcement agencies investigating the incident have not found evidence that the stolen information has been used to commit identity theft.

"Anytime there is a theft of personal information, it is concerning and requires us and our members to be vigilant," Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said. He said the loss is "the largest that I am aware of."

Army spokesman Paul Boyce said: "Obviously there are issues associated with identity theft and force protection."

For example, security experts said, the information could be used to find out where military personnel live. "This essentially can create a Zip code for where each of the service members and [their] families live, and if it fell into the wrong hands could potentially put them at jeopardy of being targeted," said David Heyman, director of the homeland security program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS).

Another worry is that the information could reach foreign governments and their intelligence services or other hostile forces, allowing them to target service members and their families, the experts said.

"There is a global black market in this sort of information . . . and you suddenly have a treasure trove of information on the U.S. military that is available," said James Lewis, director of technology and public policy at CSIS.

One defense official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter, called the extent of the data loss "monumental."

The new revelations significantly increase the potential harm from what was already one of the largest data breaches in U.S. history. On May 22, VA disclosed that an external computer hard drive was stolen May 3 from the home of a VA employee and that it contained unencrypted names and birth dates for as many as 26.5 million veterans who were discharged after 1975 or submitted benefit claims. It also included Social Security numbers for 19.6 million of those veterans, VA officials said.

Initially VA thought that all of the 26.5 million people affected were veterans, but a database comparison revealed that they also included the bulk of active-duty military services, as well as more than 1 million members of the National Guard and reserves.

DOJ_NMG_0032472

Montgomery County police released a description yesterday of the stolen laptop and its external hard drive because they said it may have been purchased by someone who does not realize the value of its content. "It could have shown up at a yard sale or a secondhand store," police spokeswoman Lucille Baur said. "This is a time of the year when parents may be buying computers for kids going to college in the fall."

Montgomery County police are offering a $50,000 reward for information that allows authorities to recover the laptop. The computer is a Hewlett-Packard model zv5360us and the external hard drive is an HP External Personal Media Drive.

The Washington Post is not publishing the name of the career data analyst whose laptop was stolen in response to a request from law enforcement authorities who are investigating its disappearance.

The breach outraged veterans -- even more so because senior VA officials knew about the theft within hours of the crime but did not tell VA Secretary Jim Nicholson until 13 days later. The 60-year-old analyst, who had been taking home sensitive data for at least three years without authorization, has been fired, officials have said. His boss resigned last week and another senior VA official is on administrative leave pending investigations by the FBI, the VA inspector general and Montgomery County police.

A coalition of veterans groups filed a class-action lawsuit against the federal government yesterday, contending that privacy rights were violated and seeking $1,000 in damages for each affected veteran.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia, demands that VA fully disclose who was affected by the theft, and asks a court to prohibit VA workers from using sensitive data until safeguards are in place. Burns said the department does not comment on pending litigation. He said VA has received no reports of stolen data being used for identity theft or other criminal activity.

VA receives records for every new recruit because active-duty personnel, National Guard members and reservists are eligible for certain VA benefits, such as GI Bill educational assistance and the home-loan program.

"The department will continue to make every effort to inform and help protect those potentially affected, and is working with the Department of Defense to notify all affected personnel," Nicholson said.

Rep. Lane Evans (D-Ill.), ranking member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, said yesterday that he was "appalled" at the data breach and called for a Government Accountability Office investigation into VA information security practices.

Research shows that it is not unusual for government employees to take home sensitive data on laptops, Lewis said. "The rules we have are either chaotic or nonexistent. . . . We still have a paper rules government when we are a digital nation."

Stolen Computer Had Data On More Troops (USAT)

USA Today, June 7, 2006

A stolen Veterans Affairs laptop computer had personal data on about 2.2 million current members of the military, not just the 50,000 initially reported, the Pentagon said Tuesday. The stolen data include the names, birth dates and Social Security numbers of as many as 1.1 million active-duty troops from all the armed forces and nearly 1.1 million National Guard and Reserves personnel, according to a Pentagon briefing paper distributed to Congress.

The disclosure is the latest revision by the government as to who was affected when burglars took a government laptop and disks from the home of a VA employee on May 3. The VA said when it disclosed the theft May 22 that the data involved up to 26.5 million veterans discharged since 1975, as well as some of their spouses.

Meanwhile, a coalition of veterans groups charged in a federal class-action lawsuit in Washington that their privacy rights were violated by the theft. The suit demands that the VA fully disclose which military personnel are affected and seeks $1,000 in damages for each. VA spokesman Matt Burns declined to comment.

Police in Montgomery County, Md., where the burglary occurred, are offering a $50,000 reward for the return of the stolen Hewlett-Packard computer gear.

Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar sought as much as $500,000 and a stake in a technology venture in his country, Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., told an FBI informant, according to court documents filed in a bribery probe of the congressman. Jefferson allegedly said he delivered “African art,” which authorities say was code for cash, to the Potomac, Md., home of Abubakar's wife late on July 31.

DOJ_NMG_0032473

The details were in an affidavit for a federal court warrant to search the house. The affidavit was filed in August and unsealed Monday.

His lawyer, Edward Weidenfeld, said Abubakar did nothing wrong and is cooperating with authorities.

The FBI said in a different affidavit reported earlier that Jefferson took a $100,000 bribe. Jefferson, who has not been charged, has denied wrongdoing.

House GOP Seeks To Keep Promise On Earmarks (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

Although House leaders have yet to appoint Members from their chamber to smooth out differences between House and Senate lobbying reform bills, they are working to make good on their pledge to appropriators that any new earmark disclosures apply equally to all committees.

A GOP leadership aide said that Republican leaders are working with each of the relevant committees to find a way to make earmark disclosures uniform for any bill that contains earmarks.

"We need to have that uniform," said this aide. "We are working committee by committee."

In order to get enough support to pass the lobbying and ethics reform legislation, House leaders pledged that any bill would contain disclosure of earmarks, including those in tax-writing and authorizing measures — not just in appropriations bills.

A spokesman for House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said that the commitment on earmarks remains.

"They're committed to ensuring that earmark reform applies to every committee," said Kevin Smith.

Another House GOP leadership aide said that the Speaker's office hasn't fully decided whether conferees from the House will be selected this week but added that discussions are taking place at the staff level.

"They have found a lot of common ground," the aide said. "More common ground than differences."

Several sources in Congress and on K Street said they have not detected a sense of urgency from House leaders on appointing conferees.

Jo Maney, a spokeswoman for House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) said that "things are being discussed at a staff level," but she declined to go into specifics. She also said that since Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is the one who must appoint conferees, she didn't know when that is likely to happen.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said conferees have not been selected but could come this week.

Fred Wertheimer, president of campaign finance and lobbying watchdog group Democracy 21, said there is much speculation about House leaders not wanting to appoint conferees until the House and Senate have worked out most of their differences between the two bills. Wertheimer added that the two main differences involve reforms of 527 political groups and earmarks.

There is a procedural reason why it may make sense for the House GOP to delay the naming of conferees until the key issues are resolved.

House rules say that 20 calendar days and 10 legislative days after conferees are appointed, Members can file motions to instruct. "That would mean that Democrats could go to the floor as much as they wanted to and pile on" motions, Wertheimer said.

One lobbyist said that such maneuvers can lead to "a series of embarrassing votes for rank-and-file Republican Members. The only way you appoint conferees is when you think you can work out a conference agreement" within that 20-calendar- and 10-legislative-days window.

House leaders, Wertheimer said, "made a commitment to the appropriators" that they would bring a bill to the House floor that includes earmark disclosure for all earmarks.

"Whether they can actually work that out remains to be seen," Wertheimer said. "Who knows where Ways and Means and Transportation" — two of the key committees for tax and authorizing measures — are on the issue. "That probably is the toughest thing they have to work out," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0032474

Ianthe Jackson, spokeswoman for the House Ways and Means Committee, said she had not heard anything about earmark negotiations. A spokesman for the Transportation panel did not return a call seeking comment.

Senate Emphasis On Ideology Has Some In G.O.P. Anxious (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — Though some Republican candidates may relish the Senate's current concentration on same-sex marriage and other ideologically charged topics, Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island is not among them.

"It may stir up my primary voters a little bit against me," said Mr. Chafee, a centrist Republican up for re-election. He opposes the push for a constitutional amendment to prohibit same-sex marriage and is under intense pressure to back a proposed amendment that would forbid flag burning. "I'm collateral damage."

Other Republicans, including some conservatives, say Mr. Chafee may not be the only potential victim of what they see as a misguided effort to appeal to social conservatives by staging votes intended primarily to make a point about the party's values. They say that voters are more concerned about the economy, health care and immigration, and that replaying the marriage debate in particular could do as much damage as good as Republicans fight to retain control of Congress.

"I don't think the problem is primarily with social conservatives," said Pat Toomey, a former Republican House member who now heads the Club for Growth, a conservative political action committee. "The problem I see is with economic conservatives who see out-of-control spending, huge deficits and that Republicans can't make the tax cuts permanent. The problem is on a different field."

Those who doubt the strategy are up against a long-held belief among Republican leaders that highlighting issues like same-sex marriage, flag desecration and abortion speaks to the party's convictions and carries concrete political benefits.

Proponents of the strategy say bringing up the issues now forces Democrats to cast votes that Republicans can use to demonstrate differences between the parties in an election year. They say the votes are important in re-energizing conservatives who have grown disaffected in the last year or two — a potentially vital step in a midterm election in which turnout is often low and races typically hinge on which side does better in turning out its base.

A poll released Tuesday showed a slide in support for President Bush among members of his party. The survey, by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, found Mr. Bush experiencing steep declines among those calling themselves moderate Republicans, with conservatives turning away from him as well, though more slowly.

The poll, based on a survey of 3,204 adults conducted from April 27 to May 22, found that Mr. Bush's support among moderate and liberal Republicans had declined to 56 percent from 81 percent in December 2004, immediately after his re-election, while conservative approval had fallen to 78 percent from 93 percent.

There are multiple reasons why Congress is taking up the issues now. The legislative calendar is relatively thin. The Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, who controls the Senate's schedule, has been trying to convince social conservatives that he is one of them in advance of a potential presidential bid. And while the leadership wants election-year votes on social issues, they do not want them too close to November in case they backfire.

Republicans skeptical of the value of pushing volatile social issues onto the agenda say the calculation is different when it comes to contentious economic issues, especially tax cuts. They say that taxes touch everyone's lives directly and that debating them helps to highlight what is at stake for individuals, in dollars-and-cents terms, in the November election.

As a result, there is much less debate among Republicans about the wisdom of forcing a vote in the Senate this week on the repeal of the federal estate tax, an issue that ranks at or near the top of the wish lists of economic conservatives.

The politics are not so clear-cut when it comes to social issues. Even Republicans who see an advantage in the marriage proposal say it is politically risky in some respects and could complicate the re-election chances of endangered Republican incumbents in the Northeast and in other spots like South Florida.

Yet they defend the fight as necessary to solidifying the party's base before any effort to expand Republican appeal. And they say the issue could be used against Democratic incumbents in conservative states like Georgia and should help drive voters to the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0032475

But the notion that social issues can influence turnout in a substantial way is a matter of some dispute.

Matthew Dowd, who was Mr. Bush's campaign strategist in 2004, said it was a myth that emphasizing same-sex marriage in battleground states like Ohio was critical to Mr. Bush's re-election. He said turnout patterns were comparable in states where same-sex marriage was a chief topic and where it was not.

"If you vote on it, vote on it for principle, because it is going to have little or no benefit in an election cycle," Mr. Dowd said.

Even as they pressed their case Tuesday, Republican advocates of the same-sex marriage ban acknowledged that they were unlikely to prevail Wednesday in a vote to limit debate, effectively killing the marriage amendment for the year. The House is still expected to consider its own version. Senate backers said they were slowly building support.

"There are very few significant issues around here that just come up and are passed in one year," said Senator David Vitter, Republican of Louisiana, who noted the increase since 2004 in the number of Senate Republicans who would vote for the proposed amendment. "It often takes a work in progress over several years to build toward success."

Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania and a chief proponent of the marriage ban, conceded that the issue was one many Republicans could do without.

"I know in many meetings of our colleagues when the issue of marriage comes up, heads drop," Mr. Santorum said in a floor speech. "It is just an issue that people just feel uncomfortable talking about. It's something that maybe in some respects they feel like, why do we even have to? Why is this even an issue?"

Dismissing the idea that politics had played a role in the timing, he said Senate Republicans had decided to act because the institution of marriage was under threat, and court decisions were slow in coming.

But one Republican strategist, Ed Rollins, said it was a mistake for the president and Senate leaders to focus attention on a marriage ban now, in what could look like a panicked reaction to shrinking public support.

"What the president needs to do is look like a leader, not be somebody who looks like a politician who is overreacting to polls," Mr. Rollins said. "If anything, he is reminding people of what they don't like about the Republican Party."

It was clear that others in the Senate were ready to put the matter behind them, and they appeared to be getting their wish as the leadership set the vote for Wednesday.

"It is the leader's decision as to what the agenda should be," said Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who opposes the amendment. "I just hope we get to the defense authorization bill as soon as possible."

Bush Chats With Children In Twin Cities Suburb (AP)

By Travis Coleman

The Associated Press, June 6, 2006

ST. LOUIS PARK, Minn. - First lady Laura Bush brought her get-involved message to Minnesota on Tuesday, visiting a community center that's been serving at-risk children for years.

Bush spoke to more than 20 children in the library at the Meadowbrook Collaborative, then examined crafts and played a game that gathered people in a circle to flap the edges of a large sheet.

The brief visit was intended to promote the federal program known as Helping America's Youth.

"This is a really great example of what communities can do when they work together," Bush said.

Meadowbrook offers health, education and safety programs to children in the area. That includes homework help, student attendance tracking, and free dental services and immunization clinics. The collaborative, formed in 1993, is credited with reducing crime in its part of this western Twin Cities suburb.

The children introduced themselves to Bush, showed her artwork, and talked about school. Bush capped her visit by sharing refreshments and cookies before heading to a fundraiser for Minnesota GOP Senate candidate Mark Kennedy.

Afterward, 9-year-old Collin Reece said it was the first time he'd ever met someone important. "This was, like, the best thing to ever happen to me," he said excitedly.

Collin's mother, Crystal Harshe, said she is a single parent who works, so she appreciates Meadowbrook for keeping kids safe and helping them with homework.

"It's awesome," she said. "They really take care of the kids."

DOJ_NMG_0032476

Rikardo Thales, 8, said he likes coming to the center for help with his math homework - but also to mix in a little fun.

"I like 100 percent of it," he said.

Earlier Tuesday, Bush promoted the federal program at a gathering in Indianapolis of hundreds of clergy, social workers, teachers and others. It was the first of several regional conferences for Helping America's Youth.

ON THE NET

Helping America's Youth: http://www.helpingamericasyouth.gov

Government Opens Drive To Offer New Hires Flexibility In Work Locations And Schedules (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

The president's chief civil service adviser yesterday rolled out a new approach to hiring the next generation of federal workers, part of an effort to help agencies better compete for talent in the labor force as baby boomers leave the government.

Linda M. Springer , director of the Office of Personnel Management, launched a "career patterns" initiative aimed at making the government a more attractive employer by offering increased flexibility and better work-life balance to potential hires who are less interested in the traditional 9-to-5 job and 30-year federal career.

The initiative seeks to take many workplace practices in use across government -- telecommuting, nonstandard work hours, part-time work -- and treat them as natural employment options rather than as exceptions.

The OPM outlined several scenarios in a briefing book on the initiative. Agencies should consider it normal, the OPM said, to hire mid-career technology experts to spend a few years on a breakthrough project and then rotate them back into industry or the nonprofit sector. Or to hire employees to rule on benefit claims who would work from home at any hour of the day or night rather than let their lives be defined by rush-hour commutes to work at a desk in an office.

Springer said a retirement wave across government -- projections show that 40 percent of the federal workforce will retire by 2015 -- will pitch agencies into a war for talent with corporations, consulting firms and other employers.

The career patterns initiative, Springer said, represents "an entirely different approach and entirely different way of thinking about how we go out and market to an increasingly competitive marketplace for talent." She said: "We can't just necessarily go out and do things the way we did in the past. . . . Everybody else is going to be out there very aggressively with new techniques and new methods."

Springer convened a group of federal hiring officials for the launch of the OPM campaign and suggested that in the future, as many as half of the jobs in the government might be suitable for nontraditional work arrangements.

"We've got to be open to thinking about a wide range of arrangements," Springer told the group, which included Dan Blair , the OPM deputy director; Marta Brito PÃ©rez , an OPM associate director; George Nesterczuk , recently named by the president to be vice chairman of the Federal Salary Council, an advisory group on locality pay adjustments; and Max Stier , president of the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service.

Officials from the Patent and Trademark Office, Interior Department and the OPM presented testimonials on how they have managed to reshape jobs to benefit the government and employees.

The PTO, for example, has 4,000 patent examiners and plans to hire 1,000 examiners this year to help reduce a backlog in patent applications, said Vickers B. Meadows , the chief administrative officer. In March, the agency started training examiners on how to work at home, an arrangement offered employees in the trademark division for several years.

About 220 examiners have given up their office space and are working at home four days a week, and officials expect the number working from home to increase to about 3,000 by 2011, Meadows said.

Lauren Ailes , a budget analyst at the PTO, said flexible working hours at the agency had permitted her and her husband to care for a newborn without having to turn to day care.

Springer said the initiative will require agencies to report by Jan. 1 on their workforces and what types of jobs could be recast to appeal to the next generation of federal employees.Veto Threat on FAA Bill

DOJ_NMG_0032477

Any legislation to change the rules for resolving contract disputes at the Federal Aviation Administration is strongly opposed at the White House, the administration said in a written statement. If Congress sends such a bill to the president, senior advisers will recommend a veto, the statement said.

The FAA on Monday, after a 60-day review period ended with no action by Congress, imposed a contract that would limit pay raises for air traffic controllers. A House bill sponsored by Rep. Steven C. LaTourette (R-Ohio) would set aside the statutory deadline and send the FAA and the National Air Traffic Controllers Association back to the bargaining table.

"Legislative intervention now could increase the pay of federal workers who are already on average the highest paid in government, increase pressure on the deficit, and displace funding for modernization of the air traffic control system," the administration said.

Hank's Likely Headaches (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

It's hard not to feel some sympathy for departing Treasury Secretary John Snow. He worked tirelessly for President Bush, trudging all over the country to plug the administration's policies. In 2005 Snow spoke at the Detroit Economic Club, the Omaha Chamber of Commerce and the Sony Technology Center in Mount Pleasant, Pa. For all his trouble, Snow earned only perfunctory public gratitude from the president and was subjected to repeated rumors that the White House was unhappy with his performance. Worse, he seemed to have had little effect on policy or the economy.

The same fate may befall Snow's anointed successor, Henry "Hank" Paulson, head of the highly profitable investment banking firm Goldman Sachs. Of course, it's not supposed to be this way. Paulson comes advertised as a Wall Street take-charge guy who will improve public economic confidence and reassert control over policy.

But how is that to happen? Unless he blunders badly, Paulson's role as chief economic spokesman doesn't matter much. Most Americans don't know the name of the Treasury secretary and don't care. What they care about is $3-a-gallon gasoline and 6.5 percent mortgage rates.

It's possible that Paulson will have more influence on policy than Snow had. As economist Roger Kubarych of HVB America points out, there's no shortage of challenges: trying to avert big bankruptcies (GM) in the auto industry; preventing disorderly shifts in global currency rates; curbing federal spending on retirement benefits; fixing the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., which insures defined-benefit pensions. The trouble is that Bush's positions on most issues are already set. Even if they weren't, many powerful interests -- Congress, the United Auto Workers, China, AARP -- may limit what Paulson can actually accomplish.

To excel as Treasury secretary, Paulson needs something no one wants: an economic crisis that enables him to act as hero, much as then-Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin (also once head of Goldman Sachs) and then-Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan did during the 1997-98 Asian financial crisis. Any new upset would spotlight Paulson (assuming the Senate confirms him) along with the new Fed chairman, Ben Bernanke. What are the odds of a crisis? Not great -- but not negligible, either. After three years of strong performance (5.3 million new jobs, 4.6 percent unemployment), the U.S. economy could be at a tipping point. Two problems loom: one traditional, one not.

The traditional problem is inflation. It's increasing, as it often does after a long business expansion. Strong demand allows companies to raise prices. Low unemployment puts upward pressure on wages. In the past 12 months, the consumer price index (CPI) has increased 3.5 percent. It's not just gasoline prices. So-called core inflation -- all items minus food and energy prices -- is 2.3 percent. By contrast, the CPI rose only 1.9 percent in 2003, and core inflation was only 1.5 percent.

All this creates a dilemma for the Fed. Since mid-2004, it has been raising short-term interest rates to stymie inflation by slowing the economy. That might be happening now. Housing construction and sales have weakened; consumer spending could follow. Should the Fed continue raising rates to ensure that inflation subsides? Or would that cause a sharp slowdown, even a recession?

The less traditional problem involves global financial markets -- markets around the world for stocks, bonds and currencies. Since April stock markets have declined. From their recent highs through last evening, the Dow is down 5.5 percent; the Nikkei (Tokyo), 12.4 percent; the Kospi (Seoul), 11.1 percent; and the Bovespa (Sao Paulo), 13 percent. Although these declines are not huge, they all happened together. Meanwhile, interest rates on bonds have risen, and the dollar has dropped against the euro and the yen.

DOJ_NMG_0032478

It seems that national financial markets, once fairly compartmentalized, are increasingly interconnected and interdependent. Companies such as Goldman Sachs, mutual funds, pension funds and hedge funds (loosely regulated pools from small numbers of wealthy investors) can move money easily across borders and react to the same events.

The danger is that these two developments will interact to create a chain reaction in financial markets that damages the world economy. Investors worry that tighter credit in the United States -- and Europe and Japan -- will imperil expansion and expose speculative investment practices. Or the trigger could be huge trade imbalances (U.S. deficits, Asian surpluses), high oil prices, terrorism or protectionism against China, says economist Desmond Lachman of the American Enterprise Institute. Just last week the European Central Bank warned that hedge funds posed a "major risk" to financial stability.

As Treasury secretary, Paulson may be frustrated by long-standing problems that elude solution. Or he may grapple with a surprising crisis to prevent some greater calamity. With hindsight, people may conclude that Snow was fairly shrewd. He knew when to leave.

Rope-a-Senator (WP)

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

THE MOST disturbing thing isn't that Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) accepted free ringside tickets to Las Vegas boxing matches, worth between several hundred and several thousand dollars each. It's that even when pressed the senator didn't see anything wrong with taking the freebies at the same time he was pushing federal legislation to oversee the industry. "I would be criticized if I didn't go," he said after the Associated Press broke the story. "It's just like going to an Ohio State football game, an Arizona State football game -- in Nevada, boxing is it."

Senate rules, which normally limit gifts to $50, don't bar more valuable presents from state and local governments, and the tickets in this case came from the Nevada Athletic Commission, a state agency. The rules don't even require that such gifts be disclosed, which reflects a problem with the rules, not with Mr. Reid's behavior.

Nor was Mr. Reid doing the athletic commission's bidding; to the contrary, he was pushing legislation it opposed, and there's no indication that he changed his position after attending the fights.

But commission officials were eager for an opportunity to lobby the senator -- and where better than ringside? This is the point of rules on gifts: It's unseemly for lawmakers to be accepting benefits from those who are trying to influence them on legislation. The Senate Ethics Manual cautions that lawmakers "should be wary of accepting any gift where it appears that the gift is motivated by a desire to reward, influence, or elicit favorable official action."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who teamed up with Mr. Reid on the boxing legislation, got that point. As reported by the AP's John Solomon, Mr. McCain joined Mr. Reid at a championship fight in 2004 but paid $3,400 for tickets for himself and his wife. Mr. Reid explained the difference this way: "He came here to watch the fight, I came here to work for the state of Nevada and to watch the fight."

Mr. Reid first declared that he would continue to take free tickets, then reversed course the next day "to avoid even the faintest appearance of impropriety." Maybe he got an inkling: It's this culture of entitlement that offends ordinary Americans -- who don't get free ringside seats and who have to settle for pay-per-view.

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Slide Further After Monday's Sell-Off (NYT)

By John Holusha

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Stocks slid further today in after a big sell-off on Monday, as investors continued to be nervous about remarks by the Federal Reserve's chairman indicating that interest rates might keep climbing to keep inflation in check.

DOJ_NMG_0032479

The Dow Jones industrial average traded below 11,000 for much of the day for the first time since early March, although it closed barely above that mark.

Investors also remained worried by increasing evidence that economic growth is slowing, said Stuart Freeman, chief equity strategist for A. G. Edwards & Sons.

"We have seen in the week specific data that show that the economy is slowing," he said, citing lower numbers for construction, housing prices and mortgage applications. The housing and construction industries are considered to be particularly sensitive to interest rates.

Asian and European stock markets followed Monday's fall on Wall Street by dropping sharply today. In Tokyo, the Nikkei 225 index fell 1.8 percent, and most other indexes in Asian and Pacific countries lost ground, especially those in Australia and India. Major European markets fell 1.6 percent or more, and the CAC 40 index in Paris dropped 2.4 percent.

In New York, the leading market indexes ended trading lower this afternoon, although some late buying cut their losses. According to preliminary figures, the Dow industrials fell 46.58 points, or 0.4 percent, to close at 11,002.14.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 1.44 points, or 0.1 percent, to 1,263.85. And the Nasdaq composite index dropped 6.84 points, or 0.3 percent, to 2,162.78.

