Hughes' case shows that the savings and loan crisis, which started mushrooming 25 years ago, isn't yet played out. Hughes' lawsuit was one of at least 150 filed against the government over the 1989 Financial Institutions, Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act, a far-reaching law that helped push many thrifts into insolvency.

The government has paid more than $1.7 billion in damages so far. About 30 cases were pending as of 2005.

Hughes, 65, seemed blasé about his victory.

"It's just a lengthy process that you have to go through to sue the government for monetary damages," he said last week from his part-time home in Arrowhead, in Colorado's Vail Valley. "We just stayed the course. It doesn't do any good to get yourself worked up.

"We always felt like it would eventually get resolved," said Hughes, who said he has been retired for about five years. "We knew what we had done was right."

The savings and loan crisis sparked the greatest collapse of financial institutions since the Great Depression.

In the decade that ended in 1995, 1,043 thrifts with more than $500 billion in assets closed, according to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.

The causes were many: an unsound deposit insurance program that didn't distinguish between conservative thrifts and reckless ones; skyrocketing interest rates that forced thrifts to pay their customers more than they were taking in from long-term mortgages; regulations that permitted excessive borrowing; and plain old fraud by savings and loan owners, with Texas contributing some of the most spectacular examples.

The failures swamped the government's savings and loan insurance program, and taxpayers had to kick in $124 billion to bail out the failed institutions. Thrifts paid another $29 billion.

Hughes already was a banking, business and government veteran by the time he acquired the foundering El Paso Federal, which he bought shortly after a deal to buy an Austin thrift collapsed. He had been a bank director, an executive at an Austin thrift and founder of the Round Rock Savings Association. He was CEO of a chain of day surgery and diagnostic centers.

In 1986, he was chairman of the Texas Department of Corrections board. At that time, the American-Statesman estimated Hughes' net worth at $30 million to $50 million, based on comments from a close associate. Hughes today says that estimate was low. To entice investors such as Hughes to buy troubled thrifts and rehabilitate them, the now-defunct Federal Home Loan Bank Board authorized an unusual accounting maneuver.

Savings and loans need a certain level of capital to meet regulatory requirements. But El Paso had more liabilities than assets and would not have met the requirements.

In these cases, regulators stretched the definition of capital to include the amount by which liabilities exceeded assets and allowed the difference to be counted as goodwill, the business term for an intangible asset.

The goodwill could then be counted toward the capital requirements. It was a crucial step that allowed the thrifts some breathing room while the new owners restored them to financial health.

"It was the only way to make an institution viable," Hughes said.

Buyers of thrifts also were allowed to use real estate instead of cash as financial backing for their operations. In this case, Hughes used his stake in Steiner Ranch, commercial real estate in North Austin and a number of federally subsidized housing units. He also paid $11.5 million in cash.

In his ruling, Merow noted that though regulators "preferred troubled thrifts to be acquired with cash rather than real estate, which lacks liquidity and has fluctuating values, contribution of real estate was not uncommon during this time of thrift failures as regulators sought to avoid industry collapse."

In 1989, Congress passed a law that was seen as the government's first serious attempt to stem the financial bleeding from savings and loans. One part of the law called for the elimination or rapid phase-out of the accounting allowance, which almost overnight left hundreds of institutions without enough capital to keep operating.

El Paso Federal, which had been in compliance with capital requirements, suddenly had a problem.

The new law took effect in December 1989. By September 1990, El Paso Federal was in regulatory receivership. It later was liquidated.

"It was pretty easy to see what was going to happen," Hughes said.

The U.S. Supreme Court later ruled that the law breached the contracts the government had made with investors who had purchased troubled savings and loans.

The rules for troubled thrifts shifted dramatically with the passage of the 1989 law, said Stephen Skaggs, president of the Bank Advisory Group LLC in Austin, a consulting firm.

Skaggs, who reviewed the court's ruling in the Hughes case, said the law was well-intentioned in its attempt to recapitalize thrifts and eliminate the goodwill accounting change, which he called a menace.

But, he said, the goodwill allowance "probably should have been eliminated far more gradually than it was."

Skaggs said the ruling makes it clear that the rule changes left investors such as Hughes "high and dry . . . simply because the rules under which Hughes capitalized the thrift were then changed after the fact."

Hughes lost the assets he had injected into El Paso Federal, including his ownership in most of Steiner Ranch.

Although he is not prone to looking back, Hughes said, "It sure would be nice to have Steiner Ranch back."

He said he had planned to develop the property in much the same way it stands today.

Hughes owned 4,500 acres. After El Paso's failure, the land ended up back in the hands of Tommy Steiner of the Steiner family, the same person from whom Hughes had bought the property.

BP Traders, Attempting To `Corner' Propane Market, Lost $10 Mln (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, July 3, 2006

3 (Bloomberg) -- The three BP Plc traders accused by regulators of attempting to corner the U.S. propane market lost $10 million when they failed to sell their inventory, court documents show.

The traders in February 2004 sought to make more than $20 million by holding most of the propane on a pipeline that ships the heating fuel from a hub in Texas to the U.S. Midwest and Northeast, according to transcripts filed June 28 with the U.S. District Court in Illinois by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Instead, they were stuck with much of the fuel as the market plunged on March 1.

``Not only do they have a public relations problem, they have a financial problem," said Charles Mankin, director of the Oklahoma Geologic Survey at the University of Oklahoma. ``It backfired on them." The losses may be more of a deterrent against future attempts to manipulate markets than any action by regulators, Mankin said. BP on June 28 denied the allegations of market manipulation and said it had fired several employees.

BP, which made $2.8 billion trading oil and gas in 2005, and other oil companies are facing increased scrutiny from U.S. regulators and lawmakers as near-record oil prices have boosted gasoline, heating oil and natural gas prices to records in the past year.

Mark Radley, a former BP trading manager who the Commodity Futures Trading Commission alleges developed the strategy, told his second-in-command that success or failure would show whether ``we can control the market at will," according to transcripts filed with the U.S. District Court in Illinois.

Grand Jury

BP is the subject of a grand jury investigation after a crude oil pipeline leak in Alaska, which was discovered in March. In September, BP agreed to pay a $21.4 million fine, the largest ever imposed by U.S. safety regulators, for more than 300 safety violations that led to a March 2005 blast at the company's Texas City, Texas, refinery, killing 15 people and injuring more than 170.

Radley's second-in-command, Dennis Abbott, pleaded guilty to conspiracy last week. Radley, Abbott and another trader, Cody Claborn, were all fired for violating BP trading policies, according to the CFTC filing.

Radley's boss, James Summers, the vice president of natural gas liquids for BP Products North America Inc., Martin Marz, compliance manager for the unit's North America Gas & Power business, and Donald Byers, then chief operating officer for the unit, have been suspended since the CFTC named all three in its complaint, the Financial Times reported today, citing people familiar with the matter.

BP can't comment on the FT report or say anything beyond the statement on June 28, Jamie Jardine, a Singapore-based spokesman for the company, said today.

Hunt Brothers

Summers, Marz and Byers were aware of the manipulation scheme, according to the Commodity Futures Regulatory Commission's complaint.

The propane trades caught the attention of other market participants, according to transcripts of telephone calls in which they accused BP traders of trying to corner the market.

One caller referred to BP trader Cody Claborn, who worked for Abbott, as Cody Hunt, a reference to the brothers Nelson and Will Hunt, who were convicted in 1988 of conspiring to manipulate silver prices.

Claborn responded: ``What are you talking about man?"

The caller, identified only as a market participant in the court documents, then said, ``Someone told me you guys were trying to corner the TET market so I figured you were one of the Hunt brothers."

`Badly Mistaken'

``I think you're badly mistaken," Claborn answered. ``Who told you that?"

Charles Mills, the attorney representing Radley, declined to comment. Attorneys representing Claborn and Abbott couldn't be reached for comment.

BP last week denied the trades were illegal. The Commodity Futures Trading Commission alleges the BP employees violated state antitrust and consumer protection laws.

``We are reviewing what has been filed, but based on our investigation of the trades we have examined to date we believe that no manipulation of the market occurred," BP said in the June 28 statement. ``That is not how we operate."

Marz, the compliance manager who approved the trades, told the traders at a February 2004 meeting to refrain from using the word ``squeeze" when discussing the strategy, the CFTC said.

`Feeding an Elephant'

Abbott, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy in a separate court filing by the Justice Department on June 29, was called by another gas trader on Feb. 19, 2004.

``Jeez, what is y'all's appetite for propane? I mean, it's just like feeding an elephant," the market participant said to Abbott.

``Um, yeah, we just like it," Abbott replied.

``You dig it, huh?"

``I'd call it insatiable right now," Abbott told the counterparty.

BP's propane inventory peaked at 5.l million barrels, 27 percent more than planned, according to its internal presentation, called ``Lessons Learned" and designed to determine how the experience might be useful in the future. The company had hoped to sell as much as 60 percent of that gas in February. It sold 17 percent, forcing it to sell the rest in March when prices fell by 34 cents a gallon, the document said.

`Dominant Position'

``BP employees purchased enormous quantities of propane to establish a dominant and controlling long position," the CFTC said in its complaint. That caused propane prices to rise to more than 90 cents a gallon on Feb. 27, 2004, the complaint said.

``A price that would not otherwise have been reached under the normal pressures of supply and demand," the CFTC said. Propane gas is used to heat homes in the U.S., largely in rural areas without access to natural gas pipelines.

The ``Lessons Learned" document said the trades carried no regulatory risks, ``but could increase the risk of regulatory intervention," the document said. There were no specific legal concerns. The ``primary risk" was to BP's reputation, the document said.

The case is U.S. Commodity Trading Commission v. BP Products North America Inc., 06Cv3503.

BP Suspends Three Traders Amid Calls To Police Markets (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, July 3, 2006

BP, the UK energy group, has suspended three Houston-based traders at the centre of an alleged propane price manipulation scheme, as alarm rose in Washington over the need to police energy markets.

Senior US senators have warned congress that “too many trades” are occurring without regulatory oversight.

Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat, said: “More and more trading is being conducted by large oil and gas traders on electronic markets where there is no oversight. It’s time to put the cop back on the beat in these markets to make sure ordinary Americans aren’t ripped off.”

Mr Levin’s call, in a bipartisan report to congress last week by the Senate’s Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is the clearest sign yet that lawmakers believe the US energy markets are still open to manipulation years after the collapse of Enron exposed the weakness of lightly regulated energy markets.

Mr Levin and Norm Coleman, his Republican counterpart, urged congress to “eliminate the Enron loophole” by extending the power of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the US futures industry regulator, to oversee over-the-counter (OTC) energy markets.

It was in such markets that the alleged BP propane scheme took place. But the CFTC, which regulates exchange-traded energy futures, only spotted the alleged trouble after receiving tip-offs from market participants in the OTC markets, people familiar with the investigation said.

A sweeping CFTC civil lawsuit last week alleged that a five-man team at BP’s natural gas trading desk in Houston cornered the market for TET propane, which millions of low-income Americans use to heat homes and fuel cookers and barbecues.

By building up a dominant position, BP drove up the price of the fuel, the suit claimed.

BP denies any manipulation took place. It says it fired two from the team some time ago. The other three were escorted out of BP’s Houston offices on Friday after being put on “administrative leave”, people familiar with the matter said.

One is Cameron Byers, a British graduate of Insead business school and chief executive of North American Gas and Power (NAGP). The unit is BP’s trading arm in North America, where the group is the biggest player in propane.

The others are Martin Marz, former NAGP compliance manager, and James Summers, former vice president of natural gas liquids trading within NAGP.

A fourth, Dennis Abbott is co-operating with the US Department of Justice after pleading guilty to conspiring to manipulate and corner the propane market in the winter of 2004.

BP declined to comment.

BP and other traders of propane typically buy and sell propane and other fuels either using the telephone, or on internet-based markets such as Chalkboard, where the alleged price manipulation took place.

Any attempt to give the CFTC added powers to oversee the OTC markets would present a huge challenge given the opaque nature of record-keeping in such markets and the need to substantially boost the CFTC's budget.

Offshore Disturbance Behind Big Wall Street Failure: An Unregulated Bermuda Unit (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp, Ian McDonald And Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

At 7:32 in the morning on Oct. 13, Paul Van Dillen tapped out an urgent email to Refco Inc. "Please return $9.9 mm," he instructed the New York-based brokerage firm.

Refco had a reputation for stellar service, but Mr. Van Dillen, an analyst for AQR Capital Management, got the runaround that morning. He traded six more phone calls and emails with Refco over the next four hours in an effort to recoup the millions held in Refco brokerage accounts by the $25 billion hedge-fund manager. Eventually, in a late-morning phone conversation with Refco employees, he got alarming news: Refco had just frozen $4 billion worth of accounts at the Bermuda unit that held his firm's money. (Read the email string1).

Refco filed for bankruptcy protection four days later, one of the largest and swiftest failures in recent Wall Street history. Refco, one of the world's largest commodities brokerages, was a global trading hub for corporations, government agencies, individual clients and hedge funds. And yet its spectacular collapse came out of nowhere. AQR, based in Greenwich, Conn., is now one of thousands of big and small investors trying to recover about $1.8 billion of assets missing from client accounts.

In recent months, the inside story of Refco's collapse is emerging in federal bankruptcy-court proceedings in lower Manhattan and in related civil and criminal actions. At its center is Refco Capital Markets Ltd. of Hamilton, Bermuda. Court proceedings have uncovered a host of unusual practices by the Bermuda unit that appear to have contributed both to Refco's rapid growth and to its catastrophic fall.

In the U.S., brokerage firms must maintain separate accounts for clients. But at Refco's unregulated Bermuda unit, client and company money was all tossed into a single unsegregated pool, the court proceedings have revealed. Refco routinely used this money for corporate purposes, and the commingled funds flowed freely between the Bermuda entity and New York units and throughout Refco, according to court testimony by employees and clients. Refco Capital Markets also made big loans to customers to finance high-risk investments. When these clients were unable to cover trading losses, the unit helped hide the bad loans, the civil and criminal actions allege.

Refco Capital Markets was incorporated in Bermuda as an "exempt" company, which meant it could do business anywhere except Bermuda. In fact, it employed no one at all at its headquarters address in Bermuda. New York-based employees ran the unit. In effect, it was unregulated: Neither Bermudan nor American regulators had any duty to watch over it.

A spokeswoman for the Bermuda Monetary Authority, the nation's financial regulator, says its main role is to protect "retail and unsophisticated" investors. Firms such as Refco Capital Markets, which cater to sophisticated investors, are entitled to exemptions from Bermuda regulation, she says.

On Oct. 10, Refco disclosed that it had made a series of transactions that could have been used to hide bad debts. That sparked a run on the bank led by its clients. Six weeks after a $583 million initial public offering of stock, Refco sought Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. Refco Capital Markets had only $1.9 billion in client-account assets, although they were supposed to total at least $3.7 billion. Phillip R. Bennett, then chief executive officer, was arrested on Oct. 11 at his home in Gladstone, N.J., on federal fraud charges.

Refco was founded in 1969 as Ray E. Friedman & Co. Mr. Friedman was a Chicago commodities trader who served a 23-month prison stint in the 1950s for selling substandard chickens to the Army during the Korean War. He was later pardoned by President Lyndon B. Johnson and died in 2004.

Initially, Refco was mainly a middleman between farmers and food buyers. Much of its commodities operation involved futures contracts -- agreements to buy or sell a specified amount of goods at a set price on a specific date, which allow buyers and sellers to hedge against price swings and speculators to bet on price moves.

In the 1970s, futures became a huge business. They were used to bet on prices of everything from currencies to U.S. Treasury bonds to precious metals. Under the leadership of Mr. Friedman's stepson, Thomas H. Dittmer, Refco became a big futures broker with a reputation as a tough competitor.

The firm frequently ran afoul of regulators. The Commodity Futures Trading Commission filed nine regulatory actions against Refco, while the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, the Chicago Board of Trade and other futures markets filed 131, according to the National Futures Association, an industry regulatory group.

Leo Melamed, former chairman of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, says he once encountered Mr. Dittmer at an exchange event shortly after his organization fined Refco. "He told me: 'I made a few million, and you took a few thousand back -- so what?' " Mr. Melamed recalls. "Refco came into the industry as a renegade, and it stayed that way until the day it folded." Mr. Dittmer couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Bennett joined the company in 1981 from what was then Chase Manhattan Bank. He became chief financial officer in 1983 and chief executive in 1998. Under his leadership, Refco's operations grew significantly, eventually encompassing about two dozen subsidiaries. Mr. Bennett's lawyer, David Frankel, declined on behalf of his client to comment on Refco or the charges against Mr. Bennett.

In Bermuda, Refco set up a foreign-currency brokerage called Refco FX Associates. That later became part of another new Bermuda entity, Refco Capital Markets, which offered trading in exotic securities such as bonds issued by developing countries in Latin America and Asia as well as Russian stocks and silver futures.

Employees of Refco Securities LLC, a regulated subsidiary based in New York, ran the unregulated Bermuda unit. Customers of Refco Capital Markets ranged from overseas hedge funds run by highly regarded money managers to a baked-goods company in Georgia to a college professor in Iowa. It offered attentive service to all comers.

"You could call one person, and whether you had to buy an equity in the United States or in Korea or in Brazil, that one person could handle the transaction," said Richard Deitz, founder of a Moscow-based hedge-fund firm, VR Capital, during a bankruptcy-court hearing. Mr. Deitz said he and the Refco trader dedicated to his account communicated about trades and markets at least five times a day.

The service "was beautiful," says Peter Catranis of Aliso Viejo, Calif., who oversaw accounts for small investors.

The interest paid to clients on cash in their accounts was often 1.75 percentage points higher than Wall Street brokerages offered, one Refco executive testified in bankruptcy court.

Refco Capital Markets eventually counted more than 3,000 customers world-wide. By 2005, it produced more than half of Refco's pretax profit, according to bankruptcy-court testimony.

Big investors often borrow money from brokerages to invest, pledging securities in their portfolios as collateral. Most brokerages set limits on the emerging-market bonds and stocks they accept as collateral because of the risks associated with them. Refco Capital Markets often didn't set such limits. Thomas Yorke, who ran the Refco Capital Markets financing desk, said in bankruptcy-court testimony that Refco Capital Markets "didn't have any of the U.S. regulatory requirements to adhere to."

Vera Kraker, who ran the desk with him, said in a sworn statement: "We would look at pretty much any security a client would bring into Refco for financing."

Bahamas-based Capital Management Select Fund was able to borrow 50% of the value of its shares of Russian oil giant OAO Lukoil, its manager said in a court statement. Another brokerage, Bear Stearns Cos., wouldn't let it borrow more than 15% of the shares' value, the manager said.

As an "exempt" Bermuda company, Refco Capital Markets wasn't required to keep customers' money distinct from Refco's. Client and company money circulated among various Refco entities. Every day, the Bermuda unit sent money to an affiliated Refco entity, which used the cash to run Refco's varied businesses -- to pay bills, make loans and finance acquisitions, according to bankruptcy-court documents and testimony. And other Refco units ultimately sent funds to Bermuda for Refco Capital Markets to invest. Investigators have traced thousands of money transfers since 2000, with about $20 billion going from Bermuda to other Refco entities and about $18 billion going back.

Refco Capital Markets "had full use of all of the cash invested" with it, "and I am not aware of any restrictions that apply to the use of that cash," said former Refco treasurer Matthew Hreben in a sworn statement filed in bankruptcy court.

Many customers testified they had no idea the firm was using their assets this way. "That is not a business model of which I am familiar with," Mr. Deitz, the Moscow-based hedge-fund manager, said at a bankruptcy-court hearing. "It's something that I think is more in common with three-card monte."

In testimony, Refco executives said documents sent to customers to confirm trades disclosed that Refco had a free hand with client assets. They also said clients should have known that dealing with an unregulated Bermuda firm involved risk. "These are all big boys," Mr. Yorke said in court of the clients. "These aren't widows and orphans."

Much client money was transferred to other Refco entities, testified Todd Brents of AlixPartners LLC, a firm helping unravel Refco's books. Sometimes "there will be a notation in the accounting records that will say transfer $10 million for X," he said. "Other times," he added, "there will be no explanation." He testified he suspected a large transfer last August was used to acquire the brokerage operations of Cargill Investor Services, because it was made on the same day Refco paid $208 million for the rival trading firm. Days earlier, a similar amount had flowed into Refco Capital Markets.

Clients "didn't know that what they thought was a broker was actually acting as a bank for Refco," says New York lawyer Howard Seife, who represents two dozen Refco Capital Markets customers.

The practices that brought Refco down appear to have arisen because some brokerage customers suffered investment losses and were unable to repay loans made by Refco. Some of these bad debts dated to the late 1990s.

In February 2000, Mr. Bennett made an unusual proposal to Bawag P.S.K. Group, an Austrian bank that bought 10% of Refco in 1999. In emails between Mr. Bennett and Bawag executives, the project was referred to as "Cleanup," say people familiar with the matter.

The project was a complex effort to hide hundreds of millions of dollars of bad debts, including loans customers couldn't repay due to trading losses. A private company controlled by Mr. Bennett assumed those bad debts to make Refco's books look better, according to federal prosecutors and Refco creditors.

In order for Refco to mask the transaction from auditors, Mr. Bennett's company engaged in a circular series of money transfers, which took place just before Refco closed its books each financial period. His company borrowed money from Bawag and Bawag borrowed money from Refco Capital Markets, prosecutors and creditors allege. Then, Mr. Bennett paid the money to Refco.

Thus, the bad debt on Refco's books was converted into a standard, collectable loan to Bawag. None of the transactions were visible to investors. Days after the financial period ended, the transactions would be reversed, creditors say, saddling Refco once again with the bad debt. (Read letters discussing the Bawag transactions: one3 | two4)

Eventually, these transactions were conducted quarterly and involved both the Austrian bank and a New Jersey hedge fund, Liberty Corner Capital Strategies LLC, Refco creditors allege. Investors in Refco stock and bonds make similar allegations in lawsuits against Refco executives and the company's auditor and underwriters. (Bawag agreed last month to settle criminal and civil claims that it helped carry out the alleged fraud. Liberty Corner has denied knowingly participating in the alleged wrongdoing.)

In early 2004, Thomas H. Lee Partners, a buyout firm, was preparing to acquire a stake in Refco with an eye toward transforming it into a publicly traded company. As part of the deal, Refco was planning a large bond offering, which meant that investors would be scouring its books. Creditors allege that at that time, Refco hid $970 million in debts, including bad debts. Although the Lee buyout firm spent $10 million investigating Refco, it didn't uncover the problem, and the deal went through.

On Aug. 11, 2005, Refco went public. To celebrate, Mr. Bennett rang the opening bell at the New York Stock Exchange. Two weeks after the IPO came another series of debt-hiding transactions with Liberty Corner valued at $420 million, according to the civil complaint by investors.

As Refco closed its books for the period ending August 2005, company bookkeepers noticed an irregularity, a move that forced Mr. Bennett to disclose his role at an Oct. 6 meeting with Refco's audit committee, according to bankruptcy-court testimony and court filings. Four days later, Refco disclosed the transactions relating to the bad debt. Over the next few days, "we had literally hundreds and hundreds of millions go out the door," Mr. Yorke testified.

Among those demanding money was Christopher Sugrue, a former Refco executive who ran a money-management firm called PlusFunds Group Inc. On Oct. 11, he burst into the office of Mr. Hreben, Refco's treasurer, in the company's lower Manhattan headquarters, according to sworn testimony from Mr. Hreben. Mr. Sugrue demanded that $300 million of PlusFunds money be transferred from unregulated Bermuda accounts to regulated U.S. ones in order to protect the funds, according to the sworn statement. "He appeared to be very upset and was shouting," Mr. Hreben said in his statement. Mr. Hreben ordered him out. (Read Mr. Hreben's account.5)

The next day, Mr. Sugrue returned to see Ms. Kraker, who helped run the Refco Capital Markets financing desk. "He stood behind me at my station on the trading floor asking repeatedly if the money had been transferred as he had demanded," she said in a sworn statement.

Refco transferred the money, and Mr. Sugrue withdrew it. Others also withdrew their funds, depleting the coffers of Refco Capital Markets. Refco froze the unit's customer accounts and declared bankruptcy. A bankruptcy court later froze the money withdrawn by PlusFunds because under bankruptcy law, all Refco Capital Markets clients have to be treated equally. In an interview earlier this year, Mr. Sugrue said he had every right to recover the money.

Customers of Refco Capital Markets continue to try to recoup their money through bankruptcy court. Refco has sold its regulated futures-brokerage business to a unit of London-based Man Group PLC. Its remaining assets, including some expensive art work, are being sold off piece by piece. Mr. Bennett remains under house arrest. No date has been set for his trial.

SEC Dubious Of German Bond Deal (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, July 3, 2006

Las Vegas investor Jeffrey Weston has been snapping up Germany Weimar Republic bonds from the 1920s on the premise that $1,000 in IOUs payable in gold then are today worth about $1 billion apiece.

Along the way, Weston, 46, persuaded dozens of investors to give him $7.7 million to purchase the antique certificates, which lost much of their value after Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933.

Last week, the Securities and Exchange Commission said Weston had spun a fantastic tale while spending $2 million of investors' money on a house and cars and tucking away $454,000 more in Swiss bank accounts. The SEC said Weston bought some German bonds of dubious value, paying as little as $190 apiece for them, but laid little of the legal groundwork he promised investors toward establishing an investment trust he called INGOTs for Insured Notes of German Obligations Trusts.

In an emergency filing in Las Vegas, the SEC sued to halt Weston's promotions, freeze his funds and recover what authorities say might be only pennies on the dollar. The FBI and Texas authorities also are investigating, court records show.

SEC attorney Jeffrey Norris called Weston's investment sales pitch "far-fetched and impossible."

Weston, author of The German Financial Time Bomb: A Betrayal of the American Public, a Fantastic Deception, 50 years of Cover-up and Now a Solution, which investigators say he published with investors' funds, declined to comment. In a brief phone conversation, Weston said he was unfamiliar with the SEC lawsuit but promised to "be in touch" with his investors about the government case.

Since 1953, Germany has offered to honor bonds belonging to their legitimate owners — at face value, and without interest — while contending that most paper certificates now in circulation have no redemption value because they were pillaged by Russian troops from its banks at the end of World War II.

Weston's far greater expectations are based on his assertion that "Germany was lying about the looting by Russian soldiers" and appraisals that value the certificates much higher, his sales materials state. One marketing document identifies the Iowa high school graduate as "one of the world's foremost experts" in finance.

In June, Weston gave SEC investigators a lengthy deposition in which he cited previous jobs as a "penny stock" broker, a multilevel cosmetic salesman and manager of a Cayman Islands mutual fund that authorities liquidated in 2002. Weston acknowledged he'd had no income since the fund folded.

Weston told investigators he had "used a significant portion" of investors' funds for "personal expenses," which he'd recorded as a loan with "a sticky (note) that I put in my calendar book … indicating that it was a loan that I had taken that needed to be repaid."

Far from shy, Weston recounted previous clashes with the FBI and disgruntled investors and boasted he was able to buy the prewar German bonds far cheaper than anybody else "because most people won't sell them to anybody but me, because they're afraid that the person they're dealing with is an agent of the German government and going to confiscate the bonds."

Several investors expressed confidence Weston will prevail and force German authorities to honor the securities.

"I don't find anything untoward in anything Mr. Weston's told me," said George Vaile of Las Vegas, who invested $830,000 with Weston. "I believe the bonds have value."

James Long of Austin, who invested $300,000, said: "He's got, frankly, the German government in a very terrible position and I feel like this is a good investment even for somebody who's a moderate risk taker like I am."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Justice Dept. Subpoenas Jefferson's E-mails (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

The Justice Department has issued a new subpoena for e-mails from Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is at the center of an ongoing bribery and corruption investigation.

The subpoena, approved by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Va., was sent last week to James Eagan, Chief Administrative Officer of the House. The Jefferson probe is being overseen by the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria.

The subpoena was read into the Congressional Record on Thursday evening, as required under House rules, but did not specify that Jefferson was the target of the request.

The Justice Department is seeking e-mail traffic from Jefferson's office prior to Aug. 3, 2005, when FBI agents raided his home and car, according to sources close to the case. The Justice Department and House officials have been negotiating over the scope of the subpoena for months, said the sources.

Any e-mails relevant to the Justice Department search will now be assembled, and Jefferson will be allowed to review them and decide whether he wants to try to assert his privilege under the Speech or Debate Clause and withhold them from the federal prosecutors. Jefferson would then have to file a legal motion in federal court in Alexandria outlining the reasons for why they should not be turned over to federal investigators.

Jefferson's attorney declined to comment for this article.

The House Administration Committee, which oversees Eagan's office, also had no comment.

Jefferson's office in the Rayburn House Office Building was raided by FBI agents on May 20, a move that infuriated both Democratic and GOP leaders. Jefferson's legal team, backed by the House leadership, has challenged the propriety of the raid in court. An initial ruling in that case is expected soon. House officials are negotiating with the Justice Department over ground rules for any future search of a Congressional office. Those talks remain ongoing.

Jefferson has been waging a legal fight with the Justice Department in federal court in Alexandria, but the proceedings in that case are under seal and not publicly available.

Jefferson is suspected of taking hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes in return for his assistance in aiding a Kentucky businessman win several telecom deals in Africa. That businessman, Vernon Jackson, has already pleaded guilty in federal court to paying bribes to Jefferson beginning in 2001 through a company owned by his wife and five daughters.

A former Jefferson aide, Brett Pfeffer, pleaded guilty in January to conspiracy to commit bribery and aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes by a Member of Congress. Pfeffer has been sentenced to eight years in federal prison for his role in the bribery scheme.

Ohio's Rep. Ney Stuck In Wait-and-see Game (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

CHILLICOTHE, Ohio — There's often a caveat these days when Ohio Republicans talk about re-election prospects for their embattled congressman, Bob Ney. As state Rep. Clyde Evans put it at a recent GOP barbecue, "Unless he's indicted, I think he'll do very well."

In a district that stretches more than 200 miles through hills, farms and small-town Main Streets, Ney has been the go-to guy for a dozen years. He won 66% of the vote in 2004. Now he's a central figure in the federal corruption investigation of convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and, according to the political newsletter Hotline, the most vulnerable House incumbent.

The six-term Republican from Heath is accused in court papers and testimony by a former aide of accepting gifts, trips and campaign donations from Abramoff and his clients in exchange for official actions. The House ethics committee is investigating him. Ney's top Capitol Hill aides are leaving, and federal investigators last week subpoenaed his district director.

Ney, who turns 52 on Wednesday, hasn't been charged and says he has done nothing wrong. He also says he'll run even if he's indicted. "I'll be serving … until the day the voters decide whether they want me to continue," Ney said in an interview. "They make the decision. No one else."

Diane Carnes, head of the Ross County GOP, says an indictment won't shake her support. "I trust him," she says. "I'm going to be there for him because he's always been there for us."

Some of Ney's past backers, however, say an indictment would change their votes. Some already are considering a switch to Democrat Zack Space, 45, an attorney and hotel developer from Dover.

Retired paper mill supervisor Arlan Cox said he is "up in the air" about whether he'll stick with Ney. As he prepared for a Lion's Club fish fry at a downtown park, Cox said he knew little about Space, but "we need to clean house in Washington and start over."

Ohio is awash in scandal, making it prime territory for the "culture of corruption" argument Democrats are using against Republicans in their quest to take control of the House and Senate. The largest corruption probe in Ohio history has produced charges against 14 people. The two most prominent:

·Republican Gov. Bob Taft was convicted of four misdemeanors involving golf outings, dinners and other unreported gifts; his approval rating in May was 26%.

·Tom Noe, a rare coin dealer and party fundraiser, pleaded guilty to illegally funneling contributions to President Bush. Noe also is charged with embezzlement arising from his management of a $50 million coin investment for the state worker's compensation fund.

The drag on GOP candidates here is palpable. Two-term Sen. Mike DeWine, seven-term Rep. Deborah Pryce and six-term Rep. Steve Chabot are in contests that Hotline editor Chuck Todd and other independent analysts rate as tossups or potential upsets, although all three won their last races with 60%.

Ken Blackwell, the Republican candidate for governor, doesn't talk about Taft. “Bob Taft is not in the matrix,” he declared, smiling, when asked why. Lieutenant governor candidate Tom Raga, rallying the troops at the backyard barbecue here in Ney's district, stuck to indirect allusions. “Republicans in Ohio love being Republicans,” he said. “They may have someone they're disappointed in or unhappy with, but they're Republicans.”

Space, who declined interview requests, won the Democratic primary with a campaign centered on ethics. His website features a pledge to accept no gifts, trips or meals from lobbyists.

Ney stepped down as head of the House Administration Committee in January after Abramoff, in his plea agreement, described official acts performed by “Representative #1,” later identified in court papers as Ney, in exchange for “a stream of things of value.” Abramoff partner Neil Volz, once Ney's chief of staff, pleaded guilty to trying to corrupt Ney. He testified that Ney was a “champion” for Abramoff's clients.

Ney, Abramoff and former House majority leader Tom DeLay took an expensive golf trip to Scotland, subsidized by the Tigua tribe of Texas, an Abramoff client. Ney later tried to help the Tiguas reopen a casino.

Ney calls Abramoff “a con man” who deceived him and wants to stay out of jail. Accounts of his own activities are distorted, Ney says: “Did I spend hours and hours and hours and hours on his issues? No.”

If Ney survives the election, it could be because of the Social Security glitches he has unraveled, the federal money he has secured, the sympathetic ear he offers his constituents. “People know him personally,” says Republican Connie Meyer, a registered nurse here. “Word of mouth is going to help.”

Controversy has only intensified Ney's attentions to the home folk. “I don't cancel events” in tough times, he says. “I just continue on a pretty rigorous schedule.”

One staple is leading students on tours of the Capitol. “Welcome to the floor of the U.S. House. My name is Bob Ney, and I'm your member of Congress,” Ney began recently, standing before 63 sixth-graders and 14 chaperones from Jackson (Ohio) Middle School.

Ney recently did the tour for 84 students from a neighboring district after they got stuck in traffic and missed their scheduled tour. The desperate request came from Democrat Violet Cummings, a Ney constituent on the trip. When he came through, driving all night from Ohio to Washington because of a canceled flight, Cummings took down her Zack Space lawn sign.

“How could I work against somebody who cares that much? … He can't be all bad if he cares that much about the kids,” she said.

Political Scandals Refuse To Go Away In 'Corrupticut' (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- There was the mayor who liked to be plied with $100-plus bottles of Bordeaux. The governor who took a free hot tub. The state senator who was given a job that paid $30,000 for doing nothing -- and then demanded a raise.

The past few years have revealed so many tales of graft, malfeasance and all-purpose criminality by public servants in Connecticut that it's hard to choose the most brazen. But for Kevin J. O'Connor, the U.S. attorney here, one moment stands out.

It came in June 2004, while then-Gov. John G. Rowland (R) -- he of the hot tub -- was facing impeachment in the legislature for improperly taking gifts. Even in that fraught time, O'Connor said, federal agents recorded state Sen. Ernest E. Newton II (D) -- he of the no-show job -- asking someone for a bribe.

"I thought to myself, you know, 'What are these people thinking?' " O'Connor said.

When Connecticut forefathers nicknamed their state "The Land of Steady Habits," this was probably not what they had in mind. But a tradition of bad behavior by officeholders persists here, despite numerous prosecutions and attempts at reform.

If more proof were needed, it has come in the past few weeks, with three new scandals involving current or former big-city mayors.

When Rowland resigned, pleaded guilty and was sentenced in March 2005 to a year and a day in jail, "everybody thought that was going to be the end of it," said John M. Orman, a professor of politics at Fairfield University in Fairfield, Conn. Instead, he said, the continuing parade of misdeeds has helped the state live up to a new nickname, "Corrupticut." "We just keep having 'em in Connecticut," Orman said.

The recent scandals here include the tearful, nationally televised admission on June 20 by Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi (D) that he had used cocaine while in office. "I am pleased to tell you that I have not used drugs in the last 18 months," said Fabrizi, who has been mayor for more than three years. For now, the U.S. attorney's office says it has no plans to prosecute him for the drug use.

Other cases include a former mayor and city council member from Middletown -- who pleaded guilty late last month to fraud for embezzling money from his law clients -- and a new charge against Joseph Santopietro, the former mayor of Waterbury. Santopietro previously was convicted on bribery charges stemming from his conduct as mayor in the 1990s. Now out of jail, he has been charged with racketeering conspiracy for allegedly serving as a consultant to a mob-affiliated garbage-hauling business.

These cases are just the latest in a long string of charges against officeholders this year. There was Rowland's former chief of staff, who was sentenced to jail in April for bribery and tax offenses. There was a postmaster who stole from a customer, a public-works official who lied to federal investigators, and a state transportation worker who helped rig a bidding process and got a free TV from the winning contractor.

It all adds up to a big problem, officials here say. Statistically, the state's corruption prosecutions still don't equal those of places such as New Jersey, Illinois or Mississippi. But many fear that businesses will be driven away, or that voters and potential candidates might be disillusioned by a perception that Connecticut is -- as one pol has put it -- "Louisiana with foliage."

"We thought we were a state of Yankee integrity," said Howard L. Reiter, a professor of political science at the University of Connecticut. "Clearly, that's not the case anymore."

Observers of Connecticut politics say that part of the problem was that ethics rules went unenforced here for so long, allowing corrupt practices to become ingrained before large-scale prosecutions began in the 1980s and 1990s. Another problem is the state's network of political machines, which incubate Republican and Democratic hopefuls in systems in which friendship and favors rule.

In recent years, the two most prolific incubators have been a pair of old manufacturing cities in Connecticut's western half. Waterbury, in addition to being Rowland's home town, had three mayors charged with crimes, and two of them imprisoned. In Bridgeport, Fabrizi's predecessor, Joseph P. Ganim, also a Democrat, was convicted of taking bribes and kickbacks.

In the Ganim case, one of those doing the bribing was Lennie Grimaldi, a public relations consultant. Grimaldi said that the city's political culture dictated that he lavish gifts on the mayor or else worry that his clients would be frozen out of city business.

"It started off with, you know, buying dinners, and then expensive dinners, and then a little bit of wine, and then the gifts. . . . It became this monster," recalled Grimaldi, who served 10 months in prison and has become a successful freelance writer after his release. "I didn't have the guts to say no to a mayor that had a tremendous amount of economic power over me."

Last year, the Rowland scandal galvanized legislators to try to change the atmosphere. They created a system that bars political contributions from state contractors and lobbyists, and aims to reduce the influence of donors overall by providing public financing for candidates in future elections.

Locally, some officials have made their own efforts at doing politics strictly by the book. These days, Waterbury Mayor Michael J. Jarjura (D) said, even fruit baskets sent by constituents won't be accepted.

"I know they're just trying to be kind," Jarjura said, "but we immediately send it back, and we document that we sent it back."

These efforts at reforming the system are now widespread enough that Rowland's defense attorney, William F. Dow III, said he fears the good in the state's old system might be lost.

"Government will operate less efficiently" if politicians obsess over avoiding appearances of impropriety, Dow said. "I think this dotting the i's and crossing the t's is going to have a chilling effect."

The chill isn't here yet, though. Instead, last week saw another of the kind of embarrassing spectacle Connecticut is seeking to avoid, as defendants in the garbage-hauling case were arraigned in New Haven's federal court.

In that case, prosecutors allege that a slew of Connecticut businesses used mob muscle to keep competitors away from the routes where they picked up trash. Those charged include an 86-year-old man alleged to be mob boss "Matty the Horse," plus a number of lower-level players who appeared in court wearing pompadour haircuts or tailored suits.

Then there was Santopietro, the former Republican mayor of Waterbury, who stood out because he wore just slacks and a sensible-looking short-sleeved dress shirt. Out of the whole bunch, he was the only one who looked like a civil servant.

Missouri Court Ruling Limits Names On Sex Offender Registry (SLPD)

By Matt Franck

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038492

Thousands of offenders would no longer be required to provide information for Missouri's sex offender registry after a ruling Friday by the Missouri Supreme Court, according to the lawyer behind the litigation.

While the high court upheld the constitutionality of the state's sex offender registry law, it ruled that the statute should not apply to nearly all of those convicted of crimes prior to 1995, when the law took effect. One key exception is sexually violent predators, who will stay on the list regardless of when their crimes occurred.

Just how many of Missouri's more than 11,000 registered sex offenders would be affected by the ruling was unclear Friday. Tim Hull, a spokesman for the Missouri Highway Patrol, which maintains the list, said officials must review the ruling in detail.

But Arthur Benson II, the lawyer who brought the case, estimates that thousands would no longer have to be registered as sex offenders. Currently, the registry includes offenses from 1979 to the present. Crimes committed during more than half of those years would not be included in the registry.

Benson said the ruling addresses "the height of unfairness" in the current law, which requires people to register even for crimes they committed years before the registry law was conceived.

Eleven of Benson's clients claimed their inclusion on the sex offender registry was unconstitutional on numerous grounds.

The high court rejected nearly all their claims, affirming the constitutionality of requiring offenders to register even after they had completed prison sentences. The court ruled - as it and others have in the past - that the registration requirement does not represent an additional criminal punishment.

But the unanimous opinion, written by Judge Laura Denvir Stith, said applying the law retrospectively conflicts with constitutional interpretation dating back to 1820.

The ruling continues to allow publication of information about prior sex offenders, whose crimes are a matter of public record. But those who committed crimes before 1995 would not face criminal charges for failing to register or update their address.

Benson said the ruling in no way places the public at risk. He said the true sexual predators are known by law enforcement and will continue to be tracked.

One Missouri legislator who has recently worked to toughen sex offender laws disagrees.

"There will be people who will drop off the registry who the public would feel would be a threat," said Sen. Matt Bartle, R-Lee's Summit.

Bartle co-sponsored a sex offender bill signed by the governor this year that addresses many of the issues raised in the Supreme Court case.

The new provisions allow people who committed certain nonsexual crimes, such as kidnapping by a parent or other forms of child abuse, to be removed from the registry.

The law also allows those who were found guilty of consensual sex between teenagers to petition to have their names removed. Several of the plaintiffs involved in the Supreme Court case are now eligible to make use of the new law.

According to the ruling, the new law made it unnecessary for the high court to rule on whether certain offenders don't belong on the registry.

Bartle said he believes lawmakers this year worked to make sure the registry was both fair and useful to those wanting to track serious offenders. Friday's ruling, he said, goes too far by striking scores of names from the list.

Guiding Kids From Net Danger (DENP)

Denver Post, July 3, 2006

There has been a great deal of concern recently - among lawmakers, in the courts and in the media - about the dangers faced by children on the Internet.

Indeed, the statistics about online predators are frightening. Just in the last three years, 7,600 offenders have been caught and arrested for sexual solicitations.

According to a U.S. Department of Justice survey, 1 in 5 girls and 1 in 10 boys admitted to being sexually solicited on the Internet.

The Internet has proven to be a riveting tool for children - it provides an incredible opportunity for students to gain a broader view of the world, collect research for school projects, and keep in contact with family and friends.

Kids are a lot less likely to become victims of sexual solicitation with proper supervision and education about online dangers. That is why we were so encouraged by the program established by Qwest and the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children in an effort to educate parents about monitoring their kids on the Net.

To raise Internet safety awareness in Colorado, Qwest is calling for 10,000 Coloradans to become educated about online safety. The Denver-based telecommunications company is offering grants of up to $250 to the first 100 schools that provide instructions to at least 20 percent of parents by the end of the year, using the website incredibleinternet.com.

The site, among several services, provides tips on safe surfing and teaches parents about social networking sites such as MySpace and Friendster. It also offers information on the top anti-spyware scanners and an online safety video featuring former Olympic speedskater Bonnie Blair.

The National Center for Missing & Exploited Children provides a site, www.cybertipline.com, that reaches out to both parents and children. It describes the dangers of the Web and discusses situations to avoid. There is even a game where children can use simulated chat rooms, instant messaging and e-mail, and are asked to identify possible predators - a creative way to practice identifying red flags on the Web.

It doesn't make sense to deal with Internet risks by locking up your children's computer, but it's vital for parents and guardians to monitor their online use.

Through awareness, parent-child communication and a few safety precautions, kids and teens can appreciate the benefits of the Internet while dodging most of the dangers.

Toddler Didn't Meet Amber Alert Criteria (DMN)

By Jeff Mosier, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, July 2, 2006

Irving: Case lacked proof of kidnap, but chief says he 'couldn't rule it out'

The Irving Police Department could face an informal reprimand for issuing an Amber Alert for 2-year-old Elian Majano, who disappeared from a park more than a week ago and is still missing.

Evidence of abduction is a requirement for activating the regional alert system, but Police Chief Larry Boyd said there was no such evidence in this case. The task force that runs the local system reviews each alert to determine whether it was warranted.

There were "no signs of abduction, but we couldn't rule it out," Chief Boyd said.

Elian disappeared in Lively Park on June 21 while his mother was sitting in a truck with a man described by authorities as her boyfriend. The toddler and his 4-year-old brother were playing outside at the time.

Police are unsure whether Elian was abducted or fell into a sinkhole that leads to the sewer system. Authorities said that there's no evidence to support either theory but that no other option makes sense.

Chief Boyd said it was important "to err on the side of caution and make sure the maximum amount of people heard about the child."

Tarrant County Sheriff Dee Anderson, a member of the local and state Amber Alert committees, said the system wasn't created only to drum up extra media coverage or to determine what happened.

He said the system should be used when police know that an abduction has occurred and there is sufficient information to help the public spot the kidnapper and child.

"I do not like to Monday morning quarterback this without full knowledge of the case, but my overall obvious concern is that there was never any evidence of an abduction," Sheriff Anderson said. "To my knowledge, there still isn't."

In Elian's case, police had a description of the boy and his flower-print shorts and Spider-Man flip-flops. But there were no other details about what might have happened to him.

Sheriff Anderson said that improper use of the system often happens when there is pressure from the family or media to issue an alert or when an investigation has stalled. He said the task force has written many letters during the past two decades reprimanding departments for using those criteria.

Capt. Richard Holland of the Houston Police Department said he could sympathize with Irving's decision.

"It's one of the most challenging calls that a law enforcement agency is asked to make," he said.

Capt. Holland, a member of the Houston regional Amber Alert committee, said that when other possibilities are eliminated, a department has to assume that a child has been abducted.

"If you have a very young child, sometimes you have to make that presumption," he said.

Strict rules

Most Amber Alert systems use standardized criteria for when it should be activated, such as evidence of abduction and risk of harm to the child. But there are some differences.

The Texas Department of Public Safety operates its own statewide Amber Alert system with even stricter rules. Elian's case would not have been eligible for that alert because a description of the suspect is required.

Lisa Block, a DPS spokeswoman, said that such stringent standards ensure that the system isn't overused and remains effective. Since the system was created in August 2002, DPS has issued Amber Alerts for 27 children. Twenty-five were returned safely, one child was killed and one is still missing.

"The suspect information is vital to what we do," Ms. Block said.

Statistics for the North Texas regional Amber Alert system were not immediately available.

The Amber Alert for Elian has been active for about a week and half, far longer than the usual one to three days.

Alerts stay active

In the Houston area, the regional committee does not rescind its Amber Alerts until the child is found. Since the regional system was created in 2000, there are three subjects of Amber Alerts who are still missing.

Each of those is still listed as active even after several years, although those alerts are no longer broadcast by local media or placed on digital highway signs.

DPS re-evaluates Amber Alerts every 24 hours to determine whether they are still helping with the investigation. In a Houston case from 2004, the state Amber Alert was canceled on the third day while the local alert remains in effect today.

Chief Boyd said he understands that the Amber Alert system could lose its potency if it's used too often, but he also noted that it's a critical tool that can't be overlooked during an investigation.

"I hope it was for nothing," he said about the Amber Alert for Elian. "But we still need information, and that's what the system is for."

Sheriff Anderson said it appears that Irving issued the alert because officials ran out of other options.

"The Irving people will certainly have a chance to explain their thought process," he said. "We'll see where it leads us."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Chabad Fight Goes To Court (MH)

By Todd Wright

The Miami Herald, July 3, 2006

Hollywood is expected to ask a federal judge today for more time to settle a religious discrimination lawsuit brought against the city by an Orthodox synagogue.

Jury selection is scheduled to start at 9 a.m. before Judge Joan Lenard in U.S. District Court in Miami.

The city last week offered a last-minute deal to end the five-year dispute with the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch. Now, the congregation wants time to consider the offer.

Even if the settlement is accepted, Hollywood leaders may face a fresh round of lawsuits -- this time from neighbors concerned that the deal would allow the synagogue to expand without their input or city approval.

"The point is to end this litigation, not start 10 more lawsuits," said Commissioner Peter Bober, who supports the latest deal. ``How are we not liable to all these other property owners?"

The proposal now on the table would give the Chabad $2 million and allow it to remain in the homes at 2215 and 2221 N. 46th Ave. -- with some restrictions on expansion.

Under the agreement, the synagogue would be allowed to buy only three more lots in a two-block area to expand and build whatever it wants. Initially, the Chabad had wanted to be able to buy as many lots as it needed, without any restriction.

Some 40 homes are located in that two-block area.

Rabbi Joseph Korf said the congregation may consider a day care, school or parking lot.

Chabad leaders agreed to consider the deal and ask Lenard for a delay this morning.

NEIGHBORS UNHAPPY

But neighboring homeowners say the city's deal -- allowing the Chabad to expand without regard to existing zoning rules -- subjects them to noise and traffic without giving them a chance to object.

Even City Attorney Dan Abbott said residents could claim the city never gave them the opportunity to voice their opinion on how a neighboring property impacts theirs.

Already, several homeowners have threatened legal action.

"The whole thing about neighborhoods is the protection you have around your house," said Christie DeMinico, president of the Hollywood Hills Civic Association. ``We trusted the city to make the right judgment call on special exception and how it will impact the neighborhood. They have taken the protection away."

Homeowners are concerned that a settlement with the Chabad could give religious groups the right to locate and expand in neighborhoods, with little worry about restrictions, said Charles Vollman, president of the Hollywood Council of Civic Associations.

"What affects one neighborhood," he said, ``affects all of our neighborhoods."

Several homeowners associations want the city to take Chabad to trial, which could cost taxpayers millions if Hollywood should lose.

Currently, about 70 religious groups hold the special permit needed to operate a house of worship in a single-family district.

The most recent settlement proposal is the latest twist in a dispute that started in 2001, when neighbors complained about noise, trash and illegally parked cars at the synagogue.

SUITS, COUNTERSUITS

The disagreement led to a series of lawsuits, with the synagogue charging discrimination. The U.S. Justice Department joined in on the side of the congregation.

On June 23, in a last-minute effort to settle the matter before going to court, city leaders offered the synagogue the right to stay in the houses temporarily, until they could come up with new rules allowing houses of worship in residential areas.

The Chabad rejected the city's deal, calling instead for the right to stay in the houses permanently, then asking for a $2 million settlement.

The congregation also wanted the right to expand without restrictions.

On June 26, when the lawsuit hearing opened in U.S. District Court, attorneys for both sides said everyone -- city leaders and the Chabad -- had signed off on the Chabad's version of the proposed settlement.

Lenard postponed the trial, with the understanding that an agreement had been worked out.

Later that day, in a separate portion of the case, Lenard ruled that the city's requirements for granting permits for houses of worship in residential neighborhoods are unconstitutional.

She also ruled that the Chabad has a right to stay permanently in the two homes, and that the congregation was entitled to monetary damages.

What followed was massive confusion at City Hall.

Mayor Mara Giulianti said she never agreed to Chabad's version of the settlement.

The Chabad's lawyers went back to federal court, accusing the city of reneging.

At their meeting Wednesday, commissioners agreed to meet with Chabad leaders the next day to give negotiations another chance.

Lenard told both sides to be prepared for trial this morning.

La Tuna Inmates Say Prison Doesn't Follow Procedures (EPTIMES)

By Chris Roberts

El Paso Times, July 3, 2006

Inmates held at the various La Tuna federal prison facilities are convinced they have been denied visits, thrown in "the hole" for minor infractions and denied access to the prison law library because they went public with a lawsuit claiming the federal Bureau of Prisons isn't following its own procedures.

Requests for interviews with two of the inmates have been denied twice by La Tuna officials who said it was for the safety of the prisoners. By mail, those inmates have said they want to be interviewed. In that correspondence, they have claimed they are experiencing retaliation for their lawful actions.

"That's just simply not true," said La Tuna spokesman Israel Jacquez. "These guys went to the press. That's their right. ... If we believe a staff member is retaliating against an inmate, no matter how frivolous the allegation may be, it is referred to the office of internal affairs."

Wayne D. Beaman, special agent in charge of the Dallas Office of the Department of Justice's Office of the Inspector General,wouldn't comment on the specific allegations, but said, "La Tuna is a well-managed facility." The Dallas office oversees federal prisons in Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana and Arkansas, Beaman said.

The inmates' lawsuit claims that the Bureau of Prisons, or BoP, is ignoring its own policies when it houses prisoners in facilities with more severe security measures than are required by the inmates' classifications and when it houses inmates outside a 500-mile radius from the areas where they expect to be released.

However, a convict needs "rock-solid proof" to make a case against the BoP, said Jay Hurst, an attorney and chief of legislative affairs for FedCURE, an inmates' rights group. Hurst had a client in La Tuna -- he recently was transferred to another facility -- who also says he suffered retaliation.

"The Constitution doesn't apply in the federal system any more than it does in the state systems," Hurst said. "It's hard to make a case because you can't get records and you are relying on the testimony of a bunch of 'cons.' ... It's a system-wide culture. As long as the good order and security is preserved, that's what they care about."

Harassment

Lawrence J. Levine, convicted of possessing counterfeit securities and conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, filed the lawsuit for himself and others in the system. He and others, including Robert Carter, convicted of mail and tax fraud, have said they are being targeted by guards and administrators because of their actions.

Levine's lawsuit recently was dismissed by U.S. District Judge David Briones after it appeared Levine had failed to respond to a Bureau of Prisons motion to dismiss. However, Levine said he mailed the response and it was lost in the mail or intercepted. He has asked the judge to reopen the case.

Jacquez said the U.S. Attorneys Office is reviewing Levine's claim. Levine said prison officials also have been gradually limiting his access to the law library. Jacquez said everyone has to work their hours unless they can prove they have an impending court date.

"There is no preferential treatment," he said.

Levine said his work assignment originally was in food service because of medical issues, including bulging disks and a heart problem, which require limitations on the amount of walking, standing and lifting. That job allowed time to use the law library, he said.

He says he was switched to ground maintenance, which requires prolonged standing and walking on shifts that coincide with the law library's daytime hours. A week after stories about the lawsuit appeared in the media, Levine says, his education schedule was changed from daytime to evening hours, which limits his evening access.

Levine asked the judge to issue an order directing La Tuna staff to allow him unrestricted law library access, which he argues is required by BoP policies.

Carter says he was subjected to entrapment when he picked up a bag on the floor of the chapel -- which also serves as a visiting room -- containing two white T-shirts and a watch. Those items were labeled as "contraband" by BoP officials who apparently believed someone left it for him.

Carter said the bag wasn't his and said he was taken into custody by guards at the scene before he even had a chance to look inside.

Carter said he was put in the special housing unit, or the SHU, which some inmates call "the hole" because of the limited human contact they are allowed there. Documents Carter provided show he lost visits from the outside for eight months, and commissary privileges for 90 days. He said he was only allowed one 10-minute phone call each week. All this, he said, even though he had a clean record before the incident.

He is now at the La Tuna Federal Correctional Institute, which houses medium- and low-security inmates, requiring an even higher level of security than his previous La Tuna placement.

"He was sanctioned for a violation and subjected to disciplinary action," Jacquez said. "It was the introduction of contraband. ... There's no way he could be trusted out at the (low- and minimum-security) Biggs facility."

Treated like a criminal

The original inmate complaint involved placements with appropriate security levels.

Some prisoners, including Levine and Carter, were housed at a federal prison camp -- which is the least restrictive type of facility -- near Nellis Air Force Base, Nev. That facility was closed for budget reasons and they were transferred to the La Tuna Federal Satellite Low, or FSL, prison on Biggs Army Airfield. The FSL houses both minimum- and low-security inmates, which require a higher level of security.

The inmates say the bureau is ignoring its own stated mission of confining offenders in safe, humane and appropriately secure facilities that provide work and other self-improvement opportunities "to assist offenders in becoming law-abiding citizens."

They claim that transferring inmates to a higher security facility requires "a specific and compelling reason," which the BoP did not provide. They say these transfer policies are contained in the bureau's own Program Statements.

"We try to place inmates in facilities where they're all equal in classification," Jacquez said. "It has to do with length of sentence, type of crime, history of violence."

Jacquez said part of the reason Carter originally could have been transferred from the minimum-security camp in Nevada to the low-security facility at Biggs is that his sentence is "pretty heavy duty. He was fairly fortunate to be classified as minimum security."

Carter was sentenced to five years and 11 months and has a release date of June 19, 2010.

Budgets and beds

Hurst said he believes there is a case that the BoP didn't follow its stated policies, but, in his experience, it won't be easy to get a judge to agree.

With federal budget cuts and efforts to make the system more efficient, particularly in the Western region, prison officials have said bed space is at a premium and the policies can't always be followed. Jacquez said another satellite camp opening in Tucson will help relieve some of those problems.

"We might be able to refer a little closer" to the inmates' homes, he said.

The Biggs facility "used to be just a prison camp, but the BoP needed more space for low-security," Jacquez said. "It's rare that you're going to have a stand-alone prison for one group of inmates."

Every Biggs facility prisoner is subject to the security measures designed for low-security inmates, which are more strict than the minimum measures used at prison camps. The only way an inmate is rewarded is with time off for good behavior, Jacquez said. Otherwise it would be seen as preferential treatment, he said, which could single an inmate out for retribution from other inmates.

"You've got to treat all the inmates the same," Jacquez said. And to be placed at the Biggs facility, he said, they must have "very little history of disciplinary actions in prison."

Ostensibly, the purpose of those policies is to keep inmates connected with the more positive elements in society -- including family and friends -- and in the prison system so they don't leave prison more isolated, angry and educated in crime than when they entered.

Relatives, who often are traveling thousands of miles, have been turned away for triggering a drug screening device. Carter's wife, Ginny, who lives in Illinois, said she was turned away once and when she asked for documentation of the incident, the BoP responded that it had no records.

"It is disheartening and appalling to see how the prison staff use the ion spectrometer machine to deny visits to people who simply want to spend time with their loved ones," said Ginny Carter. "It appears that the machine is used both randomly and specifically when certain persons are targeted as I was."

Fallout Felt From Texas Redistricting Ruling (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

DALLAS -- Last week's Supreme Court ruling on the constitutionality of the 2003 Tom DeLay-led Texas redistricting coup was a distinct victory for the Republican Party, but it could spawn some interesting fallout.

There was only one instance in which the court said the Republican gerrymandering could not be upheld -- District 23, which sprawls from San Antonio to far West Texas. The court criticized the redrawing of a second district, District 25, which meanders from Austin to the Mexican border, and said it expected that district would be somewhat redrawn.

Despite the fact that the redrawing of district lines took months to accomplish -- resulting in the defeat of a half-dozen Democratic congressional incumbents throughout the state -- a panel of judges overseeing the changes is making sure they are determined well before this November's elections.

Within hours of the ruling, a federal judge from Texas' Eastern District ordered that all participants in the lawsuit claiming that the Voting Rights Act had been violated must have new maps and arguments submitted to the court within two weeks. Oral arguments are scheduled for Aug. 3 in Austin.

In making District 23 voter alignment comply with the Voting Rights Act, some predict that several additional districts will have to be retooled.

"Anyone who thinks there isn't going to be a ripple effect when countless counties are traded with other congressional districts is not seeing the big picture," said Rep. Henry Bonilla, the current District 23 congressman.

Despite slight realignment in several other districts to make the Bonilla district acceptable, the new map is not expected to alter the course of growing Republicanism throughout Texas. The worst that could happen from the Republican viewpoint, several political analysts say, is that Mr. Bonilla might lose the reconstituted 23rd District.

Most Hispanics in Texas still vote Democratic, and Mr. Bonilla has not been overly effective at courting them. However, he has repeatedly predicted he will win his seat again, if by a smaller margin.

The Republican redistricting effort in 2003, strongly guided by Mr. DeLay, reconfigured District 23 to protect Mr. Bonilla, who had barely eked out a victory against Laredo Democrat Henry Cuellar in 2002.

It shifted about 100,000 Hispanic voters in Webb County -- Mr. Cuellar's stronghold -- out of Mr. Bonilla's 23rd District to a newly configured district to the east of Laredo, the 28th.

Though the court said the dilution of Hispanic voters from Mr. Bonilla's district was unlawful, it did not suggest how the situation should be rectified.

Both Mr. Bonilla and Mr. Cuellar prefer that they not be thrown in the same district.

"Laredo is not the only magical place where you can get Hispanic voters," Mr. Cuellar said last week.

Meanwhile, Democrat Lloyd Doggett, of the 25th District, expects there will be major changes in his district also.

"I don't think this is a matter of mere tweaking," he said.

The Flag Fetish (WSJ)

By Christopher Hitchens

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

The night before my interview for American citizenship, I suddenly decided that it was too long since I had read the Constitution. Taking it down from the shelf (I am not one of those who makes a fetish of carrying it around on my person) I found myself staying up much later than the vestigial civics exam would have required of me. To turn these pages is to revisit the record of American history. It's also a bit like viewing a cross-section of mammalian evolution, as a clumsy creature gradually acquires the needful adaptations.

The original three-fifths rule was never really designed for flight, but some wings and feathers (and talons) are then added by those amendments that abolish slavery. There are backslidings -- the attempt to impose Prohibition -- and there are the fossilized records of political vendetta, such as the limitation of presidencies to two terms. I have some personal favorite details, such as the provision that forbids office-holders from accepting any titles or decorations from foreign potentates. And I've never quite understood why increases in congressional pay should require an amendment of their own. But to speak generally, it can be said that the Constitution is written with admirable force and clarity, with remarkably few weasel-words and with a great respect for citizens who desire a document that is both intelligible, flexible and authoritative. With fascination and emotion, as if reading by candlelight, one watches the fledgling gradually become an eagle. The King James Bible to one side, the Constitution is probably the greatest document ever composed by a committee.

It is of course designed to be amended and made more spacious, and many brave people fought and died to make this point. But it should never be burdened with anything trivial or transient, such as the zeal of certain Calvinists to ban alcohol, or the horror of certain other people at the idea of homosexual weddings. And this, it seems to me, is part of the reason why the so-called "flag-burning" amendment should never be allowed to waste any more congressional time.

I would perhaps be suspected of excess Fourth-of-July zeal if I said that the First Amendment is my life as well as the source of my living, but I swear that it would not be that far from the truth. No other country has such a terse and comprehensive statement of the case for free expression: considered important enough to rank first, and also to rank with the freedom of religious conscience. The jewel in the crown of the Bill of Rights does not say that Congress shall make no hasty or crowd-pleasing law abridging the right of assembly and protest. It stoutly insists that Congress shall make no such law.

Thus, it does not matter at all which opinion, or which "sensitivity," is being outraged. The uttermost limit of contempt for America, or American foreign policy, is evidently the vandalizing (and, mindful of the careful neutrality of the Constitution regarding religion, let us not say "desecration") of the stars and stripes. Shall we then say that expression is protected only until it reaches its symbolic limit? What could be more absurd? It is precisely because the flag is so important to some people that we must permit its trashing by others. To legislate otherwise would be to instate a taboo, and that is exactly what the First Amendment exists to forestall.

Of course there are various more pragmatic ways of ridiculing the flag-fetishists. This ponderous "cure" is in response to exactly what "disease"? Like a good number of today's "left," the supporters of the amendment are still living in the '60s. (And even in that incendiary time, the great American socialist Norman Thomas proposed that the flag be publicly washed, not publicly ignited.) Foreign crowds may still torch the flag with impunity, but domestic ones now prefer to represent the president of the United States in full Nazi regalia. I dare say Mr. Bush can stand it; in any event the Constitution says that he has to. As to the myriad other forms in which flags are misused, from album covers to headbands and tattoos, we may as well face the fact that, as the patron of globalization, our country has had to see its emblem become to some extent a logo. No law could even attempt to contain this without becoming richly farcical. And the future possibilities of satire are themselves protected from any prior restraint.

When it was proposed that my apartment building in Washington, D.C., display Old Glory after Sept. 11, 2001, I was not at all opposed but did express a misgiving. What about the day when the flag becomes tattered and drooping, and it's nobody's particular job to take care of it? (You can all think of a comparable example, from a ragged flag on a truck to a half-vanished flag decal on a taxi.) There is nothing more dispiriting than the ebb of such a tide. If I find that I have stuck a flag-stamp on an envelope and accidentally put it on upside-down, I admit with slight embarrassment that I now start over with a new envelope. Nobody would ever notice my tiny disrespect, but I still won't commit it. However, the whole case would be altered if I was told that I had to get it right. The flag would no longer stand for the constitutional spirit that gives it meaning in the first place. It may once have waved over hellish plantations but it was also defended to the end by the Maine regiment at Little Round Top. Without ambiguities and ironies, it would not be what it is. And ambiguity and irony are just what the flag-fetishists do not understand.

If they did have any concept of historical and political irony, they would surely be repelled by at least some of the senators who affected to take their side. You may believe if you choose that Hillary Clinton has abruptly decided to stand between her country's star-spangled banner and its unsleeping enemies. I cannot quite shake the feeling that she is instead putting the flag between herself and her potential critics. Is it this kind of degraded election-year parody that the sponsors of the proposal seriously wanted to encourage? In Iraq, our most desperate field of battle, our troops do not display the flag on patrol because they are in someone else's country. No thinking soldier needs to have this explained to him, or her. But in Washington, the alleged "defense" of the flag depends, for its swing-votes, on people whose very stock-in-trade is cowardice. That ought never to have happened, and is an insult to those who serve, and ought not be permitted to happen again.

It's easy enough to boast that "these colors do not run." However, those who mistake the symbol for the essence are manifesting not a show of spirit for the former but a pathetic lack of confidence in the latter.

Mr. Hitchens is a columnist for Vanity Fair. His most recent book is "Thomas Jefferson: Author of America" (HarperCollins, 2006).

Flagging Rhetoric (WP)

THERE ARE TWO things to be thankful for in the recent flag waving over flag burning. The first and most important is that this politically timed effort to amend the First Amendment failed in the Senate, albeit by a single vote. The second is that the threatened four days of more-patriotic-than-thou chest-thumping were truncated to two -- which was two more than the Senate ought to have spent on this phony issue.

As these kinds of amendments tend to do, the flag-burning debate managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. Take, for example, the smarmy statement put out by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) after the amendment's defeat.

"Old Glory lost today," Mr. Frist said, starting on a low note and heading lower. "At a time when our armed services are defending America's freedom in the war on terror, it's unfortunate that a minority of my colleagues blocked this amendment." We don't know which is more repugnant: Mr. Frist's cynical invocation of troops "defending America's freedom" as an excuse for limiting freedom of speech or his insinuation that it was dirty filibuster-like tactics that killed the amendment when, in fact, the Constitution requires a two-thirds vote.

The majority leader went on to inveigh against the "activist Supreme Court decision" that invalidated flag-burning laws. Perhaps Mr. Frist should read the ruling -- or at least take a look at the lineup. Among the "activists" in the five-justice majority was archconservative Justice Antonin Scalia.

Not that Mr. Frist's Democratic counterpart, Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), was exactly a profile in courage on this issue. "I don't think it's the right time to bring up the issue," Mr. Reid said. So why break with the majority of his party to support it? "I'm confident it won't pass," Mr. Reid explained. There's a principled stand.

If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, "No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that."

Too bad 66 fellow senators (52 Republicans and 14 Democrats) don't think so.

Kosher Slaughterhouses Investigated By Feds (APP/AP)

Asbury Park Press, July 3, 2006

MELVILLE, N.Y. — The federal government is investigating kosher slaughterhouses and suppliers for possible antitrust practices, according to a lawyer for one of the firms.

DOJ_NMG_0038500

AgriProcessors Inc., the world's largest kosher slaughterhouse, received a grand jury subpoena requesting documents and was cooperating with the investigation, attorney Nathan Lewin said Friday.

"It has been told that neither the corporation, nor any corporate officer or employee is presently a target of the investigation," Lewin said in a statement.

It was not immediately clear exactly how many slaughterhouses and suppliers were involved in the probe.

The U.S. Department of Justice did not immediately return a phone call for comment from The Associated Press late Friday. A telephone number listed for AgriProcessors Inc. was out of service Saturday.

Based in Postville, Iowa, AgriProcessors employs about 700 people. Trained rabbis at the plant slaughter cows at a rate of about one every three minutes. The meat is sold under the brands Iowa's Best Beef, Rubashkin's and Aaron's Best.

The slaughterhouse became the focus of controversy two years ago when People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, or PETA, made public an undercover videotape showing steers walking or bellowing up to three minutes after their throats were slit.

The group claimed the video proved the animals were conscious and victims of cruel and inhumane treatment.

Company officials have said that the video depicted only the involuntary movements animals make after death.

Merger Machine Keeps Churning Out Deals (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

A strong first quarter for mergers continued in the second quarter, as deals rolled in from seemingly every sector: banks, stock exchanges, oil companies, real-estate firms and consumer-products companies. It was one of history's largest and most diverse corporate-buying sprees, with nearly $1 trillion in deals around the world.

The frenetic deal-making produced the third most-active quarter since Thomson Financial began keeping track in 1985. It amounted to more than $916 billion of announced transactions, according to Thomson, up about 35% from about $676 billion a year earlier.

World-wide deal volume in the latest three months trailed only the inflated totals of late 1999 and 2000, during the stock-market bubble. It beat the record set in this year's first quarter of $914 billion. The numbers in the U.S. also were impressive, with total volume of $369 billion, up 25% from the year-earlier total of $294 billion.

In the first half of the year, global deal-making moved at a clip of $1.83 trillion, up 43% from last year and on pace to make 2006 the most active year ever, based on noninflation-adjusted dollars. When controlling for inflation, 2006 is on pace to be the third most-active year after 1999 and 2000.

"Even factoring in the tech bubble, our [mergers and acquisitions] backlog is the strongest in history," said Boon Sim, U.S. merger head for Credit Suisse Group. "With the Fed's recent remarks on interest rates," he said, referring to indications from the Federal Reserve that interest rates won't go much higher, "we can expect things to remain pretty healthy for the near future."

For deal makers and deal junkies, the quarter brought a bounty of notable milestones: Thirteen transactions valued at more than $10 billion; headline-grabbing cross-border transactions such as the NYSE Group Inc.'s $10.2 billion bid for Euronext NV, of Amsterdam, and a high-stakes battle over Toronto mining companies Inco Ltd. and Falconbridge Ltd. that started when Inco announced plans to acquire Falconbridge last October. A competing bid for Falconbridge and two bids for Inco were announced in the latest quarter.

Deal-making continued through the last day of the three-month period, with Blackstone Group's $4.3 billion offer for the Travelport travel-services unit of Cendant Corp. And late Friday, Michaels Stores Inc. announced that it accepted a more than $6 billion takeover bid from a private-equity group including Bain Capital and Blackstone Group. That deal came too late to be included in Thomson Financial's calculations for the quarter.

Like the first quarter, the center of the deal making in the latest period wasn't the U.S., but Europe. A series of cross-border combinations continued the first quarter's pattern. Abertis Infraestructuras SA, of Barcelona, Spain, agreed in April to purchase Italian toll-road operator Autostrade SpA, of Rome, for about $16 billion. In May, AXA SA, of Paris, agreed to buy the Winterthur insurance unit of Credit Suisse Group, of Zurich, for nearly $10 billion. They joined a series of massive deals that stand to unite some of the biggest companies on the Continent, such as French state-owned gas company Gaz de France's $40 billion bid for French-Belgian utility Suez SA in the first quarter.

Cross-border mergers and acquisitions surged to about 40% of total deal volume, or $685 billion-plus of transactions year-to-date, according to data from Citigroup. In just the first five months of this year, the volume of international deals already was greater than full-year totals for 2001 through 2004.

The weakening and volatile stock market failed to deter the deal making. Steven Baronoff, Merrill Lynch's global-mergers chief points to a few fundamental changes supporting the wave of acquisitions. Hedge funds are forcing companies to put themselves on the block by agitating for corporate changes that would increase stock prices. From there, private-equity funds -- flush with billions of dollars to invest -- are scooping up the prey.

Private-equity funds are proving to be the ballast of the overall market, willing to inject capital into all kinds of deals, including the pending $13.55 billion acquisition of Houston oil-pipeline operator Kinder Morgan Inc., announced in late May. There, a group of private-equity investors including Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, the Carlyle Group and its Riverstone Holdings affiliate and American International Group Inc., along with Kinder Morgan Chief Executive and Founder Richard Kinder assembled cash and debt to propose the second-largest private-equity transaction ever.

Acquisitions involving private-equity firms surged 51% in the first half to about $335 billion, according to data provider Dealogic, from $222 billion in the first six months 2005. Private-equity transactions represent about 18% of all merger-and-acquisition activity world-wide, roughly in line with a trend that has been building since the end of 2003.

"This market is fundamentally different than in prior expansion periods," said Louis Friedman, global chairman of mergers and acquisitions at Bear Stearns Cos. "These huge pools of private capital are consistently able to compete with strategic, corporate buyers."

That was clear when Cerberus Capital Management announced in April a $7.85 billion transaction to purchase a controlling stake in General Motors Corp.'s financing arm, General Motors Acceptance Corp. In this complex deal, large banks largely steered clear, letting private investors take on the risk of the transaction.

There are plenty of reasons to be cautious. Rising interest rates, greater competition for deals and some more adventurous combinations -- such as Phoenix mining company Phelps Dodge Corp.'s audacious $35 billion, three-way deal involving both Inco and Falconbridge -- show that the market is getting frothier.

"There is one thing you can say for sure," said George Bilicic, a managing director at Lazard Ltd. "There will be deals that destroy value. There always are. And people have to be careful."

When corporations and private equity are competing for deals, "something has to give," said Paul J. Taubman, global head of mergers and acquisitions at Morgan Stanley. "You will probably see premiums [over current stock prices] start to trend upward."

For now, though, it appears that general conditions will support a sustained merger boom, which is good news for the investment banks and lawyers who assemble the transactions. Based on calculations by Thomson Financial, nearly all the investments banks are raking in higher revenue than last year.

On Wall Street, Goldman Sachs Group Inc. continued its dominance over the merger business in the first half, advising on more than $660 billion of transactions globally. The second slot went to Citigroup Inc., which has picked up momentum since being ranked sixth at the same time last year. Citigroup worked on a third of the deals valued at $5 billion or more during the quarter, and 40% of these large transactions year-to-date.

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. came in third. Morgan Stanley was fourth, after a slow start to the year. It appears to be on pace to regain its usual place among the top two or three by the year end. Merrill Lynch & Co. took fifth place, after working on some of the largest transactions, especially in Europe.

Perhaps the most surprising finish was Evercore Partners Inc., a New York boutique firm that ranks sixth this year among advisers on U.S. deals, a notable accomplishment for an operation that is considerably smaller than its big-bank competitors.

Among legal advisers, the top five firms as measured by dollar volume for the year to date are: Sullivan & Cromwell LLP; Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP; Simpson Thacher & Bartlett LLP, all of New York; London's Linklaters; and New York's Wachtell Lipton Rosen & Katz.

Street Sleuth Countdown Starts For Satellite Giant (WSJ)

By Andy Pasztor

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

Consolidation and cost cutting have swept across the commercial-satellite industry, but surviving operators are finding growth opportunities as elusive as ever.

Intelsat Ltd. and PanAmSat Holding Corp. are set to complete a $3.2 billion merger today, creating a closely held company whose fleet of more than 50 orbiting spacecraft will make it the largest and most diversified global satellite-services operator. The transaction is the end game of three years of intense deal making by prominent private-equity firms on both sides of the Atlantic. The combined company's performance will show how effective the private owners will be in balancing cost cutting with creative investments and strategies for boosting revenue and profit over the long haul.

With offerings that include direct-to-home television broadcasting and support for classified U.S.-government operations, the enlarged Intelsat has promised to shrug off the industry's staid image by exploiting burgeoning technologies. Investors who just purchased some $3 billion in high-yield bonds from the two firms will demand significant synergies, little geographic overlap and streamlined management bent on revving up growth in unconventional ways, if necessary.

But a close look at the business shows how tough it will be to meet those demands. In an industry with huge capital-investment needs and average annual growth rates hovering around 3% or less, the combined company faces major integration, personnel and marketing challenges to break out of that historical slow-growth pattern.

Indeed, before Apax Partners & Co. and the other private-equity owners of Intelsat bid for PanAmSat last August, they agonized over whether the satellite industry could produce the growth rates such investors typically expect. There is reason for concern: In the past, PanAmSat has had to rely on small bits of revenue from specialty consulting contracts -- a minor part of its business -- to meet closely watched revenue guidance for a particular quarter.

The combining companies insist they can make a go of it: "This is not going to be satellite operations as usual," incoming Chairman Joseph Wright vowed during an industry conference earlier this year. Mr. Wright has advocated investments that blur the line between space and ground-based systems to better serve consumers. PanAmSat is even experimenting with distributing ethnic programming it owns to various cable-TV systems.

Wall Street, while recognizing the benefits of fresh investment dollars, has doubts about satellite-industry strategy.

The emergence of private-equity groups as owners has created "a much larger field of banks willing to participate" in satellite debt and equity offerings, according to Carol Goldstein, head of telecommunications and media at ABN Amro Inc. But Heidi Wood, an analyst at Morgan Stanley, said many remain skeptical about space projects.

PanAmSat of Wilton, Conn., posted revenue of $213.2 million, up 2.1%, for the first quarter. Intelsat, which is based in Bermuda but has its headquarters in Washington, reported a 4% drop in overall revenue to $280.4 million.

The new company is betting big on expanding its business in India and Latin America. At the same time, it hopes to participate in the drive to turn cellular phones and other mobile devices into Internet connections and entertainment centers. With phone and cable rivals maneuvering to tap many of the same markets, satellite firms are searching for novels ways to expand their reach.

The biggest immediate financial boost is likely to come from a nearly 40% cut in the combined company's work force, a process that is under way but will take as long as 18 months to play out. Total head count eventually will dive to about 1,000 from 1,400 or so, with PanAmSat executives largely overseeing marketing efforts and Intelsat officials primarily in charge of technical and operating issues.

Mr. Wright, who served as PanAmSat's chief executive, said last week that early personnel decisions will make it easier for the combination for proceed. "The major cuts have been made on the front end," he said, with the aim of easing employee uncertainty and boosting the morale of those who are staying.

David McGlade, Intelsat's chief executive, who will keep the same title at the merged company, stressed in a separate interview that sustainable growth is the company's ultimate goal rather than cost cutting. That means smarter, smaller bets on new markets, combined with "a lot more discipline than either company has had before," he added.

For the next quarter or two, however, some veteran insiders anticipate lackluster results. Combined year-over-year revenue may be flat or even take a dip, they predict, as integration efforts sap momentum from marketing campaigns and other sales initiatives.

The satellite companies that succeed will have to avoid the mistakes of the 1990s, when "indiscriminate cash was thrown" at economically flawed projects, said Andrew Sukawaty, chief executive of Inmarsat Ltd., which provides satellite services to ships and other mobile users.

Intelsat To Get Much Bigger, But Not Yet Profitable (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

Intelsat Ltd. of Washington is to become the world's largest commercial satellite operator today when it completes its purchase of the firm that had been its toughest domestic competitor.

The deal to buy longtime rival PanAmSat Holding Corp. creates a company that will carry about a quarter of the world's commercial satellite-delivered television programming on a fleet of 51 satellites and can reach 99 percent of the world's populated areas with communications services.

Intelsat and PanAmSat had flirted with a merger before, but each time the rivalry between the two proved to be too deep to make a deal.

Last August, the companies worked out their differences and settled on a $6.4 billion acquisition, which included the assumption by Intelsat of about $3.2 billion worth of PanAmSat's debt. If the deal closes as scheduled today, PanAmSat will become a wholly owned subsidiary of Intelsat, and its stock-ticker symbol will disappear from the New York Stock Exchange.

The combined company will lose money. PanAmSat earned $72.7 million last year, but Intelsat lost far more, about $325 million. Already deep in debt, Intelsat is borrowing heavily to finance the purchase.

Intelsat chief executive David McGlade said that given the level of debt and interest payments, the company does not expect to become profitable in the foreseeable future. He said the company's investors have been pleased with Intelsat's positive cash flow and its heavy backlog of orders.

Intelsat executives said the merger, approved by government officials from several agencies, consolidates companies with different strengths at a time they expect demand for satellite services to grow rapidly.

The traditional core of Intelsat's business has been telecommunications, a rough arena in recent years. The combined company will be more diverse with the addition of PanAmSat media and entertainment customers such as the British Broadcasting Corp., News Corp., Time Warner Inc. and the Walt Disney Co. PanAmSat also gives Intelsat expanded reach worldwide.

"Scale is important in this industry. Customers increasingly want global coverage," McGlade said.

Intelsat has its operating headquarters in a distinctive building on Connecticut Avenue, from which it controls its satellites. Its corporate headquarters are in Bermuda.

The company was born in 1964 as an intergovernmental organization that provided satellite communications services worldwide. It has been a privately owned corporation since 2001.

Together, Intelsat and PanAmSat would have had $2 billion in revenue for the 12 months ended in March, with about $8.3 billion in pending contracts for the next 15 years.

Even though Intelsat has now acquired its main domestic rival, the competition is far from over. The company still has many competitors overseas, some of which are deeply entrenched in their parts of the world.

"Intelsat and PanAmSat are a good match. But I don't believe it's going to create a huge, dominant player in the industry," said Patrick M. French, a senior analyst with NSR LLC, a satellite industry research company. "At the end of the day, it's still a very regional market."

Intelsat is the largest supplier of commercial satellite services to the U.S. government, doing business with the Defense Department, the State Department and other agencies that the company won't disclose. Its government business, about 15 percent of its total, is run separately from the rest of the company and has its own board of directors, whose names are kept secret.

After the deal closes, the company's management team will include several former PanAmSat executives, including James B. Frownfelter, PanAmSat's president, who will become Intelsat's chief operating officer. Joseph R. Wright Jr., PanAmSat's former chief executive, will become chairman of Intelsat's board.

McGlade said the two companies will fully integrate over the next 18 months. About 400 of the combined company's 1,400 employees will lose their jobs, including some now based in Washington.

An Exodus Of Agents (TIME)

By Brian Bennett And Adam Zagorin

Time, July 3, 2006

Office birthday parties must make FBI Director Robert Mueller a little nervous these days. Consider his No. 2, John Pistole, who hits retirement age when he turns 50 this month. For weeks rumors bubbled up to the seventh floor of the FBI's headquarters at the J. Edgar Hoover Building in Washington: Pistole was going to bolt for a lucrative job in the private sector. The whispers got so loud that Pistole took it upon himself to assure Mueller that he wasn't leaving. One reason he gave: it wouldn't be right to split when so many other senior officials have headed for the exits.

Years of pummeling by the press and Congress, plus wrenching changes produced by the bureau's shift in focus to antiterrorism, have depressed morale, even in the highest ranks. That has coincided with lucrative employment offers to agents from firms desperate for experienced security chiefs in the wake of 9/11. On July 15, just weeks after his 50th birthday, acting executive assistant director for law-enforcement services Chris Swecker is to leave for a new job as head of global security for Bank of America, where he will earn a reported $600,000, more than triple what he makes as the FBI's No. 3. Better pay isn't the only motivation--one former senior FBI manager says he quit after tiring of the "constant berating" he got from lawmakers when briefing Congress. "All these factors play into a decision to leave: family, finances, burnout, pressure, criticism," he says. "You've worked your a__ off. Eventually you say, Hey, the heck with this."

The turnover has hit some of the most vital positions in the bureau hierarchy. In five years, six different people have moved through the post of counterterrorism chief, overseeing what has been the FBI's core mission since 9/11. And June 2 was the last day for 29-year veteran Gary Bald, 52, who retired just 10 months after being tapped to start up the FBI's new National Security Branch. He's taking a security job with Royal Caribbean Cruises.

Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have been debating whether the brain drain at the FBI poses a threat to national security. "The FBI cannot be a revolving door for senior managers," says Senator Chuck Grassley. "It needs stability in these important positions to fight in the war on terror."

Mueller seems to agree. When promoting agents to senior-executive levels, he "is trying to extract some promise as to how long they are willing to stay," says Michael Mason, who runs the administrative side of the FBI. Grassley suggested to TIME that "the FBI needs to appeal to the patriotic spirit of its senior managers." But beyond that, the bureau is offering few tangible perks to make working there more attractive. Nor will the jobs be getting easier--Mason says new recruits should expect to be rotated around the country and the world, even if it means uprooting their families, a practice that, for budgetary reasons, had waned in recent years.

Mason, however, is optimistic that the new generation of agents will make the sacrifices necessary for the job. At the Washington field office, he notes, 65% of the new recruits last year had taken pay cuts from previous jobs to work at the FBI.

Despite New Allegations, Blagojevich Says Misconduct Is Limited (CHIT/AP)

By F.n. D'alessio, Associated Press Writer

Chicago Tribune, July 3, 2006

CHICAGO -- Gov. Rod Blagojevich insisted Saturday that misconduct in his administration is limited to isolated events by people who are soon punished, even though his own inspector general found a top Blagojevich aide took part in a "concerted effort" to subvert the law.

"As you police the system, every so often you're going find some people who violate the rules. The test of leadership is what do you do about it? Do you act and do you pursue it? Do you work with other law enforcement agencies to ferret more of it out?" he said. "Those are the things we've been doing."

His comments came one day after the release of a letter saying that a yearlong federal investigation had produced credible witnesses related to hiring fraud at multiple state agencies.

And the Chicago Tribune reported that Blagojevich's former inspector general, Zaldwaynaka "Z" Scott, found that the governor's patronage chief had worked with the Illinois Department of Employment Security to manipulate state hiring.

Joe Cini, head of the Governor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, worked with personnel officials at the Department of Employment Security to manipulate job titles, candidate credentials and job descriptions to aid jobseekers sponsored by the governor's office, Scott concluded.

"This effort reflects not merely an ignorance of the law, but complete and utter contempt for the law," Scott wrote in a Sept. 9, 2004, report obtained by the Tribune.

Scott, who resigned a year ago to join a private law firm, found "a concerted effort to subvert the laws including veterans' preference and the hiring process" for jobs that are supposed to be insulated from politics.

Blagojevich said he was not concerned about her blistering criticism of Cini.

"In fact, that's a good sign," he said at a news conference. "Again, that shows we're not even afraid to police people, you know, who are working for us who have responsibilities."

Cini and his aides received additional training on hiring law, as Scott had recommended. Some personnel at the Department of Employment Security were fired, said a Blagojevich spokeswoman.

Blagojevich said his administration has referred some misconduct allegations to the U.S. attorney for possible prosecution. He did not say whether the report on Cini was sent to federal authorities.

The Democratic governor has been hit with a series of revelations about possible misconduct in the way he hands out state jobs and contract. The disclosures create a huge political obstacle for someone who was elected on a promise to clean up state government and now is asking voters for a second term.

Blagojevich acknowledges he has been interviewed by the FBI. Prosecutors have issued subpoenas for hiring records and other information from state agencies, but Blagojevich won't say which agencies.

The administration -- after a list surfaced to prove the practice -- admitted it keeps track of jobseekers and their politically influential sponsors. Another list obtained by The Associated Press showed the administration tracked, by name, hundreds of jobs and promotions that are supposed to be shielded from political considerations.

Then Illinois Attorney General Lisa Madigan released the letter confirming the federal investigation and providing details. In it, U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald says he is looking into "very serious allegations of endemic hiring fraud."

Jay Stewart, head of the watchdog Better Government Association, said the letter shows Fitzgerald is well beyond a preliminary review of the facts. He concludes Fitzgerald is conducting a broad, aggressive investigation like the ones into former Gov. George Ryan and Chicago Mayor Richard Daley's administration.

"Given what (Fitzgerald) has done, I would be surprised if there are not indictments," Stewart said.

As he has before, Blagojevich portrayed the hiring scandals as fallout from his efforts to change the way things are done in Springfield after 26 years of Republican governors.

Blagojevich noted that one of the changes is that every state employee must now understand the state's ethical standards and answer a series of questions about them.

"I just completed mine," he said, "and I'm happy to say I got every one right."

Watchdog Rips State Hiring (CHIT)

By Ray Long, Rick Pearson And John Chase, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, July 3, 2006

`This effort reflects not merely ignorance of the law, but complete and utter contempt for the law.' --Excerpt from report by governor's own inspector general

Nearly two years ago, Gov. Rod Blagojevich's inspector general issued a searing confidential rebuke that called the governor's patronage office "the real machine driving hiring" in one state agency for jobs that were supposed to be free of political influence.

The investigation concluded "the governor's office improperly exercised a great deal, if not all, control over the hiring" at the Illinois Department of Employment Security since shortly after the Democratic governor took office in January 2003.

The report said Blagojevich's patronage office--known formally as the governor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs--played a key role with compliant agency officials in subverting state laws that give veterans a preference in getting state employment and ban political considerations in hiring for most state jobs.

"This effort reflects not merely an ignorance of the law, but complete and utter contempt for the law," wrote Zaldwaynaka "Z." Scott, who served as Blagojevich's first executive inspector general under an ethics law he signed. Scott, who left the post to join a private law firm last year, said she could not comment on her report.

Details of the Sept. 9, 2004, report, obtained by the Tribune, have never before been made public. The inspector general's findings take on added significance after Friday's disclosure that U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald is looking into allegations of "endemic hiring fraud" within Blagojevich's administration.

Blagojevich said Saturday his office complied with disciplinary recommendations for employees made in the confidential inspector general's report. Publicly, Blagojevich has defended his top patronage aides and said he maintained that "qualifications, all the time," guided his system for hiring state workers.

"We're more than happy to have all of that referred to other agencies if there's wrongdoing," Blagojevich said. "Because as far as I'm concerned, I'm as determined as anybody else to make sure there is no wrongdoing in state government."

But the inspector general's report contended the governor's patronage office, whose head, Joe Cini, is under federal scrutiny, worked with Department of Employment Security personnel officials to manipulate job titles, candidate credentials and job descriptions to place applicants sponsored by the governor's office "without following state law or normal state hiring protocol."

"Evidence shows non-compliance with state hiring laws," the inspector general wrote. "In fact, it reveals a concerted effort to subvert the laws including veterans' preference and the hiring process" for jobs protected under a 1990 U.S. Supreme Court ruling known as the Rutan decision.

The report cites repeated violations of Rutan, which prohibits political influence in hiring, promotions and transfers for most state jobs.

The report's critique of the heavy involvement of Blagojevich's patronage office into hiring decisions occurred months before Fitzgerald launched his investigation into the administration and some of the governor's top patronage aides. Prosecutors detailed the criminal grand jury investigation in a March 2005 letter that was disclosed by the Tribune last fall.

Letter to attorney general

Fitzgerald provided the clearest context to date on the status of the yearlong federal probe in a letter to state Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan that was released Friday. Fitzgerald said his investigation involves "the alleged rigging of state employment practices to enable political hiring in violation of Rutan" and includes, "among other things, the preparation of fraudulent hiring documentation."

"Our investigation has now implicated multiple state agencies and departments and we have developed a number of credible witnesses," Fitzgerald said in thanking Madigan for turning over her own state investigation to the FBI and federal prosecutors.

The federal investigation into state hiring is taking place against the larger backdrop of the high-profile federal prosecution of alleged political hiring in Chicago's City Hall. Federal prosecutors have charged top city patronage aides with rewarding Mayor Richard Daley's loyal political workers with jobs in violation of another federal decree prohibiting political considerations in most city hiring.

The inspector general's report also was written four months before Blagojevich's estranged father-in-law, Ald. Richard Mell (33rd), alleged that the administration traded appointments on state boards and commissions for campaign cash. Mell later recanted the allegations under threat of a lawsuit, but Blagojevich has blamed Mell for the federal and state hiring investigations.

Blagojevich was questioned by federal authorities early in 2005, but he has said the issue involved Mell's allegations, which he called spurious.

On Saturday, Blagojevich said his legal counsel more than a year ago shared information with federal prosecutors and he has told them again to hand over everything to Fitzgerald's office. Blagojevich has said such investigations provide a chance to show "that we do things right."

Such comments contrast with a recommendation from the inspector general's findings on the Department of Employment Security, the federally funded agency in charge of jobless benefits.

"This administration has made many public statements critical of the way in which those seeking political gains have compromised systems," the inspector general wrote. "We urge a similar response to the issues raised in this report."

But it wasn't until May that the Blagojevich administration publicly conceded it had a problem in its hiring system, when it disclosed it had fired two personnel supervisors at the state's office-management agency, the Department of Central Management Services. The fired workers contend they were being made scapegoats for standing up to political intimidation from the governor's office.

On Friday, in response to the release of Fitzgerald's letter, a Blagojevich spokeswoman acknowledged in a statement that among the administration's hires after taking office in January 2003 were "some bad apples who violated the rules."

Yet the inspector general said after investigating hiring at the Department of Employment Security, "The evidence supports the conclusion that the real machine driving hiring decisions in the IDES HR department was the Governor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs rather than any professional management team in place in the agency."

The inspector general recommended that six employees at Employment Security be disciplined, "up to and including discharge for unethical and fraudulent activity." Three of those employees are still working for the department, including one who has been promoted since the report to become deputy director of administration.

Blagojevich and his administration have touted the work of his inspector general, under an ethics law he sought, as evidence of his reform credentials.

"Whether it's an employee that preceded my being there who came from one of my predecessors or whether it's somebody we hired, if they're doing something wrong and they're violating the rules, we act on what the inspector general suggests and recommends," Blagojevich said.

Though the inspector general's report portrayed the extensive and improper influence of Cini's office on hiring at the department, it only recommended "additional training" for him and his aides on state hiring laws. Scott, the inspector general at the time, would not comment on the rationale of her recommendation for Cini.

While saying "every so often some people make some mistakes and you correct those and you move forward," Blagojevich said he wasn't worried about the allegations against Cini because he received the recommended training.

"Again, that shows we're not even afraid to police people who are working for us who have responsibilities," he said.

Hiring procedures outlined

In describing the pervasive influence of Cini's office at the Department of Employment Security, inspector general investigators found a memo titled "Procedures for Hiring" at the agency. "Step one in the process is, `We receive resume from Governor's Office'" the inspector general's report said in quoting the memo. "Step nine is, `Information should be logged on one status report for the Governor's Office.'

"The process starts and ends with GOIA," the inspector general wrote, using the acronym for the governor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Investigators for the inspector general's office reported that when a new human resources director for the Department of Employment Security questioned some of the agency's own hiring practices, "Cini also said that the governor's office determines the hiring process, not the agency."

The inspector general noted that it did not investigate every hiring that occurred at the Department of Employment Security since Blagojevich took office. "Thus," the report said, "this sampling may not represent the entirety of the illegalities in hiring at IDES."

Governor, It's Mr. Fitzgerald (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, July 3, 2006

U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald guards news of what he's investigating as fiercely as mama grizzlies protect their cubs. So his disclosure that federal prosecutors are aggressively probing "very serious allegations of endemic hiring fraud" in Gov. Rod Blagojevich's administration is unexpected on one level, not completely shocking on another. The FBI and the office of Illinois Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan have been digging into reports of state hiring abuses since last year.

But Friday's disclosure that the feds have "implicated multiple state agencies and departments" in politically motivated hiring comes as Blagojevich must stand uneasily for re-election. Awarding state jobs to folks with political connections might strike most of us as business as usual, to borrow a phrase. But it would violate a 1990 U.S. Supreme Court decision that said most state hiring in Illinois has to be free of political influence. That's serious business to a prosecutor who's clearly determined to purge criminals from the Illinois culture of political sleaze.

Fitzgerald's revelations, contained in a letter to Madigan, cite the possibility of federal indictments of state officials. We're content to let the feds figure out what to do and when to do it. Fitzgerald routinely says his office brings prosecutions when the cases are ready, regardless of what's coming up on the calendar. Fitzgerald proved that by announcing the indictment of former Gov. George Ryan for public corruption on Dec. 17, 2003, eight days before Christmas.

We note this because, in barely five months, Illinois voters will elect their next governor. Those voters deserve what they didn't get in 1998 before Ryan was elected governor: a sense of the nature and sweep of a federal investigation. The issue then was the fetid swamp of corruption over which Ryan had presided as secretary of state.

What happens now, happens. Our hope, though, is that to the extent possible, the federal investigation of the Blagojevich administration either culminates or collapses before voters must make their quadrennial choice.

On Friday, the governor's office asserted that there were "some bad apples who violated the rules" among the officials who were hired to run state government after Blagojevich took office in 2003. "The systems we put in place in our first year helped ferret out this wrongdoing." That's hard to square with the disclosure in Sunday's Tribune that in 2004, Blagojevich's own inspector general said the involvement of the governor's patronage office in state hiring reflected "not merely an ignorance of the law, but complete and utter contempt for the law."

Here's the lovely thing about a full-bore FBI investigation with federal prosecutors evaluating evidence the agents unearth. The feds can assess Blagojevich's reassurance that "We do things right" in hiring state employees. Just as they'll no doubt assess the explosive 2004 report from his inspector general.

The bottom line here is ... well, the bottom line is yet to be written. Fitzgerald is keeping to his pattern of probing what he finds to be credible allegations of public corruption, whether they originate in state government, in Cook County or in Chicago's City Hall. And Madigan has correctly ceded her own probe to the feds, who have greater resources. Illinois doesn't need investigators tripping over one another.

What Illinois does need is an end to business as usual. To borrow a phrase.

Late Mobster's Ex-girlfriend A Key Witness (KCS)

By Tom Hays And Larry Mcshane

The Kansas City Star, July 3, 2006

NEW YORK - When Linda Schiro was just 16 years old, she was already a mistress to the mob. The Brooklyn teen hooked up with an older man, a veteran of the Colombo crime family, and they lived together for nearly three decades.

Gregory Scarpa Sr. was convicted of murder and racketeering and died in a Minnesota prison.

A dozen years later, Schiro has emerged as a key witness against an FBI agent accused in what a prosecutor has labeled one of the worst cases of law enforcement corruption in the nation's history.

The agent, R. Lindley DeVecchio, allegedly fed Schiro's late boyfriend inside information that led to four mob slayings - including hits against another mobster's girlfriend and a gangster turned born-again Christian.

But attorneys for DeVecchio say the longtime mob mistress lacks the credibility to implicate the former FBI agent. Her story has changed drastically over time, the defense says.

Authorities insist that Schiro's initial reluctance to detail the relationship between the agent and the mob capo was motivated by fears for her life. Only recently was she persuaded to tell the truth, they say.

Schiro met Scarpa in 1966 when she was 16. They quickly moved in together and shared the same home for 28 years - except when Scarpa was behind bars. The couple had two children.

DeVecchio was the head of the FBI's Colombo crime family squad and became Scarpa's handler when the mobster turned informer. During Scarpa's time as a mole, DeVecchio put together a 700-page informant file detailing their relationship, court papers showed.

Allegations about possible leaks from DeVecchio to Scarpa first surfaced after the mobster's June 1994 death from AIDS, contracted when he received a tainted blood transfusion. But the Department of Justice declined to prosecute DeVecchio following an internal investigation.

DeVecchio, now 65, retired to Florida in 1996. The former agent has pleaded not guilty to murder charges and is free on $1 million bond.

A law enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation remains open, said authorities approached Schiro two years ago after a private investigator turned up fresh evidence against DeVecchio.

Prosecutors persuaded Schiro to come clean about the relationship between the agent and Scarpa by promising relocation and police protection. "It was a matter of making her feel safe, telling her, 'You're not going to get whacked,'" the official said.

Court papers filed by the prosecution present a sinister relationship between Scarpa and DeVecchio.

The pair met once a week at Scarpa's home, where the agent accepted a roll of bills bound with a rubber band - the payoff for DeVecchio's tips from inside the FBI, according to an affidavit from Assistant District Attorney Ann Bordley.

The prosecutor maintains that Schiro has direct knowledge about the 1990 slaying of Patrick Porco, who with Scarpa's son Joey and two other suspects murdered a man outside a church in Brooklyn on Halloween 1989.

In May 1990, Schiro answered a phone call from DeVecchio, asking for Scarpa. The mobster had Schiro drive him to a pay phone, where he spoke with DeVecchio for about 10 minutes before returning to the car.

"I can't believe this (expletive) kid," Scarpa allegedly told Schiro. "Patrick is going to rat on Joey. We got to do something about this."

Porco, 18, was found the next morning on a Brooklyn street corner with a bullet in his head.

Suspect Pleads Guilty To Terrorism Hoax (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, July 3, 2006

A man accused in a terrorism hoax pleaded guilty in the case Friday and faces up to 41 months in prison.

Gilbert Romero, 31, pleaded guilty to "conveying false information about the use of a weapon of mass destruction against property in the United States" and making false statements to federal agents. Romero is to be sentenced by U.S. District Judge Elaine Bucklo Oct. 13.

Romero in June 2005 told the FBI that a terrorist attack was to be carried out against the Chicago headquarters of a U.S. company.

The claim came after Romero was detained in Lake County on state charges, according to his plea agreement.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Bill: GOP Firmly Against Amnesty (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

In response to your June 23 editorial "The Tancredo Republicans": You're correct that the Republican-led Congress should learn from the mistakes of the Democrats handling the crime bill in 1994 as it deals with the difficult issue of immigration. The then-Democrat-led Congress did pass a crime bill in 1994 -- and the voters rightfully responded by sending a Republican majority to Congress for the first time in 40 years. Speaker Tom Foley, House Judiciary Committee Chairman Jack Brooks, and numerous other senior Democrats were ousted by voters precisely because they passed a crime bill that the public didn't support.

House Republicans are committed to enacting border security and immigration legislation, but not if it makes the current situation worse. The upcoming hearings should help Congress understand the public's views on issues such as holding employers accountable who hire illegal workers and, as the Senate bill requires, whether the U.S. must consult with Mexico before the U.S. can secure the border by erecting more walls and fences.

House Republicans will diligently work with Democrats, the Bush administration, and the Senate to solve the enormous immigration problems, but will not support any bill that includes amnesty, weak border enforcement, weak interior enforcement, weak work site enforcement, or other provisions that the public doesn't support. In November, voters will judge members of Congress based upon whether they lead with an understanding of voters' concerns, as House Republicans are committed to doing, or whether they ignore voters by enacting legislation, such as the Senate amnesty bill, that the public doesn't support.

Winning On Immigration (NATLREVIEW)

By Kate O'Bierne
National Review, July 3, 2006

While talking to reporters about immigration reform recently, Sen. John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, floated a tantalizing option available to the House that would bedevil the Senate. "What if the House passed just the enforcement provisions of the Senate bill and sent it back to us?" Cornyn wondered aloud. When he was asked whether he'd vote for just those sections of the Senate's "comprehensive" bill, he replied with a chuckle, "I'd sure take a look at it." Later that week, House Republican leaders announced plans to hold hearings across the country on border security and on the most controversial provisions of a bill they have dubbed the "Reid-Kennedy" bill; and the "Border Security First Act" was introduced in the Senate by Pennsylvania Republican Rick Santorum.

In Washington's immigration-reform script, congressional Republicans have been cast as villains intent on blocking enlightened policies — but they are refusing to play the part of spoilers. They are instead spoiling for a fight they are confident they can win.

Rather than merely blocking action on a Senate bill they refuse to support, a unified House GOP caucus has decided to go on offense in order to wring the maximum political credit from being on the right side of their reading of public opinion. Because House Republicans fear the appearance of compromising with a Senate bill they are convinced is wildly unpopular, they have — according to a leadership aide — no intention of taking part in a conference to hammer out differences between the House and Senate unless "there is a sea change in either public or Senate opinion." The "Tancredo Republicans" the Wall Street Journal rails against as being out of touch with public sentiment include the majority of Republicans in the House and Senate. (Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican, is contemplating running for president on a border-security platform, hence the Journal's phrase.)

The White House is touting a recent poll commissioned by the Manhattan Institute claiming that likely Republican voters are clamoring for "comprehensive" reform, including "earned citizenship" for illegal aliens; Wall Street Journal editors profess to be unaware of any contradictory polling evidence of public sentiment. But congressional Republicans who will be facing the voters are firmly convinced that backing border security now will mean job security in November.

Senators Reid and Kennedy
Roman Genn

The mid-June Tarrance Group survey of likely Republican voters found that 75 percent favored tougher border security, a crackdown on employers who hire illegal workers, and earned legalization for illegal aliens. The survey asked respondents about a proposal under which current illegal aliens would have to pay a fine, pay taxes, learn English, and go to the back of the line before being granted citizenship. A House GOP leadership aide scoffed at the poll as providing what Republican members consider a misleading summary of the Senate plan. (For example, under the Senate's bill illegal aliens will form a wholly new line — one that permits them to remain legally in the U.S.)

The leadership aide explains that, in any case, the GOP members' position on this issue doesn't rest on poll results. He allows that politicians can sometimes misread the public mood, but says that "this time the mood is so overwhelming, they can't miss it." Voters aren't waiting for a pollster to call to express their views on illegal immigration. In phone calls, in writing, and in person they are letting their congressmen know where they stand. Even the more liberal members of the House GOP caucus grant that in the short term it's good politics to strongly oppose the Senate bill, even as they fret over the possible political effects a decade or so from now.

A Senate Republican aide flatly adds, “If it were true that 75 percent of Republican voters want an amnesty bill, Rick Santorum wouldn’t be introducing a border-security-only bill.” He noted that the embattled Santorum faces reelection in a “purple” state — a mixture of blue and red — where he hopes to appeal well beyond the conservative base.

The polls promoted by supporters of the Senate’s version of immigration reform typically don’t mention the issues House Republicans will be raising during their hearings this summer. Provisions of the White House–backed bill that the House GOP will be highlighting include in-state tuition for illegal aliens and the allowance of Social Security benefits for illegal workers based on their use of fraudulent documents. Some hearings will focus on the national-security risk posed by chaos at the border, the problem of voter fraud, and the importance of English fluency and assimilation. One influential conservative who advises House Republicans expects “the drumbeat of bad publicity against the Senate bill” to put the Bush administration on the defensive for the next couple of months.

Republicans anticipate that their hearings will prompt demonstrations calling for amnesty — which, according to the Tarrance poll, 57 percent of Republican voters define as allowing illegal aliens to apply for citizenship. The poll also found that 47 percent of those who were aware of previous “pro-immigration demonstrations” were “strongly less likely” to support amnesty.

In a battle of the dueling polls, House Republicans find support in an April survey of likely voters by McLaughlin & Associates. The poll tested alternative messages on border security and found 93 percent agreeing that “we have to regain control of our borders so that we are the ones deciding who enters our country,” and 84 percent agreeing that “we have to stop the flow of illegals before we address what to do about those who are already here.” Even the survey promoted by the White House found that when presented with a range of choices on how to handle the problem of 12 million illegal aliens living in the U.S., the largest percentage of likely GOP voters (65 percent) “strongly” favored a proposal that included only border security and workplace enforcement.

While support for legalization of illegal aliens and guest-worker programs depends on how questions are phrased and what details are omitted, the overwhelming support for controlling the border is indisputable. So rather than being intimidated with the need to back “comprehensive” reform, congressional Republicans confidently favor a “consensus” reform that would dramatically reduce illegal border crossings. Republicans argue that “border security first” would avoid the costly mistake made in the 1986 immigration reform that promised border enforcement but only delivered an amnesty that encouraged more illegal immigration.

If Senate majority leader Bill Frist permits a vote on Senator Santorum’s new bill — or if the House approves the border-security provisions of the Senate bill and returns them to the Senate — senators will have to decide whether they are willing to hold the border-security measures they claim to favor hostage to an amnesty program.

House Of (immigration) Blues (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

LAST WEEK SAW THE FIRST narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) announced that he'd be willing to stagger reform measures so that all enforcement issues were enacted first. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) seconded that motion and emphasized that the border was being strengthened. And President Bush invited Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) to the White House to discuss Pence's proposal to delay all other action until the border was somehow "certified" as secure, after which the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States would be asked to leave and apply for a visa, perhaps in fancy new e-kiosks operated by an Internet job-search company. No word on who would pick our crops, work construction sites and clean our bathrooms in the meantime.

Worrying solely about "securing" the border without securing and legalizing a flow of needed workers would have three sure-fire side effects. First, the current stream of illegal immigration would turn into a panicky flood, as people risk even more life and limb to sneak in before the southern border is militarized. Second, as has happened during nearly every proposed U.S. immigration crackdown, a rush of legal immigrants would jump into line, backing up an already interminably clogged process. And worst of all, the millions of workers who live in the shadow economy would be even less likely to come out of the cold and into the reach of U.S. law.

Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has already indicated that he will abide by his "majority of the majority" rule, preventing even consideration of a bill that's not supported by most House Republicans.

Considering that the infamous HR 4437 was co-sponsored by Republicans such as Texan Ted Poe, who believes (among other things) that "Mexico is at war with the United States" to "occupy this entire land," and given that Congress has chosen to spend the run-up to the November elections holding unusual public "field hearings" instead of conference committee sessions, it's clear that the House GOP is most interested in inflaming xenophobic passions.

What's odd is that Senate Republicans seem to know this. At a pro-reform news conference last week, McCain expressed "regret" at the "level of dialogue" in the House. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) advised Americans not to be led astray "by a few loud people" and stated his belief that "the good people can prevail." Conservative flamethrower Grover Norquist called Republican anti-immigration rhetoric "hateful" and "damaging" and even choked back sobs.

Such bluntness is startling and overdue within the ranks of the GOP. Senators should not be overly desperate to reach any deal they can call "comprehensive" with their intemperate colleagues on Capitol Hill. If the House dictates terms of an immigration compromise, it is certain that the "reform" will only aggravate the problem it aims to fix.

Border Apprehensions Increase In 2006 (WT)

By Jerry Seper

U.S. Border Patrol agents have detained 901,428 foreign nationals seeking to sneak into the United States in the past nine months -- more than 3,300 a day -- up from the 890,358 apprehended in the same period last year.

Border Patrol spokesman Michael Friel said the number of apprehensions, monitored since the Oct. 1 start of fiscal 2006, was a 1 percent increase over detention totals in the first nine months of fiscal 2005. He also said that although arrests had edged up, the number of apprehended non-Mexicans, known as "other than Mexicans" or "OTMs," had declined by about 16 percent.

Mr. Friel said non-Mexican apprehensions totaled 89,059, compared with nearly 106,000 detained in the first nine months of fiscal 2005.

The Border Patrol, an agency within U.S. Customs and Border Protection, is responsible for protecting U.S. borders between the land ports of entry.

"CBP continues to enhance border security by innovative programs such as the Secure Border Initiative, which will increase border-security effectiveness through the right mix of personnel, infrastructure, technology and rapid-response capability," Mr. Friel said.

The initiative is a comprehensive, multiyear plan aimed at securing the borders and reducing illegal entry.

It involves the deployment of additional agents to patrol the borders, secure ports of entry and enforce immigration laws; expanded detention-and-removal capabilities; upgraded technology, including airplanes, helicopters and unmanned aerial vehicles; additional resources for infrastructure improvements; and expanded interior enforcement, including work-site inspections.

The initiative's goal is to gain "operational control" of both the northern and southern borders.

Congress has authorized the hiring of 6,000 additional Border Patrol agents to augment the agency's 12,000-member force. President Bush has ordered the deployment of 6,000 National Guard troops to the southern border to assist while the Border Patrol hires and trains the additional agents.

Mr. Friel said that since Oct. 1, Border Patrol agents have seized more than 1.15 million pounds of narcotics, including marijuana, cocaine and heroin, with an estimated street value of $1.2 billion. The nine-month total represents about 4,300 pounds of drugs being seized every day.

He also said that in the past nine months, agents rescued 2,281 aliens attempting to cross into the United States, a 39 percent increase from fiscal 2005. Last fiscal year, he said, the agency recorded 473 migrant deaths, compared with 240 this fiscal year.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Name Virginian To Lead Maritime Agency (WT)

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

The chairman of the Prince William Board of County Supervisors is going national.

Last week, President Bush announced that he would nominate Sean T. Connaughton to lead the Maritime Administration at the Department of Transportation.

Mr. Connaughton, a lawyer, unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor last year, losing in the primary to William T. Bolling. Mr. Bolling went on to win the seat.

Mr. Connaughton has served as a senior transportation associate for the American Petroleum Institute.

He served in the Coast Guard from 1983 to 1986 after receiving a bachelor's degree from the Merchant Marine Academy, He is a commander in the Naval Reserve.

He also holds a master's degree from Georgetown University and a law degree from George Mason University.

·Hispanic history

The D.C. Office of Latino Affairs (OLA) is teaming with Maya, a Hispanic marketing firm, to produce a documentary about the history of Hispanics in the District.

"Through Our Eyes" -- a documentary funded by OLA in celebration of its 30th anniversary -- will feature donated pictures, stories, videos and recorded music that showcase Hispanic life in the District since the 1970s.

The fast-paced, English- and Spanish-subtitled film will feature residents, community leaders, activists and journalists discussing issues such as Hispanics' settlement 30 years ago near the newly established embassies in Adams Morgan, increased Salvadoran emigration in the 1980s and the immigration rallies this spring.

OLA Director Gustavo Velasquez said the film will "look retrospectively at the contributions of Latinos in the nation's capital."

A film screening will be held in mid-September.

·Singalong campaign

With 10 candidates running for one seat on the D.C. Council, bold and daring campaigning isn't out of the question, or so the minds behind Bill Rice's council run seem to think.

Mr. Rice, a former journalist and a one-time spokesman for the D.C. Department of Transportation, plans to spice up his campaign for the Ward 3 council seat with a catchy jingle and some July Fourth fun.

The candidate plans to distribute Rice Krispies treats as he bikes along MacArthur Boulevard in the July Fourth Palisades parade tomorrow.

But it won't stop there.

Bridget Davis, a spokeswoman for Mr. Rice, said he will be accompanied by singers from Middle C Music who will "belt out" the official campaign song, "Rice is Running," which is sung to the tune of the advertising jingle for "Rice-a-roni, the San Francisco treat."

Rice is running for Ward 3 council seat.
Rice is running;
his platform can't be beat.
For services that you've paid for,
his policy is open door.
Rice is running.
Your vote is all he needs.

"Everybody can join and march in perhaps the most American hometown experience we have in our nation's capital," Mr. Rice said. "Rain or shine, we will be handing out the Rice Krispies treats. It's always fun."

·Settlement

Frederick County, Md., has agreed to pay $55,000 to settle a lawsuit that says State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle wrongly fired a worker, saying she abused sick leave.

The county agreed to give $40,000 in back pay and benefits to plaintiff Amy Hill-Boyer and to pay her $15,000 in legal fees, but it won't reinstate her, the Frederick News-Post reported Thursday.

The county denies any wrongdoing in the settlement reached earlier this month after a mediation session in U.S. District Court in Baltimore.

Miss Hill-Boyer was fired in September after 10 years with the state's attorney's office.

Mr. Rolle is a Republican candidate for state attorney general.

·Call to resign

A Chesterfield County, Va., supervisor pleaded guilty Wednesday to sexually abusing a teenager, prompting board members to ask for his resignation.

Edward B. Barber, the former board chairman, pleaded guilty to two misdemeanor counts of sexual battery against a 16-year-old girl as part of a plea agreement. He originally was charged with one felony count each of aggravated sexual battery and object sexual penetration.

Mr. Barber, 50, was sentenced to two years in prison, suspended, and must submit to a sex offender evaluation. He was placed on three years of probation and must serve 100 hours of community service.

If Mr. Barber had been convicted of a felony, he would have been forced to give up his seat on the board. But at the Board of Supervisors meeting on Wednesday, members requested that he step down.

"In view of the serious nature of the convictions today, we feel he has violated the public trust and it would be inappropriate for Mr. Barber to continue to serve on this board," board Chairman Dickie King said, a stand endorsed by the three other supervisors.

Mr. Barber told the Richmond Times-Dispatch that he had no plans to give up his seat.

"I've represented that district well for 14 years, and I plan to continue to do that," he said.

Mr. Barber would not say whether he would run for re-election in 2007.

Mr. Barber already had been suspended from his job as a physical education teacher at Crenshaw Elementary School. School officials said last week that his contract would not be renewed.

The charges did not involve a student at the school.

Push For Government Openness On Right And Left (NYT)

By Jason DeParle

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 2 — Exasperated by his party's failure to cut government spending, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, is seeking cyberhelp.

Mr. Coburn wants to create a public database, searchable over the Internet, that would list most government contracts and grants — exposing hundreds of billions in annual spending to instant desktop view.

Type in "Halliburton," the military contractor, or "Sierra Club," the environmental group, for example, and a search engine would show all the federal money they receive. A search for the terms "Alaska" and "bridges" would expose a certain $315 million span to Gravina Island (population 50) that critics call the "Bridge to Nowhere."

While advocating for openness, Mr. Coburn is also placing a philosophical bet that the more the public learns about federal spending, the less it will want.

"Sunshine's the best thing we've got to control waste, fraud and abuse," he said. "It's also the best thing we've got to control stupidity. It'll be a force for the government we need."

But Mr. Coburn's plan, hailed by conservatives, is also sponsored by a Democrat, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, and applauded by liberal groups that support activist government. The result is a showcase of clashing assumptions and the oddest of coalitions, uniting Phyllis Schlafly, a prominent critic of gay rights, with the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force.

Liberal groups, while also praising openness, are hoping for a new appreciation of what government does, like provide clean water and feed the hungry. "We need to remind people where Uncle Sam helps us each day," said Gary Bass, director of OMB Watch, a liberal group that got its start monitoring the Office of Management and Budget.

The House unanimously passed a version of the proposal in late June, though in a form that had drawn outside criticism. The House bill creates a database that would omit contracts, which typically go to businesses, but would include about $300 billion in grants, which usually go to nonprofit groups.

"Contracts are awarded in a much more competitive environment," said Representative Thomas M. Davis III, a Virginia Republican who was a sponsor of the bill. That makes them more self-policing, he said. Mr. Davis, whose district includes many government contractors, said grants "are more susceptible to abuse."

But liberal critics see a revival of what they call old partisan efforts to "de-fund the left," by reducing grants to liberal groups or adding conditions that limit their activities.

Mr. Coburn joined them in criticizing the House omission of contracts. Including them in the database, he said, is "the only way you're going to bust these indecent relationships of former Pentagon employees working for defense contractors and getting sweetheart deals from buddies inside."

When told of Mr. Coburn's statement, Mr. Davis said, "As usual, I think he's headline grabbing." While Mr. Davis supports more openness in contracting, he said including contracts would "gum up the works" legislatively since more Congressional committees would be involved.

Spending hawks have sought a spending database for years. The Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington group, tried to build one itself, but search-engine technology now makes the task easier.

On the right, support for the plan reflects an old concern about spending and a new faith in the power of blogs. Supporters picture a citizen army of e-watchdogs, greatly increasing the influence of antispending groups in Washington.

"Now that you've got the Internet, you'll have tens of thousands of watchdogs," said Bridgett G. Wagner of the Heritage Foundation, who is leading a coalition of conservative groups that support the Coburn bill. "That's what people see in it."

Among the bill's leading supporters is Mark Tapscott, the editorial page editor of The Washington Examiner, who has promoted it there and on his blog, Tapscott's Copy Desk. While most spending is already a matter of public record, Mr. Tapscott argues that it is often buried in obscure documents.

"The spending cannot be sufficiently scrubbed," Mr. Tapscott said. Whether the database causes spending to rise or fall (he guesses it will fall), "what's important to me is the principle of the public's right to know," Mr. Tapscott said.

A number of blogs popular among conservatives have praised Mr. Coburn's bill. Instapundit, among the most popular, has pushed it. Seeker Blog called it "the best news I've heard out of D.C. this year." Captain's Quarters demanded "Give us the Pork Database," and Porkopolis hailed the measure with the slogan, "Show Me the Money."

While the bill has few overt critics, it may encounter resistance from Congressional insiders who have used their influence to secure projects back home. When Mr. Coburn tried to attach the measure to a lobbying reform bill this spring, Senator Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican known for his zeal in aiding his state, killed it on procedural grounds.

Not everyone is convinced more sunshine will matter. "All this information is out there right now" and being mined by watchdog groups, said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office. While it was "certainly appropriate" to build a database, he said: "I don't think it would dramatically change public perception of the appropriate size and scope of government. That's a much deeper issue."

One important challenge involves tracking subcontractors. Money awarded, for example, to Lockheed, to build a military plane, might get divided among hundreds of parts suppliers. The database, Mr. Coburn said, would seek to list them all.

The push for openness runs counter to the trend of increased secrecy among government officials who cite the need to protect national security. Criticizing that trend, Mr. Tapscott said, "people in the Pentagon, like bureaucrats everywhere, overclassify too much because of the basic instinct to protect yourself."

But Mr. Coburn said he was comfortable with the overall level of secrecy. His database would adhere to current disclosure rules, he said.

What if sunlight so cleanses the government that the public wants more of it? Grover Norquist, an antitax advocate who supports the House bill, just laughed. "They might say, 'Oh my goodness, look at all the good work that's being done,' " he said. "But I'm willing to take that chance."

Growers Reap Benefits Even In Good Years (WP)

By Dan Morgan, Sarah Cohen And Gilbert M. Gaul

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

EDEN, Md. -- Roger L. Richardson, a vigorous 72-year-old who grows corn on 1,500 acres of prime Eastern Shore farmland, had a good year in 2005. Thanks to smart planning, shrewd investing and a little luck, he grossed a healthy $500,000 for his crop.

But the federal government treated him as if he needed help and paid him $75,000.

The money came from a little-known, 20-year-old U.S. Agriculture Department program that was intended to boost farmers' incomes when prices are low.

The farmers do not have to sell at distressed prices to collect the money. They can bank the government payments and sell when prices are higher.

Since September, the program has cost taxpayers $4.8 billion. Most of that money -- $3.8 billion -- went to farmers such as Richardson who sold at higher prices, according to a Washington Post analysis of USDA payment data.

The subsidy is called the loan deficiency payment. Although it has cost taxpayers $29 billion since 1998, it is virtually unknown outside farm country. But in rural America, the LDP is a topic at backyard barbecues and local diners along with the high school football team and the weather. Despite its name, it is neither a loan nor, in many cases, payment for a deficiency. It is just cash paid to farmers when market prices dip below the government-set minimum, or floor, if only for a single day.

The LDP has become so ingrained in farmland finances that farmers sometimes wish for market prices to drop so they can capture a larger subsidy.

"In the fall of the year, we find the farmer wanting the price to go down," John Fletcher, a Missouri grain dealer, told Congress last year. "It's almost unnatural."

Corn farmers collected the LDP on 90 percent of their crop last year, but most did not suffer the losses that traditional subsidies are meant to offset. Some collected hundreds of thousands of dollars.

"Most smart farmers are cashing in on it," said Bruce A. Babcock, director of the Center for Agricultural and Rural Development at Iowa State University. "It shows me that farmers are being overcompensated."

The LDP bears little resemblance to the original price-support system, created in 1938 to help millions of desperate farmers during the Depression. The government then propped up prices by buying grain and cotton whenever the market dipped below a government-set floor.

But by the 1980s, the government had accumulated huge stockpiles of commodities that it could not sell abroad. With the backing of Southern rice- and cotton-state lawmakers, Congress in 1985 came up with a way to protect farmers from low prices: the LDP. The government encouraged farmers to sell their crops on the market and paid them cash when prices fell below the floor.

This reduced the stockpiles and made U.S. farm products a better buy abroad. But few foresaw where the program would end up, according to Arkansas Secretary of Agriculture Richard E. Bell, who lobbied for the change as president of the state's largest rice cooperative.

When corn prices fell in the late 1990s, the cash payments to farmers soared.'Location, Location . . .'

Roger Richardson's experience with his corn farm in Maryland's Worcester County illustrates one way farmers take advantage of the LDP.

After harvesting his corn last summer, Richardson stored 190,000 bushels in silos that he owns with other farmers. He then waited for prices to rise. He had reason to be hopeful because the corn-dependent Delmarva poultry industry pays a premium to lock up local supplies for chicken feed.

Meanwhile, in the Midwest, prices briefly dropped to their lowest level in five years after Hurricane Katrina. The storm stalled grain barges up and down the Mississippi. Huge yellow piles lay in fields outside stuffed grain elevators, and a sign outside one elevator said, "Blame it on Katrina."

The drop in prices brought the government's safety net -- the LDP -- into play.

In DeKalb County, Ill., the subsidy had reached 46 cents a bushel one day in September. (The LDP for each county is calculated by subtracting the USDA's daily estimate of the local market price from the government's floor, which is set each year and was $1.98 a bushel in DeKalb.)

Yet in one of the oddities of the system, across the country on the Eastern Shore, where corn market prices were much higher, the subsidy was about the same: 48 cents. It hovered around that level for the next two months.

To book the subsidy being paid on a particular date, Richardson simply had to walk into the local USDA office in Snow Hill, Md., with the ability to prove that he owned a harvested corn crop. He applied for the subsidy for different portions of his crop on several days throughout the fall.

By December, feed mills on the Eastern Shore had begun running short, and prices were rising. Richardson began selling for an average $2.60 a bushel. That was about 50 cents more than the price quoted in Chicago, the national benchmark. Richardson cashed in because of his ability to store grain until it was needed and his proximity to the mills.

"It's like real estate," he said. "It's location, location, location."

The LDP subsidy that he had already booked would bring his total take to more than $3 a bushel -- he made $75,000 from the LDP alone.

The paradox of paying roughly equal subsidies regardless of local conditions was a deliberate policy devised by Congress. In 2002, it directed the USDA to "minimize" the difference in LDP subsidies across states and between counties -- and, in effect, across the country.

"We were trying to make certain that you wouldn't have a farmer receiving 5, 10, 15 cents less than another farmer across the river or the county line," said former representative Charles W. Stenholm (D-Tex.).

Lawmakers are frequently deluged by complaints from farm constituents who are outraged by a higher LDP across state or county borders. The lawmakers, in turn, lean on the USDA.

In June 2002, for example, South Dakota's senators demanded that an injustice be corrected: Corn farmers in Iowa were getting 9 cents a bushel while those just across the border in South Dakota were getting 7 cents.

"These inequities are more than just numbers because for farmers they could make the difference between profit and loss," wrote Sens. Tim Johnson (D) and Thomas A. Daschle (D) in a two-page, single-spaced letter to then-Agriculture Secretary Ann M. Veneman obtained under the Freedom of Information Act.

Efforts to equalize the subsidies fall to a staff of 10 officials housed in the USDA's Commodity Office in suburban Kansas City. Every workday, they check with online services, call grain elevators across the Midwest and poll 19 major grain markets, where large merchants and food processors go to buy.

Then, in a 4 p.m. ritual, the USDA officials gather around a conference table with an open phone line to headquarters in Washington. Poring over maps and prices, the group sets the next day's LDP for corn, wheat and 15 other commodities in more than 3,000 counties.

Officials add a few cents in one county and take away in another, when the research shows that subsidies in different areas would be too far apart.

"Congress gave us conflicting requirements," said Bert Farrish, director of the USDA's Commodity Office in Washington. "We have to minimize the difference in benefits across state and county lines, but administer it in a way that reflects local markets as closely as we can."

Stenholm acknowledges the problems but believes it all evens out.

"There's no way you're going to get a national program that works perfectly," he said. "Some get an advantage, some get a disadvantage. And you hope over 10 years it balances out."Financial Hedging

Increasingly, farmers have learned to lock in their subsidies when prices are low and sell when prices are higher.

For last year's crop, farmers sold their corn for an average of $1.90 per bushel, only 5 cents below the national floor price. But they received an LDP averaging 44 cents, government payment records show. The difference amounted to $3.8 billion.

The same thing happened in 2004, when the LDP was 27 cents even though the price farmers received when they sold their crops was above the floor. The windfall for farmers was $2.7 billion.

One reason for the discrepancy is that farmers have adopted modern methods to limit their financial risk.

"A farmer who plays it right can make a bundle at times," said Daniel A. Sumner, an agricultural economist at the University of California at Davis.

One who played it right last year was Michael T. Sullivan, who produces a million bushels of corn annually with his three sons in Franklin, Minn. He thrived even during the depressed post-Katrina market.

Well before the storm, Sullivan said, the family had arranged to sell three-quarters of its crop to a local grain elevator for about $2 a bushel. The practice, called "forward contracting," is increasingly common and helps insulate farmers from the market's routine ups and downs.

On top of their contracted price, the Sullivans got the subsidy: $292,054 for that same corn, according to payment records.

Sullivan considers the LDP a godsend, given the uncertainties of farming. "Without it, Main Street Minnesota would have no money to keep the economy rolling," he said.

Richardson also makes no apologies for taking the government money. He contends that the LDP helps keep him and other farmers afloat by offsetting rising energy costs. Maryland farmers, he adds, deserve higher subsidies because they have higher costs and lower yields than Midwestern farmers.

"Without the LDP last year, farmers would have been in deep water," he said recently. As a large farmer, he said, "You handle a lot of dollars, but that's no panacea."

The bigger the farm, the bigger the payouts.

Walker Place, an operation based in Danville, Ill., that farms in 23 counties in six states, has received $3.4 million in LDP checks over the past decade, including $491,726 on the 2005 corn crop, government records show.

Stephanie Walker Spiros, who helps run the sprawling family farm empire, acknowledged that the system has flaws. But she defends it as necessary to cushion other farmers who do not have access to sophisticated financial hedges, and to buttress the farm economy in bad years.

"It's a protection in years of depressed prices," she said.

But the payments for corn alone have grown, from $1 billion for the 1998 crop to $4.3 billion for last year's, even though the average price farmers received for a bushel has remained near or above the government floor for the past five years.

U.S. farmers can also make up for declining prices with higher yields. They now harvest 20 percent more corn from each acre than just a decade ago, and yields in the past three years were the highest ever, according to USDA statistics.

'Paper Corn'

Riding his combine through the heart of Illinois corn and soybean country early last October, Mackinaw farmer John Kuhfuss personified the business-savvy farmer who profits from the LDP.

Kuhfuss is a modest-size farmer by Illinois standards. He sharecrops 1,000 acres of corn and soybeans, splitting the revenue and the government payments with several landowners.

Still, he uses a financial adviser and a commodity broker to help hedge his farming risks with options and futures contracts at the Chicago Board of Trade and Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Farmers call that "paper corn."

It is a different world from that of the 1970s, when his father, the late William J. Kuhfuss, was president of the American Farm Bureau, the nation's largest farm group.

"When he started farming, he hitched a couple of horses to a wagon, hauled his corn to the nearest railroad siding and sold it for whatever the cash offer was -- and in the Depression it was cheaper to burn corn than sell it," Kuhfuss said.

He talked his father into his first contract on the corn futures market -- and he came out a winner.

Now the son uses the lingo of the trader as much as that of the farmer, throwing around terms such as "strike price," "puts" and "calls." He looks for opportunities to sell his crop more than a year before it is harvested.

"I'm perfectly willing to plan a year out," he said. "Sometimes there are opportunities there."

In spring 2005 he had seized such an opportunity and sold 30,000 bushels of corn to a local elevator for $2.25 a bushel. By October, with buyers offering only $1.70 a bushel, that decision looked smart.

With his price assured, Kuhfuss made another smart decision: "I LPDed all my corn at over 40 cents a bushel," he said.

He said he and his partners netted nearly $40,000 in LDP on their 500 acres of corn. They were not alone. On the days he received his checks, other Illinois corn farmers netted $36.5 million.

In Lincoln, Ill., not far from Kuhfuss's place, the farmer-owned Kruger grain elevator was at full-harvest tilt.

General manager Hugh Whelan was keeping a close eye on the LDP.

"The best thing for farmers now is for the market to go lower," he said. But then Whelan put on his taxpayer's hat:

"It's going to take a lot of dollars to pay that LDP."Global Impact

Today, farm price supports, especially the LDP, are under serious attack.

Last year at the economic summit of the Group of Eight leading industrial nations in Gleneagles, Scotland, President Bush shocked U.S. farm organizations by proposing that certain farm subsidies by rich industrial nations be eliminated. That would mean the end, or drastic scaling back, of the LDP.

The main objection to the LDP is that it hurts world commodity prices by encouraging overproduction.

Farmers abroad lose because "the LDP causes us to grow more corn than we otherwise would," said Sumner, the University of California economist. He advised Brazil when it successfully argued to the World Trade Organization last year that the LDP and other U.S. subsidies depress world cotton prices.

Negotiations over a new world trade deal broke up in disarray Saturday after the United States and other countries deadlocked on the issue of reducing farm subsidies.

Lawmakers from Midwestern farm states -- most of which backed Bush in the past two presidential elections -- have vowed to defend the LDP.

Supporters say it has helped the U.S. trade balance and has encouraged the efficient marketing of grain. Moreover, they say, European and Asian nations subsidize their agriculture at even higher levels.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) has warned U.S. trade negotiators not to bow to foreign pressure unless they win major concessions for U.S. agriculture.

"We're not going to buy a pig in a poke," he said.

Democrats Seek To Enact Lobby Reforms By Rule (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

In a bid to salvage some progress from the fizzling drive to overhaul lobbying and ethics laws, Democratic Sens. Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) are pushing their colleagues to adopt as a rules change a slate of reforms from a package the Senate passed months ago.

A resolution the pair introduced late last week would immediately ban gifts, meals and tickets from lobbyists, require pre-approval for privately funded trips and expand revolving-door prohibitions, among other items.

While the Senate approved the changes, 90-8, as part of a broader reform package in March, that bill has stalled awaiting House action. The House approved its version of the measure in May but has yet to name conferees, and negotiations over the bills have run aground on disagreements about campaign finance and earmark provisions.

“The Senate congratulated itself for passing new travel and gift rules back in March, but those rules aren’t yet in effect because the lobbying reform bill has stalled,” Feingold said in a statement. “Lobbyists can still buy meals for Members, despite what the public has been led to believe. It is time for the Senate to start living by the rule changes it adopted with such fanfare three months ago.”

Senate rules changes require a simple majority to pass, but two-thirds of those voting to invoke cloture, setting the bar for the resolution as high as 67 votes. Obama and Feingold wrote to Senate leaders last week, asking their resolution be adopted as soon as Senators return from the July Fourth recess.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist’s (R-Tenn.) office did not respond to a request for comment.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who has sought to portray a GOP “culture of corruption” as a central theme in his party’s midterm messaging, stopped short of a full-throated endorsement of the approach. “Our first priority is to get a bill out of conference,” Reid spokesman Jon Steinberg said. “There shouldn’t be an either-or choice here. It’s time for the Republicans to step up. They had a lot of rhetoric in January and February about changing the way things are done in Washington, but they don't seem to be following it up with action."

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), a conferee on the lobbying bill, called the plan by Obama and Feingold "an interesting proposal that should be given consideration." Other conferees were unavailable for comment Friday.

In addition to the gift, travel and revolving-door provisions, the new resolution would end floor privileges for former staffers and lawmakers-turned lobbyists. It would force Senators to quickly disclose any outside job negotiations; ban close relatives from lobbying that Senator or the lawmaker's staff; and prohibit Senators from trying to influence hiring decisions by outside groups on the basis of partisan affiliation.

The resolution leaves unaddressed several key changes the broader bill would accomplish. That package requires more frequent and fuller disclosures by lobbyists, including new requirements for grass-roots lobbying campaigns. It also adds transparency to the earmarking process.

Nevertheless, Congressional watchdogs praised the effort as one that could inch a mired reform process forward.

"This is a great move because half of these reforms could be implemented by each body on its own as a rules change," said Craig Holman, ethics lobbyist for Public Citizen.

Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, said while the broader package is inadequate, "this is just laying down a marker that says, 'We can adopt our rules changes immediately, and we ought to do it.'"

"This is a statement to the Senate, and the Senate leadership," Wertheimer said.

Feingold and Obama were at the forefront of their party's drive to strengthen ethics rules in the wake of high-profile corruption cases early this year, but both ended up dissatisfied with the package that emerged months later. They joined a slim minority of Senators opposing the reform bill on final passage, calling it too weak. Obama last week reiterated his criticism of the bill but added that enacting some of its measures would be "better than no reform at all."

"Even if this bill doesn't become law, the Senate should adopt these modest rules to put an end to lobbyist-paid lunches and gifts and start to change the culture in Washington that led to the rise of Jack Abramoff and Duke Cunningham," he said in a statement.

Several Senate Democratic offices have been voluntarily complying with their own versions of new ethics rules. Reid's staff, for example, is abiding by the terms of the Democratic-sponsored package, the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act, which goes further than the Senate-passed measure on several fronts. Both Feingold and Obama have both imposed strict ethics guidelines on their own staffs.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the Capitol, Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) is attempting to enforce the provisions of the House-passed measure requiring new disclosures on earmarks. Last week, Flake pledged to challenge any special project that does not identify its sponsor.

"The House passed a lobbying reform bill in May that required that the sponsors of earmarks be identified," he said in a statement. "There's no good reason why that policy hasn't been implemented."

President Wanted, MBA Not Required (LAT)

By Charles R. Kesler

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

GEORGE W. BUSH is the first president with an MBA (from Harvard Business School, no less), but it's not clear that being a master of business administration has made him a better chief executive. The disarray in Iraq, the debacle after Hurricane Katrina — these aren't exactly the kinds of triumphs that the alumni office likes to boast about.

Business schools are a relatively new institution. The MBA was invented in the Progressive era as a way to abort future generations of robber barons. The idea was to train a class of business administrators (the ethos was anti-entrepreneurial) who would expiate capitalism's sins by managing their corporations in keeping with higher morality. The higher morality was whatever the spirit of the age revealed to professors and high-toned Protestant ministers. Over decades, the pursuit of ethical uplift waned, and the pursuit of efficiency and new methods of reading a balance sheet waxed, paving the way for the increasingly empty trendiness of modern management books.

It's hard to say what President Bush absorbed from his management studies. We can only draw inferences, though eventually historians may know more. Defending Donald H. Rumsfeld a few weeks ago, Bush said: "I hear the voices, and I read the front page, and I know the speculation. But I'm the decider, and I decide what is best. And what's best is for Don Rumsfeld to remain as the secretary of Defense."

Being the decider-in-chief suggests one paradigm of modern management: the executive who makes the final decisions, the tough calls. He "hears" and even listens to others before deciding, but the point of a decision (from decidere, "to cut off") is to be decisive, not to reason your way to a judgment that can be explained to others.

Bush's management style is long on decisions and short on explanations. He's apparently better at listening to others than questioning their views. He prefers to have around him people whose judgment he trusts implicitly, even as he insists that they trust and abide by his decisions implicitly.

This isn't simple cronyism or "hackocracy," as the left charges. But neither is it a model of political wisdom. It leads to a disinclination to deliberate, a reliance on peremptory assertions of subordinates' good character to quiet doubt about their judgments, and a certain habitual speechlessness. On ordinary rhetorical occasions, Bush and his text seem hardly acquainted. On great occasions, he tends to overshoot the mark, calling for impossibilities such as an "end to evil." He lacks a rhetorical mean, much less the rhetorical mien that served Ronald Reagan so well.

Democrats usually turn for inspiration to universities and law schools (not exactly fonts of conservatism or even of moderation), Republicans to business and business schools. The GOP loves to call for applying the businessman's common sense to government problems. Rumsfeld, a former Fortune 500 executive, is applying business methods (just-in-time inventories, information networks, strict control of labor costs) to try and transform the Pentagon and, while he's at it, win the war in Iraq.

The precedents aren't entirely encouraging. In the 1960s, Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara tried to revolutionize the Pentagon using the systems analysis techniques he'd championed in his former job as president of Ford Motor Co. He succeeded in discrediting himself, the techniques and the war he was trying to win.

Pray things work out better this time. In general, however, the analogy between business and politics so beloved by Republicans is a flawed one. At the simplest level, politicians report to a large electorate and have fixed terms of office; businessmen do not. And although the latter can hire and fire at will, the former cannot, and thus face vast, recalcitrant bureaucracies.

Second, government deals not merely with property, vital as that is, but also with life and liberty. Government thus involves issues of national defense, criminal justice and other "involuntary transactions" backed by a monopoly on the legitimate use of force.

Third, though both pursuits involve self-interest, economic self-interest is less complicated. By contrast, there are many forms of political self-interest, frequently in conflict: Should you desire security or glory? Low taxes or a balanced budget? Much political skill must be devoted to persuading people where, exactly, their interest lies. (This is the rhetorical part, at which Bush doesn't excel.)

Finally, and most significantly, politics has to reconcile multiple goals — consent, security, liberty, prosperity, justice, virtue — in the presence of continuing disagreements about both means and ends. These inherent differences frustrate, eventually, all businesslike schemes of government. Too bad they don't teach that in business school.

A New Partnership Binds Old Republican Rivals (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Adam Nagourney

After years of competitive and often contentious dealings, President Bush and Senator John McCain of Arizona are building a deepening if impersonal relationship that is serving the political needs of both men.

Given their history of intense rivalry and sometimes personally bitter combat, their newfound partnership is seen by some Republicans as born more of political calculation than personal evolution. Either way, it could prove valuable to Mr. McCain in his efforts to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 by sending a signal to Mr. Bush's conservative base and fund-raising network that, at a minimum, the White House will not stand in the Arizonan's way.

The president had Mr. McCain to the White House three times in one week recently to talk about how Mr. Bush should make the case for the war in Iraq and how to break the wall of conservative opposition to the immigration measures proposed by both men. Mr. McCain was back in the Oval Office again on Tuesday to talk about ways to win approval of the line-item veto.

Behind the scenes, during a month in which he repeatedly came to Mr. Bush's public defense, Mr. McCain called the president to offer words of support, he recounted in an interview.

"I said, 'Look, hang on, things are bad,' " Mr. McCain said. "I said, 'I'm proud of the job you are doing, and I wanted you to know that I will continue to do what I can to help.'

"I've tried, when his numbers went down, to be more supportive and outspoken, because I'd love to pick him up," Mr. McCain said.

The senator showed that again on Sunday in an interview on the ABC program "This Week," saying he was "proud" of the president's leadership on immigration and emphasizing cooperation with the administration on a former issue of serious contention, the treatment of American-held prisoners of war.

Aides said a thaw that began when Mr. McCain campaigned alongside Mr. Bush in the 2004 election has continued through the tougher days of Mr. Bush's second term. The appearances began after top aides for the two men met to hash out some of their differences. During private moments in joint appearances — at the White House, at campaignlike events pressing for immigration reform and on Air Force One — the two even chat about baseball and golf.

"He calls me Johnny Mac," Mr. McCain said.

Still, for all the talk of reconciliation, both sides describe the relationship between arguably the two highest-profile leaders of the Republican Party as almost entirely professional, a little stiff and the product of the pragmatic calculation by two politicians who see potential gain in striking a peace with a powerful rival.

"This is a very odd partnership that is almost founded at the moment on mutual need," said Tom Rath, a Republican leader in New Hampshire and a longtime ally of the Bush family, who hastened to add that Mr. Bush and Mr. McCain share more convictions than people realize and would not be working so closely if that were not the case.

But Mr. Bush has not had Mr. McCain to Camp David or the White House for dinner or a movie, and Mr. Bush has not visited Mr. McCain's cabin in Sedona, Ariz., since 2001. Mr. McCain, who served 22 years in the Navy, rises to his feet whenever he takes a call from Mr. Bush, even in the privacy of his office. But Mr. McCain's friends say he is fonder of Mr. Bush's father.

Even as he called Mr. Bush a friend, Mr. McCain described their relationship as a function of their positions and their shared views on such big issues as Iraq and immigration. "I believe if I were not in the Senate and not working on these issues, we might communicate once in a while, but not the way we do," he said. "We have a very good personal relationship, but it's primarily based on the agenda."

Mr. Bush is in need of a loyal Republican at a time when there is so much wariness within the party of a president whose popularity has declined. Mr. McCain would like the support of Mr. Bush's supporters and contributors in 2008 and could not afford to have a hostile White House that could trip up his own presidential bid.

Whatever the motivation, the relationship has potentially big political implications for the 2008 race, although Mr. Bush's aides have said that he would almost certainly stay out of the Republican primary contest. And some aides declined to comment publicly for this article out of concern, they said, that they would appear to be giving the White House stamp of approval for a McCain campaign. But the president appears to have stronger ties to Mr. McCain than to the other likely presidential candidates.

There has been a steady stream of Bush advisers who have ended up in Mr. McCain's orbit. Most recently, Republicans close to both candidates said that Nicolle Wallace — who just stepped down as Mr. Bush's communications director and has long been close to the president — was likely to serve in some formal or informal role in a McCain campaign. Her husband, Mark D. Wallace, Mr. Bush's deputy campaign manager in 2004 and now an ambassador-level representative to the United Nations, is already lending advice. In another high-profile move, Wayne L. Berman, a longtime supporter and fund-raiser for Mr. Bush, has signed on to help Mr. McCain.

On the other side of the divide, some of Mr. McCain's supporters made it clear in interviews that the McCain camp viewed Mr. Bush's brother Jeb, the governor of Florida, as an ideal running mate for Mr. McCain. This news would presumably be pleasing to President Bush, who has made it clear in recent weeks that he would like his brother to move onto the national stage; Governor Bush has made it just as clear that he has no interest in running for national office in 2008.

And Mr. Bush's senior political adviser, Karl Rove, was said by associates to have put aside his suspicion and dislike of Mr. McCain. The two spent time together during the 2004 campaign when, Mr. Rove told associates, they drew close. Mr. Rove gave Mr. McCain a pair of antique Theodore Roosevelt presidential cufflinks at the end of that race.

John Weaver, a senior adviser to Mr. McCain, said that accounts of animosity between Mr. McCain and Mr. Bush had been at least slightly exaggerated.

"There's heat in a campaign, and it can get pretty raw," said Mr. Weaver, who had a particularly famous feud with Mr. Rove. "I can speak for ourselves: after we lost the nominating process in 2000, it was time to move on. It took longer for some of us on the staff level to get to that point, but we did."

Still, it was just last year when Mr. McCain, a prisoner of war during the Vietnam War, led something of a revolt in the Senate to push a ban on cruel or inhumane treatment of prisoners in American custody, over Mr. Bush's threat of a veto. And for much of Mr. Bush's first term, the senator had a reputation as one of the few Republicans who would publicly criticize the administration, on issues like Mr. Bush's tax cut proposals, the Abu Ghraib prison torture scandal and the administration's postwar planning in Iraq.

But Mr. McCain has become one of the biggest defenders of Mr. Bush, even on some of the president's most unpopular moves, including the administration's decision this year to approve a deal giving control of several American ports to a company owned by the Dubai government.

"On a series of very tough issues, McCain's been there," said Tony Snow, the White House press secretary.

The jelling of the McCain-Bush relationship has included a series of gestures, some odd, on both sides. When Mr. McCain visited Mr. Bush at his ranch in Texas during the 2004 presidential campaign, he suggested to the president that he try cooking turkey with a turkey fryer, promising to rustle one up for him. Mr. McCain apparently forgot the promise until White House aides started calling Mr. McCain's office, saying the president was still waiting for his turkey fryer.

And aides said there were long memories in both camps stemming from the bitterly fought presidential primary season of 2000, in which Mr. McCain embarrassed Mr. Bush with a defeat in New Hampshire, and Mr. Bush responded with a searing campaign — which provoked charges of dirty tricks — that knocked Mr. McCain out in South Carolina.

A Republican with ties to the administration said there was lingering resentment among some Bush aides at Mr. McCain for so regularly going on television, especially during Mr. Bush's first term, to criticize the president. And Mr. McCain, a politician who is given to speaking his mind, could certainly still say something critical of the White House that would set back this rapprochement, his aides said.

But Mr. Bush and Mr. McCain have both instructed their aides to cease their hostilities. "We both made it very clear to all of our supporters that that's over," Mr. McCain said. "What people find difficulty understanding," he said, "is that we're capable of putting that behind us."

Emanuel, Dean Still Sparring (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

A letter to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean from Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has set off a new round of sniping over party strategy and resources between allies of the two party leaders.

Emanuel, who reportedly stormed out of a May meeting with Dean, penned a letter, dated June 22, to the party chairman demanding $100,000 per targeted district from the DNC to defray the cost of the DCCC's proposed field operation, several individuals who have read the letter said.

Attached to the letter was a sample field plan for a district, itemizing various projected expenses, down to details such as $1,500 for T-shirts. The expense plan was dated June 26, although it was unclear when Dean actually received the missive.

In making his monetary request, Emanuel cited the example of 1994, when, he said, the Republican National Committee earmarked $20 million for then-Speaker Newt Gingrich's successful drive for a House takeover. By contrast, Emanuel suggested that Dean had offered a woefully inadequate $20,000 per district.

But while his allies argue that Emanuel, through his record-setting fundraising for the DCCC, deserves wide latitude in shaping '06 strategy, Dean loyalists took the letter as hostile in nature, coming as it did after months of coy suggestions by Emanuel that Dean and the DNC were shirking their financial obligations to the DCCC's election year effort.

"This is all about C.Y.A.," a Democrat familiar with DCCC operations, and sympathetic to the DNC, said. "He's trying to lay the groundwork to blame someone else in case things go bad in November."

On top of that, Dean's backers contend he is not low-balling the DCCC on field operations as Emanuel suggests, and that the $20,000-per-district figure was simply a number being bandied about during negotiations, which were still proceeding when Emanuel wrote the letter.

More to the point, Dean's allies contend, Emanuel is not taking into account what they call the unprecedented support the DNC is providing this year at the state level.

For instance, in Ohio — a quintessential battleground state where Democrats are locked in competitive contests for the governorship, a Senate seat and several House seats, a slew of statewide offices, and control of the state Legislature — the DNC has earmarked significant resources for coordinated statewide campaign efforts and has also implemented early voting and voter outreach programs designed to drive up turnout among the party's core supporters.

"Anybody's who's an operative and who has been around can tell you that the DNC has never stepped up like this before," the same Democrat said.

Emanuel refused to comment on the letter. His press secretary said, “The DCCC does not confirm or comment on the private correspondence that takes place between the chairman of the committee and anyone else.”

Stacie Paxton, press secretary for the DNC, said, “The DNC will continue to focus on working with the other Democratic committees and state parties, helping to unify the party, activate and engage voters, and ensure Democrats are successful up and down the ballot this November.”

Dean and Emanuel have been squabbling over campaign strategy for months, with Emanuel pushing Dean to fork over large sums directly to the DCCC for this year’s efforts. Dean has been reticent, and Emanuel’s frustrations have often spilled into the press. Despite strong suspicions that Emanuel was the source of many of those stories, Dean and the DNC have largely held their fire for the sake of party unity.

Since taking over the DNC, Dean’s relations with other Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill have been similarly strained, a result of his unapologetic investing of DNC money in all 50 state party organizations — at a time when a handful of states and districts could give the party control of Congress.

Emanuel’s backers point out that the RNC is poised to spend heavily down the stretch in key House and Senate races and argue that a lack of similar support from the DNC could cost the party winnable seats. As of the end of May, the RNC had $43.1 million on hand compared to the DNC’s $10.3 million.

Emanuel himself suggested as much in May, when he told Roll Call, “There is no cavalry financially for us.”

Originally, Emanuel asked Dean to help bankroll a fall strategy that relied heavily on television ads, but Dean balked, arguing that such a plan had failed in the past and that beefing up field operations would be a shrewder course.

One Democrat sympathetic to Emanuel argued that the DNC’s efforts in statewide campaigns shouldn’t preclude a significant investment in the DCCC’s own plan.

“If you were to look at each state, you’d see that they’re a minor player,” this Democrat said of the DNC. “If they covered half the costs in some of those states, that would be one thing. But they don’t.”

As DCCC chairman, Emanuel, who amassed a small fortune as an investment banker after serving as a top aide to then-President Bill Clinton, has won rave reviews for his fundraising prowess, although his aggressive and impatient manner has rubbed some the wrong way. If his party were to reclaim the House this fall, Emanuel would be hailed by his fellow Democrats as a hero — and the guessing game is already under way about how he might seek to capitalize on that status.

GOP Claims Edge In House Races (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

Congressional Republicans say they have a strategic advantage in their effort to increase their House majority, even as national polls show Democrats with a significant lead heading into this year's elections.

The National Republican Congressional Committee says that despite the polling edge for the Democrats, Republicans are targeting conservative districts that went for President Bush in 2004. "We're competing for red turf held by Democrats," NRCC spokesman Jonathan Collegio said.

Four districts stand out as leading prospects for Republican gains, but none is considered a guaranteed win.

The House Race Hotline, a nonpartisan publication, lists Iowa's 3rd District as the top contender for a Republican pickup. Rep. Leonard L. "Boswell's facing a well-funded, politically experienced opponent this cycle in state Senate President Jeff Lamberti," House Race Hotline Editor Josh Kraushaar said.

"And the district narrowly voted for Bush in the last presidential election. If there's one incumbent that Democrats are worried about, it's probably Leonard Boswell, especially given recent concerns about his health."

Mr. Boswell, 72, recently had a noncancerous tumor removed from his abdomen and has been restricted in his ability to make campaign appearances.

The top three other prospects for Republicans are two seats in conservative Georgia districts and the home of embattled West Virginia Democrat Alan B. Mollohan, who faces accusations of corruption from critics who say he delivered lucrative private contracts to his campaign's financial supporters. Mr. Bush carried the district by 15 percentage points in 2004.

Republicans say they are also targeting Reps. John M. Spratt Jr. of South Carolina and Melissa Bean of Illinois. Both districts voted for Mr. Bush by more than 10 points in 2004, but both incumbent Democrats are considered likely winners.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) described the Republican strategy as "desperate," and one not likely to yield results.

"Republicans are behind on money, recruiting and support from the American people," said DCCC spokesman Bill Burton. "Not one of those things can be made up for with spin."

Mr. Burton said that even if the districts targeted by Republicans are competitive, Democrats are targeting more than 40 Republican districts they consider up for grabs. Democrats need to win 15 Republican seats to gain control of the House.

After relying heavily on Mr. Bush in 2002 and 2004, some Republicans are keeping their distance from the president as he battles the lowest approval ratings of his presidency. Yet even with Mr. Bush's poll numbers showing a small upward trajectory in recent weeks, House Republicans remain far behind in all generic national polls.

Even if Republicans are unable to win those competitive Democratic seats, there is evidence some of their own districts may be less vulnerable than national polls indicate.

Earlier this month, many observers considered the special election in California's 50th District a bellwether for Democrats' hopes of winning control of Congress. However, the race's Republican candidate, Brian P. Bilbray, defeated his Democrat opponent, Francine Busby, by four points, despite two right-of-center minor candidates drawing away 5 percent of the vote. What's more, Mr. Kraushaar said that nearly half of the Democrats' top prospects in 2006 are in districts that supported Mr. Bush in 2004 by a higher margin than in Mr. Bilbray's district.

In Political Waves, Tide Doesn't Rise To Same Level In Every State (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

The last major national political wave, in 1994, didn't sweep over all areas of the country with equal force. In some states, Congressional Democrats suffered minimal losses, while in others Democratic House seats fell in bunches.

For Democrats to take the House this year, they may need one or two states to deliver a significant number of wins, not just an isolated victory. Which states give Democrats the best chance to score victories in bunches?

The best examples of how the impact of the '94 Republican wave differed from state to state are four states on three coasts: Washington, Virginia, North Carolina and Alabama.

In Washington, Democrats went into Election Day holding eight of the state's nine House seats. Jennifer Dunn was the only Republican member of the House delegation (though Republican Slade Gorton held one of the state's Senate seats).

On Nov. 9, Republican candidates emerged with seven of the nine districts, leaving only Democrats Norm Dicks and Jim McDermott standing. Five incumbent Democrats were defeated, and one open Democratic seat went to the GOP, a net gain of six seats.

In North Carolina, Republicans also made major gains, turning an 8-4 Democratic-majority delegation before the election into an 8-4 Republican majority after the votes were counted, for a net GOP gain of four seats.

Together, Washington and North Carolina combined to produce a 10-seat gain for the Republicans, almost one-fifth of the party's 52-seat gain nationwide.

But just to the Tar Heel State's north, in Virginia, the wave was little more than a ripple.

In the Old Dominion, Democrats headed into Election Day with a 7-4 majority in the commonwealth's delegation. But unlike their neighbors in North Carolina, Virginia Republicans picked up only a single additional district. Democrats came out of the election still holding six of 11 Congressional districts.

And further into the Deep South, in conservative (and increasingly Republican) Alabama, Republicans failed to pick up even a single new House seat. Democrats went into the election holding four of the state's seven districts, and they retained that margin and all of their seats after the election. Three white and one African-American Democrats were re-elected.

What states deserve special attention as possible candidates for a wave within a wave?

Democratic operatives have been suggesting that at least a handful of states are ripe for a Democratic wave: New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Indiana.

In Connecticut, where Republicans represent three of the state's five Congressional districts, a wave conceivably could sweep Reps. Rob Simmons, Christopher Shays and Nancy Johnson out. But a true partisan wave would inundate Republican lawmakers at all levels, and Republican Gov. Jodi Rell appears headed for a thundering victory.

In New York, Democrats are aggressively competing in at least four Upstate districts (against incumbent Reps. John Sweeney, Randy Kuhl and Jim Walsh, and in retiring Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's open seat) and, possibly, in Rep. Sue Kelly's Westchester to Poughkeepsie district just north of New York City.

Democratic strategists reason that party strength in the gubernatorial and U.S. Senate races should produce a big Democratic turnout that could also deliver a number of Congressional seats. That's possible, but all of the districts being targeted by Democrats have a Republican bent, and easy victories by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and all-but-certain gubernatorial nominee Eliot Spitzer could easily make voters bored rather than energized. The Democrats, in other words, are more likely to get shut out than sweep the seats.

Ohio, Pennsylvania and, to a lesser extent, Indiana appear to be better candidates for state-specific waves.

Republicans hold seven of Indiana's nine Congressional districts, and Democrats have an excellent chance of seizing districts, specifically Rep. John Hostettler's 8th district and Rep. Mike Sodrel's 9th district. But they also have a longer-shot opportunity against Rep. Chris Chocola in the 2nd district, and a sweep of all three would give Democrats a majority of the House delegation.

Indiana holds some promise for Democrats because Gov. Mitch Daniels (R) is having a tough time, and that increases the possibility that voters will send a collective message to the GOP.

Pennsylvania and Ohio seem to have the requisite voter anger and slate of competitive races that provide the ingredients for a wave election that could deliver a considerable number of seats to Democrats.

Incumbents struggled during Pennsylvania's April primary, confirming voter dissatisfaction with a legislative pay raise, something that at the very least ought to raise Republican concerns. GOP House incumbents in the eastern third of the state, including Reps. Don Sherwood, Curt Weldon, Jim Gerlach and Michael Fitzpatrick, are all at some risk, and Republican nominees for the Senate (incumbent Rick Santorum) and governor (neophyte Lynn Swann) are not currently doing well enough to help downballot Republican nominees.

Ohio, of course, is made-to-order for a local wave, given Republican Gov. Bob Taft's horrendous poll numbers, state government scandals and credible Democratic challengers to Reps. Deborah Pryce, Bob Ney and Steve Chabot.

The point is that even national waves can be fickle. Not all states have a tsunami even if one appears nationally. Of course, Democrats don't really care where they get their 15-seat gain as long as they get it. But it certainly would be easier for them to get to 218 seats with big gains in at least a couple of states.

On July 4, Where's The Voter Outrage? (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

The surprisingly easy victory that Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah) scored over his primary opponent last week has been heralded as a win for President Bush's immigration policy.

But wealthy developer John Jacob's defeat in the Beehive State's 3rd district holds other lessons for both Republicans trying to dislodge incumbents in primaries and Democrats hoping to flip Republican-held seats in November.

Just as the victories of newly elected Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) and Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and now-ex Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) demonstrated in recent primaries, voters still need a reason to dump incumbents or switch party control of a House seat.

"I think the lesson is if you are going to beat an incumbent, you have to have a strong candidate," said Brad Coker of Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc., an independent firm. "The opportunity was there for Jacob, and he kind of came unglued the last weekend."

Coker was referring to statements Jacob made to the Salt Lake Tribune in the campaign's waning days about how the devil was sabotaging his business dealings, thereby preventing him from pumping more personal money into his race with Cannon.

"That was bizarre," Coker said. "If you're going to replace an incumbent, voters are looking to make sure that the person they are replacing the incumbent with is competent."

Jacob also faltered because he ran his entire campaign on just one issue — immigration — observers and party insiders agreed. Cannon sides with Bush's overhaul proposal, while Jacob tried to tap into anger over the current situation that has allowed some 12 million illegal immigrants into the country by saying Cannon is for "amnesty."

"You need more than one issue, but you also need to be a competent alternative," Coker said. "You just can't put up any angry person with a name to take out an incumbent."

Republicans, and some independent observers, have argued that Democrats were unable to capitalize on the scandal that sent Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) to jail, thereby necessitating a special election for his 50th district seat, because their candidate, Francine Busby (D), was not up to snuff.

Democrats were hoping that a surge in turnout, fueled by voter anger over the ethics issue, would propel Busby to victory. But it never materialized, and voter turnout has not notably increased in any primary to date, even in races where an incumbent was considered vulnerable.

"Democrats lost California 50 because they ran with a second-tier, flawed candidate, and we expect what happened in California to be duplicated across the country this cycle," said Ed Patru, a National Republican Congressional Committee spokesman.

Busby faltered late in the campaign when she told Hispanic voters that they didn't need "papers" to vote.

She was trying to explain that voters are not required to show identification, but Bilbray's campaign claimed she was prodding illegal immigrants to vote.

Democratic leaders warned Republicans last week that they would not allow the GOP to use immigration as a wedge issue.

"They thought this almost jingoistic approach would work," Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said at a news conference unveiling a poll commissioned by Third Way, a Democratic think tank. "They thought it would be the gay marriage or Willie Horton of 2006."

Horton was the convicted murderer whose violent crime committed while on furlough from prison severely damaged the presidential hopes of then-Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis (D).

The poll, conducted by the Benenson Strategy Group, found that 68 percent of voters in 19 battleground states believe Bush is doing a poor job of enforcing immigration laws.

"If Congressional Republicans want to make immigration the centerpiece of their 2006 campaign, I've got three words for them: Make our day," Schumer continued. "The GOP Congress has had 12 years to tackle this problem but has instead taken a 'see no evil, hear no evil' approach to the Bush White House's failure to enforce immigration law."

Patru said the wins by Cannon and Bilbray underscore that Democrats still face an uphill battle in trying to take back the House.

"The polls are right," Patru said. "Most voters approve of their own Member's job performance; it's very difficult to beat an incumbent; and quality of candidates makes all the difference in the world, which is a problem the Democrats will have to contend with this cycle."

Though not technically an incumbent, Bilbray previously served in Congress and was working as a lobbyist at the time of his June 6 win. He bested an "outsider" in a crowded open primary to secure the Republican nomination before defeating Busby.

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said Republicans are reading too much into those victories.

All Cannon's win proved was that he could survive a Republican primary, Emanuel said at the Thursday news conference. It also revealed the divisions within the GOP on a number of issues, including immigration, he said.

Bilbray took a hard line on immigration, similar to the position of House Republicans — and a sharp contrast to the position of Cannon and Bush.

"Why are they holding field hearings when they should be in a conference room getting things done?" Emanuel asked about the announcement that Republicans will hold hearings across the country on the immigration issue despite both chambers having passed two radically different bills.

"They want to run a single-issue campaign" but lack a unified immigration plan, he said.

GOP 'Suburban Agenda' Gains Traction On Hill (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

In the 1970s, as a young deputy sheriff in King County, Wash., Rep. Dave Reichert (R) had his throat slashed while trying to break up a domestic dispute.

Reichert's attacker spent time in a mental institution, then was released. Later, Sheriff Reichert made an effort to find out what happened to the man. He found he was teaching school in Colorado.

Reichert recounted the tale to fellow Republicans last month as part of an effort to get them to back a bill enabling school districts to tap into national criminal databases before they hire employees.

It turned out that the school district that hired Reichert's attacker had checked Colorado databases but had no idea about his criminal record in the Evergreen State.

The bill Reichert was boosting, the School Safely Acquiring Faculty Excellence Act, passed the House almost unanimously in June — the first legislative success for the GOP's "Suburban Agenda," a set of bills designed to appeal to the majority of American voters who live in the suburbs.

The agenda is the brainchild of Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), one of Congress' most effective moderates, who has sold it to a growing group of conservatives and the House GOP leadership.

Kirk, who represents North-suburban Chicago, told me, "I noticed that the Republican Party was led by mostly Southern and rural Members, starting with [Speaker] Denny Hastert (R-Ill.) from the cornfields of Illinois. And the Democratic Party is led by Members representing the central urban cores. [House Minority Leader] Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is from central San Francisco. The American people live in between.

"Washington may think this is small-bore. It's not the war on terror. But this is an agenda that people care about in their everyday lives — their kids' safety, health care, their ability to send their kids to college."

Besides the school safety measure, the agenda includes a national "401Kids" savings account for college, a screen to block predators from contacting children at online chat rooms and a bill setting standards for computerizing health records.

Kirk got the idea for a suburban agenda in early 2004, made a presentation on it at the party's national convention in New York, formed a House GOP caucus around it and commissioned pollster John McLaughlin to test potential policy items.

From an original core of 22 Members, the suburban caucus has grown to 67. McLaughlin's polling indicates that 70 percent to 80 percent of voters say they'd be more likely to support a Republican candidate knowing that he or she favors items in the agenda.

"I suspect that in the 36 districts where this election will be decided, the suburban agenda is going to be talked about a lot," House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) told me.

Even some Democrats have signed on to specific bills, not entirely to their leadership's liking. All the bills are lead-sponsored by Republicans on the Democrats' 2006 target list, and top Democrats have tried to get their Members to avoid co-sponsoring them.

The school safety bill, for example, was lead-sponsored by Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), who represents suburban Las Vegas. In the Senate, Kirk told me, the bill is being bottled up by Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who's hoping to see Porter defeated.

Another measure that originally attracted bipartisan support is the Health IT Promotion Act, sponsored by Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.), which would set standards for computerizing health records, widely deemed necessary for improving health quality and cost-saving.

However, the two Democrats on the bill, Reps. Sheila Jackson Lee (Texas) and Anna Eshoo (Calif.), abruptly dropped off last week as Johnson's bill was slated for House floor action later this month.

Porter's bill retains the support of Rep. Mark Udall (D-Colo.). And Rep. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.) is co-sponsoring the Deleting Online Predators Act sponsored by Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick (R-Pa.). He also is co-sponsoring her online predator bill.

Reichert, who gained fame for capturing Washington's "Green River killer," is sponsor of the anti-gang bill. Targeted Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.) is sponsoring the "401Kids" bill, and Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) is promoting a measure to help farmers preserve open spaces.

Kirk is already working on a "second wave" of suburban bills, including one sponsored by Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) that would allow workers who lose their jobs to keep their health insurance for life, not just 18 months, as provided under current COBRA law.

Another bill would give teachers permission to search students for dangerous weapons without fear of litigation.

At one time, I thought that Kirk's suburban agenda was small-bore and symbolic, something like former President Bill Clinton's advocacy of school uniforms. It won't cure global warming or capture Osama bin Laden, but he's convinced me it's bigger than that. And so has Democratic hostility.

An About-Face On '527' Groups (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two years ago, Republicans were organizing against new, loosely regulated political groups that were raising money to attack President Bush.

Now, illustrating how roles often reverse in politics, some of the party's conservative activists are trying to stop legislation that would choke off those groups.

The dispute centers on a House bill that would curtail funding for organizations nicknamed 527s, for the section of the tax code that governs them. The groups drew attention during the 2004 presidential campaign, particularly when financier George Soros donated millions of dollars to launch the Media Fund and America Coming Together, or ACT. Those groups ran television commercials against President Bush and registered voters opposed to his re-election.

Republicans want to prevent Mr. Soros and other wealthy Democrats from doing that again. But legislation may not be necessary to achieve their goal: The rich liberals who spent heavily to oust Mr. Bush aren't investing in 527s this election cycle, even though the stakes are high, with control of Congress in play. ACT closed last year and the Media Fund is dormant.

In the 2006 campaign so far, it is right-leaning 527s that are most active. The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-issue group, is leading the charge to kill the Republican bill that would shut down 527s. The Club for Growth received $8 million in donations during the 2004 cycle; for this cycle, its donations as of May tally $5.1 million. "I don't know how they would expect organizations to sit on the sideline and cheer when they are talking about taking a wrecking ball to the First Amendment," says David Keating, the club's executive director.

Mr. Keating's allies include social conservatives, gun-rights groups and college Republicans. Their campaign could stall congressional efforts to enact anticorruption legislation -- a response to a spate of ethics scandals -- because the House attached 527 language to its rewrite of lobbying laws.

The fracas stems from the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law, which banned unlimited "soft-money" donations to political parties from companies, labor unions and wealthy individuals. But many of those donors didn't rein in their spending in the campaign cycle that followed. Instead, they found a new outlet in 527 advocacy groups, which could take unlimited funds from donors, though they ostensibly couldn't explicitly say who to vote for and couldn't coordinate their efforts with the parties.

The House measure would subject 527s to limits like those for political action committees. Individuals could give a maximum of $5,000 per election cycle to groups advocating or opposing federal candidates and $25,000 to groups engaged in partisan voter registration.

The proposal is backed by the Republican National Committee and other party leaders. "There is certainly an opinion in the House that the 527s represent a loophole in campaign-finance laws that they want to see reformed," says New York Republican Rep. Tom Reynolds, who heads the National Republican Congressional Committee.

The House passed the bill in April and attached it to legislation overhauling lobbying rules. The Senate version doesn't have 527 limits. The two chambers are trying to reconcile their bills but failed to do so before Congress's July 4 recess -- in part because of the 527 tussle.

Seven Republican senators have sent a letter to Majority Leader Bill Frist warning they might filibuster the lobbying legislation if it emerges with 527 limits attached to it. "Republicans do not need, and should not attempt, to muzzle their opponents," the letter said. It was signed by Virginia Sen. George Allen and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, two potential 2008 presidential candidates who are wooing the Republican's conservative base.

The debate is causing some philosophical gymnastics. Many Republicans opposed the McCain-Feingold law's limits on party donations, saying that the curbs infringed on free speech. Now, some Republicans argue that extending the donation limits to 527 groups aren't a further infringement.

Democrats who supported the 2002 bill as vital to ending the corrosive influence of money on politics now say such limits on independent groups would infringe on the political discussion.

The dispute comes amid scant evidence that 527 groups will figure significantly in November's midterm elections.

Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a money-and-politics watchdog, says 527s "are certainly not going to play the kind of role they played in the 2004 election in this election."

But, he adds, "That doesn't mean the problem has gone away or that it won't come back in a very big form in the next presidential election."

A recent Campaign Finance Institute study found that in the 2004 election cycle, 527s raised a total of $426 million. By this point in the cycle, they had collected $109 million. As of March of this year, the 527s registered in the 2006 cycle had raised just $57 million -- and most groups are focused on labor or particular issues that aren't as tethered to wealthy donors as the groups in 2004.

Mr. Soros, for instance, has given about $1 million to one 527 group, America Votes, a voter-turnout operation. Most of his other donations this cycle are to traditional party committees and candidates. "George fundamentally believes the effort to elect Democrats has to be united under the banner of the Democratic Party," said Michael Vachon, Mr. Soros's spokesman. "There wasn't sufficient time in 2004 to do that."

House leaders say they will enter negotiations with the Senate determined to see their 527 language included in a final bill overhauling lobbying rules. But as ethics scandals make headlines, lawmakers are under pressure to back down and clear the way for an anticorruption measure. Most Republicans say passage of such a law is vital to restore voter confidence before November's elections. When asked if the House would stick to that position if it meant blocking passage of an ethics and lobbying-overhaul law, Rep. Reynolds, of New York, said: "I don't think you could necessarily say that."

If the House cedes its position, Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner says the rules governing 527s "will be pretty well settled for the 2006 election and the 2008 elections" under a loose system similar to the one in 2004. "The $64,000 question will be what these outside groups do with that. How active will they be? And will they play as big a role in 2008 as they did in the 2004 election?"

Are Americans Ready For A Mormon President? (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren

DOJ_NMG_0038528

BOSTON -- Most traditional barriers to religion in presidential elections have toppled, a new Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found. In particular, the survey to be released Monday showed that anti-Semitism and anti-Catholicism are fading as voter taboos.

But uneasiness about some religions persists. Thirty-seven percent of those questioned said they would not vote for a Mormon presidential candidate -- and 54 percent said no to the prospect of a Muslim in the White House.

In addition, 21 percent said they could not vote for an evangelical Christian. Only 15 percent replied that they would not vote for a Jewish presidential candidate. Just 10 percent of those polled were unwilling to cast ballots for a Catholic chief executive.

"This clearly shows that the old Protestant/Catholic/Jewish distinction has largely eroded in American politics," said David Campbell, a professor of political science at the University of Notre Dame. "That doesn't mean that candidates from religious groups that might be considered to be exotic, in the way that Catholics once were thought to be exotic, wouldn't necessarily be confronted with challenges."

The nationwide survey of 1,321 adults was conducted June 24-27. The poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, poll director Susan Pinkus said.

With no likely Muslim candidate on the presidential horizon, the poll numbers present the greatest threat to a potential contender from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (as the Mormon Church is formally known). Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is a Mormon who is exploring a run for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

"It is something he will have to address," said MerleBlack, a professor of politics at Emory University. "It will be a challenge. It doesn't necessarily kill him as a candidate, but he may have to talk in more detail than he ever has before about his faith."

His religion apparently was no detriment in Massachusetts in 2002, when he easily won election as governor. Massachusetts is one of the most heavily Catholic states in the country, and also one of the most Democratic.

The governor hails from a family that is almost as political as it is Mormon. His late father, George Romney, was a three-term governor of Michigan who also made a brief, unsuccessful run for the Republican presidential nomination. Lenore Romney, the Massachusetts governor's late mother, lost a Republican bid for the U.S. Senate.

Romney, who made a fortune as a venture capitalist, suffered defeat in his maiden political outing in 1994 when he ran against Democrat Edward M. Kennedy for a U.S. Senate seat from Massachusetts.

As a young man, Mitt Romney was a Mormon missionary in France. He graduated from Brigham Young University, an LDS-sponsored institution. Romney has been a Mormon bishop, and was president of the LDS stake -- or congregation -- in Belmont, Mass., where he settled with his family more than 30 years ago.

His great-grandfather had five wives, but Romney has disavowed polygamy -- a practice that no longer is condoned by the LDS hierarchy. The Mormon Church claims about 12.5 million members worldwide, according to the church Web site; almost half are in the United States.

Romney is reluctant to discuss his religion, citing privacy and contending that candidates should not be judged on their "brand of faith." But he regularly describes himself as a Christian who believes that "Jesus Christ is my savior."

But some branches of Christianity are less than eager to embrace the Mormon Church. On its Web site, the Southern Baptist Convention includes Mormonism in a section called "cults, sects and new religious movements." Kenyn Cureton, a vice president of the Baptist convention, said his church does not regard Mormons as Christians.

"They are not orthodox in their beliefs," Cureton said. "They have additional books that they add to the Bible, which evangelical Christians believe is God's word. They believe that there are many, many gods and that you, too, can become a god in your own world. It sounds good, but unfortunately it is not based on sound teaching."

Cureton praised Mormons as "very moral, very family-oriented people." Southern Baptists, he said, "would appreciate that angle. But as far as our beliefs, we would have disagreements."

Republican political consultant Mike Murphy, who advised Romney in his gubernatorial bid, said any discussion about Romney's religion as a potential political obstacle was premature -- and probably misplaced. Murphy also has counseled the Massachusetts governor as he tests the waters for the 2008 presidential race.

"I think the poll is wrong," Murphy said. "I think this is a classic example of how with polling data, you can find something that is not predictive at all."

If his religion was the only thing voters knew about Romney in a "hypothetical candidacy," that could be an impediment, Murphy said.

"If he runs, I think he won't be judged only through that prism," he said. "When you break it down to one aspect for a guy, that is a mistake. Polls, I am sure, said the exact same thing about John F. Kennedy a year before he ran."

DOJ_NMG_0038529

In a Roper poll from June 1960, 35 percent of respondents said either that it might be better not to have a Catholic president, or that they would be against it. Then-Sen. John F. Kennedy addressed the Southern Leadership Conference on the subject of his religion that September, and was elected president two months later.

But Emory University political scientist Black rejected the comparison to earlier political biases against Catholic or Jewish candidates.

"I don't think it is of the same status, because Mormonism has never been seen as a mainstream religion," Black said.

According to Campbell, "The question facing Mitt Romney is, will he be the Mormons' Al Smith -- who was the first Catholic ever to run for president in 1928, and went down in flames. Or will he be the Mormons' John F. Kennedy?"

Atlantic City Casinos Ordered To Close (AP-Y2)

By Angela Delli Santi

AP2, July 2, 2006

Atlantic City's casinos were ordered to close Wednesday, the latest casualty of a state government shutdown that entered its second day Sunday after the Legislature failed to adopt a budget by its July 1 deadline.

The head of the Casino Control Commission ordered gaming in Atlantic City to cease at 8 a.m. Wednesday — the day after the July Fourth holiday — if New Jersey fails to enact a budget by then.

Atlantic City's 12 casinos, which require state monitoring, have waged a court battle to remain open, and an appeals court was weighing the matter Sunday. There was no word on when a ruling would be made, courts spokeswoman Winnie Comfort said.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine said Sunday there was "no immediate prospect of a budget." State parks, beaches and historic sites also were expected to shut down Wednesday.

If the casinos shut down, the state would lose an estimated $2 million in tax revenue each day they stayed closed. Republican Assemblyman Francis Blee, whose district includes the casinos, said it was important for them to remain open.

"We will have tens of thousands of individuals, real people, that are going to be hurt by this," he said. "There will be bread-winners who are not bringing home a paycheck."

Corzine shut down nonessential government services Saturday after the Legislature failed to adopt a budget by its July 1 deadline, leaving the state without the means to spend money. Budget talks became heated this year as Corzine, a Democrat, proposed increasing the state sales tax from 6 percent to 7 percent to help overcome a $4.5 billion budget deficit.

Most Democrats in the Assembly and several Senate Democrats oppose the sales tax increase, fearing voter backlash and reserving any tax increase for property tax reform. Assembly Democrats proposed a series of alternatives, some of which Corzine accepted, but both sides remained $1 billion apart as the budget deadline passed.

About 45,000 state employees were furloughed Saturday. Corzine's order allows him to keep 36,000 state employees working without pay. Services such as state police, prisons, mental hospitals and child welfare were to keep operating.

The lottery and road construction projects were among the first to close. A state appellate panel on Sunday ordered horse tracks closed at the end of business Tuesday. It was not immediately known Sunday whether the horse racing industry would file further appeals to keep harness and thoroughbred tracks open past July 4.

Corzine was expected to meet in private Sunday with top Assembly and Senate leaders. Assembly Budget Committee members were called to the Statehouse and were discussing alternatives to a sales tax increase, panel chairman Lou Greenwald said.

The Senate is scheduled to meet on Monday, and Senate President Richard J. Codey has told senators to be ready to stay in session until a budget is adopted.

"Let's get on with getting this problem solved," Corzine said while touring a state police dispatch center in Hamilton on Sunday, emphasizing he couldn't "sign a bill that doesn't exist."

Republicans, the minority party in both the Assembly and Senate, have expressed frustration.

"I'm appalled that this reached this stage," said Senate Minority Leader Leonard Lance, R-Hunterdon. "It is very unfortunate that the Democratic governor and Democratic majorities in the Legislature could not achieve a budget in place by June 30, and now all the people of New Jersey suffer as a result."

Some lottery sellers — and many customers — were surprised to learn that the games were being put on hold until the budget impasse is resolved.

"People will be angry, but we can't do anything about it," said Umesh Patel, 40, owner of Deli Delight in Ewing. "I don't know how long it's going to be, so let's just see what happens next."

Same-Sex Marriage Debate Drives Intense Fundraising Efforts (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0038530

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

The proposed state constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage in Virginia has sparked an aggressive fundraising effort, with each side of the debate hoping to secure hundreds of thousands of dollars for their cause.

Virginia voters will decide Nov. 7 whether the state constitution should be amended to define marriage solely as a union between a man and a woman. The amendment also would place a ban in the constitution on civil unions, which already are illegal in Virginia.

To help rally amendment opponents, the Commonwealth Coalition, a Richmond-based group, has set an ambitious goal of raising $3 million, organizers said. They want to fund a barrage of radio and television ads in the fall. Meanwhile, the Family Foundation Action, which is organizing amendment supporters, has set a best-case-scenario fundraising goal of $900,000, although activists and volunteers said they expected to raise less than that.

Already, both sides have created Internet fundraising mechanisms and appealed to potential voters through churches and community events across the state. Activists said they plan a direct mailing campaign throughout the summer and fall.

Activists on both sides said money raised for the marriage amendment will go toward outreach, mailers and electronic advertising.

"I don't think there's any question that Virginians are engaged in this fight and that they're stepping up to the plate both as volunteers and contributors," said Claire Guthrie Gastanaga, campaign director for the coalition.

Each organization has to submit its first campaign finance report Sept. 15.

Amendment supporters said they do not feel pressure to raise millions of dollars because they were confident door-to-door activism and church networks would be effective.

"The reality is that we knew from the beginning we might get out-raised and outspent," said Chris Freund, communications director for the Family Foundation. "But an important part about all of this is the grass-roots mechanics. Campaigns tend to get analyzed by their bank account, and sometimes that's not the best reflection of what's really there."

The fundraising drive in Virginia probably will mirror what was seen in other states that have voted on such amendments. In 2004, for instance, supporters and opponents of amendments in 13 states spent more than $13 million, according to the Institute on Money in State Politics. In 2004, supporters of marriage amendments out-raised their opponents. The costliest race was in Oregon, which also was the closest. The two sides spent a total of $5.4 million.

The amendments have passed in each of the 20 states where they have been on the ballot, often by more than 3 to 1.

The struggle over money mirrors the sharp campaigning that has begun. Opponents, who include Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), have argued that the language of the amendment -- that the state will "not create or recognize a legal status for relationships of unmarried individuals" -- is so broad that it also would affect contracts between unwed heterosexual couples. Kaine spoke on that point in a radio interview Thursday.

The amendment "in my view disenfranchises . . . unmarried people, both same-sex or heterosexual couples," Kaine said. But he took his criticism one step further, saying that the proposed amendment was discriminatory:

"There's nothing else in the [Virginia] Bill of Rights that takes away rights of people. We're equal citizens in the state; we ought to be treated equally."

Supporters of the amendment believe that the amendment is necessary to preserve traditional marriage. They also say that current law -- Virginia's Marriage Affirmation Act of 2004 -- mirrors the language in the proposed constitutional amendment and has not invalidated contracts between unwed couples.

