Much of Hoekstra's letter to Bush outlined the chairman's objections -- which were widely known -- to the appointment of Stephen R. Kappes as CIA deputy director under Hayden. Kappes quit the CIA in 2004 in a dispute with then-Director Porter J. Goss. Goss preceded Hoekstra as House intelligence committee chairman, and many Republicans remain loyal to him.

"Regrettably," Hoekstra wrote Bush, "the appointment of Mr. Kappes sends a clear signal that the days of collaborative reform between the White House and this committee may be over." He defended Goss for responding to Kappes's "demonstrated contempt for Congress."

In imploring Bush to brief top lawmakers on surveillance operations, Hoekstra wrote that Congress "should not have to play 'Twenty Questions' to get the information that it deserves under our Constitution."

"I want to reemphasize," he wrote, "that the Administration has the legal responsibility to 'fully and currently' inform the House and Senate Intelligence Committees of its intelligence and intelligence-related activities."

He said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) shared his concerns.

Asked for a comment on the letter, White House spokesman Peter Watkins said the administration "will continue to work closely" with Hoekstra and other congressional leaders on intelligence matters.

When In Doubt, Publish (WP)

By On Secrets

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

It is the business -- and the responsibility -- of the press to reveal secrets.

Journalists are constantly trying to report things that public officials and others believe should be secret, and constantly exercising restraint over what they publish.

Most Americans want their government to be held accountable, which is the raison d'?tre of watchdog journalism. At the same time, they do not want the press to disclose government secrets that are vital to national security.

The journalist's dilemma, then, lies in choosing between the risk that would result from disclosure and the parallel risk of keeping the public in the dark -- a quandary that has become all the more pointed since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. As deans charged with imparting the values of journalism to the next generation of reporters and editors, we favor disclosure when there are not strong reasons against it.

DOJ_NMG_0039317

That issue is front and center again because of the June 23 articles in the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal describing the government's efforts to track terrorist financing. The New York Times has attracted most of the outrage because it took the lead in investigating the system.

It is appropriate for Americans to be concerned when news organizations publish information that the president and others in authority have strongly urged not be published. No sane citizen would wish the media to provide terrorists with information that would be likely to endanger Americans.

President Bush has denounced the Times in exceptionally harsh language, and on June 29 the House formally condemned the paper. Some critics of the Times have termed its actions "treasonous" and called for criminal charges under the Espionage Act. One conservative commentator told the San Francisco Chronicle that she would happily send Bill Keller, the paper's executive editor, to the gas chamber.

Keller has characterized the decision to publish the information as a "close call," making this an especially important example to examine. Despite its security concerns, the public has shown steady support for the media's watchdog role. Earlier this year, a survey by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press found that 56 percent of respondents said it was very important for the media to report stories they believe are in the nation's interest. A third of respondents ranked government censorship on the grounds of national security as more important. The public wants the press to keep a sharp lookout, but wants the job performed responsibly. We share this sentiment.

In the case of the stories about financial data, the government's main concern seemed to be that the hitherto cooperative banks might stop cooperating if the Times disclosed the existence of their financial tracking system. So far, that apparently has not happened.

For many Americans, however, the possibility of damage to terrorist surveillance should have been sufficient justification for the Times to remain silent. Why, they ask, should the press take such a chance?

There are situations in which that chance should not be taken. For instance, there was no justification for columnist Robert D. Novak to have unmasked Valerie Plame as a covert CIA officer.

We believe that in the case of a close call, the press should publish when editors are convinced that more damage will be done to our democratic society by keeping information away from the American people than by leveling with them.

We know from history that the government often claims to be concerned about national security when its concern is that disclosure will prove politically or personally embarrassing. The documents that came to be known as the Pentagon Papers in 1971 told how Presidents Dwight D. Eisenhower, John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson had misled Americans about our role in the Vietnam War. Hence the classification of their contents.

In the aftermath of 9/11, a new climate of caution was a sensible response to a sophisticated terrorist foe. But Bush's reaction -- declaring a "war on terror" and claiming the Constitution grants almost limitless powers to the president in a time of war -- is excessive. His administration has been aggressively restricting access to information on the grounds of national security. For example, earlier this year historians complained that intelligence agencies were removing previously declassified documents from archives. Some of these papers dated as far back as the Korean War; many had been cited multiple times in books.

In general, the administration has sought to conduct much of what it calls the war on terror in secret, and it has been able to do so with little oversight from Congress, which would normally be a key check on power. When the press has played such an oversight role, it has often been harshly criticized.

For instance, a few months ago Bush denounced the Times for revealing the National Security Agency's program of monitoring international telephone calls by Americans without first obtaining warrants, as the law requires. In that case, Bush rebuked the paper for revealing a classified secret. For most observers, however, the most important secret that was revealed was that the president had ignored the statutory process that Congress had established.

Despite the rhetoric of their fiercest critics, most journalists take secrets seriously. Indeed, in a number of cases since 9/11, many news organizations, including the Times, have forgone publication of information at the request of the Bush administration. The Times held the article on domestic eavesdropping for a year, publishing it only after the paper thought that the issues raised were of great importance.

We believe that the extraordinary power of the presidency at this moment mandates more scrutiny rather than less. Yet Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has said he would consider prosecuting journalists for publishing classified information. Such an action would threaten to tilt the balance between disclosure and secrecy in a direction that would weaken watchdog reporting at a time when it is badly needed.

DOJ_NMG_0039318

We subscribe to the vision of Carl C. Magee, a crusading journalist whose Albuquerque newspaper infuriated another president in the 1920s with revelations in the Teapot Dome scandal. Forced to close his paper after being driven to bankruptcy, Magee emerged two months later with another newspaper.

Emblazoned on the front page was a new motto, borrowed from Dante: Give Light and the People Will Find Their Own Way.

journalismdeans@hotmail.com
Geoffrey Cowan, dean
Annenberg School for Communication
University of Southern California
Alex S. Jones, director
Shorenstein Center
Harvard University
John Lavine, dean
Medill School of Journalism
Northwestern University
Nicholas Lemann, dean
Graduate School of Journalism
Columbia University
Orville Schell, dean
Graduate School of Journalism
University of California at Berkeley

All The News That's Fit To Bully (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

TWO weeks and counting, and the editor of The New York Times still has not been sentenced to the gas chamber. What a bummer for one California radio talk-show host, Melanie Morgan, who pronounced The Times guilty of treason and expressly endorsed that punishment. She and the rest of the get-the-press lynch mob are growing restless, wondering why newspapers haven't been prosecuted under the Espionage Act. "If Bush believes what he is saying," taunted Pat Buchanan, "why does he not do his duty as the chief law enforcement officer of the United States?"

Here's why. First, there is no evidence that the Times article on tracking terrorist finances either breached national security or revealed any "secrets" that had not already been publicized by either the administration or Swift, the Belgian financial clearinghouse enlisted in the effort. Second, the legal bar would be insurmountable: even Gabriel Schoenfeld, who first floated the idea of prosecuting The Times under the Espionage Act in an essay in Commentary, told The Nation this month that the chance of it happening was .05 percent.

But the third and most important explanation has nothing to do with the facts of the case or the law and everything to do with politics. For all the lynch mob's efforts to single out The Times — "It's the old trick, go after New York, go after big, ethnic New York," as Chris Matthews put it — three papers broke Swift stories on their front pages. Even in this bash-the-press environment, the last spectacle needed by a president with an approval rating in the 30's is the national firestorm that would greet a doomed Justice Department prosecution of The Times, The Wall Street Journal and The Los Angeles Times.

The administration has a more insidious game plan instead: it has manufactured and milked this controversy to reboot its intimidation of the press, hoping journalists will pull punches in an election year. There are momentous stories far more worrisome to the White House than the less-than-shocking Swift program, whether in the chaos of Anbar Province or the ruins of New Orleans. If the press muzzles itself, its under-the-radar self-censorship will be far more valuable than a Nixonesque frontal assault that ends up as a 24/7 hurricane veering toward the Supreme Court.

Will this plan work? It did after 9/11. The chilling words articulated at the get-go by Ari Fleischer (Americans must "watch what they say") carried over to the run-up to the Iraq war, when the administration's W.M.D. claims went unchallenged by most news organizations. That this strategy may work again can be seen in the fascinating escalation in tactics by the Bush White House's most powerful not-so-secret agent in the press itself, the Wall Street Journal editorial page. The Journal is not Fox News or an idle blogger or radio bloviator. It's the establishment voice of the party in power. The infamous editorial it ran on June 30 ("Fit and Unfit to Print"), an instant classic, doesn't just confer its imprimatur on the administration's latest crusade to conflate aggressive journalism with treason, but also ups the ante.

DOJ_NMG_0039319

The editorial was ostensibly a frontal attack on The Times, accusing its editors of not believing America is "really at war" and of exercising bad faith in running its report on the Swift operation. But an attack on The Times by The Journal's editorial page is a shrug-inducing dog-bites-man story; the paper's conservative editorialists have long dueled with a rival whose editorials usually argue the other side. (And sometimes the Times opinion writers gleefully return the fire.) What was groundbreaking and unsettling about the Journal editorial was that it besmirched the separately run news operation of The Journal itself.