On Monday, the Dow fell almost 200 points, or 1.8 percent, after Ben S. Bernanke, the Fed chairman, said the central bank intended to remain vigilant in fighting inflation.

His remarks were interpreted to mean that the Fed would probably increase its benchmark short-term interest rate for a 17th time when its policymaking committee meets at the end of the month. Investors had been hoping for a halt to the rate increases.

Bond prices were modestly higher this afternoon, pushing down their yields, despite the prospect of another Fed rate increase. Still, the dollar gained some strength against the euro, the Japanese yen and the British pound. Commodity prices, meanwhile, moved lower.

Stocks Take Hit As Dow Finishes At 3-Month Low (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

Following Monday's selloff, investors continued to flee stocks tied most closely to economic growth, but a late-day rebound helped to soften the blow.

After falling 199.15 points on Monday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 122.30 points in the middle of the trading day, well below the 11000 level that it had traded above for most of this year. Then, the late surge pushed the blue-chip average back above the much-watched 11000 benchmark, leaving it down just 46.58 points, or 0.42%, at 11002.14.

The Dow industrials now are down 640.51 points, or 5.5%, since hitting a six-year high of 11642.65 on May 10. Back then, they were fewer than 100 points below their January 2000 record close of 11722.98. Now, they are at a three-month low, although still up 2.7% this year.

For a second day, the main drag on stocks was Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's surprisingly blunt warning in a speech Monday that key inflation indicators are running above the level he considers acceptable. His comment was taken as a warning that the Fed may move to slow the economy further by pushing its target short-term interest rate up for a 17th time running, to 5.25%, at its next interest-rate meeting June 28 and 29. Some analysts worried the Fed might raise rates further as the summer progresses. Higher interest rates hurt stocks by slowing economic growth and crimping corporate profits.

Investors continued to flee stocks that had shown the sharpest gains in recent years, those that had been propelled higher by booming world economic growth. Investors now fear that those stocks have risen too far, at a time when central bankers led by Mr. Bernanke seem intent on continuing to raise interest rates and mopping up excess cash in order to snuff out inflationary pressures.

"The economically sensitive stocks were getting banged around," said Todd Clark, director of stock trading at San Francisco money-management and brokerage firm Nollenberger Capital Partners. But late in the day, as the Standard & Poor's

DOJ_NMG_0032480

500-stock index managed to remain above the intraday low it had hit late in May, buyers stepped in and stocks "bounced nicely," he noted.

The S&P 500 finished down just 0.11%, or 1.44 points, at 1263.85, still up 1.3% in 2006. Makers of consumer staples -- daily necessities such as food and household products that are less dependent on economic growth -- actually finished the day with gains. They are heavily represented in the S&P 500. Procter & Gamble rose 0.4% and Colgate-Palmolive gained 1%.

Things looked nasty as the day began. U.S. investors awoke to find foreign stocks down sharply in the wake of Monday's U.S. declines.

Even after the late-day recovery, copper producer Phelps Dodge finished down 1.1%. Construction- and mining-equipment maker Caterpillar fell 1.2%, and aluminum maker Alcoa fell 2.2%. All three have fallen more than 15% since the first half of May. Many banking stocks, whose cost of obtaining money rises when interest rates move higher, continued to decline. J.P. Morgan fell 1.4%, but Citigroup inched up 0.3%.

A wide variety of commodities, which had been soaring amid economic optimism until last month, also continued their pullback, led by copper and gold. Despite continued worries about summer oil supplies and despite export-cutoff threats from Iran, crude-oil futures edged down 10 cents to $72.50 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Gold futures fell $13.80 to $629.40 a troy ounce.

Small stocks, which once led the gains, were again among the hardest-hit because small companies are more dependent on bank borrowing than large ones. The Russell 2000 small-stock index fell 0.41% to 710.96, its lowest finish in nearly four months. It is down 9.1% since hitting a record May 5, although it still is up 5.6% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.32%, or 6.84 points, to 2162.78, down 1.9% this year.

The dollar, which becomes more attractive to investors when interest rates are higher, rose again against both the yen and the euro. Although short-term Treasury-note prices fell on the rate fears, pushing yields higher, longer-term notes and bonds moved the opposite way. That reflects in part a flight to safety as investors abandon stocks for bonds, but it also suggests that bond investors may be somewhat less concerned about inflation risks than are stock investors.

Measures of market volatility, based on option trading, moved sharply higher. That reflected fears that markets have entered a period when investors and Fed officials alike will be uncertain of how much higher the Fed will have to raise rates, when such decisions will be made based on what hard-to-predict economic data indicate about inflation risks.

In the short term, investors will be watching to see whether the Dow can hold the 11000 mark, and whether other indexes can remain above recent lows. If the market moves sharply below these much-watched levels, another round of selling could follow.

Three more Fed officials spoke yesterday, offering opinions that weren't always fully in line with Mr. Bernanke's.

William Poole, president of the St. Louis Federal Reserve Bank, and Fed Governor Susan Bies both suggested that higher inflation could force more rate increases, echoing Mr. Bernanke. But Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig said inflation pressures should "taper off" as economic growth moderates, suggesting that he may be less worried about inflation risks.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated; bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note rose 4/32, or $1.25 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 5.010%. The 30-year bond was up 14/32 to yield 5.083%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, the currency traded at 113.22 yen, up from 112.17, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2838 from $1.2914.

Inflation Fears Mount At Fed As Poole Toughens Rate Posture (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Inflation alarms at the Federal Reserve rang louder yesterday as a top official said slowing economic growth may not be enough to contain inflation if the public's inflationary psychology intensifies.

DOJ_NMG_0032481

"If inflation turns out to exceed ... our target range, I do not believe we can count on a slowing economy to bring inflation down, by itself, quickly," William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, said in an interview. If inflation expectations rose in "a persistent way...we could expect to see that show up in measured inflation in fairly short order."

Mr. Poole said to keep expected inflation from rising further, the Fed needs "an upside bias" in setting interest rates.

Mr. Poole, who has held his job since 1998, has long been on the hawkish side of the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee. The FOMC consists of seven Washington-based governors and 12 regional-bank presidents, of whom five vote in a given year.

Nonetheless, Mr. Poole's remarks echoed Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, who on Monday indicated he is more concerned about the recent rise in inflation than signs of slowing economic growth. Mr. Bernanke's remarks prompted futures markets to sharply increase the odds that the Fed will raise its short-term interest-rate target to 5.25% from 5% at its meeting on June 28-29. Mr. Poole's remarks, made in an interview Monday and published yesterday on WSJ.com and Dow Jones Newswires, caused those odds to rise further, to 80% from 72% Monday and 48% Friday. They also contributed to a decline in stocks yesterday.

When the public expects higher inflation, it may set prices and wages in a way that makes that expectation a reality. Mr. Poole said that effect is more powerful than the "output gap," the idle capacity that exists when the economy is operating below its potential. "If inflation expectations were to rise ... it might take a very long time before the [output gap] would be able to offset what's going on with inflation expectations."

Mr. Poole noted that investors' expectations of inflation, judging from the behavior of inflation-protected Treasury bonds, have risen about 0.2 percentage point this year. "It's not a huge number, but from my perspective, it's going in the wrong direction" because inflation is already "at the upper end of what I would like to see." Many officials say they prefer that inflation, by their favored price index, remain between 1% to 2%, which Mr. Poole called a "fully acceptable range," though he personally would prefer a lower target. By that measure, inflation was 2.1% in April.

Analysts say Mr. Bernanke's speech may in part have been meant to squelch doubts of his willingness to administer tough anti-inflation medicine. If so, he appears to have succeeded.

Macroeconomic Advisers, a forecasting firm, says expected inflation as measured by inflation-protected bonds has dropped almost 0.1 percentage point in the past two days. Brian Sack, an economist there, called that a "vote of confidence" in Mr. Bernanke but cautioned it was conditional on the Fed raising rates later this month.

Other Fed officials delivered more balanced messages. Governor Susan Bies said at a conference in California yesterday that 2.1% inflation "makes me very uncomfortable" but added that the 16 quarter-percentage point interest rate increases the Fed has made over the past two years are still "making their way through the economy." And Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig, at an event in Montrose, Colo., said, "We know that monetary policy acts with a lag ... that the effects could still be ahead of us," and while inflation expectations have ticked higher, that has happened in the past and not been sustained.

Separately, the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia named Charles Plosser, an economics professor at the University of Rochester, its new president effective Aug. 1. He succeeds Anthony Santomero, who resigned March 31.

Michael Feroli, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase, said Mr. Plosser "likely has a hawkish bent," given his grounding in an economic theory that holds the Fed has little influence on growth and should thus focus exclusively on inflation. Like Mr. Poole before his current job, Mr. Plosser has served on the Shadow Open Market Committee, a group of academics that has often criticized the Fed for being soft on inflation.

Pondering The Bear Necessities (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

NEW YORK, June 6 -- Now that the Dow Jones industrial average has slid 246 points in two days and shed 5.5 percent since mid-May, it's time to ask the question: How do you distinguish a short-term stock market correction from a full-blown bear market?

You wait awhile, of course. But already there are clues in technical market data, such as who is doing the buying and selling, the price of stocks relative to corporate earnings, inflation data, and the length of time since the last recession.

DOJ_NMG_0032482

Corrections, defined as a drop of 5 percent over a few weeks or a month or two, are pretty common. Since 1900, the Dow has fallen at least that much more than 300 times, or an average of more than three times a year, according to Ned Davis Research Inc. But nine out of 10 such slides bottom out and start rising again. It's the other 10 percent that scare the pants off investors. They turn into bear markets, in which the broad market indicators lose 20 percent or more and take their own sweet time coming back.

Even the professionals have trouble telling the two apart. In 2005, the Dow dropped more than 800 points -- 8 percent -- in March and April before rallying, then dropped an additional 400 points in September and October before climbing some more. In both cases, investors who jumped out prematurely would have suffered losses and missed another good rise.

On the other hand, analysts were full of rosy predictions in 2000 and 2001 that the market was simply resting briefly and would soon resume its dizzying climb. None of the major indicators have ever returned to their early 2000 highs.

"Picking the short-term movement of the stock market is like standing at the roulette table and saying, 'I think red is coming up next' and then congratulating yourself when you are right," said Andrew Smithers, a British economic consultant. Though he published a book in March 2000 that correctly predicted that stocks were overvalued and about to tank, he called the timing "pure luck."

Now, consider today's investing environment.

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke spooked the equity markets Monday with comments that suggested the central bank is concerned about inflation and is likely to continue to raise interest rates. That prospect in turn raises fears that a significantly tighter money supply could push the already slowing economy into recession. The Dow shed 199 points on Monday and was down as much as 110 points on Tuesday before climbing back to 11,002.14, down 46.58 points for the day.

The Nasdaq composite index dropped 6.84 Tuesday and is down 3.6 percent since the beginning of January. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dropped 1.44 Tuesday to finish at 1263.85, down more than 4 percent from its most recent high in May. Even the high-flying Russell 2000, which tracks small stocks and gained 13.9 percent in the first quarter, has given back more than half of its 2006 gains.

"There's some panic in the street," said Al Goldman, chief equity strategist for brokerage firm A.G. Edwards & Sons Inc., "but I don't feel it's justified. . . . We don't have any signs that a recession is at hand, and inflation, although it's up, is still pretty well contained."

George Feiger, who runs Contango Capital Advisors, a wealth-management business, looks at the same signals and sees trouble. "All the technical indicators are showing that we must be getting near the end. The economy is slowing down, the dollar is tanking, people are pulling their money out of equities and putting them in cash, huge amounts of debt have been issued by below-grade [high-risk] issuers," he said. "Where else can it go? The real question is not where will it go but how far."

Interviews with nearly a dozen economists and market analysts turned up widely varying views on whether this particular market correction will develop fur and claws. That's partly because each one looks at different signals to determine where the equity markets are going.

Charles Biderman, chief executive of TrimTabs Investment Research, argues that the real answers lie in mutual fund flows and in whether companies are spending money to buy their own stock or that of other companies as part of a merger. He noted that at the market peak in early 2000, individual investors were piling into equity funds but that companies were net sellers of stock. By contrast, at the bottom of the last bear market from June 2002 to February 2003, individuals pulled $100 billion out of equity funds, while companies were net buyers by $30 billion. "Typically, individual investors are always wrong," Biderman said, "and ever since the mid-1990s, for every year when companies were net buyers of their own shares, the market has gone up."

Right now, Biderman notes, companies are again net buyers -- he calculated that in May, 135 companies announced a total of $63 billion in stock buybacks and $40 billion more in stock purchases as part of takeovers. Meanwhile, individuals pulled money out of equity funds in May. His conclusion: "The economy is doing very well, and the market is underperforming."

James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist for Wells Capital Management, also predicts good times ahead for stock buyers. He argues that corporate profits and consumer spending are still relatively strong and notes that even though the Federal Reserve has repeatedly raised the benchmark short-term interest rate over the past two years, the current level of 5 percent is still low by historical standards.

DOJ_NMG_0032483

"I think the odds favor us getting over this and going back up to where we were," Paulsen said. "My bet is that we have not shut down the speed of world growth yet."

Some analysts are far less sanguine. Many of them rely on the relationship between a company's share price and its earnings to determine whether it is over- or undervalued, and they say that rapidly rising corporate earnings were the crucial engine behind the stock market's long rise from late 2002 through the first part of this year. S&P 500 companies are trading around 15 times operating earnings, well below where they were at the last market peak in 2000.

But some analysts are worried that high energy prices and the possibility -- also mentioned by Bernanke on Monday -- of a cooling economy could combine to make it harder for companies to post strong earnings growth. "Earnings are going to be a little harder from now on," said Peter Jankovskis, director of research for OakBrook Investments LLC. Though he thinks the current drop is a correction rather than a bear market, he said small investors with extra money in their pockets might do well to put it in a money market fund or high-interest bank account until the current trend becomes clearer. "The market definitely has cycles: Sell in May, stay away. Markets are generally weak in the summer. . . . It won't hurt you to stay on the sidelines for a while."

On the other hand, investors who are already invested in equities shouldn't run for the exits, market watchers said. "The worst thing that can happen is that people panic at the bottom, and it takes them a year or two to get over that panic. By that time, you've missed most of the next bull market," said Ken Tower, chief market strategist for CyberTrader, a Charles Schwab Co. subsidiary that focuses on active traders.

Ben Bernanke: Tough Guy (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Ben S. Bernanke rattled world financial markets Monday with his tough talk about combating inflation, but he also buffed up his image as a strong Federal Reserve chairman committed to the fight, analysts said yesterday.

"He reintroduced testosterone to the inflation-fighting resolve of the Fed," said Diane Swonk, chief economist of Mesirow Financial Inc., an investment management firm. "This is a pure male thing. He said to the markets, 'You think I'm a wimp? Take me on.' "

Gone, during Bernanke's remarks to a bankers' conference, was any mention of a Fed pause in its two-year series of interest rate increases. Gone was any fretting over the danger of pushing interest rates too far and triggering a slump. Instead, he declared that the recent rise in inflation would not be tolerated.

Bernanke, who took over as Fed chief in February, needed to send such a signal to counter the markets' doubts about his anti-inflation resolve, analysts said -- even though it meant jolting the markets with the implication of higher interest rates. He called recent inflation trends "unwelcome," noting that the Labor Department's consumer price index, excluding volatile food and energy items, had risen at a 3.2 percent annual rate over the three months ended in April and at a 2.8 percent pace in the six months ended in April.

When Bernanke told Congress in April that the Fed might pause in its rate increases, "he sent a bad message that the central bank was going to be soft on inflation, and that was the wrong message to send when energy, commodities and raw materials prices were at multi-decade or historic highs," said Richard Yamarone, director of research at Argus Research Corp. "I was pleasantly surprised [Monday]; my beliefs were confirmed that the world's most important central banker was in fact vigilant against inflation. He finally laid that out. I'm surprised he didn't do this earlier."

Bernanke's remarks followed extensive discussion within the central bank about its strategy for communicating with the public. Bernanke has long argued that Fed officials should be more open about their thinking to help the markets anticipate the likely course of interest rates. But that effort may have backfired: Recent attempts to reflect the Fed's internal uncertainty and debate caused some investors to question whether the central bank's commitment to low inflation had weakened with the retirement of former chairman Alan Greenspan.

Most of the Fed's top policymakers believed they were nearly done when they raised their benchmark short-term interest rate to 4.75 percent at their meeting in late March, Bernanke's first as chairman, minutes of that session show. And some of them worried then about the danger of raising the rate too high and causing an economic downturn. But others expressed concern about the inflation risks posed by rising prices for energy and raw materials, tightening labor markets, and robust economic growth -- suggesting that more interest rate increases might be needed.

DOJ_NMG_0032484

Fed officials again lifted the rate in May, to 5 percent, and left the door open to more increases. But several also spoke more openly in public about the difficulty of knowing when to stop raising interest rates -- the classic dilemma for any central bank and one that the Greenspan Fed faced three times in his 18-year tenure.

The problem is that Fed interest rate changes take effect over many months and even years, as consumers take on new mortgages, car loans and credit card debt and as businesses borrow to expand. Higher interest rates eventually crimp spending, causing the economy to soften and inflation to fall -- but the process takes time.

And, as Bernanke observed in a paper he co-authored in 1995, when interest rates go up, economic growth typically slows many months before inflation falls .

This makes it particularly tricky to decide when to stop. The Fed today is close to reaching that "no-man's land of not knowing if you've gone too far because of the lags," Swonk of Mesirow Financial said.

Inflation rose or stayed high for some months after each time the Greenspan Fed finished a series of interest rate increases, in 1989, 1995 and 2000. Twice, in 1990 and in 2001, the Fed tightenings were followed by recession. Only in 1995 did the Fed achieve the central banker's Holy Grail of a "soft landing," in which an overheating economy cools to a healthy pace of expansion without a painful slump.

Greenspan faced higher inflation than Bernanke faces, and he raised the federal funds rate much higher than it is now before stopping: to nearly 10 percent in 1989, to 6 percent in 1995 and to 6.5 percent in 2000.

The Fed has been steadily raising its benchmark federal funds rate, the overnight interest rate on loans between banks, for two years, from a very low 1 percent in June 2004. With rates so low for so long, the housing market boomed through last year and began to soften only in recent months. Consumer spending remained strong through earlier this year and has just recently started to sag.

Bernanke said Monday that the expected economic slowdown "seems now to be underway," but he expressed more concern about inflation and signaled strongly that interest rates will move higher before he is done.

Financial markets, which have been volatile for weeks because of inflation fears and uncertainty over the Fed's likely action, sold off Monday and yesterday on expectations of more rate increases.

"This happens all the time at the end of a tightening cycle, and everybody is all atwitter because they don't know when it will end," said Mark Gertler, the New York University professor who co-authored the 1995 paper on Fed policy with Bernanke. "Our paper tells you there are lags in the effects of policy but doesn't tell you when to stop."

Fed, Bernanke Take Blistering Flak (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff And Adam Shell

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke is finding out the hard way that openness is not the same thing as clarity.

Bernanke took office in February promising to make central bank policy more transparent. Four months later, a number of economists and traders say the Fed chairman and other central bank officials have stumbled by making too many contradictory statements, muddying the outlook and spooking markets.

The complaints got louder Monday after Bernanke told a banking group inflation was at an “unwelcome” level, raising the specter of further Fed interest rate increases. That appeared counter to April congressional testimony in which Bernanke suggested the central bank could pause from its two-year campaign of interest rate increases, even if inflation was a risk.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell nearly 200 points Monday and another 47 points Tuesday.

“Give us a break, please. Can we have just one week, or at least one day, without some Fed official obsessing publicly about containing inflation?” says Ed Yardeni, chief investment strategist at Oak Associates. “They are giving us more information than we need.”

DOJ_NMG_0032485

The issue goes beyond language, however. There are a number of reasons the Fed is taking flak as it tries to wind up a drive that has pushed short-term interest rates to 5% from a historic low of 1% in mid-2004:

•The economy is changing. Minutes of the March 27-28 meeting of the Fed's policymaking Open Market Committee show members believed the end of the tightening cycle was near, with some expressing concern the Fed could push rates too high. Bernanke's April testimony echoed those comments. The markets, however, interpreted Bernanke's "pause" statement as soft on inflation. Further, in recent weeks core inflation, which doesn't include food and energy, has been running above the Fed's 2% projection.

As the Fed responded to market concerns and altered conditions, its message necessarily changed.

"The end of tightening cycles are often controversial. We see more disagreement on the Fed committee about what the stopping point is; we see more skittishness in the markets," says Brian Sack of Macroeconomic Advisers, a former Fed economist. "This was a tricky time to have a transition to a new chair."

•There are disagreements on policy. While some analysts applaud Bernanke's emphasis on inflation, others say the central bank is not paying enough attention to economic cooling. They fear the Fed will push rates too high, choking growth. "The Fed is overly concerned with inflationary pressures and less concerned with the slowing of economic activity … the consumer is getting whacked" by rising rates and energy prices, says David Lereah, National Association of Realtors' chief economist.

•There are too many voices. Bernanke doesn't yet have the same control that former chairman Alan Greenspan had over the Open Market Committee. Traders and economists are paying more attention to sometimes conflicting statements of Fed governors and regional bank presidents to try to figure out policy.

"They should really leave it to one spokesman, and that should be the Fed chairman," Yardeni says.

•Bernanke doesn't have Greenspan's inflation-fighting credentials and reputation.

"He needs to quickly realize that the markets around the world care very much about every word that comes out of his mouth," says Gary Kaltbaum, a money manager at Kaltbaum & Associates. "Potentially, it could be a longer-term positive that he is going to stand up to inflation if it is occurring … (it's) better than doing nothing and letting things get out of hand."

Unease Over Fed Policy Has Markets In A Tizzy (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, June 7, 2006

The bulls and bears are in a heated game of chicken that has the Dow clinging to 11,000 for dear life.

Puzzlement about what appeared to be a threat Monday from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke to head off inflation at any price has Wall Street's mood ranging from nervous to downtrodden. Those fears sent the Dow Jones industrial average below 11,000 for much of Tuesday, before it recovered to close down 47 points at 11,002 — barely extending its longest streak above 11,000 to 61 trading days.

Inflation and the Fed are perplexing investors. "The worry is the Federal Reserve has already made a mistake or … will make a mistake soon," by raising short-term interest rates too high in its efforts to keep inflation in check, says Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors.

Investors have historical reasons to be concerned, says Sam Stovall, market strategist at Standard & Poor's. During the past 36 years, the Fed has had to start cutting interest rates — to help the economy — six months or less after its last rate increase, on average.

"People worry the Fed tightens too much," Stovall says.

Fearing the Fed might be about to dump a bucket of cold water on the economy, investors are running from the risky stocks and assets they were chasing just months ago. Consider how investors have been punishing the riskiest areas of the market since the Dow Jones industrial average topped out this year on May 10, including:

•Emerging market stocks. The biggest losers, by far, have been emerging markets investments in developing nations ranging from Brazil to China. The iShares MSCI Emerging Markets exchange-traded fund, which soared 31% in 2005, has tanked 16.5% since March 10.

DOJ_NMG_0032486

•Companies with small market values. The USA's smallest publicly traded firms, as measured by the Russell 2000 index, have cratered 8.4% since May 10. Meanwhile, less- risky large-company stocks, measured by the S&P 500, are down just 4.5%.

•Former winning industry groups. Industries that investors target when the economy is steaming ahead or is expected to be strong, such as basic materials and semiconductors, have been battered. The iShares Dow Jones U.S. Basic Materials ETF is down 10.7% from May 10. That has cut its 2006 gain to 7.0%, which doesn't look bad until you consider it had been up 20% at its peak for the year.

Meanwhile, defensive stocks such as health care have lived up to their names as investors' hiding places. The iShares Dow Jones U.S. Healthcare Providers ETF is up 1.1% since the Dow topped on May 10.

This reminder of the dangers of owning risky stocks was overdue, because investors were almost blindly buying them, says Jack Ablin of Harris Private Bank: "It makes sense to stay on the safe side of the street."

Economic Rehab (WSJ)

By Brian S. Wesbury

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

The stock, bond, currency and commodity markets are bouncing around wildly. While there are many crosscurrents, monetary policy and economic data are front and center in day-to-day market volatility. As a result, some market observers are trash-talking the new Federal Reserve Board chairman, Ben Bernanke, and blaming him for all sorts of perceived missteps.

This is unfair. Mr. Bernanke is doing a fine job. The inflationary pressures he is fighting today were baked in the cake before he arrived. Monetary policy was overly accommodative for too long, and even after 16 rate hikes the Fed has not yet reached neutral. Weaning investors, home builders, hedge funds and proprietary trading desks from 50-year low interest rates is like forcing them to quit smoking: It's good for the health of the economy, but it hurts and they are complaining loudly.

There are two forces that cause the economy to grow. One is real, the other is an illusion. The real force -- entrepreneurial innovation and creativity -- comes naturally as long as government policies do not drive it away. The artificial force is easy money. An increased supply of money, by creating an illusion of wealth, can increase spending in the short run, but this eventually turns into inflation. Printing money cannot possibly create wealth; if it could, counterfeiting would be legal.

For monetary policy makers and investors it is important to determine to what extent growth is due to each force. In the late 1990s, when the economy and equity markets were booming, the Greenspan Fed became convinced that monetary policy was largely responsible. But commodity prices were falling and the dollar was strong -- both signs that Fed policy was not the culprit. The Fed hiked interest rates anyway. This was a mistake. The U.S. economy fell into recession and deflation became the No. 1 fear of financial markets and central banks around the world.