"There is a law on the books right now that does the same thing as the amendment and that has never been challenged in court," said Del. Robert G. Marshall (R-Prince William), sponsor of the legislative resolution creating the proposed amendment. "The argument is nothing but a red herring."

Petitions To FDA Sometimes Delay Generic Drugs (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

A procedure designed to alert the Food and Drug Administration to scientific and safety issues is getting a hard look from members of Congress, who say they are concerned that it may be getting subverted by the brand-name drug industry.

Some at the FDA, as well as leaders in the generic drug industry, complain that "citizen petitions" -- requests for agency action that any individual, group or company can file -- are being misused by brand-name drugmakers to stave off generic competition.

The simple act of filing a petition, they say, triggers another round of time-consuming and often redundant reviews of the generics by the FDA, which can take months or years. In the process, consumers continue to pay millions of dollars more for the brand-name drugs.

Statistics collected by the staff of Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who has introduced legislation with Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) that would rein in industry-filed citizen petitions, show that 20 of the 21 brand-name petitions settled by the FDA since 2003 were ultimately rejected.

"The brand-name drug industry has found a major new loophole," Stabenow said in an interview. "The way things stand now, even if the FDA finds that a petition was frivolous and rejects it, [the drug companies] can get hundreds of millions of dollars of profits from the delay."

She and others point to the example of Wellbutrin XL, a hot-selling antidepressant that was facing the prospect of competition from cheaper generics late last year.

By the time Biovail Corp., the drug's maker, filed a citizen petition with the FDA, raising concerns about the safety of its potential rivals, Impax Laboratories Inc. and several other companies had already gone through much of the FDA application and review process for their generic versions of the drug. Impax was looking forward to getting a tentative approval that would bring it considerably closer to making and selling its competing drug.

But because of the citizen petition, the FDA has yet to act, and Biovail still has the market for Wellbutrin XL to itself. Impax is fuming, as are many others in the generic drug industry.

In a letter sent last week to FDA Acting Commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach, Stabenow and Lott estimated that the delay in approving a generic version of the antidepressant Wellbutrin XL is costing consumers $37 million a month.

Impax already sells a twice-a-day version of Wellbutrin; the once-a-day XL version was approved by the FDA in 2003 as the patent on the shorter-lasting formulations was running out.

"Biovail's petition is a sham, designed solely to delay the onset of generic competition for its Wellbutrin XL product," Impax told the FDA in a letter. "Biovail has wasted FDA's and Impax's time and resources and has likely cost the American public millions of dollars in taxes and health care expenditures in selfish pursuit of further undeserved windfall profits."

Biovail rejects the view that it is trying to block generic competition, and in its petition made the case that generic versions of its product may not be biologically equivalent and could be dangerous. As a result, the company -- which has also filed patent infringement suits against its prospective rivals -- asked the FDA to require substantial additional testing before any generic version of Wellbutrin XL is approved.

Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA), which represents brand-name drugmakers, supports the citizen petition process and says the dozens of similar petitions pending with the FDA raise legitimate concerns.

"Most citizen petitions raise important regulatory, legal or scientific issues," said Caroline Loew, the group's senior vice president. "The fact is, the petitions have played a vital role at the FDA since their adoption almost 30 years ago. They have been responsible for important discussions about health and safety, and have been a catalyst for key agency decisions, such as speeding approval of AIDS medicines and implementing rules to protect children from accidental iron poisoning."

Although citizen petitions have raised many important drug policy issues, the Wellbutrin filing is one of several dozen pending that some call "blocking petitions" because they have the effect of delaying approval of a generic alternative. FDA officials said that about 170 citizen petitions are before the agency -- compared with 90 in 1999 -- and that about 30 percent involve industry challenges to generic applications.

FDA Chief Counsel Sheldon Bradshaw told generic drugmakers at a September conference that the agency has been troubled by the number of such petitions. He said they "appear designed not to raise timely concerns with respect to the legality or scientific soundness of approving a drug application, but rather to delay approval by compelling the agency" to review arguments that could have been made months before.

That response caused PhRMA to write to Bradshaw asking for more information. Scott Lassman, PhRMA's assistant general counsel, said the organization found the comments to be "troubling," especially if they could lead to restrictions on how and when citizen petitions could be filed.

More recently, Scott Gottlieb, FDA deputy commissioner for medical and scientific affairs, said in an interview that the agency has instituted internal changes that will allow for quicker rulings on citizen petitions, especially if they are filed close to the time when a decision on a new generic is expected. But he said that he did not believe there had been an increase in "what a reasonable person would call a blocking petition."

"It's very hard to decide what's a blocking petition and what has value without taking a serious look," Gottlieb said. "I think citizen petitions are very important and have to be preserved. The last thing we want to do is close off an avenue of discourse with the agency."

By regulation, all generic drugs must be "bioequivalent" to the brand-name drugs they copy and must have the same effects and dependability. Industry-sponsored citizen petitions often challenge the process by which bioequivalence was tested.

Because generics generally cost 25 percent to 75 percent less than brand-name products, the sums of money at stake can be enormous -- for the brand-name company, the generic maker, patients, insurance companies and government programs. Wellbutrin XL (a once-a-day formula of bupropion hydrochloride with fewer side effects than the original) costs $1 to $5 a pill and earns about $800 million a year for Biovail and GlaxoSmithKline PLC, which developed the drug. An Impax spokesman said his company planned to sell its generic version, if approved by the FDA, for "a considerable discount."

Making changes to the citizen petition process is a high priority for the Generic Pharmaceutical Association. Its president, Kathleen Jaeger, said her group considers blocking petitions to be among the greatest obstacles facing the industry.

"Because of the way the system works now, branded companies have every reason to file citizen petitions," she said. "There's a potentially great benefit, and there's no risk. I can't imagine that this is how the originators of the petitions thought they should work."

This is not the first time that the generic industry has complained about citizen petitions that it believed were unfairly blocking generic applications. The Clinton administration responded to those complaints in 1999 with a proposal that would have changed the way the FDA received and handled citizen petitions. PhRMA strongly opposed the rule, and the Bush administration withdrew it in 2003.

Jaeger said the generic industry was working hard with Congress at that time to close other loopholes in the patent system that allowed makers of brand-name drugs to extend their time for exclusive sales. "We were working so hard to get that legislation passed that we didn't really focus on what was happening with the citizen petition rule," she said, "so some of what we won in Congress, we lost to the citizen petitions."

Stabenow and Lott, who are trying, in their bill, to reduce the petitions, said in their letter to von Eschenbach that "the Senate Appropriations Committee recognized the unintended effect citizen petitions were having on the approval of [generic drug applications] and directed the FDA to provide a written report explaining the process and suggesting improvements. . . . It is our understanding the FDA has not moved forward with this request."

Weather Nixes Shuttle Launch - Again (AP)

By Marcia Dunn

The Associarted Press, July 2, 2006

Stormy weather prevented NASA from launching Discovery for the second day in a row Sunday, extending a yearlong grounding of the space shuttle prompted by persistent trouble with fuel-tank foam.

Launch officials said they would try again Tuesday, on the Fourth of July, after giving the work force some rest and a chance to replenish the shuttle's on-board fuel. The weather was expected to improve by Tuesday, although rain was still in the forecast.

Launch director Mike Leinbach said it will be tight getting Discovery ready for a Tuesday afternoon launch — only the second liftoff of a shuttle since the 2003 Columbia disaster — and that any thunderstorms on Monday could put his team behind.

He halted the countdown just an hour after the seven astronauts boarded the fueled spaceship.

"Looking out the window it doesn't look good today," shuttle commander Steven Lindsey radioed from the cockpit. He noted that July Fourth would be "a good day to launch." It would be the first time NASA has ever launched a crew on the holiday.

The afternoon sky was considerably darker than on Saturday and left NASA with little choice but to call off the flight to the international space station. Thunderstorms were moving in quickly from the west, and lightning was detected within a few miles of the launch pad. The astronauts rode back to crew quarters in the rain.

The back-to-back delays cost NASA an estimated $2 million in overtime pay and fuel costs.

"After a year of preparation and after a very careful countdown, you don't want to get into a rush and do something that is not smart from a weather standpoint," said deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon, chairman of NASA's mission management team. "Nobody is going to remember that we scrubbed a day or two days a year from now. But if we go launch and get struck by lightning or have some other problem, that will be very memorable."

Shannon said he told his team, "What a great gift NASA could give to the nation to return the shuttle to operation on Independence Day."

"If the weather is good, that's exactly what we'll do," he said.

Among the invited guests who returned for the second launch attempt were family members of the perished Columbia astronauts. Vice President Dick Cheney was back in Washington after a brief visit to the space center Saturday.

Last month, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin approved launching the shuttle despite the concerns of two top agency managers who wanted additional repairs to the foam insulation on the external fuel tank. Columbia was brought down by a chunk of flyaway foam, and a piece broke off Discovery's redesigned tank last July, barely missing the shuttle.

"I've kind of steeped myself in this problem over the last month, and I am quite confident that we've got a very good chance of flying and flying safely," Griffin said Sunday in an interview on CNN's "Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer."

Griffin has repeatedly pointed out that if Discovery were damaged during launch, the astronauts always could take refuge on the space station until a rescue vehicle is sent up.

Sen. Bill Nelson (news, bio, voting record), D-Fla., who flew on a space shuttle in 1986 right before the Challenger disaster, defended Griffin's decision on Sunday and said it was an acceptable risk.

NASA's top safety officer and chief engineer recommended at a flight readiness review meeting two weeks ago that the shuttle remain grounded until design changes are made to the foam that insulates 34 brackets on the fuel tank. Without this foam, dangerous ice could form on the metal brackets once the tank is filled with super-cold fuel.

As it is, more than 35 pounds of foam were removed elsewhere in what NASA described as the biggest aerodynamic change ever made to the shuttle's launch system. Shuttle managers said they wanted to fly with only one major change at a time.

Once in orbit, Discovery's crew will test shuttle-inspection techniques, deliver supplies to the space station and drop off German astronaut Thomas Reiter for a six-month stay.

NASA hopes to add an extra day to Discovery's 12-day flight to test spacewalking methods for repairing possible damage to the ship's thermal skin. By replenishing the shuttle's on-board fuel now, the astronauts will have a better chance of getting that additional day in orbit.

Academic Manifesto Takes Root (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

DENVER -- Three years ago, David Horowitz came to Colorado to promote his newly inked Academic Bill of Rights, a plan the radical-turned-conservative activist said was needed to liberate students from an oppressive atmosphere of liberal groupthink at the nation's universities.

Critics had scoffed at the assertion by Mr. Horowitz -- who in the 1960s had been a prominent left-wing student activist -- that freedom on 21st-century campuses was being crushed by a tyrannical regime of political correctness.

But as then-state Senate Majority Leader John Andrews listened to Mr. Horowitz over breakfast at the Brown Palace Hotel, he agreed the time was ripe for an intellectual revolution.

"We were finishing each other's sentences, because this has been a concern for conservatives for such a long time," Mr. Andrews recalled. "I started working on and researching legislation right away."

A few months later, the Colorado legislature became the first to broker a deal with state universities on policies to protect students from political discrimination.

Since then, the Academic Bill of Rights, which says students should be graded and faculty should be hired and promoted without regard to their political or religious beliefs, has inspired the introduction of legislation in 18 states. Ohio and Tennessee struck deals with their universities on protecting academic freedom in lieu of legislation.

Meanwhile, Students for Academic Freedom, the campus watchdog group founded by Mr. Horowitz, has established chapters on more than 150 campuses. Student governments at a dozen universities have approved resolutions supporting the Academic Bill of Rights.

In April, Princeton University became the first institution of higher learning to pass a version of the Student Bill of Rights by a vote of the entire student body, surprising even Mr. Horowitz, who had no hand in the election.

"I didn't engineer that. They took the Academic Bill of Rights I designed, made their own Student Bill of Rights and got it passed," said Mr. Horowitz, who visited Princeton shortly after the plebiscite. "That shows it's taken on a life of its own."

Of course, it hasn't all been good news. A well-known conservative writer and activist, Mr. Horowitz was never the most popular guy on campus, and the academic freedom movement has cemented his status as a persona non grata.

Demonstrators greet Mr. Horowitz's every college appearance. At Duke University, associate professor Diane Nelson urged students to pull off their T-shirts to protest his March 7 speech. During a talk last year at Butler University in Indiana, he was hit in the face with a pie.

For all his success in raising the issue before state legislatures, no state has actually approved an academic freedom bill, despite the flurry of hearings and committee votes.

That is fine with Mr. Horowitz. The strategy of taking the issue to the legislatures was aimed at focusing attention on the issue, with the hope that universities would take up the gauntlet themselves and not on force-feeding diversity by statute.

"The agenda was always to force university administrators to pay attention, because there's nobody to hold them accountable," Mr. Horowitz said.

Still, the tactic has backfired with some small-government Republicans.

"The left knows there's a battle on, and they're in it," Mr. Horowitz said. "Conservatives are still hung up on this legislation thing -- they don't want to do anything that requires legislation. It's going to take a little time."

Mr. Horowitz's success with state legislatures has caught the attention of the left. The Center for American Progress, funded by Democratic billionaire George Soros, last year started Campus Progress, which follows the conservative movement at universities.

In February, a coalition of teachers unions and civil-liberties groups, including the center, founded Free Exchange on Campus, an organization designed to counter Mr. Horowitz and his quest.

Jamie Horwitz, who acts as a spokesman both for Free Exchange on Campus and the American Federation of Teachers, said the opposition was slow to react because "we dismissed it at first as the rantings of an ideologue."

"But when the states starting proposing legislation, starting with Colorado, we decided to get involved," Mr. Horwitz said. "We've tried to raise awareness about what's really going on here."

On its face, few would disagree with the Academic Bill of Rights, a two-page document that outlines principles protecting the free-inquiry and free-speech rights of professors and students while stressing the importance of intellectual diversity.

It says that professors should use their class time for education -- not indoctrination -- and that neither the political nor religious beliefs of students and faculty should be a factor in grades or promotion.

Despite the document's political neutrality, critics fear that if it becomes state law, it will be used as a hammer to promote conservative thought and squelch liberal dissent.

"I think what they're doing is curtailing academic freedom," said Adam Jentleson, policy and advocacy manager of Campus Progress. "I don't think they're really making that much progress because every state that's considered it has either voted it down or referred it to committee."

In 2003, the American Association of University Professors condemned the Academic Bill of Rights as "a grave threat to academic freedom." Last year, however, the organization was one of 27 higher-education groups to sign a statement endorsing "intellectual pluralism," grievance procedures for students and other tenets of the document.

"That was pretty huge for us," said Sara Dogan, president of Students for Academic Freedom. "They never would have done that if we hadn't pointed out the problems and asked them to do something about it. Unfortunately, their member organizations [universities] haven't picked up on it."

Indeed, university professors have been the document's biggest critics, arguing that the cure is worse than the purported disease. Already, they say, the debate has created a climate of self-censorship on campus as professors increasingly steer clear of politically charged topics, such as global warming.

"Wouldn't it be worse to have laws that restrict free speech in the classroom?" Mr. Horwitz said.

Professors stay silent

Most professors aren't the all-powerful gods that they're made out to be, he said, noting that only one-third of university faculty are tenured.

"What I hear more and more is that the majority of faculty are afraid to speak their views because they have no protection," Mr. Horwitz said.

Critics also insist that the problem isn't as bad as the academic freedom movement claims, despite hundreds of examples ranging from professors who routinely bash Republicans in class to those who penalize students for expressing conservative views.

At the Students for Academic Freedom conference in April, however, Mr. Horwitz said many of the horror stories boiled down to students disgruntled over bad grades.

"I went to the conference and listened to a handful of students. Most of the time it was, 'I'm active in conservative politics, and I got a professor I didn't like and got a bad grade, and it's because he was biased,' " said Mr. Horwitz.

"Where's the evidence? This raises questions in higher education when it starts to look like a witch hunt."

Not so, says Pennsylvania state Sen. Gibson Armstrong. After legislators held five hearings at state universities to gauge academic freedom, wrapping up May 31, Mr. Armstrong said he's convinced there's "a serious problem."

"They [critics] point to one case that turned out to be not true," said Mr. Armstrong.

"But I've got a lot of these stories and some of them have to be true. It's hypocritical -- if there were one case of a problem with gender or racial diversity, the university would be apoplectic."

In fact, he said, that did happen. At Penn State University, there was a campuswide uproar after several black students received racist e-mails in 2001. It was later discovered the e-mails were sent from a computer lab at Temple University in Philadelphia.

"They spent $10 million to stop a problem that wasn't even theirs. Here we report numerous problems with diversity of thought, and they turn a blind eye. It's a double standard," he said.

In March, the Pennsylvania House passed academic freedom language in an amendment to the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act, now pending in the Senate.

Churchill ignites a firestorm

To those who ask for evidence of liberal bias in academia, Mr. Horowitz has two words: Ward Churchill. The University of Colorado ethnic-studies professor transformed the debate in February 2005, when it was publicized that he wrote an essay comparing victims of the September 11 terrorist attack to Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann.

"Churchill is huge," Mr. Horowitz said. "I don't think this movement would have happened without Ward Churchill. I know I wouldn't have written 'The Professors' if it hadn't been for Ward Churchill."

The specter of the long-haired, chain-smoking, research-faking, America-bashing Mr. Churchill molding impressionable young minds turned Mr. Horowitz's pet project into a national sensation almost overnight. Suddenly, it became difficult to argue that liberal bias on campus was the product of an overheated right-wing imagination.

Nowhere was his influence greater than in Colorado, where Mr. Churchill literally rescued the movement. After the Democrats took back the legislature in November 2004, state Sen. Bob Hagedorn introduced a bill that would have erased the state's groundbreaking Memorandum of Understanding with the state universities on academic freedom.

A few weeks later, the Churchill story broke, and Mr. Hagedorn, a Democrat, withdrew the bill.

"Everything changed," recalled Mr. Andrews, now a fellow with the Claremont Institute. "Churchill became the poster boy for abuse in the classroom and destroyed whatever chance Hagedorn thought he had to pass this protective layer on university professors."

The publicity gave Republicans an unexpected bonus issue on the education front. Whether academic freedom has the political mojo to sway voters will be tested this year in Maine.

As vice chairman of the Maine Republican Party, Dan Schuberth is on a mission to elect Republicans to the state House, where they trail Democrats by just one seat, and academic freedom may be the issue that gets him there.

"This is something people are talking about, on talk radio, on the street, in the papers," Mr. Schuberth said. "I think it's a winning issue for us, to be honest. It's playing well, and any candidate who talks about academic freedom is going to win support."

Last month, the Maine Republican Party became the first in the nation to add academic freedom language to its platform. The decision came after an academic freedom bill failed by one vote in the state House by a straight party-line vote.

Calls for the legislation came after a stir over liberal bias at Bates College. In February 2004, a Bates staffer accidentally copied an e-mail back to the College Republicans calling them a "bunch of thugs" for sponsoring a seminar on conservative politics.

In the ensuring outcry, the Bates student government passed a resolution calling for an Academic Bill of Rights. The staff member apologized and was reprimanded.

In May 2005, during legislative hearings on academic freedom, a Bowdoin College student testified that his early Christian literature professor had thrown a Bible to the floor on the first day of class.

The events created a political climate ripe for the Academic Bill of Rights.

"It's phenomenal. It's the archetypal grass-roots campaign," said Mr. Schuberth.

"It's just common sense, and Maine people are all about common sense," Mr. Schuberth said. "When you talk to Maine people about what they want for their kids, one thing they want is to be able to send them to college without having them indoctrinated."

Maine Republicans have vowed to introduce another academic freedom bill if they win the House in November. Mr. Schuberth is confident that the state will ultimately approve such legislation, as long as the unthinkable doesn't happen.

"Heaven forbid we get a Republican professor in there who insists Ronald Reagan was the greatest president ever and [Franklin Roosevelt] was a communist," said Mr. Schuberth.

Representatives Relish Being Made A Mockery (WT)

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

No matter how hard members of Congress who appear on the "Better Know a District" comedy segment try to beat the system, Stephen Colbert makes them end up looking silly. But several lawmakers said doing the spoof spot on "The Colbert Report" on TV's Comedy Central actually has raised their profiles back home, particularly among young folks.

"You have to have the right attitude," said Rep. Phil Gingrey, Georgia Republican, whose 11th District was featured on the cable show in April.

"It's a comedy show; he's a comedian, and you're not," he said. "Even though I tried to be funny, all my funny stuff ended up on the cutting-room floor. I just had to leave hoping that when they slice and dice and put it all back together again, I wouldn't look too stupid."

Indeed, any publicity is good publicity.

Mr. Gingrey, whose thick mustache was admired by Mr. Colbert, who asked to stroke it, said there was an unexpected byproduct of doing the show -- attention from young constituents and House staffers.

Rep. Earl Blumenauer of Oregon had a similar experience when his 3rd District was profiled in May. "I had never watched it, but I was stunned at the number of e-mails I got almost instantly," the Democrat said.

But Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, regrets his appearance and called Mr. Colbert a "third-rate" comedian.

"It was a stupid waste of time, and he is two stooges short of a good routine," Mr. Frank said.

Still, the segment is among the more popular on "The Colbert Report," a spin-off of "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart," with more than 1 million viewers.

Mr. Colbert so far has targeted 25 members in the 435-member House, splicing and dicing sometimes two-hour-long camera sessions into five-minute clips.

Mr. Blumenauer said his appearance was fun, even though the two argued about global warming and Mr. Colbert called him "an America-hating terrorist-lover hiding behind a stupid bow tie."

"We tend to take ourselves too seriously in this business," Mr. Blumenauer said.

Several lawmakers said that although their staffers prepped them with clips of past segments, they were not prepared for Mr. Colbert's creative editing.

Mr. Colbert recently hazed Rep. Lynn Westmoreland, a Republican from Georgia's 8th District, for not writing a single piece of legislation during his nearly two years in Congress.

However, Mr. Westmoreland co-sponsored a bill that would require the Ten Commandments be displayed in the Capitol.

When asked, the lawmaker was able to name just three of the Commandments. "I can't name them all," he said.

Democratic Rep. Brad Sherman did the show with gusto, even filming a spoof pornographic movie with Mr. Colbert because his 27th District in California is home to many pornographers.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who has been a guest on "The Daily Show," said the Colbert segment is "humorous," but wouldn't recommend members make an appearance.

"I would think it would be OK to go on if you were live to tape, but don't subject yourself to a comic's edit unless you want to be made a fool of," the California Democrat said. "I think: Why would anybody go on there? Not that I don't think they have all done very well."

Mrs. Pelosi added that she watches the show "all the time."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, by contrast, said he had never heard of the show.

"I'm culturally illiterate," he told The Washington Times.

The segment has an educational element, with Mr. Colbert outlining the district's demographics, history and oddball trivia. He also gives each district the adjective "fightin'," as in the "Fightin' Fifth" in Oregon.

He talked to that district's Rep. Darlene Hooley about the state's medicinal-marijuana laws. The Democrat laughed heartily when she was asked: "Are you high right now?"

Mr. Colbert, widely panned for his performance bashing President Bush at the White House Correspondents Dinner, commonly asks guests: "George W. Bush: great president or the greatest president?"

Mr. Colbert has featured five Republicans and 18 Democrats, and also did a mock "retiring" of Texas' 22nd District when Republican Rep. Tom DeLay announced his retirement, putting together press clips for a fake interview with the former majority leader.

He moved California's 50th District to the "never existed to me" category when former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham resigned amid a bribery scandal. The Republican is now serving prison time, and Mr. Colbert's segment was renamed as a 434-part series.

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

The typically rowdy fans who attended the 45th Annual Roll Call Congressional Baseball Game on Thursday night were pretty tame this year. Until the seventh inning, when embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who's teetering dangerously close to the edge of indictment, got up to bat as a pinch hitter.

That's when a small group of Republicans in the stands starting chanting, "Cold hard cash, cold hard cash."

Their taunting — a reference to that $90,000 in alleged bribe money that FBI agents found in Jefferson's freezer — didn't last long. Jefferson popped out meekly and headed off the field almost as soon as he got up to bat.

One GOP source told HOH that "some of the higher-ups" in Republican ranks thought the hecklers, who were sitting down close to home plate, had "crossed the line." But Jefferson's communications director, Melanie Roussell, said the Congressman wasn't bothered by the chanting, because he didn't hear it.

She said she didn't hear any chants either. "Ney, not a one," she joked in an e-mail, cleverly referencing the Republican who seems to be in dire danger of indictment — Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio).

Softball Gets Downright Scary. No, that wasn't Jaws from the James Bond flicks who you saw Thursday at the Congressional baseball game. That was Spicer, Sean Spicer, the recently departed spokesman for the House Republican Conference, whose mouth has been wired shut for a week and a half.

Spicer, who was scheduled to start his new job last Monday flacking for the U.S. trade representative's office, got whacked in the face during a Congressional softball game on June 22 and wound up in intensive care for four days. Now he's on a diet of applesauce and Frappacinos.

Spicer got up to pitch for his team, the Ugly Mugs, during their game against the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The first pitch was so-so, he recalled Friday.

"The second one was a dream," he mumbled through the wires keeping his jaw shut for the next five weeks. "That dream pitch got jammed in my face."

Three teammates grabbed some ice from a cooler, packed it on Spicer's face and drove him to George Washington University Hospital. His entire jaw had been shattered.

"One side of my jaw was going one way, the other side was going another way, my teeth were smashed out, and I was spitting up blood," he said.

Four days of intensive care, two hours of surgery and many stitches later, Spicer had a plate in his face, wires in his mouth, and, luckily, painkillers in his bloodstream.

He was supposed to start his new job at USTR on June 26 and travel to Geneva for World Trade Organization meetings. Obviously, that didn't happen. "I got to go on a different trip," Spicer said. "Four days in ICU, wasn't exactly the idea of 'travel.'"

Still, tough nut that he is, Spicer, after being released from the hospital on Monday, started his agency job on Thursday, wires and all. So, that guy at USTR you can't understand on the phone — that's him.

Though many a friend and colleague have threatened to wire Sean Spicer's mouth shut over the years, nobody wanted to see it happen this way! HOH wishes him a speedy recovery and the dinner of his dreams when he gets those wires off.

Pity the Fool. Attention House Democrats: Don't go on "The Colbert Report" if you care what House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) thinks.

At her press conference Thursday, when asked what she thinks of Stephen Colbert's "Better Know a District" series, Pelosi said: "Well, it is humorous; I wouldn't recommend that anyone go on the show. I would think it would be okay to go on if you were live to tape, but don't subject yourself to a comic's edit unless you want to be made a fool of."

That said, Pelosi said she watches Colbert's show "all the time" and she thinks, "why would anybody go on there? Not that I don't think they have all done very well."

To the Moon, Alice. While Gabrielle Giffords, the apparent Democratic frontrunner in Arizona's 8th district to replace retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), stumps for votes this July Fourth holiday, her boyfriend will be out of this world. Sure, he's in love and all that, but we mean literally out of this world.

Giffords has been dating U.S. Navy Commander Mark Kelly for over a year. At press time, Kelly, a combat veteran of the first Persian Gulf War, was slated to pilot the Space Shuttle Discovery, scheduled to launch from the Kennedy Space Center.

"This is such an exciting weekend for Mark; we're all so proud of him as he pilots the shuttle for the first time," his gal/House candidate said. "It's so fitting that it's happening over the Fourth of July weekend — so many of us are still inspired by President Kennedy's dream of exploring the new frontier."

If They Build It, Will Jesus Come? (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

The Republican-controlled House and Senate don't seem to be able to agree on much these days. There have been bloody, public battles over immigration, estate taxes, voting rights and, of course, the important constitutional amendment to ban flag-burning.

But the biggest fight may have occurred last week over a House proposal to build a fenced walkway that would run across the now-closed east front of the Capitol -- the area where the long-delayed Capitol Visitor Center is being built.

House folks, led by Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) himself -- he's said to be "passionate" about the idea -- want the walkway. "It's so the American people get a view of all sides of the Capitol," a House Republican aide said. "They deserve to have a walkway to see it."

House backers say the walkway will cost only $60,000, the aide said, adding "that's not all that much. They [Senate aides] claim the cost is $95,000, but we don't know what that is for, some $35,000 in incidental costs, like a slush fund."

The walkway would be about 10 feet wide -- 30 feet in some spots -- and the fence would be six feet tall on the sides, though at one point, in front of the Capitol steps, it would drop to 3 1/2 feet.

Senate detractors say this proposal is exceptionally stupid, even for Congress. One Senate aide opined that House members wanted it because they're "cranky over there about the delays with the visitors center -- now a year behind schedule, so they want to take people there and show progress."

The Upper Chamber folks rather uncharitably say the mysterious fence dips to only four feet high so Hastert and House members can walk down the steps and have their pictures taken with constituents.

"We are an active construction zone" on the Senate side, with "trucks coming in and out daily, dropping off building materials," a Senate aide said, so safety is an issue. Also, "someone could hop the fence, then you have an intruder and security issue, requiring additional police. And what if there's an evacuation?" People leaving the Capitol would be impeded by the fence.

But the aide for the People's House said these things are being overblown. "We're saying it is safe, so why not let citizens see that side of the Capitol? The House is prepared to move on this," he said, and if the Senate won't go along, "it'll show the Senate doesn't want people to have access to the view."

That means, however, that the walkway will end halfway across the Capitol, making it more a dead-end chute than a walkway.

"The Jesus Lady could come back," another congressional aide said, referring to Rita Warren , a 77-year-old, white-haired woman who, until the construction began, appeared daily at the east entrance steps with a life-size mannequin in white robes and a beard. The well-known duo might camp in the walkway, that aide said.

Warren, who calls herself "a lobbyist for God," had protested the closing of the Capitol steps to build the visitor center, telling The Hill newspaper it was "a waste of a billion dollars."

"The good Lord is waiting until it's finished."

No reason to wait much longer. The fence, at least on the House side, is scheduled to go up this week.Abramoff Can't Get a Break

Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine , after a lengthy investigation, reported last week that although disgraced lobbyist and Loop favorite Jack Abramoff had boasted of ridding immigrant smugglers and sweatshop owners in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands of an annoying interim U.S. attorney, he actually had nothing to do with it.

The interim official, Frederick Black , said President Bush replaced him in 2001 because Black had called for an investigation of Abramoff and had supported applying federal immigration law to the Marianas, which Abramoff's clients opposed.

The inspector general concluded that the new nominee had already been chosen under normal selection procedures, "well before Abramoff tried to become involved in the process," a Justice Department official said.

"We concluded that Abramoff played no role in the selection of Black's replacement. However, when informed of the White House's decision to select a new prosecutor, Abramoff attempted to take credit with his Guam contacts for the selection, even though Abramoff had played no role in it."

Well, it was a good try.Speaking of Legitimate Elections . . .

More from the now-famous taped luncheon chat between Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov last week in Moscow. All very cordial, we were assured -- until the tape proved completely otherwise.

During the talk, Rice, speaking of Iraq, said: "This is the only legitimately elected government in the Middle East with a possible exception of Lebanon, which was a peculiar election."

Not sure what she means by Lebanon, but what about the Palestinian territories? Because Hamas won, it's not legitimately elected? What about Israel?

Lessons Learned (WT)

By By James Loy

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

History shows us that Congress follows a time-honored pattern of reacting to the aftermath of a major tragedy with an impulsive first response followed by years of "perfecting" the original legislation.

After the 1989 Exxon-Valdez oil spill in the pristine Prince William Sound, Alaska, Congress and the executive branch reacted with the Oil Pollution Act of 1990. One of my last acts as commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard in 2002 was to sign the 110th clarification on how to implement that law. Though we thought the act was the right response at the time, experience later showed that we needed to make adjustments. America finds itself in such a pattern yet again in the debate over the future of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and its place within the Department of Homeland Security.

Most would agree that the deficiencies of FEMA stood out in sharp relief in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. There is much less consensus on how best to correct these deficiencies. There are currently 11 bills pending in Congress that address the future of FEMA. Some would re-establish FEMA as an independent agency, while others acknowledge the value of leaving FEMA within DHS and would simply restructure the agency. Some would give the FEMA director additional powers.

None of these proposals, however, address the central problem: The Homeland Security Act of 2002 diluted the FEMA director's focus on the agency's core mission -- response and recovery -- by requiring him to wear an additional hat as the DHS under-secretary for emergency preparedness and response (later changed to the under-secretary for federal emergency management).

This dual role within the DHS bureaucracy necessarily prevents him from concentrating 100 percent of his time on improving FEMA's performance. In the current iteration, the FEMA director is required to devote significant attention to the administrative, budget and policy issues that are part and parcel of managing a directorate within the overall DHS bureaucracy. To once and for all set FEMA up for success, Congress must restore the FEMA director's singular responsibility -- making FEMA run well.

At the same time, it is important to keep FEMA within DHS, preserving its access to the agencies and assets it needs to perform well during an emergency. Those who advocate reverting FEMA to the independent, cabinet-level agency that it was during the Clinton Administration fail to recognize the dramatically different post-September 11 security environment we live in today. The creation of the Department of Homeland Security was a response to new threats facing our country. It pulled together 22 disparate agencies under one roof responsible for preventing and responding to disasters. It made the secretary of homeland security the president's designated coordinator for disaster preparedness and response, regardless of the threat source. It does not seem wise to pull the rug out from under him by reverting FEMA to a stand-alone agency, thus removing the major response and recovery agency from his oversight.

FEMA is charged with protecting the nation from all hazards -- natural or man-made. To effectively fulfill this mission, FEMA needs ready access to and association with the communication and law enforcement assets that exist within DHS. To remove FEMA from that synergy would require building bureaucratic bridges back to the other DHS response and recovery agencies in order to do its job. This would be a redundant effort, costing time and money that we simply don't have.

Ample precedent already exists for the creation of FEMA as an independent agency within DHS. Both the Coast Guard and the Secret Service exist within DHS, but their leaders are focused solely on running their agencies and report directly to the secretary. They can be a model for FEMA.

It is reasonable to expect that we will need to make adjustments to the initial solutions we quickly devise after major disasters. In the debate over FEMA's future, we should ensure that the FEMA director can focus all of his time, energy and talent on guiding the agency in responding effectively and efficiently to the American people in the event of a disaster. That is best accomplished by restoring FEMA's independent agency status, offloading the director's responsibilities of being double-hatted as an under secretary and keeping the agency and the director inside DHS with direct access to the secretary during a crisis.

Adm. James Loy is the national co-chairman of ProtectingAmerica.org. He is the former commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard and former deputy secretary of Homeland Security.

We Need Fewer Secrets (WP)

By Jimmy Carter

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

The U.S. Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) turns 40 tomorrow, the day we celebrate our independence. But this anniversary will not be a day of celebration for the right to information in our country. Our government leaders have become increasingly obsessed with secrecy. Obstructionist policies and deficient practices have ensured that many important public documents and official actions remain hidden from our view.

The events in our nation today -- war, civil rights violations, spiraling energy costs, campaign finance and lobbyist scandals -- dictate the growing need and citizens' desire for access to public documents. A poll conducted last year found that 70 percent of Americans are either somewhat or very concerned about government secrecy. This is understandable when the U.S. government uses at least 50 designations to restrict unclassified information and created 81 percent more "secrets" in 2005 than in 2000, according to the watchdog coalition OpenTheGovernment.org.

Moreover, the response to FOIA requests often does not satisfy the transparency objectives or provisions of the law, which, for example, mandates an answer to information requests within 20 working days. According to the National Security Archives 2003 report, median response times may be as long as 905 working days at the Department of Agriculture and 1,113 working days at the Environmental Protection Agency. The only recourse for unsatisfied requesters is to appeal to the U.S. District Court, which is costly, timely and unavailable to most people. Policies that favor secrecy, implementation that does not satisfy the law, lack of a mandated oversight body and inaccessible enforcement mechanisms have put the United States behind much of the world in the right to information.

Increasingly, developed and developing nations are recognizing that a free flow of information is fundamental for democracy. Whether it's government or private companies that provide public services, access to their records increases accountability and allows citizens to participate more fully in public life. It is a critical tool in fighting corruption, and people can use it to improve their own lives in the areas of health care, education, housing and other public services. Perhaps most important, access to information advances citizens' trust in their government, allowing people to understand policy decisions and monitor their implementation.

Nearly 70 countries have passed legislation to ensure the right to request and receive public documents, the vast majority in the past decade and many in middle- and low-income nations. While the United States retreats, the international trend toward transparency grows, with laws often more comprehensive and effective than our own. Unlike FOIA, which covers only the executive branch, modern legislation includes all branches of power and some private companies. Moreover, new access laws establish ways to monitor implementation and enforce the right, holding agencies accountable for providing information quickly and fully.

What difference do these laws make?

In South Africa, a country emerging from authoritarian rule under the apartheid system, the act covering access to information gives individuals an opportunity to demand public documents and hold government accountable for its actions, an inconceivable notion just a decade ago. Requests have exposed inappropriate land-use practices, outdated HIV-AIDS policies and a scandalous billion-dollar arms deal. In the United Kingdom, the new law forced the government to reveal the factual basis for its decision to go to war in Iraq.

In Jamaica, one of the countries where the Carter Center has worked for the past four years to help establish an access-to-information regime, citizens have used their right to request documents concerning the protection of more than 2,500 children in public orphanages. Two years ago there were credible allegations of sexual and physical abuse. In the past year, a coalition of interested groups has made more than 40 information requests to determine whether new government recommendations were implemented to ensure the future safety and well-being of these vulnerable children.

Even in such unlikely places as Mali, India and Shanghai, efforts that allow access to information are ensuring greater transparency in decision making and a freer flow of information.

In the United States, we must seek amendments to FOIA to be more in line with emerging international standards, such as covering all branches of government; providing an oversight body to monitor compliance; including sanctions for failure to adhere to the law; and establishing an appeal mechanism that is easy to access, speedy and affordable. We cannot take freedom of information for granted. Our democracy depends on it.

Doctors, Lawyers, Priests -- And Journalists? (WSJ)

By Dick Thornburgh

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

National debate over media disclosure of the government's bank-records investigation has so far focused on newspapers' editorial decisions to publicize this information. But it's only a matter of time until the spotlight turns. Questions will soon be raised about who leaked that information to the press, and whether or not Washington has a right to force a reporter to reveal the leaker's name.

Ever since then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller went to jail for 85 days last year rather than comply with a subpoena for her sources in the Valerie Plame case, the media has been pushing for a federal shield that would grant reporters unprecedented special protection from revealing sources during litigation. The Senate is now taking steps toward providing such a reporter-source privilege with the Free Flow of Information Act, which is likely to be sent to the floor for a vote over the next few weeks. The act contains an exception for national security that might well apply to the bank-records investigation, which was conducted as a means to track terrorist activity.

But for the longer term, the bill has troubling implications. In its current form it contains a shield so broad -- and a definition of journalism so vague -- that it upends what up to now has been a reasonable balance between protecting reporters from disclosing sources and preserving the right to the fullest possible access to truth in the courtroom for plaintiffs and defendants.

Important as it may be to safeguard the source confidentiality that is one element of a free press, we have an equal or greater interest in ensuring that truthful evidence is presented in the courtroom. Over the years, on a case-by-case basis, our courts have done a pretty good job of balancing these occasionally conflicting principles -- as they have with attorney-client, doctor-patient and priest-penitent privileges. Congress has recognized this and resisted the temptation to enact laws that would override such judicial balancing acts.

In 1975, for example, the Judicial Federal Rules Advisory Committee recommended that Congress codify the doctor-patient, priest-penitent and attorney-client privilege, among others -- though not the reporter-source privilege. Congress declined to do this, determining that the development and application of privileges that might keep crucial information from the courtroom are best left to "principles of common law" and the "reason and experience" of the judicial system.

Unfortunately, the Senate has responded to recent controversy over media sources by turning its back on that wisdom and restraint. The result is a piece of legislation that could do more harm than good.

Under the proposed law, for example, a person could illegally reveal someone else's private health-care or employment records and be completely protected from any consequences, as long as he or she used a reporter to reveal the information, the reporter declined to reveal the source and there were no other ways to learn the identity of that person. A disgruntled employee could illegally share a company's trade secrets and intellectual property with the world -- again with no concerns about being unmasked, as long as the only way to identify the wrong-doer was by questioning a reporter. People on either side of a lawsuit might well be emboldened to leak to the press documents that the court has placed under seal. In all of these cases, if any party sought to identify the source of a leak known only to a reporter, judges would no longer have the discretion to weigh all the facts to determine what would be fair and in the interest of justice.

Another serious failing in the proposed legislation is its overly broad definition of who is a "journalist," and what constitutes "journalism." The bill does not require that a journalist be someone professionally engaged in the legitimate reporting of news, or that the information at issue be obtained in the course of legitimate newsgathering. Nor does it require that reporters be accountable to any objective standard of journalism ethics. The only requirement is that the "reporter" be paid for the work and be part of an organization that regularly processes and researches information. This is so broad that it could be used to give immunity to nonreporters engaged in nonjournalistic activities -- including those with ties to terrorist or criminal organizations.

It is important to note that most leaking is not whistle-blowing, and that people who reveal trade secrets, private medical or tax information are rarely whistle-blowers. Employees, including government employees, who report legal or regulatory infractions or fraud to the proper authorities are protected from retaliation by a variety of whistle-blower provisions, none of which are or can be affected by media-shield laws.

If Congress insists on breaking with longstanding tradition and precedent to categorically keep certain types of truthful information from the courtroom, it needs to make sure that the privilege is as clearly defined as possible, and has a reasonable balancing test that allows the protection to be superseded when necessary.

Perhaps the most efficient way to ensure such a balance would be to base media-shield legislation on the long practical experience our federal courts have with this issue. All 13 federal circuits strike a balance between unfettered protection of journalistic sources, the right to truth in the courtroom, and the need to prevent media protection from encouraging or protecting law-breakers. Indeed, six circuits have explicitly adopted a balancing test that looks at whether the information is relevant to the case; whether the information can be reasonably obtained by other means; and whether there is a legitimate interest in disclosure of the information.

At its best, the media supports democracy by providing the public with the information that citizens need to exercise their rights. But given the potential for abuse of that critical role, any media shield must, in the interests of justice, be carefully crafted.

We Were Wrong About Term Limits (LAT)

By Rob Stutzman

DOJ_NMG_0038542

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

THE POLITICAL landscape is always evolving. Sometimes violently (as with 9/11 or Watergate), other times gradually, through shifting demographics or economic change. Dogmas come, dogmas go, political winds shift back and forth, tossing us about.

About 20 years ago, the notion of term limits for officeholders became dogma for the center-right. Voters wanted to punish self-dealing politicians by eliminating their permanency. Career politicians out, citizen politicians in! Or so the idea went.

Fourteen years have passed since California voters approved legislative term limits, restricting Assembly members to a trio of two-year terms and state senators to two four-year stints.

I have always been a loyal conservative supporter of term limits — not as any kind of fundamental prerequisite for a healthy democracy, but more as a suitably blunt instrument to correct the arrogance of elected officials not mindful enough of those who elected them. Public service, I reasoned, should be an avocation, not a permanent vocation. And the public interest would be protected by preventing the development of entrenched, powerful political dynasties, such as Willie Brown's marathon 14-year rule of the Assembly.

But after 16 years of working in California politics, I've changed my mind. We were wrong. Term limits haven't delivered what we hoped for. They have, in fact, harmed the public interest.

For starters, they have done little to eliminate the permanent political class. Today's legislators, from whichever party, are all too often ex-staffers or relatives of the politicians the limits uprooted from office. (Six direct relatives of term-limited Assembly members ran last month for the vacated seats, though this time only two of them won.) The goal of creating a true "citizen" Legislature has gone unrealized.

Term limits also have led to a revolving door of Assembly speakers who are so temporary and beholden to the special interests that helped put them in power that at times they function without complete authority. While eliminating its evils, we didn't fully account for the virtues of an imperial speakership.

For example, just look at last year, when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger attempted to negotiate his reform agenda with the Legislature and avoid a contentious special election. The Assembly has a dynamic and charismatic leader in Fabian Nuñez, who I believe genuinely wants to accomplish great things for California, and who knows that we have a broken budget system that needs to be fixed. Yet, for those of us close to those negotiations, it was clear that Speaker Nuñez did not have the ultimate authority to sign off on a deal. The ultimate power resided with the California Teachers Assn.

This is not a criticism of the speaker but an indictment of our system. It's difficult to imagine Brown having to bow to an interest group. A strong speakership is good for the state, but it can't exist under term limits. Outside interest groups — business, labor, trial lawyers, doctors — are more powerful now than before.

This situation is exacerbated by noncompetitive legislative districts. When 90% of legislators are immune from voters in a general election, it should come as no surprise that the citizens are easily forgotten under the Capitol dome.

To launch a political career, one must simply win a primary election. Primary campaigns in each party have become the new battleground between interest groups, which can get more for their dollars because the electorate is smaller. Freshly minted legislators often feel they owe their careers to whichever interest group funded their first successful race.

We know from the fairly drawn state legislative districts of the 1990s that requiring roughly 25% of the seats to be competitive will give us a Legislature that more accurately reflects California.

The proof is in how Brown was finally displaced as speaker after the 1994 elections. Although one motivation for term limits was to get rid of Brown, it was competitive seats and a new GOP majority that took Brown's name off the speaker's door before term limits could get him.

The real reform that we need is redistricting. Politicians from both parties raised millions of dollars to defeat Schwarzenegger's ballot initiative last year, but Democratic leaders promised to work with the governor to pass new legislation this year.

If that means also abolishing or at a minimum extending term limits, then Schwarzenegger and the Republicans should take that deal. It would be a win-win. We need competitive legislative races, and it is high time to admit that term limits haven't worked.

Rank Disloyalty (NEWREP)

By The Editors

New Republic, July 3, 2006

There is something a bit troubling about the Democrats' current obsession with discipline, as though there were no higher aspiration than matching the ruthless efficiency of the House Republicans. A political party is not the same as a Third World liberation movement. It ought to accommodate moments of dissent and occasional deviations from the party line without the forms of retribution that have recently taken hold in the liberal blogosphere.

But apostasy comes in gradations: There is heterodoxy, and then there is Montana Senator Max Baucus. Baucus isn't in the mold of Daniel Patrick Moynihan, who flirted with reasonable ideas taboo among Democratic constituencies. He doesn't take quirky procedural stands, à la Russ Feingold. He's not even a Zell Miller-like figure who rhetorically strafes his party but does little substantive damage. What Baucus does is use his influence as the top Democrat on the Finance Committee to systematically undercut his party and enable George W. Bush's most egregious domestic legislation. So why does his party entrust him with so much responsibility?

We were reminded of this question during this month's estate-tax debate. On one side was the vast majority of Republicans, who kvetch about the cosmic unfairness of taxing the top 1 percent of family fortunes. On the other side was the vast majority of Democrats, who see the estate tax as a reasonable, if modest, curb on the excesses of dynastic wealth. And in the middle was Baucus, an opponent of the tax, pushing a last-minute compromise that would dramatically scale it back. Baucus says he was trying to make the best of a difficult situation, since the tax will be reined in one way or another. But his compromise doesn't merely split differences; its price tag is nearly 70 percent of the cost of outright repeal, according to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center. And it reveals precisely why Baucus shouldn't be in such a sensitive position: He understands statesmanship strictly in terms of the size of the concession he makes; the more he concedes, the more Churchillian he thinks he is.

If you look closely enough at recent domestic policy debacles, you'll invariably see his fingerprints. Facing George W. Bush's massive tax-cut proposal in 2001, Baucus undermined the Senate Democrats' strategy of forcing concessions by maintaining a united front. In private negotiations with his GOP counterpart, Chuck Grassley, Baucus produced a bill that handed the White House virtually all of its top priorities. Afterward, he boasted that he'd done Democrats a favor, since they "would have been in trouble in 2002 just saying no to every one of the president's proposals." We shudder to think what might have happened had the Democrats been labeled "obstructionist."

Then there was the 2003 Medicare debate. Baucus, true to his method, agreed to a set of procedural conditions that undermined Democratic unity and preordained a disastrous outcome. Then he used the little authority he retained to--how to put it?--give away the store. In addition to agreeing to Health Savings Accounts--a gambit that he had once condemned as irresponsible--Baucus assented to a provision preventing Medicare from negotiating discounts with pharmaceutical manufacturers.

Baucus and his defenders--alternately known as his press office--make two arguments on his behalf. The first is that Baucus is simply doing what he needs to do to get reelected. (This argument usually masquerades behind the mantra of doing what's best for the "people of Montana.") But, unless the way to get ahead in Montana is to insist on overcharging Medicare patients by billions of dollars, the senator has been going far above and beyond the call of duty.

Baucus's second argument is that Democrats get substantively better legislation when he engages Republicans on their behalf. But this argument assumes the Bush administration has the votes to pass legislation without Democratic support. Often, it's Baucus who provides the margin of victory--either with his own vote or by crafting pseudo-compromises that provide cover for a small number of Democratic defectors. Indeed, the Democrats' only real victory of the last five years--stuffing the administration on Social Security--came after Harry Reid cautioned Baucus against freelancing with the White House.

Well, we'll do Reid one better and suggest he boot Baucus from the Finance Committee altogether. If we miss out on a few deals by not having Max Baucus at the table, that's a risk we're prepared to live with.

Correction: This article originally stated that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid had "explicitly ordered" Senator Max Baucus not to negotiate with the White House on Social Security. In fact, Reid only cautioned Baucus about cutting his own deal with the White House. We regret the error.

Where The Boys Aren't (WSJ)

By Christina Hoff Sommers

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

Education Sector, a new Washington think tank established this year by the Bill & Melinda Gates and other leading foundations, describes itself as an "honest broker of evidence in key education debates." But its first big study, "The Evidence Suggests Otherwise: Truth About Boys and Girls," is deficient in this virtue.

The report, written by policy analyst Sara Mead, denies that American boys are in trouble academically. "The real story," says Ms. Mead, "is not bad news about boys doing worse; it's good news about girls doing better." So why do so many fret about boys doing poorly? Ms. Mead explains: "The idea that women might actually surpass men in some areas seems hard for many people to swallow." She also hopes that the nation can have a reasonable "conversation" about gender issues "without unfairly undermining the gains girls have made in recent decades."

One looks in vain in Ms. Mead's report for any indication that anyone is undermining girls. She seems to think that concern for boys means shortchanging girls. But it does not -- because education is not a zero sum game.

From the study's title, one might think that it contains evidence that boys are not languishing academically. It doesn't. In fact Ms. Mead concedes that vast numbers of boys are doing poorly. She acknowledges that more boys than girls drop out; that girls have higher aspirations and take more rigorous academic programs. The number of boys diagnosed with disabilities, she says, "has exploded in the past 30 years." She admits that "high school boys' achievement is declining in most subjects." And, yes, she says, it is true that our colleges are now 57% female.

So how does she back up her claim that "in fact, overall academic achievement for boys is higher than it has ever been"? She argues that in "absolute" terms boys are doing better today than they were 20 or 30 years ago. She adds that, in any case, the problem of male underachievement is largely confined to black, Hispanic and low-income white males. Neither claim withstands scrutiny.

The reading scores of 17-year-old boys overall have gone down in the past decade, hitting an all-time low in 2004. Judith Kleinfeld, a professor of psychology at the University of Alaska, has done a thorough analysis of the reading skills of white males from college-educated families. Using Department of Education data, she shows that at the end of high school, 23% of the white sons of college educated parents scored "below basic." For girls from the same background, the figure is 7%. "This means," Ms. Kleinfeld writes, "that one in four boys who have college educated parents cannot read a newspaper with understanding."

Education Sector's study concedes that African-American, Hispanic and low-income white males "are in real trouble." But it attributes their plight to larger social problems that have little to do with gender. Ms. Mead does not seem to have noticed that among these demographics, males are far behind their female counterparts. For example, Ms. Kleinfeld found that 34% of Hispanic males with college-educated parents scored "below basic" -- compared to 19% of Hispanic females.

Today, for every 100 women who earn a bachelor's degree, just 73 men get one. Not to worry, says Ms. Mead. It is actually good news for young men, because more of them are going to college today than did in the '70s and '80s. By this reasoning, we need not worry about the relatively low wages of women compared to men, since in "absolute terms" women are doing better than in the past.

We are strikingly better at educating young women than young men. Boys need our attention. It is difficult to understand why an organization devoted to improving education should regard the current concern for boys as a threat to girls' progress. Education Sector would be more constructively occupied if it looked for ways to help our boys keep pace with the girls.

Ms. Sommers is the author of "The War Against Boys" (Simon & Schuster, 2000).

What Boy Crisis? (NYT)

By Judith Warner

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

It's been muttered for some time now in feminist academic circles that the "boy crisis" — the near-ubiquitous belief that our nation's boys are being academically neglected and emotionally persecuted by teachers whose training, style and temperament favor girls — is little more than a myth.

Now a major study has confirmed it. According to "The Truth About Boys and Girls," a report from the nonpartisan group Education Sector, most boys aren't just not failing; they're doing better than ever on most measures of academic performance. The only boys who aren't — the boys who skew the scores because they're doing really, really badly — are Hispanic and black boys and those from low-income homes.

"But the predominant issues for them," wrote Sara Mead, who based her conclusions in the study on decades of government statistics, "are race and class, not gender." Mead's conclusions echo those of Prof. Caryl Rivers of Boston University and Prof. Rosalind Chait Barnett of Brandeis.

"White suburban boys," they wrote in The Washington Post earlier this year, "are not dropping out of school, avoiding college or lacking in verbal skills ... among whites, the gender composition of colleges is pretty balanced. ... In Ivy League colleges, men still outnumber women."

Given these facts — which, when you think of it, were always pretty obvious — why is it that the notion that their sons are "in crisis" has persisted among affluent, educated (mostly) white parents and the similarly privileged journalists, experts and politicians who shape their opinions?

Blame anti-girl "backlash." Blame media navel gazing. I think, though, that there's more to it than that.

The notion that boys are in crisis rings true to many middle- and upper- middle-class parents because it feels true to them. And that's because these parents are sick of being told that their preschool sons need occupational therapy because they can't apply stickers with the right fine-motor finesse. These parents are sick of seeing their kindergarten boys referred to reading specialists. They're sick of suggestions that their 9-year-olds have A.D.H.D. if they can't sit still through school days from which recess has been cut, gym has been eliminated and even lunch, sometimes, has been all but eradicated to cram in more hours of test prep.

Many dads recall that when they were in school, they were restless, sometimes turbulent, sometimes aggressive, sometimes disruptive in class. When they channeled their energy into the workplace, they thrived — and they don't want their sons pathologized, or girlified, for the sake of big-size classroom control.

I sympathize with much of this. But what I don't see happening among parents who complain that their boys are being disserved by educators is a calling into question of their own complicity with high-pressure schools that demand way too much of their sons.

Talk of the boy crisis is a diversion. It draws attention from the real reasons so many white suburban parents sense that their sons are in trouble. Those reasons aren't academic; they're behavioral and emotional. Researchers have found in recent years that anxiety, depression and self-medicating through drugs and alcohol are disproportionately on the rise in rich communities, as kids seek escape from excessive pressures to succeed.

This isn't unique to boys. Girls in these communities are showing an increased incidence of eating disorders (female athletes are in particular trouble on that score), and also a disturbing rise in escapist behaviors like binge drinking and cutting. Experts say girls are showing crisis signs for the same reasons as boys: because they're stressed out, overextended and pushed beyond the limits of normal human endurance. But since girls' forms of acting out tend to be self-destructive rather than disruptive and often coexist with excellent academic performance, they often pass under the radar.

The notion that there's a universal boy crisis is expedient for well-off parents in other ways as well. Talk — about anti-boy discrimination, about boy-only learning styles — is cheap. Doing the things necessary to address the real crisis among black, Latino and rural and poor city boys isn't: it requires money for smaller classes, better-trained teachers and more support. I'm not sure that white suburban taxpayers are eager to pay the price. But I do know that if we can get past gender turf battles, we might be able to address what's really going wrong with our nation's kids.

Judith Warner, the author of "Perfect Madness: Motherhood in the Age of Anxiety" and a contributing columnist for TimesSelect, will be a guest columnist through the end of July.

What 'Energy Security' Really Means (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

At their annual gathering each summer, the leaders of the rich world promise to fix some pressing global problem -- and usually fail to deliver. This month's Group of Eight summit in Russia takes statecraft to a whole new level. Global leaders have "energy security" on the agenda. But judging by what they say and do, they don't always understand the subject.

For many American leaders, energy security means producing energy at home and relying less on foreigners. But the United States imports three-fifths of its oil, and the share is heading up. For the foreseeable future, alternative fuel is unlikely to change that.

For China, which isn't part of the G-8 but participates in some of its meetings, energy security means buying stakes in foreign oil fields -- in Sudan, Nigeria, Angola and so on. But this doesn't make China any more secure. If a geopolitical crisis broke out, China's tankers might be blocked on the high seas; owning chunks of Africa's oil wouldn't make much difference. In the absence of a crisis, African investments make little more sense: China can buy oil on the world market.

For Russia, which pushed energy onto the G-8 agenda, energy security has yet a third meaning: restrictions on foreign investment in domestic oil and gas fields. But this is the mirror image of the Chinese mistake. Just as China's security isn't boosted by owning African resources, Russia's security isn't reduced by allowing foreigners to own Russian ones. In a crisis, Russia would control its oil fields by military force. Short of a crisis it can extract taxes and royalties from foreign energy firms just as it can from Russian ones.

So there's no sense in these nationalistic conceptions of energy security. As Daniel Yergin has written recently in Foreign Affairs, real energy security requires setting aside the pipe dream of energy independence and embracing interdependence.

Energy interdependence can actually be good for energy security: Just look at natural gas markets. Right now nearly all the natural gas that Americans consume comes from U.S. and Canadian fields; only 3 percent comes into the country by tanker in the form of liquefied natural gas. This renders the United States highly vulnerable to disruptions on its home continent. If terrorists or a hurricane took out a key pipeline, it would be hard to bring in alternative supplies from outside North America, and prices would spike upward. By buying more liquefied natural gas from a diverse range of foreigners, the United States would reduce its energy independence but enhance its energy security.

For different reasons, the oil market also shows why leaders should embrace interdependence. Because oil is traded globally, a supply disruption anywhere will affect gas prices in the United States; there's no use thinking nationalistically. If there's an explosion in a Chinese oil field that serves Chinese consumers, it will force the Chinese to buy more oil on the world market and so drive up the global price: American motorists will suffer. So China's energy security is not in competition with U.S. energy security, as the resource-scramble model would suggest. China's energy security is part of U.S. energy security.

Equally, there's a lot of breast-beating about the U.S. strategic oil reserve. The idea of vast bunkers full of crude conjures pleasing feelings of national self-sufficiency: The heck with those foreigners, we can take care of ourselves! But this is mostly a delusion. If the United States releases oil from its reserve, the benefit is dissipated around the world since the global oil price is affected. To have a serious impact on that price, the United States needs Europe and the advanced Asian countries to release oil from their stockpiles in a concerted way: Far from being a tool of national self-sufficiency, strategic oil reserves are a classic multilateral instrument. There's an urgent need to bring the big emerging economies into the International Energy Agency, which coordinates the reserves held by the rich countries.

What about U.S. relations with energy suppliers ; surely here the model of nationalistic competition is relevant? The Arab oil embargo of 1973 demonstrated the danger of a conflict between suppliers and consumers, and Russia's withholding of natural gas from Ukraine last winter shows that embargoes remain possible. But suppliers know that strong-arm tactics are the surest way to accelerate the search for alternative fuels, which is why Russia plays politics with energy more by giving out subsidized supplies than by refusing to sell any. The threat of an embargo by oil states is therefore smaller than the threat of violence by non-states -- rebel attacks in Nigeria's oil delta, an al-Qaeda strike in Saudi Arabia. In this sense the energy security of producers is not in competition with that of consumers. They are interdependent.

If the G-8 summit can spread the word about this interdependence, it will do some good. But the nationalistic conception of energy security is worse than useless. By encouraging a competitive scramble for resources that could spiral into conflict, this sort of security talk only creates insecurity.

Working For A Pittance (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

"We can no longer stand by and regularly give ourselves a pay increase while denying a minimum wage increase to the hardworking men and women across this nation."

— Hillary Rodham Clinton, to her fellow senators.

The federal minimum wage, currently $5.15 an hour, was last raised in 1997. Since then, its purchasing power has deteriorated by 20 percent. Analysts at the Economic Policy Institute and the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities jointly crunched the numbers and determined that, after adjusting for inflation, the value of the minimum wage is at its lowest level since 1955.

For those who don't remember, Eisenhower was president in 1955, the Dodgers were still in Brooklyn, and Barack Obama hadn't even been born.

If you're making the minimum wage, you're hurting. If Congress and the president don't raise the minimum wage by Dec. 2, it will have remained unchanged for the longest stretch since it was established in 1938. (The longest period previously was from January 1981 to April 1990 — a span that saw the entire Reagan administration come and go.)

Senate Republicans recently blocked a Democratic bill, sponsored by Senator Edward Kennedy, that would have raised the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour over the next two years. Jared Bernstein, a senior economist at the Economic Policy Institute, noted that while Republicans in Congress are standing like a stone wall against this modest increase in the poverty-level wage, "they are working as hard as they can to repeal the estate tax."

"That," he said, "is just vicious class warfare."

The most important pay increases for most members of Congress are their own, and they are diligent in that regard. Senator Clinton, in a floor speech supporting the minimum-wage hike, said, "During the past nine years, we've raised our own pay by $31,600."

Mrs. Clinton has introduced a bill that, in addition to raising the minimum wage to $7.25, would link Congressional pay raises to hikes in the minimum wage. Under the bill, the minimum wage would be increased automatically by the same percentage as any increase in Congressional pay.

Polls have shown that Americans overwhelmingly favor an increase in the minimum wage. But the low-income workers who would benefit from such an increase are not part of the natural G.O.P. constituency. Thus, the stonewall.

A separate study by the Economic Policy Institute found that in 2005, with the pay of top corporate executives up sharply, and with the minimum wage falling further and further behind inflation, "an average chief executive officer was paid 821 times as much as a minimum wage earner."

That C.E.O., according to the study, "earns more before lunchtime on the very first day of work in the year than a minimum wage worker earns all year."

"The reality," said Senator Clinton, "is that a full time job that pays the minimum wage just doesn't provide enough money to support a family today. We have to acknowledge that fact and do something about it. As a country, we cannot accept that a single mother with two children who works 40 hours a week, 52 weeks a year earns $10,700 a year — let me say this again: $10,700 a year. That is almost $6,000 below the federal poverty line for a family of three."

During the 1950's and 60's, the minimum wage was roughly 50 percent of the average wage of nonsupervisory workers. It has now fallen to 31 percent — less than a third — of that average.

As the Economic Policy Institute and the Center on Budget pointed out in their study: "Each year that Congress fails to raise the wage floor, its purchasing power erodes. The fact that the minimum wage has remained the same for nearly nine years means that its real value has declined considerably over that period. As inflation has accelerated recently due to higher energy costs, the real value of the minimum wage has fallen faster."

There is no justification — none — for condemning the nation's lowest-paid workers to this continuing slide into ever deeper economic distress. "No one who works for a living should have to live in poverty," said Senator Kennedy.

It's very telling that in the most prosperous nation in the world, that kind of comment actually sounds radical. We have a very long way to go.

A Call To Honor The Sabbath (USAT)

By Henry G. Brinton

USA Today, July 3, 2006

For all the attention paid this past year to public displays of the Ten Commandments, you'd think people would spend as much energy trying to follow them.

When it comes to the Fourth Commandment — "Remember the Sabbath Day" — that's not the case. And pastors like me, far from being role models, are among the worst offenders. After all, we work every Sunday.

INDEX: Read other stories in the series

The problem with ignoring the Sabbath is that it hurts us as individuals, families and communities. Wayne Muller, a therapist, minister and best-selling author, is convinced that modern life has become a violent enterprise.

We make war on our bodies by pushing them beyond their limits, war on our children by failing to give them our time, and war on our communities by failing to be kind and generous and connected to our neighbors. To bring an end to this destruction, we have to establish a healthier balance between work and rest.

Whether religious or not, people know that they need to take a day off in order to maintain their sanity and remain efficient and productive at work. But I'm convinced that downtime is not enough.

We need a formal day of rest. A true Sabbath gives us time to refresh and renew ourselves, regain proper perspective and redirect our lives to what is good and true and worthwhile.

There is something positive and even creative about allowing ourselves to take a break, as is noted in the Bible when it says God finishes the work of creation on the seventh day ... by resting (Genesis 2:2). Resting is an act of creativity.

Unfortunately, our society rewards hard-driving people who are focused on their work seven days a week, and our technology allows us to be constantly connected to the workplace through computers, cellphones and BlackBerrys.

"Modern culture's time values often seem enslaving and oppressive," says Dennis Olson, professor of Old Testament Theology at Princeton Theological Seminary. "Work time seems increasingly to expand and rob us of time with family and friends. Computers and the Internet bombard us with a constant flow of data, messages and information."

And as many Americans are pulling more time at the office, they're spending less time in bed. Average amount of sleep has dropped from nine hours a night in 1910 to seven hours today. The result is that we feel harried and hurried, out of balance, out of sync.

For much of this country's history, blue laws kept businesses closed on Sundays, forcing Americans to focus on church-going, rest and relaxation. Although many people resented these limitations, these laws did have the beneficial effect of creating a day of rest. But in the past century, and particularly since the 1960s, states have relaxed these rules regulating business on Sunday as our consumer-driven culture has gone into overdrive.

What began as a trickle soon became a raging river: Today, almost every mall, theater and restaurant is operating seven days a week. Even in Europe, where church-going has been in decline for years, Sunday has been — until recently — a day in which most businesses were closed, allowing people to spend time with family members and friends.

Given this history, Sabbath-keeping is going to be a countercultural activity, one requiring commitment and creativity. A day of rest does not have to be a Saturday or a Sunday — impossible for pastors and many others — but it should be at least one day out of seven, and qualitatively different from the other six.

The key is to break away from work patterns, whether that means hobbies, sports or artistic activities. (Sabbath is related to the Hebrew verb meaning "to cease, stop, interrupt.")

"Spend more time with people in a friendly way, with meals (and) extended conversations, but no talk related to work," advises theologian Marva Dawn, author of Keeping the Sabbath Wholly: Ceasing, Resting, Embracing, Feasting.

New York Mets pitcher Pedro Martinez rests by engaging in gardening; for a professional gardener, though, Sabbath-keeping might involve playing baseball.

My own practice on Wednesday, my substitute for Sunday, always includes a long run. My thinking becomes unstructured as I jog along a beautiful wooded trail, the stress melting away and solutions to knotty problems popping into my mind. In this activity, I feel close to God. This is my way of remembering the Sabbath day, and keeping it holy.

There is a communal dimension to rest as well, one that is important for maintaining healthy relationships in our families and communities.

My son, who is trying out for his high school cross-country team, often joins me on my runs. This gives us a chance to talk without time pressures or interruptions, far from the demands of work and school.

At the end of life, we'll remember and cherish these times — these mini-sabbaticals, if you will — far more than those hours toiling away in the office. As the saying goes, no one ever says from his deathbed, "I wish I had spent more time at the office."

Ironically, we can actually be more productive if we take a break from time to time. Dawn is convinced that what we gain is "a greater eagerness to do our work and a better sense of what that work actually is."

We can learn from men and women in the European Union, who work hard but still enjoy an average of five weeks of paid vacation per year. They often remark that they don't "live to work," as we do — instead, they "work to live."

So take a vacation this summer and a Sabbath day throughout the year — whether to honor God, your family or yourself.

Protecting All Waters (NYT)

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not.

Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands.

The court issued what amounted to three opinions. Four conservatives led by Justice Antonin Scalia said the law protected only "permanent, standing or continuously flowing" water bodies, a judgment that would have exposed most wetlands and all seasonal streams — nearly 60 percent of the country's waters, by the government's own estimates — to dredging, dumping and development.

A liberal four-justice bloc argued the opposite, that the act protected all the nation's waters — a view that has been endorsed by every regulatory authority except President Bush's Environmental Protection Agency since the act's inception in 1972. The crucial ninth vote was cast by Justice Anthony Kennedy, who said in effect that each case should be judged on whether the water body in question had a "significant nexus" with a navigable waterway.

That saved the country from the blanket destruction of Justice Scalia's reasoning. But it, too, had no solid basis in the act itself and, worse, threatened to open matters up to continuous dispute.

There is a bill in Congress that would quickly resolve the issue. It is called the Clean Water Authority Restoration Act, and its purpose is to remove any ambiguities in the original law and to reassert, in clear terms, the act's intention to protect all the waters of the United States, large and small, permanent or seasonal, navigable or isolated.

This would also clarify things for the E.P.A. and the Army Corps of Engineers, the regulatory agencies charged with carrying out the law. With the law's scope in doubt, neither agency has known quite how to proceed — some developers received permits to dredge and fill wetlands and small streams, some did not. Congress can make sure that from now on the law is squarely on the side of clean water.

Campaign Finance Bellwether (WP)

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

AT FIRST GLANCE, the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws may seem like a defeat for proponents of reasonable regulation of election money. The court voided the toughest contribution limits in the country and refused Vermont's invitation to reconsider its long-standing hostility toward legal limits on campaign expenditures. In the long run, however, the decision may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising.

Ever since the Supreme Court handed down its landmark 1976 decision in Buckley v. Valeo , it has treated legal limits on campaign expenditures with the gravest of suspicion and treated limits on contributions to campaigns as presumptively valid as long as they are not too low. Both of these holdings have had detractors ever since. One flank, mostly conservatives, believes that contribution limits, too, are unconstitutional. The other, mostly liberals, wants to give legislatures control of spending limits. The Vermont law tested both prongs of Buckley . It not only contained a spending limit for state offices but also set contribution limits lower than does any other state in the country. The limits of $200 to $400 per election cycle, in constant dollars, amount to about one-twentieth of the $1,000 federal limit the court upheld in Buckley .

It is thus no surprise that the court balked. While the three most liberal justices, in dissent, would have used the case to give legislatures more authority on spending limits, this was never a plausible outcome. Rather, the case posed the danger that the court's new members, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., would join with the three justices who take a far more restrictive view of campaign finance under the First Amendment and would radically scale back legislative power to restrict money in politics. Not only did that not happen, but both joined an opinion by Justice Stephen G. Breyer that analyzes the Vermont law in the context of Buckley . In other words, despite an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny.

This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing.

How To Educate Young Scientists (NYT)

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

The United States could easily fall from its privileged perch in the global economy unless it does something about the horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels. That means finding ways to enliven a dry and dispiriting style of science instruction that leads as many as half of the country's aspiring scientists to quit the field before they leave college.

The emerging consensus among educators is that students need early, engaging experiences in the lab — and much more mentoring than most of them receive now — to maintain their interest and inspire them to take up careers in the sciences.

Some universities have already realized the need for better ways of teaching. But this means revising an incentive system that has historically rewarded scientists for making discoveries and publishing academic papers, not for nurturing the next generation of great minds.

The Howard Hughes Medical Institute, the country's largest private supporter of science education, is well ahead of the curve, and has been pushing universities in this direction for several years under the leadership of Thomas Cech, a Nobel laureate. The institute recently announced its latest batch of 20 "million dollar professors," who will use their grant money to explore and expand innovative approaches to teaching science.

The institute has also awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools.

These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them.

Mr. Ehrlich In The Ring (WP)

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

THE GOVERNOR of Maryland, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis. Despite the obvious difficulties of being a Republican facing a legislature dominated by Democrats, he has often managed to be his own worst enemy.

Those qualities, as well as the advantage that Democrats enjoy in the state, may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich, despite generally high approval ratings and a public persona that many voters find likable, paradoxically begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley. Naturally, the governor, who scored a come-from-behind victory four years ago, insists that he relishes the role of underdog -- although with an anticipated campaign war chest of $20 million, he's a very well-financed underdog indeed.

Expect a no-holds-barred campaign. Both candidates know how to hold a grudge. Both seem to think politics is intensely personal, a battle of egos and pride and personal honor. The governor claims not to read the newspaper because the coverage of his administration makes him so mad. For his part, the mayor, hypersensitive to perceived slights and slow to forget them, seems often to struggle with his own temper. What's more, the two don't care for each other and make no effort to disguise it.

So wouldn't it be a pleasant surprise if despite all the bad blood, chin-jutting and macho bluster, Mr. Ehrlich and Mr. O'Malley could focus on the issues that confront the state -- education and crime; good government and sound finances; containing the cost of health care and cleaning up the Chesapeake Bay? Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley.

LaRocco Engaging In Hand-to-Hand Combat (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

Former lobbyist and one-time Rep. Larry LaRocco (D-Idaho), who disembarked from K Street earlier this year to run for lieutenant governor of the Gem State, recently kicked off a "handshake pledge" to show that he's in touch, literally, with voters.

LaRocco, who during a failed 1982 Congressional race took a job in every county of the district, launched a 25,000 handshakes/25,000 stories campaign in June.

"I'm shaking hands individually with Idahoans throughout the state and listening to what they have to say, their stories, their positions on various issues. I'm trying to get back to old-fashioned campaigning," LaRocco said. "Part of my theme is, I'm a good listener. I'm not going to do all the talking."

In order to keep track of just how many hands he actually shakes, LaRocco's camp has printed out palm cards numbered one through 25,000 to give to would-be voters during the handshake. Repeat customers, he said, don't get a second card.

As of late last week, LaRocco's count was up to 2,430 hands after a stop at a barber shop in Boise. "I'm in the car now, so that's the reason I'm not shaking hands," he said.

Last week, though, LaRocco shook some familiar hands in Washington, D.C. The candidate's son, Matthew LaRocco, who recently joined the firm Arnold & Porter, hosted a fundraiser at the shop on June 28.

"Some of my old buddies are co-hosting," the elder LaRocco said. Those buddies included fellow Reps.-turned-lobbyists Cal Dooley (D-Calif.) and Max Sandlin (D-Texas).

Foreign Agent Files. Clients from afar have been helping K Street firms expand their new-client rosters.

The all-Republican Barbour Griffith & Rogers recently sealed a deal with the National Dialogue Party of Lebanon for a monthly fee of at least $50,000. The work includes "developing, refining and expanding relationships between officials of the National Dialogue Party and US foreign policy-making apparatus in the Executive and Legislative Branches of the US Government," according to a contract filed with the Justice Department's foreign agent registration unit.

Meanwhile, Barbour Griffith's other international clients have helped the upstart firm Herald Group. Herald, whose partners include former White House spokesman Taylor Gross, is working with Barbour Griffith on Taiwan, and the Kurdish Regional Government in Iraq as well as India, which is lobbying for Congressional approval for a civil nuclear program.

"As a number of foreign-policy issues continue to take center stage before Congress and the executive branch, the Herald Group remains increasingly involved in providing strategic communications to foreign governments and organizations," Gross said. "With respect to these specific engagements, we are working with the leadership of Barbour Griffith & Rogers to help provide international clients with coordinated and effective public and government affairs services in Washington."

K Street Moves. Carolyn Doyle, a former aide to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), has left her position as senior federal affairs representative at the MWW Group. On July 5, Doyle will start a new gig lobbying for the March of Dimes, a nonprofit group that focuses on health care to prevent birth defects. Doyle's title will be associate director of federal affairs.

· Karen Reidy, most recently with the former MCI, has joined the telecom trade association COMPTEL as its vice president for regulatory affairs. COMPTEL also promoted Jonathan Lee to general counsel and Mary Albert to assistant general counsel.

· Cable giant Comcast Corp. has picked up a new lobbyist. Peter Filon comes to the company as senior director, federal government affairs, from the House Energy and Commerce Committee, where he has served as minority counsel.

· PR power-shop Qorvis Communications has signed Jim McGann as managing director. McGann is a 22-year veteran of AT&T, where he led media efforts in Washington, D.C.

· The U.S. Tuna Foundation has a new president. Anne Forristall comes to the fishy lobby from MGN Inc., where she advised a range of clients on legislative strategy.

· The public policy and law group at Dickstein Shapiro has added Brian Finch as counsel. He previously worked at McKenna Long & Aldridge, where he focused on homeland security matters.

· Benjamin McKay has been promoted to senior vice president of federal government relations at the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America.

· Trading one heavy-hitting Wall Street CEO for another, the Financial Services Roundtable has named Citigroup chief Charles O. Prince to replace newly confirmed Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson as chairman of the group.

Broad Experience For A Tall Job: A Hipper CNBC (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

When Jonathan Wald was fired as executive producer of the "Today" show, he says, "I wanted to stay in the game and get back into the daily battle."

When Josh Howard was forced to resign as executive producer of "60 Minutes II" after the botched story on President Bush and the National Guard, "I frankly wasn't sure, after my last experience, whether I wanted to work in television again."

Both men landed at CNBC, where they are helping to retool programming on a business channel that has struggled in the ratings since the dot-com bust six years ago.

Wald helped launch the 7 p.m. weeknight show "On the Money," which takes a freewheeling approach to the financial side of pop culture. Howard is preparing the fall launch of a monthly magazine show that sounds suspiciously like "60 Minutes" and producing four documentaries, some of which may run as long as two hours.

The two executives are helping to move CNBC, which fixates on stocks and bonds during the day, toward a broader definition of business coverage. And they're finding it liberating to be freed from having to deliver mass audiences for the broadcast networks.

"We don't have to do a piece on Britney Spears because we need to drag in the 18-to-49-year-olds," Howard says. "It's a huge advantage."

Since its core mission is to cover Wall Street and corporate America, CNBC's fate is tied to public interest in the markets. So executives are trying to dream up new programming that will get more people into the cable tent. "We'd like everybody who has even a passing interest in business and markets and investment," says Mark Hoffman, who took over as CNBC president last year and would face stiff competition if Fox News follows through on plans for a business channel.

Hoffman wanted the evening lineup to reflect the network's core identity. CNBC's prime time has had more than its share of failures, including shows hosted by Dennis Miller and John McEnroe, leaving the channel turning to reruns of Conan O'Brien and "The Apprentice" and looking very much out of gas.

The O'Brien repeats gave way to "On the Money," which boosted viewership by 32 percent but still reached only 141,000 viewers over the past three months. The show, hosted by Dylan Ratigan, has been covering issues involving Hollywood (why is America obsessed with weekend box office grosses?), cyberspace (NBC's alliance with the post-it-yourself video site YouTube), and global business (a piece from Russia on the seizing of a factory that makes tubes for the kind of amplifiers once used by Jimi Hendrix).

"Business news and what people are talking about need not be mutually exclusive," says Wald, now a senior vice president. With segments such as "Ka-Ching" (on who's making big bucks) and running jokes (such as calling Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke "The Bearded One"), "On the Money" brings a fast-paced sensibility to potentially dull subjects.

Unlike "Today," where he was dropped in 2002 after 16 months on the job, "it's great to start something new and not just be the latest one to be handed the keys," Wald says. But even with cable's smaller audiences, he says, "the pressure and the stakes are just as high" as at NBC.

Howard, whose first documentary involves a behind-the-scenes look at a major airline, says the model is CNBC reporter David Faber's examination of Wal-Mart, which won Peabody and DuPont awards and has aired 35 times. "One of the nice things about cable is you get to run the stuff over and over again," Howard says.

The magazine show, a blend of features, profiles and investigative work, will use some NBC reporters and "Dateline" staffers. "The pieces could look very much like '60 Minutes' pieces," says Howard, who is also developing two pilots with lighter themes. "The format works, so why reinvent it?"

Howard, a 14-year veteran of "60 Minutes," took a year off after the debacle over the National Guard story, which led to the departure of two other senior executives and the firing of Dan Rather's producer on the story, Mary Mapes. "It would have been depressing if I really felt my reputation had been ruined by this thing," Howard says.

CNBC's ratings are quite modest -- although understated, because many investors watch from their offices -- but the network remains a gold mine, generating an estimated $250 million a year in profit. That's because advertisers are willing to pony up for viewers whose median household net worth is more than $1.5 million.

After a long ratings slump, daytime business programming was up 41 percent in the last three months, to 217,000 viewers, over the same period last year. But Hoffman sounds nonchalant about the numbers, saying he's less concerned than most television executives.

"We're not a populist network," Hoffman says. "This is a niche network that is focused on a fairly narrow content area that appeals to a high-end audience."Live From Gitmo

When the Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the Bush administration exceeded its authority in arranging military tribunals for terror suspects, ABC's Terry Moran was at the perfect spot: Guantanamo Bay.

The timing was coincidental -- ABC had been pressing for access to the prison for months -- but the "Nightline" co-anchor did win Pentagon approval to extend his stay by one day after learning that the closely watched case filed by a Gitmo detainee was about to be decided.

Despite the great proximity, Moran had a frustrating week and couldn't get anyone there to comment on the ruling. "It's hard to do anything here because the security situation is so intense -- getting around, getting into the camps, what you can shoot when you're in the camps," he says from the U.S. base in Cuba. In fact, military censors must clear all videotape after ensuring that no detainees can be identified.

While Moran interviewed top officials of the camp, he says the Pentagon refused access to several detainees who had agreed in writing to talk to him. "As I've told our viewers, we can only get one side of the story," he says.Vanity Fair: Is It a Crime?

Henry Porter, Vanity Fair's London editor, had already gotten under Tony Blair's skin with a piece accusing the prime minister of using the fear of terrorism to wage an assault on civil liberties. Blair responded by conducting an e-mail debate with Porter that was published in London's Observer, where the writer has a column.

Two weeks ago a man carrying a placard with a George Orwell quote was arrested and charged with violating a law banning demonstrations within one kilometer of Parliament.

Steven Jago, who faces up to a year in jail, has said that police confiscated a copy of Porter's Vanity Fair piece, which he was carrying, and told him the article was "politically motivated material."

Says Porter, who has written a letter of complaint to the police: "The idea that a piece of journalism could be used as evidence of someone's criminal intent, when it's a mainstream journalism attack on the prime minister, it's a little step toward tyranny. That's astounding. It's frightening, really."Falling Star

"They had done a great deal of research, and her negatives were rising." -- Barbara Walters to the New York Times, explaining the decision to drop Star Jones Reynolds from ABC's "The View." So politicians aren't the only ones who live and die by opinion polls?

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

Crisis Postponed At The U.N. (NYT)

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

The United Nations steered clear of a financial shipwreck last week, but it also steered clear of approving urgently needed management reforms. That is a standoff, not a solution. If the less-developed countries blocking those reforms continue to dig in, the United Nations will suffer in diminished public credibility and greater resistance to dues-paying by some of the largest contributor nations, including the United States.

The less-developed countries — led by Cuba, Egypt, Pakistan and South Africa — are reluctant to yield the influence over management and personnel issues that comes with detailed control over U.N. spending. These poorer nations make up a decisive majority of the General Assembly. But most of the U.N.'s budget comes from the developed world, chiefly the United States, Japan and the European Union.

The United Nations cannot move forward unless both groups are satisfied. And if it doesn't move forward, the less-developed countries will suffer the most.

One crucial reform would have given Secretary General Kofi Annan management flexibility on making job assignments. The less-developed majority flatly turned him down. Another reform would sharply pare down the roughly 9,000 directives of various kinds accumulated over the decades — many of them now outdated or redundant. The majority agreed only to a trivial reduction.

Less-developed countries complain that the demanding tone of donors has poisoned the atmosphere for compromise. That is partly true. America's U.N. ambassador, John Bolton, has particularly tried to bludgeon the resisters into submission with dire financial threats.

But these criticisms miss the point. The reforms are not a concession to Washington and other big donors. They are a necessity for all U.N. members. The U.N. cannot function effectively in the 21st century under budget and management rules that were originally devised for a much smaller organization. Successive embarrassments like the oil-for-food scandal should have made that painfully clear.

Taming The Tamil Tigers (LAT)

SINCE APRIL, SRI LANKA has experienced rising violence between the government and the Tamil Tigers rebel group, effectively gutting a 4-year-old cease-fire. But amid the carnage, leaders of both sides have been making unexpected conciliatory gestures, spurring hope that with the help of international monitors, full-scale war can be avoided.

The decades-old conflict between the Tamil rebels, who control portions of the country and want separate rule, and the Sri Lankan government has claimed more than 60,000 lives. More than 800 people have been killed since the November election of President Mahinda Rajapakse, a hard-liner who rode to victory on the heels of a Tamil boycott and with the support of ardent Sri Lankan nationalist groups.

Cease-fire monitoring by Norway and other countries broke down in early June when the European Union declared the Tigers a terrorist group, causing the Tigers to reject them as biased. Soon afterward, more than 60 people were killed in an explosion on a bus, and on June 26, a suicide bomber killed Sri Lanka's third-highest-ranking general. The Tigers have denied responsibility, and the government has wisely avoided retaliation.

Also in June, the so-called Sea Tigers attempted a large-scale raid on a ship carrying Sri Lankan soldiers. The navy thwarted the attack, but it demonstrated that the rebels' sea capabilities remain fairly strong, making an all-out war a real possibility.

Aiming to avoid that, Rajapakse recently offered to negotiate directly with the Tigers and rein in a paramilitary group run by a former Tiger who now attacks his one-time associates. The Tigers are considering the offer. Both sides also have made overtures to India, a significant move for the Tigers because they are believed responsible for the assassination of Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in 1991. A senior Tiger officer expressed "regret" over Gandhi's death, the closest the group has come to admitting guilt.

The Sri Lankan government has requested Indian assistance in monitoring the Palk Strait between India and Sri Lanka to head off further attacks by the Tamil navy, but India hasn't indicated that it will change its largely hands-off policy.

A peaceful Sri Lanka is very much in India's interest; war could bring a stream of refugees and instability to India, particularly in the state of Tamil Nadu. India should start to take a more active role, while the EU must work for a return to the bargaining table. It isn't too late to head off a full-scale war.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Defends War On Terror Strategy At Fort Bragg. The AP (7/5, Riechmann) reports President Bush told 3,500 US troops and other guests at Fort Bragg yesterday "that insurgents in Iraq and Afghanistan are violent, yet vulnerable, and urged US troops to march on in the fight for freedom so Americans can celebrate Independence Day year round." At the "outdoor pep rally," Bush "recalled the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the former leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, who died last month in a US airstrike that boosted troop morale and offered hope to Americans weary of the war."

Of the networks, both ABC and CBS reported on President Bush's trip to Fort Bragg in their stories on the July 4th observances in this country. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 4, 1:40, Moran, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush traveled to Ft. Bragg, North Carolina to celebrate the day and pay tribute to soldiers there." President Bush: "You are serving our country in a time when our country needs you. And because of your courage, every day is Independence Day in America." The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 5, 0:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "By tradition, President Bush spent the day with the troops. He received an early birthday cake from soldiers at Fort Bragg North Carolina. The President's 60th birthday is Thursday."

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Gosselin, 958K) reports Bush mounted "a feisty defense of administration strategy in the war on terrorism and to assert that America was winning the battles in Iraq and Afghanistan." The President "made only a passing reference to recent reports that Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, had drafted plans to sharply reduce troop numbers in the violence-plagued nation by the end of 2007. Bush said Casey was working with the new Iraqi government 'on a path forward.'" Praising US forces "for the bravery they have displayed, Bush repeatedly said that he would not set an 'artificial timetable' for withdrawal."

The Washington Post (7/5, A3, Baker, 744K) also says Bush, "surrounding himself with uniformed men and women…again vowed to resist calls to withdraw from Iraq." Bush said, "I'm going to make you this promise: I'm not going to allow the sacrifice of 2,527 troops who have died in Iraq to be in vain by pulling out before the job is done." Bush's "appearance here came more than three years into a war that has proved more difficult than he imagined and sapped support among the U.S. public." Against this "backdrop, the White House has searched for a formula that will preserve Republican control of Congress in November's midterm elections, with Bush and his allies once again trying to portray themselves as the party of national security." To "make his case, the president eschewed his usual civilian Fourth of July events and visited the 82nd Airborne Division and U.S. Special Operations Command here at Fort Bragg, where a year ago he delivered a prime-time television address intended to reverse the slide in support for the war."

The Washington Times (7/5, 90K) reports, "In his talk, Mr. Bush made a veiled jab at some Democrats who have called for an immediate withdrawal of US forces from Iraq. He said that setting a timetable for pulling out troops would undermine a fragile new Iraqi government, undercut the efforts of US troops and signal to the enemy that if they wait a little longer, American forces would leave Iraq."

The New York Times (7/5, Hauser, 1.19M) reports Bush "thanked American troops for their service in Iraq and elsewhere, rousing thousands of soldiers to applause by saying that they were winning the war, but warning them that it was far from over." Bush said since Zarqawi's death, "there have been 190 raids by coalition troops in Iraq, 700 enemy 'operatives' have been captured and 60 or more killed. He said fresh intelligence had helped American forces keep the pressure on terrorists, and that the United States would continue to strike at their networks." Bush "delivered his speech as violence persisted in Iraq with the kidnapping of a deputy minister in the Iraqi government."

The Fayetteville (NC) Observer (7/4, Cuningham) referred to Bush's "rousing Independence Day speech. He pledged to a cheering crowd not to 'pull out before the job is done.'" Bush, "wearing an open-necked olive-green shirt with his sleeves rolled up, spoke to a crowd of about 4,000 in the traffic circle around the Iron Mike statue. His back was wet with sweat as he worked the crowd at the end of his half-hour speech, which was carried live by some national cable news stations." The "crowd of soldiers and airmen in their duty uniforms frequently clapped and cheered during the outdoor speech — a contrast to the restrained crowd in dress uniforms Bush addressed in a visit to Fort Bragg just over a year ago."

The Raleigh News & Observer (7/5, Curliss) reports that during the rally, Bush "drew attention to one soldier -- Capt. Chip Eldridge, 36, who lost part of his left leg in a mine explosion while searching for insurgents in Afghanistan in late 2004. Eldridge, who later showed reporters his prosthetic leg, has been in rehabilitation and volunteered to return to duty. A husband with twin 3-year-old boys, he will return to combat next year, he said."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/4, Henry) reported, "Perhaps the highlight of the President's trip came when he actually met the special ops pilot who was the person who flew Saddam Hussein to the Baghdad airfield after he was pulled out of that spider hole dramatically a couple of years back. The President seemed to be surprised to be meeting, in fact, this pilot and at some point the President said that, 'Did you really do that? That was a good job.' It was not a surprise when the President actually spoke. In his remarks he spoke a lot about patriotic themes, he talked about the sacrifice in Iraq, saying that the sacrifice of military officials brings Independence Day to Americans every day of the year."

The Durham Herald-Sun (7/5, Phillips) says Bush described terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarawi's "last moments in the care of a US Army medic. 'One of the last things he saw was the face of an American soldier from Fort Bragg,' the president said." The reference brought "cheers" from the crowd.

Lawmakers Concerned About SCOTUS Use Of Geneva Accords. The AP (7/5, Yost) reports, "Of all the steps the Supreme Court could have taken to undercut President Bush's legal position in the war on terror, applying international law to al-Qaida probably would have been the worst." The AP continues, "That development came to pass Thursday and now Republicans are rushing to protect the cornerstone of Bush's thinking: Suspected terrorists are not entitled to protection under the Geneva Accords." The AP adds, "Sens. Mitch McConnell and Lindsey Graham said Sunday that Congress must address the Supreme Court ruling embracing Article 3 of the conventions in the military commission case of Osama bin Laden's former driver. … Article 3 prohibits outrages upon personal dignity, 'in particular humiliating and degrading treatment,' and bars violence, including murder, mutilation and torture." The AP notes, "In an election year, declaring that international law governs the war on terror reminds voters of some of the Republican administration's lowest moments: controversies over Justice Department 'torture' memos and allegations of abuse against detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. … McConnell, R-Ky., the second-ranking GOP leader in the Senate, said the 5-3 court decision 'means that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes.' … Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., also expressed concern about the decision, saying it 'is somewhat of a departure, in my view, of people who are stateless terrorists.' McCain appeared on ABC's 'This Week.'"

SCOTUS Ruling Is Rare Win For Defendant. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Ben Winograd) reports, "The Supreme Court's rejection of the Guantanamo Bay military tribunals wasn't just a defeat of Bush-administration policy. The ruling also marked a rare win for a criminal defendant during the court's latest term." The Journal continues, "Defendants lost by a more than 2-1 margin during the term that began in October. In many votes, the two Bush appointees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, sided with police, prosecutors and prison wardens." The Journal adds, "Under decisions this term, prosecutors can use evidence police took after violating the requirement they knock and announce their arrival to execute a search warrant (Hudson v. Michigan). Juries may hear 911 telephone emergency recordings of witnesses whom defendants can't cross-examine (Davis v. Washington). Police may search parolees for any reason -- or no reason at all (Samson v. California). And states may carry out death sentences even when juries find that mitigating circumstances surrounding a defendant and his crime equal aggravating factors (Kansas v. Marsh). … To be sure, conservatives haven't reversed many 1960s-era criminal procedure rulings, such as Miranda warnings, to deter police misconduct. But the new justices, who have strong law-and-order records, already are pushing the pendulum to the right. 'There seems to be a new self-confidence or aggressiveness' by the court's conservative bloc, says Joshua Dressler, a criminal-law professor at Ohio State University."

SCOTUS Ruling Puts Administration In Hot Seat. The Long Island Newsday (7/5) reports, "The Supreme Court decision striking down the tribunal system created by the Pentagon for trying accused enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay has apparently presented the Bush administration and its allies in Congress with two choices - both fraught with risk." Newsday continues, "They can use the GOP majorities in the House and Senate to put a quick congressional seal of approval on something close to the existing system, but run the risk that it too will be struck down by the court. … Or they can follow the path suggested by the court and devise a system embracing the procedural and other principles of the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions, but risk the possibility that few, if any, of the terrorists will be convicted. … And both choices, as well as attempting to chart a middle course, could set off the kind of protracted, internally divisive debate that the White House and GOP political strategists would not relish."

Schumer Seeks Review Of Anti-Terror Measures. The AP (7/3) reports, "Sen. Charles Schumer is urging the review of all the Bush administration's anti-terror programs in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision that military tribunals for Guantanamo detainees violate U.S. and international law." The AP continues, "Schumer, a New York Democrat and member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, called for the establishment of an independent commission to scrutinize the president's war on terror. … 'I am growing increasingly concerned about the Administration's stubbornly unilateral approach to these types of issues,' Schumer wrote Sunday in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. 'The Administration has not only largely ignored the Congress, but has also badly miscalculated how its efforts would be evaluated by the Supreme Court...'"

The New York Daily News (7/4, McAuliff) reports, "In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Schumer, D-N.Y., called for a panel to do a 'top-to-bottom legal review' of all the White House's controversial terror efforts. … 'Before another administration procedure or policy is struck down by the Supreme Court, dealing another potential setback to the war on terror and the prosecution of terrorists, I urge you to establish an independent commission,' Schumer wrote." The News notes, "Schumer said it was particularly important to act while there are several other pending legal challenges to administration policies. Critics have said policies such as domestic eavesdropping exceed the president's powers. … Politicians on both sides of the aisle said Sunday that Congress likely would act quickly to give President Bush whatever power he needs to pass muster with the high court."

More Commentary. In an op-ed that rant in the Lawrence (KS) Journal World (7/5), Rosa Brooks, an associate professor at the University of Virginia School of Law, writes, "The Supreme Court on Thursday dealt the Bush administration a stinging rebuke, declaring in Hamdan v.

Rumsfeld that military commissions for trying terrorist suspects violate both U.S. military law and the Geneva Convention. … But the real blockbuster in the Hamdan decision is the court's holding that Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention applies to the conflict with al-Qaida — a holding that makes high-ranking Bush administration officials potentially subject to prosecution under the federal War Crimes Act." Brooks continues, "The provisions of the Geneva Convention were intended to protect noncombatants — including prisoners — in times of armed conflict. But as the administration has repeatedly noted, most of these protections apply only to conflicts between states. Because al-Qaida is not a state, the administration argued that the Geneva Convention didn't apply to the war on terror. These assertions gave the administration's arguments about the legal framework for fighting terrorism a through-the-looking-glass quality. On the one hand, the administration argued that the struggle against terrorism was a war, subject only to the law of war, not U.S. criminal or constitutional law. On the other hand, the administration said the Geneva Convention didn't apply to the war with al-Qaida, which put the war on terror in an anything-goes legal limbo. … This novel theory served as the administration's legal cover for a wide range of questionable tactics, ranging from the Guantanamo military tribunals to administration efforts to hold even U.S. citizens indefinitely without counsel, charge or trial. … Perhaps most troubling, it allowed the administration to claim that detained terrorism suspects could be subjected to interrogation techniques that constitute torture or cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment under international law, such as 'waterboarding,' placing prisoners in painful physical positions, sexual humiliation and extreme sleep deprivation. … For prosecutions to occur, some federal prosecutor would have to issue an indictment. And in the Justice Department of Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales -- who famously called the Geneva Convention 'quaint' -- a genuine investigation into administration violations of the War Crimes Act just ain't gonna happen. … But as Yale law professor Jack Balkin concludes, it's starting to look as if the Geneva Convention 'is not so quaint after all.'"

CIA Disbands Unit Solely Dedicated To Finding Bin Laden. The New York Times (7/4, Mazzetti, 1.19M) reports the Central Intelligence Agency has "closed a unit that for a decade had the mission of hunting Osama bin Laden and his top lieutenants, intelligence officials confirmed Monday." The "unit, known as Alec Station, was disbanded late last year and its analysts reassigned within the C.I.A. Counterterrorist Center, the officials said." The decision is "a milestone for the agency, which formed the unit before Osama bin Laden became a household name and bolstered its ranks after the Sept. 11 attacks, when President Bush pledged to bring Mr. bin Laden to justice 'dead or alive.'" Intelligence officials said the "realignment reflects a view that Al Qaeda is no longer as hierarchical as it once was," and a "growing concern about Qaeda-inspired groups that have begun carrying out attacks independent of Mr. bin Laden and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri."

Bin Laden Calls For Attacks On Shiites In Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (7/3, Ensor) reported, "In his fifth taped message this year, Osama bin Laden calls for attacks against Shiites in Iraq, and all those who support the government of Prime Minister al-Maliki or the United States. … It is a sharper tone than bin Laden and his deputy have so far taken against Iraqi Shiite, apostates, as he calls them, though he only calls for killing those who support the Iraqi government."

Experts Say Congress Should Avoid Major Changes In Detainee Policy. The AP (7/4, Yost) reports legal experts "urged Congress to forgo far-reaching changes following" the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld, in which the court ruled the White House had exceeded its authority in ordering military tribunals for Guatanamo Bay detainees. The "calls for caution stem from the Supreme Court's embrace of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions in a military commission case against Osama bin Laden's former driver." Duke University law professor Scott Silliman "said the court did not extend Article 3 protections to anyone outside of detainees facing trials before military commissions — just a handful of the more than 400 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay."

France Tries Six Former Guantanamo Detainees On Terrorism Charges. The New York Times (7/4, Smith, 1.19M) reports six former detainees "from the United States Naval Base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, went on trial" in Paris on Monday, "accused of past terrorist links." The US "released the six men, all of them French, in two groups, in July 2004 and March 2005. All but one of the men — Brahim Yadel, 36 — were freed pending trial after several months of further detention by the French authorities." The men are

"accused of training in a camp run by Al Qaeda near Kandahar, Afghanistan, during the months before the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States. If found guilty, they face up to 20 years in jail under a French antiterrorism law that makes 'associating with criminals in relation to a terrorist enterprise' a crime."

Treasury Official Faces Hurdles In Increasing Financial Pressure On Hamas, Iran. The Washington Post (7/5, A11, Linzer, 744K) in a positive profile of Treasury Department Undersecretary for Terrorism and Financial Intelligence Stuart Levey credits him with taking a more diplomatic approach by not condemning the disclosure of the terrorist finance tracking program saying he "made his disappointment over the reports strongly known without resorting to attack. It is a style that separates him from some within the administration he serves while bringing him closer to others." His non-confrontational approach has been successful. After joining the Treasury Department "he discovered, that simply asking bank managers to drop their business with Kim Jong Il worked better than surprising them with public embarrassment, as had been the strategy during Bush's first term." But using the same strategy against Hamas and the Iranian government, "have proven more challenging." His "direct approach with bank managers still comes in handy, but he has had difficulty persuading allies to sign on to a plan that will cost them in Iranian trade and oil." Levey said, "I've been in lots of meetings with foreign officials where I tell them what I want, and they look like they want to show me the door."

British Military, Police Under Stress In War On Terror. The New York Times (7/4, Cowell, 1.19M) reports Britain's "effort to curb terrorism — like that of the United States — is fought on a broad front, from the dark conspiracies of homegrown bombers to the resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan." Both "contests seemed to have intensified, with suggestions that British troops in Afghanistan were overstretched while the government and the police at home were locked in a duel with the judiciary over the handling of terrorism suspects." The High Court last week "rejected the government's use of a form of house arrest for terrorism suspects, saying it ran counter to human rights laws," while in Parliament "lawmakers discussed increasing the maximum period of detention without trial for terrorism suspects to 90 days, from 28 — a proposal strongly opposed by civil libertarians." Meanwhile, British commanders in Afghanistan "say they have requested further equipment to fight insurgents in southern Helmand Province, where five British soldiers have been killed in recent weeks, two of them over the weekend." The debates "have sharpened as Britain prepares to commemorate the 52 people killed by four suicide bombers in London last July 7, offering a reminder of the stakes and scope of the campaign against terrorism."

Kristof Says Administration Effort To "Tame" Media Is Dangerous. In his New York Times column (7/4), Nicholas Kristof says that with President Bush "leading a charge against this 'disgraceful' newspaper, and a conservative talk show host, Melanie Morgan, suggesting that maybe The Times's executive editor should be executed for treason, we face a fundamental dispute about the role of the news media in America. At stake is the administration's campaign to recast the relationship between government and press." But "historically, we in the press have done more damage to our nation by withholding secret information than by publishing it." So "be very wary of Mr. Bush's effort to tame the press. Watchdogs can be mean, dumb and obnoxious, but it would be even more dangerous to trade them in for lap dogs."

State Department Official Defends US Rendition Policy. U.S. Department of State Legal Adviser John Bellinger III in a letter to the editor in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) defends the US renditions policy saying the State Department disagrees with the Venice Commission's assertion "that there are only four legal ways to transfer a prisoner to foreign authorities: deportation, extradition, transit, and transfer of a sentenced person to serve that sentence in his country of origin." Bellinger states, "As the European Commission on Human Rights found, renditions are not per se unlawful, though important principles must be protected. Renditions should not be used to transfer terrorist suspects to face torture, and the U.S. does not transport anyone, and will not transport anyone, for this purpose. We believe, however, that the international community must continue to be able to use renditions not only to bring terrorists to justice but also to prevent terrorist suspects from remaining at large to plan future attacks."

Congress Urged To Increase Oversight Role Of Administration National Security Policies.

Balch & Bingham attorney Stephen Gidiere, in an op-ed in USA Today (7/5, 2.31M) raises questions about the success of the Freedom of Information Act's on its 40th anniversary. Focusing on the Bush Administration, Gidiere states that even prior to the 9/11 attack, "President Bush has repeatedly asserted his constitutional power to hide information from the American people, Congress and the courts." Bush "says he's using that power only to track down terrorists, but we'll never know because the eavesdropping program is, well, secret." And "Congress seems happy to abdicate its power to the president. FOIA's 40th anniversary is the perfect opportunity for Congress to reassert its role." Gidiere concludes, "There will always be secrets, and good government requires a balance between secrecy and openness. This balance must be constantly adjusted as circumstances change. But right now, Bush is pulling hard on his side of the rope, and no one is pulling back."

Cohen Defends NYTimes Decision To Publish Details Of Anti-Terror Programs. The New York Times continues its now-daily defense of its decision to publish details of US national security programs. Roger Cohen in his column in the New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) cites President Bush's and Vice President Cheney's objections but in particular takes issue with White House press secretary Tony Snow's accusation that the New York Time's placing "the public's right to know" over "somebody's right to live" as "an offensive way of framing the core of this debate." Cohen argues "Making a society safe is not everything. The Soviet Union was safe enough. … American liberty thrives on a division of power that endless war should not be allowed to erode." Therefore, "publishing may be patriotic, a defense rather than a betrayal of America."

US Crackdown On Possible Terrorist Financing Criticized As Too Broad. Michael Young, opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) uses his own personal example of having his US bank account closed because he lived in Lebanon as an example of how the Patriot Act was having a negative effect in the war against terrorism. Sun Trust "decided to discontinue financial services to any 'individual residing in an OFAC [the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control] sanctioned or other high risk country.'" Young says his problem with Sun Trust "highlighted how, in the name of national security, the U.S. government and institutions coping with its requirements may be throwing the baby out with the bathwater. Banks indiscriminately sanctioning depositors in risk countries owe them a minimum of privacy and the benefit of the doubt. Fighting terrorism won't work if most of those paying the price happen to be on your side."

Ignatius Warns Administration Against Politicizing Terror Policy Debate. Two opinion pieces in the Washington Post accuse the Administration and Republicans of placing politics before national security in the debate over national counter-terrorism policies. David Ignatius in his column in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, 744K) writes, "The Bush administration's press-bashing campaign may be good election-year politics, but it is adding a poisonous new element to the national security debate at the very time the administration ought to be trying to rebuild a bipartisan consensus." The Supreme Court's ruling against the Administration's detainee policies "completed the collapse of the temporary post-Sept. 11 system. The administration should be working carefully with Congress to build a permanent legal framework -- rather than using anti-terrorist agitprop against the New York Times in an effort to patch together the old scaffolding." The GOP "may pick up votes by berating the New York Times. And the administration may even be tempted to bring a criminal case to enforce the rules against leaking or publishing communications secrets. But those politically divisive steps won't give anti-terrorism programs the broader legal foundation they need, and in that sense, they won't make the country any safer."

Meyerson Predicts Republicans Will Use Detainee Policy Debate For Partisan Purposes. Harold Meyerson in his column in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, Meyerson, 744K) writes that after the recent Supreme Court ruling on US detainee policy, "Republicans have a choice. Working with the Democrats, they could craft a legislative response that incorporates both halves of the court's decision, guaranteeing the legality of the new procedures -- but forfeiting a major opportunity to demagogue against Democrats between now and November. Or, as they do roughly 100 times out of 100, they could simply choose to go for the politics. A bill that gives the force of law to the administration's kangaroo courts could surely pass the House with close to unanimous Republican support. In the Senate, so many Republicans might demur that such a bill could fail. No matter: Some Democrats in both houses would surely vote against such a bill, which Rove and Co. would use to brand the party as one big Osama Enabling Society. And the rule of law? That's so pre-Sept. 11."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Nebraska ACLU Files FOIA Request For FBI Surveillance Of Peace Groups. The Lincoln Journal Star (7/4) reported, "The Nebraska affiliate of the American Civil Liberties Union said Monday it filed a records request with the Federal Bureau of Investigation to determine if the agency has illegally spied on Nebraskans." Citing "recent news reports that said the agency has spied on Quakers in Colorado and Catholic Peace Ministries in Iowa, among other 'peaceful groups,'" Nebraska ACLU legal director Amy Miller said, "Since we have people working for peace and justice in Nebraska who are criticizing the current administration, we fear the FBI has been illegally spying in our state, too." The Journal Star added, "The ACLU filed the request…on behalf of itself, Nebraskans for Peace, Speak Out at Stratcom, Nebraskans for Justice and seven citizens who are active in those groups." The AP (7/4, O'Hanlon) noted, "One of the individuals named in the request is Malcom Miles, who helped organize the Speak Out at Stratcom event on the anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima. 'It is frightening to know that the FBI may have been involved in spying on a group of Nebraska citizens who planned a legal and peaceful event in full cooperation with the Omaha Police Department, the United States Air Force, the University of Nebraska at Omaha and the cities of Omaha and Bellevue,' he said. 'The FBI should be concerned about protecting us from serious threats, not worrying about legal, peaceful, public gatherings.'"

Former White House Official Hired For Top NYPD Counterterrorism Post. The New York Times (7/5, Baker, 1.19M) describes how former White House national security policy expert Richard Falkenrath was recently offered a position as deputy commissioner for counterterrorism in the New York Police Department. As someone who helped create the DHS he has extensive policy experience, but "this operational post…is something of a departure. At least one former head of the city's Office of Emergency Management, while praising Dr. Falkenrath personally, called him a surprising choice. But Commissioner Kelly says his department can quickly give its new deputy commissioner any seasoning he may need." And "the F.B.I. has praised the choice. In a statement last Wednesday it said the bureau's director, Robert S. Mueller III, had worked closely with Dr. Falkenrath and acknowledged 'his distinguished history of public service.'"

NYTimes Advocates Listing Names Of 9/11 Victims Randomly At WTC Memorial. The New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) in an editorial examines the debate over how the names of the victims of the 9/11 attacks should be presented at the Ground Zero memorial. The original plan called for the names to be recorded randomly, "to acknowledge the randomness with which death struck on that day and to honor the individuality of every victim." But, "many 9/11 family members have argued that the names should be grouped by the tower they died in, the company they worked for, and the floor they worked on. The impetus is, in part, the desire to place loved ones in their context, to provide a richer narrative for each individual." The Times states, "To us, the most respectful acknowledgment we can make to them is to acknowledge them as individuals" and rank them randomly regardless of status.

Lagging Hospital, School, City Services Limit Repopulation Of New Orleans. In a New York Times op-ed (7/5), Matt Fellowes of the Brookings Institution, Bruce Katz and Amy Liu of the metropolitan policy program, and graphic designer Nigel Holmes says, "Last week this newspaper reported that more than $2 billion in reconstruction aid for the victims of Hurricane Katrina had been lost to 'scams, schemes and stupefying bureaucratic bungles.' Add to this the inexcusable $7 billion allocated for temporary trailers and mobile homes, which cost far more than available rental apartments, and the scale of waste is stunning. Nonetheless, the vast majority of the $107 billion we calculate has been allocated by the federal government has been converted by public officials and private leaders into a substantial amount of progress." As a graphic included "indicates, problems in reopening hospitals and schools and in getting city services operating will make it hard for New Orleans to attract new families, particularly the service workers that support the tourism industry."

Inmates Remain Source Of Cheap Labor In Louisiana. The New York Times (7/5, Nossiter, 1.19M)

reports many people "in East Carroll Parish, as Louisiana counties are known, say they could not get by without their inmates, who make up more than 10 percent of its population and most of its labor force. They are dirt-cheap, sometimes free, always compliant, ever-ready and disposable." National prison experts "say that only Louisiana allows citizens to use inmate labor on such a widespread scale, under the supervision of local sheriffs. The state has the nation's highest incarceration rate, and East Carroll Parish, a forlorn jurisdiction of 8,700 people along the Mississippi River in the remote northeastern corner of Louisiana, has one of the highest rates in the state." As a result, "it is here that the nation's culture of incarceration achieves a kind of ultimate synthesis with the local economy. The prison system converts a substantial segment of the population into a commodity that is in desperately short supply — cheap labor — and local-jail inmates are integrated into every aspect of economic and social life."

WAR NEWS:

Former GI Accused Of Raping Iraqi Woman, Killing Three Family Members. The Financial Times (7/4, Yeager) reports, "Steven Green, 21, who was discharged from the US army 'due to a personality disorder' before the case came to light, was arrested on Friday and appeared in federal court in North Carolina on Monday." According to an affidavit filed on Monday, Green, "who had been stationed in Iraq with the 101st airborne division, conspired with three other soldiers to rape a woman who lived near the traffic checkpoint they manned in Mahmudiya, south of Baghdad. … After participating in the rape of the woman, Mr Green shot and killed her, according to the charges. He also allegedly shot and killed three family members – an adult male, an adult woman, and a girl – who were in the house, prosecutors said." The charges "come amid several investigations into alleged killings of Iraq civilians by US servicemen." The allegations "are likely to further fuel anti-US sentiment in Iraq and add to calls that the US withdraw its troops."

ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 3, 1:45, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "The three other soldiers are still serving in Iraq. They are being questioned. They have not been charged. This is the same company that just a couple of weeks ago had two soldiers kidnapped, tortured and killed."

The CBS Evening News (7/3, story 3, 1:45, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "They are the worst, most shocking charges yet leveled at US troops serving in Iraq." CBS (Stewart) added, "Obviously this was a brutal crime by any standard and one obvious question is whether insurgents later targeted this unit in reprisal for the murders. There's no evidence that's the case and we may never know." On its website, USA Today (7/4, Johnson) also notes "the suspects belong to the same unit as two soldiers kidnapped and killed south of Baghdad last month, a military official told the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the case is underway." The military "has said that one and possibly both of the slain soldiers were tortured and beheaded. The official said the mutilation of the slain soldiers stirred feelings of guilt and led at least one member of the platoon to reveal the rape-slaying on June 22."

On NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 3, 2:40, Curry, 9.87M), Eugene R. Fidell, a military law expert, was shown saying, "If they prove to be true, it's a very disturbing set of facts and it's certainly going to have a terrible effect on relations with the Iraqi people." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "If convicted of murder, Green could face the death penalty. Because he's a civilian, Green's been charged in Federal court but Army officials say there's still an outside chance he could be recalled to duty and face trial before a military Court Marshal. Ann."

The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Spiegel, 958K) reports, "The killings have fanned unease between Iraqi officials and the US military, and the incident in Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad, is considered likely to aggravate tensions further because of its violent, sexual nature."

The New York Times (7/4, Cloud, Semple, 1.19M) reports, "The rape victim was identified in the American court documents as a 25-year-old woman, but there have been conflicting accounts of her age. In Iraq, the mayor of Mahmudiya said Monday that the rape victim had been only 15 years old." The mayor, Mouayid Fadhil, "said that those killed included the rape victim's parents and her 7-year-old sister, and that the attackers also tried to set the rape victim's body on fire, apparently in an effort to cover up evidence." A White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino, said, "The president has full confidence in the military to investigate alleged crimes and to punish anyone convicted of abhorrent behavior that dishonors the proud traditions of our military. He will not comment on ongoing investigations so as not to prejudice the outcome; however, he believes that 99.9 percent of our men and women in uniform are performing their jobs honorably and skillfully and they deserve our full appreciation and gratitude."

The Washington Post (7/4, White, 744K) reports, "The case is the fifth in recent weeks in which US troops have been accused of killing civilians in Iraq, a spate of incidents that has drawn attention to the way U.S. forces operate in what is often a complex and confusing battlefield. The rape and murder allegations against Green, however, detail a crime that appears to have had little if anything to do with the prosecution of the war itself." According to an affidavit by FBI Special Agent Gregor J. Ahlers, "the crimes appeared carefully crafted." The AP (7/4, Whitmire) says "an official familiar with details of the investigation in Iraq has told The Associated Press that a flammable liquid was used to burn the rape victim's body in an attempted cover-up." The affidavit "noted that prosecutors have photos taken by Army investigators in Iraq of all four bodies found inside a burned house and a photo of a burned body of 'what appears to be a woman with blankets thrown over her upper torso.'"

Iraqi Officials Express Outrage Over Rape-Slay Case. USA Today (7/5, 2.31M) reports, "Iraqi officials expressed outrage Tuesday over charges that a US soldier raped a young Iraqi woman and murdered her and her family." The rape and murder charges "were made public Monday when Steven Green, 21, appeared in federal court in North Carolina. The military said at least four other soldiers still in Iraq are under investigation in the March 12 slayings of the woman, her parents and her younger sister in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad."

The AP (7/5) reports, "Iraq's justice minister Tuesday condemned the alleged rape-slaying by U.S. soldiers of an Iraqi woman and the killing of her family. … 'If this act actually happened, it constitutes an ugly and unethical crime, monstrous and inhuman, and is a violation of international and Geneva conventions,' Justice Minister Hashim Abdul-Rahman al Shebli, a Sunni Arab, said in a statement." He "demanded that the United Nations Security Council and other international organizations make sure troops are punished."

The Washington Times/AP (7/5, Gamel) reports, "Iraqi lawmakers blasted the United States on Tuesday over an alleged rape-slaying case, while a southern governor said he was resigning amid fears Iraqi forces cannot handle security once coalition troops transfer responsibility there this month." Two women legislators "called for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to be summoned to parliament to give assurances that justice would be done in the March 12 slaying of four members of a family in Mahmoudiya. A teenage girl allegedly was raped before being killed. … The two lawmakers, Safiya al-Suhail and Ayda al-Sharif, said condemnation was not enough. 'We demand severe punishment for the five soldiers involved,' al-Sharif said. 'Denouncements are not enough. If this act has taken place in another country, the world would have turned upside down.'"

Another AP story (7/4, Reid) says "allegations of US soldiers abusing civilians often draw more media attention in the United States than in Iraq. And they generate little more than perfunctory statements from Iraq's leaders, who depend on American troops for their political and physical survival." However, "such reports do serve to motivate insurgents, who seize upon them for propaganda value. The allegations also undermine public confidence in the US-backed government and complicate America's hopes of reducing forces."

Pace Pledges Full Investigation. The AP (7/4, Whitmire) reports, "The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff vowed Tuesday to get to the bottom of charges that a former solider raped and killed a young Iraqi woman and shot her family to death. Three other soldiers still in Iraq are suspected of joining in the crime and helping cover it up." Marine Gen. Peter Pace said yesterday, "Any such acts on the part of a US servicemember, if proven to be true, are totally unacceptable. We know that in uniform, and our fellow citizens know that…If there are those who have done things as they have been accused of, we will get to the bottom of it. We will do the investigations, we will find out what the truth is, and, if necessary, we will take those who deserve to be taken to court so they can have their day in court."

Probe Looking Into Unit Oversight Issues. The New York Times (7/5, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "The military investigation…is looking at whether poor oversight within the soldiers' unit helped give them the chance to operate on their own, American military officials said Tuesday. … The procedures will be given a 'top-down scrub,' one of the officials added. This broad approach to the investigation leaves open the possibility that senior officers in the unit, the 502nd Infantry Regiment of the 101st Airborne Division, may be implicated later."

request from some local insurgent leaders to supply them with weapons so they can turn on the heavily armed foreign fighters who were once their allies, according to two Iraqi lawmakers. Leaders claiming to represent about 11 insurgent groups asked for weapons to fight foreign al-Qaeda elements in Iraq, said Haider al-Ibadi, a Shiite lawmaker and member of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa Party." The insurgent request "was confirmed by al-Ibadi and Mithal al-Alusi, another lawmaker. Al-Maliki was out of the country, and several officials in his office declined to comment. The request came out of talks between people claiming to represent insurgent groups and the Iraqi government." USA Today adds" the US military said insurgent talks are an Iraqi matter."

Activity In Baghdad Morgue Signals Increase In Violence. The New York Times (7/5, Tavernise, Nageeb, 1.19M) reports, "The central morgue said Tuesday that it received 1,595 bodies last month, 16 percent more than in May, in a tally that showed the pace of killing here has increased since the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Al Qaeda's leader in Iraq." Baghdad, "home to one-fourth of Iraq's population, has slowly descended into a low-grade civil war in some neighborhoods, with Sunni and Shiite militias carrying out systematic sectarian killings that clear whole city blocks." The Times adds, "To a large extent, control of the capital means control of the country, and Baghdad is at the center of efforts by American military officials and the new Iraqi government to stem the tide of violence."

US Forces To Bulldoze Area Of Ramadi Where Repeated Fighting Has Occurred. The New York Times (7/5, A1, Filkins, 1.19M) reports from Ramadi, "In three years here the Marine Corps and the Army have tried nearly everything to bring this provincial capital of 400,000 under control. Nothing has worked. Now American commanders are trying something new. Instead of continuing to fight for the downtown, or rebuild it, they are going to get rid of it, or at least a very large part of it." They "say they are planning to bulldoze about three blocks in the middle of the city, part of which has been reduced to ruins by the fighting, and convert them into a Green Zone, a version of the fortified and largely stable area that houses the Iraqi and American leadership in Baghdad." The idea "is to break the bloody stalemate in the city by ending the struggle over the battle-scarred provincial headquarters that the insurgents assault nearly every day. The Government Center will remain, but the empty space around it will deny the guerrillas cover to attack." Ramadi, "a largely Sunni Arab city, is regarded by American commanders as the key to securing Anbar Province."

Critics Say Iraq IG Trying To Create "Empire." The Washington Times (7/5, Scarborough, 90K) reports Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the Bush Administration's special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction (SIGIR), has "has near carte blanche to probe how the administration has managed nearly $70 billion in Iraqi and U.S. taxpayer rebuilding money. His rapid-fire series of reports on the reconstruction at times have seared the White House and delighted its Democratic critics. … If the White House thought it was getting a pushover by hiring a longtime legal adviser to Mr. Bush, well, it was wrong." The Times adds, "Since taking office in January 2004, Mr. Bowen's staff of more than 160 federal and contract employees have churned out an impressive array of work -- 55 audits, 165 recommendations, 42 project assessments and 112 reports based on satellite imagery." Critics "contend that Mr. Bowen gives little emphasis to a broad list of achievements in Iraq. … Anonymous critics also say Mr. Bowen is trying create an 'empire' with expanded power to investigate all sorts of operations in Iraq, not just rebuilding."

Blair Says Withdrawal Of "Substantial" Number Of UK Troops Possible In 2007. CNN's The Situation Room (7/4, King) reported that British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday "there could be opportunities over the next year and a half to withdraw a substantial number of British troops from Iraq. Prime Minister Blair pegged that troop reduction to the buildup of Iraqi forces."

Five Workers For US Base Killed In Afghanistan. The AP (7/4, Shah) reports, "A bomb hidden in a cart exploded Tuesday in a crowded intersection of downtown Kabul, injuring 10 people, and five Afghan laborers were ambushed and fatally shot on their way to a U.S. military base in eastern Afghanistan." The attacks "come amid a surge of violence by Taliban-led rebels, 12 of whom are killed in a clash with police." The bomb that went off in the Afghan capital "had been planted in a hand cart behind a car, said police official Mohammed Nabi. The explosion took place at a busy traffic intersection near the presidential palace, shattering windows at a movie theater and the nearby Justice Ministry." The New York Times (7/5, Gall, 1.19M) also reports the story.

CIA Closes Unit Overseeing Hunt For Bin Laden. Fox News' Special Report (7/4, Wilson) reported, "US intelligence officials today confirmed reports the CIA has closed…the unit assigned to oversee the hunt for Osama bin Laden. They say the unit shut down late last year because the agency is now more concerned about terrorists attacks independent of bin Laden and al Qaeda."

US Forces Celebrate Independence Day In Iraq, Afghanistan. NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 5, 2:15, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "For Americans in war zones, there was little opportunity to commemorate the day, no time off from the violence or from the need to maintain vigilance. But even on a holiday so far from home, troops found ways to note their special connection to the fight for freedom." NBC (Maceda) added, "Even in this sprawling furnace called Kandahar airbase, a few American soldiers managed to celebrate with an outdoor barbeque and Fourth of July fantasies."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 6, 1:45, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "For families of troops overseas in Iraq and Afghanistan are likely to be deployed soon, there was a bittersweet note to this Independence Day celebration, the fun somewhat muted by concerns for loved ones in harm's way." CBS (Acosta) went on to report from at Fort Hood, TX, where it showed Jessica Signor, a soldier's wife, saying, "They've been over there for a long time and I know some more -- longer than others -- so I know they're looking forward to coming home." CBS added, "For some that homecoming cannot happen soon enough. But at least for today, those concerns can be set aside. There will be a fireworks show later this evening and nobody does explosives better than the Army."

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Barnes, 958K) reports that in Iraq, "most US troops marked the Fourth of July by doing the exact same thing they did on July 3: Patrolling the streets, training Iraqis, checking people into sleeping quarters or whatever their jobs entail. There aren't any fireworks, for obvious reasons."

US Troops In Iraq, Afghanistan Become Naturalized Citizens. The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 8, 2:55, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "It was an especially patriotic Fourth of July for some brand new Americans who became citizens half a world away. Twenty-six foreign-born members of the US military took the oath at a base north of Kabul in Afghanistan. A similar ceremony was held in Iraq for troops taking advantage of a new law that put them on the fast track to US citizenship."

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 8, 2:30, Moran, 8.78M) reported, "This Independence Day was a milestone for a group of soldiers in Iraq. In one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces, they became citizens of the country they're fighting to protect. They are at war. The nation's flag emblazoned on their uniforms. But it wasn't until today…that they became Americans." NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 6, 2:30, Curry, 9.87M) said the "76 men and women…were born in 29 different countries but they are all wearing one uniform and fighting for one nation -- the United States. Yet when they joined, not one was even an American citizen."

Air Force Captain Stationed In Iraq Criticizes "Politicians In Washington." F. John Duresky, an Air Force captain stationed in Iraq, writes in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, 744K), "Yesterday millions of Americans celebrated Independence Day," and "today Americans go back to their normal business. The politicians in Washington have made sure the sacrifices of the war are borne by the very smallest percentage of Americans. They won't even change the tax rates to prevent deficits from running out of control. Future generations will pay the cost of this war. Many Americans feel strongly about the war one way or another, but they aren't signing up their children for service or taking the protest to the streets. What can they do? It is they whom we in the military trust to influence our leaders in Washington." Duresky adds, "Today, as on every other day in Iraq, American servicemen are in very real danger. Our country is at war. Mothers, fathers, wives, husbands and children are worrying about their loved ones in a faraway land. They all hope he or she isn't the one whose luck runs out today."

US Military Radio Host In Iraq Profiled. The Washington Post (7/5, A8, Finer, 744K) profiles "the US military's most popular radio host in Iraq," Spec. Kristen King, 21, whose "sugary twang a product of her Shreveport, La., upbringing. … A reservist halfway through a journalism degree at Louisiana State University, King is energetic and apple-cheeked, with a tireless smile. She wears desert camouflage fatigues, and her straight brown hair is pulled tightly behind her head. Her program, 'Country Convoy,' is four hours of down-home Americana beamed throughout Iraq

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Mercury Interactive Review Finds Options Backdating. The San Jose Mercury News (7/5, Garner) reports, "More than a year and a half after regulators began examining its stock options practices, Mercury Interactive said Monday that it has found 54 intentional acts of backdating options, from 1994 until March 31, 2005, to inflate senior executives' compensation." The News continues, "Mercury's former senior management 'deliberately' overrode controls to prevent backdating, the Mountain View company said in a regulatory filing." The News adds, "Mercury, a maker of software to test computer programs, was one of the first valley companies to come under suspicion for options granting practices, a controversy that has now widened to include about two dozen valley companies. … In November, three senior executives -- then-Chief Executive Amnon Landan, Chief Financial Officer Douglas Smith and General Counsel Susan Skaer -- resigned after a special committee of board members determined that top executives had manipulated dates of option grants over a decade. … The filing Monday by the maker of software to test computer programs suggested that regulators are starting to go after directors as well. Mercury said directors Igal Kohavi, Yair Shamir and Giora Yaron on June 23 received so-called Wells notices from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, warning that the agency may seek to permanently bar them from the boards of any public company. The SEC is considering charges alleging each director knew or should have known about the manipulation of option grant dates. Mercury said it has accepted those directors' resignations."

The Financial Times (7/5, Grant) reports, "The stock options backdating scandal in the US widened this week as four companies said they were being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission or federal prosecutors." The Times continues, "Mercury Interactive, a California-based business software company, said three of its directors had offered to step aside from the company's audit and compensation committees after being told by the SEC it was considering a civil enforcement action against them for violations of federal securities laws. .. About 60 companies have said they are subject to government probes. Many are also conducting internal reviews." The Times adds, "Authorities want to know whether companies falsified documents to make the backdated granting of an option appear on a different date from that already announced by the company. … They also want to know whether stock options that were backdated were properly accounted for and disclosed to shareholders. … A number of companies have already been hit with class action lawsuits from public pension funds and other shareholders claiming that the accounting effects of backdated options were not properly disclosed to them and that executives fraudulently pocketed profits as a result of the backdating."

The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "In a sign that securities regulators may try to hold directors accountable for stock-option grant backdating, the Securities and Exchange Commission staff has said it is likely to pursue civil charges against directors of Mercury Interactive Corp., one of the first companies caught up in the options scandal, according to a regulatory filing." The Journal continues, "To fix faulty accounting, Mercury restated years of financial results, reducing its net income by $525.4 million from 1992 to 2004 -- nearly all due to options-related problems. The restatement for 2003 turned that year's reported profit of $41.5 million into a loss of $62.6 million. … An independent investigation led by a special board committee uncovered other troubles at Mercury, including improper management of earnings and a $1 million loan to the former chief executive that 'lacked documentation supporting its approval' by the board. … Mercury, of Mountain View, Calif., said three directors, including prominent Israeli businessman Yair Shamir, received so-called Wells notices, which signify the inclination of the SEC staff to pursue civil-securities charges against the individuals. Mercury said the directors have notified the SEC that they intend to challenge any charges, claiming they neither knew about, nor participated in, the alleged backdating."

CEOs Pushing Back In Dispute Over Executive Pay. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Murray) reports, "Tired of being beat up over executive pay, big business is starting to push back -- a bit. … Today, the Business Roundtable, a lobbying group of chief executives of 160 of the largest companies in the U.S., is releasing a study showing the pay of CEOs, while still lush compared to that of a Starbucks barista, isn't as outrageous as some press reports suggest." The Journal continues, "The study, authored by compensation consultant Frederic W. Cook, is based on the 350 large public companies in the Mercer Human Resources Consulting database. And it finds that the median pay of CEOs -- which Mr. Cook argues is a better measure than average pay -- was $6.8 million last year, down slightly from its peak of $7 million in 2004. Those numbers include salary, bonus and the estimated value of options at the time they were issued, using the Black-Scholes method." The Journal adds, "That's a lot of money. But it's 'only' 179 times the pay of the average American worker -- not 475 times, a number of vague origins that has popped up in some media reports, including in this newspaper. (The Journal later issued a correction.) … Moreover, the study shows growth in CEO pay over the past decade has roughly tracked growth in shareholder returns. Median CEO compensation has grown 9.6% a year since 1995 -- compared with 9.9% growth in median annual shareholder returns. That, Mr. Cook argues, shows that these CEOs, as a group, are getting pay raises commensurate with performance."

South Korea Continues Probe Of Texas Firm. The New York Times (7/5, Fackler) reports, "South Korean authorities are continuing a high-profile investigation into Lone Star, the Dallas-based private-equity fund, fueling a public backlash against excessive profits made by foreign investment funds." The Times continues, "Just eight years ago, Lone Star was hailed as a savior, pouring money into companies crippled by South Korea's financial crisis. Today, it appears to be in danger of being run out of town in a flap that could threaten Seoul's attractiveness to foreign investors." The Times adds, "South Korea is investigating Lone Star for possible wrongdoing involving its takeover of Korea Exchange Bank. Lone Star's plan to sell the bank, earning a windfall profit of $4.4 billion, has provoked a public outcry, along with its attempts to avoid Korean taxes. … A separate investigation into allegations of embezzlement and bribery resulted in a raid on Lone Star's Seoul offices and the arrest of three businessmen linked to the fund. … Lone Star's troubles sit at the center of a growing uproar over the huge and often tax-free profits earned by foreign hedge funds and other investment funds, which like Lone Star are now cashing out of lucrative investments made here during and after the financial crisis. Most experts, however, describe the outcry as just growing pains of this country's rapid transformation into one of Asia's most open economies."

Federal Prosecutors Feel Vindicated By Sieglman, Scrushy Convictions. The Birmingham News (AL) (7/5, Chandler) reports, "In 2004, prosecutor Louis Franklin had a decision to make: Continue the 3-year-old investigation into Gov. Don Siegelman's administration or close the books on it for good." The News continues, "The easy thing would have been to walk away. … Siegelman was a popular politician with widespread support in the state. The Democrat had a bevy of skilled lawyers at his disposal. … 'What a lot of people don't know is, until we impaneled that special grand jury, this case was about to be closed,' Franklin said. … 'We knew this is going to be tough. They are going to have an explanation that people are going to want to believe. Nobody wants to believe a governor is trading on his office,' Franklin said." The News notes, "Franklin, chief of the criminal division in the Middle District of Alabama, inherited the case when his predecessor retired. Leura Canary, the U.S. attorney in the district, had stepped aside after a lawyer for Siegelman complained to the U.S. Department of Justice about her husband's long-standing ties to Republican politics. … Franklin and others decided to convene a special grand jury in June 2004. The investigation, put together from the privacy of an office in a leaky old airplane hangar, culminated Thursday with guilty verdicts against Siegelman and HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy on bribery charges. … Franklin said the team of career prosecutors that drove the final years of the case felt vindicated by the verdicts after months of heated words between the two sides."

New Regulator Says Fannie, Freddie Roles Should Be Reduced, Not Eliminated. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports the new director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, James Lockhart, said Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac "should retain an ability to help prop up the U.S. home-mortgage market in times of financial turmoil, the companies' new chief regulator said in an interview." Lockhart's remark "point to a possible compromise in the heated debate over the future role of the government-sponsored providers of funding for home loans." The Bush Administration "is pushing for legislation that would force the companies to shed most of their holdings of mortgages and related securities, totaling more than $1.4 trillion. But housing-industry officials and many members of Congress fret that strict limits on those holdings could deprive the housing market of a steady source of funding." Lockhart

"said the mortgage portfolios held by Fannie and Freddie are far too large, creating the risk of serious damage to financial markets if the companies fail to control their interest-rate risks. But Mr. Lockhart still sees a role for those portfolios, on a smaller scale, in ensuring that plenty of money is available for home loans."

CRIMINAL LAW:

All 50 States Now Participating In Online Sex Offender Registry. The AP (7/5) reports, "US authorities said on Monday all 50 states have joined a national web site that lists addresses and other details of convicted sex offenders." The AP continues, "The states of South Dakota and Oregon were added last week to the registry, which 'provides real-time access to public sex offender data nationwide with a single Internet search,' the Department of Justice said in a statement." The AP adds, "The online database includes more than 500,000 convicted sex offenders who are required to register their address with local authorities. … The government-sponsored site 'allows parents and concerned citizens to search existing public state and territory sex offender registries beyond their own states,' the Justice Department said. .. Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales said the completion of the National Sex Offender Public Registry was 'good news' for parents and police. 'The constant effort to safeguard our children from sex offenders is never finished, but today's announcement marks a clear accomplishment on the side of protection,' Gonzales said in a statement."

Government Technology (7/5) reports, "The Justice Department announced the activation of a national registry Web site last year and initially linked 22 states to the site. Oregon and South Dakota recently passed the sex offender legislation that now allows the state to be included in the NSOPR as of July 1, 2006. With the addition of these two states inclusion, the registry connects 50 states, the District of Columbia and the territory of Guam the site. … 'With the inclusion of the last two states to the registry, the capacity grows for parents and communities to be informed and aware of sex offenders residing in their neighborhoods. We commend Oregon and South Dakota for making the site truly available nationwide.' said Regina B. Schofield, Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Justice Programs. 'The coordination among states, private organizations, and the Department of Justice moves us closer to making information about all registered sex offenders available to parents and concerned citizens.'"

Pennsylvania Violent Obscenity Case Moves Forward. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/4, Ward) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court has refused to review a case in the Western District of Pennsylvania that involves the sale of violent, graphic pornography from California." The Post-Gazette continues, "A posting last week in U.S.A. v. Extreme Associates Inc. shows that the Supreme Court, on May 15, denied the defendants' request for a writ of certiorari." The Post-Gazette adds, "Attorneys for Robert Zicari and his wife, Janet Romano, who own Extreme Associates, asked the high court to review a December decision by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reinstating the criminal charges against them. … They were indicted in August 2003 and charged with 10 counts of mailing obscene materials, transporting obscene materials and criminal conspiracy. The pornography that they produce depicts violent scenes, including women being raped and killed. … U.S. District Judge Gary L. Lancaster dismissed the indictment against the couple in January 2005, saying that federal obscenity laws violate the U.S. Constitution. … But in December, the appeals court disagreed with Judge Lancaster, claiming that he erred and that his decision ignored existing precedent."

Reed Targeted For Role In Abramoff Scandal. The Washington Times (7/5, McCain, 90K) reports, "Two weeks before his July 18 Republican primary showdown with state Sen. Casey Cagle," Georgia lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed "is locked in a battle for political survival. On Monday, after weeks of attack ads from Mr. Reed, the Cagle campaign fired back with what Georgia pollster Matt Towery termed a 'hydrogen bomb' -- a TV ad accusing Mr. Reed of 'betrayal' for his role in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal." Reed has "denied wrongdoing in the Abramoff affair. But the latest TV ad by Mr. Cagle -- a 12-year state Senate veteran whom Mr. Reed has accused of tax dodging, ethical violations and opposing property rights -- seems to have put the Reed camp in an angry mood." The new Cagle ad "shows Mr. Reed being played as a face card in a poker hand, an allusion to the casino-lobbying scandal that has sent Abramoff and two associates to federal prison and caused Democrats to accuse the Republican Party of fostering a 'culture of corruption.'" The Cagle campaign "defended the ad by citing a Thursday report in the Wall Street Journal that 'Abramoff appears to have funneled $4 million in fees from the Mississippi Choctaw to Mr. Reed's consulting firm' through tax-exempt organizations." The "most recent public poll, taken last Tuesday and Wednesday by Mr. Towery's Insider Advantage firm, shows Mr. Reed with 32 percent support to 27 percent for Mr. Cagle, a north Georgia businessman."

Norquist Accuses McCain Of Retribution In Abramoff Report. The Hill (7/5, Sheffield) reports prominent conservative activist Grover Norquist "says a Senate report connecting him with convicted felon Jack Abramoff is a personal attack from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that could hurt the senator's recent efforts to woo the right for a presidential bid." Norquist says the Senate Indian Affairs Committee report last month "outlining his efforts to funnel money from Abramoff's tribal clients to former Christian Coalition head Ralph Reed is riddled with half-truths and falsely implicates his nonprofit group, Americans for Tax Reform (ATR), in wrongdoing." Norquist says McCain, "chairman of the committee, issued the report in retaliation for Norquist's efforts to thwart McCain's 2000 presidential bid." Norquist said, "He has exhibited personal animus toward me. McCain, who's running for president and is ostensibly the front-runner, takes time and effort to throw a punch at me and Ralph Reed. Why? He has told people we stopped him in the presidential election last time, and he thinks we might do it again. He is delusional." The Hill adds McCain aides "said the 373-page report, the culmination of a two-year investigation, is a neutral, factual account of Abramoff's movements."

Illinois Man Pleads Not Guilty To Murdering FBI Informant. The Chicago Sun-Times (7/4, Fitzpatrick) reported, "An Alsip man pleaded not guilty Monday to shooting an FBI informant in May as federal agents monitored the weapons sting. Jerry T. Henderson pleaded innocent to 12 counts of murder and three counts of armed robbery in the fatal shooting of FBI informant Timothy Forrest in a Dolton parking lot, prosecutors said." The Sun-Times noted that Forrest "was shot twice in the head, according to the Cook County medical examiner's office. FBI agents did not hear any shots, the agency said in a statement." The AP (7/4) added, "FBI spokesman Tom Simon said after Henderson's arrest that the FBI took all the normal safeguards to protect the cooperating witness, adding there were inherent risks anytime a cooperating witness meets with a criminal."

Mariano Lawyer, Supporters Ask Judge For Leniency In Sentencing. The Philadelphia Inquirer (7/4, Shiffman, 423K) reported that on Monday, "Rick Mariano's lawyer and friends…asked a federal judge to exercise leniency, arguing that the former city councilman does not deserve to spend a decade in prison for taking bribes" when he is sentenced Thursday. "Prosecutors have sought 10 years, arguing that Mariano betrayed the public trust and intimidated witnesses during their investigation. Mariano's lawyer, Thomas A. Bergstrom, said that a 10-year sentence is 'too harsh' and that the councilman's discussions with his staff helped the FBI, rather than hurt it."

Blagojevich Calls Hiring Fraud Report "A Good Thing." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (7/5, Carpenter) reports, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich insisted Tuesday that continued findings of wrongdoing within his administration are 'a good thing' because they are being made by an inspector general he appointed to help him clean up state government. The Democratic governor, on the defensive amid ongoing revelations about possible misconduct in the way his administration hands out state jobs and contracts, told reporters at an Independence Day parade that the findings show his administration is aggressively going after those who break rules and laws. Reiterating a position he has taken as the hiring scandals mount, Blagojevich called them a consequence of his efforts to change government practices after 26 years of Republican governors."

California Red Cross Employees Sentenced To Prison For Hurricane Relief Fraud. The AP (7/4) reported, "Two men were sentenced to federal prison Monday after pleading guilty to a scam that bilked thousands of Hurricane Katrina funds from the American Red Cross." David Robert Candelaria and Harold Dennis Oats "worked as employees at a Red Cross call center in Bakersfield where they filed false claims to get money wired to themselves or to family and friends. U.S. District Judge Anthony Ishii sentenced Candelaria to 18 months in prison and Oats to 10 months. They were also ordered to repay $12,520." The AP noted, "The Red Cross contacted the FBI after it performed an audit and discovered an unusually high number of claims were being paid out at Western Union outlets in the Bakersfield area, even though few evacuees had moved there." The Bakersfield Californian (7/4, Logan, 64K) added, "The FBI conducted an investigation and 72 people were charged with wire fraud, a federal crime. So far 60 defendants have pleaded guilty and 29 have been sentenced."

US Accuses Gang Of Conspiring To Kill Blacks. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Spano) reports, "Jose Cruz is a walking testament to what happens when a member turns against the Avenues street gang. … He has 30 scars from the stab wounds he suffered in one attempt on his life — on his arms, torso and legs. In another attack, he was beaten so severely that he has a visible dent in his skull, according to court papers, 'the size and shape of a pistol butt.'" The Times continues, "His street gang goes back five generations in Highland Park, which for Cruz is five miles and several lifetimes from the downtown courtroom where he is scheduled to testify as the star witness for the prosecution in the trial of a group of childhood friends. … Federal prosecutors, who launched their case last week, contend that the Avenues gang between 1994 and 2000 conspired to kill African Americans on their turf." The Times adds, "Men, women and children were harassed, terrorized, assaulted and slain as gang members sought to force black residents out of Latino neighborhoods, prosecutors said. … Authorities are using a federal hate-crime law based on the amendment to the U.S. Constitution that outlawed slavery, and another law created in the civil rights era, to go after four gang members. Barbara Bernstein, deputy chief of the criminal section of the civil rights divisions of the U.S. Department of Justice in Washington, is part of the prosecution team. … Attorneys for the defendants — Gilbert Saldana, Alejandro Martinez, Fernando Cazares and Porfirio Avila — have asserted that the federal government has no power to involve itself in a common street crime."

"Web Bangers" Posting Gang Web Sites. The AP (7/5, Glazer) reports, "Some of the country's most notorious street gangs have gotten Web-savvy, showcasing illegal exploits, making threats, and honoring killed and jailed members on digital turf. … 'Web bangers' are posting potentially incriminating photos of members holding guns, messages taunting other gangs and boasts of illegal exploits on personal Web sites and social networking sites." The AP notes, "Gangs once only roamed the streets of big cities but now can be found in 2,500 U.S. communities, according to the FBI. Police departments suddenly faced with the unwelcome arrivals are looking for help anywhere they can get it, including the gangs' own easy-to-find Web sites."

Ohio Police, FBI Arrest Seven In Ransom Kidnapping. WXIX-TV Cincinnati (7/3) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast Monday, "North College Hill Police and the FBI have been working around the clock on a bizarre case where a 17-year-old girl was kidnapped and held for ransom. Police are saying that at least one of the kidnappers has confessed to the crime. According to police, a woman came to the College Hill home of the girl early Monday morning and asked the girl, who answered the door, for help. The teen went to get a portable phone for the woman who then shoved the door open and abducted the girl." The Cincinnati Enquirer (7/4, Truong, 205K) added that the "girl was found duct-taped and blindfolded in the basement of a Bond Hill house Monday after she was kidnapped and a ransom was demanded, police said. Seven people have been arrested and were being interviewed by North College Hill police, Cincinnati police and the Federal Bureau of Investigation." WCPO-TV Cincinnati (7/3, Walton, Kettler, Terrell) noted that the girl "is currently at Children's Hospital with her parents and the FBI."

The AP (7/4) reported, "The suspects were being interviewed Monday by police in this Cincinnati suburb where the girl lives, as well as Cincinnati police and the FBI. … Police accompanied the girl's father to a park where he was supposed to meet her captors, who had demanded ransom. They chased a man who showed up to a house where the teen was found, authorities said."

Tennessee Truck Driver Arrested In Kidnapping, Sexual Assault Of Teen Girls. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Bernstein, 958K) reported, "A 16-year-old Lancaster girl was on her way home Monday, after what police said was a harrowing nearly two-week ordeal in which she and another teen were assaulted and held against their will by a cross-country trucker." Trucker Ricky Donnell Jones "remained in jail in Knoxville, Tenn., facing state charges of kidnapping while the FBI weighed whether to file additional charges in federal court. Knox County Sheriff's Department spokeswoman Martha Dooley said the girl and an 18-year-old friend had gone willingly with Jones." However, Dooley noted, "When both girls tried to get away from Jones, he held them against their will, he sexually assaulted them and he broke the 18-year-old's arm." The Times added, "FBI Special Agent Gary Kidder, who is based in Knoxville, said his agency was gathering information on the case to present to the U.S. attorney's office in Tennessee, to see if there was enough evidence to file federal charges against Jones."

US Pursuit Of Death Penalty In North Dakota Case Sparks Controversy. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (7/4, Prather) reports, "Dru Sjodin's disappearance touched off a torrent of worry and sadness. Alfonso Rodriguez Jr.'s arrest unleashed enough outrage to change how Minnesota and North Dakota deal with sex offenders. … More than two years after the painful saga unfolded, a trial that begins Thursday may force two states that haven't executed a criminal in more than a century to wade into the divisive issue of capital punishment." The P-P continues, "Sjodin's family and some of her friends have supported a federal prosecutor's decision to seek the death penalty. … 'There is no question in anybody's mind that's what should happen,' said friend Elia Loven. 'That's not even enough.' … Some of those who were close to the spirited college student aren't so sure that pursuing a death sentence is the right thing to do. High school friend Sarah Millard said she wonders what Sjodin would have wanted. … 'She did not have any grudges against anyone. Everyone was in love with her,' Millard said. 'Of course, you are so angry about what he did you feel that's the only way you are going to make peace. But at the same time, I try to think about had this been me, would Dru have been OK with the death penalty? I don't know if she would have.'" The P-P adds, "Jury selection begins Thursday in Fargo. Rodriguez, 53, who has pleaded not guilty, is accused of kidnapping, torturing and killing Sjodin. … Her disappearance in November 2003 from a shopping mall in Grand Forks sparked massive searches in North Dakota and Minnesota. Rodriguez, a convicted sex offender, was arrested the following month. Sjodin's body was found in April 2004. … Rodriguez faces a possible death sentence through a happenstance of geography. He is accused of crossing state lines during the commission of a kidnapping, which gave federal authorities an opportunity to step in. That action exposed Rodriguez to the death penalty, even though the crime he is accused of committing happened in two states that have outlawed capital punishment."

Suspect In Florida Death Returned To US. The Gainesville Sun (7/3, Pakkala) reports, "A former Gainesville nurse accused in the overdose death of a University of Florida student was returned to the United States from West Africa on Sunday." The Sun continues, 'Oliver Travis O'Quinn, 27, was escorted by U.S. Marshals to New York to await extradition to Florida. He is believed to have been out of the country since shortly after the November 2005 death." The Sun adds, "State Attorney Bill Cervone, whose office will handle the case when O'Quinn returns to Gainesville, was unsure Sunday when O'Quinn will be back. He said O'Quinn will decide whether to travel to Florida voluntarily or to have an extradition hearing. O'Quinn will be scheduled for an arraignment when he gets to Gainesville. … O'Quinn faces a second-degree murder charge in the death of 24-year-old Michelle Herndon, whose body was found in a southeast Gainesville apartment Nov. 10, 2005. … Shortly after the death, O'Quinn… left the country. Investigators tracked flight records to Ireland, and the North Florida Violent Fugitive Task Force joined the case at the request of Gainesville Police. … The Marshal Service and the U.S. Department of State's Diplomatic Security Service launched a week-long manhunt to catch back up with O'Quinn, eventually apprehending him in Senegal. … Once O'Quinn was in custody, the U.S. Department of State Bureau of Consular Affairs and the U.S. Department of Justice Office of International Affairs revoked his passport and released him to the Marshals Service for return to the U.S."

Extradition Dispute Looms In South Carolina Slay Case. The Greenville News (7/5, Edmonds) reports, "The United States faces a long, uphill legal battle in extraditing a former Wren High School student who is charged in the slaying of an Easley pawnshop owner." The News continues, "Roger Eugene Shephard, 21, has sought the protection of Canadian authorities because he may face the death penalty upon returning to the United States. … Shephard is charged in the slaying of John Bruin, 65, who was killed the afternoon of June 15 during an armed robbery at Action Pawn in downtown Easley." The News adds, "Because Shephard filed for refugee status, he cannot be deported, leaving the United States with no other option but to pursue extradition. A hearing on that effort will be held July 10. … Clemente Monterosso, Shephard's deportation lawyer, said he is waiting for the United States to file an extradition request. … Currently Monterosso has at least 15 extradition cases; among them are drug, conspiracy and telemarketing cases. In his experience, extradition takes an average of three to four years, sometimes more."

Lobbyists Square Off Over Internet Gambling Bills. The New York Times (7/4, Phillips, 1.19M) reports that while Internet gamblers "lay down big money on World Cup soccer this summer, teams of lobbyists are facing off on Capitol Hill in a contest over whether the United States should choke off the growth of wagering on the Web." Faced with "bills to curb online betting, which attracts an estimated $12 billion a year in wagers worldwide, an array of interest groups like casinos here and abroad, as well as sports leagues, antigambling coalitions and even poker players, has dispatched lobbyists to argue what should be legal and what should not." Major League Baseball "wants to make sure that any measures do not diminish fantasy sports games, which it credits for a resurgence in its popularity." The Justice Department has "always considered Internet gambling illegal. But that has not stopped online wagering from flourishing. Gambling opponents are pushing for bills to put teeth into enforcement. In the House, proponents of a crackdown merged two bills." The "odds of a bill's becoming law this year appear long. Beyond that, nearly everyone agrees that online betting may be unstoppable because of the reach of the Internet and the difficulty in regulating its activity."

Debate Grows Over Castration Of Sex Offenders. The Washington Post (7/5, B1, Rondeaux) reports, "James Jenkins wanted to end it. No more fantasies. No more molesting little girls. He knew he was the only one who could stop it; he was just waiting for the right time." The Post continues, "The right moment arrived one night nearly three years ago when he was alone in an Accomack County, Va., jail cell. He had spent five years in a Virginia prison for sexually molesting three young girls and another 2 1/2 years for violating his parole. The next morning, a prosecutor was going to ask a judge to commit him to a state facility for high-risk sex offenders. Jenkins could think of only one way out. … He asked a jail guard for a razor. He told the guard he wanted to look nice and cleanshaven for his court hearing the next day. The guard hesitated but handed Jenkins the blade. Jenkins walked to the shower in his cell. He bit the blade out of its plastic casing and stuffed an apple in his mouth to muffle his screams. Then he castrated himself and flushed his testicles down the jail cell toilet." The Post adds, "Jenkins, 63, doesn't flinch when he talks about it now. 'Castration has done precisely what I wanted it to do,' he said. 'I have not had any sexual urges or desires in over two years. My mind is finally free of the deviant sexual fantasies I used to have about young girls.'" The Post notes, "He spoke with the clinical cool of a surgeon as he tried to explain his pedophilia during a rare interview in a guarded room of the Virginia Center for Behavioral Rehabilitation, the sex offender treatment center where Jenkins was sent. The Petersburg facility is part of a new way the state is trying to keep sex offenders off the streets: Identify the most dangerous before they are released from prison and ask a judge in civil court to commit them to a treatment facility even after they have completed their sentences. … Jenkins readily admits that the prospect of being confined indefinitely partly prompted his drastic action three years ago. But he also insists he did it to prevent himself from victimizing another child."

Florida Law Aims At Curbing False Alarms. The Orlando Sentinel (7/5) reports, "Every day, police spend valuable time and resources responding to false burglar alarms. The trigger could be a door left ajar, a clumsy homeowner -- or, today, a dog frightened by fireworks. … All but a tiny percentage of those alarm calls are false, according to a 2003 U.S. Department of Justice report." The Sentinel continues, "Police agencies hope that a July 1 change to state law will save time and money by requiring alarm companies to make a second call before asking for officers' help. … Dramatic results already are being seen in Martin County, which implemented the second-call requirement in January. Since then, monthly false-alarm dispatches have fallen by 30 percent to 35 percent, Martin County sheriff's Lt. Glenn Zirkle said. … But this March, there were 489 false alarms, down from 672 in March 2005. … Alarm companies already call a home or business when a burglar alarm sounds to see whether it is accidental. They request police if no one answers. But now, no response at the home leads to a second call to a customer's cell phone or workplace before an officer responds."

WPost Argues For End Of Capital Punishment. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/4, A14, 744K) says, "In his intemperate concurrence to a decision on capital punishment last week, Justice Antonin Scalia made a remarkable claim: 'One cannot have a system of criminal punishment without accepting the possibility that someone will be punished mistakenly. ... But with regard to the punishment of death in the current American system, that possibility has been reduced to an insignificant minimum.'" Scalia "is correct that innocence has not been -- and probably can never be -- proven in these cases. … Still, it seems highly unlikely that all of these convictions are solid. We hope never to see convincing evidence that an innocent person has been put to death. Avoiding that unthinkable likelihood is one reason capital punishment should end."

LATimes Criticizes Court For Denying Appeal Of Death Penalty. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, 958K) in an editorial faults the Supreme Court for rejecting "the appeal of Eric Clark, who was 17 when he shot a Flagstaff, Ariz., policeman after the officer stopped his pickup truck. The teenager was convicted for 'intentionally or knowingly' killing a law enforcement officer even though Clark, who had a history of delusional behavior, said he thought the cop was a space alien." Writing for the majority, Justice David Souter "said the Constitution's guarantee of due process did not prevent Arizona from lopping off one of two prongs of a definition of legal insanity known as the M'Naghten rule." It "was a horrific tragedy that might have been averted if Clark had been institutionalized. But once the deed was done, the courts -- including the high court -- should have given him more of an opportunity to prove that bad acts are sometimes committed by mad people."

FOIA Policies Under Fire As Law Turns 40. The San Diego Union-Tribune (7/5) reports, "Today marks the 40th anniversary of the signing of the federal Freedom of Information Act, but open-government advocates say there is little to celebrate. … The historic law, enacted to ensure that citizens have the greatest possible access to government information, is widely seen as broken. The backlog of requests is growing, with some Americans waiting years for information from government agencies." The Union-Tribune continues, "Each administration since 1966 has used every tool at its disposal to thwart disclosure of information it deems dangerous or embarrassing. The administration of President Bush is no different, often citing the changed security environment after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as justification for secrecy. … 'The marching orders are now: If there's a basis to withhold, do it,' said Elizabeth Withnell, chief counsel at the Department of Homeland Security's Privacy Office."

The AP (7/5, Bridis) reports, "The U.S. law that is the foundation for opening the government's filing cabinets to its citizens has provoked bureaucratic headaches since President Johnson grudgingly signed it 40 years ago today -- and he worried immediately that it might force the disclosure of damaging national secrets, newly disclosed records show. … Decades later, the Freedom of Information Act still regularly creates tension between the government and citizens, corporations, researchers and journalists. The law's staunchest advocates believe its principles have never been so imperiled, threatened by what they call the Bush administration's penchant for secrecy. … 'This is the worst of times for the Freedom of Information Act in many ways,' said Paul K. McMasters of the First Amendment Center. … The First Amendment Center studies issues of free speech, press and religion. McMasters cited large backlogs of unresolved citizen requests for records and new administration strategies to withhold records."

Yale University Faces Probe Of Grant Programs. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Levitz, 2.11M) reports, "Three federal agencies have subpoenaed documents from Yale University regarding its use of research grants in the past decade, heightening scrutiny of the university after an audit alleged expense padding for stem-cell research." The Journal continues, "The Defense Department, the National Science Foundation and the Department of Health and Human Services sought documents concerning research expenses, faculty effort devoted to research, and 'numerous other matters related to grant administration,' the New Haven, Conn., university said." In response, "Yale President Richard C. Levin said he expects faculty and staff to give 'top priority' to the requests."

LATimes Calls SCOTUS Ruling On Whistleblowers "Surprising." An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (7/4, 958K) says, "By a surprising unanimous vote, the US Supreme Court has ruled that an employer may not retaliate against a worker who has filed a charge of illegal discrimination by transferring her to a less desirable assignment with the same job title. The decision is a victory not only for the worker who filed the case but for potentially thousands of other whistle-blowers who have been retaliated against in ways real but not measurable in dollars and cents." The Times adds, "An employer who wants to punish a worker for complaining about discrimination can do so in myriad ways that don't change the employee's pay or job title. It would weaken the purpose of the Civil Rights Act to allow such retaliation to go unpunished."

Judge Seeks Settlement Today In Florida Synagogue Case To Avoid Trial. The Miami Herald (7/5, Wright) reports, "A federal judge on Monday gave the city of Hollywood and an Orthodox synagogue until 3 p.m. Wednesday to sign a deal ending their feud or be ready to start trial Thursday." The Herald continues, "The deadline was set after attorneys, for the second time, asked U.S. District Judge Joan Lenard to postpone the federal religious discrimination trial. Attorneys told Lenard the two sides were close to a deal after a face-to-face mediation between city commissioners and leaders of the synagogue on Thursday. … An obviously agitated Lenard said she had heard that same story June 26, when the trial was originally scheduled to start." The Herald adds, "If the deadline is not met, trial will begin Thursday morning, and Lenard made it clear she will make no exceptions. … 'I will wait no longer than July 6,' she said." The Herald notes, "Under the current proposal offered by the city, the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch would be paid $2 million and allowed to continue to operate out of two homes in a residential neighborhood. The congregation would also be able to expand to no more than three homes within the two blocks surrounding the synagogue. … In return, the synagogue and the U.S. Justice Department would drop lawsuits against the city and Commissioner Sal Oliveri."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/4, Rodriguez) reports, "The federal civil lawsuit stems from the city's attempts to oust Chabad from the two single-family homes it converted into a synagogue in Hollywood in 1999. The group claims the city was biased when it removed a special permit in 2003 while allowing other religious groups to operate. … The agreement being negotiated still needed to be signed off by a number of officials, including Mayor Mara Giulianti, City Attorney Dan Abbott, and supervisors with the Department of Justice in Washington. Moments before City Hall was closed Monday, Abbott said he still had not received anything to sign, but that other attorneys were still 'talking to each other' and it was conceivable an agreement would be reached before Lenard's deadline."

Kentucky Mental Facility Dogged By Abuse Charges. The Louisville Courier-Journal (7/5, Beardsley) reports, "With abuse charges mounting, Kentucky has extended its contract with the Pennsylvania company hired last year to clean up the troubled Communities at Oakwood, the state's largest facility for mentally retarded adults." The Courier-Journal continues, "The 123-day contract extension was signed last week with Liberty Healthcare and is worth a maximum of $8.8 million, with $4.5 million earmarked to pay for direct-care staff, officials with Kentucky's Cabinet for Health and Family Services announced yesterday. … The announcement came one day after Oakwood, in Somerset, was hit with its 19th Type A violation since January 2005, after a resident returned from an April park outing with a cut on the back of her head that required surgical staples." The Courier-Journal adds, "The contract extension requires Liberty, within four months, to bring Oakwood back into compliance with federal standards at the Department of Justice and the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, or the state can choose a new manager, Health and Family Services Secretary Mark Birdwhistell said in an interview. … Liberty's previous contract to run the center, which houses about 260 people, was worth $9 million for about eight months. The extension will be discussed at next week's meeting of the General Assembly's contract review committee."

High Court Issues Stay In Fight Over California Cross. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 11, 0:20, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "The Supreme Court has issued a stay that will temporarily save a large cross on city property in San Diego. A lower court had ordered removal of the cross at the Mount Soledad National War Memorial, but Justice Anthony Kennedy issued the stay while supporters fight to preserve what they call a national treasure."

The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Perry, 958K) notes Justice Anthony Kennedy "ordered a temporary delay so the city can continue the legal fight to keep the cross. … For 17 years, the city has been fighting a lawsuit by a military veteran and atheist who objects to the cross on public property. Twice, San Diego voters have endorsed keeping the cross, but the courts have struck down a sale of the Point Loma property as rigged in favor of groups promising to keep the cross."

The AP (7/3, Watkins) reports, "Lawyers for San Diegans for the Mount Soledad National War Memorial said in an appeal that they wanted to avoid the 'destruction of this national treasure.'" And "attorneys for the city said the cross was part of a broader memorial that was important to the community." Phil Thalheimer, chairman of the war memorial group, "said the ruling 'borders on divine intervention.'" The New York Times (7/4, Archibold, 1.19M), among other sources, also reports the story.

Democrats Seen As Unlikely To Pursue Texas-Style Redistricting In Other States. The Washington Post (7/5, A7, Babington, 744K) reports, "Democrats cried foul three years ago when Texas Republicans rammed through a highly partisan redistricting to gain an advantage in several House races. Now, a recent Supreme Court ruling that blessed the Texas plan gives Democrats a chance to show that turnabout is fair play." But "early indications are that Democrats will probably resist the temptation to do unto Republicans as Republicans did unto them. … A state-by-state analysis…finds that Democrats' ability and apparent willingness to seize the opportunity left by the high court ruling in favor of the Texas plan are slim." The Post adds, "First, Democrats must compile a list of states where" such a "strategy is feasible. It will be remarkably short. … The result, redistricting experts say, yields perhaps four states where Democrats conceivably could try a mid-decade gerrymander comparable to that of Texas's: Illinois, North Carolina, New Mexico and Louisiana. In each one, however, such a move seems unlikely because of factors that include racial politics, Democratic cautiousness and even a hurricane's impact."

WPost Criticizes Ruling. The Washington Post (7/5, A12, 744K) editorializes, "The court has, perhaps unwittingly, sent one other clear message to politicians of both parties eager to see how many extra seats they can create for their own side: Do it now, while you have the power."

EEOC Says Disabled Workers Make Up Less Than 1% Of Federal Workforce. The Washington Post (7/4, A13, 744K) reports, "The latest numbers from the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission show that disabled workers make up less than 1 percent of the federal workforce despite the Bush administration's efforts to reverse the trend. … Experts are not sure what accounts for the falling federal numbers."

ANTITRUST:

South Korean Court Rejects Microsoft's Stay Request. The AP (7/5) reports, "A court on Tuesday turned down Microsoft Corp.'s request for a stay of sanctions imposed by South Korea's fair trade regulator, the software company said." The AP continues, "Microsoft had asked the Seoul High Court to allow the stay of penalties while the company lodges a legal challenge to the Korea Fair Trade Commission ruling ordering it to provide two separate versions of Windows from Aug. 24. … 'Consistent with the court's decision, Microsoft will, in a timely manner, comply with the KFTC's order,' the Redmond, Washington-based company said in a statement." The AP adds, "Microsoft is pursuing an appeal to the KFTC's ruling in the Seoul High Court. That is unaffected by Tuesday's decision regarding the stay request. … In the statement, Microsoft said that it 'will continue to defend its position in the case through the appeal process.'"

Nissan Stakeholders Question GM Deal. The Wall Street Journal (7/5) reports, "Although Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA appear willing to push forward on an alliance with General Motors Corp., some Nissan investors are expressing skepticism about potential benefits for the Japanese auto maker." The Journal continues, "Meanwhile, French Industry Minister François Loos urged Renault to exercise 'enormous caution' when looking into a potential alliance with GM. 'It's not a done deal; it's an idea,' the minister told French news channel i-Tele. The French government would have a say in any discussions involving Renault because it holds a 15% interest in the company. Renault and Nissan have cross-shareholdings in one another." The Journal adds, "On Monday, the boards of Nissan and Renault cleared the way for their chief executive, Carlos Ghosn, to pursue a three-way alliance with GM. Nissan and Renault left it up to GM to make the first move. GM's board so far has said only that it will take the idea of a three-way alliance 'under advisement.' GM's outside directors are scheduled to have a telephone conference Friday."

EU Approves Inco Purchase Of Falconbridge. The AP (7/5, White) reports, "EU regulators on Tuesday cleared Canadian company Inco Ltd.'s $15 billion purchase of Falconbridge Ltd., a deal that would create the world's largest nickel producer, but joined

U.S. regulators in ordering Falconbridge to sell off a Norwegian nickel refinery." The AP continues, "Canada's Falconbridge is at the center of a bidding war between Inco's "friendly" cash-and-stock offer and an unsolicited bid from Anglo-Swiss firm Xstrata PLC. … If Inco's purchase of Falconbridge goes through, Phoenix-based miner Phelps Dodge Corp. plans to acquire the combined company for $40 billion." The AP adds, "Inco is also a takeover target for Teck Cominco Ltd. and that deal is contingent on Inco's offer for Falconbridge falling through. … The European Commission cleared Inco's offer to buy Falconbridge after an in-depth probe confirmed that the tie-up would create antitrust problems on some European nickel and cobalt markets. … But it said it could approve the deal if Falconbridge agreed to sell its Nikkelverk nickel refinery in Kristiansand, Norway, and related assets to London-based LionOre Mining International Ltd."

Stolt-Nielsen Denies Report Of Improper Share Sale. The AP (7/5) reports, "Shipping firm Stolt-Nielsen SA on Monday denied a report that a subsidiary improperly sold treasury shares in 2004 after the U.S. government had suspended its antitrust immunity." The AP continues, "The company called both allegations 'false and misleading.' The Oslo, Norway stock exchange has begun an investigation because of the report, Stolt-Nielsen said. The company said it welcomes the review, and it will cooperate fully." The AP adds, "The controversy centers on a report in the Norwegian business newspaper Dagens Naeringsliv that alleges subsidiary Stolt-Nielsen Transportation Group received a 2003 letter from the U.S. Department of Justice's antitrust division, suspending its amnesty. The report further alleges the subsidiary failed to disclose the status of its amnesty when it sold treasury shares in 2004. … Stolt-Nielsen said the DOJ did not revoke its amnesty; it suspended the subsidiary's obligation to cooperate with the DOJ. The company said it also had previously disclosed the status of its amnesty was 'uncertain,' prior to selling the shares."

Intelsat Finalizes PanAmSat Deal. Broadcasting & Cable (7/5) reports, "Intelsat's $3.2 billion acquisition of PanAmSat has finally closed, positioning the company as the world's largest satellite operator." B&C continues, "The PanAmSat acquisition, first announced in August 2005, has a total transaction value of $6.4 billion. In addition to paying $3.2 billion in cash to acquire PanAmSat's 23 satellites and associated ground facilities, Intelsat also assumed $3.2 billion in PanAmSat debt. The deal has already undergone various layers of regulatory approval, passing Department of Justice antitrust muster in May and gaining the FCC's approval last month." B&C adds, "The scope of the new Intelsat is impressive. SES Global, previously the largest satellite operator, has $1.6 billion in annual revenues and 43 satellites. The new Intelsat has roughly $2 billion in annual revenues, 51 high-power satellites in operation and five more birds under construction, and some 1,800 customers. … While Intelsat has traditionally served international markets such as Africa and Asia and carried more data and voice traffic than television feeds, PanAmSat has been historically strong in covering North and South America and has focused heavily on media customers. By integrating PanAmSat's stable of broadcast and cable customers, Intelsat's revenue mix changes considerably."

Orthopedic Firms Under Antitrust Probe. The AP (7/5) reports, "Shares of major orthopedics makers tumbled Monday after three Warsaw, Indiana-based companies and one based in Michigan said they had received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice about possible antitrust violations." The AP continues, "Biomet, Zimmer Holdings and DuPuy of Warsaw, and Stryker Corporation of Kalamazoo, Michigan, said separately they have recieved subpoenas. All the companies say they are cooperating with investigators." The AP adds, "The subpoenas requested documents from January 2001 until the present. DePuy said search warrants had been executed in connection with the investigation, but did not provide additional details."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Judge Blocks Navy's Use Of Sonar During War Games. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Perry, 958K) reports, "A federal judge today issued a temporary restraining order blocking the Navy from using sonar during war games off Hawaii until it can negotiate with environmentalists who say the sonar will harm whales." On Friday, the Department of Defense "invoked a national security exemption from the Marine Mammal Protection Act to thwart a lawsuit by the Natural Resources Defense Council." But US District Court Judge Florence-Marie Cooper, in Los Angeles, "ruled that the exemption does not cover the National Environmental Policy Act cited in the lawsuit."

The Washington Post (7/4, Kaufman, 744K) reports, "The temporary restraining order is the latest development in the increasingly contentious battle between the Navy and environmental groups over the safety of its mid-frequency, high-intensity sonar. The equipment sends out loud underwater blasts that can detect enemy "quiet" submarines -- which the Navy says are a growing threat -- but also has been tied to the deaths of whales in numerous strandings." The Post adds, "The lawsuit against the sonar component of the maneuvers was filed by NRDC, the International Fund for Animal Welfare, the Cetacean Society International, Ocean Futures Society and Jean-Michel Cousteau."

Hunter Clashes With Democrats, Park Service Over Private Hunts. The Washington Post/AP (7/4, A13, Werner) reported, "Brush-covered and wind-swept, accessible only by boat or plane, Santa Rosa Island seems worlds removed from the crowded Southern California coastline -- let alone Washington, D.C." But the "53,000-acre public island 40 miles from Santa Barbara is in the middle of a political tugging match between a House committee chairman, the National Park Service and congressional Democrats." Under a Federal court settlement "in place for nearly a decade, private deer and elk hunts staged on the island must end by 2011 and the nonnative game must be removed." But Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) "wants to keep the trophy animals on the island and allow military veterans to hunt them." The plan has "drawn protests from the Park Service and Democratic lawmakers, who said hunting blocks public access and interferes with indigenous plants and animals."

EPA Testing Finds Water Unsafe At Quarter Of Beaches Tested. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 12, 2:10, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "As we head into the home stretch on this Fourth day holiday weekend, something to ponder from the Environmental Protection Agency. The EPA tests the water at more than 4,000 beaches a year in this country and it turns out that more than a quarter were dirty enough to warrant warnings or closures last year." NBC (Kosinski) added, "According to the EPA, among the states with the most incidents of bacteria, Louisiana -- every beach tested there last year required an advisory or closing. Hurricane Katrina likely contributed, but the prior year had the same result. A high percentage of Wisconsin and Texas beaches also registered contamination. So where is the bacteria coming from? Scientists say, in a big measure, storm runoff from ever more developed coastlines. But testing nationwide is inconsistent and can take at least a day to register a result. Environmentalists say that's too late to protect people."

Report To Warn Of Possible Threat To Coral Reefs From Global Warming. The Washington Post (7/5, A1, Eilperin, 744K) in a front page article highlights the threat to coral reefs from increasing acidity in the Oceans due to "escalating level of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere." While "scientists and some politicians have just begun to focus on the question of ocean acidification, they describe it as one of the most pressing environmental threats facing Earth." Today a coalition of federal and university scientists will issue a report "describing how carbon dioxide emissions are, in the words of a press release from the National Center for Atmospheric Research and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, "dramatically altering ocean chemistry and threatening corals and other marine organisms that secrete skeletal structures.'"

Political Leaders Accused Of Not Proposing Serious Solutions To Global Warming. Robert Samuelson in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, 744K) faults political leaders for not taking the threat of global warming seriously enough. Population growth and energy needs mean "With modest growth, energy use and greenhouse emissions more than double by 2050." And "keeping annual greenhouse gas emissions constant means that the world must somehow offset these huge increases." Meanwhile "Ambitious U.S. politicians…practice…self-serving hypocrisy. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has a global warming program. Gore counts 221 cities that have 'ratified' Kyoto. Some pledge to curb their greenhouse emissions. None of these programs will reduce global warming. They're public relations exercises and -- if they impose costs -- are undesirable."

Officials Urged To Act "Promptly." Philip Boffey, an editorial board member who writes about science," in an extensive 5,175 word "Talking Points" op-ed in the New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) examines both sides of the debate over whether global warming is occurring. Introducing his analysis, Boffey says the "evidence suggests that humans are altering the atmosphere in ways never before seen. The only question is how damaging the consequences might be, and what can be done to head off or adapt to the worst." While "no definitive answer is yet possible for many of these dramatic events that symbolize the global warming threat in popular discourse. Given the dreadful possibilities that perfectly legitimate worst-case scenarios imply, there would be no excuse for failing to act under any circumstances." After examining the "evidence carefully," Boffey says, "None of this is settled science or sure to happen. But these and other potential risks show what's at stake in the climate debate, and underscore the need to act promptly to head off the worst dangers."

Politicians' Goal Of Energy Independence Seen As Unrealistic. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, A4, Fialka, 2.11M) reports the US "may be addicted to oil, but many of its politicians are addicted to 'energy independence' -- which may be among the least realistic political slogans in American history." Sen. John Kerry, "perhaps warming up for another presidential campaign," recently "gave a speech calling for energy independence and invoking the Fourth of July. 'For the second time in our history, let's declare and win our independence,' he said." Separately, "43 Democratic senators, including Mr. Kerry, launched a program to 'Put America on the road to energy independence by 2020.'" Now, energy experts "across the political spectrum are criticizing politicians' calls for 'energy independence,' saying the goal falls somewhere between pipe dream and economic impossibility." Indeed, the US "is moving rapidly away from energy independence: Oil imports made up 35% of the nation's petroleum supplies in 1973 and 59% in the first four months of 2006, according to the Department of Energy."

Coal-Based Fuel Generates Interest, But Has Drawbacks. The New York Times (7/5, Wald, 1.19M) reports the "coal in the ground in Illinois alone has more energy than all the oil in Saudi Arabia. The technology to turn that coal into fuel for cars, homes and factories is proven. And at current prices, that process could be at the vanguard of a big, new industry." While the potential "has attracted entrepreneurs and government officials," there is "a big catch. Producing fuels from coal generates far more carbon dioxide, which contributes to global warming, than producing vehicle fuel from oil or using ordinary natural gas. And the projects now moving forward have no incentive to capture carbon dioxide beyond the limited amount that they can sell for industrial use." The technology also "requires a large capital investment, and a plant could be rendered useless by a collapse in oil prices."

Departure Of Drilling Rigs From Gulf Of Mexico To Boost Natural Gas, Oil Prices. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Spector, 2.11M) reports the "biggest long-term threat to oil and natural-gas production in the Gulf of Mexico isn't hurricanes. It is the dwindling supply of drilling equipment. Jack-up and deep-water rigs, the massive platforms and ships that drill for oil and gas in the ocean, are leaving the Gulf of Mexico for more lucrative jobs elsewhere." The departures are "expected to accelerate production declines in the Gulf, putting upward pressure on domestic energy prices. The rig exodus is squeezing what was an already tight market for drilling equipment. In 2001, about 148 rigs were in the Gulf. Now, about 90 remain, and more are expected to leave soon." The "rig migration will have the most pronounced effect on natural-gas production and prices because most of the rigs leaving the Gulf are jack-ups used to find gas in shallower waters." The Energy Information Administration, "a government agency that tracks data on the industry, predicts natural gas will cost $10 a million British thermal units by the end of 2007, up from Friday's close of $6.104 in New York Mercantile Exchange futures trading. (Nymex was closed on Monday and Tuesday this week.) Gas cost $2.43 a million BTUs as recently as the end of 2001."

Biodiesel Production Expanding. The New York Times (7/5, O'Keefe, 1.19M) reports biodiesel "is a fuel made by the chemical mixing of alcohol and fats, greases or oils from animals or vegetables. Proponents of this alternative fuel, including" Willie Nelson, "point out that one of Rudolf Diesel's first engines was powered by peanut oil. But by the time the Model T began rolling off Henry Ford's assembly lines, it was powered by petrochemical products, not vegetable oils." Nelson and his wife Annie "have invested in two biodiesel production facilities, including one at Carl's Corner [Texas], where a grand opening took place on Monday. The Dallas Mavericks assistant coach, Del Harris, the former Dallas Mavericks head coach, Don Nelson, and Carl Cornelius's original partner at the truck stop, the Dallas stockbroker, Monk White, are a few of the other investors in the plant, which will be run by Pacific Biodiesel, the company that fuels the Nelsons' cars in Hawaii."

the U.S. Department of Justice has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial." The Tribune continues, "Theodore J. Hogan, 61, of Sedona, Ariz., was indicted on three counts of false statements and pleaded last week before a federal magistrate here. … An indictment alleges that in 2001, 2003 and 2005, Hogan knowingly gave the Department of Justice false information on a form required of people owing restitution." The Tribune adds, "Omissions included his stakes in Ted Hogan and Associates LLC and Raven Resource Development Co.; information about accounts in financial institutions; and information about creditors, the indictment says. Hogan also is accused of not disclosing cash gifts that he gave, in amounts exceeding $500."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Trial To Begin For Reputed Cail Cartel Leader. The Tampa Tribune (7/5) reports the arrest of Joaquin Mario Valencia-Trujillo "climaxed one of the biggest U.S. drug investigations ever. Now jurors in a Tampa federal courtroom will decide the fate of the man authorities say was a leader in the notorious Cali Cartel. … After several delays, jury selection is scheduled to start today in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Elizabeth Kovachevich. … The trial is expected to last six months."

Task Force To Focus On Combating Violence In Newark. The AP (7/4) writes, "With scores of killings already committed this year in the state's largest city, an anti-violence task force led by federal law enforcement agents said Monday that it will focus solely on Newark to try to end the carnage. The task force plans to dedicate extra officers to patrol Newark and investigate gun, drug and other types of crime. The goal is to prosecute more crimes under federal law, from which there is no parole. … The task force also includes…the Drug Enforcement Administration, the U.S. Marshal's Office and others."

The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (7/4, Mays) reports, "As of [Monday] morning, there were 70 homicides in Essex County this year. Fifty-four of those murders occurred in Newark, said Essex County Prosecutor Paula Dow."

MLB Calls Conseco's Comments On Steroids "Nonsense." According to the Washington Post / AP(7/5, E4), Major League Baseball "took a stand against admitted steroids user Jose Canseco , calling the former slugger's allegations that the league might be playing favorites with some big-name players when it comes to positive drug tests 'complete nonsense.' Canseco, who last played in the majors for the White Sox in 2001, returned to professional baseball with the independent San Diego Surf Dawgs on Monday in Chico, Calif. Before the game, he made critical comments about how baseball officials are handling the new, stricter steroids policy and said a 'cleanup' in the commissioner's office is needed."

Taliban Insurgents Seen As Profiting From Large Afghanistan Opium Harvest. In an editorial, the Financial Times (7/5) says the NATO mission, "with 3,300 British troops at its heart, is in the process of doubling its contingent, assuming unified command of allied and US troops, and moving into the southern Pashtun heartland of the Taliban. … But the force is already clearly overstretched, fighting a resurgent Taliban that is growing in confidence. The insurgents, moreover, can draw on the revenues of Afghanistan's largest ever opium harvest, and tactical alliances with narco-warlords."

The Financial Times (7/5, Morarjee) also reports, "As the harvest season sets in, recent estimates by western officials suggest that Helmand's poppy crop may more than double to 77,000 hectares, up from 26,500 in 2005." The Times adds, "The $1bn (€770m, £550m) campaign to eradicate the crop had been 'an absolute disaster", a top western counter-narcotics official said.

British Soldiers Killed. The Belfast Telegraph (7/3) reports, "Two more British soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan, as Western officials there admit that the country is about to produce its largest ever poppy harvest. … The deaths, on Saturday, bring the number of Britons killed in the past three weeks to five."

Karzai Pushes Kandahar's Pomegranates. The Indian Express Newspapers writes, (7/3) President Hamid Karzai "boasts that Kandahar's pomegranates are the best in the world. … The president is also pushing the desert province's farmers to rip up their illegal opium poppies and replant the pomegranates and other fruits that Afghanistan was renowned for until decades of war kicked off with the 1979 Soviet invasion and left the farming sector in tatters."

IMMIGRATION:

House Republicans To Kick Off Immigration Hearings On Wednesday. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "Starting with a hearing in San Diego on Wednesday, House members are launching a summerlong sparring match over how best to untangle and reorder the nation's thicket of immigration laws." Meanwhile, Democrats and Republicans "will wage a second struggle — to see which party can best wring a political advantage from the hearings as the November elections draw closer." The San Diego hearing "is a stage for Republicans to highlight the dangers of cross-border smuggling. They will argue that the Senate immigration bill would not adequately protect against either threat." In Philadelphia on Wednesday, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) "will counter the House inquiry with his own hearing defending the Senate's broader approach to immigration." Congressional hearings are "usually held to explore an issue and search for solutions. House Republicans have been frank in saying that their hearings, in July and August, are a negotiating tool with two goals: to highlight perceived flaws in the Senate bill and to build public support for their own enforcement-only legislation."

Long Island Contractors Have Conflicting Views Of Immigrant Laborers. The Washington Post (7/4, A4, Garcia, 744K) reports on differing views in the construction industry of immigrant day laborers. Robert Stokes "doesn't buy the argument that immigrants do work that native-born Americans won't." Stokes said, "I get people calling all the time -- someone gets laid off, they need work." He "limits work hires to friends and family." The Post adds contractor Tom Lippolt said, "They're filling in the gaps. It seems like all the kids want to be stockbrokers. We don't have young people coming in to fill these places, all these trade jobs." The Post adds when Stokes and Lippolt "were growing up, Long Island was anchored by a mix of blue-collar white men like them and mid-level professionals. Their families were part of the post-World War II exodus from the city, chasing the dream of suburban life. But the heart of Long Island is different now." White men "on Long Island in the financial and banking industries outnumber those in construction and the trades by 3 to 1, according to a recent Census study. And the blue-collar work has browned. Spanish-speaking immigrants -- legal and illegal -- now take on manual labor jobs. But if they are needed, they are not always welcome."

Bush Seen As Moving Toward "Enforcement-First" Approach On Immigration. The New York Times (7/5, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "On the eve of nationwide hearings that could determine the fate of his immigration bill, President Bush is signaling a new willingness to negotiate with House Republicans in an effort to revise the stalled legislation before Election Day." The Times adds "Republicans both inside and outside the White House say Mr. Bush, who has long insisted on comprehensive reform, is now open to a so-called enforcement-first approach that would put new border security programs in place before creating a guest worker program or path to citizenship for people living in the United States illegally." Candi Wolff, the White House director of legislative affairs, said, "He thinks that this notion that you can have triggers is something we should take a close look at, and we are." She was "referring to the idea that guest worker and citizenship programs would be triggered when specific border security goals had been met, a process that could take two years." The "shift is significant because Mr. Bush has repeatedly said he favors legislation like the Senate's immigration bill, which establishes border security, guest worker and citizenship programs all at once. The enforcement-first approach puts Mr. Bush one step closer to the House, where Republicans are demanding an enforcement-only measure. … In a sign of that willingness, the White House last week invited a leading conservative proponent of an enforcement-first bill, Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, to present his ideas to Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney in the Oval Office."