By any standard, The Journal is one of the great newspapers in the world, whether you agree with its editorials or not. As befits a great newspaper, its journalists are fearless in pursuit of news, as tragically exemplified by Daniel Pearl. Like reporters at The Times, those at The Journal operate independently of the paper's opinion pages. Witness The Journal's schism during the Enron scandal. Its editorial page belittled the scandal's significance most of the way, resisting even mild criticisms of Enron (it was "partly a victim of its own success") until it filed for bankruptcy. The dearly departed Ken Lay, after all, was the leading Bush financial patron; to the Journal editorialists, the "Clintonian moral climate" of the 1990's was a root cause of Enron's problems. Meanwhile, The Journal's investigative reporters had gone their own way months earlier, helping unearth the scandal. So much so that Mr. Lay tried to argue his innocence in the spring by testifying that a "witch hunt" by the paper's reporters had more to do with his company's demise than he did.

It was a similarly top-flight Journal reporter, Glenn Simpson, who wrote his paper's Swift story. But the Journal editorial page couldn't ignore him if it was attacking The Times for publishing its Swift scoop on the same day. So instead it maligned him by echoing Tony Snow's official White House line: The Journal was merely following The Times once it knew that The Times would publish anyway. As if this weren't insulting enough, the editorial suggested that the Treasury Department leaked much of the story to The Journal and that a Journal reporter could be relied upon to write a "straighter" account more to the government's liking than that of a Times reporter.

This version of events does not jibe with an e-mail sent by The Journal's own Washington bureau chief, Gerald Seib, on the day the Swift articles ran. "I was surprised to see your news story about the New York Times 'scoop' on the government program to monitor international bank transactions," Mr. Seib wrote to Joe Strupp of the trade publication Editor & Publisher. "As you could tell from the lead story on the front page of The Wall Street Journal today, we had the same story. Moreover, we posted it online early last evening, virtually at the same time The Times did. In sum, we and The Times were both chasing the story and crossed the finish line at the same time — and well ahead of The Los Angeles Times, which posted its story well after ours went up."

In other words, The Journal's journalists were doing their job with their usual professionalism. But by twisting this history, the Journal editorial page was sending an unsubtle shot across the bow, warning those in the newsroom (and every other newsroom) that their patriotism would be impugned, as The Times's had been, if they investigated administration conduct in wartime in ways that displeased the White House.

Any fan of The Journal's news operation expects it to stand up to this bullying. But the nastiness of the Journal editorial is a preview of what we can expect from the administration and all of its surrogates this year. In "The One Percent Doctrine," the revelatory book about wartime successes and failures now (happily) outpacing Ann Coulter at Amazon.com, the former Wall Street Journal reporter Ron Suskind explains just how tough it is for a reporter in this climate: "to report about national affairs and, especially, national security in this contentious period demands at least a spoonful of disobedience — a countermeasure to strong assurances by those in power that the obedient will be rewarded or, at the very least, have nothing to worry about."

The trouble is we have plenty to worry about. For all the airy talk about the First Amendment, civil liberties and Thomas Jefferson in the debate over the Swift story and the National Security Agency surveillance story before it, there's an urgent practical matter at stake, too. Now more than ever, after years of false reports of missions accomplished, the voters need to do what Congress has failed to do and hold those who mismanage America's ever-expanding war accountable for their performance in real time.

As George Will wrote in March, all three members of the "axis of evil" — Iraq, Iran and North Korea — are "more dangerous than they were when that phrase was coined in 2002." So is Afghanistan, which is spiraling into Taliban-and-drug-lord anarchy, without nearly enough troops or other assistance to secure it. On the first anniversary of the London bombings, and on a surging wave of new bin Laden and al-Zawahiri videos, the two foremost Qaeda experts outside government, Peter Bergen and the former C.I.A. officer Michael Scheuer, both sounded alarms that contradict the insistent administration refrain that the terrorists are on the run.

We can believe instead, if we choose to, that all is well and that the press shouldn't question our government's account of how it is winning the war brilliantly at every turn. (The former C.I.A. analytical chief, Jami Miscik, decodes this game in "The One Percent Doctrine": the administration tells "only half the story, the part that makes us look good," and keeps the other half classified.) We can believe that reporters, rather than terrorists, are the villains. We can debate whether traitorous editors should be sent to gas chambers or merely tarred and feathered.

DOJ_NMG_0039320

Or we can hope that the press will rise to the occasion and bring Americans more news we can use, not less, at a perilous time when every piece of information counts.

U.S. Says Inmate Legal Notes May Have Aided Suicide Plot (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Detainees at the Guantánamo Bay detention center in Cuba may have planned three suicides there last month by exchanging messages on note paper that was provided by lawyers and generally not scrutinized by guards because of confidentiality rules, the government has asserted in court papers.

Justice Department lawyers made the claim on Friday in a court filing in seeking permission from a federal district judge to review some 1,100 pounds of papers seized from the detainees as part of a military investigation into the suicides on June 10.

The filing, in the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, cites a handful of notes found since the suicides. Detainees' lawyers have described the suicides as acts of desperation, while Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., the facility's commander, has described them as acts of "asymmetric warfare." The government's claims were first reported by The Washington Post on Saturday.

Government lawyers argued in the filing that all prisoners' possessions needed to be searched, including documents typically protected by attorney-client privilege, because an initial search had "demonstrated that detainees had developed practices for misusing the existence of a privileged attorney-client communication system."

In the cell of one of the detainees who died, the authorities said, investigators found a hand-written message from another prisoner on notepaper marked "privileged attorney-client material."

Several other notes said to be relevant to the suicides were later discovered in prisoners' cells and plastic bins where detainees keep their personal possessions, according to a chronology of the investigation.

One of the notes offered guidance on knot-tying, court records said, although it is not clear if the three detainees were aware of the instructions when they hanged themselves with torn sheets and clothing.

Another set of notes marked privileged and "potentially authored by at least two of the deceased detainees" were found in the cell of a living detainee, according to court documents. One detainee also used envelopes marked attorney-client that were found to hold government documents that investigators said might have been classified.

Because all three of the men who died had never been visited by attorneys, government lawyers said the evidence "indicated the passing of materials and messages between detainees and that some level of planning or coordination of the suicides had taken place."

In an affidavit, Admiral Harris said the evidence suggested that "the suicides may have been part of a larger plan or pact for more suicides that day or in the immediate future."

He also raised the possibility that detainees' lawyers or others might have played a role in passing the notes, asking investigators to search for evidence of a plot assisted by "third parties."

Lawyers representing detainees at Guantánamo bridled at that suggestion. Bill Goodman, the legal director of the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York group that has coordinated efforts to file habeas corpus petitions on behalf of most Guantánamo detainees, said guards were careful to check lawyers' briefcases both before and after they spent time with clients.

"Certainly if something is written on the back in Arabic, the guards are going to see it," Mr. Goodman said.

He and other lawyers described the government's demand for control of prisoners' possessions as an attempt to weaken their clients' cases.

Stephen Oleskey, a lawyer in Boston who represents six Algerians seized in Bosnia in 2001, said written communication was critical to defending the detainees.

Guantanamo Probe Finds Evidence Of Plot (AP)

By Ben Fox

AP, July 9, 2006

An investigation into three apparent suicides at the Guantanamo Bay prison has found that other detainees may have helped the men hang themselves or were planning to kill themselves too.

Authorities who searched other detainees' cells after the three were found hanged discovered instructions on tying knots, along with several notes in Arabic that were "relevant" to an investigation of a possible broader plot, officials said in court papers filed late Friday in Washington.

The detention center's commander, Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris, said in an affidavit that investigators believe "the suicides may have been part of a larger plan or pact for more suicides that day or in the immediate future."

DOJ_NMG_0039321

Authorities confiscated personal papers from nearly all 450 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay to "determine whether other suicides were planned or likely to be planned," Carol Kisthardt, the Naval Criminal Investigative Service agent in charge of the investigation, said in an affidavit.

Both affidavits were filed in support of a request for a judge to appoint a special review panel to review all the detainees' documents, which include letters from attorneys.

Lawyers for Guantanamo detainees have condemned the confiscation of the legal papers as a violation of attorney-client privilege and asked a judge to order their immediate return.

Investigators said they confiscated about 1,100 pounds of personal documents after three detainees were found hanging from their steel mesh cells before dawn on June 10 — the first reported deaths of prisoners at the prison.

Bill Goodman, legal director for the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents about 200 detainees, said Saturday that a special review panel would undermine trust between prisoners and their lawyers and delay the legal process.

"It's another roadblock," Goodman said.

The government said the panel's independence would be assured, and detainees' rights protected, by its including lawyers, law enforcement and intelligence personnel and translators who have not taken part in any legal proceedings against detainees.

The special panel, or "Filter Team," would review all the material and report any information that threatens national security or involves "imminent violence" but would not divulge anything that would violate attorney-client privilege, the government said.

Authorities took the papers after finding a note in Arabic related to the suicides in the mesh wall of the cell of one of the prisoners found hanged to death, Kisthardt wrote.

The note did not appear to be written by the prisoner, or another of the detainees who committed suicide, and it was written on paper provided by lawyers stamped with the words "Attorney-Client Privilege."

Among the papers, investigators also found a printout of an e-mail written by someone on the base that appeared to contain sensitive information about the location of cells and operations at Guantanamo, where the U.S. holds men suspected of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

Investigators also confiscated envelopes from detainees marked "Attorney-Client Privilege" but did not review the contents to see if they had any relevant information, Kisthardt wrote.