The Fed fought this deflation -- by cutting rates 11 times in 2001 -- eventually pushing the federal funds rate down to 1%. In late 2001, commodity prices began to rise, and in early 2002 the dollar began to fall. But because it was so worried about deflation, the Fed ignored these signs of monetary excess and held rates artificially low well into 2004. This policy has finally come home to roost.

Inflation is on the rise. "Core" consumer prices have climbed 3.2% at an annual rate in the past three months, the fastest growth since 1995. Mr. Bernanke said recently that inflation has "reached a level that, if sustained, would be at or above the upper end of the range that many economists, including myself, would consider consistent with price stability and the promotion of maximum long-run growth."

What the market is debating is whether fighting this inflation will hurt the economy. With housing activity down sharply, these fears are palpable. But this is likely an overreaction. Housing was stimulated to extraordinary heights by artificially low interest rates (and the 1997 capital gains tax cut) and is now correcting back to more normal levels. Housing starts may be down 18.4% from their peak, but they are still up 12.3% from 1999 levels. It may be painful for participants in the construction industry and those who thought they could make a fast buck flipping houses, but only a recession could send the housing market into a tailspin.

Historically, housing has been a solid leading indicator of business cycles, but the special circumstances of recent years suggest that this time it is sending a misleading signal. And while some believe that a slowdown in housing will undermine consumer spending, this fear is overblown. Cash-out financing (or mortgage equity withdrawal) may have increased spending for those who took advantage of low interest rates to refinance, but every dollar of borrowing was funded with someone else's savings.

DOJ_NMG_0032487

With interest rates up and refinance activity down, the savings do not disappear, but instead are used in different ways. Resources that would have been put into housing will be shifted to other sectors of the economy. One area that appears to be benefiting already is business fixed investment. Commercial and industrial loans are up 14.9% at an annual rate during the first four months of this year, and after five years of sluggishness are finally growing at rates similar to those of the late 1990s.

In other words, there is little evidence that rates have reached a level that is detrimental to the economy. The Fed is not tight; it is just less loose. This can be seen in real time by watching market-based indicators. Commodity prices remain elevated and the dollar continues to weaken; both suggest excess money creation. Moreover, the economy has not experienced a recession in over 45 years without the federal funds rate rising above nominal GDP growth. In the past year nominal GDP growth has been 6.9%, so with the federal funds rate at 5%, monetary policy is still accommodative.

Nonetheless, the Fed is very close to a neutral monetary policy. Using nominal GDP as a target, and looking back historically, a neutral rate is likely close to 6%. If the Fed could get rates to this level soon, the economy could continue to grow based on underlying entrepreneurial activity and productivity -- a rate estimated to be 3.5% or 4% per year. A neutral rate would also put a lid on inflation, stabilize the dollar and cap commodity prices, including oil. A 6% federal funds rate would be monetary policy nirvana.

Now that the Fed is close, the future path of short-term interest rates has become less certain. After two predictable years, with a rate hike every six to eight weeks, a great deal of leverage was employed by investors who understood the pattern. Lately, many investors have been betting on an early end to rate hikes, but with Mr. Bernanke remaining vigilant about inflation this leverage has become more risky. The result is volatility. In retrospect, if the Fed had moved rates up faster than it did, it might have been able to stop sooner. Unfortunately, the longer the Fed maintains an accommodative policy stance, the higher the neutral rate becomes.

The good news is that there is no reason to suspect that this volatility is anything more than a short-term phenomenon. During the past two years, the Fed was trying to wean the economy from low rates slowly, so as not to shock the system. But in doing so, it allowed inflationary pressures to accumulate. Ben Bernanke is finishing the job and cleaning up the mess. While this may create some near-term turbulence in financial markets, getting rates to neutral will be a huge benefit to the economy.

Mr. Wesbury is chief economist of First Trust Advisors L.P. in Lisle, Ill.

Realtors Lower Sales Forecast, Seek Pause In Fed Rate Increases (WSJ)

By Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The National Association of Realtors lowered slightly its forecast for existing and new home sales this year, while the group's chief economist called for the Federal Reserve to pause its interest rate increases.

The slowdown from the previously hot housing market is positive because the economy needs a solid housing sector, and slower price appreciation will improve affordability, said NAR Chief Economist David Lereah.

"But this is a time for the Fed to pause rate hikes because we have some interest-sensitive housing markets that have become vulnerable," Mr. Lereah said.

The group lowered slightly its previous forecast for a slowdown this year in home sales and construction. Existing home sales are now projected to decline 6.8% from last year's record to 6.60 million in 2006, while new home sales are seen down 13.4% from last year's record to 1.11 million. Housing starts are forecast to decline 6.2% to 1.94 million this year.

The Realtors' group also lowered slightly its forecast for 30-year fixed mortgage rates. It now expects them to average 6.9% in the second half of the year, a tenth of a percentage point lower than its previous forecast.

The NAR said the housing boom has ended, but it still expects 2006 to be the third-strongest on record for the market. Existing home prices still are expected to grow by slightly more than the historical trend of house appreciation at 1.5 to 2.0 percentage points above inflation, Mr. Lereah said.

DOJ_NMG_0032488

The group forecasts the national median existing home price will rise 5.3% this year to $231,300, while the national median new home price will rise 0.8% to $242,900. It expects inflation measured by the consumer price index to grow 3.1% this year, while the economy grows 3.4%.

In general, rising inventories have eased what was unsustainable home price growth, and for most of the country future home price gains will "be much closer to normal returns we expect from housing," said NAR President Thomas Stevens. Higher interest rates have slowed sales in many high-cost markets, but job growth has boosted sales in some moderately priced areas, Mr. Stevens said.

Gas Prices May Fall A Bit, But Summer Costs Still High (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Although gasoline prices will likely dip a bit in the near-term, families hitting the road this summer will still pay record prices at the pump, the government said Tuesday.

Nationwide, retail gasoline prices will average a record $2.76 a gallon over the April-September summer period for regular. That's up 39 cents from last summer and a nickel higher than the Energy Information Administration, the Energy Department's statistical arm, forecast a month ago.

In April, the EIA estimated that summer gasoline prices would average $2.62 a gallon. But prices early in the season have been higher than anticipated, leading to the increase in the forecast, EIA economist Neil Gamson says.

The U.S. average price for a gallon of gasoline was $2.87 Tuesday, up a penny from the day before, and 76 cents higher than a year ago, according to motor club AAA. Prices exceeded $3 a gallon in 10 states.

The most expensive gasoline was in Hawaii at $3.40 a gallon for regular. The cheapest was in Oklahoma and South Carolina, where the statewide average was $2.64, according to AAA.

EIA said prices will likely fall “somewhat” in the near-term, “barring new, unanticipated supply disruptions.” But analysts at the agency warned that prices could rise midsummer, “if demand growth picks up to higher rates than currently expected or if refinery outages occur at unusual rates.”

Higher gasoline prices have largely been driven by elevated oil costs. Oil accounts for approximately half the cost of gasoline for drivers at the pump.

The price of a barrel of crude oil in New York closed at $72.50 Tuesday, down 10 cents from Monday.

The record high, not adjusted for inflation, was $75.17 on April 21. In inflation-adjusted dollars, the record is $86.99 set in January 1981, according to EIA data.

Oil prices will likely stay high, the EIA said in its monthly report, as the gap between potential supplies and demand remains extremely small, putting oil investors on edge.

“Because of only limited surplus capacity throughout the forecast period, continued concern about potential or existing supply problems in Nigeria, Iran, Iraq, Venezuela and elsewhere, as well as the threat of more hurricane damage and the continued tight supply-demand balance, we expect little change in the current high-price environment,” EIA analysts said.

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke on Monday cited high energy prices as a concern for the economy, reducing consumers' non-energy spending power and driving up inflation. “The volatility of these and other commodity prices is such that possible future increases in these prices remain a risk to the inflation outlook,” he said at an American Bankers Association forum.

Bilbray Close To Victory (AP)

By Philip J. Lavelle And Dani Dodge

The Associated Press, June 7, 2006

Republican Brian Bilbray appeared headed toward a win over Democrat Francine Busby last night in the race to replace imprisoned former Rep. Randy “Duke” Cunningham in the 50th Congressional District, a contest seen as a gauge of voter attitudes for the national midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0032489

In another closely watched race, Rep. Bob Filner easily defeated Assemblyman Juan Vargas in the 51st Congressional District Democratic primary. It was their third face-off in what has become a long and bitter rivalry.

Bilbray said in an interview that he believed his long focus on illegal immigration would pay off in the race against Busby.

"It's been ignored for too long," said Bilbray, a former congressman-turned-lobbyist. "It's been a simmering problem that's come to a head."

Bilbray also said that running in a heavily Republican district was an advantage, to a degree. "It can also be a big negative, because people were really hurt by Mr. Cunningham. But it was one man's mistake, and we have to remember that," he said.

"I don't think anyone should be writing the epitaph for the Republican Party based on what's happened tonight."

Busby, a Cardiff school board member, was far from conceding late last night.

"Tonight we have made history by sending that message for change ... it's time for Congress to work for us," Busby told cheering supporters at the D Street Bar and Grill in Encinitas. "This will send a message and put the wind in the sails to take us to victory in November.

"We're waiting to see if the people stand up and send a soccer mom from Cardiff to Congress. ... Anyone who writes this off as just being about Cunningham is wrong. This is just the beginning."

Filner said he expected to have the edge because of "25 years of effective representation. My opponent had nothing positive to say."

Vargas could not be reached for comment last night.

The winner in the 50th District will go to Washington and complete the last six months of Cunningham's term, but the campaign will continue. Bilbray and Busby seem certain to face off again in November.

The structure of yesterday's ballot underscored the unusual nature of the election. In addition to the special-election runoff, voters in the 50th cast ballots in the primary for the next two-year term. Busby and Bilbray led their parties in this race, and only Bilbray had nominal opposition because most candidates on the primary ballot agreed not to campaign.

Aside from Filner, none of San Diego County congressional incumbents faced primary opposition and all are expected to cruise to victory in November: Republican Darrell Issa of Vista in the 49th District, Republican Duncan Hunter of Alpine in the 52nd District and Democrat Susan Davis in the 53rd District.

Issa has no Democratic opponent. Hunter will be challenged by Democrat John Rinaldi. Davis will face Republican John Woodrum.

Blake L. Miles won the Republican nomination in Filner's heavily Democratic 51st District.

While Filner and Vargas waged one of the nations's toughest primary campaigns, the Bilbray-Busby race attracted national attention because of the Cunningham scandal and the conventional wisdom that the outcome could foreshadow the midterm elections, when the Democrats hope to win back the House.

In November, a tearful Cunningham, once a brash, swaggering Navy fighter ace in the Vietnam War, resigned his seat after pleading guilty in San Diego federal court to conspiracy and tax evasion for taking more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. He was sentenced to eight years and four months in federal prison.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger set a special election to fill the seat, which was held April 11. The district – a political subdivision including some of the city of San Diego's northern communities plus much of suburban North County – is heavily Republican.

Eighteen candidates were on the April ballot, including 14 Republicans. No candidate won a majority, so the top voter-getters of each party moved to yesterday's runoff. Bilbray is a political veteran whose career was spent in the South Bay, as mayor of Imperial Beach, as a county supervisor and then as a member of Congress from 1995 to 2001.

After losing his seat to Susan Davis, he became a lobbyist, spending some of his time working for FAIR, an anti-illegal-immigration group. Bilbray moved to his mother's Carlsbad home last year, shortly after Cunningham's troubles were revealed.

Busby is an 18-year Cardiff resident and has served on the Cardiff school board since 2000. She ran against Cunningham in 2004, and after losing by a wide margin, immediately started campaigning for 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0032490

This year's race pitted a Democrat against a Republican seen by many in his own party as too liberal on social issues, including abortion rights, which he supports. There were nasty TV attack ads financed by both Republican and Democratic national parties and visits by high-profile party leaders.

Despite a substantial Republican voter-registration advantage – 44 Republican, 30 percent Democrat and 22 percent independent – polls suggested a dead heat.

Busby focused her campaign on ethics and the "culture of corruption" in Washington – a popular theme among Democratic congressional candidates this year.

But immigration become the defining issue, reflecting its standing atop public opinion surveys in California.

Busby supports the U.S. Senate's immigration bill, which calls for a comprehensive approach to immigration, including a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants along with enforcement measures.

That bill is pushed by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., which led to an awkward situation for Bilbray, who has said the bill would lead to "amnesty." McCain and others dispute that characterization and McCain canceled a scheduled appearance at a Bilbray fundraiser last week, though he said he continued to support the Republican candidate.

Bilbray supports the harder-line House immigration bill, focused exclusively on enforcement, and has said he favors building a fence from the Pacific Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico.

Late last week, Busby found herself doing damage control for a verbal blunder – telling a Spanish-speaker at a meeting of mostly Latinos that "You don't need papers for voting." Republicans seized on her comments, and she later said she flubbed her words and did not mean to advocate illegal immigrants voting, but that she wanted to say people not registered to vote could help her campaign.

By Monday, the GOP had launched a radio ad that said, "That's right. Francine Busby says you don't need papers to vote."

In the 51st Congressional District, it was Round Three between Filner and Vargas, who faced each other in 1992 and 1996.

Both candidates were in relative agreement on the issues, and the contest was marked more by personal attacks than policy discussion.

Each candidate argued that he would be the better representative for the district, with a particular focus on Latinos, who make up about 40 percent of the registered voters in the heavily Democratic district. The 51st includes the South Bay and all of Imperial County.

Vargas, a former San Diego City Council member being forced from the Assembly by term limits, hit Filner for paying his wife more than $505,000 in campaign money over the years to be his fundraiser. Filner said the practice is legal.

Vargas describes himself as a moderate-to-conservative Democrat.

Filner criticized Vargas as being out of step with Democratic Party orthodoxy.

He also attacked Vargas for taking more than $335,000 in contributions from the insurance industry and voting with the industry over consumers, particularly on bills favored by victims of San Diego's 2003 wildfires. Vargas is chairman of the Assembly Insurance Committee.

Angelides To Face Schwarzenegger In November (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan And Mark Z. Barabak, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

Westly Concedes; Brown Wins and Preschool Plan Fails

After months of vitriolic campaigning, state Treasurer Phil Angelides laid claim early today to the Democratic nomination for governor and pledged to turn his candidacy into a "fight for the California of our dreams."

"I will not let you down," Angelides told exuberant supporters in Sacramento.

At 1:15 a.m., rival Steve Westly borrowed an aide's cell phone and called Angelides from Los Angeles to concede the contest and congratulate his erstwhile foe.

Facing no serious opposition, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger easily won the Republican nomination for a second term and planned to set out today on a bus trip through the Central Valley as the formal kickoff of his reelection effort.

DOJ_NMG_0032491

In other results Tuesday, Oakland Mayor Jerry Brown won the party nomination for attorney general and voters rejected a universal preschool initiative.

Angelides' victory claim followed a long night of suspense as he opened a small but steady lead that he never relinquished. Speaking after midnight to his supporters in Sacramento, the exuberant candidate said he would "hit the road tomorrow as the Democratic nominee for governor."

Earlier in the evening, Angelides stepped before the same crowd and struck the themes that he has sounded for months.

"I believe we can give hardworking families a chance to climb the ladder of success," he said. "I believe we can give our kids the best education in the world. I believe it is time for a governor that California can count on to stand up for hardworking people."

The climate for Tuesday's election was great voter discontent at the direction of the state and nation, with high gasoline prices, immigration and the Iraq war among the top concerns.

A gauge of the national mood Tuesday — and possible precursor of November's midterm election — was the San Diego County congressional race to fill the seat vacated by former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who was convicted in a corruption scandal.

The first wave of returns for the special election showed Republican Brian Bilbray holding a single-digit lead over Democrat Francine Busby in what would have been a romp for the GOP candidate in most years.

In the Democratic primary for attorney general, Brown led Los Angeles City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo, who was making his first run for statewide office, from early in the evening. Delgadillo, who conceded late Tuesday, had faced an uphill fight from the start against the former governor and three-time presidential candidate, a household name to Californians for decades.

"We knew this was going to be a tough race when we got into it, and we gave it our all. But we've come up just a bit short," Delgadillo told supporters at a downtown hotel.

In November, Brown will face Republican nominee Chuck Poochigian, a Fresno state senator who is also little known to most Californians but who has raised enough money to mount a serious campaign against the Oakland mayor.

Another loser in Tuesday's election appeared to be filmmaker Rob Reiner, whose latest ballot measure, Proposition 82, was failing in early returns. It called for raising income taxes on the wealthiest Californians to establish free preschool for all 4-year-olds. Also behind was Proposition 81, a $600-million bond issue to build and repair libraries.

In other races, early returns found that:

• Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante was heading to a wide margin of victory in the Democratic contest for insurance commissioner. But rival John Kraft, who ran virtually no campaign, was winning nearly a third of the vote, a sign of potential trouble in Bustamante's fall race against Republican Steve Poizner, a Silicon Valley millionaire.

• State Sen. Debra Bowen of Marina del Rey was leading Sen. Deborah Ortiz of Sacramento in the Democratic primary for secretary of state. The winner will face Republican incumbent Bruce McPherson in November.

• Another cliffhanger was occurring in the Democratic primary for lieutenant governor, as state Sen. Jackie Speier of Hillsborough and Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi were locked in a tight race, and state Sen. Liz Figueroa of Sacramento was trailing badly. The winner will face Republican nominee Tom McClintock, a Thousand Oaks state senator.

• In the GOP primary for controller, no clear front-runner emerged in the match between state Sen. Abel Maldonado of Santa Maria and former Assemblyman Tony Strickland of Moorpark. In the race for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Joe Dunn of Santa Ana was trailing State Board of Equalization member John Chiang.

• State Supt. of Public Instruction Jack T. O'Connell, a Democrat, appeared headed toward reelection, getting more than half of the vote in the nonpartisan race, which is enough to avert a runoff.

• In the Republican race for treasurer, Board of Equalization member Claude Parrish was leading state Assemblyman Keith Richman of Northridge. The winner will face Democratic nominee Bill Lockyer, now attorney general.

The election also set the field for the fall U.S. Senate race, with Democratic incumbent Dianne Feinstein heavily favored over Republican challenger Richard Mountjoy of Monrovia, a former state senator and leader of the state party's conservative wing.

DOJ_NMG_0032492

Across the state, officials reported a few troubles in Tuesday's voting — polling stations that opened late, paper jams in ballot machines and other "standard election day hiccups," said Ashley Snee Giovannettone, a spokeswoman for the secretary of state.

One big glitch was in the Bay Area, where Alameda County was facing an unusually slow ballot count that threatened to delay statewide results until early today. The county, which includes Oakland and the surrounding area, is home to more than 382,000 registered Democrats — about 6% of the party's voters in the state.

The problem was voting machines. The state required the county to scrap its touch-screen machines earlier this year, because they could not produce a paper trail of votes cast, said Guy Ashley, a spokesman for the county's registrar of voters. So the county reverted to optical-scan paper ballots. Tuesday night, the ballots were to be taken from 830 polling stations to a central site to be inserted, one by one, into 60 scanners to tally the vote, Ashley said.

Statewide, turnout was light, although it was too soon to say whether it met projections of a little more than a third of California's 15.7 million registered voters. A huge chunk of the vote came in mail-in ballots, further depleting Tuesday's ranks.

Los Angeles voter Maria Vasquez, 60, surveyed the deserted polling station at the Islamic Center on Vermont Avenue. "There's nobody here," she said.

For many, the election's main draw was the Democratic contest for governor, a race so spiteful that many Californians cringed at the choice they faced.

In TV ads, Westly portrayed his foe as a former developer who polluted Lake Tahoe, bulldozed wetlands and took campaign money from oil firms.

Angelides, in turn, depicted Westly as an untrustworthy politician who broke his vow not to run negative ads, rewarded a corrupt campaign donor with state favors and backed Schwarzenegger's school and healthcare cuts.

Ads by both Democrats were short on context. In some cases, they misled voters, who were forced to sort out accusations by each man that the attacks from the other were dishonest. In the end, the vicious back-and-forth gave Schwarzenegger a head start in defining his Democratic challenger in negative terms.

"It's hurt the Democrats' chance of beating Schwarzenegger in the fall," said Gary C. Jacobson, a UC San Diego political science professor.

The bitter campaign seemed to hurt both candidates Tuesday, with voters expressing no great enthusiasm for either Angelides or Westly, according to a Los Angeles Times exit poll.

Only about half of those who cast ballots said they very strongly or even fairly strongly supported their candidate, the survey found. Angelides had slightly more solid support than Westly. But Westly had a slightly better image among Democratic primary voters.

The mud fight also came at a time of California voter fatigue, brought on mainly by the 2003 recall and last fall's special election, called by Schwarzenegger. With their bland personalities, Angelides and Westly each struggled to captivate voters. The dry nature of their state finance jobs heightened the challenge.

But neither lacked the fierce ambition that any serious candidate for governor requires.

Angelides, 52, spent years laying the groundwork for his campaign. A former Sacramento home builder and state Democratic chairman, he won the job of state treasurer in 1998 and coasted to reelection in 2002.

The post's duties, like overseeing state debt, are obscure, but Angelides still used the job to polish his political credentials.

As a member of state pension fund boards, he worked hard to build his standing on the environment: He pressured big corporations to take steps against global warming and promoted billions of dollars in investments in solar power and other alternative energy sources.

An important turning point for Angelides was Schwarzenegger's victory in the recall. When the governor took office, Angelides immediately staked his ground as Schwarzenegger's loudest critic, even as Westly and other Democrats were more accommodating to a leader who was then immensely popular. Ever since, Angelides has cited his early willingness to stand up to Schwarzenegger as testament to the strength of his principles.

His top assets in the campaign have been organized labor and top elected officials, such as U.S. Sens. Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein. On Tuesday, unions put 5,000 volunteers on the street for Angelides, said the California Labor Federation.

DOJ_NMG_0032493

To counter labor's army of volunteers, Westly's main weapon was money: The former EBay executive, who reported more than $225 million in personal income over the last decade, poured more than $35 million of his fortune into his campaign.

Like Angelides, Westly has spent decades building ties with players in the state Democratic Party. He was vice chairman of the party in the late 1980s.

His base is the Silicon Valley. A former investment banker, Westly, 49, served as a manager at several dot-com companies. The last one, EBay, made him an instant tycoon when its stock went public.

In 2002, Westly left EBay and spent millions of dollars in his campaign for controller, a job he won by a margin of less than 1 percentage point. In the race for governor, he has taken credit for collecting billions of dollars in unpaid taxes as controller.

For months, he has used those efforts — and his pledge to raise taxes only as a "last resort" — to contrast himself with Angelides, who has made his plan to increase taxes on corporations and the wealthy a central focus of his campaign.

It was largely the tax issue that enabled Westly to position himself as the more moderate Democrat in the race. That, in turn, led to a series of polls showing that he would perform better against Schwarzenegger than Angelides would. Westly's campaign used those polls to argue to the end that he was the one candidate who could reclaim the governor's job for Democrats.

CONTRIBUTORS

Also contributing to election night coverage were Times staff writers Jonathan Abrams, Juliet Chung, Lynn Doan, Megan Garvey, Arin Gencer, John M. Glionna, Michelle Keller, Patrick McGreevy, Paul Pringle, Valerie Reitman, Lee Romney, Catherine Saillant, Robert Salladay, Nancy Vogel and Nancy Wride.

On To November (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

NOW THAT CALIFORNIA'S primary season is over, voters have at least one thing to look forward to: silence. And they better enjoy it because it won't last long. The Democrats' shrill and shallow campaign ads may be off the air, but Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger embarks today on a statewide bus tour. Maybe the winner of Tuesday's Democratic gubernatorial primary can take a few days, a few hours — OK, a few minutes — to pause and consider how to articulate a more positive message about the state's future.

The primary did little to boost the enthusiasm Democrats feel for their state candidates, and voters were also skeptical about two ballot measures to increase public spending on preschool and libraries. Regardless of whether the Democratic gubernatorial candidate is state Treasurer Phil Angelides or state Controller Steve Westly — and the race was too close to call even hours after the polls closed — he will have plenty of work to do before the final contest against Schwarzenegger on Nov. 7.

In the next five months, the Democratic candidate must show that he can repair the damage done to himself, his party and electoral politics in general by the recent weeks of cynical and self-defeating campaigning. If he expects to beat Schwarzenegger, he must rally voters by articulating how he can lead California in meeting a host of challenges. He must inspire confidence in his plans to deal with state finances, housing, transportation, healthcare, immigration and the environment, to name but a few of the state's pressing issues.

It's not enough to be smart, innovative and straightforward. He must also earn the trust of voters who are increasingly wary about where candidates get their campaign money and how they pad their resumes. And he must lay out, in greater detail and more convincing fashion, his plan to deal with the state's structural deficit.

Schwarzenegger, too, has his work cut out for him. He's riding high on the back of unexpectedly rosy revenues, and he now looks like a reliable senior statesman next to the squabbling Angelides and Westly. But if voters are to pick Schwarzenegger for four more years, they must know which version they will get.

Will he be the independent who ousted Gray Davis and called for an end to Sacramento politics as usual? Or the partisan who tried and failed to ram a slate of overreaching ballot measures past voters in a special election? Or the consensus-builder who worked with the Legislature to craft a budget and get a massive rebuilding bond on the November ballot? Or all of the above?

DOJ_NMG_0032494

Political professionals often like it when voters are disgusted. They like targeting their campaigns to relatively small numbers of high-propensity voters, and Tuesday's election was notable for its low turnout. But both the Democrats and Schwarzenegger would do well to remember Davis and the 2003 recall — and to keep in mind the voters' skeptical attitude toward both ballot propositions on Tuesday's ballot. Voter disgust can be hard to control.