Albanians Caught Up In Deportation Mess. Knight Ridder (7/5, Audi) reports, "Mateo Kraja was repairing a house June 2 when he received a frantic phone call from his Madison Heights, Mich., home. Police had arrived, his mother-in-law said. Kraja sped home. The men were not police, but immigration agents there to enforce a deportation order. They arrested Kraja immediately." Knight Ridder continues, "Now Kraja, 45, who has spent seven years seeking political asylum from his native Albania, sits in the Calhoun County jail in Battle Creek, Mich., part of the latest federal round ups of thousands of illegal immigrants across the country. This month, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement announced it had picked up more than 2,000 immigrants nationwide for deportation. In one four-day sweep in Detroit in late May and early June, 63 immigrants were rounded up, including Kraja and 24 other Albanians." Knight Ridder adds, "As the nation grapples with immigration reform, Kraja's arrest after an exhausting journey through the U.S. immigration system reveals a complex, often subjective process. It also underscores the difficulty in reforming a system that has presided over an influx of 1.3 million legal and illegal immigrants a year since the early 1990s, and labored for decades under backlogs and politics. … It's a system that frequently awards residency to some members of a family, while denying it to others. Kraja's parents, in-laws, sister, nephew and brother-in-law - anti-Communists who fled the same Albanian town - were awarded residency in the United States. Kraja, his wife and son were not." Knight Ridder notes, "Federal officials have called men like Kraja fugitives, and they touted the arrests as a sweep of dangerous criminals who have hidden from U.S. authorities. They promise more arrests to come. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, meanwhile, is conducting a nationwide review of immigration judges, after criticism of their conduct and decisions in asylum cases."

Yagman Pleads "Presumed Innocent" In California To Money Laundering, Tax Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Mozingo) reports, "In characteristic form, Stephen Yagman, the pugnacious civil rights attorney who has challenged police conduct for nearly three decades, declared, 'Presumed innocent,' Monday when asked how he pleaded to federal charges of tax evasion, bankruptcy fraud and money laundering. … 'Pleading "not guilty" turns the presumption of innocence on its head in a way semantically favorable to the prosecution,' Yagman told U.S. Magistrate Rosalyn M. Chapman in Los Angeles federal court. 'Therefore, I plead, "Presumed innocent."' … Chapman recorded the plea as 'not guilty.'" The Times adds, "Yagman called the 19 counts against him 'politically motivated, retaliatory charges.' … His attorneys have accused the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service of targeting Yagman because of two 'successful battles' he won against the agencies, including a $650,000 judgment against the IRS. … U.S. attorney's spokesman Thom Mrozek has refused to say what prompted the investigation, but denied that it was 'motivated by political retribution or any other improper motive.'"

Iowa Latino Tax Return Complaints Under Investigation. The Des Moines Register (7/4) reports, "It could take months for authorities to complete an investigation into complaints by several Latino families about a Des Moines woman who prepared federal income tax forms, a Des Moines police official said Monday." The Register continues, "Sgt. Joe Gonzalez said police are working with Polk County prosecutors to get to the bottom of numerous families' complaints against Tamara Aguilar. Dozens of Hispanics have alleged that Aguilar charged immigrants high fees to obtain federal taxpayer identification numbers, and promised customers they would receive tax refunds that never arrived, according to Gonzalez and Latino groups." The Register adds, "Aguilar, who has not been charged, has said she has done nothing wrong and only followed her clients' instructions. She told The Des Moines Register last week that some of her clients are complaining prematurely because refunds have not yet arrived. … The investigation was prompted by a Des Moines woman who in June complained to the Iowa Division of Latino Affairs about Aguilar, saying the tax preparer told her she could claim as dependents relatives in Mexico who were ineligible. The agency posted information on its Web site about the complaints against Aguilar. … Federal authorities are increasingly hammering on a growing number of tax preparers who cheat recent immigrants. The U.S. Department of Justice has filed charges against at least a half-dozen people in the first half of this year for allegedly swindling people unfamiliar with U.S. tax laws."

WSJournal Touts Tax Cuts By Democratic Governors. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) editorializes, "Democrats in Congress should get out more -- out of Washington, that is, and into state capitals, where some of their fellow party members are embracing tax cuts, and even supply-side logic in the bargain." Recently Rhode Island "adopted one of the most sweeping pro-growth tax reforms in any state in recent years" In addition to Democratic governors like Arizona's Gov. Janet Napolitano and Oklahoma's Brad Henry who agreed to cutting tax rates, New Mexico's Bill Richardson "has cut the state's top income tax rate to 4.9% from 8.2% and cut the capital gains tax in half." The Journal "asked Mr. Richardson how he thought his party could regain its competitiveness with the GOP on the national level. His answer is good advice for Democrats everywhere: 'We have to be the party of growth and the American dream, not the party of redistribution.'"

Bill Would Raise Threshold For Penalties On Estimated Tax Payments. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Wells, 2.11M) reports a bill "moving through Congress could save taxpayers more than $100 million a year in estimated-tax-payment penalties. The Senate Finance Committee last week approved numerous taxpayer protections as part of a wide-ranging bill that would also repeal a 3% excise tax on local telephone calls. With broad bipartisan support, the election-year tax-cut measure has a good chance of reaching President Bush's desk, analysts say." One provision – "a tax break valued at an estimated $1.3 billion over the next decade -- would boost the threshold at which taxpayers are hit with estimated-tax penalties. Hundreds of thousands of taxpayers stand to benefit from the change, including wage earners who reaped a significant capital gain and didn't adjust their withholding taxes or make estimated-tax payments to account for the windfall."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Kennedy Questions Bush Judicial Nominee Over Male-Only Club Membership. The Washington Times (7/5, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Just six months after quitting the all-male social club to which he belonged for 50 years, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy is questioning one of President Bush's nominees to the federal bench about his membership in an all-male dining club." Documents "provided to the Senate Judiciary Committee and obtained by The Washington Times show that Mr. Holmes belonged to the Men's Dinner Club of Oklahoma City but quit after expressing interest in becoming a federal judge." Holmes told the committee "in writing that he never perceived the dining club to harbor any bias toward women but he resigned to clear up any appearances of impropriety."

Roberts Court's First Term Marked By Acrimony. The Legal Times (7/5, Mauro) reports, "If this was the new look of harmony and consensus at the Supreme Court, it needs some work. .. There, on the final day of the Court's term, June 29, was Justice John Paul Stevens, calmly defiant as he read from his landmark opinion in the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detainee case Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. The 73-page ruling against the Bush administration's military commissions thoroughly trashed an appeals court ruling joined by the man sitting next to Stevens, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., when he was on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit." The Times continues, "Then came Justice Antonin Scalia, reading his dissent with a mournful tone of disgust, as if he were disowning a child. 'I vigorously dissent,' he said, pointedly omitting the word 'respectfully,' which justices usually recite in dissent, even if they don't mean it. Justice Clarence Thomas was next, also in dissent, and he joked bitterly that the Court was more willing to heed the Army Corps of Engineers' definition of navigable waters than it was to defer to the president of the United States in wartime. … So much for unanimity at the Supreme Court." The Times adds, "A term that began with hope and at least limited evidence that a new era of consensus had begun dissolved in its final weeks into a blizzard of quarrelsome writing that clarified little and robbed some decisions of their precedential force. In some of the Court's most important rulings, justices tossed consensus aside and penned lengthy opinions, partial concurrences, and dissents that left readers crying 'Uncle' or pleading, 'Can't they all get along?' … Several factors, including the increased importance of Justice Anthony Kennedy as the Court's swing vote, appear to explain the messy finale. And some think the June disarray may just be a preview of next term, when the Court will face even thornier cases on race-conscious public school policies and abortion."

Columnist Warns Supreme Court One Justice Away From Conservative Majority. Ruth Marcus in her column in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, 744K) warns that while Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy has recently been characterized as emerging "as the new Sandra Day O'Connor: commanding the power to control a closely divided court," that characterization "misses the bigger point: This is a court on the brink. Kennedy plays a pivotal role, but his star turn is likely to be brief. And a court with Kennedy at the center is not a securely centrist court." That's because a more conservative court is "just one liberal retirement away." It "is a court that could be a single vote away -- if that -- from crippling affirmative action; curtailing, if not abolishing, abortion rights; dramatically lowering the wall of separation between church and state; and limiting congressional authority under the Constitution's commerce clause to protect the environment and enact other laws of national sweep."

State Department Report Details Gifts To CIA Employees. The Washington Post (7/5, A11, Geraghty, 744K) reports "an unidentified foreign leader" bought "the CIA director a set of five Bahranian 22-karat gold coins, estimated to be worth $1,500. The State Department's Office of the Chief of Protocol detailed that gift, given in July 2004, and dozens of others last month in a public notice of gifts from foreign governments to U.S. officials." Since 1978, Federal employees "have been required to file reports with their agencies detailing gifts worth more than $305 received from foreign government sources. Employees are permitted to keep gifts worth less that that; gifts worth more are considered gifts to the agency, although the employee has the option of purchasing the item." The only CIA employee "identified in the disclosure announcement is former director George J. Tenet. On Jan. 14, 2004, Tenet accepted from an unnamed foreign donor a 16-inch bronze statuette of an Arab man helping a woman from a bath, mounted on a black-slate base, valued at $300."

FTC Reports Sharp Increase In Complaints About Debt Collection Tactics. The New York Times (7/5, Chan) reports the "rise in American consumer debt has been accompanied by a sharp increase in complaints about aggressive and sometimes unscrupulous tactics by debt collection agencies, a phenomenon that has government regulators increasingly concerned." In April, the Federal Trade Commission, "which enforces the federal law that governs debt collection practices, reported that it received 66,627 complaints against third-party debt collectors last year — more than against any other industry, and nearly six times the number in 1999." The agencies "often buy the debt from more established companies for pennies on the dollar and seek to collect even if the debt has been paid or was never valid to begin with. Sometimes, consumers pay up simply because they are worn down by threats from the companies and fear damage to their credit rating." Robert J. Hobbs, "the deputy director of the National Consumer Law Center, an advocacy group based in Boston, attributed the rise in complaints to three trends: the rapid growth in the number of collection agencies, the tightening of bankruptcy-protection laws last year and the record level of consumer debt, now totaling $2.2 trillion, complicated by rising interest rates and stagnant personal incomes. Identity theft and Internet fraud are also cited as factors."

Former White House Adviser Allen Negotiating Plea Deal. The Washington Post (7/4, B6, Londoio, 744K) reports former White House adviser Claude A. Allen "appears to be negotiating a plea deal with prosecutors in Montgomery County on theft charges filed in March." Assistant State's Attorney John D. Lalos and Allen's lawyers filed a motion "for a postponement, indicating that 'the parties have been working on a disposition regarding this matter and are hopeful that it will be resolved without the necessity of a trial.'" Allen, 45, "was charged with shoplifting more than $5,000 worth of merchandise from Target and Hecht's stores by obtaining refunds for items he was seen picking up at the stores, using receipts for identical items he had bought earlier."

Bush Celebrates 60th Birthday. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Neuman, 958K) reports President Bush "jokes with audiences about how his eligibility for early Social Security payments, at age 62, 'just happens to come in 2008.' Describing his age as 'a personal crisis,' he muses aloud about how he 'used to think 60 was old…. Now I think it's young, don't you?'" The Times adds, "Every day this year, according to the U.S. Census Bureau, 7,918 people will turn 60. On Thursday, it's Bush's turn and Sylvester Stallone's — and they're joined throughout 2006 by such celebrities as Suzanne Somers, Sally Field, Diane Keaton, Tommy Lee Jones, Cher, Steven Spielberg, Susan Sarandon, Donald Trump and Dolly Parton. Among political names, Bush's wife, Laura, and his White House predecessor, Bill Clinton, also enter their seventh decade this year." Bush's birthday "will be celebrated today — two days early — as 150 friends and family join him at the White House for festivities and fireworks. For his presidency, the Big Six-O signals another milestone likely to draw the attention of friends and foes alike." Bush "himself has resisted all interviews on the topic — with the exception of appearing with his wife on CNN's 'Larry King Live,' which will be taped on Thursday for broadcast that night." Aides have "offered minimal details about today's celebration. Last year, the White House pastry chef baked a chocolate cake topped with a three-dimensional chocolate mountain bike. There's been no word on this year's theme."

USA Today (7/5, 2.31M) reports President Bush "hits a milestone Thursday familiar to some of his fellow baby boomers: He turns 60." In "some ways, the commander in chief -- the father of two recent college graduates -- epitomizes the post-World War II generation, as does predecessor Bill Clinton, who will turn 60 on Aug. 19." Cheryl Russell, author of Demographics of the U.S.: Trends and Projections, said, "Bush and Clinton, both leading-edge boomers, show the diversity of opinions and philosophies of the baby boom generation."

The Washington Post (7/5, A3, Baker, 744K) reports while Bush "celebrated the nation's 230th birthday" at Fort Bragg, "others began celebrating his 60th." A group of Fort Bragg soldiers "serenaded the president with 'Happy Birthday' and presented him with a white cake emblazoned with a frosted U.S. flag and two candles, '6' and '0.'" Bush "then flew home to the first lady's party, a relatively low-key event with about 150 old friends, relatives, close advisers and Yale University schoolmates in the executive mansion."

Cheney Says He Hasn't Driven In Seven Years. The Washington Times (7/4, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Vice President Dick Cheney reveals something rather unusual: He's not driven a car in seven years. 'It's a bummer,' Mr. Cheney remarked before the start of the Pepsi 400 NASCAR Nextel Cup Series race at the Daytona International Speedway. 'The morning the president -- then governor -- announced that I was going to be his running mate, the Secret Service showed up outside my door, and I haven't driven since.'"

Price For Destroying Army's Chemical Weapons Tops $28 Billion. The Washington Post (7/4, A5, Eilperin, 744K) reports, "In 1987, the Army estimated it would cost $2 billion to dispose of the 27,768 metric tons of chemical weapons in its stockpile. Today, the price has mushroomed to $28 billion, and the military is about a third of the way through the job. An array of problems -- including technical challenges and protests from community activists concerned about the impact of burning the weapons -- has dogged the progress." The Army "is incinerating weapons in Alabama, Arkansas, Oregon and Utah, and has finished work on Johnston Atoll in the Pacific. Under pressure from activists, the Pentagon has opted for chemically neutralizing warfare agents in Colorado, Indiana, Kentucky and Maryland. It has completed work in Maryland, but plant construction in Colorado and Kentucky will only begin this year."

Support Grows For Provision Forcing White House To Pay For Wars Within Regular Budget. The Hill (7/5, Tiron) reports, "Some senior House defense authorizers and appropriators are welcoming a Senate provision in a defense bill that would force the White House to pay for the Iraq and Afghanistan operations within the regular Pentagon budget, not as unforeseen emergencies in supplemental spending bills." The provision "could become a critical issue in Senate and House conference negotiations for the 2007 defense authorization because the House version does not contain such a measure." Yet, while the provision "is gaining support among members of the House Armed Services Committee, military leaders and some defense lobbyists are balking at the idea." Army and Marine Corps leaders as well "as the defense industry fear that modernization programs may take a hit if the Pentagon had to pay out of its base budget to repair war-torn equipment and not out of emergency funds, as it has done since 2001."

Members Of Congress Tapped Credit Lines For At Least $4 Million In 2005. The Hill (7/5, Schor) reports members of Congress "reported open credit lines totaling a minimum of $4 million during 2005, most of them tied to home-equity loans or lines of credit, according to a survey of financial disclosures conducted by The Hill." But as "lawmakers keep a watchful eye on interest rates and consider legislation that would increase homeowners' ability to tap into their property value, the data show that lawmakers are less likely than their average constituent to hold open lines of credit." And, amid "the outcry over recent data-security breaches that exposed untold thousands of federal as well as private-sector employees to the risk of identity theft, few members reported checking on the safety of their credit reports."

Congress Returns From July 4th Recess Next Week With Much To Do. The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Chaddock, 61K) reports members of Congress "return next week to a long list of incompletes that could shape fall elections." Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, said, "Like last year, all will get done in July." The Monitor adds that what is "making that difficult is that, unlike last year, the rifts within GOP ranks on the bills yet to be completed are often as daunting as those between Republicans and Democrats." For Democrats, "the to-do list is grist for campaign speeches about the Republican 'do-nothing' Congress: no lobby reform, no immigration reform, not even a budget for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1." But Republicans "say big-ticket issues are still in play in the three critical weeks before August recess - typically the last window for legislating in an election year. And they insist that's enough time to wrap up at least some of them." The Monitor adds the top issues include immigration; the Voting Rights Act; the estate state tax; lobbying reform; and Internet access.

Price Of Capitol Visitors' Center Balloons To Twice Original Cost. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 6, 2:10, Cochran, 8.78M) reported Congress "promised" the planned Capitol visitors' center "would be finished in 2004. But 2004 came and went. And the hole just got bigger. As the years passed, some in Congress tried to shift the blame on to the Capitol architect. But a big part of the problem was that Congress kept adding goodies, such as another $85 million to expand their own offices. What, you may ask, does that have to do with the visitors' center? Well, we wondered that, too. And we wondered whether the center was ever going to be finished. Not to worry, says Congress. It will open September 2006, at the latest. But now, we learn it won't open until next July at the earliest, a year from now." Steve Ellis, Taxpayers for Common Sense: "You have right at the doorstep of the Capitol, a boondoggle. A deep hole where we are just throwing cash, year after year after year." Cochran: "The center is three years behind schedule, and will cost more than $500 million, twice what it was supposed to cost. It's 'Your Money.'"

Despite Foam Concerns, Discovery Launches Successfully. The New York Times (7/5, A1, Schwartz, Leary, 1.19M) reports in a front page story that space shuttle Discovery "split a nearly cloudless sky with thunder and fire on Tuesday afternoon and roared safely into orbit. The liftoff, right on schedule at 2:38 p.m., was the start of a 13-day flight that is the first in a year for the diminished shuttle fleet as NASA continues its efforts to resume more frequent human spaceflight." The Discovery is "to rendezvous on Thursday with the International Space Station, where it is carrying equipment, supplies and a fresh astronaut for the station's crew." But "this is also considered the second and final test flight for the shuttle fleet since the loss of the Columbia and its seven astronauts in 2003, and the Discovery's ascent was scrutinized for the kind of liftoff debris that caused that disaster." Officials said "insulating foam broke away from five spots on the external fuel tank and a solid rocket booster, some with several pieces of foam. But none occurred within the time that NASA considers hazardous, and only one piece might be larger than the allowable size."

The networks all also reported on the Discovery launch. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 3, 3:45, Moran, 8.78M) reported, "It was the first manned mission ever to launch on the Fourth of July, and only the second since the Columbia disaster." ABC (L. Stark) added, "The mission will last 13 days. The astronauts are delivering 5,000 pounds of supplies to the space station, including food, water and clothes. And in the next hours and days, NASA will continue to scrutinize all the photos and the video from the launch, trying to make absolutely sure that the shuttle sustained no serious damage."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 3, 2:10, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "NASA has spent much of the afternoon also trying to resolve another potential problem. One of the astronauts onboard taking videotaped pictures of the external tank saw what he thought looked like a large piece of insulation with straps floating away from the orbiter. Perhaps it came from the orbiter, he thought. Now NASA engineers have taken a look at his videotape and they are fairly convinced it was ice."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 4, 2:45, Costello, 9.87M) reported, "NASA engineers are looking at video and still imagery of the shuttle as it took off, as well as the external fuel tank, looking for any signs of debris falling off."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/4, Zarella) reported Tuesday's launch "is only the second launch of a space shuttle from the Kennedy Space Center in some three and a half years, Columbia three and a half years ago, and Discovery a year ago." Since the launch "we have had an opportunity to take a closer look at some of those isolation cameras on the external tank, you know, foam being the big issue. The foam that fell off the external tank during Columbia and again in the Discovery mission a year ago. Very difficult to see, but along the bottom side of that image, along that pipeline on the left-hand side of the external tank, it appears there are tiny pieces of some sort of material that are falling away, breaking away from the external tank in those isolation shots."

NYTimes Greets Discovery Launch With "Restrained Jubilation." The New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) says in an editorial, "The apparently successful launch of the shuttle Discovery is cause for restrained jubilation. The astronauts are not out of danger yet. Only further inspections will tell whether their fragile vehicle sustained any significant damage on ascent." The "striking thing about this shuttle flight is that the most important task is simply survival — of both the vehicle and the astronauts who are riding in it."

WPost Cites Hastert As Example Of Need For Earmarking Reform. The Washington Post (7/5, A12, 744K) in an editorial raise the question of whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert personally benefited from Federal funding targeting two highway projects near property he sold for a $2 million profit. The Post says it is unlikely he was "taking care of himself" but says while it is not a political scandal "so far," it "is a cautionary tale about the potential for abuse. With the explosion of earmarks in recent years comes the temptation for lawmakers to use them for personal gain." For example, "Rep. Ken Calvert (R-Calif.) doubled his investment on a four-acre plot after snagging $9.5 million to build a freeway interchange and spur commercial development near the Air Force base about 16 miles away. Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) got $1.28 million for street improvements near a development he co-owns." The Post concludes, "Mixing real estate investing and earmark pushing makes for risky political business.. … This is yet another argument for cracking down on earmarking gone wild."

Studies Predict Higher Medical Costs. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Mincer, 2.11M) reports Americans "should expect to pay more for medical costs whether they are employed or retired, according to two new studies. The reports, by Milliman Inc. and Watson Wyatt Worldwide, show that health-care costs are still rising at a fast pace -- despite slowing from double-digit rates in recent years -- and that businesses expect to curtail or limit retiree medical benefits." The "average annual medical cost for a family of four participating in a preferred provider organization, or PPO, program is up 9.6% from 2005 to $13,382 in 2006, according to Milliman, a consulting and actuarial firm that released its second annual study Thursday."

Economists Forecast 2.9% Growth In Second Half Of 2006. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "Neither resurgent inflation nor a housing slowdown is likely to throw the economy completely off track, but they will make life a lot tougher for Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, economists said in a new survey." The Wall Street Journal's latest survey of 56 forecasters, "conducted in mid-June, suggests an economy at a crossroads, with growth looking set to slow but inflation accelerating." The Journal adds "the consensus forecast of the 56 economists is that growth in real gross domestic product -- a broad measure of economic activity, adjusted for inflation -- will ease to an annualized 2.9% in the second half of 2006. That compares with an annualized 5.6% in the first quarter and an expected 2.8% in the second quarter, which would bring first-half growth to about 4.2%. By the first half of next year, growth would cool further to 2.7%, the slowest rate since mid-2003. … The forecasters expect nonfarm businesses to add an average of about 140,000 jobs in each of the next 12 months."

The Wall Street Journal (7/5, A1, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "For several years, Allen Sinai, chief global economist at Boston-based consulting firm Decision Economics, has argued that the current expansion -- with global demand pushing up oil prices -- looks a lot more like the classic business cycles of the 1970s and 1980s than the exceptional one of the 1990s, when various factors -- from globalization to smaller government deficits -- helped keep inflation in check. In the Journal's December survey, that conviction led Mr. Sinai to forecast that consumer prices would rise sharply in the first half of 2006 and wind up 3.5% higher in May 2006 than a year earlier. … Now, Mr. Sinai thinks inflation likely will begin to feed on itself, as workers and suppliers demand higher wages and input prices and companies pass those cost increases on to consumers. As a result, he expects the Federal Reserve to slam harder on the brakes, increasing its target for short-term interest rates from the current 5.25% to 6.25% by mid-2007, a level that no other economists think likely and that many believe would be high enough to trigger a recession."

Manufacturing Sector Grows At Slower Rate Than Forecast. The Washington Post (7/4, D3, Powell, 744K) reports the US manufacturing sector "expanded at a slower rate than expected in June and construction spending plunged in May, reinforcing the belief of some analysts that increasing sluggishness in the economy will prompt the Federal Reserve to pause at last in its credit-tightening regime." The Institute for Supply Management "said Monday that its manufacturing index registered 53.8 in June, slightly below the 54.4 reading in May. It was the slowest growth reading since the gauge registered 53.5 last August. Analysts had forecast a June index of 55 to 56." Meanwhile, the

Commerce Department "reported that building activity fell 0.4 percent in May to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.206 trillion, after a 0.2 percent decline in April. It was the first time in more than three years that construction spending had fallen for two consecutive months."

Stock Markets Make Pre-Holiday Gains. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 10, 0:10, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street, the markets ended a shortened, pre-holiday session on a positive note. The Dow posted a gain of nearly 78 points [to close at 11,228.02]. The NASDAQ closed up more than 18 points [to close at 2,190.43]."

Gas Prices Spike For Fourth Of July Travel. ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 8, :15, Moran, 8.78M) reported, "And if you're driving this Fourth of July, you'll be paying more to fill up. The Energy Department reported today that the average price of a gallon of gas is $2.93. That's up 7 cents in just the past week and up 71 cents more than a year ago."

High Oil, Gas Prices Produce Drilling Frenzy In Wyoming. The New York Times (7/4, McInnis, 1.19M) reports that surging oil and gas prices "have ignited a drilling frenzy" in Wyoming. The drilling surge "is producing a tidy income for Clear Creek [Ranch], even though the ranch owns only a tiny percentage of the oil and gas rights in the field, said Rob Hendry, who owns the ranch with his wife and two sons. Royalties are about $4,000 a month, or roughly what it costs Clear Creek to cover higher prices for gasoline and diesel fuel used to raise cattle on the 180,000-acre spread. A second, larger revenue stream comes from another oil-related business that Mr. Hendry created, a construction company that uses earth movers, bulldozers and other heavy equipment to level sections of ranch land to accommodate a moveable drilling rig that is as tall as a 15-story building."

GOP, Democrats Believe They Have The Edge Heading Into Midterms. The Washington Times (7/4, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Democrats are sure they have Republicans cornered and reeling heading into this fall's elections, but Republicans are overjoyed by the campaign, believing that it simply reinforces their own message of being tough on terrorism and illegal aliens." A second Washington Times piece (7/4, Fagan) says "lawmakers from both sides of the aisle are staking out issues this election year that they think resonate with Americans and portray the other party as out of touch." While "Democrats have seized upon the issues of a minimum wage increase and the Medicare prescription drug program," Republicans "are pushing a 'values' agenda that includes banning flag burning and protecting the Pledge of Allegiance."

Lieberman Will Run As Independent If He Loses Primary. The New York Times (7/4, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut said on Monday that he would run as an independent Democratic candidate if he loses the state Democratic primary next month. The announcement by Mr. Lieberman, a political moderate and longtime party leader seeking his fourth term, underscores the increasing vulnerability he feels over his support for the Iraq war."

NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 7, 0:30, Curry, 9.87M) reported Lieberman "is a staunch defender of the war in Iraq and faces a tough primary challenge from anti-war businessman Ned Lamont. Lamont's candidacy has drawn nationwide support on the Internet.

The AP (7/4, Haigh) reports, "Once a Democratic stalwart and the party's 2000 vice presidential nominee, Lieberman has fallen into disfavor from some Democrats for his support of the Iraq war and his perceived closeness to President Bush." He has also been targeted "by liberal blogs, which have given a boost to his challenger and bill the race as a chance to send a message to the Democratic establishment." The ActBlue.com Web site, "which helps Democrats set up fundraising campaigns for candidates, has helped bring challenger Ned Lamont nearly $233,000 in contributions as of last week. Lamont also received about $70,000 in contributions from the liberal group Democracy for America by way of the Internet."

The Washington Post (7/4, Murray, 744K) reports, "A Quinnipiac University survey conducted in early June showed Lamont gaining ground against Lieberman. Among all Democrats, Lieberman led Lamont 57 percent to 32 percent, compared with 65 percent to 19 percent in a Quinnipiac poll taken a month earlier." The margin "was slimmer among likely Democratic primary voters, including undecided voters who are leaning toward a candidate, with Lamont trailing the incumbent 55 percent to 40 percent, the June poll found." The Hill (7/4, Kaplan) also reports the development on its website.

CNN's The Situation Room (7/3, Bash) reported, "Democratic leaders have been scrambling to figure out exactly how to play this. They're in a very tough position, because they say it's their instinct and even priority to protect the Democratic incumbent, but it's also their responsibility to follow the regular rules of the road. And that usually means when there is a primary, and the party supports a winner, then the national leadership supports that winner. So, in the meantime, what we are seeing today from Democrats on the national level is, that they have decided on the political equivalent of kick the can. Senate Minority leader Harry Reid, through spokesman Jim Manley, would only confirm that the senator spoke with Senator Lieberman and he says that he respects his decision." CNN's The Situation Room (7/3, King) reported, "Aome political analysts I spoke with said really this is unprecedented, in their view, that they cannot remember someone doing this in a major race like this."

In an analysis piece titled "Senator's Plan B Puts Democrats In A Bind," the New York Times (7/4, Healy, Medina, 1.19M) reports, "Karen Finney, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, said the party would support its nominee this fall, whether it is Mr. Lieberman or Mr. Lamont. Another party official, Donna Brazile, said yesterday that she supported Mr. Lieberman's candidacy but was concerned that his contingency plan would 'hurt more than help his candidacy.' She explained: 'I think Joe Lieberman could have really scored with the Democratic voters if he'd said that he was a Democrat, would run as a Democrat and would honor the wishes of the Democratic voters.'" Lieberman's "troubles," adds the Times, "reflect the force of the evolving antiwar movement. His support for the Bush administration's Iraq policy initially galvanized the opposition of left-leaning Internet habitués, focusing national attention on Mr. Lamont as a viable antiwar alternative to the senator."

Lieberman Defends His Loyalty To Democratic Party. Sen. Joe Lieberman was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (7/3) about critics who say he is putting self preservation over his loyalty to the Democratic party. Lieberman said, "I would definitely put my loyalty to the Democratic Party and my service to the Democratic Party up against most of those who are saying those things. I am a loyal Democrat and I am going to work my heart out to get the Democratic nomination for the US Senate this year and the primary on August 8th." Lieberman added, "I have a loyalty higher than that to my party. That is to my state and my country. And I feel so deeply that I can do a better job for my state and my country than either the Democratic or Republican opponents against me that I'm prepared, if necessary, to take my fight to November as a petitioning Democratic candidate."

Hillary Clinton Says She'll Back Democratic Nominee. The Washington Post/AP (7/5, A2, Press) reports, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), a longtime supporter of Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, said Tuesday that she will not back the Connecticut Democrat's bid for reelection if he loses their party's primary. 'I've known Joe Lieberman for more than 30 years. I have been pleased to support him in his campaign for reelection, and hope that he is our party's nominee,' the former first lady said in a statement issued by aides. 'But I want to be clear that I will support the nominee chosen by Connecticut Democrats in their primary,' Clinton added." She added, "I believe in the Democratic Party, and I believe we must honor the decisions made by Democratic primary voters."

WSJournal Applauds Lieberman. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) editorializes, "Lieberman's announcement Monday that he'll run as an independent if he loses the Democratic nomination is a remarkable commentary on the mind of the Democratic Party these days. … Connecticut's Senate race may turn out to be the most important election of the year. If Democrats drive Mr. Lieberman from their ranks, they will be sending Americans a message that George Soros and MoveOn.org dominate their party. This is all the more reason to applaud Mr. Lieberman for declaring that he won't easily be pushed from the Senate, whatever party banner he has to wave."

Four Influential Left-Wing Bloggers Jointly Endorsing Democratic Challengers. The Hill (7/5, Kaplan) reports, "Four of the most powerful left-wing political bloggers have developed a new joint strategy to steer financial support from the 'netroots,' or Internet-based activists, to Democratic challengers, many of whom they know have little chance of winning their mid-term election races." Markos Moulitsas Zúniga of Daily Kos, Matt Stoller and Chris Bowers of MyDD and "DavidNYC" of Swing State Project "have endorsed 16 candidates and posted their names at Act Blue, a website that allows visitors to contribute money to campaigns." Democratic challengers "need not pass any policy litmus test to earn endorsement; the four bloggers merely need to agree to go ahead. The endorsements depend on the candidate's having won a measure of support from bloggers in his or her district." And "crucially, the candidate does not have to have a good chance of winning. Bowers said their hope is to 'stretch Republican defenses' and turn less-noticed races into top-tier races, which will encourage more activity on the Internet." The 16 challengers "include Democratic Senate candidates Ned Lamont (Conn.), Jon Tester (Mont.) and former Navy Secretary Jim Webb (Va.). Lamont has raised $79,000 at Act Blue, Tester $39,000 and Webb $14,000."

Plan For Expanding Routine HIV Testing Draws Opposition. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Chase, 2.11M) reports Federal officials are "readying new guidelines that propose routine HIV tests for people 13 to 64 years old. But fears that the change could short-circuit patients' rights are prompting protests and even legislation." The proposed policy changes "are part of a sweeping effort by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention to streamline HIV testing. While lacking the force of law, the new guidelines would urge doctors to offer the test to everyone with basic health care, regardless of their risk factors." The test "would remain voluntary. But pretest counseling would be trimmed, or even eliminated, and consent could be obtained orally instead of in writing, as many states now require." The CDC says "broader testing is needed because about 25% of the estimated one million Americans with HIV are unaware they are carrying it."

Conservative Groups Oppose Effort To Shut Down 527s. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (7/3, 2.11M) reported, "Two years ago, Republicans were organizing against new, loosely regulated political groups that were raising money to attack President Bush. Now, illustrating how roles often reverse in politics, some of the party's conservative activists are trying to stop legislation that would choke off those groups. The dispute centers on a House bill that would curtail funding for organizations nicknamed 527s, for the section of the tax code that governs them." The Journal added, "In the 2006 campaign so far, it is right-leaning 527s that are most active. The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-issue group, is leading the charge to kill the Republican bill that would shut down 527s."

Research Shows Environment Impacts Development Of Stem Cells. The Washington Times (7/4, Price, 90K) reports, "Interaction with the environment surrounding immature embryonic stem cells is a factor in their transformation into a complex organ, even when they are outside the body in a laboratory dish, research shows. Scientists at the University of Florida's McKnight Brain Institute found that when embryonic stem cells from mice were placed on four different surfaces in cell culture dishes, specific types of body cells were created. Their findings, published in this week's issue of Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, shed light on how embryonic stem cells diversify to form various neural structures, which has been a fundamental mystery of brain development, researchers say. In experiments, the Florida scientists confirmed that a cell culture molecule called laminin activates a common developmental pathway essential for the generation and survival of particular types of brain cells."

North Korea Threatens To Use Nuclear Weapons Against US. The CBS Evening News (7/3, story 5, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The North Korean News Agency said that if the US were to launch a preemptive attack, it would respond with 'an annihilating strike and a nuclear war.' The White House shrugged it off, saying it has no intention of attacking but will act to protect the US if North Korea tests a long-range missile."

The AP (7/4, Schweid) reports Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns "cautioned North Korea on Monday to avoid 'any type of provocative activity' and to return to negotiations on its nuclear weapons program. Referring to reports that North Korea might be preparing to launch a long-range ballistic missile, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said 'that would be a profoundly unwise step by the North Koreans.'"

The Washington Post (7/4, Tyson, 744K) reports, "North Korea has a Taepodong-2 missile poised for a possible launch, although it is not clear whether it has been fully fueled. The two- or three-stage missile has estimated ranges that give it the potential of striking parts of the United States." US "officials played down the possibility of a preemptive strike."

North Korea Test Fires Long-Range Missile. North Korea test fired a long-range missile yesterday, but it failed seconds after launch, US officials said. The AP (7/4, Talmadge) reported that in addition to the missile that may be capable of reaching the US, North Korea also tested four shorter range missiles "in an exercise the White House termed 'a provocation' but not an immediate threat." The AP added, "None of the missiles made it as far as Japan. The Japanese government said all landed in the Sea of Japan between Japan and the Korean Peninsula."

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 2, 1:40, Karl, 8.78M) reported that the missile's failure is "better than a successful launch. A launch that would show they had the technology to hit the United States. But it's a limited relief. Even a failure is something that you can learn from. And officials here are telling me they're concerned that now the North Koreans will be able to go back to the drawing board. They will learn from this failure. Learn why it failed. And work on improving that technology, technology that could ultimately develop such a missile to hit the United States."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 3, 1:15, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "The White House now is telling us that they believe that North Korea has even additional missiles that could be launched, so they are bracing themselves for what may be other possible launches as the hours go by." In fact, the AP (7/5) reports this morning, "North Korea has launched a seventh missile, a news report said Wednesday, citing Japanese government sources. North Korea fired the latest missile at 5:22 p.m. (4 a.m. EDT), Kyodo News agency reported. The missile landed 6 minutes later, the report said. … It was unclear what type of missile was launched or where it landed."

AFP (7/4) reported, "The US missile defense system, based in California, Alaska and onboard US Navy ships, was on high alert in anticipation of the Taepodong 2 test, and ready to shoot any missile down if it threatened US territory. But since it failed just 40 seconds into the flight, 'no action was taken,' said a defense official." AFP added, "To address the situation, the United States was sending its senior envoy for six-nation North Korean nuclear talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, to Asia on Wednesday."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, lead story, 2:40, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "Pentagon officials tell CBS News that all of these launches were detected and were tracked by ships on station in the Sea of Japan and by the US missile-defense system. The Pentagon is under standing orders to try to shoot down a North Korean missile if it threatens US territory, but, again, this missile didn't get that far."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, lead story, 2:50, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported that "military officials say US spy satellites were tracking the missile from the moment it launched and quickly determined the missile posed no threat. There was no need to employ the US missile defense system."

A front page story in the New York Times (7/5, Onishi, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "In a statement issued late Tuesday night, the White House said the United States 'remains committed to a peaceful diplomatic solution' and sought implementation of a joint statement on denuclearization issued after a meeting with North Korea in September. But it said 'the North Korean regime's actions and unwillingness to return to the talks appears to indicate that the North has not yet made the strategic decision to give up their nuclear programs.' 'Accordingly, we will continue to take all necessary measures to protect ourselves and our allies,' the White House said, offering no details."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 2, 1:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported that the Bush Administration wants "to make the point that there was no immediate threat posed by the launch, but it was a clear provocation."

The Washington Times (7/5, Gertz, 90K) reports, "The White House said North Korea's decision to escalate its nuclear standoff with the international community by test-firing missiles will further alienate it from the international community."

The AP (7/4, Riechmann) reported, "White House Press Secretary Tony Snow, told reporters, 'The North Koreans have again clearly isolated themselves.'" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "planned to confer, starting tonight, with her counterparts from China, Japan, South Korea and Russia, over the missile firings, according to the State Department." President Bush "has been in consultation with Rice, [National Security Adviser Stephen] Hadley and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld."

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Wallace, Demick, 958K) reports, "Hadley described the barrage of missiles…as 'provocative behavior' from a country that had been warned against breaking its 6-year-old moratorium on long-range missile tests. 'The United States strongly condemns these missile launches and North Korea's unwillingness to heed calls for restraint from the international community,' the White House said in a statement. It said the tests 'demonstrate North Korea's intent to intimidate other states by developing missiles of increasingly longer ranges.'"

The Financial Times (7/5, Fifield, Daniel, Pilling) predicts the "highly provocative move" by North Korea "will invite a strong diplomatic response." Washington, Tokyo and Seoul "had issued stern threats of economic sanctions if Pyongyang proceeded with an inflammatory test. Emergency meetings were underway in all three capitals, as well as at the United Nations in New York. … A spokesman for the US mission at the United Nations said that the US ambassador, John Bolton, was 'consulting on an urgent basis with our fellow council members.'"

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, lead story, 2:45, Moran, 8.78M) called the test "a major provocation from North Korea." ABC (Raddatz) added that the US will "certainly try to put some sort of economic sanctions in place. That's a possibility only at this time. I sense the White House is trying to calm things down tonight. They're saying there's no immediate threat to the United States. And they're just going to continue to consult."

Fox News' Special Report (7/4, Baier) reported, "Today late in the afternoon, the US Ambassador to the United Nations said the United States was urgently consulting other UN Security Council members about the North Korean missile launches."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/4, Roth) reported, "US Ambassador John Bolton is working the phones, talking with other ambassadors on the UN Security Council."

USA Today (7/5, Page, Jackson, Nichols, 2.31M) reports that North Korea's move "prompted a diplomatic scramble." Bolton "held what he called 'urgent' consultations. The Security Council was likely to meet today, spokesman Richard Grennell said."

A front page story in the Washington Post (7/5, A1, Priest, Faiola, 744K) reports, "Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said Tokyo was likely to impose economic sanctions against North Korea in response to the missile tests; Japanese authorities said they would begin by banning North Korean ships from Japanese ports for six months or more. … In Japan, US Ambassador J. Thomas Schieffer told reporters that he and Japanese officials had discussed the possibility of getting the UN Security Council to impose economic sanctions on Pyongyang. In South Korea, Suh Choo Suk, senior presidential secretary for security policy, said in a nationally televised announcement that the North 'should assume full responsibility for its missile launches.' He expressed 'deep regret' for the 'provocative act' that he said would deepen the North's isolation and affect inter-Korean ties."

An analysis in the Financial Times (7/5, Fifield) says that if North Korea "was hoping to force the Bush administration, in particular, to give into its demands to drop financial sanctions and to negotiate on its own terms, it is almost certain to have gravely failed. Not only has Pyongyang incensed Washington and Tokyo, both of whom have threatened a strong response including new sanctions, it has managed to alienate its usually appeasing brother in Seoul, which vowed to cut off shipments of rice and fertiliser."

Weldon Calls Missile Launch A "Political Provocation." Rep. Curt Weldon said on CNN's The Situation Room (7/4), "I think this is basically a political provocation. I have been to North Korea twice. I led the only two delegations into the country. I sat across the table from…their lead negotiator for a total of 15 hours. In fact I had an invitation that I received one month ago to take the third delegation back into North Korea from August the 1st to the 5th. I consulted with the White House and they suggested I not go on this trip because of the possibility of the launch that we've now seen today. Even though I think this is absolutely provocative. The last thing we need to do is to rush to some kind of offensive military action. Because a war with North Korea would not be a war like any that we have seen in recent years. They have the fourth largest army in the world. They have thousands of missiles that are all set up along the DMZ to Seoul, and they also have capabilities on their ground forces. I think we have to engage them. We have to get China off the dead center."

NYTimes Calls North Korea A "Dangerous Rogue Actor." An editorial in the New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) says, "Americans can take some comfort from the reported failure of a long-range missile test by North Korea. … But the other message from the missile tests is considerably less reassuring. North Korea has again shown itself to be a dangerous rogue actor, ignoring the almost universal pleas from other countries to refrain from a test that can only add to regional tensions and multiply doubts about its trustworthiness and intentions." The Times adds, "Since the test poses no direct security threat, and violates no international treaty, there is no justification for any military response, by the United States or anyone else. … Someday North Korea may actually be able to build a missile that can cross the Pacific. A reinvigorated diplomatic effort to head off that threat before it comes closer to reality can only be a good idea."

Radicals Gaining Control Of Somalia's Capital. The Washington Post (7/4, Timberg, 744K) reports, "A group of largely moderate Muslim leaders who took control of Somalia's capital a month ago has been pushed aside in recent days by radicals determined to create a strict Islamic state there, according to Somali and other political analysts. Leading the drive has been Hassan Dahir Aweys, whom the United Nations and the United States consider a terrorist with ties to al-Qaeda." Aweys's "June 24 appointment as head of the Islamic militias ruling Mogadishu, the capital, has been followed by the installation of like-minded lieutenants in other key posts and the demotion of moderates such as the previous leader, Sharif Ahmed, analysts say." The Post adds, "Among those losing clout is Abdurahman Osman, a Somali-born US citizen who emerged last month as a spokesman for the Islamic militias and a moderate face toward the outside world."

Trials Of Khmer Rouge Leaders Begin In Cambodia. The Washington Times/AP (7/4, Cheang) reports, "Judges and prosecutors from Cambodia and foreign countries were sworn in yesterday to begin the UN-backed judicial process to try former Khmer Rouge leaders for genocide and crimes against humanity. It was a major step forward in the search for justice for victims of the brutal Khmer Rouge regime, whose extremist policies in the late 1970s killed an estimated 1.7 million people. … None of the top leaders of the 1975-79 communist regime have been held accountable for the atrocities. Khmer Rouge leader Pol Pot died in 1998, but several of his top deputies, aging and infirm, still live freely in Cambodia."

Chinese Official Says Draft Law Applies To Foreign And Domestic Media. The New York Times (7/4, Kahn, 1.19M) reports, "A Chinese draft law that threatens to fine the news media for reporting on 'sudden incidents' without permission applies to foreign as well as domestic news organizations, an official involved in preparing the legislation said Monday. The law, now under consideration by the legislature run by the Communist Party, calls for fines of up to $12,500 for unauthorized reports on outbreaks of disease, natural disasters, social disturbances or other so-called sudden incidents that officials determine to be false or harmful to China's social order. Wang Yongqing, vice minister of the legislative affairs office of China's State Council, or cabinet, told reporters at a news briefing that the law should apply to all news organizations, including foreign newspapers, magazines and broadcast outlets, which usually operate under different rules from those of the Chinese news media."

NYTimes Criticizes China's Draft Media Law. An editorial in the New York Times (7/4, 1.19M) says, "The trouble with suppressing reports of sudden incidents is that they usually emerge anyway, in a form even more damaging to the state." China's draft law "says that newspapers, magazines, Web sites and television stations would face fines up to $12,500 each time they published information about a sudden incident 'without authorization.' It is, of course, a horrible idea that strips away any pretense China might have of political openness or modernity."

Senior Intelligence Official Defends DIA Officer Who Spied For Chinese. The Washington Times (7/5, Gertz, 90K) reports, "A senior intelligence official is leading an effort within the Bush administration to defend former Defense Intelligence Agency China specialist Ronald Montaperto, who pleaded guilty recently to espionage-related charges involving Chinese intelligence. Lonnie Henley, a friend of Montaperto and another former DIA China specialist, has written e-mails and had telephone conversations with intelligence and policy officials criticizing the FBI investigation and seeking to downplay the damage caused by Montaperto's 22 years of contacts with two Chinese military intelligence officers, according to officials familiar with the private support program. The effort by numerous pro-China intelligence analysts is aimed at protecting their prestige and influence, and at shielding others in government who share Montaperto's benign views of China and the Chinese military, said officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity." The Times notes that Henley's "defense of Montaperto and criticism of the FBI is unusual and has raised concerns among U.S. counterintelligence officials that there are others in the intelligence community who may have improperly shared classified information with China."

Many Bush Foreign Allies Leaving World Stage. The AP (7/4, Raum) reported, "President Bush's stalwart foreign friends are fading fast. Most of the leaders who defied criticism at home to stand with him on Iraq and win his friendship are no longer players on the world stage, or are on their way out." British Prime Minister Tony Blair "has said he'll step down before the next national election." Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is leaving office in September. Italy's Silvio Berlusconi "resigned in early May after his party's election losses. Spain's Jose Maria Aznar was earlier forced out of office, the first casualty of supporting Bush on Iraq." The AP added, "Newer leaders, particularly those in Europe, have seen the political penalties paid by those who stood too close to Bush — and have been more reluctant to embrace him so openly."

Putin Seeks Right To Send Anti-Terror Forces Around World. The Washington Times (7/5, 90K) reports, "Russian President Vladimir Putin asked parliament yesterday for the right to send soldiers and special forces anywhere in the world to fight terrorists, acting just days after having pledged to 'destroy' the terrorists who killed five Russian diplomats in Iraq." The Kremlin said Putin "had requested the right to defend 'the human rights and freedoms of citizens, the sovereignty of the Russian Federation, its independence and state integrity,' by using security forces outside Russia." Putin "did not say the troops would be sent to Iraq. Nor was it clear whether the United States would object to Russian forces operating in the country or welcome any assistance in dealing with insurgents who for three years have kept Iraq on the edge of chaos."

Six Russian Soldiers Killed In Chechnya. The New York Times (7/5, Kramer, 1.19M), "Gunmen broke several months of relative calm with an ambush of a Russian military column on a road south of Grozny, the regional capital, killing 6 soldiers and wounding 12 others in a midafternoon attack. The column came under fire from rocket-propelled grenades and small arms, Valery A. Kuznetsov, Chechnya's prosecutor, said in a telephone interview."

López Obrador Likely To Challenge Result Of Mexican Presidential Vote. Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the leftwing candidate in Mexico's presidential race is "almost certain" to challenge the results of Sunday's vote, according to the Financial Times (7/5, Thomson). Such move "would heighten tensions and increase uncertainty about the country's immediate political future. Word of the likely challenge was raised as center right candidate Felipe Calderon "looked to have taken a small but decisive lead in what is turning out to be the closest election in Mexico's history. A preliminary count by the country's Federal Electoral Institute (IFE) showed Mr Calderon ahead by 400,000 votes – about 1 per cent of the total cast – over." Manuel Camacho, a leading adviser to López Obrador and a congressman for his Democratic Revolution party (PRD), stopped short of claiming electoral fraud, but "said there were 'serious discrepancies' in the vote-counting process that, once rectified, could easily tip the result in favour of Mr López Obrador."

The New York Times (7/5, McKinley, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "Mr. López Obrador's challenge made it clear that this country was about to live through its own version of the drawn-out legal battle that Americans experienced in the 2000 presidential race. Mexico's dispute, however, instead of being focused on one state, could be nationwide." The Times adds, "Foreign election observers said the election was transparent and largely free of problems, adding that the system could even be a model for many other countries."

The Washington Post (7/5, A8, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that the question of whether Obrador will "unleash the fury of the streets" looms over Mexico. Emotions "have been intensifying in the past two days as the populist candidate and his top aides have outlined a growing list of alleged election law violations that they claim are responsible for the narrow lead of his opponent, Felipe Calderón. No large demonstrations have been held yet, apparently because López Obrador's supporters are waiting for a signal from him and because they want to see the results of an official count that begins Wednesday. … Still, the rhetoric is getting more heated."

The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Harman, Llana, 61K) reports that Mexico is in "political limbo" with both candidates claiming victory. The standoff "raises the prospect of protests and court challenges that could take weeks to resolve. It could also further polarize a divided electorate after months of negative campaigning." The Monitor adds, "Preliminary official results are expected Wednesday - at which point a recount is set to begin. By law, this process will go on day and night until a final result is reached."

The Washington Times (7/5, Behn, 90K) reports that "whoever wins will have to address the anger of voters in towns like LaPuerta, who blame economic conditions for the flight of half their residents to the United States. … The joblessness that sent the young men north became a central issue in Sunday's election, with leftist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador promising a Mexican version of the New Deal and conservative Felipe Calderon insisting that existing free-market policies offered the surest hope for growth."

Election Called "Crucial Test" Of Mexican Democracy. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Luhnow, De Córdoba, Lyons, 2.11M) calls the controversy a "crucial test" of Mexico's democracy. The Journal adds, "Unlike the US, which has had a democracy for two centuries and a Supreme Court whose word is accepted by the vast majority of the electorate, Mexico's democracy is fragile. Until as recently as the 1990s, Mexican presidents were chosen through a process called the 'dedazo,' where the departing leader literally hand-picked his successor. And it was only in 2000 that an opposition party finally won a clean, uncontested election. How the showdown plays out over the coming months could become a defining moment in Mexico's drive to become a modern nation where independent institutions like courts, the central bank and the election agency are respected."

Officials Say 2.5 Million Votes Went Uncounted. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Tobar, Martinez, 958K) reported on its web site that the margin between Calderon and Obrador "narrowed suddenly Tuesday after election authorities revealed that some 2.5 million votes had been missing from earlier counts. … The uncounted votes heightened the sense of disarray that has plagued the election since Mexico's polls closed Sunday evening."

Snow Likens Mexican Election To 2000 US Presidential Race. The Washington Times (7/5, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that White House press secretary Tony Snow was asked "whether he was 'concerned about the Mexican election, and what it might mean if there's a real problem down there.'" Snow was asked, "What if we've got two guys both claiming victory?" Snow "reminded the scribe: 'I think we've had situations here where people have -- there have been multiple claimants to victory.'"

O'Grady Says It Seems "Almost Certain" Calderon Won. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M), "Felipe Calderón of the National Action Party hasn't any doubt that he won Sunday's presidential election, and he says that his adversary, Andres Manuel López Obrador of the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD), knows it, too. … Mr. Calderón's numbers jibe with those of Mexico's Federal Electoral Institute (IFE) and it seems almost certain that he won. But as we go to press, an official announcement has not yet been made." O'Grady adds, "In the past 48 hours, Mexico has watched two distinct management styles unfold. Indeed, it is not unreasonable to conclude that the very reason that Mr. Calderón seems set to take the office of president is precisely because Mexicans feared the López Obrador they are now witnessing."

WSJournal Says Mexican Vote Signals Latin American Shift To Left Has Crested. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) says, "Assuming Mr. Calderón's lead holds -- and that his victory is recognized by all of his opponents -- Mexico may be on the cusp of a new era in which the old-style populism typified by the PRD gives way to a new style of politics catering to an aspirational electorate, regardless of economic class. For the US this is excellent news, not least because the ultimate solution to our immigrant influx is a prosperous southern neighbor that doesn't export millions of laborers every year. It is also a good sign for Latin America: Together with recent elections in Colombia, Peru and Bolivia (where voters on Sunday rejected an effort by President Evo Morales to rewrite the Constitution), Mexico's vote suggests the region's ballyhooed march left has crested."

Israeli Planes Destroy Palestinian Interior Ministry. Israeli aircraft destroyed the Palestinian Interior Ministry early this morning. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Ellingwood, King, 958K) reported, "Israeli missiles flattened a wing of the Hamas-run Palestinian Interior Ministry here today, in the latest wave of airstrikes meant to pressure Palestinian militants into freeing a captive Israeli soldier."

The Washington Post (7/5, A8, Wilson, 744K) reports that the attack that wounded at least seven people, came "hours after the military wing of the governing Hamas movement fired a rocket at the southern Israeli city of Ashkelon that landed in an empty school."

The New York Times (7/5, Myre, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "The militant Hamas organization called the attack a response to 'Israeli aggression.' But in a statement on Tuesday evening, Mr. Olmert called it 'an escalation of unprecedented gravity in the campaign of terror waged by Hamas, which leads the Palestinian Authority.'"

The AP (7/4, Nessman) reported, "Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called the rocket fire on the coastal city of Ashkelon a 'major escalation,' coming just hours after a deadline set by the militants holding an Israeli soldier passed with Israel rejecting demands to release about 1,500 Palestinian prisoners." The AP adds, "Early Wednesday, Israeli aircraft struck the Palestinian Interior Ministry in Gaza for the second time in a week, the military said. Witnesses said missiles hit the main structure again and damaged a building next to the ministry which has been used since the first attack." The Wall Street Journal and the Washington Times run the AP story this morning.

Crisis Expected To Leave Power Vacuum In Israeli, Palestinian Politics. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Leggett, 2.11M) reports that the current crisis in Gaza "likely will leave behind an unpredictable and potentially dangerous power vacuum in Israeli and Palestinian politics. When Palestinian militants kidnapped an Israeli solider late last month, officials on both sides initially sought a diplomatic solution. Mediators from Egypt were brought in while U.S. and European diplomats worked the phones with Israeli and Palestinian officials. Today, the Israeli soldier remains captive in Gaza, and diplomatic efforts increasingly seem to have failed. As the crisis persists, one political cost is also becoming clear: seriously weakened governments on both sides."

USA Today (7/5, Frank, 2.31M) reports that the Gaza crisis "threatens to upend Israel's strategy of achieving stability in the region by withdrawing from occupied land. Israeli troops are back in areas ceded to Palestinians. Their return has fed concerns that pulling out of territories leads to instability — not security."

Diehl Says Israel Can't Leave Gaza Without Cutting Deal With Abbas. Jackson Diehl of the Washington Post writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M), "Israel may not be able to return to negotiation with the Palestinians anytime soon. But until it does it probably won't do any more major withdrawals from Palestinian territory, or restore the relative security it enjoyed for the past 18 months. … Mr. Olmert is well aware that having marched back into Gaza, Israel probably won't be able to leave again without cutting a deal with Mr. Abbas and maybe Hamas. As it turns out, it takes two to end a war."

Friedman Says Israeli-Palestinian Violence Is "Utterly Without Purpose." Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) that "the violence unfolding between Israelis and Palestinians today is utterly without purpose. Israel has evacuated Gaza, and what does Hamas do? It doesn't put all its energy into building a nest for its young there — a decent state and society, with jobs. Instead, it launches hundreds of rockets into Israel. The Palestinians could have a state on the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem tomorrow, if they and the Arab League clearly recognized Israel, normalized relations and renounced violence. Anyone who says otherwise doesn't know Israel today."

Khamenei Moves To Set Stage For Iran's Eventual WTO Membership. The Washington Post (7/5, A10, Vick, 744K) reports, "As diplomatic maneuvering continues over Iran's nuclear program, the cleric who holds ultimate authority in the country has signaled twice in recent days that Iran intends to engage the wider world it long held at bay. Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, announced the formation of a new council to advise him on foreign affairs and a new privatization program aimed at preparing Iran for eventual membership in the World Trade Organization." Analysts "said Khamenei's announcements served to reinforce the assumption of US and European officials that Iran wants to be more integrated in the world."

Blair Says Moderate Muslims Should Confront Militants. British Prime Minister Tony Blair yesterday called on moderate Muslims to do more to confront militancy in their own communities. The AP (7/4, Gardiner) reported, "Blair said the vast majority of Muslims abhorred terrorism and wanted to defeat it, but said they had to do more to counter what he described as the extremists' misplaced anger and grievances. Moderates, he said, must 'stand up against the ideas of these people, not just their methods.'"

The Washington Times (7/5, Kralev, 90K), "Moderate Muslim leaders and other prominent society figures outside the government have to do more to change attitudes, he said. 'I profoundly disagree that the problem here is that the government hasn't acted,' he said. 'We are not having a debate of a fundamental enough nature within the community, which is where the moderate majority go and stand up against the ideas of those people, not just their methods.'"

Western News Outlets Moving Into Arab World. The New York Times (7/5, Carvajal, 1.19M) reports, "A media competition for minds and market share in the Middle East is evolving as a crowd of Western news organizations prepares to deliver headlines -- and geopolitical views -- in the language of the Koran. Backed by government financing, Germany's public international broadcaster, Deutsche Welle, is poised to beam as much as 24 hours of daily news programming in Arabic this autumn. France's yet-to-be-named CNN-style channel is in development for a year-end opening, along with a Web site in Arabic and later in 2007 an Arabic television version. And the state-owned Russia Today has similar plans for an Arabic Web site and television presence." From the United States, CNN "is watching the development of its Arabic Web site, which attracts more than 300,000 unique visitors monthly, before it decides whether to pursue television plans." The BBC World Service itself "is also in the fray, with £19 million, or $35 million, from the British government for an autumn introduction of an Arabic news broadcast, starting with 12 hours of daily programming and expanding to 24 hours." The Times adds "a debate is beginning about whether these foreign broadcasts will create understanding or lead to more conflict."

Chavez Hosts Trade Summit. The AP (7/4, Pearson) reported that Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez "marked Venezuela's entry into the South American trade bloc Mercosur with a six-nation summit Tuesday, an alliance that he says should be a common front against US free trade deals. Chavez and the leaders of Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay were set to formalize the bloc's expansion to include Venezuela, which Chavez claims as a victory against Washington's 'imperialistic' economic plans for the hemisphere. Bolivian President Evo Morales, a close Chavez ally, was to attend the signing ceremony as an observer."

Bush Invites Georgian Leader To Washington. The New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) reprints an International Herald Tribune (Vaisman) story which reported that President Bush has invited Georgian president, Mikheil Saakashvili to Washington 10 days before the G-8 summit meeting in St. Petersburg. For Saakashvili, "the talks with Bush represent a welcome indication that his small Black Sea country is being taken seriously at a time when it is being harried by Russia on a number of fronts - notably energy supplies and ties to NATO - and is irritating Moscow by forging new alliances in an effort to break out of dependency. For Bush, the talks are not only a salute to Georgia's role in a new pipeline that bypasses both Russia and Iran. The meeting also sends a message that, as Saakashvili put it, the G-8 gathering should be more than a photo opportunity and become 'an instrument in solving things.'"

Putin Issues Threat To Force WTO Membership. Russian President Vladimir Putin yesterday threatened to stop implementing global trade rules unless the US agrees to Russian entry to the WTO. The Financial Times (7/5, Buckley, Williams) reports that "two of the Russian president's senior officials said they were still hopeful agreement with the US could be reached in time for next week's Group of Eight summit in St Petersburg." A WTO deal "could clear the way for Gazprom, the Russian gas giant, to announce the go-ahead for development of the massive Shtokman gas field in the Barents Sea, and which of the five short listed foreign oil companies – including two US groups – it has chosen as its partners."

Putin Efforts To Revitalize Moscow Come Under Fire. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Chazan, 2.11M) reports that as deputy mayor of St. Petersburg in the early 1990s, President Vladimir Putin "had a dream to turn St. Petersburg into Russia's financial capital and a hub of foreign investment. It never happened. The city looked on in envy as Western money poured instead into its booming rival, Moscow. Now the tables have turned. Mr. Putin -- who was born and raised in Leningrad, as St. Petersburg was then called -- is leveraging Kremlin power to revitalize his hometown." He "chose it for the site of this month's Group of Eight summit of leading industrial nations, an event designed to showcase Russia's re-emergence as a major power." But "some have dismissed the city's renaissance as skin deep." Some critics "say behind the restored facades and new construction, poverty is widespread and crime is rife: British Ambassador Anthony Brenton was robbed in broad daylight last summer while walking along Nevsky Prospekt, the city's main thoroughfare."

UN Agency Advises Poor Asian Nations To Protect Industries With Tariffs. A report issued last week by the UN Development Program disputes the US position that the removal of trade barriers is the best way to reduce poverty. USA Today (7/5, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "Asia's poorest countries are being out-muscled economically by China and remain stranded in poverty despite a regional boom in free trade," according to the report. The agency "advises poor Asian countries to do what Japan and South Korea did successfully in the 1970s and '80s: protect key industries temporarily with tariffs before exposing them to foreign competition." The UNDP "says Asia's poorest countries have been left behind even as trade has exploded across the region. … One problem: Inexperienced trade negotiators from poor countries are frequently outmaneuvered and enter into trade pacts on unfavorable terms."

Pearlstein Says There Is Little Appetite For Another Round Of Globalization. Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (7/5, D1, 744K), "The utter collapse last weekend of a global trade conference is the latest evidence that, among developed and developing countries alike, there is simply little appetite for another round of globalization. The best face to put on it is that there's still a lot of adjustment going on just to digest the last round, and it is only natural that people want and need more time before diving in for another helping." Pearlstein adds, "Up to now, globalization has been the project of business and economic elites who have largely foisted it on a wary or unsuspecting public. Now, from remote villages of China to a gathering spot for day laborers in Herndon, globalization has entered its more democratic phase. And it's likely to be a messy phase, at that."

LATimes Urges Elimination Of Farm Subsidies. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, 958K) editorializes, "When a meeting of international trade ministers in Geneva collapsed last weekend, it wasn't just the latest disappointing failure by the World Trade Organization to produce an agreement in the Doha round of talks -- it may have been the last." The Bush Administration "has floated a number of worthy proposals, but it might have done better in pressuring the recalcitrant Europeans -- the most egregious opponents of needed liberalization -- with a dramatic, unilateral move. … Farm subsidies cost taxpayers about $19 billion last year. For their money, consumers got the privilege of paying more for some food because farm supports (and quotas on some imports, such as sugar) distort markets. … Ending these subsidies and lowering agricultural tariffs would boost the U.S. economy, eliminate waste and help farmers in the Third World trade their way out of poverty. It's a shame Washington thinks that its protectionist farm policies are something to be surrendered only grudgingly, and only if others do so. Good riddance, we say."

WSJournal Praises Improved US Relations With India, Pakistan. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) says, "Weapons sales are a notoriously touchy subject, particularly in nuclear South Asia. Yet New Delhi barely raised a peep when the Bush Administration announced a $5 billion arms package to Islamabad on Monday. That's a tacit vote of confidence in the strengthened U.S.-India relationship, and another step toward normalized relations with Pakistan. … What a sea change in U.S.-Pakistani ties." The Journal adds, "Relations between New Delhi and Islamabad are also improving, if slowly. … America doesn't have much of a role to play in those discussions. But it's a step forward that Washington can improve its relationships with both countries, without hurting their relationship with each another."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Defends War On Terror Strategy At Fort Bragg. The AP (7/5, Riechmann) reports President Bush told 3,500 US troops and other guests at Fort Bragg yesterday "that insurgents in Iraq and Afghanistan are violent, yet vulnerable, and urged US troops to march on in the fight for freedom so Americans can celebrate Independence Day year round." At the "outdoor pep rally," Bush "recalled the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the former leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, who died last month in a US airstrike that boosted troop morale and offered hope to Americans weary of the war."

Of the networks, both ABC and CBS reported on President Bush's trip to Fort Bragg in their stories on the July 4th observances in this country. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 4, 1:40, Moran, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush traveled to Ft. Bragg, North Carolina to celebrate the day and pay tribute to soldiers there." President Bush: "You are serving our country in a time when our country needs you. And because of your courage, every day is Independence Day in America." The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 5, 0:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "By tradition, President Bush spent the day with the troops. He received an early birthday cake from soldiers at Fort Bragg North Carolina. The President's 60th birthday is Thursday."

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Gosselin, 958K) reports Bush mounted "a feisty defense of administration strategy in the war on terrorism and to assert that America was winning the battles in Iraq and Afghanistan." The President "made only a passing reference to recent reports that Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, had drafted plans to sharply reduce troop numbers in the violence-plagued nation by the end of 2007. Bush said Casey was working with the new Iraqi government 'on a path forward.'" Praising US forces "for the bravery they have displayed, Bush repeatedly said that he would not set an 'artificial timetable' for withdrawal."

The Washington Post (7/5, A3, Baker, 744K) also says Bush, "surrounding himself with uniformed men and women…again vowed to resist calls to withdraw from Iraq." Bush said, "I'm going to make you this promise: I'm not going to allow the sacrifice of 2,527 troops who have died in Iraq to be in vain by pulling out before the job is done." Bush's "appearance here came more than three years into a war that has proved more difficult than he imagined and sapped support among the U.S. public." Against this "backdrop, the White House has searched for a formula that will preserve Republican control of Congress in November's midterm elections, with Bush and his allies once again trying to portray themselves as the party of national security." To "make his case, the president eschewed his usual civilian Fourth of July events and visited the 82nd Airborne Division and U.S. Special Operations Command here at Fort Bragg, where a year ago he delivered a prime-time television address intended to reverse the slide in support for the war."

The Washington Times (7/5, 90K) reports, "In his talk, Mr. Bush made a veiled jab at some Democrats who have called for an immediate withdrawal of US forces from Iraq. He said that setting a timetable for pulling out troops would undermine a fragile new Iraqi government, undercut the efforts of US troops and signal to the enemy that if they wait a little longer, American forces would leave Iraq."

The New York Times (7/5, Hauser, 1.19M) reports Bush "thanked American troops for their service in Iraq and elsewhere, rousing thousands of soldiers to applause by saying that they were winning the war, but warning them that it was far from over." Bush said since Zarqawi's death, "there have been 190 raids by coalition troops in Iraq, 700 enemy 'operatives' have been captured and 60 or more killed. He said fresh intelligence had helped American forces keep the pressure on terrorists, and that the United States would continue to strike at their networks." Bush "delivered his speech as violence persisted in Iraq with the kidnapping of a deputy minister in the Iraqi government."

The Fayetteville (NC) Observer (7/4, Cuningham) referred to Bush's "rousing Independence Day speech. He pledged to a cheering crowd not to 'pull out before the job is done.'" Bush, "wearing an open-necked olive-green shirt with his sleeves rolled up, spoke to a crowd of about 4,000 in the traffic circle around the Iron Mike statue. His back was wet with sweat as he worked the crowd at the end of his half-hour speech, which was carried live by some national cable news stations." The "crowd of soldiers and airmen in their duty uniforms frequently clapped and cheered during the outdoor speech — a contrast to the restrained crowd in dress uniforms Bush addressed in a visit to Fort Bragg just over a year ago."

explosion while searching for insurgents in Afghanistan in late 2004. Eldridge, who later showed reporters his prosthetic leg, has been in rehabilitation and volunteered to return to duty. A husband with twin 3-year-old boys, he will return to combat next year, he said."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/4, Henry) reported, "Perhaps the highlight of the President's trip came when he actually met the special ops pilot who was the person who flew Saddam Hussein to the Baghdad airfield after he was pulled out of that spider hole dramatically a couple of years back. The President seemed to be surprised to be meeting, in fact, this pilot and at some point the President said that, 'Did you really do that? That was a good job.' It was not a surprise when the President actually spoke. In his remarks he spoke a lot about patriotic themes, he talked about the sacrifice in Iraq, saying that the sacrifice of military officials brings Independence Day to Americans every day of the year."

The Durham Herald-Sun (7/5, Phillips) says Bush described terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarawi's "last moments in the care of a US Army medic. 'One of the last things he saw was the face of an American soldier from Fort Bragg,' the president said." The reference brought "cheers" from the crowd.

Lawmakers Concerned About SCOTUS Use Of Geneva Accords. The AP (7/5, Yost) reports, "Of all the steps the Supreme Court could have taken to undercut President Bush's legal position in the war on terror, applying international law to al-Qaida probably would have been the worst." The AP continues, "That development came to pass Thursday and now Republicans are rushing to protect the cornerstone of Bush's thinking: Suspected terrorists are not entitled to protection under the Geneva Accords." The AP adds, "Sens. Mitch McConnell and Lindsey Graham said Sunday that Congress must address the Supreme Court ruling embracing Article 3 of the conventions in the military commission case of Osama bin Laden's former driver. … Article 3 prohibits outrages upon personal dignity, 'in particular humiliating and degrading treatment,' and bars violence, including murder, mutilation and torture." The AP notes, "In an election year, declaring that international law governs the war on terror reminds voters of some of the Republican administration's lowest moments: controversies over Justice Department 'torture' memos and allegations of abuse against detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. … McConnell, R-Ky., the second-ranking GOP leader in the Senate, said the 5-3 court decision 'means that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes.' … Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., also expressed concern about the decision, saying it 'is somewhat of a departure, in my view, of people who are stateless terrorists.' McCain appeared on ABC's 'This Week.'"

SCOTUS Ruling Is Rare Win For Defendant. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Ben Winograd) reports, "The Supreme Court's rejection of the Guantanamo Bay military tribunals wasn't just a defeat of Bush-administration policy. The ruling also marked a rare win for a criminal defendant during the court's latest term." The Journal continues, "Defendants lost by a more than 2-1 margin during the term that began in October. In many votes, the two Bush appointees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, sided with police, prosecutors and prison wardens." The Journal adds, "Under decisions this term, prosecutors can use evidence police took after violating the requirement they knock and announce their arrival to execute a search warrant (Hudson v. Michigan). Juries may hear 911 telephone emergency recordings of witnesses whom defendants can't cross-examine (Davis v. Washington). Police may search parolees for any reason -- or no reason at all (Samson v. California). And states may carry out death sentences even when juries find that mitigating circumstances surrounding a defendant and his crime equal aggravating factors (Kansas v. Marsh). … To be sure, conservatives haven't reversed many 1960s-era criminal procedure rulings, such as Miranda warnings, to deter police misconduct. But the new justices, who have strong law-and-order records, already are pushing the pendulum to the right. 'There seems to be a new self-confidence or aggressiveness' by the court's conservative bloc, says Joshua Dressler, a criminal-law professor at Ohio State University."

SCOTUS Ruling Puts Administration In Hot Seat. The Long Island Newsday (7/5) reports, "The Supreme Court decision striking down the tribunal system created by the Pentagon for trying accused enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay has apparently presented the Bush administration and its allies in Congress with two choices - both fraught with risk." Newsday continues, "They can use the GOP majorities in the House and Senate to put a quick congressional seal of approval on something close to the existing system, but run the risk that it too will be struck down by the court. … Or they can follow the path suggested by the court and devise a system embracing the procedural and other principles of the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions, but risk the possibility that few, if any, of the terrorists will be convicted. … And both choices, as well as attempting to chart a middle course, could set off the kind of protracted, internally divisive debate that the White House and GOP political strategists would not relish."

Schumer Seeks Review Of Anti-Terror Measures. The AP (7/3) reports, "Sen. Charles Schumer is urging the review of all the Bush administration's anti-terror programs in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision that military tribunals for Guantanamo detainees violate U.S. and international law." The AP continues, "Schumer, a New York Democrat and member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, called for the establishment of an independent commission to scrutinize the president's war on terror. … 'I am growing increasingly concerned about the Administration's stubbornly unilateral approach to these types of issues,' Schumer wrote Sunday in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. 'The Administration has not only largely ignored the Congress, but has also badly miscalculated how its efforts would be evaluated by the Supreme Court...'"

The New York Daily News (7/4, McAuliff) reports, "In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Schumer, D-N.Y., called for a panel to do a 'top-to-bottom legal review' of all the White House's controversial terror efforts. … 'Before another administration procedure or policy is struck down by the Supreme Court, dealing another potential setback to the war on terror and the prosecution of terrorists, I urge you to establish an independent commission,' Schumer wrote." The News notes, "Schumer said it was particularly important to act while there are several other pending legal challenges to administration policies. Critics have said policies such as domestic eavesdropping exceed the president's powers. … Politicians on both sides of the aisle said Sunday that Congress likely would act quickly to give President Bush whatever power he needs to pass muster with the high court."

More Commentary. In an op-ed that rant in the Lawrence (KS) Journal World (7/5), Rosa Brooks, an associate professor at the University of Virginia School of Law, writes, "The Supreme Court on Thursday dealt the Bush administration a stinging rebuke, declaring in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld that military commissions for trying terrorist suspects violate both U.S. military law and the Geneva Convention. … But the real blockbuster in the Hamdan decision is the court's holding that Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention applies to the conflict with al-Qaida — a holding that makes high-ranking Bush administration officials potentially subject to prosecution under the federal War Crimes Act." Brooks continues, "The provisions of the Geneva Convention were intended to protect noncombatants — including prisoners — in times of armed conflict. But as the administration has repeatedly noted, most of these protections apply only to conflicts between states. Because al-Qaida is not a state, the administration argued that the Geneva Convention didn't apply to the war on terror. These assertions gave the administration's arguments about the legal framework for fighting terrorism a through-the-looking-glass quality. On the one hand, the administration argued that the struggle against terrorism was a war, subject only to the law of war, not U.S. criminal or constitutional law. On the other hand, the administration said the Geneva Convention didn't apply to the war with al-Qaida, which put the war on terror in an anything-goes legal limbo. … This novel theory served as the administration's legal cover for a wide range of questionable tactics, ranging from the Guantanamo military tribunals to administration efforts to hold even U.S. citizens indefinitely without counsel, charge or trial. … Perhaps most troubling, it allowed the administration to claim that detained terrorism suspects could be subjected to interrogation techniques that constitute torture or cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment under international law, such as 'waterboarding,' placing prisoners in painful physical positions, sexual humiliation and extreme sleep deprivation. … For prosecutions to occur, some federal prosecutor would have to issue an indictment. And in the Justice Department of Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales -- who famously called the Geneva Convention 'quaint' -- a genuine investigation into administration violations of the War Crimes Act just ain't gonna happen. … But as Yale law professor Jack Balkin concludes, it's starting to look as if the Geneva Convention 'is not so quaint after all.'"

CIA Disbands Unit Solely Dedicated To Finding Bin Laden. The New York Times (7/4, Mazzetti, 1.19M) reports the Central Intelligence Agency has "closed a unit that for a decade had the mission of hunting Osama bin Laden and his top lieutenants, intelligence officials confirmed Monday." The "unit, known as Alec Station, was disbanded late last year and its analysts reassigned within the C.I.A. Counterterrorist Center, the officials said." The decision is "a milestone for the agency, which formed the unit before Osama bin Laden became a household name and bolstered its ranks after the Sept. 11 attacks, when President Bush pledged to bring Mr. bin Laden to justice 'dead or alive.'" Intelligence officials said the "realignment reflects a view that Al Qaeda is no longer as hierarchical as it once was," and a "growing concern about Qaeda-inspired groups that have begun carrying out attacks independent of Mr. bin Laden and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri."

Bin Laden Calls For Attacks On Shiites In Iraq. CNN's The Situation Room (7/3, Ensor) reported, "In his fifth taped message this year, Osama bin Laden calls for attacks against Shiites in Iraq, and all those who support the government of Prime Minister al-Maliki or the United States. … It is a sharper tone than bin Laden and his deputy have so far taken against Iraqi Shiite, apostates, as he calls them, though he only calls for killing those who support the Iraqi government."

Experts Say Congress Should Avoid Major Changes In Detainee Policy. The AP (7/4, Yost) reports legal experts "urged Congress to forgo far-reaching changes following" the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld, in which the court ruled the White House had exceeded its authority in ordering military tribunals for Guatanamo Bay detainees. The "calls for caution stem from the Supreme Court's embrace of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions in a military commission case against Osama bin Laden's former driver." Duke University law professor Scott Silliman "said the court did not extend Article 3 protections to anyone outside of detainees facing trials before military commissions — just a handful of the more than 400 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay."

France Tries Six Former Guantanamo Detainees On Terrorism Charges. The New York Times (7/4, Smith, 1.19M) reports six former detainees "from the United States Naval Base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, went on trial" in Paris on Monday, "accused of past terrorist links." The US "released the six men, all of them French, in two groups, in July 2004 and March 2005. All but one of the men — Brahim Yadel, 36 — were freed pending trial after several months of further detention by the French authorities." The men are "accused of training in a camp run by Al Qaeda near Kandahar, Afghanistan, during the months before the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States. If found guilty, they face up to 20 years in jail under a French antiterrorism law that makes 'associating with criminals in relation to a terrorist enterprise' a crime."

Treasury Official Faces Hurdles In Increasing Financial Pressure On Hamas, Iran. The Washington Post (7/5, A11, Linzer, 744K) in a positive profile of Treasury Department Undersecretary for Terrorism and Financial Intelligence Stuart Levey credits him with taking a more diplomatic approach by not condemning the disclosure of the terrorist finance tracking program saying he "made his disappointment over the reports strongly known without resorting to attack. It is a style that separates him from some within the administration he serves while bringing him closer to others." His non-confrontational approach has been successful. After joining the Treasury Department "he discovered, that simply asking bank managers to drop their business with Kim Jong Il worked better than surprising them with public embarrassment, as had been the strategy during Bush's first term." But using the same strategy against Hamas and the Iranian government, "have proven more challenging." His "direct approach with bank managers still comes in handy, but he has had difficulty persuading allies to sign on to a plan that will cost them in Iranian trade and oil." Levey said, "I've been in lots of meetings with foreign officials where I tell them what I want, and they look like they want to show me the door."

British Military, Police Under Stress In War On Terror. The New York Times (7/4, Cowell, 1.19M) reports Britain's "effort to curb terrorism — like that of the United States — is fought on a broad front, from the dark conspiracies of homegrown bombers to the resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan." Both "contests seemed to have intensified, with suggestions that British troops in Afghanistan were overstretched while the government and the police at home were locked in a duel with the judiciary over the handling of terrorism suspects." The High Court last week "rejected the government's use of a form of house arrest for terrorism suspects, saying it ran counter to human rights laws," while in Parliament "lawmakers discussed increasing the maximum period of detention without trial for terrorism suspects to 90 days, from 28 — a proposal strongly opposed by civil libertarians." Meanwhile, British commanders in Afghanistan "say they have requested further equipment to fight insurgents in southern Helmand Province, where five British soldiers have been killed in recent weeks, two of them over the weekend." The debates "have sharpened as Britain prepares to commemorate the 52 people killed by four suicide bombers in London last July 7, offering a reminder of the stakes and scope of the campaign against terrorism."

Kristof Says Administration Effort To "Tame" Media Is Dangerous. In his New York Times column (7/4), Nicholas Kristof says that with President Bush "leading a charge against this 'disgraceful' newspaper, and a conservative talk show host, Melanie Morgan, suggesting that maybe The Times's executive editor should be executed for treason, we face a fundamental dispute about the role of the news media in America. At stake is the administration's campaign to recast the relationship between government and press." But "historically, we in the press have done more damage to our nation by withholding secret information than by publishing it." So "be very wary of Mr. Bush's effort to tame the press. Watchdogs can be mean, dumb and obnoxious, but it would be even more dangerous to trade them in for lap dogs."

State Department Official Defends US Rendition Policy. U.S. Department of State Legal Adviser John Bellinger III in a letter to the editor in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) defends the US renditions policy saying the State Department disagrees with the Venice Commission's assertion "that there are only four legal ways to transfer a prisoner to foreign authorities: deportation, extradition, transit, and transfer of a sentenced person to serve that sentence in his country of origin." Bellinger states, "As the European Commission on Human Rights found, renditions are not per se unlawful, though important principles must be protected. Renditions should not be used to transfer terrorist suspects to face torture, and the U.S. does not transport anyone, and will not transport anyone, for this purpose. We believe, however, that the international community must continue to be able to use renditions not only to bring terrorists to justice but also to prevent terrorist suspects from remaining at large to plan future attacks."

Congress Urged To Increase Oversight Role Of Administration National Security Policies. Balch & Bingham attorney Stephen Gidiere, in an op-ed in USA Today (7/5, 2.31M) raises questions about the success of the Freedom of Information Act's on its 40th anniversary. Focusing on the Bush Administration, Gidiere states that even prior to the 9/11 attack, "President Bush has repeatedly asserted his constitutional power to hide information from the American people, Congress and the courts." Bush "says he's using that power only to track down terrorists, but we'll never know because the eavesdropping program is, well, secret." And "Congress seems happy to abdicate its power to the president. FOIA's 40th anniversary is the perfect opportunity for Congress to reassert its role." Gidiere concludes, "There will always be secrets, and good government requires a balance between secrecy and openness. This balance must be constantly adjusted as circumstances change. But right now, Bush is pulling hard on his side of the rope, and no one is pulling back."

Cohen Defends NYTimes Decision To Publish Details Of Anti-Terror Programs. The New York Times continues its now-daily defense of its decision to publish details of US national security programs. Roger Cohen in his column in the New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) cites President Bush's and Vice President Cheney's objections but in particular takes issue with White House press secretary Tony Snow's accusation that the New York Time's placing "the public's right to know" over "somebody's right to live" as "an offensive way of framing the core of this debate." Cohen argues "Making a society safe is not everything. The Soviet Union was safe enough. … American liberty thrives on a division of power that endless war should not be allowed to erode." Therefore, "publishing may be patriotic, a defense rather than a betrayal of America."

US Crackdown On Possible Terrorist Financing Criticized As Too Broad. Michael Young, opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) uses his own personal example of having his US bank account closed because he lived in Lebanon as an example of how the Patriot Act was having a negative effect in the war against terrorism. Sun Trust "decided to discontinue financial services to any 'individual residing in an OFAC [the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control] sanctioned or other high risk country.'" Young says his problem with Sun Trust "highlighted how, in the name of national security, the U.S. government and institutions coping with its requirements may be throwing the baby out with the bathwater. Banks indiscriminately sanctioning depositors in risk countries owe them a minimum of privacy and the benefit of the doubt. Fighting terrorism won't work if most of those paying the price happen to be on your side."

Ignatius Warns Administration Against Politicizing Terror Policy Debate. Two opinion pieces in the Washington Post accuse the Administration and Republicans of placing politics before national security in the debate over national counter-terrorism policies. David Ignatius in his column in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, 744K) writes, "The Bush administration's press-bashing campaign may be good election-year politics, but it is adding a poisonous new element to the national security debate at the very time the administration ought to be trying to rebuild a bipartisan consensus." The Supreme Court's ruling against the Administration's detainee policies "completed the collapse of the temporary post-Sept. 11 system. The administration should be working carefully with Congress to build a permanent legal framework -- rather than using anti-terrorist agitprop against the New York Times in an effort to patch together the old scaffolding." The GOP "may pick up votes by berating the New York Times. And the administration may even be tempted to bring a criminal case to enforce the rules against leaking or publishing communications secrets. But those politically divisive steps won't give anti-terrorism programs the broader legal foundation they need, and in that sense, they won't make the country any safer."

Meyerson Predicts Republicans Will Use Detainee Policy Debate For Partisan Purposes. Harold Meyerson in his column in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, Meyerson, 744K) writes that after the recent Supreme Court ruling on US detainee policy, "Republicans have a choice. Working with the Democrats, they could craft a legislative response that incorporates both halves of the court's decision, guaranteeing the legality of the new procedures -- but forfeiting a major opportunity to demagogue against Democrats between now and November. Or, as they do roughly 100 times out of 100, they could simply choose to go for the politics. A bill that gives the force of law to the administration's kangaroo courts could surely pass the House with close to unanimous Republican support. In the Senate, so many Republicans might demur that such a bill could fail. No matter: Some Democrats in both houses would surely vote against such a bill, which Rove and Co. would use to brand the party as one big Osama Enabling Society. And the rule of law? That's so pre-Sept. 11."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Nebraska ACLU Files FOIA Request For FBI Surveillance Of Peace Groups. The Lincoln Journal Star (7/4) reported, "The Nebraska affiliate of the American Civil Liberties Union said Monday it filed a records request with the Federal Bureau of Investigation to determine if the agency has illegally spied on Nebraskans." Citing "recent news reports that said the agency has spied on Quakers in Colorado and Catholic Peace Ministries in Iowa, among other 'peaceful groups,'" Nebraska ACLU legal director Amy Miller said, "Since we have people working for peace and justice in Nebraska who are criticizing the current administration, we fear the FBI has been illegally spying in our state, too." The Journal Star added, "The ACLU filed the request…on behalf of itself, Nebraskans for Peace, Speak Out at Stratcom, Nebraskans for Justice and seven citizens who are active in those groups." The AP (7/4, O'Hanlon) noted, "One of the individuals named in the request is Malcom Miles, who helped organize the Speak Out at Stratcom event on the anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima. 'It is frightening to know that the FBI may have been involved in spying on a group of Nebraska citizens who planned a legal and peaceful event in full cooperation with the Omaha Police Department, the United States Air Force, the University of Nebraska at Omaha and the cities of Omaha and Bellevue,' he said. 'The FBI should be concerned about protecting us from serious threats, not worrying about legal, peaceful, public gatherings.'"

Former White House Official Hired For Top NYPD Counterterrorism Post. The New York Times (7/5, Baker, 1.19M) describes how former White House national security policy expert Richard Falkenrath was recently offered a position as deputy commissioner for counterterrorism in the New York Police Department. As someone who helped create the DHS he has extensive policy experience, but "this operational post…is something of a departure. At least one former head of the city's Office of Emergency Management, while praising Dr. Falkenrath personally, called him a surprising choice. But Commissioner Kelly says his department can quickly give its new deputy commissioner any seasoning he may need." And "the F.B.I. has praised the choice. In a statement last Wednesday it said the bureau's director, Robert S. Mueller III, had worked closely with Dr. Falkenrath and acknowledged 'his distinguished history of public service.'"

NYTimes Advocates Listing Names Of 9/11 Victims Randomly At WTC Memorial. The New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) in an editorial examines the debate over how the names of the victims of the 9/11 attacks should be presented at the Ground Zero memorial. The original plan called for the names to be recorded randomly, "to acknowledge the randomness with which death struck on that day and to honor the individuality of every victim." But, "many 9/11 family members have argued that the names should be grouped by the tower they died in, the company they worked for, and the floor they worked on. The impetus is, in part, the desire to place loved ones in their context, to provide a richer narrative for each individual." The Times states, "To us, the most respectful acknowledgment we can make to them is to acknowledge them as individuals" and rank them randomly regardless of status.

Lagging Hospital, School, City Services Limit Repopulation Of New Orleans. In a New York Times op-ed (7/5), Matt Fellowes of the Brookings Institution, Bruce Katz and Amy Liu of the metropolitan policy program, and graphic designer Nigel Holmes says, "Last week this newspaper reported that more than $2 billion in reconstruction aid for the victims of Hurricane Katrina had been lost to 'scams, schemes and stupefying bureaucratic bungles.' Add to this the inexcusable $7 billion allocated for temporary trailers and mobile homes, which cost far more than available rental apartments, and the scale of waste is stunning. Nonetheless, the vast majority of the $107 billion we calculate has been allocated by the federal government has been converted by public officials and private leaders into a substantial amount of progress." As a graphic included "indicates, problems in reopening hospitals and schools and in getting city services operating will make it hard for New Orleans to attract new families, particularly the service workers that support the tourism industry."

Inmates Remain Source Of Cheap Labor In Louisiana. The New York Times (7/5, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports many people "in East Carroll Parish, as Louisiana counties are known, say they could not get by without their inmates, who make up more than 10 percent of its population and most of its labor force. They are dirt-cheap, sometimes free, always compliant, ever-ready and disposable." National prison experts "say that only Louisiana allows citizens to use inmate labor on such a widespread scale, under the supervision of local sheriffs. The state has the nation's highest incarceration rate, and East Carroll Parish, a forlorn jurisdiction of 8,700 people along the Mississippi River in the remote northeastern corner of Louisiana, has one of the highest rates in the state." As a result, "it is here that the nation's culture of incarceration achieves a kind of ultimate synthesis with the local economy. The prison system converts a substantial segment of the population into a commodity that is in desperately short supply — cheap labor — and local-jail inmates are integrated into every aspect of economic and social life."

WAR NEWS:

Former GI Accused Of Raping Iraqi Woman, Killing Three Family Members. The Financial Times (7/4, Yeager) reports, "Steven Green, 21, who was discharged from the US army 'due to a personality disorder' before the case came to light, was arrested on Friday and appeared in federal court in North Carolina on Monday." According to an affidavit filed on Monday, Green, "who had been stationed in Iraq with the 101st airborne division, conspired with three other soldiers to rape a woman who lived near the traffic checkpoint they manned in Mahmudiya, south of Baghdad. … After participating in the rape of the woman, Mr Green shot and killed her, according to the charges. He also allegedly shot and killed three family members – an adult male, an adult woman, and a girl – who were in the house, prosecutors said." The charges "come amid several investigations into alleged killings of Iraq civilians by US servicemen." The allegations "are likely to further fuel anti-US sentiment in Iraq and add to calls that the US withdraw its troops."

ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 3, 1:45, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "The three other soldiers are still serving in Iraq. They are being questioned. They have not been charged. This is the same company that just a couple of weeks ago had two soldiers kidnapped, tortured and killed."

The CBS Evening News (7/3, story 3, 1:45, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "They are the worst, most shocking charges yet leveled at US troops serving in Iraq." CBS (Stewart) added, "Obviously this was a brutal crime by any standard and one obvious question is whether insurgents later targeted this unit in reprisal for the murders. There's no evidence that's the case and we may never know." On its website, USA Today (7/4, Johnson) also notes "the suspects belong to the same unit as two soldiers kidnapped and killed south of Baghdad last month, a military official told the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the case is underway." The military "has said that one and possibly both of the slain soldiers were tortured and beheaded. The official said the mutilation of the slain soldiers stirred feelings of guilt and led at least one member of the platoon to reveal the rape-slaying on June 22."

On NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 3, 2:40, Curry, 9.87M), Eugene R. Fidell, a military law expert, was shown saying, "If they prove to be true, it's a very disturbing set of facts and it's certainly going to have a terrible effect on relations with the Iraqi people." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "If convicted of murder, Green could face the death penalty. Because he's a civilian, Green's been charged in Federal court but Army officials say there's still an outside chance he could be recalled to duty and face trial before a military Court Marshal. Ann."

The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Spiegel, 958K) reports, "The killings have fanned unease between Iraqi officials and the US military, and the incident in Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad, is considered likely to aggravate tensions further because of its violent, sexual nature."

The New York Times (7/4, Cloud, Semple, 1.19M) reports, "The rape victim was identified in the American court documents as a 25-year-old woman, but there have been conflicting accounts of her age. In Iraq, the mayor of Mahmudiya said Monday that the rape victim had been only 15 years old." The mayor, Mouayid Fadhil, "said that those killed included the rape victim's parents and her 7-year-old sister, and that the attackers also tried to set the rape victim's body on fire, apparently in an effort to cover up evidence." A White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino, said, "The president has full confidence in the military to investigate alleged crimes and to punish anyone convicted of abhorrent behavior that dishonors the proud traditions of our military. He will not comment on ongoing investigations so as not to prejudice the outcome; however, he believes that 99.9 percent of our men and women in uniform are performing their jobs honorably and skillfully and they deserve our full appreciation and gratitude."

The Washington Post (7/4, White, 744K) reports, "The case is the fifth in recent weeks in which US troops have been accused of killing civilians in Iraq, a spate of incidents that has drawn attention to the way U.S. forces operate in what is often a complex and confusing battlefield. The rape and murder allegations against Green, however, detail a crime that appears to have had little if anything to do with the prosecution of the war itself." According to an affidavit by FBI Special Agent Gregor J. Ahlers, "the crimes appeared carefully crafted." The AP (7/4, Whitmire) says "an official familiar with details of the investigation in Iraq has told The Associated Press that a flammable liquid was used to burn the rape victim's body in an attempted cover-up." The affidavit "noted that prosecutors have photos taken by Army investigators in Iraq of all four bodies found inside a burned house and a photo of a burned body of 'what appears to be a woman with blankets thrown over her upper torso.'"

Iraqi Officials Express Outrage Over Rape-Slay Case. USA Today (7/5, 2.31M) reports, "Iraqi officials expressed outrage Tuesday over charges that a US soldier raped a young Iraqi woman and murdered her and her family." The rape and murder charges "were made public Monday when Steven Green, 21, appeared in federal court in North Carolina. The military said at least four other soldiers still in Iraq are under investigation in the March 12 slayings of the woman, her parents and her younger sister in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad."

The AP (7/5) reports, "Iraq's justice minister Tuesday condemned the alleged rape-slaying by U.S. soldiers of an Iraqi woman and the killing of her family. … 'If this act actually happened, it constitutes an ugly and unethical crime, monstrous and inhuman, and is a violation of international and Geneva conventions,' Justice Minister Hashim Abdul-Rahman al Shebli, a Sunni Arab, said in a statement." He "demanded that the United Nations Security Council and other international organizations make sure troops are punished."

The Washington Times/AP (7/5, Gamel) reports, "Iraqi lawmakers blasted the United States on Tuesday over an alleged rape-slaying case, while a southern governor said he was resigning amid fears Iraqi forces cannot handle security once coalition troops transfer responsibility there this month." Two women legislators "called for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to be summoned to parliament to give assurances that justice would be done in the March 12 slaying of four members of a family in Mahmoudiya. A teenage girl allegedly was raped before being killed. … The two lawmakers, Safiya al-Suhail and Ayda al-Sharif, said condemnation was not enough. 'We demand severe punishment for the five soldiers involved,' al-Sharif said. 'Denouncements are not enough. If this act has taken place in another country, the world would have turned upside down.'"

Another AP story (7/4, Reid) says "allegations of US soldiers abusing civilians often draw more media attention in the United States than in Iraq. And they generate little more than perfunctory statements from Iraq's leaders, who depend on American troops for their political and physical survival." However, "such reports do serve to motivate insurgents, who seize upon them for propaganda value. The allegations also undermine public confidence in the US-backed government and complicate America's hopes of reducing forces."

Pace Pledges Full Investigation. The AP (7/4, Whitmire) reports, "The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff vowed Tuesday to get to the bottom of charges that a former solider raped and killed a young Iraqi woman and shot her family to death. Three other soldiers still in Iraq are suspected of joining in the crime and helping cover it up." Marine Gen. Peter Pace said yesterday, "Any such acts on the part of a US servicemember, if proven to be true, are totally unacceptable. We know that in uniform, and our fellow citizens know that…If there are those who have done things as they have been accused of, we will get to the bottom of it. We will do the investigations, we will find out what the truth is, and, if necessary, we will take those who deserve to be taken to court so they can have their day in court."

Probe Looking Into Unit Oversight Issues. The New York Times (7/5, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "The military investigation…is looking at whether poor oversight within the soldiers' unit helped give them the chance to operate on their own, American military officials said Tuesday. … The procedures will be given a 'top-down scrub,' one of the officials added. This broad approach to the investigation leaves open the possibility that senior officers in the unit, the 502nd Infantry Regiment of the 101st Airborne Division, may be implicated later."

Iraqi Government Considers Arming Insurgents To Fight Al Qaeda. USA Today (7/5, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "Iraq's government is studying a request from some local insurgent leaders to supply them with weapons so they can turn on the heavily armed foreign fighters who were once their allies, according to two Iraqi lawmakers. Leaders claiming to represent about 11 insurgent groups asked for weapons to fight foreign al-Qaeda elements in Iraq, said Haider al-Ibadi, a Shiite lawmaker and member of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa Party." The insurgent request "was confirmed by al-Ibadi and Mithal al-Alusi, another lawmaker. Al-Maliki was out of the country, and several officials in his office declined to comment. The request came out of talks between people claiming to represent insurgent groups and the Iraqi government." USA Today adds" the US military said insurgent talks are an Iraqi matter."

Activity In Baghdad Morgue Signals Increase In Violence. The New York Times (7/5, Tavernise, Nageeb, 1.19M) reports, "The central morgue said Tuesday that it received 1,595 bodies last month, 16 percent more than in May, in a tally that showed the pace of killing here has increased since the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, Al Qaeda's leader in Iraq." Baghdad, "home to one-fourth of Iraq's population, has slowly descended into a low-grade civil war in some neighborhoods, with Sunni and Shiite militias carrying out systematic sectarian killings that clear whole city blocks." The Times adds, "To a large extent, control of the capital means control of the country, and Baghdad is at the center of efforts by American military officials and the new Iraqi government to stem the tide of violence."

US Forces To Bulldoze Area Of Ramadi Where Repeated Fighting Has Occurred. The New York Times (7/5, A1, Filkins, 1.19M) reports from Ramadi, "In three years here the Marine Corps and the Army have tried nearly everything to bring this provincial capital of 400,000 under control. Nothing has worked. Now American commanders are trying something new. Instead of continuing to fight for the downtown, or rebuild it, they are going to get rid of it, or at least a very large part of it." They "say they are planning to bulldoze about three blocks in the middle of the city, part of which has been reduced to ruins by the fighting, and convert them into a Green Zone, a version of the fortified and largely stable area that houses the Iraqi and American leadership in Baghdad." The idea "is to break the bloody stalemate in the city by ending the struggle over the battle-scarred provincial headquarters that the insurgents assault nearly every day. The Government Center will remain, but the empty space around it will deny the guerrillas cover to attack." Ramadi, "a largely Sunni Arab city, is regarded by American commanders as the key to securing Anbar Province."

Critics Say Iraq IG Trying To Create "Empire." The Washington Times (7/5, Scarborough, 90K) reports Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the Bush Administration's special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction (SIGIR), has "has near carte blanche to probe how the administration has managed nearly $70 billion in Iraqi and U.S. taxpayer rebuilding money. His rapid-fire series of reports on the reconstruction at times have seared the White House and delighted its Democratic critics. … If the White House thought it was getting a pushover by hiring a longtime legal adviser to Mr. Bush, well, it was wrong." The Times adds, "Since taking office in January 2004, Mr. Bowen's staff of more than 160 federal and contract employees have churned out an impressive array of work -- 55 audits, 165 recommendations, 42 project assessments and 112 reports based on satellite imagery." Critics "contend that Mr. Bowen gives little emphasis to a broad list of achievements in Iraq. … Anonymous critics also say Mr. Bowen is trying create an 'empire' with expanded power to investigate all sorts of operations in Iraq, not just rebuilding."

Blair Says Withdrawal Of "Substantial" Number Of UK Troops Possible In 2007. CNN's The Situation Room (7/4, King) reported that British Prime Minister Tony Blair said Tuesday "there could be opportunities over the next year and a half to withdraw a substantial number of British troops from Iraq. Prime Minister Blair pegged that troop reduction to the buildup of Iraqi forces."

Five Workers For US Base Killed In Afghanistan. The AP (7/4, Shah) reports, "A bomb hidden in a cart exploded Tuesday in a crowded intersection of downtown Kabul, injuring 10 people, and five Afghan laborers were ambushed and fatally shot on their way to a U.S. military base in eastern Afghanistan." The attacks "come amid a surge of violence by Taliban-led rebels, 12 of whom are killed in a clash with police." The bomb that went off in the Afghan capital "had been planted in a hand cart behind a car, said police official Mohammed Nabi. The explosion took place at a busy traffic intersection near the presidential palace, shattering windows at a movie theater and the nearby Justice Ministry." The New York Times (7/5, Gall, 1.19M) also reports the story.

CIA Closes Unit Overseeing Hunt For Bin Laden. Fox News' Special Report (7/4, Wilson) reported, "US intelligence officials today confirmed reports the CIA has closed…the unit assigned to oversee the hunt for Osama bin Laden. They say the unit shut down late last year because the agency is now more concerned about terrorists attacks independent of bin Laden and al Qaeda."

US Forces Celebrate Independence Day In Iraq, Afghanistan. NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 5, 2:15, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "For Americans in war zones, there was little opportunity to commemorate the day, no time off from the violence or from the need to maintain vigilance. But even on a holiday so far from home, troops found ways to note their special connection to the fight for freedom." NBC (Maceda) added, "Even in this sprawling furnace called Kandahar airbase, a few American soldiers managed to celebrate with an outdoor barbeque and Fourth of July fantasies."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 6, 1:45, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "For families of troops overseas in Iraq and Afghanistan are likely to be deployed soon, there was a bittersweet note to this Independence Day celebration, the fun somewhat muted by concerns for loved ones in harm's way." CBS (Acosta) went on to report from at Fort Hood, TX, where it showed Jessica Signor, a soldier's wife, saying, "They've been over there for a long time and I know some more -- longer than others -- so I know they're looking forward to coming home." CBS added, "For some that homecoming cannot happen soon enough. But at least for today, those concerns can be set aside. There will be a fireworks show later this evening and nobody does explosives better than the Army."

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Barnes, 958K) reports that in Iraq, "most US troops marked the Fourth of July by doing the exact same thing they did on July 3: Patrolling the streets, training Iraqis, checking people into sleeping quarters or whatever their jobs entail. There aren't any fireworks, for obvious reasons."

US Troops In Iraq, Afghanistan Become Naturalized Citizens. The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 8, 2:55, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "It was an especially patriotic Fourth of July for some brand new Americans who became citizens half a world away. Twenty-six foreign-born members of the US military took the oath at a base north of Kabul in Afghanistan. A similar ceremony was held in Iraq for troops taking advantage of a new law that put them on the fast track to US citizenship."

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 8, 2:30, Moran, 8.78M) reported, "This Independence Day was a milestone for a group of soldiers in Iraq. In one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces, they became citizens of the country they're fighting to protect. They are at war. The nation's flag emblazoned on their uniforms. But it wasn't until today…that they became Americans." NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 6, 2:30, Curry, 9.87M) said the "76 men and women…were born in 29 different countries but they are all wearing one uniform and fighting for one nation -- the United States. Yet when they joined, not one was even an American citizen."

Air Force Captain Stationed In Iraq Criticizes "Politicians In Washington." F. John Duresky, an Air Force captain stationed in Iraq, writes in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, 744K), "Yesterday millions of Americans celebrated Independence Day," and "today Americans go back to their normal business. The politicians in Washington have made sure the sacrifices of the war are borne by the very smallest percentage of Americans. They won't even change the tax rates to prevent deficits from running out of control. Future generations will pay the cost of this war. Many Americans feel strongly about the war one way or another, but they aren't signing up their children for service or taking the protest to the streets. What can they do? It is they whom we in the military trust to influence our leaders in Washington." Duresky adds, "Today, as on every other day in Iraq, American servicemen are in very real danger. Our country is at war. Mothers, fathers, wives, husbands and children are worrying about their loved ones in a faraway land. They all hope he or she isn't the one whose luck runs out today."

US Military Radio Host In Iraq Profiled. The Washington Post (7/5, A8, Finer, 744K) profiles "the US military's most popular radio host in Iraq," Spec. Kristen King, 21, whose "sugary twang a product of her Shreveport, La., upbringing. … A reservist halfway through a journalism degree at Louisiana State University, King is energetic and apple-cheeked, with a tireless smile. She wears desert camouflage fatigues, and her straight brown hair is pulled tightly behind her head. Her program, 'Country Convoy,' is four hours of down-home Americana beamed throughout Iraq from a fiberglass trailer tucked amid a warren of identical units in the fortified Green Zone."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Mercury Interactive Review Finds Options Backdating. The San Jose Mercury News (7/5, Garner) reports, "More than a year and a half after regulators began examining its stock options practices, Mercury Interactive said Monday that it has found 54 intentional acts of backdating options, from 1994 until March 31, 2005, to inflate senior executives' compensation." The News continues, "Mercury's former senior management 'deliberately' overrode controls to prevent backdating, the Mountain View company said in a regulatory filing." The News adds, "Mercury, a maker of software to test computer programs, was one of the first valley companies to come under suspicion for options granting practices, a controversy that has now widened to include about two dozen valley companies. … In November, three senior executives -- then-Chief Executive Amnon Landan, Chief Financial Officer Douglas Smith and General Counsel Susan Skaer -- resigned after a special committee of board members determined that top executives had manipulated dates of option grants over a decade. … The filing Monday by the maker of software to test computer programs suggested that regulators are starting to go after directors as well. Mercury said directors Igal Kohavi, Yair Shamir and Giora Yaron on June 23 received so-called Wells notices from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, warning that the agency may seek to permanently bar them from the boards of any public company. The SEC is considering charges alleging each director knew or should have known about the manipulation of option grant dates. Mercury said it has accepted those directors' resignations."

The Financial Times (7/5, Grant) reports, "The stock options backdating scandal in the US widened this week as four companies said they were being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission or federal prosecutors." The Times continues, "Mercury Interactive, a California-based business software company, said three of its directors had offered to step aside from the company's audit and compensation committees after being told by the SEC it was considering a civil enforcement action against them for violations of federal securities laws. .. About 60 companies have said they are subject to government probes. Many are also conducting internal reviews." The Times adds, "Authorities want to know whether companies falsified documents to make the backdated granting of an option appear on a different date from that already announced by the company. … They also want to know whether stock options that were backdated were properly accounted for and disclosed to shareholders. … A number of companies have already been hit with class action lawsuits from public pension funds and other shareholders claiming that the accounting effects of backdated options were not properly disclosed to them and that executives fraudulently pocketed profits as a result of the backdating."

The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "In a sign that securities regulators may try to hold directors accountable for stock-option grant backdating, the Securities and Exchange Commission staff has said it is likely to pursue civil charges against directors of Mercury Interactive Corp., one of the first companies caught up in the options scandal, according to a regulatory filing." The Journal continues, "To fix faulty accounting, Mercury restated years of financial results, reducing its net income by $525.4 million from 1992 to 2004 -- nearly all due to options-related problems. The restatement for 2003 turned that year's reported profit of $41.5 million into a loss of $62.6 million. … An independent investigation led by a special board committee uncovered other troubles at Mercury, including improper management of earnings and a $1 million loan to the former chief executive that 'lacked documentation supporting its approval' by the board. … Mercury, of Mountain View, Calif., said three directors, including prominent Israeli businessman Yair Shamir, received so-called Wells notices, which signify the inclination of the SEC staff to pursue civil-securities charges against the individuals. Mercury said the directors have notified the SEC that they intend to challenge any charges, claiming they neither knew about, nor participated in, the alleged backdating."

CEOs Pushing Back In Dispute Over Executive Pay. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Murray) reports, "Tired of being beat up over executive pay, big business is starting to push back -- a bit. … Today, the Business Roundtable, a lobbying group of chief executives of 160 of the largest companies in the U.S., is releasing a study showing the pay of CEOs, while still lush compared to that of a Starbucks barista, isn't as outrageous as some press reports suggest." The Journal continues, "The study, authored by compensation consultant Frederic W. Cook, is based on the 350 large public companies in the Mercer Human Resources Consulting database. And it finds that the median pay of CEOs -- which Mr. Cook argues is a better measure than average pay -- was $6.8 million last year, down slightly from its peak of $7 million in 2004. Those numbers include salary, bonus and the estimated value of options at the time they were issued, using the Black-Scholes method." The Journal adds, "That's a lot of money. But it's 'only' 179 times the pay of the average American worker -- not 475 times, a number of vague origins that has popped up in some media reports, including in this newspaper. (The Journal later issued a correction.) … Moreover, the study shows growth in CEO pay over the past decade has roughly tracked growth in shareholder returns. Median CEO compensation has grown 9.6% a year since 1995 -- compared with 9.9% growth in median annual shareholder returns. That, Mr. Cook argues, shows that these CEOs, as a group, are getting pay raises commensurate with performance."

South Korea Continues Probe Of Texas Firm. The New York Times (7/5, Fackler) reports, "South Korean authorities are continuing a high-profile investigation into Lone Star, the Dallas-based private-equity fund, fueling a public backlash against excessive profits made by foreign investment funds." The Times continues, "Just eight years ago, Lone Star was hailed as a savior, pouring money into companies crippled by South Korea's financial crisis. Today, it appears to be in danger of being run out of town in a flap that could threaten Seoul's attractiveness to foreign investors." The Times adds, "South Korea is investigating Lone Star for possible wrongdoing involving its takeover of Korea Exchange Bank. Lone Star's plan to sell the bank, earning a windfall profit of $4.4 billion, has provoked a public outcry, along with its attempts to avoid Korean taxes. … A separate investigation into allegations of embezzlement and bribery resulted in a raid on Lone Star's Seoul offices and the arrest of three businessmen linked to the fund. … Lone Star's troubles sit at the center of a growing uproar over the huge and often tax-free profits earned by foreign hedge funds and other investment funds, which like Lone Star are now cashing out of lucrative investments made here during and after the financial crisis. Most experts, however, describe the outcry as just growing pains of this country's rapid transformation into one of Asia's most open economies."

Federal Prosecutors Feel Vindicated By Sieglman, Scrushy Convictions. The Birmingham News (AL) (7/5, Chandler) reports, "In 2004, prosecutor Louis Franklin had a decision to make: Continue the 3-year-old investigation into Gov. Don Siegelman's administration or close the books on it for good." The News continues, "The easy thing would have been to walk away. … Siegelman was a popular politician with widespread support in the state. The Democrat had a bevy of skilled lawyers at his disposal. … 'What a lot of people don't know is, until we impaneled that special grand jury, this case was about to be closed,' Franklin said. … 'We knew this is going to be tough. They are going to have an explanation that people are going to want to believe. Nobody wants to believe a governor is trading on his office,' Franklin said." The News notes, "Franklin, chief of the criminal division in the Middle District of Alabama, inherited the case when his predecessor retired. Leura Canary, the U.S. attorney in the district, had stepped aside after a lawyer for Siegelman complained to the U.S. Department of Justice about her husband's long-standing ties to Republican politics. … Franklin and others decided to convene a special grand jury in June 2004. The investigation, put together from the privacy of an office in a leaky old airplane hangar, culminated Thursday with guilty verdicts against Siegelman and HealthSouth founder Richard Scrushy on bribery charges. … Franklin said the team of career prosecutors that drove the final years of the case felt vindicated by the verdicts after months of heated words between the two sides."

New Regulator Says Fannie, Freddie Roles Should Be Reduced, Not Eliminated. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports the new director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, James Lockhart, said Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac "should retain an ability to help prop up the U.S. home-mortgage market in times of financial turmoil, the companies' new chief regulator said in an interview." Lockhart's remark "point to a possible compromise in the heated debate over the future role of the government-sponsored providers of funding for home loans." The Bush Administration "is pushing for legislation that would force the companies to shed most of their holdings of mortgages and related securities, totaling more than $1.4 trillion. But housing-industry officials and many members of Congress fret that strict limits on those holdings could deprive the housing market of a steady source of funding." Lockhart "said the mortgage portfolios held by Fannie and Freddie are far too large, creating the risk of serious damage to financial markets if the companies fail to control their interest-rate risks. But Mr. Lockhart still sees a role for those portfolios, on a smaller scale, in ensuring that plenty of money is available for home loans."

All 50 States Now Participating In Online Sex Offender Registry. The AP (7/5) reports, "US authorities said on Monday all 50 states have joined a national web site that lists addresses and other details of convicted sex offenders." The AP continues, "The states of South Dakota and Oregon were added last week to the registry, which 'provides real-time access to public sex offender data nationwide with a single Internet search,' the Department of Justice said in a statement." The AP adds, "The online database includes more than 500,000 convicted sex offenders who are required to register their address with local authorities. … The government-sponsored site 'allows parents and concerned citizens to search existing public state and territory sex offender registries beyond their own states,' the Justice Department said. .. Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales said the completion of the National Sex Offender Public Registry was 'good news' for parents and police. 'The constant effort to safeguard our children from sex offenders is never finished, but today's announcement marks a clear accomplishment on the side of protection,' Gonzales said in a statement."

Government Technology (7/5) reports, "The Justice Department announced the activation of a national registry Web site last year and initially linked 22 states to the site. Oregon and South Dakota recently passed the sex offender legislation that now allows the state to be included in the NSOPR as of July 1, 2006. With the addition of these two states inclusion, the registry connects 50 states, the District of Columbia and the territory of Guam the site. … 'With the inclusion of the last two states to the registry, the capacity grows for parents and communities to be informed and aware of sex offenders residing in their neighborhoods. We commend Oregon and South Dakota for making the site truly available nationwide.' said Regina B. Schofield, Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Justice Programs. 'The coordination among states, private organizations, and the Department of Justice moves us closer to making information about all registered sex offenders available to parents and concerned citizens.'"

Pennsylvania Violent Obscenity Case Moves Forward. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/4, Ward) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court has refused to review a case in the Western District of Pennsylvania that involves the sale of violent, graphic pornography from California." The Post-Gazette continues, "A posting last week in U.S.A. v. Extreme Associates Inc. shows that the Supreme Court, on May 15, denied the defendants' request for a writ of certiorari." The Post-Gazette adds, "Attorneys for Robert Zicari and his wife, Janet Romano, who own Extreme Associates, asked the high court to review a December decision by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reinstating the criminal charges against them. … They were indicted in August 2003 and charged with 10 counts of mailing obscene materials, transporting obscene materials and criminal conspiracy. The pornography that they produce depicts violent scenes, including women being raped and killed. … U.S. District Judge Gary L. Lancaster dismissed the indictment against the couple in January 2005, saying that federal obscenity laws violate the U.S. Constitution. … But in December, the appeals court disagreed with Judge Lancaster, claiming that he erred and that his decision ignored existing precedent."

Reed Targeted For Role In Abramoff Scandal. The Washington Times (7/5, McCain, 90K) reports, "Two weeks before his July 18 Republican primary showdown with state Sen. Casey Cagle," Georgia lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed "is locked in a battle for political survival. On Monday, after weeks of attack ads from Mr. Reed, the Cagle campaign fired back with what Georgia pollster Matt Towery termed a 'hydrogen bomb' -- a TV ad accusing Mr. Reed of 'betrayal' for his role in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal." Reed has "denied wrongdoing in the Abramoff affair. But the latest TV ad by Mr. Cagle -- a 12-year state Senate veteran whom Mr. Reed has accused of tax dodging, ethical violations and opposing property rights -- seems to have put the Reed camp in an angry mood." The new Cagle ad "shows Mr. Reed being played as a face card in a poker hand, an allusion to the casino-lobbying scandal that has sent Abramoff and two associates to federal prison and caused Democrats to accuse the Republican Party of fostering a 'culture of corruption.'" The Cagle campaign "defended the ad by citing a Thursday report in the Wall Street Journal that 'Abramoff appears to have funneled $4 million in fees from the Mississippi Choctaw to Mr. Reed's consulting firm' through tax-exempt organizations." The "most recent public poll, taken last Tuesday and Wednesday by Mr. Towery's Insider Advantage firm, shows Mr. Reed with 32 percent support to 27 percent for Mr. Cagle, a north Georgia businessman."

conservative activist Grover Norquist "says a Senate report connecting him with convicted felon Jack Abramoff is a personal attack from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that could hurt the senator's recent efforts to woo the right for a presidential bid." Norquist says the Senate Indian Affairs Committee report last month "outlining his efforts to funnel money from Abramoff's tribal clients to former Christian Coalition head Ralph Reed is riddled with half-truths and falsely implicates his nonprofit group, Americans for Tax Reform (ATR), in wrongdoing." Norquist says McCain, "chairman of the committee, issued the report in retaliation for Norquist's efforts to thwart McCain's 2000 presidential bid." Norquist said, "He has exhibited personal animus toward me. McCain, who's running for president and is ostensibly the front-runner, takes time and effort to throw a punch at me and Ralph Reed. Why? He has told people we stopped him in the presidential election last time, and he thinks we might do it again. He is delusional." The Hill adds McCain aides "said the 373-page report, the culmination of a two-year investigation, is a neutral, factual account of Abramoff's movements."

Illinois Man Pleads Not Guilty To Murdering FBI Informant. The Chicago Sun-Times (7/4, Fitzpatrick) reported, "An Alsip man pleaded not guilty Monday to shooting an FBI informant in May as federal agents monitored the weapons sting. Jerry T. Henderson pleaded innocent to 12 counts of murder and three counts of armed robbery in the fatal shooting of FBI informant Timothy Forrest in a Dolton parking lot, prosecutors said." The Sun-Times noted that Forrest "was shot twice in the head, according to the Cook County medical examiner's office. FBI agents did not hear any shots, the agency said in a statement." The AP (7/4) added, "FBI spokesman Tom Simon said after Henderson's arrest that the FBI took all the normal safeguards to protect the cooperating witness, adding there were inherent risks anytime a cooperating witness meets with a criminal."

Mariano Lawyer, Supporters Ask Judge For Leniency In Sentencing. The Philadelphia Inquirer (7/4, Shiffman, 423K) reported that on Monday, "Rick Mariano's lawyer and friends…asked a federal judge to exercise leniency, arguing that the former city councilman does not deserve to spend a decade in prison for taking bribes" when he is sentenced Thursday. "Prosecutors have sought 10 years, arguing that Mariano betrayed the public trust and intimidated witnesses during their investigation. Mariano's lawyer, Thomas A. Bergstrom, said that a 10-year sentence is 'too harsh' and that the councilman's discussions with his staff helped the FBI, rather than hurt it."

Blagojevich Calls Hiring Fraud Report "A Good Thing." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (7/5, Carpenter) reports, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich insisted Tuesday that continued findings of wrongdoing within his administration are 'a good thing' because they are being made by an inspector general he appointed to help him clean up state government. The Democratic governor, on the defensive amid ongoing revelations about possible misconduct in the way his administration hands out state jobs and contracts, told reporters at an Independence Day parade that the findings show his administration is aggressively going after those who break rules and laws. Reiterating a position he has taken as the hiring scandals mount, Blagojevich called them a consequence of his efforts to change government practices after 26 years of Republican governors."

California Red Cross Employees Sentenced To Prison For Hurricane Relief Fraud. The AP (7/4) reported, "Two men were sentenced to federal prison Monday after pleading guilty to a scam that bilked thousands of Hurricane Katrina funds from the American Red Cross." David Robert Candelaria and Harold Dennis Oats "worked as employees at a Red Cross call center in Bakersfield where they filed false claims to get money wired to themselves or to family and friends. U.S. District Judge Anthony Ishii sentenced Candelaria to 18 months in prison and Oats to 10 months. They were also ordered to repay $12,520." The AP noted, "The Red Cross contacted the FBI after it performed an audit and discovered an unusually high number of claims were being paid out at Western Union outlets in the Bakersfield area, even though few evacuees had moved there." The Bakersfield Californian (7/4, Logan, 64K) added, "The FBI conducted an investigation and 72 people were charged with wire fraud, a federal crime. So far 60 defendants have pleaded guilty and 29 have been sentenced."

US Accuses Gang Of Conspiring To Kill Blacks. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Spano) reports, "Jose Cruz is a walking testament to what happens when a member turns against the Avenues street gang. … He has 30 scars from the stab wounds he suffered in one attempt on his life — on his arms, torso and legs. In another attack, he was beaten so severely that he has a visible dent in his skull, according to court papers, 'the size and shape of a pistol butt.'" The Times continues, "His street gang goes back five generations in Highland Park, which for Cruz is five miles and several lifetimes from the downtown courtroom where he is scheduled to testify as the star witness for the prosecution in the trial of a group of childhood friends. … Federal prosecutors, who launched their case last week, contend that the Avenues gang between 1994 and 2000 conspired to kill African Americans on their turf." The Times adds, "Men, women and children were harassed, terrorized, assaulted and slain as gang members sought to force black residents out of Latino neighborhoods, prosecutors said. … Authorities are using a federal hate-crime law based on the amendment to the U.S. Constitution that outlawed slavery, and another law created in the civil rights era, to go after four gang members. Barbara Bernstein, deputy chief of the criminal section of the civil rights divisions of the U.S. Department of Justice in Washington, is part of the prosecution team. … Attorneys for the defendants — Gilbert Saldana, Alejandro Martinez, Fernando Cazares and Porfirio Avila — have asserted that the federal government has no power to involve itself in a common street crime."

"Web Bangers" Posting Gang Web Sites. The AP (7/5, Glazer) reports, "Some of the country's most notorious street gangs have gotten Web-savvy, showcasing illegal exploits, making threats, and honoring killed and jailed members on digital turf. … 'Web bangers' are posting potentially incriminating photos of members holding guns, messages taunting other gangs and boasts of illegal exploits on personal Web sites and social networking sites." The AP notes, "Gangs once only roamed the streets of big cities but now can be found in 2,500 U.S. communities, according to the FBI. Police departments suddenly faced with the unwelcome arrivals are looking for help anywhere they can get it, including the gangs' own easy-to-find Web sites."

Ohio Police, FBI Arrest Seven In Ransom Kidnapping. WXIX-TV Cincinnati (7/3) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast Monday, "North College Hill Police and the FBI have been working around the clock on a bizarre case where a 17-year-old girl was kidnapped and held for ransom. Police are saying that at least one of the kidnappers has confessed to the crime. According to police, a woman came to the College Hill home of the girl early Monday morning and asked the girl, who answered the door, for help. The teen went to get a portable phone for the woman who then shoved the door open and abducted the girl." The Cincinnati Enquirer (7/4, Truong, 205K) added that the "girl was found duct-taped and blindfolded in the basement of a Bond Hill house Monday after she was kidnapped and a ransom was demanded, police said. Seven people have been arrested and were being interviewed by North College Hill police, Cincinnati police and the Federal Bureau of Investigation." WCPO-TV Cincinnati (7/3, Walton, Kettler, Terrell) noted that the girl "is currently at Children's Hospital with her parents and the FBI."

The AP (7/4) reported, "The suspects were being interviewed Monday by police in this Cincinnati suburb where the girl lives, as well as Cincinnati police and the FBI. … Police accompanied the girl's father to a park where he was supposed to meet her captors, who had demanded ransom. They chased a man who showed up to a house where the teen was found, authorities said."

Tennessee Truck Driver Arrested In Kidnapping, Sexual Assault Of Teen Girls. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Bernstein, 958K) reported, "A 16-year-old Lancaster girl was on her way home Monday, after what police said was a harrowing nearly two-week ordeal in which she and another teen were assaulted and held against their will by a cross-country trucker." Trucker Ricky Donnell Jones "remained in jail in Knoxville, Tenn., facing state charges of kidnapping while the FBI weighed whether to file additional charges in federal court. Knox County Sheriff's Department spokeswoman Martha Dooley said the girl and an 18-year-old friend had gone willingly with Jones." However, Dooley noted, "When both girls tried to get away from Jones, he held them against their will, he sexually assaulted them and he broke the 18-year-old's arm." The Times added, "FBI Special Agent Gary Kidder, who is based in Knoxville, said his agency was gathering information on the case to present to the U.S. attorney's office in Tennessee, to see if there was enough evidence to file federal charges against Jones."

US Pursuit Of Death Penalty In North Dakota Case Sparks Controversy. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (7/4, Prather) reports, "Dru Sjodin's disappearance touched off a torrent of worry and sadness. Alfonso Rodriguez Jr.'s arrest unleashed enough outrage to change how Minnesota and North Dakota deal with sex offenders. … More than two years after the painful saga unfolded, a trial that begins Thursday may force two states that haven't executed a criminal in more than a century to wade into the divisive issue of capital punishment." The P-P continues, "Sjodin's family and some of her friends have supported a federal prosecutor's decision to seek the death penalty. … 'There is no question in anybody's mind that's what should happen,' said friend Elia Loven. 'That's not even enough.' … Some of those who were close to the spirited college student aren't so sure that pursuing a death sentence is the right thing to do. High school friend Sarah Millard said she wonders what Sjodin would have wanted. … 'She did not have any grudges against anyone. Everyone was in love with her,' Millard said. 'Of course, you are so angry about what he did you feel that's the only way you are going to make peace. But at the same time, I try to think about had this been me, would Dru have been OK with the death penalty? I don't know if she would have.'" The P-P adds, "Jury selection begins Thursday in Fargo. Rodriguez, 53, who has pleaded not guilty, is accused of kidnapping, torturing and killing Sjodin. … Her disappearance in November 2003 from a shopping mall in Grand Forks sparked massive searches in North Dakota and Minnesota. Rodriguez, a convicted sex offender, was arrested the following month. Sjodin's body was found in April 2004. … Rodriguez faces a possible death sentence through a happenstance of geography. He is accused of crossing state lines during the commission of a kidnapping, which gave federal authorities an opportunity to step in. That action exposed Rodriguez to the death penalty, even though the crime he is accused of committing happened in two states that have outlawed capital punishment."

Suspect In Florida Death Returned To US. The Gainesville Sun (7/3, Pakkala) reports, "A former Gainesville nurse accused in the overdose death of a University of Florida student was returned to the United States from West Africa on Sunday." The Sun continues, 'Oliver Travis O'Quinn, 27, was escorted by U.S. Marshals to New York to await extradition to Florida. He is believed to have been out of the country since shortly after the November 2005 death." The Sun adds, "State Attorney Bill Cervone, whose office will handle the case when O'Quinn returns to Gainesville, was unsure Sunday when O'Quinn will be back. He said O'Quinn will decide whether to travel to Florida voluntarily or to have an extradition hearing. O'Quinn will be scheduled for an arraignment when he gets to Gainesville. … O'Quinn faces a second-degree murder charge in the death of 24-year-old Michelle Herndon, whose body was found in a southeast Gainesville apartment Nov. 10, 2005. … Shortly after the death, O'Quinn… left the country. Investigators tracked flight records to Ireland, and the North Florida Violent Fugitive Task Force joined the case at the request of Gainesville Police. … The Marshal Service and the U.S. Department of State's Diplomatic Security Service launched a week-long manhunt to catch back up with O'Quinn, eventually apprehending him in Senegal. … Once O'Quinn was in custody, the U.S. Department of State Bureau of Consular Affairs and the U.S. Department of Justice Office of International Affairs revoked his passport and released him to the Marshals Service for return to the U.S."

Extradition Dispute Looms In South Carolina Slay Case. The Greenville News (7/5, Edmonds) reports, "The United States faces a long, uphill legal battle in extraditing a former Wren High School student who is charged in the slaying of an Easley pawnshop owner." The News continues, "Roger Eugene Shephard, 21, has sought the protection of Canadian authorities because he may face the death penalty upon returning to the United States. … Shephard is charged in the slaying of John Bruin, 65, who was killed the afternoon of June 15 during an armed robbery at Action Pawn in downtown Easley." The News adds, "Because Shephard filed for refugee status, he cannot be deported, leaving the United States with no other option but to pursue extradition. A hearing on that effort will be held July 10. … Clemente Monterosso, Shephard's deportation lawyer, said he is waiting for the United States to file an extradition request. … Currently Monterosso has at least 15 extradition cases; among them are drug, conspiracy and telemarketing cases. In his experience, extradition takes an average of three to four years, sometimes more."

Lobbyists Square Off Over Internet Gambling Bills. The New York Times (7/4, Phillips, 1.19M) reports that while Internet gamblers "lay down big money on World Cup soccer this summer, teams of lobbyists are facing off on Capitol Hill in a contest over whether the United States should choke off the growth of wagering on the Web." Faced with "bills to curb online betting, which attracts an estimated $12 billion a year in wagers worldwide, an array of interest groups like casinos here and abroad, as well as sports leagues, antigambling coalitions and even poker players, has dispatched lobbyists to argue what should be legal and what should not." Major League Baseball "wants to make sure that any measures do not diminish fantasy sports games, which it credits for a resurgence in its popularity." The Justice Department has "always considered Internet gambling illegal. But that has not stopped online wagering from flourishing. Gambling opponents are pushing for bills to put teeth into enforcement. In the House, proponents of a crackdown merged two bills." The "odds of a bill's becoming law this year appear long. Beyond that, nearly everyone agrees that online betting may be unstoppable because of the reach of the Internet and the difficulty in regulating its activity."

Debate Grows Over Castration Of Sex Offenders. The Washington Post (7/5, B1, Rondeaux) reports, "James Jenkins wanted to end it. No more fantasies. No more molesting little girls. He knew he was the only one who could stop it; he was just waiting for the right time." The Post continues, "The right moment arrived one night nearly three years ago when he was alone in an Accomack County, Va., jail cell. He had spent five years in a Virginia prison for sexually molesting three young girls and another 2 1/2 years for violating his parole. The next morning, a prosecutor was going to ask a judge to commit him to a state facility for high-risk sex offenders. Jenkins could think of only one way out. … He asked a jail guard for a razor. He told the guard he wanted to look nice and cleanshaven for his court hearing the next day. The guard hesitated but handed Jenkins the blade. Jenkins walked to the shower in his cell. He bit the blade out of its plastic casing and stuffed an apple in his mouth to muffle his screams. Then he castrated himself and flushed his testicles down the jail cell toilet." The Post adds, "Jenkins, 63, doesn't flinch when he talks about it now. 'Castration has done precisely what I wanted it to do,' he said. 'I have not had any sexual urges or desires in over two years. My mind is finally free of the deviant sexual fantasies I used to have about young girls.'" The Post notes, "He spoke with the clinical cool of a surgeon as he tried to explain his pedophilia during a rare interview in a guarded room of the Virginia Center for Behavioral Rehabilitation, the sex offender treatment center where Jenkins was sent. The Petersburg facility is part of a new way the state is trying to keep sex offenders off the streets: Identify the most dangerous before they are released from prison and ask a judge in civil court to commit them to a treatment facility even after they have completed their sentences. … Jenkins readily admits that the prospect of being confined indefinitely partly prompted his drastic action three years ago. But he also insists he did it to prevent himself from victimizing another child."

Florida Law Aims At Curbing False Alarms. The Orlando Sentinel (7/5) reports, "Every day, police spend valuable time and resources responding to false burglar alarms. The trigger could be a door left ajar, a clumsy homeowner -- or, today, a dog frightened by fireworks. … All but a tiny percentage of those alarm calls are false, according to a 2003 U.S. Department of Justice report." The Sentinel continues, "Police agencies hope that a July 1 change to state law will save time and money by requiring alarm companies to make a second call before asking for officers' help. … Dramatic results already are being seen in Martin County, which implemented the second-call requirement in January. Since then, monthly false-alarm dispatches have fallen by 30 percent to 35 percent, Martin County sheriff's Lt. Glenn Zirkle said. … But this March, there were 489 false alarms, down from 672 in March 2005. … Alarm companies already call a home or business when a burglar alarm sounds to see whether it is accidental. They request police if no one answers. But now, no response at the home leads to a second call to a customer's cell phone or workplace before an officer responds."

WPost Argues For End Of Capital Punishment. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/4, A14, 744K) says, "In his intemperate concurrence to a decision on capital punishment last week, Justice Antonin Scalia made a remarkable claim: 'One cannot have a system of criminal punishment without accepting the possibility that someone will be punished mistakenly. ... But with regard to the punishment of death in the current American system, that possibility has been reduced to an insignificant minimum.'" Scalia "is correct that innocence has not been -- and probably can never be -- proven in these cases. … Still, it seems highly unlikely that all of these convictions are solid. We hope never to see convincing evidence that an innocent person has been put to death. Avoiding that unthinkable likelihood is one reason capital punishment should end."

LATimes Criticizes Court For Denying Appeal Of Death Penalty. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, 958K) in an editorial faults the Supreme Court for rejecting "the appeal of Eric Clark, who was 17 when he shot a Flagstaff, Ariz., policeman after the officer stopped his pickup truck. The teenager was convicted for 'intentionally or knowingly' killing a law enforcement officer even though Clark, who had a history of delusional behavior, said he thought the cop was a space alien." Writing for the majority, Justice David Souter "said the Constitution's guarantee of due process did not prevent Arizona from lopping off one of two prongs of a definition of legal insanity known as the M'Naghten rule." It "was a horrific tragedy that might have been averted if Clark had been institutionalized. But once the deed was done, the courts -- including the high court -- should have given him more of an opportunity to prove that bad acts are sometimes committed by mad people."

FOIA Policies Under Fire As Law Turns 40. The San Diego Union-Tribune (7/5) reports, "Today marks the 40th anniversary of the signing of the federal Freedom of Information Act, but open-government advocates say there is little to celebrate. … The historic law, enacted to ensure that citizens have the greatest possible access to government information, is widely seen as broken. The backlog of requests is growing, with some Americans waiting years for information from government agencies." The Union-Tribune continues, "Each administration since 1966 has used every tool at its disposal to thwart disclosure of information it deems dangerous or embarrassing. The administration of President Bush is no different, often citing the changed security environment after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as justification for secrecy. … 'The marching orders are now: If there's a basis to withhold, do it,' said Elizabeth Withnell, chief counsel at the Department of Homeland Security's Privacy Office."

The AP (7/5, Bridis) reports, "The U.S. law that is the foundation for opening the government's filing cabinets to its citizens has provoked bureaucratic headaches since President Johnson grudgingly signed it 40 years ago today -- and he worried immediately that it might force the disclosure of damaging national secrets, newly disclosed records show. … Decades later, the Freedom of Information Act still regularly creates tension between the government and citizens, corporations, researchers and journalists. The law's staunchest advocates believe its principles have never been so imperiled, threatened by what they call the Bush administration's penchant for secrecy. … 'This is the worst of times for the Freedom of Information Act in many ways,' said Paul K. McMasters of the First Amendment Center. … The First Amendment Center studies issues of free speech, press and religion. McMasters cited large backlogs of unresolved citizen requests for records and new administration strategies to withhold records."

Yale University Faces Probe Of Grant Programs. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Levitz, 2.11M) reports, "Three federal agencies have subpoenaed documents from Yale University regarding its use of research grants in the past decade, heightening scrutiny of the university after an audit alleged expense padding for stem-cell research." The Journal continues, "The Defense Department, the National Science Foundation and the Department of Health and Human Services sought documents concerning research expenses, faculty effort devoted to research, and 'numerous other matters related to grant administration,' the New Haven, Conn., university said." In response, "Yale President Richard C. Levin said he expects faculty and staff to give 'top priority' to the requests."

LATimes Calls SCOTUS Ruling On Whistleblowers "Surprising." An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (7/4, 958K) says, "By a surprising unanimous vote, the US Supreme Court has ruled that an employer may not retaliate against a worker who has filed a charge of illegal discrimination by transferring her to a less desirable assignment with the same job title. The decision is a victory not only for the worker who filed the case but for potentially thousands of other whistle-blowers who have been retaliated against in ways real but not measurable in dollars and cents." The Times adds, "An employer who wants to punish a worker for complaining about discrimination can do so in myriad ways that don't change the employee's pay or job title. It would weaken the purpose of the Civil Rights Act to allow such retaliation to go unpunished."

Judge Seeks Settlement Today In Florida Synagogue Case To Avoid Trial. The Miami Herald (7/5, Wright) reports, "A federal judge on Monday gave the city of Hollywood and an Orthodox synagogue until 3 p.m. Wednesday to sign a deal ending their feud or be ready to start trial Thursday." The Herald continues, "The deadline was set after attorneys, for the second time, asked U.S. District Judge Joan Lenard to postpone the federal religious discrimination trial. Attorneys told Lenard the two sides were close to a deal after a face-to-face mediation between city commissioners and leaders of the synagogue on Thursday. … An obviously agitated Lenard said she had heard that same story June 26, when the trial was originally scheduled to start." The Herald adds, "If the deadline is not met, trial will begin Thursday morning, and Lenard made it clear she will make no exceptions. … 'I will wait no longer than July 6,' she said." The Herald notes, "Under the current proposal offered by the city, the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch would be paid $2 million and allowed to continue to operate out of two homes in a residential neighborhood. The congregation would also be able to expand to no more than three homes within the two blocks surrounding the synagogue. … In return, the synagogue and the U.S. Justice Department would drop lawsuits against the city and Commissioner Sal Oliveri."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/4, Rodriguez) reports, "The federal civil lawsuit stems from the city's attempts to oust Chabad from the two single-family homes it converted into a synagogue in Hollywood in 1999. The group claims the city was biased when it removed a special permit in 2003 while allowing other religious groups to operate. … The agreement being negotiated still needed to be signed off by a number of officials, including Mayor Mara Giulianti, City Attorney Dan Abbott, and supervisors with the Department of Justice in Washington. Moments before City Hall was closed Monday, Abbott said he still had not received anything to sign, but that other attorneys were still 'talking to each other' and it was conceivable an agreement would be reached before Lenard's deadline."

Kentucky Mental Facility Dogged By Abuse Charges. The Louisville Courier-Journal (7/5, Beardsley) reports, "With abuse charges mounting, Kentucky has extended its contract with the Pennsylvania company hired last year to clean up the troubled Communities at Oakwood, the state's largest facility for mentally retarded adults." The Courier-Journal continues, "The 123-day contract extension was signed last week with Liberty Healthcare and is worth a maximum of $8.8 million, with $4.5 million earmarked to pay for direct-care staff, officials with Kentucky's Cabinet for Health and Family Services announced yesterday. … The announcement came one day after Oakwood, in Somerset, was hit with its 19th Type A violation since January 2005, after a resident returned from an April park outing with a cut on the back of her head that required surgical staples." The Courier-Journal adds, "The contract extension requires Liberty, within four months, to bring Oakwood back into compliance with federal standards at the Department of Justice and the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, or the state can choose a new manager, Health and Family Services Secretary Mark Birdwhistell said in an interview. … Liberty's previous contract to run the center, which houses about 260 people, was worth $9 million for about eight months. The extension will be discussed at next week's meeting of the General Assembly's contract review committee."

High Court Issues Stay In Fight Over California Cross. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 11, 0:20, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "The Supreme Court has issued a stay that will temporarily save a large cross on city property in San Diego. A lower court had ordered removal of the cross at the Mount Soledad National War Memorial, but Justice Anthony Kennedy issued the stay while supporters fight to preserve what they call a national treasure."

The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Perry, 958K) notes Justice Anthony Kennedy "ordered a temporary delay so the city can continue the legal fight to keep the cross. … For 17 years, the city has been fighting a lawsuit by a military veteran and atheist who objects to the cross on public property. Twice, San Diego voters have endorsed keeping the cross, but the courts have struck down a sale of the Point Loma property as rigged in favor of groups promising to keep the cross."

The AP (7/3, Watkins) reports, "Lawyers for San Diegans for the Mount Soledad National War Memorial said in an appeal that they wanted to avoid the 'destruction of this national treasure.'" And "attorneys for the city said the cross was part of a broader memorial that was important to the community." Phil Thalheimer, chairman of the war memorial group, "said the ruling 'borders on divine intervention.'" The New York Times (7/4, Archibold, 1.19M), among other sources, also reports the story.

Democrats Seen As Unlikely To Pursue Texas-Style Redistricting In Other States. The Washington Post (7/5, A7, Babington, 744K) reports, "Democrats cried foul three years ago when Texas Republicans rammed through a highly partisan redistricting to gain an advantage in several House races. Now, a recent Supreme Court ruling that blessed the Texas plan gives Democrats a chance to show that turnabout is fair play." But "early indications are that Democrats will probably resist the temptation to do unto Republicans as Republicans did unto them. … A state-by-state analysis…finds that Democrats' ability and apparent willingness to seize the opportunity left by the high court ruling in favor of the Texas plan are slim." The Post adds, "First, Democrats must compile a list of states where" such a "strategy is feasible. It will be remarkably short. … The result, redistricting experts say, yields perhaps four states where Democrats conceivably could try a mid-decade gerrymander comparable to that of Texas's: Illinois, North Carolina, New Mexico and Louisiana. In each one, however, such a move seems unlikely because of factors that include racial politics, Democratic cautiousness and even a hurricane's impact."

WPost Criticizes Ruling. The Washington Post (7/5, A12, 744K) editorializes, "The court has, perhaps unwittingly, sent one other clear message to politicians of both parties eager to see how many extra seats they can create for their own side: Do it now, while you have the power."

EEOC Says Disabled Workers Make Up Less Than 1% Of Federal Workforce. The Washington Post (7/4, A13, 744K) reports, "The latest numbers from the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission show that disabled workers make up less than 1 percent of the federal workforce despite the Bush administration's efforts to reverse the trend. … Experts are not sure what accounts for the falling federal numbers."

ANTITRUST:

South Korean Court Rejects Microsoft's Stay Request. The AP (7/5) reports, "A court on Tuesday turned down Microsoft Corp.'s request for a stay of sanctions imposed by South Korea's fair trade regulator, the software company said." The AP continues, "Microsoft had asked the Seoul High Court to allow the stay of penalties while the company lodges a legal challenge to the Korea Fair Trade Commission ruling ordering it to provide two separate versions of Windows from Aug. 24. … 'Consistent with the court's decision, Microsoft will, in a timely manner, comply with the KFTC's order,' the Redmond, Washington-based company said in a statement." The AP adds, "Microsoft is pursuing an appeal to the KFTC's ruling in the Seoul High Court. That is unaffected by Tuesday's decision regarding the stay request. … In the statement, Microsoft said that it 'will continue to defend its position in the case through the appeal process.'"

Nissan Stakeholders Question GM Deal. The Wall Street Journal (7/5) reports, "Although Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA appear willing to push forward on an alliance with General Motors Corp., some Nissan investors are expressing skepticism about potential benefits for the Japanese auto maker." The Journal continues, "Meanwhile, French Industry Minister François Loos urged Renault to exercise 'enormous caution' when looking into a potential alliance with GM. 'It's not a done deal; it's an idea,' the minister told French news channel i-Tele. The French government would have a say in any discussions involving Renault because it holds a 15% interest in the company. Renault and Nissan have cross-shareholdings in one another." The Journal adds, "On Monday, the boards of Nissan and Renault cleared the way for their chief executive, Carlos Ghosn, to pursue a three-way alliance with GM. Nissan and Renault left it up to GM to make the first move. GM's board so far has said only that it will take the idea of a three-way alliance 'under advisement.' GM's outside directors are scheduled to have a telephone conference Friday."

EU Approves Inco Purchase Of Falconbridge. The AP (7/5, White) reports, "EU regulators on Tuesday cleared Canadian company Inco Ltd.'s $15 billion purchase of Falconbridge Ltd., a deal that would create the world's largest nickel producer, but joined U.S. regulators in ordering Falconbridge to sell off a Norwegian nickel refinery." The AP continues, "Canada's Falconbridge is at the center of a bidding war between Inco's "friendly" cash-and-stock offer and an unsolicited bid from Anglo-Swiss firm Xstrata PLC. … If Inco's purchase of Falconbridge goes through, Phoenix-based miner Phelps Dodge Corp. plans to acquire the combined company for $40 billion." The AP adds, "Inco is also a takeover target for Teck Cominco Ltd. and that deal is contingent on Inco's offer for Falconbridge falling through. … The European Commission cleared Inco's offer to buy Falconbridge after an in-depth probe confirmed that the tie-up would create antitrust problems on some European nickel and cobalt markets. … But it said it could approve the deal if Falconbridge agreed to sell its Nikkelverk nickel refinery in Kristiansand, Norway, and related assets to London-based LionOre Mining International Ltd."

Stolt-Nielsen Denies Report Of Improper Share Sale. The AP (7/5) reports, "Shipping firm Stolt-Nielsen SA on Monday denied a report that a subsidiary improperly sold treasury shares in 2004 after the U.S. government had suspended its antitrust immunity." The AP continues, "The company called both allegations 'false and misleading.' The Oslo, Norway stock exchange has begun an investigation because of the report, Stolt-Nielsen said. The company said it welcomes the review, and it will cooperate fully." The AP adds, "The controversy centers on a report in the Norwegian business newspaper Dagens Naeringsliv that alleges subsidiary Stolt-Nielsen Transportation Group received a 2003 letter from the U.S. Department of Justice's antitrust division, suspending its amnesty. The report further alleges the subsidiary failed to disclose the status of its amnesty when it sold treasury shares in 2004. … Stolt-Nielsen said the DOJ did not revoke its amnesty; it suspended the subsidiary's obligation to cooperate with the DOJ. The company said it also had previously disclosed the status of its amnesty was 'uncertain,' prior to selling the shares."

Intelsat Finalizes PanAmSat Deal. Broadcasting & Cable (7/5) reports, "Intelsat's $3.2 billion acquisition of PanAmSat has finally closed, positioning the company as the world's largest satellite operator." B&C continues, "The PanAmSat acquisition, first announced in August 2005, has a total transaction value of $6.4 billion. In addition to paying $3.2 billion in cash to acquire PanAmSat's 23 satellites and associated ground facilities, Intelsat also assumed $3.2 billion in PanAmSat debt. The deal has already undergone various layers of regulatory approval, passing Department of Justice antitrust muster in May and gaining the FCC's approval last month." B&C adds, "The scope of the new Intelsat is impressive. SES Global, previously the largest satellite operator, has $1.6 billion in annual revenues and 43 satellites. The new Intelsat has roughly $2 billion in annual revenues, 51 high-power satellites in operation and five more birds under construction, and some 1,800 customers. … While Intelsat has traditionally served international markets such as Africa and Asia and carried more data and voice traffic than television feeds, PanAmSat has been historically strong in covering North and South America and has focused heavily on media customers. By integrating PanAmSat's stable of broadcast and cable customers, Intelsat's revenue mix changes considerably."

Orthopedic Firms Under Antitrust Probe. The AP (7/5) reports, "Shares of major orthopedics makers tumbled Monday after three Warsaw, Indiana-based companies and one based in Michigan said they had received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice about possible antitrust violations." The AP continues, "Biomet, Zimmer Holdings and DuPuy of Warsaw, and Stryker Corporation of Kalamazoo, Michigan, said separately they have recieved subpoenas. All the companies say they are cooperating with investigators." The AP adds, "The subpoenas requested documents from January 2001 until the present. DePuy said search warrants had been executed in connection with the investigation, but did not provide additional details."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Judge Blocks Navy's Use Of Sonar During War Games. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Perry, 958K) reports, "A federal judge today issued a temporary restraining order blocking the Navy from using sonar during war games off Hawaii until it can negotiate with environmentalists who say the sonar will harm whales." On Friday, the Department of Defense "invoked a national security exemption from the Marine Mammal Protection Act to thwart a lawsuit by the Natural Resources Defense Council." But US District Court Judge Florence-Marie Cooper, in Los Angeles, "ruled that the exemption does not cover the National Environmental Policy Act cited in the lawsuit."

The Washington Post (7/4, Kaufman, 744K) reports, "The temporary restraining order is the latest development in the increasingly contentious battle between the Navy and environmental groups over the safety of its mid-frequency, high-intensity sonar. The equipment sends out loud underwater blasts that can detect enemy "quiet" submarines -- which the Navy says are a growing threat -- but also has been tied to the deaths of whales in numerous strandings." The Post adds, "The lawsuit against the sonar component of the maneuvers was filed by NRDC, the International Fund for Animal Welfare, the Cetacean Society International, Ocean Futures Society and Jean-Michel Cousteau."

Hunter Clashes With Democrats, Park Service Over Private Hunts. The Washington Post/AP (7/4, A13, Werner) reported, "Brush-covered and wind-swept, accessible only by boat or plane, Santa Rosa Island seems worlds removed from the crowded Southern California coastline -- let alone Washington, D.C." But the "53,000-acre public island 40 miles from Santa Barbara is in the middle of a political tugging match between a House committee chairman, the National Park Service and congressional Democrats." Under a Federal court settlement "in place for nearly a decade, private deer and elk hunts staged on the island must end by 2011 and the nonnative game must be removed." But Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) "wants to keep the trophy animals on the island and allow military veterans to hunt them." The plan has "drawn protests from the Park Service and Democratic lawmakers, who said hunting blocks public access and interferes with indigenous plants and animals."

EPA Testing Finds Water Unsafe At Quarter Of Beaches Tested. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 12, 2:10, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "As we head into the home stretch on this Fourth day holiday weekend, something to ponder from the Environmental Protection Agency. The EPA tests the water at more than 4,000 beaches a year in this country and it turns out that more than a quarter were dirty enough to warrant warnings or closures last year." NBC (Kosinski) added, "According to the EPA, among the states with the most incidents of bacteria, Louisiana -- every beach tested there last year required an advisory or closing. Hurricane Katrina likely contributed, but the prior year had the same result. A high percentage of Wisconsin and Texas beaches also registered contamination. So where is the bacteria coming from? Scientists say, in a big measure, storm runoff from ever more developed coastlines. But testing nationwide is inconsistent and can take at least a day to register a result. Environmentalists say that's too late to protect people."

Report To Warn Of Possible Threat To Coral Reefs From Global Warming. The Washington Post (7/5, A1, Eilperin, 744K) in a front page article highlights the threat to coral reefs from increasing acidity in the Oceans due to "escalating level of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere." While "scientists and some politicians have just begun to focus on the question of ocean acidification, they describe it as one of the most pressing environmental threats facing Earth." Today a coalition of federal and university scientists will issue a report "describing how carbon dioxide emissions are, in the words of a press release from the National Center for Atmospheric Research and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, "dramatically altering ocean chemistry and threatening corals and other marine organisms that secrete skeletal structures.'"

Political Leaders Accused Of Not Proposing Serious Solutions To Global Warming. Robert Samuelson in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, 744K) faults political leaders for not taking the threat of global warming seriously enough. Population growth and energy needs mean "With modest growth, energy use and greenhouse emissions more than double by 2050." And "keeping annual greenhouse gas emissions constant means that the world must somehow offset these huge increases." Meanwhile "Ambitious U.S. politicians…practice…self-serving hypocrisy. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has a global warming program. Gore counts 221 cities that have 'ratified' Kyoto. Some pledge to curb their greenhouse emissions. None of these programs will reduce global warming. They're public relations exercises and -- if they impose costs -- are undesirable."

Officials Urged To Act "Promptly." Philip Boffey, an editorial board member who writes about science," in an extensive 5,175 word "Talking Points" op-ed in the New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) examines both sides of the debate over whether global warming is occurring. Introducing his analysis, Boffey says the "evidence suggests that humans are altering the atmosphere in ways never before seen. The only question is how damaging the consequences might be, and what can be done to head off or adapt to the worst." While "no definitive answer is yet possible for many of these dramatic events that symbolize the global warming threat in popular discourse. Given the dreadful possibilities that perfectly legitimate worst-case scenarios imply, there would be no excuse for failing to act under any circumstances." After examining the "evidence carefully," Boffey says, "None of this is settled science or sure to happen. But these and other potential risks show what's at stake in the climate debate, and underscore the need to act promptly to head off the worst dangers."

Politicians' Goal Of Energy Independence Seen As Unrealistic. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, A4, Fialka, 2.11M) reports the US "may be addicted to oil, but many of its politicians are addicted to 'energy independence' -- which may be among the least realistic political slogans in American history." Sen. John Kerry, "perhaps warming up for another presidential campaign," recently "gave a speech calling for energy independence and invoking the Fourth of July. 'For the second time in our history, let's declare and win our independence,' he said." Separately, "43 Democratic senators, including Mr. Kerry, launched a program to 'Put America on the road to energy independence by 2020.'" Now, energy experts "across the political spectrum are criticizing politicians' calls for 'energy independence,' saying the goal falls somewhere between pipe dream and economic impossibility." Indeed, the US "is moving rapidly away from energy independence: Oil imports made up 35% of the nation's petroleum supplies in 1973 and 59% in the first four months of 2006, according to the Department of Energy."

Coal-Based Fuel Generates Interest, But Has Drawbacks. The New York Times (7/5, Wald, 1.19M) reports the "coal in the ground in Illinois alone has more energy than all the oil in Saudi Arabia. The technology to turn that coal into fuel for cars, homes and factories is proven. And at current prices, that process could be at the vanguard of a big, new industry." While the potential "has attracted entrepreneurs and government officials," there is "a big catch. Producing fuels from coal generates far more carbon dioxide, which contributes to global warming, than producing vehicle fuel from oil or using ordinary natural gas. And the projects now moving forward have no incentive to capture carbon dioxide beyond the limited amount that they can sell for industrial use." The technology also "requires a large capital investment, and a plant could be rendered useless by a collapse in oil prices."

Departure Of Drilling Rigs From Gulf Of Mexico To Boost Natural Gas, Oil Prices. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Spector, 2.11M) reports the "biggest long-term threat to oil and natural-gas production in the Gulf of Mexico isn't hurricanes. It is the dwindling supply of drilling equipment. Jack-up and deep-water rigs, the massive platforms and ships that drill for oil and gas in the ocean, are leaving the Gulf of Mexico for more lucrative jobs elsewhere." The departures are "expected to accelerate production declines in the Gulf, putting upward pressure on domestic energy prices. The rig exodus is squeezing what was an already tight market for drilling equipment. In 2001, about 148 rigs were in the Gulf. Now, about 90 remain, and more are expected to leave soon." The "rig migration will have the most pronounced effect on natural-gas production and prices because most of the rigs leaving the Gulf are jack-ups used to find gas in shallower waters." The Energy Information Administration, "a government agency that tracks data on the industry, predicts natural gas will cost $10 a million British thermal units by the end of 2007, up from Friday's close of $6.104 in New York Mercantile Exchange futures trading. (Nymex was closed on Monday and Tuesday this week.) Gas cost $2.43 a million BTUs as recently as the end of 2001."

Biodiesel Production Expanding. The New York Times (7/5, O'Keefe, 1.19M) reports biodiesel "is a fuel made by the chemical mixing of alcohol and fats, greases or oils from animals or vegetables. Proponents of this alternative fuel, including" Willie Nelson, "point out that one of Rudolf Diesel's first engines was powered by peanut oil. But by the time the Model T began rolling off Henry Ford's assembly lines, it was powered by petrochemical products, not vegetable oils." Nelson and his wife Annie "have invested in two biodiesel production facilities, including one at Carl's Corner [Texas], where a grand opening took place on Monday. The Dallas Mavericks assistant coach, Del Harris, the former Dallas Mavericks head coach, Don Nelson, and Carl Cornelius's original partner at the truck stop, the Dallas stockbroker, Monk White, are a few of the other investors in the plant, which will be run by Pacific Biodiesel, the company that fuels the Nelsons' cars in Hawaii."

Former Tribal Official Pleads Not Guilty To Making False Statements. The Great Falls Tribune (7/5) reports, "A former Crow tribal official accused of lying to the U.S. Department of Justice has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial." The Tribune continues, "Theodore J. Hogan, 61, of Sedona, Ariz., was indicted on three counts of false statements and pleaded last week before a federal magistrate here. … An indictment alleges that in 2001, 2003 and 2005, Hogan knowingly gave the Department of Justice false information on a form required of people owing restitution." The Tribune adds, "Omissions included his stakes in Ted Hogan and Associates LLC and Raven Resource Development Co.; information about accounts in financial institutions; and information about creditors, the indictment says. Hogan also is accused of not disclosing cash gifts that he gave, in amounts exceeding $500."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Trial To Begin For Reputed Cail Cartel Leader. The Tampa Tribune (7/5) reports the arrest of Joaquin Mario Valencia-Trujillo "climaxed one of the biggest U.S. drug investigations ever. Now jurors in a Tampa federal courtroom will decide the fate of the man authorities say was a leader in the notorious Cali Cartel. … After several delays, jury selection is scheduled to start today in the courtroom of U.S. District Judge Elizabeth Kovachevich. … The trial is expected to last six months."

Task Force To Focus On Combating Violence In Newark. The AP (7/4) writes, "With scores of killings already committed this year in the state's largest city, an anti-violence task force led by federal law enforcement agents said Monday that it will focus solely on Newark to try to end the carnage. The task force plans to dedicate extra officers to patrol Newark and investigate gun, drug and other types of crime. The goal is to prosecute more crimes under federal law, from which there is no parole. … The task force also includes…the Drug Enforcement Administration, the U.S. Marshal's Office and others."

The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (7/4, Mays) reports, "As of [Monday] morning, there were 70 homicides in Essex County this year. Fifty-four of those murders occurred in Newark, said Essex County Prosecutor Paula Dow."

MLB Calls Conseco's Comments On Steroids "Nonsense." According to the Washington Post / AP(7/5, E4), Major League Baseball "took a stand against admitted steroids user Jose Canseco , calling the former slugger's allegations that the league might be playing favorites with some big-name players when it comes to positive drug tests 'complete nonsense.' Canseco, who last played in the majors for the White Sox in 2001, returned to professional baseball with the independent San Diego Surf Dawgs on Monday in Chico, Calif. Before the game, he made critical comments about how baseball officials are handling the new, stricter steroids policy and said a 'cleanup' in the commissioner's office is needed."

Taliban Insurgents Seen As Profiting From Large Afghanistan Opium Harvest. In an editorial, the Financial Times (7/5) says the NATO mission, "with 3,300 British troops at its heart, is in the process of doubling its contingent, assuming unified command of allied and US troops, and moving into the southern Pashtun heartland of the Taliban. … But the force is already clearly overstretched, fighting a resurgent Taliban that is growing in confidence. The insurgents, moreover, can draw on the revenues of Afghanistan's largest ever opium harvest, and tactical alliances with narco-warlords."

The Financial Times (7/5, Morarjee) also reports, "As the harvest season sets in, recent estimates by western officials suggest that Helmand's poppy crop may more than double to 77,000 hectares, up from 26,500 in 2005." The Times adds, "The $1bn (€770m, £550m) campaign to eradicate the crop had been 'an absolute disaster", a top western counter-narcotics official said.

British Soldiers Killed. The Belfast Telegraph (7/3) reports, "Two more British soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan, as Western officials there admit that the country is about to produce its largest ever poppy harvest. … The deaths, on Saturday, bring the number of Britons killed in the past three weeks to five."

Karzai Pushes Kandahar's Pomegranates. The Indian Express Newspapers writes, (7/3) President Hamid Karzai "boasts that Kandahar's pomegranates are the best in the world. … The president is also pushing the desert province's farmers to rip up their illegal opium poppies and replant the pomegranates and other fruits that Afghanistan was renowned for until decades of war kicked off with the 1979 Soviet invasion and left the farming sector in tatters."

IMMIGRATION:

House Republicans To Kick Off Immigration Hearings On Wednesday. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "Starting with a hearing in San Diego on Wednesday, House members are launching a summerlong sparring match over how best to untangle and reorder the nation's thicket of immigration laws." Meanwhile, Democrats and Republicans "will wage a second struggle — to see which party can best wring a political advantage from the hearings as the November elections draw closer." The San Diego hearing "is a stage for Republicans to highlight the dangers of cross-border smuggling. They will argue that the Senate immigration bill would not adequately protect against either threat." In Philadelphia on Wednesday, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) "will counter the House inquiry with his own hearing defending the Senate's broader approach to immigration." Congressional hearings are "usually held to explore an issue and search for solutions. House Republicans have been frank in saying that their hearings, in July and August, are a negotiating tool with two goals: to highlight perceived flaws in the Senate bill and to build public support for their own enforcement-only legislation."

Long Island Contractors Have Conflicting Views Of Immigrant Laborers. The Washington Post (7/4, A4, Garcia, 744K) reports on differing views in the construction industry of immigrant day laborers. Robert Stokes "doesn't buy the argument that immigrants do work that native-born Americans won't." Stokes said, "I get people calling all the time -- someone gets laid off, they need work." He "limits work hires to friends and family." The Post adds contractor Tom Lippolt said, "They're filling in the gaps. It seems like all the kids want to be stockbrokers. We don't have young people coming in to fill these places, all these trade jobs." The Post adds when Stokes and Lippolt "were growing up, Long Island was anchored by a mix of blue-collar white men like them and mid-level professionals. Their families were part of the post-World War II exodus from the city, chasing the dream of suburban life. But the heart of Long Island is different now." White men "on Long Island in the financial and banking industries outnumber those in construction and the trades by 3 to 1, according to a recent Census study. And the blue-collar work has browned. Spanish-speaking immigrants -- legal and illegal -- now take on manual labor jobs. But if they are needed, they are not always welcome."

Bush Seen As Moving Toward "Enforcement-First" Approach On Immigration. The New York

Times (7/5, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "On the eve of nationwide hearings that could determine the fate of his immigration bill, President Bush is signaling a new willingness to negotiate with House Republicans in an effort to revise the stalled legislation before Election Day." The Times adds "Republicans both inside and outside the White House say Mr. Bush, who has long insisted on comprehensive reform, is now open to a so-called enforcement-first approach that would put new border security programs in place before creating a guest worker program or path to citizenship for people living in the United States illegally." Candi Wolff, the White House director of legislative affairs, said, "He thinks that this notion that you can have triggers is something we should take a close look at, and we are." She was "referring to the idea that guest worker and citizenship programs would be triggered when specific border security goals had been met, a process that could take two years." The "shift is significant because Mr. Bush has repeatedly said he favors legislation like the Senate's immigration bill, which establishes border security, guest worker and citizenship programs all at once. The enforcement-first approach puts Mr. Bush one step closer to the House, where Republicans are demanding an enforcement-only measure. … In a sign of that willingness, the White House last week invited a leading conservative proponent of an enforcement-first bill, Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, to present his ideas to Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney in the Oval Office."

Albanians Caught Up In Deportation Mess. Knight Ridder (7/5, Audi) reports, "Mateo Kraja was repairing a house June 2 when he received a frantic phone call from his Madison Heights, Mich., home. Police had arrived, his mother-in-law said. Kraja sped home. The men were not police, but immigration agents there to enforce a deportation order. They arrested Kraja immediately." Knight Ridder continues, "Now Kraja, 45, who has spent seven years seeking political asylum from his native Albania, sits in the Calhoun County jail in Battle Creek, Mich., part of the latest federal round ups of thousands of illegal immigrants across the country. This month, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement announced it had picked up more than 2,000 immigrants nationwide for deportation. In one four-day sweep in Detroit in late May and early June, 63 immigrants were rounded up, including Kraja and 24 other Albanians." Knight Ridder adds, "As the nation grapples with immigration reform, Kraja's arrest after an exhausting journey through the U.S. immigration system reveals a complex, often subjective process. It also underscores the difficulty in reforming a system that has presided over an influx of 1.3 million legal and illegal immigrants a year since the early 1990s, and labored for decades under backlogs and politics. … It's a system that frequently awards residency to some members of a family, while denying it to others. Kraja's parents, in-laws, sister, nephew and brother-in-law - anti-Communists who fled the same Albanian town - were awarded residency in the United States. Kraja, his wife and son were not." Knight Ridder notes, "Federal officials have called men like Kraja fugitives, and they touted the arrests as a sweep of dangerous criminals who have hidden from U.S. authorities. They promise more arrests to come. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, meanwhile, is conducting a nationwide review of immigration judges, after criticism of their conduct and decisions in asylum cases."

TAX:

Yagman Pleads "Presumed Innocent" In California To Money Laundering, Tax Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Mozingo) reports, "In characteristic form, Stephen Yagman, the pugnacious civil rights attorney who has challenged police conduct for nearly three decades, declared, 'Presumed innocent,' Monday when asked how he pleaded to federal charges of tax evasion, bankruptcy fraud and money laundering. … 'Pleading "not guilty" turns the presumption of innocence on its head in a way semantically favorable to the prosecution,' Yagman told U.S. Magistrate Rosalyn M. Chapman in Los Angeles federal court. 'Therefore, I plead, "Presumed innocent."' … Chapman recorded the plea as 'not guilty.'" The Times adds, "Yagman called the 19 counts against him 'politically motivated, retaliatory charges.' … His attorneys have accused the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service of targeting Yagman because of two 'successful battles' he won against the agencies, including a $650,000 judgment against the IRS. … U.S. attorney's spokesman Thom Mrozek has refused to say what prompted the investigation, but denied that it was 'motivated by political retribution or any other improper motive.'"

Iowa Latino Tax Return Complaints Under Investigation. The Des Moines Register (7/4) reports, "It could take months for authorities to complete an investigation into complaints by several Latino families about a Des Moines woman who prepared federal income tax forms, a Des Moines police official said Monday." The Register continues, "Sgt. Joe Gonzalez said police are working with Polk County prosecutors to get to the bottom of numerous families' complaints against Tamara Aguilar. Dozens of Hispanics have alleged that Aguilar charged immigrants high fees to obtain federal taxpayer identification numbers, and promised customers they would receive tax refunds that never arrived, according to Gonzalez and Latino groups." The Register adds, "Aguilar, who has not been charged, has said she has done nothing wrong and only followed her clients' instructions. She told The Des Moines Register last week that some of her clients are complaining prematurely because refunds have not yet arrived. … The investigation was prompted by a Des Moines woman who in June complained to the Iowa Division of Latino Affairs about Aguilar, saying the tax preparer told her she could claim as dependents relatives in Mexico who were ineligible. The agency posted information on its Web site about the complaints against Aguilar. … Federal authorities are increasingly hammering on a growing number of tax preparers who cheat recent immigrants. The U.S. Department of Justice has filed charges against at least a half-dozen people in the first half of this year for allegedly swindling people unfamiliar with U.S. tax laws."

WSJournal Touts Tax Cuts By Democratic Governors. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) editorializes, "Democrats in Congress should get out more -- out of Washington, that is, and into state capitals, where some of their fellow party members are embracing tax cuts, and even supply-side logic in the bargain." Recently Rhode Island "adopted one of the most sweeping pro-growth tax reforms in any state in recent years" In addition to Democratic governors like Arizona's Gov. Janet Napolitano and Oklahoma's Brad Henry who agreed to cutting tax rates, New Mexico's Bill Richardson "has cut the state's top income tax rate to 4.9% from 8.2% and cut the capital gains tax in half." The Journal "asked Mr. Richardson how he thought his party could regain its competitiveness with the GOP on the national level. His answer is good advice for Democrats everywhere: 'We have to be the party of growth and the American dream, not the party of redistribution.'"

Bill Would Raise Threshold For Penalties On Estimated Tax Payments. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Wells, 2.11M) reports a bill "moving through Congress could save taxpayers more than $100 million a year in estimated-tax-payment penalties. The Senate Finance Committee last week approved numerous taxpayer protections as part of a wide-ranging bill that would also repeal a 3% excise tax on local telephone calls. With broad bipartisan support, the election-year tax-cut measure has a good chance of reaching President Bush's desk, analysts say." One provision – "a tax break valued at an estimated $1.3 billion over the next decade -- would boost the threshold at which taxpayers are hit with estimated-tax penalties. Hundreds of thousands of taxpayers stand to benefit from the change, including wage earners who reaped a significant capital gain and didn't adjust their withholding taxes or make estimated-tax payments to account for the windfall."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Kennedy Questions Bush Judicial Nominee Over Male-Only Club Membership. The Washington Times (7/5, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Just six months after quitting the all-male social club to which he belonged for 50 years, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy is questioning one of President Bush's nominees to the federal bench about his membership in an all-male dining club." Documents "provided to the Senate Judiciary Committee and obtained by The Washington Times show that Mr. Holmes belonged to the Men's Dinner Club of Oklahoma City but quit after expressing interest in becoming a federal judge." Holmes told the committee "in writing that he never perceived the dining club to harbor any bias toward women but he resigned to clear up any appearances of impropriety."

Roberts Court's First Term Marked By Acrimony. The Legal Times (7/5, Mauro) reports, "If this was the new look of harmony and consensus at the Supreme Court, it needs some work. .. There, on the final day of the Court's term, June 29, was Justice John Paul Stevens, calmly defiant as he read from his landmark opinion in the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detainee case Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. The 73-page ruling against the Bush administration's military commissions thoroughly trashed an appeals court ruling joined by the man sitting next to Stevens, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., when he was on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit." The Times continues, "Then came Justice Antonin Scalia, reading his dissent with a mournful tone of disgust, as if he were disowning a child. 'I vigorously dissent,' he said, pointedly omitting the word 'respectfully,' which justices usually recite in dissent, even if they don't mean it. Justice Clarence Thomas was next, also in dissent, and he joked bitterly that the Court was more willing to heed the Army Corps of Engineers' definition of navigable waters than it was to defer to the president of the United States in wartime. … So much for unanimity at the Supreme Court." The Times adds, "A term that began with hope and at least limited evidence that a new era of consensus had begun dissolved in its final weeks into a blizzard of quarrelsome writing that clarified little and robbed some decisions of their precedential force. In some of the Court's most important rulings, justices tossed consensus aside and penned lengthy opinions, partial concurrences, and dissents that left readers crying 'Uncle' or pleading, 'Can't they all get along?' … Several factors, including the increased importance of Justice Anthony Kennedy as the Court's swing vote, appear to explain the messy finale. And some think the June disarray may just be a preview of next term, when the Court will face even thornier cases on race-conscious public school policies and abortion."

Columnist Warns Supreme Court One Justice Away From Conservative Majority. Ruth Marcus in her column in the Washington Post (7/5, A13, 744K) warns that while Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy has recently been characterized as emerging "as the new Sandra Day O'Connor: commanding the power to control a closely divided court," that characterization "misses the bigger point: This is a court on the brink. Kennedy plays a pivotal role, but his star turn is likely to be brief. And a court with Kennedy at the center is not a securely centrist court." That's because a more conservative court is "just one liberal retirement away." It "is a court that could be a single vote away -- if that -- from crippling affirmative action; curtailing, if not abolishing, abortion rights; dramatically lowering the wall of separation between church and state; and limiting congressional authority under the Constitution's commerce clause to protect the environment and enact other laws of national sweep."

State Department Report Details Gifts To CIA Employees. The Washington Post (7/5, A11, Geraghty, 744K) reports "an unidentified foreign leader" bought "the CIA director a set of five Bahranian 22-karat gold coins, estimated to be worth $1,500. The State Department's Office of the Chief of Protocol detailed that gift, given in July 2004, and dozens of others last month in a public notice of gifts from foreign governments to U.S. officials." Since 1978, Federal employees "have been required to file reports with their agencies detailing gifts worth more than $305 received from foreign government sources. Employees are permitted to keep gifts worth less that that; gifts worth more are considered gifts to the agency, although the employee has the option of purchasing the item." The only CIA employee "identified in the disclosure announcement is former director George J. Tenet. On Jan. 14, 2004, Tenet accepted from an unnamed foreign donor a 16-inch bronze statuette of an Arab man helping a woman from a bath, mounted on a black-slate base, valued at $300."

FTC Reports Sharp Increase In Complaints About Debt Collection Tactics. The New York Times (7/5, Chan) reports the "rise in American consumer debt has been accompanied by a sharp increase in complaints about aggressive and sometimes unscrupulous tactics by debt collection agencies, a phenomenon that has government regulators increasingly concerned." In April, the Federal Trade Commission, "which enforces the federal law that governs debt collection practices, reported that it received 66,627 complaints against third-party debt collectors last year — more than against any other industry, and nearly six times the number in 1999." The agencies "often buy the debt from more established companies for pennies on the dollar and seek to collect even if the debt has been paid or was never valid to begin with. Sometimes, consumers pay up simply because they are worn down by threats from the companies and fear damage to their credit rating." Robert J. Hobbs, "the deputy director of the National Consumer Law Center, an advocacy group based in Boston, attributed the rise in complaints to three trends: the rapid growth in the number of collection agencies, the tightening of bankruptcy-protection laws last year and the record level of consumer debt, now totaling $2.2 trillion, complicated by rising interest rates and stagnant personal incomes. Identity theft and Internet fraud are also cited as factors."

Former White House Adviser Allen Negotiating Plea Deal. The Washington Post (7/4, B6, Londoio, 744K) reports former White House adviser Claude A. Allen "appears to be negotiating a plea deal with prosecutors in Montgomery County on theft charges filed in March." Assistant State's Attorney John D. Lalos and Allen's lawyers filed a motion "for a postponement, indicating that 'the parties have been working on a disposition regarding this matter and are hopeful that it will be resolved without the necessity of a trial.'" Allen, 45, "was charged with shoplifting more than $5,000 worth of merchandise from Target and Hecht's stores by obtaining refunds for items he was seen picking up at the stores, using receipts for identical items he had bought earlier."

Bush Celebrates 60th Birthday. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Neuman, 958K) reports President Bush "jokes with audiences about how his eligibility for early Social Security payments, at age 62, 'just happens to come in 2008.' Describing his age as 'a personal crisis,' he muses aloud about how he 'used to think 60 was old…. Now I think it's young, don't you?'" The Times adds, "Every day this year, according to the U.S. Census Bureau, 7,918 people will turn 60. On Thursday, it's Bush's turn and Sylvester Stallone's — and they're joined throughout 2006 by such celebrities as Suzanne Somers, Sally Field, Diane Keaton, Tommy Lee Jones, Cher, Steven Spielberg, Susan Sarandon, Donald Trump and Dolly Parton. Among political names, Bush's wife, Laura, and his White House predecessor, Bill Clinton, also enter their seventh decade this year." Bush's birthday "will be celebrated today — two days early — as 150 friends and family join him at the White House for festivities and fireworks. For his presidency, the Big Six-O signals another milestone likely to draw the attention of friends and foes alike." Bush "himself has resisted all interviews on the topic — with the exception of appearing with his wife on CNN's 'Larry King Live,' which will be taped on Thursday for broadcast that night." Aides have "offered minimal details about today's celebration. Last year, the White House pastry chef baked a chocolate cake topped with a three-dimensional chocolate mountain bike. There's been no word on this year's theme."

USA Today (7/5, 2.31M) reports President Bush "hits a milestone Thursday familiar to some of his fellow baby boomers: He turns 60." In "some ways, the commander in chief -- the father of two recent college graduates -- epitomizes the post-World War II generation, as does predecessor Bill Clinton, who will turn 60 on Aug. 19." Cheryl Russell, author of Demographics of the U.S.: Trends and Projections, said, "Bush and Clinton, both leading-edge boomers, show the diversity of opinions and philosophies of the baby boom generation."

The Washington Post (7/5, A3, Baker, 744K) reports while Bush "celebrated the nation's 230th birthday" at Fort Bragg, "others began celebrating his 60th." A group of Fort Bragg soldiers "serenaded the president with 'Happy Birthday' and presented him with a white cake emblazoned with a frosted U.S. flag and two candles, '6' and '0.'" Bush "then flew home to the first lady's party, a relatively low-key event with about 150 old friends, relatives, close advisers and Yale University schoolmates in the executive mansion."

Cheney Says He Hasn't Driven In Seven Years. The Washington Times (7/4, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Vice President Dick Cheney reveals something rather unusual: He's not driven a car in seven years. 'It's a bummer,' Mr. Cheney remarked before the start of the Pepsi 400 NASCAR Nextel Cup Series race at the Daytona International Speedway. 'The morning the president -- then governor -- announced that I was going to be his running mate, the Secret Service showed up outside my door, and I haven't driven since.'"

Price For Destroying Army's Chemical Weapons Tops $28 Billion. The Washington Post (7/4, A5, Eilperin, 744K) reports, "In 1987, the Army estimated it would cost $2 billion to dispose of the 27,768 metric tons of chemical weapons in its stockpile. Today, the price has mushroomed to $28 billion, and the military is about a third of the way through the job. An array of problems -- including technical challenges and protests from community activists concerned about the impact of burning the weapons -- has dogged the progress." The Army "is incinerating weapons in Alabama, Arkansas, Oregon and Utah, and has finished work on Johnston Atoll in the Pacific. Under pressure from activists, the Pentagon has opted for chemically neutralizing warfare agents in Colorado, Indiana, Kentucky and Maryland. It has completed work in Maryland, but plant construction in Colorado and Kentucky will only begin this year."

Support Grows For Provision Forcing White House To Pay For Wars Within Regular Budget. The Hill (7/5, Tiron) reports, "Some senior House defense authorizers and appropriators are welcoming a Senate provision in a defense bill that would force the White House to pay for the Iraq and Afghanistan operations within the regular Pentagon budget, not as unforeseen emergencies in supplemental spending bills." The provision "could become a critical issue in Senate and House conference negotiations for the 2007 defense authorization because the House version does not contain such a measure." Yet, while the provision "is gaining support among members of the House Armed Services Committee, military leaders and some defense lobbyists are balking at the idea." Army and Marine Corps leaders as well "as the defense industry fear that modernization programs may take a hit if the Pentagon had to pay out of its base budget to repair war-torn equipment and not out of emergency funds, as it has done since 2001."

Members Of Congress Tapped Credit Lines For At Least $4 Million In 2005. The Hill (7/5, Schor) reports members of Congress "reported open credit lines totaling a minimum of $4 million during 2005, most of them tied to home-equity loans or lines of credit, according to a survey of financial disclosures conducted by The Hill." But as "lawmakers keep a watchful eye on interest rates and consider legislation that would increase homeowners' ability to tap into their property value, the data show that lawmakers are less likely than their average constituent to hold open lines of credit." And, amid "the outcry over recent data-security breaches that exposed untold thousands of federal as well as private-sector employees to the risk of identity theft, few members reported checking on the safety of their credit reports."

Congress Returns From July 4th Recess Next Week With Much To Do. The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Chaddock, 61K) reports members of Congress "return next week to a long list of incompletes that could shape fall elections." Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, said, "Like last year, all will get done in July." The Monitor adds that what is "making that difficult is that, unlike last year, the rifts within GOP ranks on the bills yet to be completed are often as daunting as those between Republicans and Democrats." For Democrats, "the to-do list is grist for campaign speeches about the Republican 'do-nothing' Congress: no lobby reform, no immigration reform, not even a budget for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1." But Republicans "say big-ticket issues are still in play in the three critical weeks before August recess - typically the last window for legislating in an election year. And they insist that's enough time to wrap up at least some of them." The Monitor adds the top issues include immigration; the Voting Rights Act; the estate state tax; lobbying reform; and Internet access.

Price Of Capitol Visitors' Center Balloons To Twice Original Cost. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 6, 2:10, Cochran, 8.78M) reported Congress "promised" the planned Capitol visitors' center "would be finished in 2004. But 2004 came and went. And the hole just got bigger. As the years passed, some in Congress tried to shift the blame on to the Capitol architect. But a big part of the problem was that Congress kept adding goodies, such as another $85 million to expand their own offices. What, you may ask, does that have to do with the visitors' center? Well, we wondered that, too. And we wondered whether the center was ever going to be finished. Not to worry, says Congress. It will open September 2006, at the latest. But now, we learn it won't open until next July at the earliest, a year from now." Steve Ellis, Taxpayers for Common Sense: "You have right at the doorstep of the Capitol, a boondoggle. A deep hole where we are just throwing cash, year after year after year." Cochran: "The center is three years behind schedule, and will cost more than $500 million, twice what it was supposed to cost. It's 'Your Money.'"

Despite Foam Concerns, Discovery Launches Successfully. The New York Times (7/5, A1, Schwartz, Leary, 1.19M) reports in a front page story that space shuttle Discovery "split a nearly cloudless sky with thunder and fire on Tuesday afternoon and roared safely into orbit. The liftoff, right on schedule at 2:38 p.m., was the start of a 13-day flight that is the first in a year for the diminished shuttle fleet as NASA continues its efforts to resume more frequent human spaceflight." The Discovery is "to rendezvous on Thursday with the International Space Station, where it is carrying equipment, supplies and a fresh astronaut for the station's crew." But "this is also considered the second and final test flight for the shuttle fleet since the loss of the Columbia and its seven astronauts in 2003, and the Discovery's ascent was scrutinized for the kind of liftoff debris that caused that disaster." Officials said "insulating foam broke away from five spots on the external fuel tank and a solid rocket booster, some with several pieces of foam. But none occurred within the time that NASA considers hazardous, and only one piece might be larger than the allowable size."

The networks all also reported on the Discovery launch. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 3, 3:45, Moran, 8.78M) reported, "It was the first manned mission ever to launch on the Fourth of July, and only the second since the Columbia disaster." ABC (L. Stark) added, "The mission will last 13 days. The astronauts are delivering 5,000 pounds of supplies to the space station, including food, water and clothes. And in the next hours and days, NASA will continue to scrutinize all the photos and the video from the launch, trying to make absolutely sure that the shuttle sustained no serious damage."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 3, 2:10, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "NASA has spent much of the afternoon also trying to resolve another potential problem. One of the astronauts onboard taking videotaped pictures of the external tank saw what he thought looked like a large piece of insulation with straps floating away from the orbiter. Perhaps it came from the orbiter, he thought. Now NASA engineers have taken a look at his videotape and they are fairly convinced it was ice."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 4, 2:45, Costello, 9.87M) reported, "NASA engineers are looking at video and still imagery of the shuttle as it took off, as well as the external fuel tank, looking for any signs of debris falling off."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/4, Zarella) reported Tuesday's launch "is only the second launch of a space shuttle from the Kennedy Space Center in some three and a half years, Columbia three and a half years ago, and Discovery a year ago." Since the launch "we have had an opportunity to take a closer look at some of those isolation cameras on the external tank, you know, foam being the big issue. The foam that fell off the external tank during Columbia and again in the Discovery mission a year ago. Very difficult to see, but along the bottom side of that image, along that pipeline on the left-hand side of the external tank, it appears there are tiny pieces of some sort of material that are falling away, breaking away from the external tank in those isolation shots."

NYTimes Greets Discovery Launch With "Restrained Jubilation." The New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) says in an editorial, "The apparently successful launch of the shuttle Discovery is cause for restrained jubilation. The astronauts are not out of danger yet. Only further inspections will tell whether their fragile vehicle sustained any significant damage on ascent." The "striking thing about this shuttle flight is that the most important task is simply survival — of both the vehicle and the astronauts who are riding in it."

WPost Cites Hastert As Example Of Need For Earmarking Reform. The Washington Post (7/5, A12, 744K) in an editorial raise the question of whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert personally benefited from Federal funding targeting two highway projects near property he sold for a $2 million profit. The Post says it is unlikely he was "taking care of himself" but says while it is not a political scandal "so far," it "is a cautionary tale about the potential for abuse. With the explosion of earmarks in recent years comes the temptation for lawmakers to use them for personal gain." For example, "Rep. Ken Calvert (R-Calif.) doubled his investment on a four-acre plot after snagging $9.5 million to build a freeway interchange and spur commercial development near the Air Force base about 16 miles away. Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) got $1.28 million for street improvements near a development he co-owns." The Post concludes, "Mixing real estate investing and earmark pushing makes for risky political business.. … This is yet another argument for cracking down on earmarking gone wild."