Signs Of Life In Congress (NYT)

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Congress, which is supposed to push back against executive attempts to amass overweening power, has hardly played its proper role when it comes to George W. Bush. In the past, when evidence arose that the president had overstepped his authority, the Congressional response was generally to look for ways to make whatever Mr. Bush did retroactively legal. But the Supreme Court's decision on the Guantánamo Bay detention camp seems to have jolted even some of the most loyal Republicans back to reality. They are vowing that this time, they will not merely rubber-stamp presidential overreaching. Soon, Americans will get a sense of how seriously to take this newfound spine.

The court ruled, in a decision so strong that it sent shock waves through Washington, that Mr. Bush violated the Geneva Conventions and American law when he created commissions to try detainees outside established judicial procedure. The court rejected Mr. Bush's claim of a power to handle prisoners any way he wants and said it was up to Congress to set rules.

This week, three Congressional committees will hold hearings on the issue. The White House predictably asked Congress simply to legalize Mr. Bush's policies. But a wide range of senators rejected that and called for a serious look at the basic question: whether and how existing rules should be changed to deal with terrorists who are not in any army.

The court said the military commissions, which Vice President Dick Cheney and his team cooked up without bothering to consult military lawyers, violated the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which has rules of evidence and process similar to civilian law. Congress could simply apply the military court to the Guantánamo prisoners. But the code was created to try members of the United States armed forces and some experts make convincing arguments its use would not be appropriate for terrorist suspects.

Still, Congress could create a new kind of military commission, operating as closely as possible to United States military law. That is the proposal of Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, one of the Senate's experts on military law, and Arlen Specter, the Judiciary Committee chairman. It sounds reasonable, as long as lawmakers resist pressure from the administration to deny the prisoners any real rights, barring them from seeing classified evidence, admitting coerced confessions, excluding prisoners from hearings and sharply limiting their lawyers' ability to defend them.

The challenge for Congress is simply to create a vehicle for giving the prisoners their day in court that contains the protections that Americans believe any human being deserves before he can be locked away in an isolated prison forever.

DOJ_NMG_0039322

Coerced testimony should be banned. Classified material could be safeguarded by using the current civilian court practice, in which judges review such material and decide whether to share it with defense lawyers, who are cleared in advance.

The division here is not between people who want to win the war on terror and those who for some unfathomable reason do not. It is between an executive branch that seems bent on proving that the president has unlimited power and those who believe that the Constitution and the rule of law did not crumble along with the World Trade Center.

We would not be in this mess if Mr. Bush had followed the rules. If he had allowed the screening of captives on the battlefield, which the military wanted and the Geneva Conventions require, hundreds of innocent men would never have been sent to Gitmo. If he had asked Congress to create tribunals, instead of fashioning extralegal ones, some of those prisoners who really are terrorists might have been convicted by now in full view of the world.

Senator Graham put it just right the other day. "We don't need to change who we are to win the war," he said. "We need to create a system to meet the needs of a fair trial, the rights of the accused and the defense of the nation, that the world will see as fair and the nation can be proud of."

We hope Congress follows that spirit.

Congress's Turn (WP)

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

President Bush failed to create a fair legal system for accused terrorists. Congress can do better.

PRESSED BY the Supreme Court, Congress this week at last will begin considering how to create a legal system for foreigners held at the Guantanamo Bay prison and elsewhere abroad. Depending on the course it takes, the legislature could compound the damage of the past five years -- or it could enhance America's prestige and its fight against terrorism.

Having allowed President Bush to assert extralegal powers for nearly five years, some in Congress now want to rush through legislation that would rubber-stamp the regime that the court rejected. There is talk of completing a bill by summer's end. Some Republicans appear eager to turn what ought to be a serious debate about balancing national security and human rights into an election issue -- by labeling as soft on terrorism anyone who opposes Mr. Bush's unworkable scheme for trying Guantanamo inmates.

It's somewhat encouraging, therefore, that the Armed Services Committee under the chairmanship of Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) will take the legislative lead in the Senate. Mr. Warner's committee was the source last year of the sole piece of responsible legislation on foreign detainees since 2001, the ban on cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of prisoners authored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). Mr. Warner says he will conduct "intensive consultations" with Republicans and Democrats on his committee, the White House and legal experts before deciding how to proceed. His first hearing this week will feature testimony by serving and former military judge advocates general.

That's a good place to start, if only because so many in Congress seem to misunderstand the issues raised by Hamdan v. Rumsfeld -- especially its finding that all detainees are covered by Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. Based on their public statements, a number of senators appear to believe that any application of Geneva to al-Qaeda prisoners is equivalent to giving them prisoner-of-war rights or setting requirements that go beyond U.S. law. Some claim that American servicemen have been exposed to new legal jeopardy. None of that is true.

In fact, Geneva's Common Article 3 applies to everyone caught up in a conflict, including civilians and irregular combatants. Its requirement for minimally humane treatment falls far short of POW status and is very similar to that mandated by the McCain amendment. A federal law already requires U.S. personnel to comply with Article 3; what's more, Pentagon lawyers have determined that no authorized practice in the new Army interrogation manual violates the Geneva standard. Waterboarding and other practices in the CIA's secret prisons almost certainly do, but we're told these extreme methods have been dropped since the McCain amendment passed -- as they should have been.

So there's nothing practical to be gained by gratuitously repudiating Geneva or U.S. laws that mandate compliance with it -- and much that would be lost. To do so would effectively repeal the standard Congress adopted for prisoner treatment last year, and it would send a message to the world that the United States rejects one of the most basic international standards of human rights. Ideally, Congress should spell out what U.S. compliance with Common Article 3 should mean for prisoner treatment, or it should require the administration to publish its own guidance. But no action is better than gutting this basic standard.

As for trials, Article 3 requires simply that they be carried out by "a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples." The Supreme Court found that the Bush administration's plan for military commissions did not meet this basic standard. But the standard can be met without compromising security.

One approach, as Mr. Warner has suggested, is to start with the code of military justice and its court-martial system, which fully conform with international law. Senators can then examine what changes may be necessary to accommodate trials of accused terrorists. As we have suggested, some alterations may be needed -- for example, in order to use evidence that is highly classified.

DOJ_NMG_0039323

Even better would be for Congress to comprehensively bring all aspects of detention and interrogation of prisoners under law. But as Mr. Warner points out, any system Congress sets up will again be subject to review by the Supreme Court. A hasty ratification of the administration's failed scheme, or a new concoction that fails to grant detainees basic rights, may not pass muster with the court -- and certainly won't with the rest of the world.

This is the seventh editorial in an occasional series about the Bush administration's detention and treatment of foreign prisoners. The full series is available athttp://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions.

Even In Time Of War, U.S. A Nation Of Laws (SA)

San Antonio Express News, July 9, 2006

Civil liberties groups see in the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld a clear rebuke to a president who has overstepped his constitutional authority.

Advocates for executive power in the war on terror will, at the same time, find in it some vindication.

On one key issue, five justices agree that the military tribunals established by the Bush administration to try accused terrorists held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, are unlawful. On another key issue, the justices do not challenge the president's authority to hold enemy combatants.

Legal scholars will pore over the 185-page ruling — with six different opinions, three of them dissenting — for a long time to come. The immediate result is that Camp Delta will remain in business while the White House and Congress construct a process within the scope of military justice that meets the legal requirements described by the court.

The more long-standing principle at the heart of the complicated decision is this: Even in times of war, the United States is a nation of laws. When those laws are ill-suited to the conflict at hand, the commander in chief can work with Congress and the courts to modify them or create new laws. He may not simply ignore them.

Americans have struggled to find the right balance between security and civil liberties in the war on terror. In the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001, the pendulum swung too far in the direction of security. The Hamdan decision is the latest effort to restore a new equilibrium in this contentious debate.

"To the extent that there is latitude to work with the Congress to determine whether or not the military tribunals will be an avenue in which to give people their day in court," President Bush said following the court's decision, "we will do so."

It's reassuring to hear those words now. It would have been better for the nation had the president arrived at that conclusion at an earlier date.

German Man Held As Liaison Suspect For 9/11 Associate (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times/AP, July 9, 2006

BERLIN, July 8 (AP) — A German citizen of Moroccan descent has been arrested in Hamburg on suspicion that he is a member of Al Qaeda with contacts to a man close to the Sept. 11 hijackers, federal prosecutors said Saturday.

A man identified only as Redouane E. H., 36, of Kiel, was arrested Thursday on suspicion of supporting a foreign terrorist organization, a spokeswoman for the prosecutor's office, Frauke Scheuten, said Saturday.

He is suspected of being in contact with Said Bahaji, who had close ties to the three Sept. 11 hijackers who lived and studied in Hamburg — Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad al-Jarrah, Ms. Scheuten said. Mr. Bahaji is suspected of providing logistical support for the Hamburg cell but fled before the attacks and is thought to be in Pakistan. Ms. Scheuten said there was no evidence of direct contact between Redouane E. H. and the hijackers.

"The accused had numerous contacts with the international network of violent jihadis, among other places in Syria, Algeria and Iraq," she said. "He is seriously suspected of supporting the Al Qaeda foreign terrorist network through recruiting fighters for suicide attacks in Iraq and through financial payments."