State Elections Are A Midterm Bellwether (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Alabama Gov. Bob Riley easily won the Republican primary contest last night against former state Supreme Court chief justice Roy S. Moore, once regarded as a formidable challenger because of his support from social conservatives who cheered his refusal to remove a monument to the Ten Commandments from the state judicial building.

Riley probably will face Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley, who in early returns in the Democratic primary was burying the comeback attempt of former governor Don Siegelman, who hoped to use a November contest against Riley to showcase his contention that his ongoing corruption trial is a political vendetta by the Republican who unseated him.

The results were among the first to come in a night when primaries and special elections across the nation were being closely watched for signs of the broader political environment that will influence races in this fall's midterm elections.

The contest with the most national significance -- the special election in California to replace imprisoned former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham in a suburban San Diego district -- was too close to call as polls closed last night on the West Coast.

In the final days of the race, polls showed Democrat Francine Busby in a tight contest against Republican Brian P. Bilbray to complete Cunningham's term in a once-solid GOP seat. A Busby victory in a district where Bush won 55 percent of the vote two years ago would be a clear sign of the headwinds confronting Republicans this fall as they try to keep their 12-year control of the House.

In New Jersey, a famous political name -- Tom Kean Jr., the son of a popular former governor -- won a Republican primary for the right to challenge recently appointed Sen. Robert Menendez (D) in the fall. Also in the Garden State, former New Jersey Assembly speaker Albio Sires cruised to a primary victory over Assemblyman Joseph Vas in the 13th Congressional District, all but assuring him a seat in Congress because of the heavily Democratic tilt of the district.

Fearing a damaging, high-profile setback, the National Republican Congressional Committee pumped more than $4.5 million into the California race to help Bilbray, much of it in recent weeks. Busby had scored points by tarring Bilbray, a former congressman from a neighboring district, as a Washington lobbyist. But she hurt her own cause with a verbal blunder last week when she told a largely Latino audience, "You don't need papers for voting."

The former school board member quickly followed that slip by saying, "You don't need to be a registered voter to help" the campaign, but conservative talk show hosts burned up Southern California airwaves this week with charges that Busby was encouraging illegal immigrants to vote.

GOP strategists hoped that would bolster Republican turnout, which may have been depressed by the demoralizing spectacle of their congressman, a decorated Vietnam War pilot, going to prison for bribery. At the very least, Democrats conceded, the gaffe halted Busby's momentum at a critical moment and put her on the defensive.

"She needed a flawless finish to pull this off," said one Democratic Party official in Washington last night, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the results of the election were hours away.

Democratic voters in the nation's most populous state were also deciding yesterday who will challenge Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in the fall. The Democratic establishment's candidate, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, was in a dead-heat contest against telegenic state Controller Steve Westly, whose supporters believe he would be a more formidable opponent to Schwarzenegger. The two candidates have spent a combined $60 million.

In Iowa's gubernatorial race, Secretary of State Chet Culver has said he has the best chance of defeating Rep. Jim Nussle (R) in the fall, but he has tough competition from state Rep. Ed Fallon Jr. and former economic development official Mike Blouin.

DOJ_NMG_0032495

Democrats in Washington, eager to seize the 15 House seats necessary to wrest control from the GOP, had much at stake in yesterday's primaries. The race to succeed Nussle in Iowa's 1st Congressional District -- where Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) won 53 percent of the vote in 2004 -- is widely seen as one of the Democrats' best chances at a Republican seat. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had backed trial lawyer Bruce Braley against former state legislator Rick Dickinson. But Bill Gluba, the 2004 nominee, was poised to play spoiler yesterday. Under Iowa rules, if a primary contestant cannot win 35 percent of the vote, the winner will be chosen by a convention of local Democrats.

Republicans were choosing their nominee among three candidates who battled over who would be toughest on illegal immigration: state Rep. Bill Dix, Heart of America Restaurants & Inns founder Mike Whalen and lawyer Brian Kennedy.

In California, the DCCC has been boosting Navy veteran and United Airlines pilot Steve Filson as the kind of moderate-to-conservative Democrat who can beat House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo, a high-profile target. But first, Filson must beat Jerry McNerney, a more established face in the district's Democratic politics but a candidate who Democratic strategists on Capitol Hill fear cannot win enough votes in the conservative San Joaquin Valley.

The Democrats' chance to seize control of the Senate is considered more of a long shot, but one of their top targets is Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), who has been mired in allegations of ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. State Auditor John Morrison was once supposed to cruise to the nomination, but revelations of an extramarital affair and an investigation his office had conducted into a company with ties to his onetime paramour turned his contest with state Sen. Jon Tester into a horse race. A Mason-Dixon poll last month showed either candidate ahead of Burns, however.

Senate Race '06-Tester Vs. Burns (AP)

The Associated Press, June 7, 2006

State Senate President Jon Tester has been declared the winner in the Democratic U-S Senate primary.

With 53 percent of the precincts reporting, he was leading 61 percent to State Auditor John Morrison's 36 percent.They were the leading candidates in a field that thinned recently when Paul Richards bowed out to throw his support toTester. Richards, Robert Candee and Kenneth Marcure each had one percent of the Democratic vote.

Tester is a 49-year-old Big Sandy farmer. He maintained he was best able to take on incumbent Senator Conrad Burns on the issue of ethics -- the biggest issue so far as Burns gets attacked for alleged ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Morrison is the 44-year-old son of a former state Supreme Court Justice Frank Morrison Junior. He handily outraised Tester, and flooded the airwaves in recent days with advertisements promoting change in the "culture" of Washington D-C.

Meanwhile, incumbent Senator Conrad Burns has been declared the winner in the Republican U-S Senate primary. With 52 percent of the precincts reporting, he had 72 percent o fthe vote to 23 percent for the closest challenger, state lawmaker Bob Keenan.

Burns is running for his fourth term in office.

Two other challengers -- Bob Kelleher and Daniel Neste Huffman-- garnered four percent and one percent of the G-O-P vote respectively.

Burns' popularity dropped after reports of his ties to convicted lobbyist Abramoff.

Burns has chalked up the criticism to the "Eastern liberalpress." He's also aired a T-V commercial dismissing the lobbyistas -- quote -- "the guy who ripped off his Indian clients formillions and lied to anybody and everybody."

Keenan, of Bigfork, can't run for the state Senate again becauseof term limits.

Menendez, Kean Win Primary Elections (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

The Associated Press, June 7, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) - New Jersey voters will have to decide in November whether they want a veteran Democratic politician or the scion of a well-known Republican family to be their U.S. senator.

Democratic U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez and Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. easily won their primary races on Tuesday, as expected. With 90 percent of precincts reporting, Menendez had 84 percent of the Democratic vote. Kean had about 76 percent of the GOP vote with 95 percent of precincts reporting.

DOJ_NMG_0032496

Low voter turnout helped conservative Republican John Ginty make a decent showing against Kean, a 37-year-old state senator on the moderate side of the GOP who shares his father's name.

A financial data analyst, Ginty, 41, was counting on his supporters voting in droves to show their disapproval of Kean's support of abortion and embryonic stem-cell research. With 95 percent of precincts reporting, Ginty had about 24 percent of the GOP vote.

In a telephone interview, Ginty said he had hoped to do better but wished Kean well. However, Ginty would not say whether he would support Kean in November.

"Mr. Kean is going to have to be able to give conservatives and pro-life voters some incentive to support his candidacy," Ginty said. "That's up to him."

Menendez, 52, had only token opposition in James D. Kelly Jr., 50, who unsuccessfully challenged Corzine in last year's gubernatorial primary.

Menendez laid out his campaign strategy in his speech, constantly linking Kean to President Bush, who lost New Jersey in 2004. A Quinnipiac University poll in March showed that nearly two-thirds of Garden State voters disapproved of the job Bush was doing.

"As George Bush and the status quo in Washington have made the wrong choices for our country, my opponent has joined them time and time again in Trenton," Menendez said. "In five years, he's built a record of siding against New Jerseyans that shows exactly why we can't afford to send him to Washington."

Kean in his campaign will try to convince voters that New Jersey's highest-in-the-nation property taxes and other high levies are Menendez's fault. Kean in a victory speech also addressed Menendez's tactic of linking him to Bush.

"He's not running against President Bush, he's running against Tom Kean," said Kean, who also slammed Menendez as a politician who does not fight for New Jersey's residents.

"Washington is broken," Kean said. "After a decade and a half of Bob Menendez, New Jersey needs to elect a proven reformer that will fight for our security, our families and our values," Kean said.

After hearing his son speak, Thomas Kean said his son has the qualities that make him the best candidate for the job.

"He's thoughtful. He's independent. He's intelligent and he's ethical," Kean Sr. said. "That's what you want in a U.S. senator."

Menendez has a slight edge over Kean in recent polls and a big one in fundraising. As of May 17, Kean had raised $2.97 million, had $1.84 million cash on hand, and a debt of $19,801, according to the Federal Election Commission. Menendez had raised $7.16 million, $6.3 million cash on hand and no debt, according to the FEC.

Several House primaries also were decided Tuesday. In the 13th Congressional District - Menendez's old seat - former Assembly speaker Albio Sires defeated Joseph Vas in the race for the full two-year term. Sires also won the special election for the unexpired term that begins in November.

With about 90 percent of precincts reporting, nearly 16 percent of registered Democrats and Republicans cast ballots - a number that will rise as more returns are recorded. That still beats 2002, the last time a U.S. Senate seat was the main draw, when just 11 percent of the state's registered Democrats and Republicans showed up.

Menendez And Kean Sail Past Primary (NSL)

By Deborah Howlett And Joe Donohue

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), June 7, 2006

Democratic U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez and Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. shook off their primary challengers last night and immediately took aim at each other in a campaign that has begun to heat up five months before the general election.

Unofficial returns showed Kean beat a conservative opponent by better than 3-to-1 and Menendez defeated a little-known candidate by more than 5-to-1. In acceptance speeches to their supporters, the nominees set out campaign strategies that foretold a long, hot summer of intensely personal and partisan campaigning for a six-year term in the U.S. Senate.

Kean promised to conduct a referendum on ethics and taxes. "New Jersey needs strong leaders who have character and core principles which will not be compromised for personal profit," he told supporters in Mountainside.

DOJ_NMG_0032497

Menendez vowed to stand up to the Bush administration and the status quo in Washington. "Over the next five months, New Jerseyans will have a choice between two candidates with very different visions," he said at a victory celebration in East Brunswick. "The stakes could not be higher."

New Jersey's Senate race will play out against the backdrop of a national battle for control of Congress. Democrats are especially hopeful about making gains in the House, where Republicans hold a 231 to 201 majority, with two vacancies.

One of those vacancies is in New Jersey's 13th Congressional District. Former Assembly Speaker Albio Sires defeated Perth Amboy Mayor Joe Vas yesterday for the Democratic nomination to fill that seat, which Menendez held before his appointment to the Senate. Sires will face Republican John Guarini in the overwhelmingly Democratic district.

In the 5th Congressional District in the state's northwest corner, Republican Rep. Scott Garrett easily won nomination to a third term. He will take on Paul Aronsohn, a former aide to President Bill Clinton and Gov. James E. McGreevey who won the Democratic nomination last night.

Turnout was reported to be light in most parts of the state, although Division of Elections spokesman Jeff Lamb said the total wouldn't be clear until well after vote-counting began.

Slightly more than 2million of the state's 4.8million registered voters are affiliated with a major party, and less than 25 percent of those partisan voters cast ballots in the 2002 midterm primary election. Preliminary results last night indicated an even lower turnout.

Menendez overwhelmed his opponent, James D. Kelly, Jr., a perennial candidate who spent almost no money. With 90 percent of the ballots tallied last night, Menendez had 84 percent of the Democratic vote.

Kean faced a bit tougher challenge from John Ginty, a self-described conservative from Bergen County who was championed by New Jersey Right to Life and other groups he described as "values" voters. With 96 percent of the ballots counted, Kean had 76 percent of the GOP vote.

"I did everything I could," Ginty said at a rally at the Elks Lodge in Edison. "My campaign was brief and I didn't have as many resources as I wished when I first got in, but it's been a pleasure and a privilege to be involved in this process."

The results pit a son of Cuban immigrants, who pushed his way to the top of Hudson County Democratic politics and a 14-year stint in Congress, against a son of a popular former governor, whose term in public office began when he was appointed to fill an Assembly vacancy five years ago.

A GOP win in the Senate race would be a costly upset as Democrats seek to gain seats in Congress. New Jersey has not elected a Republican senator since Clifford Case in 1972.

"This is a Democratic seat. It's very important to the Democrats that they hold it," said Joseph Marbach, the chairman of the political science department at Seton Hall University. "It will be interesting to see what issues comes up -- if Kean runs from the president; if Menendez runs from the governor."

Menendez clearly means to make the Bush administration an issue. He has emphasized his willingness to stand up to President Bush and has sought to portray Kean as a toe-the-line Republican on issues such as stem cell research and the war in Iraq.

In his acceptance speech last night, Menendez referred to Kean by name nine times. The only name he invoked more often -- and not by coincidence -- was the president's.

"This campaign will be about who will side with New Jerseyans against the Bush status quo," Menendez said. "Tom Kean Jr.'s record shows he cannot be trusted to make the right choices. On issue after issue, the facts are clear: Tom Kean Jr. and George Bush are perfect together -- perfectly wrong."

Menendez was joined on the stage by his children Alicia and Rob, both college students, and by Democratic state chairman Joseph Cryan and Assembly Majority Leader Bonnie Watson Coleman.

Menendez also stood with Gov. Jon Corzine, who introduced him to the cheering crowd of about 200 people. Five months ago, Corzine appointed Menendez to finish out his term in the Senate. "Governor, thank you so much for your commitment," Menendez said.

DOJ_NMG_0032498

Kean will make their connection a central theme of his campaign, painting Menendez as a longtime political boss now beholden to Corzine and Democrats in Trenton who are trying to foist tax increases and higher spending on already overburdened New Jerseyans.

In his remarks last night, Kean rebuffed Menendez's effort to link him to the president: "I've got news for Bob Menendez. He's not running against George Bush, he's running against Tom Kean."

He also mentioned Menendez by name nine times, harping on Menendez's 30 years of political affiliation with Hudson County.

"Fourteen years ago, Bob Menendez brought his party-boss tactics to Washington. ... Today he is working to expand that machine across New Jersey," Kean said. "The people of New Jersey can no longer afford party bosses who put politics first and people second."

Kean was introduced to a crowd of about 150 partisans chanting, "Go, Tom, go," by his brother, Reed, who said his sibling is "tough as nails" and the ideal candidate to "reform a broken system."

The level of intensity in both camps is remarkable for this early in the election cycle and is likely to be ratcheted up as Menendez and Kean prepare for unusually early televised debates, scheduled for June 25 and June 26.

Said Marbach, "It's going to get ugly fairly soon."

Menendez, Kean Clear Party Rivals To Face Off (PHI)

By Cynthia Burton

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 7, 2006

The field is set: The youthful scion of a family with a history of public service and a self-made man who pulled himself up from a Union City tenement to the rarefied air of the U.S. Senate will struggle bitterly against each other until Nov. 7.

In a light turnout yesterday in the U.S. Senate primary, New Jersey voters rubber-stamped the party bosses' choices of Thomas H. Kean Jr. as the Republican nominee and U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez as the Democratic nominee.

Menendez, a former U.S. representative from Hudson County, defeated an opponent, John D. Kelly Jr., who did not campaign. Kean, a Union County state senator, fought off a challenge from John Ginty, a conservative Republican.

Of the 33 U.S. Senate seats up for election in November, Republicans will defend 15 and Democrats 18, counting the seat of Vermont's Jim Jeffords, an Independent who caucuses with the Democrats.

New Jersey has one of five open seats. Menendez, appointed by Gov. Corzine in January to finish Corzine's term, is running for a full term.

Neither Menendez, 52, of Hoboken, nor Kean, 37, of Westfield, has been tested in a statewide race. At the moment, Menendez is better financed, with $7.3 million to Kean's $2.6 million. However, Kean's campaign has been gaining ground, convincing party leaders that it can pick up this seat, which could open the financial floodgates.

Reflecting their close standings in opinion polls, both primary winners came out last night with vitriolic attacks against the other, each positing himself as the only one who can rescue New Jersey from his opponent.

Drawing on a fundamental theme of his campaign against Menendez, Kean told a crowd in a Mountainside catering hall: "Do you want a Hudson County boss or a proven reformer?"

He accused Menendez of being more interested in using power to benefit himself than the citizens.

"Is there anyone who thinks Bob Menendez is fighting for us?" Kean asked. "Bob Menendez lives off the public and not for it. Ladies and gentlemen, enough is enough."

Kean promised to "bring a true moral compass to office" and attacked Menendez for voting against tax cuts.

Taking a page from Corzine's playbook in the 2005 governor's race, Menendez painted Kean as a puppet of the Bush administration in a state where the president has low approval ratings.

At the East Brunswick Hilton, Menendez told the crowd at his victory party: "Tom Kean Jr. may try to portray himself as a different kind of Republican, but when it comes time to choose sides, he always makes the same wrong choices... . Tom Kean Jr. will choose to side with George Bush, and New Jersey needs a senator who will stand up to President Bush - and I will be that senator."

DOJ_NMG_0032499

He said Kean had voted against raising the state's minimum wage while supporting cuts in federal taxes for millionaires and oil companies, supported embryonic stem-cell research but voted against state financing of a research center, and supported the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq.

Kean, though, unwilling to cede any turf to Menendez, stated his case for the fall election. He said the country needed to bulk up homeland security, protect its borders, and cut government spending.

Both men also did a little legacy "borrowing" yesterday.

Menendez introduced a bill in the Senate that would award homeland-security money based on terrorism risks. He touted it as a continuation of the work of former Gov. Thomas Kean - the father of his Republican opponent and, most recently, head of the 911 Commission.

Kean Jr. quoted Robert F. Kennedy in the second paragraph of his acceptance speech, using the words of a beloved Democrat to set up a standard for judging Menendez: "The problem of power is... how to get men of power to live for the public rather than off the public."

In his first public statement on the race, Kean Sr. - who watched his son from the front row, and not on the stage - said in an interview: "We need people who are new who have new ideas. This, I think, is the most unified the party's been since I left office."

Menendez also sought to inoculate himself from Kean's attacks.

"The Bush administration and its allies here in New Jersey have their backs to the wall, and they are sure to resort to the same playbook they always use against anyone with the courage to question them," he said.

Seeking to blunt Menendez's populist appeal, Kean said that while voters are paying more to live, "Menendez is running up $80,000 in meal tabs at fancy steak houses - while wining and dining the special interests that fuel his political machine."

Joe Cryan, an assemblyman and the Democratic State Committee chairman, said Kean's attacks could backfire. "People expect a better campaign from a Kean," he said in an interview.

Tom Wilson, chairman of the Republican State Committee, said: "The Menendez strategy is make this race about anybody but Bob Menendez."

Also yesterday, Menendez's former House seat went to Albio Sires, mayor of West New York and a former Assembly speaker. Sires fought off a fierce battle from Joseph Vas, an assemblyman and mayor of Perth Amboy. Sires also won the Democratic primary for a shot at a full term. John Guarini is the Republican nominee.

Viola Thomas-Hughes beat Henry David Marcus in the Democratic primary to face Republican U.S. Rep. Frank LoBiondo to represent the district that covers the southernmost end of the state and the Shore.

The U.S. Senate candidates are scheduled to have their first televised debates at the end of this month.

They've Been Nicked By Scandal, But No Signs Of Bleeding Yet (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

Last week, Out There looked at the Members of Congress and governors who are grappling with the most serious ethical allegations this election season. This week, we take up the next tier.

The "risk factor" below is designed to gauge how vulnerable the politician's career is right now, or, if the politician is retiring, how difficult the seat will be for his or her party to hold.

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.)

Not much new has developed on the ties between Burns and Abramoff. Earlier this year, Burns acknowledged that language favorable to an Abramoff client, the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe of Michigan, was included in a spending bill he was responsible for, though Burns said the language was added without his knowledge.

Risk factor: medium. Burns caught a big break when it was revealed that state Auditor John Morrison, the frontrunner in the Democratic primary, had an extramarital affair that became tangled up in a case his office was involved in. Whether Morrison or state Senate President Jon Tester won Tuesday's Democratic primary (results were too late for Roll Call's deadline) the news about Morrison's past helped take the ethical spotlight off Burns for several weeks. Despite recent Democratic gains in the state, Burns' good-ol'-boy persona has carried him through tough races in the past, and it could again this time.

DOJ_NMG_0032500

Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle (D)

For a good-government state, Wisconsin is beset by a number of medium-sized ethical troubles this year. A legislative corruption scandal has produced guilty pleas by former leaders from both parties. Doyle's administration is undergoing state and federal probes over linkages between campaign donations and state travel contracts. And Doyle's use of state planes to attend events with a significant political component has been scrutinized by newspapers in the state; unfortunately for Doyle, it was an issue he rode to victory in 2002 against then-Gov. Scott McCallum (R).

Risk factor: medium. Doyle himself is embattled, but not as much for the ethical questions as for his record as governor and the strong challenge he faces from Rep. Mark Green (R). On the ethics front, he's helped by the fact that the legislative scandals were fully bipartisan and that he hasn't been directly implicated in them.

Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D)

Blagojevich, a one-time Congressman, won office four years ago by promising a change from the corruption scandals that surrounded outgoing Gov. George Ryan (R). Earlier this year, Ryan was convicted on federal corruption charges, but Blagojevich and members of his administration have themselves been blanketed by federal, state and local subpoenas (a few of them covering the period when Ryan was governor) on such matters as questionable state hiring practices and allegations of "pay to play." The governor has denied any wrongdoing.

Risk factor: medium. Recently, the key investigations have been relatively quiet and as a result, the ethics issue "has faded some in the public mind," said one observer in Springfield. This helped Blagojevich dispatch former Chicago Alderman Edwin Eisendrath in the Democratic primary, and his lavish spending on ads has given his candidacy a boost at a time when his Republican opponent, moderate state Treasurer Judy Baar Topinka, cannot keep pace. Blagojevich still faces a tough race, but at least for now, ethical problems seem less likely to doom his candidacy than they once did.

Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.)

Menendez comes from Hudson County, a jurisdiction known for its old-fashioned machine politics. Attention has focused on former Menendez aide Kay LiCausi, who started a lucrative consulting firm called K.L. Strategies Inc. The firm's clients included a number of Menendez supporters. But no investigations or ethics complaints are known to have been filed against Menendez.

Risk factor: medium-low. While Menendez's vulnerability has risen since he was appointed to the Senate, that has mainly stemmed from a frustration with newly elected Gov. Jon Corzine (D) and the attractiveness of his GOP opponent, state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.

Georgia lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed (R)

Reed, the former head of the Christian Coalition, is battling fallout from the Abramoff scandals. According to news reports, Reed acknowledges receiving more than $4 million for cooperating with Abramoff on anti-casino campaigns in Texas, Louisiana and Alabama. But Reed has said he was unaware that those funds were secretly paid by tribes trying to protect their existing gaming businesses from competition by rival tribes.

Risk factor: medium-low. This is one of the few races on the list that has barely changed since December. Though the questions surrounding Reed have enabled state Sen. Casey Cagle (R) to make an unexpectedly strong primary bid, Reed has "avoided indictments, so he has a good chance of winning, because much of the GOP base in Georgia looks at him as a hero," said one Georgia political observer.

This month, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, arguably the most liberal Republican in the 2008 presidential mix, headlined a fundraiser for Reed. But Reed may have to worry about President Bush's decline in popularity, said another political observer in the state, "because identification with Bush was Reed's strong suit with suburban voters."

Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.)

Taylor has faced a number of ethical questions in the past, most notably during investigations into Blue Ridge Savings Bank, which he founded in 1978. Hayes Martin, the bank's former president, was convicted in 2001 and alleged that Taylor was involved in bank fraud and money laundering. But Taylor vigorously denied those allegations, and he was never questioned, much less charged, in the case.

DOJ_NMG_0032501

Risk factor: medium-low. Taylor, buoyed by personal wealth and a 57 percent Bush district, has consistently won re-election against plausible challengers. Democrats recruited former University of Tennessee star and NFL quarterback Heath Shuler, who, according to Democratic polls, has gained ground as local support for Bush has eroded. Still, Shuler, a political novice, faces an Appropriations member who has delivered big-time to his district — no easy task.

Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.)

Aside from an Abramoff-related subpoena to Doolittle's wife, Julie, the questions surrounding Doolittle — who serves on the House Appropriations Committee and as GOP Conference secretary — have remained within the media sphere.

Doolittle wrote letters that advocated positions helpful to clients of Abramoff, who was a major donor. Doolittle also steered federal money toward a company owned by another donor, defense contractor Brent Wilkes, who is being investigated in connection to the bribery case of ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.). Doolittle's political action committee and re-election campaign committee reportedly paid for baby-sitting services. And Julie Doolittle's home-based fundraising firm, Sierra Dominion Financial Services, has raised eyebrows for receiving close to $200,000 in payments for raising money for Doolittle-linked entities. The practice is legal, but the sums are unusually large. Doolittle has denied any suggestion of wrongdoing.

Risk factor: low. There is little indication so far that Doolittle is a major target of prosecutors in the Abramoff case. Moreover, Doolittle's electoral position seems solid, and his aggressiveness as a fundraiser means he'll have a large war chest. Retired Air Force Lt. Col. Charles Brown was expected to prevail in Tuesday's primary, but winning in November will take an enormous Democratic wave.

Others With Low Risk Factors:

• Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.), who allegedly assaulted a Capitol Police officer in the Longworth House Office Building after she was not recognized at a security checkpoint. She later apologized. Despite the current national controversy, she's still favored over two primary challengers due to her loyal base in the solidly Democratic district.

• Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), the powerful House Appropriations chairman who has become the latest Member to be linked in media reports to the bribery case involving Cunningham. The Justice Department is looking into the relationship between federal contracts overseen by Lewis and former Rep. Bill Lowery (R-Calif.), a lobbyist whose clients benefited from federal largesse. Subpoenas have been issued to several clients, but Lewis has denied any wrongdoing. For this year, Lewis is free of serious electoral opposition.

• Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.). Several ex-aides claim that Conyers forced them to perform campaign work on government time, to baby-sit his children and to tutor his wife for law school. Conyers has denied any wrongdoing. The ethics committee has so far shown no interest in probing the case, and he faces only nominal opposition in November.

Technology Sharpens The Incumbents' Edge (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

In Ohio's 1st Congressional District, Republican incumbent Steve Chabot is running up against his toughest reelection challenge in years. But his Democratic opponent is running up against Chabot's computer.

In one of the lesser-known perks of power on Capitol Hill, lawmakers are using taxpayer-funded databases to cultivate constituents more attentively than ever. Chabot -- a six-term legislator from Cincinnati who finds himself imperiled this year after years of easy races -- has a list of e-mail addresses of people who are most interested in tax cuts. His office recently hit the send button on a personal message to alert them to the congressman's support for extending tax breaks on dividends and capital gains.

Chabot's computer is one factor to keep in mind when assessing the odds that Republicans will get evicted this November from their 12-year majority in the House. Anti-incumbent sentiment, as measured by polls and voter interviews, is stronger than it has been in years. But so, too, are certain structural advantages that overwhelmingly favor incumbents.

Some are well known, such as the superior ability of incumbents to raise campaign funds and the fact that most lawmakers come from districts that have been carefully drawn to favor one party. Other benefits -- including the ways that lawmakers are using the latest "micro-targeting" techniques in their official communications -- are more obscure, virtually unheralded beyond the people who use them.

DOJ_NMG_0032502

"A major reason fewer incumbents lose is we have perfected the use of information technology," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.). "As incumbents, we have unlimited access to the most up-to-date technology in the world" free of charge, he said.

One way to think of this midterm election year, analysts say, is a collision between a wave and a wall.

The wave overwhelmingly favors Democrats: an unpopular war in Iraq, job approval ratings for President Bush at record lows, corruption scandals that have engulfed GOP congressional leaders, and polls showing voters favoring Democrats and their positions on the issues by distinct margins.

But Republicans still benefit from the wall: a long-term trend that for years has led to steadily fewer competitive districts.

Democrats are growing increasingly confident that this year the wave will be higher than the wall, but they acknowledge that the challenge of picking up the 15 seats they need to take control is daunting. Analysts have been watching yesterday's special election in California to replace resigned and convicted representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R) for an early indicator of the year's trend. The San Diego area district is traditionally Republican, but recent polls have shown Democrats well positioned for an upset. No result was expected until early today Washington time.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), head of the House Democrats' reelection efforts, said that the party faces a "rigged system" and that only a pitched level of public discontent gives them a "fighting chance" to overcome it.

In a memo delivered to House Democrats last week, Emanuel told lawmakers that redistricting could impede their takeover hopes, noting that respected political handicapper Charlie Cook estimates there are 35 truly competitive races -- compared with 100 in 1994.

One way to look at how incumbents have grown entrenched is to compare this election year with 1994 -- the year Newt Gingrich (Ga.) and his "Republican Revolutionaries" roared to victory by picking up 54 House seats. Although Democrats had held the majority for four decades, there was ample evidence long before Election Day of how vulnerable many of them were.

Democrats that year defended 61 seats in which the lawmaker had won no more than 55 percent of the vote in the previous election, a threshold many strategists and political scientists use to identify at-risk incumbents. Democrats lost 29 of the 61 seats.

This year, Republicans are defending only 19 seats in which their House member won 55 percent or less in the previous election.

In 2004, only five of the 404 incumbents seeking reelection lost -- a reelection rate of 99 percent.

In California, all 101 incumbents who ran for reelection in 2002 and 2004 won, and all but two clobbered their opponents by 20 percentage points or more. The story is the same in most states.

At the same time, the polarized electorate tends to reduce fluidity on Capitol Hill, an advantage for the party that benefits from the status quo. Thanks to packed districts and a decline in split-ticket voting, there are fewer districts that vote for a president of one party but elect a member of Congress from the opposite party. Bush carried 255 House districts in the past presidential election, compared with Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry's 180. "There has been a big increase in party-line voting at all levels," said Gary C. Jacobson, a political scientist at the University of California at San Diego who studies political trends.

In many state legislatures, which draw congressional districts, politicians have joined in an unspoken bipartisan alliance to protect incumbents. Often this has been accomplished by packing Democratic-trending voters -- especially African Americans -- into a few urban districts, rather than spreading them in ways that would make more districts truly competitive. Some Democrats, including Rep. Brad Sherman (Calif.), lament the trend. Sherman said he fears that "a majority of those casting votes will vote Democratic in November" but that votes will be distributed in a way that does not necessarily produce a majority of House seats.

Chabot is an illustration of the way lawmakers settle into their seats. He won by campaigning against then-President Bill Clinton's tax increases in 1994, taking 56 percent of the vote. He had tight races in 1996 and 1998. But after the 2000 census, Ohio's Republican governor and the GOP-led state legislature made life easier for him. His new district was shaped to include more Republican neighborhoods. In an interview, Chabot said he estimates the new lines added about five percentage points to his November returns.

Democrat John Cranley, a Cincinnati City Council member, is bidding to change that. He and other Democrats have been hitting Chabot for supporting the Iraq war and an overhaul of Social Security.

DOJ_NMG_0032503

The national winds are gusting in Cranley's direction. A recent Washington Post-ABC News poll found that 56 percent of voters said they want Democrats to control the House, and a majority said they preferred Democrats to handle every domestic and foreign issue they were asked about. But these broad trends in public opinion will not mean much, strategists say, unless Democrats succeed in translating them into an expanded number of truly competitive races.

Chabot said he is not concerned about the toxic political environment because "I know my district very well."

Like all incumbents, he has some important tools in knowing his district, ones not easily replicated by challengers trying to reach the roughly 600,000 people who live in a typical congressional district.

One of these tools is the congressional account each lawmaker can use to communicate with constituents. In the past, this money went mainly for sending newsletters or other mailings to voters, who often turned around and tossed them in the trash. But technology has allowed lawmakers to track the interests of individual voters, file the information into a database and then use e-mails or phone calls to engage directly with voters on issues they know they care about. In essence, this is the traditional "franking" privilege updated -- and made far more powerful -- for the digital age.

There are some restrictions, such as requirements that official office communications are not overly political. But there is a fine line between politics and constituent service, legislators acknowledge.

The practice is so commonplace that a cottage industry of consultants has emerged to assist House members in their micro-targeting strategies. Aris McMahon of Constituent Services Inc. advises several lawmakers on the latest techniques, including increasingly popular "virtual town halls" or "tele-town halls."

Using taxpayers' money, legislators employ a new technology that allows them to call thousands of households simultaneously with a recorded message, asking people in their districts to join in on a conference call with their representative. With the push of a button, the constituent is on the line with the House member -- and often 1,000 or more fellow constituents. More important, the lawmaker knows from the phone numbers where the respondents live and, from what they say on the call, what issues interest them.

At a retreat in St. Michaels, Md., in January, Rep. Daniel E. Lungren (R-Calif.) briefed Republicans on how to host these tele-town halls using their office budget, participants said. Information gathered from the events, as well as e-mails and phone calls from constituents, gets plugged into a database, giving the incumbent something a challenger could only dream of: a detailed list of the specific interests of thousands of would-be voters. E-mail then allows for personal interaction -- and a free reminder of why the incumbent should be reelected.

Senate Contender In Florida Presses On (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

VENICE, Fla. — Undaunted by a run of horrific poll numbers, staff turmoil and public doubts from leaders of her party, Representative Katherine Harris is thinking confidently beyond November.

Once Ms. Harris wins her race for a Senate seat, she says, she plans to travel everywhere with a guide dog.

"Before I hire anyone to work for me in the Senate, I tell them I'm going to do this," said Ms. Harris, the former Florida secretary of state best — or worst — remembered for her role in the state's election recount of 2000.

Ms. Harris explains that she intends to participate in a program that provides guide dogs for volunteers to train. While cynics may assign unflattering symbolism to a politician who is not blind being led around the Capitol by a guide dog, Ms. Harris is undeterred — by this or by the perception that her role in 2000 makes her too divisive to lure the swing voters necessary to defeat the incumbent Democrat, Bill Nelson.

In her insistence on running, Ms. Harris has become something of a pariah among many of the people whose power she indirectly helped ensure five and a half years ago, as overseer of the recount that sealed George W. Bush's victory.

Top White House officials, Republican operatives and Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida have urged her not to run. When Ms. Harris ignored those entreaties, a Who's Who of national Republicans begged a Who's Who of Florida Republicans to oppose her in the primary, to no avail.

DOJ_NMG_0032504

Her campaign has been marked by aides leaving en masse, disclosures of her ties to a contractor caught up in a lobbying scandal and the fund-raising handicaps inherent to any enterprise perceived as a lost cause or, worse, a joke.

Ed Rollins, one of Ms. Harris's many former campaign consultants, claimed she had told him that God wanted her to stay in the race. (Ms. Harris denies making the statement.)

She promised to finance her campaign with $10 million of her own money. Popular wisdom says that will not matter. Mr. Nelson led Ms. Harris by more than 30 points in recent polls.

"She has absolutely no chance of winning," said former Representative Joe Scarborough, a Pensacola Republican who was courted strongly by the National Republican Senatorial Committee to oppose Ms. Harris but declined. Mr. Scarborough, the host of "Scarborough Country" on MSNBC, said Ms. Harris "seems to be detached from reality these days."

Because of her role in the 2000 recount, Ms. Harris still enjoys devotion from many Florida Republicans, enough to make her the likely winner over three little-known opponents for her party's nomination. Her supporters applaud avidly at Republican events and cannot understand her sudden unpopularity among party leaders.

"She acted exactly the way the Republicans wanted her to act," said Stanley Tate, a Miami businessman who serves as her campaign's finance chairman. Mr. Tate said he was "completely confused" by the party establishment's snubbing of Ms. Harris. He tells of a recent Republican dinner in Miami where Ms. Harris received a standing ovation from the crowd yet was not acknowledged in a speech by Governor Bush.

On Memorial Day, Ms. Harris rode in a parade and visited two Veterans of Foreign Wars halls and one American Legion post, and was not audibly jeered or heckled by anyone, a fact that surprises even her, "based on the press I get."

Between stops, Ms. Harris portrays herself as something of a populist under siege from "Washington Republicans" and a liberal news media. "I don't have the Beltway mentality," she said. "And I never go along to get along. So I think it's a little threatening to those in power."

She said that given the difficult environment for incumbent Republicans in November, it could be an asset to be perceived as a nonfavorite of the party establishment.

"O.K., so President Bush does not support her," said Representative John L. Mica, a Florida Republican who is close to Ms. Harris. "President Bush is at 30 percent." Mr. Mica added that Ms. Harris was previously criticized for being "a tool of the Bushes," which should not be a problem anymore.

Even so, the role of anti-establishment figure is unusual for Ms. Harris, the product of a well-to-do Central Florida family and a granddaughter of a cattle and citrus baron. She became a well-known socialite in the Sarasota area and has long been active in the state's Republican Party. She is married to a Swedish businessman, Anders Ebbeson, and they have listed assets of as much as $37 million.

In Congress, Ms. Harris has been a reliable ally of the Bush administration on issues like tax cuts, Iraq and opposition to same-sex marriage. She has done little in her three-and-a-half-year tenure to win notice beyond her district — one exception being a speech in which she spoke of a foiled terrorist plot against the city of Carmel, Ind. (Federal officials said the plot never existed; Ms. Harris later said she had heard of it secondhand.)

The belief among top Republicans was that Ms. Harris's presence in 2006 would galvanize Democrats still eager for revenge after 2000.

"The campaign can't be about her," Governor Bush told reporters last month. "I gave her that exact advice. Since then, it's gotten worse."

Like most politicians who are behind in polls, Ms. Harris says she does not pay attention to them. But she cited her own "internal polls," which she said showed that she could get 53 percent of the vote "if my base turns out."

She says she has moved on from a string of fiascoes early this year, including the disclosure that a military contractor who has pleaded guilty to bribery in the corruption case involving former Representative Randy Cunningham has also admitted to making $32,000 in illegal donations to Ms. Harris's campaign. She has said she had no idea the contributions were illegal; she donated the money to charity.

She has also seen a drain of top aides, campaign managers and consultants, many complaining on the way out the door about her management style and unwillingness to follow their advice (including not to run).

DOJ_NMG_0032505

Ms. Harris says voters are indifferent to stories about staff turnover. What matters, she said, is "my total commitment to Floridians" and "getting the word out about how liberal Bill Nelson is."

In interviews, Ms. Harris projects a somewhat frenetic personality, speaking in rapid-fire cadences, fussing incessantly with her hair and barraging aides with questions and road directions ("We have a detour to Starbucks on the way. ... Quickest way to Venice is down Fruitville"). Sometimes she will burst forth midsentence upon noticing something out the window ("Hey, there's one of my bumper stickers!").

She attributes much of how she is viewed to the "silliness" of the media. This dates from 2000, when Ms. Harris's perceived overapplication of makeup became a recurring punch line.

"They had trucks in Florida bringing the ballots to Tallahassee," Jay Leno said on "The Tonight Show." "In fact, it's the same trucks they used to bring the makeup to Florida Secretary of State Katherine Harris."

Ms. Harris is adamant in her claim that news organizations have doctored photographs to exaggerate the amount of makeup she wears. "I haven't worn blue makeup since seventh grade," she said, referring to photographs she said she had seen of herself on the Internet.

She is especially animated when the topic turns to animals, including the guide dog she plans to train starting in November. She will care for the dog for 18 months, spending nearly all her waking hours with it. "You can't let them sleep in bed with you," Ms. Harris said. "Which is going to be harder on me than the dog."

When a supporter in a Venice veterans hall said he once witnessed Ms. Harris leave her vehicle to escort a turtle across a highway, she became gravely serious.

"All of my life I have stopped for turtles," she said firmly, even defensively, as if someone had challenged her commitment to turtle safety.

As Ms. Harris hugged and hand-shaked her way toward the hall exit, the song "Y.M.C.A." came on. The mostly empty dance floor filled with aging veterans and their wives, one of whom spotted Ms. Harris and summoned her.

She obliged. And then commenced another unforgettable moment, Katherine Harris, arms over her head, dancing to "Y.M.C.A."

His Support Waning, Weld Quits New York Governor's Race (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

William F. Weld, the former governor of Massachusetts who undertook a rare bid to lead another state, dropped out of the race for governor of New York yesterday. He had been deserted by Republicans who once supported him as their best hope against Attorney General Eliot Spitzer in the November election.

Mr. Weld, a moderate Republican in the mold of Gov. George E. Pataki, ran a lackluster campaign and was never able to convert his early advantages into real campaign muscle. At the same time, Mr. Pataki's behind-the-scenes effort to help Mr. Weld last month proved too late and too thin to do any good.

Mr. Weld's departure sets the stage for an ideological clash between the presumptive Republican candidate, former Assemblyman John Faso — a conservative intent on cutting taxes — and the likely Democratic nominee, Mr. Spitzer, who is backed by a unified Democratic establishment that is determined to regain the governor's mansion after 12 years.

Mr. Weld dropped out after lengthy debates with his staff on Monday. The central issue was whether he could rebound from recent setbacks and raise enough money to win the Sept. 12 primary, running as a moderate outsider against the party's choice, Mr. Faso, and then go on to beat Mr. Spitzer in November. His decision to withdraw reflected a stunning political defeat for a man considered presidential material by some just a decade ago. [Page B4.]

Several Republican moderates urged Mr. Weld to stay in on Monday; one senior Pataki aide even e-mailed Mr. Weld a quote from the Roman emperor Marcus Aurelius, in Latin, that urges digging in and fighting.

Mr. Weld mulled setting up a new political party, devoted to tax relief, to amplify his call for income tax cuts. And he was even prepared to spend up to $5 million of his own money on the race, according to several of his advisers. Yet his loss of the Independence Party endorsement on Saturday to Mr. Spitzer, the desertion of key supporters in recent days and the realization of looming costs convinced Mr. Weld that he would end up losing to Mr. Faso — who corralled the party's support at the Republican convention last week — or to Mr. Spitzer.

DOJ_NMG_0032506

"If John and I had been head-to-head between now and Sept. 12, I guarantee you one thing: We would have had a very tired, very broke Republican candidate on Sept. 13, no matter who it was," Mr. Weld said at a news conference yesterday.

Republican concern about contested primaries is so great that the state party chairman, Stephen J. Minarik III, is expected to ask one of two Republicans running for the United States Senate, Kathleen Troia McFarland, to drop out today. Her advisers said last night she planned to say no.

Among the assets Mr. Weld, 60, had coming into the race were tacit support from Mr. Pataki and from a closer, older friend, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Mr. Weld had expected their endorsements, the advisers said, but neither was forthcoming. Some Weld advisers accused Mr. Pataki and Mr. Giuliani of caring more about protecting their own presidential ambitions in 2008 than risking their political capital on Mr. Weld, even though he shared their fiscally conservative, socially moderate views.

"I think Pataki and Rudy are constrained — they have a little touch of Potomac fever and they couldn't do anything too overt to help Weld if it could backfire on them," said Arnold L. Burns, a fund-raiser and old friend of Mr. Weld's, who is also chairman of the QuanStar Group.

Four advisers who granted anonymity said that Mr. Weld felt more betrayed by the governor than by the former mayor because he was led to believe that a Pataki endorsement was in the offing this spring.

In mid-May, Mr. Pataki held a dinner at the governor's mansion in Albany with his senior political advisers. According to participants at the dinner, Mr. Pataki said that in order to endorse Mr. Weld, he would have to see more hustle and political momentum from the candidate, such as new endorsements from Republican county leaders. In an effort to show the aggressiveness that Mr. Pataki sought, some members of the dinner group worked with Weld aides later that week to attack some Faso votes in the Assembly as "extremist."

At that time, Republicans close to Mr. Pataki told a reporter that an endorsement was imminent. Yesterday, however, they said that Mr. Pataki never followed up on the mid-May dinner by leading the charge, and that he decided against endorsing Mr. Weld when he realized it would not guarantee a major Weld victory at the convention.

Pataki advisers said Mr. Weld was hobbled most of all by his own problems. He never regained the artful political touch he showed in Massachusetts, and was unable to shake Republican concerns about his leadership of a Kentucky trade school, Decker College. The school is now under federal and state investigation into financial aid fraud.

Mr. Pataki, speaking to reporters yesterday, insisted that his endorsement had not been a crucial issue in the contest. "It was a question of — I said from the beginning — of candidates making the case and going out there and doing the hard work to win," Mr. Pataki said. "The fire in the belly counts for a lot, and John Faso had it."

As for Mr. Giuliani, his spokeswoman issued a statement praising the Republican unity around Mr. Faso; it did not mention Mr. Weld.

The major challenge facing Republicans now is Mr. Faso's money: He had $933,000 on hand in January, the last time fund-raising records were made public, while Mr. Spitzer had $19 million. Mr. Faso focused heavily on courting convention delegates this spring, and the four Weld advisers say they believe Mr. Faso is grappling with raising cash, based on the chatter in the insular world of New York Republican fund-raising.

At a joint news conference yesterday, Mr. Weld and Mr. Faso made a point of emphasizing that Mr. Weld would help his former rival raise money. Still, Cathy Blaney, a Pataki fund-raiser who worked for Mr. Weld, said last night that it was hard to predict if Mr. Faso would raise enough money to have a chance to defeat Mr. Spitzer. "Bill Weld was able to play on a bigger stage, and we raised money that isn't usually available in New York," she said. "What the future holds money-wise for John Faso, I don't know."

Yesterday, at a news conference in Mr. Weld's Manhattan campaign office, Mr. Weld and Mr. Faso complimented each other, professed a lack of ill will, and clasped and raised their hands in a victory pose at one point. Both men said that, with enough in campaign money, Mr. Faso could turn 2006 into a pocketbook race against Mr. Spitzer, who leads the Republican candidate by at least 50 points in public opinion polls.

DOJ_NMG_0032507

"The fact of the matter is, New York cannot take a governorship of Eliot Spitzer, who will raise taxes," Mr. Faso said. "Spitzer has already promised billions in new spending and billions in new borrowing that simply cannot be paid for unless taxes are raised."

In assessing Mr. Weld's campaign, his advisers said that, while he may be an uneven campaigner, he was also the victim of Republicans and conservatives who had been shut out of power by the Pataki camp.

"Our state Republican Party is increasingly under control of the right wing, exclusionary elements of the party, and Bill is really increasingly at odds with those people on social issues," said Mr. Burns, the Weld ally.

Frist Cementing Bush Alliance (RC)

By John Stanton And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 7, 2006

Less than six months before leaving the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has thrown his legacy chips in with President Bush, inextricably aligning himself with the White House on key domestic and international issues, even as many in his own party distance themselves from the unpopular president.

Although his Senate position makes him one of the GOP's four most prominent national leaders, Frist will face significant challenges in winning the 2008 presidential nomination — from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) as well as from such Senators as George Allen (R-Va.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) who are darlings of the conservative movement.

Given the already crowded field of potential GOP White House aspirants, Frist's decision to firmly tie his political fate to Bush's could result in a boon to his presidential hopes, despite Bush's current weakened state.

Frist could benefit if Bush rewards his loyalty by handing off his substantial political and fundraising operations to Frist. In addition, having the backing of Bush — who remains personally popular with much of the GOP's base despite their concerns about how he has handled his job — could be Frist's ticket to undercutting McCain's early frontrunner status and the natural support among conservatives for Allen and Brownback.

GOP sources say that Frist's allegiance to the president is no surprise, given that he arguably owes his rise to Majority Leader to Bush and his operation. Bush was among those who helped propel Frist into the top job in early 2003 after then-Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) stepped down in the wake of racially toned remarks he made about the late Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.).

One Republican Senator, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said that Frist understands Bush is largely responsible for his political fortunes in the Senate. Even with Bush's popularity now at record lows, the lawmaker said that Frist cannot turn his back now on a key ally.

"It's part loyalty, and it's partly because he's so closely hitched himself to this star," the Senator said.

Some Republican insiders suggest that Frist may be banking on Bush to give him the needed support in a prospective 2008 presidential bid. Bush not only has a tested political team but also a fundraising machine unmatched in GOP circles. A source close to Frist acknowledged that should the Majority Leader end up making a run for the White House, his decision to align himself with Bush could put him in the potentially enviable position of inheriting Bush's massive political and money network.

Frist must show that he can manage the Senate at a highly partisan time and when other Senators in his conference are also eyeing White House bids. Although as Majority Leader, Frist has spearheaded a number of significant victories — including the passage of bankruptcy reform, class-action reform, an energy bill, a transportation bill, extensions of several Bush tax cuts and Senate approval of sweeping immigration legislation — Democrats, and critics within his own party, have painted Frist as ineffective, and, to an extent, the label has stuck.

Part of that appearance problem stems from Frist's style, say those close to the lawmaker, arguing that his clinical approach to politics has often left him ineffective at trumpeting his own successes.

Additionally, unlike hot-button issues like gay marriage and judicial reform that appeal to the GOP's core voters, most of Frist's victories have been too dry or technical in nature to be easily translated into sound bites or to engage base voters' passions.

DOJ_NMG_0032508

In an effort to reverse this public perception, Frist has tried to be more aggressive this year both in touting his own agenda and defending the White House from Democratic attacks. Likewise, the White House has been much more cooperative with Frist than it has in the past, Senate aides said.

On issue after issue this year, Frist and Bush have teamed up, including on a spate of judicial and executive nominations, immigration reforms and on how much should be spent in the emergency supplemental spending bill to pay for Hurricane Katrina recovery and the war in Iraq. On the latter, Frist even asked for — and Bush agreed to — a veto pledge if the bill came in too bloated.

A Frist aide points to the recent immigration debate in the Senate as an example of this cooperation.

Unlike last year's disastrous Social Security debate — in which Bush essentially dumped the issue on the laps of Congressional Republicans and did little to help move the political ball forward — the White House agreed to play a supporting role and allow Frist to lead on the issue.

White House officials and Frist's office coordinated the timing and substance of statements by the president on the issue, so that Bush's positions could complement Frist's efforts to nudge conservatives in his party into line.

Similarly, despite the harm the gay marriage debate this week could inflict on endangered moderate Republicans such as Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.), Frist wholeheartedly agreed to take up the amendment again this year.

A close link to Bush could also strengthen Frist's muscle among other Republicans in charting the party's agenda, as well helping advance his own personal platform, once he leaves the Senate.

But there are equally obvious dangers inherent in the strategy, because the entire gambit turns on Bush recovering much of the popular support he has lost in the past year and a half, Republicans acknowledge.

"It's a gamble," said one GOP political operative. "You are gambling that hopefully there will be a rebound of some sort — a steadying of the [president's] approval ratings and popularity going into '08."

Frist's strategy also has required him to be so loyal to the White House that he has increasingly served as one of Bush's few defenders on controversial issues.

For instance, Frist earlier this year quickly released statements praising a National Security Agency wiretapping program, even as Republicans and Democrats in both chambers were blasting the effort as an illegal invasion of privacy.