Studies Predict Higher Medical Costs. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Mincer, 2.11M) reports Americans "should expect to pay more for medical costs whether they are employed or retired, according to two new studies. The reports, by Milliman Inc. and Watson Wyatt Worldwide, show that health-care costs are still rising at a fast pace -- despite slowing from double-digit rates in recent years -- and that businesses expect to curtail or limit retiree medical benefits." The "average annual medical cost for a family of four participating in a preferred provider organization, or PPO, program is up 9.6% from 2005 to $13,382 in 2006, according to Milliman, a consulting and actuarial firm that released its second annual study Thursday."

Economists Forecast 2.9% Growth In Second Half Of 2006. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "Neither resurgent inflation nor a housing slowdown is likely to throw the economy completely off track, but they will make life a lot tougher for Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, economists said in a new survey." The Wall Street Journal's latest survey of 56 forecasters, "conducted in mid-June, suggests an economy at a crossroads, with growth looking set to slow but inflation accelerating." The Journal adds "the consensus forecast of the 56 economists is that growth in real gross domestic product -- a broad measure of economic activity, adjusted for inflation -- will ease to an annualized 2.9% in the second half of 2006. That compares with an annualized 5.6% in the first quarter and an expected 2.8% in the second quarter, which would bring first-half growth to about 4.2%. By the first half of next year, growth would cool further to 2.7%, the slowest rate since mid-2003. … The forecasters expect nonfarm businesses to add an average of about 140,000 jobs in each of the next 12 months."

The Wall Street Journal (7/5, A1, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "For several years, Allen Sinai, chief global economist at Boston-based consulting firm Decision Economics, has argued that the current expansion -- with global demand pushing up oil prices -- looks a lot more like the classic business cycles of the 1970s and 1980s than the exceptional one of the 1990s, when various factors -- from globalization to smaller government deficits -- helped keep inflation in check. In the Journal's December survey, that conviction led Mr. Sinai to forecast that consumer prices would rise sharply in the first half of 2006 and wind up 3.5% higher in May 2006 than a year earlier. … Now, Mr. Sinai thinks inflation likely will begin to feed on itself, as workers and suppliers demand higher wages and input prices and companies pass those cost increases on to consumers. As a result, he expects the Federal Reserve to slam harder on the brakes, increasing its target for short-term interest rates from the current 5.25% to 6.25% by mid-2007, a level that no other economists think likely and that many believe would be high enough to trigger a recession."

Manufacturing Sector Grows At Slower Rate Than Forecast. The Washington Post (7/4, D3, Powell, 744K) reports the US manufacturing sector "expanded at a slower rate than expected in June and construction spending plunged in May, reinforcing the belief of some analysts that increasing sluggishness in the economy will prompt the Federal Reserve to pause at last in its credit-tightening regime." The Institute for Supply Management "said Monday that its manufacturing index registered 53.8 in June, slightly below the 54.4 reading in May. It was the slowest growth reading since the gauge registered 53.5 last August. Analysts had forecast a June index of 55 to 56." Meanwhile, the Commerce Department "reported that building activity fell 0.4 percent in May to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.206 trillion, after a 0.2 percent decline in April. It was the first time in more than three years that construction spending had fallen for two consecutive months."

Stock Markets Make Pre-Holiday Gains. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 10, 0:10, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street, the markets ended a shortened, pre-holiday session on a positive note. The Dow posted a gain of nearly 78 points [to close at 11,228.02]. The NASDAQ closed up more than 18 points [to close at 2,190.43]."

Gas Prices Spike For Fourth Of July Travel. ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 8, :15, Moran, 8.78M) reported, "And if you're driving this Fourth of July, you'll be paying more to fill up. The Energy Department reported today that the average price of a gallon of gas is $2.93. That's up 7 cents in just the past week and up 71 cents more than a year ago."

High Oil, Gas Prices Produce Drilling Frenzy In Wyoming. The New York Times (7/4, McInnis, 1.19M) reports that surging oil and gas prices "have ignited a drilling frenzy" in Wyoming. The drilling surge "is producing a tidy income for Clear Creek [Ranch], even though the ranch owns only a tiny percentage of the oil and gas rights in the field, said Rob Hendry, who owns the ranch with his wife and two sons. Royalties are about $4,000 a month, or roughly what it costs Clear Creek to cover higher prices for gasoline and diesel fuel used to raise cattle on the 180,000-acre spread. A second, larger revenue stream comes from another oil-related business that Mr. Hendry created, a construction company that uses earth movers, bulldozers and other heavy equipment to level sections of ranch land to accommodate a moveable drilling rig that is as tall as a 15-story building."

GOP, Democrats Believe They Have The Edge Heading Into Midterms. The Washington Times (7/4, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Democrats are sure they have Republicans cornered and reeling heading into this fall's elections, but Republicans are overjoyed by the campaign, believing that it simply reinforces their own message of being tough on terrorism and illegal aliens." A second Washington Times piece (7/4, Fagan) says "lawmakers from both sides of the aisle are staking out issues this election year that they think resonate with Americans and portray the other party as out of touch." While "Democrats have seized upon the issues of a minimum wage increase and the Medicare prescription drug program," Republicans "are pushing a 'values' agenda that includes banning flag burning and protecting the Pledge of Allegiance."

Lieberman Will Run As Independent If He Loses Primary. The New York Times (7/4, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut said on Monday that he would run as an independent Democratic candidate if he loses the state Democratic primary next month. The announcement by Mr. Lieberman, a political moderate and longtime party leader seeking his fourth term, underscores the increasing vulnerability he feels over his support for the Iraq war."

NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 7, 0:30, Curry, 9.87M) reported Lieberman "is a staunch defender of the war in Iraq and faces a tough primary challenge from anti-war businessman Ned Lamont. Lamont's candidacy has drawn nationwide support on the Internet.

The AP (7/4, Haigh) reports, "Once a Democratic stalwart and the party's 2000 vice presidential nominee, Lieberman has fallen into disfavor from some Democrats for his support of the Iraq war and his perceived closeness to President Bush." He has also been targeted "by liberal blogs, which have given a boost to his challenger and bill the race as a chance to send a message to the Democratic establishment." The ActBlue.com Web site, "which helps Democrats set up fundraising campaigns for candidates, has helped bring challenger Ned Lamont nearly $233,000 in contributions as of last week. Lamont also received about $70,000 in contributions from the liberal group Democracy for America by way of the Internet."

The Washington Post (7/4, Murray, 744K) reports, "A Quinnipiac University survey conducted in early June showed Lamont gaining ground against Lieberman. Among all Democrats, Lieberman led Lamont 57 percent to 32 percent, compared with 65 percent to 19 percent in a Quinnipiac poll taken a month earlier." The margin "was slimmer among likely Democratic primary voters, including undecided voters who are leaning toward a candidate, with Lamont trailing the incumbent 55 percent to 40 percent, the June poll found." The Hill (7/4, Kaplan) also reports the development on its website.

CNN's The Situation Room (7/3, Bash) reported, "Democratic leaders have been scrambling to figure out exactly how to play this. They're in a very tough position, because they say it's their instinct and even priority to protect the Democratic incumbent, but it's also their responsibility to follow the regular rules of the road. And that usually means when there is a primary, and the party supports a winner, then the national leadership supports that winner. So, in the meantime, what we are seeing today from Democrats on the national level is, that they have decided on the political equivalent of kick the can. Senate Minority leader Harry Reid, through spokesman Jim Manley, would only confirm that the senator spoke with Senator Lieberman and he says that he respects his decision." CNN's The Situation Room (7/3, King) reported, "Aome political analysts I spoke with said really this is unprecedented, in their view, that they cannot remember someone doing this in a major race like this."

In an analysis piece titled "Senator's Plan B Puts Democrats In A Bind," the New York Times (7/4, Healy, Medina, 1.19M) reports, "Karen Finney, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, said the party would support its nominee this fall, whether it is Mr. Lieberman or Mr. Lamont. Another party official, Donna Brazile, said yesterday that she supported Mr. Lieberman's candidacy but was concerned that his contingency plan would 'hurt more than help his candidacy.' She explained: 'I think Joe Lieberman could have really scored with the Democratic voters if he'd said that he was a Democrat, would run as a Democrat and would honor the wishes of the Democratic voters.'" Lieberman's "troubles," adds the Times, "reflect the force of the evolving antiwar movement. His support for the Bush administration's Iraq policy initially galvanized the opposition of left-leaning Internet habitués, focusing national attention on Mr. Lamont as a viable antiwar alternative to the senator."

Lieberman Defends His Loyalty To Democratic Party. Sen. Joe Lieberman was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (7/3) about critics who say he is putting self preservation over his loyalty to the Democratic party. Lieberman said, "I would definitely put my loyalty to the Democratic Party and my service to the Democratic Party up against most of those who are saying those things. I am a loyal Democrat and I am going to work my heart out to get the Democratic nomination for the US Senate this year and the primary on August 8th." Lieberman added, "I have a loyalty higher than that to my party. That is to my state and my country. And I feel so deeply that I can do a better job for my state and my country than either the Democratic or Republican opponents against me that I'm prepared, if necessary, to take my fight to November as a petitioning Democratic candidate."

Hillary Clinton Says She'll Back Democratic Nominee. The Washington Post/AP (7/5, A2, Press) reports, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), a longtime supporter of Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, said Tuesday that she will not back the Connecticut Democrat's bid for reelection if he loses their party's primary. 'I've known Joe Lieberman for more than 30 years. I have been pleased to support him in his campaign for reelection, and hope that he is our party's nominee,' the former first lady said in a statement issued by aides. 'But I want to be clear that I will support the nominee chosen by Connecticut Democrats in their primary,' Clinton added." She added, "I believe in the Democratic Party, and I believe we must honor the decisions made by Democratic primary voters."

WSJournal Applauds Lieberman. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) editorializes, "Lieberman's announcement Monday that he'll run as an independent if he loses the Democratic nomination is a remarkable commentary on the mind of the Democratic Party these days. … Connecticut's Senate race may turn out to be the most important election of the year. If Democrats drive Mr. Lieberman from their ranks, they will be sending Americans a message that George Soros and MoveOn.org dominate their party. This is all the more reason to applaud Mr. Lieberman for declaring that he won't easily be pushed from the Senate, whatever party banner he has to wave."

Four Influential Left-Wing Bloggers Jointly Endorsing Democratic Challengers. The Hill (7/5, Kaplan) reports, "Four of the most powerful left-wing political bloggers have developed a new joint strategy to steer financial support from the 'netroots,' or Internet-based activists, to Democratic challengers, many of whom they know have little chance of winning their mid-term election races." Markos Moulitsas Zúniga of Daily Kos, Matt Stoller and Chris Bowers of MyDD and "DavidNYC" of Swing State Project "have endorsed 16 candidates and posted their names at Act Blue, a website that allows visitors to contribute money to campaigns." Democratic challengers "need not pass any policy litmus test to earn endorsement; the four bloggers merely need to agree to go ahead. The endorsements depend on the candidate's having won a measure of support from bloggers in his or her district." And "crucially, the candidate does not have to have a good chance of winning. Bowers said their hope is to 'stretch Republican defenses' and turn less-noticed races into top-tier races, which will encourage more activity on the Internet." The 16 challengers "include Democratic Senate candidates Ned Lamont (Conn.), Jon Tester (Mont.) and former Navy Secretary Jim Webb (Va.). Lamont has raised $79,000 at Act Blue, Tester $39,000 and Webb $14,000."

Plan For Expanding Routine HIV Testing Draws Opposition. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Chase, 2.11M) reports Federal officials are "readying new guidelines that propose routine HIV tests for people 13 to 64 years old. But fears that the change could short-circuit patients' rights are prompting protests and even legislation." The proposed policy changes "are part of a sweeping effort by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention to streamline HIV testing. While lacking the force of law, the new guidelines would urge doctors to offer the test to everyone with basic health care, regardless of their risk factors." The test "would remain voluntary. But pretest counseling would be trimmed, or even eliminated, and consent could be obtained orally instead of in writing, as many states now require." The CDC says "broader testing is needed because about 25% of the estimated one million Americans with HIV are unaware they are carrying it."

Conservative Groups Oppose Effort To Shut Down 527s. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (7/3, 2.11M) reported, "Two years ago, Republicans were organizing against new, loosely regulated political groups that were raising money to attack President Bush. Now, illustrating how roles often reverse in politics, some of the party's conservative activists are trying to stop legislation that would choke off those groups. The dispute centers on a House bill that would curtail funding for organizations nicknamed 527s, for the section of the tax code that governs them." The Journal added, "In the 2006 campaign so far, it is right-leaning 527s that are most active. The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-issue group, is leading the charge to kill the Republican bill that would shut down 527s."

Research Shows Environment Impacts Development Of Stem Cells. The Washington Times (7/4, Price, 90K) reports, "Interaction with the environment surrounding immature embryonic stem cells is a factor in their transformation into a complex organ, even when they are outside the body in a laboratory dish, research shows. Scientists at the University of Florida's McKnight Brain Institute found that when embryonic stem cells from mice were placed on four different surfaces in cell culture dishes, specific types of body cells were created. Their findings, published in this week's issue of Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, shed light on how embryonic stem cells diversify to form various neural structures, which has been a fundamental mystery of brain development, researchers say. In experiments, the Florida scientists confirmed that a cell culture molecule called laminin activates a common developmental pathway essential for the generation and survival of particular types of brain cells."

North Korea Threatens To Use Nuclear Weapons Against US. The CBS Evening News (7/3, story 5, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The North Korean News Agency said that if the US were to launch a preemptive attack, it would respond with 'an annihilating strike and a nuclear war.' The White House shrugged it off, saying it has no intention of attacking but will act to protect the US if North Korea tests a long-range missile."

The AP (7/4, Schweid) reports Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns "cautioned North Korea on Monday to avoid 'any type of provocative activity' and to return to negotiations on its nuclear weapons program. Referring to reports that North Korea might be preparing to launch a long-range ballistic missile, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said 'that would be a profoundly unwise step by the North Koreans.'"

The Washington Post (7/4, Tyson, 744K) reports, "North Korea has a Taepodong-2 missile poised for a possible launch, although it is not clear whether it has been fully fueled. The two- or three-stage missile has estimated ranges that give it the potential of striking parts of the United States." US "officials played down the possibility of a preemptive strike."

North Korea Test Fires Long-Range Missile. North Korea test fired a long-range missile yesterday, but it failed seconds after launch, US officials said. The AP (7/4, Talmadge) reported that in addition to the missile that may be capable of reaching the US, North Korea also tested four shorter range missiles "in an exercise the White House termed 'a provocation' but not an immediate threat." The AP added, "None of the missiles made it as far as Japan. The Japanese government said all landed in the Sea of Japan between Japan and the Korean Peninsula."

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 2, 1:40, Karl, 8.78M) reported that the missile's failure is "better than a successful launch. A launch that would show they had the technology to hit the United States. But it's a limited relief. Even a failure is something that you can learn from. And officials here are telling me they're concerned that now the North Koreans will be able to go back to the drawing board. They will learn from this failure. Learn why it failed. And work on improving that technology, technology that could ultimately develop such a missile to hit the United States."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 3, 1:15, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "The White House now is telling us that they believe that North Korea has even additional missiles that could be launched, so they are bracing themselves for what may be other possible launches as the hours go by." In fact, the AP (7/5) reports this morning, "North Korea has launched a seventh missile, a news report said Wednesday, citing Japanese government sources. North Korea fired the latest missile at 5:22 p.m. (4 a.m. EDT), Kyodo News agency reported. The missile landed 6 minutes later, the report said. … It was unclear what type of missile was launched or where it landed."

AFP (7/4) reported, "The US missile defense system, based in California, Alaska and onboard US Navy ships, was on high alert in anticipation of the Taepodong 2 test, and ready to shoot any missile down if it threatened US territory. But since it failed just 40 seconds into the flight, 'no action was taken,' said a defense official." AFP added, "To address the situation, the United States was sending its senior envoy for six-nation North Korean nuclear talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, to Asia on Wednesday."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, lead story, 2:40, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "Pentagon officials tell CBS News that all of these launches were detected and were tracked by ships on station in the Sea of Japan and by the US missile-defense system. The Pentagon is under standing orders to try to shoot down a North Korean missile if it threatens US territory, but, again, this missile didn't get that far."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, lead story, 2:50, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported that "military officials say US spy satellites were tracking the missile from the moment it launched and quickly determined the missile posed no threat. There was no need to employ the US missile defense system."

A front page story in the New York Times (7/5, Onishi, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "In a statement issued late Tuesday night, the White House said the United States 'remains committed to a peaceful diplomatic solution' and sought implementation of a joint statement on denuclearization issued after a meeting with North Korea in September. But it said 'the North Korean regime's actions and unwillingness to return to the talks appears to indicate that the North has not yet made the strategic decision to give up their nuclear programs.' 'Accordingly, we will continue to take all necessary measures to protect ourselves and our allies,' the White House said, offering no details."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 2, 1:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported that the Bush Administration wants "to make the point that there was no immediate threat posed by the launch, but it was a clear provocation."

The Washington Times (7/5, Gertz, 90K) reports, "The White House said North Korea's decision to escalate its nuclear standoff with the international community by test-firing missiles will further alienate it from the international community."

The AP (7/4, Riechmann) reported, "White House Press Secretary Tony Snow, told reporters, 'The North Koreans have again clearly isolated themselves.'" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "planned to confer, starting tonight, with her counterparts from China, Japan, South Korea and Russia, over the missile firings, according to the State Department." President Bush "has been in consultation with Rice, [National Security Adviser Stephen] Hadley and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld."

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Wallace, Demick, 958K) reports, "Hadley described the barrage of missiles…as 'provocative behavior' from a country that had been warned against breaking its 6-year-old moratorium on long-range missile tests. 'The United States strongly condemns these missile launches and North Korea's unwillingness to heed calls for restraint from the international community,' the White House said in a statement. It said the tests 'demonstrate North Korea's intent to intimidate other states by developing missiles of increasingly longer ranges.'"

The Financial Times (7/5, Fifield, Daniel, Pilling) predicts the "highly provocative move" by North Korea "will invite a strong diplomatic response." Washington, Tokyo and Seoul "had issued stern threats of economic sanctions if Pyongyang proceeded with an inflammatory test. Emergency meetings were underway in all three capitals, as well as at the United Nations in New York. … A spokesman for the US mission at the United Nations said that the US ambassador, John Bolton, was 'consulting on an urgent basis with our fellow council members.'"

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, lead story, 2:45, Moran, 8.78M) called the test "a major provocation from North Korea." ABC (Raddatz) added that the US will "certainly try to put some sort of economic sanctions in place. That's a possibility only at this time. I sense the White House is trying to calm things down tonight. They're saying there's no immediate threat to the United States. And they're just going to continue to consult."

Fox News' Special Report (7/4, Baier) reported, "Today late in the afternoon, the US Ambassador to the United Nations said the United States was urgently consulting other UN Security Council members about the North Korean missile launches."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/4, Roth) reported, "US Ambassador John Bolton is working the phones, talking with other ambassadors on the UN Security Council."

USA Today (7/5, Page, Jackson, Nichols, 2.31M) reports that North Korea's move "prompted a diplomatic scramble." Bolton "held what he called 'urgent' consultations. The Security Council was likely to meet today, spokesman Richard Grennell said."

A front page story in the Washington Post (7/5, A1, Priest, Faiola, 744K) reports, "Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said Tokyo was likely to impose economic sanctions against North Korea in response to the missile tests; Japanese authorities said they would begin by banning North Korean ships from Japanese ports for six months or more. … In Japan, US Ambassador J. Thomas Schieffer told reporters that he and Japanese officials had discussed the possibility of getting the UN Security Council to impose economic sanctions on Pyongyang. In South Korea, Suh Choo Suk, senior presidential secretary for security policy, said in a nationally televised announcement that the North 'should assume full responsibility for its missile launches.' He expressed 'deep regret' for the 'provocative act' that he said would deepen the North's isolation and affect inter-Korean ties."

An analysis in the Financial Times (7/5, Fifield) says that if North Korea "was hoping to force the Bush administration, in particular, to give into its demands to drop financial sanctions and to negotiate on its own terms, it is almost certain to have gravely failed. Not only has Pyongyang incensed Washington and Tokyo, both of whom have threatened a strong response including new sanctions, it has managed to alienate its usually appeasing brother in Seoul, which vowed to cut off shipments of rice and fertiliser."

Weldon Calls Missile Launch A "Political Provocation." Rep. Curt Weldon said on CNN's The Situation Room (7/4), "I think this is basically a political provocation. I have been to North Korea twice. I led the only two delegations into the country. I sat across the table from…their lead negotiator for a total of 15 hours. In fact I had an invitation that I received one month ago to take the third delegation back into North Korea from August the 1st to the 5th. I consulted with the White House and they suggested I not go on this trip because of the possibility of the launch that we've now seen today. Even though I think this is absolutely provocative. The last thing we need to do is to rush to some kind of offensive military action. Because a war with North Korea would not be a war like any that we have seen in recent years. They have the fourth largest army in the world. They have thousands of missiles that are all set up along the DMZ to Seoul, and they also have capabilities on their ground forces. I think we have to engage them. We have to get China off the dead center."

NYTimes Calls North Korea A "Dangerous Rogue Actor." An editorial in the New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) says, "Americans can take some comfort from the reported failure of a long-range missile test by North Korea. … But the other message from the missile tests is considerably less reassuring. North Korea has again shown itself to be a dangerous rogue actor, ignoring the almost universal pleas from other countries to refrain from a test that can only add to regional tensions and multiply doubts about its trustworthiness and intentions." The Times adds, "Since the test poses no direct security threat, and violates no international treaty, there is no justification for any military response, by the United States or anyone else. … Someday North Korea may actually be able to build a missile that can cross the Pacific. A reinvigorated diplomatic effort to head off that threat before it comes closer to reality can only be a good idea."

Radicals Gaining Control Of Somalia's Capital. The Washington Post (7/4, Timberg, 744K) reports, "A group of largely moderate Muslim leaders who took control of Somalia's capital a month ago has been pushed aside in recent days by radicals determined to create a strict Islamic state there, according to Somali and other political analysts. Leading the drive has been Hassan Dahir Aweys, whom the United Nations and the United States consider a terrorist with ties to al-Qaeda." Aweys's "June 24 appointment as head of the Islamic militias ruling Mogadishu, the capital, has been followed by the installation of like-minded lieutenants in other key posts and the demotion of moderates such as the previous leader, Sharif Ahmed, analysts say." The Post adds, "Among those losing clout is Abdurahman Osman, a Somali-born US citizen who emerged last month as a spokesman for the Islamic militias and a moderate face toward the outside world."

Trials Of Khmer Rouge Leaders Begin In Cambodia. The Washington Times/AP (7/4, Cheang) reports, "Judges and prosecutors from Cambodia and foreign countries were sworn in yesterday to begin the UN-backed judicial process to try former Khmer Rouge leaders for genocide and crimes against humanity. It was a major step forward in the search for justice for victims of the brutal Khmer Rouge regime, whose extremist policies in the late 1970s killed an estimated 1.7 million people. … None of the top leaders of the 1975-79 communist regime have been held accountable for the atrocities. Khmer Rouge leader Pol Pot died in 1998, but several of his top deputies, aging and infirm, still live freely in Cambodia."

Chinese Official Says Draft Law Applies To Foreign And Domestic Media. The New York Times (7/4, Kahn, 1.19M) reports, "A Chinese draft law that threatens to fine the news media for reporting on 'sudden incidents' without permission applies to foreign as well as domestic news organizations, an official involved in preparing the legislation said Monday. The law, now under consideration by the legislature run by the Communist Party, calls for fines of up to $12,500 for unauthorized reports on outbreaks of disease, natural disasters, social disturbances or other so-called sudden incidents that officials determine to be false or harmful to China's social order. Wang Yongqing, vice minister of the legislative affairs office of China's State Council, or cabinet, told reporters at a news briefing that the law should apply to all news organizations, including foreign newspapers, magazines and broadcast outlets, which usually operate under different rules from those of the Chinese news media."

NYTimes Criticizes China's Draft Media Law. An editorial in the New York Times (7/4, 1.19M) says, "The trouble with suppressing reports of sudden incidents is that they usually emerge anyway, in a form even more damaging to the state." China's draft law "says that newspapers, magazines, Web sites and television stations would face fines up to $12,500 each time they published information about a sudden incident 'without authorization.' It is, of course, a horrible idea that strips away any pretense China might have of political openness or modernity."

Senior Intelligence Official Defends DIA Officer Who Spied For Chinese. The Washington Times (7/5, Gertz, 90K) reports, "A senior intelligence official is leading an effort within the Bush administration to defend former Defense Intelligence Agency China specialist Ronald Montaperto, who pleaded guilty recently to espionage-related charges involving Chinese intelligence. Lonnie Henley, a friend of Montaperto and another former DIA China specialist, has written e-mails and had telephone conversations with intelligence and policy officials criticizing the FBI investigation and seeking to downplay the damage caused by Montaperto's 22 years of contacts with two Chinese military intelligence officers, according to officials familiar with the private support program. The effort by numerous pro-China intelligence analysts is aimed at protecting their prestige and influence, and at shielding others in government who share Montaperto's benign views of China and the Chinese military, said officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity." The Times notes that Henley's "defense of Montaperto and criticism of the FBI is unusual and has raised concerns among U.S. counterintelligence officials that there are others in the intelligence community who may have improperly shared classified information with China."

Many Bush Foreign Allies Leaving World Stage. The AP (7/4, Raum) reported, "President Bush's stalwart foreign friends are fading fast. Most of the leaders who defied criticism at home to stand with him on Iraq and win his friendship are no longer players on the world stage, or are on their way out." British Prime Minister Tony Blair "has said he'll step down before the next national election." Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is leaving office in September. Italy's Silvio Berlusconi "resigned in early May after his party's election losses. Spain's Jose Maria Aznar was earlier forced out of office, the first casualty of supporting Bush on Iraq." The AP added, "Newer leaders, particularly those in Europe, have seen the political penalties paid by those who stood too close to Bush — and have been more reluctant to embrace him so openly."

Putin Seeks Right To Send Anti-Terror Forces Around World. The Washington Times (7/5, 90K) reports, "Russian President Vladimir Putin asked parliament yesterday for the right to send soldiers and special forces anywhere in the world to fight terrorists, acting just days after having pledged to 'destroy' the terrorists who killed five Russian diplomats in Iraq." The Kremlin said Putin "had requested the right to defend 'the human rights and freedoms of citizens, the sovereignty of the Russian Federation, its independence and state integrity,' by using security forces outside Russia." Putin "did not say the troops would be sent to Iraq. Nor was it clear whether the United States would object to Russian forces operating in the country or welcome any assistance in dealing with insurgents who for three years have kept Iraq on the edge of chaos."

Six Russian Soldiers Killed In Chechnya. The New York Times (7/5, Kramer, 1.19M), "Gunmen broke several months of relative calm with an ambush of a Russian military column on a road south of Grozny, the regional capital, killing 6 soldiers and wounding 12 others in a midafternoon attack. The column came under fire from rocket-propelled grenades and small arms, Valery A. Kuznetsov, Chechnya's prosecutor, said in a telephone interview."

López Obrador Likely To Challenge Result Of Mexican Presidential Vote. Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the leftwing candidate in Mexico's presidential race is "almost certain" to challenge the results of Sunday's vote, according to the Financial Times (7/5, Thomson). Such move "would heighten tensions and increase uncertainty about the country's immediate political future. Word of the likely challenge was raised as center right candidate Felipe Calderon "looked to have taken a small but decisive lead in what is turning out to be the closest election in Mexico's history. A preliminary count by the country's Federal Electoral Institute (IFE) showed Mr Calderon ahead by 400,000 votes – about 1 per cent of the total cast – over." Manuel Camacho, a leading adviser to López Obrador and a congressman for his Democratic Revolution party (PRD), stopped short of claiming electoral fraud, but "said there were 'serious discrepancies' in the vote-counting process that, once rectified, could easily tip the result in favour of Mr López Obrador."

The New York Times (7/5, McKinley, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "Mr. López Obrador's challenge made it clear that this country was about to live through its own version of the drawn-out legal battle that Americans experienced in the 2000 presidential race. Mexico's dispute, however, instead of being focused on one state, could be nationwide." The Times adds, "Foreign election observers said the election was transparent and largely free of problems, adding that the system could even be a model for many other countries."

The Washington Post (7/5, A8, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that the question of whether Obrador will "unleash the fury of the streets" looms over Mexico. Emotions "have been intensifying in the past two days as the populist candidate and his top aides have outlined a growing list of alleged election law violations that they claim are responsible for the narrow lead of his opponent, Felipe Calderón. No large demonstrations have been held yet, apparently because López Obrador's supporters are waiting for a signal from him and because they want to see the results of an official count that begins Wednesday. … Still, the rhetoric is getting more heated."

The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Harman, Llana, 61K) reports that Mexico is in "political limbo" with both candidates claiming victory. The standoff "raises the prospect of protests and court challenges that could take weeks to resolve. It could also further polarize a divided electorate after months of negative campaigning." The Monitor adds, "Preliminary official results are expected Wednesday - at which point a recount is set to begin. By law, this process will go on day and night until a final result is reached."

The Washington Times (7/5, Behn, 90K) reports that "whoever wins will have to address the anger of voters in towns like LaPuerta, who blame economic conditions for the flight of half their residents to the United States. … The joblessness that sent the young men north became a central issue in Sunday's election, with leftist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador promising a Mexican version of the New Deal and conservative Felipe Calderon insisting that existing free-market policies offered the surest hope for growth."

Election Called "Crucial Test" Of Mexican Democracy. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Luhnow, De Córdoba, Lyons, 2.11M) calls the controversy a "crucial test" of Mexico's democracy. The Journal adds, "Unlike the US, which has had a democracy for two centuries and a Supreme Court whose word is accepted by the vast majority of the electorate, Mexico's democracy is fragile. Until as recently as the 1990s, Mexican presidents were chosen through a process called the 'dedazo,' where the departing leader literally hand-picked his successor. And it was only in 2000 that an opposition party finally won a clean, uncontested election. How the showdown plays out over the coming months could become a defining moment in Mexico's drive to become a modern nation where independent institutions like courts, the central bank and the election agency are respected."

Officials Say 2.5 Million Votes Went Uncounted. The Los Angeles Times (7/4, Tobar, Martinez, 958K) reported on its web site that the margin between Calderon and Obrador "narrowed suddenly Tuesday after election authorities revealed that some 2.5 million votes had been missing from earlier counts. … The uncounted votes heightened the sense of disarray that has plagued the election since Mexico's polls closed Sunday evening."

Snow Likens Mexican Election To 2000 US Presidential Race. The Washington Times (7/5, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that White House press secretary Tony Snow was asked "whether he was 'concerned about the Mexican election, and what it might mean if there's a real problem down there.'" Snow was asked, "What if we've got two guys both claiming victory?" Snow "reminded the scribe: 'I think we've had situations here where people have -- there have been multiple claimants to victory.'"

O'Grady Says It Seems "Almost Certain" Calderon Won. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M), "Felipe Calderón of the National Action Party hasn't any doubt that he won Sunday's presidential election, and he says that his adversary, Andres Manuel López Obrador of the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD), knows it, too. … Mr. Calderón's numbers jibe with those of Mexico's Federal Electoral Institute (IFE) and it seems almost certain that he won. But as we go to press, an official announcement has not yet been made." O'Grady adds, "In the past 48 hours, Mexico has watched two distinct management styles unfold. Indeed, it is not unreasonable to conclude that the very reason that Mr. Calderón seems set to take the office of president is precisely because Mexicans feared the López Obrador they are now witnessing."

WSJournal Says Mexican Vote Signals Latin American Shift To Left Has Crested. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) says, "Assuming Mr. Calderón's lead holds -- and that his victory is recognized by all of his opponents -- Mexico may be on the cusp of a new era in which the old-style populism typified by the PRD gives way to a new style of politics catering to an aspirational electorate, regardless of economic class. For the US this is excellent news, not least because the ultimate solution to our immigrant influx is a prosperous southern neighbor that doesn't export millions of laborers every year. It is also a good sign for Latin America: Together with recent elections in Colombia, Peru and Bolivia (where voters on Sunday rejected an effort by President Evo Morales to rewrite the Constitution), Mexico's vote suggests the region's ballyhooed march left has crested."

Israeli Planes Destroy Palestinian Interior Ministry. Israeli aircraft destroyed the Palestinian Interior Ministry early this morning. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Ellingwood, King, 958K) reported, "Israeli missiles flattened a wing of the Hamas-run Palestinian Interior Ministry here today, in the latest wave of airstrikes meant to pressure Palestinian militants into freeing a captive Israeli soldier."

The Washington Post (7/5, A8, Wilson, 744K) reports that the attack that wounded at least seven people, came "hours after the military wing of the governing Hamas movement fired a rocket at the southern Israeli city of Ashkelon that landed in an empty school."

The New York Times (7/5, Myre, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "The militant Hamas organization called the attack a response to 'Israeli aggression.' But in a statement on Tuesday evening, Mr. Olmert called it 'an escalation of unprecedented gravity in the campaign of terror waged by Hamas, which leads the Palestinian Authority.'"

The AP (7/4, Nessman) reported, "Prime Minister Ehud Olmert called the rocket fire on the coastal city of Ashkelon a 'major escalation,' coming just hours after a deadline set by the militants holding an Israeli soldier passed with Israel rejecting demands to release about 1,500 Palestinian prisoners." The AP adds, "Early Wednesday, Israeli aircraft struck the Palestinian Interior Ministry in Gaza for the second time in a week, the military said. Witnesses said missiles hit the main structure again and damaged a building next to the ministry which has been used since the first attack." The Wall Street Journal and the Washington Times run the AP story this morning.

Crisis Expected To Leave Power Vacuum In Israeli, Palestinian Politics. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Leggett, 2.11M) reports that the current crisis in Gaza "likely will leave behind an unpredictable and potentially dangerous power vacuum in Israeli and Palestinian politics. When Palestinian militants kidnapped an Israeli solider late last month, officials on both sides initially sought a diplomatic solution. Mediators from Egypt were brought in while U.S. and European diplomats worked the phones with Israeli and Palestinian officials. Today, the Israeli soldier remains captive in Gaza, and diplomatic efforts increasingly seem to have failed. As the crisis persists, one political cost is also becoming clear: seriously weakened governments on both sides."

USA Today (7/5, Frank, 2.31M) reports that the Gaza crisis "threatens to upend Israel's strategy of achieving stability in the region by withdrawing from occupied land. Israeli troops are back in areas ceded to Palestinians. Their return has fed concerns that pulling out of territories leads to instability — not security."

Diehl Says Israel Can't Leave Gaza Without Cutting Deal With Abbas. Jackson Diehl of the Washington Post writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M), "Israel may not be able to return to negotiation with the Palestinians anytime soon. But until it does it probably won't do any more major withdrawals from Palestinian territory, or restore the relative security it enjoyed for the past 18 months. … Mr. Olmert is well aware that having marched back into Gaza, Israel probably won't be able to leave again without cutting a deal with Mr. Abbas and maybe Hamas. As it turns out, it takes two to end a war."

Friedman Says Israeli-Palestinian Violence Is "Utterly Without Purpose." Thomas Friedman writes in the

New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) that "the violence unfolding between Israelis and Palestinians today is utterly without purpose. Israel has evacuated Gaza, and what does Hamas do? It doesn't put all its energy into building a nest for its young there — a decent state and society, with jobs. Instead, it launches hundreds of rockets into Israel. The Palestinians could have a state on the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem tomorrow, if they and the Arab League clearly recognized Israel, normalized relations and renounced violence. Anyone who says otherwise doesn't know Israel today."

Khamenei Moves To Set Stage For Iran's Eventual WTO Membership. The Washington Post (7/5, A10, Vick, 744K) reports, "As diplomatic maneuvering continues over Iran's nuclear program, the cleric who holds ultimate authority in the country has signaled twice in recent days that Iran intends to engage the wider world it long held at bay. Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, announced the formation of a new council to advise him on foreign affairs and a new privatization program aimed at preparing Iran for eventual membership in the World Trade Organization." Analysts "said Khamenei's announcements served to reinforce the assumption of US and European officials that Iran wants to be more integrated in the world."

Blair Says Moderate Muslims Should Confront Militants. British Prime Minister Tony Blair yesterday called on moderate Muslims to do more to confront militancy in their own communities. The AP (7/4, Gardiner) reported, "Blair said the vast majority of Muslims abhorred terrorism and wanted to defeat it, but said they had to do more to counter what he described as the extremists' misplaced anger and grievances. Moderates, he said, must 'stand up against the ideas of these people, not just their methods.'"

The Washington Times (7/5, Kralev, 90K), "Moderate Muslim leaders and other prominent society figures outside the government have to do more to change attitudes, he said. 'I profoundly disagree that the problem here is that the government hasn't acted,' he said. 'We are not having a debate of a fundamental enough nature within the community, which is where the moderate majority go and stand up against the ideas of those people, not just their methods.'"

Western News Outlets Moving Into Arab World. The New York Times (7/5, Carvajal, 1.19M) reports, "A media competition for minds and market share in the Middle East is evolving as a crowd of Western news organizations prepares to deliver headlines -- and geopolitical views -- in the language of the Koran. Backed by government financing, Germany's public international broadcaster, Deutsche Welle, is poised to beam as much as 24 hours of daily news programming in Arabic this autumn. France's yet-to-be-named CNN-style channel is in development for a year-end opening, along with a Web site in Arabic and later in 2007 an Arabic television version. And the state-owned Russia Today has similar plans for an Arabic Web site and television presence." From the United States, CNN "is watching the development of its Arabic Web site, which attracts more than 300,000 unique visitors monthly, before it decides whether to pursue television plans." The BBC World Service itself "is also in the fray, with £19 million, or $35 million, from the British government for an autumn introduction of an Arabic news broadcast, starting with 12 hours of daily programming and expanding to 24 hours." The Times adds "a debate is beginning about whether these foreign broadcasts will create understanding or lead to more conflict."

Chavez Hosts Trade Summit. The AP (7/4, Pearson) reported that Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez "marked Venezuela's entry into the South American trade bloc Mercosur with a six-nation summit Tuesday, an alliance that he says should be a common front against US free trade deals. Chavez and the leaders of Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay were set to formalize the bloc's expansion to include Venezuela, which Chavez claims as a victory against Washington's 'imperialistic' economic plans for the hemisphere. Bolivian President Evo Morales, a close Chavez ally, was to attend the signing ceremony as an observer."

Bush Invites Georgian Leader To Washington. The New York Times (7/5, 1.19M) reprints an International Herald Tribune (Vaisman) story which reported that President Bush has invited Georgian president, Mikheil Saakashvili to Washington 10 days before the G-8 summit meeting in St. Petersburg. For Saakashvili, "the talks with Bush represent a welcome indication that his small Black Sea country is being taken seriously at a time when it is being harried by Russia on a number of fronts - notably energy supplies and ties to NATO - and is irritating Moscow by forging new alliances in an effort to break out of dependency. For Bush, the talks are not only a salute to Georgia's role in a new pipeline that bypasses both Russia and Iran. The meeting also sends a message that, as Saakashvili put it, the G-8 gathering should be more than a photo opportunity and become 'an instrument in solving things.'"

Putin Issues Threat To Force WTO Membership. Russian President Vladimir Putin yesterday threatened to stop implementing global trade rules unless the US agrees to Russian entry to the WTO. The Financial Times (7/5, Buckley, Williams) reports that "two of the Russian president's senior officials said they were still hopeful agreement with the US could be reached in time for next week's Group of Eight summit in St Petersburg." A WTO deal "could clear the way for Gazprom, the Russian gas giant, to announce the go-ahead for development of the massive Shtokman gas field in the Barents Sea, and which of the five short listed foreign oil companies – including two US groups – it has chosen as its partners."

Putin Efforts To Revitalize Moscow Come Under Fire. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Chazan, 2.11M) reports that as deputy mayor of St. Petersburg in the early 1990s, President Vladimir Putin "had a dream to turn St. Petersburg into Russia's financial capital and a hub of foreign investment. It never happened. The city looked on in envy as Western money poured instead into its booming rival, Moscow. Now the tables have turned. Mr. Putin -- who was born and raised in Leningrad, as St. Petersburg was then called -- is leveraging Kremlin power to revitalize his hometown." He "chose it for the site of this month's Group of Eight summit of leading industrial nations, an event designed to showcase Russia's re-emergence as a major power." But "some have dismissed the city's renaissance as skin deep." Some critics "say behind the restored facades and new construction, poverty is widespread and crime is rife: British Ambassador Anthony Brenton was robbed in broad daylight last summer while walking along Nevsky Prospekt, the city's main thoroughfare."

UN Agency Advises Poor Asian Nations To Protect Industries With Tariffs. A report issued last week by the UN Development Program disputes the US position that the removal of trade barriers is the best way to reduce poverty. USA Today (7/5, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "Asia's poorest countries are being out-muscled economically by China and remain stranded in poverty despite a regional boom in free trade," according to the report. The agency "advises poor Asian countries to do what Japan and South Korea did successfully in the 1970s and '80s: protect key industries temporarily with tariffs before exposing them to foreign competition." The UNDP "says Asia's poorest countries have been left behind even as trade has exploded across the region. … One problem: Inexperienced trade negotiators from poor countries are frequently outmaneuvered and enter into trade pacts on unfavorable terms."

Pearlstein Says There Is Little Appetite For Another Round Of Globalization. Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (7/5, D1, 744K), "The utter collapse last weekend of a global trade conference is the latest evidence that, among developed and developing countries alike, there is simply little appetite for another round of globalization. The best face to put on it is that there's still a lot of adjustment going on just to digest the last round, and it is only natural that people want and need more time before diving in for another helping." Pearlstein adds, "Up to now, globalization has been the project of business and economic elites who have largely foisted it on a wary or unsuspecting public. Now, from remote villages of China to a gathering spot for day laborers in Herndon, globalization has entered its more democratic phase. And it's likely to be a messy phase, at that."

LATimes Urges Elimination Of Farm Subsidies. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, 958K) editorializes, "When a meeting of international trade ministers in Geneva collapsed last weekend, it wasn't just the latest disappointing failure by the World Trade Organization to produce an agreement in the Doha round of talks -- it may have been the last." The Bush Administration "has floated a number of worthy proposals, but it might have done better in pressuring the recalcitrant Europeans -- the most egregious opponents of needed liberalization -- with a dramatic, unilateral move. … Farm subsidies cost taxpayers about $19 billion last year. For their money, consumers got the privilege of paying more for some food because farm supports (and quotas on some imports, such as sugar) distort markets. … Ending these subsidies and lowering agricultural tariffs would boost the U.S. economy, eliminate waste and help farmers in the Third World trade their way out of poverty. It's a shame Washington thinks that its protectionist farm policies are something to be surrendered only grudgingly, and only if others do so. Good riddance, we say."

WSJournal Praises Improved US Relations With India, Pakistan. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/5, 2.11M) says, "Weapons sales are a notoriously touchy subject, particularly in nuclear South Asia. Yet New Delhi barely raised a peep when the Bush Administration announced a $5 billion arms package to Islamabad on Monday. That's a tacit vote of confidence in the strengthened U.S.-India relationship, and another step toward normalized relations with Pakistan. … What a sea change in U.S.-Pakistani ties." The Journal adds, "Relations between New Delhi and Islamabad are also improving, if slowly. … America doesn't have much of a role to play in those discussions. But it's a step forward that Washington can improve its relationships with both countries, without hurting their relationship with each another."

July 2, 2006

The Honorable Alberto Gonzales
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20530-0001

Dear Attorney General Gonzales:

I write to urge you, in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision last week in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, to establish an independent commission for the purpose of conducting a top-to-bottom legal review of all of the Administration's ongoing anti-terror measures.

Given the Supreme Court's decision striking down the creation – without Congressional approval – of military commissions to try detainees held at Guantanamo Bay and the existence of various other legal challenges wending their way through the courts, I am growing increasingly concerned about the Administration's stubbornly unilateral approach to these types of issues. The Administration has not only largely ignored the Congress, but has also badly miscalculated how its efforts would be evaluated by the Supreme Court. As the Hamdan decision demonstrates, however, attempts by the President to marginalize the other two branches of government threaten to undermine, rather than promote, counter-terrorism efforts.

Accordingly, before another Administration procedure or policy is struck down by the Supreme Court, dealing another potential setback to the war on terror and the prosecution of terrorists, I urge you to establish an independent commission to examine those policies and procedures. Such a commission would ideally be comprised of legal scholars, Administration officials, members of Congress, and distinguished judges, who would be in a position to conduct a comprehensive review of all of the Administration's anti-terror measures to ensure that they follow the law. We should not wait until the Court throws out another program before committing to working together going forward.

I firmly believe that we can prosecute the war on terror in a way that protects both security and liberty. In order to do so, however, we need to sit down and widen the circle beyond a few people in the Administration debating this issue in private.

I appreciate your attention to this matter, and I look forward to your prompt reply.

Sincerely,

Chuck Schumer

Charles E. Schumer
United States Senator

TERRORISM NEWS:

Italy Arrests Two Italian Intelligence Officials, Seeks Four Americans In Rendition Probe. The AP (7/6, Rizzo) reports, "Prosecutors said Wednesday they had arrested two Italian intelligence officers and were seeking four more Americans as part of an investigation into the alleged CIA kidnapping of an Egyptian cleric in Milan in 2003. … In a statement released in Milan, prosecutors said three Americans being sought were CIA agents, while the fourth worked at the joint U.S.-Italian air base of Aviano, where the Egyptian was allegedly taken after his abduction. The statement did not provide names" of the Italians, but "Italian media reports identified the two as Marco Mancini, currently the head of military counterespionage, and Gustavo Pignero, and said they were charged with kidnapping."

The New York Times (7/6,Grey, Povoledo, 1.19M) notes, "The arrests will put pressure on the new government of Prime Minister Romano Prodi to decide whether to back the efforts of the Milan prosecutor, which the previous government of Silvio Berlusconi had opposed." The Prodi "government is less supportive of the war in Iraq than was Mr. Berlusconi's. But Massimo Brutti, who oversees judicial issues for the largest party in the governing majority…said the change in government had not affected the decision to issue the arrest warrants."

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Wilkinson, 958K) reports, "In marked contrast to the previous administration…Prodi's government Wednesday night pledged 'maximum cooperation' with the judiciary and expressed faith in the 'institutional loyalty' of the state security services. The arrests bolster a European report last month that denounced a global "spider's web" of collusion, including hundreds of alleged clandestine flights by CIA planes transporting terrorism suspects across Europe and into North Africa, the Middle East and Central Asia."

USA Today (7/6, 4A, 2.31M) also notes, "The arrests were the first acknowledgement that Italian agents may have been involved," and the Washington Post (7/6, A15, Whitlock, 744K) adds, "Several Italian and European lawmakers said Wednesday that the arrests confirmed what they had suspected all along: that the Italian government worked directly with the CIA to kidnap" Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr. "Others said they were shocked at the move and said prosecutors were going after the wrong people."

Cole Bombing Mastermind Recaptured. ABC News.com (7/5, Ross) reports on its news blog the "alleged mastermind of the USS Cole bombing, Jamal Badawi, who had escaped from prison in Yemen, has been caught again according to US law enforcement sources." Badawi, "along with 22 others, had escaped from jail in February through an underground tunnel. The prisoners were believed to have help from both inside and outside the prison to dig the 460 foot tunnel."

Judge Denies Bond For Alleged Miami Terror Plotters. The AP (7/6, Wides-Munoz) reports, "A federal judge denied bond Wednesday to six men accused of plotting to blow up Chicago's Sears Tower and conspiring to help al-Qaida attack several federal buildings." The six, who have pleaded not guilty, "were arrested June 22 in Miami as part of an undercover FBI sting. They are accused of seeking to support what they thought was an al-Qaida operative's effort to bomb FBI buildings in Chicago, Los Angeles, Miami, New York and Washington." A seventh man arrested in the case and charged in Atlanta "was also being held without bond." US Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra 'ruled Wednesday that the men in Miami posed too great a risk to the community to be released." The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Blum, 958K) also reports the story.

Judge Warns US Officials Not To Share Details Of Sealed Padilla Defense Motions. The AP (7/6) reports, "U.S. government officials who know of sealed defense motions in the Jose Padilla terror case face court punishment if they disclose their contents to the prosecution trial team, a judge has ruled. District Judge Marcia G. Cooke issued the order after Padilla's defense attorneys expressed concern over a sealed motion they filed requesting evidence and assistance from Egypt's government as part of their case. Defense attorneys claimed they received a call from a U.S. government representative who said that if the government is ordered to respond to a defense motion and the defense does not withdraw the motion, the government would disclose the motion's contents to the prosecution trial team."

More Time Behind Bars Seen As Likely Future For Many Guantanamo Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Williams, 958K) reports that the Bush Administration has described the men being held at the US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba "as being among the world's most dangerous men, but many profess to be simple villagers captured in the chaotic aftermath of Sept. 11." The majority of them have "not been charged with any war crime," so their detentions were "unaffected by the Supreme Court ruling that struck down the tribunal system used for those who do face formal charges. Congress, however, is looking at passing legislation to mandate the procedures for dealing with the foreign captives." The short term outlook for these men ""seems to be more time inside the fences and razor wire of the camps set among cactus groves on this Caribbean island."

Media Leak Throws French Terror Trial Into Turmoil. The New York Times (7/6, Smith, 1.19M) reports, "A French terrorism trial was thrown into turmoil on Wednesday by a leaked report that French intelligence agents had secretly interviewed the six defendants during their detention by the United States at Guantánamo Bay in Cuba. The revelation by the daily newspaper Libération is an embarrassment for the French government, which has long expressed official disdain for the American policy of detaining terrorism suspects beyond the reach of law." The Times adds, "According to a copy of a diplomatic cable published Wednesday by the newspaper, French agents visited the detention center shortly after it was created in January 2002 and again in March of that year. … French courts have previously declared the Guantánamo detentions illegal."

UK Neighborhood Patrols Focus On Home-Grown Terror Threat. Under the headline "UK Targets Terrorists-to-Be," the Wall Street Journal (7/6, Mollenkamp, 2.11M) reports, "While other British intelligence and law-enforcement agencies concentrate on terrorists' international movements, telephone calls or money transfers, British police believe neighborhood patrols are the best way to confront a particular type of terrorist: the homegrown variety who grow up in Britain and lead otherwise ordinary lives until the day they strike. London's Metropolitan Police Service, better known as Scotland Yard, increasingly is looking at this approach, especially in the wake of incidents such as last year's London bus and subway bombings. … 'Terrorism starts in the neighborhoods,' says Tim Godwin, assistant commissioner for territorial policing at Scotland Yard. The hope is that having community-support officers as a familiar presence on the streets will 'build the trust and confidence that people can come forward and say, "I don't like what's going on next door,"' he says."

The New York Times (7/6, Cowell, 1.19M), meanwhile, says that "with some anxiety, Britons are still asking what inspired the onslaught by British-born Muslims, and whether the dark undercurrents of July 7, 2005, could resurface in a new attack." There is an "increasingly rancorous debate a year after the four bombers struck on three Underground trains and a bus. The government of Prime Minister Tony Blair is locked in recrimination with Muslim leaders, who say the authorities have failed to reduce Muslim discontent. Many Muslims…are insisting that the government do more to investigate the origins of the attack."

Al Qaeda To Release Video Of London Suicide Bomber. ABC News.com (7/5, Ross) reports on its news blog that Al Qaeda is "set to release a new video tape featuring one of the suicide bombers from last year's London attacks, according to Ben Venzke at the IntelCenter." Venzke says "the as-Sahab production house will be putting out a tape on the Internet sometime Thursday that includes a video last will and testament of Shahzad Tanweer as well as a new statement from the al Qaeda number two leader Ayman al-Zawahiri." The tape "is also expected to include former Californian Adam Gadahn, who now goes by the name of Azzam al-Amriki. Gadahn is believed by U.S. authorities to be running the al Qaeda propaganda operation from a secret location somewhere inside of Pakistan." The tapes' release "the day before the London anniversary bombings suggest that al Qaeda had a significant role in the attacks which killed 52 and injured hundreds."

PATRIOT ACT:

National Security Letters Allow FBI To Obtain Trove Of Personal Data. Under the headline "With only a letter, FBI can gather private data," USA Today (7/6, A1, Willing, 2.31M) reports on the increased post-9/11 use of National Security Letters by the FBI in counter-terrorism investigations, noting that the Library Connection lawsuit challenging an NSL request "provides a rare public glimpse of the vast amount of banking, credit, telephone and Internet records that anti-terrorism or counterintelligence investigators can have simply by asking." In a filing in the Library Connection suit, "David Szady, the FBI's assistant director for counterintelligence, said the letters are vital to the bureau's post-9/11 mission: to disrupt terrorist plots and other national security threats before attacks occur. … According to U.S. Justice Department figures, the FBI served 9,254 National Security Letters concerning 3,501 individuals in 2005." USA cites the arrest of al Qaeda terrorist Mohammad Junaid Babar in 2004 as an NSL "success story," but adds that the ACLU and civil liberties groups continue to criticize NSLs as unconstitutional."

In an accompanying table titled "Trove Of Information FBI Can Get," USA Today (7/6, 2A, 2.31M) reports, "Federal laws expanded by the USA Patriot Act of 2001 give anti-terrorism and counterintelligence investigators access to an array of consumer information beyond what the FBI can obtain through National Security Letters. … Some examples of records accessible to investigators: Driver's licenses, hotel bills, storage rental agreements, apartment leases and other commercial records. … Cash deposits, wire and digital money transfers, casino credit records, unusual bank transactions. … Patient business records and personal health information."

FBI Computer System Contractor Illegally Accessed Classified Data. The Washington Post (7/6, A5, Weiss, 744K) reports BAE Systems employee Joseph Thomas Colon, "using computer programs easily found on the Internet, managed to crack the FBI's classified computer system and gain the passwords of 38,000 employees, including that of FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III. … As a direct result, the bureau said it was forced to temporarily shut down its network and commit thousands of man-hours and millions of dollars to ensure no sensitive information was lost or misused." Colon, "who was assigned to the FBI field office in Springfield, Ill., said in court filings that he used the passwords and other information to bypass bureaucratic obstacles and better help the FBI install" the Trilogy system, and "he said agents in the Springfield office approved his actions." Colon is not accused of any malicious intent.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FAA Wants Restricted Airspace Training For Pilots. The Washington Post (7/6, A9, Wilber, 744K) reports that citing concerns over "too many pilots" violating restricted airspace around the Washington region, the FAA proposed a rule yesterday that would require the completion of "an Internet-based training course before being allowed to fly" in the area. Frequent "incursions drain resources from air-traffic controllers and from military and law enforcement authorities, officials said." The Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association said yesterday "it supported the FAA's proposed training requirements, which are to go into effect after a 60-day comment period."

New Orleans Officials Announce Neighborhood Rebuilding Plan. The New York Times (7/6, Saulny, 1.19M) reports New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin, along with the City Council and community leaders, "announced a long-awaited framework Wednesday for planning the rebuilding of ruined neighborhoods, nearly a year after Hurricane Katrina and after months of indecision about how various parts of the city should work together toward recovery." The Unified New Orleans Neighborhood Plan, "financed largely by a $3.5 million grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, is expected to bring order to an effort that was beginning to grow unruly and uneven without strong central advice or control."

Groups See Potential For Fraud In Gulf Coast Housing Aid. USA Today (7/6, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "A block of consumer advocates, mortgage companies and community groups are warning that plans to hand out up to $150,000 apiece in housing aid to Gulf Coast hurricane victims could open the door to fraud." HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson has received more than a dozen letters from groups concerned about the "nearly $7 billion in federal grants that would help tens of thousands of people in Louisiana and Mississippi rebuild damaged and destroyed homes. Both states have decided to give the grants directly to homeowners and bypass mortgage companies that typically dole out such money."

Texas Asks Louisiana To Issue Arrest Warrants For Felons Who Fled Katrina. USA Today (7/6, Johnson, 2.31M) reports the Texas attorney general's office is "urging Louisiana to issue arrest warrants for hundreds of felons who are suspected of violating conditions of their probation or parole by remaining in Texas nearly a year after fleeing Hurricane Katrina." The office "has sent Louisiana the names of more than 1,700 felons who either have failed to keep in touch with Louisiana officials or who have ignored court orders to return to Louisiana," 104 of whom "represent a particular risk to the public, says Angela Hale, spokeswoman for Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott. … A list of the offenders initially was assembled by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which identified the felons from lists of Katrina evacuees who received federal housing or other disaster benefits."

WAR NEWS:

Car Bomb Kills 12 Pilgrims In Kufa. The Los Angeles Times/AP (7/6) reports a car bomb "targeting Iranian pilgrims struck this morning near a Shiite shrine in the holy city of Kufa, killing at least 12 people and wounding 37, police said." The bomb "exploded near the shrine of Maitham al-Tamar and yards from the Kufa mosque." Attacks on "houses of worship have stoked tensions between Shiite and Sunni Muslims." Meanwhile, "hundreds of U.S. Marines on Wednesday stormed through the largest hospital in western Iraq, taking control of a facility they said was being used by insurgents."

Violence Spreads To Baghdad University. The Washington Post (7/6, A1, Partlow, 744K) reports in a front page story that at Baghdad University, "It's finals time in Iraq. Black-clad gunmen have stormed a dormitory to snatch students from their rooms. Professors fear failing and angering their pupils. Administrators curtailed graduation ceremonies to avoid convening large groups of people into an obvious bombing target. Perhaps nowhere else does the prospect of two months' summer vacation -- for those who can afford it, a chance to flee the country -- bring such unbridled relief." On the "tree-shaded, stone-slab courtyard of Iraq's most prestigious university, with 70,000 undergraduates and 10,000 graduate students, students still stroll to class and chat idly with friends." Within the "concrete blast walls and barbed-wire barriers, the campus exists in relative calm compared with more overtly violent areas of Baghdad."

House Panel Subpoenas Pentagon For Information On Abu Ghraib Whistleblower. The AP (7/6, Jelinek) reports lawmakers have "issued a subpoena seeking Pentagon information on a soldier who says he suffered retaliation for reporting abuses at Abu Ghraib prison." The subpoena "from the House Government Reform Committee seeks all communications relating to information provided by Army Spc. Samuel Provance about the Iraq prison." The subpoena also "seeks information on the interrogation of an Iraqi officer there, identified by Provance as Gen. Hamid Zabar. Provance had helped interrogate Zabar's 16-year-old son and was later told the boy had been captured and abused to compel the general to give information, Provance said in testimony prepared for Congress." Provance has "said his rank was reduced for disobeying orders not to speak about mistreatment he saw at Abu Ghraib." The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) runs the AP story.

Malaki Wants Independent Probe Of Alleged Rape-Murder By US Soldiers. The AP (7/6, Gamel) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Malaki "demanded an independent inquiry of the rape-slaying of a girl and the killing of her family, saying the immunity from Iraqi prosecution enjoyed by U.S. forces 'encouraged them to commit such crimes.'" Al-Malaki, "whose brief tenure has been marked by several high-profile allegations of abuse by U.S. forces, called for an Iraqi investigation — or at least a joint inquiry — into the March 12 rape and murder of Abeer Qassim Hamza, and the killing of her mother, father and sister at their home in Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad. He also said the agreements under which U.S.-led coalition troops enjoy immunity from prosecution by Iraqi courts should be reviewed." Al-Maliki "spoke two days after former Army Pfc. Steve D. Green was charged in federal court in Charlotte, N.C., with rape and four counts of murder."

The New York Times (7/6, Semple, 1.19M) reports al-Maliki "said Wednesday that Iraq would open an inquest into the recently disclosed rape-and-murder case involving American soldiers and contended that the immunity from Iraqi prosecution granted to foreign troops encouraged them to commit crimes." American military officials "scrambled Wednesday to control fallout from the case, one of at least five current investigations into accusations that American troops in Iraq had killed unarmed civilians."

The Washington Post (7/6, A13, Finer, Partlow, 744K) reports, "Following a recent string of alleged atrocities by U.S. troops against Iraqi civilians, leaders from across Iraq's political spectrum," including al-Malaki, "called Wednesday for a review of the U.S.-drafted law that prevents prosecution of coalition forces in Iraqi courts." The demand "could widen a rift between U.S. and Iraqi authorities over killings and other crimes allegedly carried out in recent months." The dispute "centers on a rule with the force of law enacted two years ago by the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority, which governed Iraq after the fall of Saddam Hussein. Known as CPA Order 17, it stipulates that coalition forces, diplomatic personnel and contractors working for coalition forces or for diplomats 'shall be immune from the Iraqi legal process.' But challenges to the immunity order have gained momentum, beginning with the November killing of 24 civilians in Haditha, which came to light in March when Time magazine reported the incident." In a "rare unified stance by factional leaders, members of Iraq's Kurdish and Sunni Arab political blocs endorsed Maliki's call to revisit the immunity issue."

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Salman, Kennedy, 958K) reports the case, "which includes the alleged rape of the older daughter, has caused a firestorm in the United States and Iraq. And the soldiers, including one charged Monday with rape and murder, have become lurid symbols of the American military at its worst. The image has not been helped in recent weeks by the emergence of other accusations that U.S. soldiers had killed Iraqi civilians." Abu Firas Janabi, the cousin of the girls' mother, "has emerged as a potential witness, has been interviewed by a U.S. investigator. He lives about half a mile from the scene of the killings, just outside the town of Mahmoudiya." Janabi and his wife "found the two young boys in the family crying as they stood outside the farmhouse, where they could see the bodies inside. The boys had been at school when the killings occurred but were home by the time Janabi and his wife arrived."

Accused Soldier Joined Army To "Get Direction." The AP (7/6, Breed) reports Pvt. Green "was a high-school dropout from a broken home who enlisted to get some direction in his life, yet was sent home early because of an 'anti-social personality disorder.'" Green "could get the death penalty if convicted in the horrific crime that has strained the U.S. military's already troubled relations with the Iraqi people and sent shockwaves around the world." Military officials "said the accusations of Green's involvement in the rape and killings came to light more than a month later during a session to counsel soldiers about the June 16 abductions of two fellow soldiers who were killed, and reportedly mutilated, by insurgents."

The New York Times (7/6, Cloud, 1.19M) reports Pvt. Green "was allowed to leave the Army in May under guidelines that required a medical finding that he was suffering from a severe personality disorder, according to documents released by the Army on Wednesday." Green "left the Army on May 13 under a regulation that allows the Army to honorably discharge a soldier if a psychiatric evaluation finds a personality disorder 'so severe that the soldier's ability to function effectively in the military environment is significantly impaired,' the Army documents said."

Kurdish Islamists Seek To Ensconce Sharia In Regional Constitution. The Christian Science Monitor (7/6, Brandon, 61K) reports the creation "of a new constitution for Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region was meant to be relatively straightforward. But instead, Kurdish Islamic parties have courted controversy by calling a greater role for sharia, or Islamic law." Mohammed Ahmed, a member of parliament for the Kurdistan Islamic Union (KIU), "the largest Kurdish Islamic party in the regional parliament, the Kurdistan National Assembly," said, "The Kurds are a Muslim nation and we have to follow Islam." The Monitor adds that "such calls may well go unheeded by secular parties which hold 80 percent of seats in the parliament, where a cross-party committee is now drawing up a draft constitution." But the "demands for Islamic law reflect the growing popularity of Islamic parties like the KIU and its smaller, more radical rival Komala, which was once allied with the Al-Qaeda's Kurdish offshoot Ansar Al-Islam. While unlikely to change the political power balance in Kurdistan any time soon, the Islamic parties may cultivate the ground for more radical ideas to take root."

Bombings In Kabul Kill One, Injure 47. The AP (7/6, Shah) reports, "Multiple bombs exploded Wednesday in Kabul for the second day in a row, killing one bystander, wounding 47 and raising fears that violence largely confined to the south and east will increasingly make its way into the capital." The blasts "came as U.S.-led coalition forces in the south killed 35 suspected militants during a raid Tuesday night while hunting for Taliban fighters. One British soldier was killed on patrol in a separate attack." The violence "has shaken the city, which has seen little of the heavy fighting sparked by resurgent Taliban militants in southern Afghanistan."

The Washington Post (7/6, A12, Constable, 744K) reports the three bombs were "apparently aimed at buses carrying government workers and Afghan troops." The blasts "occurred one day after two similar bombs were set off here, injuring 10. In those attacks, one bomb exploded near a bus carrying workers to the Interior Ministry and the second detonated in a vendor's cart near the Justice and Finance ministries, several hundred yards from the presidential palace."

Afghanistan Destroys 40 Tons Of Confiscated Drugs. The AP (7/6, Faiez) reports Afghan officials "destroyed more than 40 tons of confiscated narcotics worth an estimated $500 million on Wednesday in a giant bonfire on the outskirts of Kabul." Afghan counter narcotics police "have also arrested more than 600 drug traffickers, including 19 government officials, over the last year, said Deputy Interior Ministry Gen. Mohammad Daud Daud. Some 63 traffickers have been given long-term jail sentences for drug smuggling, according to the ministry."

Fisher Houses Aid Families Of Wounded Veterans. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (7/6), San Antonio Express-News columnist Jonathan Gurwitz says that since the fall of 2001, the Brooke Army Medical Center (BAMC) at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio "has treated more than 2,300 casualties from Operation Enduring Freedom and Operation Iraqi Freedom. The trauma center is heartbreakingly filled with the mangled and burned bodies of young Americans. For the wounded, the love and care of family members is indispensable. The painful rehabilitation process is made more bearable by the presence of loved ones. And many times, that would not be possible were it not for Fisher Houses." The Fisher Houses are "homes away from home for the families of wounded service members. They were born from a discussion in 1990 between the late Zachary Fisher, New York developer and philanthropist, and Pauline Trost, wife of Chief of Naval Operations Adm. Carlisle Trost." Mrs. Trost, "who was a volunteer at Bethesda Naval Hospital, relayed the story of a sailor sleeping in his car because he couldn't afford a hotel room while his wife was recuperating from surgery. The account inspired Mr. Fisher and Adm. Trost to begin a bureaucratic fight to create an innovative partnership between government and private philanthropy."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lay Dies Of Heart Attack. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 4, 2:20, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "Ken Lay, the founder of Enron, who took it to such great heights before it collapsed in one of greatest scandals in corporate history, died of a heart attack today at the age of 64."

The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 6, 1:55, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "Lay's sudden death didn't temper the anger of former employees." Lois Black, former Enron employee: "It's easy to die. Boom, you're gone. But to serve day after day in a prison cell after having lived a lavish lifestyle that he had become accustomed to, it's getting out easy."

NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 6, 2:10, Teague, 9.87M) reported, "During the trial, Lay claimed his personal fortune was gone, but in filings just last week, prosecutors said his assets total nearly $8 million, including this luxury condo here in Houston. Prosecutors today aren't commenting on Lay's death, and his family asks that their privacy be respected. Meanwhile, former Enron employees are left stunned." Connie Castillo, former Enron employee: "No matter how bad or whatever he did, he loved his family and that was pretty clear."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Emshwiller, 2.11M) reports, "With his death, his record may be expunged, though civil lawsuits against his estate likely will continue." The New York Times (7/6, Romero, 1.19M) says Lay's death "may have spared his survivors financial ruin. Mr. Lay's death effectively voids the guilty verdict against him, temporarily thwarting the federal government's efforts to seize his remaining real estate and financial assets, legal experts say."

The Financial Times (7/6, Ben White) says "Lay's death means the full story of Enron's catastrophic fall may never be known. Historians had hoped Mr Lay might provide a fuller account, from prison or after his release, of what was real at Enron and what was accounting fantasy." A similar Los Angeles Times (7/6, Bustillo, Mulligan, 958K) story reports Lay's death "complicates the federal government's effort to close the books on one of its most ambitious corporate fraud prosecutions. Legal experts said there is precedent in the federal courts for a criminal conviction to be wiped out after a defendant's death, on the grounds that the case had not reached finality because the defendant had not had the opportunity to exhaust all appeals."

The Washington Times/AP (7/6, Hays) reports Lay "had stayed out of the public eye since a federal jury on May 25 convicted him and former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling of fraud and conspiracy for lying to employees and investors about Enron's financial health." Lay, "who described himself as naturally optimistic, displayed no signs of ill health throughout the grueling four-month trial that started Jan. 30. His lead lawyer, Michael Ramsey, was sidelined for several weeks during the trial because of heart problems." Kurtzman "said the autopsy revealed that Lay had a heart attack in the past." The New York Times (7/6, Eichenwald, 1.19M) and Washington Post (7/6, A1, Johnson, 744K) run similar reports.

The Deal (7/6, Poole) reports, "The death Wednesday of Kenneth Lay, the founder and former chairman and CEO of Enron Corp., means any restitution in the criminal case will probably be vacated and the future of the Securities and Exchange Commission and civil cases will be more difficult to pursue, according to attorneys following the case. … 'It's a tragic end to a tragic story,' said Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and now partner at Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker in Washington. 'You don't have to be doctor to know that he was under a lot of stress. The sentencing won't go forward, mooted by his death, but the more interesting issue will be seizure and now forfeiture of the assets -- do they transfer to his wife? Even if they pass to a spouse or family, they're still attachable and still forfeitable to the government.'" The Deal adds, "Jacob Frenkel, a defense attorney at Shulman Rogers Gandal Pordy & Ecker in Rockville, Md., who worked at the SEC and is also a former federal prosecutor, said while Lay's death is sad and shows the 'human soul' of the case, there will be a lot of pressure on the government to pursue Lay's assets. 'But whether it can be done through a criminal proceeding, that's the unanswered question. It's not a case against an entity; it's a case against him, and he's no longer here. Then there's the SEC case and civil litigation. Those seeking to pursue his assets may or may not be able to find recovery.'"

CNN.com (7/6) reports, "White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday that Lay was an 'acquaintance,' not a friend, of the president, 'and many of the president's acquaintances have passed on during his time in office.' … 'I really haven't talked to him about it,' Snow said. 'I'll give you my own personal reaction, which is that when somebody dies, you leave behind those who grieve, and I think they deserve our compassion.' … The U.S. Justice Department had no comment in reaction to news of Lay's death."

AFP (7/6, Lever) reports, "David Berg, a Houston-based trial lawyer who has followed the case closely, said Lay's death would have no impact on Skilling's sentence or appeal, or on the various civil suits pending. … 'As to the civil cases (against Lay) it will have no impact because it will proceed against his estate,' Berg said."

The Rocky Mountain News (7/6, Rudawsky) reports, "As part of the 64-year-old's $5 million bond conditions, he was required to stay in the Southern District of Texas or Colorado or en route between the two until his sentencing in October. … He reportedly traveled to Old Snowmass, about 12 miles 'downvalley' from the better-known town of Aspen, shortly after he was convicted. He was sighted on a United Airlines flight, and was said to be staying at a ranch, rarely coming into town."

More Commentary. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) editorializes that Lay "was headed for the penitentiary, but that did not have to be the end for him. He would have had an opportunity to use his personal skills to help other prisoners. And at 64 years, he might have had another shot at that third act after all. Michael Milken has devoted much of his resources to medical research since serving his sentence. What Ken Lay might have done we will never know. Chances are it would have been interesting."

Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (7/6, D1, 744K), "The remarkable rise and tragic fall of Ken Lay is really a story about a man whose optimism was finally outrun by reality. Early on, he found he could succeed by putting the best face on things, stretching the truth, dismissing the doubts of naysayers." But "in the end, those habits became his undoing." Also in the Washington Post (7/6, C1, 744K), Henry Allen writes an "Essay" titled "Ken Lay's Last Evasion," in which he says "many people had looked forward to knowing more about Ken Lay, especially how he liked prison."

2nd Circuit Asks New York Court To Rule On NASD Form Statement Privilege. The New York Law Journal (7/6, Hamblett) reports, "Are statements made by an employer on a National Association of Securities Dealers termination form subject to an absolute or qualified privilege? … That is the question the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals wants New York state judges to answer as it wrestles with the latest of several cases where a fired employee claims he was libeled in a termination form by his employer." The Journal continues, "The circuit, calling it an 'unsettled and important' question of New York law, has asked the state's highest court to resolve the issue in Rosenberg v. MetLife. Inc., 05-4363-cv. … The decision certifying the question to the New York Court of Appeals was issued by Chief Judge John M. Walker Jr., Judge Dennis Jacobs and, sitting by designation, Judge J. Clifford Wallace of the 9th Circuit." The Journal adds, "Chaskie Rosenberg sued MetLife for employment discrimination, libel, fraudulent misrepresentation and breach of contract. The suit claimed Rosenberg was investigated and ultimately fired because he was a Hasidic Jew. … The NASD requires that, whenever a registered employee is terminated, member firms must fill out a termination form -- Form U-5. … Rosenberg's Form U-5 stated that, 'An internal review disclosed Mr. Rosenberg appeared to have violated company policies and procedures involving speculative insurance sales and possible accessory to money laundering violations.' … That same statement, Walker said, appeared on the Form U-5 of each of five other Hasidic Jews who were fired by MetLife -- all of whom worked out of the company's All-Boro Agency and were hired to develop business in the Hasidic community in Brooklyn. … Southern District of New York Judge Jed Rakoff held that the statement on the Form U-5 was absolutely privileged, barring legal action against MetLife. Rakoff said that, although the circuit may have ruled to the contrary in Fahnestock & Co. v. Waltman, 935 F.2d 512 (1991), 'the overwhelming authority in the New York courts has since rendered Fahnestock bad law.'"

Stock Options Probe Widens To Include Marvell, Quest, Openwave. Bloomberg News (7/6, Day) reports, "Marvell Technology Group Ltd.'s accounting is being scrutinized, Quest Software Inc. will restate six years of results and Openwave Systems Inc. received two subpoenas as the investigation into stock-option grants widened." Bloomberg continues, "Executives of Mercury Interactive Corp. held a conference call Wednesday to discuss Monday's announcement that it found 54 intentional acts of option backdating starting as far back as 1994. … The Securities and Exchange Commission signaled an escalation in the effort to clean up option grants by warning Mercury that it may bar three directors from serving on boards of public companies. Mercury, Marvell, Openwave and Quest are among at least 62 companies whose option grants to executives and directors are under scrutiny by the SEC, the Justice Department or internal review panels. … 'You're going to see more and more action against directors by the commission,' former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt said Wednesday. 'The commission takes this very seriously and will come down hard.'" Bloomberg notes, "Apple Computer Inc. and Home Depot Inc. also are investigating to see if grant dates were manipulated to increase payoffs. Apple late Wednesday said that at least two shareholder lawsuits were brought against company officers and directors over the option grants."

The AP (7/6, Gordon) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission staff is considering civil charges against a former finance chief and three directors of Mercury Interactive Corp., as regulators sharpen a probe into how stock options were dated." The AP continues, "Mercury, one of the earliest companies to become ensnared in the widening controversy over suspicious timing of stock option awards to top executives, disclosed the notices from the SEC enforcement staff to the three directors." The AP adds, "Separately, software maker Opsware Inc., said Wednesday that its chief financial officer, Sharlene Abrams — who formerly held that position at Mercury — also had received a so-called Wells notice from the SEC related to timing of stock options at her former company. .. In issuing Wells notices, the SEC enforcement staff customarily gives the companies or individuals receiving them the chance to make the case why charges are unwarranted. … The three Mercury directors — Igal Kohavi, Yair Shamir and Giora Yaron — have told the SEC staff they will formally assert 'that they did not violate the federal securities laws, that they did not participate in or know of option backdating, and that the charges under consideration are legally and factually without basis,' the company said Monday in a news release."

Austrian Bank To Pay $675 Million In Refco Probe. USA Today (6/6, Farrell) reports, "More than six months after the former CEO of a financial services firm was indicted on charges of fraud, a government investigation into the matter seems to have gathered momentum." USA continues, "The U.S. Attorney's office here announced Monday that an Austrian bank would pay at least $675 million to settle claims that it helped Refco and its former CEO, Phillip Bennett, hide more than $1 billion in debt from investors and creditors in the past five years." USA adds, "The settlement was part of a non-prosecution agreement between federal prosecutors and the Bank fur Arbeit und Wirtschaft (Bawag), headquartered in Vienna. In a statement, Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, said the bank merited the non-prosecution agreement because new management, installed in January after the scandal, was cooperating fully with the criminal investigation. … Although no mention was made of the bank's previous management, prosecutors and regulators from the Securities and Exchange Commission are continuing their investigation." USA notes, "The deal lifts a cloud of uncertainty from the bank, while resolving most of the financial claims that have been lodged against it for its role in propping up Refco, now in Chapter 11. … More than half of the $675 million settlement will go to Refco's creditors. About $84 million will be paid to Thomas Lee Partners, which bought a substantial stake in the firm in 2004, and another $100 million to shareholders who invested in Refco after its 2005 IPO."

Private-Equity Firms Quick To Hire DC Insiders. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, B2B, Tracy) reports, "Private-equity firms are finding it hard to turn down job candidates when their experience includes oversight of the U.S. economy, drafting national laws and trying to secure world peace. Within the past decade, U.S. private-equity firms have recruited more than a dozen politicians to their ranks, employing them as partners, consultants, advisers and board members. Law firms and other high-powered employers often follow the same strategy. In April, Apollo Investment Corp., the publicly traded arm of Apollo Management LP, became the most recent firm to hire a Washington insider, appointing former U.S. Sen. Thomas A. Daschle of South Dakota to its board." The Journal notes, "Former Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill joined Blackstone Group in 2003; Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers recruited former Secretary of State Colin Powell last year; and Yucaipa Cos. brought former President Bill Clinton on board in 2002. Over the years, Carlyle Group has employed almost half a dozen ex-government officials, including former President George H.W. Bush, former Secretary of State James Baker and former Secretary of Defense Frank Carlucci." The Journal adds that "private-equity firms have plenty of reasons to be involved in Washington's affairs these days." The SEC's "attempts to regulate hedge funds are continuing. Also, Congress could always consider legislation concerning capital-gains taxes or Sarbanes-Oxley requirements that might affect their operations."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US Charges Three In Theft Of Coke Secrets. The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 10, 0:20, Smith) reported, "Three people, including an employee of Coca-Cola, were charged today with stealing Coke's secret recipes and trying to sell them to Pepsi. Federal authorities say a Coke employee rifled through company files at Coke's Atlanta headquarters and stole documents and a sample of a new drink. The arrest came after an undercover investigation."

The Washington Post (7/6, D1, Day) reports, "The FBI arrested three people in Atlanta yesterday on charges that they conspired to steal trade secrets from Coca-Cola Co. and sell the information for more than $1.5 million to PepsiCo Inc., federal law enforcement officials said." The Post continues, "The defendants, including one Coca-Cola employee, who worked as an administrative assistant in the company's Atlanta headquarters, contacted PepsiCo officials in May, who tipped off Coca-Cola officials, who then contacted the FBI, according to Atlanta U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias. … Coca-Cola and PepsiCo, whose fierce rivalry in the soft-drink and food arena has provided case studies for generations of marketing students, worked together to help federal agents set up an undercover sting operation that led to yesterday's arrests."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Mckay) reports, "Pepsi tipped off Coke to the scheme, which was busted after an undercover agent paid off one of the defendants with $30,000 stuffed into a Girl Scout cookie box, according to a statement from the U.S. attorney's office in Atlanta. The suspects, who are charged with wire fraud and unlawfully stealing and selling Coke trade secrets, were arrested Wednesday and are expected to appear before a federal magistrate judge in Atlanta Thursday." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors said the three people arrested had attempted to sell to Pepsi several documents and a sample of a product under development at Coke. An unidentified senior executive at Pepsi headquarters in Purchase, N.Y., received a letter in May in an official Coca-Cola envelope from a man identifying himself as 'Dirk' and offering to sell confidential Coke information, Pepsi spokesman Mark Dollins said. … Mr. Dollins said Pepsi 'immediately' turned the letter over to Coke, of Atlanta. 'We only did what any responsible company would do,' he said. 'Competition must be tough, but must always be fair and legal.' On May 24, Coke turned the letter over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which launched an undercover investigation."

The New York Times (7/6, Goodman) reports, "The recipe for Coca-Cola Classic, perhaps the company's most closely guarded secret, was never in jeopardy, said Ben Deutsch, a spokesman for Coca-Cola. … Instead, the information seems to be related to a beverage in development that had not yet been released, though the company declined to reveal more about the nature or scope of the thefts." The Times adds, "Executives at Coca-Cola verified that the documents were valid and proprietary. … At least one glass vial containing a sample of a new drink was offered for sale, court documents said. … According to a criminal complaint filed in federal court Wednesday, a letter postmarked May 8 and written on a Coca-Cola letterhead by someone who claimed to be a high-level employee at the company was mailed to executives at PepsiCo, offering 'very detailed and confidential information' in exchange for cash. … 'Pepsi, to their great credit, turned the letter over to Coke, who brought the matter to us,' said David E. Nahmias, United States attorney for the Northern District of Georgia."

The Financial Times (7/6, Ward) reports, "Prosecutors said that video footage filmed at Coke's headquarters showed Joya Williams, a company employee, rifling through corporate files and stuffing documents and the drink sample into her bag. … According to prosecutors, another of the conspirators attempted to sell the documents to an undercover FBI agent, posing as a go-between for PepsiCo, for $10,000 and the product sample for $75,000. … Later, the FBI agent struck a deal with the same suspect to buy additional trade secrets for $1.5m."

AFP (7/6) and the Atlanta Business Chronicle (7/6) also report on the arrests.

Former Florida Prisons Head To Plead Guilty To Federal Kickback Charge. USA Today/AP (7/6) reports, "The former head of Florida's prisons, ousted amid a broad investigation of alleged criminal activity within the system, will plead guilty to a federal charge of accepting kickbacks, according to court documents filed Wednesday." The AP continues, "Former Florida Corrections Secretary James Crosby and former corrections department regional director Allen Clark are accused of accepting $130,000 from a subcontractor over 2 years ending in February, according to the documents filed in U.S. District Court." The AP adds, "As part of a plea agreement, Crosby will not face any other federal charges in return for his cooperation in the continuing investigation. Clark also accepted a plea agreement. … U.S. Attorney Paul Perez said both Crosby and Clark can expect up to eight years in prison." The AP notes< "Law enforcement officials said seven other current and former prison employees are facing state charges of grand theft and one other person a charge of accepting unauthorized compensation."

The Tallahassee Democrat (7/6, Cotterell, 51K) adds that at a press conference yesterday, US Attorney Paul Perez and Jacksonville FBI Assistant SAC Nestor Duarte "said that Crosby and Clark took kickbacks totaling $1,000 to $12,000 per month from a subcontactor of Keefe Commissary Network of St. Louis. Crosby and Clark approached Keefe about its using a Gainesville friend of theirs to handle prison concessions. The unidentified subcontractor allegedly promised Clark and Crosby 40 percent of the $1.5 million he stood to make."

The Miami Herald (7/6, Caputo, Long, 323K) reports, "Crosby's written plea agreement implicating himself and…Clark was released just before state and federal authorities announced seven other former officials of the nation's third-largest prison system were charged in state court with theft. Including Wednesday's arrests, 21 former Department of Corrections workers have been charged since 2003 in a wide-ranging probe of steroid distribution, rampant theft, misuse of inmate labor, questionable contracts, drunken violence and a cutthroat softball culture in which a former pro slugger was given a no-show job to play ball. … Said FBI investigator Nestor Duarte: 'Many times when the top officials of a public agency are engaged in corrupt activity it fosters a culture of corruption which permeates the department.'"

New York Times Reporter Banned From Visiting Jailed Pellicano. The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Philips) reports, "The Metropolitan Detention Center in Los Angeles has barred a New York Times reporter from the facility for allegedly misrepresenting herself in an effort to interview Anthony Pellicano, the celebrity detective at the center of a Hollywood wiretapping scandal." The Times continues, "Allison Hope Weiner, who has written about the Pellicano case, got into the jail last month after presenting a State Bar of California card and asking to speak with the investigator. Weiner, who earned a degree 20 years ago from the USC law school, is registered with the California bar but has never done legal work for Pellicano or the New York Times." The Times adds, "Michael Benov, warden of the detention center, issued an order in February saying that, for security reasons, no one could visit Pellicano except his lawyer or immediate family. After learning that Weiner was admitted to a room in the jail where prisoners meet with their lawyers, Benov ordered an investigation. … Guards brought Pellicano from his cell to the meeting room, but he refused to talk to Weiner after learning that she was a reporter. .. A spokeswoman for the New York Times confirmed that Weiner had received a letter from Benov permanently barring her from the facility."

FBI To Open Criminal Probe Of Memphis Parking Garage Construction Errors. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (7/6, Williams, Erskine)

reports, "The FBI is launching a criminal investigation of FedExForum's parking garage, answering the calls of City Council members and angering Mayor Willie Herenton. 'This is so ridiculous for anyone to suggest that there's been some criminal activity,' Herenton said Wednesday. … But council member Myron Lowery, referring to $6.3 million in federal funding the city is losing over garage mistakes, said, 'If there was nothing done illegally, why are we being asked to pay back money out of future funds?' FBI spokesman George Bolds declined to comment Wednesday, but U.S. Atty. David Kustoff said, 'The matter has been referred to the FBI for the purpose of determining any criminal activity involving the construction of the parking garage at the FedExForum.'" WREG-TV Memphis (7/5, Encina) notes on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "the FBI will start investigating how the 20 million dollar FedEx Forum parking garage is lacking an entire floor, not to mention a bus terminal." Kustoff said, "If the report comes back and there was criminal activity we will prosecute." WREG adds that in a statement released yesterday, the Memphis Public Building Authority, "the agency in charge of overseeing the construction of the forum," said it "is confident it properly fulfilled it's responsibilities" and "will cooperate fully with the ongoing investigation."

Judge Rejects Defense Motion To Vacate Virginia Mayor's Corruption Conviction. The Lynchburg News & Advance (7/6, Reilly) reports US District Judge James Turk ruled yesterday that "defense motions seeking to throw out the recent convictions against Carl Hutcherson have 'no basis,'" derailing "a defense strategy focused on acquitting the former Lynchburg mayor of obstruction of justice, a crime his attorneys have said factor 'greatly' into his sentence." The News & Advance notes, "The defense reasoned that Hutcherson couldn't be convicted of obstruction because prosecutors forced him to turn over fake board minutes to a grand jury. … But Turk wrote that the defense's reasoning is flawed because of the 'misguided reliance' on an older section of the code dealing with obstruction. The former mayor's conviction for lying to an FBI agent and leading him on a search for documents he knew didn't exist is consistent with the newer obstruction law, Turk wrote."

Nevada DA Withdraws From Spousal Murder-Judicial Sniper Case. The AP (7/6, Chereb) reports, "Washoe County District Attorney Dick Gammick, citing possible conflicts of interest, on Wednesday removed his office from the case involving a wealthy businessman charged with killing his wife and shooting the judge who was handling their bitter divorce. At a morning news conference, Gammick said the Clark County district attorney's office will take over prosecution of Darren Mack." The AP notes that for the 11 days Mack was on the run, "Gammick said Mack called him about a dozen times to discuss his surrender. They also communicated by e-mail. Because of those communications, defense lawyers argue that Gammick is a potential witness."

Missouri Man Sentenced To Year In Prison For Identity Theft. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/6, Shinkle, 310K) reports, "An identity thief who made taunting statements to his victim was sentenced Wednesday to a year and a day in prison and ordered to repay $12,316 in losses." Mario D. Smith of St. Louis "pleaded guilty in April in U.S. District Court to one count of credit card fraud. The FBI claimed that Smith used the credit cards of Steven B. Weiss to set up credit card accounts, and then made charges on those accounts. … The case became more than a routine identity theft when Weiss contacted the perpetrator to try to stop the fraud, and the two had a series of communications." The Post-Dispatch notes, "Ultimately, authorities concluded that Smith…did not intend to harm Weiss."

Son Of Former Liberian Leader Pleads Not Guilty To US Fraud Charges. The New York Times (7/6, Goodnough) reports, "The son of Charles G. Taylor, the Liberian warlord and former president awaiting trial in the Netherlands on charges of human rights atrocities, pleaded not guilty here on Wednesday to charges of passport fraud and was returned to jail to await trial." The Times continues, "The son, Charles McArthur Emmanuel, also known as Charles Taylor Jr., has been held without bail at the Federal Detention Center downtown since March 30, when he arrived at Miami International Airport from Trinidad and Tobago." The Times adds, "Mr. Emmanuel lied on March 15 in applying to renew his passport and listing his father as Steven Smith of St. Vincent, court papers say. … He was seeking the renewal at the American Embassy in Port of Spain, Trinidad, days before President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf of Liberia asked Nigeria to extradite his father to face charges in Sierra Leone. … Mr. Emmanuel, 29, who goes by Chuckie, was born in Boston to a girlfriend of Mr. Taylor, who was living there. The criminal complaint against him says Mr. Emmanuel joined his father in West Africa in the 1990's, running the Liberian Antiterrorist Unit, an elite military force that provided security to Mr. Taylor while he was president of the war-torn country from 1997 to 2003."

DC Lobbying Firm Under Corruption Probe Underreported Income. The Washington Post (7/6, A4, Smith) reports, "A Washington lobbying firm at the center of a federal corruption probe failed to disclose at least $755,000 in income from 17 nonprofit organizations and governmental entities, and $635,000 from 18 other clients between 1998 and 2005, according to the firm's recently amended filings with the clerk of the House." The Post continues, "Lawyers for the Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White firm say that the errors were inadvertent. But some experts have called them unusual and suggested that Copeland Lowery might have been trying to play down how much money it was paid by those who received federal grants the firm arranged, particularly the clients who paid its lobbying fees with tax-exempt or public funds." The Post adds, "Such payments to obtain 'earmarks' -- a form of funding directed by language that lawmakers often insert in spending bills without hearings or competition -- have become increasingly common on Capitol Hill and increasingly controversial. Federal investigators have been probing whether there was a relationship between some of these earmarks and the campaign donations Copeland Lowery lobbyists made to House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) and his committee colleagues. … The initial reporting errors had the effect of understating what Copeland Lowery received in lobbying fees from universities, health-care centers and municipal governments, among others. The reporting errors also understated what the lobbying firm received from private firms including ADCS Inc., owned by Brent R. Wilkes, a longtime Republican contributor also targeted in the federal probe. … Wilkes, who was close to former representative Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.) before Cunningham's recent conviction for taking $2.4 million worth of bribes, was identified as co-conspirator No. 1 in court documents charging Cunningham, a former Appropriations Committee member. Lewis and Wilkes have denied wrongdoing."

Maryland Accountant Denies Aiding Bribery Scheme. The Washington Post (7/6, B04, Rich) reports, "An Upper Marlboro accountant, testifying at his own trial yesterday, denied that he conspired with two Prince George's County officials to demand a $250,000 bribe from a security company in exchange for a county contract worth more than $1 million." The Post continues, "At the trial, which is winding toward conclusion after six days of testimony, prosecutors have accused accountant Paul L. Wright of serving as the bagman in a 2004 bribery scheme targeting Interior Systems Inc. They allege that payments in exchange for the contract were to be laundered through one of Wright's companies." The Post adds, "The investigation by State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh, in cooperation with the FBI and other agencies, has led to the conviction of Robert L. Isom, the former deputy director of the county Department of Environmental Resources. Isom pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery last September and testified against Wright last week. … As the prosecution and Isom described it, the cost of the scheme would have been borne by taxpayers: ISI, a subcontractor, was to recover the cost of the bribery payments through change orders that were to be approved by county staff after the contract was awarded. … Wright's trial in Prince George's Circuit Court has offered a preview of the evidence prosecutors will probably present next month at the trial of the official they have painted as the ringleader, Robert L. Thomas, the former deputy director of the county's Office of Central Services."

New York Lawmakers Criticized For Failing To Pass Sex-Trafficking Bill. In a piece in the New York Times (7/6), columnist Bob Herbert writes, "Early last year a Democratic assemblyman from the Bronx, Jeffrey Dinowitz, introduced a bill to fight sex trafficking." Dinowitz "hoped, through his legislation, to establish two new crimes in New York: trafficking a person for sexual servitude and trafficking a person for labor servitude." His bill "would have made trafficking a Class C felony, with penalties ranging from probation for a first-time offender to a maximum of 15 years in prison. It would have modestly raised the penalties for patronizing prostitutes, making it easier to jail chronic offenders. And it would have addressed the problem of sex tourism, in which tour companies arrange trips from the U.S. to foreign countries so the tourists -- invariably men -- can have sex with foreign prostitutes, many of whom have been forced into the sex trade, and some of whom are children." Hebert notes, however, that Dinowitz's "bill hit a few roadblocks," as the Assembly and state Senate squabbled over the wording in the bill. Herbert adds, "Neither house of the Legislature gave the other house's bill serious consideration. Last week the Assembly and the Senate adjourned without making any genuine attempt to actually enact a law against sex trafficking. It was a big win for the pimps and the madams."

Intelligence Analyst Faces Questions Over Support For China Spy. The Washington Times (7/6, Gertz, 90K) reports that Lonnie Henley, a high ranking US intelligence analyst "is facing an internal probe for his support of former Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) analyst Ron Montaperto, who recently pleaded guilty to an espionage-related charge involving contacts with Chinese intelligence." Henley "recently sent a two-page e-mail to several hundred current and former US intelligence and policy officials criticizing the FBI investigation of Montaperto and defending the former DIA analyst. … Mr. Henley also made telephone calls to intelligence officials after the guilty plea to state that Montaperto was caught up in technical violations of classified information laws."

Federal Judge Blocks Rule Allowing Firms To Cut Retirees' Benefits. The New York Times (7/6, Pear) reports, "A federal district judge on Wednesday blocked a Bush administration rule that would have allowed employers to reduce or eliminate health benefits for retirees when they reach age 65 and become eligible for Medicare." The Times continues, "Ten million retirees could have had benefits cut under the rule, which was adopted last April by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. … The judge, Anita B. Brody of the Federal District Court in Philadelphia, struck down the rule and issued a permanent injunction that prohibits federal officials from enforcing it. … The rule 'is contrary to Congressional intent and the plain language of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act,' the 1967 law that bans most forms of age discrimination in the workplace, Judge Brody wrote." The Times adds, "The erosion of retiree health benefits is an explosive political issue. Before issuing the rule, the commission was deluged with letters opposing it. … The rule would have created an explicit exemption to the age discrimination law, allowing employers to reduce health benefits for retirees when they became eligible for Medicare. Under the rule, Judge Brody said, employers could have given older retirees "health benefits that are inferior" to those given retirees younger than 65. … The commission argued that employers were more likely to continue providing health benefits to retirees under 65 if they were allowed to reduce or eliminate benefits for those 65 and older. … AARP, the main plaintiff in the case, rejected that argument. It said the rule would accelerate the erosion of retiree health benefits, a trend that has been evident for more than a decade."

Dispute Over Florida Synagogue Settled. The Miami Herald (7/6, Wright) reports, "A five-year battle between the city of Hollywood and an Orthodox Jewish synagogue appears to be over." The Herald continues, "The two sides agreed to end the feud today, signing a settlement deal that will allow the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch to stay in two homes in a residential neighborhood permanently and expand to three other homes in the future. … The city would also pay the congregation $2 million." The Herald adds, "The deal was hand-delivered at around 2:50 p.m. to the federal courthouse in Miami, just ahead of a deadline set by Judge Joan Lenard on Monday. … Lenard has to approve the settlement, but city officials said the fight is over. … In return for the right to stay and expand, the Chabad and the U.S. Justice Department agreed to drop their religious discrimination lawsuits against the city and Commissioner Sal Oliveri."

CBS 4, Miami, FL (7/6, Murray) reports, "Lawyers had been given till Wednesday afternoon to reach a settlement or face trial otherwise. Both sides have agreed to the settlement which includes: Giving Chabad Lubavitch the right to continue using two homes in a residential area as a synagogue, and it gives them the right to buy a third home to use as a parking lot. Furthermore, the city has to pay Chabad $2 Million dollars. Chabad will also have the right to buy as many more properties in the area as it needs to continue practicing their religion." CBS 4 continues, "Sources close to the negotiations say the two sides met on the July 4th holiday to hammer out an agreement, and said the documents outlining the settlement have been sent to judge Lenard, in advance of her deadline. The judge will decide whether to approve the settlement Thursday."

Navy Chaplain's Complaint Ruled "Without Merit." A Navy review has ruled that a Navy chaplain's complaint that his commanding officer censored and harassed him by discouraging the use of certain Bible quotations was "without merit." The Washington Times (7/6, Scarborough, 90K) reports that Navy Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt "said the investigative report actually backs up his complaint, even though the chief investigator sided with the commander." The chaplain "said his commanding officer, Capt. James Carr, retaliated against him by downgrading his January 2005 fitness report. But Adm. Ruehe concluded that the report 'was not the result of improper discrimination on the basis of his religious beliefs or the practice of his faith, but rather Captain Carr's legitimate evaluation of his performance of duty.'"

Care Of Family Leads To Discrimination Suits. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 9, 2:25, Sawyer) reported, "There is news tonight about a relatively new kind of discrimination. Workers being treated unfairly because of their family obligations. It is called family responsibility discrimination. It's about the care of children but also about the care of elderly parents. And the pressure has led to an explosion of lawsuits." ABC (B. Stark) added, "Dawn Gallina says her career at a prestigious law firm was going well until the managing partner found out she had a baby. Then, she says, he started testing her. Would she work Christmas and come in weekends?" Dawn Gallina: "I would come in, and we wouldn't have anything to do. But I really felt like it was – let's see if she'll come in. And, of course, I would." Stark: "Eventually she was let go. A victim, she says, of family responsibility discrimination. It can happen to mothers and fathers or daughters and sons. Jonathan Bell, who routinely works six days a week designing cars, says his troubles started after his father was hospitalized." Jonathan Bell: "I took a Saturday off to attend to my father. Sunday I went into work for awhile, and then Monday, the next day after, I -- that's when I was let go." Stark: "Bell's employer says he was one of many workers laid off for financial reasons. But law professor Joan Williams says Bell and Gallina are part of a growing trend." Prof. Joan Williams: "The fact is, in many situations, workers with family responsibilities are not treated the same as workers without the family responsibilities." Stark: "Now these women and men are taking their cases to court. In the last decade, there's been a 400% increase in family responsibility discrimination suits. And the good news for caregivers is that while employers may not be family friendly, the courts increasingly are." Prof. Williams: "Family values have a very broad constituency. You are more likely to win, it appears, if you bring a family responsibilities discrimination case, than if you bring other kinds of discrimination cases." Stark: "Jonathan Bell's case is still in court. But after a jury sided with Dawn Gallina, her employer offered her a cash settlement." Dawn Gallina: "I don't think that by being a parent, that anyone wants special rights. I think we want equal rights."

US Intensifies Scrutiny Of Air Fares. The Financial Times (7/6, Cameron) reports, "US regulators intensified their scrutiny of transatlantic air fares with plans to end a long-standing practice which allows carriers to co-ordinate some pricing." The Times continues, "The Department of Transportation wants to remove antitrust immunity from airlines co-operating in the regular price-setting conferences organised by the International Air Transport Association, mirroring similar efforts by competition authorities in Europe and Australia." The Times adds, "The fares set by the conferences do not prevent airlines from offering discount and other prices, but the DoT believes the practice limits competition and is unnecessary in an industry where most of the largest carriers now co-operate through the global alliances which now dominate the industry. The transportation department wants to end immunity for carriers setting prices through IATA on passenger and cargo flights from the US to Europe and Australia. … However, the proposal also coincides with the launch of probes on both sides of the Atlantic into alleged collusion by operators in the passenger and cargo markets." The Times notes, "More than a dozen airlines are being investigated by the justice department and the European Commission about price-fixing in the freight business. British Airways last month admitted it was at the centre of an investigation into an alleged cartel setting prices on longhaul passenger routes. … IATA has defended the fare-setting practice, arguing that it allows carriers to operate so-called 'interline' agreements. The prices set at the tariff conference set a template of fares and conditions which IATA says allows passengers to travel on two or more airlines between destinations lacking direct service."

ADC, Andrew Close In On Buyout Deal. The AP (7/6) reports, "ADC Telecommunications Inc. said Wednesday the Federal Trade Commission cut short a required waiting period necessary to complete an acquisition." The AP continues, "ADC announced its plan to buy rival telecommunications equipment company Andrew Corp. May 31 for $1.6 billion in stock. No closing date has been set. … In a statement, the company said the required waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 was lifted early, satisfying a closing condition of the deal. It was set to expire July 14. The law requires companies to file notice of a merger or acquisition in advance with the Federal Trade Commission."

AMS Clears Antitrust Period For Laserscope Purchase. The AP (7/6) reports, "Medical device maker American Medical Systems Holdings Inc. said Wednesday it moved closer to completing its $715 million buyout of San Jose, Calif-based Laserscope." The AP continues, "The company announced the buyout of the medical laser systems maker on June 5. On June 30, the required antitrust waiting period expired, satisfying a closing condition of the deal. The law requires companies to file notice of a merger or acquisition in advance with the Federal Trade Commission. … The deal does not yet have a closing date."

Many Students Turn Down Colleges' Offer Of Free Music Downloads. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Timiraos) reports, "As a student at Cornell University, Angelo Petrigh had access to free online music via a legal music-downloading service his school provided. Yet the 21-year-old still turned to illegal file-sharing programs. .. The reason: While Cornell's online music program, through Napster, gave him and other students free, legal downloads, the email introducing the service explained that students could keep their songs only until they graduated. 'After I read that, I decided I didn't want to even try it,' says Mr. Petrigh, who will be a senior in the fall at the Ithaca, N.Y., school." The Journal adds, "College students don't turn down much that's free. But when it comes to online music, even free hasn't been enough to persuade many students to use such digital download services as Napster, Rhapsody, Ruckus and Cdigix. As a result, some schools have dropped their services, and others are considering doing so or have switched to other providers." The Journal adds, "To stop students from pirating music, more than 120 colleges and universities have tried providing free or subsidized access to the legal subscription services over campus networks in the past few years. About 7% of all four-year schools and 31% of private research universities provided one of the legal downloading services, according to a 2005 survey of 500 schools by the Campus Computing Project, a nonprofit that studies how colleges use information technology. Universities typically pay for the services, some with private grants and others through student fees. While a typical monthly subscription to Napster is $9.95, the schools have been able to cut special deals, funded in part by record companies."

FCC Asks 2nd Circuit To Allow Comments In TV Case. The Wall Street Journal (7/6) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to send back to the agency a court challenge to some recent decisions on indecent television programming, requesting 60 days to handle the matter in a way that allows broadcasters to file comments with the agency." The Journal continues, "TV broadcast networks, including News Corp.'s Fox Television Stations Inc., in April filed court challenges to a handful of March FCC decisions. As part of a broad initiative on indecent programming, the FCC in March had found four television programs were 'indecent and profane,' but hadn't fined the stations. … 'Several of the parties to this litigation have complained to the Commission that this process failed to provide them with any opportunity to be heard by the Commission before the decisions were reached,' the FCC said."

Peabody Energy To Purchase Australia's Excel For $1.34 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Golden) reports, "Peabody Energy Corp., the world's largest private-sector coal company, agreed to acquire Australia's Excel Coal Ltd. for $1.34 billion." The Journal continues, "Peabody will pay 8.50 Australian dollars (US$6.31) a share for all shares outstanding under the terms of the agreement, which is a 10% premium above Excel's average share price over the past month. Peabody will also assume debt of $190 million, Peabody said." The Journal adds, "The move extends St. Louis-based Peabody's expansion in Australia. In the past five years, the company has purchased several coal mines there and developed some of its own. … Excel is an expanding company within the growing industry of producing coal to feed Asian industry. Coal is Australia's biggest export product, and nearly a third of the world's coal produced for export comes from Australia. … The combination of Peabody's Australian operations and Excel 'creates one of the largest coal companies in Australia,' said Peabody President and Chief Executive Officer Gregory H. Boyce."

Maryland Officials Testing Geese For Bird Flu. The Baltimore Sun (7/6, Thomson, 296K) reports a team of biologists from the Maryland Department of Natural Resources has begun testing flocks of geese in the state for avian influenza, specifically the deadly H5N1 strain. According to the Sun, wildlife experts "suspect that if the deadly form of the virus enters this country, it will most likely be through birds that mingle in the arctic during the breeding season before returning to their wintering grounds." Maryland, it notes, has been designated a "Tier One" state by the US Department of Agriculture "because the Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries are at the heart of the Atlantic goose migratory route." The AP (7/6) says the state is using federal funds to test geese flocks at wetlands and ponds across the state.

State Department Discusses Priorities, Wildlife Trafficking. The Washington Post (7/6, A19, Eilperin, 744K) interviews Claudia A. McMurray, who "took the helm of the State Department's Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs in February after spending two years as deputy assistant secretary for the environment." Asked what her priorities were, McMurray said, "Climate change and avian influenza. Those two issues are realities. They're important and complicated issues that we spend time on. Every day I spend time on them." Asked about the $10 billion annual international wildlife trafficking business, McMurray said, "[Wildlife conservation] counts on individual countries to enforce [trafficking] restrictions. While a lot of countries do a really good job, there are a lot of countries that need help. … First of all, the most important thing for governments is a political commitment to stop the trade." China, "in particular, is one that we're interested in because that's the world's largest market. Secondly, we look at supply and demand. This is organized crime, for the most part."

WPost Makes Case For Reducing Dependence On Fossil Fuels. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/6, A20, 744K) says "a new report by a group of federal scientists and university researchers highlights a different threat posed by carbon emissions, one with its own set of potentially devastating ecological consequences: the increasing acidity of the oceans. Ocean water absorbs a huge amount of the carbon emitted by human energy use." All that carbon "seems to be making the waters more acidic, a trend researchers believe will continue as concentrations increase. … While there still exist big questions surrounding climate change and carbon emissions, the best evidence all points in a single direction: that failing to reduce dependence on fossil fuels will have terrible consequences, and failing to start now will make the disruption later all the more painful."

Judge Jails Bonds' Trainer For Contempt Of Court. The AP (7/6, Elias) reports, "Barry Bonds' personal trainer was held in contempt of court and taken to prison Wednesday for refusing to testify to the federal grand jury investigating the San Francisco Giants' slugger for perjury." The AP continues, "Greg Anderson, who served three months in prison after pleading guilty last year for his role in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid scandal, was led out of U.S. District Judge William Alsup's courtroom by two deputy U.S. marshals. He will be housed at the Federal Correctional Institution in nearby Dublin, but his stay may be short. … That's because Anderson will be set free once the grand jury's term expires, which will occur within weeks, Alsup said."

Bloomberg (7/6) reports, "U.S. District Judge William Alsup in San Francisco said government prosecutors had met the burden required to find Anderson in contempt of court. U.S. marshals took Anderson into custody without bail shortly after 4 p.m. … 'The court finds that the information sought is relevant to the proceeding looking into several athletes, some of whom are Greg Anderson's clients,' Alsup said in court today. Questions posed by the grand jury 'were proper and you should've answered them,' Alsup told Anderson." Bloomberg adds, "U.S. prosecutors in San Francisco are investigating steroid use by professional athletes after obtaining guilty pleas from distributors. Anderson spent three months in prison after pleading guilty in July 2005 to conspiring to distribute steroids and money laundering. … Anderson's lawyer, Mark Geragos, argued Anderson isn't required to testify because the conversation that triggered an investigation into whether Bonds lied to the grand jury about his steroid use was illegally wiretapped."

The San Francisco Chronicle (7/6, Williams, Fainaru-Wada) reports, "Anderson, 40, Bonds' friend since boyhood and his weight trainer since 1998, will be incarcerated indefinitely at the Federal Correctional Institution in Dublin. … At a grand jury hearing last week, he had balked at testifying about what the government styled a 'mountain of evidence' seized in a raid on his Burlingame home in 2003 indicating he had provided banned drugs to elite athletes." The Chronicle adds, "Anderson's lawyer, Mark Geragos, said he would appeal immediately to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. Geragos had urged the judge not to jail Anderson, arguing that by subpoenaing the trainer, the government was violating terms of his plea bargain last year in the BALCO steroids case. … Anderson pleaded guilty to money laundering and distributing steroids and was sentenced to three months in prison and three months' home confinement. At the time of the plea, he had refused to become a government witness. … Geragos also asked the judge to convene an evidentiary hearing to learn how the government obtained a recording on which Anderson admitted providing 'undetectable' steroids to Bonds in 2003. … In court, prosecutors Matt Parrella and Jeff Nedrow said they want to question Anderson about documents seized in the September 2003 raid. The documents include doping calendars, drug price lists and other written material indicating that Anderson was providing banned drugs to Bonds and other athletes, The Chronicle has reported."

In Delaware, More Overdoses Linked To Heroin. Wilmington's News Journal (7/5) reports Wilmington police "announced three more heroin overdoses, bringing the total number of drug overdoses in New Castle County since June 29 to at least 15. Vice squad detectives are investigating the rash of heroin overdoses in the city and warning people to avoid the potentially deadly drugs. A Drug Enforcement Administration task force was formed months ago to investigate distribution of a deadly batch of heroin mixed with the painkiller fentanyl that has killed users in the Delaware Valley and nationwide."

The News Journal (7/5) also writes, "Responding to a five-day rash of drug overdoses in Wilmington and suburban New Castle County, officials are warning heroin users that a dangerous batch of the drug, possibly mixed with formaldehyde or the analgesic fentanyl, could be on the streets. Two drug overdoses were reported Tuesday, bringing the total to at least 12 since Thursday. Several of the overdoses occurred after ingesting heroin sold in light blue packages with 'The Omen' in red lettering, Wilmington police said."

Fentanyl-Related Deaths Scrutinized. In the Oak Park, Illinois Austin Weekly News (7/6), Robert Felon writes, "During a press conference at the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Chicago office, agent Tim Ogden stated, without apparent irony, that the current threat of Fentanyl-laced heroin, which has been responsible for 150-300 deaths throughout the upper Midwest and the Northeast, was 'the biggest threat I have seen in almost 30 years of law enforcement experience.' To say that this statement is a bit hyperbolic is putting it mildly. Especially since the 'victims,' as the news refers to them, are all willing participants who are generally mindful of most of the risks involved with cooking up and injecting a substance like heroin intravenously."

Weed Resembling Marijuana Plant Causes Concern In Michigan. For Heritage Newspapers, Belleville, Michigan's The View (7/6) reports, "There is a common weed that has been found near railroad tracks in Belleville and other industrial sites that can easily be confused with marijuana. Recent deaths of heroin users injecting a mix of heroin and fentanyl...have raised concerns that addicts and recreational drug users are growing more reckless in their search for a more potent source of drug use. There are several types of cinquefoil, which is common throughout Southeastern Mich., sulfur cinquefoil very closely resembles marijuana plants."

Local TV Coverage. WFMZ-TV, Philadelphia (7/5, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "A deadly drug combination that's showing up in major cities across the country has taken the life of a Reading man. The Berks County coroner says toxicology tests show the body of the man found dead last month along the side of route 222 tested positive for an overdose of cocaine and fentanyl. The prescription pain killer is also being mixed with heroin. The Berks County coroner's office says it's waiting for test results to see if fentanyl was a factor in several drug related deaths over the past two weeks."

WHYY-TV, Philadelphia (7/5, 5:30 p.m.) reported, "Three more heroin overdoses in the city of Wilmington, bringing the total to more than a dozen. … One man died Sunday night from an overdose, but the three most recent victims were treated and released. … Police are waiting on toxicology test results to determine if the heroin had been laced with a deadly drug that has killed here and across the region."

WJBK-TV, Detroit (7/5, 7:00 a.m.) reported, "One of the men accused of dealing a deadly dose of drugs is due in court today. Jamar Woffard is one of the suppliers that sold the lethal combination of heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl. The deadly drug has killed more than 100 people in the metro Detroit area."

Limbaugh Viagra Case To Be Reviewed By Miami-Dade Prosecutors. The AP (7/5, Skoloff) reports Rush Limbaugh "will not face criminal charges in Palm Beach County after authorities found he had a bottle of Viagra that was prescribed in his doctor's name, prosecutors said Wednesday. … However, since the doctor wrote the prescription in Miami-Dade County, the case has been forwarded to prosecutors there for review." Nonetheless, "according to the Drug Enforcement Administration, Viagra is not considered a controlled substance because it is not addictive."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/5, Stoddard) writes, "Saying Rush Limbaugh's Viagra prescription was legally prescribed, the Palm Beach County State Attorney's Office announced on Wednesday that it would not file charges against the conservative radio talk show host for possessing medication in someone else's name. But Miami-Dade prosecutors will review the file and decide whether charges are warranted against the two Miami doctors involved."

On its Web site, WFOR-TV, Doral, Florida (7/5) reports a spokesman for the Palm Beach County state attorney said, "It is generally not illegal under Florida law for a physician to prescribe medication in a third party's name if all parties are aware and the doctor documents it correctly."

Man Barricades Himself In Virginia Home After Shooting At ATF Agents. The AP (7/6) reports, "Authorities surrounded a home in Arlington, where they say a man has barricaded himself after firing a gun at federal agents on Wednesday." The AP continues, "A spokesman with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives says the shooting happened about 5:30 p.m. when ATF agents traveling in a Jeep Cherokee on Interstate 395 were sideswiped by a man driving erratically in a Ford Taurus." The AP adds, "Spokesman Tom Mangan says the man in the Taurus pulled over at Glebe Road and opened fire on the agents, who were giving chase. Two agents suffered minor injuries. … Authorities say the man then drove off, eventually running into a home at 13th and Irving streets, where he shot a man who lives there in the leg. The man wasn't seriously hurt and managed to escape."

The Washington Post (7/6, B01, Stockwell, Dvorak) reports, "A man stepped out the shower at his Arlington home yesterday and was shot by a gunman who had broken down his door after fleeing federal agents in a wild rush-hour car chase and gunfight, police said last night. … The gunman was barricaded inside the house late last night as police surrounded the area and fired pepper spray canisters inside. The wounded resident and his sister managed to escape." The Post adds, "The incident began about 5:30 p.m. on Interstate 395 near Glebe Road, when three agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives were traveling south in an unmarked sport-utility vehicle and the SUV was 'severely sideswiped' by a gold Ford Taurus, police said. … Agents took off after the suspect, who pulled over at the South Glebe Road exit and got out of his car. … 'The suspect probably thought he was dealing with a common citizen,' said ATF Special Agent Tom Mangan. … The agents identified themselves, and the man began shooting at them, Mangan said." The Post notes, "Bullets hit the engine compartment and a window of the SUV. The agents returned fire, but the suspect dived back into his car and sped off, Mangan said. … The chase continued onto South Glebe Road, where it went on for a couple of blocks, with both vehicles beginning to falter."

along with the District Attorney's office. what is the more appropriate form to get the strongest sentence for that fire arm and gun violation. We come to that agreement, then we decided who will prosecute the case. So we hold a weekly meeting and determine proper court to prosecute, that is Project Exile' Flynn said. … But Flynn says they have now 'leaped' that program into a second level, called Project Safe Neighborhood. That is a federal program initiated by U-S Attorney Alberto Gonzales. Flynn says under this program, law enforcement works to identify potential gang members in the City."

US Attorney In California Encourages Public To Report Suspected Meth Labs. The Mount Shasta (CA) Herald (7/5) reports, "Local agencies, including those in Siskiyou County, have joined forces with state and federal agencies to create task forces in the ongoing war on methamphetamine. This team effort is needed in order to provide the manpower and equipment to combat the 'devil's drug,' United States Attorney for California's Eastern District McGregor Scott said. Scott stressed that while the task forces provide the trained personnel and sophisticated surveillance equipment used in detection of meth, there is one other vital member of the team effort - the public. … Scott said where the public can really provide its assistance is in reporting any signs of a meth lab operation."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Touts Immigration Reform As House GOP Highlights Border Security Gaps. President Bush yesterday visited a Northern Virginia Dunkin' Donuts owned by Iranian immigrants to highlight his support for a comprehensive immigration reform bill. But in the media, the President's event was largely upstaged by the competing House and Senate field hearings on immigration reform. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Lueck, 2.11M) reports President Bush "underlined his support for immigration overhaul yesterday, even as House Republicans rallied backers of their competing plan, which aims to stop illegal immigration by tightening border security." Bush "reiterated his belief that immigration changes should include expanded guest-worker programs and a path to citizenship for some of the 12 million illegal immigrants already in the U.S." Meanwhile, at "a San Diego Border Patrol station, House Republicans framed the issue differently. At the first of several hearings around the country scheduled for this summer, House Republicans and local law-enforcement officials emphasized border security, raising the possibility that terrorists, specifically al Qaeda operatives, could enter the U.S. through its porous borders." Supporters of the Senate bill "held a hearing in Philadelphia intended to counter the House event."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/5, Koppel) reported the House and Senate Republicans went "ahead with potentially divisive hearings outside of Washington today, hearings that prompted President Bush to get involved. Immigration was on the menu during President Bush's quick stop at this Virginia Dunkin' Donuts. Flanked by the store's Iranian-American owners and some of their foreign-born employees, Mr. Bush insisted immigration reform must include a guest worker program and a realistic solution for the millions of illegal immigrants already in the US. … The President's latest appeal was clearly timed to coincide with competing hearings as Republicans in the House and Senate continue to battle over immigration legislation."

The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 8, 2:30, Smith, 7.66M) reported that at the Senate hearing, "New York's Mayor, Michael Bloomberg, was a guest speaker." Mayor Bloomberg: "Although they broke the law by illegally crossing our borders or overstaying their visas and our businesses broke the law by employing them, our city's economy would be a shell of itself had they not, and it would collapse if they were deported." Pitts: "In San Diego, the majority of the House of Representatives favor broader border security and tougher enforcement," while President Bush "tried his hand at referee." President Bush was shown saying, "We're not going to be able to deport people who have been here working hard and raising their families, so I want to work with Congress to come up with a rational way forward."

NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 9, 2:15, Reid, 9.87M) reported House Democrats "accuse Republicans of staging the hearings for purely political purposes." Rep. Brad Sherman, California: "These hearings are not designed to legislate. They're designed to whip up public opinion." Reid: "It's no accident that this hearing is being held so close to the Mexican border. It's part of a coordinated strategy by Republicans in the House of Representatives to convince the American people that the top priority on immigration is getting control of that border, a border that must be secure, they insist, before even considering a guest worker program or citizenship for illegal immigrants. Recent reports have suggested President Bush might agree with House Republicans to take up border security first, but today at a donut shop owned and run by immigrants, the President reiterated his desire for comprehensive immigration reform." President Bush: "We cannot kick people out who've been here for a while."

The AP (7/6, Pickler) reports, "The immigration legislation that Bush is demanding is caught between House and Senate negotiators who so far have not been able to work out disagreements over how to handle an estimated 12 million foreigners living illegally in the United States." One compromise "being promoted by Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., would require the immigrants to go to centers across the border and fill out the appropriate paperwork before becoming guest workers. They also would have to have an employer sponsor them to get back in the country." Although Bush has "repeatedly said it's impractical to force millions of illegal immigrants to leave the country, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president finds the Pence plan 'interesting.'"

The Washington Post (7/6, A10, Murray, Babington, 744K) reports President Bush, who "prefers the Senate's more comprehensive approach, staged his own immigration event, showing up at a Dunkin' Donuts in Alexandria owned by two Iranian American brothers to reiterate his call for a guest-worker program." President Bush said, "If you talk to employer[s] such as these folks, they'll tell you they need workers. And people are willing to do the work that others aren't willing to do, but we want to make sure there's a legal way to do it." The Post adds some "advocates are disappointed that Bush has not taken a more active role in trying to weaken the House Republicans' resolve, which has intensified as the midterm elections near and conservatives try to rally their voting base."

USA Today (Welch, Kiely, 2.31M) reports congressional Republicans "heard lively testimony Wednesday from mayors, sheriffs and ordinary citizens in two public hearings held on both coasts to discuss illegal immigration." The hearings "in San Diego and Philadelphia marked the opening of a summer season that will take proponents of competing immigration proposals in Congress across the country. The aim is to demonstrate public support for their plans." On the West Coast, "much of the talk was about how hard it is to handle the stream of Mexican citizens coming across the border." But Democrats "mocked the Republicans for holding hearings they said would not lead to solutions."

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Gaouette, Quinones, 958K) reports the "two hearings marked the start of a summer-long contest between the House and the Senate to control the terms of the immigration debate." As lawmakers "held court on opposite coasts, President Bush hosted his own field hearing at a Dunkin' Donuts in Alexandria, Va. Celebrating the entrepreneurial energy of the store's two Iranian American owners and their Guatemalan American district manager, Bush jokingly offered reporters coffee and reiterated his support for a Senate-style overhaul." The "atmosphere at the House hearing, at San Diego Border Patrol headquarters, was far less jovial. Within sight of the hills of Tijuana and the walls that separate the United States from Mexico, immigration restrictionists waved American flags, while immigrant advocates displayed hundreds of crosses representing those who died trying to cross the border."

The New York Times (7/6, Preston, 1.19M) reports most of the speakers at the Philadelphia hearing "embraced the Senate's approach, which calls for a path to citizenship for most illegal immigrants and a guest worker program, as well as enhanced border security and punishment for employers who hire illegal workers." In San Diego, Rep. Ed Royce, chairman of the House Subcommittee on International Terrorism and Non-Proliferation, "was chosen to lead a meeting in a Border Patrol station that featured agents and local sheriffs."

The AP (7/6, Hefling) reports Mayor Bloomberg said the "economy of the country's largest city and the entire nation would collapse if illegal immigrants were deported en masse." New York City is "home to more than 3 million immigrants, and a half-million of them came to this country illegally, Bloomberg testified." Bloomberg said, "Although they broke the law by illegally crossing our borders ... our city's economy would be a shell of itself had they not, and it would collapse if they were deported. The same holds true for the nation." The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) also runs the AP story.

The Washington Times (7/6, Hurt, 90K) reports Mayor Louis Barletta of Hazleton, Pa., "yesterday told senators at a special 'field hearing' in Philadelphia that illegal aliens have strained his city's services and brought a wave of crime." Barlettta said, "We've seen a dramatic increase in gang-style graffiti, some of which has included threats to kill police officers. … This graffiti has marred an award-winning redevelopment project that replaced vacant factories with family homes. Now, those homes, those families, are threatened by hoodlums who don't respect people or their property."

House GOP Focusing On "Terrorist Loophole" In Senate Immigration Bill. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (7/6) writes, "With their party sharply divided on immigration, House Republicans this week launched an effort to transform this political liability into an asset by tying it to the war against terrorism." CA40 Rep. Ed Royce's (R) "International Relations subcommittee on terrorism started hearings Wednesday in San Diego and Friday in Laredo, Texas, on a 'terrorist loophole' in the Senate measure." Novak notes that "Section 240d" of the Senate bill "would restrict local police from arresting aliens for civil violations, limiting them to apprehension for criminal offenses. That means a sheriff's officer on the border could not arrest someone whose papers showed he had overstayed his visa." Royce and Kris W. Kobach, "who was Attorney General John Ashcroft's chief adviser on immigration law," "point to the fact that four of the 9-11 terrorists, all of whom had violated immigration laws, were stopped for speeding before their attack. Had the police officers asked the right questions, terrorists could have been arrested under current law -- but not under the Senate bill. … In contrast, the House bill provides assistance to local police to encourage their help in immigration enforcement."

Owens Says Colorado Shouldn't Wait For Federal Action On Illegal Immigration. The AP (7/6, Paulson) reports Gov. Bill Owens of Colorado said his state "should not wait for the federal government to stop illegal immigration but should implement its own plans." Gov. Owens "told the Joint Budget Committee, which held hearings Wednesday to discuss the cost of illegal immigration, that Colorado spends about $560 million a year educating illegal immigrants and their U.S.-born children, who are legal citizens. He said that the cost falls most heavily on local governments and that the federal government is doing little to help." Owens told legislators "the state could sharply reduce the number of illegal immigrants in Colorado by setting up a secure identification system, requiring job applicants to present a driver's license or identity card before they could get a job."

NYTimes Criticizes House GOP For Focus On Immigration, Terrorism. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) says in an editorial that the "nation's debate over a serious reform of its immigration laws" was "hijacked yesterday by 'Border Vulnerabilities and International Terrorism' — the first of many hearings that House Republican leaders plan to hold around the country this summer, ostensibly to solicit public opinion about immigration reform." This "novel approach to governing — seeking public input on bills after they have passed — reflects a cynical gamble that linking immigration and terror will upend the Senate bill and give House Republicans a short-term electoral boost."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Assertion Of Executive Power Seen As Risking Backlash. The Financial Times (7/6, Daniel) reports in an extended story on the White House's philosophy of executive power that the Hamdan v Rumsfeld Supreme Court decision that held the President "did not have the right to hold military commissions to try terror suspects held at Guantánamo Bay" marks "a defining moment in the Bush presidency. Not only does it dismantle some of the elaborate legal scaffolding he has erected since the attacks of 9/11 to prosecute the war on terror. It also potentially heralds a 1970s-style backlash against executive power, triggered by the perceived overreach of the last six years." Reagan Administration deputy attorney General Bruce Fein said, "The White House could be left with fewer powers than when Bush entered. Like President Nixon, Mr Bush's craving for an imperial presidency could bring his office to its ebb." The Times also examines Vice President Cheney's role in the Administration's assertion of executive authority, noting that he "arrived at the White House in 2000 determined to avoid the 'unwise compromises' made by presidents over the past three decades. For Mr Bush, the motivation has been more visceral. Shocked by the events of 9/11, he vowed he would do 'whatever it takes' to defend the American people. This interplay of ideological and intuitive motivations has played out in the war on terror. Recognising that congressional power is greatest at times of peace and presidential power at times of war, officials seized their opportunity."

Broder Urges Congressional Debate On Anti-Terror Policies. In his column in the Washington Post (7/6, A21, 744K), David Broder writes about the recent Supreme Court decision on Guantanamo. Says Broder, "I am delighted that Republican congressional leaders say they hope to turn the ruling to their advantage by engaging the Democrats in a lively debate about the president's counterterrorism strategy. That debate is long overdue. In the first reaction to the Sept. 11 attacks, Congress gave Bush broadly worded authority to protect the country and strike back at the terrorists. After that it paid little attention for the next four years to the way that authority was being used -- and how the administration assumed additional powers." Adds Broder, "There is no reason for Democrats in Congress to fear the coming debate. They need not feel embarrassed about…finding ways to legislate the needed rules for handling these detainees. Far from being defensive, Democrats could challenge the Republican majority to take the opportunity to examine all that Bush is doing -- or not doing -- to counter al-Qaeda and other threats to national security."

Bush Turns 60. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 11, 1:50, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported President Bush is "the leader of the free world. But for a moment, George W. Bush is also the nation's most vocal birthday boy. Tomorrow is the big day. Boomer in Chief. That's what the press corps has been calling the President lately because the President seems to have that milestone, turning 60, on his mind. Really on his mind." President Bush: "I used to thing 60 was old, didn't you? … Security is strong at the airports. I hope they stop taking off shoes of the elderly. I must confess, they haven't taken off my shoes lately at the airport. … We're living longer. I don't know about you all, I plan on just kind of stretching it out a little bit." Sawyer: "Even though President Bush has aged in office, according to his latest physical, he is in the superior fitness category for men his age, despite his jokes."

The New York Times (7/6, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "Could it be that Mr. Bush, with his enviably low heart rate and penchant for two-hour mountain bike rides that exhaust Secret Service agents half his age, is worried about getting old? Is that why the president, so mindful of proper attire that he demands a coat and tie in the Oval Office even on weekends, wore a decidedly youthful red-and-white Hawaiian shirt to his two-days-early birthday dinner in the East Room of the White House Tuesday night?" But if "the president is worried about getting old, his friends say, he certainly has not confessed it to them, though they recognize the Big 6-0 could be a touchy subject. Mr. Bush took four friends along with him on Air Force One for a trip to Ft. Bragg, N.C., on Tuesday; all were mum about the impending birthday, refusing to disclose even the teeniest detail of the party or gifts."

FDA Approves New AIDS Pill. The New York Times (7/6, McNeil, 1.19M) reports that the FDA has approved "the first 3-in-1 antiretroviral pill for use by the American-sponsored plan for AIDS treatment, something that the White House's acting global AIDS coordinator said yesterday should greatly improve treatment for AIDS patients in poor countries." The agency "posted the approval of the drug on its Web site on Friday evening. It approved the 3-in-1 pill, made by an Indian generic drug company, for patients in countries helped by the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief." The new pill "combines three common first-line drugs, AZT, 3TC and NVP, which are also known as zidovudine, lamivudine and nevirapine and sold in the United States as Retrovir, Epivir and Viramune."

Turley Criticizes Roberts Court's First Term. Jonathan Turley, the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest Law at George Washington University, writes in USA Today (7/6, 2.31M) that the first term of the Roberts court "was no cause for hope, let alone celebration, for uneasy liberals, moderates or libertarians. To the contrary, the only comfort these groups should take from the past term is that it will likely prove far better than the coming term when the court is poised to hear cases involving affirmative action, abortion, environmental law and other hot-button issues. Despite hopeful accounts that John Roberts and Samuel Alito would prove mainstream jurists, they proved every bit as ideological in major cases as predicted." The Court's first term reveals "a new vision of our society emerging from the new conservative base of the court with Roberts and Alito," who are "speaking clearly and loudly — from the far right side of the court."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Tumble As Oil Prices Rise To Record Level. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 8, :15, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "Oil prices jumped to a record high today, $75.40 a barrel, on strong US demand and tensions over North Korea's missile launch and Iran's nuclear program. Prices settled at $75.19 when the markets closed, up1.7 percent for the day."

The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 5, 0:15, Smith, 7.66M) said the spike was due to "concern about North Korea's nuclear ambitions." NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 7, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) also reported the story. The Washington Times (7/6, Hill, 90K) also reports the oil price "spiral" came "in response to rising tensions with North Korea," adding that "some traders predicted that crude will hit $80 before the end of the year." The New York Times (7/6, Peters, Fackler, 1.19M) titles a similar report "Oil Up And

Stocks Fall On Missile Worries." The Washington Post (7/6, D3, Kirkham, 744K) also reports the story.

NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 8, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "And a strong US Jobs report caused fears on Wall Street today that interest rates would have to be raised again in August. That was enough to spook the Dow down over 76 points on the day [to close at 11,151.82]. Nasdaq was down 37 points [2,153.34]." The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Browning, 2.11M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.72%, or 9.28 points, to 1270.91, "still up 1.8% for 2006." USA Today (6/6, Shell, 2.31M) also reports the stock numbers.

Factory Orders Rise Amid Strong Employment Data. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Gerena-Morales, 2.11M) reports, "The US economy may have entered the third quarter with a little more momentum than thought, according to new data tracking industrial activity and employment growth." The Commerce Department "reported that orders to US factories rose a stronger-than-expected 0.7% in May, to $399.9 billion, following a 2% decline in April." Meanwhile, "an employment report suggests the nation experienced robust employment growth in June. The private sector added a seasonally adjusted 368,000 nonfarm jobs in June, according to the National Employment Report from Automatic Data Processing Inc. The report is a measure of employment based on a subset of ADP's payroll data covering 225,000 businesses and 14 million employees. The data don't include government employment."

Oil Prices Said To Endanger US Jobs. USA Today (6/6, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "The rising cost of oil has put a squeeze on the companies that use oil as an ingredient for their products. Although they are down from the records seen recently, oil prices are up more than 20% from a year ago and are more than 150% higher than they were five years ago. Natural gas prices have also risen." USA Today adds "the impact on manufacturers and other companies that use oil-based ingredients could be significant, causing a ripple effect throughout the economy. As firms are faced with rising prices and see their margins cut, they may have to cut back on production, reduce pay increases or maybe even cut jobs or shut down."

US Population Approaches 300 Million. The AP (7/6, Ohlemacher) reports that the US' population is approaching 300 million. The US "is the fastest growing industrialized nation in the world, adding about 2.8 million people a year. That's a little less than 1 percent, but enough to mitigate the kinds of problems facing Japan and many European countries," which are facing declining populations. The US "has a fertility rate of 2.05, about enough to maintain a stable population. The US also adds people through immigration, something many European countries have shunned."

State Houses Hold Greatest Potential For Power Shift In 2006 Races. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Cooper, 2.11M) reports that "the potential for swings in power may be greater at the state level than in Congress, where the struggle for control gets more attention. In 29 legislative chambers across the nation, a shift of no more than five seats would bring a new party to power. If the restless, dissatisfied mood among many voters produces a desire to throw out incumbents, both parties could see turmoil at the state level. If the sentiment turns against Republicans in charge at the national level, Democrats could make significant gains in elections." The Journal adds, "Beyond the legislatures, Democrats also hope to regain a majority of governorships for the first time since Republicans gained the advantage there in 1994."

Biden, Boxer, Salazar To Campaign For Lieberman. The AP (7/6, Miga) reports, "Embattled Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman is getting a little help from his Senate friends as he tries to fend off an anti-Iraq war challenger in an intraparty fight." Sens. Joe Biden, Barbara Boxer and Ken Salazar "plan to campaign in Connecticut for Lieberman between now and the Aug. 8 primary. Their goal is to reassure the party faithful of the three-term senator's loyalty to Democratic causes, including women's issues, labor and the environment." The AP adds, "The rush of support from his Senate colleagues comes two days after Lieberman, the party's 2000 vice presidential nominee, surprised Democrats by announcing that he would start collecting signatures for an independent campaign if he loses the primary."

Lamont Said He May Spend $1 Million More In Primary Battle. The AP (7/6, Haigh) reports, "Businessman Ned Lamont said Wednesday that he is prepared to spend perhaps as much as $1 million more in his Democratic primary battle against US Sen. Joe Lieberman." Lamont "wouldn't say how much he plans to spend between now and the Aug. 8 primary. His campaign has cost $1.5 million so far.

'It depends. Let's see what happens over the course of the next 30 days,' Lamont told The Associated Press. 'If the senator says, "I'm going to put up a million dollars on TV and start hammering Ned Lamont and where he's from,' then I'll have to match that.'"

Lieberman Campaign Refuses To Criticize Clinton. CNN's The Situation Room (7/45, King) reported, "Senator Joe Lieberman's camp is refusing to criticize colleague Hillary Clinton, even though she is prepared to take a stand against him. Yesterday, Senator Clinton said she won't support Lieberman if he's defeated in next month's Democratic primary in Connecticut." Clinton "says she hopes Lieberman wins that primary and wins re-nomination, but, if he doesn't, she will back Lamont. Lieberman's spokeswoman tells CNN, the senator values Hillary Clinton's friendship and her support in the primary."

LATimes Criticizes Antiwar Democrats' Effort To Oust Lieberman. The Los Angeles Times (7/6, 958K) says in an editorial, "Antiwar activists who are opposing the renomination of Sen. Joe Lieberman in next month's Connecticut Democratic primary complain that he's not a 'real Democrat.' They're wrong, but Lieberman runs the risk of making prophets of his critics by preparing for a backup reelection campaign as an independent." Lieberman has been "immune to the buyer's remorse that has afflicted other Democratic senators who voted to authorize President Bush to use force against the Iraqi dictator. Two weeks ago, he was one of only six Senate Democrats to vote against a resolution calling for U.S. forces to begin leaving Iraq this year." Democratic voters "in Connecticut have the right to nominate the candidate of their choice. But it is more than a little disturbing for the longtime popular senator (and the party's 2000 nominee for vice president) to be targeted for defeat by national fundraisers based on his foreign policy views."

Liberal Bloggers Draw Fire For Promoting Candidates. The Washington Times (7/6, Lambro, 90K) reports, "The founders of two politically influential liberal blogs, known for their bare-knuckle attacks on Republicans and errant Democrats, are being knocked for promoting political candidates for whom one of them works as a paid campaign consultant. Bloggers and news organizations have begun to question the close relationship between Markos Moulitsas, creator of the widely read DailyKos.com, and Jerome Armstrong, creator of MyDD.com and a political consultant." Armstrong "is working for former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, a potential Democratic presidential candidate, whom Mr. Moulitsas praised effusively in a December interview."

Top Republicans Say Presidential Nomination Is McCain's To Lose. The Washington Times (7/6, Hallow, 90K) reports, "Some top Republicans at odds with Sen. John McCain on core conservative issues say privately that the party's 2008 presidential nomination is 'his to lose.' They cite the Arizona senator's head start in fundraising, a primary calendar that is shaping up in his favor and a growing belief that he enjoys the tacit support of President Bush." The Post adds, "Now, one of the most widely respected conservatives in the country says he is ready to help pull the McCain campaign bandwagon whenever the senator makes his 2008 Republican presidential run official." Former Sen. Phil Gramm "has quietly been helping to write Mr. McCain's speeches."

Professors Say Science, Ethics Need Not Be At Odds Over Stem Cell Research. Robert P. George, McCormick professor of jurisprudence at Princeton University and a member of the President's Council on Bioethics, and Eric Cohen, a fellow of the Ethics and Public Policy Center and editor of the New Atlantis, write in the Washington Post (7/6, A21, 744K), that too often in the debate over stem cell research, "science and ethics are regarded as being on a collision course. They need not be. For what could be more pro-science than relying upon scientific ingenuity to lead the way to stem cell advances without conducting unethical cloning experiments?"

Casinos Close In Atlantic City As Government Shutdown Continues. The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 11, 2:25, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "Gambling in this country is big business. In Atlantic City, New Jersey, it is a $5 billion a year business. Today, with the state government shut down by a budget dispute and no money to pay state inspectors, the casinos were forced to close for the first time ever, and all bets were off."

The New York Times (7/6, Chen, 1.19M) reports from Atlantic City, "As New Jersey's budget impasse deepened and the shutdown of state government services continued, this city's 12 casinos were forced to close indefinitely on Wednesday for the first time in the 28 years that gambling has been legal here." Until now, "the failure of Gov. Jon S. Corzine and his fellow Democrats in the Legislature to approve a budget had been felt most viscerally by about 45,000 state workers who were furloughed without pay, and by the eternally hopeful who play the lottery." But "with estimated revenues of $16 million a day and a work force of 50,000, the casinos represent the biggest and most symbolic casualty so far."

The AP (7/6, Curran) reports Gov. Jon S. Corzine "addressed the Legislature at the Statehouse Wednesday morning, defending his position as a stalemate over the state budget entered its fifth day with no deal in sight." Corzine "wants to raise the state sale tax from 6 percent to 7 percent to close a $4.5 billion state budget gap; lawmakers oppose the tax increase, estimated to cost the average New Jersey family $275 per year. When the Legislature missed its July 1 deadline to pass a state budget because of the dispute, Corzine ordered the government shut down." Said Corzine, "It is deplorable that the people of this state are left in such a painful position. … The people of New Jersey have every right to be angry." The Washington Post (7/6, A3, Strauss, 744K) and USA Today (7/6, Jones, El Nasser, 2.31M), among other newspapers, also report the story.

More Commentary. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) editorializes, "It's time for Joseph Roberts Jr., speaker of the New Jersey Assembly, to fold his cards. He and his colleagues thought they could bluff their way through a confrontation with Gov. Jon Corzine over the governor's proposed sales tax increase." But "the bluff has been called: Mr. Corzine shut down nonessential services and furloughed 45,000 nonessential employees when he and Mr. Roberts could not agree on a new budget by July 1, the start of a new fiscal year."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) editorializes, "The gambling shutdown will cost the state some $1.3 million a day in lost taxes, but Governor Jon Corzine and the Democrats who run the legislature still won't end their showdown at the spendthrift corral, also known as Trenton. The legislators are convinced that Mr. Corzine is leading them down a path to political ruin by insisting on raising the state sales tax to 7% from an already high 6%, and they're probably right. … New Jersey voters keep electing these tax-and-spendaholics, so we suppose they get what they deserve."

LATimes Criticizes Schwarzenegger On Children's Health Coverage. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (7/6, 958K) says, "Until last week, it looked as if Sacramento might use a fraction of this year's multibillion-dollar budget surplus to expand health coverage for more kids in California. But in their final budget negotiations, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Legislature decided that it was better to cave to a small group of vocal Republicans who believe that sick 3-year-olds should be punished for their parents' actions. … Schwarzenegger and the Democratic leadership were wrong to trade the well-being of children for political compromise. Hopefully the Legislature, which is expected to take up the issue again later this summer, will show more courage once the deadline pressure of budget-making is removed."

WSJournal Says Sweeney's "Wal-Mart Tax" Has Fizzled. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) says AFL-CIO President John Sweeney's campaign to force Wal-Mart and other retailers either to spend more on health care or pay more in taxes is "striking out in a surprising number of state capitals." Sweeney's campaign "began as Maryland enacted the first 'Wal-Mart tax.' … Not a single state has followed Maryland's lead." The Journal concludes that "the Wal-Mart tax has already fizzled as a political cause."

Bush Urges World Leaders To Stand United On North Korean Nukes. North Korea continued its defiance of the international community yesterday by launching additional short range missiles, brining the total number of tests to seven. The White House and State Department response is being described as muted. The AP (7/6, Riechmann), for example, says President Bush "addressed the issue in a subdued manner without the harsh warnings he had issued last week threatening unspecified repercussions." The AP also notes the President "urged world leaders Wednesday to stand united in demanding that North Korea give up its nuclear weapons program, saying the communist nation remains a threat even though its long-range missile plunged into the sea seconds after liftoff." Said Bush, "One thing we have learned is that the rocket didn't stay up very long and tumbled into the sea, which doesn't, frankly, diminish my desire to solve this problem."

The story was the lead on each of the networks, which ran multiple segments on the crisis, totaling about 26 minutes. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, lead story, 2:40, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "The Administration has repeatedly said over the last month that a missile launch would be unacceptable, a serious matter. But today, the President toned down the rhetoric, calling for North Korea to return to diplomatic discussions." Bush was shown saying, "Russia, South Korea, Japan and the United States spoke with one voice about the rocket launches and we will work together to continue to remind the lead of North Korea there is a better way forward for his people."

The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 2, 1:30, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "As one Administration official said to me today, 'What are we talking about here? Six missiles that are based on World War II technology and one longer-range missile that flew for all of 42 seconds.' This was the kind of tone the President seemed to echo today." The White House does not want the President saying too much about this, elevating the issue and turning it into a US-North Korea confrontation. The Administration prefers to have its diplomats and its allies do the talking."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 2, 1:55, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "The White House tried hard today not to give the North Korean leader what Administration officials suspect Kim Jong Il may want -- direct one-on-one attention from the United States and President Bush."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/5, Henry) reported, "From the President on, down the White House is all about trying to calm this situation down. They're playing down the threat from North Korea, playing up the support they're getting from allies. In short, just the opposite of how they handled the standoff with Iraq before that war."

The Washington Post (7/6, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column, "After interpreting every gesture of Saddam Hussein as a casus belli, a changed Bush administration is taking the opposite approach with Kim Jong Il. Officials were determined not to give the little man with the big missile the attention he craves. … A few years ago, the administration was using breathless terms to describe Iraq. … Now? The administration finds itself before the Security Council, working on sanctions and isolation for North Korea."

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Richter, Demick, 958K), in a story headlined "A Level Reply to N. Korea Missiles," says "the relatively low-key reaction in Washington, the United Nations and elsewhere reflected the lack of an international consensus and also a determination by the Bush administration not to be drawn into a one-on-one struggle with North Korea. 'The US response is we're working with our allies to figure out how to try to get North Korea back to the table,' said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. 'There are attempts to try to describe this almost in breathless World War II terms. This is not such a situation.'"

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Wallace, Demick, 958K) also reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking at a Washington news conference, "told reporters that outrage expressed from other world leaders shows that the dispute 'is now not a matter of the United States and North Korea.'" She added that "the Bush administration believes the disagreement can best be handled through six-party talks, with diplomats from the US, China, Japan, South Korea, Russia and North Korea." The international community, she said, "has many options that would make engaging in this 'kind of brinksmanship' more difficult for the North Koreans." The Washington Times (7/6, Pisik, 90K) notes Rice also said Pyongyang had "miscalculated." Added the Secretary, "Whatever their motivations, whatever they thought they were doing, they've gotten a very strong reaction from the international community."

The New York Times (7/6, Cooper, Hoge, 1.19M) says "Bush administration officials suggested that more tests might be on the way: Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, said that the North had initially rolled about 10 missiles up to the launching pads, meaning that maybe three or four more could be ready soon, though it was unclear what types they might be." And "officials turned their attention to persuading China, and to a lesser extent Russia, to put pressure on North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program."

The AFP (7/6) reports Bush "said that US officials were still analyzing data from the long-range Taepodong 2 missile launch but dismissed the other missiles launched as 'pretty routine weapons' and said the immediate political impact was that North Korea was worse off." Bush also said, "I am deeply concerned about the plight of the people of North Korea. I would hope that the government would agree to verifiably abandoning its weapons programs."

Several stories this morning indicate world powers appear divided over how to deal with the North Korean actions. Under the headline "Split Over N Korea Missile Test Response," the Financial Times (7/6, Fifield, Nations, Pilling) reports, "As the UN Security Council gathered to discuss the tests, Japan and the US, supported by the UK, pushed for tough measures that would require countries to prevent the transfer of financial resources and materials that would help

North Korea's missile and weapons programmes." The AP (7/6, Lederer) says China and Russia "resisted an attempt in the UN Security Council to impose sanctions against North Korea." Reacting to the Japanese proposal, "China, the North's closest ally, and Russia, which has been trying to re-establish Soviet-era ties with Pyongyang, countered that they favor a weaker council statement without any threat of sanctions. Both countries hold veto power in the council, making sanctions unlikely."

ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 2, 1:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "In South Korea, the government has threatened to cut off food aid to North Korea. But the South Koreans may be less worried about a nuclear North Korea than an unstable North Korea. If Kim Jong-Il's government were to fall, South Korea could be flooded with refugees."

The New York Times (7/6, Onishi, Kahn, 1.19M) reports "regional analysts doubt the launchings will bridge big gaps between the regional powers on how to handle North Korea. The military exercise strained relations between North Korea and all its neighbors. … But when Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asia and the lead negotiator with North Korea, returns to the region this week, he will find that many of the same rifts that existed before continue to complicate the task of forming a united front." USA Today (7/6, Nichols, 2.31M) runs a similar story titled "Attempt To Punish N. Korea Hits Snag," noting there are "cracks in the world's united opposition to North Korea's missile tests."

A second USA Today story (7/6, Wiseman, Nishiwaki), meanwhile, says "international condemnation of the North's missile tests…was widespread. NATO said the tests threatened security in East Asia and the rest of the world. Belgium, Italy, Turkey, Germany and France jointly condemned the tests. Belgian Foreign Minister Karel de Gucht called for an immediate halt to the tests." USA Today adds, "Missile expert Riki Ellison, president of the Missile Defense Advocacy Alliance in Alexandria, Va., said, however, that North Korea gained some clout and prestige with the launch. 'They called the bluff,' he said."

The Washington Post (7/6, A1, Lynch, Faiola, 744K) reports, "Several observers warned that even if Beijing agreed to some form of censure, it would remain reluctant to impose tough economic sanctions out of fear that such measures could destabilize North Korea and spark a crisis on their shared border." But John R. Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, "said the council's reaction to the missile tests highlighted North Korea's growing isolation. 'No member defended what the North Koreans have done,' Bolton said. 'I think there is support for sending a clear signal to Pyongyang.'" The Post adds, "Analysts and some diplomats involved in the six-nation nuclear talks said the first casualty of the missile tests might be the talks themselves."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, King, Solomon, Ramstad, Fairclough, 2.11M) analyzes possible US responses to North Korea, in a story titled "North Korea Gives US, Allies Few Good Options," and says "the likeliest, but also the least muscular, would be an official rebuke from the United Nations Security Council, such as that issued when North Korea last tested a long-range missile, in 1998. Next on the list would be a package of UN economic sanctions, put forward yesterday by Japan and backed by the U.S., which might also carry the tacit threat of military action down the road. US officials said they aren't weighing a military response to the missile launches." The Journal adds, "A weak response from the international community could undercut US credibility, not just in Pyongyang, but also in Tehran, where the Bush administration is trying to persuade Iran to give up its nuclear program in the face of threatened isolation from the UN."

The New York Times (7/6, Sanger, 1.19M), likewise, runs a piece headlined "Few Good Choices In North Korean Standoff," in which it says that an alternative for Bush "would be take a hard line that might risk an escalation of the half-century-old confrontation between the United States and North Korea." But "such a tack is now complicated by the widespread assumption that even if the North does not have the ability to launch a nuclear weapon, it now probably possesses enough extra nuclear fuel that it may be tempted to sell some to a terrorist group or another state."

The Christian Science Monitor (7/6, Marquand, 61K) reports Bolton "said the council must send a 'strong and unanimous signal' that Kim's actions were unacceptable, adding that the council would proceed in a 'calm and deliberate fashion.'"

NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 3, 1:40, Mitchell, 9.87M) said "no one really understands the motive of this hermetic kingdom of Kim Jong Il, but the best thinking is that he wants attention. They have not had direct talks. They want security guarantees from the United States. They want economic aid, and look at what's happening with Iran. Iran is being given and offered all sorts of economic aid and concessions to give up its nuclear program, so this is really a cry for attention very strategically timed for the 4th of July and an attempt to try to get people to say, you know, look at North Korea, they've got some muscle."

In a similar analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (7/6, Demick, 958K) says the test "was a move from a well-thumbed playbook that has been passed down from father to son, starting with the nation's founder, Kim Il Sung, and now in the hands of current leader Kim Jong Il. Such has been the North's modus operandi for decades: To solve a crisis one needs to create a crisis." The Times adds, "The crisis that the North Koreans perceived as needing a solution is that they were being ignored by the United States."

Burns Says US Wants International Unity Against North Korea. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said on CNN's The Situation Room (7/5) reported, "I don't think this is America against North Korea. This is the world against North Korea. You saw an extraordinary number of statements today from Russia and China, from all across Asia, from Europe, and certainly from our country of condemnation of rebuking the North Koreans. So what you want to achieve in a situation like this is you want to achieve international unity to force the North Koreans to take account of the fact that they are completely isolated on this issue. What they did was reckless and provocative and very unwise. And we're going to be a lot stronger as the weeks and months go forward on this North Korea business if we've got the rest of the world saying essentially what we're saying. So I don't think we want to isolate ourselves one on one with the North Koreans. We're much better off with this collective approach that the President and Secretary Rice talked about today."

Hill Says North Korea Has United World Against It. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (7/5) that North Korea has been "signaling for several weeks now that they were intending to have a launch. And just about every responsible country in the world weighed in against it, and then they went ahead and did it anyway. So, the first thing they have done is to unite us all." Hill added, "I think the North Koreans are learning the law of unintended consequences. But I mean, they have, I think, really united us. I mean, we are very concerned about this. The -- we have been talking to our South Korean allies, our Japanese allies. And we're going to start having some in-depth discussions with the Chinese. And we're going to see what we can do. What is very important about this, though, is, we have got to work together. We have really got to make this a multilateral process, because it's not a bilateral problem."

North Korea Deepens Ties With Iran. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Fairclough, 2.11M) reports that late last year, North Korea delivered more than a dozen intermediate-range ballistic missiles to Iran, according to senior US and Asian officials. The delivery, along with yesterday's missile test-launches "shows Pyongyang is increasingly willing to use its missile technology as a way to stand up to the US and its allies. North Korea's exports to Iran also mark a significant deepening of longstanding ties between Pyongyang and Tehran as international pressure mounts on the two governments to curb their nuclear ambitions, U.S. and Asian officials and analysts say."

Administration Facing "Crisis In Every Direction." In a story titled "A Driven President Faces A World Of Crises," the Washington Post (7/6, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, 744K) reports, "From deteriorating security in Afghanistan and Somalia to mayhem in the Middle East, confrontation with Iran and eroding relations with Russia, the White House suddenly sees crisis in every direction." North Korea's missile test "was another reminder of the bleak foreign policy landscape that faces…Bush even outside of Iraq." The Post adds "White House officials emphatically reject such pessimism," but "the events on the Korean Peninsula underscored how the administration has lost the initiative it once possessed on foreign policy in the aftermath of the Iraq invasion, leaving at risk the central Bush aspiration of democracy-building around the world." They also "showed how the huge commitment of resources and time on Iraq -- and the attendant falloff in international support for the United States -- has limited the administration's flexibility in handling new world crises." In an interview, National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said that "such criticism is misplaced, adding that victory in Iraq is crucial to success in fighting terrorists and in creating a new democracy that could serve as a beacon to other Middle Eastern countries."

Launches Provide First Test Of US Missile Defense. The Washington Times (7/6, Gertz, 90K) reports that the North Koreans missile tests provided the first real test of the US' ground based missile defense, "even though the failure of the long-range Taepodong-2 seconds after launch prevented the Pentagon from responding with a U.S.-based interceptor, defense officials said yesterday."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Karp, 2.11M) reports that the apparent failure of the long range missile "gives the Pentagon some breathing room as it prepares two critical tests for a US missile shield that has taken nearly 20 years and $100 billion to develop." Defense officials "confirmed yesterday that ground-based missiles in Alaska and California -- the backbone of the planned shield -- were operational during the North Korean launches." The Journal adds, "The Pentagon's confirmation yesterday that the missile interceptors had been activated specifically for the North Korean launches underscores the reality that the shield isn't permanently up and running."

ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 3, 2:05, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "The US has been concerned for decades about the threat of a missile attack from North Korea, spending billions trying to create a shield. But it's far from ready." ABC (Karl) added, "Two decades and $95 billion have bought a much smaller system that is just now taking shape. The first piece? Detection. The US now has radar systems around the world from Alaska's remote Shemya island to this floating platform off Japan's northern coast -- and space-based infrared sensors. The system allowed US officials to track North Korea's missile launches from the moment of take-off. If the order came to shoot down the Taepodong 2, the military has 11 interceptors capable of doing the job -- two in California, nine in Alaska."

The AP (7/6, Raum) says that North Korea's missile tests "suggested the country can't directly threaten the United States — for now. But the Koreans can learn from mistakes, whether the tests were posturing, serious military efforts or both, U.S. officials and military experts said." The long-range Taepodong-2 missile "failed 42 seconds after liftoff, suggesting a catastrophic failure of the rocket's first, or booster, stage. That heartened US officials, since an earlier version of the long-range missile…failed later in its flight, apparently due to a third-stage malfunction."

The Washington Post (7/6, A16, Ricks, Faiola, 744K) reports that it is not clear whether the Taepodong missile "crashed or was aborted by its controllers, but U.S. and Japanese officials said that intelligence and monitoring of the Taepodong-2 test launch indicated that it failed. The result of the attempt is that, to some specialists, North Korea looks less dangerous than it did just a few days ago."

Republicans Tout Support For Missile Defense System. The Washington Times (7/6, Bellantoni, 90K) reports that congressional Republicans used the North Korean missile tests to tout the GOP's support for missile defense and praise "their expansion of the program's budget and scope." The Times adds, "It is uncertain whether Congress, on a one-week break, will take legislative action, but aides for Republican leaders noted the unanimous passage of a Senate measure increasing funding for the U.S. missile defense system beyond the initial Pentagon request." House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter said, "If you have a missile in the air, and it's coming toward one of your cities, the only way to stop it at that point is not with words, but with interceptors." Sen. George Allen "said the North Korean launches were a reminder '[of the need for an effective missile defense system.'"

Brownback Says North Korea Is Desperate. Sen. Sam Brownback said on CNN's Larry King Live (7/5), "I think it's an obviously very difficult situation we're in. Thank goodness we went forward with the missile defense system and that we have something in place, although not fully in place to be able to move forward but can use in this if we need to in this particular situation. I think it also points out how desperate North Korea is and how we really need to confront them on a global basis. I'm glad the Japanese are leading the effort at the United Nations. But this needs to be a global effort including the Chinese and the Russians to confront the North Koreans to stop doing these provocative acts."

Weldon Says China Is Key To Dealing With North Korea. Rep. Curt Weldon said on CNN's Larry King Live (7/5), "I think we've got to see what the G8 brings about, and I hope the President can have a frank discussion with Putin and bring Russia into a more bold position with both Iran and North Korea. We've got to reinvigorate our discussions with China. They clearly are the key. If they want to shut North Korea's economy down, they could do it tomorrow. And with our trade imbalance being what it is with China, we need to apply more pressure with the Chinese."

Burton Says Diplomatic, Economic Pressure Should Be Exerted On North Korea. Rep. Dan Burton said on MSNBC's Hardball (7/5), "I think every ounce of diplomatic pressure that we can bring to bear upon them, as well as economic pressure, should be exerted, and that should not be done unilaterally by the United States. So I think the entire world, the United Nations, the entire world ought to tell North Korea that this is not something that is not acceptable, because it's not just the United States and our people that's at risk, it's anybody within the…range of those missiles."

Pascrell Says UN Should Take Action Against North Korea. Rep. Bill Pascrell said on MSNBC's Hardball (7/5) that there "should be a multilateral approach to a very serious problem. I think this is not an erector set we're talking about. North Korea has been working on this for a long time. They haven't fired a long-range missile since 1998. They're trying to flex their muscle. We are not going to be intimidated by the North Koreans, but we need to have the Chinese and South Koreans involved in negotiations, and we need to have the United Nations not only speaking, but taking action, against North Korea. We are not going to go to the bargaining table simply by them rattling swords."

WSJournal Says US Should Not "Reward" North Korean Tests With Direct Talks. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) says, "The last thing the US should do is reward North Korea's missile provocation with direct talks. Yet before yesterday's missile tests, that is exactly what Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Richard Lugar advised." The Journal also notes, "This is what happens when a non-transparent, authoritarian regime is appeased long enough for it to acquire nuclear weapons and the means to deliver them. The mullahs in Tehran have already absorbed that lesson. Iran, and other states that are considering going nuclear, will be closely watching how the world responds to Kim Jong Il's latest provocation."

WPost Says US May Have To Address North Korean Threat Alone. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/6, A20, 744K) says North Korea's launching of at least seven missiles "was baldly aimed at putting pressure on the Bush Administration, which lately has been focused on making disarmament offers to Tehran rather than Pyongyang. Sure enough, within hours there were predictable calls in Washington for the administration to begin 'bilateral talks' with the regime of Kim Jong Il, exactly as he must have hoped." The Post says the missile firings "offer the Bush administration an opportunity: not to bargain with Mr. Kim but to insist that China and South Korea stop tolerating his refusal to begin the disarmament he promised last year." The Post adds, "If China and South Korea are serious about stopping North Korea's development of weapons of mass destruction, now is the time to demonstrate it. If they are unwilling to act, the Bush administration should consider other means of preventing further North Korean missile launches."

LATimes Says "Desperate Nature" Of North Korea's Militarism Is Troubling. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (7/6, 958K) says the "silver lining in North Korea's act of defiance is the renewed unity of purpose that it is likely to forge among regional powers ostensibly engaged in trying to dissuade Kim's regime from developing nuclear weapons. Russia, China, South Korea and Japan all need to work alongside the Bush administration in the so-called six-party talks." The Times adds that "all nations in the region should be troubled by the desperate nature of North Korea's militarism." The region's "principal players need to stand together, alongside the White House, in dealing with this rogue state."

North Korea Said To Be Ratcheting Up Confrontation With US. Nicholas Eberstadt, the Henry Wendt scholar in political economy at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) that with yesterday's tests. North Korea "has done more than simply raise the stakes in its contest of wills with the Bush administration. Much more ominously, the launch reveals that the Dear Leader and his inner circle are ready to ratchet up their confrontation with 'the imperialists' to a new and still more dangerous level -- and that North Korea's masters are confident that they hold the upper hand in this escalation." Kim Jong Il and his regime "are now embarking on a perilous new high-stakes gamble, one through which they may earn unprecedented economic and strategic benefits. Ballistic missiles are their instrument in this venture. These will be wielded as like a strategic battering ram, with the aim of shattering the US security architecture in the Korean peninsula and throughout northeast Asia."

Bush Meets With Georgian Leader, Backs Country's Bid To Join NATO. USA Today (7/6, 2.31M) reports, "President Bush gave strong support Wednesday to ex-Soviet state Georgia's desire to join NATO, something that may annoy Russia ahead of next week's Group of Eight leading industrial nations summit in St. Petersburg, Russia." Said Bush, after a meeting with Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili at the White House, "We will work with our partners in NATO to see if we can't make the path a little smoother for Georgia" to join.

Under the headline "President Of Georgia Gets Warm Embrace," the Washington Post (7/6, A4, Baker, 744K) reports Bush "embraced" the foreign leader "as 'my friend,' delivering a pointed message just a week before a summit in Russia that he will stand by its neighbors in the face of pressure from Moscow." Bush praised Saakashvili "for 'vigor and enthusiasm' and called him 'a man who shares the same values I share.'" Bush also said, "I assured the president that Georgia is our friend and we care deeply about the people of Georgia. … My friend, the president, wouldn't be sitting here if

I didn't have Georgia on my mind." The Post adds, "The pun aside, Bush's comments had a serious, if unspoken meaning. Located on Russia's southern rim along a vital oil pipeline corridor, Georgia has been at a flash point between Washington and Moscow for years. By showcasing his meeting with Saakashvili, officials and analysts said, Bush signaled he is concerned about Kremlin treatment of former satellites as he prepares to head to St. Petersburg for the first Group of Eight summit hosted by Russia."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, A1 Champion, 2.11M) profiles Saakashvili in a front-page story, saying he has "strong backing from the US" as he tries "to transform Georgia's economy in a hurry. His aim is to end centuries of Russian domination and to forge new ties with the West. Corruption is down, and tax revenues have at least doubled since 2003, due in part to a new flat tax and improved collection, helping to pay for the government's many projects. The nation's gross domestic product rose 8.5% during the first quarter." Saakashvili "faces enormous challenges. Georgia sits at the center of an unstable region and shares borders with both Russia and Iran. If he succeeds, Western nations stand to benefit."

Bush Urged To Raise Browder's Case With Putin. The Financial Times (7/6, Yeager, Buckley) reports that Senate Majority Leader bill Frist and Sens. John McCain and Chuck Schumer have asked President Bush to raise the case of William Browder, the hedge fund chief who has been barred from entering Russia, when he meets Vladimir Putin at the Group of Eight summit this month. In a letter to Bush, the Senators say Browder's case "reminds us that the path to a free society and an open market in Russia cannot be taken for granted." They said Moscow "should either let Mr Browder back into Russia or provide a credible explanation as to why it is denying entry to its largest foreign portfolio investor. The White House had not yet responded to the request, a Senate aide said on Wednesday."

Gazprom Given Exclusive Rights For Russian Natural Gas. Parliament Grants Exclusive Rights The New York Times (7/6, Kramer, 1.19M) reports, "Russia's Parliament passed a law on Wednesday that grants exclusive rights for exporting natural gas to Gazprom, the state-owned energy operator that is already the world's largest gas company." If signed by President Vladimir Putin, the law "would be a boon for Gazprom, already a company with many perquisites bestowed by the state."

Bush To Meet With Canadian PM Today. The Washington Times (7/6, Sheikh, 90K) reports that President Bush will meet at the White House today with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Canada's first conservative Prime Minister in 12 years. The times says that in Harper, Bush "will find an ideological soul mate who has moved quickly to rebuild his country's long-neglected military and committed to keeping 2,300 troops in Afghanistan through 2009." Bush "also can expect a major improvement in atmospherics after years of prickly relations with Liberal Party governments, whose members were accused at times of adopting anti-American positions to score political points."

Iran Postpones Talks With EU. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) reports, "Iran on Wednesday postponed for a day a meeting with the European Union about its nuclear activities, apparently to protest the appearance of a prominent Iranian exile organization before the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France." Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, "announced that the meeting would be put off, exasperating Western officials, including Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief." The Washington Post/AP (7/6, A16) says Solana "expressed surprise that Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, did not appear for their scheduled meeting Wednesday." Iran "said the meeting would go ahead on Thursday."

Rice Says West Wants Answer From Iran Soon. Fox News' Special Report (7/5, Hume) reported, "Western nations say if Iran is trying to delay its response to a package of carrots and sticks aimed at getting Tehran to give up its uranium enrichment program, it will not succeed." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "says the West expects an answer and soon."

Israeli Army Pushes Deeper Into Gaza. The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 4, 1:45, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported "a major incursion" was "launched…in northern Gaza following…the launch of three of hose homemade rockets into the nearby city of Ashkelon. That is something that Israel's government says it will not stand for. It called the launch a serious escalation and said it would do all it could to prevent it. Tonight, they have moved tanks and armor into an area of northern Gaza about three miles north of where I am. They've taken over old Israeli settlements that they left about 11 months ago during disengagement."

The AP (7/6, Barzak) reports, "Israeli tanks and armored personnel carriers entered one of Israel's former settlements in northern Gaza Wednesday night and opened fire on a nearby Palestinian town, Palestinian officials and witnesses said." Earlier in the day, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "convened his Security Cabinet and met with top military officials after militants fired rockets on Tuesday into Ashkelon, a southern Israeli city of 110,000 people." The Washington Times (7/6, 90K) runs a similar AP story, while the New York Times (7/6, Myre, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports "Israeli officials said the security cabinet, meeting in special session, did not specifically authorize the establishment of a long-term buffer zone within northern Gaza." But "the previous troop position, about half a mile inside the border, did little to prevent more rocket fire into Israel. Plans originally drawn up by the army called for a deeper incursion into northern Gaza, along with the current deployment in southern Gaza near Rafah, where the captured soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, is believed to be held."

The Washington Post (7/6, A17, Wilson, 744K) reports from Beit Hanoun, in the Gaza Strip, "As Israeli tanks began moving toward this town, small squads of masked gunmen from the governing Hamas movement's military wing and other armed groups could be seen deploying at key intersections and along the dark streets of Jabaliya and Beit Lahiya, blacked out by a recent Israeli airstrike." The Post adds, "Two thudding explosions sounded in the dunes just north of Beit Hanoun as Israel targeted gunmen it said were burying explosives in the sand. At least two Palestinians -- one Hamas gunman and one member of the Palestinian navy -- were killed in the strike or other clashes, Palestinian hospital officials said. Fourteen others, including seven civilians, were wounded."

Hamas Seeks To Intimidate Palestinian Journalists. USA Today (7/6, Gutman, 2.31M) reports "Palestinian journalists say Hamas is trying to control news coverage" in Gaza, and that "intimidation tactics compelled some media outlets, such as al-Hurriya, to suspend news coverage. Frightened columnists put down their pens. Hazem Abu Shanab, a communications lecturer at Gaza's Al Azhar University, stopped writing his column for Al-Hayat Al-Jadida and other newspapers. Those tactics include: Death threats to journalists or outlets perceived as biased against Hamas, according to Arabeed and Reporters Without Borders, an advocacy group for journalists. Raids on radio and TV stations, including the sacking of Palestine TV's bureau in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis by gunmen claiming to be from Hamas. Sharp public criticism from Hamas officials."

More Commentary On Hamas. Edmund R. Hanauer, an American Jewish human rights activist who directs Search for Justice and Equality in Palestine/Israel, writes in USA Today (7/6, 2.31M), "Israel's brutal response in Gaza -- called 'war crimes' by Amnesty International -- to the capture of an Israeli soldier by Palestinian militants will not further peace. Israel, more than Hamas, blocks peace. … Palestinians are backed by international law; Israel is backed by the United States. Hamas says Abbas can negotiate with Israel and submit any agreement to a referendum. That is democratic and hopeful as most Palestinians seek a two-state settlement. The United States should press Israel to cease violence, freeze settlements, honor human rights and seek talks with both Hamas and Abbas." USA Today (7/6, 2.31M), meanwhile, editorializes that Hamas; "inability to evolve from terrorists to leaders of a government ignited a series of events over the past two weeks that underscore a depressing regional truism: When things hit rock bottom, they can always get worse. … When Palestinians elected Hamas, many weren't voting for terrorism. They ached for more normal lives and a change from the corrupt incompetence that had evolved under Yasser Arafat. Israel is hardly blameless." But "one essential part of a real peace is for Hamas to work to fulfill those aspirations."

Algeria Hires Carmen Group To Lobby In DC.

The Washington Post (7/6, A19, 744K) reports the Carmen Group, "which in the past year has made a play for business in Africa and hired strategically to make that happen, has scored a substantial lobbying client -- the government of Algeria." The fee "is a healthy $25,000 a month, for a total of $300,000 for the one-year term of the contract, according to the Carmen Group's Foreign Agents Registration Act filing with the Justice Department. The shop also filed a lobby registration with Congress." The Carmen Group "says it will work to strengthen relations between the Algerian and U.S. governments and expand trade, through government relations and 'strategic advice.'"

López Obrador Now Ahead In Mexico. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Luhnow, De Córdoba, 2.11M) reports, "Mexico undertook a tense official recount of its contested presidential election yesterday that with 91% of the vote counted showed a different outcome than Sunday's results, with populist Andrés Manuel López Obrador leading conservative candidate Felipe Calderón by a 36.2% to 35% margin." The Journal adds, "The mixed results produced confusion and tension in Mexico. Mr. Calderon's National Action Party, or PAN, said it was still confident of winning the recount because most of the districts outstanding were areas the party had won." Calderón's campaign strategist, Juan Camilo Mouriño, said, "In the states where Felipe Calderón won, the [Party of the Democratic Revolution] are playing games to draw this out, questioning everything, making long speeches, and raising the same objections over and over." The New York Times (7/6, Thompson, McKinley, 1.19M) notes that "as the night wore on, Mr. López Obrador's lead steadily narrowed as tallies arrived from the northwestern states that voted heavily in favor of Mr. Calderón," adding that "some" López Obrador "advisers…acknowledged that they were not confident that their candidate's lead would hold, and they made clear they would not recognize the results until there was a vote-by-vote recount."

The Financial Times (7/6, Lapper, Thomson) reports Calderón yesterday "accused his leftwing rival of 'intolerance' and 'irresponsibility' by alleging foul play in last Sunday's election and calling for street protests." In a Financial Times interview, Calderón said López Obrador "wanted to make the people believe he had won." Added Calderón, "It is not true. Then he wanted to make them believe that there was foul play. That is not true either, and we will fight these tricks one by one."

The Washington Post (7/6, A12, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports on the recount in a story titled "Mexico Watches As Votes Are Tallied," while the Washington Times/AP (7/6, Grillo) says that "in scenes reminiscent of the Florida recount in the US presidential vote in 2000, the divided nation bit its nails as the partial returns showed Mr. Lopez Obrador overtaking Mr. Calderon, who had ended just ahead in the initial vote count." ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 7, :25, Sawyer, 8.78M) said "the recount should be finished by the weekend."

More Commentary. Novelist Mario Vargas-Llosa writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) that López Obrador "represents a renunciation of the idea that development comes from transferring responsibility from the state to civil society and embracing a full exchange with the world. … It is unlikely that Mr. López Obrador would have become a full member of the 'axis' formed by Hugo Chávez, Fidel Castro and Evo Morales, for the same reasons the PRI kept away from communist alliances when it dominated Mexico: Mexican nationalism." But "a populist victory in Mexico would have invigorated other populists in Latin America. And the demagogic foreign policy establishment that used to be part of the PRI state would have likely come back, straining relations with the US." Calderón, "by contrast, understands the stakes better than the man he barely beat. Yet there is no guarantee that he will be a more effective reformer than Mr. Fox."

Cuba's Drilling Plans Spark Controversy In US. The Christian Science Monitor (7/6, Luscombe, 61K) reports that there are potentially billions of barrels of oil and trillions of cubic feet of natural gas beneath the waters of the North Cuban Basin. Late last year, Fidel Castro's government "started contracting out 59 lots in Cuban waters for exploratory drilling," creating a controversy in the US where the federal government maintains a moratorium on any drilling. The Monitor adds, "China, Canada, Spain, and India are among the countries that have snapped up Cuba's lots, while the US oil industry has stood by unhappily, abiding by America's decades-old trade embargo with the communist nation. … Environmental groups, meanwhile, are concerned that even if the US moratorium stays intact, drilling in Cuban waters will have a noticeable effect on Florida's 663 miles of beaches."

Morales Has Filled Bolivia's Government With Ex-Guerillas, Activists, Intellectuals. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, De Córdoba, Luhnow, 2.11M) reports, "Since he was elected Bolivia's first indigenous president by a landslide vote in December, Evo Morales, a former leader of the coca growers' union, has assembled a governing team of ex-guerrillas, former street activists and Bolivian intellectuals. … Since Mr. Morales assumed power in January, he has pledged to redistribute the country's wealth among Bolivia's poor Indians, and exert greater state control over the country's economy and natural resources. He has forged a close alliance with Venezuela's fiery anti-American president Hugo Chávez, and has organized a constitutional convention, to reform the way the country is organized." The Journal adds, "Many Aymara intellectuals say they want to re-create in the 21st century the values of the communal Eden they believe existed before the conquest, a place without poverty or oppression."

Nationalist Opposition Ousts Macedonian PM. The Washington Post/AP (7/6, A13) reports that Macedonia's Prime Minister Vlado Buckovski "conceded defeat Thursday to the nationalist opposition in Macedonia's parliamentary elections." The AP adds, "Sounding like a winner, Nikola Gruevski thanked his VMRO-DPMNE party supporters and said he would begin efforts on Friday to put together a coalition. … With 36 percent of the ballots counted, the VMRO-DPMNE party had 33 percent of the vote, while Buckovski's ruling Social Democrats had 24 percent, according to the State Electoral Commission."

Taylor's Son Pleads Not Guilty To Passport Fraud. The New York Times (7/6, Goodnough, 1.19M) reports the son of Former Liberian President Charles Taylor pleaded not guilty in Miami Wednesday to charges of passport fraud. The son, Charles McArthur Emmanuel, also known as Charles Taylor, Jr. was "returned to jail to await trial. He has "been held without bail at the Federal Detention Center downtown since March 30, when he arrived at Miami International Airport from Trinidad and Tobago. Mr. Emmanuel lied on March 15 in applying to renew his passport and listing his father as Steven Smith of St. Vincent, court papers say."

Author Says Belief In "Complacent Myths" Will Not Solve India's Problems. Author Pankaj Mishra, writes in the New York Times (7/6, 1.19M), "In recent weeks, India seemed an unlikely capitalist success story as communist parties decisively won elections to state legislatures, and the stock market, which had enjoyed record growth in the last two years, fell nearly 20 percent in two weeks, wiping out some $2.4 billion in investor wealth in just four days. This week India's prime minister, Manmohan Singh, made it clear that only a small minority of Indians will enjoy 'Western standards of living and high consumption.' There is, however, no denying many Indians their conviction that the 21st century will be the Indian Century just as the 20th was American. The exuberant self-confidence of a tiny Indian elite now increasingly infects the news media and foreign policy establishment in the United States. … Many serious problems confront India. They are unlikely to be solved as long as the wealthy, both inside and outside the country, choose to believe their own complacent myths."

NYTimes Says "Killing Fields" Tribunal Has Responsibility To Survivors. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) editorializes, "Three decades have passed since the world first learned of the 'killing fields' of Cambodia. … Yet it was only this week that a UN-Cambodian tribunal was sworn in and began the long task of bringing those most responsible to trial. … We can only hope that there will be enough of a trial in the end to give Cambodia's survivors some sense of justice done. The tribunal has a responsibility not only to those survivors but to a world that has yet to learn how to deal with crimes against humanity. … The court -- as well as other international tribunals -- should be supported by serious efforts to ensure that such atrocities do not happen again. Getting a UN force into Darfur would be a good start."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Italy Arrests Two Italian Intelligence Officials, Seeks Four Americans In Rendition Probe. The AP (7/6, Rizzo) reports, "Prosecutors said Wednesday they had arrested two Italian intelligence officers and were seeking four more Americans as part of an investigation into the alleged CIA kidnapping of an Egyptian cleric in Milan in 2003. … In a statement released in Milan, prosecutors said three Americans being sought were CIA agents, while the fourth worked at the joint U.S.-Italian air base of Aviano, where the Egyptian was allegedly taken after his abduction. The statement did not provide names" of the Italians, but "Italian media reports identified the two as Marco Mancini, currently the head of military counterespionage, and Gustavo Pignero, and said they were charged with kidnapping."

The New York Times (7/6,Grey, Povoledo, 1.19M) notes, "The arrests will put pressure on the new government of Prime Minister Romano Prodi to decide whether to back the efforts of the Milan prosecutor, which the previous government of Silvio Berlusconi had opposed." The Prodi "government is less supportive of the war in Iraq than was Mr. Berlusconi's. But Massimo Brutti, who oversees judicial issues for the largest party in the governing majority…said the change in government had not affected the decision to issue the arrest warrants."

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Wilkinson, 958K) reports, "In marked contrast to the previous administration…Prodi's government Wednesday night pledged 'maximum cooperation' with the judiciary and expressed faith in the 'institutional loyalty' of the state security services. The arrests bolster a European report last month that denounced a global "spider's web" of collusion, including hundreds of alleged clandestine flights by CIA planes transporting terrorism suspects across Europe and into North Africa, the Middle East and Central Asia."

USA Today (7/6, 4A, 2.31M) also notes, "The arrests were the first acknowledgement that Italian agents may have been involved," and the Washington Post (7/6, A15, Whitlock, 744K) adds, "Several Italian and European lawmakers said Wednesday that the arrests confirmed what they had suspected all along: that the Italian government worked directly with the CIA to kidnap" Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr. "Others said they were shocked at the move and said prosecutors were going after the wrong people."

Cole Bombing Mastermind Recaptured. ABC News.com (7/5, Ross) reports on its news blog the "alleged mastermind of the USS Cole bombing, Jamal Badawi, who had escaped from prison in Yemen, has been caught again according to US law enforcement sources." Badawi, "along with 22 others, had escaped from jail in February through an underground tunnel. The prisoners were believed to have help from both inside and outside the prison to dig the 460 foot tunnel."

Judge Denies Bond For Alleged Miami Terror Plotters. The AP (7/6, Wides-Munoz) reports, "A federal judge denied bond Wednesday to six men accused of plotting to blow up Chicago's Sears Tower and conspiring to help al-Qaida attack several federal buildings." The six, who have pleaded not guilty, "were arrested June 22 in Miami as part of an undercover FBI sting. They are accused of seeking to support what they thought was an al-Qaida operative's effort to bomb FBI buildings in Chicago, Los Angeles, Miami, New York and Washington." A seventh man arrested in the case and charged in Atlanta "was also being held without bond." US Magistrate Judge Ted Bandstra 'ruled Wednesday that the men in Miami posed too great a risk to the community to be released." The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Blum, 958K) also reports the story.

Judge Warns US Officials Not To Share Details Of Sealed Padilla Defense Motions. The AP (7/6) reports, "U.S. government officials who know of sealed defense motions in the Jose Padilla terror case face court punishment if they disclose their contents to the prosecution trial team, a judge has ruled. District Judge Marcia G. Cooke issued the order after Padilla's defense attorneys expressed concern over a sealed motion they filed requesting evidence and assistance from Egypt's government as part of their case. Defense attorneys claimed they received a call from a U.S. government representative who said that if the government is ordered to respond to a defense motion and the defense does not withdraw the motion, the government would disclose the motion's contents to the prosecution trial team."

More Time Behind Bars Seen As Likely Future For Many Guantanamo Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Williams, 958K) reports that the Bush Administration has described the men being held at the US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba "as being among the world's most dangerous men, but many profess to be simple villagers captured in the chaotic aftermath of Sept. 11." The majority of them have "not been charged with any war crime," so their detentions were "unaffected by the Supreme Court ruling that struck down the tribunal system used for those who do face formal charges. Congress, however, is looking at passing legislation to mandate the procedures for dealing with the foreign captives." The short term outlook for these men ""seems to be more time inside the fences and razor wire of the camps set among cactus groves on this Caribbean island."

Media Leak Throws French Terror Trial Into Turmoil. The New York Times (7/6, Smith, 1.19M) reports, "A French terrorism trial was thrown into turmoil on Wednesday by a leaked report that French intelligence agents had secretly interviewed the six defendants during their detention by the United States at Guantánamo Bay in Cuba. The revelation by the daily newspaper Libération is an embarrassment for the French government, which has long expressed official disdain for the American policy of detaining terrorism suspects beyond the reach of law." The Times adds, "According to a copy of a diplomatic cable published Wednesday by the newspaper, French agents visited the detention center shortly after it was created in January 2002 and again in March of that year. … French courts have previously declared the Guantánamo detentions illegal."

UK Neighborhood Patrols Focus On Home-Grown Terror Threat. Under the headline "UK Targets Terrorists-to-Be," the Wall Street Journal (7/6, Mollenkamp, 2.11M) reports, "While other British intelligence and law-enforcement agencies concentrate on terrorists' international movements, telephone calls or money transfers, British police believe neighborhood patrols are the best way to confront a particular type of terrorist: the homegrown variety who grow up in Britain and lead otherwise ordinary lives until the day they strike. London's Metropolitan Police Service, better known as Scotland Yard, increasingly is looking at this approach, especially in the wake of incidents such as last year's London bus and subway bombings. … 'Terrorism starts in the neighborhoods,' says Tim Godwin, assistant commissioner for territorial policing at Scotland Yard. The hope is that having community-support officers as a familiar presence on the streets will 'build the trust and confidence that people can come forward and say, "I don't like what's going on next door,"' he says."

The New York Times (7/6, Cowell, 1.19M), meanwhile, says that "with some anxiety, Britons are still asking what inspired the onslaught by British-born Muslims, and whether the dark undercurrents of July 7, 2005, could resurface in a new attack." There is an "increasingly rancorous debate a year after the four bombers struck on three Underground trains and a bus. The government of Prime Minister Tony Blair is locked in recrimination with Muslim leaders, who say the authorities have failed to reduce Muslim discontent. Many Muslims…are insisting that the government do more to investigate the origins of the attack."

Al Qaeda To Release Video Of London Suicide Bomber. ABC News.com (7/5, Ross) reports on its news blog that Al Qaeda is "set to release a new video tape featuring one of the suicide bombers from last year's London attacks, according to Ben Venzke at the IntelCenter." Venzke says "the as-Sahab production house will be putting out a tape on the Internet sometime Thursday that includes a video last will and testament of Shahzad Tanweer as well as a new statement from the al Qaeda number two leader Ayman al-Zawahiri." The tape "is also expected to include former Californian Adam Gadahn, who now goes by the name of Azzam al-Amriki. Gadahn is believed by U.S. authorities to be running the al Qaeda propaganda operation from a secret location somewhere inside of Pakistan." The tapes' release "the day before the London anniversary bombings suggest that al Qaeda had a significant role in the attacks which killed 52 and injured hundreds."

National Security Letters Allow FBI To Obtain Trove Of Personal Data. Under the headline "With only a letter, FBI can gather private data," USA Today (7/6, A1, Willing, 2.31M) reports on the increased post-9/11 use of National Security Letters by the FBI in counter-terrorism investigations, noting that the Library Connection lawsuit challenging an NSL request "provides a rare public glimpse of the vast amount of banking, credit, telephone and Internet records that anti-terrorism or counterintelligence investigators can have simply by asking." In a filing in the Library Connection suit, "David Szady, the FBI's assistant director for counterintelligence, said the letters are vital to the bureau's post-9/11 mission: to disrupt terrorist plots and other national security threats before attacks occur. … According to U.S. Justice Department figures, the FBI served 9,254 National Security Letters concerning 3,501 individuals in 2005." USA cites the arrest of al Qaeda terrorist Mohammad Junaid Babar in 2004 as an NSL "success story," but adds that the ACLU and civil liberties groups continue to criticize NSLs as unconstitutional."