The arrest was made after gathering information largely drawn from monitoring the suspect's conversations in online chat rooms, Ms. Scheuten said.

Mr. Bahaji has relatives in Hamburg, including a wife, and authorities have previously said they had intercepted e-mail from him.

Prosecutors said that Redouane E. H. served "as an intermediary for messages between the separately pursued Said Bahaji and his wife."

Yemen Acquits 19 Suspected Al-Qaida Members (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0039324

By Ahmed Al-haj

AP, July 9, 2006

Nineteen alleged al-Qaida members accused of plotting to assassinate Westerners and blow up a hotel used by Americans were acquitted Saturday by a judge who also exonerated some of fighting U.S. troops in Iraq.

The accused denied many of the charges, but some had confessed to fighting U.S. troops in Iraq, and had Iraqi stamps in their passports.

"This does not violate (Yemeni) law," presiding judge Ahmed al-Baadani said. "Islamic sharia law permits jihad against occupiers."

The 14 Yemenis and five Saudis were accused of forming a gang to assassinate Americans and Westerners in Yemen, and of joining the so-called holy war against the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq.

One defendant testified he had returned home to perpetrate jihad against Americans in Yemen, a U.S. ally and the ancestral homeland of Osama bin Laden.

But the prosecution failed to provide "adequate evidence that the defendants were plotting attacks against foreigners or planning to assassinate Americans in Yemen," al-Baadani said.

The defendants greeted the verdict with cries of "God is Great!" from behind the bars of a cage in the courtroom.

Mohammed al-Maqaleh, an expert in Islamist affairs who frequently appears in the Yemeni media, described the verdict as a "shock" and a sign that President Ali Abdullah Saleh was trying to drum up support from Muslim radicals ahead of the coming presidential elections.

Yemen, long regarded as a haven for al-Qaida, was the scene of the October 2000 suicide bombing against the USS Cole that killed 17 American sailors. But the country allied itself with the United States after Sept. 11 and waged a crackdown on militants.

Saleh nonetheless has long-standing ties with Islamic militants, who have stood by the administration since the 1980s.

"This (verdict) is a change for the judiciary in Yemen," said Ali al-Kurdi, one of the defendants, who spent three years in Afghanistan in the 1990s. "It is fair, something unusual."

Al-Kurdi was charged with being linked to al-Qaida.

The defendants were arrested in early 2005 and accused of having contact with al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and receiving directions from him to attack a Western-owned hotel in the Yemeni city of Aden. Al-Zarqawi was killed June 7 in a U.S. airstrike in Iraq.

Saleh's announcement that he will again run for president broke earlier promises to step down after 28 years at the helm of this impoverished Arab nation.

Five Yemeni opposition parties have chosen Faisal bin Shamlan, a former oil industry executive to challenge him. Bin Shamlan has spoken out against al-Qaida and denounced corruption.

US Extends Condolences On British Bombing Anniversary (AFP)

AFP, July 9, 2006

The United States has expressed sorrow and solidarity with Britons in memory of the 52 people killed in London bombings a year ago, a day after the grim anniversary.

"They had started their day like many others with breakfast with their families, and preparations for work and school. While they left their homes like any other day on July 7, they did not return," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a statement.

"Fifty-two families suddenly lost a wife, a husband, a parent, a child. On the anniversary of their death we again mourn their loss and extend our condolences to their families," Rice said.

She recalled the United States shares with the people of Britain "a deep bond of friendship that has stood the test of time."

"Their loss is our loss, their struggles are our struggles.

"While we mourn those who were killed last July 7, we will honor their memory by continuing to work together to defeat terrorism and ensure that all those who would do harm to the innocent are brought to justice."

Britain observed two minutes of silence Friday in memory of the 52 people who died when four British Muslim suicide bombers, with explosives packed into rucksacks, blew themselves up inside three packed London underground trains and a double-decker bus on July 7, 2005.

It was the worst-ever terrorist attack on British soil, as well as Europe's first experience with a suicide bombing.

DOJ_NMG_0039325

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Recent Arrests In Terror Plots Yield Debate On Pre-emptive Action By Government (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 8 — In Miami last month and now in New York, terror cases have unfolded in which suspects have been apprehended before they lined up the intended weapons and the necessary financing or figured out other central details necessary to carry out their plots.

For officials in Washington, it is a demonstration of the much-needed emphasis in this post-9/11 era for pre-emptive arrests.

"We don't wait until someone has lit the fuse to step in," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Friday at a news conference about the New York plot.

But the Miami and New York cases are inspiring a new round of skepticism from some lawyers who are openly questioning whether the government, in its zeal to stop terrorism, is forgetting an element central to any case: the actual intent to commit a crime.

"Talk without any kind of an action means nothing," said Martin R. Stolar, a New York defense lawyer. "You start to criminalize people who are not really criminals."

In the two most recent plots, the authorities have simultaneously warned that the suspects were contemplating horrific attacks — blowing up the Sears Tower in Chicago and setting off a bomb in a tunnel between New York and New Jersey — but then added that as far as they knew, no one was close to actually making such a strike.

In the Miami case, an F.B.I. official said at a recent hearing that the suspects apparently did not have written information on how to make explosives, details on the layout of the Sears Tower or any known link to a terrorist group.

In New York, officials said Friday that none of the eight suspects believed to be planning the tunnel attack were in the United States, and that they apparently did not have bomb materials and had not completed reconnaissance work on their supposed target.

The arrest on April 27 in Beirut of Assem Hammoud, 31, a Lebanese man who is accused of being the mastermind of the tunnel plot, came after the authorities monitored Internet chat rooms used by Islamic extremists who had used coded language to discuss a possible attack. One American official said the members of the group had never met one another.

In announcing the case, federal officials, including Mr. Chertoff, said the government could not waste time trying to determine whether the suspects were smart enough or serious enough to turn their threats into destructive action.

"It is a mistake to assume that the only terrorist that's a serious terrorist is the kind of guy you see on television, that's a kind of James Bond type," Mr. Chertoff said Friday. "The fact of the matter is mixing a bomb in a bathtub does not take rocket science."

Representative Peter T. King, a New York Republican and the chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said that the cases also demonstrate that the authorities cannot always delay charges until they have built airtight criminal cases.

"It was essential that the F.B.I. get rid of its pre-9/11 mentality of not making an arrest until they have enough evidence to convict," Mr. King said Friday in an interview. "You can't be locking everyone up. But so long as there are reasonable grounds to make the arrest, they should do that."

Mark J. Mershon, an F.B.I. assistant director, said that the apprehensions related to the New York case — so far no one has been arrested in the United States — began after the authorities were convinced that the talk was close to turning into action.

"Plotting for this attack had matured to a point where it appeared that the individuals were about to move forward," Mr. Mershon said Friday in New York.

"They were about to go to a phase where they would attempt to surveil targets, establish a regimen of attack and acquire the resources necessary to effectuate the attacks."

Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at University of Richmond in Virginia who tracks terrorism cases, said the modest evidence disclosed so far in some recent cases in relation to the ability of the suspects to deliver on their threats has caused him to wonder if politics might be a factor.

"There is some kind of public relations gained by making Americans on the one hand feel concerned that the Sears Tower in Chicago or some tunnel in Manhattan is targeted yet on the other hand feel comforted that the government is on top of it," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0039326

The questions posed about some of the terror-related arrests echo doubts raised when Tom Ridge was secretary of homeland security and the Bush administration half a dozen times raised the color-coded alert warning to orange, signaling a high risk of a terrorist attack, leading skeptics to suggest the up-and-down warning levels may have been driven in part by politics.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, according to a Justice Department tally, 261 defendants have been convicted or have pleaded guilty in terrorism or terrorism-related cases. But many of those cases have only remote connections to actual terrorism plots, like the case involving six men from Lackawanna, N.Y., who pleaded guilty to attending a terrorist training camp, but never actually took part in a terror plot.

But Pasquale J. D'Amuro, former assistant director in charge of the F.B.I. office in New York, said that law enforcement officials have no choice but to act pre-emptively, even if planning has not yet turned into an active plot.

"When they go operational, they run silent," Mr. D'Amuro said. "It becomes very difficult to follow them and try to trail them."

Mr. Chertoff acknowledged the debate on Friday, saying he had heard criticism by some that "the people you are arresting are not really serious or they don't really have the capacity of actually carrying something out."

But he said that the lesson not only of Sept. 11, but of terrorist attacks since then, including bombings last year in London, is that the government has no other choice. That means, he said, acting sooner rather than later, even if it might result in skeptics suggesting the plots were more imaginary than real.

"We are dangerously putting people at risk if somehow we believe that only criminal masterminds or terrorist masterminds are a threat," he said.

Terror Suspects Plotted Against Brooklyn Bridge, Other Landmarks, Officials Say (NSDY)

By Mohamad Bazzi

Long Island Newsday, July 9, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- Before Assem Hammoud and his associates decided to try to bomb New York's PATH trains, they had considered several other targets: the Brooklyn Bridge, the Golden Gate Bridge and the forests of California, where they would set a huge fire, Lebanese security officials told Newsday.

They eventually settled on the tunnels under the Hudson River, plotting to send suicide bombers to kill thousands of commuters and devastate the U.S. economy, according to two security officials who spoke yesterday on the condition on anonymity.