And Frist has thus far been the only major Republican to defend the Department of Justice's decision to raid the office of Rep. William Jefferson (R-La.) last month. That put Frist in direct conflict with Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who, despite some backlash from members of his conference, has been vocal in criticizing the raid.

In fact, while Frist has often found himself at odds with House leaders this year, he has put up an all-but-united front with the White House. Perhaps the only notable divide between the two came earlier this year when Frist joined scores of other lawmakers in challenging the Bush administration's decision to authorize Dubai Ports World to manage several major U.S. ports.

Frist's decision to keep close to the president "may have an appeal to some people for staying loyal, but if not, you look like you are just more of the same," the operative warned.

Democrats have increasingly looked to tie Republicans in the House and Senate to Bush, constantly referring to them as "Bush Republicans" in statements and press releases and attempting to paint Bush and his political adviser, Karl Rove, as the masterminds of every move Congressional Republicans make.

It appears that Democrats are taking notice of the alignment between Bush and Frist, repeatedly questioning the Majority Leader's motives as he shepherds legislation through the Senate.

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said Tuesday that ballot-box hopes are certainly influencing the GOP Senate agenda, but he is unsure of the exact culprit.

"I don't know how much of it is dictated by Frist's '08 ambitions or by [White House adviser] Karl Rove's political strategy," Durbin said, adding that he also couldn't say whether the two were coordinating behind the scenes to set Congressional priorities.

"I don't know what's driving it," Durbin said.

By any measure, Frist must negotiate a difficult path. He is trying to show he is a capable leader despite his lame-duck status in the Senate and his possible presidential ambitions. He must also compete against at least four of his GOP colleagues who are similarly interested in residing at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave.

"It's Frist's job to push the president's agenda forward," the GOP operative noted. "It's a very difficult position to be in."

Still, the Republican source said, Frist might lose by so closely aligning himself with Bush.

"It certainly seems, at least for the short term, that there's not a lot of political risk in distancing yourself, because even the base right now is uncomfortable with where the president is," the source said.

Faith-Based Initiative (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

In 1995, Sam Brownback sacrificed part of his body and wound up closer to God. He discovered a melanoma and had to have two surgeries, during which a "big hunk of flesh" was taken out of his side.

"It was a great season in life," the Kansas senator says in his soft lullaby of a voice. "Season" is one of his favorite words. He sometimes sounds as though he's quoting the Bible even when he isn't.

"I can identify now better with people that have cancer, 'cause when you're told that, it's kind of like -- where else? What else is going on in this body?" Brownback says. He is sitting on a couch in an office in the Capitol and once or twice smiles a serene smile. "But that's mind focused on the flesh. That's death. Literally, you almost can worry yourself to death."

Instead of dying, the first-term Republican congressman had a revelation. In a speech once, he likened the melanoma to God pounding on his hardened heart, even bringing a hunk of concrete and an ax onstage to make the point. He says now it produced "a wonderful and radical transformation of focus." When he ran for the Senate the next year, his spiritual awakening gave him the determination to run an aggressive campaign and crush his opponents at the polls.

Everything has its season, and now is the time when presidential aspirants sprout like stalks of tall Kansas wheat. Brownback thinks 2008 might be his moment, though in interviews he emphasizes his humility. He calls himself a "flawed man," and says the longer he pursues his faith, the more he finds his own sin. It seems contradictory -- all that ego and all that modesty.

"I could be the right person with the right message at the right moment. And I could be completely wrong and I'll still be happy about it," he says, sounding way too mellow for a wannabe president.

In the meantime, amid the fundraising and the visits to Iowa and New Hampshire, Brownback is focused on spreading light when he enters a room. He has said he tries to see Jesus in his fellow senators.

Three years ago he gave a speech at the Archdiocese of Denver. He spoke of the need to "convert the culture" by spreading God's love. He posed a question: "When we walk up to the McDonald's counter, what if we looked at that person in the eye . . . and we said, 'God bless you for that Big Mac?!' "

Then Brownback quoted Burt Bacharach.

"What the world needs now," the senator said, "is love, sweet love."A Religious Experience

Four years ago, Brownback -- who'd been a Protestant all his life -- had another spiritual transformation. He decided to become a Catholic.

"Just felt a real deep calling," he says.

He won't talk much about this aspect of his religious life. "It's kind of a divisive issue," he says, perhaps conscious of his many evangelical supporters. "People divide along churches instead of trying to look at how you pull together. Like, okay, this church is better than that church. You can find the Lord in a lot of places if you're willing to look for Him."

Brownback says he felt drawn to Catholicism for several years before he converted. (He had been raised a Methodist, and later belonged to a nondenominational evangelical church.) He describes the decision as an organic process, less a journey away from his faith and more a return to its roots. He doesn't call it a conversion.

"A conversion is if I became a Buddhist," he says. "Joining the Catholic Church was joining the early church. This is the mother church. This is the church out of which orthodoxy and Protestantism came."

DOJ_NMG_0032510

He was sponsored by his friend in the Senate, Rick Santorum (R-Pa.). The ceremony was performed by the Rev. John McCloskey, a member of the controversial and strict Opus Dei sect who has helped convert a number of high-profile people, including columnist Robert Novak and former abortion provider Bernard Nathanson.

Sundays back in Topeka, the senator, who says he is not himself Opus Dei, attends two services. First he goes to Mass by himself, then to his old nondenominational church with his family, who did not convert. His wife, the former Mary Stauffer, comes from a wealthy family that used to own a media conglomerate. They have five children, the two youngest adopted after the Brownbacks applied in China and Guatemala simultaneously and both applications -- unexpectedly -- came through.

He invoked his adopted daughter recently during the Southern Republican Leadership Conference in Memphis, where potential '08 candidates gathered to speechify.

"Tomorrow, because a woman in China saw that abortion was killing a child, Jenna Joy Brownback, my daughter, will have an eighth birthday party," he told the crowd, prompting applause.

Brownback has a folksy, reassuring presence: He might be lamenting Roe v. Wade or he might be tucking you in and reading "The Berenstain Bears." He grew up on a farm and uses agricultural analogies and words like "skedaddle." He keeps a Mother Teresa quote about not judging people on the back door of his home in Topeka.

"So easy to judge people," he says. "I see you coming in the hallway and my mind just automatically goes, 'Okay, reporter, Washington Post, that's a primarily liberal publication, be careful.' Well, now I've automatically judged you. So I've spent my time judging you instead of thinking, 'Oh, here's a great person that I can interact with. I pray to love 'em.' "

Love, sweet love. Brownback examines his soul for hate and tries to excise any malignancies. Some years back, he says, he apologized to Hillary Clinton at a prayer breakfast for having despised her and her husband.

"I'm ashamed to say it but I did. And I felt -- justified in my hate," he says, his tone bitter, as if reliving an ancient betrayal. "I disagree politically but there is no call to hate. And it was wrong, it's a sin, and I went to her and I apologized."

He practices prayer when he finds himself in heated situations, as he did recently during a meeting on a constitutional amendment he supports, which would ban same-sex marriage. (Marriage, he says, is "a man and a woman bonded together for life and grandparents surrounding 'em.")

"Instead of getting angry at somebody for opposing you on something, you're just praying for them," he says. "You just pray blessings on them, blessings on their family."

Because of his emphasis on compassion, Brownback does not fit the stereotype of the angry Christian conservative. This persona was embodied sensationally by "Pitchfork Pat" Buchanan and his talk of America's "religious war," by Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, who once imagined "rampant" lesbianism in his state's schools, by the Rev. Jerry Falwell, who said abortionists, feminists, gays and pagans helped cause the 9/11 terror attacks. (Falwell later took it back.)

Brownback has teamed up with some of the most liberal members of the Senate to help victims of sex trafficking, and suffering Sudanese. He quotes Bono on the struggles of the poor and encourages college students to take their spring breaks in Africa. He has worked for women's rights in Afghanistan and for North Korean refugees. When the issue of illegal immigration blew up in the Senate earlier this year, Brownback embraced President Bush's plan for comprehensive reform, infuriating some conservatives who see it as too lenient. He has pushed for an African American history museum on the Mall, saying he became committed after a "divine intervention" came to him during prayer.

"It's a consistent kind of a viewpoint that he has that's across the spectrum, and I think a lot of political leaders sort of pick and choose," says Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

"The wonderful thing about Sam is yes, he is ambitious, but it doesn't change anything," says David Barron, who coordinates a consortium of environmental groups called the International Conservation Partnership and has worked with Brownback on conservation issues. "He doesn't worry that someone's going to think he's a squishy liberal because he wants to feed people."

It would, in fact, be a grave error to characterize Brownback as squishy.

When he entered the House as part of the Republican sweep of 1994, Brownback argued for dismantling the departments of Commerce, Education, Energy, and Housing and Urban Development as part of an effort to downsize the federal government.

DOJ_NMG_0032511

Some years later he put forward the theory that part of the problem with the Social Security system was abortion, because too few children were growing up to become workers who could pay into the system.

During the 2004 Republican convention, Brownback told a closed-door rally, "We must win this culture war," according to the New York Times. "I say we fight."

"He has this kind of soft physical presence," says Burdett Loomis, a political scientist at the University of Kansas. "I think Sam Brownback is a very tough customer."

Brownback believes that research on embryonic stem cells is immoral. In a hearing in 2000, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) argued that research could save lives, and pointed out that the embryos in question were left over from fertility treatments and were going to be discarded anyway.

Brownback compared Specter's argument to the gruesome medical experiments performed on victims of the Holocaust.

"You had the Nazis in World War II saying, of these people, 'They are going to be killed,' " Brownback said. " 'Why do we not experiment on them and find out what happens with these experiments? They are going to die anyway.' "

"But they were living people," said Specter, whose parents were Jewish immigrants.

"These are living embryos," Brownback countered. He then hastened to reassure his opponents that he knew they meant well.

"I do not think our hearts are any different," he told one.A Humble Leader

During visits to Israel, Brownback used to study the Torah with Ariel Sharon, calling it "each of us feeding our souls." Lately he has been reading the Koran. He says Islam's holy book talks a lot about weighing people's good deeds against their bad deeds, and this has made him appreciate Christianity more.

"That's why I love grace so much. And mercy," he says. "Think of the burden that is on a person, that you're going to be weighed. And all of us fall short."

This notion of falling short is a big part of Brownback's identity. He's even humble about his own humility, saying there are others who surpass him in this virtue. Once, years ago, he washed the feet of a staffer at a farewell party to demonstrate respect and humility. When he feels his staffers need guidance, he gives them index cards with Scripture encouraging them to follow Christ's model of servant leadership, or reminding them that "Pride goes before destruction."

He says he struggles "to be really fully committed to the faith -- to die to self," to "pick up His cross daily and carry it." He talks about a visit he made earlier this year to Gospel Rescue Ministries downtown, where he stayed overnight in a room full of men participating in a substance abuse program.

"But for the grace of God," he says three times, "there go I."

Brownback grew up one of four kids on a Kansas farm outside Parker, which had 281 residents in the last census. His childhood friend David Prentice recalls herding cattle with Sam on motorcycles. In high school Brownback was a quarterback ("Wasn't much of one," the senator says), and maintained a lustrous afro he likes to joke about now.

But if the young Sam was, as high school friend Joe Atwood describes him, "extremely overboard humble," he was also highly ambitious. He held leadership positions through law school at the University of Kansas and was state president of Future Farmers of America. At 30, he was appointed the youngest agriculture secretary in Kansas history.

And now, at 49, he's considering a run for president. Across the country, not many people know who Sam Brownback is. His fundraising has been lackluster, though it's still early. Even if he doesn't get close to winning, though, his support in the conservative Christian community may affect what other candidates are talking about.

"One of his major contributions would be to anchor the moral issues in the Republican Party," says Rob Schenck, an evangelical minister and president of the conservative National Clergy Council. "He in a way could hold the evangelical and the traditional Catholic vote hostage if the party began to waver on those issues."

Brownback says his model for the presidential race would be the way he ran for Senate in 1996, after discovering the melanoma.

"If I win, I win. If I lose, I lose," he says. "It's a great liberation. . . . And then you run on the topics that you really feel called to do. And the beauty of it is, is that people really like that. They may not agree with you on things but they really do like that. The purpose-driven life."

DOJ_NMG_0032512

He talks about the presidency with a sense -- as his former chief of staff David Kensinger put it -- that "what is supposed to happen will happen." He believes America is a special place destined for special things, and that it is undergoing a "renewal of the soul."

"If Sam's headed for higher office it's because he thinks the mission is headed for higher office," says Barron, the conservationist.

But how can a person be humble and also believe he should be president of the most powerful country in the world?

"It's one of the most humbling things on Earth," Brownback says, his voice soft. "Look at the nature and the difficulty of that job and the greatness of this country and the need to be humble and wise to serve. Plus it's just, it's like, pride was the first sin and humility's the first grace . . ."

"I think Reagan had it right that you don't pursue the presidency, it pursues you."

But a man who expects a crop must first till the soil. Brownback knows this. He still goes home to his childhood farm for the spring planting and the fall harvest of the wheat.

He used to keep a tennis ball can filled with Kansas dirt in his office as a symbol "of what I physically return to," he says. "It's just a great reminder that you serve for a period, you serve for a season and then you move on."

Brownback says he imagines future generations walking the halls of Congress and nobody knowing who he was. He imagines people passing a "Brownback Room" and someone saying, "Who was he?"

Perhaps someone else might answer that Sam Brownback was a complicated man, who thought himself a servant and a potential president at the same time, who imagined his life forgotten even as he dreamed of a room named after himself.

Harvard, Boston Hospital To Attempt Embryo Cloning (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Scientists at Harvard and Children's Hospital Boston announced Tuesday they have the green light to clone human embryos that could generate stem cell lines for specific diseases.

The researchers join a small cadre of scientists worldwide attempting to do what a South Korean scientist claimed to have done, only to have his work unravel when it was exposed as a fraud.

“We are convinced that work with embryonic stem cells holds enormous promise,” Harvard's Steven Hyman said.

Embryonic stem cells are the precursor cells to almost every tissue in the body; growing them could provide replacement tissues for diseases such as diabetes and cancer. In theory, the body would not reject the tissues from cloned embryos. Cloning requires inserting a cell from a patient into an egg and chemically triggering division of their union.

A South Korean team claimed in 2004 to have grown a cloned cell line, or colony, but key members face prosecution for the discredited work.

Opponents call the research immoral because the cells are harvested from embryos that are destroyed in the process. President Bush banned federal funding of stem cell lines created after Aug. 9, 2001, but privately financed work is permissible in many states.

Two research teams led by Douglas Melton and Kevin Eggan of Harvard and George Daley of Children's Hospital will attempt to create cells cloned from patients with juvenile diabetes and blood disorders such as sickle cell anemia.

The Harvard approval, by the institutions' oversight boards, took two years and followed a review process recommended by the National Academy of Sciences. The teams will use eggs collected from unpaid donors and fertility treatments.

“The announcement is important for stem cell science globally and also important for the debate over the ethics of stem cell research,” says British stem cell researcher Michael Whitaker of the University of Newcastle, one of at least four universities making similar attempts. The University of California-San Francisco began a smaller attempt this month.

Any cell treatments, Eggan said, are at least a decade away.

Harvard Joins New U.S. Push In Stem Cells (WSJ)

By Sylvia Pagán Westphal

The Wall Street Journal, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032513

Researchers at Harvard University said they are beginning experiments to clone human embryos for making stem cells, a move that lends clout to renewed U.S. efforts to master the technology.

The announcement marked the culmination of lengthy preparations designed to keep the effort within the ethical and legal boundaries of what is considered to be one of the most controversial areas of medical research.

It is illegal to use federal money for research in which human embryos are harmed. Harvard says its effort will be privately funded.

Harvard's effort mirrors that of other U.S.-based researchers who have also announced recent cloning initiatives in the wake of a major scientific scandal in South Korea, where researchers falsely claimed they had created stem cells from cloned embryos. The Korean debacle has renewed U.S. hopes that the country will regain prominence in world-wide efforts to master the difficult technology.

In cloning, a person's cell is introduced into an egg whose own DNA has been stripped. Inside the egg, the cell starts to divide and form an embryo that is genetically identical to the person who donated the cell. At its earliest stages -- when it's only a few dozen cells in size -- the embryo contains special cells known as "stem cells," which have the unique ability to become all the tissues in the body.

The Harvard experiments aim to take cells from patients with diseases such as diabetes and neurodegenerative disorders to create genetically identical embryos. Because stem cells from those embryos carry the genetic defects of people with the diseases, the scientists hope to study the cells to understand how to repair the problems.

Harvard's announcement comes after scientists at the University of California in San Francisco and closely held Advanced Cell Technology in Worcester, Mass., said in May they would also be resuming efforts to clone human embryos for research purposes.

"The science is moving forward in the face of significant hardship," said Arnold Kriegstein, director of the UCSF Institute for Regeneration Medicine, which has started to work on the technology. Scientists in the United Kingdom and Sweden are also working on creating stem cells from cloned embryos.

Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of pro-life activities at the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the Harvard effort "will likely be a waste of money and a waste of lives....People think this is some kind of miracle cure around the corner, but for now they'll be exploiting women and killing embryos."

In the type of research planned at Harvard, the embryos created via cloning would be destroyed at an early stage and their stem cells would be extracted. In the laboratory, the scientists would hope to coax the cells into becoming specialized tissue cells, such as insulin-producing pancreatic cells.

One of the Harvard researchers, George Daley, wants to make cloned embryos from patients with blood diseases and derive stem cells from the embryos so he can repair the defect in the laboratory. The cells could then be placed back -- without fear of rejection -- in those people. In similar experiments done in mice, Dr. Daley's team has been able to treat a blood disease using this approach.

But any medical applications of the technology are still many years away. After yesterday's announcement, the Harvard researchers will attempt to take the very first step of the process: getting a human cloned embryo to develop to the stage where stem cells can be extracted from it. It's a goal that has so far proved elusive for several teams around the world.

Harvard said millions of dollars were being devoted to the cloning effort, but declined to be specific. The school said its funding sources include the Howard Hughes Medical Institute, of Chevy Chase, Md.; Boston's Children's Hospital; the New York Stem Cell Foundation, and private individuals.

Douglas Melton, co-director of the Harvard Stem Cell Institute, whose team will be working with cells donated by diabetic patients, maintains a separate facility at Harvard for work he has been doing with human embryonic stem cells derived from IVF embryos. This is where some of the new cloning experiments will take place as well.

Dr. Daley said his laboratory has a separate room where "every single pipette, Petri dish and reagent bottle" has been bought with private money and is marked with a sticker. "We have careful administrative and financial accounting methods in place to insure that none of the experiments that involve [cloning] use any materials purchased with federal funds." At UCSF, the cloning work is also conducted in facilities that receive no federal funds, a spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0032514

The Harvard experiments were approved after a lengthy review by eight different boards and committees at five different institutions involved in the work. These included two Boston area hospitals, a local IVF clinic and Columbia University, where cells from diabetic patients will be grown for the Harvard experiments.

According to Leonard Zon, director of the stem-cell program at Children's Hospital, the two-year process not only involved an extensive ethics review but also consideration of legal and intellectual-property issues. One of the issues was the risk to women from the hormone treatments used in the process of egg donation. According to Harvard researcher Kevin Eggan, it was decided that women would be given hormone doses tailored toward not producing too many eggs, in order to minimize their risk of side effects.

Massachusetts, where Harvard is located, passed a law last year making it illegal to pay for eggs for stem-cell research. For the Harvard experiments, two of the three teams will procure eggs donated by women. At Dr. Daley's laboratory, as well as the UCSF facility, scientists will instead use leftover eggs from failed in vitro fertilization treatments.

Either strategy has pitfalls. Robert Lanza, vice president of research at Advanced Cell Technology, says the company has, since December 2005, placed "over 100 ads" looking for egg donors. Initially there were many replies, but as women realized the discomfort and risks involved in hormone treatments, the numbers have dwindled to two or three potential candidates. "We don't have a single egg at this point," he says.

On the other hand, eggs from failed IVF treatments are plentiful but their ability to form embryos might be compromised. "It might not even be possible" to use them, says Dr. Lanza. He says the company's experience as well as published research suggests that eggs for cloning should be used within hours of obtaining them. Eggs from failed IVF treatments tend to be one to two days old, he says.

2 New Efforts To Develop Stem Cell Line For Study (NYT)

By Nicholas Wade

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

Scientists at two universities — Harvard and the University of California, San Francisco — will try to develop embryonic stem cells from the adult cells of patients suffering from certain diseases.

Their purposes in creating the cell lines, which require making an early human embryo, are to study how the diseases develop and also to see if replacement cells can be generated to repair the patient's own degenerating tissues. But the field, despite its much emphasized promise, faces many serious uncertainties.

"Clinical applications may be a decade or more away," said George Q. Daley, a Harvard expert on blood diseases.

Harvard announced its plans yesterday at a news conference; the University of California, San Francisco, did so less conspicuously a month ago, resuming a program abandoned in 2001. Both universities, having received required approvals, will at first obtain the human eggs needed for cloning from fertility clinics, starting with eggs deemed too low quality to produce a successful pregnancy. Both programs are privately financed because federal support for human stem cell research is available only for cell lines made before August 9, 2001.

Advanced Cell Technology in Worcester, Mass., also has a human nuclear transfer program "well under way," said Robert Lanza, the company's vice president, but has run into problems in recruiting egg donors. Under guidelines issued by the National Academy of Sciences, which are voluntary but widely observed, donors may not be paid anything beyond expenses.

The new efforts, if successful, would accomplish what the disgraced South Korean scientist Woo-Suk Hwang claimed he had achieved in articles published in Science in 2004 and 2005. Both papers turned out to be based on forged data. But the flaws remained undetected by scientists involved in the cloning field, raising doubts about the rigor and expertise with which the new field was being conducted. The problems came to light not through criticism by scientific peers, but only after a whistle-blower in Dr. Hwang's lab contacted a Seoul television station.

The University of California, San Francisco, said last month that one of its researchers, Renee Reijo Pera, would start the cloning procedure, which involves transferring the nucleus of an adult cell into an unfertilized egg whose own nucleus has been removed.

DOJ_NMG_0032515

A composite egg of this kind should develop in glassware into an early embryo, or blastocyst, from which embryonic stem cells could be isolated. There is no evident reason why this should not work in people as it has already done in several animal species, yet so far no one has succeeded. Dr. Hwang used no less than 2,000 fresh eggs donated by a healthy women but failed to accomplish anything useful.

Dr. Reijo Pera will switch to using donated eggs if those rejected by fertility clinics do not work, a university spokeswoman said. Harvard researchers said yesterday that they too would seek to derive eggs from healthy donors in the future.

Dr. Lanza, of Advanced Cell Technology, said that freshly harvested human eggs were "much better" for nuclear transfer experiments but that a six-month campaign by his company to recruit donors "appears to be a losing effort."

Many women had come forward, saying they would donate their eggs for research without compensation but, after seeing the battery of tests required, "most of the donors change their mind once they realize what's involved," Dr. Lanza said.

If research should establish that replacement tissues can be developed for a patient through the nuclear transfer technique, probably tens or hundreds of donated human eggs would be needed for each operation. Some scientists regard such a requirement as impractical, arguing that researchers should learn how to reprogram an adult cell's nucleus back to embryonic state without the use of human eggs. But this requires a far deeper understanding of human cells than is yet at hand.

Three Harvard scientists described their proposed research yesterday, promising not to discuss it further in public until they had firm results ready to be published. Dr. Daley hopes to develop, via nuclear transfer, embryonic stem cells from patients with blood diseases. He will try to correct the genetic defect behind the disease, then develop blood stem cells that could be engrafted in the patient's marrow.

The two other scientists, Douglas Melton and Kevin Eggan, said they would develop embryonic stem cell lines from diabetic patients, hoping to understand the development of the disease from its earliest moments at the cellular level.

Many Americans Headed For Money Struggles In Retirement (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson

The Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Almost one in two American families are headed toward years of financial struggle in retirement, according to a new report that says workers are unprepared for cuts in pension and Social Security income.

The Boston College study presumes that most people need to replace 65 percent to 85 percent of their annual income in their working years to stay secure in retirement. But 43 percent of U.S. households will fall at least 10 percent short of that range, the study found, using what it said were conservative projections.

The percentage of households at risk of an insecure retirement rises to 66 percent under a less rosy set of assumptions -- for example, if workers retire at age 63 instead of at 65.

"Unless Americans change their ways, many will struggle in retirement," said Alicia H. Munnell, director of the study and a former member of the White House Council of Economic Advisers. "There is no silver bullet," she added. "The answer is saving more and working longer."

Saying it hoped to draw attention to the issue, Boston College unveiled a new National Retirement Risk Index based on survey data from 4,500 households in the Federal Reserve's 2004 Survey of Consumer Finances. Researchers calculated that the risk index has risen from 31 percent in 1983 to 43 percent in 2004.

Baby boomers born between 1946 and 1964 are generally in better shape than members of Generation X, born between 1965 and 1972, the report said. That's primarily because these younger workers face the prospect of diminished Social Security income, and fewer of them will have pensions.

"Americans weaned on post-war affluence have come to expect an extended period of leisure at the end of their work life," the report noted. "And, indeed, the majority of today's retirees are able to afford a decent retirement. However, this group is living in a 'golden age' that will fade as Baby Boomers and Generation Xers reach traditional retirement ages in the coming decades."

The study is the latest addition to a growing body of research that suggests households headed by working-age adults are poorly prepared to meet their financial needs of retirement.

DOJ_NMG_0032516

In April, the Employee Benefit Research Institute cautioned that many Americans "have accumulated only modest retirement savings, under-estimate the share of their pre-retirement income they are likely to need in retirement, and have made no estimate of how much they will need to live comfortably once they retire."