In an accompanying table titled "Trove Of Information FBI Can Get," USA Today (7/6, 2A, 2.31M) reports, "Federal laws expanded by the USA Patriot Act of 2001 give anti-terrorism and counterintelligence investigators access to an array of consumer information beyond what the FBI can obtain through National Security Letters. … Some examples of records accessible to investigators: Driver's licenses, hotel bills, storage rental agreements, apartment leases and other commercial records. … Cash deposits, wire and digital money transfers, casino credit records, unusual bank transactions. … Patient business records and personal health information."

FBI Computer System Contractor Illegally Accessed Classified Data. The Washington Post (7/6, A5, Weiss, 744K) reports BAE Systems employee Joseph Thomas Colon, "using computer programs easily found on the Internet, managed to crack the FBI's classified computer system and gain the passwords of 38,000 employees, including that of FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III. … As a direct result, the bureau said it was forced to temporarily shut down its network and commit thousands of man-hours and millions of dollars to ensure no sensitive information was lost or misused." Colon, "who was assigned to the FBI field office in Springfield, Ill., said in court filings that he used the passwords and other information to bypass bureaucratic obstacles and better help the FBI install" the Trilogy system, and "he said agents in the Springfield office approved his actions." Colon is not accused of any malicious intent.

FAA Wants Restricted Airspace Training For Pilots. The Washington Post (7/6, A9, Wilber, 744K) reports that citing concerns over "too many pilots" violating restricted airspace around the Washington region, the FAA proposed a rule yesterday that would require the completion of "an Internet-based training course before being allowed to fly" in the area. Frequent "incursions drain resources from air-traffic controllers and from military and law enforcement authorities, officials said." The Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association said yesterday "it supported the FAA's proposed training requirements, which are to go into effect after a 60-day comment period."

New Orleans Officials Announce Neighborhood Rebuilding Plan. The New York Times (7/6, Saulny, 1.19M) reports New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin, along with the City Council and community leaders, "announced a long-awaited framework Wednesday for planning the rebuilding of ruined neighborhoods, nearly a year after Hurricane Katrina and after months of indecision about how various parts of the city should work together toward recovery." The Unified New Orleans Neighborhood Plan, "financed largely by a $3.5 million grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, is expected to bring order to an effort that was beginning to grow unruly and uneven without strong central advice or control."

Groups See Potential For Fraud In Gulf Coast Housing Aid. USA Today (7/6, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "A block of consumer advocates, mortgage companies and community groups are warning that plans to hand out up to $150,000 apiece in housing aid to Gulf Coast hurricane victims could open the door to fraud." HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson has received more than a dozen letters from groups concerned about the "nearly $7 billion in federal grants that would help tens of thousands of people in Louisiana and Mississippi rebuild damaged and destroyed homes. Both states have decided to give the grants directly to homeowners and bypass mortgage companies that typically dole out such money."

Texas Asks Louisiana To Issue Arrest Warrants For Felons Who Fled Katrina. USA Today (7/6, Johnson, 2.31M) reports the Texas attorney general's office is "urging Louisiana to issue arrest warrants for hundreds of felons who are suspected of violating conditions of their probation or parole by remaining in Texas nearly a year after fleeing Hurricane Katrina." The office "has sent Louisiana the names of more than 1,700 felons who either have failed to keep in touch with Louisiana officials or who have ignored court orders to return to Louisiana," 104 of whom "represent a particular risk to the public, says Angela Hale, spokeswoman for Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott. … A list of the offenders initially was assembled by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which identified the felons from lists of Katrina evacuees who received federal housing or other disaster benefits."

WAR NEWS:

Car Bomb Kills 12 Pilgrims In Kufa. The Los Angeles Times/AP (7/6) reports a car bomb "targeting Iranian pilgrims struck this morning near a Shiite shrine in the holy city of Kufa, killing at least 12 people and wounding 37, police said." The bomb "exploded near the shrine of Maitham al-Tamar and yards from the Kufa mosque." Attacks on "houses of worship have stoked tensions between Shiite and Sunni Muslims." Meanwhile, "hundreds of U.S. Marines on Wednesday stormed through the largest hospital in western Iraq, taking control of a facility they said was being used by insurgents."

Violence Spreads To Baghdad University. The Washington Post (7/6, A1, Partlow, 744K) reports in a front page story that at Baghdad University, "It's finals time in Iraq. Black-clad gunmen have stormed a dormitory to snatch students from their rooms. Professors fear failing and angering their pupils. Administrators curtailed graduation ceremonies to avoid convening large groups of people into an obvious bombing target. Perhaps nowhere else does the prospect of two months' summer vacation -- for those who can afford it, a chance to flee the country -- bring such unbridled relief." On the "tree-shaded, stone-slab courtyard of Iraq's most prestigious university, with 70,000 undergraduates and 10,000 graduate students, students still stroll to class and chat idly with friends." Within the "concrete blast walls and barbed-wire barriers, the campus exists in relative calm compared with more overtly violent areas of Baghdad."

House Panel Subpoenas Pentagon For Information On Abu Ghraib Whistleblower. The AP (7/6, Jelinek) reports lawmakers have "issued a subpoena seeking Pentagon information on a soldier who says he suffered retaliation for reporting abuses at Abu Ghraib prison." The subpoena "from the House Government Reform Committee seeks all communications relating to information provided by Army Spc. Samuel Provance about the Iraq prison." The subpoena also "seeks information on the interrogation of an Iraqi officer there, identified by Provance as Gen. Hamid Zabar. Provance had helped interrogate Zabar's 16-year-old son and was later told the boy had been captured and abused to compel the general to give information, Provance said in testimony prepared for Congress." Provance has "said his rank was reduced for disobeying orders not to speak about mistreatment he saw at Abu Ghraib." The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) runs the AP story.

Malaki Wants Independent Probe Of Alleged Rape-Murder By US Soldiers. The AP (7/6, Gamel) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Malaki "demanded an independent inquiry of the rape-slaying of a girl and the killing of her family, saying the immunity from Iraqi prosecution enjoyed by U.S. forces 'encouraged them to commit such crimes.'" Al-Malaki, "whose brief tenure has been marked by several high-profile allegations of abuse by U.S. forces, called for an Iraqi investigation — or at least a joint inquiry — into the March 12 rape and murder of Abeer Qassim Hamza, and the killing of her mother, father and sister at their home in Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad. He also said the agreements under which U.S.-led coalition troops enjoy immunity from prosecution by Iraqi courts should be reviewed." Al-Maliki "spoke two days after former Army Pfc. Steve D. Green was charged in federal court in Charlotte, N.C., with rape and four counts of murder."

The New York Times (7/6, Semple, 1.19M) reports al-Maliki "said Wednesday that Iraq would open an inquest into the recently disclosed rape-and-murder case involving American soldiers and contended that the immunity from Iraqi prosecution granted to foreign troops encouraged them to commit crimes." American military officials "scrambled Wednesday to control fallout from the case, one of at least five current investigations into accusations that American troops in Iraq had killed unarmed civilians."

The Washington Post (7/6, A13, Finer, Partlow, 744K) reports, "Following a recent string of alleged atrocities by U.S. troops against Iraqi civilians, leaders from across Iraq's political spectrum," including al-Malaki, "called Wednesday for a review of the U.S.-drafted law that prevents prosecution of coalition forces in Iraqi courts." The demand "could widen a rift between U.S. and Iraqi authorities over killings and other crimes allegedly carried out in recent months." The dispute "centers on a rule with the force of law enacted two years ago by the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority, which governed Iraq after the fall of Saddam Hussein. Known as CPA Order 17, it stipulates that coalition forces, diplomatic personnel and contractors working for coalition forces or for diplomats 'shall be immune from the Iraqi legal process.' But challenges to the immunity order have gained momentum, beginning with the November killing of 24 civilians in Haditha, which came to light in March when Time magazine reported the incident." In a "rare unified stance by factional leaders, members of Iraq's Kurdish and Sunni Arab political blocs endorsed Maliki's call to revisit the immunity issue."

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Salman, Kennedy, 958K) reports the case, "which includes the alleged rape of the older daughter, has caused a firestorm in the United States and Iraq. And the soldiers, including one charged Monday with rape and murder, have become lurid symbols of the American military at its worst. The image has not been helped in recent weeks by the emergence of other accusations that U.S. soldiers had killed Iraqi civilians." Abu Firas Janabi, the cousin of the girls' mother, "has emerged as a potential witness, has been interviewed by a U.S. investigator. He lives about half a mile from the scene of the killings, just outside the town of Mahmoudiya." Janabi and his wife "found the two young boys in the family crying as they stood outside the farmhouse, where they could see the bodies inside. The boys had been at school when the killings occurred but were home by the time Janabi and his wife arrived."

Accused Soldier Joined Army To "Get Direction." The AP (7/6, Breed) reports Pvt. Green "was a high-school dropout from a broken home who enlisted to get some direction in his life, yet was sent home early because of an 'anti-social personality disorder.'" Green "could get the death penalty if convicted in the horrific crime that has strained the U.S. military's already troubled relations with the Iraqi people and sent shockwaves around the world." Military officials "said the accusations of Green's involvement in the rape and killings came to light more than a month later during a session to counsel soldiers about the June 16 abductions of two fellow soldiers who were killed, and reportedly mutilated, by insurgents."

The New York Times (7/6, Cloud, 1.19M) reports Pvt. Green "was allowed to leave the Army in May under guidelines that required a medical finding that he was suffering from a severe personality disorder, according to documents released by the Army on Wednesday." Green "left the Army on May 13 under a regulation that allows the Army to honorably discharge a soldier if a psychiatric evaluation finds a personality disorder 'so severe that the soldier's ability to function effectively in the military environment is significantly impaired,' the Army documents said."

Kurdish Islamists Seek To Ensconce Sharia In Regional Constitution. The Christian Science Monitor (7/6, Brandon, 61K) reports the creation "of a new constitution for Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region was meant to be relatively straightforward. But instead, Kurdish Islamic parties have courted controversy by calling a greater role for sharia, or Islamic law." Mohammed Ahmed, a member of parliament for the Kurdistan Islamic Union (KIU), "the largest Kurdish Islamic party in the regional parliament, the Kurdistan National Assembly," said, "The Kurds are a Muslim nation and we have to follow Islam." The Monitor adds that "such calls may well go unheeded by secular parties which hold 80 percent of seats in the parliament, where a cross-party committee is now drawing up a draft constitution." But the "demands for Islamic law reflect the growing popularity of Islamic parties like the KIU and its smaller, more radical rival Komala, which was once allied with the Al-Qaeda's Kurdish offshoot Ansar Al-Islam. While unlikely to change the political power balance in Kurdistan any time soon, the Islamic parties may cultivate the ground for more radical ideas to take root."

Bombings In Kabul Kill One, Injure 47. The AP (7/6, Shah) reports, "Multiple bombs exploded Wednesday in Kabul for the second day in a row, killing one bystander, wounding 47 and raising fears that violence largely confined to the south and east will increasingly make its way into the capital." The blasts "came as U.S.-led coalition forces in the south killed 35 suspected militants during a raid Tuesday night while hunting for Taliban fighters. One British soldier was killed on patrol in a separate attack." The violence "has shaken the city, which has seen little of the heavy fighting sparked by resurgent Taliban militants in southern Afghanistan."

The Washington Post (7/6, A12, Constable, 744K) reports the three bombs were "apparently aimed at buses carrying government workers and Afghan troops." The blasts "occurred one day after two similar bombs were set off here, injuring 10. In those attacks, one bomb exploded near a bus carrying workers to the Interior Ministry and the second detonated in a vendor's cart near the Justice and Finance ministries, several hundred yards from the presidential palace."

Afghanistan Destroys 40 Tons Of Confiscated Drugs. The AP (7/6, Faiez) reports Afghan officials "destroyed more than 40 tons of confiscated narcotics worth an estimated $500 million on Wednesday in a giant bonfire on the outskirts of Kabul." Afghan counter narcotics police "have also arrested more than 600 drug traffickers, including 19 government officials, over the last year, said Deputy Interior Ministry Gen. Mohammad Daud Daud. Some 63 traffickers have been given long-term jail sentences for drug smuggling, according to the ministry."

Fisher Houses Aid Families Of Wounded Veterans. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (7/6), San Antonio Express-News columnist Jonathan Gurwitz says that since the fall of 2001, the Brooke Army Medical Center (BAMC) at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio "has treated more than 2,300 casualties from Operation Enduring Freedom and Operation Iraqi Freedom. The trauma center is heartbreakingly filled with the mangled and burned bodies of young Americans. For the wounded, the love and care of family members is indispensable. The painful rehabilitation process is made more bearable by the presence of loved ones. And many times, that would not be possible were it not for Fisher Houses." The Fisher Houses are "homes away from home for the families of wounded service members. They were born from a discussion in 1990 between the late Zachary Fisher, New York developer and philanthropist, and Pauline Trost, wife of Chief of Naval Operations Adm. Carlisle Trost." Mrs. Trost, "who was a volunteer at Bethesda Naval Hospital, relayed the story of a sailor sleeping in his car because he couldn't afford a hotel room while his wife was recuperating from surgery. The account inspired Mr. Fisher and Adm. Trost to begin a bureaucratic fight to create an innovative partnership between government and private philanthropy."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lay Dies Of Heart Attack. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 4, 2:20, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "Ken Lay, the founder of Enron, who took it to such great heights before it collapsed in one of greatest scandals in corporate history, died of a heart attack today at the age of 64."

The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 6, 1:55, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "Lay's sudden death didn't temper the anger of former employees." Lois Black, former Enron employee: "It's easy to die. Boom, you're gone. But to serve day after day in a prison cell after having lived a lavish lifestyle that he had become accustomed to, it's getting out easy."

NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 6, 2:10, Teague, 9.87M) reported, "During the trial, Lay claimed his personal fortune was gone, but in filings just last week, prosecutors said his assets total nearly $8 million, including this luxury condo here in Houston. Prosecutors today aren't commenting on Lay's death, and his family asks that their privacy be respected. Meanwhile, former Enron employees are left stunned." Connie Castillo, former Enron employee: "No matter how bad or whatever he did, he loved his family and that was pretty clear."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Emshwiller, 2.11M) reports, "With his death, his record may be expunged, though civil lawsuits against his estate likely will continue." The New York Times (7/6, Romero, 1.19M) says Lay's death "may have spared his survivors financial ruin. Mr. Lay's death effectively voids the guilty verdict against him, temporarily thwarting the federal government's efforts to seize his remaining real estate and financial assets, legal experts say."

The Financial Times (7/6, Ben White) says "Lay's death means the full story of Enron's catastrophic fall may never be known. Historians had hoped Mr Lay might provide a fuller account, from prison or after his release, of what was real at Enron and what was accounting fantasy." A similar Los Angeles Times (7/6, Bustillo, Mulligan, 958K) story reports Lay's death "complicates the federal government's effort to close the books on one of its most ambitious corporate fraud prosecutions. Legal experts said there is precedent in the federal courts for a criminal conviction to be wiped out after a defendant's death, on the grounds that the case had not reached finality because the defendant had not had the opportunity to exhaust all appeals."

The Washington Times/AP (7/6, Hays) reports Lay "had stayed out of the public eye since a federal jury on May 25 convicted him and former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling of fraud and conspiracy for lying to employees and investors about Enron's financial health." Lay, "who described himself as naturally optimistic, displayed no signs of ill health throughout the grueling four-month trial that started Jan. 30. His lead lawyer, Michael Ramsey, was sidelined for several weeks during the trial because of heart problems." Kurtzman "said the autopsy revealed that Lay had a heart attack in the past." The New York Times (7/6, Eichenwald, 1.19M) and Washington Post (7/6, A1, Johnson, 744K) run similar reports.

The Deal (7/6, Poole) reports, "The death Wednesday of Kenneth Lay, the founder and former chairman and CEO of Enron Corp., means any restitution in the criminal case will probably be vacated and the future of the Securities and Exchange Commission and civil cases will be more difficult to pursue, according to attorneys following the case. … 'It's a tragic end to a tragic story,' said Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and now partner at Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker in Washington. 'You don't have to be doctor to know that he was under a lot of stress. The sentencing won't go forward, mooted by his death, but the more interesting issue will be seizure and now forfeiture of the assets -- do they transfer to his wife? Even if they pass to a spouse or family, they're still attachable and still forfeitable to the government.'" The Deal adds, "Jacob Frenkel, a defense attorney at Shulman Rogers Gandal Pordy & Ecker in Rockville, Md., who worked at the SEC and is also a former federal prosecutor, said while Lay's death is sad and shows the 'human soul' of the case, there will be a lot of pressure on the government to pursue Lay's assets. 'But whether it can be done through a criminal proceeding, that's the unanswered question. It's not a case against an entity; it's a case against him, and he's no longer here. Then there's the SEC case and civil litigation. Those seeking to pursue his assets may or may not be able to find recovery.'"

CNN.com (7/6) reports, "White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday that Lay was an 'acquaintance,' not a friend, of the president, 'and many of the president's acquaintances have passed on during his time in office.' … 'I really haven't talked to him about it,' Snow said. 'I'll give you my own personal reaction, which is that when somebody dies, you leave behind those who grieve, and I think they deserve our compassion.' … The U.S. Justice Department had no comment in reaction to news of Lay's death."

AFP (7/6, Lever) reports, "David Berg, a Houston-based trial lawyer who has followed the case closely, said Lay's death would have no impact on Skilling's sentence or appeal, or on the various civil suits pending. … 'As to the civil cases (against Lay) it will have no impact because it will proceed against his estate,' Berg said."

The Rocky Mountain News (7/6, Rudawsky) reports, "As part of the 64-year-old's $5 million bond conditions, he was required to stay in the Southern District of Texas or Colorado or en route between the two until his sentencing in October. … He reportedly traveled to Old Snowmass, about 12 miles 'downvalley' from the better-known town of Aspen, shortly after he was convicted. He was sighted on a United Airlines flight, and was said to be staying at a ranch, rarely coming into town."

More Commentary. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) editorializes that Lay "was headed for the penitentiary, but that did not have to be the end for him. He would have had an opportunity to use his personal skills to help other prisoners. And at 64 years, he might have had another shot at that third act after all. Michael Milken has devoted much of his resources to medical research since serving his sentence. What Ken Lay might have done we will never know. Chances are it would have been interesting."

Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (7/6, D1, 744K), "The remarkable rise and tragic fall of Ken Lay is really a story about a man whose optimism was finally outrun by reality. Early on, he found he could succeed by putting the best face on things, stretching the truth, dismissing the doubts of naysayers." But "in the end, those habits became his undoing." Also in the Washington Post (7/6, C1, 744K), Henry Allen writes an "Essay" titled "Ken Lay's Last Evasion," in which he says "many people had looked forward to knowing more about Ken Lay, especially how he liked prison."

2nd Circuit Asks New York Court To Rule On NASD Form Statement Privilege. The New York Law Journal (7/6, Hamblett) reports, "Are statements made by an employer on a National Association of Securities Dealers termination form subject to an absolute or qualified privilege? … That is the question the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals wants New York state judges to answer as it wrestles with the latest of several cases where a fired employee claims he was libeled in a termination form by his employer." The Journal continues, "The circuit, calling it an 'unsettled and important' question of New York law, has asked the state's highest court to resolve the issue in Rosenberg v. MetLife. Inc., 05-4363-cv. … The decision certifying the question to the New York Court of Appeals was issued by Chief Judge John M. Walker Jr., Judge Dennis Jacobs and, sitting by designation, Judge J. Clifford Wallace of the 9th Circuit." The Journal adds, "Chaskie Rosenberg sued MetLife for employment discrimination, libel, fraudulent misrepresentation and breach of contract. The suit claimed Rosenberg was investigated and ultimately fired because he was a Hasidic Jew. … The NASD requires that, whenever a registered employee is terminated, member firms must fill out a termination form -- Form U-5. … Rosenberg's Form U-5 stated that, 'An internal review disclosed Mr. Rosenberg appeared to have violated company policies and procedures involving speculative insurance sales and possible accessory to money laundering violations.' … That same statement, Walker said, appeared on the Form U-5 of each of five other Hasidic Jews who were fired by MetLife -- all of whom worked out of the company's All-Boro Agency and were hired to develop business in the Hasidic community in Brooklyn. … Southern District of New York Judge Jed Rakoff held that the statement on the Form U-5 was absolutely privileged, barring legal action against MetLife. Rakoff said that, although the circuit may have ruled to the contrary in Fahnestock & Co. v. Waltman, 935 F.2d 512 (1991), 'the overwhelming authority in the New York courts has since rendered Fahnestock bad law.'"

Stock Options Probe Widens To Include Marvell, Quest, Openwave. Bloomberg News (7/6, Day) reports, "Marvell Technology Group Ltd.'s accounting is being scrutinized, Quest Software Inc. will restate six years of results and Openwave Systems Inc. received two subpoenas as the investigation into stock-option grants widened." Bloomberg continues, "Executives of Mercury Interactive Corp. held a conference call Wednesday to discuss Monday's announcement that it found 54 intentional acts of option backdating starting as far back as 1994. … The Securities and Exchange Commission signaled an escalation in the effort to clean up option grants by warning Mercury that it may bar three directors from serving on boards of public companies. Mercury, Marvell, Openwave and Quest are among at least 62 companies whose option grants to executives and directors are under scrutiny by the SEC, the Justice Department or internal review panels. … 'You're going to see more and more action against directors by the commission,' former SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt said Wednesday. 'The commission takes this very seriously and will come down hard.'" Bloomberg notes, "Apple Computer Inc. and Home Depot Inc. also are investigating to see if grant dates were manipulated to increase payoffs. Apple late Wednesday said that at least two shareholder lawsuits were brought against company officers and directors over the option grants."

The AP (7/6, Gordon) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission staff is considering civil charges against a former finance chief and three directors of Mercury Interactive Corp., as regulators sharpen a probe into how stock options were dated." The AP continues, "Mercury, one of the earliest companies to become ensnared in the widening controversy over suspicious timing of stock option awards to top executives, disclosed the notices from the SEC enforcement staff to the three directors." The AP adds, "Separately, software maker Opsware Inc., said Wednesday that its chief financial officer, Sharlene Abrams — who formerly held that position at Mercury — also had received a so-called Wells notice from the SEC related to timing of stock options at her former company. .. In issuing Wells notices, the SEC enforcement staff customarily gives the companies or individuals receiving them the chance to make the case why charges are unwarranted. … The three Mercury directors — Igal Kohavi, Yair Shamir and Giora Yaron — have told the SEC staff they will formally assert 'that they did not violate the federal securities laws, that they did not participate in or know of option backdating, and that the charges under consideration are legally and factually without basis,' the company said Monday in a news release."

Austrian Bank To Pay $675 Million In Refco Probe. USA Today (6/6, Farrell) reports, "More than six months after the former CEO of a financial services firm was indicted on charges of fraud, a government investigation into the matter seems to have gathered momentum." USA continues, "The U.S. Attorney's office here announced Monday that an Austrian bank would pay at least $675 million to settle claims that it helped Refco and its former CEO, Phillip Bennett, hide more than $1 billion in debt from investors and creditors in the past five years." USA adds, "The settlement was part of a non-prosecution agreement between federal prosecutors and the Bank fur Arbeit und Wirtschaft (Bawag), headquartered in Vienna. In a statement, Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, said the bank merited the non-prosecution agreement because new management, installed in January after the scandal, was cooperating fully with the criminal investigation. … Although no mention was made of the bank's previous management, prosecutors and regulators from the Securities and Exchange Commission are continuing their investigation." USA notes, "The deal lifts a cloud of uncertainty from the bank, while resolving most of the financial claims that have been lodged against it for its role in propping up Refco, now in Chapter 11. … More than half of the $675 million settlement will go to Refco's creditors. About $84 million will be paid to Thomas Lee Partners, which bought a substantial stake in the firm in 2004, and another $100 million to shareholders who invested in Refco after its 2005 IPO."

Private-Equity Firms Quick To Hire DC Insiders.

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, B2B, Tracy) reports, "Private-equity firms are finding it hard to turn down job candidates when their experience includes oversight of the U.S. economy, drafting national laws and trying to secure world peace. Within the past decade, U.S. private-equity firms have recruited more than a dozen politicians to their ranks, employing them as partners, consultants, advisers and board members. Law firms and other high-powered employers often follow the same strategy. In April, Apollo Investment Corp., the publicly traded arm of Apollo Management LP, became the most recent firm to hire a Washington insider, appointing former U.S. Sen. Thomas A. Daschle of South Dakota to its board." The Journal notes, "Former Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill joined Blackstone Group in 2003; Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers recruited former Secretary of State Colin Powell last year; and Yucaipa Cos. brought former President Bill Clinton on board in 2002. Over the years, Carlyle Group has employed almost half a dozen ex-government officials, including former President George H.W. Bush, former Secretary of State James Baker and former Secretary of Defense Frank Carlucci." The Journal adds that "private-equity firms have plenty of reasons to be involved in Washington's affairs these days." The SEC's "attempts to regulate hedge funds are continuing. Also, Congress could always consider legislation concerning capital-gains taxes or Sarbanes-Oxley requirements that might affect their operations."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US Charges Three In Theft Of Coke Secrets.

The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 10, 0:20, Smith) reported, "Three people, including an employee of Coca-Cola, were charged today with stealing Coke's secret recipes and trying to sell them to Pepsi. Federal authorities say a Coke employee rifled through company files at Coke's Atlanta headquarters and stole documents and a sample of a new drink. The arrest came after an undercover investigation."

The Washington Post (7/6, D1, Day) reports, "The FBI arrested three people in Atlanta yesterday on charges that they conspired to steal trade secrets from Coca-Cola Co. and sell the information for more than $1.5 million to PepsiCo Inc., federal law enforcement officials said." The Post continues, "The defendants, including one Coca-Cola employee, who worked as an administrative assistant in the company's Atlanta headquarters, contacted PepsiCo officials in May, who tipped off Coca-Cola officials, who then contacted the FBI, according to Atlanta U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias. … Coca-Cola and PepsiCo, whose fierce rivalry in the soft-drink and food arena has provided case studies for generations of marketing students, worked together to help federal agents set up an undercover sting operation that led to yesterday's arrests."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Mckay) reports, "Pepsi tipped off Coke to the scheme, which was busted after an undercover agent paid off one of the defendants with $30,000 stuffed into a Girl Scout cookie box, according to a statement from the U.S. attorney's office in Atlanta. The suspects, who are charged with wire fraud and unlawfully stealing and selling Coke trade secrets, were arrested Wednesday and are expected to appear before a federal magistrate judge in Atlanta Thursday." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors said the three people arrested had attempted to sell to Pepsi several documents and a sample of a product under development at Coke. An unidentified senior executive at Pepsi headquarters in Purchase, N.Y., received a letter in May in an official Coca-Cola envelope from a man identifying himself as 'Dirk' and offering to sell confidential Coke information, Pepsi spokesman Mark Dollins said. … Mr. Dollins said Pepsi 'immediately' turned the letter over to Coke, of Atlanta. 'We only did what any responsible company would do,' he said. 'Competition must be tough, but must always be fair and legal.' On May 24, Coke turned the letter over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which launched an undercover investigation."

The New York Times (7/6, Goodman) reports, "The recipe for Coca-Cola Classic, perhaps the company's most closely guarded secret, was never in jeopardy, said Ben Deutsch, a spokesman for Coca-Cola. … Instead, the information seems to be related to a beverage in development that had not yet been released, though the company declined to reveal more about the nature or scope of the thefts." The Times adds, "Executives at Coca-Cola verified that the documents were valid and proprietary. … At least one glass vial containing a sample of a new drink was offered for sale, court documents said. … According to a criminal complaint filed in federal court Wednesday, a letter postmarked May 8 and written on a Coca-Cola letterhead by someone who claimed to be a high-level employee at the company was mailed to executives at PepsiCo, offering 'very detailed and confidential information' in exchange for cash. … 'Pepsi, to their great credit, turned the letter over to Coke, who brought the matter to us,' said David E. Nahmias, United States attorney for the Northern District of Georgia."

The Financial Times (7/6, Ward) reports, "Prosecutors said that video footage filmed at Coke's headquarters showed Joya Williams, a company employee, rifling through corporate files and stuffing documents and the drink sample into her bag. … According to prosecutors, another of the conspirators attempted to sell the documents to an undercover FBI agent, posing as a go-between for PepsiCo, for $10,000 and the product sample for $75,000. … Later, the FBI agent struck a deal with the same suspect to buy additional trade secrets for $1.5m."

AFP (7/6) and the Atlanta Business Chronicle (7/6) also report on the arrests.

Former Florida Prisons Head To Plead Guilty To Federal Kickback Charge. USA Today/AP (7/6) reports, "The former head of Florida's prisons, ousted amid a broad investigation of alleged criminal activity within the system, will plead guilty to a federal charge of accepting kickbacks, according to court documents filed Wednesday." The AP continues, "Former Florida Corrections Secretary James Crosby and former corrections department regional director Allen Clark are accused of accepting $130,000 from a subcontractor over 2 years ending in February, according to the documents filed in U.S. District Court." The AP adds, "As part of a plea agreement, Crosby will not face any other federal charges in return for his cooperation in the continuing investigation. Clark also accepted a plea agreement. … U.S. Attorney Paul Perez said both Crosby and Clark can expect up to eight years in prison." The AP notes< "Law enforcement officials said seven other current and former prison employees are facing state charges of grand theft and one other person a charge of accepting unauthorized compensation."

The Tallahassee Democrat (7/6, Cotterell, 51K) adds that at a press conference yesterday, US Attorney Paul Perez and Jacksonville FBI Assistant SAC Nestor Duarte "said that Crosby and Clark took kickbacks totaling $1,000 to $12,000 per month from a subcontactor of Keefe Commissary Network of St. Louis. Crosby and Clark approached Keefe about its using a Gainesville friend of theirs to handle prison concessions. The unidentified subcontractor allegedly promised Clark and Crosby 40 percent of the $1.5 million he stood to make."

The Miami Herald (7/6, Caputo, Long, 323K) reports, "Crosby's written plea agreement implicating himself and…Clark was released just before state and federal authorities announced seven other former officials of the nation's third-largest prison system were charged in state court with theft. Including Wednesday's arrests, 21 former Department of Corrections workers have been charged since 2003 in a wide-ranging probe of steroid distribution, rampant theft, misuse of inmate labor, questionable contracts, drunken violence and a cutthroat softball culture in which a former pro slugger was given a no-show job to play ball. … Said FBI investigator Nestor Duarte: 'Many times when the top officials of a public agency are engaged in corrupt activity it fosters a culture of corruption which permeates the department.'"

New York Times Reporter Banned From Visiting Jailed Pellicano. The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Philips) reports, "The Metropolitan Detention Center in Los Angeles has barred a New York Times reporter from the facility for allegedly misrepresenting herself in an effort to interview Anthony Pellicano, the celebrity detective at the center of a Hollywood wiretapping scandal." The Times continues, "Allison Hope Weiner, who has written about the Pellicano case, got into the jail last month after presenting a State Bar of California card and asking to speak with the investigator. Weiner, who earned a degree 20 years ago from the USC law school, is registered with the California bar but has never done legal work for Pellicano or the New York Times." The Times adds, "Michael Benov, warden of the detention center, issued an order in February saying that, for security reasons, no one could visit Pellicano except his lawyer or immediate family. After learning that Weiner was admitted to a room in the jail where prisoners meet with their lawyers, Benov ordered an investigation. … Guards brought Pellicano from his cell to the meeting room, but he refused to talk to Weiner after learning that she was a reporter. .. A spokeswoman for the New York Times confirmed that Weiner had received a letter from Benov permanently barring her from the facility."

FBI To Open Criminal Probe Of Memphis Parking Garage Construction Errors. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (7/6, Williams, Erskine) reports, "The FBI is launching a criminal investigation of FedExForum's parking garage, answering the calls of City Council members and angering Mayor Willie Herenton. 'This is so ridiculous for anyone to suggest that there's been some criminal activity,' Herenton said Wednesday. … But council member Myron Lowery, referring to $6.3 million in federal funding the city is losing over garage mistakes, said, 'If there was nothing done illegally, why are we being asked to pay back money out of future funds?' FBI spokesman George Bolds declined to comment Wednesday, but U.S. Atty. David Kustoff said, 'The matter has been referred to the FBI for the purpose of determining any criminal activity involving the construction of the parking garage at the FedExForum.'"

WREG-TV Memphis (7/5, Encina) notes on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "the FBI will start investigating how the 20 million dollar FedEx Forum parking garage is lacking an entire floor, not to mention a bus terminal." Kustoff said, "If the report comes back and there was criminal activity we will prosecute." WREG adds that in a statement released yesterday, the Memphis Public Building Authority, "the agency in charge of overseeing the construction of the forum," said it "is confident it properly fulfilled it's responsibilities" and "will cooperate fully with the ongoing investigation."

Judge Rejects Defense Motion To Vacate Virginia Mayor's Corruption Conviction. The Lynchburg News & Advance (7/6, Reilly) reports US District Judge James Turk ruled yesterday that "defense motions seeking to throw out the recent convictions against Carl Hutcherson have 'no basis,'" derailing "a defense strategy focused on acquitting the former Lynchburg mayor of obstruction of justice, a crime his attorneys have said factor 'greatly' into his sentence." The News & Advance notes, "The defense reasoned that Hutcherson couldn't be convicted of obstruction because prosecutors forced him to turn over fake board minutes to a grand jury. … But Turk wrote that the defense's reasoning is flawed because of the 'misguided reliance' on an older section of the code dealing with obstruction. The former mayor's conviction for lying to an FBI agent and leading him on a search for documents he knew didn't exist is consistent with the newer obstruction law, Turk wrote."

Nevada DA Withdraws From Spousal Murder-Judicial Sniper Case. The AP (7/6, Chereb) reports, "Washoe County District Attorney Dick Gammick, citing possible conflicts of interest, on Wednesday removed his office from the case involving a wealthy businessman charged with killing his wife and shooting the judge who was handling their bitter divorce. At a morning news conference, Gammick said the Clark County district attorney's office will take over prosecution of Darren Mack." The AP notes that for the 11 days Mack was on the run, "Gammick said Mack called him about a dozen times to discuss his surrender. They also communicated by e-mail. Because of those communications, defense lawyers argue that Gammick is a potential witness."

Missouri Man Sentenced To Year In Prison For Identity Theft. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/6, Shinkle, 310K) reports, "An identity thief who made taunting statements to his victim was sentenced Wednesday to a year and a day in prison and ordered to repay $12,316 in losses." Mario D. Smith of St. Louis "pleaded guilty in April in U.S. District Court to one count of credit card fraud. The FBI claimed that Smith used the credit cards of Steven B. Weiss to set up credit card accounts, and then made charges on those accounts. … The case became more than a routine identity theft when Weiss contacted the perpetrator to try to stop the fraud, and the two had a series of communications." The Post-Dispatch notes, "Ultimately, authorities concluded that Smith…did not intend to harm Weiss."

Son Of Former Liberian Leader Pleads Not Guilty To US Fraud Charges. The New York Times (7/6, Goodnough) reports, "The son of Charles G. Taylor, the Liberian warlord and former president awaiting trial in the Netherlands on charges of human rights atrocities, pleaded not guilty here on Wednesday to charges of passport fraud and was returned to jail to await trial." The Times continues, "The son, Charles McArthur Emmanuel, also known as Charles Taylor Jr., has been held without bail at the Federal Detention Center downtown since March 30, when he arrived at Miami International Airport from Trinidad and Tobago." The Times adds, "Mr. Emmanuel lied on March 15 in applying to renew his passport and listing his father as Steven Smith of St. Vincent, court papers say. … He was seeking the renewal at the American Embassy in Port of Spain, Trinidad, days before President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf of Liberia asked Nigeria to extradite his father to face charges in Sierra Leone. … Mr. Emmanuel, 29, who goes by Chuckie, was born in Boston to a girlfriend of Mr. Taylor, who was living there. The criminal complaint against him says Mr. Emmanuel joined his father in West Africa in the 1990's, running the Liberian Antiterrorist Unit, an elite military force that provided security to Mr. Taylor while he was president of the war-torn country from 1997 to 2003."

DC Lobbying Firm Under Corruption Probe Underreported Income. The Washington Post (7/6, A4, Smith) reports, "A Washington lobbying firm at the center of a federal corruption probe failed to disclose at least $755,000 in income from 17 nonprofit organizations and governmental entities, and $635,000 from 18 other clients between 1998 and 2005, according to the firm's recently amended filings with the clerk of the House." The Post continues, "Lawyers for the Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White firm say that the errors were inadvertent. But some experts have called them unusual and suggested that Copeland Lowery might have been trying to play down how much money it was paid by those who received federal grants the firm arranged, particularly the clients who paid its lobbying fees with tax-exempt or public funds." The Post adds, "Such payments to obtain 'earmarks' -- a form of funding directed by language that lawmakers often insert in spending bills without hearings or competition -- have become increasingly common on Capitol Hill and increasingly controversial. Federal investigators have been probing whether there was a relationship between some of these earmarks and the campaign donations Copeland Lowery lobbyists made to House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) and his committee colleagues. … The initial reporting errors had the effect of understating what Copeland Lowery received in lobbying fees from universities, health-care centers and municipal governments, among others. The reporting errors also understated what the lobbying firm received from private firms including ADCS Inc., owned by Brent R. Wilkes, a longtime Republican contributor also targeted in the federal probe. … Wilkes, who was close to former representative Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.) before Cunningham's recent conviction for taking $2.4 million worth of bribes, was identified as co-conspirator No. 1 in court documents charging Cunningham, a former Appropriations Committee member. Lewis and Wilkes have denied wrongdoing."

Maryland Accountant Denies Aiding Bribery Scheme. The Washington Post (7/6, B04, Rich) reports, "An Upper Marlboro accountant, testifying at his own trial yesterday, denied that he conspired with two Prince George's County officials to demand a $250,000 bribe from a security company in exchange for a county contract worth more than $1 million." The Post continues, "At the trial, which is winding toward conclusion after six days of testimony, prosecutors have accused accountant Paul L. Wright of serving as the bagman in a 2004 bribery scheme targeting Interior Systems Inc. They allege that payments in exchange for the contract were to be laundered through one of Wright's companies." The Post adds, "The investigation by State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh, in cooperation with the FBI and other agencies, has led to the conviction of Robert L. Isom, the former deputy director of the county Department of Environmental Resources. Isom pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery last September and testified against Wright last week. … As the prosecution and Isom described it, the cost of the scheme would have been borne by taxpayers: ISI, a subcontractor, was to recover the cost of the bribery payments through change orders that were to be approved by county staff after the contract was awarded. … Wright's trial in Prince George's Circuit Court has offered a preview of the evidence prosecutors will probably present next month at the trial of the official they have painted as the ringleader, Robert L. Thomas, the former deputy director of the county's Office of Central Services."

New York Lawmakers Criticized For Failing To Pass Sex-Trafficking Bill. In a piece in the New York Times (7/6), columnist Bob Herbert writes, "Early last year a Democratic assemblyman from the Bronx, Jeffrey Dinowitz, introduced a bill to fight sex trafficking." Dinowitz "hoped, through his legislation, to establish two new crimes in New York: trafficking a person for sexual servitude and trafficking a person for labor servitude." His bill "would have made trafficking a Class C felony, with penalties ranging from probation for a first-time offender to a maximum of 15 years in prison. It would have modestly raised the penalties for patronizing prostitutes, making it easier to jail chronic offenders. And it would have addressed the problem of sex tourism, in which tour companies arrange trips from the U.S. to foreign countries so the tourists -- invariably men -- can have sex with foreign prostitutes, many of whom have been forced into the sex trade, and some of whom are children." Hebert notes, however, that Dinowitz's "bill hit a few roadblocks," as the Assembly and state Senate squabbled over the wording in the bill. Herbert adds, "Neither house of the Legislature gave the other house's bill serious consideration. Last week the Assembly and the Senate adjourned without making any genuine attempt to actually enact a law against sex trafficking. It was a big win for the pimps and the madams."

Intelligence Analyst Faces Questions Over Support For China Spy. The Washington Times (7/6, Gertz, 90K) reports that Lonnie Henley, a high ranking US intelligence analyst "is facing an internal probe for his support of former Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) analyst Ron Montaperto, who recently pleaded guilty to an espionage-related charge involving contacts with Chinese intelligence." Henley "recently sent a two-page e-mail to several hundred current and former US intelligence and policy officials criticizing the FBI investigation of Montaperto and defending the former DIA analyst. … Mr. Henley also made telephone calls to intelligence officials after the guilty plea to state that Montaperto was caught up in technical violations of classified information laws."

Federal Judge Blocks Rule Allowing Firms To Cut Retirees' Benefits. The New York Times (7/6, Pear) reports, "A federal district judge on Wednesday blocked a Bush administration rule that would have allowed employers to reduce or eliminate health benefits for retirees when they reach age 65 and become eligible for Medicare." The Times continues, "Ten million retirees could have had benefits cut under the rule, which was adopted last April by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. … The judge, Anita B. Brody of the Federal District Court in Philadelphia, struck down the rule and issued a permanent injunction that prohibits federal officials from enforcing it. …

The rule 'is contrary to Congressional intent and the plain language of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act,' the 1967 law that bans most forms of age discrimination in the workplace, Judge Brody wrote." The Times adds, "The erosion of retiree health benefits is an explosive political issue. Before issuing the rule, the commission was deluged with letters opposing it. … The rule would have created an explicit exemption to the age discrimination law, allowing employers to reduce health benefits for retirees when they became eligible for Medicare. Under the rule, Judge Brody said, employers could have given older retirees "health benefits that are inferior" to those given retirees younger than 65. … The commission argued that employers were more likely to continue providing health benefits to retirees under 65 if they were allowed to reduce or eliminate benefits for those 65 and older. … AARP, the main plaintiff in the case, rejected that argument. It said the rule would accelerate the erosion of retiree health benefits, a trend that has been evident for more than a decade."

Dispute Over Florida Synagogue Settled. The Miami Herald (7/6, Wright) reports, "A five-year battle between the city of Hollywood and an Orthodox Jewish synagogue appears to be over." The Herald continues, "The two sides agreed to end the feud today, signing a settlement deal that will allow the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch to stay in two homes in a residential neighborhood permanently and expand to three other homes in the future. … The city would also pay the congregation $2 million." The Herald adds, "The deal was hand-delivered at around 2:50 p.m. to the federal courthouse in Miami, just ahead of a deadline set by Judge Joan Lenard on Monday. … Lenard has to approve the settlement, but city officials said the fight is over. … In return for the right to stay and expand, the Chabad and the U.S. Justice Department agreed to drop their religious discrimination lawsuits against the city and Commissioner Sal Oliveri."

CBS 4, Miami, FL (7/6, Murray) reports, "Lawyers had been given till Wednesday afternoon to reach a settlement or face trial otherwise. Both sides have agreed to the settlement which includes: Giving Chabad Lubavitch the right to continue using two homes in a residential area as a synagogue, and it gives them the right to buy a third home to use as a parking lot. Furthermore, the city has to pay Chabad $2 Million dollars. Chabad will also have the right to buy as many more properties in the area as it needs to continue practicing their religion." CBS 4 continues, "Sources close to the negotiations say the two sides met on the July 4th holiday to hammer out an agreement, and said the documents outlining the settlement have been sent to judge Lenard, in advance of her deadline. The judge will decide whether to approve the settlement Thursday."

Navy Chaplain's Complaint Ruled "Without Merit." A Navy review has ruled that a Navy chaplain's complaint that his commanding officer censored and harassed him by discouraging the use of certain Bible quotations was "without merit." The Washington Times (7/6, Scarborough, 90K) reports that Navy Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt "said the investigative report actually backs up his complaint, even though the chief investigator sided with the commander." The chaplain "said his commanding officer, Capt. James Carr, retaliated against him by downgrading his January 2005 fitness report. But Adm. Ruehe concluded that the report 'was not the result of improper discrimination on the basis of his religious beliefs or the practice of his faith, but rather Captain Carr's legitimate evaluation of his performance of duty.'"

Care Of Family Leads To Discrimination Suits. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 9, 2:25, Sawyer) reported, "There is news tonight about a relatively new kind of discrimination. Workers being treated unfairly because of their family obligations. It is called family responsibility discrimination. It's about the care of children but also about the care of elderly parents. And the pressure has led to an explosion of lawsuits." ABC (B. Stark) added, "Dawn Gallina says her career at a prestigious law firm was going well until the managing partner found out she had a baby. Then, she says, he started testing her. Would she work Christmas and come in weekends?" Dawn Gallina: "I would come in, and we wouldn't have anything to do. But I really felt like it was – let's see if she'll come in. And, of course, I would." Stark: "Eventually she was let go. A victim, she says, of family responsibility discrimination. It can happen to mothers and fathers or daughters and sons. Jonathan Bell, who routinely works six days a week designing cars, says his troubles started after his father was hospitalized." Jonathan Bell: "I took a Saturday off to attend to my father. Sunday I went into work for awhile, and then Monday, the next day after, I -- that's when I was let go." Stark: "Bell's employer says he was one of many workers laid off for financial reasons. But law professor Joan Williams says Bell and Gallina are part of a growing trend." Prof. Joan Williams: "The fact is, in many situations, workers with family responsibilities are not treated the same as workers without the family responsibilities." Stark: "Now these women and men are taking their cases to court. In the last decade, there's been a 400% increase in family responsibility discrimination suits. And the good news for caregivers is that while employers may not be family friendly, the courts increasingly are." Prof. Williams: "Family values have a very broad constituency. You are more likely to win, it appears, if you bring a family responsibilities discrimination case, than if you bring other kinds of discrimination cases." Stark: "Jonathan Bell's case is still in court. But after a jury sided with Dawn Gallina, her employer offered her a cash settlement." Dawn Gallina: "I don't think that by being a parent, that anyone wants special rights. I think we want equal rights."

US Intensifies Scrutiny Of Air Fares. The Financial Times (7/6, Cameron) reports, "US regulators intensified their scrutiny of transatlantic air fares with plans to end a long-standing practice which allows carriers to co-ordinate some pricing." The Times continues, "The Department of Transportation wants to remove antitrust immunity from airlines co-operating in the regular price-setting conferences organised by the International Air Transport Association, mirroring similar efforts by competition authorities in Europe and Australia." The Times adds, "The fares set by the conferences do not prevent airlines from offering discount and other prices, but the DoT believes the practice limits competition and is unnecessary in an industry where most of the largest carriers now co-operate through the global alliances which now dominate the industry. The transportation department wants to end immunity for carriers setting prices through IATA on passenger and cargo flights from the US to Europe and Australia. … However, the proposal also coincides with the launch of probes on both sides of the Atlantic into alleged collusion by operators in the passenger and cargo markets." The Times notes, "More than a dozen airlines are being investigated by the justice department and the European Commission about price-fixing in the freight business. British Airways last month admitted it was at the centre of an investigation into an alleged cartel setting prices on longhaul passenger routes. … IATA has defended the fare-setting practice, arguing that it allows carriers to operate so-called 'interline' agreements. The prices set at the tariff conference set a template of fares and conditions which IATA says allows passengers to travel on two or more airlines between destinations lacking direct service."

ADC, Andrew Close In On Buyout Deal. The AP (7/6) reports, "ADC Telecommunications Inc. said Wednesday the Federal Trade Commission cut short a required waiting period necessary to complete an acquisition." The AP continues, "ADC announced its plan to buy rival telecommunications equipment company Andrew Corp. May 31 for $1.6 billion in stock. No closing date has been set. … In a statement, the company said the required waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 was lifted early, satisfying a closing condition of the deal. It was set to expire July 14. The law requires companies to file notice of a merger or acquisition in advance with the Federal Trade Commission."

AMS Clears Antitrust Period For Laserscope Purchase. The AP (7/6) reports, "Medical device maker American Medical Systems Holdings Inc. said Wednesday it moved closer to completing its $715 million buyout of San Jose, Calif-based Laserscope." The AP continues, "The company announced the buyout of the medical laser systems maker on June 5. On June 30, the required antitrust waiting period expired, satisfying a closing condition of the deal. The law requires companies to file notice of a merger or acquisition in advance with the Federal Trade Commission. … The deal does not yet have a closing date."

Many Students Turn Down Colleges' Offer Of Free Music Downloads. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Timiraos) reports, "As a student at Cornell University, Angelo Petrigh had access to free online music via a legal music-downloading service his school provided. Yet the 21-year-old still turned to illegal file-sharing programs. .. The reason: While Cornell's online music program, through Napster, gave him and other students free, legal downloads, the email introducing the service explained that students could keep their songs only until they graduated. 'After I read that, I decided I didn't want to even try it,' says Mr. Petrigh, who will be a senior in the fall at the Ithaca, N.Y., school." The Journal adds, "College students don't turn down much that's free. But when it comes to online music, even free hasn't been enough to persuade many students to use such digital download services as Napster, Rhapsody, Ruckus and Cdigix. As a result, some schools have dropped their services, and others are considering doing so or have switched to other providers." The Journal adds, "To stop students from pirating music, more than 120 colleges and universities have tried providing free or subsidized access to the legal subscription services over campus networks in the past few years. About 7% of all four-year schools and 31% of private research universities provided one of the legal downloading services, according to a 2005 survey of 500 schools by the Campus Computing Project, a nonprofit that studies how colleges use information technology. Universities typically pay for the services, some with private grants and others through student fees. While a typical monthly subscription to Napster is $9.95, the schools have been able to cut special deals, funded in part by record companies."

FCC Asks 2nd Circuit To Allow Comments In TV Case. The Wall Street Journal (7/6) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to send back to the agency a court challenge to some recent decisions on indecent television programming, requesting 60 days to handle the matter in a way that allows broadcasters to file comments with the agency." The Journal continues, "TV broadcast networks, including News Corp.'s Fox Television Stations Inc., in April filed court challenges to a handful of March FCC decisions. As part of a broad initiative on indecent programming, the FCC in March had found four television programs were 'indecent and profane,' but hadn't fined the stations. … 'Several of the parties to this litigation have complained to the Commission that this process failed to provide them with any opportunity to be heard by the Commission before the decisions were reached,' the FCC said."

Peabody Energy To Purchase Australia's Excel For $1.34 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Golden) reports, "Peabody Energy Corp., the world's largest private-sector coal company, agreed to acquire Australia's Excel Coal Ltd. for $1.34 billion." The Journal continues, "Peabody will pay 8.50 Australian dollars (US$6.31) a share for all shares outstanding under the terms of the agreement, which is a 10% premium above Excel's average share price over the past month. Peabody will also assume debt of $190 million, Peabody said." The Journal adds, "The move extends St. Louis-based Peabody's expansion in Australia. In the past five years, the company has purchased several coal mines there and developed some of its own. … Excel is an expanding company within the growing industry of producing coal to feed Asian industry. Coal is Australia's biggest export product, and nearly a third of the world's coal produced for export comes from Australia. … The combination of Peabody's Australian operations and Excel 'creates one of the largest coal companies in Australia,' said Peabody President and Chief Executive Officer Gregory H. Boyce."

Maryland Officials Testing Geese For Bird Flu. The Baltimore Sun (7/6, Thomson, 296K) reports a team of biologists from the Maryland Department of Natural Resources has begun testing flocks of geese in the state for avian influenza, specifically the deadly H5N1 strain. According to the Sun, wildlife experts "suspect that if the deadly form of the virus enters this country, it will most likely be through birds that mingle in the arctic during the breeding season before returning to their wintering grounds." Maryland, it notes, has been designated a "Tier One" state by the US Department of Agriculture "because the Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries are at the heart of the Atlantic goose migratory route." The AP (7/6) says the state is using federal funds to test geese flocks at wetlands and ponds across the state.

State Department Discusses Priorities, Wildlife Trafficking. The Washington Post (7/6, A19, Eilperin, 744K) interviews Claudia A. McMurray, who "took the helm of the State Department's Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs in February after spending two years as deputy assistant secretary for the environment." Asked what her priorities were, McMurray said, "Climate change and avian influenza. Those two issues are realities. They're important and complicated issues that we spend time on. Every day I spend time on them." Asked about the $10 billion annual international wildlife trafficking business, McMurray said, "[Wildlife conservation] counts on individual countries to enforce [trafficking] restrictions. While a lot of countries do a really good job, there are a lot of countries that need help. … First of all, the most important thing for governments is a political commitment to stop the trade." China, "in particular, is one that we're interested in because that's the world's largest market. Secondly, we look at supply and demand. This is organized crime, for the most part."

WPost Makes Case For Reducing Dependence On Fossil Fuels. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/6, A20, 744K) says "a new report by a group of federal scientists and university researchers highlights a different threat posed by carbon emissions, one with its own set of potentially devastating ecological consequences: the increasing acidity of the oceans. Ocean water absorbs a huge amount of the carbon emitted by human energy use." All that carbon "seems to be making the waters more acidic, a trend researchers believe will continue as concentrations increase. … While there still exist big questions surrounding climate change and carbon emissions, the best evidence all points in a single direction: that failing to reduce dependence on fossil fuels will have terrible consequences, and failing to start now will make the disruption later all the more painful."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Jails Bonds' Trainer For Contempt Of Court. The AP (7/6, Elias) reports, "Barry Bonds' personal trainer was held in contempt of court and taken to prison Wednesday for refusing to testify to the federal grand jury investigating the San Francisco Giants' slugger for perjury." The AP continues, "Greg Anderson, who served three months in prison after pleading guilty last year for his role in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid scandal, was led out of U.S. District Judge William Alsup's courtroom by two deputy U.S. marshals. He will be housed at the Federal Correctional Institution in nearby Dublin, but his stay may be short. … That's because Anderson will be set free once the grand jury's term expires, which will occur within weeks, Alsup said."

Bloomberg (7/6) reports, "U.S. District Judge William Alsup in San Francisco said government prosecutors had met the burden required to find Anderson in contempt of court. U.S. marshals took Anderson into custody without bail shortly after 4 p.m. … 'The court finds that the information sought is relevant to the proceeding looking into several athletes, some of whom are Greg Anderson's clients,' Alsup said in court today. Questions posed by the grand jury 'were proper and you should've answered them,' Alsup told Anderson." Bloomberg adds, "U.S. prosecutors in San Francisco are investigating steroid use by professional athletes after obtaining guilty pleas from distributors. Anderson spent three months in prison after pleading guilty in July 2005 to conspiring to distribute steroids and money laundering. … Anderson's lawyer, Mark Geragos, argued Anderson isn't required to testify because the conversation that triggered an investigation into whether Bonds lied to the grand jury about his steroid use was illegally wiretapped."

The San Francisco Chronicle (7/6, Williams, Fainaru-Wada) reports, "Anderson, 40, Bonds' friend since boyhood and his weight trainer since 1998, will be incarcerated indefinitely at the Federal Correctional Institution in Dublin. … At a grand jury hearing last week, he had balked at testifying about what the government styled a 'mountain of evidence' seized in a raid on his Burlingame home in 2003 indicating he had provided banned drugs to elite athletes." The Chronicle adds, "Anderson's lawyer, Mark Geragos, said he would appeal immediately to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. Geragos had urged the judge not to jail Anderson, arguing that by subpoenaing the trainer, the government was violating terms of his plea bargain last year in the BALCO steroids case. … Anderson pleaded guilty to money laundering and distributing steroids and was sentenced to three months in prison and three months' home confinement. At the time of the plea, he had refused to become a government witness. … Geragos also asked the judge to convene an evidentiary hearing to learn how the government obtained a recording on which Anderson admitted providing 'undetectable' steroids to Bonds in 2003. … In court, prosecutors Matt Parrella and Jeff Nedrow said they want to question Anderson about documents seized in the September 2003 raid. The documents include doping calendars, drug price lists and other written material indicating that Anderson was providing banned drugs to Bonds and other athletes, The Chronicle has reported."

In Delaware, More Overdoses Linked To Heroin.

Wilmington's News Journal (7/5) reports Wilmington police "announced three more heroin overdoses, bringing the total number of drug overdoses in New Castle County since June 29 to at least 15. Vice squad detectives are investigating the rash of heroin overdoses in the city and warning people to avoid the potentially deadly drugs. A Drug Enforcement Administration task force was formed months ago to investigate distribution of a deadly batch of heroin mixed with the painkiller fentanyl that has killed users in the Delaware Valley and nationwide."

The News Journal (7/5) also writes, "Responding to a five-day rash of drug overdoses in Wilmington and suburban New Castle County, officials are warning heroin users that a dangerous batch of the drug, possibly mixed with formaldehyde or the analgesic fentanyl, could be on the streets. Two drug overdoses were reported Tuesday, bringing the total to at least 12 since Thursday. Several of the overdoses occurred after ingesting heroin sold in light blue packages with 'The Omen' in red lettering, Wilmington police said."

Fentanyl-Related Deaths Scrutinized. In the Oak Park, Illinois Austin Weekly News (7/6), Robert Felon writes, "During a press conference at the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Chicago office, agent Tim Ogden stated, without apparent irony, that the current threat of Fentanyl-laced heroin, which has been responsible for 150-300 deaths throughout the upper Midwest and the Northeast, was 'the biggest threat I have seen in almost 30 years of law enforcement experience.' To say that this statement is a bit hyperbolic is putting it mildly. Especially since the 'victims,' as the news refers to them, are all willing participants who are generally mindful of most of the risks involved with cooking up and injecting a substance like heroin intravenously."

Weed Resembling Marijuana Plant Causes Concern In Michigan. For Heritage Newspapers, Belleville, Michigan's The View (7/6) reports, "There is a common weed that has been found near railroad tracks in Belleville and other industrial sites that can easily be confused with marijuana. Recent deaths of heroin users injecting a mix of heroin and fentanyl...have raised concerns that addicts and recreational drug users are growing more reckless in their search for a more potent source of drug use. There are several types of cinquefoil, which is common throughout Southeastern Mich., sulfur cinquefoil very closely resembles marijuana plants."

Local TV Coverage. WFMZ-TV, Philadelphia (7/5, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "A deadly drug combination that's showing up in major cities across the country has taken the life of a Reading man. The Berks County coroner says toxicology tests show the body of the man found dead last month along the side of route 222 tested positive for an overdose of cocaine and fentanyl. The prescription pain killer is also being mixed with heroin. The Berks County coroner's office says it's waiting for test results to see if fentanyl was a factor in several drug related deaths over the past two weeks."

WHYY-TV, Philadelphia (7/5, 5:30 p.m.) reported, "Three more heroin overdoses in the city of Wilmington, bringing the total to more than a dozen. … One man died Sunday night from an overdose, but the three most recent victims were treated and released. … Police are waiting on toxicology test results to determine if the heroin had been laced with a deadly drug that has killed here and across the region."

WJBK-TV, Detroit (7/5, 7:00 a.m.) reported, "One of the men accused of dealing a deadly dose of drugs is due in court today. Jamar Woffard is one of the suppliers that sold the lethal combination of heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl. The deadly drug has killed more than 100 people in the metro Detroit area."

Limbaugh Viagra Case To Be Reviewed By Miami-Dade Prosecutors. The AP (7/5, Skoloff) reports Rush Limbaugh "will not face criminal charges in Palm Beach County after authorities found he had a bottle of Viagra that was prescribed in his doctor's name, prosecutors said Wednesday. … However, since the doctor wrote the prescription in Miami-Dade County, the case has been forwarded to prosecutors there for review." Nonetheless, "according to the Drug Enforcement Administration, Viagra is not considered a controlled substance because it is not addictive."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/5, Stoddard) writes, "Saying Rush Limbaugh's Viagra prescription was legally prescribed, the Palm Beach County State Attorney's Office announced on Wednesday that it would not file charges against the conservative radio talk show host for possessing medication in someone else's name. But Miami-Dade prosecutors will review the file and decide whether charges are warranted against the two Miami doctors involved."

On its Web site, WFOR-TV, Doral, Florida (7/5) reports a spokesman for the Palm Beach County state attorney said, "It is generally not illegal under Florida law for a physician to prescribe medication in a third party's name if all parties are aware and the doctor documents it correctly."

Man Barricades Himself In Virginia Home After Shooting At ATF Agents. The AP (7/6) reports, "Authorities surrounded a home in Arlington, where they say a man has barricaded himself after firing a gun at federal agents on Wednesday." The AP continues, "A spokesman with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives says the shooting happened about 5:30 p.m. when ATF agents traveling in a Jeep Cherokee on Interstate 395 were sideswiped by a man driving erratically in a Ford Taurus." The AP adds, "Spokesman Tom Mangan says the man in the Taurus pulled over at Glebe Road and opened fire on the agents, who were giving chase. Two agents suffered minor injuries. … Authorities say the man then drove off, eventually running into a home at 13th and Irving streets, where he shot a man who lives there in the leg. The man wasn't seriously hurt and managed to escape."

The Washington Post (7/6, B01, Stockwell, Dvorak) reports, "A man stepped out the shower at his Arlington home yesterday and was shot by a gunman who had broken down his door after fleeing federal agents in a wild rush-hour car chase and gunfight, police said last night. … The gunman was barricaded inside the house late last night as police surrounded the area and fired pepper spray canisters inside. The wounded resident and his sister managed to escape." The Post adds, "The incident began about 5:30 p.m. on Interstate 395 near Glebe Road, when three agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives were traveling south in an unmarked sport-utility vehicle and the SUV was 'severely sideswiped' by a gold Ford Taurus, police said. … Agents took off after the suspect, who pulled over at the South Glebe Road exit and got out of his car. … 'The suspect probably thought he was dealing with a common citizen,' said ATF Special Agent Tom Mangan. … The agents identified themselves, and the man began shooting at them, Mangan said." The Post notes, "Bullets hit the engine compartment and a window of the SUV. The agents returned fire, but the suspect dived back into his car and sped off, Mangan said. … The chase continued onto South Glebe Road, where it went on for a couple of blocks, with both vehicles beginning to falter."

Buffalo US Attorney Cracking Down On Gun Crime. WBFO-TV, Buffalo, NY (7/6, Buckley) reports, "The U-S Attorney's office in Buffalo continues efforts to try and get guns off City streets." WBFO-TV continues, "There are two federal programs implemented in Buffalo that are aimed at gun violence. Terrance Flynn, U-S Attorney for the Western District says one of those programs is Project Exile. The Justice Department started Project Exile in 1997. It is designed to reduce gun violence. … But Flynn says since he began his new post this past spring, Project Exile has been stepped up locally. The program is in Buffalo, Niagara County, Jamestown and Rochester, all covered under the Western district. Flynn says members of local law enforcement and area district attorneys meet weekly to examine gun violations. … 'And then based upon the arrest, we determine if there is other infractions. Did they have prior records, is there a narcotics element? Then were determine, along with the District Attorney's office. what is the more appropriate form to get the strongest sentence for that fire arm and gun violation. We come to that agreement, then we decided who will prosecute the case. So we hold a weekly meeting and determine proper court to prosecute, that is Project Exile' Flynn said. … But Flynn says they have now

'leaped' that program into a second level, called Project Safe Neighborhood. That is a federal program initiated by U-S Attorney Alberto Gonzales. Flynn says under this program, law enforcement works to identify potential gang members in the City."

US Attorney In California Encourages Public To Report Suspected Meth Labs. The Mount Shasta (CA) Herald (7/5) reports, "Local agencies, including those in Siskiyou County, have joined forces with state and federal agencies to create task forces in the ongoing war on methamphetamine. This team effort is needed in order to provide the manpower and equipment to combat the 'devil's drug,' United States Attorney for California's Eastern District McGregor Scott said. Scott stressed that while the task forces provide the trained personnel and sophisticated surveillance equipment used in detection of meth, there is one other vital member of the team effort - the public. … Scott said where the public can really provide its assistance is in reporting any signs of a meth lab operation."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Touts Immigration Reform As House GOP Highlights Border Security Gaps. President Bush yesterday visited a Northern Virginia Dunkin' Donuts owned by Iranian immigrants to highlight his support for a comprehensive immigration reform bill. But in the media, the President's event was largely upstaged by the competing House and Senate field hearings on immigration reform. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Lueck, 2.11M) reports President Bush "underlined his support for immigration overhaul yesterday, even as House Republicans rallied backers of their competing plan, which aims to stop illegal immigration by tightening border security." Bush "reiterated his belief that immigration changes should include expanded guest-worker programs and a path to citizenship for some of the 12 million illegal immigrants already in the U.S." Meanwhile, at "a San Diego Border Patrol station, House Republicans framed the issue differently. At the first of several hearings around the country scheduled for this summer, House Republicans and local law-enforcement officials emphasized border security, raising the possibility that terrorists, specifically al Qaeda operatives, could enter the U.S. through its porous borders." Supporters of the Senate bill "held a hearing in Philadelphia intended to counter the House event."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/5, Koppel) reported the House and Senate Republicans went "ahead with potentially divisive hearings outside of Washington today, hearings that prompted President Bush to get involved. Immigration was on the menu during President Bush's quick stop at this Virginia Dunkin' Donuts. Flanked by the store's Iranian-American owners and some of their foreign-born employees, Mr. Bush insisted immigration reform must include a guest worker program and a realistic solution for the millions of illegal immigrants already in the US. … The President's latest appeal was clearly timed to coincide with competing hearings as Republicans in the House and Senate continue to battle over immigration legislation."

The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 8, 2:30, Smith, 7.66M) reported that at the Senate hearing, "New York's Mayor, Michael Bloomberg, was a guest speaker." Mayor Bloomberg: "Although they broke the law by illegally crossing our borders or overstaying their visas and our businesses broke the law by employing them, our city's economy would be a shell of itself had they not, and it would collapse if they were deported." Pitts: "In San Diego, the majority of the House of Representatives favor broader border security and tougher enforcement," while President Bush "tried his hand at referee." President Bush was shown saying, "We're not going to be able to deport people who have been here working hard and raising their families, so I want to work with Congress to come up with a rational way forward."

NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 9, 2:15, Reid, 9.87M) reported House Democrats "accuse Republicans of staging the hearings for purely political purposes." Rep. Brad Sherman, California: "These hearings are not designed to legislate. They're designed to whip up public opinion." Reid: "It's no accident that this hearing is being held so close to the Mexican border. It's part of a coordinated strategy by Republicans in the House of Representatives to convince the American people that the top priority on immigration is getting control of that border, a border that must be secure, they insist, before even considering a guest worker program or citizenship for illegal immigrants. Recent reports have suggested President Bush might agree with House Republicans to take up border security first, but today at a donut shop owned and run by immigrants, the President reiterated his desire for comprehensive immigration reform." President Bush: "We cannot kick people out who've been here for a while."

The AP (7/6, Pickler) reports, "The immigration legislation that Bush is demanding is caught between House and Senate negotiators who so far have not been able to work out disagreements over how to handle an estimated 12 million foreigners living illegally in the United States." One compromise "being promoted by Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., would require the immigrants to go to centers across the border and fill out the appropriate paperwork before becoming guest workers. They also would have to have an employer sponsor them to get back in the country." Although Bush has "repeatedly said it's impractical to force millions of illegal immigrants to leave the country, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president finds the Pence plan 'interesting.'"

The Washington Post (7/6, A10, Murray, Babington, 744K) reports President Bush, who "prefers the Senate's more comprehensive approach, staged his own immigration event, showing up at a Dunkin' Donuts in Alexandria owned by two Iranian American brothers to reiterate his call for a guest-worker program." President Bush said, "If you talk to employer[s] such as these folks, they'll tell you they need workers. And people are willing to do the work that others aren't willing to do, but we want to make sure there's a legal way to do it." The Post adds some "advocates are disappointed that Bush has not taken a more active role in trying to weaken the House Republicans' resolve, which has intensified as the midterm elections near and conservatives try to rally their voting base."

USA Today (Welch, Kiely, 2.31M) reports congressional Republicans "heard lively testimony Wednesday from mayors, sheriffs and ordinary citizens in two public hearings held on both coasts to discuss illegal immigration." The hearings "in San Diego and Philadelphia marked the opening of a summer season that will take proponents of competing immigration proposals in Congress across the country. The aim is to demonstrate public support for their plans." On the West Coast, "much of the talk was about how hard it is to handle the stream of Mexican citizens coming across the border." But Democrats "mocked the Republicans for holding hearings they said would not lead to solutions."

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Gaouette, Quinones, 958K) reports the "two hearings marked the start of a summer-long contest between the House and the Senate to control the terms of the immigration debate." As lawmakers "held court on opposite coasts, President Bush hosted his own field hearing at a Dunkin' Donuts in Alexandria, Va. Celebrating the entrepreneurial energy of the store's two Iranian American owners and their Guatemalan American district manager, Bush jokingly offered reporters coffee and reiterated his support for a Senate-style overhaul." The "atmosphere at the House hearing, at San Diego Border Patrol headquarters, was far less jovial. Within sight of the hills of Tijuana and the walls that separate the United States from Mexico, immigration restrictionists waved American flags, while immigrant advocates displayed hundreds of crosses representing those who died trying to cross the border."

The New York Times (7/6, Preston, 1.19M) reports most of the speakers at the Philadelphia hearing "embraced the Senate's approach, which calls for a path to citizenship for most illegal immigrants and a guest worker program, as well as enhanced border security and punishment for employers who hire illegal workers." In San Diego, Rep. Ed Royce, chairman of the House Subcommittee on International Terrorism and Non-Proliferation, "was chosen to lead a meeting in a Border Patrol station that featured agents and local sheriffs."

The AP (7/6, Hefling) reports Mayor Bloomberg said the "economy of the country's largest city and the entire nation would collapse if illegal immigrants were deported en masse." New York City is "home to more than 3 million immigrants, and a half-million of them came to this country illegally, Bloomberg testified." Bloomberg said, "Although they broke the law by illegally crossing our borders ... our city's economy would be a shell of itself had they not, and it would collapse if they were deported. The same holds true for the nation." The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) also runs the AP story.

The Washington Times (7/6, Hurt, 90K) reports Mayor Louis Barletta of Hazleton, Pa., "yesterday told senators at a special 'field hearing' in Philadelphia that illegal aliens have strained his city's services and brought a wave of crime." Barlettta said, "We've seen a dramatic increase in gang-style graffiti, some of which has included threats to kill police officers. … This graffiti has marred an award-winning redevelopment project that replaced vacant factories with family homes. Now, those homes, those families, are threatened by hoodlums who don't respect people or their property."

House GOP Focusing On "Terrorist Loophole" In Senate Immigration Bill. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (7/6) writes, "With their party sharply divided on immigration, House Republicans this week launched an effort to transform this political liability into an asset by tying it to the war against terrorism." CA40 Rep. Ed Royce's (R) "International Relations subcommittee on terrorism started hearings Wednesday in San Diego and Friday in Laredo, Texas, on a 'terrorist loophole' in the Senate measure." Novak notes that "Section 240d" of the Senate bill "would restrict local police from arresting aliens for civil violations, limiting them to apprehension for criminal offenses. That means a sheriff's officer on the border could not arrest someone whose papers showed he had overstayed his visa." Royce and Kris W. Kobach, "who was Attorney General John Ashcroft's chief adviser on immigration law," "point to the fact that four of the 9-11 terrorists, all of whom had violated immigration laws, were stopped for speeding before their attack. Had the police officers asked the right questions, terrorists could have been arrested under current law -- but not under the Senate bill. … In contrast, the House bill provides assistance to local police to encourage their help in immigration enforcement."

Owens Says Colorado Shouldn't Wait For Federal Action On Illegal Immigration. The AP (7/6, Paulson) reports Gov. Bill Owens of Colorado said his state "should not wait for the federal government to stop illegal immigration but should implement its own plans." Gov. Owens "told the Joint Budget Committee, which held hearings Wednesday to discuss the cost of illegal immigration, that Colorado spends about $560 million a year educating illegal immigrants and their U.S.-born children, who are legal citizens. He said that the cost falls most heavily on local governments and that the federal government is doing little to help." Owens told legislators "the state could sharply reduce the number of illegal immigrants in Colorado by setting up a secure identification system, requiring job applicants to present a driver's license or identity card before they could get a job."

NYTimes Criticizes House GOP For Focus On Immigration, Terrorism. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) says in an editorial that the "nation's debate over a serious reform of its immigration laws" was "hijacked yesterday by 'Border Vulnerabilities and International Terrorism' — the first of many hearings that House Republican leaders plan to hold around the country this summer, ostensibly to solicit public opinion about immigration reform." This "novel approach to governing — seeking public input on bills after they have passed — reflects a cynical gamble that linking immigration and terror will upend the Senate bill and give House Republicans a short-term electoral boost."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Assertion Of Executive Power Seen As Risking Backlash. The Financial Times (7/6, Daniel) reports in an extended story on the White House's philosophy of executive power that the Hamdan v Rumsfeld Supreme Court decision that held the President "did not have the right to hold military commissions to try terror suspects held at Guantánamo Bay" marks "a defining moment in the Bush presidency. Not only does it dismantle some of the elaborate legal scaffolding he has erected since the attacks of 9/11 to prosecute the war on terror. It also potentially heralds a 1970s-style backlash against executive power, triggered by the perceived overreach of the last six years." Reagan Administration deputy attorney General Bruce Fein said, "The White House could be left with fewer powers than when Bush entered. Like President Nixon, Mr Bush's craving for an imperial presidency could bring his office to its ebb." The Times also examines Vice President Cheney's role in the Administration's assertion of executive authority, noting that he "arrived at the White House in 2000 determined to avoid the 'unwise compromises' made by presidents over the past three decades. For Mr Bush, the motivation has been more visceral. Shocked by the events of 9/11, he vowed he would do 'whatever it takes' to defend the American people. This interplay of ideological and intuitive motivations has played out in the war on terror. Recognising that congressional power is greatest at times of peace and presidential power at times of war, officials seized their opportunity."

Broder Urges Congressional Debate On Anti-Terror Policies. In his column in the Washington Post (7/6, A21, 744K), David Broder writes about the recent Supreme Court decision on Guantanamo. Says Broder, "I am delighted that Republican congressional leaders say they hope to turn the ruling to their advantage by engaging the Democrats in a lively debate about the president's counterterrorism strategy. That debate is long overdue. In the first reaction to the Sept. 11 attacks, Congress gave Bush broadly worded authority to protect the country and strike back at the terrorists. After that it paid little attention for the next four years to the way that authority was being used -- and how the administration assumed additional powers." Adds Broder, "There is no reason for Democrats in Congress to fear the coming debate. They need not feel embarrassed about…finding ways to legislate the needed rules for handling these detainees. Far from being defensive, Democrats could challenge the Republican majority to take the opportunity to examine all that Bush is doing -- or not doing -- to counter al-Qaeda and other threats to national security."

Bush Turns 60. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 11, 1:50, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported President Bush is "the leader of the free world. But for a moment, George W. Bush is also the nation's most vocal birthday boy. Tomorrow is the big day. Boomer in Chief. That's what the press corps has been calling the President lately because the President seems to have that milestone, turning 60, on his mind. Really on his mind." President Bush: "I used to thing 60 was old, didn't you? … Security is strong at the airports. I hope they stop taking off shoes of the elderly. I must confess, they haven't taken off my shoes lately at the airport. … We're living longer. I don't know about you all, I plan on just kind of stretching it out a little bit." Sawyer: "Even though President Bush has aged in office, according to his latest physical, he is in the superior fitness category for men his age, despite his jokes."

The New York Times (7/6, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "Could it be that Mr. Bush, with his enviably low heart rate and penchant for two-hour mountain bike rides that exhaust Secret Service agents half his age, is worried about getting old? Is that why the president, so mindful of proper attire that he demands a coat and tie in the Oval Office even on weekends, wore a decidedly youthful red-and-white Hawaiian shirt to his two-days-early birthday dinner in the East Room of the White House Tuesday night?" But if "the president is worried about getting old, his friends say, he certainly has not confessed it to them, though they recognize the Big 6-0 could be a touchy subject. Mr. Bush took four friends along with him on Air Force One for a trip to Ft. Bragg, N.C., on Tuesday; all were mum about the impending birthday, refusing to disclose even the teeniest detail of the party or gifts."

FDA Approves New AIDS Pill. The New York Times (7/6, McNeil, 1.19M) reports that the FDA has approved "the first 3-in-1 antiretroviral pill for use by the Americansponsored plan for AIDS treatment, something that the White House's acting global AIDS coordinator said yesterday should greatly improve treatment for AIDS patients in poor countries." The agency "posted the approval of the drug on its Web site on Friday evening. It approved the 3-in-1 pill, made by an Indian generic drug company, for patients in countries helped by the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief." The new pill "combines three common first-line drugs, AZT, 3TC and NVP, which are also known as zidovudine, lamivudine and nevirapine and sold in the United States as Retrovir, Epivir and Viramune."

Turley Criticizes Roberts Court's First Term. Jonathan Turley, the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest Law at George Washington University, writes in USA Today (7/6, 2.31M) that the first term of the Roberts court "was no cause for hope, let alone celebration, for uneasy liberals, moderates or libertarians. To the contrary, the only comfort these groups should take from the past term is that it will likely prove far better than the coming term when the court is poised to hear cases involving affirmative action, abortion, environmental law and other hot-button issues. Despite hopeful accounts that John Roberts and Samuel Alito would prove mainstream jurists, they proved every bit as ideological in major cases as predicted." The Court's first term reveals "a new vision of our society emerging from the new conservative base of the court with Roberts and Alito," who are "speaking clearly and loudly — from the far right side of the court."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Tumble As Oil Prices Rise To Record Level. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 8, :15, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "Oil prices jumped to a record high today, $75.40 a barrel, on strong US demand and tensions over North Korea's missile launch and Iran's nuclear program. Prices settled at $75.19 when the markets closed, up1.7 percent for the day."

The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 5, 0:15, Smith, 7.66M) said the spike was due to "concern about North Korea's nuclear ambitions." NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 7, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) also reported the story. The Washington Times (7/6, Hill, 90K) also reports the oil price "spiral" came "in response to rising tensions with North Korea," adding that "some traders predicted that crude will hit $80 before the end of the year." The New York Times (7/6, Peters, Fackler, 1.19M) titles a similar report "Oil Up And Stocks Fall On Missile Worries." The Washington Post (7/6, D3, Kirkham, 744K) also reports the story.

NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 8, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "And a strong US Jobs report caused fears on Wall Street today that interest rates would have to be raised again in August. That was enough to spook the Dow down over 76 points on the day [to close at 11,151.82]. Nasdaq was down 37 points [2,153.34]." The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Browning, 2.11M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.72%, or 9.28 points, to 1270.91, "still up 1.8% for 2006." USA Today (6/6, Shell, 2.31M) also reports the stock numbers.

Factory Orders Rise Amid Strong Employment Data. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Gerena-Morales, 2.11M) reports, "The US economy may have entered the third quarter with a little more momentum than thought, according to new data tracking industrial activity and employment growth." The Commerce Department "reported that orders to US factories rose a stronger-than-expected 0.7% in May, to $399.9 billion, following a 2% decline in April." Meanwhile, "an employment report suggests the nation experienced robust employment growth in June. The private sector added a seasonally adjusted 368,000 nonfarm jobs in June, according to the National Employment Report from Automatic Data Processing Inc. The report is a measure of employment based on a subset of ADP's payroll data covering 225,000 businesses and 14 million employees. The data don't include government employment."

Oil Prices Said To Endanger US Jobs. USA Today (6/6, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "The rising cost of oil has put a squeeze on the companies that use oil as an ingredient for their products. Although they are down from the records seen recently, oil prices are up more than 20% from a year ago and are more than 150% higher than they were five years ago. Natural gas prices have also risen." USA Today adds "the impact on manufacturers and other companies that use oil-based ingredients could be significant, causing a ripple effect throughout the economy. As firms are faced with rising prices and see their margins cut, they may have to cut back on production, reduce pay increases or maybe even cut jobs or shut down."

US Population Approaches 300 Million. The AP (7/6, Ohlemacher) reports that the US' population is approaching 300 million. The US "is the fastest growing industrialized nation in the world, adding about 2.8 million people a year. That's a little less than 1 percent, but enough to mitigate the kinds of problems facing Japan and many European countries," which are facing declining populations. The US "has a fertility rate of 2.05, about enough to maintain a stable population. The US also adds people through immigration, something many European countries have shunned."

State Houses Hold Greatest Potential For Power Shift In 2006 Races. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Cooper, 2.11M) reports that "the potential for swings in power may be greater at the state level than in Congress, where the struggle for control gets more attention. In 29 legislative chambers across the nation, a shift of no more than five seats would bring a new party to power. If the restless, dissatisfied mood among many voters produces a desire to throw out incumbents, both parties could see turmoil at the state level. If the sentiment turns against Republicans in charge at the national level, Democrats could make significant gains in elections." The Journal adds, "Beyond the legislatures, Democrats also hope to regain a majority of governorships for the first time since Republicans gained the advantage there in 1994."

Biden, Boxer, Salazar To Campaign For Lieberman. The AP (7/6, Miga) reports, "Embattled Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman is getting a little help from his Senate friends as he tries to fend off an anti-Iraq war challenger in an intraparty fight." Sens. Joe Biden, Barbara Boxer and Ken Salazar "plan to campaign in Connecticut for Lieberman between now and the Aug. 8 primary. Their goal is to reassure the party faithful of the three-term senator's loyalty to Democratic causes, including women's issues, labor and the environment." The AP adds, "The rush of support from his Senate colleagues comes two days after Lieberman, the party's 2000 vice presidential nominee, surprised Democrats by announcing that he would start collecting signatures for an independent campaign if he loses the primary."

Lamont Said He May Spend $1 Million More In Primary Battle. The AP (7/6, Haigh) reports, "Businessman Ned Lamont said Wednesday that he is prepared to spend perhaps as much as $1 million more in his Democratic primary battle against US Sen. Joe Lieberman." Lamont "wouldn't say how much he plans to spend between now and the Aug. 8 primary. His campaign has cost $1.5 million so far. 'It depends. Let's see what happens over the course of the next 30 days,' Lamont told The Associated Press. 'If the senator says, "I'm going to put up a million dollars on TV and start hammering Ned Lamont and where he's from,' then I'll have to match that.'"

Lieberman Campaign Refuses To Criticize Clinton. CNN's The Situation Room (7/45, King) reported, "Senator Joe Lieberman's camp is refusing to criticize colleague Hillary Clinton, even though she is prepared to take a stand against him. Yesterday, Senator Clinton said she won't support Lieberman if he's defeated in next month's Democratic primary in Connecticut." Clinton "says she hopes Lieberman wins that primary and wins re-nomination, but, if he doesn't, she will back Lamont. Lieberman's spokeswoman tells CNN, the senator values Hillary Clinton's friendship and her support in the primary."

LATimes Criticizes Antiwar Democrats' Effort To Oust Lieberman. The Los Angeles Times (7/6, 958K) says in an editorial, "Antiwar activists who are opposing the renomination of Sen. Joe Lieberman in next month's Connecticut Democratic primary complain that he's not a 'real Democrat.' They're wrong, but Lieberman runs the risk of making prophets of his critics by preparing for a backup reelection campaign as an independent." Lieberman has been "immune to the buyer's remorse that has afflicted other Democratic senators who voted to authorize President Bush to use force against the Iraqi dictator. Two weeks ago, he was one of only six Senate Democrats to vote against a resolution calling for U.S. forces to begin leaving Iraq this year." Democratic voters "in Connecticut have the right to nominate the candidate of their choice. But it is more than a little disturbing for the longtime popular senator (and the party's 2000 nominee for vice president) to be targeted for defeat by national fundraisers based on his foreign policy views."

Liberal Bloggers Draw Fire For Promoting Candidates. The Washington Times (7/6, Lambro, 90K) reports, "The founders of two politically influential liberal blogs, known for their bare-knuckle attacks on Republicans and errant Democrats, are being knocked for promoting political candidates for whom one of them works as a paid campaign consultant. Bloggers and news organizations have begun to question the close relationship between Markos Moulitsas, creator of the widely read DailyKos.com, and Jerome Armstrong, creator of MyDD.com and a political consultant." Armstrong "is working for former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, a potential Democratic presidential candidate, whom Mr. Moulitsas praised effusively in a December interview."

Top Republicans Say Presidential Nomination Is McCain's To Lose. The Washington Times (7/6, Hallow, 90K) reports, "Some top Republicans at odds with Sen. John McCain on core conservative issues say privately that the party's 2008 presidential nomination is 'his to lose.' They cite the Arizona senator's head start in fundraising, a primary calendar that is shaping up in his favor and a growing belief that he enjoys the tacit support of President Bush." The Post adds, "Now, one of the most widely respected conservatives in the country says he is ready to help pull the McCain campaign bandwagon whenever the senator makes his 2008 Republican presidential run official." Former Sen. Phil Gramm "has quietly been helping to write Mr. McCain's speeches."

Professors Say Science, Ethics Need Not Be At Odds Over Stem Cell Research. Robert P. George, McCormick professor of jurisprudence at Princeton University and a member of the President's Council on Bioethics, and Eric Cohen, a fellow of the Ethics and Public Policy Center and editor of the New Atlantis, write in the Washington Post (7/6, A21, 744K), that too often in the debate over stem cell research, "science and ethics are regarded as being on a collision course. They need not be. For what could be more pro-science than relying upon scientific ingenuity to lead the way to stem cell advances without conducting unethical cloning experiments?"

Casinos Close In Atlantic City As Government Shutdown Continues. The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 11, 2:25, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "Gambling in this country is big business. In Atlantic City, New Jersey, it is a $5 billion a year business. Today, with the state government shut down by a budget dispute and no money to pay state inspectors, the casinos were forced to close for the first time ever, and all bets were off."

The New York Times (7/6, Chen, 1.19M) reports from Atlantic City, "As New Jersey's budget impasse deepened and the shutdown of state government services continued, this city's 12 casinos were forced to close indefinitely on Wednesday for the first time in the 28 years that gambling has been legal here." Until now, "the failure of Gov. Jon S. Corzine and his fellow Democrats in the Legislature to approve a budget had been felt most viscerally by about 45,000 state workers who were furloughed without pay, and by the eternally hopeful who play the lottery." But "with estimated revenues of $16 million a day and a work force of 50,000, the casinos represent the biggest and most symbolic casualty so far."

The AP (7/6, Curran) reports Gov. Jon S. Corzine "addressed the Legislature at the Statehouse Wednesday morning, defending his position as a stalemate over the state budget entered its fifth day with no deal in sight." Corzine "wants to raise the state sale tax from 6 percent to 7 percent to close a $4.5 billion state budget gap; lawmakers oppose the tax increase, estimated to cost the average New Jersey family $275 per year. When the Legislature missed its July 1 deadline to pass a state budget because of the dispute, Corzine ordered the government shut down." Said Corzine, "It is deplorable that the people of this state are left in such a painful position. … The people of New Jersey have every right to be angry." The Washington Post (7/6, A3, Strauss, 744K) and USA Today (7/6, Jones, El Nasser, 2.31M), among other newspapers, also report the story.

More Commentary. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) editorializes, "It's time for Joseph Roberts Jr., speaker of the New Jersey Assembly, to fold his cards. He and his colleagues thought they could bluff their way through a confrontation with Gov. Jon Corzine over the governor's proposed sales tax increase." But "the bluff has been called: Mr. Corzine shut down nonessential services and furloughed 45,000 nonessential employees when he and Mr. Roberts could not agree on a new budget by July 1, the start of a new fiscal year."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) editorializes, "The gambling shutdown will cost the state some $1.3 million a day in lost taxes, but Governor Jon Corzine and the Democrats who run the legislature still won't end their showdown at the spendthrift corral, also known as Trenton. The legislators are convinced that Mr. Corzine is leading them down a path to political ruin by insisting on raising the state sales tax to 7% from an already high 6%, and they're probably right. … New Jersey voters keep electing these tax-and-spendaholics, so we suppose they get what they deserve."

LATimes Criticizes Schwarzenegger On Children's Health Coverage. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (7/6, 958K) says, "Until last week, it looked as if Sacramento might use a fraction of this year's multibillion-dollar budget surplus to expand health coverage for more kids in California. But in their final budget negotiations, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Legislature decided that it was better to cave to a small group of vocal Republicans who believe that sick 3-year-olds should be punished for their parents' actions. … Schwarzenegger and the Democratic leadership were wrong to trade the well-being of children for political compromise. Hopefully the Legislature, which is expected to take up the issue again later this summer, will show more courage once the deadline pressure of budget-making is removed."

WSJournal Says Sweeney's "Wal-Mart Tax" Has Fizzled. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) says AFL-CIO President John Sweeney's campaign to force Wal-Mart and other retailers either to spend more on health care or pay more in taxes is "striking out in a surprising number of state capitals." Sweeney's campaign "began as Maryland enacted the first 'Wal-Mart tax.' … Not a single state has followed Maryland's lead." The Journal concludes that "the Wal-Mart tax has already fizzled as a political cause."

Bush Urges World Leaders To Stand United On North Korean Nukes. North Korea continued its defiance of the international community yesterday by launching additional short range missiles, brining the total number of tests to seven. The White House and State Department response is being described as muted. The AP (7/6, Riechmann), for example, says President Bush "addressed the issue in a subdued manner without the harsh warnings he had issued last week threatening unspecified repercussions." The AP also notes the President "urged world leaders Wednesday to stand united in demanding that North Korea give up its nuclear weapons program, saying the communist nation remains a threat even though its long-range missile plunged into the sea seconds after liftoff." Said Bush, "One thing we have learned is that the rocket didn't stay up very long and tumbled into the sea, which doesn't, frankly, diminish my desire to solve this problem."

The story was the lead on each of the networks, which ran multiple segments on the crisis, totaling about 26 minutes. ABC World News Tonight (7/5, lead story, 2:40, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported, "The Administration has repeatedly said over the last month that a missile launch would be unacceptable, a serious matter. But today, the President toned down the rhetoric, calling for North Korea to return to diplomatic discussions." Bush was shown saying, "Russia, South Korea, Japan and the United States spoke with one voice about the rocket launches and we will work together to continue to remind the lead of North Korea there is a better way forward for his people."

The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 2, 1:30, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "As one Administration official said to me today, 'What are we talking about here? Six missiles that are based on World War II technology and one longer-range missile that flew for all of 42 seconds.' This was the kind of tone the President seemed to echo today." The White House does not want the President saying too much about this, elevating the issue and turning it into a US-North Korea confrontation. The Administration prefers to have its diplomats and its allies do the talking."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 2, 1:55, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "The White House tried hard today not to give the North Korean leader what Administration officials suspect Kim Jong Il may want -- direct one-on-one attention from the United States and President Bush."

CNN's The Situation Room (7/5, Henry) reported, "From the President on, down the White House is all about trying to calm this situation down. They're playing down the threat from North Korea, playing up the support they're getting from allies. In short, just the opposite of how they handled the standoff with Iraq before that war."

The Washington Post (7/6, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column, "After interpreting every gesture of Saddam Hussein as a casus belli, a changed Bush administration is taking the opposite approach with Kim Jong Il. Officials were determined not to give the little man with the big missile the attention he craves. … A few years ago, the administration was using breathless terms to describe Iraq. … Now? The administration finds itself before the Security Council, working on sanctions and isolation for North Korea."

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Richter, Demick, 958K), in a story headlined "A Level Reply to N. Korea Missiles," says "the relatively low-key reaction in Washington, the United Nations and elsewhere reflected the lack of an international consensus and also a determination by the Bush administration not to be drawn into a one-on-one struggle with North Korea. 'The US response is we're working with our allies to figure out how to try to get North Korea back to the table,' said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. 'There are attempts to try to describe this almost in breathless World War II terms. This is not such a situation.'"

The Los Angeles Times (7/6, Wallace, Demick, 958K) also reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking at a Washington news conference, "told reporters that outrage expressed from other world leaders shows that the dispute 'is now not a matter of the United States and North Korea.'" She added that "the Bush administration believes the disagreement can best be handled through six-party talks, with diplomats from the US, China, Japan, South Korea, Russia and North Korea." The international community, she said, "has many options that would make engaging in this 'kind of brinksmanship' more difficult for the North Koreans." The Washington Times (7/6, Pisik, 90K) notes Rice also said Pyongyang had "miscalculated." Added the Secretary, "Whatever their motivations, whatever they thought they were doing, they've gotten a very strong reaction from the international community."

The New York Times (7/6, Cooper, Hoge, 1.19M) says "Bush administration officials suggested that more tests might be on the way: Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, said that the North had initially rolled about 10 missiles up to the launching pads, meaning that maybe three or four more could be ready soon, though it was unclear what types they might be." And "officials turned their attention to persuading China, and to a lesser extent Russia, to put pressure on North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program."

The AFP (7/6) reports Bush "said that US officials were still analyzing data from the long-range Taepodong 2 missile launch but dismissed the other missiles launched as 'pretty routine weapons' and said the immediate political impact was that North Korea was worse off." Bush also said, "I am deeply concerned about the plight of the people of North Korea. I would hope that the government would agree to verifiably abandoning its weapons programs."

Several stories this morning indicate world powers appear divided over how to deal with the North Korean actions. Under the headline "Split Over N Korea Missile Test Response," the Financial Times (7/6, Fifield, Nations, Pilling) reports, "As the UN Security Council gathered to discuss the tests, Japan and the US, supported by the UK, pushed for tough measures that would require countries to prevent the transfer of financial resources and materials that would help North Korea's missile and weapons programmes." The AP (7/6, Lederer) says China and Russia "resisted an attempt in the UN Security Council to impose sanctions against North Korea." Reacting to the Japanese proposal, "China, the North's closest ally, and Russia, which has been trying to re-establish Soviet-era ties with Pyongyang, countered that they favor a weaker council statement without any threat of sanctions. Both countries hold veto power in the council, making sanctions unlikely."

ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 2, 1:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "In South Korea, the government has threatened to cut off food aid to North Korea. But the South Koreans may be less worried about a nuclear North Korea than an unstable North Korea. If Kim Jong-Il's government were to fall, South Korea could be flooded with refugees."

The New York Times (7/6, Onishi, Kahn, 1.19M) reports "regional analysts doubt the launchings will bridge big gaps between the regional powers on how to handle North Korea. The military exercise strained relations between North Korea and all its neighbors. … But when Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asia and the lead negotiator with North Korea, returns to the region this week, he will find that many of the same rifts that existed before continue to complicate the task of forming a united front." USA Today (7/6, Nichols, 2.31M) runs a similar story titled "Attempt To Punish N. Korea Hits Snag," noting there are "cracks in the world's united opposition to North Korea's missile tests."

A second USA Today story (7/6, Wiseman, Nishiwaki), meanwhile, says "international condemnation of the North's missile tests…was widespread. NATO said the tests threatened security in East Asia and the rest of the world. Belgium, Italy, Turkey, Germany and France jointly condemned the tests. Belgian Foreign Minister Karel de Gucht called for an immediate halt to the tests." USA Today adds, "Missile expert Riki Ellison, president of the Missile Defense Advocacy Alliance in Alexandria, Va., said, however, that North Korea gained some clout and prestige with the launch. 'They called the bluff,' he said."

The Washington Post (7/6, A1, Lynch, Faiola, 744K) reports, "Several observers warned that even if Beijing agreed to some form of censure, it would remain reluctant to impose tough economic sanctions out of fear that such measures could destabilize North Korea and spark a crisis on their shared border." But John R. Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, "said the council's reaction to the missile tests highlighted North Korea's growing isolation. 'No member defended what the North Koreans have done,' Bolton said. 'I think there is support for sending a clear signal to Pyongyang.'" The Post adds, "Analysts and some diplomats involved in the six-nation nuclear talks said the first casualty of the missile tests might be the talks themselves."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, King, Solomon, Ramstad, Fairclough, 2.11M) analyzes possible US responses to North Korea, in a story titled "North Korea Gives US, Allies Few Good Options," and says "the likeliest, but also the least muscular, would be an official rebuke from the United Nations Security Council, such as that issued when North Korea last tested a long-range missile, in 1998. Next on the list would be a package of UN economic sanctions, put forward yesterday by Japan and backed by the U.S., which might also carry the tacit threat of military action down the road. US officials said they aren't weighing a military response to the missile launches." The Journal adds, "A weak response from the international community could undercut US credibility, not just in Pyongyang, but also in Tehran, where the Bush administration is trying to persuade Iran to give up its nuclear program in the face of threatened isolation from the UN."

The New York Times (7/6, Sanger, 1.19M), likewise, runs a piece headlined "Few Good Choices In North Korean Standoff," in which it says that an alternative for Bush "would be take a hard line that might risk an escalation of the half-century-old confrontation between the United States and North Korea." But "such a tack is now complicated by the widespread assumption that even if the North does not have the ability to launch a nuclear weapon, it now probably possesses enough extra nuclear fuel that it may be tempted to sell some to a terrorist group or another state."

The Christian Science Monitor (7/6, Marquand, 61K) reports Bolton "said the council must send a 'strong and unanimous signal' that Kim's actions were unacceptable, adding that the council would proceed in a 'calm and deliberate fashion.'"

NBC Nightly News (7/5, story 3, 1:40, Mitchell, 9.87M) said "no one really understands the motive of this hermetic kingdom of Kim Jong Il, but the best thinking is that he wants attention. They have not had direct talks. They want security guarantees from the United States. They want economic aid, and look at what's happening with Iran. Iran is being given and offered all sorts of economic aid and concessions to give up its nuclear program, so this is really a cry for attention very strategically timed for the 4th of July and an attempt to try to get people to say, you know, look at North Korea, they've got some muscle."

In a similar analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (7/6, Demick, 958K) says the test "was a move from a well-thumbed playbook that has been passed down from father to son, starting with the nation's founder, Kim Il Sung, and now in the hands of current leader Kim Jong Il. Such has been the North's modus operandi for decades: To solve a crisis one needs to create a crisis." The Times adds, "The crisis that the North Koreans perceived as needing a solution is that they were being ignored by the United States."

Burns Says US Wants International Unity Against North Korea. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said on CNN's The Situation Room (7/5) reported, "I don't think this is America against North Korea. This is the world against North Korea. You saw an extraordinary number of statements today from Russia and China, from all across Asia, from Europe, and certainly from our country of condemnation of rebuking the North Koreans. So what you want to achieve in a situation like this is you want to achieve international unity to force the North Koreans to take account of the fact that they are completely isolated on this issue. What they did was reckless and provocative and very unwise. And we're going to be a lot stronger as the weeks and months go forward on this North Korea business if we've got the rest of the world saying essentially what we're saying. So I don't think we want to isolate ourselves one on one with the North Koreans. We're much better off with this collective approach that the President and Secretary Rice talked about today."

Hill Says North Korea Has United World Against It. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said on PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (7/5) that North Korea has been "signaling for several weeks now that they were intending to have a launch. And just about every responsible country in the world weighed in against it, and then they went ahead and did it anyway. So, the first thing they have done is to unite us all." Hill added, "I think the North Koreans are learning the law of unintended consequences. But I mean, they have, I think, really united us. I mean, we are very concerned about this. The -- we have been talking to our South Korean allies, our Japanese allies. And we're going to start having some in-depth discussions with the Chinese. And we're going to see what we can do. What is very important about this, though, is, we have got to work together. We have really got to make this a multilateral process, because it's not a bilateral problem."

North Korea Deepens Ties With Iran. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Fairclough, 2.11M) reports that late last year, North Korea delivered more than a dozen intermediate-range ballistic missiles to Iran, according to senior US and Asian officials. The delivery, along with yesterday's missile test-launches "shows Pyongyang is increasingly willing to use its missile technology as a way to stand up to the US and its allies. North Korea's exports to Iran also mark a significant deepening of longstanding ties between Pyongyang and Tehran as international pressure mounts on the two governments to curb their nuclear ambitions, U.S. and Asian officials and analysts say."

Administration Facing "Crisis In Every Direction." In a story titled "A Driven President Faces A World Of Crises," the Washington Post (7/6, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, 744K) reports, "From deteriorating security in Afghanistan and Somalia to mayhem in the Middle East, confrontation with Iran and eroding relations with Russia, the White House suddenly sees crisis in every direction." North Korea's missile test "was another reminder of the bleak foreign policy landscape that faces…Bush even outside of Iraq." The Post adds "White House officials emphatically reject such pessimism," but "the events on the Korean Peninsula underscored how the administration has lost the initiative it once possessed on foreign policy in the aftermath of the Iraq invasion, leaving at risk the central Bush aspiration of democracy-building around the world." They also "showed how the huge commitment of resources and time on Iraq -- and the attendant falloff in international support for the United States -- has limited the administration's flexibility in handling new world crises." In an interview, National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said that "such criticism is misplaced, adding that victory in Iraq is crucial to success in fighting terrorists and in creating a new democracy that could serve as a beacon to other Middle Eastern countries."

Launches Provide First Test Of US Missile Defense. The Washington Times (7/6, Gertz, 90K) reports that the North Koreans missile tests provided the first real test of the US' ground based missile defense, "even though the failure of the long-range Taepodong-2 seconds after launch prevented the Pentagon from responding with a U.S.-based interceptor, defense officials said yesterday."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Karp, 2.11M) reports that the apparent failure of the long range missile "gives the Pentagon some breathing room as it prepares two critical tests for a US missile shield that has taken nearly 20 years and $100 billion to develop." Defense officials "confirmed yesterday that ground-based missiles in Alaska and California -- the backbone of the planned shield -- were operational during the North Korean launches." The Journal adds, "The Pentagon's confirmation yesterday that the missile interceptors had been activated specifically for the North Korean launches underscores the reality that the shield isn't permanently up and running."

ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 3, 2:05, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "The US has been concerned for decades about the threat of a missile attack from North Korea, spending billions trying to create a shield. But it's far from ready." ABC (Karl) added, "Two decades and $95 billion have bought a much smaller system that is just now taking shape. The first piece? Detection. The US now has radar systems around the world from Alaska's remote Shemya island to this floating platform off Japan's northern coast -- and space-based infrared sensors. The system allowed US officials to track North Korea's missile launches from the moment of take-off. If the order came to shoot down the Taepodong 2, the military has 11 interceptors capable of doing the job -- two in California, nine in Alaska."

The AP (7/6, Raum) says that North Korea's missile tests "suggested the country can't directly threaten the United States — for now. But the Koreans can learn from mistakes, whether the tests were posturing, serious military efforts or both, U.S. officials and military experts said." The long-range Taepodong-2 missile "failed 42 seconds after liftoff, suggesting a catastrophic failure of the rocket's first, or booster, stage. That heartened US officials, since an earlier version of the long-range missile…failed later in its flight, apparently due to a third-stage malfunction."

The Washington Post (7/6, A16, Ricks, Faiola, 744K) reports that it is not clear whether the Taepodong missile

"crashed or was aborted by its controllers, but U.S. and Japanese officials said that intelligence and monitoring of the Taepodong-2 test launch indicated that it failed. The result of the attempt is that, to some specialists, North Korea looks less dangerous than it did just a few days ago."

Republicans Tout Support For Missile Defense System. The Washington Times (7/6, Bellantoni, 90K) reports that congressional Republicans used the North Korean missile tests to tout the GOP's support for missile defense and praise "their expansion of the program's budget and scope." The Times adds, "It is uncertain whether Congress, on a one-week break, will take legislative action, but aides for Republican leaders noted the unanimous passage of a Senate measure increasing funding for the U.S. missile defense system beyond the initial Pentagon request." House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter said, "If you have a missile in the air, and it's coming toward one of your cities, the only way to stop it at that point is not with words, but with interceptors." Sen. George Allen "said the North Korean launches were a reminder '[of the need for an effective missile defense system.'"

Brownback Says North Korea Is Desperate. Sen. Sam Brownback said on CNN's Larry King Live (7/5), "I think it's an obviously very difficult situation we're in. Thank goodness we went forward with the missile defense system and that we have something in place, although not fully in place to be able to move forward but can use in this if we need to in this particular situation. I think it also points out how desperate North Korea is and how we really need to confront them on a global basis. I'm glad the Japanese are leading the effort at the United Nations. But this needs to be a global effort including the Chinese and the Russians to confront the North Koreans to stop doing these provocative acts."

Weldon Says China Is Key To Dealing With North Korea. Rep. Curt Weldon said on CNN's Larry King Live (7/5), "I think we've got to see what the G8 brings about, and I hope the President can have a frank discussion with Putin and bring Russia into a more bold position with both Iran and North Korea. We've got to reinvigorate our discussions with China. They clearly are the key. If they want to shut North Korea's economy down, they could do it tomorrow. And with our trade imbalance being what it is with China, we need to apply more pressure with the Chinese."

Burton Says Diplomatic, Economic Pressure Should Be Exerted On North Korea. Rep. Dan Burton said on MSNBC's Hardball (7/5), "I think every ounce of diplomatic pressure that we can bring to bear upon them, as well as economic pressure, should be exerted, and that should not be done unilaterally by the United States. So I think the entire world, the United Nations, the entire world ought to tell North Korea that this is not something that is not acceptable, because it's not just the United States and our people that's at risk, it's anybody within the…range of those missiles."

Pascrell Says UN Should Take Action Against North Korea. Rep. Bill Pascrell said on MSNBC's Hardball (7/5) that there "should be a multilateral approach to a very serious problem. I think this is not an erector set we're talking about. North Korea has been working on this for a long time. They haven't fired a long-range missile since 1998. They're trying to flex their muscle. We are not going to be intimidated by the North Koreans, but we need to have the Chinese and South Koreans involved in negotiations, and we need to have the United Nations not only speaking, but taking action, against North Korea. We are not going to go to the bargaining table simply by them rattling swords."

WSJournal Says US Should Not "Reward" North Korean Tests With Direct Talks. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) says, "The last thing the US should do is reward North Korea's missile provocation with direct talks. Yet before yesterday's missile tests, that is exactly what Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Richard Lugar advised." The Journal also notes, "This is what happens when a non-transparent, authoritarian regime is appeased long enough for it to acquire nuclear weapons and the means to deliver them. The mullahs in Tehran have already absorbed that lesson. Iran, and other states that are considering going nuclear, will be closely watching how the world responds to Kim Jong Il's latest provocation."

WPost Says US May Have To Address North Korean Threat Alone. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/6, A20, 744K) says North Korea's launching of at least seven missiles "was baldly aimed at putting pressure on the Bush Administration, which lately has been focused on making disarmament offers to Tehran rather than Pyongyang. Sure enough, within hours there were predictable calls in Washington for the administration to begin 'bilateral talks' with the regime of Kim Jong Il, exactly as he must have hoped." The Post says the missile firings "offer the Bush administration an opportunity: not to bargain with Mr. Kim but to insist that China and South Korea stop tolerating his refusal to begin the disarmament he promised last year." The Post adds, "If China and South Korea are serious about stopping North Korea's development of weapons of mass destruction, now is the time to demonstrate it. If they are unwilling to act, the Bush administration should consider other means of preventing further North Korean missile launches."

LATimes Says "Desperate Nature" Of North Korea's Militarism Is Troubling. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (7/6, 958K) says the "silver lining in North Korea's act of defiance is the renewed unity of purpose that it is likely to forge among regional powers ostensibly engaged in trying to dissuade Kim's regime from developing nuclear weapons. Russia, China, South Korea and Japan all need to work alongside the Bush administration in the so-called six-party talks." The Times adds that "all nations in the region should be troubled by the desperate nature of North Korea's militarism." The region's "principal players need to stand together, alongside the White House, in dealing with this rogue state."

North Korea Said To Be Ratcheting Up Confrontation With US. Nicholas Eberstadt, the Henry Wendt scholar in political economy at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) that with yesterday's tests. North Korea "has done more than simply raise the stakes in its contest of wills with the Bush administration. Much more ominously, the launch reveals that the Dear Leader and his inner circle are ready to ratchet up their confrontation with 'the imperialists' to a new and still more dangerous level -- and that North Korea's masters are confident that they hold the upper hand in this escalation." Kim Jong Il and his regime "are now embarking on a perilous new high-stakes gamble, one through which they may earn unprecedented economic and strategic benefits. Ballistic missiles are their instrument in this venture. These will be wielded as like a strategic battering ram, with the aim of shattering the US security architecture in the Korean peninsula and throughout northeast Asia."

Bush Meets With Georgian Leader, Backs Country's Bid To Join NATO. USA Today (7/6, 2.31M) reports, "President Bush gave strong support Wednesday to ex-Soviet state Georgia's desire to join NATO, something that may annoy Russia ahead of next week's Group of Eight leading industrial nations summit in St. Petersburg, Russia." Said Bush, after a meeting with Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili at the White House, "We will work with our partners in NATO to see if we can't make the path a little smoother for Georgia" to join.

Under the headline "President Of Georgia Gets Warm Embrace," the Washington Post (7/6, A4, Baker, 744K) reports Bush "embraced" the foreign leader "as 'my friend,' delivering a pointed message just a week before a summit in Russia that he will stand by its neighbors in the face of pressure from Moscow." Bush praised Saakashvili "for 'vigor and enthusiasm' and called him 'a man who shares the same values I share.'" Bush also said, "I assured the president that Georgia is our friend and we care deeply about the people of Georgia. … My friend, the president, wouldn't be sitting here if I didn't have Georgia on my mind." The Post adds, "The pun aside, Bush's comments had a serious, if unspoken meaning. Located on Russia's southern rim along a vital oil pipeline corridor, Georgia has been at a flash point between Washington and Moscow for years. By showcasing his meeting with Saakashvili, officials and analysts said, Bush signaled he is concerned about Kremlin treatment of former satellites as he prepares to head to St. Petersburg for the first Group of Eight summit hosted by Russia."

The Wall Street Journal (7/6, A1 Champion, 2.11M) profiles Saakashvili in a front-page story, saying he has "strong backing from the US" as he tries "to transform Georgia's economy in a hurry. His aim is to end centuries of Russian domination and to forge new ties with the West. Corruption is down, and tax revenues have at least doubled since 2003, due in part to a new flat tax and improved collection, helping to pay for the government's many projects. The nation's gross domestic product rose 8.5% during the first quarter." Saakashvili "faces enormous challenges. Georgia sits at the center of an unstable region and shares borders with both Russia and Iran. If he succeeds, Western nations stand to benefit."

Bush Urged To Raise Browder's Case With Putin. The Financial Times (7/6, Yeager, Buckley) reports that Senate Majority Leader bill Frist and Sens. John McCain and Chuck Schumer have asked President Bush to raise the case of William Browder, the hedge fund chief who has been barred from entering Russia, when he meets Vladimir Putin at the Group of Eight summit this month. In a letter to Bush, the Senators say Browder's case "reminds us that the path to a free society and an open market in Russia cannot be taken for granted." They said Moscow "should either let Mr Browder back into Russia or provide a credible explanation as to why it is denying entry to its largest foreign portfolio investor. The White House had not yet responded to the request, a Senate aide said on Wednesday."

Gazprom Given Exclusive Rights For Russian Natural Gas. Parliament Grants Exclusive Rights The New York Times (7/6, Kramer, 1.19M) reports, "Russia's Parliament passed a law on Wednesday that grants exclusive rights for exporting natural gas to Gazprom, the state-owned energy operator that is already the world's largest gas company." If signed by President Vladimir Putin, the law "would be a boon for Gazprom, already a company with many perquisites bestowed by the state."

Bush To Meet With Canadian PM Today. The Washington Times (7/6, Sheikh, 90K) reports that President Bush will meet at the White House today with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Canada's first conservative Prime Minister in 12 years. The times says that in Harper, Bush "will find an ideological soul mate who has moved quickly to rebuild his country's long-neglected military and committed to keeping 2,300 troops in Afghanistan through 2009." Bush "also can expect a major improvement in atmospherics after years of prickly relations with Liberal Party governments, whose members were accused at times of adopting anti-American positions to score political points."

Iran Postpones Talks With EU. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) reports, "Iran on Wednesday postponed for a day a meeting with the European Union about its nuclear activities, apparently to protest the appearance of a prominent Iranian exile organization before the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France." Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, "announced that the meeting would be put off, exasperating Western officials, including Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief." The Washington Post/AP (7/6, A16) says Solana "expressed surprise that Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, did not appear for their scheduled meeting Wednesday." Iran "said the meeting would go ahead on Thursday."

Rice Says West Wants Answer From Iran Soon. Fox News' Special Report (7/5, Hume) reported, "Western nations say if Iran is trying to delay its response to a package of carrots and sticks aimed at getting Tehran to give up its uranium enrichment program, it will not succeed." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "says the West expects an answer and soon."

Israeli Army Pushes Deeper Into Gaza. The CBS Evening News (7/5, story 4, 1:45, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported "a major incursion" was "launched…in northern Gaza following…the launch of three of hose homemade rockets into the nearby city of Ashkelon. That is something that Israel's government says it will not stand for. It called the launch a serious escalation and said it would do all it could to prevent it. Tonight, they have moved tanks and armor into an area of northern Gaza about three miles north of where I am. They've taken over old Israeli settlements that they left about 11 months ago during disengagement."

The AP (7/6, Barzak) reports, "Israeli tanks and armored personnel carriers entered one of Israel's former settlements in northern Gaza Wednesday night and opened fire on a nearby Palestinian town, Palestinian officials and witnesses said." Earlier in the day, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "convened his Security Cabinet and met with top military officials after militants fired rockets on Tuesday into Ashkelon, a southern Israeli city of 110,000 people." The Washington Times (7/6, 90K) runs a similar AP story, while the New York Times (7/6, Myre, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports "Israeli officials said the security cabinet, meeting in special session, did not specifically authorize the establishment of a long-term buffer zone within northern Gaza." But "the previous troop position, about half a mile inside the border, did little to prevent more rocket fire into Israel. Plans originally drawn up by the army called for a deeper incursion into northern Gaza, along with the current deployment in southern Gaza near Rafah, where the captured soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, is believed to be held."

The Washington Post (7/6, A17, Wilson, 744K) reports from Beit Hanoun, in the Gaza Strip, "As Israeli tanks began moving toward this town, small squads of masked gunmen from the governing Hamas movement's military wing and other armed groups could be seen deploying at key intersections and along the dark streets of Jabaliya and Beit Lahiya, blacked out by a recent Israeli airstrike." The Post adds, "Two thudding explosions sounded in the dunes just north of Beit Hanoun as Israel targeted gunmen it said were burying explosives in the sand. At least two Palestinians -- one Hamas gunman and one member of the Palestinian navy -- were killed in the strike or other clashes, Palestinian hospital officials said. Fourteen others, including seven civilians, were wounded."

Hamas Seeks To Intimidate Palestinian Journalists. USA Today (7/6, Gutman, 2.31M) reports "Palestinian journalists say Hamas is trying to control news coverage" in Gaza, and that "intimidation tactics compelled some media outlets, such as al-Hurriya, to suspend news coverage. Frightened columnists put down their pens. Hazem Abu Shanab, a communications lecturer at Gaza's Al Azhar University, stopped writing his column for Al-Hayat Al-Jadida and other newspapers. Those tactics include: Death threats to journalists or outlets perceived as biased against Hamas, according to Arabeed and Reporters Without Borders, an advocacy group for journalists. Raids on radio and TV stations, including the sacking of Palestine TV's bureau in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis by gunmen claiming to be from Hamas. Sharp public criticism from Hamas officials."

More Commentary On Hamas. Edmund R. Hanauer, an American Jewish human rights activist who directs Search for Justice and Equality in Palestine/Israel, writes in USA Today (7/6, 2.31M), "Israel's brutal response in Gaza -- called 'war crimes' by Amnesty International -- to the capture of an Israeli soldier by Palestinian militants will not further peace. Israel, more than Hamas, blocks peace. … Palestinians are backed by international law; Israel is backed by the United States. Hamas says Abbas can negotiate with Israel and submit any agreement to a referendum. That is democratic and hopeful as most Palestinians seek a two-state settlement. The United States should press Israel to cease violence, freeze settlements, honor human rights and seek talks with both Hamas and Abbas." USA Today (7/6, 2.31M), meanwhile, editorializes that Hamas; "inability to evolve from terrorists to leaders of a government ignited a series of events over the past two weeks that underscore a depressing regional truism: When things hit rock bottom, they can always get worse. … When Palestinians elected Hamas, many weren't voting for terrorism. They ached for more normal lives and a change from the corrupt incompetence that had evolved under Yasser Arafat. Israel is hardly blameless." But "one essential part of a real peace is for Hamas to work to fulfill those aspirations."

Algeria Hires Carmen Group To Lobby In DC. The Washington Post (7/6, A19, 744K) reports the Carmen Group, "which in the past year has made a play for business in Africa and hired strategically to make that happen, has scored a substantial lobbying client -- the government of Algeria." The fee "is a healthy $25,000 a month, for a total of $300,000 for the one-year term of the contract, according to the Carmen Group's Foreign Agents Registration Act filing with the Justice Department. The shop also filed a lobby registration with Congress." The Carmen Group "says it will work to strengthen relations between the Algerian and U.S. governments and expand trade, through government relations and 'strategic advice.'"

López Obrador Now Ahead In Mexico. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, Luhnow, De Córdoba, 2.11M) reports, "Mexico undertook a tense official recount of its contested presidential election yesterday that with 91% of the vote counted showed a different outcome than Sunday's results, with populist Andrés Manuel López Obrador leading conservative candidate Felipe Calderón by a 36.2% to 35% margin." The Journal adds, "The mixed results produced confusion and tension in Mexico. Mr. Calderon's National Action Party, or PAN, said it was still confident of winning the recount because most of the districts outstanding were areas the party had won." Calderón's campaign strategist, Juan Camilo Mouriño, said, "In the states where Felipe Calderón won, the [Party of the Democratic Revolution] are playing games to draw this out, questioning everything, making long speeches, and raising the same objections over and over." The New York Times (7/6, Thompson, McKinley, 1.19M) notes that "as the night wore on, Mr. López Obrador's lead steadily narrowed as tallies arrived from the northwestern states that voted heavily in favor of Mr. Calderón," adding that "some" López Obrador "advisers…acknowledged that they were not confident that their candidate's lead would hold, and they made clear they would not recognize the results until there was a vote-by-vote recount."

The Financial Times (7/6, Lapper, Thomson) reports Calderón yesterday "accused his leftwing rival of 'intolerance' and 'irresponsibility' by alleging foul play in last Sunday's election and calling for street protests." In a Financial Times interview, Calderón said López Obrador "wanted to make the people believe he had won." Added Calderón, "It is not true. Then he wanted to make them believe that there was foul play. That is not true either, and we will fight these tricks one by one."

The Washington Post (7/6, A12, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports on the recount in a story titled "Mexico Watches As Votes Are Tallied," while the Washington Times/AP (7/6, Grillo) says that "in scenes reminiscent of the Florida recount in the US presidential vote in 2000, the divided nation bit its nails as the partial returns showed Mr. Lopez Obrador overtaking Mr. Calderon, who had ended just ahead in the initial vote count." ABC World News Tonight (7/5, story 7, :25, Sawyer, 8.78M) said "the recount should be finished by the weekend."

More Commentary. Novelist Mario Vargas-Llosa writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/6, 2.11M) that López Obrador "represents a renunciation of the idea that development comes from transferring responsibility from the state to civil society and embracing a full exchange with the world. … It is unlikely that Mr. López Obrador would have become a full member of the 'axis' formed by Hugo Chávez, Fidel Castro and Evo Morales, for the same reasons the PRI kept away from communist alliances when it dominated Mexico: Mexican nationalism." But "a populist victory in Mexico would have invigorated other populists in Latin America. And the demagogic foreign policy establishment that used to be part of the PRI state would have likely come back, straining relations with the US." Calderón, "by contrast, understands the stakes better than the man he barely beat. Yet there is no guarantee that he will be a more effective reformer than Mr. Fox."

Cuba's Drilling Plans Spark Controversy In US. The Christian Science Monitor (7/6, Luscombe, 61K) reports that there are potentially billions of barrels of oil and trillions of cubic feet of natural gas beneath the waters of the North Cuban Basin. Late last year, Fidel Castro's government "started contracting out 59 lots in Cuban waters for exploratory drilling," creating a controversy in the US where the federal government maintains a moratorium on any drilling. The Monitor adds, "China, Canada, Spain, and India are among the countries that have snapped up Cuba's lots, while the US oil industry has stood by unhappily, abiding by America's decades-old trade embargo with the communist nation. … Environmental groups, meanwhile, are concerned that even if the US moratorium stays intact, drilling in Cuban waters will have a noticeable effect on Florida's 663 miles of beaches."

Morales Has Filled Bolivia's Government With Ex-Guerillas, Activists, Intellectuals. The Wall Street Journal (7/6, De Córdoba, Luhnow, 2.11M) reports, "Since he was elected Bolivia's first indigenous president by a landslide vote in December, Evo Morales, a former leader of the coca growers' union, has assembled a governing team of ex-guerrillas, former street activists and Bolivian intellectuals. … Since Mr. Morales assumed power in January, he has pledged to redistribute the country's wealth among Bolivia's poor Indians, and exert greater state control over the country's economy and natural resources. He has forged a close alliance with Venezuela's fiery anti-American president Hugo Chávez, and has organized a constitutional convention, to reform the way the country is organized." The Journal adds, "Many Aymara intellectuals say they want to re-create in the 21st century the values of the communal Eden they believe existed before the conquest, a place without poverty or oppression."

Nationalist Opposition Ousts Macedonian PM. The Washington Post/AP (7/6, A13) reports that Macedonia's Prime Minister Vlado Buckovski "conceded defeat Thursday to the nationalist opposition in Macedonia's parliamentary elections." The AP adds, "Sounding like a winner, Nikola Gruevski thanked his VMRO-DPMNE party supporters and said he would begin efforts on Friday to put together a coalition. … With 36 percent of the ballots counted, the VMRO-DPMNE party had 33 percent of the vote, while Buckovski's ruling Social Democrats had 24 percent, according to the State Electoral Commission."

Taylor's Son Pleads Not Guilty To Passport Fraud. The New York Times (7/6, Goodnough, 1.19M) reports the son of Former Liberian President Charles Taylor pleaded not guilty in Miami Wednesday to charges of passport fraud. The son, Charles McArthur Emmanuel, also known as Charles Taylor, Jr. was "returned to jail to await trial. He has "been held without bail at the Federal Detention Center downtown since March 30, when he arrived at Miami International Airport from Trinidad and Tobago. Mr. Emmanuel lied on March 15 in applying to renew his passport and listing his father as Steven Smith of St. Vincent, court papers say."

Author Says Belief In "Complacent Myths" Will Not Solve India's Problems. Author Pankaj Mishra, writes in the New York Times (7/6, 1.19M), "In recent weeks, India seemed an unlikely capitalist success story as communist parties decisively won elections to state legislatures, and the stock market, which had enjoyed record growth in the last two years, fell nearly 20 percent in two weeks, wiping out some $2.4 billion in investor wealth in just four days. This week India's prime minister, Manmohan Singh, made it clear that only a small minority of Indians will enjoy 'Western standards of living and high consumption.' There is, however, no denying many Indians their conviction that the 21st century will be the Indian Century just as the 20th was American. The exuberant self-confidence of a tiny Indian elite now increasingly infects the news media and foreign policy establishment in the United States. … Many serious problems confront India. They are unlikely to be solved as long as the wealthy, both inside and outside the country, choose to believe their own complacent myths."

NYTimes Says "Killing Fields" Tribunal Has Responsibility To Survivors. The New York Times (7/6, 1.19M) editorializes, "Three decades have passed since the world first learned of the 'killing fields' of Cambodia. … Yet it was only this week that a UN-Cambodian tribunal was sworn in and began the long task of bringing those most responsible to trial. … We can only hope that there will be enough of a trial in the end to give Cambodia's survivors some sense of justice done. The tribunal has a responsibility not only to those survivors but to a world that has yet to learn how to deal with crimes against humanity. … The court -- as well as other international tribunals -- should be supported by serious efforts to ensure that such atrocities do not happen again. Getting a UN force into Darfur would be a good start."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Hill GOP Divided Over How To Try Detainees.

In a report running more than 1,600 words, the New York Times (7/10, Zernike, Stolberg) examines the Republican "divide on Capitol Hill" created by the Supreme Court ruling prohibiting the use of military commissions to try terrorism detainees. On one side are Republicans "who believe Congress should give the president the authority to set up the kind of military commissions that were struck down by the court"; on the other are those "who say the trials should be modeled on the military system of courts-martial," which would give detainees more due-process rights. In a second piece, the New York Times (7/10, Lewis) says the court's Hamdan v. Rumsfed ruling "provided no clear road map for the White House and its allies in Congress as they ponder their next move."

The Christian Science Monitor (7/10, Richey) also examines the issue, writing that "the challenge for Congress is to decide how best to balance the concerns raised by the Supreme Court against the flexibility desired by the Bush administration. Specifically at issue is whether to retain or rewrite rules that heavily favor prosecutors by allowing hearsay and coerced statements to be introduced as evidence."

NCIS Probe Finds Evidence Of Broader Guantanamo Suicide Plot. The AP (7/9, Fox) reports a Naval Criminal Investigative Service probe into three apparent Guantanamo Bay suicides has found evidence that other detainees "may have helped the men hang themselves or were planning to kill themselves too." Evidence included "instructions on tying knots" and "several notes in Arabic that were 'relevant' to an investigation of a possible broader plot."

Administration Debates How To Respond To Hamdan Ruling.

Newsweek (7/17, Isikoff, Taylor) reports that the side effects of the High Court's ruling in the Hamdan case "have set off an intense debate within the administration over how to respond. One camp, headed by national-security adviser Stephen Hadley and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, want to use the decision as the basis for a wide-ranging 'fix' that would accept a role for Congress and the courts on detainee issues. … But hard-liners -- led by [David] Addington, now Vice President Cheney's chief of staff -- are fiercely resisting. They, along with some congressional Republicans, want to nullify the court ruling by rewriting portions of the Uniform Code of Military Justice and granting the president the powers the court rejected."

Ruling Could Have Ripple Effects. Newsweek (7/17, Isikoff, Taylor) reports, "Administration officials and Washington lawyers are still digesting the text" of the Supreme Court's ruling in the case of Gitmo detainee Ahmed Hamdan, "but it is already becoming clear that it could have ripple effects that extend far beyond the trial of Hamdan and other Guantánamo prisoners. The President has long argued that Congress granted him wide-reaching powers in the days after 9/11, when it passed a resolution authorizing him to use military force against the perpetrators of the attacks. But in his ruling, Justice Stevens took a much narrower view of the president's wartime powers, rejecting the Administration's argument that military commissions of the kind Bush had created were covered by the resolution. Now other antiterror programs that the president has justified by invoking the same congressional resolution might be vulnerable to serious legal challenge."

Hoekstra Says White House Failed To Inform Congress About "Significant" Intel Program.

House Intelligence Chairman Pete Hoekstra appeared on Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace) to comment on his charge that the Bush Administration may have violated the law by failing to inform Congress about certain intelligence programs. Hoekstra said, "There was at least one major, what I consider significant, activity that we had not been briefed on that we have now been briefed on, and I want to set the standard there, that it is not optional for this President or any president or people in the executive community not to keep the intelligence committees fully informed of what they are doing." The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 6, 0:40, Mitchell) reported that Hoekstra said the "Bush Administration may have broken the law by keeping several intelligence programs secret from lawmakers responsible for their oversight."

Hoekstra's remarks receive fairly broad print coverage today. USA Today (7/10) runs a straightforward lead, saying the Administration "was running several intelligence programs, including one major activity, that it kept secret from Congress" according to Hoekstra. The New York Times (7/10, Lichtblau, Shane) takes a similar tack, saying Hoekstra said the White House briefed his committee "on a 'significant' intelligence program only after a government whistle-blower alerted him to its existence and he pressed President Bush for details." But the Washington Post and the AP are a bit sharper. The Washington Post (7/10, A7, Babington) says Hoekstra says the Bush Administration briefed top lawmakers "on a significant intelligence program" only after he "angrily complained of being left in the dark." The AP (7/10, Pickler) reports Hoekstra said "the White House possibly broke the law by keeping intelligence activities a secret from the lawmakers responsible for overseeing them."

Carter Telecom Analyst Says Media Taking National Security On Itself. In a Washington Times (7/10) op-ed entitled "Helping The Terrorists," Jack O'Neill, who "worked in the White House under President Carter as a telecommunications policy analyst," writes, "If you want to reveal information critical to our national security for any reason, turn it over to a reporter. Once the information is in the hands of a reporter, the reporter and his or her news media claim the authority to decide its relevance to our national security and who should know. … Can you hear terrorists cheering?"

Moussaoui Trial Lawyer Faces Legal Action. The Washington Post (7/10, B1, Markon) runs an update on the case of Carla Martin, the "obscure government lawyer" who gained infamy when she violated a court order in the Zacarias Moussaoui death penalty trial "by sharing testimony with witnesses and coaching them about what to say." Her actions "have spawned a wave of legal proceedings. Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are exploring the possibility of criminal charges against her, and Pennsylvania's lawyer disciplinary board has begun an investigation." She remains on paid leave from TSA, "which is also investigating her conduct. And seven family members of Sept. 11 victims have filed suit against her."

Pakistani Intelligence Seeks Link Between London Bombers, Al Qaeda. The Washington Times (7/10, Ansari) reports Pakistani intelligence officials "say they are on the trail of a British 'go-between,' the al Qaeda recruiter" who reportedly introduced the July 7, 2005, London bombers to al Qaeda. The "wealthy British passport holder, who is of Afghan origin, is thought to use the nom de guerre 'Abdul Rehman,' which means 'willing disciple of God.' The Pakistani officials think that Rehman met the suspected attack ringleader Mohammad Sidique Khan, in a British mosque and later introduced him and fellow bomber Shehzad Tanweer to al Qaeda."

Messages Said To Show Sophistication Of Al Qaeda's PR Methods. Newsweek (7/17) reports in its "Periscope" column, "A day or two before the release of one recent message from bin Laden, his media handlers issued Internet 'teasers' -- brief announcements declaring that a bin Laden message was about to be released. Later, an elaborately produced Qaeda message surfaced commemorating the London bombings; the presentation included a previously unseen extended English-language video of Shehzad Tanweer, one of the suicide bombers, and an American-accented Qaedite called Azzam the American." A US counterterrorism official "said the use of promos and edited video packages with English speakers demonstrates the increasing sophistication of Al Qaeda's PR methods." The official "also said the fact that [Osama bin Laden's chief deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri] appeared in recent video messages but bin Laden has appeared only in audio messages suggests the two terror leaders live apart, and that bin Laden is still stringently protecting himself."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York, Miami Cases Show New FBI Emphasis On Preemptive Arrests. USA Today (7/10, 4A, Willing) reports that the arrests announced Friday "are typical of the FBI's post-Sept. 11 strategy in counterterrorism cases: detect and disrupt plots in their early stages rather than wait to collect additional evidence more likely to produce a conviction." Still, the New York and the Miami cases "have prompted some to suggest that the FBI is overstating the danger posed by wannabe jihadists." USA notes, "In a speech in May, deputy attorney general Paul McNulty credited this new 'aggressive, proactive and preventative course of action' with winning 253 convictions in 435 terrorism cases since 2001."

The AP (7/9, Caruso) similarly reported, "Policy makers and security experts said the bust illustrates a shift in U.S. counterterrorism policy that has played out in other recent high-profile cases, including the arrest of seven men suspected of wanting to bomb Chicago's Sears Tower. Law enforcers, they said, are now willing to act swiftly against al-Qaida sympathizers, even if it means grabbing wannabe terrorists whose plots may be only pipe dreams." Rep. Peter King observed, "You may end up not winning it in court, but you get a bad guy off the street."

NYC Subway Bag Search Policy Still Enforced One Year Later. The AP (7/10, Hays) reports that a year after the introduction of the "temporary imposition," the policy of bag searches on New York's subway "remains in effect and is barely causing a stir." Officials "won't say how many bags police have searched in the past year, or specify where and when they do it." The program "has resulted in five arrests -- not for terrorism, but for drug possession, disorderly conduct and other minor charges."

Businesses, Homeowners Finding It Hard To Obtain Disaster Coverage. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Pleven, McDonald, Richardson) reports in the wake of the "violent hurricanes" of 2005, "Demand for disaster coverage is far outstripping supply," with insurance companies attempting "to buy more coverage on the policies they write -- a crucial segment of the business known as reinsurance. But reinsurers, which also paid out billions last year, are wary of getting hit hard again and have raised their rates substantially. Businesses and homeowners are paying the price."

Mississippi Casinos Reopening. NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 9, 2:10, Kotb) reported three of Mississippi's Gulf Coast casino that were "battered by Katrina" have reopened and are welcoming "returning crowds." NBC (Mott) added, "Eight more casinos are planning to reopen by year's end, meaning jobs for thousands more dealers, more wait staff and hotel workers. Where will they all live? After Katrina's destruction, affordable housing is in short supply."

WAR NEWS:

Sectarian Violence Intensifies In Baghdad. ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 2, 0:25, Muir) reported, "At least 41 people were killed when masked gunmen went on a rampage in a Sunni section of Baghdad, setting up roadblocks, dragging people from their cars, checking IDs, and shooting people with Sunni names. Hours later, two car bombs exploded near a Shiite mosque, killing 17 people and wounding 38 more." The CBS Evening News (7/9, lead story, 3:00, Cowan) noted "anyone identified as Sunni was executed. The US military says at least 11 bodies were found dumped in the street. This hospital reported getting nearly two dozen. Those who brought the dead and wounded in were dazed and confused by the attack that seemed as bold as it was bloody."

NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 2, 1:55, Kotb) reported that by evening, much of the city was "quiet because of the nightly curfew, but there are worries this latest violence will most certainly undermine renewed efforts at Sunni and Shiite reconciliation."

USA Today/AP (7/10) reports Sunni leaders "expressed outrage over the killings, and President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, appealed for calm, warning that the nation stood 'in front of a dangerous precipice.'" while the Washington Post (7/10, A1, Partlow, Al-Izzi) reports "Sunni politicians said the spate of attacks gravely exacerbated the problems in Baghdad, where killings occur almost daily, and they accused Iraqi police of collaborating with Shiite militiamen in the violence. 'This is a new step. A red line has been crossed,' said Alaa Makky, a Sunni member of parliament."

The Los Angeles Times (7/10, Kennedy, Daragahi) says "the sectarian violence underscored a dramatic worsening of security conditions in the capital even after the formation of a government in May and the imposition of a massive lockdown by Iraqi troops and police. It also raised fears that the beleaguered country might soon dissolve into all-out civil war." The Financial Times (7/10, Negus) reports "bombings and abductions are common in many parts of the city, but this was one of the first times a group of gunmen had taken control of a section of Baghdad and conducted a massacre on this scale." The New York Times (7/10, Semple) runs a similar story under the headline "Baghdad Erupts In Mob Violence,"

Tribes' Role In Pacifying Amara Seen As Hopeful Sign For Iraq. The New York Times (7/10, Tavernise, Mizher) reports from Amara, where "in a surprising twist, the region's tribes, particularly powerful in neighborhood life here, have weighed in forcefully, using their authority, often in a nonviolent way, to force the Islamists to back off." The Times adds, "Large portions of Iraq's rural south have been relatively peaceful, like the provinces of Muthana, where Japanese forces recently left, and Dhi Qar, whose capital, Nasiriya, is patrolled by the Italians, and it is possible that tribes are playing a similarly quiet but central role in keeping order. …

The story of how Amara, the capital of a leaf-shaped province called Maysan, came to be relatively safe for its citizens -- even as danger increased for the British -- is a hopeful tale of small-town camaraderie, fierce independence and, above all, tribal power."

More US Soldiers Charged In Rape-Slaying Case. The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 2, 2:45; Mitchell) reported that "in Iraq, more American soldiers have been charged with rape and murder in connection with the alleged assault of an Iraqi teenager and her family. Michelle Miller has more from the Pentagon." CBS (Miller) added, "The US military now says that former Private First Class Steven D. Green, arrested last week, did not act alone, that five other soldiers in his platoon either participated in the rape and murders or helped cover them up. Their identities remain secret, but court documents confirm at least one other soldier took part in the rape and two others witnessed the crime."

ABC World News Tonight (7/9, lead story, 2:25, Muir) called the story "a major development in a crime that is fueling anger and outrage in Iraq and raising troubling questions the conduct of American troops." NBC Nightly News (7/9, lead story, 2:40, Kotb) interviewed Col. Ken Allard (Ret.), NBC News military analyst, who said, "It's happening right now for two main reasons. Number one, this conflict has dragged on. Number two, you're dealing with a much smaller force than we've ever dealt with before." NBC (Allen) added, "Adding to the stress, he says, confronting an insurgent insurgency imbedded in the community and the random nature of the war's biggest killer -- IEDs." Allard: "When they serve multiple tours, the stress levels increase and the odds of this kind of thing happening increase as well." Allen: "In the rape and murder case, one witness who apparently told investigators about green and the others was a soldier undergoing stress counseling last month after the kidnapping and killing of two GIs, all from the same unit."

The Los Angeles Times (7/10, Daragahi) reports, "The charges were lodged Saturday, the military said." The five soldiers "face an Article 32 investigation, the military's equivalent of a grand-jury inquest, to see if evidence warrants bringing them before a full-scale military tribunal or courts-martial." USA Today (7/10, Jervis, Stone), Washington Post (7/10, A14, Finer, Partlow) and Washington Times/AP (7/10, Lenza), among other sources, also report the story.

Time (7/17, Rawe, Ghosh) reports that former US Army Pvt. Steven Green last week "pleaded not guilty to charges" of raping and killing Iraqi girl along with her parents and 7-year-old sister. Unlike the massacre in Haditha, the butchering of this family "does not appear to be the result of vengeance or confusion. Instead, all signs point to premeditated depravity." Pentagon officials "say charges could be brought against as many as four other soldiers, including the one who allegedly joined Green in the rape."

Arrest Does Not Stem Debate Over CPA Order 17. Newsweek (7/17) reports in its "Periscope" column that Green's arrest "didn't stem a growing debate over Coalition Provisional Authority Order 17, which exempts members of the US military from Iraqi laws." US officials, "unnamed because of diplomatic sensitivities, said Iraqi P.M. Maliki's need to oppose the order might lessen if any wrongdoers in the Haditha and Mahmudiyah cases are held accountable."

Republicans Say Shells Are Proof Of Iraq's WMD. Congressional Republicans are clashing with Democrats and the Bush Administration over the meaning of munitions found in Iraq since 2003. The Washington Times (7/10, Scarborough) reports that GOP lawmakers say the discovery of the 500-plus shells which was recently disclosed by the Pentagon "are evidence that Saddam was still concealing WMDs in 2003 in violation of United Nations resolutions to disarm after Iraq's failed invasion of Kuwait. … Democrats dismiss the findings. They say the munitions were found in small clusters and are 1980s vintage. In other words, Iraq produced them before the 1990 invasion of Kuwait and thus they are irrelevant to the CIA's flawed 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), on which President Bush largely based his decision to go to war to keep Iraq's WMDs from terrorists, they say." The Times adds, "To the consternation of congressional Republicans, including Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the House Intelligence Committee chairman, the Democrats are getting support from the administration" which is downplaying the munitions finding.

Vietnam Vets Advise Navy On Reconstituting River Patrols. USA Today (7/10, Vanden Brook) reports that a group of Vietnam veterans is advising the Navy as it revamps river patrols. The Navy "wants to extend its reach into the shallow brown waters of deltas and rivers, often the front line in the war against terrorists and insurgents. Next spring, the first sailors since the days of the Vietnam-era swift boats will relieve Marines on river patrols protecting Haditha dam in Iraq." USA adds, "In all, there will be about 900 sailors involved in the river patrol effort. By comparison, there were 4,500 sailors in 450 boats patrolling coastal and inland waters during Vietnam."

Herbert Says Army Has Lowered Its Standards. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (7/10), "The biggest lesson we failed to learn from Vietnam was how utterly tragic it was to pull the trigger on an unnecessary war. Now once again we are condemned to suffer the consequences, and those consequences are not always self-evident." The US military "is again falling victim to lowered standards, breakdowns in discipline and a series of atrocities that are nothing less than a betrayal of the many honorable men and women in uniform and the country they serve." Herbert adds that the Army "has had to lower its standards because most young Americans want no part of George W. Bush's war in Iraq."

Fifteen Taliban, One Canadian Soldier Killed In Afghanistan. At least 15 militants and one Canadian solider were killed Sunday as Canadian and Afghan forces raided Taliban strongholds in Afghanistan. The AP (7/9, Khan) reported, "Canadian Cpl. Anthony Boneca was killed in the Pasmhol village in Zharew during a 'combined coalition-Afghan operation' against the Taliban, said military spokesman Maj. Marc Theriault. Several hours later, 'intense close quarters' fighting broke out nearby, leaving at least five Taliban militants dead and two Canadian soldiers slightly wounded, said another coalition official, Lt. Cdr. Mark MacIntyre. A coalition airstrike killed another 10 militants in the neighboring Panjwayi district, where Canadian troops launched a campaign against Taliban strongholds Saturday, according to a military statement."

Afghan Cab Drivers Run Rival Poetry Groups In Washington. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (7/10, Farivar) reports that Washington, DC, has two poetry societies run by Afghan cab drivers, and the groups "don't like each other."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Postpones Hearing For Former Qwest CEO. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Young) reports, "The judge overseeing the criminal insider trading case against former Qwest Communications International Inc. Chief Executive Joseph Nacchio delayed an important hearing in the case because of the complex logistics involved in reviewing classified material introduced by the defense." The Journal continues, "Saying he needed extra time for his staff to get the security clearances and facilities that are legally required for handling the classified materials, Denver-based U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham on Friday postponed the hearing to August 25 from July 14. He is scheduled to rule on a variety of motions from both sides, including a defense motion to dismiss the case." The Journal adds, "Mr. Nacchio is fighting charges that he sold $101 million in stock in early 2001 with insider knowledge that the Denver-based phone company was about to falter. In court filings, his attorneys have said he was optimistic about the company's prospects because, based on classified information, he thought Qwest was poised to win important contracts related to national security. … Prosecutors have argued that the national security aspect of the defense is a smokescreen with no relevance to the charges. Even if the company had won the government contracts, they wouldn't have solved the underlying problems that Mr. Nacchio knew the company faced, prosecutors have said in court filings."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Documents From Jefferson Office Raid In Legal Limbo. The AP (7/10, Sherman) reports, "Prosecutors and investigators building a bribery case against Rep. William Jefferson have been unable to examine the documents and computer files seized in a search of the lawmaker's Capitol Hill office. … The materials were placed off limits by President Bush for 45 days, a cooling-off period that ended Sunday. Yet there has been no resolution of the court fight or talks between congressional leaders and the Justice Department." The AP continues, "The president acted after congressional leaders denounced the FBI's search on May 20 and May 21 as an unprecedented and unconstitutional intrusion on their turf by federal agents. … Bush directed Solicitor General Paul Clement to keep the materials while Justice Department officials negotiated with Congress' lawyers and a legal challenge made its way through the federal courts." The AP adds, "Until the judge in the case rules on the constitutionality of the search, prosecutors will not examine what it yielded, department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. … U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, who signed the warrant authorizing the search, indicated at a hearing last month that he was likely to reject the main argument advanced by Jefferson, D-La., and House lawyers that the Constitution's speech or debate clause prohibits searches of congressional offices. … That clause protects senators and representatives from being questioned by the president, a prosecutor or a plaintiff in a lawsuit about their legislative work."

US Weighs Pursuit Of Death Penalty In Pennsylvania Slaying. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (7/10, Cato) reports, "The decision, like any involving life or death, is difficult. … U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan is considering whether to seek the death penalty against two drug dealers accused in the 2004 slaying of a Beaver County man whose son was to testify against one of them. No defendant in a federal case has ever been sentenced to death in Western Pennsylvania." The Tribune-Review continues, "Many people familiar with the federal death penalty, including the attorney to defend the most recent case four years ago in Pittsburgh, think Buchanan will seek it in the case against Jelani Solomon, of Beaver County, and Claron Hanner, of Pittsburgh's Knoxville neighborhood. … 'She has a reputation as an aggressive prosecutor,' said Richard Kammen, who defended Joseph P. Minerd, accused of the New Year's Day 1999 pipe-bomb killings of his pregnant former girlfriend and her young daughter. Minerd was convicted of the killings, but jurors deadlocked on the death penalty, and he was sentenced to life in prison. … 'I would not be surprised if she seeks the death penalty in this case,' Kammen said. … The ultimate decision will come from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, but he likely will follow Buchanan's recommendation, Kammen said. Buchanan said she will make her recommendation in August."

Three Arrested For Brutal Georgetown Slaying. The Washington Post (7/10, A1, Montgomery, Sullivan) reports, "Three assailants who cut the throat of an aspiring politician from Britain killed him and tried to rape his female companion early yesterday in the driveway of a Georgetown mansion, police reported, after the couple had returned from a night at the movies." The Post continues, "The victim, Alan Senitt, 27, a Jewish activist and volunteer for former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner, died at the scene, police said. The woman, whom police declined to identify, was not injured." The Post adds, "Within hours, D.C. police arrested four people in connection with one of the most brutal crimes in years on the affluent streets of Georgetown and said they were looking for possible links to other recent attacks in the city. … Christopher Piper, 25, of Southeast Washington was charged with felony murder and attempted sexual assault. The others -- Jeffery Rice, 22, of Southeast; Olivia Miles, 26, of Northeast; and a 15-year-old boy from Southeast whom police declined to identify because he has been charged as a juvenile -- all face murder charges. … According to police and others, the attack occurred shortly after 2 a.m. as Senitt was seeing the woman home. The couple walked north on 31st Street NW, then turned west toward Wisconsin Avenue on Q Street NW, where the woman lives. … The two were rummaging in the trunk of a car when they were approached by three men wielding a gun and a knife. Police said Piper, who had the gun, grabbed the woman and began dragging her down the driveway. Out of view of his companions, he tried to pull off her clothes, police said. The attacker made a comment 'in reference to his intent to commit a sexual assault,' said Lt. Robert Glover of the police department's violent crimes branch, which is handling the investigation. … Meanwhile, the other two assailants grabbed Senitt, stabbed him and slashed his throat."

Judge Denies Bail For Alleged Florida Genovese Mobsters. The AP (7/8, Wides-Munoz) reported that on Friday, "U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Seltzer denied bail for Renaldi 'Ray' Ruggiero, 72, whom federal prosecutors identified as a Genovese capo or captain, and three of his co-defendants -- Joseph Dennis Colasacco, 54, Charles Steinberg, 30, and Mitchell Weissman, 54, said Weissman's attorney John Contini. Seltzer, prosecutors and attorneys for defendant Francis O'Donnell, 47, will continue negotiations for O'Donnell's release on Monday, said Theresa Van Vliet, one of his attorneys." The AP noted, "The case, considered the latest blow to one of New York's most powerful Mafia families, deals with 10 years of alleged criminal activity, including murder."

Florida Police, FBI Arrest Alleged Gang Member Wanted In Georgia Student's Murder. The Miami Herald (7/9, Dryhurst, 323K) reported, "A teenager wanted in the killing of a Georgia college student was arrested by Fort Lauderdale police Friday near his grandmother's home. Roosevelt Lawrence, 18 and allegedly a member of the Bloods street gang, surrendered to police and FBI agents in Lauderdale Manors." The Herald noted, "The gunmen aimed through a vehicle window and shot

Valdosta State University student Mason Harper, 24, twice in the upper body just after 1 a.m. June 29. Two suspects were quickly apprehended and charged with homicide," and Lawrence "was identified as one of the shooters. Police continue to investigate who fired the other shot." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/9, Haas, 249K) added, "Fort Lauderdale police and the South Florida FBI Violent Crime Fugitive Taskforce got the call Thursday that he might be in the area. They had their man within 24 hours," and "when agents moved in, they took Lawrence down without incident."

Jury Acquits Maryland Accountant In Prince George's Bribery Case. The Washington Post (7/8, B1, Castaneda, 744K) reported, "An Upper Marlboro accountant was acquitted yesterday of conspiring with two Prince George's County officials to shake down a security company for $250,000 in exchange for a county contract worth more than $1 million. Accountant Paul L. Wright testified at the eight-day trial that he believed a $10,000 payment to his company in November 2004 was part of a legitimate consulting arrangement and that he had no knowledge of any bribery scheme." The Post noted, "The investigation by State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh, in cooperation with the FBI and other law enforcement agencies, has resulted in the conviction of a former high-ranking county government official," and "the alleged ringleader of the bribery scheme, Robert L. Thomas, former deputy director of the county's Office of Central Services, is scheduled to go on trial Aug. 14."

Mortgage Fraud Continues To Rise. The New York Times (7/9, Tedeschi, 1.19M) reported, "With interest rates at historic lows in recent years, consumers have raced to get mortgages. So have criminals. Industry executives and law-enforcement officials say mortgage fraud continues to climb, with lenders incurring more than $1 billion in fraud losses in the last fiscal year, twice the amount of the previous year." Mortgage Bankers Association government affairs director Tim Doyle said, "The F.B.I. has prioritized this, state attorneys general are looking at this, and more state laws are being passed about it." The Times noted, "About 80 percent of mortgage fraud involves professional thieves who are bilking lenders, the F.B.I. estimates, while in the remaining cases consumers are involved in one way or another."

Report Urges Prisons To Target Tuberculosis. The Washington Times (7/10, Price) reports, "Tuberculosis is 'particularly problematic' in U.S. correctional and detention facilities, say federal health officials, who have updated guidelines for preventing the spread of TB in jails and prisons. … 'Effective TB prevention and control measures in correctional facilities are needed to reduce TB rates among inmates and the general U.S. population,' say authors of a report published in the current issue of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's (CDC) Morbidity & Mortality Weekly Report. … 'Inmates with undiagnosed TB disease place other inmates and correctional staff at risk for TB, and when released, these persons also can infect persons living in surrounding communities,' the researchers said." The Times continues, "In the report, G. Scott Earnest and other CDC epidemiologists point out that the number of U.S. prison inmates quadrupled from 500,000 in 1980 to about 2 million in 2003. … 'A disproportionately high percentage of TB cases' occur among prison inmates, they said. In 2003, 0.7 percent of the total U.S. population was confined in jails and prisons, yet 3.2 percent of all TB cases nationwide that year 'occurred among residents of correctional facilities.'" The Times adds, "The researchers said the TB rates of inmates in prisons in California and New York are 10 to 15 times greater than the general populations of those states. Studies show the prevalence of LTBI -- or latent TB infection, which is asymptomatic – 'to be as high as 25 percent' in prisons, they said. Like TB disease, LTBI can be detected by screening and can be treated. … The authors say the key reasons that prison inmates are at higher risk for the airborne infection are their diverse backgrounds, overcrowded facilities and poor ventilation. … In addition, they say, 'disparate numbers of incarcerated persons are at high risk for TB,' because they have HIV, use injection drugs and have 'low socioeconomic status' so may not have had access to proper medical care."

WPost Says Kaine Should Review Bustillo Conviction. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/10, A16) says, The Supreme Court's decision in the case of Mario A. Bustillo was correct on the arcane but important point of law it addressed: What happens when American states fail to inform foreign governments of the arrest of one of their nationals, thus violating an international treaty? Mr. Bustillo is serving 30 years in prison in Virginia for a brutal murder; after his arrest, authorities did not inform him of his right under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations to contact Honduran officials. … But here's the problem: Mr.

Bustillo may well be innocent. Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) ought to review his case. … At a minimum, the record cries out for a serious review. That could take years in federal courts, where procedural bars may prevent it from happening at all. Mr. Kaine could short-circuit that process with a review of his own."

Huckabee Wants Arkansas Ban On Gay Foster Parents Reinstated. The Washington Times (7/10, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is optimistic the legislature quickly will reinstate a ban on same-sex couples serving as foster parents in his state. 'What we are talking about is whether the state should place a child in a relationship that is not recognized by the state as a marriage,' the Republican governor, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, told the Associated Press on Saturday. The Arkansas Supreme Court last month struck down regulations banning the placement of foster children with same-sex couples. The court said state officials went too far in imposing the ban, but the court did not rule on the merit of the ban."

Gay Marriage Backers Suffer String Of Defeats. The Financial Times (7/10, Knight) reports, "For US advocates of gay marriage, the losing streak continues. Their opponents won two important state court battles last week, and those defeats offered little optimism for approval of gay unions in the legal and electoral battles that lie ahead in 2006." A California appeals court in San Francisco will hear on Monday "arguments on whether the state constitution gives gay and lesbian couples the right to marry, while appeals against decisions upholding same-sex marriage bans are pending in Washington and New Jersey.' And in Massachusetts, "currently the only state that permits the marriage of same-sex couples, Mitt Romney, the Republican governor, is urging the state legislature to go ahead this Wednesday with a scheduled vote on a proposed state constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage."

WSJournal Urges Activists To Use Political Process, Not Courts, To Push Gay Marriage Issue. The Wall Street Journal (7/10) reports, "The biggest problem with contemporary courts is their inclination to invent rights that legislators and our Constitution-writers never intended. So it's certainly noteworthy when they decline a politically fashionable invitation to do so. That's precisely what happened last week, when the highest courts in Georgia and New York decided that the state constitution does not guarantee a right to same-sex marriage. … If gay activists want to persuade New Yorkers and other fair-minded Americans to come around to their view, there is a traditional way to do that: hard work and commitment to the democratic process."

LATimes Criticizes New York, Georgia Court Rulings. The Los Angeles Times (7/10) editorializes, "The highest courts of New York and Georgia last week moved in the opposite direction of history and justice on same-sex marriage. … Neither of these decisions is binding on the courts of other states, any more than was the famous 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' high court that gay marriage couldn't be prohibited. So there's still hope that California's Supreme Court will take a more enlightened view of the issue when it next hears a challenge to heterosexual monopoly on civil marriage." The Times adds, "Someday we'll look back on the anti-gay-marriage hysteria with the same revulsion" as we viewed anti-miscegenation laws. Until then, "with a high court seemingly disinclined to address marriage, states such as California should take the lead."

Group Sees Itself As The Antithesis Of The ACLU. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/10, A1, Slevin) reports on the Alliance Defense Fund, a "a socially conservative legal consortium" that "spends $20 million a year seeking to protect what it regards as the place of religion -- and especially Christianity -- in public life." The group, which considers itself the "antithesis of the American Civil Liberties Union," has become "the leading player in a movement to tug the nation to the right by challenging decades of legal precedent. By stepping into the nation's most impassioned debates about religion in the public sphere, the group aims to bring law and society into alignment with conservative Christianity."

WPost Makes Case For Bilingual Ballots. The Washington Post (7/10, A16) editorializes, "THE HOUSE of Representatives' smooth passage to renewal of the Voting Rights Act hit a bump last month when a group of conservative Republicans rebelled over, among other things, provisions to require bilingual ballots in many jurisdictions. The rebels were wrong. When the House takes up the measure, as it may do this week, it should reject any effort to strip the bilingual-ballot requirement or to allow objections over the rule to torpedo this important measure." The Post adds, "We doubt there are many people who will decide to learn, or not to learn, English based on the availability of bilingual ballots. But we don't doubt that many more people will vote, and in an informed way, if they know what they're voting on. That is something to be welcomed, not feared."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Scrambling To Meet EU Antitrust Demands. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (7/10, Bishop) reports, "Faced with a series of tough deadlines, one group on Microsoft Corp.'s Redmond campus has been working until all hours -- but not on anything so normal as the new Windows or Office." The P-I continues, "The ad hoc team of 300 people is creating volumes of technical documents required by the European Commission's March 2004 antitrust decision. The project will be in the spotlight this week, with the commission poised to fine the company up to $2.5 million a day, dating back months, for what it calls Microsoft's failure to comply with the ruling." The P-I adds, "Microsoft says the all-out push shows that it has been doing all it can. The company points to signs of devotion to the cause -- such as one of the project leaders, engineer Henry Sanders, deciding to swear off shaving until the effort is complete, like an athlete in the playoffs. … The team's work may help in the future, but it isn't expected to avert a major fine this week. European officials say the very fact that Microsoft is still working on the documents shows that it wasn't living up to its obligations in the first place. … The provision in dispute requires Microsoft to offer technical information to its competitors in the computer server market, to help the rival products work as smoothly with Windows as Microsoft's own server products would. … That reflects the central goal of the repeated antitrust actions against the company -- reducing the advantage Microsoft enjoys because of its dominant Windows operating system."

Venture To Purchase Heritage Property. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Chittum, Berman) reports, "An Australian and American joint venture agreed to purchase strip-mall owner Heritage Property Investment Trust Inc. for about $1.83 billion in a deal that will more than double its U.S. presence in the sector." The Journal continues, "Centro Watt, a partnership between Centro Properties Group, a publicly traded Australian company, and Watt Commercial Properties, a private Los Angeles-based concern, will pay $36.15 a share for the Boston-based real-estate investment trust. The price represents a 3.3% premium to Friday's close of $34.98 on the New York Stock Exchange. … Including debt, Centro is paying about $3.3 billion and getting what it says is a 7.3% capitalization rate -- the return on investment in the first year of ownership, a key real-estate measure." The Journal adds, "Heritage owns 157 strip malls with 27 million square feet of space in 27 states. It has been sharply criticized by investors and analysts for its executive-compensation practices, which have led the industry while its share performance has lagged."

LATimes Opposes Entertainment Industry's Anti-Piracy Proposals. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (7/10) says that to attack the problem of global music and video piracy, "industry lobbyists are pressing Congress to adopt at least five different proposals that would give them more control over their works as they flow through new digital pipelines into living rooms and portable devices. But these measures, like the technologies they would affect, have a hard time distinguishing between illicit actions and legitimate ones." The Times adds, "Protecting intellectual property is a legitimate goal for Congress," but "what the entertainment industry is seeking in this year's proposals isn't merely protection from piracy; it's after increased leverage to protect its business models." The Times adds, "As they weigh the entertainment industry's pleas, lawmakers shouldn't assume all consumers are bootleggers and every digital device is a hand grenade aimed at Hollywood."

NOAA Ordered To Stop Jet Flights Into Hurricanes. The Washington Post (7/10, D4, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "A federal administrative law judge has stopped the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration from flying its high-altitude jet into hurricanes until the agency negotiates with a union representing meteorologists, engineers and technicians. Richard A. Pearson, an administrative law judge with the Federal Labor Relations Authority, found that the NOAA's Aircraft Operations Center in Tampa had wrongfully bypassed the National Weather Service Employees Organization in forming a team to study proposals for flying a Gulfstream IV-

SP jet into and near the centers of hurricanes as safely as possible. NOAA officials contended that they were not changing the conditions of employment for the jet's civilian crews, but Pearson said the high speed and altitude of the jet, the hazards of flying close to a storm's inner core, and the inability of flight instruments to detect all hazards were 'quantitatively and qualitatively different from those the employees were accustomed to...and required them to face new and more complex safety hazards.'"

EPA Whistleblower's Story To Become A Movie. The Washington Post (7/10, A15, Fears) reports that Marsha Coleman-Adebayo "sold the story of her battles with the Environmental Protection Agency to Hollywood, and actor Danny Glover is preparing a movie about how she blew the whistle against the agency and successfully sued for race and gender discrimination." Coleman-Adebayo "was allowed to work at home for five years because of a medical condition, but when she resisted coming back in April, the EPA took away her pay." Her case "involves larger issues about how the government treats employees who feel they are being retaliated against. Coleman-Adebayo and others say it amounts to corruption." The Post adds, "Coleman-Adebayo's case stands out because her crusade against what she calls 'government corruption' won her powerful allies, such as President Bush and House Judiciary Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who recently wrote a letter to the EPA on her behalf."

"Prudent" Use Of Eminent Domain Defended. In an op-ed in USA Today (7/10), Donald J. Borut, executive director of the National League of Cities, defends the use of eminent domain, noting that without it, "rundown buildings and empty lots would attract trash, rodents and trouble. Blighted structures would sit abandoned. If owners didn't want to sell or were holding out for more money, the cities and their taxpayers could do nothing to get rid of them." Borut adds, "The prudent use of eminent domain has brought hope and opportunity -- through good jobs and better housing -- to thousands of Americans. That story deserves to be told."

USA Today Says Property Seizures Should Be Rare And A Last Resort. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (7/10) says the Supreme Court's ruling on eminent domain "has ignited a nationwide fight between developers rushing to seize a fresh opportunity and an unlikely political coalition that sees the decision as an assault on America's 'home-as-castle' mind-set." The case has also "inspired a political backlash unusual in the annals of Supreme Court rulings. It has united conservative defenders of property rights and liberals who say the seizures amount to corporate welfare at the expense of the powerless." USA adds, "Seizures of one person's property to benefit another should be rare and a last resort."

Aides Say Bush Has Always Been An "Ardent Conservationist." As part of its cover package, Newsweek (7/17, Wolffe) reports that President Bush "is not monochromatic when it comes to the environment. … Has Bush turned green in his six years in office? Both environmentalists and the White House say no -- but for different reasons. To activists, Bush's record is unremittingly bad. … On the other side, Bush's aides say the president is unchanged -- he has always been an ardent conservationist -- and have their own take on his record. On the highways, Bush has set rules to improve the fuel consumption of light trucks and SUVs. In the air, he has proposed the first-ever cut in mercury emissions from power plants. And on global warming, the most controversial part of his green scorecard, Bush acknowledged back in June 2001 that the National Academy of Sciences believed climate change was 'due in large part to human activity.' The dispute is what to do about that warming. Bush thinks new technologies -- not treaties -- can save the day."

Mallaby Says Response To Climate Change Requires Taxation, Regulation. Sebastian Mallaby writes in the Washington Post (7/10, A17), "These days almost nobody asserts that global warming isn't happening. Instead, we are confronted with a new lie: that we can respond to climate change without taxing and regulating carbon. … It feels good to be for new technology rather than for nasty new taxes or regulations. But this is a false choice. If you want the new technology, you have to support the new tax or the new cap. Those who argue otherwise should ask themselves: Would we have rapid medical innovation if we didn't bother to protect intellectual property?"

NYTimes Calls Draft National Park Management Policy A "Marvel Of Sanity." An editorial in the New York Times (7/10) reports that the current draft of the National Park Service's management policy

"appears to reaffirm the doctrine that preservation is the core historical mission of the parks. That had been the philosophy guiding the Park Service for years, until the Bush administration attempted to give recreation and commercial use a much higher priority. Compared with the original draft, this one is a marvel of sanity and historical conscience. But it's been a rough road getting to this point, and there may well be a few bumps ahead." The Times adds, "The new interior secretary, Dirk Kempthorne, should listen to the claims of the motorized recreationists and weigh them for what they are worth against the many thousands of public comments supporting the historical mission of the parks — and act accordingly."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Overdoses In Pennsylvania Possibly Linked To Fentanyl. The Times Leader (7/9) reports, "Daniel Dominick, 27, died Friday at Wilkes-Barre General Hospital after taking what was likely a fentanyl-heroin mix, according to Luzerne County Coroner's Office. The Luzerne man's death placed Wilkes-Barre on a growing list of cities where the deadly heroin concoction has been circulating in recent months."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/9) reports a Millvale man died of a possible drug overdose, the Allegheny County medical examiner reported. The 31-year-old man…was the first of two suspected drug overdoses reported [Saturday]. The second one, just before 10 p.m., happened in Pittsburgh and it was not fatal."

Drug Mixture May Have Resurfaced In Delaware. The AP (7/9) reports five heroin overdoses in a 24-hour period "are leading to suspicions that heroin laced with a powerful painkiller has resurfaced in Delaware. State police spokesman Corporal Jeff Oldham says investigators are looking into whether the heroin involved was laced with fentanyl. Police say there have been two single-vehicle crashes that appear to be the result of overdoses."

Report: Illicit Fentanyl Produced A Dozen Ways. The Philadelphia Inquirer (7/9, Wood, Ott, Graham) writes, "Since spring, fentanyl-laced heroin has killed as many as 100 people in the Philadelphia region, and hundreds more in cities such as Chicago, Detroit and Pittsburgh. Despite a huge law-enforcement collaboration, investigators have yet to unlock the mystery of the fentanyl: Where is it coming from? Why is it being mixed with heroin? How can they stop it? … There are at least a dozen home methods for synthesizing illicit fentanyl, including one posted on the Internet by someone claiming to be an organic chemist. One of the essential chemicals for making fentanyl remains unregulated - and can be legally purchased by anyone. The Drug Enforcement Administration is trying to have it listed as a controlled precursor chemical, Daley said.

Michigan Anti-Meth Effort Nets More Than 30 Arrests. The AP (7/9) an effort to "fight the production and use of methamphetamine in southwest Michigan has paid off, the U.S. attorney's office says, but officials are concerned that drug makers could relocate. During the past seven months, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has assisted Kalamazoo-area law enforcement in the crackdown. Thirty-five people were arrested, seven methamphetamine labs were seized and marijuana, cocaine, heroin and meth were confiscated."

The Sturgis (MI) Journal (7/8) reports, "The seven-month investigation covered most of southwest Michigan and included the counties of St. Joseph, Cass, Barry, Kalamazoo, Allegan and Van Buren. The DEA from its Detroit office mobilized a seven-person mobile enforcement team, or MET, to help with the cooperative effort."

The Battle Creek (MI) Enquirer (7/8) reports, "While the same people don't use and distribute meth and cocaine, DEA targeted those allegedly involved in the Albion cocaine trade and agreed to help police as part of the bigger investigation, said Andrew Eiseman, group supervisor of the DEA Mobile Enforcement Team that conducted the investigation."

Authorities Say Cartels Deliver Millions Of Dollars In Meth To Minnesota. In Minneapolis, the Star-Tribune (7/10) profiles Alberto Zatarain, who is in the Sherburne County jail, "convicted on federal drug-conspiracy charges, sentenced to 15 years, and awaiting transfer to federal prison." The Star-Tribune says he "is one of only a few large-scale meth dealers in Minnesota with ties to the Sinaloa cartel to get caught in recent years."

The AP (7/9) reports, Capt. David Graham, head of the State Patrol's investigative unit, "says smugglers working for Mexican drug cartels are delivering millions of dollars worth of meth to Minnesota. Drug Enforcement Administration and state authorities estimate that more than 100 pounds of meth produced and packaged by Mexican cartels arrives in Minnesota every month."

Five Charged With Operating Mississippi Prison Meth Ring. From Magee, the AP (7/8) reports federal prosecutors "say five men, identified as members of the Aryan Brotherhood, have been charged with operating a methamphetamine ring that was directed from a Simpson County community work center in Magee. … Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent in Charge Stephen Luzinski said several imprisoned members of the white-supremacist gang allegedly enlisted the assistance of former inmates and criminal co-conspirators outside of the prison to produce and distribute the drug."

The Meridian (MS) Star (7/10) writes, "The investigation started in 2004 when correctional officers heard through telephone monitoring and confidential informants about the ring. The scheme lasted for about a year, authorities said."

Officials In Colorado Seek Federal Help To Combat Meth. The Daily Reporter-Herald (7/8) highlights a congressional hearing in Loveland on Friday and writes, "A panel of local officials asked the federal government for help combating methamphetamine. One suggestion: Close the borders, cut off the source. … In Colorado, the largest source is Mexico, said Lt. Craig Dodd, commander of the Larimer County Drug Task Force, Denver Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Jeffrey Sweetin and 13th Judicial District Attorney Bob Watson."

The Sterling, Colorado Journal-Advocate (7/8) reports, "The heart of war on illegal drugs in the eastern Colorado plains was in danger because of to lack of funding. That all ended Friday with an announcement late in a congressional hearing held here. Late in the Congressional Field Hearing on Meth Abuse in Northern Colorado, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave, R-Colo., said she has secured a direct appropriation funding for the Eastern Colorado Plains Drug Task Force for 2007."

Pennsylvania Couple Pleads Guilty In Meth Case. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/8) reports a husband and wife from Cranberry "pleaded guilty in federal court...to conspiring to make methamphetamine. Brian and Christy McKenzie were charged after agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration rummaged through their trash at the Forest Park Trailer Court where they lived in July 2005."

Pennsylvania Man Sentenced For Attacking Witness In Drug Investigation. In its Briefs section, the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (7/10) writes, "A case of retaliation against a witness has ended with a New Brighton, Beaver County, man being sentenced to more than eight years in prison. Virgil Wolfe…was found guilty April 12 of attacking a Beaver County man who provided information in a federal narcotics investigation, the U.S. Attorney's office in Pittsburgh said. The federal Drug Enforcement Administration and state, Beaver County and New Brighton police investigated the case, in which another man, John Wolfe, was also convicted."

Accused "Drug Kingpin" To Return To Federal Court In Sacramento. Vacaville, California's Reporter (7/8) writes, "Described as a regional drug kingpin by the Drug Enforcement Administration, a Fairfield man will return to federal court in Sacramento on July 18. Defendant Eduardo Nunez Pichardo - also known as Eddie Nunez - is scheduled to appear for a status conference…July 18." Pichardo "was arrested by DEA agents - assisted by Fairfield and Vacaville police - June 21. According to the DEA, the arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into drug trafficking that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama."

Former Prosecutor Faces New Accusations In Ethics Investigation. The Tucson Citizen (7/7) reports a former Pima County prosecutor "is accused of lying to federal agents and violating terms of a plea agreement involving her ex-fiance, a former eye surgeon recently convicted of ordering the death of a colleague. The accusations are made in an amended complaint filed last week by the State Bar of Arizona against Lourdes Lopez. … According to the complaint, Lopez committed ethical violations by lying to federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents in October 2001 about illegal prescriptions she obtained for Dr. Bradley Alan Schwartz and continuing to have contact with him despite a court order."

In Arizona, Couple Claims Marijuana Case Amounts To Religious Persecution. From Tucson, the AP (7/10) reports the Church of Cognizance "has been in Pima, Arizona since 1991. Until recently, they smoked, ate or drank marijuana daily as a way of becoming more spiritually enlightened. That was until federal authorities charged them with possessing 172 pounds of their leafy green sacrament earlier this year. And now, church founders Dan and Mary Quaintance face added conspiracy charges and up to 40 years each in prison in a case they call religious persecution. The couple is scheduled to go on trial in Las Cruces, New Mexico, on July 18th, though defense lawyers are asking for a delay."

The Arizona Daily Star (7/9) reports federal prosecutors "say religious freedom does not exempt the use of illegal drugs. The Quaintances say it does. They also say a recent U.S. Supreme Court decision allowing a religious group's use of a hallucinogenic tea containing a federally banned substance should nullify the charges against them."

IMMIGRATION:

Fewer Than 1,000 Guard Members Have Been Deployed To Border. CBS and NBC both ran reports on President Bush's efforts to deploy "up to 6,000" National Guard members to the US-Mexico border by August 1. Both stories focus on the slow place of the deployment. The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 8, 3:00, Mitchell) reported, "Bush's idea…is not going according to plan." CBS (Regan) added, "Operation Jump Start, to strengthen the Border Patrol with National Guard troops, seems to have stalled. There are less than 900 Guards actually on the border right now. Many believe deploying an additional 5,000 troops within the next three weeks unlikely." In its similar report, the NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 12, 2:20, Kotb) reported said there are "reports of a snag in the President's border patrol plan. Instead of growing to 6,000 National Guard troops along the border, there are fewer than 1,000, with many states reluctant to send more."

At Least 30 States Have Taken Action On Immigration. USA Today (7/10, Jones) reports at least 30 states have "passed laws or taken other steps this year to crack down on illegal immigrants, often making it harder for undocumented workers to find jobs or receive public services." While the federal Congress "struggles to set policy," states have enacted "at least 57 laws," with many states "fining businesses that hire undocumented workers and denying such companies public contracts if they don't verify the legal status of employees."

Florida Mayor Proposes Tough Immigration Policy. The New York Times (7/10, Goodnough) runs a feature on Avon Park, Florida, mayor Tom Macklin, who is pushing a proposal to "deny business permits to companies that knowingly hired illegal immigrants. The ordinance, which states that illegal immigration 'destroys our neighborhoods and diminishes our overall quality of life,' would also make English the official language of Avon Park, removing Spanish from all city documents, signs and automated phone messages."

Interior Repatriation Program Resumed. The Washington Times (7/10, Seper) reports the governments of the US and Mexico have resumed the Interior Repatriation Program, which returns Mexican nationals caught illegally in the US to their Mexican hometowns rather than to border towns.

WSJournal, "Prominent Conservatives" Defend Open Immigration. The Wall Street Journal (7/10) editorializes, "No issue more deeply divides American conservatives today than immigration. It's the subject on which we get the most critical mail by far, no doubt reflecting this split on the right. So with Congress holding hearings on the issue around the country, perhaps it's a good moment to step back and explain the roots of our own, longstanding position favoring open immigration. A position, by the way, on which we hardly stand alone. There is also President Bush, and before him the Gipper. … In the context of the current debate, we also print on the opposite page an open letter supporting comprehensive immigration reform from 33 prominent conservatives, including former Secretary of State George Shultz and GOP Vice Presidential nominee Jack Kemp. … Our own view is that a philosophy of 'free markets and free people' includes flexible labor markets. At a fundamental level, this is a matter of freedom and human dignity."

In their Wall Street Journal (7/10) open letter, the 33 conservatives, who also include Jeanne Kirkpatrick, Grover Norquist, Bill Kristol, Arthur Laffer, Linda Chavez, Max Boot, and Steve Forbes, say Reagan "was in favor of strong borders -- he once remarked that 'a nation without borders is not really a nation' -- but also constantly reminded us that America must remain a 'beacon' and a 'shining city on a hill' for immigrants who continually renew our great country with their energy and add to the nation's economic growth and prosperity. Reagan was right. We need to do both things -- secure the borders and allow for sensible levels of safe, open, lawful immigration. Americans and immigrants share the same values of work and opportunity. There is no reason to fear the newcomers arriving on our shores today -- if anything, they will energize what is best about our country."

Plight Of Day Laborers Considered. In a New York Times (7/10) "Editorial Observer" piece, Lawrence Downes

examines the plight of the "quiet" subgroup "at the bottom" of the immigration system: "the Latino day laborers, the street-corner guys. They are not the largest group, but they are the most visible, most vulnerable and most hated. They are also the least likely to get anything good out of the immigration bills now festering in Congress. … The possibility of being victimized without sympathy or a safety net is, of course, the risk one takes when entering this country illegally."

Allies Say Hastert "Won't Give An Inch" To Bush On Immigration. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that allies of House Speaker Dennis Hastert "say he won't give an inch" to President Bush and others who want to "water down" the House's immigration plan.

TAX:

Yagman Accused Of Concealing Money. The National Law Journal (7/10, Bronstad) reports, "While recent tax evasion charges brought against civil rights attorney Stephen Yagman are based largely on expenditures related to his personal lifestyle, federal prosecutors have accused him of concealing money he received as a principal of his Venice, Calif.-based law firm, now called Yagman & Yagman & Reichmann." The Journal continues, "On June 23, prosecutors unsealed an indictment that charged Yagman with one count of tax evasion, one count of bankruptcy fraud and 17 counts of money laundering. Prosecutors allege that Yagman failed to pay more than $158,000 in federal income taxes to the Internal Revenue Service and hid assets from trustees overseeing bankruptcies filed on behalf of himself and his former law firm, Yagman & Yagman." The Journal adds, "Yagman is best known for filing numerous lawsuits against the top officials of various law enforcement agencies, particularly in Los Angeles. In recent years, Yagman has sought to bring disciplinary action against U.S. District Judge Manuel Real of the Central District of California in a case closely watched by judges nationwide. … Yagman alleges that Real, who was handling a loan fraud case involving a woman under probation, made improper rulings as part of her separate bankruptcy case. After dismissing Yagman's case twice, Mary Schroeder, chief judge of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, recently appointed a special committee to investigate the charges."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Portman Says Deficit Will Shrink In Short Term. The Washington Times (7/10, Dinan) reports, "The economy and federal revenues are growing at such a rapid rate that the deficit will shrink in the short term, President Bush's chief budget official says, while adding that keeping the deficit in control will depend in the long run on reform of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid." Rob Portman, a former congressman and US trade representative "whom Mr. Bush tapped two months ago to be director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), said the president's economic policies have led to exceptional economic growth, which has in turn led to bulging federal receipts." Portman "will deliver the annual mid-session budget review this week, detailing progress on spending and revenues, and he told The Washington Times in a recent interview that tax revenues are expected to show at least double-digit growth in the year to date compared with fiscal year 2005." The Congressional Budget Office on Friday "said federal revenue is running 12.8 percent ahead of the figures at the same time last year. The double-digit increase is the second-highest growth rate in the last 25 years, following only 2005's increase of 15 percent. With federal spending up 8.6 percent to date compared with 2005, the deficit should be at least $50 billion less than last year, though Mr. Portman said that depends on keeping the spending side under control."

House Republicans Have Trouble Passing Their "American Values Agenda." The Washington Times/AP (7/10) reports that House Republicans are having trouble passing their "American Values Agenda," and their majority is "in jeopardy for the first time in more than a decade." Privately, many Republicans "are frustrated. Democrats have pounced on the lack of progress with a 'we can do better' election theme." Democrats "ridicule as political ploys Republican decisions to bring up legislation doomed to fail, such as the constitutional amendments to ban flag desecration." The Times adds, "With two-thirds of the 2006 legislative calendar over, Congress has passed and sent President Bush only two major pieces of legislation. One renewed the terrorist-fighting USA Patriot Act; the other extended $70 billion in tax cuts, roughly divided evenly between investors and middle-income families."

Shuttle Discovery Cleared For Reentry. NBC's network news broadcast last night included a very short report on Discovery being cleared for reentry, while ABC carried a full, nearly two-minute long segment on Discovery's progress. NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 11, 0:15, Kotb) reported, "NASA has decided the shuttle will not need repairs before returning to Earth. There was some concern about a cloth between the thermal tiles but managers say that does not pose a problem. In a news conference from space today, the astronauts expressed confidence in a safe return."

ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 4, 1:45, Muir) reported, "Encouraging news from NASA. After a seven-hour spacewalk and an inch-by-inch inspection, they say the space shuttle Discovery is safe to come home next week." ABC added, "For the first time since the Columbia disaster more than three years ago, the space program can get back to business as usual thanks to more than a billion dollars in redesigns and new cameras that give them unprecedented views of the shuttle."

The Washington Post (7/10, A3, Gugliotta) reports, "NASA engineers completed their exhaustive analysis of three remaining 'areas of concern' on Discovery's heat shielding and 'cleared' all of them, said John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team."

The AP (7/10, Borenstein) reports Mission Control "informed the crew of six that the ship's thermal shielding is '100 percent cleared for entry' in another week."

NASA Schedules Next Shuttle Launch For August 28. ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 4, 1:45, Muir) reported, "NASA is so confident the shuttle program is back on track that today they released a schedule for the next launch. Atlantis is due to go up on August 28th, just after 4 PM."

ISS Research Has Shifted To Manned Spaceflight Support. The Washington Post (7/10, A6, Kaufman), in a thousand word piece titled, "Research Shifts At Space Station," reports, "When the international space station was initially proposed by President Ronald Reagan, its central mission was conceived as providing the most innovative and unusual research center that mankind had ever created. … Twenty-two years later, the space station is half-built and can carry out some experiments, but the U.S. view of its science mission has greatly changed. The primary U.S. goal is no longer basic research, but to support President Bush's initiative of manned missions to the moon and to Mars by learning about how astronauts can live for long periods in space. The morphing of the space station's role has not been without controversy."

USO Volunteer Receives President's Volunteer Service Award. The Chicago Tribune (7/7, Wang) reported that President Bush presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to Dave Kruger last Thursday for his volunteer work with the United Service Organizations center at O'Hare International Airport. Kruger "volunteers about 27 hours a week, Friday through Sunday, and sometimes stops by to help after he gets off work as a shipping scheduler at a Wheeling manufacturing plant. He delivers food from the grocery, does odd jobs around the office…and serves food when naval recruits at the base come in. In two years Kruger has volunteered more than 1,300 hours."

USAID Employees Believe Merger With State Is Coming. The Washington Post (7/10, A15, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Administration officials insist that the U.S. Agency for International Development, traditionally a distinct operation within the State Department, is not about to be officially merged with State. But recent events are making people wonder. … USAID veterans are certain a merger is coming. 'We're merging, but it's incremental,' one source said, 'so you don't know that you're merging and then it's happened. There's less pain and suffering that way, I guess.'"

Graham Sees Controlling Spending As GOP's Highest Priority. In his column, carried on TownHall.com (7/10), Robert Novak writes that Sen. Lindsey Graham "sees a real danger of Republicans losing control of both houses in Congress for the first time since the 1992 elections. Such foreboding reflects Graham's fear that demographic changes in America will extend beyond this year's elections and return the Republican Party to minority status." Novak adds, "Graham's remedy to avert both short-term and long-term disaster stresses Republicans returning to fiscal integrity by seriously cutting spending -- a goal to which his GOP colleagues give lip service. … Graham sees the highest Republican priority as controlling federal spending. He proposes renewing the campaign for a constitutional amendment mandating a balanced budget, backed up by self-restraint on earmarks."

Library Of Congress To Lay Off 29 Employees. The Washington Post (7/10, D4, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Library of Congress has notified 29 employees at the Congressional Research Service that their jobs will be abolished on Sept. 29. The layoffs are believed to be the first in the 92-year history of CRS, the division of the library that tracks legislative issues and collects data for members of Congress. The workers being eliminated perform clerical, technical and audio-visual duties."

Bush Has Been Working On A Memoir For The Past Year. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that President Bush has been working on a memoir for the past year. But "here's the odd part: Bush hasn't actually written a word yet. Instead, he and his aides have been packaging the stuff he wants to reference so that he'll be ready to write when the project moves into that stage. And that probably won't happen until after he leaves office."

Bush Tells Paulson To Make Treasury The "Star It Used To Be." U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that President Bush has ordered Henry Paulson, who is to be sworn in as Treasury Secretary this week, "to make the agency the star it used to be. He's led by example, telling Congress that Paulson, the former Goldman Sachs boss, is his economic point man. Also significant: The White House named Jim Wilkinson the chief of staff. He's largely responsible for rebuilding State's influence under Condi Rice."

Commercial Real Estate Market Is Strongest In Five Years. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Forsyth) reports that the US' commercial real estate market, "which cratered after the tech bust in 2000, has recovered and is the strongest it has been in five years. The shopping-mall market has stayed strong because consumer spending held up better than expected. And hotels had their most profitable year ever in 2005, partly because of strong business travel."

Former Lobbyist's $2 Million Severance Pay Raises Eyebrows. The Washington Post (7/10, D1, Birnbaum) reports in its "K Street Confidential" column that congressional aide Jeffrey S. Shockey last year "collected nearly $2 million in severance payments from his former employer, a lobbying firm that specializes in winning benefits from the committee he now serves. Many longtime Washingtonians are shaking their heads in disbelief over the payout's enormous size, its ad hoc method of calculation and the fact that Shockey received it while working as a senior congressional aide." Shockey "says his payment was justified and within the rules. But experienced lobbyists around town question both its economics and its propriety." The Post adds, "The situation is an example of a common occurrence -- the spinning of the 'revolving door' between the public and private sectors."