"They studied different possibilities and they decided to move ahead with an attack on the train tunnels," one official said. "They thought that would be the most viable plan."

Lebanese investigators found maps and other information about the two bridges and California forests when they raided Hammoud's home in Beirut after his arrest on April 27, the official said.

Hammoud, 31, is the alleged mastermind of the plot by eight al-Qaida followers scattered across six countries. He is being held in Lebanon. U.S. and Lebanese officials unraveled the plan by monitoring Internet chat rooms used by Islamic extremists -- long before any of the suspects tried to secure financing or explosives. None had even visited the United States.

U.S. officials said Friday that two other plotters were in custody but refused to say where. The Lebanese officials said that Hammoud was in contact with militants in Iran, Syria, Pakistan, Denmark and Canada, and that the other suspects are in those countries. The five plotters still at large are a Saudi, a Yemeni, a Palestinian, a Jordanian and an Iranian Kurd, according to the officials.

Although Lebanese and U.S. authorities said Hammoud was an al-Qaida operative who had sworn allegiance to Osama bin Laden, they did not outline his alleged ties to that group -- or its leaders -- when they first announced his arrest on Friday. That led some analysts to speculate that Hammoud was part of a new trend in global terrorism: small, localized cells that don't necessarily take orders from bin Laden or other al-Qaida leaders.

"This is the lone wolf phenomenon, where a small band of like-minded extremists decide to take action on their own," said Diaa Rashwan, a leading expert on Islamic militancy at the al-Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "They might draw inspiration from al-Qaida and bin Laden, but they might not be following direct orders."

The security officials told Newsday that Hammoud had contact with at least two of 13 men who were arrested by Lebanese authorities in December for belonging to al-Qaida and planning attacks from Lebanon. The officials said Hammoud was in touch with Hassan Nabaat, a Lebanese, and Hany Shanti, who has both Lebanese and Jordanian nationalities. But Lebanese officials have provided few details about those arrested, their relationship to al-Qaida and what attacks they were plotting.

Investigators moved to arrest Hammoud in late April -- after keeping him under surveillance for three months -- because they concluded that he had obtained a visa to Pakistan and was getting ready to leave. After his arrest, the officials said, he confessed he was to undergo four months of training in Pakistan at an al-Qaida-linked camp.

DOJ_NMG_0039327

The officials said Hammoud also had applied for a tourist visa at the Canadian Embassy in Beirut. He had traveled several times to Canada and studied business administration at a university in Montreal in the mid-1990s. Once he entered Canada this time, an official said, Hammoud planned to go to the United States and organize the train attacks in October or November.

The son of a wealthy Sunni Muslim family from Beirut, Hammoud taught economics and management at Lebanese International University, a private college. He is fluent in Arabic, English, French and German, relatives said.

In militant chat rooms, he was instructed not to grow a beard, wear Islamic clothing or show any outward sign of religious devotion. He was told to act like a typical Lebanese young man so he could avoid suspicions.

Hammoud did not disappoint his militant handlers, living a fast life in Beirut, according to his family and Lebanese officials. He frequently went out to nightclubs and cafes. He traveled around the Middle East, Europe and Canada. He drank and dated women. He even drove a red sports car -- an MG convertible.

Before his arrest, he was planning to take part in a car race this summer, according to his mother, Nabila Qotb, 58. In an interview at the family's home in an upscale Beirut neighborhood, she insisted her son had no connection to al-Qaida or any militant group.

"He's very well educated. He speaks several languages. He likes to enjoy life, to go out and play sports," she said, sitting in a living room with flower print couches. "Why are people making these accusations against him? My son is innocent. ... I'm certain that he has no connection to al-Qaida. Absolutely none at all."

Activists Cited For Protest Near NSA (WT/AP)

By Ben Nuckols

The Washington Times/AP, July 9, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Thirteen anti-war activists were given citations yesterday for protesting outside the National Security Agency headquarters at Fort Meade.

An agency security officer cited the activists for "entering into military facility for purposes prohibited by law" and ordered them to leave the area, protest organizers and an agency spokesman said. They were ordered to appear in U.S. District Court in Baltimore to be arraigned at a date to be announced.

Twenty-five persons participated in the protest, but only 13 who refused to stop carrying signs were cited, said Max Obuszewski, one of those cited and a member of the group Pledge of Resistance -- Baltimore. They carried a banner reading "NSA = Crime Scene" and other signs protesting the agency's involvement in the war in Iraq.

The activists were stopped on a public road near the entrance to the agency that provides access to two museums that are open to the public, Mr. Obuszewski said.

"We were on, I would argue, public property," he said. "Anybody could go there and get gasoline. Anybody could go there and visit the two museums."

The activists were handed a document dated May 12, 2005, indicating that "protests, public speeches, marches, sit-ins, political displays, or demonstrations" were banned at Fort Meade. But Mr. Obuszewski said he had protested at the same spot a few times since that date without being cited.

"They never showed us this document before," he said. "Why were they allowing us out there before?"

Don Weber, an agency spokesman, declined to comment on that claim. Fort Meade policy specifies that protesters must submit a written request for a permit, he said.

"The requirement on Fort Meade is that they have a permit to protest," Mr. Weber said. "They did not. Although they were given a couple of opportunities not to be, they chose to be cited."

The Pledge of Resistance -- Baltimore sent a letter last month to Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander, the agency's director, seeking a meeting to discuss what it called "the illegal wiretapping and wholesale collection of Americans' phone records" and "the NSA's surveillance of our group."

The organization has received no response, Mr. Obuszewski said.

Investors Lead Home Sale Boom In New Orleans (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, July 8 — In a market spurred by speculators and bargain hunters, an extraordinarily large number of houses in the flood-ravaged metropolitan area here are being sold, according to real estate analysts, who say volume and sales prices exceed levels before Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0039328

The higher prices are largely due to an increase in value in suburban areas, many of which were not heavily flooded, or in dry areas of New Orleans. But flooded houses in the city are being bought as well, often at deep discounts of as much as $50 a square foot less than they would have sold for before the hurricane.

"We have a stronger housing market than before," said Wade R. Ragas, professor emeritus of finance at the University of New Orleans and the president of a local consulting firm, Real Property Associates.

"There is renovation activity in every ZIP code of Orleans Parish," Dr. Ragas added, "but the strongest buying activity is, in general, closest to where it did not flood or where there was under two feet of water."

Across the nine-parish region that includes New Orleans, 7,506 single-family homes were sold between January and the end of last month, compared with 6,449 in the same period last year, according to statistics from the New Orleans Metropolitan Association of Realtors and the Gulf South Real Estate Information Network. The average price so far this year is $221,244, compared with $193,097 in the same period last year.

The interest in buying, selling and renovating has been a bright spot since the last months of 2005, and has confounded some people who thought the flooding would cripple the housing market for years. But it is just one of many counterintuitive contrasts that are defining the area and making easy predictions unreliable.

Before the storm, Jennifer and Rodney Greenup lived in the Gentilly neighborhood of New Orleans, in a 1950's-era, 2,600-square-foot house with a red tile roof that they bought nine years ago for $108,000. It was appraised for nearly $240,000 before Hurricane Katrina.

But after the storm, when the levees broke, Gentilly was inundated, and the house sat in deep, murky water for weeks.

It sold after just two weeks on the market in February for $110,000. The house had been gutted and still lacks walls, floors, appliances and other standard fixtures.

"We didn't think we'd be able to get anything remotely normal when we decided to sell it," said Ms. Greenup, a pharmacist. "We just wanted to do all right and would have been happy to get 80 grand."

The buyer was a firefighter who said he had admired the house for years and planned to fix it up and live in it.

Kim and Reginald Glass are among the local investors betting on flood-ruined areas like Gentilly, which was a solidly middle-class neighborhood north of downtown toward Lake Pontchartrain. They have bought eight damaged houses for prices from $50,000 to $112,000, which Ms. Glass says probably represents about half the houses' market value before the storm.

"We had too much invested in New Orleans to walk away," said Ms. Glass, a lawyer who grew up in Gentilly. "We needed to figure out a way to stay here and make a living. So we decided to purchase properties in Gentilly. We looked to purchase any property that had potential, in hope of being able to renovate and rent. I think we're going to try the rental market, because there are so many people looking to come back."

The home the Glass family lived in had flood damage, and a house they were building on the lakeshore suffered wind damage. Undaunted, they returned to the city as early as possible, in October, and got to work.

"The biggest problem has been getting things like cabinets and appliances in," Ms. Glass said. "It's been quite an experience. But we knew that we were coming back to fight."

For-sale signs are everywhere, even in neighborhoods that feel dead, in this city of contrasts.. Some flood-ruined areas are still foul-smelling and dirty, while other neighborhoods are vibrant and clean. Some areas still have looting and other crimes, while many neighborhoods are generally safe, and tourists roam the French Quarter with drinks in hand.

Though billions of dollars in federal housing aid will begin pouring into the city this fall, there is no clear vision for renovating vast parts of the area, and some experts say speculators are taking a significant risk. In addition, there has been a 20 percent increase in the cost of construction materials, and the city continues to have a shortage of workers, experts say.

"We don't know how things will pan out," said Ivan J. Miestchovich Jr., director of the Real Estate Market Data Center and the Center for Economic Development, both at the University of New Orleans. "There's a readjustment period right now. I think there's still a big question mark."