The institute said that people's expectations for retirement are "like a piece of Swiss cheese -- full of holes."

The Boston College report said the grim outlook is being driven by a variety of factors, including:

-- Social Security will replace a smaller share of people's pre-retirement income in the future. The reasons include increased taxation of benefits and higher Medicare premiums. In addition, the retirement age for full benefits will increase to 67 for people born after 1959, up from 65 now.

-- Companies have abandoned costly traditional pensions, which guarantee monthly income for life, in favor of contributions to individual 401(k) plans overseen by the employees themselves. In 2004, the typical older worker nearing retirement had just $60,000 in 401(k) and individual retirement accounts, a sum that would yield less than $400 per month in retirement, according to the researchers.

-- People save too little. "Most of the working age population saves virtually nothing outside of their employer-sponsored pension plan," according to the report.

-- Retirement lasts longer as longevity increases. The price tag of retirement goes up with its increased duration, particularly for health-care expenses. At the same time, future retirees may find it difficult to make their nest eggs grow through investing, the researchers said.

On the hopeful side, the picture can change significantly by working longer and saving more. For example, retiring at 67 instead of 65 reduces a household's risk by 11 percentage points, the report found. Saving more also can help a person's long-term outlook, particularly if the added savings start when a worker is young.

"If workers consistently set aside 6 percent of their paychecks (with a 3 percent employer match) invest prudently, and leave the money alone, they should have enough," the report said.

At the same time, a recent report by consulting firm McKinsey & Co. found that four out of 10 workers are forced to retire earlier than they intended, usually because of health issues or loss of their job.

Meanwhile, those employees still lucky enough to have pensions may get less than they expected.

In a separate report issued Tuesday, financial rating company Standard & Poor's said federal employee programs are short roughly $4.5 trillion of the money they need to make good on their pension promises. In addition, companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 stock index have about $140.4 billion less set aside than the amount they're expected to need, S&P said.

That's an improvement over 2004, when pension plans were $164.3 billion short. However, corporations have fallen further behind in funding so-called "other post retirement benefits" which include retiree health care programs. These programs are now $320.9 billion short of what they need to back promises made to retirees, senior analyst Howard Silverblatt said. That's likely to lead to cutbacks and caps that retirees may not have planned for, he said.

Study: 43% Not Saving Enough To Retire Well (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, June 7, 2006

A new retirement study provides further evidence that a growing number of Americans are at risk of a diminished standard of living once they stop working.

The Center for Retirement Research's new retirement-risk index, released Tuesday, shows 43% of working households were in danger in 2004 of having too little income to fund their retirement.

But the study probably understates the proportion of retirees at risk. Its projections assume that people retire at age 65, cash in on their home equity through a “reverse mortgage” and exchange their assets for a stream of income by buying an immediate annuity.

Yet many people retire before 65, according to the center, and don't necessarily buy immediate annuities or take out reverse mortgages. Nor does the research take in account the “wild card” of health care costs — and how these expenses will affect retirees' standards of living, says Alicia Munnell, director of the center at Boston College.

DOJ_NMG_0032517

The percentage of “at risk” households has surged in the past two decades, from 31% in 1983, according to the center's analysis, which was funded by Nationwide Mutual Insurance. Two factors that have raised the risks are the growing uncertainty of Social Security payouts and the increasing burden on employees to save for their own retirements.

The index, which uses data from the Federal Reserve, is part of a stream of recent sobering conclusions about workers' abilities to finance their golden years. The studies come as the first of 79 million baby boomers — the generation born from 1946 to 1964 — are turning 60 this year.

The center's analysis found that nearly half of today's workers, at their current savings rate, will be unable to fund a comfortable retirement. People will need to work longer or save more, Munnell, one of the authors of the research, said in a conference call.

Boston College says its retirement index goes a step beyond other research in taking into account the income that people would get, theoretically, from tapping their home's equity.

The center assumes that households will need 65% to 85% of their pre-retirement income replaced each year once they stop working, to maintain their pre-retirement standard of living. A household whose projected replacement rate fell below 10% of the target rate was considered “at risk.”

Younger households, and those with low income levels or without traditional pensions, are particularly vulnerable to having too little money for retirement, according to the research.

Jack VanDerhei of the Employee Benefit Research Institute says the center's calculations leave a key question unanswered: How much more income do workers need to save? EBRI's own research says that most future retirees must put away 5% to 25% more of their pay each year to cover basic needs, as well as health care expenses, in retirement.

New Campaign Shows Progress For Homeless (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

DENVER — Arthur Sena spent years living in a hole that he had dug near the railroad tracks. He would probably still be there, defying offers of help from social workers and using cardboard to ward off the chill, if Denver had not adopted a radical strategy of putting homeless people into apartments of their own, no strings attached.

The "housing first" policy that this city adopted last year is part of an accelerating national movement that has reduced the numbers of the chronically homeless — the single, troubled men and women who spend years in the streets and shelters — in more than 20 cities.

In this campaign, promoted by a little-known office of the Bush administration, 219 cities, at last count, have started ambitious 10-year plans to end chronic homelessness.

The cities include New York, which is stepping up efforts to house the estimated nearly 4,000 people huddling on sidewalks or sleeping in parks, and Henderson, N.C., population 17,000, which recently counted 91 homeless people, 14 of them chronic cases.

Many of the early starters are reporting turnarounds. In Philadelphia, street dwellers have declined 60 percent over five years. In San Francisco, the number of the chronic homeless is down 28 percent in two years, in Dallas 26 percent and in Raleigh-Durham, N.C., 15 percent.

If it is not always clear who will pay for the plans, the burst of effort has buoyed a field long accustomed to futility.

"I've sensed a new energy in city halls and state houses around the issue of ending homelessness," said Robert V. Hess, who just took over as homeless services commissioner in New York City after years of similar work in Philadelphia. "This is unprecedented in my lifetime."

Part of the credit, Mr. Hess and others said, goes to Philip F. Mangano, a Bush appointee who has spent five years visiting every mayor and governor he can, brandishing successful examples, cost-benefit studies and his own messianic fervor along with modest amounts of federal money.

DOJ_NMG_0032518

"We're conspiring to undo what we'd been told for so many years, that this was an intractable issue," Mr. Mangano told 150 mayors, state and city officials and private leaders here in May. They were gathered for the first "national leadership summit," sponsored by the once-dormant office that Mr. Mangano leads, the United States Interagency Council on Homelessness.

Wherever he goes, Mr. Mangano, 58, who was director of the Massachusetts Housing and Shelter Alliance, emphasizes that it is cheaper to put the chronically homeless right into apartments, and provide medical and addiction treatments there, than to watch them cycle endlessly through shelters, soup kitchens, emergency rooms, detoxification centers and jails.

"Cost-benefit analysis may be the new expression of compassion in our communities," he said at the Denver meeting.

Typically, people in such programs are put into sparsely furnished apartments free. Soon after, as they are helped into jobs or sign up for disability or other government benefits, they are required to pay modest rents.

Outreach workers had spent months persuading Mr. Sena, 69, to move to an efficiency apartment downtown. He finally did in 2005, after injuring an arm. His room still has bare walls, and Mr. Sena, who remarkably retains a head of dark hair, has not lost his crustiness.

"I never had any alcohol addiction," he told a visitor. "I just copped a little shot now and then. As a matter of fact, I was just heading out right now to get a half pint. It's the only thing that helps the pain in my arm."

Mr. Sena refused to disclose more about his history or use of public services. But in a study here, officials found that 25 men were taken into emergency detoxification centers for an average of 80 nights each in one year, at a total cost of $772,000. Officials have found that they can provide housing and most medical and other services for about $15,000 a year per person.

The growing focus on housing the chronically homeless was driven, many officials said, by a study in 1998 by Prof. Dennis P. Culhane, a sociologist at the University of Pennsylvania. Professor Culhane showed that a vast majority of people staying in shelters did so briefly and got on with their lives and that 10 percent were in and out repeatedly for years, accounting for half of total bed use.

National estimates of the chronic homeless run about 200,000, among an estimated total of 750,000 homeless people on any given night that includes families and other people in temporary trouble, said Nan Roman, president of the National Alliance to End Homelessness, a group in Washington.

Some advocates and state officials have questioned the intense focus on chronic cases, fearing that it detracts from programs for families. Mr. Mangano responds that homeless families continue to receive the bulk of public money and are the subject of promising experiments, too.

More important, he said in an interview, visible progress against the most visible face of homelessness will inspire more financing. Already, Mr. Mangano added, documented gains have persuaded the White House and Congress to increase spending. Federal money to work on homelessness has climbed over the last five years to more than $4 billion, from $3 billion.

Mr. Mangano "is great at spin," said Bob Erlenbusch, chairman of the National Coalition for the Homeless, an advocacy group based in Washington. But Mr. Mangano is glossing over the broader trend, Mr. Erlenbusch said, because federal programs for low-income housing, which can prevent homelessness, have languished in the Bush years or been cut.

To start their new plans, cities have combined federal and local public money with foundation and corporate grants. But many officials say a lack of money will hamper the development of needed housing and support teams.

The "housing first" approach was pioneered in the 1990's by a group in New York, Pathways to Housing.

In a first step, confirmed street dwellers are coaxed into rooms of their own, a more attractive proposition to many than the drug treatment programs or transitional group homes they had been offered in the past. Some skittish people take along their shopping carts.

Once drawn into so-called supportive housing, the participants are monitored by social workers and offered psychiatric and other services that might stabilize their lives. But breaking addictions or seeking other needed treatment is not a prerequisite for entry.

New York City, a leader in supportive housing, recently counted 3,843 people living in the streets, a 13 percent decline from the previous year. The state and city governments are also joining to build 9,000 supportive housing units in New York over 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0032519

Some "tough-love" groups have opposed housing first, saying that without more discipline, addicts will never succeed. But in experiments around the country, 80 percent or more of those housed participants remained in their quarters after a year.

Workers at the Colorado Coalition for the Homeless, which runs Mr. Sena's building, said they knew that some tenants were using drugs or alcohol.

"It's better that they pass out here than in the streets," said John Parvensky, director of the coalition.

In many cities, the approach has also drawn fire from agencies that run shelters and drug treatment programs. Those agencies bristle at the suggestion that their emergency aid just perpetuates problems.

"It was very tough to buck the status quo and tell service providers that we're not going to do it your way anymore," said Angela Alioto, a lawyer and Democratic politician who oversees the 10-year plan in San Francisco on behalf of Mayor Gavin Newsom.

Among some groups, Ms. Alito said, "there was hysteria" when the city said it would stop financing groups that did not send participants to housing. But by the end of 2006, she predicted, 2,200 of the estimated 3,000 chronically homeless will be in apartments.

As much as they talk excitedly about ending homelessness, experts know that change will come in fits and starts, for cities as well as for individuals.

By early 2005, Philadelphia had pushed down the number of homeless in the streets to 250, compared to 824 five years earlier, Mr. Hess said.

After a Live Aid concert there last July, however, the number spiked, for reasons that are not clear to the experts, to more than 400, and the city has been whittling it back down.

In Denver, Deborah Johnson, 52, is more openly grateful than Mr. Sena for her new apartment, saying that after 11 years in shelters and recovery programs "it feels great because I'm an independent person."

But her craving for alcohol is a recurring threat, Ms. Johnson conceded. Two times in the last two years she entered housing but was ejected because of "behavior problems" involving her or her guests, a coalition official said.

After another stay in an addiction center, Ms. Johnson moved to her latest apartment in April. She uses an overturned supermarket basket for a table and keeps a Bible near her mattress. She meets her case manager three times a week, Ms. Johnson said, and hopes some day to resume work as a cook.

C.I.A. Knew Where Eichmann Was Hiding, Documents Show (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 6 — The Central Intelligence Agency took no action after learning the pseudonym and whereabouts of the fugitive Holocaust administrator Adolf Eichmann in 1958, according to C.I.A. documents released Tuesday that shed new light on the spy agency's use of former Nazis as informants after World War II.

The C.I.A. was told by West German intelligence that Eichmann was living in Argentina under the name Clemens — a slight variation on his actual alias, Ricardo Klement — but did not share the information with Israel, which had been hunting for him for years, according to Timothy Naftali, a historian who examined the documents. Two years later, Israeli agents abducted Eichmann in Argentina and flew him to Israel, where he was tried and executed in 1962.

The Eichmann papers are among 27,000 newly declassified pages released by the C.I.A. to the National Archives under Congressional pressure to make public files about former officials of Hitler's regime later used as American agents. The material reinforces the view that most former Nazis gave American intelligence little of value and in some cases proved to be damaging double agents for the Soviet K.G.B., according to historians and members of the government panel that has worked to open the long-secret files.

Elizabeth Holtzman, a former congresswoman from New York and member of the panel, the Nazi War Crimes and Japanese Imperial Government Records Interagency Working Group, said the documents showed that the C.I.A "failed to lift a finger" to hunt Eichmann and "force us to confront not only the moral harm but the practical harm" of relying on intelligence from ex-Nazis.

DOJ_NMG_0032520

The United States government, preoccupied with the cold war, had no policy at the time of pursuing Nazi war criminals. The records also show that American intelligence officials protected many former Nazis for their perceived value in combating the Soviet threat.

But Ms. Holtzman, speaking at a news briefing at the National Archives on Tuesday, said information from the former Nazis was often tainted both by their "personal agendas" and their vulnerability to blackmail. "Using bad people can have very bad consequences," Ms. Holtzman said. She and other group members suggested that the findings should be a cautionary tale for intelligence agencies today.

As head of the Gestapo's Jewish affairs office during the war, Eichmann put into effect the policy of extermination of European Jewry, promoting the use of gas chambers and having a hand in the murder of millions of Jews. Captured by the United States Army at the end of the war, he gave a false name and went unrecognized, hiding in Germany and Italy before fleeing to Argentina in 1950.

Israeli agents hunting for Eichmann came to suspect that he was in Argentina but did not know his alias. They temporarily abandoned their search around the time, in March 1958, that West German intelligence told the C.I.A. that Eichmann had been living in Argentina as Clemens, said Mr. Naftali, of the University of Virginia.

The West German government was wary of exposing Eichmann because officials feared what he might reveal about such figures as Hans Globke, a former Nazi government official then serving as a top national security adviser to Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, Mr. Naftali said.

In 1960, also at the request of West Germany, the C.I.A. persuaded Life magazine, which had purchased Eichmann's memoir from his family, to delete a reference to Mr. Globke before publication, the documents show.

Ironically, in view of the information the C.I.A. received in 1958, documents previously released by the C.I.A. showed that it was surprised in May 1960 when the Israelis captured Eichmann. Cables from the time show that Allen Dulles, the C.I.A. director, demanded that officers find out more about the capture.

Since Congress passed the Nazi War Crimes Disclosure Act in 1998, the Interagency Working Group has worked to declassify more than eight million pages of documents.

Norman J. W. Goda, an Ohio University historian who reviewed the C.I.A. material, said it showed in greater detail than previously known how the K.G.B. aggressively recruited former Nazi intelligence officers after the war. In particular, he said, the documents fill in the story of the "catastrophic" Soviet penetration of the Gehlen Organization, the postwar West German intelligence service sponsored by the United States Army and then the C.I.A.

Mr. Goda described the case of Heinz Felfe, a former SS officer who was bitter over the Allied firebombing of his native city, Dresden, and secretly worked for the K.G.B. Mr. Felfe rose in the Gehlen Organization to oversee counterintelligence, a Soviet agent placed in charge of combating Soviet espionage.

The C.I.A. shared much sensitive information with Mr. Felfe, Mr. Goda found. A newly released 1963 C.I.A. damage assessment, written after Mr. Felfe was arrested as a Soviet agent in 1961, found that he had exposed "over 100 C.I.A. staffers" and caused many eavesdropping operations to end with "complete failure or a worthless product."

The documents also provide new information about the case of Tscherim Soobzokov, a former SS officer who was the subject of a much-publicized deportation case in 1979 when he was living as an American citizen in Paterson, N.J. He was charged with having falsified his immigration application to conceal his SS service, which ordinarily would have barred his entry. But the charge was dropped when a C.I.A. document turned up showing that he had disclosed his SS membership.

The newly declassified records show that he was employed by the C.I.A. from 1952 to 1959 despite "clear evidence of a war crimes record," said another historian at the briefing, Richard Breitman of American University.

Because it valued Mr. Soobzokov for his language skills and ties to fellow ethnic Circassians living in the Soviet Union, the C.I.A. deliberately hid details of his Nazi record from the Immigration and Naturalization Service after he moved to the United States in 1955, Mr. Breitman said.

But Mr. Soobzokov ultimately did not escape his past. He died in 1985 after a pipe bomb exploded outside his house. The case has never been solved.

DOJ_NMG_0032521

CIA Ties With Ex-Nazis Shown (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

The CIA organized Cold War spy networks that included former Nazis and failed to act on a 1958 report that fugitive Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann was living in Argentina, newly released CIA records show.

The records were among 27,000 pages of documents made public yesterday at the National Archives. They shed new light on the secret protection and support given to former Nazi officials and Nazi collaborators by U.S. intelligence agencies as fighting communism became the central aim of American foreign policy in the years after World War II.

"It was not U.S. policy to track Nazi war criminals once the Cold War began," said historian Timothy Naftali of the University of Virginia, a Cold War expert who has studied the new documents.

"The CIA based its decisions about using former SS men or unreconstructed Nazis solely on operational considerations. . . . Hiring these tainted individuals brought little other than operational problems and moral confusion to our government's intelligence community," he added.

The subject of postwar collaboration between U.S. intelligence and former Nazis that the government sought to use in the struggle against the Soviet Union has been documented, but historians said the previously inaccessible documents have enabled them to fill in many blanks in the historical narrative.

About 60,000 pages of CIA records had already been released since 1999, after a 1998 federal law opened up secret government files relating to war crimes by the German and Japanese governments during World War II.

Historians reviewing the records for the government published a 2004 book, "U.S. Intelligence and the Nazis," based on 240,000 pages of FBI records, 419 CIA files and 3,000 pages of U.S. Army information. It detailed the Army's postwar relationship with former officers of the German Wehrmacht's intelligence service, which are available at the National Archives.

The materials released yesterday include operational documents detailing the activities of the CIA and its contacts abroad, historians and other officials said during a news conference at the National Archives.

"It's a rare release of operational files," said Allen Weinstein, head of the National Archives and chairman of the interagency working group overseeing the declassification of records about World War II crimes and criminals. "The files are also more inclusive than any other CIA files made public before. . . . This time, the documents are nearly all without redactions, providing researchers and historians the clearest view yet of the postwar intelligence world."

The release of the records stalled last year with the deadline for the interagency project approaching when the CIA balked at declassifying more detailed documents about the agency's postwar ties to Nazis. But the CIA caved in under pressure from Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), an author of the original legislation, and other prominent backers of that law. Congress passed a new law extending the life of the interagency panel by two years, to early 2007.

Some of the newly released documents show that between 1949 and 1955, the CIA organized "stay-behind" networks of German agents to provide intelligence from behind enemy lines, should the Soviet Union invade western Germany.

One network included at least two former Nazi SS members -- Staff Sgt. Heinrich Hoffman and Lt. Col. Hans Rues -- and one was run by Lt. Col. Walter Kopp, a former German army officer referred to by the CIA as an "unreconstructed Nazi." The network was disbanded in 1953 amid political concerns that some members' neo-Nazi sympathies would be exposed in the West German press.

In a March 1958 memo to the CIA, the West German foreign intelligence services (BND) wrote that Eichmann, a top Gestapo official who helped orchestrate the mass murder of Jews, "is reported to have lived in Argentina under the alias CLEMENS since 1952." The memo also mentioned a rumor that Eichmann lived in Jerusalem.

In fact, Eichmann was in Argentina and was using the name Ricardo Klement -- but apparently neither the CIA nor the West Germans acted on the information, Naftali said.

"Tragically, at the moment the CIA and the BND had this information the Israelis were temporarily giving up their search for Eichmann in Argentina because they could not figure out his alias," Naftali wrote in an analysis of the documents.

Eventually, Israeli Mossad agents abducted Eichmann in Buenos Aires on May 11, 1960. He was tried in Jerusalem, sentenced to death and hanged on May 31, 1962.

DOJ_NMG_0032522

Robert Wolfe, a former federal archivist and an expert on captured German records, said the new CIA documents illustrate the "sorry results" of recruiting former Nazi intelligence personnel to U.S. efforts to keep the Soviet Union in check.

"The alleged intelligence those recruits peddled was mostly hearsay and gossip designed to tell their American interrogators what they wanted to hear, in the hope of escaping retribution for past crimes, or for mercenary gain, or for political agendas not necessarily compatible with American national interests," Wolfe said.

Health Insurance Doesn't Have To Hurt (USAT)

By Laura Vanderkam

USA Today, June 7, 2006

Like most young people, I like to believe I'm invincible. Every so often, though, an e-mail shows up in my inbox that reminds me I'm not. Another twentysomething acquaintance has suffered a ski accident, appendectomy or electric-saw mishap. The worst reports share a line: "He doesn't have health insurance." Then I know this young person is not only in pain, he's also wincing as his hospital time ticks by at $7,000 per day.

At least these young people can take comfort that they're not alone. A third of Americans ages 21-24 lack health insurance, more than any other demographic. A quarter of those ages 25-34 do without.

Given hospital costs these days, it's not surprising that young people and their families are agitating for government to "do something." Some states are listening. New Jersey legislators, for instance, passed a law this spring that lets certain residents stay on their parents' plans until age 30. In theory, raising the age of dependency could reduce the coverage gap.

In theory. Looking closer, though, I'm reminded of Ronald Reagan's adage: Government is not the solution to our problem. Government is the problem, at least when it comes to health insurance. Well-meaning but misguided states such as New Jersey and Massachusetts have priced young people out of the market by keeping laws on the books that force plans to cover everything, take all comers or treat young and old, healthy and sick, roughly the same. It's nice that legislatures then try to mop up the mess by passing "slacker mandates" that pretend 30-year-olds are dependents, or, in Massachusetts, forcing people to carry coverage. But if this country truly wants to cover the uninsured, we should remember that rates aren't high everywhere. Insurance companies have come up with cheap ways to get young people covered in states that don't tie insurers' hands. The answer is not to pass more laws.

The answer is to get government out of the way.

Sticker shock

Few young people graduating this spring — and leaving their parents' plans or state plans for children — will think much about health insurance as they collect their diplomas. That's one of the reasons such a high percentage wind up uninsured. Most eventually land coverage the way most Americans do — through a full-time job at a big employer. But not all young people can, or want to, work full-time for such places.

Unfortunately, responsible folks who then shop for their own coverage encounter massive sticker shock in some states. The only individual plan available for a 27-year-old New York City woman on eHealthInsurance.com, a website that lets you comparison shop for policies, runs a whopping $365.50 a month — and it doesn't cover office visits. I conducted a similar search in Manhattan a few years ago and finally found a group plan I could join. My monthly rate ran a not-much-lower $286.

Recalling the appendectomy e-mails, I paid (until I got married and joined my husband's plan). But, boy, did I fume about it. I had previously paid about $70 a month in Washington, D.C. Looking online now, I can still find rates that low in states from Illinois to Texas.

So why the four-to-fivefold price difference? The answer stems from a few policies imposed by state legislatures that raise insurance costs considerably:

• Guaranteed issue. In the handful of states with this policy, such as Massachusetts and New Jersey, plans have to take all comers — you and your 58-year-old obese neighbor with a motorcycle-racing hobby alike.

• Community rating. In states, such as New York, with versions of this rule, plans can't notice that you and your neighbor have different risk profiles. So they have to charge you similar amounts (and it's rarely the lower-risk person's rate).

DOJ_NMG_0032523

• Mandates. These are goodies from hair prostheses to massage therapy visits that states force plans to cover. All states have some mandates, though the number and their costs vary widely.

States presumably mean well when they pass these laws. They don't want plans to discriminate against old people or sick people, and they want residents to have all their medical needs covered. But in states where plans have to take all comers, charge them similar rates and cover things such as in vitro fertilization treatments, it's no wonder rates skyrocket beyond young people's ability to pay.

Better models

Insurance doesn't have to cost an arm and a leg, though. In California, for instance, Blue Cross launched a policy in 2004 called TONIK that's aimed specifically at twentysomethings who want coverage for catastrophes but don't need a lot of other care. A plan with a $1,500 deductible and unlimited $40 doctor visits runs $90 a month. A $5,000 deductible plan with four $20 visits is $69. TONIK quickly became the company's second best-selling policy in California. Even better: 70% of buyers were previously uninsured. You can now buy versions of TONIK in low-regulation states from Texas to Illinois.

There is fine print, of course. TONIK doesn't cover maternity benefits (pregnant members get bumped to a different plan). California TONIK policies also don't cover brand-name drugs. But once you expect insurance to cover everything for everybody — as in New Jersey — and when you don't let plans treat people differently based on risk profiles, insurance stops being cheap. When it stops being cheap, young people decide to risk going without.

That choice is bad news for the unlucky young people who then endure expensive ski accidents and appendectomies. But it's bad news for older folks, too. Not only do all taxpayers foot hospital bills for uninsured people who can't pay, shoving young people out of insurance pools also raises rates for everyone else. If states truly want people covered, that's something to keep in mind.

Laura Vanderkam, who lives in New York, is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

A Positive In Going Negative? (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

Economist John Kenneth Galbraith died this year, but he left behind the conventional wisdom. Galbraith coined the phrase in 1958 to denote those comfortable ideas "which are esteemed at any time for their acceptability."

Coincidentally, in the weeks after Galbraith's death, I came across assaults on two pillars of the conventional political wisdom: that negative attack ads are bad and that disclosure of campaign finance information is good. Neither argument is ultimately convincing, but both serve as provocative warnings against the complacent repetition of accepted verities.