Santorum Seeks To Refurbish His Image As "Political Heir" To D'Amato. The New York Times (7/10, Toner) reports, "The conservative glory days of 1994, when Rick Santorum roared into the Senate at the age of 36, seem a long time ago as he fights for his political life this year, trying to convince Pennsylvania voters that he has not gone Washington. Not become part of the establishment he used to rail against. Not forgotten the kitchen table issues that matter here." Santorum "was a symbol of the conservative movement in its brash youth; now, in many ways, he embodies the movement in middle age, 12 years after taking control of the House and Senate, no longer so confident that the political winds are with it, especially in an anti-incumbent year." He "needs to reintroduce himself over the next four months, he said, to get beyond the stereotypes." He "said he wanted Pennsylvanians to think of him as a political heir to Alfonse M. D'Amato of New York, who was known as Senator Pothole for being acutely attuned to constituent needs. (Perhaps not the most auspicious role model, since Mr. D'Amato was unseated by an ambitious Democrat, Charles E. Schumer.)"

Hillary Clinton Seeks Support On Wall Street. The Financial Times (7/10, Ben White) reports, "Hillary Clinton has been cosying up to Wall Street in recent weeks with a series of meetings with top executives that could help her follow the path blazed by her husband ahead of his first presidential run." The Times adds, "People familiar with the meetings said they appeared intended to help Wall Street figures get to know the New York senator better as she coasts through an easy 2006 re-election campaign and paves the way for a possible Democratic presidential run in 2008. Bill Clinton's early forays to Wall Street helped advance his bid for the Democratic nomination in 1992." Ann Lewis, "a senior adviser to Mrs Clinton, said the meetings were focused on 2006." However, "political observers noted that Mrs Clinton faces little significant opposition in 2006. They said the Wall Street meetings could pay dividends in 2008."

Dodd Accuses Fellow Democrats Of Undermining Lieberman's Candidacy. Sen. Christopher Dodd, on CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), said that though he "respect[s] those who have taken the position they're going to support whoever the nominee is" in the Connecticut Democratic Senate primary. His "own view is, while their intentions may be otherwise, I think that undermines Joe Lieberman's ability to win on August 8th, by suggesting somehow they're going to move in that direction. I'll take a position on August 9th if I have to."

Democrats Urged To Offer "Breakthrough Ideas." Kenneth S. Baer and Andrei Cherny, the founding editors of Democracy: A Journal of Ideas, write in the Los Angeles Times (7/10), "Something happens to a political party when it is not just out of power but has had to play on the home field of its opponents for a generation: It loses faith in itself and becomes scared. … That this has become true in the Democratic Party is clear in listening to the worried words of pundits and political professionals who counsel Democrats to avoid offering any vision or direction for the country -- to instead simply wait for voters to so tire of Republican mismanagement that they will turn to more 'competent' Democrats to administer a conservative state." Baer and Cherny add, "Having seen the failure of a generation of conservative ideas on fiscal and foreign policy, Americans are ready to listen to an alternative. Now is the moment for Democrats to offer a set of breakthrough ideas that will create a governing majority for a generation."

DeLay Planning Campaign To Retake His House Seat. Time (7/17, Allen, Hylton) reports in its "Notebook" column, "A source close to the ex-Congressman tells TIME that [former Rep. Tom] DeLay is planning an aggressive campaign to retake the House seat he quit in June if an appeals court lets stand a ruling by a federal judge last week that his name must stay on November's ballot -- even though he has moved to Virginia."

Democrats Plan To Push Minimum Wage Increase Going Into 2006 Election. Time (7/17, Bacon) reports in its "Notebook" column, "Polls show that more than 80% of Americans favor" a minimum wage increase, but "most Republican politicians...do not. So Democrats are sharpening their attacks on the GOP for seeming out of step with public opinion. Senator Hillary Clinton of New York has led a Democratic effort to block a scheduled $3,300 increase in congressional pay...unless Republicans agree to hike the minimum wage to $7.25. The Dems are also emulating the Republican gay-marriage strategy by backing ballot measures in six states to boost the minimum wage. They hope voters will go to the polls for this cause, then support Democrats in races that could help the party take back Congress."

Edwards Makes Fighting Poverty Centerpiece Of Possible 2008 Run. Newsweek (7/17, Darman) reports that former Sen. John Edwards' "new political plan" involves "a presidential campaign with fighting poverty as a central plank. It's a risky strategy in today's Democratic Party -- Edwards may be the most viable national candidate since Bobby Kennedy to tie his destiny to a fight for the destitute." Edwards' "2008 presidential campaign -- still hypothetical but proceeding at high speed -- is all about breaking with the established script. He's largely opted out of the buzz primary," and is instead "using the name recognition he built up in '04 and hitting the campaign trail early and often -- quietly raising $6.5 million in 105 appearances for Democrats running in 2006."

Matalin, Allen Asked To Leave Alexandria City Event. The Washington Times (7/10, McCaslin) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Virginia senatorial wife Susan Allen and Republican operative Mary Matalin, accompanied by their respective daughters, were asked to leave a birthday celebration for the city of Alexandria on Saturday evening because they were 'distracting.'" A close friend of Mrs. Allen said, "They were asked to leave the public event by Alexandria's Parks and Recreation Department because they were told they were "distracting,"' adding, "That was the exact word [officials] used. Perhaps these Alexandria servants should be reminded that politicking at public, community events is a time-honored, American tradition, not to mention a First Amendment right."

Schwarzenegger Leading Opponent In Latest Poll. The Washington Times (7/10, Bellantoni) reports, "California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a wide lead over state Treasurer Phil Angelides, his Democratic re-election challenger who said Friday that, if elected, he would sign a bill to grant marriage licenses to homosexual couples." Schwarzenegger "leads Mr. Angelides 44 percent to 37 percent in a statewide poll taken the last week of June. The poll showed 14 percent of voters were undecided, while 5 percent of those surveyed wanted a different candidate."

Liberal Clergy Try To Engineer Religious Left Political Movement. The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 10, 3:30, Mitchell) reported, "Conservative religious voters have played an important role in the national debate of late courted by politicians from both parties. Now some liberal religious leaders are hoping to build a similar movement to advance their agenda." CBS goes on to report on a church in Washington, DC, where "hundreds of committed Christians met recently and try to map out a strategy to get their values into the political debate. Not the conservative Christian values which have been so influential lately -- this is the religious left." Dr. Bob Edger, Gen. Sec. of the National Council of Churches: "Jesus called us to love our neighbor, love our enemy, care for the poor, care for the outcast and that's really the moral core of where we think the nation ought to go." Mitchell: "Dr. Bob Edgar is general secretary of the National Council of Churches, which represents about 50 million Christians in America, the majority of them mainline Protestants." Edgar: "Jesus never said one word about homosexuality, never said one word about civil marriage or abortion." Mitchell: "He calls this movement the center left and it's seeking the same political muscle as conservative Christians, a group with a strong power base and the huge evangelical churches of the South. The left has its own evangelical leaders, like the Reverend Tony Campolo." Rev. Tony Campolo, evangelical Leader: "We are furious that the religious right has made Jesus into a Republican. That's idolatry. To recreate Jesus in your own image rather than allowing yourself to be created in Jesus' image is what's wrong with politics."

Obama Says Politicians Should Not Abandon Field Of Religious Discourse. Sen. Barack Obama writes in USA Today (7/10) that there has been talk "among pundits and pollsters that the political divide in this country falls sharply along religious lines. Indeed, the single biggest gap in party affiliation among white Americans today is not between men and women, between red states and blue, but between those who attend church regularly and those who don't." If political leaders "truly hope to communicate our hopes and values to Americans in a way that's relevant to their own, we cannot abandon the field of religious discourse." Obama adds, "Americans are looking for a deeper, fuller conversation about religion in this country." They "are willing to listen and learn from those who are willing to speak in reasonable terms — those who know of the central and awesome place that God holds in the lives of so many, and who refuse to treat faith as simply another political issue with which to score points."

Krugman Says Resurgence Of New York City Flies In Face Of Conventional Wisdom. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (7/10) that the resurgence of Manhattan as a site for corporate headquarters "flies in the face of today's conventional wisdom, which says that modern technology is making geography irrelevant. Since work can now be done anywhere, the story goes, jobs move wherever the wages and other costs of doing business are lowest. And this should mean trouble for a high-wage, high-cost location like New York. But somebody forgot to tell New York about the new rules: in spite of high costs, the city's economy is thriving." Krugman adds that New York City, "a city that a generation ago seemed to be in irreversible decline, seems to be doing O.K."

NYTimes Decries Lobbyists' Expansion To Local Governments. An editorial in the New York Times (7/10) says, "The news that the Washington lobbying industry is rapidly extending its tentacles into cities, towns and school districts across the country should be an outright embarrassment to Congress." Lobbyists "are shopping themselves as gifted middlemen for mayors and school boards. And localities are biting, having seen the sorry evidence that lawmakers tend to deliver earmarks more readily for Beltway lobbyists than for hometown nobodies." The Times says that despite the fact that one Congressman has gone to jail for influence peddling and more criminal investigations of others are under way, "a what-me-worry evasiveness remains the strategy of Republican leaders on ethics reform."

WPost Calls Farm Subsidies "Shamefully Unfair." The Washington Post (7/10, A16) editorializes, "We've known for a long time that America's bloated food subsidy programs rile foreign governments, complicate trade talks, distort agricultural prices and disproportionately benefit large agribusinesses. As if that weren't enough, the results of a nine-month Post investigation published last week vividly detail the scandalous waste of America's vast farm subsidy system." The Post adds, "Federal farm subsidies are wildly misdirected and shamefully unfair to anyone who pays taxes and doesn't get a piece of the billions -- $25 billion in 2005 -- the government drops every year on agricultural payments. Last year the federal government paid $4.3 billion in corn subsidies, up from $1 billion in 1998."

Professor Says Training More Doctors Won't Solve US Health Care Problems. David C. Goodman, a professor of pediatrics and family medicine at Dartmouth Medical School, writes in the New York Times (7/10) that the Association of American Medical Colleges, "has recommended increasing the number of doctors they train by 30 percent, in large part to keep up with the growing number of elderly patients. But the most serious problems facing our health care system — accelerating costs, poor quality of care and the rising ranks of the uninsured — cannot be solved by more doctors. In fact, that approach, like prescribing more drugs for an already overmedicated patient, may only make things worse." Goodman adds that "our resources would be better directed toward improving efforts to prevent illness and manage chronic ailments like diabetes and heart disease. … Instead of training more doctors, let's make better use of the ones we already have."

Administration Wants China To Exert Pressure On North Korea. The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 4, 0:35, Mitchell) reported, "The US said today that it wants China to put more pressure on North Korea to end missile tests and return to disarmament talks. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns indicated that the US would not negotiate directly with North Korea. He also warned of the consequences if the rogue state continued to defy the International Community."

Burns appeared on NBC's Meet the Press (7/9, Russert), CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace) and CNN's Late Edition (7/9, Blitzer). With the exception of his CNN appearance, during which he discussed the sectarian violence in Iraq at length, Burns focused almost exclusively on describing the US diplomatic response to North Korea's July 4 missile launches. Burns emphasized repeatedly that the administration considers the Chinese government's decision to send envoys to Pyongyang "the most important step today" (Fox), and "a very interesting development" (NBC).

Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (7/9, Russert) if the US will "insist that the United Nations impose sanctions against North Korea," Burns replied, "we are pursuing a very aggressive resolution up in New York at the Security Council, and we think we've got the votes to pass that. But we're also operating on multiple diplomatic fronts. We have our lead negotiator, Chris Hill, Ambassador Hill, in Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo this week. President Bush and Secretary Rice have been working the phones with their counterparts." Burns added, "We also have a very interesting development today. The Chinese government is sending tonight to Pyongyang a senior delegation. And, you know, frankly we think it's time for China to use its influence with North Korea. … China now has an opportunity to put its best foot forward, to send the North Koreans a direct message that these missile tests cannot be tolerated."

On Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace), Burns said, "I think the most important step today is that China has decided to send a senior-level delegation to Pyongyang this evening. And it's time for China to exert its influence that it does have on North Korea."

On CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), Burns added, "China has influence with North Korea of the type that most of the rest of us do not. And the Chinese are sending a senior-level delegation to Pyongyang this evening, and we hope that China is going to bring some pressure and influence to bear to convince the North Koreans that they are entirely isolated in the world."

Burns, on CNN's Late Edition (7/9, Blitzer), predicted, "I think you'll see over the course of the next couple of days, when we get the results of this Chinese delegation to Pyongyang, I think you will then see us move ahead in New York at the Security Council. We hope that China and Russia are going to support this resolution."

NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 5, 2:20, Aspell) reported, "North Korea's missile tests have alarmed Asia. South Korea has stepped up the readiness of its armed forces along the demilitarized zone, the most heavily fortified border in the world. It's been like this since the end of the Korean War more than 50 years ago -- a million men on both sides all across the Korean Peninsula, thousands of tanks and artillery pieces, but all this is now nearly obsolete."

In a lengthy analysis piece, the Wall Street Journal (7/10, Fairclough, King) notes, "North Korea's barrage of missile tests has put China in a tough spot, calling into question its policy of patient diplomacy and economic support aimed at encouraging change in Pyongyang. The U.S., saying Beijing's response is a critical test of China's new high-profile role on the international stage, is urging China to alter course and use its considerable leverage as North Korea's most important trading partner to get Pyongyang to return to talks on its nuclear program." The Journal says it "is far from clear" if the missile tests "will be enough to overcome Beijing's extreme reluctance to use economic pressure as a diplomatic tool, especially against its communist ally." Beijing "has successfully used arm-twisting in the past," and, the Journal notes, "the U.S. has appealed to China's pride, saying it risks diminishing its international standing if it can't use its influence even to moderate the behavior of one of its closest neighbors. … Washington also has said China's ability -- or inability -- to make headway with North Korea will be important in shaping the future of relations between Washington and Beijing."

The Christian Science Monitor (7/10, Marquand) runs a similar story titled "US Looks To China To Influence N. Korea," in which it says "a message from President Bush to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il will be delivered Monday in Pyongyang -- via two Chinese officials. Beijing now meets quarterly with Mr. Kim, the most contact the unpredictable North has with any outside party. Whether Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei and Vice Premier Hui Liangyu will surprise Kim Jong Il and exert real pressure is unclear." The Los Angeles Times (7/10, Demick) also reports the story.

Administration Continues To Defer To China On North Korea. Newsweek (7/17, Hirsh) reports that on North Korea, the Bush Administration "continues to defer to China, the lead negotiator, but it has seemed clear since a September 2005 pact to restart talks that Beijing will not pressure Pyongyang too hard with sanctions. Why? Mainly because the Chinese fear a collapse of the regime that could send millions of refugees streaming over the Sino-Korean border."

Time (7/17, Powell) reports that there is "little reason to think Kim Jong Il will be dissuaded" by the failure of his Taepodong-2 missile last week. Time considers the "remaining options for dealing with the world's most unpredictable totalitarian nuclear regime." They include, a "swift and precise military strike," containing Kim's regime and then squeezing it "with the hope that his government will eventually atrophy into collapse" and going back to the bargaining table. The Bush Administration "may have to face the fact that if it wants closure on North Korea, it will have to engage in what Kim has wanted all along: direct talks."

Burns Defends Administration's Opposition To One-On-One Talks. During his appearance on NBC's Meet the Press (7/9, Russert), Burns explained that the administration opposes one-on-one talks with the government of North Korea because "we really don't see the logic in turning this into a test of wills between two countries -- the United States and North Korea. The fact is that China has the same interests as the United States -- it should have the same interests -- and that is to stop the North Korean nuclear program. Our allies, Japan and South Korea, have the same interests, and the Russians do as well. And so we think we're far better off working within the framework of the six-party talks, because you get in that process the combined leverage, the combined strength, and frankly the combined pressure on North Korea of all these different countries."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, on CNN's Late Edition (7/9, Blitzer), said, "I agree with President Bush; it needs to be a multi- party situation. … I think it would be a huge mistake for us to sit down by ourselves. What they need to see, the North Koreans need to see a table full of people throughout the world -- the Japanese, the South Koreans, the Chinese, the Russians -- telling them the same thing."

Hill Seeks To Restart Talks, With Or Without North Korea. The Financial Times (7/10, Fifield, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Efforts are under way to convene 'five-party talks' involving North Korea's neighbours and the US as officials search for diplomatic avenues to respond to the Asian country's missile tests last week without further highlighting the divergent views over how to deal with the rogue state. But China, the host of the talks, and North Korea's closest ally, is understood to be unwilling to hold a meeting without Kim Jong-il's representatives, posing another challenge to presenting a united front in condemning the tests." Assistant Secretary Chris Hill said, "We think there ought to be six-party talks – six is better than five but five is better than none. We need the six-party process regardless of whether we get all six parties to come to it." Since last September, the talks have "stagnated" because of North Korean anger over

Washington's imposition of Macau money laundering sanctions.

The New York Times (7/10, Onishi) reports Hill "said Sunday that his first priority was to get [Pyongyang] back to the negotiating table, signaling that the United States was seeking a diplomatic solution instead of punitive economic sanctions against it for launching seven missiles last week." Hill further "said his talks with South Korean officials [in Seoul] over the weekend focused on kick-starting the six-nation talks over the North's nuclear program. The talks have been deadlocked since last September." Hill is quoted telling reporters, "My mission here is not to get sanctions. My mission here is to make sure we can all speak with one voice to deal with this provocative action by the North Koreans."

ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 6, 2:35, Muir) interviewed Hill. ABC (Harris) asked, "Dealing with the regime of the world's last Stalinist dictator -- Kim Jong Il -- that's part of the job of Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill. … Is this the type of person that we really can deal with?" Christopher Hill, Assistant Secretary of State: "It's very tough to deal with this kind of regime. But, you know, you don't just negotiate with your friends. You negotiate with people that you often have profound disagreements with." ABC (Harris) added, "If diplomacy fails, Hill does not take the military card off the table." Hill was shown saying, "Of course there's a point at which we need to take actions to defend ourselves, and we are well aware of that." Harris: "Hill's job is to make sure it doesn't come to that."

US Declines North Korean Request To End Freeze On Bank Funds. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Ramstad) reports, "The US is holding the line on a freeze of North Korean funds in a Macau bank, rebuffing Pyongyang's latest effort to link diplomatic talks on its nuclear-weapons program with a probe of its financial activities by U.S. and Chinese authorities." North Korea's deputy ambassador to the United Nations "was quoted in a Seoul newspaper as saying Pyongyang wouldn't rejoin six-party talks on its weapons program until the US takes steps to lift a freeze of about $24 million in North Korean funds in a bank in Macau, a special administrative region of China." Hill, however, said, "To change the subject from this rather reckless [missile] activity on their part back to an issue of illicit activities, which I would argue are also reckless, is simply not appropriate."

South Korean Reaction To Missile Test Making US Position More Difficult. USA Today (7/10, Wiseman) reports that in South Korea, the news of the North's missile test "has been greeted with a shrug, never mind that Seoul sits within range of North Korean artillery and rockets. The attitude in South Korea is in sharp contrast to the alarm with which the missile tests were viewed in Tokyo and Washington." Yesterday, "the administration of South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun even issued a statement criticizing Japan for what it said was an overreaction to the missile tests." USA Today adds, "South Korea's attitude has made it even harder for US policymakers to forge a coalition committed to punishing North Korea. China and Russia, traditional North Korean allies, have opposed harsh sanctions."

Nonetheless, says the Wall Street Journal (7/10, Hitt), "talks between South Korea and the US on a free-trade agreement resumed in Seoul Monday. One sensitive issue: South Korea wants the pact to cover goods originating at its joint-venture Kaesong industrial complex in North Korea."

Bush's Reaction To North Korea Tests Called Sign Of "End Of Cowboy Diplomacy." Time's (7/17, Allen, Ratnesar) cover story this week is entitled "The End Of Cowboy Diplomacy." The cover features a photo of a large cowboy hat with a presidential seal on it, on top of a pair of cowboy boots. Time reports that more surprising than North Korea's missile tests "was Bush's response to it." Bush "pledged to 'make sure we work with our friends and allies...to continue to send a unified message' to Pyongyang. In a press conference following the missile test, he referred to diplomacy half a dozen times." Time adds, that "in the span of four years, the Administration has been forced to rethink the doctrine with which it hoped to remake the world as the strategy's ineffectiveness is exposed by the very policies it prescribed. The swaggering Commander in Chief who embodied the doctrine's aspirations has modulated himself too." Time adds, "Under the old Bush Doctrine, "defiance by a dictator like Kim Jong Il would have merited threats of punitive US action -- or at least a tongue lashing. Instead, the Administration has mainly been talking up multilateralism and downplaying Pyongyang's provocation."

"Strategic Makeover" Of Administration's Foreign Policy Noted. Time (7/17, Allen, Ratnesar) reports in its cover story, entitled "The End Of Cowboy Diplomacy," that "a strategic makeover" of the Administration's foreign policy "is evident in the ascendancy of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has tried to repair the Administration's relations with allies and has persuaded Bush to join multilateral negotiations aimed at defusing the standoffs with North Korea and Iran." Rice's "push for pragmatism has rubbed off on hawks like Vice President Dick Cheney, the primary intellectual force behind Bush's post-9/11 policies."

Kristol Mocks Burns' Assessment Of North Korea Diplomacy. The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace), said, "North Korea is paying no price at all for doing something that we said is unacceptable, and that is a very bad precedent to set. And I'm afraid that watching Nick Burns here tell you that the world is more complicated than you think…I thought 'oh, my God, we're back to the Clinton administration.' Nick Burns was actually a pretty good spokesman for Bill Clinton's State Department in the first couple of years. And there's not a word he said today that couldn't have been said cheerfully by Clinton administration types…" Kristol paraphrased Burns as saying, "We're thrilled China is sending a delegation to Pyongyang tonight. Isn't that wonderful?" and commented, "I mean, it's really pathetic." Kristol went on to urge President Bush to "walk away from the six-party talks. He should cancel them. North Korea has behaved in a way that's unacceptable for someone you're trying to have negotiations with. We should tighten the sanctions on North Korea."

Hoekstra Backs Administration's View Of China's Role. Rep. Pete Hoekstra, on Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace), said, "We also need to take this as an opportunity to take a much closer look at China. I do believe that the path to success in North Korea is going to have to go through Beijing."

Richardson Accuses Bush Of "Trying To Outsource Our Foreign Policy To China." New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, also on NBC's Meet the Press (7/9, Russert), said he supports face-to-face negotiations with the government of North Korea, adding, "Our policy, so far, is not working. What you have is North Korea has quadrupled its enriched plutonium since 2002. The six-party talks are going nowhere. We should talk directly to the North Koreans to discuss what is next. … The only way to do that, in my judgment, is face-to-face talks at a level of Christopher Hill. He is a competent diplomat. The successes we've had with the North Koreans have been through direct engagement." Richardson went on to argue that the administration is "trying to outsource our foreign policy to China. I believe China is not necessarily interested in helping us on North Korea. They don't want to see a bunch of refugees go into their country."

McCain, Graham Warn China Of "Consequences" If They Do Not Cooperate On North Korea. Sen. John McCain, on CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), said, "I believe that China is the key. They're the only ones that really have a significant influence over North Korea. If we make it clear to China that we understand they are emerging on the world stage as a superpower, they should behave like one. And this will be a defining issue in our relations with China. And if they continue to vacillate, as they have all last week in the United Nations, then there are consequences in our relationship. There are many key areas that we are cooperating in that I believe would be affected, including trade, by China's failure to act. We're not asking China to be charitable here."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, on CNN's Late Edition (7/9, Blitzer), said, "The Chinese are hanging by a thread politically with the Congress now over trade policy. If they don't really come to the table harder with North Korea, they're going to be hanging by a thread in terms of international diplomatic policy."

Lugar Notes North Korea Has Increased Its Missile Capabilities Since Bush Was Elected. Sen. Richard Lugar was asked on ABC's This Week (7/9, Stephanopoulos) if North Korea has "gotten more dangerous on President Bush's watch," Lugar answered, "Perhaps. They certainly have been able to produce more missiles. And they are selling missiles. … So perhaps they have become more dangerous."

Woolsey Warns That South Korea, Japan, Taiwan May All Seek Nuclear Weapons. Former CIA Director James Woolsey, on Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace), predicted, "the way China is going now, they're going to end up with four new nuclear powers in East Asia, I think -- North Korea in time, South Korea in time, Japan, and in time maybe Taiwan. Why China thinks it's in its interest to have four new nuclear powers in East Asia is beyond me."

NYTimes Urges Direct Talks. The New York Times (7/10) editorializes, "The United Nations Security Council certainly should register international condemnation of last week's North Korean missile launches. But if any serious progress is going to be made on this and the related North Korean nuclear issue, it will not be through Security Council resolutions or sanctions. … The Bush administration should drop its reflexive opposition to direct talks." But "before scheduling a meeting, Washington should call on North Korea to reinstate its moratorium on long-range missile tests and keep it in place for at least one year while talks on a permanent ban proceed." Those direct talks should also include discussions on North Korea's nuclear weapons programs."

Unity On Iran Said To Hinge On US-Russian Relations. The Financial Times (7/10, Dombey, Khalaf) reports, "Western governments are stepping up their efforts to win Russian and Chinese backing for a tougher stance over Iran's nuclear programme in the run-up to the G8 summit next weekend. The latest indication came from the US, which at the weekend said it was willing to offer Moscow a deal on civil nuclear co-operation – as long as Russia provided more help in convincing Tehran to scale down its programme." The Times says Iran watchers were "distracted" by North Korea's missile tests last week, and notes that Tehran's technical problems "have also reduced the sense of urgency surrounding the case." Washington and Brussels "are focused on using the [G-8 Summit] as the main source of pressure on Iran. Russia wants the summit to focus on energy security instead." Of the Europeans' planned meeting with Iranian nuclear chief Ali Larjani tomorrow, the Times says, "If the encounter with Mr. Larijani proves frustrating for the Europeans, the EU and the US will seek to rally support from Russia and China at a foreign ministers' meeting in Paris for a tougher international line. This will set the tone for the G8 summit later in the week."

NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 6, 2:20, Kotb) reported, "The spotlight will be on Russian democracy as President Bush heads to the G-8 summit. The President starts his trip this week, visiting Germany's chancellor in her former East German parliamentary district, and then moves on to Russia for the gathering of the industrialized nations. The summit gives Mr. Bush a chance for a meeting of the minds with Russian leader Vladimir Putin at a time of tension between the two nations." NBC (Jordan) added, "George W. Bush and Vladimir Putin preparing for this coming weekend's G-8 summit in Putin's hometown of St. Petersburg. As children of the Cold War, they weren't supposed to be friends, certainly not leaders who talk frequently about trade, energy and terrorism -- NBC news presidential historian Michael Beschloss." Michael Beschloss: "Oddly, this is the flip side of the Cold War and a big sign that the Cold War is over." Jordan: "But Bush and Putin don't see eye-to-eye on how to end the nuclear ambitions of North Korea and Iran and Russia's commitment to democracy has also been questioned. Critics accuse Putin of cracking down on civil liberties and the media, as well as jiggling political opponents. He dismissed those charges last week, saying, 'Without democracy, there is no future for Russia.' But those concerns aren't enough to derail President Bush's desire to reach agreements with Russia on a major deal for the storage of nuclear waste."

The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Dreazen) says the Administration's decision "to allow Russia to house spent nuclear fuel highlights a dynamic likely to shape this week's [G-8 Summit]: the shifting power balance between a US facing challenges on several fronts and a Russia moving to reassert itself on the world stage." Washington's "need for Russian support" on the North Korean and Iranian questions "is forcing the US to accede to Russian demands on a range of issues. … The moves represent an acknowledgment by the administration that on a variety of hot-button issues, the U.S. needs Russia more than Russia needs the U.S." On the "cost" to the West for Russian cooperation, the Journal says, Kremlin advisor Igor Shuvalov told reporters that "Moscow hoped to win final U.S. approval for Russia's bid to enter the [WTO] during a bilateral summit between Messrs. Bush and Putin," and "wanted White House assurances that Russian firms would be able to freely invest in the U.S. without facing the kind of political scrutiny that derailed recent proposed acquisitions of U.S. assets by companies from China and the United Arab Emirates."

McCain Criticizes Administration Over Russia Nuclear Deal. Sen. John McCain, appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), was asked if he believes it is a "good idea" for the administration to "reverse policy and cooperate with the Russians on civilian nuclear power," McCain responded, "I'm very skeptical. The Russians are the ones that helped the Iranians. This I another example where the Russians have got to understand, again, that their continued autocracy and repression and oppression of the media, of a free and democratic society…should not be rewarded with an agreement that, I think, probably is more beneficial to them than to us." McCain added, "Putin is clearly on the path to the restoration of autocracy in Russia. And that's not good for America. That's not good for Russia. And that's not good for the world."

Bush Said To Have Become "More Realistic" About Putin. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Walsh) reports that President Bush has "gotten more realistic" about Russian President Vladimir Putin since they first met in June 2001. Bush's original assessment that Putin was "'very straightforward and trustworthy' and committed to reform" now seems "naive and certainly premature. U.S. policymakers admit as much." US News adds, "As Bush prepares to meet Putin this week at the annual conference of the Group of Eight industrialized democracies in St. Petersburg, the Russian leader's hometown, he is under pressure to condemn Putin's lurches toward autocracy." Some critics "urge Bush to criticize Putin's backsliding in a very dramatic way this week. Arizona Sen. John McCain has even suggested that Bush boycott the entire conference in St. Petersburg." Bush "is trying to find a way to thread the needle by expressing disapproval for Putin's excesses while at the same time winning Kremlin support for his key international objectives."

Media Freedoms Have Been Rolled Back Under Putin. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Smith) reports, "Under Putin, Russia has experienced a dramatic rollback of media freedom, a sensitive issue as his fellow leaders of the Group of Eight major industrialized nations meet late this week in St. Petersburg. … Before Putin took over in 2000, opposition voices were often heard on the three dominant television networks, particularly on the then privately owned NTV channel. There were hostile interviews with officials, merciless political satire shows, and investigations of what human-rights groups call Russia's dirty war in Chechnya. Today, NTV is owned by the state-run natural gas behemoth Gazprom, and its output differs little from that of the two big state-owned channels Rossiya and Channel One."

Putin Portrayed As Foe Of Democracy. Opinion pieces in today's major newspapers are highly critical of Putin. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (7/10), Gary Kasparov, leader of the United Civil Front of Russia, says "persuasion and appeasement toward Russia have failed. … The right of Russians to elect their governors and parliamentary representatives is steadily eroding, with more and more influence accruing to the executive. … Opposition activists and journalists are routinely arrested and interrogated," while the government "loots private businesses and then uses state-controlled companies to launder the money abroad." Washington and Brussels' strategy of ignoring Putin's transgressions "for the sake of receiving Russia's cooperation on security and energy" is "cynical and morally repugnant" and "has also proven ineffective." Western leaders including "this American president [seem] to be saying that Iraqis and Afghans are deserving of democracy, but Russians are not."

Fred Hiatt writes in the Washington Post (7/10, A17) that Putin is "working hard to undermine democratic Georgia, a nation of fewer than 5 million people bordering Russia on the south. He has banned imports of Georgian produce, wine and mineral water; he is manipulating secessionists inside the country. Saakashvili's success in promoting economic growth and diminishing corruption may be too dangerous an example for Putin to abide." He adds, "A key question for this week will be whether the G-7 leaders make clear that undermining neighboring democracies is not an acceptable policy. France and Germany will be reluctant to allow principle to interfere with commercial interests, which lie with Russia, not some tiny nation to the south. So it will be up to Bush."

Tehran Asks IAEA To Replace Inspector. The AP (7/10, Jahn) reports, "Iran has asked the International Atomic Energy Agency to remove" Chris Charlier," the "head of the inspection team probing Tehran's nuclear program." Charlier "has not been back to Iran since April because of Iranian displeasure with his work," however he "remains the head of the team." He "has previously complained publicly that Iranian constraints made inspection work there difficult."

US Official Warns Iran To Yield Or Face Sanctions. The Washington Times (7/10, Pfeiffer) reports, "US officials yesterday accused Iran of stalling negotiations and said the deadline has arrived for the country to halt nuclear production or face sanctions in the United Nations." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told "Fox News Sunday" yesterday, "We offered them two paths, negotiations or Security Council action. … The Iranians can choose, but the time to choose has come."

Bush Seen As Having Changed His Demeanor, Rhetoric On Foreign Policy. The New York Times (7/10, Sanger) reports, "President Bush has never made apologies for enshrining pre-emption as the defining doctrine of his first term. He has declared many times that in a post-9/11 world, presidents no longer have the luxury of waiting for the slow grinding of diplomatic give-and-take when unpredictable dictators are assembling arsenals that could threaten the United States." But "as he leaves for Europe and Russia this week, where the simultaneous nuclear standoffs in Iran and North Korea will top the agenda, Mr. Bush finds himself struggling to square his muscular declarations with the realpolitik of his second term after the invasion of Iraq. At every turn, and every provocation, he finds himself in an unaccustomed position: urging patience." The Times adds that "some conservatives who backed Mr. Bush's decision in Iraq, 'standing by and waiting' is the essence of Mr. Bush's current strategy. … This weekend in The Weekly Standard, William Kristol, another prominent conservative voice, wrote: 'The red lines, pink lines, and mauve lines of U.S. foreign policy seem increasingly to be written in erasable ink. What was 'unacceptable' to President Bush a week ago (a North Korean missile launch) has been accepted.' He called the current policy 'Clintonian.'" Bush's aides, "who decline to speak about their internal deliberations on North Korea and Iran for attribution, say their critics have done everything but describe a workable alternative."

India Says It Has Tested A Long-Range Nuclear-Capable Missile. The New York Times (7/10, Kumar, Sanger) reports, "India test-fired its longest-range nuclear-capable missile on Sunday for the first time, government officials said." But "although the missile was launched, it was unclear whether the entire test was successful, with at least one report saying that the missile had failed at some point in its flight." The Times adds, "The launching has occurred at a time of rising international tension over North Korea's recent missile tests, and as the United States Congress is considering a civilian nuclear pact that the Bush administration negotiated with India." The missile is reported "to have a range of more than 1,800 miles."

Success Of Withdrawal Plan Rests On Olmert's Handling Of Current Gaza Crisis. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Derfner) reports that the future of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's plan for withdrawal from most of the West Bank in order to secure Israelis behind a protective barrier, "now rests on his handling of the growing political crisis sparked by Palestinian militants' kidnapping of Israeli Army Cpl. Gilad Shalit and the escalating military conflict that has drawn Israeli forces back into Gaza."

Newsweek (7/17, Ephron, Dickey) reports that Olmert "has staked his political future…on the success of unilateral disengagement -- with pullouts planned from parts of the West Bank as well as Gaza. Now that's on hold. A policy of unilateral action that requires repeated incursions by Israeli troops is not a viable long-term option. … But Olmert faces a strategic problem. Not only does he have no partner in peace, as he often says, he has no partner in war. The would-be peacemaker, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, has been relegated to a role as spectator. And the breakdown of law and order in Gaza is such that the elimination of the Hamas government could mean the elimination of all government -- with a likely increase in the influence of both Iran and Al Qaeda."

Olmert Rejects Any Deal With Hamas, Vows Long Offensive. NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 10, 0:15, Kotb) reported, "Israel says it is pressing forward with its Gaza offensive in an effort to retrieve a kidnapped soldier. The Israelis stepped up rocket attacks today. One hit a car carrying suspected militants in southern Gaza, killing a bystander and wounding four other civilians."

The New York Times (7/10, Erlanger) reports a statement by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to his Cabinet yesterday that "Israel will continue its military offensive in the Gaza Strip at its own pace until Palestinian militants release a captured Israeli soldier and halt their rocket attacks." Olmert is quoted saying "it is impossible to set a timetable. We will continue this battle with level-headedness and patience, while making use of the proper means. We cannot sit and not respond to the Qassam rocket fire." Olmert made clear, according to the Times, that Israel "would not reoccupy Gaza but would act militarily there as it saw fit." The Times says Olmert "ruled out negotiations with Hamas," but "had been prepared to release prisoners to Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, before the two men met for a formal meeting, and Mr. Abbas confirmed that on Friday."

The AP (7/10, Nessman) reports adds Olmert said Israel "would push ahead with the army's widescale offensive in the Gaza Strip, saying the fight to free an abducted soldier and stop militant rocket fire would last for a 'long time.'" The operation "has caused widespread destruction in Gaza, left 51 Palestinians dead and led to international complaints that Israel was using excessive force." The Palestinian public is "widely supportive of the militants' actions" against Israeli forces," the AP says, citing a poll that shows "that 77 percent of those questioned backed Shalit's kidnapping and 67 percent said they supported further abductions. Sixty-nine percent said the soldier should only be released in exchange for prisoners."

ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 3, 0:20, Muir) also noted Olmert "said the offensive in Gaza would not stop until Hamas releases a captured Israeli soldier," while the CBS Evening News (7/9, story 5, 1:50, Mitchell) showed Nabil Abu Rudaina, a Palestinian advisor, saying "By force, nothing is going to be solved. The situation is very dangerous on us and on the Israelis as well." MacVicar: "Israel threatens this is a war that will continue for a long time. What's going on here is not much talking, and even less listening."

Hezbollah Now Part Of Governing Coalition In Lebanon. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, A1, Leggett) reports, "When Syrian troops left Lebanon last year, the Bush administration saw a prime opportunity to de-fang a group one US diplomat once called the 'A-Team' of terror groups: Hezbollah, which receives major backing from Syria. The end of Syria's nearly three-decade occupation was a watershed moment for President Bush's campaign to spread democracy in the Middle East as an antidote to violent Islamic movements." However, "today, it's stronger than ever. The group, once disdainful of domestic politics, filled the power vacuum of Syria's departure by joining Lebanon's governing coalition. That has given Hezbollah new clout, including control over two ministries." It also has "helped the group elude a big threat: international pressure, led by the US and France, to disarm."

Islamic Militiamen, Secular Fighters Clash In Mogadishu. The Washington Post (7/10, A11, Mohamed) reports, "Islamic militiamen attacked fighters loyal to defeated secular warlords in Mogadishu on Sunday, and at least 20 people were killed and scores wounded in heavy street battles, witnesses said. The death toll was expected to rise in the most serious flare-up since the militiamen seized control of the Somali capital from US-backed warlords a month ago." Mogadishu's" war-weary residents ran for cover as rival groups fired machine guns and pounded each other with mortar rounds near an area that had been a pocket of warlord resistance to the Islamic militiamen."

Lopez Obrador Files Fraud Claim, Promises Ample Evidence. The Washington Post (7/10, A11, Roig-Franzia) reports, "Legal advisers to" Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador "gathered Sunday evening at a polling place guarded by soldiers toting machine guns and filed a formal challenge to Mexico's vote results. The filing demands a vote-by-vote recount of the closest presidential election in Mexican history, which was decided Thursday when an official tally left Lopez Obrador, the populist former mayor of Mexico City, a half-percentage-point behind Felipe Calderon, a champion of free trade. Outside the polling place, Manuel Camacho Solis, a top Lopez Obrador strategist, accused election officials, as well as the administration of outgoing President Vicente Fox, of election violations that were 'systematic and on a grand scale.'" The challenge will be reviewed by the Federal Electoral Tribunal, which has two months to certify or refute the election board's tally. "The tribunal will also receive what Lopez Obrador says is evidence of an Internet smear campaign against him and examples of alleged illegal campaigning by Fox, who, as president, was prohibited by law from involvement in political campaigns."

The AP (7/10, Pacheco) says Lopez Obrador "was sending hundreds of pages of purported evidence of fraud Sunday to a court he hoped would overturn" Calderon's victory, and notes that "fraud allegations strike a sensitive nerve with many Mexicans. They question whether Mexico has overcome decades of institutional corruption and fraud that long favored the ruling party — the Institutional Revolutionary Party for 71 years until it lost the presidency to Fox in 2000. Lopez Obrador has sought to stoke those fears."

The Financial Times (7/10, Thomson) says the challenge "raised the pressure on the country's electoral authorities by openly claiming this month's vote had been fraudulent." Lopez Obrador is quoted calling Fox "a traitor to democracy." The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Lyons, De Córdoba) adds, "Despite his rhetoric, analysts say the veteran politician faces an uphill battle both to win a court ruling to overturn the election as well as to galvanize Mexicans into taking to the streets to support him. … Whatever the outcome, the dispute is likely to further polarize a divided nation, making governing more tricky for the next president." The New York Times (7/10, McKinley) notes "the European Commission on Sunday called on both sides to show restraint while the courts dealt with the legal challenges."

Mexican Election Said To Highlight Divide Between Haves And Have-Nots. Newsweek (7/17, Contreras, Campbell) reports that "final tallies showed Felipe Calderón of the center-right National Action Party (PAN)" won Mexico's presidential election, defeating Manuel López Obrador "by a mere 244,000 votes. It was Mexico's closest-ever presidential race." López Obrador "announced plans to challenge the tally in court, and the federal election tribunal has until early September to certify or annul Calderón's apparent win. But no matter how the dispute plays out, the vote confirms an emerging trend in Latin America: a sharpening divide between haves and have-nots."

Chavez Said To Be A Liability For Leftist Candidates In Mexico And Peru. Time (7/17, Naam)

reports that Latin America "is witnessing the rise of a generation of politicians seeking to capitalize on frustration with the free-market, pro-American policies commonly pursued in the region in the 1990s, when much was promised and little was accomplished in terms of raising living standards. The leader of this turn toward populism is Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who has cast himself as the heir to Fidel Castro, using his country's oil bonanza to purchase political influence all over the continent." But in Mexico's election, "as in Peru's last month, Chavez turned out to be more of a liability than an asset to the leftist candidate carrying his banner."

Saudis Looking To Tap Unexplored Reservoirs Of Oil. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Bahree, Gold) reports, "With global energy demand soaring, Saudi Arabia, whose abundant reserves of light oil have supplied the world for decades, is looking to unlock its huge, hard-to-tap and largely unexploited reservoirs of heavy crude. If it succeeds in overcoming the technical hurdles, the effort could significantly increase Saudi Arabia's oil reserves over the next several years, potentially adding some slack to tight energy markets. It would also be a blow to so-called peak-oil theorists who have forecast that world oil production is on the brink of peaking." The Journal adds, "Earlier this year, in a critical trial of Saudi Arabia's heavy-oil potential, US oil giant Chevron Corp. began a field trial of a technique designed to pump out heavy oil that was previously considered unrecoverable. … Chevron and the Saudis say initial results are promising and that the technique could greatly enhance recovery at some huge fields."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Hill GOP Divided Over How To Try Detainees. In a report running more than 1,600 words, the New York Times (7/10, Zernike, Stolberg) examines the Republican "divide on Capitol Hill" created by the Supreme Court ruling prohibiting the use of military commissions to try terrorism detainees. On one side are Republicans "who believe Congress should give the president the authority to set up the kind of military commissions that were struck down by the court"; on the other are those "who say the trials should be modeled on the military system of courts-martial," which would give detainees more due-process rights. In a second piece, the New York Times (7/10, Lewis) says the court's Hamdan v. Rumsfed ruling "provided no clear road map for the White House and its allies in Congress as they ponder their next move."

The Christian Science Monitor (7/10, Richey) also examines the issue, writing that "the challenge for Congress is to decide how best to balance the concerns raised by the Supreme Court against the flexibility desired by the Bush administration. Specifically at issue is whether to retain or rewrite rules that heavily favor prosecutors by allowing hearsay and coerced statements to be introduced as evidence."

NCIS Probe Finds Evidence Of Broader Guantanamo Suicide Plot. The AP (7/9, Fox) reports a Naval Criminal Investigative Service probe into three apparent Guantanamo Bay suicides has found evidence that other detainees "may have helped the men hang themselves or were planning to kill themselves too." Evidence included "instructions on tying knots" and "several notes in Arabic that were 'relevant' to an investigation of a possible broader plot."

Administration Debates How To Respond To Hamdan Ruling. Newsweek (7/17, Isikoff, Taylor) reports that the side effects of the High Court's ruling in the Hamdan case "have set off an intense debate within the administration over how to respond. One camp, headed by national-security adviser Stephen Hadley and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, want to use the decision as the basis for a wide-ranging 'fix' that would accept a role for Congress and the courts on detainee issues. … But hard-liners -- led by [David] Addington, now Vice President Cheney's chief of staff -- are fiercely resisting. They, along with some congressional Republicans, want to nullify the court ruling by rewriting portions of the Uniform Code of Military Justice and granting the president the powers the court rejected."

Ruling Could Have Ripple Effects. Newsweek (7/17, Isikoff, Taylor) reports, "Administration officials and Washington lawyers are still digesting the text" of the Supreme Court's ruling in the case of Gitmo detainee Ahmed Hamdan, "but it is already becoming clear that it could have ripple effects that extend far beyond the trial of Hamdan and other Guantánamo prisoners. The President has long argued that Congress granted him wide-reaching powers in the days after 9/11, when it passed a resolution authorizing him to use military force against the perpetrators of the attacks. But in his ruling, Justice Stevens took a much narrower view of the president's wartime powers, rejecting the Administration's argument that military commissions of the kind Bush had created were covered by the resolution. Now other antiterror programs that the president has justified by invoking the same congressional resolution might be vulnerable to serious legal challenge."

Hoekstra Says White House Failed To Inform Congress About "Significant" Intel Program. House Intelligence Chairman Pete Hoekstra appeared on Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace) to comment on his charge that the Bush Administration may have violated the law by failing to inform Congress about certain intelligence programs. Hoekstra said, "There was at least one major, what I consider significant, activity that we had not been briefed on that we have now been briefed on, and I want to set the standard there, that it is not optional for this President or any president or people in the executive community not to keep the intelligence committees fully informed of what they are doing." The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 6, 0:40, Mitchell) reported that Hoekstra said the "Bush Administration may have broken the law by keeping several intelligence programs secret from lawmakers responsible for their oversight."

Hoekstra's remarks receive fairly broad print coverage today. USA Today (7/10) runs a straightforward lead, saying the Administration "was running several intelligence programs, including one major activity, that it kept secret from Congress" according to Hoekstra. The New York Times (7/10, Lichtblau, Shane) takes a similar tack, saying Hoekstra said the White House briefed his committee "on a 'significant' intelligence program only after a government whistle-blower alerted him to its existence and he pressed President Bush for details." But the Washington Post and the AP are a bit sharper. The Washington Post (7/10, A7, Babington) says Hoekstra says the Bush Administration briefed top lawmakers "on a significant intelligence program" only after he "angrily complained of being left in the dark." The AP (7/10, Pickler) reports Hoekstra said "the White House possibly broke the law by keeping intelligence activities a secret from the lawmakers responsible for overseeing them."

Carter Telecom Analyst Says Media Taking National Security On Itself. In a Washington Times (7/10) op-ed entitled "Helping The Terrorists," Jack O'Neill, who "worked in the White House under President Carter as a telecommunications policy analyst," writes, "If you want to reveal information critical to our national security for any reason, turn it over to a reporter. Once the information is in the hands of a reporter, the reporter and his or her news media claim the authority to decide its relevance to our national security and who should know. … Can you hear terrorists cheering?"

Moussaoui Trial Lawyer Faces Legal Action. The Washington Post (7/10, B1, Markon) runs an update on the case of Carla Martin, the "obscure government lawyer" who gained infamy when she violated a court order in the Zacarias Moussaoui death penalty trial "by sharing testimony with witnesses and coaching them about what to say." Her actions "have spawned a wave of legal proceedings. Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are exploring the possibility of criminal charges against her, and Pennsylvania's lawyer disciplinary board has begun an investigation." She remains on paid leave from TSA, "which is also investigating her conduct. And seven family members of Sept. 11 victims have filed suit against her."

Pakistani Intelligence Seeks Link Between London Bombers, Al Qaeda. The Washington Times (7/10, Ansari) reports Pakistani intelligence officials "say they are on the trail of a British 'go-between,' the al Qaeda recruiter" who reportedly introduced the July 7, 2005, London bombers to al Qaeda. The "wealthy British passport holder, who is of Afghan origin, is thought to use the nom de guerre 'Abdul Rehman,' which means 'willing disciple of God.' The Pakistani officials think that Rehman met the suspected attack ringleader Mohammad Sidique Khan, in a British mosque and later introduced him and fellow bomber Shehzad Tanweer to al Qaeda."

Messages Said To Show Sophistication Of Al Qaeda's PR Methods. Newsweek (7/17) reports in its "Periscope" column, "A day or two before the release of one recent message from bin Laden, his media handlers issued Internet 'teasers' -- brief announcements declaring that a bin Laden message was about to be released. Later, an elaborately produced Qaeda message surfaced commemorating the London bombings; the presentation included a previously unseen extended English-language video of Shehzad Tanweer, one of the suicide bombers, and an American-accented Qaedite called Azzam the American." A US counterterrorism official "said the use of promos and edited video packages with English speakers demonstrates the increasing sophistication of Al Qaeda's PR methods." The official "also said the fact that [Osama bin Laden's chief deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri] appeared in recent video messages but bin Laden has appeared only in audio messages suggests the two terror leaders live apart, and that bin Laden is still stringently protecting himself."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York, Miami Cases Show New FBI Emphasis On Preemptive Arrests. USA Today (7/10, 4A, Willing) reports that the arrests announced Friday "are typical of the FBI's post-Sept. 11 strategy in counterterrorism cases: detect and disrupt plots in their early stages rather than wait to collect additional evidence more likely to produce a conviction." Still, the New York and the Miami cases "have prompted some to suggest that the FBI is overstating the danger posed by wannabe jihadists." USA notes, "In a speech in May, deputy attorney general Paul McNulty credited this new 'aggressive, proactive and preventative course of action' with winning 253 convictions in 435 terrorism cases since 2001."

The AP (7/9, Caruso) similarly reported, "Policy makers and security experts said the bust illustrates a shift in U.S. counterterrorism policy that has played out in other recent high-profile cases, including the arrest of seven men suspected of wanting to bomb Chicago's Sears Tower. Law enforcers, they said, are now willing to act swiftly against al-Qaida sympathizers, even if it means grabbing wannabe terrorists whose plots may be only pipe dreams." Rep. Peter King observed, "You may end up not winning it in court, but you get a bad guy off the street."

NYC Subway Bag Search Policy Still Enforced One Year Later. The AP (7/10, Hays) reports that a year after the introduction of the "temporary imposition," the policy of bag searches on New York's subway "remains in effect and is barely causing a stir." Officials "won't say how many bags police have searched in the past year, or specify where and when they do it." The program "has resulted in five arrests -- not for terrorism, but for drug possession, disorderly conduct and other minor charges."

Businesses, Homeowners Finding It Hard To Obtain Disaster Coverage. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Pleven, McDonald, Richardson) reports in the wake of the "violent hurricanes" of 2005, "Demand for disaster coverage is far outstripping supply," with insurance companies attempting "to buy more coverage on the policies they write -- a crucial segment of the business known as reinsurance. But reinsurers, which also paid out billions last year, are wary of getting hit hard again and have raised their rates substantially. Businesses and homeowners are paying the price."

Mississippi Casinos Reopening. NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 9, 2:10, Kotb) reported three of Mississippi's Gulf Coast casino that were "battered by Katrina" have reopened and are welcoming "returning crowds." NBC (Mott) added, "Eight more casinos are planning to reopen by year's end, meaning jobs for thousands more dealers, more wait staff and hotel workers. Where will they all live? After Katrina's destruction, affordable housing is in short supply."

WAR NEWS:

Sectarian Violence Intensifies In Baghdad. ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 2, 0:25, Muir) reported, "At least 41 people were killed when masked gunmen went on a rampage in a Sunni section of Baghdad, setting up roadblocks, dragging people from their cars, checking IDs, and shooting people with Sunni names. Hours later, two car bombs exploded near a Shiite mosque, killing 17 people and wounding 38 more." The CBS Evening News (7/9, lead story, 3:00, Cowan) noted "anyone identified as Sunni was executed. The US military says at least 11 bodies were found dumped in the street. This hospital reported getting nearly two dozen. Those who brought the dead and wounded in were dazed and confused by the attack that seemed as bold as it was bloody."

NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 2, 1:55, Kotb) reported that by evening, much of the city was "quiet because of the nightly curfew, but there are worries this latest violence will most certainly undermine renewed efforts at Sunni and Shiite reconciliation."

USA Today/AP (7/10) reports Sunni leaders "expressed outrage over the killings, and President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, appealed for calm, warning that the nation stood 'in front of a dangerous precipice.'" while the Washington Post (7/10, A1, Partlow, Al-Izzi) reports "Sunni politicians said the spate of attacks gravely exacerbated the problems in Baghdad, where killings occur almost daily, and they accused Iraqi police of collaborating with Shiite militiamen in the violence. 'This is a new step. A red line has been crossed,' said Alaa Makky, a Sunni member of parliament."

The Los Angeles Times (7/10, Kennedy, Daragahi) says "the sectarian violence underscored a dramatic worsening of security conditions in the capital even after the formation of a government in May and the imposition of a massive lockdown by Iraqi troops and police. It also raised fears that the beleaguered country might soon dissolve into all-out civil war." The Financial Times (7/10, Negus) reports "bombings and abductions are common in many parts of the city, but this was one of the first times a group of gunmen had taken control of a section of Baghdad and conducted a massacre on this scale." The New York Times (7/10, Semple) runs a similar story under the headline "Baghdad Erupts In Mob Violence,"

Tribes' Role In Pacifying Amara Seen As Hopeful Sign For Iraq. The New York Times (7/10, Tavernise, Mizher) reports from Amara, where "in a surprising twist, the region's tribes, particularly powerful in neighborhood life here, have weighed in forcefully, using their authority, often in a nonviolent way, to force the Islamists to back off." The Times adds, "Large portions of Iraq's rural south have been relatively peaceful, like the provinces of Muthana, where Japanese forces recently left, and Dhi Qar, whose capital, Nasiriya, is patrolled by the Italians, and it is possible that tribes are playing a similarly quiet but central role in keeping order. … The story of how Amara, the capital of a leaf-shaped province called Maysan, came to be relatively safe for its citizens -- even as danger increased for the British -- is a hopeful tale of small-town camaraderie, fierce independence and, above all, tribal power."

More US Soldiers Charged In Rape-Slaying Case. The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 2, 2:45; Mitchell) reported that "in Iraq, more American soldiers have been charged with rape and murder in connection with the alleged assault of an Iraqi teenager and her family. Michelle Miller has more from the Pentagon." CBS (Miller) added, "The US military now says that former Private First Class Steven D. Green, arrested last week, did not act alone, that five other soldiers in his platoon either participated in the rape and murders or helped cover them up. Their identities remain secret, but court documents confirm at least one other soldier took part in the rape and two others witnessed the crime."

ABC World News Tonight (7/9, lead story, 2:25, Muir) called the story "a major development in a crime that is fueling anger and outrage in Iraq and raising troubling questions the conduct of American troops." NBC Nightly News (7/9, lead story, 2:40, Kotb) interviewed Col. Ken Allard (Ret.), NBC News military analyst, who said, "It's happening right now for two main reasons. Number one, this conflict has dragged on. Number two, you're dealing with a much smaller force than we've ever dealt with before." NBC (Allen) added, "Adding to the stress, he says, confronting an insurgent insurgency imbedded in the community and the random nature of the war's biggest killer -- IEDs." Allard: "When they serve multiple tours, the stress levels increase and the odds of this kind of thing happening increase as well." Allen: "In the rape and murder case, one witness who apparently told investigators about green and the others was a soldier undergoing stress counseling last month after the kidnapping and killing of two GIs, all from the same unit."

The Los Angeles Times (7/10, Daragahi) reports, "The charges were lodged Saturday, the military said." The five soldiers "face an Article 32 investigation, the military's equivalent of a grand-jury inquest, to see if evidence warrants bringing them before a full-scale military tribunal or courts-martial." USA Today (7/10, Jervis, Stone), Washington Post (7/10, A14, Finer, Partlow) and Washington Times/AP (7/10, Lenza), among other sources, also report the story.

Time (7/17, Rawe, Ghosh) reports that former US Army Pvt. Steven Green last week "pleaded not guilty to charges" of raping and killing Iraqi girl along with her parents and 7-year-old sister. Unlike the massacre in Haditha, the butchering of this family "does not appear to be the result of vengeance or confusion. Instead, all signs point to premeditated depravity." Pentagon officials "say charges could be brought against as many as four other soldiers, including the one who allegedly joined Green in the rape."

Arrest Does Not Stem Debate Over CPA Order 17. Newsweek (7/17) reports in its "Periscope" column that Green's arrest "didn't stem a growing debate over Coalition Provisional Authority Order 17, which exempts members of the US military from Iraqi laws." US officials, "unnamed because of diplomatic sensitivities, said Iraqi P.M. Maliki's need to oppose the order might lessen if any wrongdoers in the Haditha and Mahmudiyah cases are held accountable."

Republicans Say Shells Are Proof Of Iraq's WMD. Congressional Republicans are clashing with Democrats and the Bush Administration over the meaning of munitions found in Iraq since 2003. The Washington Times (7/10, Scarborough) reports that GOP lawmakers say the discovery of the 500-plus shells which was recently disclosed by the Pentagon "are evidence that Saddam was still concealing WMDs in 2003 in violation of United Nations resolutions to disarm after Iraq's failed invasion of Kuwait. … Democrats dismiss the findings. They say the munitions were found in small clusters and are 1980s vintage. In other words, Iraq produced them before the 1990 invasion of Kuwait and thus they are irrelevant to the CIA's flawed 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), on which President Bush largely based his decision to go to war to keep Iraq's WMDs from terrorists, they say." The Times adds, "To the consternation of congressional Republicans, including Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the House Intelligence Committee chairman, the Democrats are getting support from the administration" which is downplaying the munitions finding.

Vietnam Vets Advise Navy On Reconstituting River Patrols. USA Today (7/10, Vanden Brook) reports that a group of Vietnam veterans is advising the Navy as it revamps river patrols. The Navy "wants to extend its reach into the shallow brown waters of deltas and rivers, often the front line in the war against terrorists and insurgents. Next spring, the first sailors since the days of the Vietnam-era swift boats will relieve Marines on river patrols protecting Haditha dam in Iraq." USA adds, "In all, there will be about 900 sailors involved in the river patrol effort. By comparison, there were 4,500 sailors in 450 boats patrolling coastal and inland waters during Vietnam."

Herbert Says Army Has Lowered Its Standards. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (7/10), "The biggest lesson we failed to learn from Vietnam was how utterly tragic it was to pull the trigger on an unnecessary war. Now once again we are condemned to suffer the consequences, and those consequences are not always self-evident." The US military "is again falling victim to lowered standards, breakdowns in discipline and a series of atrocities that are nothing less than a betrayal of the many honorable men and women in uniform and the country they serve." Herbert adds that the Army "has had to lower its standards because most young Americans want no part of George W. Bush's war in Iraq."

Fifteen Taliban, One Canadian Soldier Killed In Afghanistan. At least 15 militants and one Canadian solider were killed Sunday as Canadian and Afghan forces raided Taliban strongholds in Afghanistan. The AP (7/9, Khan) reported, "Canadian Cpl. Anthony Boneca was killed in the Pasmhol village in Zharew during a 'combined coalition-Afghan operation' against the Taliban, said military spokesman Maj. Marc Theriault. Several hours later, 'intense close quarters' fighting broke out nearby, leaving at least five Taliban militants dead and two Canadian soldiers slightly wounded, said another coalition official, Lt. Cdr. Mark MacIntyre. A coalition airstrike killed another 10 militants in the neighboring Panjwayi district, where Canadian troops launched a campaign against Taliban strongholds Saturday, according to a military statement."

Afghan Cab Drivers Run Rival Poetry Groups In Washington. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (7/10, Farivar) reports that Washington, DC, has two poetry societies run by Afghan cab drivers, and the groups "don't like each other."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Postpones Hearing For Former Qwest CEO. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Young) reports, "The judge overseeing the criminal insider trading case against former Qwest Communications International Inc. Chief Executive Joseph Nacchio delayed an important hearing in the case because of the complex logistics involved in reviewing classified material introduced by the defense." The Journal continues, "Saying he needed extra time for his staff to get the security clearances and facilities that are legally required for handling the classified materials, Denver-based U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham on Friday postponed the hearing to August 25 from July 14. He is scheduled to rule on a variety of motions from both sides, including a defense motion to dismiss the case." The Journal adds, "Mr. Nacchio is fighting charges that he sold $101 million in stock in early 2001 with insider knowledge that the Denver-based phone company was about to falter. In court filings, his attorneys have said he was optimistic about the company's prospects because, based on classified information, he thought Qwest was poised to win important contracts related to national security. … Prosecutors have argued that the national security aspect of the defense is a smokescreen with no relevance to the charges. Even if the company had won the government contracts, they wouldn't have solved the underlying problems that Mr. Nacchio knew the company faced, prosecutors have said in court filings."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Documents From Jefferson Office Raid In Legal Limbo. The AP (7/10, Sherman) reports, "Prosecutors and investigators building a bribery case against Rep. William Jefferson have been unable to examine the documents and computer files seized in a search of the lawmaker's Capitol Hill office. … The materials were placed off limits by President Bush for 45 days, a cooling-off period that ended Sunday. Yet there has been no resolution of the court fight or talks between congressional leaders and the Justice Department." The AP continues, "The president acted after congressional leaders denounced the FBI's search on May 20 and May 21 as an unprecedented and unconstitutional intrusion on their turf by federal agents. … Bush directed Solicitor General Paul Clement to keep the materials while Justice Department officials negotiated with Congress' lawyers and a legal challenge made its way through the federal courts." The AP adds, "Until the judge in the case rules on the constitutionality of the search, prosecutors will not examine what it yielded, department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. … U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, who signed the warrant authorizing the search, indicated at a hearing last month that he was likely to reject the main argument advanced by Jefferson, D-La., and House lawyers that the Constitution's speech or debate clause prohibits searches of congressional offices. … That clause protects senators and representatives from being questioned by the president, a prosecutor or a plaintiff in a lawsuit about their legislative work."

US Weighs Pursuit Of Death Penalty In Pennsylvania Slaying. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (7/10, Cato) reports, "The decision, like any involving life or death, is difficult. … U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan is considering whether to seek the death penalty against two drug dealers accused in the 2004 slaying of a Beaver County man whose son was to testify against one of them. No defendant in a federal case has ever been sentenced to death in Western Pennsylvania." The Tribune-Review continues, "Many people familiar with the federal death penalty, including the attorney to defend the most recent case four years ago in Pittsburgh, think Buchanan will seek it in the case against Jelani Solomon, of Beaver County, and Claron Hanner, of Pittsburgh's Knoxville neighborhood. … 'She has a reputation as an aggressive prosecutor,' said Richard Kammen, who defended Joseph P. Minerd, accused of the New Year's Day 1999 pipe-bomb killings of his pregnant former girlfriend and her young daughter. Minerd was convicted of the killings, but jurors deadlocked on the death penalty, and he was sentenced to life in prison. … 'I would not be surprised if she seeks the death penalty in this case,' Kammen said. … The ultimate decision will come from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, but he likely will follow Buchanan's recommendation, Kammen said. Buchanan said she will make her recommendation in August."

Three Arrested For Brutal Georgetown Slaying. The Washington Post (7/10, A1, Montgomery, Sullivan) reports, "Three assailants who cut the throat of an aspiring politician from Britain killed him and tried to rape his female companion early yesterday in the driveway of a Georgetown mansion, police reported, after the couple had returned from a night at the movies." The Post continues, "The victim, Alan Senitt, 27, a Jewish activist and volunteer for former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner, died at the scene, police said. The woman, whom police declined to identify, was not injured." The Post adds, "Within hours, D.C. police arrested four people in connection with one of the most brutal crimes in years on the affluent streets of Georgetown and said they were looking for possible links to other recent attacks in the city. … Christopher Piper, 25, of Southeast Washington was charged with felony murder and attempted sexual assault. The others -- Jeffery Rice, 22, of Southeast; Olivia Miles, 26, of Northeast; and a 15-year-old boy from Southeast whom police declined to identify because he has been charged as a juvenile -- all face murder charges. … According to police and others, the attack occurred shortly after 2 a.m. as Senitt was seeing the woman home. The couple walked north on 31st Street NW, then turned west toward Wisconsin Avenue on Q Street NW, where the woman lives. … The two were rummaging in the trunk of a car when they were approached by three men wielding a gun and a knife. Police said Piper, who had the gun, grabbed the woman and began dragging her down the driveway. Out of view of his companions, he tried to pull off her clothes, police said. The attacker made a comment 'in reference to his intent to commit a sexual assault,' said Lt. Robert Glover of the police department's violent crimes branch, which is handling the investigation. … Meanwhile, the other two assailants grabbed Senitt, stabbed him and slashed his throat."

Judge Denies Bail For Alleged Florida Genovese Mobsters. The AP (7/8, Wides-Munoz) reported that on Friday, "U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Seltzer denied bail for Renaldi 'Ray' Ruggiero, 72, whom federal prosecutors identified as a Genovese capo or captain, and three of his co-defendants -- Joseph Dennis Colasacco, 54, Charles Steinberg, 30, and Mitchell Weissman, 54, said Weissman's attorney John Contini. Seltzer, prosecutors and attorneys for defendant Francis O'Donnell, 47, will continue negotiations for O'Donnell's release on Monday, said Theresa Van Vliet, one of his attorneys." The AP noted, "The case, considered the latest blow to one of New York's most powerful Mafia families, deals with 10 years of alleged criminal activity, including murder."

Florida Police, FBI Arrest Alleged Gang Member Wanted In Georgia Student's Murder. The Miami Herald (7/9, Dryhurst, 323K) reported, "A teenager wanted in the killing of a Georgia college student was arrested by Fort Lauderdale police Friday near his grandmother's home. Roosevelt Lawrence, 18 and allegedly a member of the Bloods street gang, surrendered to police and FBI agents in Lauderdale Manors." The Herald noted, "The gunmen aimed through a vehicle window and shot Valdosta State University student Mason Harper, 24, twice in the upper body just after 1 a.m. June 29. Two suspects were quickly apprehended and charged with homicide," and Lawrence "was identified as one of the shooters. Police continue to investigate who fired the other shot." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (7/9, Haas, 249K) added, "Fort Lauderdale police and the South Florida FBI Violent Crime Fugitive Taskforce got the call Thursday that he might be in the area. They had their man within 24 hours," and "when agents moved in, they took Lawrence down without incident."

Jury Acquits Maryland Accountant In Prince George's Bribery Case. The Washington Post (7/8, B1, Castaneda, 744K) reported, "An Upper Marlboro accountant was acquitted yesterday of conspiring with two Prince George's County officials to shake down a security company for $250,000 in exchange for a county contract worth more than $1 million. Accountant Paul L. Wright testified at the eight-day trial that he believed a $10,000 payment to his company in November 2004 was part of a legitimate consulting arrangement and that he had no knowledge of any bribery scheme." The Post noted, "The investigation by State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh, in cooperation with the FBI and other law enforcement agencies, has resulted in the conviction of a former high-ranking county government official," and "the alleged ringleader of the bribery scheme, Robert L. Thomas, former deputy director of the county's Office of Central Services, is scheduled to go on trial Aug. 14."

Mortgage Fraud Continues To Rise. The New York Times (7/9, Tedeschi, 1.19M) reported, "With interest rates at historic lows in recent years, consumers have raced to get mortgages. So have criminals. Industry executives and law-enforcement officials say mortgage fraud continues to climb, with lenders incurring more than $1 billion in fraud losses in the last fiscal year, twice the amount of the previous year." Mortgage Bankers Association government affairs director Tim Doyle said, "The F.B.I. has prioritized this, state attorneys general are looking at this, and more state laws are being passed about it." The Times noted, "About 80 percent of mortgage fraud involves professional thieves who are bilking lenders, the F.B.I. estimates, while in the remaining cases consumers are involved in one way or another."

Report Urges Prisons To Target Tuberculosis. The Washington Times (7/10, Price) reports, "Tuberculosis is 'particularly problematic' in U.S. correctional and detention facilities, say federal health officials, who have updated guidelines for preventing the spread of TB in jails and prisons. … 'Effective TB prevention and control measures in correctional facilities are needed to reduce TB rates among inmates and the general U.S. population,' say authors of a report published in the current issue of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's (CDC) Morbidity & Mortality Weekly Report. … 'Inmates with undiagnosed TB disease place other inmates and correctional staff at risk for TB, and when released, these persons also can infect persons living in surrounding communities,' the researchers said." The Times continues, "In the report, G. Scott Earnest and other CDC epidemiologists point out that the number of U.S. prison inmates quadrupled from 500,000 in 1980 to about 2 million in 2003. … 'A disproportionately high percentage of TB cases' occur among prison inmates, they said. In 2003, 0.7 percent of the total U.S. population was confined in jails and prisons, yet 3.2 percent of all TB cases nationwide that year 'occurred among residents of correctional facilities.'" The Times adds, "The researchers said the TB rates of inmates in prisons in California and New York are 10 to 15 times greater than the general populations of those states. Studies show the prevalence of LTBI -- or latent TB infection, which is asymptomatic – 'to be as high as 25 percent' in prisons, they said. Like TB disease, LTBI can be detected by screening and can be treated. … The authors say the key reasons that prison inmates are at higher risk for the airborne infection are their diverse backgrounds, overcrowded facilities and poor ventilation. … In addition, they say, 'disparate numbers of incarcerated persons are at high risk for TB,' because they have HIV, use injection drugs and have 'low socioeconomic status' so may not have had access to proper medical care."

WPost Says Kaine Should Review Bustillo Conviction. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/10, A16) says, The Supreme Court's decision in the case of Mario A. Bustillo was correct on the arcane but important point of law it addressed: What happens when American states fail to inform foreign governments of the arrest of one of their nationals, thus violating an international treaty? Mr. Bustillo is serving 30 years in prison in Virginia for a brutal murder; after his arrest, authorities did not inform him of his right under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations to contact Honduran officials. … But here's the problem: Mr. Bustillo may well be innocent. Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) ought to review his case. … At a minimum, the record cries out for a serious review. That could take years in federal courts, where procedural bars may prevent it from happening at all. Mr. Kaine could short-circuit that process with a review of his own."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Huckabee Wants Arkansas Ban On Gay Foster Parents Reinstated. The Washington Times (7/10, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is optimistic the legislature quickly will reinstate a ban on same-sex couples serving as foster parents in his state. 'What we are talking about is whether the state should place a child in a relationship that is not recognized by the state as a marriage,' the Republican governor, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, told the Associated Press on Saturday. The Arkansas Supreme Court last month struck down regulations banning the placement of foster children with same-sex couples. The court said state officials went too far in imposing the ban, but the court did not rule on the merit of the ban."

Gay Marriage Backers Suffer String Of Defeats. The Financial Times (7/10, Knight) reports, "For US advocates of gay marriage, the losing streak continues. Their opponents won two important state court battles last week, and those defeats offered little optimism for approval of gay unions in the legal and electoral battles that lie ahead in 2006." A California appeals court in San Francisco will hear on Monday "arguments on whether the state constitution gives gay and lesbian couples the right to marry, while appeals against decisions upholding same-sex marriage bans are pending in Washington and New Jersey.' And in Massachusetts, "currently the only state that permits the marriage of same-sex couples, Mitt Romney, the Republican governor, is urging the state legislature to go ahead this Wednesday with a scheduled vote on a proposed state constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage."

WSJournal Urges Activists To Use Political Process, Not Courts, To Push Gay Marriage Issue. The Wall Street Journal (7/10) reports, "The biggest problem with contemporary courts is their inclination to invent rights that legislators and our Constitution-writers never intended. So it's certainly noteworthy when they decline a politically fashionable invitation to do so. That's precisely what happened last week, when the highest courts in Georgia and New York decided that the state constitution does not guarantee a right to same-sex marriage. … If gay activists want to persuade New Yorkers and other fair-minded Americans to come around to their view, there is a traditional way to do that: hard work and commitment to the democratic process."

LATimes Criticizes New York, Georgia Court Rulings. The Los Angeles Times (7/10) editorializes, "The highest courts of New York and Georgia last week moved in the opposite direction of history and justice on same-sex marriage. … Neither of these decisions is binding on the courts of other states, any more than was the famous 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' high court that gay marriage couldn't be prohibited. So there's still hope that California's Supreme Court will take a more enlightened view of the issue when it next hears a challenge to heterosexual monopoly on civil marriage." The Times adds, "Someday we'll look back on the anti-gay-marriage hysteria with the same revulsion" as we viewed anti-miscegenation laws. Until then, "with a high court seemingly disinclined to address marriage, states such as California should take the lead."

Group Sees Itself As The Antithesis Of The ACLU. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/10, A1, Slevin) reports on the Alliance Defense Fund, a "a socially conservative legal consortium" that "spends $20 million a year seeking to protect what it regards as the place of religion -- and especially Christianity -- in public life." The group, which considers itself the "antithesis of the American Civil Liberties Union," has become "the leading player in a movement to tug the nation to the right by challenging decades of legal precedent. By stepping into the nation's most impassioned debates about religion in the public sphere, the group aims to bring law and society into alignment with conservative Christianity."

WPost Makes Case For Bilingual Ballots. The Washington Post (7/10, A16) editorializes, "THE HOUSE of Representatives' smooth passage to renewal of the Voting Rights Act hit a bump last month when a group of conservative Republicans rebelled over, among other things, provisions to require bilingual ballots in many jurisdictions. The rebels were wrong. When the House takes up the measure, as it may do this week, it should reject any effort to strip the bilingual-ballot requirement or to allow objections over the rule to torpedo this important measure." The Post adds, "We doubt there are many people who will decide to learn, or not to learn, English based on the availability of bilingual ballots. But we don't doubt that many more people will vote, and in an informed way, if they know what they're voting on. That is something to be welcomed, not feared."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Scrambling To Meet EU Antitrust Demands. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (7/10, Bishop) reports, "Faced with a series of tough deadlines, one group on Microsoft Corp.'s Redmond campus has been working until all hours -- but not on anything so normal as the new Windows or Office." The P-I continues, "The ad hoc team of 300 people is creating volumes of technical documents required by the European Commission's March 2004 antitrust decision. The project will be in the spotlight this week, with the commission poised to fine the company up to $2.5 million a day, dating back months, for what it calls Microsoft's failure to comply with the ruling." The P-I adds, "Microsoft says the all-out push shows that it has been doing all it can. The company points to signs of devotion to the cause -- such as one of the project leaders, engineer Henry Sanders, deciding to swear off shaving until the effort is complete, like an athlete in the playoffs. … The team's work may help in the future, but it isn't expected to avert a major fine this week. European officials say the very fact that Microsoft is still working on the documents shows that it wasn't living up to its obligations in the first place. … The provision in dispute requires Microsoft to offer technical information to its competitors in the computer server market, to help the rival products work as smoothly with Windows as Microsoft's own server products would. … That reflects the central goal of the repeated antitrust actions against the company -- reducing the advantage Microsoft enjoys because of its dominant Windows operating system."

Venture To Purchase Heritage Property. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Chittum, Berman) reports, "An Australian and American joint venture agreed to purchase strip-mall owner Heritage Property Investment Trust Inc. for about $1.83 billion in a deal that will more than double its U.S. presence in the sector." The Journal continues, "Centro Watt, a partnership between Centro Properties Group, a publicly traded Australian company, and Watt Commercial Properties, a private Los Angeles-based concern, will pay $36.15 a share for the Boston-based real-estate investment trust. The price represents a 3.3% premium to Friday's close of $34.98 on the New York Stock Exchange. … Including debt, Centro is paying about $3.3 billion and getting what it says is a 7.3% capitalization rate -- the return on investment in the first year of ownership, a key real-estate measure." The Journal adds, "Heritage owns 157 strip malls with 27 million square feet of space in 27 states. It has been sharply criticized by investors and analysts for its executive-compensation practices, which have led the industry while its share performance has lagged."

LATimes Opposes Entertainment Industry's Anti-Piracy Proposals. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (7/10) says that to attack the problem of global music and video piracy, "industry lobbyists are pressing Congress to adopt at least five different proposals that would give them more control over their works as they flow through new digital pipelines into living rooms and portable devices. But these measures, like the technologies they would affect, have a hard time distinguishing between illicit actions and legitimate ones." The Times adds, "Protecting intellectual property is a legitimate goal for Congress," but "what the entertainment industry is seeking in this year's proposals isn't merely protection from piracy; it's after increased leverage to protect its business models." The Times adds, "As they weigh the entertainment industry's pleas, lawmakers shouldn't assume all consumers are bootleggers and every digital device is a hand grenade aimed at Hollywood."

ENVIRONMENT:

NOAA Ordered To Stop Jet Flights Into Hurricanes. The Washington Post (7/10, D4, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "A federal administrative law judge has stopped the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration from flying its high-altitude jet into hurricanes until the agency negotiates with a union representing meteorologists, engineers and technicians. Richard A. Pearson, an administrative law judge with the Federal Labor Relations Authority, found that the NOAA's Aircraft Operations Center in Tampa had wrongfully bypassed the National Weather Service Employees Organization in forming a team to study proposals for flying a Gulfstream IV-SP jet into and near the centers of hurricanes as safely as possible. NOAA officials contended that they were not changing the conditions of employment for the jet's civilian crews, but Pearson said the high speed and altitude of the jet, the hazards of flying close to a storm's inner core, and the inability of flight instruments to detect all hazards were 'quantitatively and qualitatively different from those the employees were accustomed to...and required them to face new and more complex safety hazards.'"

EPA Whistleblower's Story To Become A Movie. The Washington Post (7/10, A15, Fears) reports that Marsha Coleman-Adebayo "sold the story of her battles with the Environmental Protection Agency to Hollywood, and actor Danny Glover is preparing a movie about how she blew the whistle against the agency and successfully sued for race and gender discrimination." Coleman-Adebayo "was allowed to work at home for five years because of a medical condition, but when she resisted coming back in April, the EPA took away her pay." Her case "involves larger issues about how the government treats employees who feel they are being retaliated against. Coleman-Adebayo and others say it amounts to corruption." The Post adds, "Coleman-Adebayo's case stands out because her crusade against what she calls 'government corruption' won her powerful allies, such as President Bush and House Judiciary Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who recently wrote a letter to the EPA on her behalf."

"Prudent" Use Of Eminent Domain Defended. In an op-ed in USA Today (7/10), Donald J. Borut, executive director of the National League of Cities, defends the use of eminent domain, noting that without it, "rundown buildings and empty lots would attract trash, rodents and trouble. Blighted structures would sit abandoned. If owners didn't want to sell or were holding out for more money, the cities and their taxpayers could do nothing to get rid of them." Borut adds, "The prudent use of eminent domain has brought hope and opportunity -- through good jobs and better housing -- to thousands of Americans. That story deserves to be told."

USA Today Says Property Seizures Should Be Rare And A Last Resort. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (7/10) says the Supreme Court's ruling on eminent domain "has ignited a nationwide fight between developers rushing to seize a fresh opportunity and an unlikely political coalition that sees the decision as an assault on America's 'home-as-castle' mind-set." The case has also "inspired a political backlash unusual in the annals of Supreme Court rulings. It has united conservative defenders of property rights and liberals who say the seizures amount to corporate welfare at the expense of the powerless." USA adds, "Seizures of one person's property to benefit another should be rare and a last resort."

Aides Say Bush Has Always Been An "Ardent Conservationist." As part of its cover package, Newsweek (7/17, Wolffe) reports that President Bush "is not monochromatic when it comes to the environment. … Has Bush turned green in his six years in office? Both environmentalists and the White House say no -- but for different reasons. To activists, Bush's record is unremittingly bad. … On the other side, Bush's aides say the president is unchanged -- he has always been an ardent conservationist -- and have their own take on his record. On the highways, Bush has set rules to improve the fuel consumption of light trucks and SUVs. In the air, he has proposed the first-ever cut in mercury emissions from power plants. And on global warming, the most controversial part of his green scorecard, Bush acknowledged back in June 2001 that the National Academy of Sciences believed climate change was 'due in large part to human activity.' The dispute is what to do about that warming. Bush thinks new technologies -- not treaties -- can save the day."

Mallaby Says Response To Climate Change Requires Taxation, Regulation. Sebastian Mallaby writes in the Washington Post (7/10, A17), "These days almost nobody asserts that global warming isn't happening. Instead, we are confronted with a new lie: that we can respond to climate change without taxing and regulating carbon. … It feels good to be for new technology rather than for nasty new taxes or regulations. But this is a false choice. If you want the new technology, you have to support the new tax or the new cap. Those who argue otherwise should ask themselves: Would we have rapid medical innovation if we didn't bother to protect intellectual property?"

NYTimes Calls Draft National Park Management Policy A "Marvel Of Sanity." An editorial in the New York Times (7/10) reports that the current draft of the National Park Service's management policy "appears to reaffirm the doctrine that preservation is the core historical mission of the parks. That had been the philosophy guiding the Park Service for years, until the Bush administration attempted to give recreation and commercial use a much higher priority. Compared with the original draft, this one is a marvel of sanity and historical conscience. But it's been a rough road getting to this point, and there may well be a few bumps ahead." The Times adds, "The new interior secretary, Dirk Kempthorne, should listen to the claims of the motorized recreationists and weigh them for what they are worth against the many thousands of public comments supporting the historical mission of the parks — and act accordingly."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Overdoses In Pennsylvania Possibly Linked To Fentanyl. The Times Leader (7/9) reports, "Daniel Dominick, 27, died Friday at Wilkes-Barre General Hospital after taking what was likely a fentanyl-heroin mix, according to Luzerne County Coroner's Office. The Luzerne man's death placed Wilkes-Barre on a growing list of cities where the deadly heroin concoction has been circulating in recent months."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/9) reports a Millvale man died of a possible drug overdose, the Allegheny County medical examiner reported. The 31-year-old man…was the first of two suspected drug overdoses reported [Saturday]. The second one, just before 10 p.m., happened in Pittsburgh and it was not fatal."

Drug Mixture May Have Resurfaced In Delaware. The AP (7/9) reports five heroin overdoses in a 24-hour period "are leading to suspicions that heroin laced with a powerful painkiller has resurfaced in Delaware. State police spokesman Corporal Jeff Oldham says investigators are looking into whether the heroin involved was laced with fentanyl. Police say there have been two single-vehicle crashes that appear to be the result of overdoses."

Report: Illicit Fentanyl Produced A Dozen Ways. The Philadelphia Inquirer (7/9, Wood, Ott, Graham) writes, "Since spring, fentanyl-laced heroin has killed as many as 100 people in the Philadelphia region, and hundreds more in cities such as Chicago, Detroit and Pittsburgh. Despite a huge law-enforcement collaboration, investigators have yet to unlock the mystery of the fentanyl: Where is it coming from? Why is it being mixed with heroin? How can they stop it? … There are at least a dozen home methods for synthesizing illicit fentanyl, including one posted on the Internet by someone claiming to be an organic chemist. One of the essential chemicals for making fentanyl remains unregulated - and can be legally purchased by anyone. The Drug Enforcement Administration is trying to have it listed as a controlled precursor chemical, Daley said.

Michigan Anti-Meth Effort Nets More Than 30 Arrests. The AP (7/9) an effort to "fight the production and use of methamphetamine in southwest Michigan has paid off, the U.S. attorney's office says, but officials are concerned that drug makers could relocate. During the past seven months, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has assisted Kalamazoo-area law enforcement in the crackdown. Thirty-five people were arrested, seven methamphetamine labs were seized and marijuana, cocaine, heroin and meth were confiscated."

The Sturgis (MI) Journal (7/8) reports, "The seven-month investigation covered most of southwest Michigan and included the counties of St. Joseph, Cass, Barry, Kalamazoo, Allegan and Van Buren. The DEA from its Detroit office mobilized a seven-person mobile enforcement team, or MET, to help with the cooperative effort."

The Battle Creek (MI) Enquirer (7/8) reports, "While the same people don't use and distribute meth and cocaine, DEA targeted those allegedly involved in the Albion cocaine trade and agreed to help police as part of the bigger investigation, said Andrew Eiseman, group supervisor of the DEA Mobile Enforcement Team that conducted the investigation."

Authorities Say Cartels Deliver Millions Of Dollars In Meth To Minnesota. In Minneapolis, the Star-Tribune (7/10) profiles Alberto Zatarain, who is in the Sherburne County jail, "convicted on federal drug-conspiracy charges, sentenced to 15 years, and awaiting transfer to federal prison." The Star-Tribune says he "is one of only a few large-scale meth dealers in Minnesota with ties to the Sinaloa cartel to get caught in recent years."

The AP (7/9) reports, Capt. David Graham, head of the State Patrol's investigative unit, "says smugglers working for Mexican drug cartels are delivering millions of dollars worth of meth to Minnesota. Drug Enforcement Administration and state authorities estimate that more than 100 pounds of meth produced and packaged by Mexican cartels arrives in Minnesota every month."

Five Charged With Operating Mississippi Prison Meth Ring. From Magee, the AP (7/8) reports federal prosecutors "say five men, identified as members of the Aryan Brotherhood, have been charged with operating a methamphetamine ring that was directed from a Simpson County community work center in Magee. … Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent in Charge Stephen Luzinski said several imprisoned members of the white-supremacist gang allegedly enlisted the assistance of former inmates and criminal co-conspirators outside of the prison to produce and distribute the drug."

The Meridian (MS) Star (7/10) writes, "The investigation started in 2004 when correctional officers heard through telephone monitoring and confidential informants about the ring. The scheme lasted for about a year, authorities said."

Officials In Colorado Seek Federal Help To Combat Meth. The Daily Reporter-Herald (7/8) highlights a congressional hearing in Loveland on Friday and writes, "A panel of local officials asked the federal government for help combating methamphetamine. One suggestion: Close the borders, cut off the source. … In Colorado, the largest source is Mexico, said Lt. Craig Dodd, commander of the Larimer County Drug Task Force, Denver Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Jeffrey Sweetin and 13th Judicial District Attorney Bob Watson."

The Sterling, Colorado Journal-Advocate (7/8) reports, "The heart of war on illegal drugs in the eastern Colorado plains was in danger because of to lack of funding. That all ended Friday with an announcement late in a congressional hearing held here. Late in the Congressional Field Hearing on Meth Abuse in Northern Colorado, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave, R-Colo., said she has secured a direct appropriation funding for the Eastern Colorado Plains Drug Task Force for 2007."

Pennsylvania Couple Pleads Guilty In Meth Case. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/8) reports a husband and wife from Cranberry "pleaded guilty in federal court...to conspiring to make methamphetamine. Brian and Christy McKenzie were charged after agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration rummaged through their trash at the Forest Park Trailer Court where they lived in July 2005."

Pennsylvania Man Sentenced For Attacking Witness In Drug Investigation. In its Briefs section, the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (7/10) writes, "A case of retaliation against a witness has ended with a New Brighton, Beaver County, man being sentenced to more than eight years in prison. Virgil Wolfe…was found guilty April 12 of attacking a Beaver County man who provided information in a federal narcotics investigation, the U.S. Attorney's office in Pittsburgh said. The federal Drug Enforcement Administration and state, Beaver County and New Brighton police investigated the case, in which another man, John Wolfe, was also convicted."

Accused "Drug Kingpin" To Return To Federal Court In Sacramento. Vacaville, California's Reporter (7/8) writes, "Described as a regional drug kingpin by the Drug Enforcement Administration, a Fairfield man will return to federal court in Sacramento on July 18. Defendant Eduardo Nunez Pichardo - also known as Eddie Nunez - is scheduled to appear for a status conference…July 18." Pichardo "was arrested by DEA agents - assisted by Fairfield and Vacaville police - June 21. According to the DEA, the arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into drug trafficking that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama."

Former Prosecutor Faces New Accusations In Ethics Investigation. The Tucson Citizen (7/7) reports a former Pima County prosecutor "is accused of lying to federal agents and violating terms of a plea agreement involving her ex-fiance, a former eye surgeon recently convicted of ordering the death of a colleague. The accusations are made in an amended complaint filed last week by the State Bar of Arizona against Lourdes Lopez. … According to the complaint, Lopez committed ethical violations by lying to federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents in October 2001 about illegal prescriptions she obtained for Dr. Bradley Alan Schwartz and continuing to have contact with him despite a court order."

In Arizona, Couple Claims Marijuana Case Amounts To Religious Persecution. From Tucson, the AP (7/10) reports the Church of Cognizance "has been in Pima, Arizona since 1991. Until recently, they smoked, ate or drank marijuana daily as a way of becoming more spiritually enlightened. That was until federal authorities charged them with possessing 172 pounds of their leafy green sacrament earlier this year. And now, church founders Dan and Mary Quaintance face added conspiracy charges and up to 40 years each in prison in a case they call religious persecution. The couple is scheduled to go on trial in Las Cruces, New Mexico, on July 18th, though defense lawyers are asking for a delay."

The Arizona Daily Star (7/9) reports federal prosecutors "say religious freedom does not exempt the use of illegal drugs. The Quaintances say it does. They also say a recent U.S. Supreme Court decision allowing a religious group's use of a hallucinogenic tea containing a federally banned substance should nullify the charges against them."

IMMIGRATION:

Fewer Than 1,000 Guard Members Have Been Deployed To Border. CBS and NBC both ran reports on President Bush's efforts to deploy "up to 6,000" National Guard members to the US-Mexico border by August 1. Both stories focus on the slow place of the deployment. The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 8, 3:00, Mitchell) reported, "Bush's idea…is not going according to plan." CBS (Regan) added, "Operation Jump Start, to strengthen the Border Patrol with National Guard troops, seems to have stalled. There are less than 900 Guards actually on the border right now. Many believe deploying an additional 5,000 troops within the next three weeks unlikely." In its similar report, the NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 12, 2:20, Kotb) reported said there are "reports of a snag in the President's border patrol plan. Instead of growing to 6,000 National Guard troops along the border, there are fewer than 1,000, with many states reluctant to send more."

At Least 30 States Have Taken Action On Immigration. USA Today (7/10, Jones) reports at least 30 states have "passed laws or taken other steps this year to crack down on illegal immigrants, often making it harder for undocumented workers to find jobs or receive public services." While the federal Congress "struggles to set policy," states have enacted "at least 57 laws," with many states "fining businesses that hire undocumented workers and denying such companies public contracts if they don't verify the legal status of employees."

Florida Mayor Proposes Tough Immigration Policy. The New York Times (7/10, Goodnough) runs a feature on

Avon Park, Florida, mayor Tom Macklin, who is pushing a proposal to "deny business permits to companies that knowingly hired illegal immigrants. The ordinance, which states that illegal immigration 'destroys our neighborhoods and diminishes our overall quality of life,' would also make English the official language of Avon Park, removing Spanish from all city documents, signs and automated phone messages."

Interior Repatriation Program Resumed. The Washington Times (7/10, Seper) reports the governments of the US and Mexico have resumed the Interior Repatriation Program, which returns Mexican nationals caught illegally in the US to their Mexican hometowns rather than to border towns.

WSJournal, "Prominent Conservatives" Defend Open Immigration. The Wall Street Journal (7/10) editorializes, "No issue more deeply divides American conservatives today than immigration. It's the subject on which we get the most critical mail by far, no doubt reflecting this split on the right. So with Congress holding hearings on the issue around the country, perhaps it's a good moment to step back and explain the roots of our own, longstanding position favoring open immigration. A position, by the way, on which we hardly stand alone. There is also President Bush, and before him the Gipper. … In the context of the current debate, we also print on the opposite page an open letter supporting comprehensive immigration reform from 33 prominent conservatives, including former Secretary of State George Shultz and GOP Vice Presidential nominee Jack Kemp. … Our own view is that a philosophy of 'free markets and free people' includes flexible labor markets. At a fundamental level, this is a matter of freedom and human dignity."

In their Wall Street Journal (7/10) open letter, the 33 conservatives, who also include Jeanne Kirkpatrick, Grover Norquist, Bill Kristol, Arthur Laffer, Linda Chavez, Max Boot, and Steve Forbes, say Reagan "was in favor of strong borders -- he once remarked that 'a nation without borders is not really a nation' -- but also constantly reminded us that America must remain a 'beacon' and a 'shining city on a hill' for immigrants who continually renew our great country with their energy and add to the nation's economic growth and prosperity. Reagan was right. We need to do both things -- secure the borders and allow for sensible levels of safe, open, lawful immigration. Americans and immigrants share the same values of work and opportunity. There is no reason to fear the newcomers arriving on our shores today -- if anything, they will energize what is best about our country."

Plight Of Day Laborers Considered. In a New York Times (7/10) "Editorial Observer" piece, Lawrence Downes examines the plight of the "quiet" subgroup "at the bottom" of the immigration system: "the Latino day laborers, the street-corner guys. They are not the largest group, but they are the most visible, most vulnerable and most hated. They are also the least likely to get anything good out of the immigration bills now festering in Congress. … The possibility of being victimized without sympathy or a safety net is, of course, the risk one takes when entering this country illegally."

Allies Say Hastert "Won't Give An Inch" To Bush On Immigration. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that allies of House Speaker Dennis Hastert "say he won't give an inch" to President Bush and others who want to "water down" the House's immigration plan.

TAX:

Yagman Accused Of Concealing Money. The National Law Journal (7/10, Bronstad) reports, "While recent tax evasion charges brought against civil rights attorney Stephen Yagman are based largely on expenditures related to his personal lifestyle, federal prosecutors have accused him of concealing money he received as a principal of his Venice, Calif.-based law firm, now called Yagman & Yagman & Reichmann." The Journal continues, "On June 23, prosecutors unsealed an indictment that charged Yagman with one count of tax evasion, one count of bankruptcy fraud and 17 counts of money laundering. Prosecutors allege that Yagman failed to pay more than $158,000 in federal income taxes to the Internal Revenue Service and hid assets from trustees overseeing bankruptcies filed on behalf of himself and his former law firm, Yagman & Yagman." The Journal adds, "Yagman is best known for filing numerous lawsuits against the top officials of various law enforcement agencies, particularly in Los Angeles. In recent years, Yagman has sought to bring disciplinary action against U.S. District Judge Manuel Real of the Central District of California in a case closely watched by judges nationwide. … Yagman alleges that Real, who was handling a loan fraud case involving a woman under probation, made improper rulings as part of her separate bankruptcy case. After dismissing Yagman's case twice, Mary Schroeder, chief judge of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, recently appointed a special committee to investigate the charges."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Portman Says Deficit Will Shrink In Short Term. The Washington Times (7/10, Dinan) reports, "The economy and federal revenues are growing at such a rapid rate that the deficit will shrink in the short term, President Bush's chief budget official says, while adding that keeping the deficit in control will depend in the long run on reform of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid." Rob Portman, a former congressman and US trade representative "whom Mr. Bush tapped two months ago to be director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), said the president's economic policies have led to exceptional economic growth, which has in turn led to bulging federal receipts." Portman "will deliver the annual mid-session budget review this week, detailing progress on spending and revenues, and he told The Washington Times in a recent interview that tax revenues are expected to show at least double-digit growth in the year to date compared with fiscal year 2005." The Congressional Budget Office on Friday "said federal revenue is running 12.8 percent ahead of the figures at the same time last year. The double-digit increase is the second-highest growth rate in the last 25 years, following only 2005's increase of 15 percent. With federal spending up 8.6 percent to date compared with 2005, the deficit should be at least $50 billion less than last year, though Mr. Portman said that depends on keeping the spending side under control."

House Republicans Have Trouble Passing Their "American Values Agenda." The Washington Times/AP (7/10) reports that House Republicans are having trouble passing their "American Values Agenda," and their majority is "in jeopardy for the first time in more than a decade." Privately, many Republicans "are frustrated. Democrats have pounced on the lack of progress with a 'we can do better' election theme." Democrats "ridicule as political ploys Republican decisions to bring up legislation doomed to fail, such as the constitutional amendments to ban flag desecration." The Times adds, "With two-thirds of the 2006 legislative calendar over, Congress has passed and sent President Bush only two major pieces of legislation. One renewed the terrorist-fighting USA Patriot Act; the other extended $70 billion in tax cuts, roughly divided evenly between investors and middle-income families."

Shuttle Discovery Cleared For Reentry. NBC's network news broadcast last night included a very short report on Discovery being cleared for reentry, while ABC carried a full, nearly two-minute long segment on Discovery's progress. NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 11, 0:15, Kotb) reported, "NASA has decided the shuttle will not need repairs before returning to Earth. There was some concern about a cloth between the thermal tiles but managers say that does not pose a problem. In a news conference from space today, the astronauts expressed confidence in a safe return."

ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 4, 1:45, Muir) reported, "Encouraging news from NASA. After a seven-hour spacewalk and an inch-by-inch inspection, they say the space shuttle Discovery is safe to come home next week." ABC added, "For the first time since the Columbia disaster more than three years ago, the space program can get back to business as usual thanks to more than a billion dollars in redesigns and new cameras that give them unprecedented views of the shuttle."

The Washington Post (7/10, A3, Gugliotta) reports, "NASA engineers completed their exhaustive analysis of three remaining 'areas of concern' on Discovery's heat shielding and 'cleared' all of them, said John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team."

The AP (7/10, Borenstein) reports Mission Control "informed the crew of six that the ship's thermal shielding is '100 percent cleared for entry' in another week."

NASA Schedules Next Shuttle Launch For August 28. ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 4, 1:45, Muir) reported, "NASA is so confident the shuttle program is back on track that today they released a schedule for the next launch. Atlantis is due to go up on August 28th, just after 4 PM."

ISS Research Has Shifted To Manned Spaceflight Support. The Washington Post (7/10, A6, Kaufman), in a thousand word piece titled, "Research Shifts At Space Station," reports, "When the international space station was initially proposed by President Ronald Reagan, its central mission was conceived as providing the most innovative and unusual research center that mankind had ever created. … Twenty-two years later, the space station is half-built and can carry out some experiments, but the U.S. view of its science mission has greatly changed. The primary U.S. goal is no longer basic research, but to support President Bush's initiative of manned missions to the moon and to Mars by learning about how astronauts can live for long periods in space. The morphing of the space station's role has not been without controversy."

USO Volunteer Receives President's Volunteer Service Award. The Chicago Tribune (7/7, Wang) reported that President Bush presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to Dave Kruger last Thursday for his volunteer work with the United Service Organizations center at O'Hare International Airport. Kruger "volunteers about 27 hours a week, Friday through Sunday, and sometimes stops by to help after he gets off work as a shipping scheduler at a Wheeling manufacturing plant. He delivers food from the grocery, does odd jobs around the office…and serves food when naval recruits at the base come in. In two years Kruger has volunteered more than 1,300 hours."

USAID Employees Believe Merger With State Is Coming. The Washington Post (7/10, A15, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Administration officials insist that the U.S. Agency for International Development, traditionally a distinct operation within the State Department, is not about to be officially merged with State. But recent events are making people wonder. … USAID veterans are certain a merger is coming. 'We're merging, but it's incremental,' one source said, 'so you don't know that you're merging and then it's happened. There's less pain and suffering that way, I guess.'"

Graham Sees Controlling Spending As GOP's Highest Priority. In his column, carried on TownHall.com (7/10), Robert Novak writes that Sen. Lindsey Graham "sees a real danger of Republicans losing control of both houses in Congress for the first time since the 1992 elections. Such foreboding reflects Graham's fear that demographic changes in America will extend beyond this year's elections and return the Republican Party to minority status." Novak adds, "Graham's remedy to avert both short-term and long-term disaster stresses Republicans returning to fiscal integrity by seriously cutting spending -- a goal to which his GOP colleagues give lip service. … Graham sees the highest Republican priority as controlling federal spending. He proposes renewing the campaign for a constitutional amendment mandating a balanced budget, backed up by self-restraint on earmarks."

Library Of Congress To Lay Off 29 Employees. The Washington Post (7/10, D4, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Library of Congress has notified 29 employees at the Congressional Research Service that their jobs will be abolished on Sept. 29. The layoffs are believed to be the first in the 92-year history of CRS, the division of the library that tracks legislative issues and collects data for members of Congress. The workers being eliminated perform clerical, technical and audio-visual duties."

Bush Has Been Working On A Memoir For The Past Year. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that President Bush has been working on a memoir for the past year. But "here's the odd part: Bush hasn't actually written a word yet. Instead, he and his aides have been packaging the stuff he wants to reference so that he'll be ready to write when the project moves into that stage. And that probably won't happen until after he leaves office."

Bush Tells Paulson To Make Treasury The "Star It Used To Be." U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that President Bush has ordered Henry Paulson, who is to be sworn in as Treasury Secretary this week, "to make the agency the star it used to be. He's led by example, telling Congress that Paulson, the former Goldman Sachs boss, is his economic point man. Also significant: The White House named Jim Wilkinson the chief of staff. He's largely responsible for rebuilding State's influence under Condi Rice."

OTHER NEWS:

Commercial Real Estate Market Is Strongest In Five Years. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Forsyth) reports that the US' commercial real estate market, "which cratered after the tech bust in 2000, has recovered and is the strongest it has been in five years. The shopping-mall market has stayed strong because consumer spending held up better than expected. And hotels had their most profitable year ever in 2005, partly because of strong business travel."

Former Lobbyist's $2 Million Severance Pay Raises Eyebrows. The Washington Post (7/10, D1, Birnbaum) reports in its "K Street Confidential" column that congressional aide Jeffrey S. Shockey last year "collected nearly $2 million in severance payments from his former employer, a lobbying firm that specializes in winning benefits from the committee he now serves. Many longtime Washingtonians are shaking their heads in disbelief over the payout's enormous size, its ad hoc method of calculation and the fact that Shockey received it while working as a senior congressional aide." Shockey "says his payment was justified and within the rules. But experienced lobbyists around town question both its economics and its propriety." The Post adds, "The situation is an example of a common occurrence -- the spinning of the 'revolving door' between the public and private sectors."

Santorum Seeks To Refurbish His Image As "Political Heir" To D'Amato. The New York Times (7/10, Toner) reports, "The conservative glory days of 1994, when Rick Santorum roared into the Senate at the age of 36, seem a long time ago as he fights for his political life this year, trying to convince Pennsylvania voters that he has not gone Washington. Not become part of the establishment he used to rail against. Not forgotten the kitchen table issues that matter here." Santorum "was a symbol of the conservative movement in its brash youth; now, in many ways, he embodies the movement in middle age, 12 years after taking control of the House and Senate, no longer so confident that the political winds are with it, especially in an anti-incumbent year." He "needs to reintroduce himself over the next four months, he said, to get beyond the stereotypes." He "said he wanted Pennsylvanians to think of him as a political heir to Alfonse M. D'Amato of New York, who was known as Senator Pothole for being acutely attuned to constituent needs. (Perhaps not the most auspicious role model, since Mr. D'Amato was unseated by an ambitious Democrat, Charles E. Schumer.)"

Hillary Clinton Seeks Support On Wall Street. The Financial Times (7/10, Ben White) reports, "Hillary Clinton has been cosying up to Wall Street in recent weeks with a series of meetings with top executives that could help her follow the path blazed by her husband ahead of his first presidential run." The Times adds, "People familiar with the meetings said they appeared intended to help Wall Street figures get to know the New York senator better as she coasts through an easy 2006 re-election campaign and paves the way for a possible Democratic presidential run in 2008. Bill Clinton's early forays to Wall Street helped advance his bid for the Democratic nomination in 1992." Ann Lewis, "a senior adviser to Mrs Clinton, said the meetings were focused on 2006." However, "political observers noted that Mrs Clinton faces little significant opposition in 2006. They said the Wall Street meetings could pay dividends in 2008."

Dodd Accuses Fellow Democrats Of Undermining Lieberman's Candidacy. Sen. Christopher Dodd, on CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), said that though he "respect[s] those who have taken the position they're going to support whoever the nominee is" in the Connecticut Democratic Senate primary. His "own view is, while their intentions may be otherwise, I think that undermines Joe Lieberman's ability to win on August 8th, by suggesting somehow they're going to move in that direction. I'll take a position on August 9th if I have to."

Democrats Urged To Offer "Breakthrough Ideas." Kenneth S. Baer and Andrei Cherny, the founding editors of Democracy: A Journal of Ideas, write in the Los Angeles Times (7/10), "Something happens to a political party when it is not just out of power but has had to play on the home field of its opponents for a generation: It loses faith in itself and becomes scared. … That this has become true in the Democratic Party is clear in listening to the worried words of pundits and political professionals who counsel Democrats to avoid offering any vision or direction for the country -- to instead simply wait for voters to so tire of Republican mismanagement that they will turn to more 'competent' Democrats to administer a conservative state." Baer and Cherny add, "Having seen the failure of a generation of conservative ideas on fiscal and foreign policy, Americans are ready to listen to an alternative. Now is the moment for Democrats to offer a set of breakthrough ideas that will create a governing majority for a generation."

DeLay Planning Campaign To Retake His House Seat. Time (7/17, Allen, Hylton) reports in its "Notebook" column, "A source close to the ex-Congressman tells TIME that [former Rep. Tom] DeLay is planning an aggressive campaign to retake the House seat he quit in June if an appeals court lets stand a ruling by a federal judge last week that his name must stay on November's ballot -- even though he has moved to Virginia."

Democrats Plan To Push Minimum Wage Increase Going Into 2006 Election. Time (7/17, Bacon) reports in its "Notebook" column, "Polls show that more than 80% of Americans favor" a minimum wage increase, but "most Republican politicians…do not. So Democrats are sharpening their attacks on the GOP for seeming out of step with public opinion. Senator Hillary Clinton of New York has led a Democratic effort to block a scheduled $3,300 increase in congressional pay…unless Republicans agree to hike the minimum wage to $7.25. The Dems are also emulating the Republican gay-marriage strategy by backing ballot measures in six states to boost the minimum wage. They hope voters will go to the polls for this cause, then support Democrats in races that could help the party take back Congress."

Edwards Makes Fighting Poverty Centerpiece Of Possible 2008 Run. Newsweek (7/17, Darman) reports that former Sen. John Edwards' "new political plan" involves "a presidential campaign with fighting poverty as a central plank. It's a risky strategy in today's Democratic Party -- Edwards may be the most viable national candidate since Bobby Kennedy to tie his destiny to a fight for the destitute." Edwards' "2008 presidential campaign -- still hypothetical but proceeding at high speed -- is all about breaking with the established script. He's largely opted out of the buzz primary," and is instead "using the name recognition he built up in '04 and hitting the campaign trail early and often -- quietly raising $6.5 million in 105 appearances for Democrats running in 2006."

Matalin, Allen Asked To Leave Alexandria City Event. The Washington Times (7/10, McCaslin) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "Virginia senatorial wife Susan Allen and Republican operative Mary Matalin, accompanied by their respective daughters, were asked to leave a birthday celebration for the city of Alexandria on Saturday evening because they were 'distracting.'" A close friend of Mrs. Allen said, "They were asked to leave the public event by Alexandria's Parks and Recreation Department because they were told they were "distracting,"' adding, "That was the exact word [officials] used. Perhaps these Alexandria servants should be reminded that politicking at public, community events is a time-honored, American tradition, not to mention a First Amendment right."

Schwarzenegger Leading Opponent In Latest Poll. The Washington Times (7/10, Bellantoni) reports,

"California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a wide lead over state Treasurer Phil Angelides, his Democratic re-election challenger who said Friday that, if elected, he would sign a bill to grant marriage licenses to homosexual couples." Schwarzenegger "leads Mr. Angelides 44 percent to 37 percent in a statewide poll taken the last week of June. The poll showed 14 percent of voters were undecided, while 5 percent of those surveyed wanted a different candidate."

Liberal Clergy Try To Engineer Religious Left Political Movement. The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 10, 3:30, Mitchell) reported, "Conservative religious voters have played an important role in the national debate of late courted by politicians from both parties. Now some liberal religious leaders are hoping to build a similar movement to advance their agenda." CBS goes on to report on a church in Washington, DC, where "hundreds of committed Christians met recently and try to map out a strategy to get their values into the political debate. Not the conservative Christian values which have been so influential lately -- this is the religious left." Dr. Bob Edger, Gen. Sec. of the National Council of Churches: "Jesus called us to love our neighbor, love our enemy, care for the poor, care for the outcast and that's really the moral core of where we think the nation ought to go." Mitchell: "Dr. Bob Edgar is general secretary of the National Council of Churches, which represents about 50 million Christians in America, the majority of them mainline Protestants." Edgar: "Jesus never said one word about homosexuality, never said one word about civil marriage or abortion." Mitchell: "He calls this movement the center left and it's seeking the same political muscle as conservative Christians, a group with a strong power base and the huge evangelical churches of the South. The left has its own evangelical leaders, like the Reverend Tony Campolo." Rev. Tony Campolo, evangelical Leader: "We are furious that the religious right has made Jesus into a Republican. That's idolatry. To recreate Jesus in your own image rather than allowing yourself to be created in Jesus' image is what's wrong with politics."

Obama Says Politicians Should Not Abandon Field Of Religious Discourse. Sen. Barack Obama writes in USA Today (7/10) that there has been talk "among pundits and pollsters that the political divide in this country falls sharply along religious lines. Indeed, the single biggest gap in party affiliation among white Americans today is not between men and women, between red states and blue, but between those who attend church regularly and those who don't." If political leaders "truly hope to communicate our hopes and values to Americans in a way that's relevant to their own, we cannot abandon the field of religious discourse." Obama adds, "Americans are looking for a deeper, fuller conversation about religion in this country." They "are willing to listen and learn from those who are willing to speak in reasonable terms — those who know of the central and awesome place that God holds in the lives of so many, and who refuse to treat faith as simply another political issue with which to score points."

Krugman Says Resurgence Of New York City Flies In Face Of Conventional Wisdom. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (7/10) that the resurgence of Manhattan as a site for corporate headquarters "flies in the face of today's conventional wisdom, which says that modern technology is making geography irrelevant. Since work can now be done anywhere, the story goes, jobs move wherever the wages and other costs of doing business are lowest. And this should mean trouble for a high-wage, high-cost location like New York. But somebody forgot to tell New York about the new rules: in spite of high costs, the city's economy is thriving." Krugman adds that New York City, "a city that a generation ago seemed to be in irreversible decline, seems to be doing O.K."

NYTimes Decries Lobbyists' Expansion To Local Governments. An editorial in the New York Times (7/10) says, "The news that the Washington lobbying industry is rapidly extending its tentacles into cities, towns and school districts across the country should be an outright embarrassment to Congress." Lobbyists "are shopping themselves as gifted middlemen for mayors and school boards. And localities are biting, having seen the sorry evidence that lawmakers tend to deliver earmarks more readily for Beltway lobbyists than for hometown nobodies." The Times says that despite the fact that one Congressman has gone to jail for influence peddling and more criminal investigations of others are under way, "a what-me-worry evasiveness remains the strategy of Republican leaders on ethics reform."

WPost Calls Farm Subsidies "Shamefully Unfair." The Washington Post (7/10, A16) editorializes, "We've known for a long time that America's bloated food subsidy programs rile foreign governments, complicate trade talks, distort agricultural prices and disproportionately benefit large agribusinesses. As if that weren't enough, the results of a nine-month Post investigation published last week vividly detail the scandalous waste of America's vast farm subsidy system." The Post adds, "Federal farm subsidies are wildly misdirected and shamefully unfair to anyone who pays taxes and doesn't get a piece of the billions -- $25 billion in 2005 -- the government drops every year on agricultural payments. Last year the federal government paid $4.3 billion in corn subsidies, up from $1 billion in 1998."

Professor Says Training More Doctors Won't Solve US Health Care Problems. David C. Goodman, a professor of pediatrics and family medicine at Dartmouth Medical School, writes in the New York Times (7/10) that the Association of American Medical Colleges, "has recommended increasing the number of doctors they train by 30 percent, in large part to keep up with the growing number of elderly patients. But the most serious problems facing our health care system — accelerating costs, poor quality of care and the rising ranks of the uninsured — cannot be solved by more doctors. In fact, that approach, like prescribing more drugs for an already overmedicated patient, may only make things worse." Goodman adds that "our resources would be better directed toward improving efforts to prevent illness and manage chronic ailments like diabetes and heart disease. … Instead of training more doctors, let's make better use of the ones we already have."

Administration Wants China To Exert Pressure On North Korea. The CBS Evening News (7/9, story 4, 0:35, Mitchell) reported, "The US said today that it wants China to put more pressure on North Korea to end missile tests and return to disarmament talks. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns indicated that the US would not negotiate directly with North Korea. He also warned of the consequences if the rogue state continued to defy the International Community."

Burns appeared on NBC's Meet the Press (7/9, Russert), CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace) and CNN's Late Edition (7/9, Blitzer). With the exception of his CNN appearance, during which he discussed the sectarian violence in Iraq at length, Burns focused almost exclusively on describing the US diplomatic response to North Korea's July 4 missile launches. Burns emphasized repeatedly that the administration considers the Chinese government's decision to send envoys to Pyongyang "the most important step today" (Fox), and "a very interesting development" (NBC).

Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (7/9, Russert) if the US will "insist that the United Nations impose sanctions against North Korea," Burns replied, "we are pursuing a very aggressive resolution up in New York at the Security Council, and we think we've got the votes to pass that. But we're also operating on multiple diplomatic fronts. We have our lead negotiator, Chris Hill, Ambassador Hill, in Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo this week. President Bush and Secretary Rice have been working the phones with their counterparts." Burns added, "We also have a very interesting development today. The Chinese government is sending tonight to Pyongyang a senior delegation. And, you know, frankly we think it's time for China to use its influence with North Korea. … China now has an opportunity to put its best foot forward, to send the North Koreans a direct message that these missile tests cannot be tolerated."

On Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace), Burns said, "I think the most important step today is that China has decided to send a senior-level delegation to Pyongyang this evening. And it's time for China to exert its influence that it does have on North Korea."

On CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), Burns added, "China has influence with North Korea of the type that most of the rest of us do not. And the Chinese are sending a senior-level delegation to Pyongyang this evening, and we hope that China is going to bring some pressure and influence to bear to convince the North Koreans that they are entirely isolated in the world."

Burns, on CNN's Late Edition (7/9, Blitzer), predicted, "I think you'll see over the course of the next couple of days, when we get the results of this Chinese delegation to Pyongyang, I think you will then see us move ahead in New York at the Security Council. We hope that China and Russia are going to support this resolution."

NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 5, 2:20, Aspell) reported, "North Korea's missile tests have alarmed Asia. South Korea has stepped up the readiness of its armed forces along the demilitarized zone, the most heavily fortified border in the world. It's been like this since the end of the Korean War more than 50 years ago -- a million men on both sides all across the Korean Peninsula, thousands of tanks and artillery pieces, but all this is now nearly obsolete."

In a lengthy analysis piece, the Wall Street Journal (7/10, Fairclough, King) notes, "North Korea's barrage of missile tests has put China in a tough spot, calling into question its policy of patient diplomacy and economic support aimed at encouraging change in Pyongyang. The U.S., saying Beijing's response is a critical test of China's new high-profile role on the international stage, is urging China to alter course and use its considerable leverage as North Korea's most important trading partner to get Pyongyang to return to talks on its nuclear program." The Journal says it "is far from clear" if the missile tests "will be enough to overcome Beijing's extreme reluctance to use economic pressure as a diplomatic tool, especially against its communist ally." Beijing "has successfully used arm-twisting in the past," and, the Journal notes, "the U.S. has appealed to China's pride, saying it risks diminishing its international standing if it can't use its influence even to moderate the behavior of one of its closest neighbors. … Washington also has said China's ability -- or inability -- to make headway with North Korea will be important in shaping the future of relations between Washington and Beijing."

The Christian Science Monitor (7/10, Marquand) runs a similar story titled "US Looks To China To Influence N. Korea," in which it says "a message from President Bush to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il will be delivered Monday in

Pyongyang -- via two Chinese officials. Beijing now meets quarterly with Mr. Kim, the most contact the unpredictable North has with any outside party. Whether Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei and Vice Premier Hui Liangyu will surprise Kim Jong Il and exert real pressure is unclear." The Los Angeles Times (7/10, Demick) also reports the story.

Administration Continues To Defer To China On North Korea. Newsweek (7/17, Hirsh) reports that on North Korea, the Bush Administration "continues to defer to China, the lead negotiator, but it has seemed clear since a September 2005 pact to restart talks that Beijing will not pressure Pyongyang too hard with sanctions. Why? Mainly because the Chinese fear a collapse of the regime that could send millions of refugees streaming over the Sino-Korean border."

Time (7/17, Powell) reports that there is "little reason to think Kim Jong Il will be dissuaded" by the failure of his Taepodong-2 missile last week. Time considers the "remaining options for dealing with the world's most unpredictable totalitarian nuclear regime." They include, a "swift and precise military strike," containing Kim's regime and then squeezing it "with the hope that his government will eventually atrophy into collapse" and going back to the bargaining table. The Bush Administration "may have to face the fact that if it wants closure on North Korea, it will have to engage in what Kim has wanted all along: direct talks."

Burns Defends Administration's Opposition To One-On-One Talks. During his appearance on NBC's Meet the Press (7/9, Russert), Burns explained that the administration opposes one-on-one talks with the government of North Korea because "we really don't see the logic in turning this into a test of wills between two countries -- the United States and North Korea. The fact is that China has the same interests as the United States -- it should have the same interests -- and that is to stop the North Korean nuclear program. Our allies, Japan and South Korea, have the same interests, and the Russians do as well. And so we think we're far better off working within the framework of the six-party talks, because you get in that process the combined leverage, the combined strength, and frankly the combined pressure on North Korea of all these different countries."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, on CNN's Late Edition (7/9, Blitzer), said, "I agree with President Bush; it needs to be a multi- party situation. … I think it would be a huge mistake for us to sit down by ourselves. What they need to see, the North Koreans need to see a table full of people throughout the world -- the Japanese, the South Koreans, the Chinese, the Russians -- telling them the same thing."

Hill Seeks To Restart Talks, With Or Without North Korea. The Financial Times (7/10, Fifield, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Efforts are under way to convene 'five-party talks' involving North Korea's neighbours and the US as officials search for diplomatic avenues to respond to the Asian country's missile tests last week without further highlighting the divergent views over how to deal with the rogue state. But China, the host of the talks, and North Korea's closest ally, is understood to be unwilling to hold a meeting without Kim Jong-il's representatives, posing another challenge to presenting a united front in condemning the tests." Assistant Secretary Chris Hill said, "We think there ought to be six-party talks – six is better than five but five is better than none. We need the six-party process regardless of whether we get all six parties to come to it." Since last September, the talks have "stagnated" because of North Korean anger over Washington's imposition of Macau money laundering sanctions.

The New York Times (7/10, Onishi) reports Hill "said Sunday that his first priority was to get [Pyongyang] back to the negotiating table, signaling that the United States was seeking a diplomatic solution instead of punitive economic sanctions against it for launching seven missiles last week." Hill further "said his talks with South Korean officials [in Seoul] over the weekend focused on kick-starting the six-nation talks over the North's nuclear program. The talks have been deadlocked since last September." Hill is quoted telling reporters, "My mission here is not to get sanctions. My mission here is to make sure we can all speak with one voice to deal with this provocative action by the North Koreans."

ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 6, 2:35, Muir) interviewed Hill. ABC (Harris) asked, "Dealing with the regime of the world's last Stalinist dictator -- Kim Jong Il -- that's part of the job of Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill. … Is this the type of person that we really can deal with?" Christopher Hill, Assistant Secretary of State: "It's very tough to deal with this kind of regime. But, you know, you don't just negotiate with your friends. You negotiate with people that you often have profound disagreements with." ABC (Harris) added, "If diplomacy fails, Hill does not take the military card off the table." Hill was shown saying, "Of course there's a point at which we need to take actions to defend ourselves, and we are well aware of that." Harris: "Hill's job is to make sure it doesn't come to that."

US Declines North Korean Request To End Freeze On Bank Funds. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Ramstad) reports, "The US is holding the line on a freeze of North Korean funds in a Macau bank, rebuffing Pyongyang's latest effort to link diplomatic talks on its nuclear-weapons program with a probe of its financial activities by U.S. and Chinese authorities." North Korea's deputy ambassador to the United Nations "was quoted in a Seoul newspaper as saying Pyongyang wouldn't rejoin six-party talks on its weapons program until the US takes steps to lift a freeze of about $24 million in North Korean funds in a bank in Macau, a special administrative region of China." Hill, however, said, "To change the subject from this rather reckless [missile] activity on their part back to an issue of illicit activities, which I would argue are also reckless, is simply not appropriate."

South Korean Reaction To Missile Test Making US Position More Difficult. USA Today (7/10, Wiseman) reports that in South Korea, the news of the North's missile test "has been greeted with a shrug, never mind that Seoul sits within range of North Korean artillery and rockets. The attitude in South Korea is in sharp contrast to the alarm with which the missile tests were viewed in Tokyo and Washington." Yesterday, "the administration of South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun even issued a statement criticizing Japan for what it said was an overreaction to the missile tests." USA Today adds, "South Korea's attitude has made it even harder for US policymakers to forge a coalition committed to punishing North Korea. China and Russia, traditional North Korean allies, have opposed harsh sanctions."

Nonetheless, says the Wall Street Journal (7/10, Hitt), "talks between South Korea and the US on a free-trade agreement resumed in Seoul Monday. One sensitive issue: South Korea wants the pact to cover goods originating at its joint-venture Kaesong industrial complex in North Korea."

Bush's Reaction To North Korea Tests Called Sign Of "End Of Cowboy Diplomacy." Time's (7/17, Allen, Ratnesar) cover story this week is entitled "The End Of Cowboy Diplomacy." The cover features a photo of a large cowboy hat with a presidential seal on it, on top of a pair of cowboy boots. Time reports that more surprising than North Korea's missile tests "was Bush's response to it." Bush "pledged to 'make sure we work with our friends and allies...to continue to send a unified message' to Pyongyang. In a press conference following the missile test, he referred to diplomacy half a dozen times." Time adds, that "in the span of four years, the Administration has been forced to rethink the doctrine with which it hoped to remake the world as the strategy's ineffectiveness is exposed by the very policies it prescribed. The swaggering Commander in Chief who embodied the doctrine's aspirations has modulated himself too." Time adds, "Under the old Bush Doctrine, "defiance by a dictator like Kim Jong Il would have merited threats of punitive US action -- or at least a tongue lashing. Instead, the Administration has mainly been talking up multilateralism and downplaying Pyongyang's provocation."

"Strategic Makeover" Of Administration's Foreign Policy Noted. Time (7/17, Allen, Ratnesar) reports in its cover story, entitled "The End Of Cowboy Diplomacy," that "a strategic makeover" of the Administration's foreign policy "is evident in the ascendancy of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has tried to repair the Administration's relations with allies and has persuaded Bush to join multilateral negotiations aimed at defusing the standoffs with North Korea and Iran." Rice's "push for pragmatism has rubbed off on hawks like Vice President Dick Cheney, the primary intellectual force behind Bush's post-9/11 policies."

Kristol Mocks Burns' Assessment Of North Korea Diplomacy. The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace), said, "North Korea is paying no price at all for doing something that we said is unacceptable, and that is a very bad precedent to set. And I'm afraid that watching Nick Burns here tell you that the world is more complicated than you think…I thought 'oh, my God, we're back to the Clinton administration.' Nick Burns was actually a pretty good spokesman for Bill Clinton's State Department in the first couple of years. And there's not a word he said today that couldn't have been said cheerfully by Clinton administration types…" Kristol paraphrased Burns as saying, "We're thrilled China is sending a delegation to Pyongyang tonight. Isn't that wonderful?" and commented, "I mean, it's really pathetic." Kristol went on to urge President Bush to "walk away from the six-party talks. He should cancel them. North Korea has behaved in a way that's unacceptable for someone you're trying to have negotiations with. We should tighten the sanctions on North Korea."

Hoekstra Backs Administration's View Of China's Role. Rep. Pete Hoekstra, on Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace), said, "We also need to take this as an opportunity to take a much closer look at China. I do believe that the path to success in North Korea is going to have to go through Beijing."

Richardson Accuses Bush Of "Trying To Outsource Our Foreign Policy To China." New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, also on NBC's Meet the Press (7/9, Russert), said he supports face-to-face negotiations with the government of North Korea, adding, "Our policy, so far, is not working. What you have is North Korea has quadrupled its enriched plutonium since 2002. The six-party talks are going nowhere. We should talk directly to the North Koreans to discuss what is next. … The only way to do that, in my judgment, is face-to-face talks at a level of Christopher Hill. He is a competent diplomat. The successes we've had with the North Koreans have been through direct engagement." Richardson went on to argue that the administration is "trying to outsource our foreign policy to China. I believe China is not necessarily interested in helping us on North Korea. They don't want to see a bunch of refugees go into their country."

McCain, Graham Warn China Of "Consequences" If They Do Not Cooperate On North Korea. Sen. John McCain, on CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), said, "I believe that China is the key. They're the only ones that really have a significant influence over North Korea. If we make it clear to China that we understand they are emerging on the world stage as a superpower, they should behave like one. And this will be a defining issue in our relations with China. And if they continue to vacillate, as they have all last week in the United Nations, then there are consequences in our relationship. There are many key areas that we are cooperating in that I believe would be affected, including trade, by China's failure to act. We're not asking China to be charitable here."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, on CNN's Late Edition (7/9, Blitzer), said, "The Chinese are hanging by a thread politically with the Congress now over trade policy. If they don't really come to the table harder with North Korea, they're going to be hanging by a thread in terms of international diplomatic policy."

Lugar Notes North Korea Has Increased Its Missile Capabilities Since Bush Was Elected. Sen. Richard Lugar was asked on ABC's This Week (7/9, Stephanopoulos) if North Korea has "gotten more dangerous on President Bush's watch," Lugar answered, "Perhaps. They certainly have been able to produce more missiles. And they are selling missiles. … So perhaps they have become more dangerous."

Woolsey Warns That South Korea, Japan, Taiwan May All Seek Nuclear Weapons. Former CIA Director James Woolsey, on Fox News Sunday (7/9, Wallace), predicted, "the way China is going now, they're going to end up with four new nuclear powers in East Asia, I think -- North Korea in time, South Korea in time, Japan, and in time maybe Taiwan. Why China thinks it's in its interest to have four new nuclear powers in East Asia is beyond me."

NYTimes Urges Direct Talks. The New York Times (7/10) editorializes, "The United Nations Security Council certainly should register international condemnation of last week's North Korean missile launches. But if any serious progress is going to be made on this and the related North Korean nuclear issue, it will not be through Security Council resolutions or sanctions. … The Bush administration should drop its reflexive opposition to direct talks." But "before scheduling a meeting, Washington should call on North Korea to reinstate its moratorium on long-range missile tests and keep it in place for at least one year while talks on a permanent ban proceed." Those direct talks should also include discussions on North Korea's nuclear weapons programs."

Unity On Iran Said To Hinge On US-Russian Relations. The Financial Times (7/10, Dombey, Khalaf) reports, "Western governments are stepping up their efforts to win Russian and Chinese backing for a tougher stance over Iran's nuclear programme in the run-up to the G8 summit next weekend. The latest indication came from the US, which at the weekend said it was willing to offer Moscow a deal on civil nuclear co-operation – as long as Russia provided more help in convincing Tehran to scale down its programme." The Times says Iran watchers were "distracted" by North Korea's missile tests last week, and notes that Tehran's technical problems "have also reduced the sense of urgency surrounding the case." Washington and Brussels "are focused on using the [G-8 Summit] as the main source of pressure on Iran. Russia wants the summit to focus on energy security instead." Of the Europeans' planned meeting with Iranian nuclear chief Ali Larjani tomorrow, the Times says, "If the encounter with Mr. Larijani proves frustrating for the Europeans, the EU and the US will seek to rally support from Russia and China at a foreign ministers' meeting in Paris for a tougher international line. This will set the tone for the G8 summit later in the week."

NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 6, 2:20, Kotb) reported, "The spotlight will be on Russian democracy as President Bush heads to the G-8 summit. The President starts his trip this week, visiting Germany's chancellor in her former East German parliamentary district, and then moves on to Russia for the gathering of the industrialized nations. The summit gives Mr. Bush a chance for a meeting of the minds with Russian leader Vladimir Putin at a time of tension between the two nations." NBC (Jordan) added, "George W. Bush and Vladimir Putin preparing for this coming weekend's G-8 summit in Putin's hometown of St. Petersburg. As children of the Cold War, they weren't supposed to be friends, certainly not leaders who talk frequently about trade, energy and terrorism -- NBC news presidential historian Michael Beschloss." Michael Beschloss: "Oddly, this is the flip side of the Cold War and a big sign that the Cold War is over." Jordan: "But Bush and Putin don't see eye-to-eye on how to end the nuclear ambitions of North Korea and Iran and Russia's commitment to democracy has also been questioned. Critics accuse Putin of cracking down on civil liberties and the media, as well as jiggling political opponents. He dismissed those charges last week, saying, 'Without democracy, there is no future for Russia.' But those concerns aren't enough to derail President Bush's desire to reach agreements with Russia on a major deal for the storage of nuclear waste."

The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Dreazen) says the Administration's decision "to allow Russia to house spent nuclear fuel highlights a dynamic likely to shape this week's [G-8 Summit]: the shifting power balance between a US facing challenges on several fronts and a Russia moving to reassert itself on the world stage." Washington's "need for Russian support" on the North Korean and Iranian questions "is forcing the US to accede to Russian demands on a range of issues. … The moves represent an acknowledgment by the administration that on a variety of hot-button issues, the U.S. needs Russia more than Russia needs the U.S." On the "cost" to the West for Russian cooperation, the Journal says, Kremlin advisor Igor Shuvalov told reporters that "Moscow hoped to win final U.S. approval for Russia's bid to enter the [WTO] during a bilateral summit between Messrs. Bush and Putin," and "wanted White House assurances that Russian firms would be able to freely invest in the U.S. without facing the kind of political scrutiny that derailed recent proposed acquisitions of U.S. assets by companies from China and the United Arab Emirates."

McCain Criticizes Administration Over Russia Nuclear Deal. Sen. John McCain, appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (7/9, Schieffer), was asked if he believes it is a "good idea" for the administration to "reverse policy and cooperate with the Russians on civilian nuclear power," McCain responded, "I'm very skeptical. The Russians are the ones that helped the Iranians. This I another example where the Russians have got to understand, again, that their continued autocracy and repression and oppression of the media, of a free and democratic society…should not be rewarded with an agreement that, I think, probably is more beneficial to them than to us." McCain added, "Putin is clearly on the path to the restoration of autocracy in Russia. And that's not good for America. That's not good for Russia. And that's not good for the world."

Bush Said To Have Become "More Realistic" About Putin. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Walsh) reports that President Bush has "gotten more realistic" about Russian President Vladimir Putin since they first met in June 2001. Bush's original assessment that Putin was "'very straightforward and trustworthy' and committed to reform" now seems "naive and certainly premature. U.S. policymakers admit as much." US News adds, "As Bush prepares to meet Putin this week at the annual conference of the Group of Eight industrialized democracies in St. Petersburg, the Russian leader's hometown, he is under pressure to condemn Putin's lurches toward autocracy." Some critics "urge Bush to criticize Putin's backsliding in a very dramatic way this week. Arizona Sen. John McCain has even suggested that Bush boycott the entire conference in St. Petersburg." Bush "is trying to find a way to thread the needle by expressing disapproval for Putin's excesses while at the same time winning Kremlin support for his key international objectives."

Media Freedoms Have Been Rolled Back Under Putin. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Smith) reports, "Under Putin, Russia has experienced a dramatic rollback of media freedom, a sensitive issue as his fellow leaders of the Group of Eight major industrialized nations meet late this week in St. Petersburg. … Before Putin took over in 2000, opposition voices were often heard on the three dominant television networks, particularly on the then privately owned NTV channel. There were hostile interviews with officials, merciless political satire shows, and investigations of what human-rights groups call Russia's dirty war in Chechnya. Today, NTV is owned by the state-run natural gas behemoth Gazprom, and its output differs little from that of the two big state-owned channels Rossiya and Channel One."

Putin Portrayed As Foe Of Democracy. Opinion pieces in today's major newspapers are highly critical of Putin. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (7/10), Gary Kasparov, leader of the United Civil Front of Russia, says "persuasion and appeasement toward Russia have failed. … The right of Russians to elect their governors and parliamentary representatives is steadily eroding, with more and more influence accruing to the executive. … Opposition activists and journalists are routinely arrested and interrogated," while the government "loots private businesses and then uses state-controlled companies to launder the money abroad." Washington and Brussels' strategy of ignoring Putin's transgressions "for the sake of receiving Russia's cooperation on security and energy" is "cynical and morally repugnant" and "has also proven ineffective." Western leaders including "this American president [seem] to be saying that Iraqis and Afghans are deserving of democracy, but Russians are not."

Fred Hiatt writes in the Washington Post (7/10, A17) that Putin is "working hard to undermine democratic Georgia, a nation of fewer than 5 million people bordering Russia on the south. He has banned imports of Georgian produce, wine and mineral water; he is manipulating secessionists inside the country. Saakashvili's success in promoting economic growth and diminishing corruption may be too dangerous an example for Putin to abide." He adds, "A key question for this week will be whether the G-7 leaders make clear that undermining neighboring democracies is not an acceptable policy. France and Germany will be reluctant to allow principle to interfere with commercial interests, which lie with Russia, not some tiny nation to the south. So it will be up to Bush."

Tehran Asks IAEA To Replace Inspector. The AP (7/10, Jahn) reports, "Iran has asked the International Atomic Energy Agency to remove" Chris Charlier," the "head of the inspection team probing Tehran's nuclear program." Charlier "has not been back to Iran since April because of Iranian displeasure with his work," however he "remains the head of the team." He "has previously complained publicly that Iranian constraints made inspection work there difficult."

US Official Warns Iran To Yield Or Face Sanctions. The Washington Times (7/10, Pfeiffer) reports, "US officials yesterday accused Iran of stalling negotiations and said the deadline has arrived for the country to halt nuclear production or face sanctions in the United Nations." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told "Fox News Sunday" yesterday, "We offered them two paths, negotiations or Security Council action. … The Iranians can choose, but the time to choose has come."

Bush Seen As Having Changed His Demeanor, Rhetoric On Foreign Policy. The New York Times (7/10, Sanger) reports, "President Bush has never made apologies for enshrining pre-emption as the defining doctrine of his first term. He has declared many times that in a post-9/11 world, presidents no longer have the luxury of waiting for the slow grinding of diplomatic give-and-take when unpredictable dictators are assembling arsenals that could threaten the United States." But "as he leaves for Europe and Russia this week, where the simultaneous nuclear standoffs in Iran and North Korea will top the agenda, Mr. Bush finds himself struggling to square his muscular declarations with the realpolitik of his second term after the invasion of Iraq. At every turn, and every provocation, he finds himself in an unaccustomed position: urging patience." The Times adds that "some conservatives who backed Mr. Bush's decision in Iraq, 'standing by and waiting' is the essence of Mr. Bush's current strategy. … This weekend in The Weekly Standard, William Kristol, another prominent conservative voice, wrote: 'The red lines, pink lines, and mauve lines of U.S. foreign policy seem increasingly to be written in erasable ink. What was 'unacceptable' to President Bush a week ago (a North Korean missile launch) has been accepted.' He called the current policy 'Clintonian.'" Bush's aides, "who decline to speak about their internal deliberations on North Korea and Iran for attribution, say their critics have done everything but describe a workable alternative."

India Says It Has Tested A Long-Range Nuclear-Capable Missile. The New York Times (7/10, Kumar, Sanger) reports, "India test-fired its longest-range nuclear-capable missile on Sunday for the first time, government officials said." But "although the missile was launched, it was unclear whether the entire test was successful, with at least one report saying that the missile had failed at some point in its flight." The Times adds, "The launching has occurred at a time of rising international tension over North Korea's recent missile tests, and as the United States Congress is considering a civilian nuclear pact that the Bush administration negotiated with India." The missile is reported "to have a range of more than 1,800 miles."

Success Of Withdrawal Plan Rests On Olmert's Handling Of Current Gaza Crisis. U.S. News and World Report (7/17, Derfner) reports that the future of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's plan for withdrawal from most of the West Bank in order to secure Israelis behind a protective barrier, "now rests on his handling of the growing political crisis sparked by Palestinian militants' kidnapping of Israeli Army Cpl. Gilad Shalit and the escalating military conflict that has drawn Israeli forces back into Gaza."

Newsweek (7/17, Ephron, Dickey) reports that Olmert "has staked his political future…on the success of unilateral disengagement -- with pullouts planned from parts of the West Bank as well as Gaza. Now that's on hold. A policy of unilateral action that requires repeated incursions by Israeli troops is not a viable long-term option. … But Olmert faces a strategic problem. Not only does he have no partner in peace, as he often says, he has no partner in war. The would-be peacemaker, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, has been relegated to a role as spectator. And the breakdown of law and order in Gaza is such that the elimination of the Hamas government could mean the elimination of all government -- with a likely increase in the influence of both Iran and Al Qaeda."

Olmert Rejects Any Deal With Hamas, Vows Long Offensive. NBC Nightly News (7/9, story 10, 0:15, Kotb) reported, "Israel says it is pressing forward with its Gaza offensive in an effort to retrieve a kidnapped soldier. The Israelis stepped up rocket attacks today. One hit a car carrying suspected militants in southern Gaza, killing a bystander and wounding four other civilians."

The New York Times (7/10, Erlanger) reports a statement by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to his Cabinet yesterday that "Israel will continue its military offensive in the Gaza Strip at its own pace until Palestinian militants release a captured Israeli soldier and halt their rocket attacks." Olmert is quoted saying "it is impossible to set a timetable. We will continue this battle with level-headedness and patience, while making use of the proper means. We cannot sit and not respond to the Qassam rocket fire." Olmert made clear, according to the Times, that Israel "would not reoccupy Gaza but would act militarily there as it saw fit." The Times says Olmert "ruled out negotiations with Hamas," but "had been prepared to release prisoners to Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, before the two men met for a formal meeting, and Mr. Abbas confirmed that on Friday."

The AP (7/10, Nessman) reports adds Olmert said Israel "would push ahead with the army's widescale offensive in the Gaza Strip, saying the fight to free an abducted soldier and stop militant rocket fire would last for a 'long time.'" The operation "has caused widespread destruction in Gaza, left 51 Palestinians dead and led to international complaints that Israel was using excessive force." The Palestinian public is "widely supportive of the militants' actions" against Israeli forces," the AP says, citing a poll that shows "that 77 percent of those questioned backed Shalit's kidnapping and 67 percent said they supported further abductions. Sixty-nine percent said the soldier should only be released in exchange for prisoners."

ABC World News Tonight (7/9, story 3, 0:20, Muir) also noted Olmert "said the offensive in Gaza would not stop until Hamas releases a captured Israeli soldier," while the CBS Evening News (7/9, story 5, 1:50, Mitchell) showed Nabil Abu Rudaina, a Palestinian advisor, saying "By force, nothing is going to be solved. The situation is very dangerous on us and on the Israelis as well." MacVicar: "Israel threatens this is a war that will continue for a long time. What's going on here is not much talking, and even less listening."

Hezbollah Now Part Of Governing Coalition In Lebanon. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, A1, Leggett) reports, "When Syrian troops left Lebanon last year, the Bush administration saw a prime opportunity to de-fang a group one US diplomat once called the 'A-Team' of terror groups: Hezbollah, which receives major backing from Syria. The end of Syria's nearly three-decade occupation was a watershed moment for President Bush's campaign to spread democracy in the Middle East as an antidote to violent Islamic movements." However, "today, it's stronger than ever. The group, once disdainful of domestic politics, filled the power vacuum of Syria's departure by joining Lebanon's governing coalition. That has given Hezbollah new clout, including control over two ministries." It also has "helped the group elude a big threat: international pressure, led by the US and France, to disarm."

Islamic Militiamen, Secular Fighters Clash In Mogadishu. The Washington Post (7/10, A11, Mohamed) reports, "Islamic militiamen attacked fighters loyal to defeated secular warlords in Mogadishu on Sunday, and at least 20 people were killed and scores wounded in heavy street battles, witnesses said. The death toll was expected to rise in the most serious flare-up since the militiamen seized control of the Somali capital from US-backed warlords a month ago." Mogadishu's" war-weary residents ran for cover as rival groups fired machine guns and pounded each other with mortar rounds near an area that had been a pocket of warlord resistance to the Islamic militiamen."

Lopez Obrador Files Fraud Claim, Promises Ample Evidence. The Washington Post (7/10, A11, Roig-Franzia) reports, "Legal advisers to" Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador "gathered Sunday evening at a polling place guarded by soldiers toting machine guns and filed a formal challenge to Mexico's vote results. The filing demands a vote-by-vote recount of the closest presidential election in Mexican history, which was decided Thursday when an official tally left Lopez Obrador, the populist former mayor of Mexico City, a half-percentage-point behind Felipe Calderon, a champion of free trade. Outside the polling place, Manuel Camacho Solis, a top Lopez Obrador strategist, accused election officials, as well as the administration of outgoing President Vicente Fox, of election violations that were 'systematic and on a grand scale.'" The challenge will be reviewed by the Federal Electoral Tribunal, which has two months to certify or refute the election board's tally. "The tribunal will also receive what Lopez Obrador says is evidence of an Internet smear campaign against him and examples of alleged illegal campaigning by Fox, who, as president, was prohibited by law from involvement in political campaigns."

The AP (7/10, Pacheco) says Lopez Obrador "was sending hundreds of pages of purported evidence of fraud Sunday to a court he hoped would overturn" Calderon's victory, and notes that "fraud allegations strike a sensitive nerve with many Mexicans. They question whether Mexico has overcome decades of institutional corruption and fraud that long favored the ruling party — the Institutional Revolutionary Party for 71 years until it lost the presidency to Fox in 2000. Lopez Obrador has sought to stoke those fears."

The Financial Times (7/10, Thomson) says the challenge "raised the pressure on the country's electoral authorities by openly claiming this month's vote had been fraudulent." Lopez Obrador is quoted calling Fox "a traitor to democracy." The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Lyons, De Córdoba) adds, "Despite his rhetoric, analysts say the veteran politician faces an uphill battle both to win a court ruling to overturn the election as well as to galvanize Mexicans into taking to the streets to support him. … Whatever the outcome, the dispute is likely to further polarize a divided nation, making governing more tricky for the next president." The New York Times (7/10, McKinley) notes "the European Commission on Sunday called on both sides to show restraint while the courts dealt with the legal challenges."

Mexican Election Said To Highlight Divide Between Haves And Have-Nots. Newsweek (7/17, Contreras, Campbell) reports that "final tallies showed Felipe Calderón of the center-right National Action Party (PAN)" won Mexico's presidential election, defeating Manuel López Obrador "by a mere 244,000 votes. It was Mexico's closest-ever presidential race." López Obrador "announced plans to challenge the tally in court, and the federal election tribunal has until early September to certify or annul Calderón's apparent win. But no matter how the dispute plays out, the vote confirms an emerging trend in Latin America: a sharpening divide between haves and have-nots."

Chavez Said To Be A Liability For Leftist Candidates In Mexico And Peru. Time (7/17, Naam) reports that Latin America "is witnessing the rise of a generation of politicians seeking to capitalize on frustration with the free-market, pro-American policies commonly pursued in the region in the 1990s, when much was promised and little was accomplished in terms of raising living standards. The leader of this turn toward populism is Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who has cast himself as the heir to Fidel Castro, using his country's oil bonanza to purchase political influence all over the continent." But in Mexico's election, "as in Peru's last month, Chavez turned out to be more of a liability than an asset to the leftist candidate carrying his banner."

Saudis Looking To Tap Unexplored Reservoirs Of Oil. The Wall Street Journal (7/10, Bahree, Gold) reports, "With global energy demand soaring, Saudi Arabia, whose abundant reserves of light oil have supplied the world for decades, is looking to unlock its huge, hard-to-tap and largely unexploited reservoirs of heavy crude. If it succeeds in overcoming the technical hurdles, the effort could significantly increase Saudi Arabia's oil reserves over the next several years, potentially adding some slack to tight energy markets. It would also be a blow to so-called peak-oil theorists who have forecast that world oil production is on the brink of peaking." The Journal adds, "Earlier this year, in a critical trial of Saudi Arabia's heavy-oil potential, US oil giant Chevron Corp. began a field trial of a technique designed to pump out heavy oil that was previously considered unrecoverable. … Chevron and the Saudis say initial results are promising and that the technique could greatly enhance recovery at some huge fields."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Detainee Rights Create A Divide On Capitol Hill (NYT)

By Kate Zernike And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 9 — The Supreme Court decision striking down the use of military commissions to bring terrorism detainees to trial has set off sharp differences among Republicans in Congress over what kind of rights detainees should be granted and how much deference should be shown the president in deciding the issue.

The debate is expected to consume the rest of the summer in Congress as lawmakers head into an election season expected to be dominated by issues of national security. The issue reflects the difficult legal, diplomatic and political choices the government faces in dealing with terrorism suspects.

The divisions do not fall strictly along traditional partisan lines and are as much within the parties as between them, particularly for Republicans. On one side of the debate are Republicans who believe Congress should give the president the authority to set up the kind of military commissions that were struck down by the court. Such commissions would sharply curtail defendants' rights.

On the other side are those who say the trials should be modeled on the military system of courts-martial, an approach that would give detainees more due-process rights than would the commissions. In between, many Republicans and Democrats alike argue for starting with the military judicial system and tweaking it to reflect the differences of trying terrorism suspects.

The debate will play out in a series of Congressional hearings quickly scheduled for this week, as lawmakers return to Washington after their weeklong Fourth of July recess.

Aides to President Bush said they had not yet reached any conclusions about what legislation should look like. Dan Bartlett, counselor to Mr. Bush, said lawyers for the White House, State Department and Justice Department were still reviewing the court's decision in the case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, who is expected to take a leading role on the issue as a member of the Armed Services Committee, argued that the administration's version of the military commissions had to be "reined in" to make clear, for instance, that evidence gathered by coercive interrogation techniques could not be introduced as evidence.

"I'm trying to get my colleagues to think about the international community's reception to what we do," said Mr. Graham, a former military lawyer. "We've got a chance to improve our image."

In its decision, the Supreme Court said, on a 5-to-3 vote, that the planned commissions were unauthorized by federal statute and violated international law.

Administration officials, who have been consulting with Mr. Graham, are looking to him to play a central part in drafting legislation. Senators John W. Warner of Virginia, who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and John McCain of Arizona also are expected to be at the forefront for the Republicans, while Senator Carl Levin of Michigan is quite likely to emerge as a point man for the Democrats.

On the Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Republican chairman, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the committee's ranking Democrat, who first proposed Congressional action on military tribunals in 2001, are also expected to play central roles.

The Supreme Court decision left lawmakers with the challenge of resolving a complicated legal issue under the pressure of a heated election season and a limited amount of time left on their calendar.

While both parties are united in saying they want to act quickly, they face fights over what form of trial to use and whether the protections of the Geneva Conventions apply to terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0038782

In hearings on Capitol Hill this week, the House Armed Services Committee will take testimony from lawyers, including several sympathetic to the administration. Two Senate committees, Judiciary and Armed Services, will take testimony from constitutional lawyers and top military lawyers, who some Republican senators believe were ignored in the White House discussions that led to the establishment of commissions. The only administration officials scheduled to testify are lawyers from the Justice Department and the Pentagon.

While Republicans are divided on central issues, Democrats have their own challenge. They see the court's decision as a rare rebuke to Mr. Bush, and they hope to turn the debate into a broader one over presidential power. But they said they also recognized that they must cooperate on legislation or risk being portrayed as weak on terrorism.

Some Republicans and many Democrats say that the administration may have hurt itself by rebuffing efforts as early as 2001 by Republicans and Democrats in the Senate to set up some kind of military commission. "Congress is going to want to be a full partner, and not a rubber stamp for this process," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas and a close ally of the White House.

The central question is what kind of forum to set up. Commissions allow the government wide berth in introducing evidence, including hearsay, which is banned in military courts, and restrict the rights of the accused to be present in the court and to see the evidence against them. Military courts-martial, while not as strict as civilian courts, restrict the kind of evidence that can be introduced and allow the accused to interview witnesses and see even classified evidence.

The White House has long resisted anything like courts-martial, saying they could require the government to choose between dropping the charges and disclosing more than it wants to about the sources and nature of the intelligence used to develop a case against the detainees.

Senator Warner, who will direct the hearings as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he wanted a system that relied "as much as possible" on the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which the court decision said governed the treatment of detainees.

Many lawmakers said they supported an approach based on some tweaking of the military system. Senators Graham and Specter, along with Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California and the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, advocate allowing hearsay, as well as a procedure to deal with classified evidence. The rules would be looser than in a court-martial but stricter than in a commission.

"We have to have a system that operates in the war on terror and one that doesn't tie us into knots trying to prosecute the people who have killed Americans in large numbers," Mr. Hunter said.

John C. Yoo, a professor of law at the University of California, Berkeley, who worked on orders expanding presidential power in the treatment of detainees as a former lawyer for the Justice Department, said, "The debate that people are having is whether it's going to be a short bill that just overrules Hamdan completely, which you could do in one sentence, or whether it's going to be a much more comprehensive law that tries to set out essentially a code of procedure for the military commission."

But any effort simply to codify the president's order establishing commissions would be fiercely resisted by influential Democrats.

"The Supreme Court said the president cannot continue to break the law," said Mr. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat. "The worst thing to do would be to simply paper that over and say we'll make it possible for him to break the law."

An effort by Mr. Leahy in 2001 to introduce legislation establishing tribunals was rebuffed by the White House. "They said no, they knew what they were doing, they would do it alone," Mr. Leahy said. "What's happened? Five years, there have been no trials, no convictions, nothing has happened, we've had our reputation severely hurt throughout the rest of the world."

Mr. Graham similarly called it "a mistake" to give Congressional blessing to the military commissions as envisioned in Mr. Bush's presidential order. "We have a chance to start over," he said.

Another central question is whether the Geneva Conventions extend to accused terrorists. Mr. Graham and Mr. Cornyn say no, and Mr. Graham wants Congress to pass legislation overturning the court's finding that Common Article 3 of the conventions applies to detainees. The article's provisions outlawing degrading treatments, he believes, could mean that American soldiers would be subject to prosecution in the war on terror.

But Mr. Cornyn, a former judge, said that the reference to Article 3 meant simply that any court must be established within the military justice system.

"Congress should not, and the court did not hold that, they are entitled to the whole panoply of rights that the prisoner of war would be entitled to under circumstances where the Geneva Conventions apply," Mr. Cornyn said.

Other Republicans, though, fear that any system that does not pay heed to the court's mentioning of the Geneva Conventions risks being rejected by the court again.

"We've got to structure this law in such a way that if it ever came back up through the Supreme Court, it will not be struck down," Mr. Warner said. "It's important for the credibility of the United States to put this issue at rest and let the world realize we're affording them the protections as the Supreme Court outlined."

Democrats will argue that harsh conditions at Guantánamo have made the prison a rallying cry for new terrorist recruits.

"The issue we believe is most prescient is not the balance between security and liberty, where on issues like this the parties are relatively close, but on competence," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "They just don't do it right, wherever they go. By their stubbornness and refusal to work with Congress, they've made us worse off in Guantánamo today."

Congress has rearranged its schedule to debate the issue this month, and those leading the debate say that they want to vote on new legislation, if any is needed, by September.

Court's Decision Offers Scant Guidance (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 9 — In striking down President Bush's plan to have military commissions operate at Guantánamo Bay, the Supreme Court provided no clear road map for the White House and its allies in Congress as they ponder their next move.

But the court's majority opinion offered some ambiguous guidelines as to what changes might allow Guantánamo detainees to be tried before some kind of military tribunal, as White House officials say they remain committed to doing.

There are two major issues any proposed remedy must deal with, legal analysts say. One involves the Uniform Code of Military Justice, a domestic law that prescribes guarantees for defendants in court-martial proceedings roughly analogous to those in the nation's civilian courts; the other involves the Geneva Conventions, a set of international treaties to which the United States is a party.

The court's five-member majority ruled that the law requires that in most circumstances, procedures for military commissions should be consistent with those used in courts-martial, which are used to try active American service members for crimes.

Any exceptions to those procedures, the court said, would be permissible only if the president demonstrated that it was "impracticable" to abide by the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

The military commissions at Guantánamo had at least two substantial deviations from court-martial procedures in the court's view: The defendant could be excluded from the courtroom, and evidence that would not typically be admitted in a court-martial could be used if the judge thought it was useful, including hearsay and information obtained through coercive interrogations or torture.

That means that the military commissions might be saved if changes were made to make them more like courts-martial or the president adequately demonstrated that it was impracticable to do so.

The court was not clear as to how the president could fulfill that requirement of proving it was impracticable to provide all the rights of court-martial proceedings. But one possibility is that he could get Congress to formally agree, which might oblige the court to defer to that judgment.

If Congress also moved to change the commissions' rules to make them more like court-martial proceedings — required the exclusion of hearsay and other questionable testimony and so forth — the commissions might be acceptable to the court. But lawyers inside and outside the military agree that it would make it exceedingly difficult for the government to win those cases with such restrictions.

"That's obviously why they didn't want to use the court-martial system in the first place," said John D. Hutson, a retired rear admiral who served as the Navy's top lawyer until 2000 and is now the dean and president of the Franklin Pierce Law Center in Concord, N.H.

The second major issue raised by the court is the finding that the protections guaranteed in a section of the Geneva Conventions known as Common Article 3 apply to the detainees, even those deemed to be members of Al Qaeda. The court noted that Common Article 3 (so called because it appears as Article 3 in all four Conventions) has long been regarded as a minimum baseline of rights that must be afforded to all prisoners.

Justice John Paul Stevens, in writing the majority opinion, noted that Common Article 3 requires that even a Guantánamo detainee "be tried by a regularly constituted court affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples." He suggested that the military commissions could not be regarded as "regularly constituted" courts because in the United States system, court-martial proceedings fulfilled that role. So again, Congress might consider declaring that the military commissions are regularly constituted courts and let the courts decide if that is adequate.

The invocation of Common Article 3 raises another important question. If its provisions about trials apply, so might its provisions that prohibit "humiliating and degrading treatment," which is a higher standard than the most restrictive domestic statute, the so-called McCain Amendment.

Congress Argues The Recrafting Of Terror Tribunals (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON

Two months after 9/11, President Bush announced a bold and controversial initiative. Under his power as commander in chief, he created a streamlined process in the military justice system to try members of Al Qaeda for war crimes.

The national debate that followed was rigorous and, at times, heated. But it produced no specific legislation affirming the new military-commission system.

Now, on the heels of a US Supreme Court rebuke of Mr. Bush for acting without clear legislative support, the debate is taking place again - this time in the halls of Congress. At issue is to what extent suspected terrorists should be afforded the same fair-trial protections as US soldiers facing prosecution in courts-martial.

The Bush administration and its supporters have said that generous procedural protections may make it difficult or impossible to prosecute some terrorists without revealing sensitive intelligence sources and methods.

Other analysts say that how the United States treats its captured enemies reveals something fundamental about America's character as a nation. They urge that Al Qaeda suspects be granted the same due process protections as American soldiers under the military justice system.

"If you set the higher standard, it is a signal to the rest of the world that we are treating these people under the rule of law," says Scott Silliman, director of the Center on Law, Ethics and National Security at Duke Law School.

In its ruling on June 29, the Supreme Court said the president's military commission process did not provide the minimal level of trial protections required under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) and Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

"The military commission was not born of a desire to dispense a more summary form of justice than is afforded by courts-martial; it developed, rather, as a tribunal of necessity," says Justice John Paul Stevens, discussing the history of such commissions in his majority opinion. "Exigency lent the commission its legitimacy, but did not further justify the wholesale jettisoning of procedural protections."

The challenge for Congress is to decide how best to balance the concerns raised by the Supreme Court against the flexibility desired by the Bush administration. Specifically at issue is whether to retain or rewrite rules that heavily favor prosecutors by allowing hearsay and coerced statements to be introduced as evidence. Stricter rules of evidence might prevent prosecution of terrorists where testimony was obtained through harsh interrogation tactics, legal analysts say.

The rules also allow for a defendant to be excluded from any portion of his trial dealing with classified information. Although the rules permitted an appointed military defense lawyer to attend the closed portions of the trial, the military lawyer was barred from ever disclosing or discussing the classified evidence with the defendant.

The Supreme Court did not announce a strict standard. Instead, the majority justices quoted a provision of Common Article 3 that requires the military commission be "a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples."

It will now be up to Congress to decide which judicial guarantees are "indispensable" in the context of military-commission proceedings against accused terrorists.

"Justice Stevens has done us all a favor," says David Rivkin, a Washington, D.C., lawyer who worked in both the Reagan and first Bush administrations. "This is a road map of how to fix" the commission process.

Mr. Rivkin notes that the Supreme Court invalidated the commission system based on statutory grounds, rather than identifying constitutional violations. Congress can respond to statutory problems by rewriting the law, Rivkin says.

He says Congress will probably preserve most of the Bush administration's approach. "The bottom line is you are going to hand up procedures that are probably a little less sweeping than the existing commission rules, but not by much," he says.

Others are pushing for broader protections. The Washington-based National Institute of Military Justice is proposing that Congress rewrite the UCMJ to mandate that military commissions use the same procedures as general courts-martial. "This was a very poor likeness of military justice," says NIMJ President Eugene Fidell of the invalidated commission process.

Mr. Fidell acknowledges that tougher trial standards may mean that some terror suspects are never brought to trial. "There are times when you have to do that," he says.

Professor Silliman, who served for 25 years as an Air Force judge advocate, agrees. "We are under a tremendous amount of attack in the world's public opinion as a result of the atrocities in Iraq and our handling of Guantánamo Bay," he says.

Rivkin, who supports more relaxed trial standards, says military jurors will be able to work through the evidence and other issues, and render fair verdicts. But he says the larger issue is not which procedures Congress enacts, but that Congress recognizes the symbolic importance of treating terror suspects differently. He says those who comply with the law of war deserve certain protections. Terrorists, who follow no rules or law, should not, he says.

Says Rivkin: "Here, society is saying: 'These people aren't just criminals; as terrorists, they are something else.' That doesn't mean they don't get due process, you just slice it differently."

Guantanamo Probe Finds Evidence Of Plot (AP-Y2)

By Ben Fox

AP2, July 9, 2006

An investigation into three apparent suicides at the Guantanamo Bay prison has found that other detainees may have helped the men hang themselves or were planning to kill themselves too.

Authorities who searched other detainees' cells after the three were found hanged discovered instructions on tying knots, along with several notes in Arabic that were "relevant" to an investigation of a possible broader plot, officials said in court papers filed late Friday in Washington.

The detention center's commander, Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris, said in an affidavit that investigators believe "the suicides may have been part of a larger plan or pact for more suicides that day or in the immediate future."

Authorities confiscated personal papers from nearly all 450 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay to "determine whether other suicides were planned or likely to be planned," Carol Kisthardt, the Naval Criminal Investigative Service agent in charge of the investigation, said in an affidavit.

Both affidavits were filed in support of a request for a judge to appoint a special review panel to review all the detainees' documents, which include letters from attorneys.

Lawyers for Guantanamo detainees have condemned the confiscation of the legal papers as a violation of attorney-client privilege and asked a judge to order their immediate return.

DOJ_NMG_0038786

Investigators said they confiscated about 1,100 pounds of personal documents after three detainees were found hanging from their steel mesh cells before dawn on June 10 — the first reported deaths of prisoners at the prison.

Bill Goodman, legal director for the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents about 200 detainees, said Saturday that a special review panel would undermine trust between prisoners and their lawyers and delay the legal process.

"It's another roadblock," Goodman said.

The government said the panel's independence would be assured, and detainees' rights protected, by its including lawyers, law enforcement and intelligence personnel and translators who have not taken part in any legal proceedings against detainees.

The special panel, or "Filter Team," would review all the material and report any information that threatens national security or involves "imminent violence" but would not divulge anything that would violate attorney-client privilege, the government said.

Authorities took the papers after finding a note in Arabic related to the suicides in the mesh wall of the cell of one of the prisoners found hanged to death, Kisthardt wrote.

The note did not appear to be written by the prisoner, or another of the detainees who committed suicide, and it was written on paper provided by lawyers stamped with the words "Attorney-Client Privilege."

Among the papers, investigators also found a printout of an e-mail written by someone on the base that appeared to contain sensitive information about the location of cells and operations at Guantanamo, where the U.S. holds men suspected of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

Investigators also confiscated envelopes from detainees marked "Attorney-Client Privilege" but did not review the contents to see if they had any relevant information, Kisthardt wrote.

The Gitmo Fallout (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Stuart Taylor Jr.

Newsweek, July 17, 2006

David Bowker vividly remembers the first time he heard the phrase. A lawyer in the State Department, Bowker was part of a Bush administration "working group" assembled in the panicked aftermath of the September 11 attacks. Its task: figuring out what rights captured foreign fighters and terror suspects were entitled to while in U.S. custody. White House hard-liners, led by Vice President Dick Cheney and his uncompromising lawyer, David Addington, made it clear that there was only one acceptable answer. One day, Bowker recalls, a colleague explained the goal: to "find the legal equivalent of outer space"—a "lawless" universe. As Bowker understood it, the idea was to create a system where detainees would have no legal rights and U.S courts would have no power to intervene.

The "outer space" line became something of a joke around the office, but Bowker and a handful of his colleagues didn't find it all that funny. The White House was already planning to fly terror suspects to Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, or other secret U.S. prisons overseas, where they would have no way to challenge their detention. In January 2002, Bowker and other State Department lawyers pushed back. After seeing a Justice Department memo arguing that Qaeda and Taliban prisoners did not even deserve basic protections under the Geneva Conventions, they warned that the administration was inviting an enormous backlash, both from U.S. courts and foreign allies. It would also, they feared, jeopardize President George W. Bush's plans to try such prisoners in specially created military courts. "Even those terrorists captured in Afghanistan ... are entitled to the fundamental humane treatment standards of ... the Geneva Conventions," William Howard Taft IV, the State Department legal counselor and Bowker's boss, wrote in a Jan. 23, 2002, memo obtained by NEWSWEEK. In particular, Taft argued, the United States has always followed one provision of the Geneva Conventions—known as Common Article 3—which "provides the minimal standards" of treatment that even "terrorists captured in Afghanistan" deserve.

But the complaints went unheeded. The hard-liners forcefully argued that in wartime, the president had virtually unlimited powers to defend the nation. They may come to wish they'd listened a little more closely to the warnings. In a ruling late last month, the Supreme Court came down squarely on the side of the dissenters. The case involved Ahmed Hamdan, a captured 37-year-old Yemeni who once served as Osama bin Laden's driver and now sits in a Gitmo cell. The court blocked the Pentagon's plans to try Hamdan as a war criminal in a military commission authorized by President Bush. The court's reasoning was complex, but the majority opinion, written by Justice John Paul Stevens, concluded that the military commissions, with their limited protections for the rights of the accused, violated the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the basic provisions of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions—precisely the argument that Taft, Bowker and other State Department lawyers had tried to make four years ago.

Administration officials and Washington lawyers are still digesting the text of the ruling, but it is already becoming clear that it could have ripple effects that extend far beyond the trial of Hamdan and other Guantánamo prisoners. The president has long argued that Congress granted him wide-reaching powers in the days after 9/11, when it passed a resolution authorizing him to use military force against the perpetrators of the attacks. But in his ruling, Justice Stevens took a much narrower view of the president's wartime powers, rejecting the administration's argument that military commissions of the kind Bush had created were covered by the resolution. Now other antiterror programs that the president has justified by invoking the same congressional resolution might be vulnerable to serious legal challenge. Some legal scholars and current and former administration officials believe the case could undermine the secret foreign detention centers and the NSA eavesdropping program, two cornerstones of the terror war. "This is an extremely damaging decision for presidential power," says a former senior administration lawyer, who asked for anonymity owing to his intimate involvement in the legal wrangling over prisoner treatment. "And it was largely a self-inflicted wound." The bitter irony: an administration determined to expand executive power may have caused a serious contraction.

Another possible side effect is that other countries, emboldened by the ruling, could use the case to justify efforts to bring war-crimes charges against CIA officers, U.S. service members and traveling government officials who had a hand in authorizing or carrying out harsh treatment of prisoners. Conceivably, those who violate provisions of Article 3—which mandate humane treatment for all captured prisoners—could also be criminally prosecuted by future administrations under a U.S. law known as the War Crimes Act. "This has opened up a can of worms," says Sen. Lindsay Graham, a South Carolina Republican. "You could have a situation if we don't bring some restraint where anybody who has done anything to an Al Qaeda suspect that's harsh could be prosecuted." Bowker says he and other State Department lawyers specifically warned about just such a scenario during the early debates. "The implications of this—for potentially being arrested and tried in other countries—is certainly a little scary," says Ted Olson, the former solicitor general.

Defenders of the administration's position put the blame for any such troubles on a Supreme Court they say is once again meddling where it doesn't belong. Historically, they argue, courts have given the president wide latitude during wartime. "It shows that the imperial judiciary thinks that, in addition to abortion, affirmative action and religion, war should be within its grasp," says John Yoo, now a Berkeley law professor, who was one of the chief authors of the administration's antiterror legal doctrines. But other insiders concede that the White House, by going too far, provoked the court to step in.

The court decision's possible effects have set off an intense debate within the administration over how to respond. One camp, headed by national-security adviser Stephen Hadley and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, want to use the decision as the basis for a wide-ranging "fix" that would accept a role for Congress and the courts on detainee issues. That would, at a minimum, require Congress to authorize military commissions under new rules that provide greater protections for the accused—and establish some standards for the treatment and interrogation of terror suspects. (It could also lead to a shutdown of Guantánamo—a goal President Bush has moved toward in recent weeks.)

But hard-liners—led by Addington, now Vice President Cheney's chief of staff—are fiercely resisting. They, along with some congressional Republicans, want to nullify the court ruling by rewriting portions of the Uniform Code of Military Justice and granting the president the powers the court rejected.

One person closely watching the case, and the fallout, is Hamdan himself. Last week, heavily guarded and shackled with leg irons, he met with his lawyer, Neal Katyal, to review the decision in a Gitmo interrogation room. He was "overcome with joy" that he might have a chance at a trial, Katyal says, and discussed the legal subtleties of the opinion. "He understood it better than most of the lawyers familiar with the case did," Katyal insists. A little farfetched, perhaps. But languishing in the cell, bin Laden's driver will have plenty of time to sharpen his analysis of the case that bears his name.

Lawmaker: Congress Not Told Of Programs (USAT)

USA Today, July 10, 2006

The Bush administration was running several intelligence programs, including one major activity, that it kept secret from Congress until whistle-blowers told the House Intelligence Committee, Chairman Pete Hoekstra, R-Mich., said on Fox News Sunday.

Hoekstra wrote to President Bush in May, warning him that failure to disclose intelligence activities to Congress may violate federal law. Hoekstra wrote that Congress "should not have to play 'Twenty Questions' to get the information that it deserves under our Constitution."

"I take it very, very seriously," Hoekstra said Sunday. "We've now been briefed."

The White House declined to comment directly on the allegations in Hoekstra's letter, disclosed in Sunday's New York Times. "We will continue to work closely with the chairman and other congressional leaders on important national security issues," said Alex Conant, a White House spokesman.

Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., told supporters in South Bend that if he runs for president his central theme would be to bring the country together. "I can be more of a force for reconciliation, and I think that's vitally important to our country right now," Bayh said after returning from three days of campaigning in Iowa, which holds the first presidential contest in January 2008.

Bayh, whose father, Birch, was an unsuccessful candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1976, said he likely will decide whether to run after Thanksgiving. He said whether he can raise enough money to be a viable candidate will be part of the decision, but not the primary factor.

Former U.S. House majority leader Tom DeLay suggested Friday that he is considering running again for Congress after a judge said his name must remain on the fall ballot in Texas.

DeLay, who is awaiting trial on charges of money laundering and conspiracy in a Texas campaign finance case, won the Republican primary in March. He resigned June 9 and said he had moved to Virginia.

A federal judge ruled last week in favor of the Democratic Party, which sued to keep DeLay's name on the November ballot.

DeLay told supporters in Sugar Land, Texas, he would decide whether to run after a federal appeals court reviews the judge's ruling.

Congressman Says Program Was Disclosed By Informant (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And Scott Shane

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 9 — The chairman of the House Intelligence Committee said Sunday that the Bush administration briefed the panel on a "significant" intelligence program only after a government whistle-blower alerted him to its existence and he pressed President Bush for details.

The chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan, wrote in a May 18 letter to Mr. Bush, first disclosed publicly on Saturday by The New York Times, that the administration's failure to notify his committee of this program and others could be a "violation of law."

Mr. Hoekstra expanded on his concerns in a television appearance on Sunday, saying that when the administration withholds information from Congress, "I take it very, very seriously."

Mr. Hoekstra and other officials would not discuss the nature of the undisclosed intelligence programs. But officials have said he was not referring to the National Security Agency's wiretapping operation or to the Treasury Department's bank monitoring program, both of which he was informed about. Mr. Hoekstra made clear on Sunday that he was particularly troubled by the failure to notify the Intelligence Committee of one particular major program.

"We can't be briefed on every little thing that they are doing," Mr. Hoekstra said in an interview on "Fox News Sunday." "But in this case, there was at least one major — what I consider significant — activity that we had not been briefed on that we have now been briefed on. And I want to set the standard there, that it is not optional for this president or any president or people in the executive community not to keep the intelligence committees fully informed of what they are doing."

The White House declined to comment on the issue Sunday but said last week that it would continue to work closely with Mr. Hoekstra and the intelligence committees.

The criticism of the White House was particularly surprising coming from a Republican committee chairman who has been an important ally of the Bush administration. Mr. Hoekstra has vigorously defended the administration's handling of a number of controversial issues, including the N.S.A. operation, the prewar intelligence on Iraq, and the treatment and interrogation of terrorism suspects.

Mr. Hoekstra has also been an outspoken critic of government employees who leak classified information to outsiders and of the news media for printing articles about it, and he has suggested that tougher legislation may be necessary.

But on Sunday, discussing how he learned of the administration's failure to brief the committee, Mr. Hoekstra said, "This is actually a case where the whistle-blower process was working appropriately."

"Some people within the intelligence community brought to my attention some programs that they believed we had not been briefed on," he said, adding, "They were right."

In talks with the administration, the committee "asked by code name what some of these programs" were, Mr. Hoekstra said. "We have now been briefed on those programs. But I wanted to reinforce to the president and to the executive branch and the intelligence community how important, and by law, the requirement that they keep the legislative branch informed of what they are doing."

Officials said in interviews last week that the administration had briefed the House Intelligence Committee at least twice in recent weeks, after Mr. Hoekstra's letter, to discuss details of the previously undisclosed programs. But some committee members say they remain wary that the administration is continuing to withhold information.

Regarding the leaks of classified information, Mr. Hoekstra said at a hearing on May 26 that he thought that there should be strong protections for intelligence agency whistle-blowers who bring their concerns to Congress, reducing the risk of leaks to the news media.

"We need to make sure the whistle-blower process is an open door," Mr. Hoekstra said at the hearing. Otherwise, he said, when intelligence officers see something they believe to be illegal or unwise, "they just go, 'Well, I'll just go to the press.' "

Congress is considering stronger protections for whistle-blowers, and a bill approved by the House Government Reform Committee in April would make it easier for intelligence agency employees to report concerns without fear of retaliation from superiors. But last month the Senate passed a separate whistle-blower bill that excludes employees of the intelligence agencies from its protections.

Hoekstra Urges Bush To Impart Intelligence Details (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

The Bush administration briefed top lawmakers on a significant intelligence program only after a key Republican committee chairman angrily complained of being left in the dark, the chairman said yesterday.

House intelligence committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) would not describe the program, but he said it was significant enough that the administration should have briefed him and others voluntarily, without waiting for them to learn of it through government tipsters.

"There was at least one major -- what I consider significant -- activity that we had not been briefed on that we have now been briefed on," Hoekstra said on "Fox News Sunday." "Some people within the intelligence community brought to my attention some programs that they believed we had not been briefed on. They were right."

Hoekstra said the briefings took place after he complained in a May 18 letter to President Bush of hearing about "alleged Intelligence Community activities" not described to committee members in classified briefings. "If these allegations are true," he wrote to Bush, "they may represent a breach of responsibility by the Administration, a violation of law and . . . a direct affront to me and the Members of this committee."

Yesterday, Hoekstra appeared mollified. But he said he still believes the administration falls short of its legal obligations to brief key congressional members on significant intelligence operations.

"I wanted to reinforce to the president and to the executive branch and the intelligence community how important, and by law the requirement, that they keep the legislative branch informed of what they are doing," he said. "It is not optional for this president or any president or people in the executive community not to keep the intelligence committees fully informed of what they are doing."

Numerous Democrats and civil liberties groups have alleged that the administration ignores laws involving due process and congressional notification in conducting surveillance and intelligence programs in the name of fighting terrorism. Until Hoekstra's May 18 letter was disclosed Saturday by the New York Times, the most prominent Republican questioning the administration's tactics was Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

Hoekstra's remarks left unclear the nature of the intelligence programs he alluded to in his letter. He did not specify whether they involved domestic surveillance, a contentious area in which newspapers have reported about programs involving warrantless wiretaps, extensive gathering of phone records and monitoring of international bank transactions. Hoekstra, like many other GOP lawmakers, has defended the programs as important tools in combating terrorism, and he has resisted Democrats' calls for full inquiries into the programs' legality.

Hoekstra also had shown deep interest in an April report by the National Ground Intelligence Center regarding 500 chemical munitions shells that Iraqi troops had buried in the 1980s, which were uncovered in 2004. Hoekstra and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) have said the shells justify claims that deposed Iraqi president Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, but the administration has not embraced those assertions. On June 29, Hoekstra complained in a letter to Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte about an administration background briefing for reporters that played down the shells' significance.

Sources said yesterday that they believe Hoekstra did not hear of the report on the shells until after he wrote to Bush.

An aide to Hoekstra said he could not elaborate on the chairman's letter to Bush or his remarks yesterday. The chairman did not respond to a request for an interview.

Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee, said in a statement that she agrees with Hoekstra that "vigorous congressional oversight is impossible unless the administration shares critical information with the appropriate committees of Congress."

Lawmaker Questions Bush Intel Programs (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, July 10, 2006

The White House possibly broke the law by keeping intelligence activities a secret from the lawmakers responsible for overseeing them, the House Intelligence Committee chairman said Sunday.

Rep. Pete Hoekstra, R-Mich., said he was informed about the programs by whistleblowers in the intelligence community and then asked the Bush administration about the programs, using code names. Hoekstra said members of the House and Senate intelligence committees then were briefed on the programs, which he said is required by law.

"We can't be briefed on every little thing that they are doing," Hoekstra said. "But in this case, there was at least one major — what I consider significant activity that we have not been briefed on. I want to set the standard there that it is not optional for this president or any president or people in the executive community not to keep the intelligence committees fully informed of what they are doing," he said on "Fox News Sunday."

Hoekstra complained to President Bush in a letter dated May 18 that was disclosed in Sunday's New York Times.

In the letter, Hoekstra said the failure to brief the intelligence committees "may represent a breach of responsibility by the administration, a violation of law and, just as importantly, a direct affront to me and the members of this committee who have so ardently supported efforts to collect information on our enemies."

Frederick Jones, spokesman for Bush's National Security Council, said the only comment the White House would have on the letter was that the administration "will continue to work closely with the chairman and other congressional leaders on important national security issues."

Hoekstra has been critical of the administration before. In his letter, he also objected to the president's nominees for the director and deputy director of the CIA. He also complains about the role of the director of national intelligence — a position created in response to the Sept. 11 attacks.

Helping The Terrorists (WT)

By Jack O'Neill

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

Everyone entrusted with U.S. government classified information is legally bound to protect it. They may not reveal the data to anyone not authorized to receive it. Collectively our national security depends on that trust. There are no exceptions. Or are there? What about individuals who seek out media surrogates to reveal classified information for them? In return these individuals demand protection from exposure and legal action. How can they be protected from exposure and legal action for such serious offenses? By the media erecting a solid, impregnable First Amendment stonewall.

There it is. If you want to reveal information critical to our national security for any reason, turn it over to a reporter. Once the information is in the hands of a reporter, the reporter and his or her news media claim the authority to decide its relevance to our national security and who should know.

On Dec. 15, 2005, New York Times reporters James Risen and Eric Lichtblau revealed that government sources had handed them classified information on how the National Security Agency uses the Echelon eavesdropping system in our war with terrorists. As requested by their sources, the New York Times then revealed this critical information to the world. Terrorists worldwide now know the details of a critical tool in our war against them. It's a fact. There will now be far fewer "dots" for our intelligence community to identify and connect.

It's a no-brainer how the terrorists, our sworn enemies, reacted.

The New York Times explained why they are protecting their sources: The sources "were granted anonymity because of the classified nature of the program." The New York Times then explained why these sources had violated the trust our nation had placed in them: "because of their concerns about the operation's legality and oversight." On June 23 of this year, New York Times reporters Risen and Lichtblau told the world that the CIA and the Treasury Department were using bank transactions obtained from a Belgian cooperative to track suspected al Qaeda members. Yes, the New York Times permanently erased even more "dots."

Can you hear terrorists cheering? Should government sources that reveal classified information to reporters feel secure hiding behind media-erected stonewalls? Consider the case of Dr. Wen Ho Lee, the atomic scientist at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico. He had been suspected of disclosing classified information to China.

During the media frenzy surrounding Dr. Lee, New York Times reporter Risen again reported information obtained from government sources. He wasn't alone. Along with the Times, reporters from The Washington Post, the Los Angeles Times, ABC News and the Associated Press all used information received from government sources during their hard-hitting media frenzy. Trouble is, Dr. Lee hadn't revealed any classified information. Dr. Lee sued the Energy and Justice departments, claiming they had violated his rights by revealing he was under investigation for being a spy.

During the federal trial, the reporters were ordered to reveal the government sources of their stories. The reporters refused. The federal judge held the reporters in contempt of court. The reporters faced fines and jail time. Their sources faced exposure.

The media organizations pleaded in federal court that the First Amendment protected the right of their reporters to refuse to identify their government sources. The media lost. The media appealed. Every appeal denied the existence of such First Amendment protection.

The media organizations were left with one last appeal -- to the Supreme Court. However, the Supreme Court had previously ruled that the First Amendment offered no such protection. If the media went to the Supreme Court and lost, their crumbling First Amendment stonewall would totally collapse. Their sources would be exposed in a public court, and the media would then be required to report the names of their sources to the world.

The legal staff of five media organizations jointly agreed that their only alternative was to buy their way out of their legal morass. They paid Dr. Lee $750,000 in order to void the contempt sanctions the judge had issued against the reporters.

In this case, the resources of media giants protected their reporters. Their reporters would not have to pay hefty fines or serve jail time.

But what about the media's anonymous sources that revealed the NSA's Echelon eavesdropping and the bank transactions used to track suspected al Qaeda members? Will the media giants commit all of their resources to protect and defend each and every one? Or will the media's anonymous sources be next to pay a price for erasing "dots"?

Investigations, Lawsuits Still Dogging 9/11 Lawyer (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

Carla J. Martin's moment of infamy ended nearly as quickly as it began.

An obscure government lawyer, she had been a minor player in the most major of cases: the death penalty trial of Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. But that all changed in an instant, when she violated a court order by sharing testimony with witnesses and coaching them about what to say.

Suddenly, the former flight attendant rocketed across TV screens and newspaper front pages, cast as the villain whose misconduct nearly derailed the prosecution's case. Berated by a federal judge, Martin, 51, walked out of an Alexandria courtroom with her head down -- and back into anonymity.

But even as her public profile has diminished, Martin's actions have spawned a wave of legal proceedings. Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are exploring the possibility of criminal charges against her, and Pennsylvania's lawyer disciplinary board has begun an investigation, according to court documents and sources familiar with the case. Martin remains on paid leave from the Transportation Security Administration, which is also investigating her conduct. And seven family members of Sept. 11 victims have filed suit against her in the District.

The woman at the center of the storm is emotionally distraught, crying when she talks about the criminal investigation and feeling like a prisoner in her own apartment, Martin's mother said last week.

"She's not doing very well. It's terrible, devastating for her," said Jean Martin Lay, who believes that her daughter did nothing wrong. "She doesn't do much of anything but stay at home, as far as I know."

Martin declined to comment through her attorney, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., who said: "She is doing probably as well as can be expected for somebody who is trying to see what her fate will be. We're just waiting to see how the government decides to proceed."

A longtime government aviation lawyer, Martin had been a liaison between the Moussaoui prosecutors and witnesses expected to testify about airport security. Although those witnesses were crucial to the government's argument that Moussaoui deserved to die for his role in the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, prosecutors said Martin's role was limited. She was merely a legal conduit who located files and arranged witness interviews and was never to be involved with legal strategy or litigating the case, they said.

Yet for reasons that remain a mystery, Martin e-mailed trial transcripts to seven witnesses and coached them on their testimony. In Alexandria, U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema had ruled that most witnesses could not attend or follow the trial and could not read transcripts to prevent them from altering their testimony to conform to what others had said.

An angry Brinkema halted the trial only a week after it had begun in March and accused Martin of "egregious errors" that undermined Moussaoui's constitutional rights. After an extraordinary hearing at which an agitated Martin declined to testify, the judge barred all seven witnesses from testifying -- effectively gutting the prosecution's argument for the execution of the only person convicted in an American courtroom in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Brinkema later allowed prosecutors to find new aviation witnesses not tainted by contact with Martin, and the trial resumed. Moussaoui was sentenced to life in prison in May. By that time, the criminal investigation of Martin was well underway, according to documents unsealed in U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

The U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, which prosecuted Moussaoui, has recused itself from the investigation, which is being led by a Philadelphia-based assistant U.S. attorney and two FBI agents.

Members of the Moussaoui prosecution team have been interviewed about their dealings with Martin, along with some of her Transportation Security Administration colleagues, according to law enforcement sources and lawyers familiar with the investigation. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the probe is ongoing.

Prosecutors have indicated to Martin's attorneys that criminal charges are possible, sources said, but it remains unclear whether they would be filed in court. Among the charges being considered, sources said, is lying to a federal officer, a felony. Prosecutors have been questioning witnesses about an incident in which a member of the Moussaoui prosecution team, David J. Novak, sent a letter to Moussaoui's attorneys saying that aviation industry witnesses they were seeking would not meet with them.

After hearing testimony in March, Brinkema called the letter a "bald-faced lie." It was based on information from Martin, prosecutors said.

Martin has also been warned by Brinkema that she could be held in criminal or civil contempt of court for violating the court order. Either the judge or the Justice Department can initiate a criminal contempt investigation, but any such proceeding is considered unlikely before the criminal investigation is completed.

Martin has met with the Philadelphia prosecutors at least once to answer questions and has turned over documents and her laptop computer, according to court documents and lawyers familiar with the case. Martin's attorneys are trying to persuade the government not to file charges, sources said, and part of their strategy is to blame the Moussaoui criminal prosecutors for not telling Martin about the court order barring contact with witnesses.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mary E. Crawley, who is leading the criminal investigation, said that because of the probe, "it would be inappropriate for me to say anything about that matter at this time." She declined to comment further.

Yolanda L. Clark, a spokeswoman for TSA, said that agency's investigation of Martin's conduct "is awaiting the conclusion of the criminal inquiry." Martin was a career Federal Aviation Administration lawyer who moved to the new TSA in 2002, largely because of her work on the case of the 1988 explosion of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland. The salary for her job title at TSA, an attorney adviser, is as much as $120,000.