Amy Liu, deputy director of the Metropolitan Policy Program at the Brookings Institution in Washington, which is studying the post-storm recovery, said she was stunned by the number of houses on the market, but like Dr. Miestchovich was not sure what to make of it.

"What it means to us is that people are finally making decisions," Ms. Liu said. "If people are choosing to leave, that could be a bad thing. But if inventory is moving, then that's a good thing. To us, this is part of the natural churning that has to happen."

If much of the movement is being driven by speculators, that is not necessarily bad either, Ms. Liu said.

"If there are folks who are not financially able to clean up their homes," she said, "it is much better to have someone buy it than have it be abandoned and foreclosed."

DOJ_NMG_0039329

Some sectors of the economy, of course, depend on optimism to survive, particularly real estate. Dee Luscy, president of the New Orleans Metropolitan Association of Realtors, said she thought the fear about the future was beginning to lift around the region.

"I think in the beginning people were afraid," Ms. Luscy said. "A lot of people thought, 'We'll never be able to give this stuff away.' Now we're seeing that things are selling. I think people are over the initial shock and are starting to feel O.K. about going on with life. What happened was like death. You go through stages of grief."

Vicki Shreves sold her gutted, 1,600-square-foot house in the Uptown section of New Orleans without putting up a for-sale sign. A friend of the family visited the house, on a street that had eight feet of water, "and wanted to know if we wanted to sell it," Ms. Shreves said. "It just seemed like such an easy thing, we said fine."

To Ms. Shreves, an accountant, the thought of rebuilding was depressing, and mold was a concern. But she had not decided to sell when she and her husband got the offer, which was close to $100 a square foot.

Before the storm, she said, she probably could have sold the house for $330,000. "When the storm came and obliterated it," she said, "we were happy to get $150,000."

"We got a check right there and closed the sale," she added.

Beth Amadon bought a flooded house in a neighborhood near Lake Pontchartrain for about 50 percent of its prestorm value of more than $600,000. Ms. Amadon knows what the houses are worth because she put in an offer on a different house in the same neighborhood just days before Hurricane Katrina.

"After the storm we couldn't get back to the city, so we agreed to walk away from that sale," she said. "That's how we ended up buying a different house."

In addition, Ms. Amadon sold several distressed properties that she and her husband, a real estate developer, had owned in the Tremé area near the French Quarter for about 20 percent more than they would have expected before the hurricane. The buyer was a resident who said he intended to rent the houses.

"People seem anxious to buy historically relevant houses close to the French Quarter," Ms. Amadon said. "It's been an interesting year."

Joan Farabaugh, a real estate agent in New Orleans, said she had earned as much income in the past six months as she did in all of last year.

"And I have as much business with nonflooded as flooded" houses, Ms. Farabaugh said. "Most of my sales are people who are locals, buying and fixing up."

She said she believed that her clients had faith in the future.

"They feel that what happened was unusual, and they don't feel that this will happen again," she said of the levee breaches and catastrophic flooding. "They feel they will be fine."

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Military Braces For Flurry Of Criminal Cases In Iraq (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

No American serviceman has been executed since 1961. But in the past month, new cases in Iraq have led to charges against 12 American servicemen who may face the death penalty in connection with the killing of Iraqi civilians.

Military officials caution against seeing the cases as part of any broader pattern, noting that the incidents in question are isolated and rare. But the new charges represent an extraordinary flurry in a conflict that has had relatively few serious criminal cases so far.

As investigators complete their work, military officials say, the total of American servicemen charged with capital crimes in the new cases could grow substantially, perhaps exceeding the total of at least 16 other marines and soldiers charged with murdering Iraqis throughout the first three years of the war.

Some military officials and experts say the new crop of cases appears to arise from a confluence of two factors: an increasingly chaotic and violent war with no clear end in sight, and a newly vigilant attitude among American commanders about civilian deaths.

At least five separate incidents involving the deaths of Iraqis are under investigation, setting off the greatest outcry against American military actions since the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. By far the best known of the cases is the one in Haditha, where marines are being investigated in the killings of 24 Iraqi civilians in November. No charges have been filed in that case, but some say news of the incident may have helped bring some later cases to light.

DOJ_NMG_0039330

"Unusual criminal acts raise the level of concern, whether in the military or among civilians, and with increased concern comes increased reporting," said Gary Solis, a former marine who teaches the law of war at Georgetown University.

In April, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the No. 2 American commander in Iraq, issued an order that specified for the first time that American forces must investigate any use of force against Iraqis that resulted in death, injury or property damage greater than $10,000. Maj. Todd Breasseale, a spokesman for the American command, said he knew of no clear link between General Chiarelli's order and the recent homicide investigations.

But Major Breasseale said that General Chiarelli, who took over day-to-day military operations in Iraq in January, has made clear to subordinates that he puts a high priority on avoiding and scrupulously reporting civilian casualties. American commanders in Iraq will be scrutinizing civilian deaths more intensely as the United States moves toward transferring authority to Iraqis, Major Breasseale said. Details about the five incidents under investigation are still emerging, and none of those charged have yet had an Article 32 hearing, the military's equivalent of a grand jury proceeding.

The incidents are far from the only ones in which American forces killed Iraqis. But serious criminal charges in such cases have been rare until now. In many earlier cases, the killings have been found to be justifiable, and the soldiers or marines in question have often been handled through administrative or nonjudicial processes.

The last soldier to be executed was John A. Bennett, hanged in 1961 after being convicted of the rape and attempted murder of an 11-year-old Austrian girl.

In the Iraq war, when soldiers or marines have been charged, convictions — and harsh sentences — have been rare. Of the 16 American servicemen known to have been previously charged with murder, only six were convicted or pleaded guilty to that charge, and none received the death penalty. In all, 14 service members have been convicted of any charge in connection with the deaths of Iraqis and have received sentences as varied as life in prison or dismissal from the service.

Among the new incidents, all five took place in central Iraq, in areas where the Sunni Arab insurgency is firmly entrenched despite years of effort to quell it by American and Iraqi forces. To some, that is the only thing that seems to link them.

"This is a war in which soldiers and civilians are constantly mingling, and they often don't understand each other," said Loren B. Thompson, a military analyst at the Lexington Institute. "The enemy has a conscious strategy of demoralizing U.S. forces by disorienting and confusing them. Against that backdrop, the number of alleged atrocities is quite low compared with other conflicts in the past."

In Vietnam, a much longer conflict, 95 American soldiers and 27 marines were convicted of killing noncombatants.

Some of the men under investigation in Iraq had done multiple tours in Iraq, and that, too, may have played a role.

"They can become almost numb to the killing," said Charles W. Gittins, a former marine and a lawyer who has represented marines accused of murder in Iraq. "The more you're in it, the more you want to live through it. You think more about preserving your own life than about what's the right thing to do."

In many of the cases where American troops killed Iraqi civilians, they were later found to have acted within their rules of engagement. Some of those cases became notorious, at least in the Arab world.

In Falluja in November 2004, for instance, the freelance journalist Kevin Sites filmed a Marine corporal shooting an apparently wounded and unarmed Iraqi in a mosque. The videotape generated a frenzy of negative publicity, but in May 2005 a military review cleared the corporal, stating that he had acted within the rules of engagement.

The definition of murder can be far more elusive in a war zone than in civilian life. In some previous criminal cases, soldiers or marines have claimed they acted in self-defense or carrying out mercy killings.

Cpl. Dustin M. Berg of the Indiana National Guard, who was sentenced to 18 months in prison for killing his Iraqi police partner, said he acted because he feared his partner was going to shoot him.

In 2004, Staff Sgt. Johnny Horne said he killed a wounded 16-year-old Iraqi boy to put him out of his misery after a gun battle with Shiite militants.

Sergeant Horne pleaded guilty to unpremeditated murder and was sentenced to three years in prison, later reduced to one year.

In the heaviest penalty yet issued in the Iraq war, Sgt. Michael P. Williams was sentenced to life in prison after being convicted of premeditated murder last year in the killing of two Iraqi civilians in Baghdad. The sentence was later reduced to 25 years.

"I think there's a recognition that these are weird environments," said Eugene R. Fidell, a specialist in military law. "The danger is, carried to an extreme, that can mean throwing the law books out."

The flurry of new cases has taken on a high profile in the news media and public discussion. The barriers to conviction, though, will be formidable. Recovering credible evidence in Iraq's chaos can be very difficult, and Iraqi witnesses are open to challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0039331

"There's going to be very little forensic evidence," Mr. Gittins said. "Jury members who have served in Iraq know that it is pretty common for Iraqis to lie to Americans. Also, the military pays the relatives of civilians who are killed — so they have an incentive to lie."

Some members of the military juries are likely to have served in Iraq, and are familiar with the chaotic atmosphere surrounding any decision to use force. "The presumption of innocence is going to reign supreme," Mr. Gittins said.

Haditha Probe Finds Leadership Negligent (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

The U.S. military officer overseeing the investigation into 24 civilian killings in Haditha, Iraq, has concluded that Marine leadership failed multiple times, including in pre-deployment training, in the tone set by commanders, and in how information was reported up the chain of command, defense officials said.

Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the No. 2 officer in Iraq, found that commanders and staff at the regimental and division levels were negligent in how they conveyed orders about how to deal with Iraqi civilians and also in how they responded to conflicting reports they received from units about the Haditha incident, the officials said.

Most of Chiarelli's "Findings and Recommendations" endorse the conclusions of an investigation led by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell, the officials said. Bargewell concluded that Marine commanders should have asked more questions about how and why 15 Iraqi civilians -- the number first reported -- were killed, especially after a discrepancy emerged between the first report, that they had been killed by a roadside bomb, and a later report, that they all had died of gunshot wounds. Chiarelli told colleagues that he was stunned to learn that no investigation of the incident had been conducted even after it was evident that the facts of the matter were in dispute, an official said.

Bargewell's report also criticized the Marine Corps for letting stand a statement, released in November by one of its public affairs officers, that the Iraqis had been killed by a roadside bomb, instead of correcting the record when it was clear the statement was incorrect.

Chiarelli has long been concerned that the U.S. military was inadequately prepared to conduct an effective counterinsurgency campaign in Iraq. He also included thoughts about how better to prepare troops and commanders, the official added.

"You've got to prepare for the fight you're in today," said a second defense official, summarizing Chiarelli's findings on the military's inadequate training for counterinsurgency operations. "It's totally different" from fighting in Iraq two or three years ago, he said.

The Army, for example, tends in its training to emphasize using heavy firepower against the enemy, although classic counterinsurgency doctrine teaches that soldiers should use the minimal amount of force necessary to accomplish the mission.

Also, the Army early in Iraq tended to focus on killing or capturing insurgents, although counterinsurgency doctrine teaches that the best way to deal with an insurgent is to persuade him to change sides or to desert. Also, in contrast to a spate of cases of abuse of detainees, counterinsurgency theorists recommend treating captured fighters well, to encourage them to desert and to persuade others to give themselves up. Above all, people are seen as the prize in the war, not as its playing field.

When stacked up, Bargewell's exhaustive investigation stands more than four feet high. His report will not be released, but, later this week, Chiarelli is expected to release a redacted version of his 30-page report. On Friday, Chiarelli gave his report to Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, but Casey is not expected to ask for major changes, the officials said.

The two generals' inquiry into the role of the Marine Corps chain of command in the incident is different from a criminal investigation being conducted by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS). That investigation involves more than 45 agents and is expected to conclude this summer, Pentagon officials have said.

No charges have been filed, but people familiar with the case say they expect charges of homicide, making a false statement and dereliction of duty, among others. Defense attorneys are expected to respond that the Marines involved were operating within the rules of engagement they had been given.

Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, a squad leader who was at Haditha, told his attorney last month that several civilians were killed last November when his squad went after insurgents who were firing at them from inside a house after a Marine convoy was hit by a roadside bomb. Wuterich said there was no vengeful massacre, even though women and children were killed. He instead described a house-to-house hunt that went awry on a chaotic battlefield.

"It will forever be his position that everything they did that day was following their rules of engagement and to protect the lives of Marines," Neal A. Puckett, who represents Wuterich, said then.

DOJ_NMG_0039332

NCIS is investigating members of Kilo Company of the 3rd Battalion of the 1st Marine Regiment, based at Camp Pendleton, Calif. While in Iraq, the battalion was attached to the 2nd Marine Division based at Camp Lejeune, N.C. Chiarelli blames Gen. Richard A. Huck, who then commanded that division, for leadership failure, the official said. Huck recently retired from the Marines and could not be reached for comment yesterday.

The Bargewell investigation began in January after a Time magazine reporter began asking questions about the Haditha incident. Time's report appeared in March. A few weeks later, Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani was relieved of command of the 3rd Battalion of the 1st Marines, Kilo Company's parent unit. Two subordinates also were removed. The Marines did not specify why the actions were taken, beyond saying that the officers had lost their superiors' confidence.

But Haditha did not become a major issue until May, when Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who had turned sharply against the Iraq war, said at a news conference that Marines had "killed innocent civilians in cold blood." Murtha is a former Marine and had been briefed by a senior Marine officer on the probe.

Spokesmen for the Marine Corps and for the Central Command, which oversees U.S. military operations in Iraq and the rest of the Middle East, declined to comment. Some of the details of Chiarelli's findings were reported Friday night by CBS News and the New York Times.

U.S. Seeks To Exhume Iraqi Girl's Remains (AP)

By Ryan Lenz

AP, July 9, 2006

U.S. investigators have asked Iraqi authorities to help them navigate cultural sensitivities to exhume the body of a teenager allegedly raped and murdered with her family by American soldiers, a military official said Saturday.

U.S. Maj. Mark Wright said U.S. authorities are aware that Islamic tradition has strict rules governing exhumation and could require religious leaders to become involved in the investigation.

"You want to be aware of these cultural issues while at the same time making sure that the accused receives proper justice," Wright, a spokesman for the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, told The Associated Press.

Muslim tradition generally frowns on exhumations, considering them desecration of the remains.

However, Ahmed Taha, the uncle of the dead teen, told AP Thursday that relatives were eager to cooperate with investigators and would allow them to exhume the body of the alleged rape victim, Abeer Qassim Hamza. Her parents and sister were also slain.

Ex-soldier Steven D. Green was arrested last week in North Carolina and has pleaded not guilty to one count of rape and four counts of murder.

Four soldiers from the 1st Battalion, 502nd Infantry Regiment have been taken to a U.S. military camp in Baghdad for questioning, Wright said. He would not say if those soldiers had been arrested, but another U.S. official said Saturday that several more soldiers would soon be charged. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Based on interviews and records, the U.S. military now believes the woman who Green is accused of raping and killing was between the ages of 14 and 20, Army spokesman Paul Boyce said Friday. While the military initially said she was 20, Boyce said he has seen documents that indicate she could have been about 14.

Wright said officials are also considering whether certain parts of a standard Western autopsy would be taboo in Iraq and if a religious leader or family members should be present to ensure cultural barriers are not crossed.

He said U.S. military commanders in Iraq are working with the family's relatives to expedite the investigation, but that it was not immediately clear whether Iraqis or Americans would have custody of the woman's remains.

U.S. officials are concerned that the alleged rape-slaying, which occurred March 12 near Mahmoudiya, south of Baghdad, will strain relations with the new U.S.-backed government and increase calls for changes in the agreement that exempts American soldiers from prosecution in Iraqi courts.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has demanded an independent investigation into the case, which followed a series of allegations that U.S. troops killed and mistreated Iraqi civilians.

According to an FBI affidavit, Green and at least two others targeted the teenager and her family for a week before the attack, which wasn't revealed until witnesses came forward in late June.

The soldiers drank alcohol, abandoned their checkpoint, changed clothes to avoid detection and headed to the victims' house, about 200 yards from a U.S. military checkpoint in the so-called "Triangle of Death", a Sunni Arab area south of Baghdad known for its violence, the affidavit said.

In the week since the allegations came to light, the military has remained tightlipped even amid growing cries by Iraqi leaders for a fair investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0039333

President Bush, speaking on CNN's "Larry King Live" last Thursday, said the Iraqis should understand that the allegations will be handled "in a very transparent upfront way."

"People will be held to account if these charges are true," Bush said.

In the chow halls and barracks, many soldiers remain convinced that the alleged rape and killings in Mahmoudiya were aberrations and that most American service members respect the rules of war.

"These crimes are against all the Army values, so if you don't have any of those values, you shouldn't even call yourself a soldier," said Staff Sgt. Ahmand Brown, 28, of Flint, Mich.

In the aftermath of claims that Marines killed civilians in the western town of Haditha in November, the U.S. military in Iraq ordered all personnel to undergo values training.

The Army has also paid greater attention to its rules of engagements, which determine when a soldier can use deadly force. But a bad soldier is a bad soldier, no matter the training, Brown said.

Green, who served 11 months with the 101st Airborne Division, based at Fort Campbell, Ky., received an honorable discharge and left the army in mid-May. He was discharged because of an "anti-social personality disorder," according to military officials and court documents.

But even before the rape-murder allegation surfaced, the military was investigating an incident in which three soldiers from the same battalion were killed by insurgents near Youssifiyah. Two of them apparently were abducted and slain, with their bodies mutilated.

U.S. officials insist they have no evidence that the incidents are related.

Marines Getting A New Message (LAT)

By Tony Perry And T. Christian Miller

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Even before the investigation of the killing of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha is complete, the Marine Corps has taken action, stressing accountability and sternly reminding officers that they must investigate all civilian deaths.

The investigative report, by an Army general, will be highly critical of officers for not investigating the Nov. 19 incident in which Marines from Camp Pendleton allegedly stormed into houses and killed the occupants after a roadside bombing killed a fellow Marine.

The report will also recommend that the Marine Corps change its training to remind troops that the rules for dealing with insurgencies are different from those for classic battles such as the assault on Baghdad in 2003 and the operations in the Sunni Triangle in 2004.

The Corps has anticipated the criticism, government officials close to the inquiry say.

"The word has gone out very clearly: When a civilian is killed, officers need to know how and why, and they need to get that information to the highest levels as quickly as possible," said an official who declined to be identified.

Training at Camp Pendleton, Twentynine Palms and other bases has been altered to emphasize restraint in the use of deadly force when civilians are involved.