The first challenge comes in a book by Vanderbilt University political science professor John G. Geer, "In Defense of Negativity: Attack Ads in Presidential Campaigns." Geer disputes the notion that rampant negativity is a new phenomenon; the writers of the Declaration of Independence, he says, went negative in 70 percent of the document. He argues that, despite media fixation on the subject, modern voters are not "drowning in a sea of negativity." Even in the 2004 presidential race, the most negative one in his analysis, Geer found equal numbers of positive and negative appeals.

In fact, Geer contends, negative advertising is a force for good, sharpening public debate and informing voters. Analyzing presidential campaigns from 1960 through 2004, Geer finds that negative advertising tends to be meatier than gauzy positive spots. Nearly three-quarters of the claims in negative ads involve issues, not attacks on candidates' character or values.

Geer's perspective is a valuable antidote to the usual hand-wringing, but his paean to negativity goes overboard. Geer counts only ads by the candidates themselves, not the rapidly proliferating spots from outside groups -- the Willie Horton ad in 1988 or Swift Boat Veterans' attacks in 2004 -- with more freedom to be vicious. And he shies away from assessing the legitimacy of negative attacks, which may be moored to facts but wrenched entirely out of context.

Nor does he consider how the fear of being the target of a 30-second attack ad can distort policymaking. I attended a lunch with Geer on the very day the House of Representatives approved a sham lobbying reform bill with the help of jittery lawmakers who feared that a vote against the bill would produce ads assailing them as lobbyists' handmaidens.

DOJ_NMG_0032524

The fact that Geer's analysis is limited to presidential campaigns, where negative attacks are somewhat constrained by the scrutiny they are guaranteed to draw, may diminish his damage assessment. Consider North Carolina, where Democratic congressman Brad Miller is the subject of a radio ad attacking his stances on gay rights and immigration. "If Miller had his way, America would be nothing but one big fiesta for illegal aliens and homosexuals," says the ad, to the accompaniment of mariachi music. Hardly the high-toned issue-sharpening of Geer's optimistic depiction.

If negativity's negatives are part of the received wisdom, the value of disclosure is a veritable article of faith. In a recent paper, Democratic election lawyer Robert F. Bauer, my favorite campaign finance sparring partner, takes on the popular view of disclosure as an "efficient, relatively innocuous method of managing concerns about money in politics."

The notion of disclosure as a useful tool for the well-informed voter, he says, is "almost quaint" in a data-drenched world where even the most diligent citizen can't digest all the available information. Rather, disclosure has become the province of journalists and professional do-gooders who mine the data to produce a cynical -- and cynicism-inducing -- narrative of the pernicious influence of money on the political system.

Worst of all, according to Bauer, disclosure is increasingly a mere first step in the relentless march toward an ever-expanding regulatory regime governing political speech: "the stake that the state drives into the ground to mark out new territory."

Bauer's case in point involves 527s, the independent groups that drew attention in 2004, when financier George Soros lavished $24 million on efforts to oust George W. Bush, and when the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth helped defeat John F. Kerry. Perhaps disclosure in those cases produced the cynicism that Bauer laments. But it can't be that the political system would have been better off if such spending had been cloaked in secrecy, as was the case before Congress required reporting in 2000.

In the case of 527s, Bauer correctly argues, those disclosure rules only presaged demands for additional regulation; Congress is now considering legislation that would require these groups to abide by the same campaign finance rules as other players.

This is where Bauer and I part company: Congress was right when it moved to end unlimited "soft money" donations to political parties, and it would be wise -- now that such activity has shifted to 527s -- to act there as well. But the fact that some disclosure rules precede substantive regulation doesn't mean that all such reporting requirements do, or should, lead to more. In some cases, sunlight is sufficient.

Writing nearly half a century ago, Galbraith described the "articulation of the conventional wisdom" as "a religious rite . . . an act of affirmation like reading aloud from Scriptures." In that vein, Geer and Bauer proffer useful heresies. Negativity isn't an unadulterated evil. Disclosure isn't a panacea. But when it comes to these tenets, at least, the conventional hymnal contains a good deal of wisdom.

Bush Optimistic About Iran's Reaction To Nuke Plan (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration was cautiously upbeat Tuesday about Iran's initial reaction to incentives aimed at persuading it to freeze its efforts to make nuclear fuel.

“It sounds like a positive step to me,” President Bush told reporters in Texas after visiting a Border Patrol facility. “We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously.”

The proposal was finalized last week by diplomats from the United States, Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia.

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana presented the incentives package to Iranian officials in Tehran. Top Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said the proposals had “positive steps” but said talks were needed to clear up “ambiguities.”

The Iranians told Solana that they would consider the proposal but would need time to review it, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. Solana said that he would be in contact with the Iranians in the coming days.

Larijani promised to seriously study the proposals but gave no time frame for a response.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said Iran has weeks, not months, to take up the offer. The deal threatens penalties, which have not yet been made public, if Iran does not comply.

DOJ_NMG_0032525

Iran watchers said Larijani's comments, which came after several days of often-contradictory rhetoric about the proposal from leaders in Tehran, mark the first significant sign that Iran is at least taking the offer seriously.

Trita Parsi, an Iran expert at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, said the fact that Iran did not immediately disclose the contents of the proposal indicated that the prospective deal was enticing.

The administration has offered to take part in talks with Iran about its nuclear program as part of the proposal, a significant U.S. policy shift that is considered to be the primary incentive in the proposal.

Unlike previous European and Russian overtures to Iran, this offer does not require that Tehran give up its nuclear enrichment program — only suspend it.

If Iran rejects the proposal, the United Nations Security Council will consider a resolution threatening sanctions against the nation.

The United States says Iran is using the enrichment program to try to make a nuclear weapon. Iran insists its program is for peaceful purposes.

Administration officials refused to describe the enticements to Iran contained in the proposal.

"I've seen a lot of reports flying around the past couple days about what may or may not be in this package. I would just caution everybody, until we actually are able to discuss what is in the package in public, (to) take reports with a grain of salt," McCormack said.

He said the coalition of diplomatic partners who made the proposal have agreed not to discuss it publicly in order to give Iran "a little bit of space to consider what's in the package, both on the positive as well as the negative side."

The Associated Press, citing anonymous diplomats familiar with the proposal, reported that the United States is offering to provide Iran with some civilian nuclear technology.

The wire service also reported that Washington has agreed to sell Boeing aircraft parts to Iran and that the proposal offers the possibility of Europe selling Tehran new Airbus planes. Boeing spokeswoman Amanda Landers had no comment.

Iran's commercial aircraft fleet is largely made up of Boeing planes purchased before the 1979 revolution. The nation has long complained that U.S. sanctions have created safety hazards for its aircraft.

Bush: Iran's Initial Response Positive (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, June 7, 2006

President Bush said Tuesday that Iran's initial response to a package of incentives and threats on the nuclear impasse "sounds like a positive step to me."

"We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously," Bush said in Laredo, Texas, where he was speaking about immigration overhaul. "The choice is theirs to make.

"I have said the United States will come and sit down at the table with them so long as they are willing to suspend their enrichment in a verifiable way," Bush said. "So it sounds like a positive response to me."

European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana laid out the potential rewards and consequences in a visit to Tehran. He later told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice by phone that the Iranians had said they would need time to consider the proposal, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Solana called the discussions "very useful and constructive," McCormack said.

Bush said in Laredo that he wanted to resolve the issue with Iran diplomatically.

Earlier in the day, the administration said it would give Iran "a little bit of space" to consider the package but added that the offer was not open-ended.

"It's a matter of weeks, not months," McCormack said, echoing the vague deadline set out by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice before the package was presented to Tehran.

U.S. officials would not discuss specifics, saying that Iran needed time to review the package and ask questions in private.

"We want to give this every opportunity to succeed," McCormack said. "The diplomacy, I would say, is at a sensitive stage."

DOJ_NMG_0032526

The package includes a promise of Western technical help in developing peaceful civilian nuclear energy if Iran stops enriching uranium, a waiver of U.S. legal restrictions to allow export of some agricultural technology, access to U.S. aircraft parts or new Boeing Co. planes to upgrade Iran's aging fleet and U.S. and European backing for Iran to join the World Trade Organization, diplomats and others said.

The proposal was agreed on last week by the United States, Britain, France, China and Russia — the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany. Those nations would be expected to move for Security Council sanctions such as travel and financial restrictions on Iranian officials if Tehran does not take the deal or if negotiations fall apart.

Top Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said the initiative contains "positive steps" but also some "ambiguities."

"There are robust measures on both sides, both the incentive side as well as the disincentive side," McCormack said. "It presents the Iranian government with a very clear choice on both sides of the road."

___

Associated Press writers George Jahn in Vienna and Nedra Pickler in Laredo contributed to this report.

Proposal Would Let Iran Enrich Uranium (WP)

By Karl Vick And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, June 7, 2006

TEHRAN, June 6 -- The confidential diplomatic package backed by Washington and formally presented to Iran on Tuesday leaves open the possibility that Tehran will be able to enrich uranium on its own soil, U.S. and European officials said.

That concession, along with a promise of U.S. assistance for an Iranian civilian nuclear energy program, is conditioned on Tehran suspending its current nuclear work until the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency determines with confidence that the program is peaceful. U.S. officials said Iran would also need to satisfy the U.N. Security Council that it is not seeking a nuclear weapon, a benchmark that White House officials believe could take years, if not decades, to achieve.

But the Bush administration and its European allies have withdrawn their demand that Iran abandon any hope of enriching uranium for nuclear power, according to several European and U.S. officials with knowledge of the offer. The new position, which has not been acknowledged publicly by the White House, differs significantly from the Bush administration's stated determination to prevent Iran from mastering technology that could be used to develop nuclear weapons.

"We are basically now saying that over the long haul, if they restore confidence, that this Iranian regime can have enrichment at home," said one U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "But they have to answer every concern given all that points to a secret weapons program."

Iran built its nuclear program in secret over 18 years. The effort was exposed by dissidents in 2002, setting off a U.N. investigation that has not found proof of a weapons program but has been unable to rule one out. Iran maintains that the program was designed for nuclear energy, not weapons.

In private discussions among the United States and its allies concerning possible action against Iran, Germany had suggested that Iran could be allowed to continue, under strict U.N. monitoring, its current enrichment research while negotiations commenced. But the Bush administration, as well as the governments of France and Britain, disagreed, arguing that Iran must suspend the program until suspicions regarding its true nature are cleared up.

The list of incentives that European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana detailed to Iranian officials here on Tuesday was endorsed by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council plus Germany. It contains not only the revamped American promises on enrichment but a U.S. offer to join negotiations directly if Iran suspends its program, as well as pledges of European assistance in building additional light-water nuclear power plants and support for Iranian membership in the World Trade Organization.

"We had constructive talks," Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, told reporters after the two-hour meeting in the palatial offices of Iran's Supreme National Security Council. "There are some positive steps in it and also some ambiguities."

Larijani did not elaborate, but diplomats said the atmospherics surrounding the meeting appeared to reinforce recent assurances by Iranian officials that the new proposal would be considered seriously. Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, appointed by hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, vowed to study "Europe's incentive package," a description that accentuated the proposal's positive elements.

DOJ_NMG_0032527

Speaking privately, a senior Iranian official said that the offer appeared to have much worthy of consideration.

European and American diplomats expressed relief.

"Our first aim was already achieved because they didn't reject" the offer, one European diplomat said.

Talking with reporters in Laredo, Tex., President Bush said Larijani's reaction to the proposals "sounds like a positive response to me."

"I want to solve this issue with Iran diplomatically. . . . We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously. The choice is theirs to make," Bush said.

The new package embodies the "robust diplomacy" that Bush endorsed, according to U.S. officials, in hopes of broadening policy options that had been narrowing to two unattractive options: military strikes on Iran's known nuclear facilities, or acquiescence to an Iranian nuclear program that was only lightly monitored by the IAEA.

Diplomats said the bid also includes elements mentioned in earlier rounds of negotiations: Washington would selectively relax long-standing economic sanctions to allow the sale of spare parts for civilian airliners to Iran, as well as technology for earthquake early-warning systems and meteorological study. Like the American offer to join the talks directly, the moves signal at least the potential for further future engagement between Washington and Tehran.

But a deal will pivot first on Iran's decision whether to suspend enrichment, a move it has repeatedly insisted it will not make. A diplomat said the offer reflected weeks of intense and high-level discussions in Washington and in Tehran aimed at deflecting confrontation.

"Each side has taken a more serious look at what the other wants and how compromise can be reached," a Western diplomat said.

In the Bush administration's view, the possibility for Iran to one day enrich uranium was "a very important part of the deal, and it's what will allow Iran to accept it," said a U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Iran always spun previous offers as an attempt to keep it from exercising its rights to enrich. Now that is explicitly not the case."

The move also reflects a new reality: Iran announced in April that it had made advancements toward industrial-level enrichment of uranium. Iranian officials boasted that the achievement "changed the facts on the ground."

Tehran likely will fight to retain that capability on a small scale. "This will be the big issue, and the Iranians will hold out, since they are already doing it anyway," the U.S. official said.

To allow Iran to proceed with other elements of its nuclear program, such as bringing online a power plant nearing completion at Bushehr on the Persian Gulf, the proposal suggests that Iran import enriched uranium from Russia for the duration of its own enrichment moratorium.

Diplomats in Washington and European capitals now expect weeks of private contacts among European, Iranian, Russian, Chinese and U.S. officials to work out details for negotiations over the package -- talks about talks, since the package is intended to reopen formal negotiations. Officials said the latter could begin as soon as next month, if Iran agrees to take a first step forward by suspending its current research and development work.

"They need time to swallow and actually digest not only the proposal but also the American moves, especially the latter," said a European diplomat resident in Iran who asked not to be identified further.

"The most significant part of the package is that the Americans said they're willing to sit at the table. Everything else, I think, is minor compared to that."

No formal deadline has been announced for Iran's response, although Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has described a time frame of weeks rather than months. Other diplomats said a "natural deadline" would be the summit of the Group of Eight industrialized nations set to begin July 15 in St. Petersburg.

Diplomacy Moves To The Fore Over Iranian Nuclear Issue (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin, Kasra Naji, And Paul Richter

Los Angeles Times, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032528

TEHRAN, Iran — The Iranian government suggested Tuesday it would seek changes in the package of incentives offered here on behalf of world powers by European Union Foreign Minister Javier Solana; but comments made by both sides also made clear that for now, diplomacy had replaced confrontation over Iran's nuclear aspirations.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and Solana, who was accompanied by the political directors for England, France, Germany and Russia, said they would be talking again in the coming days.

"We had constructive talks," said Larijani. Solana "delivered certain proposals that they had been working on. These proposals contain a number of positive steps, and there are also ambiguities that have to be cleared up."

"I hope after we've had a chance to consider the proposals, we could have more talks so that we can reach a balanced and logical outcome," Larijani added.

Speaking to reporters in Laredo, Texas, President Bush described Iran's reaction as "positive."

"We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously," Bush continued. "The choice is theirs to make."

The world powers are demanding that Iran halt its uranium enrichment related work in return for economic goodies and more intangible support such as backing from the West for Iran's bid to join the World Trade Organization.

Key to the entire offer however, is the United States' commitment, announced last week, to join the Europeans, Russia and China in talks with Iran if the Islamic Republic suspends uranium enrichment related ctivities. Many of the economic offers, some of which the European Union also made nearly a year ago, cannot be delivered without U.S. backing because of legal and treaty requirements.

Among them is a guarantee that the United States would facilitate a European offer to provide Iran with a light water reactor and other civilian nuclear technology. Much of the light water nuclear technology originates in the United States and without American government approval, the Europeans could not provide it to Iran. The decision to offer Iran help with a nuclear reactor is bound to be especially controversial because it is possible to harvest spent plutonium from such a plant and use it to manufacture material for an atomic bomb, according to scientists.

"Spent fuel from a light water reactor is harder to process," for use in a bomb, said David Albright, a former United Nations weapons inspector. "But nothing isproliferation proof."

Western powers are convinced that Iran's nuclear program is aimed at achieving the capability to make bombs. Tehran insists it wants nuclear technology only for civilian purposes.

The United States and the other countries have also committed to help Iran obtain new agricultural technology and to help Iran's "civil aviation" sector, said foreign diplomats. The U.S. currently refuses to sell anything to Iran and the nation's aging fleet has suffered several fatal crashes and Tehran's air authority routinely is forced to cannibalize parts from one plane to keep another running. Because the U.S. owns the licenses to a number of parts, its endorsement is needed for the sale both of parts and planes manufactured in other countries -- such as Airbus, which is manufactured in France. Technical assistance could also be part of the package, diplomats said.

A full list of incentives has yet to be unveiled and vaguer still are the penalties to which Iran might be subject if it does not accept the deal. It is not clear whether Russia and China, which have assiduously resisted economic sanctions, have changed their opposition to them.

Diplomats in Europe and people close to the Iranian government said they expected Iran to fight the demand that in order to obtain the incentives, it halt altogether its centrifuge operation and stop conversion of uranium yellow cake into uranium gas. Uranium in its gaseous form is what is fed into the centrifuges for enrichment which, when highly enriched, can be used in a bomb.

"It's unlikely they are going to give on that," said a European diplomat in Vienna, noting that the last time Iran halted its centrifuge operation, a number of the delicate machines broke.

For the past two weeks, Iran has not been enriching uranium; its cascade of 164 centrifuges have been spinning without any uranium gas in them, according to diplomats close to the International Atomic Energy Agency. However, when centrifuges are stopped altogether, unless the operation is done carefully, and seals are kept and all gaseous material removed, they can break. It is unclear the reason for the Iranians' pause in enrichment but it could be either for technical reasons while they test other parts of their operation or for political ends.

DOJ_NMG_0032529

Furthermore, Iran will almost certainly refuse to halt enrichment before beginning talks, said Iranian commentators -- a precondition of the offer as it is currently formulated.

Upbeat Iran Finds "Positive Steps" In Offer (WT)

By David R. Sands

Washington Times, June 7, 2006

Iran's top negotiator yesterday gave a cautiously upbeat review of a package offered by the United States and five world powers designed to halt Tehran's uranium enrichment program, a package that could allow Iran access to some sensitive U.S. nuclear technology.

In marked contrast to recent defiant comments from Iranian leaders, nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani told a delegation to Tehran headed by European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana that the offer "had some positive steps," but added there were still "some ambiguities, which should be removed."

U.S. officials have refused to discuss the incentives being offered Tehran for its cooperation, but diplomats in Europe told the Associated Press they include a new concession by the United States that it would share technology for civilian nuclear programs with Iran if Tehran agrees to stop enriching uranium, a critical step in developing a nuclear bomb.

The Bush administration has led the drive to suspend Iran's enrichment programs, saying they are a cover for a vast nuclear weapons program. Iran claims its extensive research programs are for peaceful uses only.

Iran also would be offered a light-water nuclear reactor and a guaranteed source of fuel for civilian nuclear power if it accepts the international offer. The United States agreed to a similar package in the mid-1990s to North Korea, only to discover years later that Pyongyang had secretly pursued a nuclear bomb program anyway.

President Bush told reporters that Tehran's restrained first reaction to the details of the offer was "positive," but U.S. officials declined to comment on the substance of their offer, saying the diplomacy had reached a particularly sensitive stage.

"We want to give the Iranian government some time to consider what is in this package," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Mr. McCormack declined to comment on whether the United States has offered to share at least some forms of nuclear technology with Iran.

"I've seen a lot of reports flying around the past couple of days about what may or may not be in this package," he said, cautioning that such reports should be taken "with a grain of salt."

Mr. Solana briefed both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier on the Tehran discussions. Mr. Steinmeier said afterward he expected an Iranian answer on the offer by the end of June, when foreign ministers of the Group of Eight nations meet ahead of next month's summit in St. Petersburg.

The package also includes trade and other incentives if Iran cooperates. The United States for the first time has agreed to participate in the multilateral talks, but only if Iran halts all uranium enrichment programs.

Wayne White, a lead Middle East analyst for the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research from 2002 to 2005, said Iran's leaders may still be trying to decide whether Washington is genuinely seeking a deal or just laying the diplomatic groundwork for tougher action.

"There was a hot debate in the United States and Europe over whether this was an offer designed to self-destruct," said Mr. White, now an adjunct scholar at the Washington-based Middle East Institute. "I expect the same debate is going on in Iran."

Najmeh Bozorgmehr, an Iranian scholar at the Brookings Institution's Saban Center for Middle East Policy, said Iran was never likely to reject the package outright because it had been endorsed by both Russia and China.

"If this deal does not work out, Iran may need Russian and Chinese help against even tougher measures," she said.

But Ilan Berman, vice president for policy at the American Foreign Policy Council, said Mr. Larijani's comments about "ambiguities" could be preparing the ground for what U.S. opponents of the Iranian offer say will be endless talks while Iran preserves its nuclear programs.

"That should be setting off alarm bells all over the place," Mr. Berman said.

Iran To Study EU Incentive Plan On Nuclear Issue (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0032530

By Gareth Smyth And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, June 7, 2006

Iran said on Tuesday it would study a package of incentives delivered by Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, designed to entice Tehran to curb its nuclear programme.

"The proposals contain positive steps and also some ambiguities, which must be removed," said Ali Larijani, Iran's top security official, after a two-hour meeting with Mr Solana.

"We hope we will have negotiations and deliberations again after we have carefully studied the proposals to reach a balanced and logical result."

President George W. Bush told reporters in Texas that the initial Iranian response sounded positive. "We will see if the Iranians take our offer seriously," he said, repeating the US offer of joining the negotiations if Iran suspended its uranium enrichment in a verifiable way.

Mr Solana later told Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, on his return to Brussels that his talks in Tehran had been "very useful and constructive", the State Department said. Mr Solana said the Iranian government had told him it would need time to consider the proposal and that he would be in contact again in the coming days.

The US repeated that Iran had "weeks, not months" to reply.

Mr Solana called Tuesday's meeting with Mr Larijani "very, very constructive" and said he hoped for "negotiations based on trust, respect and confidence".

While Iran insists its programme is purely peaceful, the US and the EU suspect Tehran is seeking to acquire a nuclear weapons capacity.

Last week, the five permanent UN Security Council members and Germany agreed the package, which focuses on a call for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of its nuclear programme.

For many in Tehran, this remains unacceptable. Hussein Shariatmadari, editor-in-chief of the state-owned Kayhan newspaper, told Fars news agency the "main point" of the package ran against Iran's national interest. "We have already officially and clearly announced we would no way stop uranium enrichment," he said.

The package has not been publicly revealed but includes trade concessions, help in building nuclear reactors and a guaranteed fuel supply. The US, which said last week it would join multilateral talks if Iran stopped enrichment, has re-portedly revived last year's offer to lift a ban on the sale of spare parts for Iran's ageing civilian aircraft which could include components from Boeing and Airbus.

Western diplomats emphasise Iran faces the prospect of "disincentives" should it decide not to suspend enrichment, which can produce weapons-grade material.

Ideas the EU and the US have worked on include travel bans for Iranian officials linked to the country's nuclear programme and restrictions on Iranian financial institutions' activities in Europe.

EU officials also highlighted the contrast with the previous time the EU put forward an offer to Iran – in July and August last year.

On that occasion, Tehran immediately rejected the proposed deal as inadequate and moved ahead with its programme. This time, the Europeans hope that the proposal will lead to negotiations rather than to another deadlock.

The current state of play also echoes an EU memo in March that called for a new package to be put to Iran and for the US to consider joining the talks – both suggestions that Washington resisted at the time.

However, while Russia and China have endorsed the package, they are reluctant to back US and European talk of UN sanctions should Iran not suspend uranium enrichment. Additional reporting by Guy Dinmore in Washington

Iran Open To Incentives On Nuclear Talks, With A Hedge (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi And Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, June 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032531

TEHRAN, June 6 — Iran on Tuesday welcomed an array of international incentives aimed at persuading the country to freeze crucial nuclear activities, but stressed that there were issues that needed to be resolved before any agreement could be reached.

"We had constructive talks," Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, told state television after meeting with Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief. "The proposals contain positive steps and also some ambiguities which should be removed."

He did not elaborate on the ambiguities. But officials with knowledge of the talks in Tehran said they centered on Iran's insistence that it will continue its production of enriched uranium, which can be used to make electricity or weapons.

The offer made by the United States, Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany requires Iran to freeze its uranium enrichment and reprocessing or face an array of possible penalties.

Mr. Larijani is seeking clarifications over the terms, timing and duration of the suspension, the officials added, speaking on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to divulge details.

Clearly both sides were on their best behavior and determined to nudge each other back to the negotiating table. "Neither side wanted to push the other to the brink today," said one senior Iranian official. "There was no real change in the position of either side, but both sides stressed their points of commonality and not their points of contention."

Mr. Solana, who was accompanied by the political directors of the foreign ministries of France, Britain, Germany and Russia, was also cautiously upbeat after he emerged from the glittery headquarters of Iran's Supreme National Security Council. "The proposal is on the table now," he said before flying to Germany. He added, "We hope that Iranian officials will examine all the aspects carefully, avoid hasty reaction, and reflect on their opinion afterwards."

The package, agreed on in Vienna on Friday, includes specific rewards to Iran like new commercial planes and light-water nuclear reactors if it suspends enrichment and reprocessing activities while talks over the deal are continuing, the officials said. But it does not say just how long the suspension would last, they added.

The United States gave crucial heft to the package by offering to remove certain economic sanctions against Iran that date from more than two decades ago, and to talk directly with Iran if the country agrees to an enrichment freeze.