The Disciplinary Board of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, through which Martin holds her law license, has also begun an investigation of Martin, according to law enforcement sources and a D.C. lawyer who filed an ethics complaint with the board about Martin's conduct in the Moussaoui case. The lawyer would not allow his name to be used, but he provided a copy of the complaint to The Washington Post. He said the board wrote him a letter saying his complaint was dismissed because the board had already initiated an investigation of Martin.

An official with the board did not return telephone calls.

Martin's attorneys have asked a federal judge in the District not to proceed with the civil suits against her until the criminal probe is completed. The suits, filed in U.S. District Court by seven people who lost relatives Sept. 11, argue that Martin "illegally coached witnesses and otherwise attempted to shade and alter evidence before the Moussaoui court" to help her "friends" in the airline industry avoid civil liability.

The seven Sept. 11 family members are among plaintiffs who have sued American Airlines, United Airlines and other defendants, alleging that they failed to prevent the attacks. Martin had been playing a role for TSA in that civil lawsuit that was similar to her role in the Moussaoui criminal case.

At a March court hearing in Alexandria, Brinkema speculated that Martin could have provided the testimony to the witnesses in the Moussaoui case out of "loyalty to the aviation industry." But the judge acknowledged that she didn't know what motivated Martin's actions and that they could have resulted from "overzealousness."

Al Qaeda Link To July 7 Sought (WT)

By Massoud Ansari

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

KARACHI, Pakistan -- Pakistani intelligence officials say they are on the trail of a British "go-between," the al Qaeda recruiter who reportedly introduced the July 7, 2005, bombers to Osama bin Laden's terrorist network, the Sunday Telegraph has learned.

The wealthy British passport holder, who is of Afghan origin, is thought to use the nom de guerre "Abdul Rehman," which means "willing disciple of God."

The Pakistani officials think that Rehman met the suspected attack ringleader Mohammad Sidique Khan, in a British mosque and later introduced him and fellow bomber Shehzad Tanweer to al Qaeda.

Rehman's recruiting role could prove crucial in piecing together al Qaeda's role in the London bombings. Rehman, thought to be in his 50s, is thought to have fought against the Russians in Afghanistan.

"When he was fighting against the Russians, he used to bring mujahedeen from the Western countries with him," an unidentified Pakistani official said. After the Russian withdrawal from Afghanistan, Rehman is thought to have recruited Muslim youths from the West to fight in Bosnia and Chechnya.

"He is very rich and quite often arranged funds for the militant organizations, before and after 9/11," the official added.

Rehman is thought to connect would-be terrorists to al Qaeda frontmen without necessarily being present when the two parties meet. He has succeeded in avoiding detection by operating on a small scale and exercising extreme caution, the official said.

"He passes on these individuals or small groups only when he is convinced that these boys are real jihadists," the official said.

The interest in Rehman's role developed only days after a video of Tanweer, in which he tried to justify his actions, was released to coincide with the first anniversary of the London bombings.

The video also featured a statement by Ayman al-Zawahri, al Qaeda's second in command. Al-Zawahri said Khan and Tanweer had been trained "in the manufacture of explosives" at camps run by the terrorist network.

Peter Clarke, the head of anti-terrorism at Scotland Yard, said last week that considerable uncertainty remained about exactly how, or whether, the July 7 bombers were linked to the terrorist network.

"It is not easy to find out what happened," Mr. Clarke said. "Such information as we do have does suggest there is probably a link to al Qaeda. We need to know who else, apart from the bombers, knew what they were planning. Did anyone encourage them? Did anyone help them with money, accommodation or expertise in bomb making?"

A Pakistani intelligence official said Rehman's role emerged in the interrogation of three militants arrested as they returned from Afghan terrorist training camps. He quoted one of the interrogated captives as saying: "Rehman had met with Khan in a mosque somewhere in [Britain], and Khan expressed his wish to obtain training to carry out terror attacks inside [Britain]."

It had been known that Khan and Tanweer traveled together to Pakistan between November 2004 and February 2005. It is now suspected that Khan, at least, was taken to a remote tribal area of Pakistan or Afghanistan. He was then put through a "crash course" in explosives training.

An intelligence official said: "This new course dispenses with much physical and mental training and lasts ... 10 to 15 days, while they impart various methods in explosives and detonators. This includes how to make suicide jackets, how to convert readily available goods like fertilizer into explosives, how to make car bombs and certain other tips."

Terrorism: From Al Qaeda—Plots And Promos (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

How real was the latest alleged New York terrorism threat? Several federal and local counterterrorism officials confirmed to NEWSWEEK that Lebanese authorities in April arrested a suspected Islamic militant for allegedly participating in a fairly elaborate plot to flood the PATH subway tunnels that carry New Jersey commuters to a station near Ground Zero in lower Manhattan. The officials, who asked for anonymity due to continuing investigations, said the plot involved blowing up a temporary barrier—called a slurry wall—that currently stops the Hudson River from flooding the site where the World Trade Center stood; according to the terrorists' plan, with the dike breached, water would pour into the cavity left by the 9/11 attacks and also undermine nearby skyscrapers and flood the trans-Hudson tunnels that carry PATH trains to New York from New Jersey. A federal counterterrorism official described the scheme as more "aspirational" than operational. Three of the officials said that while there was no evidence any of the latest New York plotters (two more plotters have been detained overseas and others are sought) had set foot on U.S. soil, the investigation was examining a possible Canadian connection.

News of the New York plot surfaced amid a flurry of new messages from Osama bin Laden, his chief deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri, and one of the suicide bombers in last July's attack on London. The new messages demonstrated the increasing media savvy of Al Qaeda's high command. A day or two before the release of one recent message from bin Laden, his media handlers issued Internet "teasers"—brief announcements declaring that a bin Laden message was about to be released. Later, an elaborately produced Qaeda message surfaced commemorating the London bombings; the presentation included a previously unseen extended English-language video of Shehzad Tanweer, one of the suicide bombers, and an American-accented Qaedite called Azzam the American. Zawahiri also appeared on tape to claim the London bombers had attended Qaeda camps (an assertion British and U.S. investigators have not yet validated). One of the U.S. counterterrorism officials said the use of promos and edited video packages with English speakers demonstrates the increasing sophistication of Al Qaeda's PR methods. The official also said the fact that Zawahiri appeared in recent video messages but bin Laden has appeared only in audio messages suggests the two terror leaders live apart, and that bin Laden is still stringently protecting himself.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NYC, Miami Cases Show FBI Efforts To Pre-empt Plots (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, July 10, 2006

The plotters hadn't bought explosives or even been to the USA to scout their alleged target, but Web postings convinced the FBI that a plan to blow up and flood New York City's commuter tunnels was, as assistant director Mark Mershon put it, "the real deal."

The arrests of the alleged plot's leader and two others, announced Friday, are typical of the FBI's post-Sept. 11 strategy in counterterrorism cases: detect and disrupt plots in their early stages rather than wait to collect additional evidence more likely to produce a conviction.

"The FBI is doing what they said they'd do," says Brian Levin, director of the Center for the Study of Hate and Extremism at Cal State University in San Bernardino.

"Because someone is maybe laughable, or doesn't look like your idea of a polished terrorist doesn't mean they're not capable of maximum destruction. So you try never to take that chance."

Friday's announcement followed the terrorism arrests last month of seven Miami men alleged to have discussed blowing up Chicago's Sears Tower.

The closest the men came to contacting al-Qaeda was meeting an FBI informant posing as a member of the terror group.

The cases have prompted some to suggest that the FBI is overstating the danger posed by wannabe jihadists.

"This is starting to look like the president's version of rounding up the usual suspects," says Joseph Cirincione, national security analyst for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank in Washington.

"There is a pattern of dramatic announcements, followed by revelations that these plots weren't as serious as we all initially thought."

Security specialists say the New York City case also highlights the FBI's increased attention to Islamic jihad websites. Increasingly, terrorists are using chat rooms and e-mail for training, planning operations and recruiting members, says Walid Phares, a scholar of Islamic terrorism at the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies in Washington.

"With the decline of al-Qaeda as a centralized organization, (the Internet) has become the host for a 'virtual jihad,' " Phares says.

In New York City, FBI officials went public only after the Daily News reported details of the case, including the name of the alleged plot leader, Assem Hammoud, and his arrest in Lebanon in April.

The FBI moved because plotters "were about to go to a phase where they would attempt to surveil targets … and acquire the necessary resources to effectuate the attacks," Mershon said.

DOJ_NMG_0038796

In a speech in May, deputy attorney general Paul McNulty credited this new “aggressive, proactive and preventative course of action” with winning 253 convictions in 435 terrorism cases since 2001. Cases are brought, he said, “at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws.”

Successful pre-emptive prosecutions include the cases of six Lackawanna, N.Y., men who sought terror training in Afghanistan, and six Portland, Ore., men and one woman who tried to travel to Afghanistan to fight with the Taliban. Six were arrested before they reached the battlefield.

Priority Shifts To Disruption Of Plots (WP)

By David B. Caruso

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- No one can know for sure whether an al-Qaida loyalist had what it took to follow through on a suspected plot to bomb Hudson River train tunnels. He had no explosives and no detailed plan, and isn't believed to have visited New York, authorities said.

But U.S. officials said they weren't willing to find out.

"We don't wait until someone has lit the fuse (to) step in and prevent something from happening. That would be playing games with peoples' lives," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Friday as Assem Hammoud's arrest in Lebanon was being announced.

Policy makers and security experts said the bust illustrates a shift in U.S. counterterrorism policy that has played out in other recent high-profile cases, including the arrest of seven men suspected of wanting to bomb Chicago's Sears Tower.

Law enforcers, they said, are now willing to act swiftly against al-Qaida sympathizers, even if it means grabbing wannabe terrorists whose plots may be only pipe dreams.

"Before 9/11, the FBI was thinking in terms of criminal convictions," said Rep. Peter King, chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

That meant waiting to act until investigators had hard evidence of a major crime, the New York Republican said. These days, he said, the priority is disruption.

"You may end up not winning it in court, but you get a bad guy off the street," he said.

Authorities announced the arrests of Hammoud and two suspected accomplices on Friday.

FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon called the suspects the "real deal," but he described the suspected scheme as being in its earliest stages. The plotters had only talked about an attack, authorities said.

The announcement came two weeks after the arrest of an unconnected group of men in Miami and Georgia on charges that they were talking about blowing up skyscrapers in Chicago.

In that case, an FBI official described the group of mostly U.S. citizens as "more aspirational than operational," with no explosives, funding or ties to established terrorist organizations.

The formative nature of the suspected plots prompted skepticism.

Joseph Cirincione, a national security analyst for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, said he worried that the arrests of rather minor conspirators were being played up for political purposes.

"This is starting to look like the president's version of rounding up the usual suspects," he said. "There is a pattern of dramatic announcements, followed by revelations that these plots weren't as serious as we all initially thought."

Some of the suspected plots taken to trial in the past few years have appeared to be unsophisticated, but that hasn't hurt prosecutors in court.

In May, a Brooklyn man, Shahawar Matin Siraj, was convicted of plotting to plant a bomb in a Manhattan subway station, despite defense claims that he was a patsy coaxed into discussing a bombing by a government informant.

In April, a federal jury convicted a young farm worker in Lodi, Calif., of supporting terrorists by visiting an al-Qaida training camp during a trip to Pakistan. Prosecutors claimed Hamid Hayat was interested in attacking hospitals, banks and grocery stores, but they presented no evidence of actual planning of such assaults at trial.

DOJ_NMG_0038797

In November, a young, outwardly pro-American Pakistani man was convicted in New York of trying to help an al-Qaida operative sneak into the United States, despite his claims that he wasn't aware that the acquaintance of his father's was a terrorist.

Chertoff said it would be a mistake to assume that the only terrorist "is the kind of guy you see on television, who's kind of a James Bond type."

"The fact of the matter is, mixing a bomb in a bathtub does not necessarily take rocket scientists," Chertoff said. "We would be dangerously putting people at risk if somehow we believed that only criminal masterminds or terrorist masterminds were threats."

In a speech to the American Enterprise Institute in May, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty defended government pursuit of groups that had not yet advanced to violence.

"In the wake of Sept. 11, this aggressive, proactive and preventative course is the only acceptable response from a department of government charged with enforcing our laws and protecting the American people," McNulty said.

Bag Searches Become Routine On NYC Subway (AP-Y2)

By Tom Hays

AP2, July 10, 2006

It was billed as a necessary counterterrorism tactic after the deadly mass transit bombings in London: Anyone entering the city's sprawling subway system could be subjected to a random search of backpacks, briefcases and shopping bags.

One year and countless searches later, the practice once thought of as a temporary imposition, with the potential to trample civil rights, remains in effect and is barely causing a stir.

"We consider it a valuable tactic to use," Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said in a recent interview. "It's not a panacea, it's not a cure-all, but it's another tool in our toolbox."

Officials won't say how many bags police have searched in the past year, or specify where and when they do it. Unpredictable deployment keeps would-be bombers off balance, they say.

The program has resulted in five arrests — not for terrorism, but for drug possession, disorderly conduct and other minor charges.

Still, the nation's largest police department considers the city's 468 subway stations and the average 4.5 million riders who use them daily on average to be ripe targets for terrorism. The subway inspections are just one element of a counterterrorism program that costs the NYPD roughly $200 million a year.

Each day, police set up checkpoints in a handful of stations across the city, often during the afternoon rush. A typical checkpoint has three uniformed officers equipped with a folding table and flashlights used to peer into bags, a far cry from the elaborate screening stations in airports.

At a checkpoint at the Wall Street subway stop last week, about every 10th person was stopped for a search that lasted perhaps 10 seconds. The officers shooed away some commuters who tried to voluntarily open their bags for inspection.

If the chosen were bothered, it didn't show.

"I'm trying to make a train, but it's OK," said Eric Mergenthaler, a 38-year-old stock trader. "I understand why they're doing it."

The New York Civil Liberties Union believed the searches were such violations of privacy that it went to court last year to stop them. A federal judge disagreed, saying that following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks the need for such measures was "indisputable, pressing, ongoing and evolving."

The NYCLU has appealed. Its lawyers argue the searches are too infrequent to be a real deterrent, yet frequent enough to violate constitutional rights.

"We're in favor of making people feel comfortable, but not at the expense of the Constitution," said NYCLU Legal Director Christopher Dunn.

Kelly cited a poll of registered voters last year that found 72 percent favored the program.

"The public seems to be happy with it, and the cops are positive about it," he said of the search program. "I think so far it's worked very, very well."

Storm Damage As Hurricane Season Begins, Disaster Insurance Runs Short (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven, Ian Mcdonald And Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

Last year's violent hurricanes continue to roil a vital corner of the insurance industry: Demand for disaster coverage is far outstripping supply, and the consequences are rippling through the economy.

The crunch isn't coming just because companies and individuals are buying more insurance. Insurers themselves, anticipating future destructive storms, are trying to buy more coverage on the policies they write -- a crucial segment of the business known as reinsurance. But reinsurers, which also paid out billions last year, are wary of getting hit hard again and have raised their rates substantially. Businesses and homeowners are paying the price.

In late January, a private-equity fund called First Reserve Corp. discovered firsthand how much the market has changed. The Greenwich, Conn., firm wanted to buy an oil-and-gas platform in the Gulf of Mexico. During a conference call with colleagues in Houston, the fund's executives learned that insuring the project would cost about $25 million a year, not the $2 million they'd expected.

"That kind of shut the room up," says Mark McComiskey, a managing director at First Reserve. The firm decided to kill the deal.

In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, billions of dollars poured into the insurance industry from investors hoping to profit from rising premiums. After hard hurricane seasons, such cash influxes often buoy insurers and help stabilize premiums.

But this time, the new capital was insufficient to soak up the increase in demand. "There's just this loud sucking sound in the market now," says J.C. Sparling, an executive vice president at Mercator Risk Services Inc., an insurance brokerage.

Disaster-insurance rates have risen so sharply that businesses with exposure to hurricanes are canceling projects, paying more for whatever coverage they can get, and in some cases, going without insurance altogether.

CDC Publishing LLC, a Vero Beach, Fla., firm that publishes construction-industry data, says it's spending 12 times as much for hurricane insurance as it did last year. Pinnacle Entertainment Inc., a Las Vegas-based hotel and gaming firm, cut its weather-catastrophe coverage from $400 million to $100 million after suffering extensive damage at a Biloxi, Miss., casino last year.

And Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said in May it would drop its coverage for severe windstorms because it had become too expensive. Instead, the retailer will cover losses from such storms out of its own pocket.

Some insurance players are stepping into the void. Hedge funds and private-equity firms are pouring billions of dollars into new and risky investment vehicles that provide capital to back coverage for specific risks. In addition, Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. seems to be betting big on reinsurance even as other investors pull back.

"If you like to watch football, you probably enjoy the game a little more if you have a bet on it," says Mr. Buffett. "I like to watch the Weather Channel."

After last season's devastating hurricanes, companies that predict the cost of storms rolled out new computer programs that foretold a mounting toll from future hurricanes. In addition, rating services such as A.M. Best Co. Inc. changed their approaches to judging the financial strength of insurers that write catastrophe policies. As a result, many insurers have to keep more cash in reserve to back up their policies.

After seven costly hurricanes in two years, insurers also are questioning how much risk they want to take in vulnerable coastal areas. The shortage of available coverage is particularly acute in the reinsurance sector, where insurers buy coverage against the policies they write. Hurricane Katrina caused nearly $40 billion in insured losses, and reinsurers covered more than half that total, according to Guy Carpenter & Co., a reinsurance brokerage unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos.

The cost of property-catastrophe reinsurance is projected to rise 25% this year, according to Robert Hartwig, chief economist at the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group. In hurricane-prone areas, rates are rising as much as fourfold, he says.

"There have been times where no matter what the price was, we've had a difficult time finding the [coverage] we need," says Dee Megna, the vice chairman of Guy Carpenter. "It's similar to the situation we saw post-Hurricane Andrew in 1993 and post-9/11, but this is actually worse than those two."

DOJ_NMG_0038799

The depth of the shortage has taken the industry by surprise in recent months. Paul Karon, chief executive of Benfield Inc., a U.S. reinsurance broker owned by the United Kingdom's Benfield Group Ltd., says prices for renewals rose about 25% on average on Jan. 1. By contrast, he said, June 1 prices doubled compared with the year earlier.

Allstate Corp., one of the nation's largest property insurers, bought significantly more catastrophe reinsurance than it had in the past. In last year's third quarter, the company registered a $1.55 billion hurricane-related loss. Earlier this year, it paid $400 million for $2 billion worth of reinsurance coverage for losses from hurricanes and other catastrophes.

Last year, U.S.-based insurers purchased about $37.5 billion in catastrophe reinsurance coverage, according to Benfield. This year, they will buy about $47.5 billion worth, a 27% increase, the firm says.

Allstate is aware that such coverage is getting harder to find. Referring to its deal earlier this year, Michael Trevino, a company spokesman, says: "I would guess we couldn't get it today."

There are many indications that Mr. Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway, which had $115.5 billion in cash and invested assets on hand at the end of March, is stepping into the fray. Berkshire boasts rare and coveted top ratings from services such as A.M. Best, Standard & Poor's, and Moody's.

The company's exact commitment to the hurricane business can't be learned, but people familiar with Berkshire's business say it's writing more reinsurance on oil rigs than in previous years. In addition, others in the insurance industry say they've noticed the company's increased presence.

"They were more active with us in the U.S. than they've ever been," says Mr. Karon of Benfield.

Mr. Buffett declined to comment specifically on how much Berkshire is underwriting. In his latest annual letter to shareholders, Mr. Buffett said he was willing to take on billions of dollars in risk if he got paid enough.

"If prices seem appropriate, however, we continue to have both the ability and the appetite to be the largest writer of mega-cat coverage in the world," he said.

One indication of Berkshire's activity: Berkshire Hathaway Reinsurance Group reported a 19% increase in the premiums it receives for writing catastrophe reinsurance in the first quarter, to $425 million. That increase follows a 22% increase in the previous quarter, compared with a year earlier.

Berkshire also sells insurance directly to businesses. Harrah's Entertainment Inc. went to Berkshire directly last December when it was facing a shortfall in coverage from other insurers after suffering big hurricane damage.

"They were one of the very few who were able to take a lead, primary position on an account such as ours," says Lance Ewing, risk manager for the company.

The reinsurance business is also getting a helping hand from Wall Street. Some firms are using a financial vehicle known as a sidecar. With sidecars, investors -- often hedge funds -- provide capital to back coverage for very specific risks, such as damage to gas rigs or Florida homes. Investing in a reinsurance company exposes investors to all kinds of insurance risks; a sidecar allows them to be more choosy.

If disaster strikes, the capital is tapped. If not, investors get their money back, plus premiums paid by policy holders. Benfield set up a sidecar with partners that raised about $310 million, which backs up policies it has taken on. Since Katrina, investors have sunk more than $3.2 billion into sidecars.

"You're betting on three months of weather, and then you're out," says Mr. Karon.

Benfield's sidecar proved very useful to Dale Hammond's company. His Homewise Insurance Group of Tampa, Fla., insures about 35,000 homes in Florida, largely against hurricane damage. The sidecar made possible 17.5% of the reinsurance the company wanted. "It was a good, creative solution using the financial markets," says Mr. Hammond.

Another, more-established route is catastrophe bonds. Investors get their cash back and an allotted return -- these days in excess of 10% -- if storms don't hit at a certain place and time. If a storm hits and losses rise above a stipulated level, insurers can tap investors' money to pay off claims. Insurers have raised about $2 billion so far this year through catastrophe bonds, as much as in all of 2005.

While creative, none of these solutions can keep up with demand. On May 9, an Atlanta, Ga., insurer, RSUI Group Inc., a part of Alleghany Insurance Holdings LLC, told agents it had not bought all the reinsurance it wanted. As a result, it wouldn't offer new hurricane insurance along the coast between North Carolina and East Texas, with a few exceptions.

Homeowners have had similar experiences in places like Florida, but individuals in many states have a backstop. In Florida, they can buy insurance from Citizens Property Insurance Corp., a state-created insurer of last resort that sells coverage to individuals who can't find it elsewhere.

For companies, on the other hand, the crunch could get costly. Wal-Mart's chief financial officer, Tom Schoewe, told analysts in May that storm coverage offered to the mammoth retailer this year was "substantially more limited and higher-priced" than previously.

Mr. Schoewe said buying coverage "did not make sense for Wal-Mart." Instead, the retailer is insuring itself. Wal-Mart wasn't specific about how it would do that -- and a spokesman declined further comment -- but typical options include paying for damage out of pocket or setting up its own insurance business.

If Wal-Mart had self-insured during its financial year ended January 31, 2005, that would have cost the company two cents in earnings per share, due to that year's storms. In fiscal 2006, the impact would have been four cents, according to Mr. Schoewe. That would have cut the company's net income by an estimated $168 million, or 1.5%, according to investment bank Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

Casino-operator Pinnacle Entertainment is taking risks beyond cards and roulette. After Hurricane Katrina, the company's Biloxi casino barge was found several hundred feet from the water on the other side of a highway, according to company disclosures at the time. Back then, Pinnacle had $400 million in coverage per storm, according to regulatory filings. Last month, the company told shareholders that due to tighter supply and higher rates, effective April 1 it has only $100 million per storm in weather-catastrophe coverage.

"It is unlikely that Pinnacle will obtain any additional coverage covering these risks this year," the company said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. A spokeswoman declines to comment.

The insurance industry is "going to drive commercial enterprises out of certain areas in this country," says Bill Black, president of CDC Publishing, which has three offices in Florida.

Last year, the company paid $10,000 in premiums for hurricane and business-interruption coverage. This spring, the premiums went up to $120,000. Another jump of a similar magnitude, Mr. Black says, could force him to consider relocating his Florida offices.

WAR NEWS:

Attacks In Iraq Intensify Sunni-Shiite Violence (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Masked Shiite gunmen roamed through a west Baghdad neighborhood Sunday, dragging Sunnis from their cars or picking them out on the street and killing them in a rampage that police said killed 41 people — a dramatic escalation of sectarian violence.

Hours later, two car bombs exploded near a Shiite mosque in the city's north, killing 17 people and wounding 38 in what appeared to be a reprisal attack, police said.

Black-clad Shiite militiamen manned checkpoints on roads into most major Shiite neighborhoods to guard against revenge attacks, as scattered clashes occurred across the Iraqi capital.

Sunni leaders expressed outrage over the killings, and President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, appealed for calm, warning that the nation stood “in front of a dangerous precipice.”

A senior government official, Haidar Majid, contested the police figures, saying late Sunday that only nine people died in the area of Jihad. Police Lt. Mohammed Khayoun insisted the figure of 41 was correct — with 24 bodies taken to Yarmouk hospital and 17 to the city morgue. The discrepancy could not be reconciled.

The attack could further enflame Shiite-Sunni tensions.

DOJ_NMG_0038801

The trouble started about 10 a.m. when several carloads of gunmen drove into the Jihad area along the main road to Baghdad International Airport, police and witnesses said. The gunmen stopped cars, checked passengers' identification cards and shot dead those with Sunni names.

U.S. and Iraqi forces sealed off the area. Smoke from burning tires wafted through the streets. A U.S. military statement said coalition and Iraqi forces found 11 bodies.

A Shiite shopkeeper said he saw heavily armed men pull four people out of a car, blindfold them and force them to stand to the side while they grabbed five others out of a minivan.

"After 10 minutes, the gunmen took the nine people to a place a few meters away from the market and opened fire on them," Saad Jawad al-Azzawi said.

Wissam Mohammad al-Ani, a Sunni, said three gunmen stopped him as he was walking toward a bus stop and demanded his identification. They let him go after he produced a fake ID with a Shiite name, but they seized two young men standing nearby.

The violence comes a day after a Saturday night car bombing at a Shiite mosque that killed two people and wounded nine.

The spokesman for a Sunni clerical association, Mohammed Beshar al-Faydhi, blamed the Jihad attack on the Mahdi Army militia, led by radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Faydhi told Al-Jazeera television that he had documents to prove it.

Al-Sadr denied responsibility and called on both Shiites and Sunnis to "join hands for the sake of Iraq's independence and stability." He assured Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, leader of the largest Sunni Arab party, that he would punish any of his militiamen if they were involved.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, has promised to disband Shiite militias and other armed groups, which are blamed for much of the sectarian violence. On Friday, Iraqi troops backed by U.S. jets raided a Shiite militia stronghold in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood, killing and wounding dozens of people.

Scores Of Sunnis Killed In Baghdad (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Saad Al-Izzi

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 9 -- Shiite Muslim militiamen rampaged through a Sunni Arab neighborhood in Baghdad early Sunday morning, killing more than 50 people and discarding bodies in the streets, according to Iraqi officials and witnesses. Hours later, attackers struck back, detonating two car bombs near a Shiite mosque.

Sunni politicians described the violence against the Sunni residents of the al-Jihad neighborhood in western Baghdad as one of the deadliest waves of murder since the aftermath of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

The killings occurred on a day when the U.S. military announced charges against four soldiers in the alleged rape and murder of a girl and the killing of three members of her family in the southern Iraqi town of Mahmudiyah. [Details, A14.]

Sectarian killings escalated sharply across Iraq after a bomb destroyed a revered golden-domed Shiite shrine in Samarra on Feb. 22. The bombing prompted reprisal attacks on Sunni mosques and pushed the country further toward all-out civil war.

In Baghdad on Sunday, the armed men, some wearing masks and dressed in black, descended on the al-Jihad neighborhood in buses after sunrise. They set up checkpoints along a main commercial street, demanded identification cards from passersby and burst into homes to single out Sunni Arabs to kill, residents said.

One resident, Hazim al-Rawi, said he gathered up his family and fled the neighborhood after he saw 15 bodies outside his home.

"Some of them were tortured with drills," he said of the bodies. "Some of them were hanged by ropes."

A U.S. military spokesman said that Iraqi national police and American soldiers found 11 dead Iraqis in three locations in the neighborhood. The higher casualty reports "do not marry up with what we have found," Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington said.

Still, Sunni politicians said the spate of attacks gravely exacerbated the problems in Baghdad, where killings occur almost daily, and they accused Iraqi police of collaborating with Shiite militiamen in the violence.

"This is a new step. A red line has been crossed," said Alaa Makky, a Sunni member of parliament. "People have been killed in the streets; now they are killed inside their homes."

DOJ_NMG_0038802

Attackers retaliated by detonating two bombs in cars parked at al-Timim Shiite mosque in central Baghdad. At least 12 people were killed, including five policemen, and 18 were wounded, according to Lt. Col. Memduh Abdulla of the Rusafa police district. The Associated Press reported that 17 people were killed and 38 hurt.

"We've said it several times that there are people who want to create civil war," Wafiq al-Samarrae, an adviser to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, said on al-Jazeera television. "Today, this country is on the edge of civil war, not sectarian strife."

Police picked up 57 bodies from the al-Jihad neighborhood, and three Interior Ministry policemen were also killed there, said Ali Hussein, a commando with the Interior Ministry who ferried bodies to Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital. Gen. Saad Mohammed al-Tamini of the Interior Ministry confirmed that more than 50 people were killed.

Some of the corpses that littered the streets lay handcuffed, pocked with bullet holes, while others were pierced with bolts and nails, witnesses said.

Iraqi officials and residents of the neighborhood identified the gunmen as members of the Mahdi Army, the powerful militia controlled by the radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. In the past three days, Iraqi troops, with the support of U.S.-led forces, have raided the homes of militiamen and detained some of their leaders.

U.S. commanders and diplomats say Sadr and his militia constitute one of the gravest threats to Iraq's security. Two years ago, U.S. forces fought Mahdi Army militiamen in Baghdad and in the southern holy city of Najaf. Sadr also holds considerable sway over the political system, with ties to more than 30 members of parliament and several cabinet ministers.

On Sunday, Iraq's deputy prime minister for security affairs, Salam al-Zobaie, accused the Defense and Interior ministries of working with the militias to carry out the killings.

"Interior and Defense ministries are infiltrated, and there are officials who lead brigades who are involved in this," Zobaie said in an interview on al-Jazeera. "What is happening now is an ugly slaughter."

After the killings, Sadr appealed for calm but criticized what he called a "Western scheme" that foments "a civil and sectarian war among brothers."

"Iraq is passing through a critical phase and a worsening security situation in spite of the presence of an independent government," Sadr said in a statement. "I call on all parties, both governmental and popular, to exercise self-control first, and to shoulder their responsibility before God and society."

Other officials in Sadr's organization condemned the killings in al-Jihad and denied that the Mahdi Army was involved.

"We regret the statements made by some Sunni Arabs who said that the Mahdi Army militia had conducted the raid at Jihad and killed the innocent people there," said Riyadh al-Nouri, a top aide to Sadr and his brother-in-law. "If the Mahdi Army wanted to enter into a fight, Iraq would become a blood bath."

In al-Jihad, a predominantly Sunni neighborhood along the road to Baghdad International Airport, police in white pickup trucks patrolled the roads. Fighters gathered in the streets holding rocket launchers and belts of machine-gun ammunition while helicopters swarmed overhead. A hot wind scoured the neighborhood, scattering the black smoke that billowed from burning tires.

The Iraqi government later imposed a daytime curfew in the neighborhood, and mosque loudspeakers broadcast warnings that residents should flee or they would be killed.

Hayider Hussein, a resident, said that outside his house, militiamen were milling around a minibus in which the bodies of the driver and a dozen passengers could be seen.

"They were all shot in the head," he said.

Ali Muhsin, 58, a retiree who lives in the neighborhood, said he saw gunmen in three cars pull up near his house and begin shooting people. Four corpses lay on the ground about 100 yards from his door and he saw four other people shot at a vegetable market nearby, he said.

Muhsin described seeing gunmen get out of a sedan, remove two bodies from the trunk "and throw them on the street."

Residents said the violence stemmed from a car bomb attack on the Shiite al-Zahra mosque Saturday night, expanding into door-to-door pursuit of Sunnis by Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0038803

Outside the morgue at the Yarmouk Hospital, a distraught woman wearing a red head scarf searched for her missing brother. At 7 a.m., she said, black-clad gunmen broke into her house and demanded to know the family's tribal name. When her brother responded "Jubour," one of the gunmen said, "You are definitely Sunnis."

"I swear on Hussein, I swear on Ali, that we are Shiites," her brother, Muzahim Salman, pleaded, referring to relatives of the prophet Muhammad who are revered by Shiites.

The gunmen locked the woman, who refused to give her full name, and her mother in a room before kidnapping her brother. A half-hour later, she said, she called her brother's cellphone.

"The man who answered said: 'We are the Mahdi Army. We killed your brother. Go to the morgue and pick up his body.' "

Sectarian Fighting Intensifies In Baghdad (LAT)

By J. Michael Kennedy And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Shiite militiamen and Sunni Arab insurgents went on murderous sprees here Sunday, killing at least 60 people in shootings and bombings in a bloody outbreak that raised the specter of a city sinking deeper into sectarian warfare.

The Sunday-morning killings of at least 36 Sunni Arab men by Shiite militiamen in the Jihad neighborhood, in apparent retaliation for a mosque bombing the previous night, were among the most serious examples of open street warfare between Shiites and Sunnis to date.

The execution-style killings immediately set off a political firestorm, with one Sunni leader accusing the government of negligence and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, downplaying the events, insisting that the "situation in Baghdad is under control."

But as dusk settled, a pair of car bombs apparently set off by Sunni Arab insurgents damaged a Shiite mosque in a northern Baghdad neighborhood, killing at least 19 worshippers and wounding 59 others, possibly setting the stage for another round of reprisal killings by Shiite gunmen.

The violence came in the same day that the U.S. military announced that five more U.S. soldiers had been charged in connection with the alleged rape of an Iraqi and the slaying of the young woman and her family in March. Four soldiers were charged with rape and murder, the fifth with dereliction of duty. None was named.

Last week, a former U.S. Army private, Steven D. Green, was charged with rape and murder in federal court in Charlotte, N.C. He pleaded not guilty.

The sectarian violence underscored a dramatic worsening of security conditions in the capital even after the formation of a government in May and the imposition of a massive lockdown by Iraqi troops and police. It also raised fears that the beleaguered country might soon dissolve into all-out civil war.

Sunni Arab politicians, who have already threatened to pull out of the nascent government, blamed the violence on Shiites, demanding that security forces crack down on militias who are believed to operate in part out of the security services.

"Acts of militias are now being expanded in Baghdad and they have become a source of concern and harm to people," said Vice President Tariq Hashimi, the head of the largest Sunni Party, adding that the government needed to "safeguard the lives of the innocent, who have become targets for these militias."

Violence in the religiously mixed Jihad neighborhood began Saturday morning after a suicide bombing at a Shiite mosque killed at least eight worshippers and passersby, officials said.

Early Sunday morning, militiamen began roaming the neighborhood and setting up checkpoints, asking those trying to pass through to show their identity papers, which give name and tribe -- both clues to whether the bearer might be Sunni or Shiite.

One witness, who asked not to be identified, said Shiite gunmen took to the streets about 7 a.m. and established a roadblock a short distance from his home. He said a neighbor of his, a Sunni, was loaded on to a bus filled with gunmen after he showed his identity papers.

"There have been some problems in this neighborhood," said the witness. "But it never reached killing because you showed the wrong identification card."

By midmorning, a number of bodies were strewn about the streets and Sunni insurgents had set up their own roadblocks nearby in retaliation.

A hospital official where bodies were taken said at least 36 young Sunni men were killed, many pulled from their home or vehicles. Also among the dead from the Jihad fighting was a Shiite family of five, a mother and four children, who were killed when gunmen tossed a grenade into their home, hospital officials who received the victims said.

At midmorning, Iraqi and U.S. troops sealed off the area, with helicopters whizzing above. The neighborhood is only a short distance from the U.S. military headquarters here, located adjacent to the Baghdad International Airport.

The Saturday-night car bomb that apparently triggered the attack took place a short distance from the Zahra Shiite mosque. At least eight people were killed and more than a dozen others were wounded in the explosion, a hospital official said.

A number of Shiite and Sunni mosques have been attacked in recent days, each apparently in reprisal for the other.

In the aftermath of the killings Sunday morning, the prime minister's office issued a brief statement saying that some media reports overstated the seriousness of the situation.

"The situation in Baghdad is under control and the concerned apparatuses are dealing with what is going on," said the statement.

However, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, described Iraq as being "upon a dangerous edge." He called on Iraqis to remain calm and avoid any immediate response to the killings, but also to be watchful.

"What happened today requires us to be honest with ourselves and others to condemn these horrendous actions loudly," he said.

Also Sunday, two Sunni clerics from the Muslim Scholars Association were killed in Samarra as they were driving away from a local mosque. A car pulled alongside them and gunmen dressed in camouflage and black masks shot the clerics and sped off.

Officials in the increasingly violent northern city of Kirkuk, at the heart of a volatile oil-rich province claimed by ethnic Kurds, Arabs and Turkoman, said at least four police and civilians were killed and six injured in various shootings and bombings throughout the city.

Gunmen Massacre Dozens In Baghdad (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

Gunmen massacred dozens of people in a Sunni district of Baghdad on Sunday, in what appears to be an escalation of the sectarian violence which has engulfed the country for nearly five months.

Bombings and abductions are common in many parts of the city, but this was one of the first times a group of gunmen had taken control of a section of Baghdad and conducted a massacre on this scale.

The interior ministry said at least 42 people had been killed in the attack in the Jihad district, a possible reprisal for the Saturday car-bombing of a nearby Shia mosque that killed three.

Iraqi security sources quoted by wire agencies said the gunmen had set up fake police checkpoints and pulled motorists from cars, or checked identity papers for Sunni names, before gunning their victims down.

Residents and Sunni politicians blamed the Mahdi Army, loyal to radical Shia leader Muqtada al-Sadr, for the massacre, but Sadrist spokesmen denied responsibility. Sadrist sympathisers say the militia targets only known extremists who carry out attacks against the Shia.

Shia militants have recently given signs of imitating some of the tactics of the more radical Sunni groups. Last week, presumed militiamen kidnapped a Sunni legislator, Tayseer al-Mashhadani, and sources in the Iraq Islamic Party to which she belongs say her abductors have issued demands including release of detainees and a halt to the bombing of Shia mosques.

As a result, the main Sunni coalition has boycotted parliament and says it is considering pulling its four ministers out of the cabinet, which would be a significant setback to Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

Iraqi security forces appear to be cracking down on the militias. The US military reported that Iraqi soldiers had raided a militant stronghold early on Sunday in the Shia district of Kadhemiya, killing nine and capturing seven.

Meanwhile, four more US soldiers were charged with rape and murder and a fifth with dereliction of duty in the alleged massacre of a family in the district of Mahmudiya, south of Baghdad.

Baghdad Erupts In Mob Violence (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 9 — A mob of gunmen went on a brazen daytime rampage through a predominantly Sunni Arab district of western Baghdad on Sunday, pulling people from their cars and homes and killing them in what officials and residents called a spasm of revenge by Shiite militias for the bombing of a Shiite mosque on Saturday. Hours later, two car bombs exploded beside a Shiite mosque in another Baghdad neighborhood in a deadly act of what appeared to be retaliation.

While Baghdad has been ravaged by Sunni-Shiite bloodletting in recent months, even by recent standards the violence here on Sunday was frightening, delivered with impunity by gun-wielding vigilantes on the street. In the culture of revenge that has seized Iraq, residents all over the city braced for an escalation in the cycle of retributive mayhem between the Shiites and Sunnis that has threatened to expand into civil war.

The violence coincided with an announcement by American military officials that they had formally accused four more American soldiers of rape and murder, and a fifth soldier of "dereliction of duty" for failing to report the crimes, in connection with the deaths of a teenage Iraqi girl and three members of her family.

With movement in Baghdad difficult after a military cordon was established to suppress the violence, facts were hard to ascertain. The death toll from the shootings alone ranged from fewer than a dozen, according to the American military, to more than 40 reported by some news services. The bombing near the mosque later claimed at least 19 lives and left 59 wounded, officials said.

The military's announcement about the soldiers brought to six the number implicated in the rape-murder, one more than previously disclosed. The case has enraged Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and led to apologies by the highest American military and civilian officials in Iraq. A photograph of the girl's passport distributed by news agencies on Sunday showed that she was 14.

Only seven weeks old, Mr. Maliki's government is facing increasingly difficult obstacles. Worsening violence has undermined his intention to disarm the country's sectarian militias. At the same time, the growing furor over criminal accusations against American troops has tested Mr. Maliki's divided loyalties to his American allies and to an Iraqi public that has grown weary of the American presence.

The killings on Sunday in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Jihad began in late morning, near the site of a car bomb explosion in front of a Shiite mosque on Saturday, residents and officials said. Initial reports said the bombing had killed three people, but the American military said Sunday that at least 12 people, including 3 children, had died in the blast, and at least 18 had been wounded.

According to some residents and Sunni Arab officials interviewed by telephone, the gunmen, whom they accused of being members of a feared Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army, set up checkpoints around the neighborhood, indiscriminately pulled scores of Sunni Arabs from their homes and cars and killed them on the street. Other bodies were found with their hands bound behind their backs and gunshots in their heads, residents said.

But as often happens in Iraq, accounts of the violence varied widely. Residents and some Iraqi officials said in interviews that more than 35 people had been killed in the attacks. The Associated Press quoted Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razzaq of the Iraqi police as saying that 41 bodies had been taken to hospitals. And an official at Yarmouk Hospital, the main medical center in western Baghdad, said in a telephone interview that at least 23 bodies had been delivered from Jihad, and 10 people had arrived wounded from the shootings.

But American and some Iraqi security officials said the casualty figures were far lower. Lt. Col. Jonathan B. Withington, spokesman for the Fourth Infantry Division, which oversees security around Baghdad, said the Iraqi police had reported finding only 11 bodies. It was unclear whether that toll included victims delivered to the morgue.

American and Iraqi security officials also said they could not confirm the accounts of the seemingly arbitrary street killings, and Colonel Withington said the Iraqi security forces were mobilized immediately after reports of "sporadic gunfire" in Jihad. By early afternoon, Iraqi and American forces had sealed off the neighborhood, officials said.

Several prominent Sunni Arab political and religious leaders criticized the Iraqi and American security forces for their inability to control the violence. In comments broadcast on Al Jazeera, Salam al-Zubaie, a deputy prime minister and a Sunni, called the events in Jihad "a real massacre," and suggested that the country's Shiite-led security forces were to blame because they had been infiltrated by militiamen. The government forces, he said, "coordinate with these filthy terror groups who are roaming the streets."

Mr. Maliki's office, in a statement, tried to distance itself from Mr. Zubaie's comments, saying "they do not represent the government's point of view." Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, has vowed to crack down on militias regardless of sectarian affiliation and to eradicate militia influence from the government's security forces.

In recent days, American and Iraqi troops have conducted several operations against the powerful Mahdi Army militia, which is loosely under the control of the influential Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, and is regarded by Sunni Arab leaders as a main force behind many sectarian reprisal killings. Iraqi and American forces captured two Mahdi Army leaders on Friday and raided a suspected militia bastion on Saturday.

Some Jihad residents and Sunni Arab leaders accused the Mahdi Army of committing the killings on Sunday, but officials in Mr. Sadr's organization denied that. "The Mahdi Army takes care of the national interest," Abdel Hadi al-Daraji, a spokesman for Mr. Sadr, told Al Jazeera. Mr. Sadr joined other government leaders in publicly calling for calm, and he requested an emergency session of Parliament to discuss the crisis and "prevent a sea of blood," his office said in a statement.

President Jalal Talabani warned Iraqis against falling prey to "acts of violence that some want to look sectarian."

Militias of all stripes appeared to be bracing for fallout from the morning's attacks. Mahdi Army fighters interviewed by telephone said they were preparing for a wider battle. Mahdi militiamen had set up checkpoints in the city's predominantly Shiite neighborhoods and, according to residents, were preparing for Sunni reprisals. A Mahdi Army platoon commander who identified himself only as Sheik Faleh said, "If anything happens, we will attack."

Later in the day, the deadly double-car bombing next to a Shiite mosque in Kasra, a mixed neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad, also seemed intended to stoke sectarian fury.

Seven people were killed and at least eight wounded in various insurgent attacks around Kirkuk, including a bomb that exploded in a bus, killing one civilian and wounding seven, the police said. In Samarra, gunmen assassinated a top official in the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni organization, and two of his guards, the police said, while in Karbala, a police captain was killed.

The American command here said an American soldier was killed early on Sunday in the greater Baghdad area in a "noncombat-related incident," but did not elaborate.

In the rape-murder case, the American military did not identify the five newly accused soldiers, who remain on active duty in Iraq. The first to be implicated was Steven D. Green, a recently discharged private first class arrested June 30 in North Carolina on suspicion of participating in the crimes on March 12.

A affidavit filed in the case against Mr. Green implicated five soldiers: Mr. Green; three soldiers who accompanied him to the farmhouse in the town of Mahmudiya, 20 miles south of Baghdad, where investigators say the rape and murders took place; and another soldier who remained at a checkpoint.

But the new accusations, made Saturday and disclosed Sunday, indicate that another soldier was also inside the farmhouse at the time of the crimes, according to a military official who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to publicly discuss such details.

The soldier who has been accused of dereliction of duty is, according to the military statement on Sunday, "not alleged to have been a direct participant in the rape and killings," suggesting that it was the soldier who was aware of the plan but stayed at the checkpoint.

The formal accusations against the five soldiers set in motion the military's court-martial process. According to military officials, the soldiers will now face an investigation under Article 32 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, a process similar to a grand jury hearing, which will determine whether enough evidence exists to put the men on trial.

In Iraq's Mayhem, Town Finds Calm Through Its Tribal Links (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

AMARA, Iraq — In the soft heat of the late evening in this southern Iraqi town, men come to the Najmawi coffee shop to play dominoes. Lights illuminate faces. Tiles click quietly.

The scene, which unfolds nightly in a garden near the Tigris River, is unimaginable in central and western Iraq, where night turns neighborhoods into dangerous ghost towns.

It was not always this tranquil. It used to be that Shiite Islamists smashed furniture and stopped games at Najmawi's. Dominoes, they said, were un-Islamic.

The British forces charged with security here did not intervene. They have enough troubles of their own, they said, trying to keep themselves safe on routine patrols.

But in a surprising twist, the region's tribes, particularly powerful in neighborhood life here, have weighed in forcefully, using their authority, often in a nonviolent way, to force the Islamists to back off.

Large portions of Iraq's rural south have been relatively peaceful, like the provinces of Muthana, where Japanese forces recently left, and Dhi Qar, whose capital, Nasiriya, is patrolled by the Italians, and it is possible that tribes are playing a similarly quiet but central role in keeping order.

"Now people feel safe," said Hassan al-Najmawi, 31, the coffee shop owner. The Islamists, he said, "have lifted their hands from the dominoes, the music shops, the young people's clothing."

The story of how Amara, the capital of a leaf-shaped province called Maysan, came to be relatively safe for its citizens — even as danger increased for the British — is a hopeful tale of small-town camaraderie, fierce independence and, above all, tribal power.

It offers an alternative to the grim formula that has applied in the provinces where a poisonous mix of sects, political parties and ethnicities has led to relentless bloodletting that the central government has been powerless to stop.

The differences reflect, in part, fundamental splits between rural and urban life in Iraq. Maysan, a province of about 920,000, is the countryside. More than 60 percent of its work force is employed in the private sector, mostly farming; in the wealthier, urban areas, a majority is employed in public service.

Because it is rural, it is smaller and easier to control than the bigger, more fractured communities in the cities, like Basra to the south, Iraq's second largest city.

There, many political parties and their militias are fighting over control of the province and its oil. Amara has just two militias, both Shiite: the Mahdi Army, loyal to the anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, and the Badr Organization, the armed wing of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

But the most important factor is the network of tribes.

In cities, generations of busy urban life have dulled people's tribal connections, while in the countryside, particularly in the south, tribes oversee all aspects of daily life — celebrating weddings, intervening in family disputes, administering justice after a killing and collecting money to help someone in need.

The 14 or so tribes in Maysan, with its vast expanses of marshes, are particularly strong — if often at odds with one another.

Even Saddam Hussein could not force the marsh Arabs, as they are known, to submit. He resorted to digging giant canals to drain their wetlands and stamp out their way of life.

"The tribe in Iraq is the basic building block of society," said Abd al-Kareem al-Mahamedawy, a tribal sheik from Amara who fought Mr. Hussein for years.

Mr. Najmawi is a smiling 31-year-old who laughs a lot and has difficulty sitting still. He has lived in Amara his whole life, and took it personally when, about a year after the American invasion, religious Shiites and their militias began to boss people around. Local men who called themselves members of the Mahdi Army, the grass-roots armed group that follows Mr. Sadr, began to come to his shop and disrupt business.

DOJ_NMG_0038808

"They are troublemakers," he recalled, sitting in an office in his shop on a balmy evening in late May. "They don't feel shy. They do anything." The militia asked to use his cafe for a meeting. He refused. He later allowed a civil society group to hold a seminar on corruption in Amara. His shop was bombed that night. Suspicions focused on the Mahdi militia.

Meanwhile, the Islamists were using the new lawlessness to impose their will, delivering lashes to those found with alcohol in their cars and confiscating un-Islamic merchandise. But the population of Amara is small, about 300,000, and residents knew who was part of the militia.

"I have a big coffee shop," Mr. Najmawi said. "You see how many people are in it. I know who likes Mahdi militia, and I know who hates them. Let me tell you, only a very few join them."

The reaction of the tribes was hardly a foregone conclusion. In the American-led effort in Iraq, they were an afterthought. Few were courted, and they were all but left out of the political process, which began here in earnest in early 2005.

Followers of Mr. Sadr dominate the 42-member provincial council. The governor is a former Mahdi Army commander. The police chief is a former Badr member.

"We didn't go the extra mile to encourage the tribes to participate, which was perhaps a mistake," said Edward Ferguson, the British political adviser in Amara.

And they fight among themselves. Lt. Col. David H. Labouchere, the commander of the British forces here, described what appeared to be tribal fighting that he watched at night from a helicopter in April. Mortars and rocket-propelled grenades exploded without stop, and when the electricity went out, the village, outside of Amara, "lit some fires and kept on fighting," he said.

But a direct attack from a militia brought the tribes together. In May 2005, two Mahdi fighters bombed the Manar engineering company, which belonged to the Kaabi tribe, infuriating its leaders. In a tribal trial called a fahsal, the attackers' families agreed to pay $18,000 in damages and to banish the two men from Amara.

A short time later, the Kaabi tribe invited the town's leading tribal sheiks to its mudhif, a guesthouse made of reeds that is the rough equivalent of a town hall.

"We invited them all," said Khalid Jabor al-Ali, the Kaabi sheik.

The gathering agreed to punish any militia member who attacked a tribe or its property. The tribes would watch the townspeople and the known militia members among them.

Suddenly, the stakes for carrying out an attack were substantially higher.

"We said anyone who does rebel attacks, his blood will no longer be tribal blood, and his tribe will reject him," Mr. Ali said, sitting on a mat in the same mudhif.

Gradually, quietly, he and other sheiks said, life began to shift.

Amar al-Sadi, 24, the owner of Al Qawthar Music Shop, said attacks on shops, common a year ago, had become rare. Islamic militia members still come from time to time to make sure the shop, which also sells movies, has no pornography, but mostly he is left alone.

Even people on the street seem irreverent. On an evening in late May, a group of young men stood just half a block from Mr. Sadr's central office in Amara, clapping and singing. A woman walked past a cleric and made a gesture with her hands, as if shoving him away, the Iraqi equivalent of a raised middle finger.

"The clerics are pushing the people, and that makes the people hate them," said Kadham al-Mashetet, the sheik of the Sarrai tribe, who saw the angry gesture.

Late last year, the number of killings began to drop. In March of this year, the police in Amara registered six homicides, the lowest rate since the British military began collecting data in the beginning of 2005. The average rate for the first five months of this year fell by 71 percent compared with the previous five months, according to British military figures.

The trend is the opposite in Basra, where violence has risen significantly in the past year. With the tribes watching in Amara, the stakes for killing were higher, and militia members weighed attacks carefully. The militias themselves seemed intent on preserving the status quo.

The police chief, Ismail Arar Qadim al-Majdi, linked to Badr, said he tried to avoid retaliatory attacks.

"I know who is doing the killing here," Mr. Majdi said in an interview. "When I arrest someone, they reply by a mortar. If I keep up this arresting, it will be the same as in Basra. I want to keep the city quiet, so I try to avoid this."

DOJ_NMG_0038809

It is not clear, however, how firm his control is. Late last month, the son of a sheik was killed in a shooting, an ominous crime that has baffled the town. Some sheiks blamed Iran, where the Badr Organization had operated in exile. For the British soldiers here, the power of tribes can be vexing, particularly during efforts to build a Western-style legal system. Six months ago, for example, a man shot another dead in front of a police officer. He was arrested, taken to jail and then promptly released, after the attacker's tribe agreed to pay $3,000 and promise three women in marriage to the family of the dead man, said Colonel Labouchere, the British commander.

"Tribes hold the key to this province," he said. "If we try to employ our own version of law in this country, we are not going to win."

The tribes have helped the occupying forces at times. They successfully mediated in 2004, when the Mahdi militia fought the British in an uprising across Iraq's south inspired by Mr. Sadr.

At that time "the tribes went to the Sadr office and said, 'Take your guys off the streets,' " said Mr. Ferguson, the British political adviser. In Dhi Qar Province, west of Amara, tribal leaders recently interceded in a similar fashion, he said.

The role of the tribes in the American-led effort may continue to grow.

Colonel Labouchere, who cares for two pet goats in a sleepy outpost in a former Hussein military camp and is planning the British withdrawal from the area, said he hoped the tribes could replace his forces as the central pillar between the Madhi Army and the Badr Organization.

In an effort to exert more influence on politics, about 1,000 tribesmen gathered in March and established a new provincewide tribal council of 35 sheiks.

And if Iraq holds a new set of provincial elections as scheduled for later this year, the tribes might increase their direct representation.

For now, Mr. Najmawi takes pleasure in testing the Islamists.

In a bold affront, he decided to show the World Cup games in his garden on a big screen for maximum effect. He even advertised around town with posters.

Before the first game, two men from Mr. Sadr's office came and delivered a warning: Go to the Sadr office and obtain permission. Soccer, they said, is un-Islamic.

"I never went," Mr. Najmawi said.

Since then, his shop has been packed with more than 500 customers a night, and the only violence has been the breaking of several chairs.

"I cannot let them control me," he said. "They are not in charge here."

More U.S. Soldiers Face Charges In Rape Case (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Four more U.S. soldiers have been charged with raping a young Iraqi and killing her and three of her family members in March, the U.S. military announced Sunday.

The military said in a statement that the charges had been lodged against four soldiers accused of rape and murder. A fifth soldier was charged with dereliction of duty in the case; although he did not participate in the alleged crimes, he knew about them but failed to report the incident, the military said.

The charges were lodged Saturday, the military said. The five soldiers face an Article 32 investigation, the military's equivalent of a grand-jury inquest, to see if evidence warrants bringing them before a full-scale military tribunal or courts-martial.

"The preferral of court-martial charges is merely an accusation," the statement said. "Those accused are presumed innocent until and unless proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt."

A former U.S. Army private, Steven D. Green, 21, already appeared in federal court last week in Charlotte, N.C., pleading not guilty to rape and murder charges in the case. He could face the death penalty if convicted.

The statement said the five new suspects were charged with conspiring with Green to commit the crimes. The military did not release their names.

DOJ_NMG_0038810

Green received an honorable discharge from the military and returned to the United States before the alleged incident in Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad, came to light late last month. An affidavit submitted by an FBI special agent in connection with the request for an arrest warrant said military personnel files showed that a "personality disorder" had led to his discharge.

Green was a member of the 502nd Infantry Regiment, which is attached to the 4th Infantry Division in Iraq.

Unlike most incidents of alleged abuse of Iraqi civilians by U.S. soldiers, the killings of the young Iraqi and her family did not occur in the heat of battle but were planned out for as long as a week, military officials have alleged.

According to the affidavit by Special Agent Gregor J. Ahlers, who said his information came largely from Army investigators who interviewed at least three of the soldiers involved, Green allegedly killed three family members before he and another soldier raped the young woman, whose age is in dispute. Green then allegedly shot the victim to death with an AK-47 found in the house.

Two soldiers allegedly went with Green and his alleged accomplices to the house but only stood guard. Another soldier stayed at a checkpoint to monitor radio traffic.

Unlike a civilian grand jury, the military investigation allows the accused to attend and, through defense counsel, to cross-examine government witnesses, call witnesses and present evidence, said Army Maj. J. Todd Breasseale, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq.

The five newly accused servicemen remain in Iraq but have been removed from their normal duties and are not allowed to leave their base, Breasseale said.

"They have had their weapons removed from them and are escorted at all times," he said.

4 Soldiers Accused Of Rape, Murder (USAT)

By Rick Jervis And Andrea Stone

USA Today, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Four more soldiers were charged with rape and murder in connection with the slaying of a young Iraqi woman and her family in Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad, the U.S. military announced Sunday.

Another soldier was accused of failing to report the offenses but was not believed to be involved in the attack, a military statement said. The soldiers, who are from the 101st Airborne Division and whose names were not released, were charged Saturday.

In all, six soldiers have been implicated in the March 12 incident, the latest of several alleged crimes by U.S. servicemembers in Iraq. Ex-soldier Steven Green was charged with one count of rape and four counts of murder. He pleaded not guilty to killing the young woman, her parents and 5-year-old sister.

According to an FBI affidavit filed in Green's case, Green and others targeted the young woman for a week before the attack. Army spokesman Paul Boyce said investigators were trying to determine the age of the young woman. Military spokesman Maj. Mark Wright said investigators have asked Iraqi authorities to help navigate cultural sensitivities to exhume the body.

The soldiers drank alcohol, abandoned their checkpoint, changed clothes to avoid detection and headed to the victims' house, about 200 yards from a U.S. military checkpoint, the affidavit said.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki last week called for an independent investigation. He also questioned why U.S. troops receive immunity from prosecution in Iraqi courts for crimes committed there.

Mahmoudiya Mayor Mouayad Fadhil applauded the new charges and said he hopes the United States continues to investigate.

The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued an apology last week for the Mahmoudiya incident, saying, “the alleged events of that day are absolutely inexcusable and unacceptable behavior.”

Military investigators are looking into at least five incidents in which U.S. troops are accused of killing Iraqi civilians. Among them: the alleged killings by Marines of 24 Iraqis in Haditha in November.

The string of recent allegations hurts U.S. and Iraqi government efforts to win over ordinary citizens and undermines support for the insurgency.

“Stories like this accusation and the others are like losing a battle,” says Andrew Krepinevich of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a defense policy group. “Whether they're true or not, they can be viewed as a significant setback for us.”

Four More GIs Charged With Rape, Murder (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 9 -- Military investigators brought charges against four more American soldiers accused of taking part in the rape and murder of an Iraqi girl and the killing of three members of her family, the U.S. military said Sunday.

The four active-duty soldiers from the Army's 502nd Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Division are accused of conspiring with Steven D. Green, a former private, who was charged with rape and murder in federal court earlier this month.

A fifth soldier from the unit, who was not accused of direct involvement in the March 12 attack in the southern town of Mahmudiyah, was charged with dereliction of duty for failing to report the incident, the military said in a statement. It did not name the five soldiers.

Green was honorably discharged with a "personality disorder" after the attack was carried out but before it came to light. He pleaded not guilty to the charges on Thursday in U.S. District Court in Louisville.

According to military officials and court documents, the soldiers entered the family's home, took the girl to another room and raped her. They then reportedly shot her and killed her mother, father and 7-year-old sister and tried to set a fire to cover up the crimes. The killings were initially reported as an insurgent attack.

Court documents said the soldiers had previously seen the girl from a roadside checkpoint they manned near the home, and a neighbor said her family had grown concerned that she could become a target.

The incident was the latest in a series of recent accusations against U.S. forces involving unarmed Iraqi civilians, including the alleged shooting deaths of 24 people in the western town of Haditha in November. The military initially reported those deaths as having been caused by a roadside bomb attack that also killed a Marine.

But a Time magazine report in March disclosed that the civilians died of gunshot wounds and that U.S. forces were responsible.

Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the No. 2 officer in Iraq who oversaw the investigation of the Haditha killings, concluded recently that Marine leadership repeatedly failed in pre-deployment training, in the tone set by commanders and in how information was reported up the chain of command, defense officials said. Chiarelli found that commanders were negligent in how they responded to conflicting reports they received from units about the Haditha killings.

In June, seven Marines and a Navy corpsman were charged with murder and other crimes related to the shooting death of a crippled man in Hamdaniyah, a village west of Baghdad. Residents there said the soldiers planted a rifle and a shovel near the victim's body to make it appear as though he had been burying roadside bombs.

Later in June, three soldiers were charged with killing three Iraqi detainees in U.S. custody and threatening to kill another soldier if he told anyone what had happened.

But the Mahmudiyah incident has provoked a particularly strong reaction from the Iraqi government because of the incendiary nature of the alleged crimes.

In recent days, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and several other Iraqi politicians have called for a review of a regulation that precludes U.S. forces from facing prosecution in Iraqi courts. Maliki said the immunity -- implemented by the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority, which governed Iraq after the 2003 invasion -- has encouraged crimes against Iraqis.

Four Soldiers Charged With Rape, Murder (WT/AP)

By Ryan Lenza

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

TIKRIT, Iraq -- Four more U.S. soldiers have been charged with rape and murder and a fifth with dereliction of duty in the rape-slaying of an Iraqi girl and the killings of her relatives in Mahmoudiya, the military said yesterday.

The five were accused Saturday after an investigation into charges that American soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division raped the teenager and killed her and three relatives at her home south of Baghdad.

Former soldier Steven D. Green was arrested last week in North Carolina and has pleaded not guilty to one count of rape and four counts of murder. He was ordered held without bond on the charges, which carry a possible death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0038812

Yesterday's disclosure of additional rape and murder charges against U.S. soldiers came on a particularly violent day, with more than 50 Iraqis killed in a spate of sectarian attacks.

Masked Shi'ite gunmen roamed through west Baghdad's Jihad neighborhood yesterday, dragging Sunnis from their cars, picking them out on the street and killing them in a rampage that police said left at least 41 persons dead in a dramatic escalation of sectarian violence.

Hours later, two car bombs exploded near a Shi'ite mosque in the city's north, killing 17 persons and wounding at least 38 in what appeared to be a reprisal attack, police said.

Black-clad Shi'ite militiamen manned checkpoints on roads into most major Shi'ite neighborhoods to guard against revenge attacks, as scattered clashes occurred across the Iraqi capital.

Sunni leaders expressed outrage over the killings, and President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, appealed for calm, warning that the nation stood "in front of a dangerous precipice."

A senior government official, Haidar Majid, contested the police figures, saying late yesterday that only nine persons died in Jihad.

Police Lt. Mohammed Khayoun insisted the figure of 41 was correct -- with 24 bodies taken to Yarmouk hospital and 17 to the city morgue. There was no way to reconcile the discrepancy.

Regardless, the brazen attack was likely to further enflame Shi'ite-Sunni tensions and undermine public confidence in Iraq's new unity government. It also raises new questions about the effectiveness of the Iraqi police and army to curb sectarian violence in the capital.

Police and Shi'ite leaders speculated the rampage was carried out in retaliation for a Saturday night car bombing at a Shi'ite mosque that killed two persons and wounded nine.

Clashes also broke out between gunmen and Iraqi police in at least three neighborhoods across the capital, police and residents said. Three Shi'ite militiamen were killed in fighting with security forces in one of them, police said.

The spokesman for a Sunni clerical association, Mohammed Beshar al-Faydhi, blamed the Jihad attack on the Mahdi Army militia, led by radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Sheik al-Sadr denied responsibility and called on both Shi'ites and Sunnis to "join hands for the sake of Iraq's independence and stability." He assured Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, leader of the largest Sunni Arab party, that he would punish any of his militiamen if they were involved.

In the rape investigation, the U.S. statement said the five soldiers still on active duty will face an Article 32 investigation, similar to a grand jury hearing in civilian law. The Article 32 proceeding will determine whether there is enough evidence to place them on trial.

One of the soldiers was charged with failing to report the attack but is not believed to have participated in it directly, the statement said. The four facing murder charges could face the death penalty if convicted.

The names of the five were not released, but a U.S. military official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said yesterday that the soldiers recently charged are two sergeants, two privates first-class and one specialist.

The March 12 attack on the family was among the worst in a series of cases of U.S. troops accused of killing and abusing Iraqi civilians.

U.S. officials are concerned the suspected rape-slaying will strain relations with the new U.S.-backed government and increase calls for changes in an agreement that exempts American soldiers from prosecution in Iraqi courts.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has demanded an independent investigation into the case, which followed a series of claims that U.S. troops killed and mistreated Iraqi civilians.

According to an FBI affidavit filed in Mr. Green's case, he and at least two others targeted the teenager and her family for a week before the attack, which was not revealed until witnesses came forward in late June.

Also yesterday, an American soldier died in a "noncombat related incident," the U.S. command said without giving further details.

DOJ_NMG_0038813

In the western city of Ramadi, a car bomb exploded next to a U.S. convoy, wounding four American soldiers, the military said. The attack occurred as the convoy headed to the government center in the city, an insurgent hotbed 70 miles west of Baghdad.

A Soldier's Shame (TIME)

By Julie Rawe With Aparisim Ghosh

Time, July 10, 2006

Family members describeÂ Abeer Qasim Hamza al-Janabi as tall for her age, skinny, but not eye-catchingly beautiful. As one of her uncles put it, "She was an ordinary girl." So perhaps it was sheer proximity that made the 15-year-old so tantalizing. Her house was less than 1,000 ft. from a U.S. military checkpoint just outside the Iraqi town of Mahmudiyah, and soldiers manning the gate started stopping by just to look at her. Her mother, who grew concerned enough to make plans for Abeer to move in with a cousin, told relatives that whenever she caught the Americans ogling her daughter, they would give her the thumbs-up sign, point to the girl and say, "Very good, very good."

Abeer's brother Mohammed, 13, told TIME he once watched his sister, frozen in fear, as a U.S. soldier ran his index finger down her cheek. Mohammed has since learned that soldier's name: Steven Green. Last week Green, 21, a former Army private first class who was honorably discharged because of a "personality disorder" a month before the criminal allegations came to light, pleaded not guilty to charges of raping Abeer and killing her along with her parents and 7-year-old sister. The grisly March 12 slayings--in which Abeer's skull was smashed and her legs and torso set on fire--sparked the military's fifth investigation into U.S. personnel accused of murdering Iraqi civilians. But unlike the massacre in Haditha, where Marines are suspected of shooting up to 24 innocent people in November following the death of a beloved comrade, the butchering of Abeer's family does not appear to be the result of vengeance or confusion. Instead, all signs point to premeditated depravity.

According to an affidavit based on sworn statements from several members of Green's infantry unit, Green and three other soldiers abandoned the traffic checkpoint they were manning 20 miles south of Baghdad, in a region littered with roadside bombs, before heading to Abeer's house. Some of them had been drinking, and all but one had changed out of their uniforms, allegedly to avoid easy identification. A fifth soldier, who remained at the checkpoint to monitor the radio, said that when the men returned in bloodied clothes, each of them told him not to speak of the incident again.

Given that the area was known to be a terrorist stronghold, many former and active-duty officers are wondering how such a small convoy of soldiers--a single vehicle's worth--was left on its own, apparently far from the watchful gaze of a superior officer. "Where were the older sergeants, and the lieutenants and captain who should have prevented this crime from happening?" asks Barry McCaffrey, a retired four-star general.

The apparent lack of supervision makes it harder for military officials to cast this as a one-time, isolated incident, particularly after an Army general concluded last week that Marine officers had been negligent in failing to probe the deaths in Haditha. In a joint statement, the U.S. ambassador and the senior U.S. commander in Iraq called the soldiers' alleged acts in Mahmudiya "absolutely inexcusable and unacceptable." Officials say one purpose of their pledge to vigorously and transparently investigate and prosecute the crimes is to quell the calls from Iraqis, among them Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, to stop granting U.S. troops immunity from local prosecution, a notion that Pentagon officials consider "a nonstarter," especially in a country whose legal system is practically nonexistent.

If there was an element of strategic calculation behind the public remarks of U.S. officials, there was genuine emotion too. In private meetings with Abeer's relatives, military officers apologized repeatedly, and a one-star general hugged her two orphaned brothers. "The general seemed emotionally distressed. He was not pretending," concluded Mahdi Obeid Saleh, Abeer's cousin, who says he rushed to the crime scene and doused the flames on her burning body. Both Saleh and Army investigators initially thought the attack was the work of insurgents. "This is what happens when you harbor terrorists," a military translator lectured Saleh on the day of the slayings.

It wasn't until some three months later that officers got wind of a different story. In June, after insurgents killed a member of Green's troop and kidnapped and beheaded two others--there's suspicion, but no evidence yet, that this attack was a response to the rape and killings--another soldier in their infantry unit told Army combat-stress counselors in Baghdad about the alleged murders in Mahmudiya. Within 24 hours of the initial report, Army officers turned the case over to military criminal investigators at Iraq's Camp Slayer. Six days later, the FBI arrested Green near his grandmother's house in Nebo, N.C., where he was visiting after attending a troopmate's funeral at Arlington National Cemetery.

The details of Green's biography contain little to suggest he was destined for trouble but nothing that indicates he knew how to avoid it either. He was born in Midland, Texas, and bounced between parents who divorced when he was 4. Green, who was in his teens when his mother spent six months in jail for drunken driving, dropped out of school after 10th grade. In February 2005, fresh from a three-day jail stint for underage possession of alcohol, he enlisted in the Army, and a month later--during basic training--he was baptized in a makeshift prayer room in a kitchen at Fort Benning, Ga. In December, after Green had been sent to Iraq, he was quoted in a newspaper article as saying of a house-to-house search for insurgents, "It's kind of disappointing that we didn't find anything."

Five months later, Green was honorably discharged with a "personality disorder." In fiscal 2005, 1,038 soldiers--or 0.21% of those on active duty--were discharged with this classification, which used to be referred to as Section 8. (Corporal Klinger was always trying to get one on M*A*S*H.) An Army spokeswoman says such cases can take weeks or even months to process and require a psychiatric evaluation followed by an opportunity for the soldier to modify his behavior as well as the option to file an appeal.

The Pentagon won't say how long it took to process Green's case. But even if his possible instability was a factor in the alleged atrocity, that doesn't explain why his fellow soldiers stood by--and helped him cover his tracks. Pentagon officials say charges could be brought against as many as four other soldiers, including the one who allegedly joined Green in the rape.

Green is scheduled to be arraigned next month in Kentucky--home to Fort Campbell, where he was most recently stationed--and could end up facing the death penalty. Close relatives won't talk about him. Even distant ones are reluctant. In tiny Denver City, Texas, where he spent a couple of years with his mother's ex-husband and which he claimed as his hometown on Army paperwork, Green's former stepgrandfather thought back about the meals they had shared. "He always seemed a little bit different," B.J. Carr said, before his wife interrupted, "We don't know that boy."

Justice: Immune? (NSWK)

By Malcolm Beith And John Barry

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

The arrest of former U.S. Army Pfc. Steven D. Green—for the alleged rape of an Iraqi woman and the murder of her and three relatives near the town of Mahmudiyah—brought apologies from U.S. officials. But that didn't stem a growing debate over Coalition Provisional Authority Order 17, which exempts members of the U.S. military from Iraqi laws.

"We cannot go on having these unfortunate incidents repeated, and we have to work on stopping them from happening again," Iraqi national-security adviser Mowaffaq al-Rubaie told NEWSWEEK. "There is no way we can accept CPA Order 17 anymore." U.S. officials, unnamed because of diplomatic sensitivities, said Iraqi P.M. Maliki's need to oppose the order might lessen if any wrongdoers in the Haditha and Mahmudiyah cases are held accountable. Green pleaded not guilty in a U.S. federal court last week.

Republican Lawmakers Cite Shells As WMD Proof (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

Congressional Republicans are at odds with Democrats -- and the Bush administration -- over the significance of 500 munitions found in Iraq since 2003 and recently disclosed by the Pentagon.

The rocket and artillery shells hold deadly sarin and mustard gas, a small part of the vast weapons of mass destruction (WMD) arsenal that Saddam Hussein built in the 1980s.

Republican lawmakers say the 500-plus shells, with more likely to be found in the coming months, are evidence that Saddam was still concealing WMDs in 2003 in violation of United Nations resolutions to disarm after Iraq's failed invasion of Kuwait.

DOJ_NMG_0038815

The resolution "didn't say pre-'91 chemical weapons," said Rep. Curt Weldon, Pennsylvania Republican. "It didn't say post-'91 chemical weapons. It said chemical weapons. Saddam Hussein violated this resolution and others like it. ... In part because of such violations, we voted to authorize the use of military force in Iraq."

Democrats dismiss the findings. They say the munitions were found in small clusters and are 1980s vintage. In other words, Iraq produced them before the 1990 invasion of Kuwait and thus they are irrelevant to the CIA's flawed 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), on which President Bush largely based his decision to go to war to keep Iraq's WMDs from terrorists, they say.

To the consternation of congressional Republicans, including Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the House Intelligence Committee chairman, the Democrats are getting support from the administration.

When the office of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte conducted a phone-in briefing for reporters last month, the presenters downplayed the munitions finding, just like the Democrats.

"The priority of the ISG [Iraq Survey Group, which headed the hunt for WMDs] was to look for post-Desert Storm [1991] munitions, newer stuff," an anonymous briefer told reporters. "It was not looking for older stuff. And so this doesn't really bear on the issue."

That dismissive remark generally dovetailed with press reporting. But it irked Mr. Hoekstra, who had held a press conference to announce that the administration had declassified a report on the 500 shells. Mr. Hoekstra wrote an unusually blunt June 29 letter to Mr. Negroponte, accusing his staff of misstating the ISG's mission statement. The ISG was not limited to poking around for post-1991 weapons, he said. He also accused Mr. Negroponte of ignoring requests for information from a Republican senator.

"I am very disappointed by the inaccurate, incomplete, and occasionally misleading comments made by the briefers," he wrote.

Negroponte spokesman Carl Kropf said of the letter, "We'll respond in some fashion to be determined."

Republicans say that with the passage of time, as new information surfaces, the CIA's much-maligned NIE does not look quite as bad. To be sure, inspectors have not found the tons of chemical weapons stockpiles it had predicted, or an active nuclear weapons program, or continued manufacturing of WMDs.

But the NIE contained other components. For example, it said hundreds of chemical weapons munitions remained unaccounted for, after U.N. inspectors destroyed thousands. The NIE did not specify the shells had to be post-1991, so the discovery of more than 500 munitions since 2004 would tend to validate that finding.

What's more, the ISG did find that Saddam planned to resume WMD production quickly once U.N. sanctions were lifted. He had already corrupted the U.N.'s oil-for-food transactions by bribing foreign government officials and suppliers of prohibited weapons.

That ISG finding has been buttressed by newly declassified transcripts of taped conversations between Saddam and his top aides. The palace talk: WMD production would be resumed once the West lost interest in containing Baghdad.

Republicans received a bit more support from the administration in a subsequent House Armed Services Committee hearing last week.

"We do assess that the chemical munitions that have been found are hazardous, and potentially they could be lethal," Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, testified. "The chemicals that are contained in the munitions that are referred to in this report are capable of creating mass casualties."

The committee also heard from David Kay, who initially led the search for WMDs before turning the job over to Charles Duelfer. He generally downplayed the discovery. "I don't think any of us should be surprised that we are still finding chemical munitions produced before 1991 in Iraq," he said. He added that his main task was to try to find WMD that the CIA said were produced after U.N. inspectors left in 1998. He found none.

The DNI briefers stressed to reporters that the new report on munitions is not a dissent from the final March 2005 report of Mr. Duelfer.

But there does seem to be a difference in how the two assess the danger to U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0038816

"The ISG believes that any remaining chemical munitions in Iraq do not pose a militarily significant threat to coalition forces because the agent and munitions are degraded and there are not enough extant to cause mass casualties," Mr. Duelfer wrote.

Col. John Chiu, commander of the National Ground Intelligence Center, which is conducting the WMD search in Iraq, told the Armed Services committee that, "The munitions that we're finding, the agents within those munitions are still toxic, and if exposed to enough of a degree, would prove to be lethal. ... They do constitute weapons of mass destruction."

Vietnam Vets' Experience On Boats Gets Use In Iraq (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, July 10, 2006

LITTLE CREEK, Va. — Thomas Cutler's combat experience on a patrol boat in Vietnam is more than 30 years old, yet it couldn't be more relevant to today's Navy.

Cutler, 58, is among a group of Vietnam veterans informally advising the Navy as it reconstitutes river patrols. The Navy wants to extend its reach into the shallow brown waters of deltas and rivers, often the front line in the war against terrorists and insurgents. Next spring, the first sailors since the days of the Vietnam-era swift boats will relieve Marines on river patrols protecting Haditha dam in Iraq.

"It is dangerous," says Cutler, an author and former naval officer. "But you don't go into the military to knit socks."

After Vietnam, the Navy abandoned its river patrols and focused instead on big ships and fleets to oppose the Soviet Union during the Cold War.

Now, the Navy plans a river force of three 12-boat squadrons. Each boat will have a crew of five. The boats will be able to top 40 knots, stop quickly and operate in less than a foot of water. They'll have armor and .50-caliber machine guns.

In all, there will be about 900 sailors involved in the river patrol effort. By comparison, there were 4,500 sailors in 450 boats patrolling coastal and inland waters during Vietnam.

At first, Vietnam veterans were concerned "we weren't building a robust enough force," said Capt. Michael Jordan, commodore of Riverine Group One. "But when we described what we were doing, they said, 'This makes sense.' "

The main mission is defeating Iraqi insurgents who often try to escape on rivers after attacking, said Adm. Michael Mullen, the chief of naval operations.

Iraq's rivers "are really the old smugglers' routes," Jordan said, "routes that have been in use for hundreds if not thousands of years. We've got checkpoints on roads but none on the water."

The Navy's river patrols eventually will be deployed around the world as part of the Navy Expeditionary Combat Command. The command, established in October 2005, aims to fight piracy, stop narcotics trafficking and intercept illegal arms and weapons of mass destruction, said Rear Adm. Donald Bullard, its leader. It also is the home of the Seabees, the Navy's construction teams, and technicians who defuse explosives.

The command allows the Navy to play a more visible role in the war on terror. "This is not just about relieving stress on the Army and Marines," Bullard said.

Vietnam veterans have participated in two seminars with Navy officials to advise them on the new river force. One was held at the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., and the other was in Norfolk, Va.

The Navy sought Cutler's expertise, in part, because he wrote a history of the Navy's river patrols in Vietnam, Brown Water, Black Berets.

Before sailors patrol the Euphrates River in Iraq, they'll be trained by Marines to fight and learn the basic language skills they'll need to develop relationships with the local people. Simply being able to talk about fishing can be helpful, Jordan said.

"With language training, we can show that we care about people rather than imposing our will. That we're really there to help them out," said Lt. Cmdr. Frank Okata, 33, a logistics officer for the river patrol squadron.

Okata said the sailors need small boats to take the fight to the insurgents. "Most of our enemies aren't going to be sending out fleets to engage us," he said. "We need small boats to go after them."

Cutler said that mission makes lessons from Vietnam more relevant.

DOJ_NMG_0038817

He counseled the Navy to think about snakes, leeches and malaria and to consider factors such as the way moonlight can silhouette a target or a sailor and how the glare of sunshine can blind a river crew.

Larry Weatherall, 58, a veteran of more than 200 river patrol missions in Vietnam, advised sailors to rely on helicopters and other aircraft for help in killing adversaries. He said the need for air support was an important lesson from Vietnam.

"When you get in a firefight, it's good to have angels come out of nowhere to help suppress enemy fire," he said.

Today's sailors have also been instructed by Vietnam vets to carry extra ammunition, said Cmdr. Bill Guarini, 39.

"It's fun stuff: going 40 knots on the water, shooting the best weapons," Guarini said. "We're all outdoorsy people. It's exciting, plus there's a sense that you're doing something special."

Petty Officer 2nd Class Tyson Carter, 25, recently completed combat training with Marines at Camp Lejeune, N.C. It was hot and humid, and he loved it. He'll be a gunner on a Navy patrol boat.

"It's all about the adrenaline," said Carter of Choctaw, Okla. "We're taking the fight to the enemy."

A Vietnam Lesson, Unlearned (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

By 1971, after years of mindless fighting, dying and widespread atrocities in Vietnam, portions of the U.S. military had fallen into a horrendous state of affairs. Morale had plummeted. Drug use was widespread. Soldiers in units that had previously fought bravely and well were threatening mutiny. Officers and N.C.O.'s were targeted for death by frightened and resentful enlisted men. Racial conflicts abounded.

The biggest lesson we failed to learn from Vietnam was how utterly tragic it was to pull the trigger on an unnecessary war. Now once again we are condemned to suffer the consequences, and those consequences are not always self-evident.

For example, the U.S. military — its capabilities and its reputation so painstakingly rebuilt in the decades since Vietnam — is again falling victim to lowered standards, breakdowns in discipline and a series of atrocities that are nothing less than a betrayal of the many honorable men and women in uniform and the country they serve.

The Army has had to lower its standards because most young Americans want no part of George W. Bush's war in Iraq. Recruiters, desperate to meet their quotas, are sifting for warm bodies among those who are less talented, less disciplined and, in some cases, repellent.

John Kifner reported in The Times last week about a study by a watchdog group that showed that recruiting shortfalls caused by the war in Iraq have allowed "large numbers of neo-Nazis and skinhead extremists" to infiltrate the military.

The study, by the Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks racist groups, was titled "A Few Bad Men." It said that recruiters and base commanders, under intense pressure to fill the thinning ranks, "often look the other way" as militant white supremacists and anti-Semites make their way into the armed forces.

The center quoted a Defense Department investigator as saying: "We've got Aryan Nations graffiti in Baghdad. That's a problem."

This comes 10 years after a Pentagon crackdown on extremist activity in the armed forces. The crackdown followed the Oklahoma City bombing, which was carried out by Timothy McVeigh, a gulf war veteran, and the murder of a black couple by skinheads in the Army's 82nd Airborne Division.

This is the sort of thing that happens when the military is run by power-hungry amateurs who lack the maturity and the sense of history to temper their arrogance.

It was already known that the Army had become more reluctant to release soldiers who were seriously out of shape, or pregnant, or abusing alcohol or drugs. The pressure to put somebody — anybody — in uniform also led to the lowering of standards for admission to the junior officer ranks. For example, minor criminal offenses that previously would have been prohibitive could suddenly be overlooked.

As the Abu Ghraib scandal unfolded, I wondered how such completely and obviously unfit characters as Charles Graner Jr. and Lynndie England had not previously been weeded out of the military, which had bragged for so long about how high its standards had become.

Now we're faced with the case of American soldiers suspected of raping an Iraqi teenager and murdering her and her family. This is one of at least five cases currently being investigated in which American troops have been accused of killing unarmed civilians. Marines are suspected of slaughtering 24 Iraqis, including women and children, in the western town of Haditha last November — a case that in its horror, if not its scale, recalls the My Lai massacre of Vietnam.

Despite the administration's repeated attempts to put the best face on Mr. Bush's war, the predicament confronting the military is growing more, not less, dire. There are still not nearly enough American troops in Iraq to secure the country. Some troops are on their third or fourth tour of duty in the war zone, which is beyond unfair.

According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, the military will be not be able to maintain its current force levels in Iraq for much longer. It doesn't take much imagination to know what happens when you stretch a rubber band too far.

The proud American military has been badly hurt by the wrecking-ball policies of the Bush administration. It deserved better.

Canadian, 15 Taliban Killed In Afghanistan (AP-Y2)

By Noor Khan

AP2, July 10, 2006

Hundreds of Canadian and Afghan soldiers raided Taliban strongholds throughout southern orchards Sunday, sparking fighting that killed at least 15 militants and one Canadian.

Two Canadian soldiers were wounded in Kandahar province's Zharew district, the scene of some of the fiercest fighting in an ongoing anti-Taliban offensive being waged across southern Afghanistan.

Canadian Cpl. Anthony Boneca was killed in the Pasmhol village in Zharew during a "combined coalition-Afghan operation" against the Taliban, said military spokesman Maj. Marc Theriault.

Several hours later, "intense close quarters" fighting broke out nearby, leaving at least five Taliban militants dead and two Canadian soldiers slightly wounded, said another coalition official, Lt. Cdr. Mark MacIntyre.

A coalition airstrike killed another 10 militants in the neighboring Panjwayi district, where Canadian troops launched a campaign against Taliban strongholds Saturday, according to a military statement. Two Canadians also were wounded.

"The fighting we have seen over the last 48 hours has been pretty intense and there has been a number of fire fights," MacIntyre said.

Most of the fighting is taking place in fields and orchards where small bands of Taliban fighters have taken cover, MacIntyre said.

At least 18 Canadian soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan since 2002. Four were killed in an April roadside bomb blast in the deadliest attack against the 2,300-strong Canadian contingent since deployment to Kandahar in February.

In a sign of the deadly Taliban threat in the south, the British government is preparing to deploy hundreds of extra soldiers and more equipment to the volatile Helmand province where more than 3,000 British troops are moving into.

Britain's defense secretary, Des Browne, is expected to announce the deployments to Britain's House of Commons on Monday after military commanders urgently requested reinforcements, a British defense official said on condition of anonymity as he was unauthorized to speak to the media.

Six British troops have been killed in Helmand in a month and Browne acknowledged on Saturday that a British deployment into the south had "energized opposition" from a resurgent Taliban.

Britain has around 5,000 troops in Afghanistan, with 3,000 of those in Helmand — where soldiers will head a NATO-led peacekeeping mission at the end of July.

During recent months, Afghanistan has been gripped by the bloodiest spate of violence since a U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban regime after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

Some 10,000 U.S., Canadian, British and Afghan forces have deployed across southern Afghanistan as part of Operation Mountain Thrust in a bid to loosen the Taliban's hold on the region. At least 20 coalition troops have been killed in combat across Afghanistan since the offensive started in May, according to an Associated Press tally based on coalition figures. Most of the fatalities have been in the south.

Separately, Spain's defense minister announced Sunday that an explosion the previous day in western Afghanistan that killed a Peruvian solder and slightly wounded four Spanish troops was probably caused by a remote-controlled 8.8 pound anti-vehicle land mine.

In eastern Laghman province, Afghan soldiers killed a militant Saturday after their patrol was ambushed, a Defense Ministry statement said. One Afghan soldier was wounded.

Afghan soldiers also arrested four suspected Taliban members, including a local leader identified as Mullah Nazar, in southern Uruzgan province, the statement said. The troops also confiscated a quantity of explosives and Iranian and Pakistani checks valued at $300,000.

For Afghan Cabbies, A Poetry Tradition Spurs War Of Words (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- There aren't many places in the U.S. that can count poetry societies run by Afghan cab drivers. Washington has two. And they don't like each other.

"An Evening with the Dervishes" prefers what it calls the serious, scholarly pursuit of poetry. The group views itself as a literary clique focusing on masters such as Abdul Qadir Bedil, a 17th century poet and Islamic mystic, or Sufi. Its gatherings feature top scholars and poets.

"An Evening of Sufism," notwithstanding its name, brings all forms of Afghan poetry to large audiences. It also treats attendees to free refreshments and pop-music performances.

On a Friday evening earlier this year, Maroof Popal checked in on "An Evening of Sufism," the group he helped found and later abandoned to establish the more highbrow Dervishes. Inside a drab, low-ceilinged hall, an Afghan woman dressed in a black pantsuit rose to the podium. She informed the audience of nearly 200 that she'd just finished her poem in the parking lot.

Mr. Popal, 52 years old, couldn't contain his disappointment. "Why read a poem if you haven't given it much thought?" he muttered, gently slapping his head with the palm of his hand.

As another woman finished her poem about the "new and tragic phenomenon of suicide bombings in our beloved country," the cab driver walked outside for a smoke.

"Nowadays, by the grace of God, there are so many poets and writers out there," he said, taking a drag. "The question is, Do you want to listen to vulgar poetry or listen to someone who can offer us the real thing?"

The ethnic and political tensions that racked Afghanistan in the 1990s have cooled off, despite the recent Taliban insurgency. But having given up battling over the merits of the Taliban and the Northern Alliance, exiled Afghans here have found a new outlet for factional debate: how to celebrate the ancient Afghan art of poetry reading.

Poetry has deep roots in Afghan culture; the art form began more than 1,000 years ago in the ancient cities of Central Asia. Today, the Afghan passion for poetry, much of it Sufi-inspired and in Persian, extends to everyday life: Afghans pepper their conversations with snippets of poetry and engage in "poetic duels" in which each side recites a line of verse that begins with the letter that ended the opposing side's line.

The two groups meet in the same Masonic lodge in Springfield, Va., on different Friday nights each month. Mostly they adhere to Afghan social norms, treating each other with civility and even deference. Occasionally, they drop by each other's gatherings. But at times, their rivalries have burst into the open.

Members of "An Evening of Sufism" accuse the Dervishes of tearing down their flyers from Afghan stores, and have dubbed them "hash-heads," which in Afghanistan is a term associated with the uneducated. Wali Popal, the group's current moderator -- who is not related to Maroof Popal -- dismisses "An Evening with the Dervishes" as an "imitation."

The Dervishes say an "Evening of Sufism" lobbied the Masonic Lodge to keep them out. They also accuse the group of spreading false rumors that they pay big money to attract top scholars. Both groups deny the others' charges.

One of the Dervishes, Yusuf Bakhtary, a former school teacher and now a cabdriver, says he wants to ban music entirely from his group -- it occasionally invites a sitar player -- if only to distinguish it from "An Evening of Sufism."

He quotes Bedil: "Hypnotized by the spell of popular acceptance, how long shall I keep on uttering vulgarity?"

DOJ_NMG_0038820

The poetry debate goes back to the early 1980s, when Maroof Popal, who left Afghanistan in 1978, began driving a taxi at Washington D.C.'s National Airport. There, he met other Afghan cabbies once or twice a week to read the poems of Bedil in any available space: the back of a furniture store, the showroom of an Afghan-owned car dealership.

At the end of 12-hour shifts, dog-tired and sometimes hungry, they'd sit cross-legged in a circle. Over cups of tea and candies, they tackled some of the most technically difficult poems written by the great Sufi poets, occasionally pausing for philosophical reflection over individual words -- "fog," "mirror," "silence."

Every now and then, when they found themselves stumped, they'd call upon a poet and Bedil scholar, M. I. Negargar. Calls to the former Kabul University professor -- who had taught one of the cabbies and lives in England -- soon became an integral part of their readings. Chipping in 25 to 50 cents each, they'd buy a phone card and hunch over the speakerphone as the professor brought the poems to life.

As Afghanistan degenerated into civil war in the 1990s, ethnic tensions flared among the exiled Afghans. Hoping that poetry would unite the community, the cabbies joined other like-minded Afghans to underwrite monthly public readings.

"People were revolted by politics," says Hashim Rayiq, a local Afghan civil engineer who helped formalize the poetry sessions. "I said, 'Let's have at least one night without politics.'"

The group they formed in summer 2000 -- "An Evening of Sufism" -- was quickly a hit. Within months it was holding monthly gatherings attended by hundreds, first in a banquet hall and later in a church and eventually in the Masonic Lodge. As the Taliban fell in 2001, it thrived.

"No Afghan organization has lasted six years," Mr. Rayiq says proudly.

Unless you count a 2004 rupture, that is. Maroof Popal and others say "An Evening of Sufism" was infiltrated by Tajik nationalists who supported the Northern Alliance, as well as former Afghan Communists. The newcomers, they say, tried to exclude the works of Pashtuns -- Afghanistan's dominant ethnic group, from which the Taliban hailed -- from the proceedings.

Wali Popal, the moderator of "An Evening of Sufism," denies the charges.

Yet even before politics intruded, some of the cabbies, who were never comfortable with the proliferation of poets and the size of the new group, had been itching to return to the Bedil readings and scholarly debates. Along with Maroof Popal, they broke away and founded "An Evening with the Dervishes" in late 2004.

One December night, the Dervishes dedicated their session to Prof. Negargar, whom they flew in for the occasion. More than 300 people showed up, mostly men in suits or black leather jackets, cell phones and keys dangling from belts. The only music for the evening would be the classical sitar, played by the son of one of India's great musicians, the late Vilayat Khan.

A silence fell over the hall as the professor spoke for two and half hours on the "concept of the unity of God in world religions" with dozens of lines of classical poetry recited from memory.

Four months later, "An Evening of Sufism" hosted an evening about Sa'duddin Ansary, a little known, second-tier 18th century poet. Wali Popal arranged for several of the poet's descendants to attend. A crowd of 200 showed up, nearly one third of them women.

The poems of Ansary moved the audience, but the loudest applause was reserved for the young poets, including the editor of an Afghan cultural magazine who read her poem lamenting suicide bombings. The evening ended with pop tunes performed by an Afghan keyboard player wearing a black shirt with a stenciled-on white tie.

Prof. Negargar says the sparring between the two groups is a little juvenile. "It is like a third grader who has started reading history poking fun at a first grader because the first grader studies only reading and math," he says.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Hearing Postponed In Case Against Former Qwest CEO (WSJ)

By Shawn Young

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038821

The judge overseeing the criminal insider trading case against former Qwest Communications International Inc. Chief Executive Joseph Nacchio delayed an important hearing in the case because of the complex logistics involved in reviewing classified material introduced by the defense.

Saying he needed extra time for his staff to get the security clearances and facilities that are legally required for handling the classified materials, Denver-based U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham on Friday postponed the hearing to August 25 from July 14. He is scheduled to rule on a variety of motions from both sides, including a defense motion to dismiss the case.

Mr. Nacchio is fighting charges that he sold $101 million in stock in early 2001 with insider knowledge that the Denver-based phone company was about to falter. In court filings, his attorneys have said he was optimistic about the company's prospects because, based on classified information, he thought Qwest was poised to win important contracts related to national security.

Prosecutors have argued that the national security aspect of the defense is a smokescreen with no relevance to the charges. Even if the company had won the government contracts, they wouldn't have solved the underlying problems that Mr. Nacchio knew the company faced, prosecutors have said in court filings.

Mr. Nacchio was indicted late last year on 42 counts of insider trading that carry a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison each. Qwest eventually restated $2.5 billion in revenue and $2.2 billion in earnings for 2000 and 2001. Mr. Nacchio is not accused of falsifying the books. In addition to the criminal charges, Mr. Nacchio faces civil fraud charges in a suit brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Papers From Jefferson Office Raid In Limbo (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman

AP2, July 10, 2006

Prosecutors and investigators building a bribery case against Rep. William Jefferson (news, bio, voting record) have been unable to examine the documents and computer files seized in a search of the lawmaker's Capitol Hill office.

The materials were placed off limits by President Bush for 45 days, a cooling-off period that ended Sunday. Yet there has been no resolution of the court fight or talks between congressional leaders and the Justice Department.

The president acted after congressional leaders denounced the FBI's search on May 20 and May 21 as an unprecedented and unconstitutional intrusion on their turf by federal agents.

Bush directed Solicitor General Paul Clement to keep the materials while Justice Department officials negotiated with Congress' lawyers and a legal challenge made its way through the federal courts.

Until the judge in the case rules on the constitutionality of the search, prosecutors will not examine what it yielded, department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan, who signed the warrant authorizing the search, indicated at a hearing last month that he was likely to reject the main argument advanced by Jefferson, D-La., and House lawyers that the Constitution's speech or debate clause prohibits searches of congressional offices.

That clause protects senators and representatives from being questioned by the president, a prosecutor or a plaintiff in a lawsuit about their legislative work.

"The speech-or-debate clause is not a hide-and-conceal clause," Hogan said.

Jefferson has not been charged and has denied wrongdoing. But a business executive has pleaded guilty to paying Jefferson more than $400,000 in bribes. An affidavit filed with Hogan to justify the May search also says the FBI videotaped Jefferson in August 2005 accepting $100,000 from another business executive, who actually was a government informant. The FBI said it recovered $90,000 from a freezer in Jefferson's home.

Separately, negotiators for Congress and the Justice Department are seeking to develop procedures in case the FBI again feels the need to search lawmakers' offices.

DOJ_NMG_0038822

While federal agents had never searched a congressional office before entering Jefferson's, some lawmakers fear the FBI could return to Capitol Hill for searches growing out of the broad corruption investigation linked to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In the Jefferson case, government lawyers have objected to providing advance notification to the target of the search or his agents and to allowing him access to the scene while the search is taking place.

Lawmakers have said they should have the ability to review documents before deciding whether they can be seized in a search. Justice Department lawyers said members of Congress do not warrant such special treatment.

Federal Prosecutor Weighs Life, Death (PTR)

By Jason Cato, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, July 10, 2006

The decision, like any involving life or death, is difficult.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan is considering whether to seek the death penalty against two drug dealers accused in the 2004 slaying of a Beaver County man whose son was to testify against one of them. No defendant in a federal case has ever been sentenced to death in Western Pennsylvania.

Many people familiar with the federal death penalty, including the attorney to defend the most recent case four years ago in Pittsburgh, think Buchanan will seek it in the case against Jelani Solomon, of Beaver County, and Claron Hanner, of Pittsburgh's Knoxville neighborhood.

"She has a reputation as an aggressive prosecutor," said Richard Kammen, who defended Joseph P. Minerd, accused of the New Year's Day 1999 pipe-bomb killings of his pregnant former girlfriend and her young daughter. Minerd was convicted of the killings, but jurors deadlocked on the death penalty, and he was sentenced to life in prison.

"I would not be surprised if she seeks the death penalty in this case," Kammen said.

Frank Helisek Sr. was inside his New Brighton home on Jan. 19, 2004, with family members and his priest, when the doorbell rang. He opened the door and a gunman fired multiple shots through the storm door. One bullet hit Helisek in the chest, ripped through his aorta and lodged in his spine.

Prosecutors say the gunman was Hanner, a 28-year-old drug dealer.

Evidence includes Hanner's cell phone, which prosecutors say he dropped at the scene, as well as the murder weapon containing Hanner's DNA and bits of glass from the shattered storm door imbedded in his shoes.

Hanner's motivation, prosecutors say, was a payment of cash and cocaine from Solomon, 27, of Beaver Falls. Solomon was to go on trial the next day. The lead witness was to be Helisek's son, and the killing was intended to send a message, prosecutors say.

Solomon and Hanner are being prosecuted under federal drug trafficking conspiracy laws, which allow both to face the death penalty for using a gun to kill someone in a planned, drug-related crime. Pennsylvania does not have such a law.

Attorneys for Solomon and Hanner will meet with Buchanan this month to try to talk her out of seeking the death penalty. First up are Solomon's attorneys on Wednesday.

"We absolutely challenge the allegations outright," said Martin A. Dietz, one of Solomon's attorneys. "We dispute that Jelani Solomon had any involvement at all."

The ultimate decision will come from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, but he likely will follow Buchanan's recommendation, Kammen said. Buchanan said she will make her recommendation in August.

Buchanan recommended the death penalty be sought against two people in a 2000 interstate murder-for-hire scheme. Lawrence Skiba, of White Oak, received a reduced sentence for cooperating with prosecutors against the shooter, Eugene DeLuca, of Oak Lawn, Ill. DeLuca committed suicide after prosecutors told him they intended to seek the death penalty, Buchanan said.

Getting a federal death sentence is difficult. One reason is that federal death penalty defendants are guaranteed two attorneys apiece -- including at least one with death penalty experience -- as well as resources for investigators and experts.

DOJ_NMG_0038823

"It's clear that the federal system provides an adequate defense, and that makes it a little unusual in the death penalty world of the United States," said David Bruck, a death penalty expert and law professor at Washington and Lee University. "The federal system gives a picture of what one might expect when it comes to fairness."

Defense attorneys often use the theory of "residual doubt" -- that if any possible doubt can be created, jurors will choose life over death.

"Polls indicate that people's support for the death penalty drops pretty remarkably when there's the option for life without parole," Kammen said. "It makes the system much, much more cautious -- as it should be."

Buchanan said her decision will be based on law, not on whether she thinks prosecutors can persuade a jury to impose the death sentence.

"The taking of a human life is an extreme sanction that should only be taken after careful consideration by the prosecutors, the jurors and the judge," she said. "However, if the law requires the death penalty be sought, we have to follow the law."

Man Slain In Attack On Couple In Georgetown (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

Three assailants who cut the throat of an aspiring politician from Britain killed him and tried to rape his female companion early yesterday in the driveway of a Georgetown mansion, police reported, after the couple had returned from a night at the movies.

The victim, Alan Senitt, 27, a Jewish activist and volunteer for former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner, died at the scene, police said. The woman, whom police declined to identify, was not injured.

Within hours, D.C. police arrested four people in connection with one of the most brutal crimes in years on the affluent streets of Georgetown and said they were looking for possible links to other recent attacks in the city.

Christopher Piper, 25, of Southeast Washington was charged with felony murder and attempted sexual assault. The others -- Jeffery Rice, 22, of Southeast; Olivia Miles, 26, of Northeast; and a 15-year-old boy from Southeast whom police declined to identify because he has been charged as a juvenile -- all face murder charges.

According to police and others, the attack occurred shortly after 2 a.m. as Senitt was seeing the woman home. The couple walked north on 31st Street NW, then turned west toward Wisconsin Avenue on Q Street NW, where the woman lives.

The two were rummaging in the trunk of a car when they were approached by three men wielding a gun and a knife. Police said Piper, who had the gun, grabbed the woman and began dragging her down the driveway. Out of view of his companions, he tried to pull off her clothes, police said. The attacker made a comment "in reference to his intent to commit a sexual assault," said Lt. Robert Glover of the police department's violent crimes branch, which is handling the investigation.

Meanwhile, the other two assailants grabbed Senitt, stabbed him and slashed his throat.

As Senitt lay dying, the three men fled with the woman's purse. The woman ran onto Q Street, flagged down a taxi and begged for help.

"She came in the street and was yelling, 'Stop! I need help! We got robbed!' " said taxi driver Ayalew Haile, who returned to Georgetown yesterday to retrieve his cab, which was trapped behind police tape for much of the day. "I stopped because you have to help someone. My passenger called the police for her."

Police received the 911 call at 2:18 a.m. and responded with paramedics almost immediately. They found several people trying to help Senitt, Glover said, "though those efforts were fruitless." Senitt's body was taken to the medical examiner's office.

The woman, a former babysitter for developer Herb Miller, lives in Miller's basement apartment. She was too upset to talk to reporters, said Miller, who was at his Maryland farm at the time of the attack. He rushed to Washington upon hearing the news. "It's very sad," he said. "So quickly to take somebody's life for nothing."

Barely three hours after the attack, at 5:30 a.m., police arrested Piper and Rice in the 2700 block of Robinson Place SE. The 15-year-old boy and Miles, who is accused of driving a green Toyota suspected to be a getaway car, surrendered to police around lunchtime, authorities said. All four are expected to be arraigned in court today.

As he was being escorted by police, a man in handcuffs whom WRC-TV (Channel 4) identified as Rice apologized for what happened. But he told the station during a brief sidewalk interview, "I did not have anything to do with the murder."

Second Police District Cmdr. Andy Solberg said the quick arrests resulted from leads detectives have developed while investigating two robberies that occurred last month in the same neighborhood. He declined to provide details. Police reports show that a trio of attackers robbed Georgetown pedestrians in the early hours of June 4 and June 11, fleeing with wallets, cash and cellphones.

In late May, three couples walking on the Mall at night were robbed by three assailants in separate incidents. The robbers wore black ski masks in at least one of the cases. In all three attacks, the women were specially targeted: One was groped, one was beaten and a third was sexually assaulted.

Glover declined to comment on a possible connection between Senitt's slaying and those attacks but said police are "taking a broad look at any other crimes that may fit what happened here."

By yesterday afternoon, police had reopened Q Street. People strolled past Miller's house, where two police cruisers stood guard. A few doors down, a woman tending geraniums said she had been awakened by police sirens but didn't know a killing had occurred until she contacted a radio station.

Police officials and D.C. Council member Jack Evans (D-Ward 2) are scheduled to discuss the crime with residents at 6:30 tonight in a meeting at Christ Church, 31st and O streets NW.

"We've had a spate of robberies, but what's unusual here is the sheer viciousness of the crime. It's awful," said Bill Starrels, a Georgetown advisory neighborhood commissioner. "You have a young man trying to get his lady friend home safely. And he essentially gave up his life trying to get her home safely."

Word of Senitt's death traveled rapidly across the Atlantic Ocean to family members in London and friends in Jerusalem. An activist dedicated to fighting anti-Semitism and promoting Israel, Senitt served twice as the elected head of the Union of Jewish Students, which represents about 5,000 college students in Britain.

Later, Senitt worked for Greville Janner, a member of the House of Lords from Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party who founded the Co-Existence Trust, a group that promotes Muslim-Jewish relations.

Last month, Senitt quit that job and moved to Washington to volunteer for Warner's potential presidential campaign and study political fundraising. Senitt was a Labor candidate this year for the council in the northwest London neighborhood where he was raised. He lost, but Danny Stone, a friend who took over at the Co-Existence Trust, said Senitt was committed to a life in politics.

"He was a serious contender for mainstream political life," Stone said. "He was up and coming. He would have been brilliant, I'm sure of it."

Senitt's parents, Jack and Karen, sister Emma and brother James issued a statement mourning the loss of "a much loved son and brother." They asked that they be allowed "to grieve in private."

"The Jewish community as a whole has lost one of its bright young leaders and the wider world has lost a champion of peace and goodwill," the statement said. "It will take us a lifetime to come to terms with our tragic loss."

Judge Denies Bail To Reputed Mobsters (MH)

By Laura Wides-munoz

The Miami Herald, July 10, 2006

A federal judge denied bond Friday to the alleged boss of the Genovese crime family's South Florida operations and three others awaiting trial on charges of extortion, robbery, and money laundering. He will consider bond for another man.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Seltzer denied bail for Renaldi "Ray" Ruggiero, 72, whom federal prosecutors identified as a Genovese capo or captain, and three of his co-defendants -- Joseph Dennis Colasacco, 54, Charles Steinberg, 30, and Mitchell Weissman, 54, said Weissman's attorney John Contini.

Seltzer, prosecutors and attorneys for defendant Francis O'Donnell, 47, will continue negotiations for O'Donnell's release on Monday, said Theresa Van Vliet, one of his attorneys. O'Donnell heads Coach Industries Group, a financial services firm.

DOJ_NMG_0038825

The five men was arrested June 30 along with an alleged Genovese "soldier" Albert "Chinky" Facchiano, 96. Facchiano, of Miami, was released on a $100,000 bond that day. Clement Santoro, 50, was arrested in New York in connection with the group's activities and is also awaiting a decision on bond.

The case, considered the latest blow to one of New York's most powerful Mafia families, deals with 10 years of alleged criminal activity, including murder. The family's reputed acting boss, Liborio S. "Barney" Bellomo, and 31 others were arrested in February in New York.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Kaplan told the courts the investigation of the Florida group began in 2001 and lasted mainly through 2003, when Internal Revenue Service agents searched Ruggiero's home. More than 130 undercover recordings of the men's conversations "brought out the violent nature of the defendants," Kaplan said.

Prosecutors alleged that Colasacco beat a man with a gun while Weissman held a baseball bat over him. The victim eventually escaped, covered in blood, Kaplan said. The men later met the victim at Ruggiero's West Palm Beach restaurant, aptly named Soprano's, to again threaten him, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors also said that the FBI learned that Ruggiero said he would flee if necessary and that he had contacts through the grand jury that was investigating him.

But Ruggiero's attorney, Michael Salnick, repeatedly sought to dispel claims that his client was connected to the Mafia or a dangerous person.

"If I said I knew someone who happened to be an alleged member of organized crime, that wouldn't necessarily mean I'm a member of organized crime, right?" Salnick asked FBI agent Willie James Creech, who testified.

Salnick asked the courts to release his client before trial, noting that Ruggiero suffers from serious health problems, has no passport and has left the country once in 20 years.

The indictment covered alleged illegal enterprises from 1994 to the present, with a few specific examples.

If convicted under the racketeering charges, Ruggiero could face 20 years to life in prison and fines of up to $1.75 million. Convictions would result in lower maximum sentences for the other defendants.

Teen Sought In Ga. Killing Is Captured (MH)

By Karin Dryhurst

The Miami Herald, July 10, 2006

A teenager wanted in the killing of a Georgia college student was arrested by Fort Lauderdale police Friday near his grandmother's home.

Roosevelt Lawrence, 18 and allegedly a member of the Bloods street gang, surrendered to police and FBI agents in Lauderdale Manors, according to the Fort Lauderdale Police Department.

Lawrence, along with two others, are the suspects in an armed robbery/carjacking in which one victim died in Valdosta, Ga., near the Florida border, said Fort Lauderdale police Detective Chuck Morrow.

The gunmen aimed through a vehicle window and shot Valdosta State University student Mason Harper, 24, twice in the upper body just after 1 a.m. June 29. Two suspects were quickly apprehended and charged with homicide, Morrow said.

ONE SEMESTER LEFT

Lawrence, of Valdosta, was identified as one of the shooters. Police continue to investigate who fired the other shot.

Harper had been expected to graduate in December with a marketing degree.

His grandmother, Helen Harper, said his younger brother Andrew had wanted to move to Valdosta to be closer to Mason. They were looking at a potential home for Andrew when Harper was shot.

Harper's family expressed relief Saturday that the last suspect had been apprehended.

`JUST SAD'

"We are a little relieved, just sad," Helen Harper said. ``We are trying to deal with it as much as we can."

Harper's grandmother described him as a generous man who served as a role model for other young black men.

DOJ_NMG_0038826

According to a July 3 Valdosta Daily Times article, Harper managed his own marketing and advertising business, Platinum Plus Entertainment, and raised money for the African American Male Initiative, a program for black male freshmen at Valdosta StateUniversity.

"He had his life planned out," Helen Harper said. ``He just helped everybody he could.

``He was just kind-hearted toward everything and everybody."

The Valdosta Daily Times reported that Mason Harper and his brother Andrew were parked in front of a rental property when Andrew spotted two shadows approaching the vehicle.

Andrew began emptying his wallet for the men while Mason put his hands up in the air. Mason was shot, and Andrew tried to perform CPR, the Daily Times reported.

The Lowndes County Sheriff's Office issued warrants for Lawrence's arrest on charges of murder and possession of a firearm. Believing that Lawrence had fled the state, the FBI in Atlanta also obtained federal warrants for unlawful flight, Morrow said.

The South Georgia Gang Task Force learned that Lawrence, whose street name is "Bo," has relatives and associates in South Florida.

On Thursday, the Georgia task force asked the FBI Fugitive Task Force in South Florida to conduct a local investigation.

The FBI unit began surveillance of three locations in Plantation and Fort Lauderdale, said Morrow, who is a member of the FBI Violent Crimes Fugitive Task Force.

Morrow said he saw Lawrence leaving a store on West Sunrise Boulevard Friday evening and requested assistance from FBI agents and Fort Lauderdale patrol officers.

The agents and officers followed Lawrence to a house at 1223 NW 18th Ave., where his grandmother lives.

"We didn't want to lose this guy," Morrow said. ``It was a brutal homicide."

Lawrence surrendered without incident around 8 p.m. Friday, Morrow said.

EXTRADITION PENDING

Lawrence is being held without bond at the Broward County Jail awaiting extradition to Georgia.

Police will continue to investigate whether the homicide was gang related, Morrow said. The task force also will investigate any connection to gang activity in South Florida.

"We will check to see what associates he has down here locally," Morrow said.

Lauderdale Police Catch Georgia Suspect Wanted In Connection With A Slaying (FLSUNSEN)

By Brian Haas, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, July 8, 2006

Federal and local authorities in Fort Lauderdale on Friday arrested a reputed member of the Bloods street gang wanted in connection with a shotgun slaying in Georgia.

Roosevelt Lawrence, 18, was wanted in connection with the June 29 shooting death of a 24-year-old Valdosta, Ga., man in his car, said Detective Chuck Morrow, who tracks fugitives for the Fort Lauderdale Police Department and is part of the FBI Violent Crime Fugitive Taskforce in South Florida. Morrow said Lawrence and two other men carjacked Mason Harper, 24, on North Troup Street in Valdosta, shooting him twice at point-blank range with shotguns.

The Valdosta Police Department, Lowndes County Sheriff's Office and the FBI's South Georgia Gang Taskforce immediately suspected after the slaying that Lawrence, a known member of the Bloods street gang, had fled to Fort Lauderdale, Morrow said.

Fort Lauderdale police and the South Florida FBI Violent Crime Fugitive Taskforce got the call Thursday that he might be in the area. They had their man within 24 hours.

Morrow said agents put several areas in Plantation, North Lauderdale and Fort Lauderdale under surveillance. He said he spotted Lawrence coming out of a convenience store on West Sunrise Boulevard on Friday about 7:45 p.m. He and the task force members followed him to a home in the 1200 block of Northwest 18th Avenue and set up a perimeter. Lawrence had already fled once, Morrow said.

"We wanted to eliminate any kind of chase with this guy," he added.

But when agents moved in, they took Lawrence down without incident. He was booked on a murder warrant and a charge of possession of a firearm during the commission of a crime.

A woman who answered the phone at the home where Lawrence was nabbed said she was the suspect's grandmother but wouldn't provide her name.

"I'm not giving any information on Roosevelt Lawrence," she said before hanging up.

Lawrence is being held in the Broward County jail without bond until he can be extradited. WALB-Ch. 10 in Albany, Ga., reported that two other suspects in the case have been arrested in Georgia and are being held on murder charges.

Accountant Acquitted In Bribery Case (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

Pr. George's Man Said Fee Seemed Legitimate

An Upper Marlboro accountant was acquitted yesterday of conspiring with two Prince George's County officials to shake down a security company for $250,000 in exchange for a county contract worth more than $1 million.

Accountant Paul L. Wright testified at the eight-day trial that he believed a $10,000 payment to his company in November 2004 was part of a legitimate consulting arrangement and that he had no knowledge of any bribery scheme.

Prosecutors had alleged that Wright conspired with two county officials to target Interior Systems Inc. (ISI). Prosecutors had said that payments totaling $250,000 in exchange for the contract were to be laundered through one of Wright's companies.

The jury deliberated for about 2 1/2 hours yesterday before acquitting Wright, 52, of three charges. Jurors left quickly after the verdict, and efforts to find them for comment were unsuccessful.

Moments after he was acquitted, a relieved Wright hugged one of his attorneys, Carol Elder Bruce, while his other attorney, Anthony J. Pagano, accepted congratulations from some of the more than a dozen relatives and friends of Wright's who were in the courtroom.

The investigation by State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh, in cooperation with the FBI and other law enforcement agencies, has resulted in the conviction of a former high-ranking county government official.

Robert L. Isom, former deputy director of the county Department of Environmental Services, pleaded guilty in September to conspiracy to commit bribery. He testified against Wright last week.

The alleged ringleader of the bribery scheme, Robert L. Thomas, former deputy director of the county's Office of Central Services, is scheduled to go on trial Aug. 14.

The scheme, as described by prosecutors and Isom, would have passed the costs of the bribe to taxpayers. Prosecutors and Isom said ISI, a subcontractor, was to recover the cost of the bribery payments through change orders that were to be approved by county staff after the contract was awarded.

According to trial testimony, the scheme came to the attention of law enforcement officials after Isom gave an ISI employee a note saying the contract was guaranteed to go to ISI in exchange for the bribe.

The ISI employee told his bosses, who in turn called authorities.

"They did not have the goods," Bruce said of the case brought by the state prosecutor's office. "I'm delighted the jury responded to Mr. Wright and the truth. Prosecutorial overreaching."

Deputy State Prosecutor Thomas M. McDonough, who tried the case against Wright, said: "The jury did its job. That's why we have trials."

In her closing argument yesterday, Bruce said that Wright believed he was participating in a legitimate business deal and that he had no knowledge of any bribery scheme.

In his closing argument, McDonough said Wright knowingly participated in the bribery conspiracy.

During its brief deliberations, the jury sent a note to Circuit Court Judge Thomas P. Smith asking for the instructions -- which he had read to the jury before it started deliberating -- regarding the conspiracy to commit bribery and theft charges against Wright.

DOJ_NMG_0038828

With the assent of attorneys on both sides, Smith had photocopies of those instructions made and sent to the jury. About five minutes after receiving the photocopies, the jury came back with its verdict.

The Growing Problem Of Fraud (NYT)

By Bob Tedeschi

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WITH interest rates at historic lows in recent years, consumers have raced to get mortgages. So have criminals.

Industry executives and law-enforcement officials say mortgage fraud continues to climb, with lenders incurring more than $1 billion in fraud losses in the last fiscal year, twice the amount of the previous year. And while no organization has yet tracked how much consumers have lost to fraud, anecdotal evidence suggests that those levels, too, are rising sharply.

"The problem is definitely growing," said Tim Doyle, the senior director of government affairs at the Mortgage Bankers Association in Washington. "The F.B.I. has prioritized this, state attorneys general are looking at this, and more state laws are being passed about it."

About 80 percent of mortgage fraud involves professional thieves who are bilking lenders, the F.B.I. estimates, while in the remaining cases consumers are involved in one way or another.

This second category is known in law enforcement as "fraud for property." Typically, mortgage applicants falsify financial documents so they can qualify for an out-of-reach mortgage, or their lender or broker falsifies the documents on their behalf, looking for profit or a quick commission. Consumers frequently default on such loans, losing their homes and ruining their credit.

Fraud against a lender is known as "fraud for profit." In such cases a criminal group works with an unscrupulous appraiser, typically finding a house that has sat on the market for a while at a certain price. They offer the homeowner that price, with a stipulation: the homeowner must allow the criminals' appraiser to value the home at, say, 30 percent higher.

A criminal in the ring takes out a loan for the higher amount using stolen financial and personal information. When the criminals get the money, they pay the former homeowner the original asking price, then split the remainder among themselves.

Harry Dinham, the president of National Association of Mortgage Brokers in McLean, Va., said that although the authorities are trying to combat the problem, it is so widespread they have not yet caught up. "Criminals have figured out this is a way to make extra money and not get caught on a regular basis," he said.

Ira Rheingold, the executive director of the National Association of Consumer Advocates, a nonprofit legal group in Washington, said prospective homeowners should be wary of unwittingly involving themselves in fraud.

According to Mr. Rheingold, most consumers who engage in mortgage fraud are subprime borrowers. A predatory lender will push such cash-poor borrowers into loans they cannot afford by overstating their income and assets on the loan application. "Some applications created by brokers are the greatest pieces of fiction I ever read," he said.

These borrowers are either not sophisticated enough to catch falsifications on the loan's closing documents or simply don't want to lose the chance to live in a particular house.

To avoid such situations, Mr. Rheingold said, borrowers should know their credit scores and shop around to get a sense of what loan terms they can reasonably expect. Applicants should also demand closing documents early in the process, so they can catch inaccuracies or falsifications before they pack up for the move.

And although consumers cannot do much to thwart "fraud for profit," they should be aware that such crimes ultimately cost them money, Mr. Dinham said. "Companies aren't going to continue to lose money on this without charging more," he said. "Anytime you have a problem this broad, consumers end up paying a premium at some point."

Prisons, Jails Urged To Target TB (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

Tuberculosis is "particularly problematic" in U.S. correctional and detention facilities, say federal health officials, who have updated guidelines for preventing the spread of TB in jails and prisons.

DOJ_NMG_0038829

"Effective TB prevention and control measures in correctional facilities are needed to reduce TB rates among inmates and the general U.S. population," say authors of a report published in the current issue of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's (CDC) Morbidity & Mortality Weekly Report.

"Inmates with undiagnosed TB disease place other inmates and correctional staff at risk for TB, and when released, these persons also can infect persons living in surrounding communities," the researchers said.

In the report, G. Scott Earnest and other CDC epidemiologists point out that the number of U.S. prison inmates quadrupled from 500,000 in 1980 to about 2 million in 2003.

"A disproportionately high percentage of TB cases" occur among prison inmates, they said. In 2003, 0.7 percent of the total U.S. population was confined in jails and prisons, yet 3.2 percent of all TB cases nationwide that year "occurred among residents of correctional facilities."

The researchers said the TB rates of inmates in prisons in California and New York are 10 to 15 times greater than the general populations of those states. Studies show the prevalence of LTBI -- or latent TB infection, which is asymptomatic -- "to be as high as 25 percent" in prisons, they said. Like TB disease, LTBI can be detected by screening and can be treated.

The authors say the key reasons that prison inmates are at higher risk for the airborne infection are their diverse backgrounds, overcrowded facilities and poor ventilation.

In addition, they say, "disparate numbers of incarcerated persons are at high risk for TB," because they have HIV, use injection drugs and have "low socioeconomic status" so may not have had access to proper medical care.

In the United States, TB tends to be concentrated among immigrants. "Detained immigrants are arriving largely from countries with a high prevalence of TB" -- including Mexico, the Philippines and Vietnam -- "and therefore present unique challenges in the elimination of TB in the United States," the authors said.

They note that testing and treating undocumented aliens can be difficult and that these people sometimes are resistant to "first-line anti-TB drugs because of interrupted treatment received in their countries of origin."

The good news, the researchers said, is that illegals who wind up in American prisons "have an opportunity to receive TB screening and begin treatment for TB disease."

The CDC's recommendations for prevention and control of TB in jails and prisons is the first update since 1996.

SOS To Tim Kaine (WP)

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

THE SUPREME Court's decision in the case of Mario A. Bustillo was correct on the arcane but important point of law it addressed: What happens when American states fail to inform foreign governments of the arrest of one of their nationals, thus violating an international treaty? Mr. Bustillo is serving 30 years in prison in Virginia for a brutal murder; after his arrest, authorities did not inform him of his right under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations to contact Honduran officials. The court held in his case, along with a companion case from Oregon, that violations of the treaty should not lead to suppression of evidence of guilt and that defendants must bring up any alleged violations of the treaty at the time of their trials or else lose the ability to raise them later. All of this is correct as a matter of law and should go a long way toward resolving a mess of litigation over consular notification that has sprung up in recent years.

But here's the problem: Mr. Bustillo may well be innocent. Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) ought to review his case.

On the strength of testimony by three eyewitnesses, a jury convicted Mr. Bustillo of bashing James Merry on the head with a baseball bat in 1997. At trial, Mr. Bustillo's defense claimed that a different man, identified only by his street name, "Sirena," was the guilty party. One witness claimed to have been with Sirena on a flight to Honduras just after Mr. Merry's death. But he could not be located, and prosecutors successfully ridiculed the defense. "This whole Sirena thing. I don't want to dwell on it too much. It's very convenient that Mr. Sirena apparently isn't available," a prosecutor argued to the jury.

Buried in a footnote of the opinion by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. are facts that -- at least from the point of view of justice -- are far more important to the case than any question of consular access: Mr. Bustillo "presented newly acquired evidence that tended to cast doubt on his conviction. Most notably, he produced a secretly recorded videotape in which Sirena admitted killing Merry and stated that Bustillo had been wrongly convicted." For it turns out that Sirena does exist. His name is

Julio Osorto. What's more, police stopped him in the vicinity of the crime the night of the killing and -- according to police reports not given to the defense -- he had ketchup-like stains on his clothes at the time. Honduran immigration records confirm that he returned to Honduras the precise day the defense contended at trial.

None of this was relevant to the question before the court. But it's very relevant to the question of whether Mr. Bustillo should be sitting in prison. State authorities stand by the conviction, claiming Sirena's confession is a fabrication to help out a fellow gang member. Based on the record in the case, it's not clear why they're so confident. At a minimum, the record cries out for a serious review. That could take years in federal courts, where procedural bars may prevent it from happening at all. Mr. Kaine could short-circuit that process with a review of his own.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

An 'inquisition'

What's happening to Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, "can only be described as an inquisition," New York Times columnist David Brooks writes.

"Whether you agree with him or not, he is transparently the most kind-hearted and well-intentioned of men. But over the past few years he has been subjected to a vituperation campaign that only experts in moral manias and mob psychology are really fit to explain. I can't reproduce the typical assaults that have been directed at him over the Internet, because they are so laced with profanity and ugliness, but they are ginned up by ideological masseurs who salve their followers' psychic wounds by arousing their rage at objects of mutual hate," Mr. Brooks said.

"Next has come the effort to expel Lieberman from modern liberalism. In a dark parody of the old struggle between Eugene McCarthy and Hubert Humphrey, the highly educated, highly affluent, highly Caucasian wing of the Democratic Party has turned liberalism from a philosophy into a secular religion, and then sought to purge a battle-scarred warhorse on the grounds of insufficient moral purity.

"So these days, for example, one hears that Lieberman is a crypto-conservative, a Bible-Belter. In reality, of course, this is a man who has been endorsed by Planned Parenthood and the Human Rights Campaign. He has a Christian Coalition rating of 0.

"But a lifetime's record is deemed not to matter any longer. For in the midst of the inquisition all of American liberalism has been reduced to one issue, the war."

DeLay's plan

Tom DeLay is planning an aggressive campaign to retake the House seat he quit in June if an appeals court lets stand a ruling by a federal judge last week that his name must stay on the November ballot, a source close to the former congressman tells Time magazine.

Mr. DeLay says he has moved to Virginia, but the federal judge pointed out that he and his wife still own a house in the Texas district.

"If it isn't overturned, Katy, bar the door," says a Republican official. "Guess he'll have to fire up the engines on the campaign and let 'er rip."

But to run, Mr. DeLay would have to raise money fast: His campaign fund has less than $1 million left, Time said. At least he knows his would-be opponent well: former Rep. Nick Lampson's original district was eliminated in a redistricting engineered by Mr. DeLay.

Holiday tradition

"We seem to have a new national holiday tradition: No holiday is complete without front-page allegations of an atrocity committed by U.S. soldiers in Iraq," Wall Street Journal columnist Daniel Henninger writes.

"A month ago, Memorial Day arrived along with Haditha, a place in western Iraq where hundreds of Memorial-weekend news reports said a military investigation had concluded that Marines 'wantonly killed unarmed civilians,' among them 'women and children.' This past Fourth of July, along with the skyrockets' red glare came news that a former Army private had been charged in Charlotte, N.C., with committing rape and murder while he was in Iraq. Labor Day awaits," Mr. Henninger said.

"Rather than let the charges against the private run like a tape-loop over a long, news-dead weekend, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, appeared Fourth of July morning on both NBC and CBS. After CBS' Harry Smith professed himself perplexed at how all this atrocity stuff was happening now, Gen. Pace said that '99.9 percent' of the men and women in Iraq were serving with honor and promised he would 'get to the bottom' of the allegations.

"Military specialists will output case studies for years on how Iraq has altered the way war is waged by Americans -- on the battlefield and on the home front. Most interesting to know would be whether the war as perceived at home and the war as fought daily by our soldiers in Iraq became two separate realms of consciousness, the former barely related to the reality of the latter."

Bush's rise

"For the moment, the issue agenda has turned favorable for Bush and thus for Republicans," Fred Barnes writes in the Weekly Standard.

"His best issue is national security and the war on terror, and the Supreme Court pushed that issue front and center. While striking down the administration's plan for prosecuting terrorists held in Guantanamo, the court said Congress could authorize and set the rules for prosecutions. And that's what Congress will try to do this month, no doubt with extended debate on how to deal with terrorists," Mr. Barnes said.

"Meanwhile, the New York Times has legitimized White House press bashing by disclosing a secret program for tracking al Qaeda money transfers. When your enemies are liberals on the Supreme Court and in the media, even disgruntled conservatives tend to rally to your side.

"At worst, Bush has bottomed out. At best, he's on his way to renewed popularity. 'We've stopped our fall and begun to gain back ground,' a White House official says. 'But we need to make more progress between now and November 1.' For one thing, Bush needs to pick up another 5 percentage points or more in approval from likely voters and perhaps as many as 10 points among adults, the group normally sampled by media pollsters. Either way, that would put him in the high 40s, a lofty enough level to assure Republicans he won't be a drag in the election."

Hopeful Huckabee

Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is optimistic the legislature quickly will reinstate a ban on same-sex couples serving as foster parents in his state.

"What we are talking about is whether the state should place a child in a relationship that is not recognized by the state as a marriage," the Republican governor, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, told the Associated Press on Saturday.

The Arkansas Supreme Court last month struck down regulations banning the placement of foster children with same-sex couples. The court said state officials went too far in imposing the ban, but the court did not rule on the merit of the ban.

Mr. Huckabee, an ordained Baptist minister who is leaving office next year because of term limits, has said that there is little doubt the legislature will reinstate the ban and that the courts eventually will uphold it.

"Our attorneys read into that that if it was legislation, it would likely stand, that we could in fact say that only married couples could be foster parents," Mr. Huckabee said. "We think that if we go back and codify that into law, that probably takes care of it."

Mr. Huckabee spoke as he opened a three-day campaign swing in Iowa, where precinct caucuses traditionally launch the presidential nominating season.

Gay-marriage Opponents Hold A Winning Hand (FT)

By Rebecca Knight

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

For US advocates of gay marriage, the losing streak continues. Their opponents won two important state court battles last week, and those defeats offered little optimism for approval of gay unions in the legal and electoral battles that lie ahead in 2006.

A California appeals court in San Francisco will hear on Monday arguments on whether the state constitution gives gay and lesbian couples the right to marry, while appeals against decisions upholding same-sex marriage bans are pending in Washington and New Jersey.

DOJ_NMG_0038832

And in Massachusetts, currently the only state that permits the marriage of same-sex couples, Mitt Romney, the Republican governor, is urging the state legislature to go ahead this Wednesday with a scheduled vote on a proposed state constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage.

The amendment needs the support of 50 lawmakers during the current and next legislative sessions to reach the November 2008 ballot.

"The Supreme Court has changed dramatically with the addition of Justice Alito and Chief Justice Roberts, and so lesbian and gay advocates are compelled to try the state courts," said Jonathan Turley, a professor at George Washington University Law School. "But the states for the most part are not going to give advocates the result they want."

Last week, the New York Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, ruled that denying marriage to same-sex couples did not violate the state constitution. In a 4-2 decision, the court found that the state's definition of marriage as a union between a man and a woman could have a rational basis – one perhaps rooted in the interests of child-rearing – and that it was up to the state legislature to decide whether it should be changed.

"What strikes me is how articulate the court is getting," said Maggie Gallagher, president of the Institute for Marriage and Public Policy and an opponent of gay marriage. "The social legitimacy of marriage is at the core of this debate, but that social judgment is not something that the courts can confer."

In Georgia, where three-quarters of voters approved a ban on gay marriage when it was on the ballot in 2004, the state's supreme court reinstated the ban, ruling unanimously that it did not violate the state's single-subject rule for ballot measures. Lawyers for the plaintiffs had claimed the ballot language was confusing, asking voters to decide on both same-sex marriage and civil unions, two distinct issues about which many people had varying opinions.

Despite the twin rulings, legal experts cautioned against expecting similar outcomes in other states. "These are state-by-state decisions. New York was looking at its constitution, Georgia was looking at its constitution," said Martha Davis, an associate professor of law at Northeastern University. "Just because we've had two rulings that turned the decision back to the legislatures, it does not necessarily mean that other rulings will go that way."

Many states and the federal government have enacted "defence of marriage" laws that limit the benefits and rights of same-sex couples. President George W. Bush's push to amend the Constitution to define marriage as strictly between a man and woman was shot down last month by the Senate. Amending the Constitution requires a two-thirds majority of both halves of the legislature.

Prof Turley noted that attitudes toward gays and lesbians had grown increasingly tolerant over the past few decades. "The gay community has been enormously successful in changing the country's views on the issue of same-sex marriage on a social level. In the long run, it may be better for the movement to change minds and not legal doctrine."

Gay Democracy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

The biggest problem with contemporary courts is their inclination to invent rights that legislators and our Constitution-writers never intended. So it's certainly noteworthy when they decline a politically fashionable invitation to do so. That's precisely what happened last week, when the highest courts in Georgia and New York decided that the state constitution does not guarantee a right to same-sex marriage.

"Plaintiffs have not persuaded us that this long-accepted restriction [in the state marriage law] is a wholly irrational one, based solely on ignorance and prejudice against homosexuals," Judge Robert S. Smith wrote for the 4-2 majority in New York, a liberal state where at least one mayor had simply decided to preside over gay marriages despite state law.

The Judge and his three colleagues may no longer be invited to certain Manhattan parties. But the upshot is that New Yorkers can still fight for gay marriage if they want. Advocates will simply have to achieve their goal the old-fashioned way: by changing the law through the democratic process. In fact, Judge Victoria Graffeo concurred with the majority but wrote a second opinion suggesting that maybe it is time for the state legislature to "address the needs of same-sex couples and their families." Policy victories achieved in this fashion, as opposed to judicial fiat, tend to be more durable since they are based on popular consent.

Three of the four majority justices were appointed by Republican Governor George Pataki, by the way, which shows that politicians sometimes do follow through on their pledges to appoint judges who believe in restraint. By contrast, Chief Justice Judith Kaye, appointed by Mario Cuomo, sounded as if she was auditioning for a Hillary Rodham Clinton Supreme Court nod as she high-mindedly warned of the disapproval of future generations in her dissent. Judicial nominees are arguably the main dividing line between Democrats and Republicans, even in New York.

Contrary to the willful Judge Kaye, we suspect future generations may view last week's ruling as a blessing in disguise for gay rights. The last thing advocates should want is to have gay marriage imposed on a skeptical public by a judicial order that would inspire a political backlash and make compromise impossible. This is precisely what happened with abortion after the U.S. Supreme Court peered into the Constitution's "emanations" and "penumbras" and overturned 50 state laws in Roe v. Wade.

Leaving the debate to legislatures will also mean politicians will have to come out of the closet themselves, so to speak. They will have to declare themselves on the issue rather than hiding behind the courts. Already in New York, Democratic candidate for Governor Eliot Spitzer has announced his support for gay marriage, while Senator Clinton has angered some activists by saying she favors civil unions for gays but not outright marriage.

If gay activists want to persuade New Yorkers and other fair-minded Americans to come around to their view, there is a traditional way to do that: hard work and commitment to the democratic process.

Setback For Marriage Justice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

THE HIGHEST COURTS of New York and Georgia last week moved in the opposite direction of history and justice on same-sex marriage.

By a 4-2 vote, the New York Court of Appeals ruled Thursday that the state Legislature's limitation of marriage to heterosexual couples was a "long-accepted restriction" not based solely on "ignorance and prejudice against homosexuals."

Adding insult to injury, an opinion signed by three of the judges in the majority ruled that it was rational for the Legislature to ban same-sex marriage in the interests of protecting children. Noting that "an important function of marriage is to create more stability and permanence in the relationships that cause children to be born," Judge Robert S. Smith wrote that the state could "offer an inducement — in the form of marriage and its attendant benefits — to opposite-sex couples who make a solemn, long-term commitment to each other." Never mind that childless heterosexual couples also receive legal benefits from civil marriage — or that many gay couples are raising children.

The Georgia Supreme Court decision, also handed down Thursday, was narrower but still disappointing. The court rejected technical objections to a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage that was approved by state voters in 2004.

Neither of these decisions is binding on the courts of other states, any more than was the famous 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' high court that gay marriage couldn't be prohibited. So there's still hope that California's Supreme Court will take a more enlightened view of the issue when it next hears a challenge to heterosexual monopoly on civil marriage. Advocates of same-sex marriage have turned to the state courts since Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's ill-advised veto of a same-sex-marriage bill last year, but hopefully the Legislature will keep trying.

Gay-rights activists shouldn't underestimate the challenge ahead. In Georgia, the ban on same-sex marriages upheld last week passed with 76% of the vote. Meanwhile, even politicians who support gay rights consider it political suicide to mention the M-word. And conservatives continue to score points with the fallacious argument that legalizing same-sex marriage would make heterosexual marriage less attractive or, even more absurdly, damage the religious sacrament of matrimony.

It took the Supreme Court until 1967 — 1967! — to strike down odiously racist anti-miscegenation laws. Someday we'll look back on the anti-gay-marriage hysteria with the same revulsion. Until then, with a high court seemingly disinclined to address marriage, states such as California should take the lead.

Bringing The Church To The Courtroom (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038834

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. -- A 29-foot war memorial shaped like a cross should be allowed to remain on public land. A teacher should be able to emphasize references to God in the Declaration of Independence. Protesters should be permitted to approach women near the doors of an abortion clinic.

These courtroom fights and dozens of others pending across the country belong to the portfolio of the ambitious Alliance Defense Fund, a socially conservative legal consortium. It spends $20 million a year seeking to protect what it regards as the place of religion -- and especially Christianity -- in public life.

Considering itself the antithesis of the American Civil Liberties Union, the Scottsdale-based organization has used money and moxie to become the leading player in a movement to tug the nation to the right by challenging decades of legal precedent. By stepping into the nation's most impassioned debates about religion in the public sphere, the group aims to bring law and society into alignment with conservative Christianity.

The group successfully challenged the issuance of same-sex marriage licenses in California and Oregon, and worked on statewide ballot initiatives prohibiting such unions. Its attorneys helped the Boy Scouts win approval of a policy barring gay Scout leaders.

The group has been battling embryonic stem cell research in Missouri and won a Supreme Court stay preventing the removal of California's 29-foot Mount Soledad cross. In Florida, where saving the life of brain-damaged Terri Schiavo became a crusade, the group supported efforts to nourish her.

"What we are really trying to protect are the things this country was founded on," said D. James Kennedy, leader of Florida's Coral Ridge Ministries and one of the prominent Christian conservatives who fashioned the alliance in 1993 as a sharp stick in the national culture debate.

That is not how opponents see the organization. While crediting the ADF with training troops for battles once fought by a haphazard assortment of government lawyers and often ill-prepared volunteers, critics question the alliance's commitment to tolerance and the Constitution.

"They're not for some form of generic religious freedom. They're for Christian superiority, that Christians take over the courts," said Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for the Separation of Church and State. "They are living in this fantasy world where the majority religion, Christianity, is claimed to be literally under attack."

Gary S. McCaleb directs the ADF's litigation team from a file-filled office in a nondescript Scottsdale office park. He said the 16 staff lawyers are in such demand that the ADF created separate divisions for marriage issues and for university free-speech questions.

The ADF underwrites legal fights and increasingly handles litigation itself. Groups receiving significant funding include the American Center for Law & Justice, founded by evangelist Pat Robertson, and Liberty Counsel, backed by the Rev. Jerry Falwell.

"We're certainly stretched. I feel I could put a hundred attorneys to work tomorrow," said McCaleb, who said the ADF files one to two cases a week and is deeply involved in 80 to 100 open cases at any one time. He calls this a "pivotal time" in U.S. history.

"What we see is an overarching agenda from the left wing and the pro-homosexual groups," said McCaleb, who perceives "clear hostility to Christian thought." He described the stakes as "the fundamental ability of Christians to speak their minds on the issues of the day."

The day McCaleb said this, lawyers were preparing to intervene in the dispute over the Mount Soledad cross, a war memorial erected in 1954 in La Jolla, Calif., and challenged by an atheist veteran. Federal judges ordered the cross to be removed from government land, but Justice Anthony M. Kennedy granted a temporary stay on July 3.

"For private citizens to be told they can't memorialize their dead is an outrage," said McCaleb, noting similar cases elsewhere. "It's not a matter of these crosses radiating secret Christian rays that will convert people."

Federal courts have said in the Mount Soledad case and other disputes that private land, including church property, is the appropriate place for such religious displays. They cite the Establishment Clause in the Constitution, which prohibits the government from sanctioning or favoring one religion over another.

DOJ_NMG_0038835

What motivated D. James Kennedy and other conservatives -- including James C. Dobson of Focus on the Family and William Bright of the Campus Crusade for Christ -- to form the ADF was the impression that Christians were losing too many such battles.

"It was just years of seeing the ACLU and its cronies attacking religious organizations or religious exercise," Kennedy said. "And, very frequently, there was nobody that even showed up to defend the Christian position."

To change the equation, the alliance hired Reagan-era prosecutor Alan Sears. He later brought in corporate lawyer Jeffery Ventrella. Mostly under Ventrella's watch, the ADF has schooled more than 800 outside lawyers, each promising to donate 450 hours to the cause.

Ventrella runs an annual summer seminar, which this year brought 100 law students to Scottsdale. The idea, according to ADF documents, is to train them in "a distinctly Christian worldview of law" before they head to clerkships and other influential posts, "perhaps even Supreme Court justices."

Some of them met recently at a training session in Chicago. Lawyers and preachers jotted tips as ADF speakers explained that prayer is not always enough: Protecting the faith sometimes demands lawsuits and clamor.

"I was looking for a way to reconcile my faith and my professional life. The ADF helped me be not a Christian and a lawyer but a Christian lawyer," said Chicago litigator Melanie Jo Triebel, who says that the "Christian side of the debate" has not been effective enough.

The ADF's rising profile in churches and the media attracts an average of 300 inquiries a month. One recent day, a call came from a government employee disappointed by a diversity training video because it did not portray homosexuality negatively. A graduating high school senior called to say he had been told not to use Jesus's name in a speech.

"It's definitely an affirmation of our fallen state as humans," Renee Bergmen said of her work evaluating such complaints. "But it's a blessing to provide an answer, and that answer being faith in Jesus Christ."

Every December, the ADF monitors the expression of Christmas, fearful that the encouragement of greetings such as "Happy Holidays" and other steps taken in the name of cultural sensitivity are costing the day its religious identity. Last year, the organization received 434 calls.

A recent case, now pending, focuses on a Pittsburgh ordinance that requires protesters to remain 15 feet from an abortion clinic door. ADF lawyer Elizabeth Murray sued, saying she represented "a compassionate, professional nurse who has devoted much of her life to kindly and gently counseling women during a difficult time in life."

The ADF took up the cause of Stephen Williams, a fifth-grade teacher in Cupertino, Calif. School authorities, wary of proselytizing, said he was overemphasizing religious excerpts from the Declaration of Independence and other documents.

When Williams sued in November 2004, asserting religious discrimination as a Christian, the alliance attracted enormous attention -- particularly from the religious right and conservative media outlets -- when it announced, "Declaration of Independence Banned From Classroom."

Authorities at Stevens Creek Elementary School said the Declaration continued to be taught. They pointed out textbook references and said it hung on school walls. Williams, they said, chose materials so narrow that they were forced to act. Williams agreed to withdraw his suit in August 2005.

Outsiders questioned the ADF's motives and legal reasoning.

"They know that a teacher who has a pattern of proselytizing has crossed the line," said Charles C. Haynes, a senior scholar at the Freedom Forum's First Amendment Center, asserting that the ADF went too far. "When they do that, it may raise money, it may raise their profile, but it undermines their credibility."

"They seem to have an ACLU-envy problem. They distort the position of the ACLU to justify themselves," said Jeremy Gunn, director of the ACLU's Program on Freedom of Religion and Belief. He said the ADF favors a "Walt Disney version of American history."

"There's no mugging of their free speech," Gunn said. "They talk about freedom and liberty. What they really want is the government to endorse their version."

Alliance executives say they are on solid ground when it comes to history and the law, and they insist that the pendulum is beginning to swing their way. Sears said the group, "by grace," expects to grow 20 percent a year.

"Over and over, there's a search-and-destroy mission for religious expression," Ventrella told the trainees in Chicago. "Do we want to forget our religious heritage? When we abandon God, we will forget man. So what's God got to do with it? Everything."

Yes On Bilingual Ballots (WP)

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

THE HOUSE of Representatives' smooth passage to renewal of the Voting Rights Act hit a bump last month when a group of conservative Republicans rebelled over, among other things, provisions to require bilingual ballots in many jurisdictions. The rebels were wrong. When the House takes up the measure, as it may do this week, it should reject any effort to strip the bilingual-ballot requirement or to allow objections over the rule to torpedo this important measure.

The disputed provisions were adopted as part of the 1975 Voting Rights Act. The requirements apply to political subdivisions where there is a significant population (more than 5 percent of eligible voters, or 10,000, whichever is fewer) of "language minority" voters (defined as those of Hispanic, Asian, Native American or Alaskan Native origins) and a higher than average illiteracy rate among that group. Currently, nearly 500 jurisdictions in 31 states must provide election information -- from registration requirements to instructions to ballots -- in more than one language; five states -- Alaska, Arizona, California, New Mexico and Texas -- must provide such help statewide.

The arguments against this provision have an air of reasonableness that dissipates upon closer study. Attaining proficiency in English is a requirement of naturalization, opponents note, so why should an English-only ballot be a problem for anyone who's attained citizenship? In addition, the critics contend, the law imposes costs on local jurisdictions and serves as a disincentive to assimilate and learn English.

But the level of English proficiency required for citizenship isn't the same as that which could be required to read a complicated ballot initiative -- or even a form whose instructions aren't completely clear. (Anybody remember butterfly ballots?) Nor do the English proficiency requirements apply to older residents seeking citizenship. And many native-born Americans whose English skills are limited -- Native Americans, Alaskan Natives and Latinos -- benefit from getting election information in their preferred languages. Puerto Rican citizens who move to the mainland ought to be able to read ballots in their native language.

The costs may not be negligible; in Los Angeles, the largest and most diverse local election jurisdiction in the country, election officials spend less than 10 percent of their budget to provide language assistance in Spanish, Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Tagalog and Vietnamese. But the benefits are clear: When bilingual assistance is provided, voting participation increases and members of the affected groups have a better shot at winning elections. Hispanic voter registration in Yakima County, Wash., went up 24 percent after the Justice Department sued the county for failing to comply with the law. After Justice reached an agreement with Harris County, Texas, turnout of Vietnamese American voters doubled, and the first Vietnamese American was elected to the state legislature.

We doubt there are many people who will decide to learn, or not to learn, English based on the availability of bilingual ballots. But we don't doubt that many more people will vote, and in an informed way, if they know what they're voting on. That is something to be welcomed, not feared.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Scrambles To Meet EU Demands (SEAPI)

By Todd Bishop, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, July 10, 2006

Faced with a series of tough deadlines, one group on Microsoft Corp.'s Redmond campus has been working until all hours -- but not on anything so normal as the new Windows or Office.

The ad hoc team of 300 people is creating volumes of technical documents required by the European Commission's March 2004 antitrust decision. The project will be in the spotlight this week, with the commission poised to fine the company up to $2.5 million a day, dating back months, for what it calls Microsoft's failure to comply with the ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0038837

Microsoft says the all-out push shows that it has been doing all it can. The company points to signs of devotion to the cause -- such as one of the project leaders, engineer Henry Sanders, deciding to swear off shaving until the effort is complete, like an athlete in the playoffs.

The team's work may help in the future, but it isn't expected to avert a major fine this week. European officials say the very fact that Microsoft is still working on the documents shows that it wasn't living up to its obligations in the first place.

"They're two years late," said Jonathan Todd, spokesman for European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, adding that Microsoft "had a very long time" to comply with the ruling.

The provision in dispute requires Microsoft to offer technical information to its competitors in the computer server market, to help the rival products work as smoothly with Windows as Microsoft's own server products would.

That reflects the central goal of the repeated antitrust actions against the company -- reducing the advantage Microsoft enjoys because of its dominant Windows operating system.

The trustee in the case called Microsoft's initial versions of the technical documents "fundamentally flawed" and "totally unfit" for the intended use.

But Microsoft says the commission itself wasn't originally clear enough about what it wanted, hampering the project.

"We are committed to complying with every part of this decision," Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith said last week. "We always have been."

Last year, the commission said Microsoft hadn't met a Dec. 15 deadline for supplying "complete and accurate" documentation. In March, the agency repeated its threat to fine Microsoft up to 2 million euros, or $2.5 million, for every day past the deadline that it didn't comply.

That maximum penalty would add up to more than $500 million, if counted until this week, although the precise time frame hasn't yet been disclosed.

Whether or not the threat of a fine played a role, the situation appeared to improve after the commission's March warning. Microsoft's Smith credits a meeting in late March where the trustee, computer science professor Neil Barrett, clarified the requirements for the documents.

After that, the company brought in veteran engineers to help meet an aggressive series of deadlines Barrett laid out. Microsoft says it also brought back retired employees and pulled people from products including Windows Vista, the new version of its flagship PC operating system, to work on the European Union initiative.

"The way we approached it was to kind of think of the commission -- and the trustee, in particular -- as a customer who we had some customer-satisfaction issues with," said Bill Laing, general manager in Microsoft's Server & Tools division and a leader of the European project.

In an office on the Microsoft campus last week, project leaders told stories of the team working extreme hours over the past three months. They recounted times such as the morning that work was interrupted after 3 a.m. by a campus fire alarm.

Sanders, general manager for Windows networking and collaboration, said the team making the European documents is focused on its work, not on the fine.

"It's out of our control," Sanders said. "I think we have done a lot of really good work in getting this stuff out the door, and that's all we can do."

Elements of their work can also be applied to the requirements of Microsoft's U.S. antitrust settlement. Although the next versions of Windows and Office have both been delayed, Microsoft says it doesn't believe diverting people to work on the EU or U.S. documentation has played a role.

The group says it has met all six deadlines to date under Barrett's revised schedule. It has named each of the milestones after a stop on the Circle Line of the London Underground, at the suggestion of Iain McDonald, director of program management for the Windows Server group and the project management leader of the EU initiative.

It will be difficult, but the group expects to meet the seventh and final deadline -- Paddington Station -- on July 18, said McDonald and Sanders.

"It is an effort that is quite massive," Smith said. "This is probably the most complex remedy that has ever been imposed in a competition law case."

DOJ_NMG_0038838

But the recent activity isn't expected to prevent the commission from imposing fines against Microsoft this week dating back to December. Kroes, the competition commissioner, told reporters in Europe last week that she saw no alternative but to impose daily fines for Microsoft's lack of compliance with the ruling.

"If that new technical documentation does finally bring them into compliance, all well and good. They would not, therefore, be subject to further penalty payments in the future," said Todd, the commission spokesman.

"But the decision on the agenda (this week) is whether or not to impose these penalty payments backdated to the 15th of December, because they have not been in compliance."

The situation shows that the commission isn't just "settling for issuing a decision," Kroes said during a Friday speech in Bonn, Germany, according to an Associated Press report. "It is just as important that this decision has the desired effect on the market."

A $500 million fine wouldn't be extraordinary compared with Microsoft's past antitrust settlements and penalties. Under the commission's ruling in March 2004, for example, Microsoft paid a $600 million fine.

Microsoft is appealing the EU's 2004 ruling but has been ordered to comply with its provisions pending the outcome of the appeal. The other main element required the company to offer a version of Windows without Windows Media Player, although that product has experienced limited market demand.

The new fines would deal solely with the separate aspect of the ruling, the technical documentation for computer servers.

Microsoft's Smith declined to say whether he, Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates or Chief Executive Steve Ballmer had been in touch with Kroes, the European competition commissioner, to try to prevent the imposition of fines.

Last week, the commission reportedly received consent from the antitrust representatives of European Union member states on the principle of imposing daily fines against Microsoft. Today, they are due to take up the issue of how much to impose.

Then, on Wednesday, the European Commission is expected make the final decision on the fine. Competition Commissioner Kroes is scheduled to hold a news conference that day.

In addition to the fines running back to Dec. 15, the commission may threaten further fines if Microsoft doesn't comply, according to news reports out of Europe last week.

Under a formula set out by competition law, the maximum daily fine against Microsoft from this point forward could be as much $5.5 million a day.

Venture To Buy Heritage Property (WSJ)

By Ryan Chittum And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

An Australian and American joint venture agreed to purchase strip-mall owner Heritage Property Investment Trust Inc. for about $1.83 billion in a deal that will more than double its U.S. presence in the sector.

Centro Watt, a partnership between Centro Properties Group, a publicly traded Australian company, and Watt Commercial Properties, a private Los Angeles-based concern, will pay $36.15 a share for the Boston-based real-estate investment trust. The price represents a 3.3% premium to Friday's close of $34.98 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Including debt, Centro is paying about $3.3 billion and getting what it says is a 7.3% capitalization rate -- the return on investment in the first year of ownership, a key real-estate measure.

Heritage owns 157 strip malls with 27 million square feet of space in 27 states. It has been sharply criticized by investors and analysts for its executive-compensation practices, which have led the industry while its share performance has lagged.

Last year Heritage Chief Executive Thomas C. Prendergast received $16.4 million in total compensation, including salary, restricted stock and retirement benefits. Heritage has significantly underperformed its peers in the four-plus years it has been public, with a total return to investors of 87.7% since it went public in April 2002, compared with 154.5% for strip-mall companies, according to SNL Financial. The company restated earnings last fall back to 2003 because of errors in its executive-compensation accounting.

Centro Watt came into the bidding process when it was under way for several months, around the time of the big annual shopping-center convention in Las Vegas in May. At the time, it appeared Heritage was taking itself off the block because it wasn't getting a high enough price from American bidders, including Equity One Inc. and Lightstone Group LLC. Centro Watt was able to pay more because the Australian cost of capital is much lower now than it is in the U.S.

Heritage shares reached a 52-week high of $40.24 in March on speculation it would be acquired.

Centro Watt plans to put most of the individual properties into various unlisted funds, while retaining sizable interests in them and collecting fee income.

The deal will help Centro Watt leverage its size with retailers who are looking for efficiencies in negotiating leases for large numbers of stores.

We Aren't All Pirates (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

THE INTERNET AND DIGITAL technology have been both a blessing and a curse for the entertainment industry, opening new opportunities for selling music and video but also fueling rampant global piracy.

To attack the latter problem, industry lobbyists are pressing Congress to adopt at least five different proposals that would give them more control over their works as they flow through new digital pipelines into living rooms and portable devices. But these measures, like the technologies they would affect, have a hard time distinguishing between illicit actions and legitimate ones.

The bills would pressure device makers and service providers to limit or eliminate features from some products, such as the ability to record individual songs off satellite radio. In essence, tech companies would have to alter what they are selling to safeguard the entertainment industry's wares.

Protecting intellectual property is a legitimate goal for Congress — after all, the Constitution called on Congress to give authors and inventors exclusive rights "to promote the progress of science and useful arts." The task has grown more urgent with the emergence of an Internet-fueled global information economy. But what the entertainment industry is seeking in this year's proposals isn't merely protection from piracy; it's after increased leverage to protect its business models.

That's why lawmakers must bear in mind the balance needed between copyright holders' interests and the public's, something Congress has not done well lately. In 1998, it gave copyright holders broad power to block legitimate uses of works, even those in the public domain, through the use of electronic locks that impede copying of digital products. And that same year, it prolonged the public domain's starvation diet by extending copyrights an additional 20 years, to 70 years beyond the death of the creator.

The movie and music industries have similar interests, but their agendas this year are distinct. The major studios want to alter digital TV receivers, recorders and home networks to stop shows from being redistributed indiscriminately online — a proposal that has won grudging support from some consumer-electronics and high-tech firms. They also want to redesign computers, set-top boxes and other products to ensure that the limits placed on digital videos are not removed when the data are converted from digital to analog. This approach could deter people from making a permanent copy of a pay-per-view movie, but it also could make it hard for digital movie buyers to create backup copies or transfer videos to portable players.

The music industry, meanwhile, is focusing its fire on satellite and digital radio services that make it easy for listeners to record and save individual songs. Those recorders don't fuel piracy, given that federal law already requires them to include a form of anti-piracy technology. Instead, a more immediate effect of the industry-backed proposals would be to give labels and music publishers more control over listeners' ability to record broadcasts, while helping them collect more money from XM, Sirius and other digital music businesses.

Clearly, the industry-backed proposals would do more than just defend copyrighted works from pirates. They also would impinge on devices that have legitimate uses and steer the development of technology, cutting off some innovation. As they weigh the entertainment industry's pleas, lawmakers shouldn't assume all consumers are bootleggers and every digital device is a hand grenade aimed at Hollywood.

Judge Tells NOAA To Stop Jet Flights Into Hurricanes (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

A federal administrative law judge has stopped the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration from flying its high-altitude jet into hurricanes until the agency negotiates with a union representing meteorologists, engineers and technicians.

Richard A. Pearson , an administrative law judge with the Federal Labor Relations Authority, found that the NOAA's Aircraft Operations Center in Tampa had wrongfully bypassed the National Weather Service Employees Organization in forming a team to study proposals for flying a Gulfstream IV-SP jet into and near the centers of hurricanes as safely as possible.

NOAA officials contended that they were not changing the conditions of employment for the jet's civilian crews, but Pearson said the high speed and altitude of the jet, the hazards of flying close to a storm's inner core, and the inability of flight instruments to detect all hazards were "quantitatively and qualitatively different from those the employees were accustomed to . . . and required them to face new and more complex safety hazards."

Jordan St. John , the NOAA director of public affairs, said the judge's ruling is under review. The ruling "won't change any hurricane observations" this year, he said.

The NOAA's propeller planes, the WP-3D Orions used since 1981 to fly into hurricanes and collect weather data, were not covered by the ruling.

In 1996, NOAA acquired the Gulfstream jet to also measure weather conditions around hurricanes, typically about 40,000 feet and 100 miles from the eyes of the storms. Last year, in a decision that prompted the union's protest, the Gulfstream pilots made three flights into the "central dense overcast," the heavy clouds that form in the upper altitudes above the center of hurricanes and tropical storms.

Those "test missions," Jordan said, were designed to help NOAA prepare for installing new radar in 2008 on the jet for observation and measurement of storm forces.

In statements filed in the case, NOAA officials acknowledged that they had changed the jet's flight pattern "but not the environment into which the flights are conducted."

Pearson, however, said that NOAA "seems to be denying the obvious." The agency, Pearson said, "fully understands the safety implications of venturing into this new area, both on the aircraft and on the crews, because it has spent literally years trying to find the best ways of flying into this new area."Layoffs at the Library

The Library of Congress has notified 29 employees at the Congressional Research Service that their jobs will be abolished on Sept. 29.

The layoffs are believed to be the first in the 92-year history of CRS, the division of the library that tracks legislative issues and collects data for members of Congress. The workers being eliminated perform clerical, technical and audio-visual duties.

Last year, CRS announced plans to cut 59 jobs. Charles V. Stanhope , acting director of communications for the Library of Congress, said that 23 CRS employees left after being offered $25,000 buyouts and early retirement packages and that seven others found jobs elsewhere in CRS, at the library or outside the library.

The 29 employees to be laid off "cannot find positions with comparable pay and benefits," according to a newsletter published by the Congressional Research Employees Association, a part of the International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers union.

Nearly two-thirds of the employees have 16 or more years of service with the Library of Congress, the association said.

In a memo to employees, the library said the layoffs were necessary "to maintain a cost-effective organization dedicated to meeting its statutory mission." But Michael Waterhouse , vice president of the employee association, said the layoffs would reduce "what we believe are essential services."Postal Resignation

Azeezaly S. Jaffer , vice president for public affairs and communications at the U.S. Postal Service for the past six years, has left "to pursue other career opportunities," the agency said.

Jaffer, a 20-year postal veteran, led a public relations campaign during the 2001 anthrax attacks aimed at maintaining public confidence in the post office. He was a ready defender of the Postal Service, writing numerous letters "setting the record straight," as he put it, that challenged news media accounts of postal operations.

DOJ_NMG_0038841

His last day was June 30. Postmaster General John E. Potter named postal manager Jon Leonard acting head the public affairs office. Jaffer could not be reached for comment.

Coming Soon: A Tale Of Whistle-Blowing At The EPA (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

Marsha Coleman-Adebayo is ready for her close-up.

She sold the story of her battles with the Environmental Protection Agency to Hollywood, and actor Danny Glover is preparing a movie about how she blew the whistle against the agency and successfully sued for race and gender discrimination.

But Coleman-Adebayo is no star at the EPA, which has described her as a bad employee who refuses to work with others. She was allowed to work at home for five years because of a medical condition, but when she resisted coming back in April, the EPA took away her pay.

"They are really trying to break me, financially, emotionally and everything else," Coleman-Adebayo, 53, said in a recent interview.

The tense, stressful, dramatic and sometimes-ugly relationship between employer and employee is the stuff of movies. But the case involves larger issues about how the government treats employees who feel they are being retaliated against. Coleman-Adebayo and others say it amounts to corruption.

Her career at the EPA took a bad turn after she complained that the agency stood by in 1996 as a U.S. chemical company mined a deadly substance in South Africa. She won a $600,000 discrimination judgment against the agency in 2000.

"Adebayo's case is interesting because the issues of whistle-blowing and retaliation in federal government are larger than any one employee, particularly in the wake of Sept. 11," said Joslyn Barnes, a New York screenwriter who is working on the screenplay.

The EPA declined to discuss Coleman-Adebayo's complaints because a second lawsuit she filed against the agency is pending and because her case is a personnel matter.

"EPA will not comment on the specifics of the pending litigation except to deny that EPA has discriminated or retaliated against Dr. Coleman-Adebayo," EPA spokeswoman Jennifer Wood said in a prepared statement last month.

The agency's opinions of Coleman-Adebayo are revealed in court documents and recent e-mails that she provided. In one e-mail, a supervisor, Rafael DeLeon, dismissed her complaints of "hostile workplace events" and a "pattern and practice of harassment." They are not medical facts, he wrote. They "merely represent your self-serving and baseless version of events."

Court records show that the EPA includes one white supervisor who referred to Coleman-Adebayo, who is African American, as "an honorary white person," and another supervisor who allegedly referred to her as "uppity," a segregation-era word for black people who do not accept the notion that they are inferior. The supervisors were never reprimanded.

The federal workplace is rife with complaints by whistle-blowers of retaliation, often involving threats of job loss. Such complaints usually play out in an arcane equal-opportunity process, rarely seeing the light of day.

Coleman-Adebayo's case stands out because her crusade against what she calls "government corruption" won her powerful allies, such as President Bush and House Judiciary Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who recently wrote a letter to the EPA on her behalf.Lodging Complaints

Sixteen years ago, Coleman-Adebayo was a promising hire, having graduated from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology with a doctorate in African studies. Her work was generally commended.

But when Coleman-Adebayo traveled to South Africa as part of a U.S. delegation focusing on the environment in 1996, her career took a turn for the worse.

She became a whistle-blower after discovering that a U.S. chemical company was mining a deadly substance in South Africa called vanadium pintoxide. Exposure often turns the tongue blue, causes nosebleeds, kidney and liver dysfunction, and sometimes cancer.

DOJ_NMG_0038842

When the EPA did not react to her complaints, she took the issue to non-government interest groups. The EPA finally reacted -- against Coleman-Adebayo. Her evaluations worsened, and she said her requests for promotions were denied as white men with far less experience rose above her pay grade.

Coleman-Adebayo sued, and her court battle in 2000 played out like a war. EPA managers said they were upset over the South Africa incident.

"She disagreed with me and made criticisms of the way the agency, of which she was a part, was doing its job," William Nitze, an EPA supervisor who worked in South Africa, testified in 2000. "You have to understand that when we try and organize and manage a program at EPA, we tried to do it as a team."

The agency said the men who rose to positions above Coleman-Adebayo's did so because they were better fundraisers and got along better with others.

Coleman-Adebayo's lawyers said race was also a factor. Witnesses said a white assistant administrator, Alan Bruce Sielen, motioned Coleman-Adebayo into a meeting of mostly white people and said it was all right because she was "an honorary white person."

Sielen denied the claim, but one of the witnesses, a black man, said he confronted Sielen after he also called him an honorary white person. Later in testimony, Coleman-Adebayo said Sielen told her she was denied a promotion because another supervisor said she was too "uppity."

The supervisor, Alan Hecht, a deputy administrator, denied the claim. The EPA fought back, enlisting psychiatrist Christiane Tellefsen to assess Coleman-Adebayo's mental state. Tellefsen said in testimony that Coleman-Adebayo was a self-centered, narcissistic woman who "tended to speak in a dramatic way."

In explaining how Coleman-Adebayo was "passive-aggressive," Tellefsen said she was uncooperative, even when asked to provide her children's names. But in cross-examination, lawyers showed that Coleman-Adebayo did provide the children's names, but the doctor believed the African names were made up. Coleman-Adebayo's husband is Nigerian.

The testimony of Jon T. Grand, who had been an EPA manager, offered evidence that Coleman-Adebayo's discrimination claim had merit. Grand, who is white, recalled that a white manager privately told him that they called her "Rosa Parks of the EPA" behind her back.

Years later, Grand's career at the EPA would free-fall. The agency had him prosecuted, and he was sent to jail because he did not report the EPA's mistake of overpaying him when he worked for the agency in Denmark. Grand said that he did report the error, but a secretary failed to act. Facing a long prison sentence, he pleaded guilty and was sentenced to four months in jail.

"I do actually believe that had I not testified, this would never have happened," Grand said.Another Fight, Another Suit

Coleman-Adebayo won her case but was later found to have uncontrollable hypertension. The EPA asked her to resign, but she refused, saying the men who discriminated against her were allowed to stay.

The agency agreed to temporarily allow Coleman-Adebayo to work from home. But her telecommute lasted for four years as her illness worsened. During that time, she helped form the No Fear Coalition to protect whistle-blowers and worked with Congress to make the No Fear (Notification and Federal Employee Anti-Discrimination and Retaliation) Act into law in 2002.

Good Housekeeping magazine presented her in 2003 with its Women in Government award for courage. Later that year, Coleman-Adebayo filed a second lawsuit, alleging retaliation by the EPA.

A year later, she was reassigned from a specialist job to a lower analyst position, effective Dec. 1, 2004. Eight days later, the agency placed her in yet another post.

The EPA sent a letter saying the new job would be "done in an office setting." Coleman-Adebayo read it at the cluttered desk in her kitchen, surrounded by numerous bottles of medication prescribed for hypertension and glaucoma.

For a year, Coleman-Adebayo and the EPA traded letters like punches. She continued to telecommute until the agency ordered her into the office this April. After complaining of dizziness, she left in an ambulance. The EPA placed her on family leave, without pay.

Coleman-Adebayo's response seemed worthy of a line in the screenplay.

"They want me to make a choice between my life and my job," she said.

Vital Tool Of Last Resort (USAT)

By Donald J. Borut

USA Today, July 10, 2006

In all the noise that surrounded the decision by the Supreme Court one year ago to continue to allow cities to use eminent domain when considering the economic future of their communities, something vital was left out: the facts.

Without eminent domain to clear title on abandoned and vacant properties — the primary use of eminent domain in this country — rundown buildings and empty lots would attract trash, rodents and trouble. Blighted structures would sit abandoned. If owners didn't want to sell or were holding out for more money, the cities and their taxpayers could do nothing to get rid of them.

Despite what some might claim, this is how eminent domain has been and continues to be used in this country: to revitalize older parts of Philadelphia; to transform an area in Indianapolis once referred to as "Dodge City" into a beautiful, mixed-income neighborhood; to save a historic church in Fitzgerald, Ga.

Let's take a closer look at the facts:

Since the Supreme Court's Kelo ruling, 43 state legislatures reviewed eminent domain laws and made changes to meet the needs of their communities. In a few cases, after numerous public hearings, legislators determined that no change was needed.

According to a survey by the National League of Cities, 76% of municipalities had not used eminent domain in the past three years in connection with an economic development project. But where it was invoked, eminent domain was used only as a last resort after all other options were explored.

Of the 5,700-plus properties claimed by the Institute for Justice to involve eminent domain in the past year, many were part of 117 multiphased and publicly scrutinized economic development projects begun well before the Kelo decision to eradicate blight — a practice even dissenting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor found appropriate.

Ensuring that owners receive appropriate compensation for their properties is equally important. In cases such as Norwood, Ohio, which was cited by the Institute as an abuse, the majority of owners willingly received twice the assessed fair market value; the "hold-outs" three times their value.

The prudent use of eminent domain has brought hope and opportunity — through good jobs and better housing — to thousands of Americans. That story deserves to be told.

Donald J. Borut is executive director of the National League of Cities.

One Year Later, Power To Seize Property Ripe For Abuse (USAT)

USA Today, July 10, 2006

Remember Susette Kelo? The New London, Conn., nurse lost a landmark legal fight to save her pink cottage from being seized by city officials, who wanted to hand it over to developers. Just over a year ago, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled against her. It held 5-4 that local governments could condemn private property, not just for a public purpose such as a road or school, but also to give to developers if a locality's economic future is at issue.

As it turned out, that wasn't the end of the story. The house won't be bulldozed after all. Last month, officials agreed to move it to another location so that her land can round out a waterfront development site — a compromise Kelo suggested years ago to little avail.

Meanwhile, the ruling has ignited a nationwide fight between developers rushing to seize a fresh opportunity and an unlikely political coalition that sees the decision as an assault on America's "home-as-castle" mind-set.

Emboldened by the ruling, local governments have threatened or condemned 5,783 properties for private projects in the past year, according to the Institute for Justice, the libertarian law firm that defended Kelo. That's up from an annual average of 2,056 such threats and takings from 1998 to 2002, the Institute said.

Of 117 projects the Institute studied over the past year, most involved taking lower-income homes, apartments and mobile home parks to construct upscale condominiums or retail development, driving the working poor from their homes.

DOJ_NMG_0038844

But the Kelo case also has inspired a political backlash unusual in the annals of Supreme Court rulings. It has united conservative defenders of property rights and liberals who say the seizures amount to corporate welfare at the expense of the powerless.

They've scored significant victories:

• Twenty-five states have enacted laws to curb eminent domain seizures — something the Supreme Court invited them to do in making its ruling.

• The U.S. House of Representatives voted 376-38 last year to bar federal economic development funds to state and local agencies that use eminent domain for private commercial development. A similar bill is stalled in the Senate.

• On June 23, one year after the Kelo decision, President Bush issued an executive order that federal agencies can seize private property only for public projects.

Those actions should help ensure that the growing movement to prevent unjustified seizures of private property will gain momentum. In the words of dissenting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, "the government now has the license to transfer property from those with fewer resources to those with more" as long as there is some purported economic benefit. And that is wrong.

Supporters of seizures such as the one in New London argue that abuses are rare and that condemnation is needed to revitalize abandoned or blighted areas and encourage the growth of jobs. But the truth is that under the court's ruling almost no one's property is safe unless states impose limits.

Seizures of one person's property to benefit another should be rare and a last resort. The halfway happy ending to Susette Kelo's ordeal should encourage political leaders to do more to stop bulldozers from plowing through the American dream.

The President: Shades Of Green (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, July 17, 2006

Before moving into the White House, George W. Bush built the kind of vacation home that Al Gore might have designed. His Texas ranch captures rain and wastewater for landscaping. Solar panels line the roof and an underground geothermal system provides heating and air conditioning. There's even a protected forest that is home to the rare golden-cheeked warbler.

Unlike his caricature, Bush is not monochromatic when it comes to the environment. During the final weeks of the 2000 campaign. he lampooned Gore's plans to cut taxes for those living a green lifestyle. "How many of you own a hybrid electric-gasoline-engine vehicle?" he would ask at rallies. "How many of you have a rooftop photovoltaic system?"

But following his green-tinted State of the Union address in January, Bush now travels the country promoting both hybrid vehicles and solar power. Just last month he created a huge national monument around the remote northwestern islands of Hawaii.

Has Bush turned green in his six years in office? Both environmentalists and the White House say no—but for different reasons. To activists, Bush's record is unremittingly bad. They accuse him of relaxing clean-air standards on power plants and refineries, and of blocking Kyoto-style measures to halt global warming. They even question the sincerity of his plan to protect the Hawaiian Islands, given the Navy's nearby use of powerful sonar that can harm whales. "Whatever motivated him to build a green ranch before he was president hasn't been translated at all into policy," says Frances Beinecke of the Natural Resources Defense Council.

On the other side, Bush's aides say the president is unchanged—he has always been an ardent conservationist—and have their own take on his record. On the highways, Bush has set rules to improve the fuel consumption of light trucks and SUVs. In the air, he has proposed the first-ever cut in mercury emissions from power plants. And on global warming, the most controversial part of his green scorecard, Bush acknowledged back in June 2001 that the National Academy of Sciences believed climate change was "due in large part to human activity." The dispute is what to do about that warming. Bush thinks new technologies—not treaties—can save the day.

While the debate about Bush rages on, the political landscape is changing. Green proponents are looking to new GOP leaders like Sen. John McCain (the 2008 front runner), as well as Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who supports caps on greenhouse gases in California.

DOJ_NMG_0038845

Some of Bush's underlings are struggling to keep up with the greener approach to energy. The day after Bush promoted renewables in his State of the Union, the Energy Department laid off 32 people at its renewable-energy lab in Colorado. They got their jobs back the day before a certain VIP toured the lab: one George W. Bush. Greening the government is sometimes harder than greening a ranch.

A Dated Carbon Approach (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

These days almost nobody asserts that global warming isn't happening. Instead, we are confronted with a new lie: that we can respond to climate change without taxing and regulating carbon.

The Bush administration -- and many Democrats, too -- promise technological salvation: hydrogen fuel cells, ethanol distilled from grass, solar power, windmills, whatever. It's more fun to call for whiz-bang technologies than regulations and taxes. But it's also dishonest.

We already have technologies to cut carbon. Hybrid cars have been around for years, but almost nobody drives them. Small cars have been on the market even more years, but they aren't consumer hits either. There are dozens of technologies to insulate buildings and design heating and cooling systems in efficient ways. The problem is we don't use them.

You can even cut carbon using no technology whatever. Mexico City has reduced its output of carbon dioxide by almost 55,000 tons a year by opening one efficient bus route; the key innovation here was the creation of two bus lanes. The new buses run on diesel -- not exactly a technological breakthrough. But because they are rapid and frequent, the buses have brought car use down and reduced emissions.

So what matters is not just the technologies we have but the incentives to deploy them. The average Western European uses half as much energy as the average American, and that's not because there's more technology in Europe. Rather, Europeans have embraced anti-carbon policies ranging from gas taxes to emissions caps, from an absence of extravagant mortgage subsidies that encourage super-size homes to congestion charges for drivers in London and Stockholm.

Because of Norway's carbon taxes, companies drilling for natural gas in the North Sea are starting to capture the carbon dioxide they release and inject it back under the sea floor. Because the United States lacks a carbon tax, natural gas drillers in this country have less incentive to do that. Meanwhile the Energy Department reports that there are plans to build 150 new coal-fired power plants in the United States, enough to generate power for 93 million homes. But because government hasn't created intelligent incentives, most of these new generators won't be fitted with technology to capture and store the carbon.

So incentives count. Technology frequently turns out to matter less than policy. But the technology salvationists are a determined bunch. Faced with clear evidence that we aren't deploying the technology we have, they insist that the solution is yet more technology. We need need need that next technological breakthrough, they scream. And until we get it, there's no point trying to do anything.

How do these fantasists suppose that we'll get the next breakthrough? Government spending on basic research is supposed to do the trick: "The Administration has dedicated $1.2 billion over five years to the research and development needed to get hydrogen cars into the showroom," declares a White House fact sheet. But that $240 million per year, or the $150 million a year that the administration wants to spend on advanced ethanol, is a laughably small sum. Private energy firms spend about $18 billion a year on researching new technology for extracting hydrocarbons.

If you want to get hydrogen cars into the showrooms, you can't put your faith in government alone; you need Exxon and Shell and Toyota and Ford to make hydrogen a priority. And what's going to drive these companies' choices? Obviously, taxes and regulatory incentives. If carbon is subject to taxes or caps, the energy companies and car companies will devote more of their vast research budgets to alternative fuels. But if carbon is not taxed, they will research new ways of using and extracting oil -- including getting it from sources that are awful for climate, such as tar sands .

Don't get me wrong. I'm not against government support for basic research into alternative fuels, just as I'm not against government funding of basic research into health sciences. But to convert the discoveries from the National Institutes of Health into usable medicines, you need a patent system that gives pharmaceutical companies incentives. And to convert government research on hydrogen into drivable cars, you need a carbon tax or carbon cap that creates the right incentives for the private sector.

It feels good to be for new technology rather than for nasty new taxes or regulations. But this is a false choice. If you want the new technology, you have to support the new tax or the new cap. Those who argue otherwise should ask themselves: Would we have rapid medical innovation if we didn't bother to protect intellectual property?

Drafting The Future Of The Parks (NYT)

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

Last Friday marked the end of the public comment period on the most recent draft of the National Park Service's management policy — the core document that governs the day-to-day operation of the national parks. It's a relief to see that the current draft appears to reaffirm the doctrine that preservation is the core historical mission of the parks. That had been the philosophy guiding the Park Service for years, until the Bush administration attempted to give recreation and commercial use a much higher priority.

Compared with the original draft, this one is a marvel of sanity and historical conscience. But it's been a rough road getting to this point, and there may well be a few bumps ahead.

Over the past few weeks, there has been a concerted effort by the so-called recreation community — a euphemism for the motorized vehicle industry and its lobbyists — to change the draft. In at least two conference calls with Interior Department officials, snowmobile and off-road vehicle lobbyists have expressed their opposition to the restored emphasis on preservation.

What's most worrying about this last-minute lobbying — besides the fact that recreation seems limited to activities involving an internal combustion engine — is the suggestion, put forward by the American Recreation Coalition, that the Park Service revise the management policy regularly. There is only one reason for a suggestion like that: to give "recreation leaders" a regular chance to pressure the park system for increased motorized vehicle access.

No one, of course, wants to limit the use of the parks to hardy hikers. Our understanding of what it means to preserve the parks "unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations" has changed dramatically since the parks system was established in 1916. Millions of motorists have visited wilderness they could never have reached on foot, using roadways that were carefully constructed to balance the goals of access and conservation. But what we have been seeing under this administration is an attempt to redefine enjoyment for the benefit of a small minority who want to eliminate restrictions on the use of noisy jet skis and open up the parks to off-road vehicles and snowmobiles.

The parks should not be sacrificed to the internal combustion engine. The new interior secretary, Dirk Kempthorne, should listen to the claims of the motorized recreationists and weigh them for what they are worth against the many thousands of public comments supporting the historical mission of the parks — and act accordingly.

Deadly Heroin Has Likely Hit Area (TLPA)

Times Leader (NE PA), July 9, 2006

WILKES-BARRE – Fentanyl is the new rat poison for heroin addicts.

Spicing up heroin with rat poison, strychnine or other chemicals has long been a practice of dealers seeking to attract customers looking for an even greater high. But sometimes the mix can be deadly – especially if the cut is fentanyl.

Daniel Dominick, 27, died Friday at Wilkes-Barre General Hospital after taking what was likely a fentanyl-heroin mix, according to Luzerne County Coroner's Office. The Luzerne man's death placed Wilkes-Barre on a growing list of cities where the deadly heroin concoction has been circulating in recent months.

More than 70 people have died from fentanyl-laced heroin in the Philadelphia area since April, and it's the same in other major cities. Officials in Detroit have reported more than 80 fentanyl-related fatalities and Chicago has had 60, according to respective law enforcement agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0038847

In Pittsburgh, fentanyl-laced heroin is being sold on the street under the name "get high or die tryin', " and an increasing number of users are doing just that.

Just 125 micrograms is enough fentanyl to kill an adult – that's the equivalent of five or six grains of salt. Law enforcement experts say lacing heroin with the painkiller has only come in vogue this year, especially in the past three months.

An undercover narcotics agent for the Philadelphia police said addicts will seek out brands of heroin reputed to be the most potent, and in recent months have been traveling to Philadelphia from all over the state to get heroin laced with fentanyl.

"If there's an extra kick in it, they look for that brand," said the agent, who declined to be identified for safety reasons. "They'll ask for 'Dracula' or 'Nike' or another brand. The dealers know when it's cut with fentanyl but they don't care; not all the customers know."

According to the agent, users from the Wilkes-Barre area have been getting fentanyl-laced heroin from Hispanic communities on the East side of Philadelphia. "They come from everywhere to get this stuff. They'll get two or three bundles so they don't have to make the trip again."

Although heroin cut with fentanyl has been claiming lives in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh since April, law enforcement officials weren't sure if it had hit the streets of Wilkes-Barre until a string of overdoses last week culminated in a death Friday. City police and medics responded to approximately 15 drug overdoses last week, including five Friday.

Luzerne County Coroner Dr. John Consalvo can't prove it was fentanyl that killed Dominick until he gets back a toxicology test in a couple weeks, but he suspects it was.

Fentanyl, some strains of which are hundreds of times more potent than heroin, affects people differently when cut with other drugs. In Friday's incident, Dominick shared a needle with another man, who took a hit from the same batch of heroin, police said. That man, whose name was not released, showed no signs of a negative reaction.

Millvale Man Possible Overdose Fatality (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 9, 2006

A Millvale man died yesterday afternoon of a possible drug overdose, the Allegheny County medical examiner reported.

The 31-year-old man, whose identity was not released last night, was the first of two suspected drug overdoses reported yesterday. The second one, just before 10 p.m., happened in Pittsburgh and it was not fatal.

It was unclear last night whether both victims overdosed on heroin or fentanyl-laced heroin. Fentanyl is 80 times more powerful than morphine and thought to be responsible for scores of deaths throughout the country.

As of June 9, police were investigating 48 overdoses -- including eight fatalities -- throughout Allegheny County to see if they are linked to fentanyl. Two samples of heroin police recovered from seven of those eight death scenes tested positive for fentanyl, the medical examiner's office has said.

Yesterday, county homicide detectives were called at 4:32 p.m. to a residence in the 500 block of North Avenue in Millvale.

The 31-year-old man, of McIntyre Road, was pronounced dead at the scene at 4:50 p.m., an investigator for the medical examiner said.

More Spiked Heroin In Delaware? (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

NEWARK, Del. (AP) - July 9, 2006 - Five heroin overdoses in a 24-hour period are leading to suspicions that heroin laced with a powerful painkiller has resurfaced in Delaware.

State police spokesman Corporal Jeff Oldham says investigators are looking into whether the heroin involved was laced with fentanyl.

Police say there have been two single-vehicle crashes that appear to be the result of overdoses.

Last night, paramedics revived two men who overdosed on heroin outside a gas station on Christiana Road. The men were in cardiac arrest when paramedics arrived. They told police they bought heroin in Wilmington and passed out shortly after they used it.

Oldham says another person overdosed today. None of the overdoses have been fatal.

Heroin laced with fentanyl has been linked to dozens of deaths in the Northeast this year.

Drug-corner Epidemic: Overdose (PHI)

By Sam Wood, Dwight Ott And Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, July 9, 2006

Neighbors saw the guy bolting from the back of a graffiti-stained, abandoned house as he shouted the word that soon would ring out on drug corners across the country.

"Overdose."

Mercedes Perez, who lives a few doors down on this North Camden block, went to investigate.

In a junk-strewn lot teeming with flies and covered in broken glass, she found Samantha Bender, a young suburban mother, lying dead on her back, surrounded by empty blue bags of heroin.

"She was a pretty girl. Looked very young," said Wanda Guzman, another neighbor. "I thought she was only about 16."

Bender was, in fact, 23, and the mother of a 3-year-old daughter. She grew up in Gibbstown, Gloucester County. She was an avid fan of the local music scene and the author of elegiac poetry. And she was a beloved friend and relative.

On that April day, Samantha Bender became something else: a victim of the drug corner.

Bender, an autopsy would show, had injected heroin laced with a lethal dose of fentanyl, a powerful narcotic painkiller that has caused hundreds of deaths across the country.

"We don't know why she was there," said Bender's mother, Mary Ann Lanzetta. "She was a smart girl and had so much potential. It doesn't make one ounce of sense."

Drug corners like the one where Bender likely copped her heroin have been claiming lives through addiction, violence, and the lure of easy money for decades.

But Bender's death in the 1600 block of State Street was a harbinger for a new epidemic.

Since spring, fentanyl-laced heroin has killed as many as 100 people in the Philadelphia region, and hundreds more in cities such as Chicago, Detroit and Pittsburgh.

Despite a huge law-enforcement collaboration, investigators have yet to unlock the mystery of the fentanyl: Where is it coming from? Why is it being mixed with heroin? How can they stop it?

"It's come as a bit of a surprise, in some respects, that it's popped up in so many places at the same time with such vigor," said Jerry Daley, the executive director of a Philadelphia-Camden drug task force known as HIDTA (High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area). "We know a lot less than we'd like to."

The true depth of the problem remains shrouded, as well. No single agency has been keeping track of victims spread across the country, so no one knows how many have died.

"If there were this number of cases of measles, people would be jumping up and screaming," said Steven Marcus, director of the New Jersey Poison Center and one of the first people to notice the fentanyl outbreak. "But it's affecting a population that people have cast off... . There doesn't seem to be anyone in public health making a concerted effort to get all the data together."

Still, with so many addicts falling, police and health workers have sounded repeated alarms in the news media, bringing attention, once again, to an illegal, multimillion-dollar business catering to suburban demand and conducted on decrepit, inner-city street corners.

Corners such as Philadelphia's Fifth and Indiana, and Philip and Ontario. Corners such as the notorious spot in North Camden where Samantha Bender bought the $10 bag marked "D-Block" that would kill her.

Fifth and Grant

The 400 block of Grant Street is a tiny, one-way street where crumbling, trash-filled vacant shells outnumber the occupied homes. The corner, where Grant opens up to Fifth Street, bustles like a Turkish rug market.

Someone has erected a portable basketball hoop on the sidewalk, presumably to replace the sagging rim bolted to a piece of plywood on the far wall. Below that, a graffiti artist, with an abundance of irony, has spray-painted the words "drug free" in huge block letters.

DOJ_NMG_0038849

The knot of young dealers passes the time pitching quarters or playing games of basketball bare-chested. They tell reporters to leave, that no one will talk to them. One accepts a business card, then burns a Phillies Blunt cigar through it.

A man sitting on a nearby porch makes a halfhearted apology.

"They're just young boys," he says. "They don't know."

He says his name is Mark. He carries himself like a man in charge, like the conductor of this corner. Then, a car rolls down the narrow street.

"No! Park the car!" Mark shouts. "Park the car!"

With a largely suburban clientele arriving in vehicles, corner etiquette requires them to park somewhere else, then walk up for a less conspicuous transaction.

The money goes to one member of the crew. Then Mark directs the customers up an alley, where another crew member will dispense the heroin.

By now, this is an old game, perfected before many of today's players were even born.

"It's been here since I came here," said Camden Police Lt. Frank Cook, a 22-year veteran, as he sat in his patrol car recently. "It's pervasive; especially heroin."

Police have successfully squashed the drug trade on corners such as this. But, inevitably, it pops up somewhere else.

Camden Police Capt. Joe Richardson estimated that the city had about 4,000 dealers, baggers, cutters and lookouts making money off the drug trade.

"We're outnumbered 10-1," he said. "It's a multimillion-dollar-a-year business."

North Camden used to be controlled by the Sons of Malcolm X, a mostly black street gang. The gang's two leaders, Kevin Money and Jose Perez, now reside just a few blocks away, at Riverfront State Prison. Their territory has changed hands to a mostly Hispanic crew.

No matter who owns the corners, Fifth and Grant remains prime real estate, a short walk from Rutgers-Camden and the Tweeter Center, and an even shorter drive from the Ben Franklin Bridge and several of the region's major highways.

The advent of fentanyl and its inherent dangers hasn't hurt business. In fact, selling lethal heroin has proven a great strategy for attracting addicts looking for the strongest dope.

"It's remarkable to me, it's totally counterintuitive. You would think when bodies start to fall... it would scare users off. Instead, it draws people in," said Acting Camden County Prosecutor James P. Lynch. "We've done a fair amount of publicity to warn people off... . We're starting to rethink that strategy now because it seems to enhance traffic."

And, as addiction psychiatrist Ken Hoffman said, "The difference between death and euphoria is a really fine line."

Despite the appeal of fentanyl's high, the fear of crossing that line appears to have driven some addicts to try, at least, to get clean. Matthew Sabo, a 45-year-old recovering addict from Gloucester City, said the number of people attending his Broadway methadone clinic had gone up by one-third.

"We had a doctor telling us that fentanyl was 150 times more powerful than heroin... . People don't want to die," he said. "It's nothing but trouble. Every day, somebody ODs out there. The whole town is infested."

Some authorities think the fentanyl problem is far larger than reported. They say an untold number of people overdose but survive without medical attention.

In the medical profession, fentanyl is most commonly described as being 80 times as powerful as morphine. The experts say 125 micrograms - the equivalent of three grains of salt - can be lethal.

"It doesn't take much of this drug to get you into trouble," said Hoffman, who works at the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. "It can paralyze your chest wall so that you still have a pulse, but you can't breathe."

That's what would have happened to Samantha Bender and the others who have died from the killer heroin.

Yameralis Sanchez, 16, lives a few houses from where Bender died. She saw Bender going into the vacant house and tried to warn her.

"She looked at us like, 'It's not your house.' "

The sight of a "pretty white girl" using an abandoned home as a shooting gallery wasn't out of place, either.

DOJ_NMG_0038850

"They are always whites, every day. They still use it," Sanchez said. "I lose count... . I see about 30 to 40 a day. I don't know how many use it after I go to bed."

Mixed with heroin abroad

Daley's HIDTA task force has been coordinating fentanyl intelligence for the region, but most investigators believe that the painkiller is being made and mixed with heroin in foreign countries, at the upper levels of the supply chain. In fact, federal agents busted an illicit lab in Mexico last month, but the fentanyl deaths have continued.

There are at least a dozen home methods for synthesizing illicit fentanyl, including one posted on the Internet by someone claiming to be an organic chemist. One of the essential chemicals for making fentanyl remains unregulated - and can be legally purchased by anyone. The Drug Enforcement Administration is trying to have it listed as a controlled precursor chemical, Daley said.

As for why the fentanyl is being added to heroin, the theories abound "but we can't put any credence in any of them yet," Daley said.

That leaves local police with traditional tactics to fight the epidemic - busting dealers and scaring off users. After decades of the drug war, veteran investigators have reasonable expectations.

"There are some people you could lock up a thousand times... . As soon as they're released from processing, they go right back. You can't beat that," said Capt. Joe Bowen of the Camden County Prosecutor's Office. "You'll see everything: juveniles, mothers with children. If you stop 25 percent from coming back, that's the goal. You'd like to do 100 percent, but that's not realistic."

Still, police in Camden have been out on the streets, fighting hard to stem the fentanyl tide. In particular, they have targeted Fifth and Grant with three "reversals" - sting operations in which undercover officers pose as drug dealers to arrest addicts.

In the first sting, they netted 102 people in about five hours, many in the morning hours when addicts need a fix to stave off sickness from withdrawal. Then, on consecutive days last month, they arrested 91 more people at Fifth and Grant.

To begin one of the reversals, officers took control of the corner by arriving in huge numbers, clogging the intersection with their SUVs and allowing a K-9 dog to roam on a leash. They stood there chatting and joking, until there could be no mistake that the corner belonged to them for the day. Then, they disappeared.

Officers wearing baggy jeans and T-shirts, baseball caps sitting sideways on their heads, huge gold chains dangling from their necks, took positions at the corner. A few minutes later, about 9:30 a.m., a white man wandered up and asked for six bags.

Those arrested were taken to a garage at the Delaware River Port Authority building, at the foot of the Ben Franklin Bridge, where they were photographed and fingerprinted. In a matter of minutes, they left with a court summons. The process amounted to a minor, embarrassing inconvenience for the addicts, but it gave police a chance to discourage them from going back to the corners.

Bowen, a reflective 23-year veteran who helped lock up many of the Sons of Malcolm X, approached a jittery Tara Marrollo in the DRPA garage. Her arms and hands were covered in scars. She admitted to shooting up as a tear mingled with the sweat on her face.

"I just can't stop," she said desperately. At 42, she has been using for 10 years after getting addicted to pain pills. She said she used two to three bags a day, and said she was unconcerned about a lethal shot of fentanyl.

"At this point in my life, I don't care," she said. "If I go to sleep and don't wake up, it doesn't matter."

Bowen warned her not to go back to Fifth and Grant, knowing her plans for the rest of the day.

"I'm going to go back out there and try to get another bag," she said matter-of-factly. "You have to have it to make yourself well."

As Marrollo talked, officers processed two teenage girls. One had just finished high school. The girls arrived at Fifth and Grant in a car with soaped windows, trumpeting the graduation.

After Marrollo leaves, Bowen stops them.

"You know what she said?" he asks the girls, gesturing toward Marrollo. " 'I used to be just like them.' "

Bowen chats with them, asking questions about their lives, offering Marrollo's as a cautionary tale. But the girls remain defiant.

DOJ_NMG_0038851

"I'm not going to end up like her," says Tara Baker, a 19-year-old from Salem County. "We're not stupid."

"I've been doing this for a long time, girls," Bowen says, finally. "And they don't get much older than that."

'Dealers have no mercy'

Samantha Bender's time came to an end on April 27, four days after her birthday. Her mother figures that she took the 402 bus, leaving Gibbstown at 10:20 a.m. She was pronounced dead at 1:45 p.m.

Lanzetta said her daughter had been taking painkillers after a car accident. She said Samantha hated needles, hated heroin, hated addicts. She blamed the guy she was with. She struggled to make sense of her daughter's death.

"Parents, pay attention to what your children are doing. Be aware. This is no joke. Drug dealers have no mercy... . That first and only time will kill you," she said. "I pray some good comes of this."

At Fifth and Grant, no good has come. Despite the fentanyl scare, the 200 arrests and the death of Samantha Bender, the corner thrives.

"I'm on my way to get some now," said Joseph D., a 29-year-old from Philadelphia, as he headed toward Fifth and Grant. He would not give his full name.

"Actually, people are trying to find it because it f-s you up. Dope ain't what it used to be. They know it's got fentanyl," he said. "I come to Camden because it's good, because the bags are bigger and better."

Meth Crackdown In Southwest Michigan Shows Results (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

KALAMAZOO, Mich. (AP) — An effort to fight the production and use of methamphetamine in southwest Michigan has paid off, the U.S. attorney's office says, but officials are concerned that drug makers could relocate.

During the past seven months, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has assisted Kalamazoo-area law enforcement in the crackdown.

Thirty-five people were arrested, seven methamphetamine labs were seized and marijuana, cocaine, heroin and meth were confiscated. In one seizure last week, police confiscated more than 50 firearms.

Meth — a highly addictive drug — can be made with common household products, including cold medicine that has pseudoephedrine. It's a growing problem in many parts of Michigan and in several other states.

Kalamazoo County's meth lab seizures dropped to 30 this year from 115 in 2005. Barry County had one seizure, down from 11 last year, the Kalamazoo Gazette reported. Calhoun County also had fewer meth cases, prosecutor John Hallacy told the Battle Creek Enquirer.

But Margaret Chiara, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Michigan, said she is worried that the manufacture of the drug might move to other areas following the crackdown in the Kalamazoo area.

"I have enormous concern for the rest of Michigan," Chiara said.

The special operation involved the Michigan State Police as well as local prosecutors and law enforcement. Police declined to provide specifics about those arrested and the locations of the labs.

Local law enforcement officials said they also have made an effort to increase education outreach to teachers, day-care centers and residents so others can recognize production in their communities.

DEA, Local Police Complete Seventh-month Probe (SJ)

By Corky Emrick

Sturgis Journal, July 8, 2006

KALAMAZOO — A seven-month investigation spearheaded by the Drug Enforcement Administration, United States Attorney General's Office and many local police agencies was the focus of a special press conference held Friday in Kalamazoo.

“Law enforcement has a tradition of working collaboratively to more effectively protect those who live and work in western Michigan,” said United States Attorney Margaret Chiara.

Last week, special agents from the DEA and members of the St. Joseph Area Narcotics Unit and Three Rivers Police Department spent one day following up on leads and tips for suspected methampthetamine dealers and users.

DOJ_NMG_0038852

"The cooperation that we had in our county was something that I've never seen before," said Dave Alli of SCAN. "We basically quadrupled the size of our unit. It put the meth community on notice, those making meth, those selling meth were shocked that we're able to bring in federal agents, state and local police together at an hour's notice."

The seven-month investigation covered most of southwest Michigan and included the counties of St. Joseph, Cass, Barry, Kalamazoo, Allegan and Van Buren.

The DEA from its Detroit office mobilized a seven-person mobile enforcement team, or MET, to help with the cooperative effort.

"The MET deployments are designed to have an immediate and positive impact on the quality of life for our local residents plagued by these drug organizations blatant disregard for public safety," said Robert Corso, a DEA Detroit special agent.

MET is designed to help state and local authorities to combat drug problems.

"We come in and take them out, it's as simple as that," Corso said. "We're kind of like exterminators that target a specific type of pest."

Corso said the DEA has been monitoring the meth activity in southwest Michigan for some time.

"The negative impact that meth has had on this community along with communities around the country is devastating," Corso said. "Meth dealers set up shop in residential buildings, motels and agricultural-rural areas. Most often, the innocent victims are children."

Corso said he wanted to send a clear message to those who manufacture meth.

"We will not tolerate that habit brought to our communities and we will not stop until you are personally unable to enjoy the freedom and beauty these communities have to offer," Corso said. "The drug war is not over. We are out there every day doing what we do best."

Will the DEA return in another joint effort?

"Absolutely we'll come back," he said. "I just won't tell you when."

In the seven-month operation, there were 31 arrests, 16 federal indictments and five meth labs uncovered, officials said.

Last week, two more labs were found. Six people were arrested and officers seized 50 guns.

Police also closed down a major cocaine operation in Albion that resulted in six arrests, they said.

Corso said there has been a decrease in meth labs, but that they are now seeing more meth imported from south of the border using existing marijuana and cocaine trails.

"Most of the labs we are seeing now are Beavis and Butt-Head labs," Corso said.

Meth Labs Seized During Seven-month Probe (BCE)

Battle Creek Enquirer, July 8, 2006

KALAMAZOO — Thirty-five people were arrested and seven methamphetamine labs seized during a seven-month undercover investigation in South Central Michigan, officials announced Friday.

"We haven't stopped it, but at least (we) put a temporary halt on the spreading menace of methamphetamine," Margaret Chiara, United States attorney for the western district of Michigan, told reporters.

Chiara and several federal, state and local law enforcement officials said the undercover operation was run by the Detroit-based Drug Enforcement Agency Mobile Enforcement Team.

The operation also involved the Michigan State Police and local prosecutors and law enforcement from the counties of Calhoun, Kalamazoo, Barry, Cass, Van Buren and St. Joseph. Officials praised the cooperative effort.

The investigation included the arrest of six people in Albion on charges of distribution of cocaine after officers from the Albion Department of Public Safety developed information on a distribution system of that drug. They were aided by agents from the DEA, according to ADPS Lt. Scott Kipp.

"We have had several raids in the last three or four months," Kipp said. Police still are looking for JonTaj Rolann Wallace, 30, described as a supplier of cocaine in the Albion area.

DOJ_NMG_0038853

While the same people don't use and distribute meth and cocaine, DEA targeted those allegedly involved in the Albion cocaine trade and agreed to help police as part of the bigger investigation, said Andrew Eiseman, group supervisor of the DEA Mobile Enforcement Team that conducted the investigation.

The concept of the DEA MET, organized more than 10 years ago, is to send federal officers to areas of the country to help combat drug trafficking, officials said.

They said the investigations are continuing and did not provide specific details of those arrested or the locations of the meth labs. But Lt. Wayne Edington of the Michigan State Police Southwest Enforcement Team said one of the meth labs seized last week was in Athens. He said arrests are pending in that case.

Calhoun County Prosecutor John Hallacy said there remain fewer numbers of meth cases in the county than in several counties like Kalamazoo and Van Buren.

"We have just not seen that huge tidal wave," Hallacy said.

The most recent numbers show Hallacy's office issued 42 counts in 2005 in meth-related cases, compared with 48 in 2004.

Several officials from other counties said their numbers have dropped in 2006. They pointed to a Michigan law enacted this year requiring that all cold medicine containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine — ingredients used to make meth — only be sold to people 18 years of age or older with a photo identification.

Edington also pointed to a strong education effort by county law enforcement and the Substance Abuse Council as helping curtail the spread of the drug.

Robert L. Corso, special agent in charge of the DEA's Detroit office, said most of the meth labs are small and the drugs are for personal use or distributed to a small group of people. But he said the toxic waste produced during the manufacture of the drug is especially harmful to people and the environment.

"It's dangerous for all living things," Chiara added, "including Mother Nature."

Eiseman said he and six DEA agents worked on the cases and estimated the cost to the agency at $200,000.

METH Inc.: The Route To Minnesota (ST)

By Paul McEnroe

Star Tribune, July 10, 2006

In the eyes of the federal agents who secretly watched him, Alberto Zatarain was a drug dealer who made all the right moves.In the eyes of the federal agents who secretly watched him, Alberto Zatarain was a drug dealer who made all the right moves.

He had at least three aliases. He switched cell phones every month and drove ugly old cars to avoid notice. After dark, he holed up and watched TV inside a rented matchbox house in Richfield that rattled from low-flying jets. No clubs, no parties, no women.

And every few months, when another runner came up from Mexico, Zatarain handed off suitcases of cash -- profits from a booming business that stretched from metro suburbs to farm towns in the Red River Valley to Fargo.

He was selling methamphetamine, and demand never let up.

Operating a network of stash houses from Richfield to Brooklyn Park, and often delivering meth hidden inside jars of instant coffee to customers, Zatarain and his band of couriers at times in recent years reeled in $250,000 a month.

"He controlled Minnesota and North Dakota," a federal drug-enforcement agent said.

Zatarain, 23, wasn't an independent operator. He was a point man for a shadowy, cunning cartel in Mexico that federal authorities say now dominates the illicit meth trade besieging Minnesota and the Midwest.

The cartel, rooted in Mexico's Sinaloa region, is producing a highly addictive form of the drug in large clandestine labs south of the border, then shipping stockpiles of it here to dealers such as Zatarain through a cross-country smuggling system.

But his success made him careless. Today, Zatarain is in the Sherburne County jail, convicted on federal drug-conspiracy charges, sentenced to 15 years, and awaiting transfer to federal prison. He is one of only a few large-scale meth dealers in Minnesota with ties to the Sinaloa cartel to get caught in recent years.

Court documents obtained by the Star Tribune, along with interviews with federal agents and attorneys involved in Zatarain's case, illustrate in detail how he operated before his organization unraveled. Zatarain also pleaded guilty last month to a second set of drug charges, from deals he allegedly tried to make in the past year while behind bars.

The cartel, meanwhile, is still flourishing, undeterred by his arrest and apparently capitalizing on a new state law that's wiping out the small-time meth producers once prevalent in Minnesota. The law restricts the sale of cold medicines that contain a chemical commonly used to process the drug.

Federal authorities say Mexican cartels now control at least 80 percent of the meth sold in Minnesota and are filling the supply void being created by the demise of mom-and-pop dealers. The cartels are ever more responsible for a drug scourge costing the state several hundred million dollars a year.

Federal agents say that Zatarain's case, in which nearly a dozen others with ties to the cartel also were prosecuted, has shed new light on how the Sinaloa cartel works. But not enough to shut it down.

Midway through this year, a Drug Enforcement Administration task force fighting the meth trade in Minnesota is on a pace to confiscate more cartel shipments here than ever. Last year, the task force seized nearly 50 kilos (1 kilo is 2.2 pounds) of the drug. Already this year, nearly 40 kilos have been seized.

Tom Kelly, the head of the DEA's office in Minneapolis, said the cartel's reach is enormous. "You can't stop it at the border of Minnesota," he said. "It's a constant uphill battle."

El Grande kept calling. His real name was Emilio Flores, and he was a cartel connection in Denver, a regional hub for heroin and meth on its way to Minnesota from Mexico. He wanted Zatarain, nicknamed Beto, to stay in the Twin Cities for the winter.

Normally, to keep a low profile, the cartel rotated its distributors in and out of the metro area every few months. But business was too good for Zatarain to return home to Tepic, a city in western Mexico where the cartel has roots.

El Grande and Zatarain, federal agents listening in on wiretaps soon would learn, spent a lot of time on the phone, often talking in code about selling meth -- which is also known on the street as crystal, glass or ice.

Since 2002, Zatarain had worked throughout the Twin Cities for the cartel. Initially, he sold heroin. But it was impossible to ignore the shift in consumer demand for meth -- especially in the suburbs, where authorities say it now ranks alongside cocaine and marijuana as a drug of choice.

For every sale of heroin, DEA agents estimated, Zatarain could make 10 sales of meth. The difference could mean thousands of dollars. By mid-2004, meth, selling sometimes at $12,000 a pound, had become the focus of Zatarain's operation for the cartel.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Dunne, the head of the Minnesota office's narcotics section, said that the meth pouring into the state from Mexico has become the focus of law enforcement officials, too.

"It is the number one drug threat facing federal drug prosecutors and agents in the Midwest," Dunne said.

The cartel to which Zatarain reported, law enforcement officials say, studied the exploding demand for meth in Minnesota and the Midwest and created a sophisticated business plan to capitalize on it. In many ways, authorities say, the cartel's tactics resemble how a corporation enters an international market.

"The cartel is run like a regular business and set up like a Fortune 500 company," Kelly said. "It has people who work on the transportation side, the finance side, the communications side, and they all work in concert to move a product to where the demand is very high."

Far from the reach of the DEA, the cartel first built labs in Mexico capable of large-scale production. To get great quantities of the drug made quickly, federal investigators say, the cartel also illegally began importing tons of ephedrine, a key ingredient in meth, from India and China. One lab in Mexico soon could produce as much as 50 pounds of meth a week.

By contrast, homemade meth labs in Minnesota -- whose numbers have plummeted since the state restricted the sale of cold medicines last year -- produce only a small fraction of that amount in a week.

To get meth to the Midwest, the cartel began using underground distribution networks that had been set up to smuggle Colombian cocaine, Mexican heroin and marijuana across the border, federal investigators say. Los Angeles, San Diego and Phoenix became major distribution hubs for cartel-made meth.

Shipments of the drug usually reach Minnesota from the Southwest via interstate highways, in cars or trucks with secret storage compartments that cartel couriers constantly change to try to stay one step ahead of state troopers who are getting intensive new training on their smuggling tactics.

Kelly, who spent time working for the DEA in the Southwest, said it has been nearly impossible to stop smuggling along the border there.

"They send five cars through at one time, and if one gets caught it doesn't matter because the rest got through, and they're on the way north," he said.

In May, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced a partnership with Mexico to fight meth trafficking. The DEA and Mexico plan to form special investigative teams along the border and compile a most-wanted list of meth traffickers.

Dunne said federal prosecutions of meth cases in Minnesota are soaring. In the past five years, those cases have more than doubled -- from 43 to 104.

But, he said, "We are only catching the tip of the iceberg of the methamphetamine that is coming into Minnesota from Mexico."

Catching Zatarain took three years.

In 2002, the DEA's task force in Minneapolis heard of a heroin dealer in Minneapolis whose name had been mentioned on a federal wiretap in Denver. The dealer was called "Beto," and he was being supplied in part from Denver by Flores, the guy nicknamed El Grande, who was also later convicted on drug charges.

But the DEA didn't figure out who "Beto" was until the spring of 2004. Through an informant, federal agents learned that Zatarain had gone home to Mexico, but was expected to return soon to the Twin Cities.

"We found that Beto was taking his turn in the rotation," a former task force member on the investigation said. "They came up in teams and stayed for a few months. Everybody was expected to do their time. If you wanted the good life back in Mexico, you had to come north and take your turn."

Federal investigators say Zatarain was making so much money that even as he was sending his receipts to the cartel he was also wiring cash home to his family -- never under his name -- and was planning to buy a ranch in Mexico.

In the fall of 2004, after reviewing the DEA's emerging investigation into drug cartels, U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum authorized the agency's request to use wiretaps in the hope of penetrating Zatarain's organization. The DEA task force soon realized it was not just pursuing a heroin case. It was on to what would become one of its most far-reaching meth probes.

By eavesdropping on Zatarain's calls, federal agents began learning his codes. When he talked about women, he was really talking about drugs. When he spoke of his "black girl," that meant he was moving black-tar heroin. Talk of "white girls" meant meth. References to the hassle of a broken window was another way of talking about "glass," slang for meth.

Heeding tips from traffickers who had come to the Twin Cities before him, Zatarain changed his cell phone every month and switched used cars about as often. He seldom moved drugs at night, reasoning that there were more police on the streets.

Once, when Zatarain's runners sensed they were being tailed -- and they were -- they simply drove off the freeway, got a hotel room along the Bloomington strip, and holed up for a few days.

On wiretapped phone lines, federal investigators say, Zatarain bragged about the vehicles he used for trafficking. They were outfitted with secret compartments that he said could get anything across the border unnoticed.

But he worried, too. Fearing detection from drug-detecting dogs that police often use on roadside stops of suspicious vehicles, Zatarain and his collaborators went so far as to put anti-freeze inside the plastic bolt that holds spare tires in the trunks of cars -- because they knew the odor throws off a dog's scent.

After spending thousands of hours listening to wiretapped conversations and conducting surveillance all the way from Lake Street in Minneapolis to the Red River Valley, the DEA was eager to learn whether Zatarain could, on short notice, deliver a large quantity of meth.

In January 2005, a Hennepin County Sheriff's deputy, working undercover, rang Zatarain's cell phone and placed an order. It was a call the DEA hoped would lead them to Mexico -- and his drug bosses.

According to court documents, Zatarain took the undercover officer's call and promised to deliver in two hours.

DOJ_NMG_0038856

Then Zatarain called one of his meth couriers in Brooklyn Park. DEA surveillance teams tailed the courier to Zatarain's new apartment at 630 Quincy Avenue in northeast Minneapolis. There, other agents watched the apartment.

Close to noon, Zatarain left and drove to sell a half-pound of meth, as promised, to the undercover officer. He delivered it inside a jar of instant coffee, but he was not immediately arrested.

DEA agents soon learned Zatarain could deal almost 20 pounds of meth a month. But they heard nothing about his bosses.

By that time, as his business was peaking, Zatarain had begun breaking most of his own rules -- and his operation began to fall apart. He started working deals at night. Instead of buying a new cell every month, he would wait two.

"It became self-defeating," one investigator on the case said. "While he bought a new cell to avoid detection, he gave his old phones to his associates rather than rotating everybody's phones."

Agents simply listened in on the old phones to get Zatarain's new number.

Once, thinking he was on a secure line, he told someone not to call him Beto. Instead, he said, call him "Johnny." Agents wrote down his new street name.

T hree days after buying a half-pound of crystal meth from Zatarain, federal agents broke down his apartment door. It was dawn, and he and two other men were there sleeping. They acted bewildered, as if the agents had targeted the wrong men.

"They had their game faces on," one of the agents on the task force said. "They weren't going to concede anything."

Agents wanted Zatarain to identify his bosses in Mexico. They offered the standard deal -- less prison time if he gave them names.

They met with Zatarain three times as he sat with his federal public defender, Kevin O'Brien. Finally, Zatarain gave information to the DEA and the U.S. Attorney's office in Minneapolis about cartel operatives in Denver and Indianapolis, O'Brien said. Zatarain provided names, methods of operation, routes, and information about how the cartel recruited distributors.

And there his disclosures stopped. He would not identify the bosses who directed the operations. To do so would mean his family could be killed in retribution, Zatarain told DEA agents.

"My argument was that he was being manipulated by much bigger forces back in Mexico," O'Brien said. "He was very engaging, very bright, good-looking. He'd be successful in any business. He was a drug dealer for a reason: he was very organized, kept track of customers and he delivered. But he was just one of these kids who is used as cannon fodder."

Federal investigators say Zatarain was an example of what they call a "cell-head" -- someone who has a family relationship within the cartel's organization back in Mexico. That way, they say, the cartel has more control over keeping its far-flung operatives from cooperating with authorities.

"You could tell he wanted to talk," an investigator said, "but the last line of defense the cartel in Mexico has over them is that if you do talk, some of your family is going to end up dead. And he still has family back there in Mexico."

Zatarain, protecting his widowed mother and siblings in Tepic, stayed silent and pleaded guilty to drug-conspiracy charges.

While in jail waiting to be sent to prison for 15 years, Zatarain talked on the phone to his brother, Julio. In recorded conversations, they spoke about trying to sell encyclopedias and other books.

But it became clear to federal agents that they were trying to sell more meth. A second investigation began.

In January, a year after his arrest, Zatarain was indicted along with Julio and two others for allegedly trying to sell 500 grams of meth. He pleaded guilty last month and is scheduled to be sentenced in August. Under federal law, he could serve as many as 10 more years.

Federal agents say shutting down Zatarain's operation was a big victory. But they also know the cartel for which he worked is still in business in Minnesota.

"In the DEA, we always ask ourselves if we dismantled or if we only disrupted an organization," an agent who worked on the Zatarain case said. "Did we dismantle this operation? No."

State Troopers Trained To Stop Different Kind Of Speed (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - A large contingent of Minnesota state troopers are leading the state's battle to stop the flow of methamphetamine into the state from the popular vacation state of Sinaloa in western Mexico.

Capt. David Graham, head of the State Patrol's investigative unit, says smugglers working for Mexican drug cartels are delivering millions of dollars worth of meth to Minnesota.

Drug Enforcement Administration and state authorities estimate that more than 100 pounds of meth produced and packaged by Mexican cartels arrives in Minnesota every month.

In the past six months, troopers have seized 25 pounds of meth - an illegal drug many users call "speed" - hidden in three vehicles.

"I shudder to think what we're missing," Graham said.

Trooper Jeff Sharpe and his colleagues recently went through a federally funded course dubbed Desert Snow, learning how to identify suspicious vehicles, conduct detailed roadside interviews, and detect signs that a vehicle has been altered with hidden storage compartments.

They learned that meth smugglers prefer nondescript compact cars that blend into highway traffic that's filled with giant semis and SUVs.

Now, Sharpe watches out for that kind of blandness.

In February, he stopped a tan Ford Contour after the driver cut off a semitrailer truck while changing lanes. According to police reports, the driver let Sharpe search the car and he noticed the molding above the glove compartment and dashboard appeared to have been cut from the trim.

He called for a patrol dog and the dog locked its nose on the dash area, where Sharpe found a hidden compartment containing about 10 pounds of packaged meth, with a street value of more than $1 million, police reports showed.

It was the largest single seizure of Mexican meth by authorities in Minnesota.

A trial date for the driver, Merced Guadalupe Bejar-Orta, is pending. His attorney is arguing that the search was illegal.

Nearly 90 of Minnesota's 425 troopers have gone through the program since last fall, along with 12 local officers who work for communities bordering the state's interstates.

They face a big job.

Federal authorities say Mexican cartels now control at least 80 percent of the meth sold in Minnesota and are filling the void created as small dealers are forced out of business by the new state law restricting the sale of cold medicines that contain pseudoephedrine or ephedrine, commonly used to process meth.

Authorities say the cartels have smuggled tons of pseudoephedrine and ephedrine into Mexico from China, India and eastern Europe to feed their super labs.

A DEA task force fighting the meth trade in Minnesota seized nearly 110 pounds of the drug last year. This year, the task force has already seized 88 pounds, officials told the Star Tribune.

Tom Kelly, head of the DEA's office in Minneapolis, said the reach of one large Sinaloa cartel, which is based in the city of Tepic, is huge.

"You can't stop it at the border of Minnesota," Kelly said. "It's a constant uphill battle."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Dunne, head of the Minnesota office's narcotics section, said meth is the number one drug threat facing federal drug prosecutors and agents in the Midwest.

In the past five years, federal prosecutions of meth cases in Minnesota have more than doubled, from 43 to 104, Dunne said.

But that's only a small percentage compared to the meth that comes in undetected, he said.

"We are only catching the tip of the iceberg of the methamphetamine that is coming into Minnesota from Mexico," Dunne said.

Mississippi Prison Meth Ring Busted (AP)

MAGEE - Federal prosecutors say five men, identified as members of the Aryan Brotherhood, have been charged with operating a methamphetamine ring that was directed from a Simpson County community work center in Magee.

The investigation started in 2004 when correctional officers heard through telephone monitoring and confidential informants about the ring, Mississippi Department of Corrections Commissioner Chris Epps said Thursday.

The scheme lasted about a year, authorities said.

Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent in Charge Stephen Luzinski said several imprisoned members of the white-supremacist gang allegedly enlisted the assistance of former inmates and criminal co-conspirators outside of the prison to produce and distribute the drug.

Those arrested were Grady Brown, 36, incarcerated at the Central Mississippi Correctional facility in Pearl; Melanie Minton, 27, of Rankin County; Donald Harris, 28, of Meridian; Eric Pendergrass, 24, of Pearl; and Jessica Wade, 22, of Rankin County.

The U.S. Attorney's Office said they face federal charges of conspiracy to manufacture and distribute meth and possession with intent to manufacture meth.

Brown would arrange for hypophosphorous acid, which can be used to make meth, to be delivered to the work center, where Brown and Harris were assigned, officials said.

Local Officials Ask For Federal Help In Fight Against Meth (DRH)

By Pamela Dickman

Daily Reporter Herald, July 8, 2006

Every day, area prosecutors and law enforcement officers battle a "perfect storm" ravaging the community environmentally, socially, emotionally and criminally.

On Friday, a panel of local officials asked the federal government for help combating methamphetamine. One suggestion: Close the borders, cut off the source.

The highly addictive drug is taking over communities, tearing apart families, monopolizing law enforcement efforts, contributing to violent and property crimes and affecting employers, the said.

People involved in the battle — three district attorneys from Northern Colorado, a sheriff, a local drug task force commander, a county commissioner and the wife of a user who started support groups — acknowledged at a U.S. congressional hearing in Loveland on Friday that the problem and solution are complex.

Communities need treatment, prevention, intervention and more money to battle the drug, they said.

But communities also need help cutting off the source.

DOJ_NMG_0038859

In Colorado, the largest source is Mexico, said Lt. Craig Dodd, commander of the Larimer County Drug Task Force, Denver Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Jeffrey Sweetin and 13th Judicial District Attorney Bob Watson.

About 80 percent of the drug consumed in the state comes from Mexico, traveling up Interstate 25 then east and west on interstates 70 and 76. The statistic is based on a drop in small clandestine labs as well as information gleaned in specific investigations, the officials said.

Five witnesses — officers and prosecutors — all suggested that tighter border security is a necessary weapon in the battle.

However, Indiana Congressman Mark Souder — a Republican who attended the hearing with Colorado Congresswoman Marilyn Musgrave and who described the drug and its ripple effect as "a perfect storm" — questioned that assertion.

After visiting a southern Border Patrol post and seeing confiscated heroin and marijuana, he said he isn't sure.

"They're not getting any meth at the border," Souder said. "Why not?"

Is it, instead, coming from Canada? he asked. Are illegal immigrants carrying it to the United States as passage fare?

All local investigation, said Dodd, Sweetin and Weld County Sheriff John Cooke, points to it coming north from Mexico into Larimer and Weld counties. They could not say how it is getting past patrols, just that it is, and federal help is needed.

"We have to have border enforcement with all the drugs coming into our country," Musgrave agreed.

"I daresay we have to focus on our northern borders as well."

By the Numbers

Larimer County

• 85 percent of adult drug court offenders listed methamphetamine as their drug of choice in 2004.

• 28 percent of juvenile drug court offenders listed meth as their drug of choice in 2005.

• 0 — the number of juveniles who listed meth five years earlier.

• 52 children were placed out of their homes because of their parents' meth use in the first nine months of 2005.

• 256 meth-related child protection investigations occurred in the same period.

• 12.9 pounds of methamphetamine were seized by drug officers in 2005— almost double the amount in the two prior years.

Weld County

• 4 of the past five murders were meth-related.

• 50 percent of property crimes are linked to meth.

• 90 percent of forgeries are linked to meth.

• 183 children have mothers who, as inmates, participated in a Weld County Jail survey about meth.

Mesa County

• $3 million was saved by the building of a drug treatment facility instead of a new jail.

• $500,000 — the amount that will be saved each year in operations costs for the treatment facility as opposed to a jail.

Federal Funds Save Drug Task Force (JA)

Journal Advocate, July 8, 2006

LOVELAND - The heart of war on illegal drugs in the eastern Colorado plains was in danger because of to lack of funding. That all ended Friday with an announcement late in a congressional hearing held here.

Late in the Congressional Field Hearing on Meth Abuse in Northern Colorado, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave, R-Colo., said she has secured a direct appropriation funding for the Eastern Colorado Plains Drug Task Force for 2007.

The Amount, Musgrave said could be as much as $250,000 - similar to the amount awarded to local law enforcement from Weld and Larimer counties last year.

DOJ_NMG_0038860

"We have a responsibility to our communities to work toward a solution to this serious problem. The meth epidemic deserves our full attention because of the drug's destructive nature," Musgrave said.

Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., chairman of the House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources said he has heard moving testimony on how methamphetamine has wreaked havoc on people and their families as he addressed the chambers in the Loveland Municipal Building.

"I have also learned about the many positive ways that communities have fought back, targeting the meth cooks and dealers, trying to get addicts into treatment and working to educate young people about the risk of meth abuse," Souder said.

Thirteenth Judicial District Attorney Bob Watson testified on the capabilities and limitations of law enforcement in his district - which is comprised of seven counties.

"We have 24 law enforcement agencies in the 13th judicial district. Some of those agencies are small and some do not have a 24-hour duty," Watson told the subcommittee.

Watson placed an emphasis on the district's drug task force and their accomplishments in the fight against drugs.

"We have put a lot of people behind bars and if we keep cutting the funding, the task force will cease to exist. It's a surrender on the war on drugs," Watson said.

Watson told the committee that his district has seen a decrease on local "mom and pop" meth labs because of the effort and cooperation from the seven counties through the drug task force.

"We have to stop this epidemic and people need to come together," Watson said, adding that one of the goals is to be ready for the next drug craze.

"This is a fine showing that federal, state and local governments came together to fight a problem," ECPDTF Commander Jeff Annis said shortly after the announcement.

"I personally thank Bob Watson for testifying in front of the committee in an effort to secure the money for us," Annis added.

"A great deal of credit goes to Watson, Musgrave and her staff who all went out to bat for us to get us funding," Logan County Sheriff's Office Lt. Walt Page said. "Without the funding, I foresaw the task force gone, which is a terrible shame."

Drug Enforcement Administration Denver Field Division Special Agent in Charge Jeffrey Sweetin testified that 80 percent of the methamphetamine used in the U.S. comes from larger labs - the agency calls super labs - which are increasingly found in Mexico.

"Most methamphetamine is produced by Mexico-based and California-based drug trafficking organizations," Sweetin said, citing that the increase of outside meth was mainly due to law enforcement's aggressive attack on small labs, which are found mostly in rural areas.

Congressional witnesses like Larimer County Drug Task Force Commander Craig Todd described to the committee the impact of the drug in his jurisdiction with increases in violent crime, property crime and identity theft.

"Meth is the primary drug threat to this state and it is readily available in most population centers. Most methamphetamine available in Colorado is produced by Mexican cartels and criminal groups in California and Arizona," 8th Judicial District Attorney Larry Abrahamsom said.

From a non-law enforcement side, the committee heard testimony from Donita Davenport who described how her life was touched dealing with her husband's addiction and his journey to rehabilitation.

Davenport said that her husband's addiction cost them two homes as well as their hard-earned money.

She asked the committee to focus on education the public on the effects of the drug to families and communities.

With the support of each jurisdiction, the ECPDTF are able to cross jurisdictional lines in pursuit of the fight against methamphetamine and other illegal drugs.

"This funding is extremely helpful to us. I have worked with Rep. Musgrave regarding the funding from the time I went to meet with her last February in Washington DC. She has tremendously supported law enforcement," Watson said.

Plans for a regional treatment facility were also laid out which Watson said would happen in the near future.

A board of directors is already in place and is awaiting Gov. Bill Owens appointment for Watson to be the district attorney to represent the facility.

"It's cheaper in the long run to send people to treatment in comparison to incarceration," Watson said.

Cranberry Couple Enters Guilty Plea In Meth Case (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 8, 2006

A husband and wife from Cranberry pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to conspiring to make methamphetamine.

Brian and Christy McKenzie were charged after agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration rummaged through their trash at the Forest Park Trailer Court where they lived in July 2005.

According to Assistant U.S. Attorney Gregory J. Nescott, the agents got a tip that the McKenzies were making methamphetamine in their Laurel Drive home.

A search warrant revealed other chemicals used in the manufacturing process and an Internet printout that gave directions, Mr. Nescott said.

Mr. McKenzie, 38, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to make less than 5 grams of methamphetamine and one count of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. Mrs. McKenzie, 30, also pleaded guilty to conspiracy and to one count of possession of acetone, a chemical used to make the drug.

Sentencing is set for Nov. 17.

Man gets prison in attack on witness

A case of retaliation against a witness has ended with a New Brighton, Beaver County, man being sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

Virgil Wolfe, 25, of Circle Street, was found guilty April 12 of attacking a Beaver County man who provided information in a federal narcotics investigation, the U.S. Attorney's office in Pittsburgh said.

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration and state, Beaver County and New Brighton police investigated the case, in which another man, John Wolfe, was also convicted. Virgil Wolfe faces three years of supervised release following his 100-month prison term, according to U.S. District Court Judge Alan N. Bloch's sentence.

Defendant To Go Before Federal Judge (REP)

Reporter, July 8, 2006

Described as a regional drug kingpin by the Drug Enforcement Administration, a Fairfield man will return to federal court in Sacramento on July 18.

Defendant Eduardo Nunez Pichardo of Fairfield - also known as Eddie Nunez - is scheduled to appear for a status conference at 9:30 a.m. July 18 in the courtroom of federal magistrate Lawrence K. Karlton.

Pichardo, 32, was arrested by DEA agents - assisted by Fairfield and Vacaville police - June 21 on suspicion of distribution and conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. According to the DEA, the arrest culminated a seven-year investigation into drug trafficking that stretched from Northern California to Arizona and Alabama.

Pichardo tentatively had been approved for release June 29 on $1 million bond secured by real property. The order, however, later was taken under submission by the court and Pichardo remains in federal custody pending the bond.

Ex-prosecutor Faces New Ethics Probe (TC)

By A.J. FLICK

Tucson Citizen, July 7, 2006

A former Pima County prosecutor is accused of lying to federal agents and violating terms of a plea agreement involving her ex-fiance, a former eye surgeon recently convicted of ordering the death of a colleague.

The accusations are made in an amended complaint filed last week by the State Bar of Arizona against Lourdes Lopez. The complaint is the basis for possible disciplinary action, up to disbarment.

According to the complaint, Lopez committed ethical violations by lying to federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents in October 2001 about illegal prescriptions she obtained for Dr. Bradley Alan Schwartz and continuing to have contact with him despite a court order.

DOJ_NMG_0038862

Lopez, who is now in private practice, resigned from the Pima County Attorney's Office shortly before she was indicted for the drug allegations in 2002.

A federal charge against Lopez was dismissed with prejudice, meaning it can never be refiled, after her attorney, Rafael Gallego, told the court she had complied with all terms of her plea agreement, the complaint says.

The allegations of lying will not result in any new federal charges against Lopez, said Ann Harwood, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix.

Schwartz also entered into a plea deal that would have wiped away his federal charge in December 2004. His October 2004 arrest and his conviction in May for the murder of Dr. Brian Stidham violate terms of the plea, Harwood said, but prosecutors will not pursue the matter because Schwartz was sentenced to life in prison for conspiracy to commit murder.

Lopez's Bar complaint will be forwarded to an internal panelist to decide whether she committed the violations and whether sanctions, which range from censure to disbarment, are warranted.

Lopez did not return a call seeking comment. Gallego said he would consult with Lopez before commenting.

Leaders Of Marijuana-friendly Church Face Charges (AP)

S. Arizona Couple Face Prison For What They Say Is Religious Use Of Marijuana (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, July 9, 2006

PIMA — The Church of Cognizance, which has quietly operated here since 1991, has an unusual tenet — its worshippers deify and use marijuana as part of their faith.

Until federal authorities charged them with possessing 172 pounds of their leafy green sacrament earlier this year, church founders Dan and Mary Quaintance say they smoked, ate or drank marijuana daily as a way of becoming more spiritually enlightened.

But now, with added conspiracy charges, the Quaintances face up to 40 years each in prison in a case they call religious persecution.

Federal prosecutors say religious freedom does not exempt the use of illegal drugs. The Quaintances say it does. They also say a recent U.S. Supreme Court decision allowing a religious group's use of a hallucinogenic tea containing a federally banned substance should nullify the charges against them.

The couple is scheduled to go on trial in Las Cruces, N.M., on July 18, though defense lawyers are asking for a delay.

"They have a bona fide religion and the only marijuana they utilize is for the practice of their religion," said Mary Quaintance's attorney, Mario A. Esparza. "Our Constitution in the United States guarantees that freedom of religion, and the Quaintances are being punished for the very thing the Constitu- tion stands for.

"They did not distribute to anyone outside of the church and they never profited from it," Esparza said.

The Church of Cognizance, which leaders say has 72 monasteries located in members' homes nationwide, has a simple motto: "With good thoughts, good words and good deeds, we honor marijuana; as the teacher, the provider, the protector."

Dan Quaintance, 54, says the church has 40 to 50 members in Arizona, but cannot estimate how many there are nationwide. Leaders say members must be 18 to join, and he says the average age of worshippers in Arizona is 35. Dan, who preaches at weddings and funerals of church members, says the church does not sell its sacrament or proselytize.

DOJ_NMG_0038863

"Laws exist to protect people from injury and we've injured nobody," said Dan Quaintance, an Iowa native, Vietnam veteran and retired welder who identifies himself as his church's "chief cognoscente."

"Marijuana is the averter of death," he said. "The energy and spirit that is in marijuana is God. You consume the plant and you consume God. You are sacrificing your body to the deity."

The Quaintances were arrested Feb. 22 in Lordsburg, N.M., just seven days before the U.S. Supreme Court ruled unanimously that a small religious group based in Santa Fe that combines Christianity and American Indian practices could use hallucinogenic tea in its ceremonies. The tea, called hoasca, contains dimethyltryptamine, or DMT, known for its hallucinogenic properties.

A variety of religious groups representing millions of members filed briefs supporting O Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao Do Vegetal, or UDV, and its use of hoasca — among them the Arizona Civil Liberties Union, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, the National Association of Evangelicals and the Union for Reform Judaism. Some supporters likened banning the tea to a federal ban on sacramental wine.

Graham County Sheriff Frank Hughes says that in his 10 years on the job, he's never had a complaint about the Quaintances, who live in a small rectangular home in the sparsely populated rural community of Pima, about 90 miles northeast of Tucson.

Their home sits on a four-acre property that's dotted with old vehicles. Alongside their house is a wall made out of tires, which the Quaintances say eventually will form the boundary of an outdoor chapel.

The couple's 31-year-old daughter, Zina; her husband, Tim; and their three children have a home on the property, as do the Quaintances' 28-year-old son, Dennis, and his wife, Vanessa, and their son.

Their home bears no resemblance to a traditional church, inside or out. Yet the Quaintances call it a monastery and are adamant that the church they founded together is a sincere, legitimate faith — on par with any mainstream religious denomination.

A tapestry of Bob Marley smoking a large joint decorates the front hallway, and inside, the couple has a few handmade pipes, some of which have won ribbons in the glazing division of the Graham County Fair. Most of their pipes and other sacramental accessories were seized when authorities searched their home March 3, they say.

The Quaintances do not grow their sacrament but, rather, say they rely on donations of it, which they pick up from church "couriers." That's what they say they were about to do when they were arrested.

They smoke the marijuana or sometimes blend it into a milk-like drink, saying it helps them to become more enlightened and in tune with the universe. Until they were arrested, the Quaintances say they'd smoked or ingested the plant every day of their 33-year marriage, even before they formed their church. Both were marijuana users when they met, and they credit the plant to helping their marriage survive.

"It makes you better at what you do, enhances who you are. It is the most beautiful plant on Earth," said Mary Quaintance, 51, a homemaker from Northern California who married Dan in 1973, when she was 18. They met while Mary worked as nurse's aide in Chico, Calif., and rented a room from Dan's parents.

Dan Quaintance, who grew up in the United Methodist faith and once was president of his church youth group, says finding marijuana helped him finish high school, later kick a heroin addiction and get through acute pancreatitis.

It was during his illness that he began researching marijuana's use among ancient cultures, and he started to think about forming his own church. As he reread the Bible, he believed many passages that referred to a leaf, tree or plant were talking about marijuana.

"Religion is basically putting your faith in what you rely on," he said. "Jesus started his church because of what he believed and learned."

He filed a "declaration of religious sentiment" on behalf of the Church of Cognizance with the Graham County Recorder's Office in 1994, though Dan, his family and other members say the church dates to 1991.

Services at the Church of Cognizance aren't scheduled. According to the Quaintances, members call the monasteries and arrange a worship time, which typically includes using marijuana and listening to sermons by fellow cognoscenti that talk about peaceful existence.

DOJ_NMG_0038864

"Dan and Mary are two of the most beautiful, wholesome people," said Daniel Jeffrey, an enlightened cognoscente in Puna, Hawaii. "We're not involved with herb for any kind of profit gain. If you tell people that, their mind just can't grasp it."

Still, Charles Haynes, a senior scholar at the Virginia-based First Amendment Center, says any group seeking an exemption to the nation's drug laws, even for religious purposes, has a "hill to climb."

And he says the federal government is likely in a better position to win against the religious use of marijuana than it was for the hallucinogenic tea case, given the prevalence of marijuana and the federal government's concern about a drug problem in the country.

The hallucinogenic tea is difficult to find and reportedly doesn't taste very good, Haynes said, noting the same is true for peyote, which also is a federally banned substance.

A federal exemption for peyote exists when it's used for religious practices by members of the Native American Church. In Arizona, people using peyote who aren't members of the Native American Church also are exempt as long as the peyote is used for a "bona fide religious purpose" in a manner that doesn't threaten the public. But there are no such exceptions for marijuana.

"Marijuana is difficult, even if they have a sincere religious belief," Haynes said. "The federal government has already successfully fought efforts to get a medical exemption."

The U.S. Constitution contains no legally recognizable definition of religion, but courts still can apply a test of sincerity, said Jeremy Gunn, director of the Freedom of Religion and Belief program for the American Civil Liberties Union, which supported the UDV church.

If, for example, a group of prisoners calling themselves the Church of Cabernet and Filet Mignon argued religious belief as a reason to be served wine and better food, the government would have a right to question the sincerity of their theological belief, he said.

"The UDV case did not open the floodgate," he said. "The government needs to show why it makes sense to apply the drug laws in that circumstance. In the UDV case, the hallucinogenic tea is honestly a traditional part of the religious practice."

The office of the U.S. attorney for New Mexico, David C. Iglesias, prosecuted the UDV case, and also is prosecuting the Quaintances. His office declined to comment on a pending case.

The Quaintances have no history of criminal convictions in Arizona, where they've lived since 1986, but both have prior convictions for marijuana possession in Washington state, records show. Dan Quaintance says he also has a 1974 conviction from California for driving under the influence and spent 30 days in jail for that offense.

The Quaintances spent two weeks in a New Mexico jail after their arrest this year and, as part of their court-ordered release, must have regular urine tests to ensure they aren't using any marijuana. Both say that living without their deity for the first time in more than three decades is extremely difficult.

The complaint against the couple, which was amended, includes two other defendants — Timothy Jason Kripner, 23, of Tucson and Joseph Allen Butts, 48, of California.

The revised complaint raised the stakes in the case, adding conspiracy charges and more than 220 pounds of marijuana. Dan Quaintance says Kripner and Butts are both certified couriers for the church. Kripner was traveling with the Quaintances when they were arrested, and authorities say Butts was involved in a conspiracy with them to distribute marijuana.

"They may take Dan and Mary down but they will never take the church down," Mary Quaintance said.

IMMIGRATION:

States Try To Block Illegal Workers (USAT)

By Charisse Jones

USA Today, July 10, 2006

At least 30 states have passed laws or taken other steps this year to crack down on illegal immigrants, often making it harder for undocumented workers to find jobs or receive public services.

Acting while Congress struggles to set policy regarding the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, states have enacted at least 57 laws, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures and a USA TODAY analysis. Among major themes of the state legislation: fining businesses that hire undocumented workers and denying such companies public contracts if they don't verify the legal status of employees.

"The trends … have leaned toward the punitive side," says Ann Morse, an immigration expert at the National Conference of State Legislatures. "The No. 1 topic has been employment in terms of deterring employers and employees."

Examples:

•A Colorado law enacted in June prohibits awarding state contracts to businesses that knowingly employ illegal immigrants.

•A Louisiana law approved in June subjects businesses that have state contracts and more than 10 employees to fines if they don't fire workers known to be undocumented.

•A Georgia bill enacted in April has a phased-in requirement that public employers and government contractors and subcontractors verify information on newly hired workers through a federal program.

The U.S. Senate and House have passed widely divergent immigration bills. The Senate's legislation would put most undocumented immigrants on a path to citizenship. The House bill would make illegal immigrants felons and increase penalties for hiring them.

Some lawmakers and advocates of stricter immigration enforcement say the flurry of legislation reflects states' mounting frustration with federal officials.

"State and local politicians and the grass-roots in those states are up in arms over Washington's conspicuous lack of leadership," says John Keeley, spokesman for the Center for Immigration Studies, which favors tighter controls on immigration. "Immigration … is a driving factor for the three biggest budget items states face: education, health care and criminal justice."

Under federal law, states must provide some services to illegal immigrants, including public education and emergency medical care. States do not have to provide commercial licenses, food assistance, health care, unemployment benefits or other services.

States' focus on workers' documentation is unfair, says Brent Wilkes, national executive director of the League of United Latin American Citizens, a civil rights group. "It feels like we're back to the days when it's OK to discriminate against minorities," he says.

A Florida Mayor Turns To An Immigration Curb To Fix A Fading City (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

AVON PARK, Fla., July 6 — Tom Macklin, the mayor of this faded city deep in Florida's citrus belt, heard the idea on talk radio and latched on with relish.

A city up north, Hazleton, Pa., planned to root out and punish landlords who rented to illegal immigrants, fining them $1,000 for every such tenant. Mr. Macklin, whose own small city has swelled with immigrants from Mexico, Haiti and Jamaica over the past decade, swiftly proposed the same for Avon Park.

"It was almost as if I was sitting in church at a revival and he was preaching to me," Mr. Macklin said of Mayor Lou Barletta of Hazleton, whom he heard promoting that city's Illegal Immigration Relief Act on the radio show last month. "If we address the housing issue — make it as difficult as possible for illegals to find safe haven in Avon Park — then they are going to have to find someplace else to go."

Like Hazleton's proposal, Avon Park's would deny business permits to companies that knowingly hired illegal immigrants. The ordinance, which states that illegal immigration "destroys our neighborhoods and diminishes our overall quality of life," would also make English the official language of Avon Park, removing Spanish from all city documents, signs and automated phone messages.

The proposal has some of Avon Park's roughly 8,800 residents exalting, others fuming and still others — including those who rent rooms or apartments in the scruffy Golden Age Villas, west of the abandoned train tracks — plain scared. The City Council passed it 3 to 2 on the first reading and is likely to adopt it July 24.

DOJ_NMG_0038866

"We just wouldn't be able to stay here," said Armando Garcia Cortes, 45, who said he came to Avon Park, about 80 miles southeast of Orlando, from Veracruz, Mexico, to pick oranges and fix roofs. "They're going to see the farmworker population here drop. We would all be leaving."

John Koch, who sells glassware and model cars at the Broken Spoke Flea Market on Main Street, said that would be fine.

"I think it's long overdue," Mr. Koch said of the proposal. "If you don't put a cap on it, it just gets out of hand."

Both Mr. Macklin and Mr. Barletta said they were forced into drastic measures by the federal government's failure to crack down on illegal immigration. Both said that tightening the nation's borders would be the best solution, but that with Congress still divided on immigration policy, they had to take action.

"When you have people begging you to do something, there comes a breaking point," said Mr. Barletta, whose family settled in Hazleton when it was a thriving coal center in the early 1900's. "I feel very confident that what we're doing is not only legal, but the right thing to do. I can't sit back and watch my city being destroyed."

Both mayors, white baby boomers who grew up in the 1960's and 70's, speak wistfully of the days when nuclear families were the only occupants of single-family homes in their towns, every resident paid taxes and English was the only language heard on the streets. Mr. Macklin said the City of Charm, as Avon Park has long called itself, no longer met that description, despite the gazebo and shuffleboard courts on Main Street, several dainty lakes and ubiquitous live oaks.

"When people come to our area," he said, "they see degrading neighborhoods, homes falling down among themselves, four or five vehicles parked in yards. There's a perception for those that come to this area — looking to perhaps expand a business, move here — that it might not necessarily be where they want to be."

Mr. Macklin, a Republican whose City Council is nonpartisan, said he had been bombarded with positive feedback since proposing the ordinance in late June, even getting e-mail messages from California and Illinois. But some residents have called him racist, and others, like Joe Wright, a dairy farmer who said two-thirds of his work force was Hispanic, said the ordinance would be unenforceable and unconstitutional.

"It's going to be impossible to police," said Mr. Wright, whose dairy, outside the city, has many employees who live in Avon Park. "Are they actually going to have their zoning people and policemen racially profile every Hispanic-looking person? I mean, this just has a very chilling effect."

Mr. Macklin said he expected opposition from citrus growers and cattle farmers, many of whom say that they hire only workers with Social Security cards, but that they cannot be sure the cards are authentic. The law would punish only those who knowingly hired or rented to illegal immigrants, he said.

But Mary Bauer, director of the Immigrant Justice Project at the Southern Poverty Law Center, said the proposal violated several laws, including the Fair Housing Act and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act.

"The real problem is that it's obvious the effect of this will be to discriminate against immigrants and Latinos generally," Ms. Bauer said, adding that the center might sue if the ordinance passed. "Any thinking landlord reading this would likely decide that renting to immigrants or Latinos is a risky proposition."

Cesar A. Perales, president of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, said he had sent two lawyers to meet with Hispanic groups in Hazleton recently and might sue to stop its ordinance.

"The Latino community is just about as angry as any I've ever seen," Mr. Perales said. "They've come to Hazleton to be part of that community, and they certainly improved the economic conditions of what by most accounts was a dying town, and helped revitalize it. And they now feel they are being blamed for every ill in the city."

Mr. Barletta said his proposal, up for a final vote July 13, was modeled on a similar one in San Bernardino, Calif., which stalled because its proponents failed to gather enough signatures to get it on the ballot. He wrote it, he said, after illegal immigrants committed several rattling crimes in Hazleton, a city of 31,000, this year.

Both proposals have led to false rumors that have fanned fears in recent weeks. At the Golden Age Villas in Avon Park, Ashley Neff, 20, whose boyfriend is an illegal immigrant from Mexico, said she had heard that speaking Spanish would not be allowed in shops and restaurants.

"They're saying they're not even going to let people in grocery stores," Ms. Neff said. "How is that fair? Even a lot of the people who are legal citizens prefer to speak Spanish because it comes easier to them."

DOJ_NMG_0038867

Down the street, Patrick Graham, a Jamaican immigrant who said he was here legally, said it was foolish to force out illegal immigrants because nobody else would work in the fields and groves.

"I sure ain't going out there to pick any oranges," said Mr. Graham, who owns a window-cleaning business. "All the hard work, the Mexicans are doing it."

Melva Santana, a shopkeeper who was among a crowd of whites, blacks and Hispanics eating at Taqueria Merlo on Thursday, said she feared the ordinance would encourage people who had kept their prejudices quiet to begin harassing immigrants.

This week, Ms. Santana said, a sales clerk refused to sell her sister beer because she had a Puerto Rico driver's license, and the clerk said, "I can't read it."

At the flamingo-pink Avon Motel, which has operated here for 52 years, Dale Graham, the manager, said he suspected that the proposal had come about because illegal immigrants were not only picking citrus these days but also getting construction and other higher-paying jobs.

"I think they're just a scapegoat," Mr. Graham said. "What it comes down to is the city is resistant to any kind of change or growth."

Outside the motel, a sign read: American Family Owned. Drive Safely.

Mexican Illegals Sent To Hometowns (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

The U.S. and Mexican governments have resumed a repatriation program to return Mexican nationals caught illegally in the United States to their hometowns in Mexico's interior, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials said.

ICE spokeswoman Kadia Koroma said the Interior Repatriation Program, which resumed with the departure of a flight Friday from Tucson International Airport with 67 Mexicans who volunteered to be repatriated, will "ensure the safe, effective and humanitarian return of Mexican nationals illegally in the United States."

A 2004 memorandum of understanding between the Department of Homeland Security and the Mexican government established the framework for the two nations to work cooperatively in repatriating Mexican nationals who volunteer to be returned home.

The program returns detained illegal aliens to Mexico's interior rather than to towns along the U.S.-Mexico border as part of an effort to both control the Southwest border and to save the lives of those who might try again to cross the desert areas of the Southwest to regain entry to the United States.

Many detained illegal aliens who are returned to various border communities after their capture often find it easier and more economical to re-enter the United States than return home to Mexico's interior, authorities have said.

Of the 1.15 million illegal aliens apprehended last year by the U.S. Border Patrol, the vast majority were Mexican nationals and more than half of them were detained along the Arizona-Mexico border -- particularly a 260-mile section of Arizona's southeast known as the Tucson sector.

For the past two summers, Ms. Koroma said, U.S. and Mexican officials have developed and jointly administered the repatriation program to return nearly 35,000 Mexican nationals to the interior of Mexico. The program initially was funded and managed by U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP).

Under the program, which is scheduled to continue until Sept. 30, Mexican nationals apprehended in Arizona will be processed at centers in Nogales and Yuma, where they will be interviewed by Mexican and U.S. officials for inclusion in the repatriation program. Ms. Koroma said those who volunteer will then be flown to Mexico City and provided bus transportation to their places of origin.

"By quickly returning aliens to the interior of Mexico rather than to the Mexican border, both nations seek so save lives and discourage additional illegal border crossings through hostile, desert terrain," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0038868

Former CBP Commissioner Robert C. Bonner, who helped create the program, has called it "a crucial, integral component" of Homeland Security's Arizona Border Control Initiative to gain greater operational control and to save lives in dangerous traffic areas along the border with Mexico.

"Returning illegal aliens to the interior of Mexico allows us to disrupt the inhumane and often callous human-smuggling organizations that operate along the border area," he said when the program first began.

Conservatives And Immigration (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

No issue more deeply divides American conservatives today than immigration. It's the subject on which we get the most critical mail by far, no doubt reflecting this split on the right. So with Congress holding hearings on the issue around the country, perhaps it's a good moment to step back and explain the roots of our own, longstanding position favoring open immigration.

A position, by the way, on which we hardly stand alone. There is also President Bush, and before him the Gipper. (See our May 16 editorial, "Reagan on Immigration1.") In the context of the current debate, we also print on the opposite page an open letter supporting comprehensive immigration reform from 33 prominent conservatives, including former Secretary of State George Shultz and GOP Vice Presidential nominee Jack Kemp.

The most frequent criticism we hear is that a newspaper called "The Wall Street Journal" simply wants "cheap labor" for business. This is an odd charge coming from conservatives who profess to believe in the free market, since it echoes the AFL-CIO and liberals who'd just as soon have government dictate wages.

Our own view is that a philosophy of "free markets and free people" includes flexible labor markets. At a fundamental level, this is a matter of freedom and human dignity. These migrants are freely contracting for their labor, which is a basic human right. Far from selling their labor "cheap," they are traveling to the U.S. to sell it more dearly and improve their lives. Like millions of Americans before them, they and certainly their children climb the economic ladder as their skills and education increase.

We realize that critics are not inventing the manifold problems that can arise from illegal immigration: Trespassing, violent crime, overcrowded hospital emergency rooms, document counterfeiting, human smuggling, corpses in the Arizona desert, and a sense that the government has lost control of the border. But all of these result, ultimately, from too many immigrants chasing too few U.S. visas.

Those migrating here to make a better life for themselves and their families would much prefer to come legally. Give them more legal ways to enter the country, and we are likely to reduce illegal immigration far more effectively than any physical barrier along the Rio Grande ever could. This is not about rewarding bad behavior. It's about bringing immigration policy in line with economic and human reality. And the reality is that the U.S. has a growing demand for workers, while Mexico has both a large supply of such workers and too few jobs at home.

Some conservatives concede this point in theory but then insist that liberal immigration is no longer possible in a modern welfare state, which breeds dependency in a way that the America of a century ago did not. But the immigrants who arrive here come to work, not sit on the dole. And thanks to welfare reform, the welfare rolls have declined despite a surge in illegal immigration in the past decade.

The real claims that illegals make on public services are education, which can't be withheld because of a 1982 Supreme Court ruling (Plyer v. Doe), and health care, especially emergency rooms. Since denying urgent medical treatment is immoral, the answer again is to legalize cross-border labor flows and remove government obstacles to affordable health insurance. As for education, even illegals pay for public schools through the indirect property taxes they pay in rent. Overall, immigrants contribute far more to our economy than they extract in public benefits.

By far the largest concern we hear on the right concerns culture, especially the worry that the current Hispanic influx is so large it can resist the American genius for assimilation. Hispanics now comprise nearly a third of the population in California and Texas, the country's two biggest states, and cultural assimilation does matter.

This is where the political left does the cause of immigration no good in pursuing a separatist agenda. When such groups as La Raza and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund push for multiculturalism, bilingual education, foreign language ballots, racial quotas and the like, they undermine support for immigration among even the most open-minded

Americans. Most Americans don't want to replicate the Bosnia model; nor are they pining for a U.S. version of the Quebec sovereignty movement. President Bush has been right to assert that immigrants must adopt U.S. norms, and we only wish more figures on the political left would say the same.

But the good news is that these newcomers by and large aren't listening to the left-wingers pushing identity politics. Mexican immigrants, like their European predecessors, are assimilating. Their children learn English and by the end of high school prefer it to their parents' native tongue. They also marry people they meet here. Second-generation Latinos earn less than white Americans but more than blacks and 50% more than first-generation Latinos. According to Tamar Jacoby's "Reinventing the Melting Pot," the most common last names among new homeowners in California include Garcia, Lee, Martinez, Nguyen, Rodriguez and Wong.

Which brings us to the politics. Contrary to what you hear on talk radio and cable news, polls continue to show that the conservative silent majority is pro-immigration, and that it supports a guest-worker program as the only practical and humane way to moderate the foreign labor flow.

According to the most recent Tarrance Group survey, 75% of likely GOP voters support immigration reform that combines increased border and workplace enforcement with a guest-worker system for newcomers and a multiyear path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already here -- provided that they meet certain requirements like living crime free, learning English and paying taxes. "Support for this plan," the poll found, "is strong even among base Republican voter demographics like strong Republicans (77%), very conservative Republicans (72%), white conservative Christians (76%), and those who listen to news talk radio on a daily basis (72%)." * * *

House Republican leaders, who passed an immigration bill last year focusing only on enforcement, want to frame this debate as a choice between more border security or "amnesty" for the 11 or 12 million illegals already here. But that's a false choice. A guest-worker program that lets market forces rather than prevailing political winds determine how many economic migrants can enter the country actually enhances security. How? By reducing pressure on the border, just as the Bracero guest-worker program in the 1950s and early 1960s did.

When border patrol agents don't have to chase down people coming here to work, they can concentrate on genuine threats, like gang members and terrorists. The real choice is between throwing more resources at an enforcement-only policy that has failed, or a larger reform that's had some past success in reducing illegal border crossings and meeting the demands of our economy and of human dignity.

A Conservative Statement For Immigration Reform (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

At this critical moment in the immigration debate, conservatives need to examine the role we are playing in this great national issue. In many respects, the way we position ourselves on immigration will determine whether we retain the mantle of majority leadership. What side of history do conservatives want to be on? Will we remain a movement that governs -- that offers practical solutions to the problems facing the country?

Conservatives have always prided themselves on acknowledging, in the words of John Adams, that "Facts are stubborn things." Well, immigration -- both the robust annual flow required to keep our economy growing and the 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country -- is a fact of life in the U.S. today. And the only practical way to deal with these stubborn realities is with a comprehensive solution, one that includes border security, interior enforcement, a guest worker program and status for the illegal immigrants already here.

Some counsel that Congress should start with tougher enforcement and border security, but wait to create a guest worker program or address the illegal population. Only that way, it is said, can we avoid the mistakes of the failed 1986 immigration reform.

But in fact, the lesson of 1986 is that only a comprehensive solution will fix our broken immigration system.

The 1986 legislation combined amnesty for three million illegal immigrants with a promise of tougher enforcement, particularly in the workplace. But the law did not recognize the need for future immigration to meet the demands of a growing economy, and the new enforcement never materialized. The result? Twenty years later, illegal immigration is unabated. Why? Because while immigrants continue to be drawn to the jobs created by our economy, they have no legal way to enter the country.

What this history teaches is that the only way to control immigration is with a combination package -- securing the border, enforcing the law in the workplace and creating legal channels for workers to enter the country.

Our past experience with guest worker programs bears this out. Illegal immigration reached a peak in the mid-'50s, and more than a million people were apprehended trying to cross the border in 1954. Then Congress expanded the Bracero work-visa program, creating a way for 300,000 immigrants to enter the U.S. legally each year.

The result? This new legal flow replaced the old illegal influx, and by 1964, INS apprehensions had dropped to fewer than 100,000. As the Congressional Research Service noted in 1980, "Without question, the Bracero program was . . . instrumental in ending the illegal alien problem of the mid-1940s and 1950s." The Bracero program and the 1986 failure point in the same direction: A comprehensive solution is the only real and lasting way to address immigration.

The American people intuitively understand this, which is why, in poll after poll, they choose a comprehensive approach over one that relies on enforcement alone. A recent NBC/Wall Street Journal poll found that Americans prefer a comprehensive plan to an enforcement-only proposal by 50% to 33%.

Of course, there are things in the Senate bill that need fixing -- and conservatives must stand strong in favor of assimilation. New immigrants need to learn English, U.S. history and the values that have made this country great.

But let us remember the counsel of the great conservative standard-bearer, Ronald Reagan, who was in favor of strong borders -- he once remarked that "a nation without borders is not really a nation" -- but also constantly reminded us that America must remain a "beacon" and a "shining city on a hill" for immigrants who continually renew our great country with their energy and add to the nation's economic growth and prosperity. Reagan was right. We need to do both things -- secure the borders and allow for sensible levels of safe, open, lawful immigration.

Americans and immigrants share the same values of work and opportunity. There is no reason to fear the newcomers arriving on our shores today -- if anything, they will energize what is best about our country.

The best way -- the only way -- to realize President Reagan's vision is through comprehensive immigration reform legislation. We urge the House and Senate to work out their differences and meet the demand of the American people that we act on this critical issue in a comprehensive way.

Day Laborers, Silent And Despised, Find Their Voice (NYT)

By Lawrence Downes

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038871

Illegal immigrants are a diverse bunch. There are about 12 million in this country, working in all industries and living in a range from middle class to working poor to something well below that. They are mostly Latino, but are Asian, African and Eastern European, too. The illegal Irish get a lot of press, but are just one tiny subset, a green sprig of parsley in the melting pot.

Of all these ethnic and economic subgroups, the one I find most compelling is the quiet one at the bottom: the Latino day laborers, the street-corner guys.

They are not the largest group, but they are the most visible, most vulnerable and most hated. They are also the least likely to get anything good out of the immigration bills now festering in Congress.

It takes nothing from the punishing toil of farm workers, hotel maids, wilderness firefighters and chicken processors to say that day laborers occupy a position of particular risk and hardship in these times of immigration panic.

They are silent and anonymous, but painfully exposed. They are jeered by suburbanites, harassed by Minuteman vigilantes and hounded by communities with police crackdowns, anti-loitering statutes and mass evictions. Contractors cheat them. People beat them up and firebomb their homes.

The possibility of being victimized without sympathy or a safety net is, of course, the risk one takes when entering this country illegally.

Day laborers are acutely aware of this and have set out to improve things on their own. In a development that may surprise those who see day laborers as immigration at its chaotic worst, this ad hoc phenomenon is shaping itself up.

Through a growing national network of job centers and hiring halls, day laborers are organizing, finding allies and pressing for better treatment.

They are energized by a sense that hard work and suffering are antidotes to shame, and that even the shunned and excluded can push back.

A coalition of worker groups around the country founded the National Day Laborer Organizing Network in 2000 to press for its members' rights. At a national conference last year at Hofstra University on Long Island, delegates from 12 states met to share strategies.

In many areas, laborers have formed de facto unions, refusing to work for less than $10 an hour. In places that have tried to force them out, like Redondo Beach, Calif., and Mamaroneck, N.Y., workers and their allies have filed federal lawsuits on First Amendment grounds.

The National Day Laborer Organizing Network is forging alliances with organized labor, like the Laborers' International Union of North America, which represents 700,000 construction workers, to fight for hiring sites and safer working conditions.

The immigration bills languishing in Congress offer very little promise for day laborers. Even the most generous legislation denies a path to legal status for the newest immigrants and those who can't prove steady employment, which leaves many day laborers out of luck.

The day laborers' group held a forum in a Manhattan church basement recently to discuss the bills, and the general mood was pessimistic. Members spoke of a disconnect between grass-roots organizations like theirs and the large immigrant-advocacy groups in Washington. They had little good to say about the Senate bill, which has been held up by many immigrant advocates as the best deal obtainable.

Such resentment may sound out of place for people who broke the law to get here. But while day laborers may be the most loathed illegal immigrants, you could also call them the least illegal. They don't misrepresent their identities as they contract independently for jobs off the books. They don't steal Social Security numbers or submit false work papers. They just work.

Members of the day laborers' network talk about ways their organization and other grass-roots groups would make their case to a public that isn't buying it. They have begun a hearts-and-minds campaign, seeking to win friends by cleaning up parks and highways while building up political clout with lobbying and protests.

But even if they can pull it off, the odds are against the strategy working. It's been hard enough getting the country behind even limited immigration reform.

If and when Congress ever gets around to fixing immigration, the illegal immigrants who benefit — if any — will be the ones seen as the worthiest, most promising and least threatening.

DOJ_NMG_0038872

There will be no room for those at the margins, and that, practically by definition, is where the day laborers are — waiting, and working.

One Race, and Cheney Is Hooked

He's been to only one NASCAR race--the July 1 Pepsi 400 at Daytona--but already we hear that Vice President Dick Cheney is digging the noise and grime. So did it make him a fan? "He is now," says spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride. Before helping start the race, Cheney visited with the teams sponsored by the Army, National Guard, and Air Force. But the veep hasn't slapped a driver's number on his limo yet. "It may take a few more races before he has a favorite," says McBride. He left the race early but caught Tony Stewart's win on Air Force 2's TV.

TAX:

Concealed Sums Part Of Charges Against Attorney Yagman (LAW)

By Amanda Bronstad, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, July 10, 2006

While recent tax evasion charges brought against civil rights attorney Stephen Yagman are based largely on expenditures related to his personal lifestyle, federal prosecutors have accused him of concealing money he received as a principal of his Venice, Calif.-based law firm, now called Yagman & Yagman & Reichmann.

On June 23, prosecutors unsealed an indictment that charged Yagman with one count of tax evasion, one count of bankruptcy fraud and 17 counts of money laundering. Prosecutors allege that Yagman failed to pay more than $158,000 in federal income taxes to the Internal Revenue Service and hid assets from trustees overseeing bankruptcies filed on behalf of himself and his former law firm, Yagman & Yagman.

Yagman is best known for filing numerous lawsuits against the top officials of various law enforcement agencies, particularly in Los Angeles. In recent years, Yagman has sought to bring disciplinary action against U.S. District Judge Manuel Real of the Central District of California in a case closely watched by judges nationwide.

Yagman alleges that Real, who was handling a loan fraud case involving a woman under probation, made improper rulings as part of her separate bankruptcy case. After dismissing Yagman's case twice, Mary Schroeder, chief judge of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, recently appointed a special committee to investigate the charges.

In a prepared statement issued the day of the indictment, Yagman's lawyer, Barry Tarlow, a partner at Tarlow & Berk in Los Angeles, said that Yagman is targeted because of the numerous cases he has successfully brought against government agencies, including one of the first federal suits filed on behalf of a detainee at the prison camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. He did not return calls seeking further comment.

"Stephen's zealous and effective advocacy for poor and unpopular clients and against the government has earned him either praise or scorn, depending upon whether or not one believes that the government and police never can do wrong," said former U.S. Magistrate Judge Joseph Reichmann, who works with Yagman at his law firm. He added in a statement that Yagman "would not intentionally commit a crime."

The indictment alleges that Yagman "made numerous material misrepresentations and omissions to the personal and corporate bankruptcy trustees concerning the cases his law corporation and law partnership were handling, the status of those cases, and the receipt of settlement funds in those cases."

In 1999, Yagman filed for Chapter 7 personal bankruptcy protection.

At that time, he had just filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy protection on behalf of Yagman & Yagman and formed his current firm, which includes his ex-wife Marion Yagman and Reichmann.

DOJ_NMG_0038873

He also had just completed a year's suspension from the practice of law for collecting exorbitant fees, the second time since being admitted by the State Bar of California in 1976. Now, legal fees, and other income he received for his work as a lawyer, are significant subjects in the government's indictment.

$1.4M ALLEGEDLY UNDISCLOSED

Specifically, Yagman failed to disclose as part of his law firm's bankruptcy about $1.4 million in attorney fees, including his personal share of $500,000, from the settlements of cases pending at the time, the indictment says.

In 1998, he allegedly opened a corporate bank account in order to hide about $581,000 in assets from the Internal Revenue Service, including three settlement checks from the city of Los Angeles totaling more than $175,000. He also used a brokerage account under his girlfriend's name to pay legal bills and make loans to his law firm, the indictment alleges.

Prosecutors also allege that he received a $125,000 bank check in 1999 from a client a few weeks after his law firm filed for bankruptcy protection. He failed to disclose the check, or his $50,000 share of the fees, as part of his personal bankruptcy.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Portman Expects Decrease In Deficit (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

The economy and federal revenues are growing at such a rapid rate that the deficit will shrink in the short term, President Bush's chief budget official says, while adding that keeping the deficit in control will depend in the long run on reform of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

Rob Portman, a former congressman and U.S. trade representative whom Mr. Bush tapped two months ago to be director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), said the president's economic policies have led to exceptional economic growth, which has in turn led to bulging federal receipts.

Mr. Portman will deliver the annual mid-session budget review this week, detailing progress on spending and revenues, and he told The Washington Times in a recent interview that tax revenues are expected to show at least double-digit growth in the year to date compared with fiscal year 2005.

The Congressional Budget Office on Friday said federal revenue is running 12.8 percent ahead of the figures at the same time last year. The double-digit increase is the second-highest growth rate in the last 25 years, following only 2005's increase of 15 percent.

With federal spending up 8.6 percent to date compared with 2005, the deficit should be at least $50 billion less than last year, though Mr. Portman said that depends on keeping the spending side under control.

Mr. Bush has set a goal of halving the deficit by 2009 compared with 2004, which finished with a $412 billion deficit. He and congressional Republicans have made the nation's recent economic growth one of the twin pillars, along with the war on terror, of their election-year campaign.

Mr. Portman said the revenue is so strong that if it were to continue, it could play a major role in helping ease the budget deficit.

"You can grow out of it short-term; it's theoretically possible," Mr. Portman said, though he cautioned that he's not predicting that will happen, particularly with long-term challenges of Social Security and Medicare still looming.

As the administration's new OMB director, Mr. Portman, who served 13 years as a congressman from Ohio, said Republicans deserve more credit than they are getting among voters for restraining spending.

"It's amazing. For the first time since 1997, last year Congress actually reduced the growth of entitlement spending," he said.

Mr. Portman also said the deficit as a percentage of total economic output, or the gross domestic product, is falling, both because of spending restraint and economic growth, and said Republicans are not getting enough credit for controlling spending.

DOJ_NMG_0038874

"If you take out defense, if you take out homeland security, which increased just above inflation, last year you actually had a slight cut and a little bit of progress on entitlements," he said. "We're actually making some progress on spending."

He blamed high-profile spending projects such as the "bridge to nowhere" for making the public so pessimistic about spending, and said that's one reason the president is pushing so hard for a legislative line-item veto.

"It encourages people to focus early on in the process on whether this particular project or tax relief or spending is appropriate," Mr. Portman said.

The House passed a version of the line-item veto last month, and the Senate may debate it later this month.

Unlike the 1996 version, which the Supreme Court ruled unconstitutional, this version would not be an actual veto. Instead, after signing a spending or tax bill, the president would send another bill back to Congress that calls for specific items to be cut, and Congress would have a set period of time to vote on the bill.

As a former congressman, Mr. Portman knows the key legislators and said he has had some success convincing them the administration would use the line-item veto carefully, and not as a club to bash Congress.

He also said some of the chairmen on the spending subcommittees realize the line-item veto would help steel them against some spending requests.

"Instead of the chairman saying, 'I don't like your idea,' he can say, 'Look, if you put it in my bill it's going to get held up to public scrutiny and The Washington Times is going to be writing about it. Do you want it on the front page of The Washington Times?'" Mr. Portman said. "It's a tool that some of them, I think, understand they can use to better legislate."

GOP 'Values' Agenda Stumbles (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

Could a Republican-controlled Congress pass a bill to protect the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance from court challenges?

No problem, especially if proposed during the patriotic season leading up to the Fourth of July, Republican leaders thought.

No way, it turned out.

The bill, the first item on the Republican Party's trumpeted election-year "American Values Agenda," could not make it past a House committee.

Even worse for the Republicans was that they could not blame Democrats. One of the party's very own, Rep. Bob Inglis of South Carolina, voted no. Seven other Republicans skipped the Judiciary Committee meeting entirely.

So it goes this year for House Republicans, their majority in jeopardy for the first time in more than a decade.

"We're not having trouble," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio said. "This is your typical legislative meat grinder."

But privately, many are frustrated. Democrats have pounced on the lack of progress with a "we can do better" election theme.

"I wish the election were today," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California said last week.

An election-year session of Congress with little major legislation turned into laws is nothing new. Lawmakers traditionally are loath to vote on contentious legislation so close to the start of campaigning.

For some, debating proposals that have little chance of passage is a legitimate process.

"Passing bills isn't the end-all and be-all of Congress," said Brian Darling of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. "There's also some value in debating these issues and using Congress to air out issues that are important to the American people."

Democrats ridicule as political ploys Republican decisions to bring up legislation doomed to fail, such as the constitutional amendments to ban flag desecration.

Republicans say Democrats are not above bringing up proposals just for political gain. They note that Democrats have insisted on bringing up a proposal to raise the minimum wage, which has failed for nine years.

DOJ_NMG_0038875

With two-thirds of the 2006 legislative calendar over, Congress has passed and sent President Bush only two major pieces of legislation. One renewed the terrorist-fighting USA Patriot Act; the other extended $70 billion in tax cuts, roughly divided evenly between investors and middle-income families.

The legislative year is littered with failed or stalled Republican priorities. Some -- such as overhauling immigration, repealing estate taxes and changing rules on lobbying in response to several ethics scandals -- are disappointments for many in the Republican Party and for Mr. Bush.

The overhaul of immigration laws has become an implacable dispute about whether to give most of the nation's 10 million to 12 million illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship.

Rather than spend the summer resolving differences between the House and Senate versions, their chief patrons scheduled new hearings to shore up their arguments, with no resolution in sight.

Space Shuttle Declared Safe For Return (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

HOUSTON, July 9 -- Space shuttle Discovery cleared a major safety hurdle Sunday for reentry, but the attention both aloft and on the ground appeared at times to focus more on the World Cup soccer final than on space travel.

NASA engineers completed their exhaustive analysis of three remaining "areas of concern" on Discovery's heat shielding and "cleared" all of them, said John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team.

"I'm pleased and proud," added Steve Poulos, chief of the shield review and manager of the Orbiter Project Office. "Not only did my team pound these issues flat, we put a dimple in the board."

By clearing the heat shield, NASA essentially gave Discovery a green light for reentry next Monday.

The inspection system was put in place after space shuttle Columbia disintegrated on reentry in 2003 because its heat shield was fatally damaged on launch.

The crews of Discovery and the international space station spent most of Sunday unloading equipment and supplies, and preparing for a spacewalk Monday to finish repairs on the station's mobile tramway.

But even with a full schedule, mission Commander Steven W. Lindsey conceded during a news conference early in the day that, after a "hectic" beginning to the mission, the shuttle astronauts and space station crew members might take something of a breather Sunday.

In response to a question from the news service Agence France-Presse, space station crewman Thomas Reiter, a German national, acknowledged that "we are very interested" in the day's soccer match between France and Italy to decide the World Cup.

"Piers Sellers and I will definitely want to know what the result is," Reiter said, adding enigmatically, "We're backing different teams."

The English-born Sellers, Discovery's lead spacewalker, then betrayed his support for France by shouting out, "To Zinedine Zidane, Thierry [Henry] and Patrick [Vieira]! Good luck!"

Asked later by German journalists to pick a favorite, Reiter ducked the question, hoping diplomatically for "a good game."

At halftime, Canadian astronaut Julie Payette, on duty at Mission Control in Houston as space shuttle communicator, told the astronauts that the score was tied 1-1, incurring the wrath of flight control team members around her who were taping the game to view later.

Payette later delivered an update. No change, she said, "but I have to be careful when I read up the score."

Ten minutes later, Russian Mission Control radioed space station Commander Pavel Vinogradov that "everybody is waiting for prime time to be over and overtime to start."

When the match ended, with Italy the victor, the new shuttle communicator, astronaut Lee Archambault, sent the result to Lindsey.

Archambault told the astronauts that "you guys are rock stars" in Berlin, where part of the morning news conference played on Olympic Stadium's big screen before the match.

DOJ_NMG_0038876

"It was probably Thomas," Lindsey deadpanned. "We try to keep Piers off the downlink."

Space Shuttle Cleared To Return Home (AP)

By Seth Borenstein

AP, July 10, 2006

Space shuttle Discovery's astronauts got some happy news Sunday: It's safe to fly home. Mission Control informed the crew of six that the ship's thermal shielding is "100 percent cleared for entry" in another week.

"Boy, that is great news, that's fantastic," shuttle commander Steve Lindsey said. "And to get all that done by the day of flight day six ... is just amazing."

"Everyone here around the room, as you can imagine, is most happy," Mission Control replied.

Only one heat shield issue remained going into the late afternoon mission management meeting — a 2-inch-long piece of fabric filler sticking out about an inch from thermal tiles on Discovery's belly. Engineers determined it wasn't necessary to have an astronaut pluck the strip out during a spacewalk and that it posed no concern for the spaceship's return to Earth on July 17. So managers gave the heat shield an official bill of health.

Officials had already decided that several other nicks and spots — ranging from bird droppings to frayed fabric — were no big deal.

Deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team, said the healthy shuttle — and the crew's accomplishments in orbit so far — pave the way for the next mission in just over 1 1/2 months. That's when assembly will resume at the international space station; construction was halted by the 2003 Columbia disaster.

Sandwiched between a daring spacewalk Saturday and a crucial but more routine spacewalk Monday, Discovery's crew had an easy day Sunday, said pilot Mark Kelly. They were scheduled to work only 15 hours, instead of 16 hours.

"Today has been a relatively light day compared to the others," Kelly said in the news conference. Those first five days of the mission were so busy "we had to take our meals on the run," Lindsey said.

Saturday's spacewalk, during which astronauts Piers Sellers and Michael Fossum stood on the end of 100 feet of sometimes-oscillating shuttle robotic arm and extension boom, proved that emergency shuttle repair work can be done from that unusual vantage point, the astronauts said. But they said the feeling of being out there at the end of the boom was a little unusual.

"You find yourself lying sideways when you think you're standing up," Sellers said. "It's an unnatural feeling, but not really very unpleasant."

The second spacewalk, which begins at 8:13 a.m. EDT Monday, is much like past international space station repair spacewalks. The bulk of the scheduled 6 1/2-hour spacewalk will concentrate on finishing repairs on the station's railcar-like mobile transporter. This is a crucial piece of the station that slides back and forth, helping in the expansion of the outpost.

"We need that thing to be working to move big pieces around during assembly," Sellers said Sunday. "It was dead on one side, kind of limping on just two wheels."

Sellers and Fossum will replace part of the transporter's umbilical reel, which weighs about 330 pounds on the ground. In what may be an awkward maneuver, Sellers will be holding the old umbilical in one hand and the new one in the other, Fossum said.

"The most challenging thing tomorrow is going to be just the choreography, going back and forth in the payload bay," Fossum said. "It's quite a ballet."

NASA planned to post on its Web site Sunday first-of-its-kind video of Discovery's launch as seen from the reusable solid rocket boosters. The video, recovered last week with the boosters, mesmerized engineers in Houston on Saturday.

Research Shifts At Space Station (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

When the international space station was initially proposed by President Ronald Reagan, its central mission was conceived as providing the most innovative and unusual research center that mankind had ever created. Orbiting 250 miles above Earth, the station would be a laboratory for developing medicines, for learning how single cells, plants and animals adapt to life in space, and for discovering technologies for processing metals and other materials in a gravity-free environment.

Twenty-two years later, the space station is half-built and can carry out some experiments, but the U.S. view of its science mission has greatly changed. The primary U.S. goal is no longer basic research, but to support President Bush's initiative of manned missions to the moon and to Mars by learning about how astronauts can live for long periods in space.

The morphing of the space station's role has not been without controversy. Some scientists fret that critical research in medicine and on atmospheric change is being de-emphasized in favor of splashy projects that will have little earthly benefit.

Much of U.S. research is focused on the rigors of living long term in zero gravity and with constant bombardment from solar radiation -- among the greatest hazards faced by crews traveling in deeper space.

"As it was originally planned, the space station would be a facility for all users," said Donald A. Thomas, NASA's space station program scientist. "Any scientist with an interesting experiment to do -- combustion and fluid scientists, plant and cell scientists, crystal growers -- they could all come to NASA, and we would try to accommodate them. But our cutbacks and refocusing have changed that."

So instead of learning how a particular gas or cell behaves in space, NASA's scientific effort is directed toward such problems as how to keep kidney stones from developing in astronauts and how to use long-distance ultrasound technology to diagnose stones if they develop. Avoiding bone and muscle loss is also a high priority, as are learning why immune systems of astronauts tend to deteriorate and how to stop that.

This refocusing does not mean basic science on the space station has ended or that planning for more elaborate and dramatic research is over. Rather, NASA's partners in the space station -- most notably Japan, 11 European nations and Canada -- will do substantial research of their own.

By the end of next year, the Japanese-developed science module Kibo and the European-built Columbus module are scheduled to be in place at the station, and both will be filled with basic research experiments. "They've gone ahead with their programs pretty much unchanged, so they'll be doing what we initially planned to do," Thomas said.

The Japanese program will focus on collecting information about trace chemicals in the atmosphere that might be associated with ozone depletion or global warming, and on the effects of weightlessness on a broad range of living things. It will also send up the world's largest wide-angle X-ray camera for use in examining very deep space.

The Columbus module, developed and manufactured by the European Space Agency, will also focus on basic biological and earth sciences research -- with experiments such as assessing the ability of bacteria to survive on an artificial meteorite and looking at volcanic activity far below Earth's surface.

Because U.S. space shuttles will carry much of the big equipment to the station, American researchers in return get room on the research modules and some access to the experiments of other nations. But to many scientists in this country, the shift in emphasis from research to furthering space travel is misguided.

A 2005 report from the National Academy of Sciences reflected that concern, with the panel worried that U.S. objectives "no longer include the fundamental biological and physical research that had been a major focus of [space station] planning since its inception. In addition to increasing fundamental scientific understanding, much of that research was intended to have eventual terrestrial applications in medicine and industry."

Without greater support, the panel concluded, the scientists who came together to work on space station experiments will soon be lost.

Even if U.S. science policy had not changed, however, it would be difficult to maintain an active research program on the station. It has housed only two or three crew members since the demise of the shuttle Columbia in 2003, and experts say it takes two people just to keep the space station operative. One of the astronauts who just arrived on space shuttle Discovery, Thomas Reiter of Germany, will remain at the station in the hope that a three-person crew can do more scientific work.

Despite the cutbacks and disappointments, NASA's Thomas said more than 100 journal articles have been published based on space station data. He said researchers have made important discoveries by growing protein crystals in space that could not be grown on Earth -- research that could lead to new drugs. Research into the nature of vibrations only possible in space, he said, could have implications for better understanding earthquakes and for protecting buildings against them.

He also said he was excited by the presence of bowling-ball-size satellites at the space station -- battery- and gas-powered units that astronauts are learning to control and perhaps will someday use on missions. Thomas said that a second mini-satellite was ferried up by Discovery and that crew members will work on synchronizing its movement in tandem with the other. A third satellite is expected up soon.

Thomas said that the satellites are largely sponsored by the Defense Department, but that NASA has some use of them and is excited about the possibilities. If the three can be controlled, he said, they could be the prototype for a free-flying space telescope.

"To be able to test them in the space station, where there's zero gravity but where they can't fly away, is an enormous plus," he said.

USO Volunteer Gets Salute From Commander In Chief (CHIT)

By Andrew L. Wang

Chicago Tribune, July 7, 2006

Dave Kruger is used to welcoming raw military recruits and career soldiers at the United Service Organizations center at O'Hare International Airport.

On Thursday evening, he was there to greet someone slightly higher up the ladder: the commander in chief of the United States, President Bush, who presented Kruger with the President's Volunteer Service Award.

When he heard earlier this week that he would meet Bush as the president arrived for a two-day visit to Chicago, "[I] choked up. My eyes started watering," Kruger said. "I just thought being put in for [the award] was an honor."

At their brief meeting, Kruger wished the president, who turned 60 on Thursday, a happy birthday and asked after his father. Bush thanked him for his service, Kruger said.

Kruger, of north suburban Lindenhurst, first volunteered about two years ago. A veteran who saw Bob Hope perform on a 1966 tour in Vietnam, he knew the effect the USO could have on military morale.

And though he was a longtime donor to the group, he wanted to do more. Not sure how he could help, he called the USO center at O'Hare. "I told the manager the only thing is, I can't sing or dance," he said, chuckling. "That's what I thought they were looking for in volunteers."

He was assured that the responsibilities entailed serving food and drinks at the center and guiding military personnel around O'Hare's labyrinthine terminals.

He started out working one Sunday a month, but soon he was also heading to the USO at Great Lakes Naval Station in North Chicago, where he asked the manager, Beth Piccolo, if she needed any help.

Being the only paid staffer there, she did.

Now Kruger volunteers about 27 hours a week, Friday through Sunday, and sometimes stops by to help after he gets off work as a shipping scheduler at a Wheeling manufacturing plant.

He delivers food from the grocery, does odd jobs around the office for Piccolo and serves food when naval recruits at the base come in. In two years Kruger has volunteered more than 1,300 hours, Piccolo said.

"Dave is like my right arm," she said. "I need him."

But more than dishing out pizza, sandwiches, cookies and hot dogs, Kruger cherishes being a part of the lives of his "extended family," the servicemen and women he meets.

A few months ago, one Friday night at O'Hare, a naval recruit walked into Kruger's post.

The tears in his eyes foretold the story: He had just flown in from a far-flung corner of Montana, where he had spent several days on emergency leave.

His mother had died, he told Kruger.

"I went around the counter and hugged him, and he said he was just so happy to have someone to talk to about it," Kruger said.

On Monday, Kruger got an e-mail from a ship in the Atlantic. It was Shane, the sailor he had comforted, writing that he had just visited Spain and asked his sweetheart to marry him.

The wedding is slated for next year. Kruger hopes to be there.

Losing And Not Knowing It (TH)

By Robert D. Novak

TownHall.com, July 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- Lindsey Graham is no less independent and outspoken as a first-term senator from South Carolina than he was during eight tempestuous years in the House. He also is a golfer, and uses a metaphor from the links to describe his political discomfort. His fellow Republicans remind him of a tournament golfer who ignores the leader board and thinks he is ahead going into the 17th and 18th holes, when he really is trailing.

"It's like we think we'll get by with pars on the last two holes when we really need birdies," Graham told me. He referred to the 2006 midterm election, where he sees a real danger of Republicans losing control of both houses in Congress for the first time since the 1992 elections. Such foreboding reflects Graham's fear that demographic changes in America will extend beyond this year's elections and return the Republican Party to minority status.

Sen. John McCain, center, R-Ariz., fields questions from reporters as he arrives Thursday, June 29, 2006, for a fundraiser for the South Carolina Republican Party. McCain, mulling a 2008 presidential bid, gathered with two of his closest South Carolina allies, Gov. Mark Sanford, left, and Sen. Lindsey Graham, right. South Carolina traditionally holds the first Republican presidential primary in the South. (AP Photo/Mary Ann Chastain) Graham's remedy to avert both short-term and long-term disaster stresses Republicans returning to fiscal integrity by seriously cutting spending -- a goal to which his GOP colleagues give lip service. He also advocates policies on entitlements, the environment and immigration that he feels are necessary for the party's health but find little Republican support on Capitol Hill and only mixed backing at the White House.

It is not merely lack of enthusiasm for Graham's agenda. Since talking to the senator, I have tested his theories with a dozen prominent Republicans. All feel the tide has turned for them over the last month. Each of them claims that the American voter will stick with the Republicans after taking a good look at Democrats, a mindset that often is a precursor of defeat. To follow Graham's metaphor, perhaps they are not reading the real leader board of American politics.

Republicans surely seem to need some birdies to keep Senate seats in 2006. Rick Santorum remains far behind in Pennsylvania. Conrad Burns is in trouble in Montana. Jim Talent trails in Missouri. Mike DeWine is threatened by a noxious Republican atmosphere in Ohio. Lincoln Chafee is endangered in Democratic Rhode Island. Jon Kyl faces a surprisingly tough race in Arizona. Despite excellent candidates in Minnesota and Washington state, no Republican challenging for a Democratic-held Senate seat is in the lead. Thus, a six-seat takeover capturing the Senate is possible.

This is of special concern for Republicans because the third of Senate seats contested in 2006 is more favorable to their party than what will follow. The long-term outlook troubles Graham, who sees a bleak Republican future north of the Mason-Dixon Line. Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins in Maine and Arlen Specter in Pennsylvania may be the last Republican senators from their states. The rising Hispanic-American population not only has transformed California into a Democratic state; freshman Democratic Sen. Ken Salazar looks like the new political face of Colorado, and Arizona is no longer safe for Kyl conservatives.

These demographic changes suggest an end to the gradual political realignment that began in the late '60s and produced consistent electoral success for Republicans. As a South Carolinian, Graham must worry about his party suffering the fate of Democrats in the '20s. Democrats elected only 20 House members and won no presidential electoral votes outside Southern and border states in 1920.

Accordingly, Graham is one conservative Republican who supports President Bush on immigration. He and Bush advisers agree that the immigration hard line may alienate the Hispanic vote with disastrous consequences. But Graham has little backing at the White House for a softened party line on global warming and entitlement reform that includes greater contributions by upper-income Americans.

Graham sees the highest Republican priority as controlling federal spending. He proposes renewing the campaign for a constitutional amendment mandating a balanced budget, backed up by self-restraint on earmarks. That agenda evokes limited applause in party circles. Sophisticates in Washington roll their eyes over constitutional limits on spending. Sens. John McCain and Tom Coburn have not made friends by fighting earmarks. After all, why should Republicans clap if they think they are ahead going into the last two holes?

OTHER NEWS:

Commercial Real Estate Maintains Its Strength Despite A Cooling Housing Market (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

With America's housing market clearly cooling, will commercial real estate start to swoon?

Hardly. The national office market, which cratered after the tech bust in 2000, has recovered and is the strongest it has been in five years. The shopping-mall market has stayed strong because consumer spending held up better than expected. And hotels had their most profitable year ever in 2005, partly because of strong business travel.

In fact, the commercial markets benefited from the former froth in the residential-property market because the boom in residential construction limited the amount of land that could be used for other purposes. In some markets, the conversion of apartments, hotels and, to a lesser extent, office buildings, into condominiums reduced the risk of oversupply -- one of the biggest hazards in commercial real estate and one that contributed to the sector's crash in the late 1980s.

Despite the widely varying types of commercial properties -- and the fact they are partly driven by different factors -- it isn't uncommon for people to assume if houses aren't selling, commercial markets must be at risk, too. So common that the faulty assumption itself could be self-fulfilling, says Robert White Jr., president of Real Capital Analytics, a New York-based real-estate information firm. "I so worry...that if they get burned on their condo in Miami, they are going to stay away from any other commercial real-estate investments for the next decade. Those markets are completely different."

Home-ownership trends are tied directly to income and interest rates, says Glenn Mueller, an investment strategist for Dividend Capital Group, a Denver-based real-estate investment-management firm. And home buying was made unusually affordable in the past few years by low interest rates and the popularity of mortgage-financing options such as interest-only loans. This led to high demand, much speculation and lots of new building. But as interest rates began to rise, it became more difficult for people to afford or even to qualify for loans. That has produced a glut of homes and condos in some markets.

Of course, interest rates affect commercial mortgages as well. Cheap debt has been one reason why there have been so many bidders on the commercial buildings sold over the past few years, pushing prices to record levels and yields to unprecedented lows.

Unlike the residential market, in which investors are most often private individuals, commercial investors are more diverse and not nearly as tied to mortgage rates. Dr. Mueller also points out that some of these investors include institutional buyers such as pension funds that pay cash instead of borrowing money. There's also still strong demand for commercial real estate, particularly among foreign investors. "We just don't see any slowing of investor interest, particularly in retail and hotels," says Deborah Jackson, executive managing director of New York-based Weiser Realty Advisors LLC.

In addition to condo conversions helping to reduce the supply of office space outright, residential construction has contributed to the high cost of land and materials in many U.S. markets. In many cases, because of high construction costs, it was cheaper to buy an office building -- even at high prices -- than to build a new one. Without much new speculative development, vacancy rates have dropped in almost every major market and landlords have been able to get more for rents.

DOJ_NMG_0038881

In Miami, for example, residential units in the central business district increased 55% since 2000, while the office increase was 9.5%, according to Jones Lang LaSalle, a real-estate services firm. Even if developers contemplated a new office building, the construction companies were likely tied up with residential jobs until recently, says Jubeen Vaghefi, a Miami-based managing director for Jones Lang LaSalle. All the while, the South Florida economy has been steadily improving. Those forces combined to boost the office market there.

To be sure, the office recovery is uneven. Longtime struggling office markets such as Dallas, while improving, still have high vacancy rates from previous overbuilding, as do areas such as Cleveland and Detroit, where job growth has been limited.

Real estate also remains a cyclical industry, and it is early in the office sector's recovery. Investors who paid sky-high prices for commercial buildings, especially those who financed using floating-rate debt or interest-only loans in the early years, are dependent on their optimistic growth projections to deliver.

Yet, with generally improving fundamentals such as reduced vacancy and higher rents and few worries about overbuilding in most markets, the office sector should continue to improve in the near term, if job growth doesn't take a dive. "We're still in that race between increasing interest rates and increasing fundamentals," Stephen Blank, senior resident fellow of finance with the Urban Land Institute, says of the commercial market. "It appears to me that we are going to skate through this."

$2 Million Payment To Former Lobbyist Raises Eyebrows (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

You've probably never heard of Jeffrey S. Shockey. So, for simplicity's sake, think of him as the Two Million Dollar Man.

The 40-year-old congressional staffer last year collected nearly $2 million in severance payments from his former employer, a lobbying firm that specializes in winning benefits from the committee he now serves. Many longtime Washingtonians are shaking their heads in disbelief over the payout's enormous size, its ad hoc method of calculation and the fact that Shockey received it while working as a senior congressional aide.

No wonder Americans hate the nation's capital. Federal employees are prohibited from supplementing their incomes with money from private sources, especially from lobbyists who have business before the government. Shockey says his payment was justified and within the rules. But experienced lobbyists around town question both its economics and its propriety.

The situation is an example of a common occurrence -- the spinning of the "revolving door" between the public and private sectors. Shockey is deputy chief of staff of the powerful House Appropriations Committee. Before that he was a partner for five years in a lobbying firm that made its living extracting goodies from the same committee. And before that he worked for Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), who was then a member of the committee and is now its chairman.

Along the way, Shockey made millions. As a lobbyist in 2004 he earned $2 million, which is double what the city's top lobbyists were said to earn just a few years ago. Shockey, in fact, was on track to make $3 million in 2005, the year he returned to government as the No. 2 staffer for the Appropriations Committee.

Lobby shops often give parting gifts to colleagues who go into public service as a way to maintain strong relations. But the amount tends to be nominal and strictly tied to past performance to avoid even the appearance of paying a federal official in exchange for favorable treatment -- an exchange that would be illegal.

Why, then, would Shockey's former firm pay him so much? The reason, several seasoned lobbyists speculated, must have been the firm's desire to keep its communications with Shockey and the appropriations panel absolutely seamless. "There would be no need to pay out that amount of money unless you needed to maintain a superlative relationship with that person after he leaves," one veteran lobbyist said.

Spokesmen for Shockey's old firm say the company already had deep connections with Lewis and didn't need any more. Still, who can blame skeptics for thinking that $2 million might buy more than merely goodwill?

Congressional appropriators like Lewis were once hesitant to explicitly fund pet projects for fear of being accused of playing favorites and of micromanaging the government. But that was a long time ago. The Republican Revolution of 1994 ushered in a new congressional majority that professed to be distrustful of government but also worked overtime to maintain its control by directing federal aid into popular programs that would help reelect GOP members.

DOJ_NMG_0038882

Lawmakers were encouraged to earmark billions of dollars for thousands of home-state projects every year as a way to court their constituents. To take advantage of those giveaways, lobbyists increasingly specialized in appropriations work. Shockey and his firm were leaders in the field.

Lobbyists were hired in droves and dozens of them made fortunes, including Shockey. Inundated by requests for earmarks, some congressmen began to rely on their lobbyist friends to help them select which projects to back and to monitor them as they moved through the legislative process. In turn, the lobbyists supplied the congressmen with campaign contributions and other amenities.

Critics decry such mutual back-scratching as incestuous, undemocratic and potentially corrupting. Lobbyists (and their grateful clients) say it's just the way things work in the complicated world of Washington. In any case, it surely was no coincidence that many of Shockey's four dozen clients -- including the city of Redlands and the county of San Bernardino -- were in the southern California district of Shockey's once and current boss.

Shockey's former lobbying firm, now called Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, assisted lots of California-based organizations and municipalities. One of its partners is a former California congressman, Bill Lowery (R), who, like Shockey, is close to Lewis -- so close that federal authorities in Los Angeles have subpoenaed many of the firm's clients to learn more about the relationship of the firm, Lewis and Lowery.

Publicity over the investigation has broken up the partnership. The firm's two Democratic partners, James M. Copeland and Lynnette R. Jacquez, told their Republican colleagues last month that they were leaving. The reason, they said, was that ethical and legal questions threatened to destroy their professional reputations and ruin their commercial prospects. Lewis has denied any wrongdoing, and the firm has said it has complied with all the rules.

Shockey has not received a subpoena. He has been careful to disclose his severance package and has removed himself from dealings with the firm and his former clients.

But several of Washington's prominent lobbyists question the deal. I spent a few days talking to owners and managers of lobbying firms about Shockey's $1.96 million payment. None wanted to be quoted by name for fear of angering Lewis, and many might benefit if Copeland Lowery fails. But they all agreed that the payout was far larger than was common in similar cases.

They also said a transaction that pricey might look like a conflict of interest even if it isn't. And that's a major danger in a political town.

Here's how it came to be:

After Lewis became chairman of the appropriations panel in early 2005, Shockey surprised his partners by announcing that he wanted to return to Capitol Hill. The question then became how much they would pay him for his ownership in the firm.

One answer could have been nothing. Copeland Lowery had no written partnership agreement and functioned under an "eat what you kill" arrangement. That meant its partners kept the revenue they collected from their clients less overhead costs, which were divided among them based on the percentage of total firm revenue that each of them brought in.

In other words, Shockey had already taken out of the firm everything he brought into it. Once the company got current with its receivables and gave Shockey his share, it could well have said goodbye to him and that would have been that.

But Shockey was one of the firm's main breadwinners. According to the firm's lawyers, he presented his partners with an implicit choice. He would recommend that his clients stay with Copeland Lowery in exchange for a severance or he would sell his "book of business" to a competing lobby shop.

So the partners cut him a deal at what they felt was fair market value. They agreed to give him six times the amount that his clients were producing per month at the time of his departure. They removed from their calculation the few clients that Shockey thought would not continue with the firm after he left and came up with roughly $1.5 million. Adding in revenue he was entitled to receive from bills that were still being paid, his severance package totaled $1.96 million, which was paid in installments in 2005.

Outsiders have several concerns about this transaction. One is that lobbying is very personal. When a key lobbyist leaves, his or her clients often bolt. That's why turnovers of business like Shockey's generally produce for the departing lobbyist nothing more than a "finder's fee," if that. Ten top lobbyists I spoke to said that departing partners rarely get more than two or three months' worth of retainers-on-the-books because there isn't any guarantee that their clients will continue with the firm.

Shockey's threat that he would park his clients elsewhere was probably empty because he was not going to go with them.

DOJ_NMG_0038883

These lobbyists also could not understand why Copeland Lowery would shoulder so massive a financial burden. Shockey's payout ate up 26 percent of the firm's 2005 lobbying revenue of $7.4 million, based on the firm's public disclosures. Even if the firm had a 50 percent profit margin (which is possible in lobbying), that would mean that half the partners' earnings went to someone who was no longer there.

I guess keeping appropriators happy is worth an awful lot.

Running Hard, Senate Power Seeks A New Image (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

PITTSBURGH, July 6 — The conservative glory days of 1994, when Rick Santorum roared into the Senate at the age of 36, seem a long time ago as he fights for his political life this year, trying to convince Pennsylvania voters that he has not gone Washington.

Not become part of the establishment he used to rail against.

Not forgotten the kitchen table issues that matter here.

Mr. Santorum, the third-ranking Republican leader in the Senate, distributed a brochure this week as he worked a sweltering round of town hall meetings and Fourth of July parades: "Fifty Things You May Not Know About Rick Santorum." It is filled with what he called meat and potatoes, like his work to expand colon cancer screenings for Medicare beneficiaries (No. 3), or to secure money for "America's first ever coal to ultra-clean fuel plant" (No. 2).

"I can't tell you the number of people who, after having read it, said, 'Gee, I didn't know any of this stuff,' " Mr. Santorum said in an interview in a firehouse in Monroeville, after his 10th event in two days.

Mr. Santorum was a symbol of the conservative movement in its brash youth; now, in many ways, he embodies the movement in middle age, 12 years after taking control of the House and Senate, no longer so confident that the political winds are with it, especially in an anti-incumbent year.

He needs to reintroduce himself over the next four months, he said, to get beyond the stereotypes. "I have to fight against five and a half years of the mainstream media, particularly local press, telling their side of the story," he said.

He said he wanted Pennsylvanians to think of him as a political heir to Alfonse M. D'Amato of New York, who was known as Senator Pothole for being acutely attuned to constituent needs. (Perhaps not the most auspicious role model, since Mr. D'Amato was unseated by an ambitious Democrat, Charles E. Schumer.)

It is a different image from the high-profile conservatism for which Mr. Santorum is so widely known: his impassioned opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage, and his advocacy of private investment accounts in Social Security.

A kinder, gentler Rick Santorum? "People already know about the other stuff," he said. "You guys remind them every day about the other stuff. Let's tell the rest of the story."

The most recent round of independent polls shows that Mr. Santorum is arguably the most endangered senator in the country. Polls show that Robert P. Casey Jr., the state treasurer, holds a comfortable lead over Mr. Santorum — in a Quinnipiac University poll, Mr. Casey is in the lead by 18 points.

Mr. Santorum has insisted that voters do not really know much about Mr. Casey, that some Pennsylvanians actually believe the Democratic candidate is his father, former Gov. Robert P. Casey, who died six years ago.

"This is a guy recruited by the Democrats because he has a good name," Mr. Santorum said, after shaking hands at a Fourth of July fireworks display in Radnor.

Mr. Casey, in an interview, noted that he had run three statewide general election campaigns in recent years and served as state auditor general and treasurer. Moreover, he said, it is "really insulting to the people of Pennsylvania" to suggest that some voters still think he is his father.

Leading pollsters agree on this: The race, so far, is mostly about Mr. Santorum. The Quinnipiac poll found that more than 40 percent of those who said they would vote for Mr. Casey said it was primarily a vote against Mr. Santorum. The senator "appears to be his own worst enemy in his battle for re-election," said Clay F. Richards, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute, which conducted its survey June 13-19 with 1,076 Pennsylvania voters and a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

In the end, Mr. Santorum said, he needs to make this race not a referendum but a choice between "a record of accomplishment and leadership" (Mr. Santorum) and "a guy who's coasted along," is "focused on ambition for the sake of ambition," and is "running for one office after another" (Mr. Casey).

Many here are steeling for an intensely negative campaign, based on this rough calculus: to win, some analysts have said, a polarizing candidate like Mr. Santorum must make his opponent seem an unacceptable choice. And Mr. Santorum has a much bigger war chest to make that case this fall.

It has not been an easy few months for Mr. Santorum. He found himself mired in controversy over his residency in recent weeks, with his detractors highlighting the fact that while he maintains a modest residence in suburban Pittsburgh, his family lives in the Virginia suburbs when the Senate is in session, which is the majority of the year. Critics argued it was not unlike the living arrangements he denounced in his 1990 House race against Representative Doug Walgren, the Democrat he defeated.

Mr. Santorum, then 32 and a quintessential grass-roots insurgent, accused Mr. Walgren of being out of touch with his Pittsburgh-area district, symbolized by his home in the Virginia suburbs.

"He's clearly paying a price for it now in western Pennsylvania," Mr. Walgren said, "because there's a lot of people who remember he was so critical of my having my children in Washington."

Mr. Santorum said the Senate was different from the House, adding that "we just decided I had to have my family here, or I'd never get to see them." He and his wife have six children.

In general, Mr. Santorum dismisses the notion that he has become what he once campaigned against — the Washington establishment.

"I think I've tried to keep my edge," he said. "I get to every county, every year. I work really hard to stay in touch with the people of this state. I don't do a lot of frilly stuff as a member of Congress. I try to be pretty meat and potatoes."

But the Casey campaign has said, relentlessly, that Mr. Santorum has voted with President Bush "98 percent of the time," and that he is a "rubber stamp" for an administration that is decidedly unpopular here. The Casey campaign has portrayed Mr. Santorum as far too close to the K Street lobbying community and far too devoted to a national conservative agenda.

"At some point, he began to spend a lot more time on Washington politics and Republican Party politics and ideology than on Pennsylvania's priorities," Mr. Casey said. "In a nutshell, he's gone Washington."

Veterans of Pennsylvania politics have said Mr. Santorum should not be underestimated. Gov. Edward G. Rendell, a Democrat who campaigned for his own re-election in a parade this week in suburban Glenside, said that while many were "writing Senator Santorum off," inside the state the view was different. Mr. Rendell said, "It's going to be a battle for us, and we know that."

But G. Terry Madonna, who heads the Keystone Poll at Franklin & Marshall College, said Mr. Santorum had been struggling to find political traction, something to move voters. Two of the classic wedge issues — abortion and the rights of gun owners — have been largely neutralized, because Mr. Casey has taken conservative stands on both.

In recent days, Mr. Santorum has been campaigning hard on the immigration issue, denouncing the Senate-passed bill, which has the support of the state's popular senior senator, Arlen Specter, also a Republican. Mr. Santorum's campaign is running television and radio spots on the issue, and made 400,000 phone calls on immigration recently, said his media consultant, John Brabender.

Mr. Santorum argues that the Senate legislation amounts to giving amnesty to illegal immigrants; advocates say it offers only a pathway to citizenship, with many requirements, for those here longest. Mr. Casey said that he would support that bill, if that was his only option, but added that Mr. Santorum "is trying to make it a one-issue campaign on an issue he's done nothing about."

Given his voting record — Congressional Quarterly ratings show he voted with his party 92 percent of the time in 2005 and with Mr. Bush 95 percent of the time — Mr. Santorum's ultimate challenge may come in the Philadelphia suburbs in southeastern Pennsylvania, home to many socially moderate Republicans and independents.

DOJ_NMG_0038885

The "50 Things You May Not Know About Rick Santorum" brochure was recently distributed heavily to that area, with its decidedly moderate spin on Mr. Santorum's record — noting, for example, his work to "battle world AIDS and to help eliminate world poverty, working closely with Bono" (No. 4).

Mr. Santorum walked the entire Fourth of July parade route in wilting heat in one such suburb, Lower Southampton Township, this week.

He was greeted politely, sometimes enthusiastically, while James F. Cawley, a Bucks County commissioner and a Republican, looked on approvingly.

"Rick Santorum never went to Washington and caught Potomac fever," Mr. Cawley insisted. Twelve years after the Republican revolution of 1994, the argument is the same — Mr. Santorum's role is different.

Hillary Clinton Seeks To Woo Wall St (FT)

By Ben White

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

Hillary Clinton has been cosying up to Wall Street in recent weeks with a series of meetings with top executives that could help her follow the path blazed by her husband ahead of his first presidential run.

People familiar with the meetings said they appeared intended to help Wall Street figures get to know the New York senator better as she coasts through an easy 2006 re-election campaign and paves the way for a possible Democratic presidential run in 2008. Bill Clinton's early forays to Wall Street helped advance his bid for the Democratic nomination in 1992.

Some events, such as a recent gathering at Morgan Stanley that included chief executive John Mack, a big Republican donor, have been fundraisers for the Senate campaign. Others, including a chat with executives at Lehman Brothers, are more policy-oriented. Mrs Clinton is said to be planning meetings at Merrill Lynch and Credit Suisse, among others.

Ann Lewis, a senior adviser to Mrs Clinton, said the meetings were focused on 2006.

"She is proud to represent a state as diverse as New York with farmers upstate and bankers on Wall Street," she said.

However, political observers noted that Mrs Clinton faces little significant opposition in 2006. They said the the Wall Street meetings could pay dividends in 2008 by helping reassure bankers that Mrs Clinton is a free-market centrist, not the tax-and-spend, protectionist liberal some Republicans paint her to be.

"She wants to reassure them that she is really OK," said Maurice Carroll, a pollster and political analyst.

Analysts said the meetings also gave Mrs Clinton, viewed as a favourite for the Democratic presidential nomination, an opportunity to argue that she would improve the standing of the US abroad and demonstrate her commitment to free trade. This has been called into question by her vocal opposition to DP World of Dubai's attempted purchase of a company controlling certain US ports.

The lack of an obvious Republican frontrunner also means more Wall Street money and support could flow to Mrs Clinton and other Democrats in 2008.

Many on Wall Street are already familiar with Mrs Clinton through her work in the Senate. She often visits big New York employers such as JP Morgan Chase for public and private events. She has raised $4.7m (€3.6m, £2.5m) from individuals in the financial services, real estate and insurance sectors this year, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Wake Up, Democrats: Ideas And Vision Do Matter (LAT)

By Kenneth S. Baer And Andrei Cherny

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

SOMETHING HAPPENS to a political party when it is not just out of power but has had to play on the home field of its opponents for a generation: It loses faith in itself and becomes scared.

Like the 98-pound weakling who lives in fear of the school bully, it will say anything to avoid being stuffed into a gym locker: I don't really believe in anything! I don't stand for anything! Please just leave me alone!

That this has become true in the Democratic Party is clear in listening to the worried words of pundits and political professionals who counsel Democrats to avoid offering any vision or direction for the country — to instead simply wait for voters to so tire of Republican mismanagement that they will turn to more "competent" Democrats to administer a conservative state.

Maureen Dowd, for instance, argued recently that "big ideas" don't matter — "what matters," she wrote, "is the bearer of an idea." James Carville — the architect of Bill Clinton's 1992 victory — told Newsweek that "the American people are going to be ready for an era of realism. They've seen the consequences of having too many 'big ideas.' "

And in these pages, Jonathan Chait cynically dismissed any talk of "vision" or "ideas" and instead argued that Democrats should not formulate a coherent worldview because, for progressives, "everything works on a case-by-case basis." This ad hoc approach to politics misunderstands the basics of American history and underestimates the power of ideas in shaping it. It may win an odd election here or there in spite of itself, but ultimately, it is a losing strategy for any political party.

Ideas have driven American politics since the founding of the republic. The U.S. was established on grand notions of democracy and freedom that were radical breaks with the entire history of the world to that point. In the 19th century, Jacksonian ideas about opportunity for all, not just the few, were brought to life through the Homestead Act, the transcontinental railroad and the land grant colleges. When industrialization came to remake the face of American life at the turn of the last century, the Progressives rethought how government and society should work to adapt to the new Machine Age and its urban centers. Eventually, these ideas were realized in Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal and came to define and delimit the debate over government for the rest of the 20th century.

The leaders who brought about these changes did not approach their work on a case-by-case basis, nor did they simply see their jobs as conscientiously administering the machinery of government so that it ran smoothly. Instead, they had ambition and a vision of how the world should work. Although their innovations may seem commonplace now, these visions often represented a radical break from the prevalent dogma of the moment, emerging from outside the accepted bounds of debate.

Ideas have both shaped America's history as well as transformed its politics. If elections were only about competence, then right about now we'd be dedicating the Michael Dukakis Presidential Library. The fact is that the parties that have won elections over the long term and have been able to build governing majorities are those that have put forward a vision that both inspires the American people and responds to the concerns they face at the time. Certainly, this was true during the New Deal era, when Americans repeatedly chose the often chaotic and unorganized administration of Roosevelt's Democrats because they responded to the ideas about government and the economy that FDR was offering.

In response, Eisenhower-type Republicans argued that what was needed was a "Modern Republicanism" that promised to administer the New Deal more effectively. Other conservatives argued that unless they offered an alternative vision that would rally Americans to their banner, the Republicans would always be the moon to the Democratic sun: reflecting its light but shining none of its own.

So the bravest conservative thinkers took on the GOP establishment and its most plodding, popular voices. They developed a series of ideas — supply-side economics, Social Security privatization, faith-based social policy and so on — that reshaped the American political landscape. It took decades for their ideas to make it into the mainstream, but — for better or worse — American politics today is played out on the terrain laid down by these thinkers.

Now, it is progressives that have a choice. Most of the voices inside Washington believe that conservative errors and overreaching — along with more effective voter targeting and door-knocking by Democrats, more compelling TV ads and new "frames" for old policies — will yield enough votes so that in a closely divided nation, Democrats might eke out a victory and regain power.

We disagree. Having seen the failure of a generation of conservative ideas on fiscal and foreign policy, Americans are ready to listen to an alternative. Now is the moment for Democrats to offer a set of breakthrough ideas that will create a governing majority for a generation. But this will happen only if they are willing to be more than the railroad conductor making sure the trains run on time, and instead put America on a new and different track.

Delay Redux? (TIME)

Could Tom DeLay be headed back to the House? A source close to the ex-Congressman tells TIME that DeLay is planning an aggressive campaign to retake the House seat he quit in June if an appeals court lets stand a ruling by a federal judge last week that his name must stay on November's ballot--even though he has moved to Virginia. "If it isn't overturned, Katy bar the door!" says a G.O.P. official. "Guess he'll have to fire up the engines on the campaign and let 'er rip." DeLay, awaiting trial for money laundering, never intended to fade away. He plans to give paid speeches and has signed a deal to have his bio penned by best-selling author Stephen Mansfield. But to run, DeLay would have to raise money fast: his campaign fund has well under $1 million left. At least he knows his would-be opponent well: ex-Congressman Nick Lampson's original district was eliminated in a redistricting engineered by DeLay.

Wage-ing Battle (TIME)

Time, July 10, 2006

Ever sinceÂ 2004, when theÂ G.O.P. fired up its conservativeÂ core by getting gay-marriage bans on the ballot in 11 states on Election Day, Democrats have sought their own rally-the-base issue. What could motivate liberals to turn out for November's midterms? They think they have an answer: the minimum wage.

The federal minimum wage has been stuck at $5.15 an hour since 1997. Polls show that more than 80% of Americans favor an increase, but most Republican politicians--who traditionally side with the business lobby on the issue--do not. So Democrats are sharpening their attacks on the G.O.P. for seeming out of step with public opinion. Senator Hillary Clinton of New York has led a Democratic effort to block a scheduled $3,300 increase in congressional pay--the typical lawmaker's salary would rise to $168,500 a year--unless Republicans agree to hike the minimum wage to $7.25. The Dems are also emulating the Republican gay-marriage strategy by backing ballot measures in six states to boost the minimum wage. They hope voters will go to the polls for this cause, then support Democrats in races that could help the party take back Congress. Clinton and ex-Senator John Edwards will head to Ohio this week to stump for that state's measure. Edwards then plans to go to Arizona to rally for an initiative there.

The potential political cost of not supporting an increase is beginning to have an impact in the G.O.P. While Republican leaders in the House have so far blocked efforts to get a vote on the issue this year, some vulnerable, moderate G.O.P. members of Congress are speaking out for a higher minimum wage--and pushing their leadership to relent. Christopher Shays, a nine-term Connecticut Republican embroiled in a tight fight for re-election, says he backs the Dems' push. "I just think it's an embarrassment," he says of his party's stance on the issue.

Not enough Republicans have sided with Shays to get a House vote, which means any action this year will depend on voters in the six states with ballot initiatives. All would increase the minimum wage to at least $6.15, and all are good bets to pass. It's less clear whether the Democrats can convert that support into backing for the party. If the minimum wage doesn't generate maximum anger against the Republicans, low-income workers may find themselves with bigger paychecks, but congressional Democrats may be right back where they began--in the minority.

One Hug At A Time (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

It's Friday night in Iowa and an old politician is trying some new tricks. John Edwards is back—back, with the familiar deep drawl, dark tan and honeyed hair. Gone, though, are the old catchphrases—"two Americas" and "hope is on the way." In their place: a long meditation on America's moral obligation to confront the plight of its poor. "Thirty-seven million of our people, worried about feeding and clothing their children," he said to his audience. "Aren't we better than that?" It's not the stuff of great sound bites, but it's part of Edwards's new political plan: a presidential campaign with fighting poverty as a central plank. It's a risky strategy in today's Democratic Party—Edwards may be the most viable national candidate since Bobby Kennedy to tie his destiny to a fight for the destitute. "Yeah, I heard all that stuff: 'Who cares?' or 'It's a dead end'," Edwards tells NEWSWEEK. "Well, it's what I want to do."

DOJ_NMG_0038888

Rebel outsider is an odd role for the Democratic Party's most recent vice presidential candidate to play. Yet Edwards's 2008 presidential campaign—still hypothetical but proceeding at high speed—is all about breaking with the established script. He's largely opted out of the buzz primary—leaving candidates like former Virginia governor Mark Warner and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh to convince Beltway insiders and media types that they're the best alternatives to front runner Hillary Clinton. Instead, he's using the name recognition he built up in '04 and hitting the campaign trail early and often—quietly raising $6.5 million in 105 appearances for Democrats running in 2006.

His under-the-radar strategy is paying off, in Iowa at least. A June Des Moines Register poll of likely Democratic caucusgoers had Edwards leading a pack of potential presidential candidates that included other widely known names like Clinton, 2004 ticketmate John Kerry and even Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. Edwards is certainly not the only candidate hustling in corn-country—Warner and Bayh visited within days of his most recent visit—but with 10 trips to the state since the beginning of 2005, he's logged more time there than any candidate in either party. This time, they're counting on Iowa, which brought John Kerry's candidacy back from the dead in 2004, to propel them into New Hampshire, and beyond. To win, Edwards must leverage his 2004 visibility, shake off the disappointment many Democrats felt at the campaign and emerge from Kerry's shadow as a worthy candidate in his own right.

Edwards talks about 2004 like it was a lifetime ago. His wife, Elizabeth, was diagnosed with breast cancer the day after the election. "We just threw ourselves into it," he recalls. "I went with Elizabeth to every chemo test." The twin traumas—losing a national election and watching a spouse suffer—were an enormous emotional load. But Elizabeth's illness helped Edwards keep the election loss in perspective. "The adjustment wasn't that hard," he says, "because I was so focused on getting her well."

Edwards's old running mate, John Kerry, has had a harder time moving on. Relations between the two men were always more functional than friendly, and the two Johns are now eying each other as potential opponents. There is history here: before inviting him to join his ticket, Kerry asked Edwards if he would run against him in 2008 in the event they lost the election the first time around. Edwards, according to two former campaign aides who asked not to be named describing closed-door discussions, was taken aback and ducked the question. (Edwards declined to comment on a private conversation; Kerry was unavailable for comment.)

Still, to truly cut the cord with Kerry-Edwards, the North Carolinian has to shore up the political weaknesses highlighted by the last campaign. Dismissed as a foreign-policy lightweight in '04, he's co-chaired (with former Republican veep candidate Jack Kemp) a task force on U.S.-Russia relations, and traveled to Europe, India and the Middle East. "The important thing," he says, "is making it clear you have a world view." He's signed up with the New York investment group Fortress—a move that may help combat the notion that as a longtime trial lawyer, he's anti-business. (It also helps cover a new home on 100 acres in Chapel Hill.)

One key advantage Edwards is counting on: people know who he is. His retooled stump speech takes ironic jabs at his old campaign persona. ("There is the chance that at least one of you remembers that I'm the son of a millworker," he told the Indianola audience.) His advisers learned in 2004 that the hardest hurdle a candidate faces is simply getting voters to remember his name. That's not a problem in Iowa anymore, they say. "A Warner or Evan Bayh would have to spend $30 million to get where Edwards is," says an aide who asked not to be identified speaking about a still unannounced campaign. Other campaigns point out that a figure as well known as Edwards will have a hard time redefining himself.

Lowered expectations could also help Edwards's chances. In '04, he was billed as Bill Clinton's second coming, and many audiences were disappointed when they saw the real thing. Now he simply has to show more ability to connect with audiences than, say, Hillary or Mark Warner—a somewhat easier hurdle to scale.

Soon, he'll start inching back toward the limelight. This fall, Elizabeth will publish a memoir; publicity plans include an excerpt in People magazine and major television appearances. But Iowa looms largest, and as the caucuses get closer, Edwards will have to take bigger steps to prove he really is a new man. After his Indianola speech, Edwards disappears into the star-struck crowd of well-wishers. "I really hope you'll get in again," a woman wearing an IOWANS FOR EDWARDS 2008 button says to him. "Thank you, ma'am," the former senator replies. "Yes," she says, "and I hope you'll really fight this time."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

Don't tread on me

Virginia senatorial wife Susan Allen and Republican operative Mary Matalin, accompanied by their respective daughters, were asked to leave a birthday celebration for the city of Alexandria on Saturday evening because they were "distracting."

That says a close friend of Mrs. Allen, the wife of Virginia Republican Sen. George Allen, who is seeking re-election to a second term.

"They were asked to leave the public event by Alexandria's Parks and Recreation Department because they were told they were 'distracting,'" the friend states. "That was the exact word [officials] used. Perhaps these Alexandria servants should be reminded that politicking at public, community events is a time-honored, American tradition, not to mention a First Amendment right."

Actually, the two women weren't so much politicking as they were attracting attention while strolling through the waterfront festival, held at Oronoco Bay Park. Frequently mentioned as a possible White House contender in 2008, Mr. Allen faces a formidable challenger in former Navy Secretary Jim Webb, a Republican until he jumped ship and became a Democrat.

Alexandria is known for being a Democratic bastion. The current mayor, vice mayor and council members are all Democrats. In addition, Old Town is home to former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat who has his own eyes on the White House in 2008. Mr. Allen resides in the Mount Vernon section of Fairfax County, just south of Alexandria.

Beyond walking on water, there was little the Alexandria "servants" could do to stop a Potomac River boat captain from showing her loyalty to the Republican candidate by cruising along the waterfront festival with "George Allen for Senate" banners hanging from the port and starboard sides of her boat.

Knows his weeds

A most intriguing e-mail arrived in our mailbox from a Washington public-relations associate, who copied it to every reporter on his media contact list.

The letter reads: "I walk past a marijuana plant on my way to work each day that has found a home just outside the gate of an embassy. I happen to find this a bit funny considering the number of people that walk past it each day.

"Anyway, I'll tell the first reporter to get back to me where the plant is located. I would recommend taking a photo first before asking the embassy any questions."

Inside the Beltway is pleased to announce that we were the first to contact the PR executive, who spoke to us about the marijuana plant on the condition of anonymity.

"It is the Tunisian Embassy at 1515 Massachusetts Avenue," he told us. "But here is the sad thing: they tore it up."

You don't say?

"Don't worry, I took a picture of the plant, and I can send it to you. The plant was much taller and bushier last week."

So do you think somebody harvested the plant? Or do you think it simply got weed-whacked?

"I don't know. There are a lot of weeds growing around there; there's not much upkeep by the embassy."

Hmmm.

"I first noticed the plant a month or two ago. I did a double-take. 'Oh my God,' I said to myself. 'It's a marijuana plant.'"

Then what did you do?

"I kept an eye on it. And it kept growing and growing. It was literally to the left of the gate, growing up out of a crack next to the curb."

Smile, Steny

Inside the Beltway told you last Friday about a pair of candid photographs of House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny H. Hoyer and Maryland Democratic senatorial candidate Kweisi Mfume prominently displayed on the front page of the Michael S. Steele for U.S. Senate Web site.

One photo shows a smiling Mr. Hoyer hamming it up the Republican lieutenant governor during last Tuesday's Independence Day celebration in Bowie.

"Apparently your column item generated a lot of controversy," Steele campaign spokesman Doug Heye called to say over the weekend. "Congressman Hoyer's office just called and asked us to take the photograph down. I told them that I would alert the lieutenant governor to their request and let them know as soon as possible.

"However, I don't see why a harmless photo of two politicians enjoying a moment together can cause such controversy in the Hoyer camp."

Klaus in town

Morton's co-founder Klaus Fritsch, who wrote the book on steak, is paying a visit to the downtown Morton's on Connecticut Avenue tomorrow evening, not Wednesday as reported earlier, to celebrate the release of "Morton's Steak Bible."

Arnold Favored For Re-election (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, July 10, 2006

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a wide lead over state Treasurer Phil Angelides, his Democratic re-election challenger who said Friday that, if elected, he would sign a bill to grant marriage licenses to homosexual couples.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, an actor who became governor after a circuslike recall election in 2003, leads Mr. Angelides 44 percent to 37 percent in a statewide poll taken the last week of June. The poll showed 14 percent of voters were undecided, while 5 percent of those surveyed wanted a different candidate.

It is unknown whether marriage will be a defining issue in a race that is four months away, but Mr. Angelides is not shying away from the topic.

"I would sign the marriage-equality bill because I believe if we can get behind people to build a lasting relationship, that is a good thing," Mr. Angelides told reporters at a press conference in San Francisco.

The New York State Court of Appeals last week issued a ruling that said: "Whether such marriages should be recognized is a question to be addressed by the legislature."

California's Democrat-controlled Assembly passed a measure last year that would have legalized same-sex unions. Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, vetoed the bill, saying the matter should be decided either by voters or by the courts.

Marriage has been a hot topic in California since February 2004, when San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom shocked the nation by allowing 4,200 same-sex couples to "marry." A state court later voided the licenses.

Mr. Newsom said Friday that he is backing Mr. Angelides.

National Democrats, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, also are supporting Mr. Angelides as he fights for one of the country's most important gubernatorial seats.

"We are all here for the same reason: We think Phil Angelides would be a great governor for California," Mrs. Clinton said Friday in San Francisco after a $1,000-per-plate fundraiser at the St. Regis Hotel.

The former first lady said Mr. Angelides helped her husband become president in 1992, when Mr. Angelides was the leader of the state Democratic Party.

"He brought passion and commitment to a campaign that was on an uphill side," she said.

Mr. Angelides, who bested state Controller Steve Westly last month after an ugly Democratic primary battle, received his former opponent's endorsement Friday. Mr. Angelides said the race provides "the clearest choice in a generation for Californians: a choice between the Bush-Schwarzenegger agenda of diminished opportunity, and a new agenda."

Others agreed, and promised the Democrat steady help throughout the campaign.

"Phil may not be a bodybuilder but he's a builder of dreams," said Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, referring to one of Mr. Schwarzenegger's pre-politics careers.

The survey of 900 Californians showing the governor leading the Democrat by seven percentage points was conducted by San Jose State University's Survey and Policy Research Institute. It had a margin of error of four percentage points. In March, Mr. Schwarzenegger held a three-point lead over Mr. Angelides in the same poll.

Pollsters said those surveyed were encouraged by Mr. Schwarzenegger's move to send some National Guard troops to the border as immigration battles heat up in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0038891

The governor has "begun to reclaim the middle-of-the road voters who are crucial to statewide elections," the pollsters said.

However Mr. Schwarzenegger's once high approval rating has not climbed above 50 percent since March. The June poll showed that he has a 43 percent favorable rating.

Politicians Need Not Abandon Religion (USAT)

By Barack Obama

USA Today, July 10, 2006

My faith shapes my values, but applying those values to policymaking must be done with principles that are accessible to all people, religious or not. Even so, those who enter the public square are not required to leave their beliefs at the door.

For some time now, there has been talk among pundits and pollsters that the political divide in this country falls sharply along religious lines. Indeed, the single biggest gap in party affiliation among white Americans today is not between men and women, between red states and blue, but between those who attend church regularly and those who don't.

This gap has long been exploited by conservative leaders such as Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson, who tell evangelical Christians that Democrats disrespect their values and dislike their church, while suggesting that religious Americans care only about issues such as abortion and gay marriage.

It's a gap that has also been kept open by some liberals, who might try to avoid the conversation about their religious values altogether, fearful of offending anyone and claiming that constitutional principles tie their hands. Some might even dismiss religion in the public square as inherently irrational or intolerant, thinking that the very word "Christian" describes one's political opponents, not people of faith.

And yet, despite all this division, we are united by the fact that Americans are a deeply religious people. Ninety percent of us believe in God, 70% affiliate ourselves with an organized religion, and 38% call ourselves committed Christians.

This is why, if political leaders truly hope to communicate our hopes and values to Americans in a way that's relevant to their own, we cannot abandon the field of religious discourse.

My lesson

I've fallen into this trap myself. During my 2004 Senate race, my opponent said, "Jesus Christ would not vote for Barack Obama." I answered with what has come to be the typically liberal response: that we live in a pluralistic society, and that I can't impose my religious views on another. I said I was running to be the U.S. senator of Illinois, and not the minister of Illinois.

But my opponent's accusations nagged at me, and I knew that my answer didn't address the role my faith has in guiding my values. I, like other progressives, should have realized that when we ignore what it means to be a good Christian or Muslim or Jew, when we discuss religion only in the negative sense of where or how it should not be practiced, when we shy away from religious venues because we think we'll be unwelcome, others will fill the vacuum: those with the most insular views of faith, or those who cynically use religion to justify partisan ends.

Moreover, it's wrong to ask believers to leave their religion at the door before entering the public square. Abraham Lincoln, William Jennings Bryan, Martin Luther King Jr. — indeed, the majority of great reformers in American history — were not only motivated by faith, they also used religious language to argue for their cause. To say men and women should not inject their "personal morality" into policy debates is a practical absurdity; our law is by definition a codification of morality.

If progressives shed some of these biases, we might recognize the overlapping values that both religious and secular people share when it comes to the direction of our country. We might recognize that the call to sacrifice, the need to think in terms of "thou" and not just "I," resonates with all Americans. And we might realize that we have the ability to reach out to the evangelical community and engage millions of religious Americans in the larger project of America's renewal.

But the conservative leaders of the religious right will need to acknowledge a few truths about religion as well.

For one, the separation of church and state in America has preserved not only our democracy but also the robustness of our religious practice. After all, during our founding, it was not the civil libertarians who were the most effective champions of this separation; it was the persecuted religious minorities concerned that any state-sponsored religion might hinder their ability to practice their faith.

DOJ_NMG_0038892

Universal values

This separation is critical to our form of government because in the end, democracy demands that the religiously motivated translate their concerns into universal, rather than religion-specific, values. It requires that their proposals be subject to argument, and amenable to reason. If I am opposed to abortion for religious reasons but seek to pass a law banning the practice, I cannot simply point to the teachings of my church. I have to explain why abortion violates some principle that is accessible to people of all faiths, including those with no faith at all.

This might be difficult for those who believe in the inerrancy of the Bible, but in a pluralistic democracy, we have no choice. Politics involves compromise, the art of the possible. But religion does not allow for compromise. To base one's life on such uncompromising commitments may be sublime; to base our policymaking on them would be dangerous.

In the months and years to come, I am hopeful we can bridge these gaps and overcome the prejudices each of us brings to this debate. I believe that Americans want this. No matter how religious they may or may not be, people are tired of seeing faith used as a tool to attack and divide.

Americans are looking for a deeper, fuller conversation about religion in this country. They might not change their positions on certain issues, but they are willing to listen and learn from those who are willing to speak in reasonable terms — those who know of the central and awesome place that God holds in the lives of so many, and who refuse to treat faith as simply another political issue with which to score points.

Barack Obamais a Democratic U.S. senator from Illinois.

The New York Paradox (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

I live and work in New Jersey, but I've always loved the energy and variety of the city that's just an hour's train ride away. So I was happy to read in The New York Times about a New York success story: the surprising resurgence of Manhattan as a site for corporate headquarters.

What's interesting about the corporate return to Manhattan is that it flies in the face of today's conventional wisdom, which says that modern technology is making geography irrelevant. Since work can now be done anywhere, the story goes, jobs move wherever the wages and other costs of doing business are lowest. And this should mean trouble for a high-wage, high-cost location like New York.

But somebody forgot to tell New York about the new rules: in spite of high costs, the city's economy is thriving.

And the report on the headquarters boom suggests that New York may, paradoxically, be doing well precisely because technology has made it possible to move many jobs away from high-cost locations.

During the 1960's and 1970's, New York lost much of its historical role as a headquarters city, as companies moved out to suburban campuses around the country. "But in the last several years," the Times article declares, "New York has regained its magnetic force": there are more than twice as many headquarters and subsidiaries in the city as there were in 1990.

Why are corporations moving back to New York? Manhattan's appeal is obvious: the Big Apple is the best place for top executives to "network face to face with their peers in the hub of the financial, legal and communications industries," as the article puts it. But that's an advantage New York has offered ever since it became America's largest city.

In the past, however, this face-to-face communication came at a high price: in order to keep their top executives in Manhattan, companies also had to pay the rent on large office buildings and fill those buildings with thousands of lower-level employees, paying those employees wages high enough to compensate for New York's high cost of living. Many companies decided that the benefits of a New York headquarters weren't worth the cost.

Now, however, it's possible for many of the people who would formerly have worked at corporate headquarters to work somewhere else instead, communicating with management electronically. And that makes it worthwhile to move top executives back to the center of things.

The same thing may be happening in the financial industry, which these days is New York's principal "export" — that is, New Yorkers sell all sorts of things to each other, but they mainly sell financial services to other Americans and the rest of the world.

If you looked only at the employment numbers, you might think that New York's export base is in trouble. A recent report by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York points out that over the past 30 years, finance-sector employment has been shifting away from New York City toward lower-cost locations, both in the outer parts of the New York metropolitan area and in places like Dallas and San Antonio.

But what seems to be happening is that only relatively low-paid finance jobs are moving out of New York, while highly paid jobs are actually moving in. The Fed study shows that New York's share of U.S. financial industry earnings, as opposed to employment, is actually higher now than it was in 1970. And it's a good guess that financial firms, like corporate headquarters, find it easier to put their top people in New York now that the back-office work can be carried out someplace cheaper.

The story of the New York economy isn't entirely a happy one. The city has essentially lost all of its manufacturing, and it's now in the process of outsourcing both routine office work and many middle-management functions to other parts of the country.

What's left is an urban economy that offers a mix of very highly paid financial jobs and low-wage service jobs, with relatively little in the middle. Economic disparities in New York, as in the United States as a whole, are wider than they have been since the 1920's.

But for once, let me focus on the positive: the world's greatest city, a city that a generation ago seemed to be in irreversible decline, seems to be doing O.K.

Lobbyists, Yes. The People, Maybe. (NYT)

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

The news that the Washington lobbying industry is rapidly extending its tentacles into cities, towns and school districts across the country should be an outright embarrassment to Congress. Elected lawmakers — not high-paid lobbyists — are supposed to be best attuned to meeting the needs of their localities. But not in the booming marketplace called earmarking — the rapid-fire, debate-free amending of budget bills with millions in special-interest boons for favored pleaders. In this case, lobbyists are shopping themselves as gifted middlemen for mayors and school boards. And localities are biting, having seen the sorry evidence that lawmakers tend to deliver earmarks more readily for Beltway lobbyists than for hometown nobodies.

In Florida, 44 public sector clients of one well-connected lobbyist netted $173 million in earmarked projects since 2001. This is a return of better than $18 federal dollars for every local dollar spent on lobbying, according to a report by Jodi Rudoren and Aron Pilhofer of The Times. The founding fathers surely didn't envision such a lucrative warping of the federal-local relationship. But lawmakers do very well by it. They not only deliver tailored pork back home, but they also are rewarded by the circular money game where grateful lobbyists and special interests raise vast sums for the re-election campaigns of cooperative incumbents.

Among the unfinished business as Congress returns is the failure by the two houses to clean up the ethical mess created by the lobbying industry's increasing muscle. One congressman who peddled his influence through earmarks has gone to prison, and criminal investigations of others are under way. Yet a what-me-worry evasiveness remains the strategy of Republican leaders on ethics reform.

Cultivating Waste (WP)

The Washington Post, July 10, 2006

HEART SURGEON Jimmy Frank Howell owns a piece of land that hasn't produced crops in years. The federal government has paid him $490,709 in rice subsidies since 1996. Michael T. Sullivan's family, corn farmers, sold most of their crop last year above a government-set minimum price. He got $292,054 in federal agricultural payments anyway.

We've known for a long time that America's bloated food subsidy programs rile foreign governments, complicate trade talks, distort agricultural prices and disproportionately benefit large agribusinesses. As if that weren't enough, the results of a nine-month Post investigation published last week vividly detail the scandalous waste of America's vast farm subsidy system.

Many American farmers have learned to speculate on foodstuff markets, successfully timing the sale of their crops to coincide with high prices. Yet under the misleadingly named loan deficiency payment (LDP) scheme the Michael Sullivans of the world can claim federal money as long as the market price dips below a government-set minimum price after they harvest their crop. Intended to benefit farmers hitting hard times, the LDP program handed out $3.8 billion more last year than it needed to guarantee its minimum price.

Other federal agricultural subsidies go to individuals who don't even farm. Under a program Congress designed to phase out government subsidies by untying payments from the cultivation of particular crops, Mr. Howell reaps federal dollars from his land as long as he doesn't grow the crops. These "direct payments" to landowners who don't grow any crop have cost the federal government $1.3 billion since 2000. Another thick layer of irony in all of this is that these programs aren't poorly managed. They operate just as Congress passed them.

In short: Federal farm subsidies are wildly misdirected and shamefully unfair to anyone who pays taxes and doesn't get a piece of the billions -- $25 billion in 2005 -- the government drops every year on agricultural payments. Last year the federal government paid $4.3 billion in corn subsidies, up from $1 billion in 1998.

Lots of American entrepreneurs take risks every year and don't expect a government safety net; why are American farmers, especially the larger planters who expertly extract government farm entitlements, any more deserving? The case for cutting farm subsidies isn't just about closing trade deals, though, as we argued last week, successful trade negotiations are vital. It's also about fixing a broken, inequitable system at home.

Too Many Doctors In The House (NYT)

By David C. Goodman

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

Hanover, N.H.

CAN we cure our ailing health care system by sending in more doctors? That is the treatment prescribed by the Association of American Medical Colleges, which has recommended increasing the number of doctors they train by 30 percent, in large part to keep up with the growing number of elderly patients. But the most serious problems facing our health care system — accelerating costs, poor quality of care and the rising ranks of the uninsured — cannot be solved by more doctors. In fact, that approach, like prescribing more drugs for an already overmedicated patient, may only make things worse.

Many studies have demonstrated that quality of care does not rise along with the number of doctors. Compare Miami and Minneapolis, for example. Miami has 40 percent more doctors per capita than Minneapolis has, and 50 percent more specialists, according to The Dartmouth Atlas of Health Care, a study of American health care markets (for which I am an investigator).

The elderly in Miami are subjected to more medical interventions — more echocardiograms and mechanical ventilation in their last six months of life, for example — than elderly patients in Minneapolis are. This also means more hospitalizations, more days in intensive care units, more visits to specialists and more diagnostic tests for the elderly in Miami. It certainly leads to many more doctors employed in Florida. But does this expensive additional medical activity benefit patients?

Apparently not. The elderly in places like Miami do not live longer than those in cities like Minneapolis. According to the Medicare Current Beneficiary Survey, which polls some 12,000 elderly Americans about their health care three times a year, residents of regions with relatively large numbers of doctors are no more satisfied with their care than the elderly who live in places with fewer doctors. And various studies have demonstrated that the essential quality of care in places like Miami — whether you are talking about the treatment of colon cancer, heart attacks or any other specific ailment — is no higher than in cities like Minneapolis.

Studies of individual hospitals have likewise shown that while the doctor-patient ratio varies widely from place to place, more doctors do not mean better care.

The Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., and the University of California, San Francisco, Medical Center each have about one doctor treating every 100 elderly patients with chronic illnesses in their last six months of life. New York University Medical Center has 2.8 doctors for every 100 such patients and the University of California, Los Angeles, Medical Center has 1.7. The elderly patients at N.Y.U. and U.C.L.A., as compared with those at the Mayo Clinic and the San Francisco hospital, see more specialists and are subjected to more imaging tests and other procedures. But the quality of their care, as judged by doctors, is no better.

Using the N.Y.U. doctor-patient ratio as a benchmark for determining the number of physicians that will be needed to care for the over-65 population in the year 2020, we can project a deficit of more than 44,000 doctors nationwide. But if the benchmark is based on the Mayo ratio, we can project an excess of nearly 50,000 doctors in the year 2020.

How can it be that more spending and greater physician effort does not lead to better health or to improvements in patient satisfaction? One explanation may be that when more doctors are around, patients spend more time in hospitals, and hospitals are risky places. More than 100,000 deaths a year are estimated to be caused by medical mishaps.

The association of medical colleges has argued that increasing the doctor supply overall can remedy regional shortages. But in the past 20 years, as the number of doctors per capita grew by more than 50 percent, according to our measurements, most of the new ones settled in areas where the supply was already above average — places like Florida or New York — rather than in regions that lack doctors, like the rural South. Medical training is an expensive business, and it makes little sense to waste additional public dollars to perpetuate doctors' preference to live in affluent places.

By training more doctors than we need, we will continue to fill more hospital beds, order more diagnostic tests — in short, spend more money. But our resources would be better directed toward improving efforts to prevent illness and manage chronic ailments like diabetes and heart disease.

Better coordination of care is also worth investment. Small physician groups in disconnected offices often provide fragmented treatments, while multispecialty practices integrated with hospitals — prevalent in Minneapolis and some other cities — are associated with lower cost and higher quality of care.

All these strategies have been shown to improve patient outcomes without adding physicians. Instead of training more doctors, let's make better use of the ones we already have.

North Korea Crisis Tests China's New Global Role (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, July 10, 2006

North Korea's barrage of missile tests has put China in a tough spot, calling into question its policy of patient diplomacy and economic support aimed at encouraging change in Pyongyang.

The U.S., saying Beijing's response is a critical test of China's new high-profile role on the international stage, is urging China to alter course and use its considerable leverage as North Korea's most important trading partner to get Pyongyang to return to talks on its nuclear program.

China has long pushed a noninterference line at the United Nations while seeking good relations around the world through a determined policy of not questioning the internal affairs of countries like Sudan or Venezuela where it seeks oil or other raw materials. But Beijing has assumed a pivotal role in international efforts to wean Pyongyang away from nuclear weapons.

It is far from clear, however, whether even North Korea's rocket launches last week -- in the face of vocal Chinese opposition -- will be enough to overcome Beijing's extreme reluctance to use economic pressure as a diplomatic tool, especially against its communist ally.

A draft resolution that would impose some sanctions against North Korea could come up for a vote at the U.N. as soon as today.

U.S. President George W. Bush, speaking in Chicago on Friday, called on the U.N. Security Council to say "loud and clear, here are some red lines." Mr. Bush also touched on the reluctance of China and Russia to support a U.N. sanctions resolution.

"You know, some nations are more comfortable with sanctions than other nations, and part of the issue we face in some of these countries is that they've got economic interests," he said. The U.S., Mr. Bush said, is trying to convince these countries to see that "security-of-the-world interests trump economic interests."

DOJ_NMG_0038896

Part of that job has fallen to Christopher Hill, the U.S. State Department's top diplomat for Asia, who met Friday with senior Chinese officials to express Washington's displeasure with North Korea's moves and to call for the resumption of disarmament talks.

Mr. Hill hurried to Beijing -- the first stop on a multiday trip to Asian capitals -- before a planned six-day trip to North Korea by China's vice premier, Hui Liangyu, set to start today.

Chinese officials expressed serious concern that North Korea's missile launches could encourage Japan to develop weapons to defend itself and lead to an arms race that could destabilize Northeast Asia, according to a senior U.S. official in Beijing. But the official said "there was nothing said" by the Chinese "that would indicate" they are ready to use the threat of economic sanctions to pressure Pyongyang.

U.S. officials say North Korea's decision to ignore warnings from China and others about the test firings shows that Beijing's policies aren't working. "I don't think anyone who believes in an engagement policy can take much of a sense of satisfaction in this," said the senior U.S. official in Beijing. "In the life of a nation, there are certain relationships...that it is time to leave behind."

Chinese diplomats at the U.N. have opposed action in the Security Council that would seek to bar North Korea from importing materials and parts that could be used in its weapons programs. Japan circulated a toughened draft resolution to that effect Friday.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, indicated that China wasn't pleased with the draft measure, which otherwise has widespread support. "If this resolution is put to a vote, definitely there will be no unity in the Security Council," he said, indicating that China would either veto the measure or abstain from voting.

Japan's foreign minister, Taro Aso, said yesterday that Russia may abstain from a vote, putting even more pressure on China as the sole one of the Security Council's 15 members standing in the way of passing the resolution.

India's test of a missile capable of carrying nuclear warheads yesterday could complicate diplomatic efforts to sanction North Korea, which is likely to complain that Pyongyang is the victim of a double standard.

China has successfully used arm-twisting in the past. In 2003, China temporarily shut down a pipeline carrying oil to North Korea, apparently in an attempt to pressure Pyongyang to participate in multilateral talks on its nuclear programs, U.S. and Asian diplomats have said. North Korea later agreed to join the negotiations.

To prod Beijing to toughen its stance this time, the U.S. has appealed to China's pride, saying it risks diminishing its international standing if it can't use its influence even to moderate the behavior of one of its closest neighbors.

When Mr. Bush last week called his Chinese counterpart, Hu Jintao, he said North Korea's missile tests represented a serious affront not just to the U.S., but also to China, U.S. officials said.

Washington also has said China's ability -- or inability -- to make headway with North Korea will be important in shaping the future of relations between Washington and Beijing. "This is an important time in the U.S.-China relationship," the senior U.S. official said. "If they are successful, it will be considered a sign that China has indeed arrived."

China is North Korea's largest supplier of both food and energy. Two-way trade between the neighbors has grown rapidly, hitting $1.58 billion last year. The vast majority of consumer goods in North Korea's markets are from China. The country's air force can't fly its planes without Chinese jet fuel.

It was business as usual at border-crossing points between China and North Korea Friday, Chinese traders said. Convoys of trucks laden with supplies rumbled over the steel-girder bridge that connects the Chinese city of Dandong with North Korea.

"We don't expect China to take drastic actions. Ties between China and North Korea are too close," said one Chinese businesswoman who handles North Korean imports and exports. Another trader said: "Our North Korean clients are very worried. But we tell them that our trade won't be affected."

For reasons of principle and pragmatism, however, China generally has been loath to use its economic clout to pressure Pyongyang to make concessions. The ideological cornerstone of Chinese foreign policy is that countries shouldn't interfere in one another's internal affairs. Beijing also has a long history of opposition to the use of economic sanctions.

In the case of North Korea, Chinese policy makers fear that too much pressure could cause the collapse of the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, potentially leading to military conflict, refugee flows and economic dislocation.

DOJ_NMG_0038897

On the other hand, bolstering the economy and sustaining Mr. Kim's control are seen as ways to foster a gradual shift to market economics and more openness in North Korea, while maintaining the country as an independent buffer between China and the region's U.S. military allies, South Korea and Japan.

US Looks To China To Influence N. Korea (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, July 10, 2006

BEIJING

A message from President Bush to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il will be delivered Monday in Pyongyang - via two Chinese officials. Beijing now meets quarterly with Mr. Kim, the most contact the unpredictable North has with any outside party.

Whether Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei and Vice Premier Hui Liangyu will surprise Kim Jong Il and exert real pressure is unclear.

With an international diplomatic effort under way a week after North Korea tested seven missiles, China has proposed informal six-party talks as a way to move the process along.

That is less than the US hoped for from China. But since China insists that it will veto any UN sanctions against the North, the US will accept such talks, according to envoy Christopher Hill.

All told, Beijing would appear key to shaping how the world deals with the defiant Kim. Yet from the moment Kim launched his missiles, China has denied it has clout; it politely insists that the US has the central role.

Since 2003, China has embarked on a historic effort to prop up and aid North Korea - a state it had the frostiest relations with for more a decade. Now, $2 billion in aid gives Beijing unprecedented access - something China is reluctant to squander, to "mix aid and diplomacy," as a Chinese scholar here puts it.

"China's influence on North Korea is more than it is willing to admit, but far less than outsiders tend to believe," says a recent report by the Seoul branch of the International Crisis Group.

To outsiders, it appears that a rising China - running a lifeline of energy and food to its poor comrade - ought to have clout in Korea, as it holds more carrots and sticks than anyone. It seems axiomatic that Beijing can simply apply ancient Chinese wisdom and modern Chinese might to stop Kim's nuclear ambition. Both states are communist, wear green and red uniforms, fought the US together, and share borders and history. China is the only country with easy access, as well as trade and tourism, to the North.

"China does have leverage, but it is afraid it may overplay its hand," says Joseph Cheng, head of the political science department at City University in Hong Kong.

Since Kim Jong Il's July 4 missile shots, voices from Sandy Berger, President Clinton's security adviser, to John Bolton, US ambassador to the UN, have argued that "China is the key" to dealing with North Korean belligerence. It has become nearly a mantra in Washington. Twelve months ago, it was an article of faith in senior White House circles, misplaced or not, that China would deliver a deal with Kim to dismantle his nuclear program. Yet this did not happen.

Instead, with the US preoccupied in Iraq, China embarked on a quiet policy of self-interest: to strengthen North Korea. That policy helps to maintain the North as a "buffer state" between China and South Korea.

China does not want the North to collapse, and for US troops to fill the vacuum and appear on its northeast border. China has hosted Kim, and moved relations away from a bad patch in the 1990s, during the North's epic famine, when China asked for cash payments for food instead of barter.

In the past two years, Chinese officials have told Kim that he can reform his state along socialist lines just as China did. China has indicated it will help with economic aid, while he retains complete political control. To now castigate Kim could wreck that formula, sources say.

In the larger sense, Kim's launch of missiles, most of which could hit long-time nemesis Japan or US bases in East Asia, puts China in the position of choosing between its North Korean comrade and an evolving consensus in the international community. So far, China has tried to please both sides.

DOJ_NMG_0038898

"I'm concerned that China isn't recognizing how serious this issue is," says Zhang Liangui, head of foreign studies at the Central Party School in Beijing, in a rare dissent. "China is taking a rigid position. Yet we have long said that if China wants to be viewed as a responsible superpower, it must not be isolated in the international community."

Adding to Beijing's problems is an unresolved ideological struggle in China - where "neo-orthodox" hard-liners who maintain contact with North Korea want China to support its revolutionary posture. There is also genuine puzzlement in Beijing over how to deal with Kim, whose founder-father, Kim Il Sung, reputedly warned him many times that China would attempt to take over his regime one day.

"I hear often that China is the key, which involves a set of policy steps Beijing can take that will bring about the outcome the allies want," says Russell Leigh Moses of People's University. "But I have yet to see anyone show how if China does X, Pyongyang will do Y."

The White House seems to have abandoned its 2003 optimism that China will harness Kim. China may agree that a nuclear peninsula and a regime that test-fires rockets is not desirable. But it isn't clear on how to force Kim to open his highly controlled state and allow international inspectors to flood in, witness his system of gulags, and bring in potentially subversive material - all to dismantle a nuclear program he's cherished for decades. The White House seems to understand this.

Scott Snyder of Stanford University argues the US is using the same strategy that it used with China in closing down Kim's accounts in Macau. China was forced to choose between the international regulatory authority, or North Korean money-laundering behavior.

Sunday, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns argued on FOX News Sunday that "It's time for China to exert its influence that it does have on North Korea." Also on Sunday programs, US and Japanese officials claimed they might have the votes to support a Japan-backed resolution for sanctions against the North.

U.S., Allies Try To Prod North Korea To The Table (LAT)

By Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, July 10, 2006

SEOUL — U.S. and Asian officials are trying to use the atmosphere of crisis generated by North Korea's missile tests as the impetus for a fresh diplomatic push on the North's weapons, according to participants in meetings here this weekend.

The push came as the North adopted an increasingly defiant tone, saying that U.N. sanctions would be tantamount to war.

Referring to a rare statement attributed directly to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, his nation's radio on Sunday broadcast an editorial saying that Kim had announced a "heroic position" in which he "promised to answer to an enemy's retaliation with retaliation and to an all-out war with an all-out war."

In an emergency sweep through the region in the wake of the missile launches, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said he was hoping to reconvene six-nation talks on denuclearization that have been stalled since September.

If North Korea boycotts a formal meeting, Hill said, the six countries might meet informally or there might be a meeting of the remaining five — the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

"Six is better than five. Five is better than none," said Hill in an interview on Sunday with a small group of Western reporters.

"If they [the North Koreans] want to negotiate, we are prepared to do so within the six-party process," Hill said. "If they are not interested, we will do our best to defend ourselves and secondly to keep them very isolated."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns blitzed Sunday morning talk shows in the U.S., urging China to step up pressure on North Korea to return to the talks. If Kim remained defiant, Burns warned, Washington and its allies might push as early as this week for the United Nations to impose harsh sanctions.

"We hope that China is going to bring some pressure and influence to bear to convince the North Koreans that they are entirely isolated in the world," Burns said on CBS' "Face the Nation." "The North Koreans have to come back to the six-party talks."

The fresh diplomatic push appears to be principally an effort by China and South Korea, along with the United States, to prevent the missile launches from escalating into a larger confrontation. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called senior Chinese officials Saturday, and Chinese leaders hurriedly sent a delegation to Pyongyang this weekend for talks.

DOJ_NMG_0038899

Both China and South Korea are particularly hesitant to go along with a Japanese-led effort before the U.N. to get sanctions enacted against North Korea.

Seoul intends to hold Cabinet-level meetings with North Korea beginning Tuesday in the South Korean port of Busan and will push for the renewed talks.

"We have to turn the dynamic created by the [missile tests] into a force for diplomacy," said South Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Chun Young-woo, after a meeting with Hill on Saturday.

In the days leading up to last week's missile launches, Beijing hastily tried to organize a meeting of the six nations in the Chinese city of Shenyang. A U.S. official, who asked not to be named, said that the Chinese had the impression that North Korea "was signed up" to attend and were surprised when it instead went ahead with the seven missile launches.

The official said that Kim might have been responding to pressure by hard-liners from within his military not to back down from the missile launches.

China's short-term goal is to get North Korea back to the six-party talks, a move that Pyongyang might accept to defuse the international backlash from its missile launches, said Robert J. Einhorn, a former State Department official who negotiated with North Korea on nuclear proliferation issues during the Clinton administration.

"Clearly, China has the leverage. It supplies more than half of North Korea's food and fuel, but China doesn't want to press the North Koreans to the breaking point," he said. "Nonetheless, the Bush administration is right to call on China to do more, because if anyone is to bring North Korea to its senses, it's the Chinese."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said China's decision whether to support strong U.N. sanctions against North Korea was a "defining issue" in Sino-U.S. relations.

"If they continue to vacillate, as they have all last week in the United Nations, then there are consequences in our relationship," McCain said on "Face the Nation."

But some senior Democrats suggested that the U.S. might want to consider bilateral talks with North Korea, a tactic the Bush administration has resisted.

"We need to get away from this idea that diplomacy is a sign of weakness," Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), who serves on the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, told the same program.

A North Korean diplomat in New York, Han Sung Ryol, said in an interview published in Seoul on Saturday that North Korea would not return to talks until the U.S. released $24 million held in a bank in the Chinese city of Macao that is being audited by the Treasury Department. Hill rejected those demands.

Hill is to meet in Tokyo today with Japanese officials who are leading the drive for tougher economic measures against North Korea.

Going Ballistic (Sort Of) (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, July 10, 2006

Is Kim Jong Il wacky? No American diplomat has talked to the North Korean dictator for years. But there have been moments when he's appeared quite sane, even sharp-witted. Six years ago the then Secretary of State Madeleine Albright stood next to the diminutive "Dear Leader"—he's about her height—at a stadium in Pyongyang. In front of them thousands of acrobats and dancers performed feats of synchronization that would have made Barnum and Bailey envious. As part of the show, which was intended to impress the visiting Albright with the glories of the North Korean "revolution," a mass of performers held colored placards that showed Kim's Taepodong I missile lifting off in a 1998 test.

"That was the first launch of that missile," Kim said, turning toward Albright. Then, alluding to a 1999 deal with Washington that placed a moratorium on missile tests, he added, "And it will be the last."

But it wasn't. Since then, Washington has refused to sit down with Kim one-on-one (the '99 missile pact was contingent on continuing negotiations). And on July 4, Kim fired off a total of seven test missiles in one night, in his own menacing fireworks display. Kim's show of defiance—even his sometime ally China had warned him not to launch—included a failed test of his new, and not so improved, Taepodong II. The prototype ICBM is supposedly capable of hitting Alaska or other parts of the western

United States, but it splashed into the Sea of Japan some 40 seconds after liftoff. Still, North Korea's first nighttime missile test sent a shudder through Asia even as it provoked snickers in Washington, where intelligence officials dismissed the new Taepodong as a fairly primitive weapon.

At a news conference on Friday, President George W. Bush also played down the dangers posed by Kim's missile and nuclear-weapons program. The president has refused to negotiate directly with Pyongyang, unlike his predecessor, Bill Clinton, Albright's boss. Bush reiterated his six-year-old demand that Kim simply give up his weapons program. "I don't know what the man's intentions are," he said.

Some North Korea experts say that Kim has made his intentions fairly clear: he wants to survive. Since Bush hinted early in his first term that he wanted Kim gone, the North Korean leader has signaled wildly that he's too dangerous to be attacked. In February 2005 his regime volunteered that it had nuclear weapons. And with his tests last week, Kim showed that, even if he can't go intercontinental, he can hit South Korea and probably Japan—including U.S. troops stationed there—with warheads if he desires.

Bush has refused to take the bait. On Friday he insisted that Washington would engage in negotiations only alongside other countries, as part of the so-called Six Party Talks including China, South Korea, Japan and Russia. "My concern about handling this issue bilaterally is you run out of options very quickly," the president said. The problem is that Bush is running out of options now. The administration continues to defer to China, the lead negotiator, but it has seemed clear since a September 2005 pact to restart talks that Beijing will not pressure Pyongyang too hard with sanctions. Why? Mainly because the Chinese fear a collapse of the regime that could send millions of refugees streaming over the Sino-Korean border.

Washington, meanwhile, continues to tighten the noose around Kim. Late last year the administration announced it was investigating a Macau bank through which the North Korean leadership allegedly laundered money. The North Koreans angrily refused to come to the table after that, and the stalemate continues. "The president in his press conference said we have to deal with the world as it is," said Wendy Sherman, a former State Department official who accompanied Albright on the 2000 trip. "That's exactly the phrase we used: you have to deal with Kim Jong Il and the regime as it is. But Bush hasn't wanted to." Kim Jong Il, in response, seems to be speaking in the only language he's comfortable with these days—bombs and blastoffs.

The Kim Conundrum (TIME)

By Bill Powell

Time, July 10, 2006

In missile tests, as in most things, practice makes perfect. So while the lone long-range Taepo Dong--2 rocket fired by North Korea last week sputtered, then splashed down into the Sea of Japan less than two minutes after its much publicized, strategically timed July 4 launch, there's little reason to think Kim Jong Il will be dissuaded by failure. With enough plutonium to make six to eight nuclear warheads and a cache of medium-range missiles, Kim is currently a menace to his Asian neighbors. With nukes and a fully functioning intercontinental missile, he can threaten the U.S. too--and the prospect of bullying his greatest nemesis seems simply too delightful for Kim to resist.

For most of President Bush's time in office, North Korea has been merely a pest, one that the President insisted on dealing with exclusively in concert with China, South Korea, Japan and Russia in six-party talks. But since late last summer, when all the parties agreed in principle that North Korea would shut down its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees, the North has refused to show up for meetings. Now that Kim has ignored warnings--from the U.S., Russia and China--not to test his missile capability and is threatening more tests in the immediate future, the question for the Administration is, What, besides the status quo, are the remaining options for dealing with the world's most unpredictable totalitarian nuclear regime?

A SWIFT AND PRECISE MILITARY STRIKE

LAST MONTH, AS INTELLIGENCE REPORTS SUGGESTED that the Taepo Dong test was imminent, two former Clinton Administration officials, Defense Secretary William Perry and Assistant Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter, opined in the Washington Post that a nuclear North with an intercontinental ballistic missile presented too great a risk for the U.S. to bear. The moment had come, they argued, for a pre-emptive strike against the North Korean launch site. Even if Perry and Carter were speaking in part to a domestic political audience in an attempt to prove before the midterm elections that Democrats can sound tougher than the Bush Administration on national security, their argument is rooted in what's considered a strategic truth about Kim's regime. It is a government that, far from being crazy or irrational, is motivated entirely "by regime survival," says Yun Dukmin, a national-security specialist at Seoul's Institute for Foreign Affairs and National Security.

Viewed through that lens, would Kim really risk war--and the certain end of a dynastic regime begun by his father--in response to a limited air strike aimed at his missile capability? The answer may well be no, but it's also clear that the Bush Administration thinks a pre-emptive strike is still too risky. The North might not currently be able to retaliate against the U.S., but it has huge artillery batteries stationed just across the 38th parallel ready to take aim at Seoul, one of the world's most densely populated cities. Even if Seoul isn't attacked, a U.S. strike would almost certainly fracture the U.S.--South Korean alliance. The population of South Korea overwhelmingly opposes the use of force against the North. Despite the fact that the government of South Korea has little to show for it, polls there suggest people still support the "sunshine" policy, in place since 1998, which amounts to an all-carrots, no-sticks approach to relations with Pyongyang.

Finally, a military strike against North Korea would infuriate China, an emerging superpower with which the Bush Administration has sought stable, cordial relations. Hitting North Korea at the risk of turning China into an outright hostile power isn't a trade anyone in the Administration wants to make.

CONTAIN THE REGIME. THEN SQUEEZE IT

FOR SOME IN THE BUSH ADMINISTRATION, the ideal strategy for dealing with Kim has always been economic and diplomatic strangulation, with the hope that his government will eventually atrophy into collapse or succumb to a coup that might usher in a more amiable--or at least more predictable--leader. That approach is based on the idea that rather than try to negotiate with Kim or take military action against him, the U.S. and its allies are better off keeping him in a box and focusing on preventing him from peddling his arsenal to other rogue actors. Elements of that strategy have been in place for some time and have produced a few notable examples of success.

The post-9/11 Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI), in which the U.S. and its allies concentrate on intercepting weapons of mass destruction, has made Pyongyang a key target because of the government's past sales of missiles to Pakistan and Iran. The big fear is that North Korea could be tempted to sell nuclear material to al-Qaeda, which would have no reluctance about using it. Former Assistant Secretary of State Robert Gallucci says Pyongyang "might figure that selling fissile material to a terrorist group would be relatively safe and profitable."

More than 60 countries now cooperate with Washington's interdiction efforts, and North Korea's record as a serial proliferator makes it a major target. The program was spurred by an incident in December 2002, when a Spanish warship intercepted--and then released--a Cambodian-registered freighter in the Arabian Sea that was manned by North Koreans and was carrying 15 North Korean--made Scud missiles bound for Yemen. At the time, there was no international legal authority for the weapons to be seized. The PSI changed that, and the U.S. insists the program has crimped North Korea's exports of weapons and matÃ©riel in the years since.

The Administration has also had some success in cutting off North Korea's access to the international banking system. For the past year, the Treasury Department has put intense pressure on international banks doing business with North Korea. Last year it helped shut down dozens of accounts at the Macao-based Banco Delta Asia, which was suspected of counterfeiting and laundering money for Pyongyang. Some diplomats in Beijing, in fact, suspect that the financial pressure the U.S. has been applying was the main reason for Pyongyang's defiant missile launch.

But punishment meted out by the U.S.--or by the U.S. and Japan, the partner in the region most willing to isolate the North economically--has a limited impact. China is North Korea's true economic lifeline, and South Korea its second largest trading partner. And last week, despite the missile test, both made it clear that they have little interest in any stringent economic sanctions against the North for the same reason: sanctions might lead to the eventual collapse of Kim's regime. In the view of both countries, collapse equals chaos, with refugees streaming across their borders. Neither wants any part of it. That's why, when asked last Thursday whether China would agree to economic pressure, Jiang Yu, spokeswoman for Beijing's Foreign Ministry, replied only by reiterating support for the six-party talks and restating China's aversion to interfering in the internal affairs of other countries.

DOJ_NMG_0038902

Beijing's top North Korean negotiator, Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei, heads to Pyongyang this week for talks. He may scold the North Koreans for defying Beijing by launching the missiles and possibly persuade them to try another round of six-party talks. But serious sanctions are unlikely to be on the table. Stability in North Korea is what matters to Chinese President Hu Jintao--even if it's the kind of stability only a jailer could love.

GO BACK TO THE BARGAINING TABLE--FOR REAL

A SENIOR DIPLOMAT IN EAST ASIA PUTS IT bluntly: "If there's no military option and there isn't--and you can't get meaningful sanctions--and you can't--and the six-party talks are exhausted--as they appear to be--what's left?"

One possibility is to return to the six-party talks, but with renewed energy and flexibility. Former diplomat Wendy Sherman, who negotiated at length with North Korea during the Clinton years, gives Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice credit for allowing her deputy, former Ambassador to South Korea Christopher Hill, to talk directly to the North Koreans within the six-party construct. It's just that, in Sherman's judgment, Hill hasn't had enough to talk about. "What it appeared Rice couldn't win was enough for Chris Hill to have in his pocket to make a difference," she says. "If you have nothing to negotiate with, you have nothing."

The President could endow his negotiators with a few concessions, such as agreeing to more one-on-one chats between Washington and the North in the context of the six-party talks, to lure Kim back to the table. But given that Kim has turned his back on multilateral discussions for almost a year, the Bush Administration may have to face the fact that if it wants closure on North Korea, it will have to engage in what Kim has wanted all along: direct talks. The goal of North Korea would presumably be diplomatic recognition and security guarantees from Washington, as well as all sorts of economic goodies like those the U.S. and its European allies are offering Iran as incentives to cease its suspected nuclear-weapons program. In return, Kim would have to agree to stand down on his nuclear program.

The President has always equated Kim's nuclear saber rattling with blackmail, and a face-to-face engagement would seem tantamount to caving in. But when Bush entered the Oval Office, North Korea had two nuclear warheads; now the CIA estimates that Pyongyang has enough plutonium to make as many as eight and is hard at work on the technology that would deliver them to American shores. North Korea is slowly but surely building its nuclear capability, making the world steadily less safe, and it's not clear what anyone can do about it without trying something entirely different. If Kim Jong Il intended to put the pressure back on Washington with his Fourth of July fireworks display, he surely succeeded. [The following descriptive text appears within A diagram] A Growing Threat The bulk of North Korea s arsenal consists of hundreds of short-range missiles that threaten South Korea and Japan. Kim Jong Il is believed to have enough plutonium for six to eight nuclear weapons, but the recent failures show he still lacks a rocket capable of reaching the U.S. for now Worst case Experts fear that North Korea is trying to modify a Taepo Dong-2 missile to carry a lighter warhead as far as the mainland U.S., but that capability is thought to be years away The missile that crashed in two minutes is believed to be a three-stage rocket, though its exact configuration remains unclear. North Korea Initiative Aims At 'five-party' Talks (FT)

By Anna Fifield And Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, July 10, 2006

Efforts are under way to convene "five-party talks" involving North Korea's neighbours and the US as officials search for diplomatic avenues to respond to the Asian country's missile tests last week without further highlighting the divergent views over how to deal with the rogue state.

But China, the host of the talks, and North Korea's closest ally, is understood to be unwilling to hold a meeting without Kim Jong-il's representatives, posing another challenge to presenting a united front in condemning the tests.

"We think there ought to be six-party talks – six is better than five but five is better than none," Christopher Hill, Washington's top delegate to the talks, said after meeting senior South Korean officials on Sunday.

"We need the six-party process regardless of whether we get all six parties to come to it," said Mr Hill, who is visiting Beijing, Seoul, Tokyo and Moscow to try to unite the five engaged players.

After reaching what appeared to be a breakthrough agreement in September last year, the talks aimed at trying to persuade North Korea to dismantle its nuclear weapons programme have stagnated as Pyongyang refuses to return to the negotiating table while Washington continues its freeze on its bank accounts in Macau.

Before the missile test, China proposed convening an informal six-way meeting in the north-eastern city of Shenyang, near the border with North Korea, to try to overcome the current deadlock.

All six parties are understood to have had agreed to the idea a few days before the missile tests.

"The question now is, do we try to go ahead with this?" asked one person involved in the process. "China wants to go ahead with the six-party talks and the rest of us are prepared to do it even without the North Koreans. This is not a time to let the North Koreans hold up the train."

The US and Japan are struggling to win support for their plan to impose sanctions on North Korea's weapons programme through the United Nations, with China, a permanent Security Council member, warning it will not support the move.

Wu Dawei, Beijing's chief nuclear negotiator, and Hui Liangyu, a vice-premier, are due to travel to Pyongyang today to discuss the tests. "I hope they are not too polite because I think their politeness has not got them very far," said one US official.

The US is "counting on" Russia and China to use their influence with North Korea to reignite negotiations, Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state said yesterday on CNN. He indicated the US had not yet heard "the last word" from either country on whether they would veto a UN resolution imposing sanctions.

"When we get results of this Chinese delegation to Pyong-yang, I think you will then see us move ahead in New York at the Security Council," he said. "We hope that China and Russia are going to support this resolution."

South Korean officials told Mr Hill they would talk tough on Tuesday when they meet their Northern counterparts in a pre-arranged ministerial meeting but said they did not yet have enough evidence that sanctions would be effective to be able to support them.

On the diplomatic front, however, South Korea's chief negotiator in the talks had a similar message. Chun Yung-woo told the Financial Times: "But if North Korea continues to boycott the six-party talks, then it would be better to have five-party talks rather than no talks at all."

After reaching a "breakthrough" agreement in September, the talks aimed at trying to persuade North Korea to relinquish its nuclear ambitions have stalled.

U.S. Wants North Korea To Return To Talks (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, July 10, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, July 9 — The top American negotiator with North Korea said Sunday that his first priority was to get that country back to the negotiating table, signaling that the United States was seeking a diplomatic solution instead of punitive economic sanctions against it for launching seven missiles last week.

The negotiator, Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said his talks with South Korean officials here over the weekend focused on kick-starting the six-nation talks over the North's nuclear program. The talks have been deadlocked since last September.

"My mission here is not to get sanctions," Mr. Hill told reporters before meeting South Korean officials on Sunday morning. "My mission here is to make sure we can all speak with one voice to deal with this provocative action by the North Koreans."

In an interview earlier Sunday, he repeated a rejection of North Korea's demands for bilateral talks with the United States. He said he was ready to meet with North Korean officials on the sidelines of six-nation talks, as he had done previously.

"I don't know how many more million times they want to hear from us that the six-party talks are how we plan to proceed with this problem," he said.

The United States has tried to rally support for a United Nations Security Council resolution drafted by Japan that would impose sanctions on North Korea for its missile launchings. But China and Russia, two veto-wielding permanent members of the Security Council, said they preferred a less forceful, nonbinding statement with no threat of punishment.

South Korea, which is not a member of the Security Council, has also strongly indicated that it opposes the Security Council resolution. The resolution will probably be put to a vote early this week.

Mr. Hill said he had not emphasized the issue of United Nations sanctions with Chinese officials in Beijing, his first stop on a whirlwind tour of China, South Korea, Japan and Russia, the countries involved in the six-nation talks along with the United States and North Korea.

"The U.N. discussions are on a different track and involve different people, and they're kind of ongoing, so I did not try to inject myself in the U.N. issue," he said.

Over the weekend, Mr. Hill also restated the United States' position that it would not lift a crackdown on banks dealing with the North Korea and its businesses, a precondition North Korea has set for returning to the talks.

Other than the United States, only Japan, among the other countries in the six-nation talks, has forcefully come out in favor of a Security Council resolution leading to sanctions.

In television appearances in Japan on Sunday morning, Foreign Minister Taro Aso said his government would not compromise on the draft resolution and was pressing for a vote on Monday.

"To compromise because of one country that has veto power, even though most other countries support us, sends the wrong message," Mr. Aso said, singling out China. "We can't alter our stance."

Under Secretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said Sunday on the NBC News program "Meet the Press" that the United States probably had sufficient support in the Security Council to impose sanctions on North Korea, but he again urged China to apply pressure on its neighbor.

"We think we've got the votes to pass that," he said, referring to the resolution drafted by Japan.

Mr. Burns said on CNN's "Late Edition" that "I don't think we've heard the last word" from either China and Russia on the resolution, and that intensive diplomacy was continuing.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said on the CBS News program "Face the Nation" that if China wavered in its support for the American stance, there should be "consequences in our relationship."