In late May, Marine Commandant Gen. Michael Hagee went to Iraq to remind Marines of the international rules of warfare that call for protection of noncombatants.

And Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, who led Marines into Iraq in 2003 and during the April 2004 fight in Fallouja, recently returned from an unpublicized two-week trip to Iraq to talk to Marines.

Bing West, a former assistant Defense secretary and author of two books about the Marines in Iraq, said that Mattis had made it "crystal clear": "If shot at from a crowd of civilians, a Marine is not to fire back and endanger women and children."

Former Marine Col. Thomas X. Hammes, an expert on insurgent warfare, said a lack of accountability in cases involving the mistreatment of civilians by U.S. personnel — particularly at the Abu Ghraib prison — helped fuel the insurgency by creating a source of frustration among ordinary Iraqis.

He praised efforts to promote greater accountability among senior officers, saying it would help fight the war in Iraq.

"To date, we've been very, very poor at holding our people accountable," Hammes said. "Anything that … emphasizes the responsibility up the chain of command is a positive step. It certainly will help our troops on the ground."

The investigative report was done by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell and reviewed by Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli.

Chiarelli's office said Friday that the report would next be sent to Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq. Finally, the report will be sent to Marine Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler, commanding general of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force at Camp Pendleton.

DOJ_NMG_0039334

Sattler, or his successor, will use that report, and an investigation by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, to determine whether any of a dozen Marines with the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, should face criminal charges. Sattler is set to be relieved this summer by Mattis.

Investigators have concluded that some of the Marines should face murder charges and that the killings were unprovoked and outside the international rules of warfare. Defense attorneys insist that the Marines were acting within the rules of engagement laid down by their officers.

The Army report is known to be critical of top officers in the 2nd Marine Division for failing to see "red flags" that should have made them question the report from ground troops. The military began an investigation only after Time magazine uncovered evidence disputing the Marines' original account of the killings.

Although the troops are with the 1st Marine Division based at Camp Pendleton, they were accountable to officers with the 2nd Regiment of the 2nd Marine Division, based at Camp Lejeune, N.C.

Two top officers in the chain of command during the Haditha incident were replaced last month, though officials said both changes had been scheduled before the controversy.

Maj. Gen. Richard Huck, commanding officer of the 2nd Marine Division, announced his retirement. And Col. Stephen Davis, commander of the second 2nd Regiment, was replaced and reassigned.

After the troops involved in the Haditha incident returned to Camp Pendleton, the commanding general of the 1st Marine Division relieved the battalion commander and company commander after losing "confidence in their leadership."

Said one Marine officer with extensive experience in Iraq, "No question, this hasn't been the Marine Corps' finest hour. But I think everybody is locked on to seeing that it never happens again."

Perry reported from San Diego and Miller from Washington.

Rules Of War Of Value To Soldiers (AP)

By Robert Tanner

AP, July 9, 2006

Whether it's firing a rifle from 100 feet away or directing a bombing raid from a mile or more in the air, the military objective is the same: Kill the enemy.

Troops get instruction in deadly skills from the first time they put on a uniform.

But there's another lesson they're taught, one that's rooted in philosophy and old-fashioned values like honor and courage. Call it the morality of war: how to kill, but not murder.

At a time when a flurry of criminal allegations have been raised against U.S. troops — charges or investigations in five separate cases alleging they gunned down unarmed Iraqis or detainees — military personnel and their instructors insist ethics training is both vital and vibrant.

This is how it breaks down for Tim Coderre, a sniper with the National Guard who spent more than five months in a frontline operation in Iraq amid heavy fighting: "I'm not a warmonger. But I understand my job. ... My job is to be ferocious in combat, to be a killer. I'm sorry, but that's war."

Coderre was a Marine for eight years before returning to civilian life in North Carolina. He joined the Guard after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and went to Iraq in 2004. "I don't apologize," he said. "I'm very proud of the number of confirmed kills I had."

Killing from a distance, he shot only those who he judged were enemy insurgents. The rules of war — no targeting civilians, no killing prisoners — were ingrained, he said, despite his revulsion for the insurgents and their tactics, such as beheading prisoners.

"I could never do that to them," he said. "I hate insurgents, but I could never do that to them."

At West Point, moral training is at the heart of the enterprise, said retired Army Col. Don Snider, a professor of political science.

Classes teach philosophy, logic and the history of war, emphasizing the right conduct and the unacceptable, like My Lai in Vietnam, where American troops killed about 300 villagers, or the French experience in Algeria, where commanders turned to torture to fight rebels.

"Normally, the right (choice) is harder than the wrong, or there is no clear right and wrong. In many cases, soldiers are choosing between two wrongs, because both have morally ambiguous outcomes," he said. An example: A unit takes fire from a village, with no target in sight. Should the troops fire back, with the likelihood of civilian casualties? Retreat?

Each choice has moral consequences, he said.

Among the latest accusations, the charge that a group of soldiers raped an Iraqi woman and killed her and her family would — if proved true — clearly fall outside the bounds of military and civilian law. In others cases, in which villagers and detainees were killed, defense attorneys say troops in danger made difficult choices but followed the rules of war.

DOJ_NMG_0039335

At the U.S. Naval Academy, a class called "The Code of the Warrior" examines warrior cultures, looking at the ancient Greeks, the Vikings, American Indian tribes, the Japanese samurai and others.

Shannon French, an associate professor of philosophy, aims to distill the essence of warrior values and the reasons they matter so much.

"It's so vital. Those rules are there to keep them from becoming monsters," French said. "Any time you take a human life, there is trauma, there is what we'd call moral, psychological or even spiritual damage. Nothing removes the trauma.

"But if, after the fact, you can understand the reason for the killing, and recognize how it fits in with the values you were raised with, how it isn't an affront to those values, then you can integrate that into your identity in a way that is healing."

Her students reject even the word "killer," insisting it carries a judgment that doesn't fit a warrior.

If the rules fail, French said, a great deal is at risk: hopes that your captured soldiers will be treated humanely, the chance to reconcile with the enemy when the war is over, the power to keep allies at your side and support at home.

Most important are the troops themselves, she said. At stake is their return to civilian life and sanity. The temptation to cross the line is undeniable in the chaos of battle, but so is the result.

To make the lessons real, her classes feature visits by American warriors.

In one case, a bomber pilot came to her class, bringing videos of his missions in Afghanistan. Infrared footage of targets exploding brought cheers from her class of would-be pilots.

"He paused an image, which was an infrared explosion, a larger explosion and some smaller heat signatures.

"He said, `What are the smaller heat signatures you're seeing?' They paused: 'People?' `That's right, when we hit this building, people came out. Why is that one so much hotter than the others?'"

"Then he let the image play, and that signature ran erratically. Finally, one of the students spoke up and said 'He's on fire?'" French recounted. "You could've heard a pin drop."

"My speaker turned to the class and looked them in the eye. 'That is a human being writhing in agony, and I caused that and I have to live with that," she said.

The pilot wasn't trying to frighten them out of the task ahead of them, French said. He was simply trying to force them to acknowledge the moral weight of warfare — even from a distance.

"He didn't regret what he did, but he felt for his own moral well being he did have to mourn it," she said.

For Coderre, back in civilian life as a deputy sheriff in coastal North Carolina, few can relate to his experience in war unless they've been through the same.

"That's something people really don't want to hear about. 'My God, you're happy you killed someone?'" he said.

But no apology is necessary, he said. "Yes, a soldier, a sailor, was able to go home because of me," he said.

When The Personality Disorder Wears Camouflage (NYT)

By Benedict Carey

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WHEN a war crime doesn't look quite like a war crime — when it seems cold and deliberate like a serial murder, rather than an impulsive act of vengeance — it can be especially disturbing, as United States Army officials have learned over the past week.

According to federal prosecutors, an Army private and several comrades attacked an Iraqi family last March, raping and killing a young woman after executing her parents and her younger sister in their home. The men disguised themselves for the attack and worked as a team, the prosecutors said. Iraqi leaders are in an uproar, as are American officials in and out of the military.

The accused ringleader, Steven D. Green, 21, who was discharged in May, pleaded not guilty after his arrest June 30, and details of the crime were still emerging last week. The Army has said it discharged Mr. Green for a "personality disorder."

Which raises a question: How does someone with a personality disorder — a significant, disabling, and dangerous condition — manage the stress of combat? Wouldn't a person with a serious mental problem drop out, or be identified and quickly discharged?

The answer, usually, is yes. People with paranoid, borderline or compulsive personality disorders, for instance, are hobbled by anxieties and delusional fears, experts say: two months of boot camp would typically be overwhelming for them. The low frequency of psychiatric breakdowns in Iraq — about 8 in 1,000 service members have been evacuated for psychiatric problems, fewer than in previous wars — suggests that few people with significant mental illness make it far in the service.

Yet the military does not perform full personality assessments on recruits unless there is some pressing reason to do so. Most anyone who has graduated from high school and avoided serious trouble with the law is qualified to enlist. And the psychological pressure recruits face during basic training is less intense than it once was, military experts say; the "shark attack" of screaming officers that used to greet fresh recruits has been tamed at some bases.

DOJ_NMG_0039336

In this environment, people who have one diagnosis in particular — antisocial personality disorder — can often masquerade as bold, effective soldiers, psychiatrists argue. Antisocial behavior is characterized by reckless irresponsibility, habitual lying and an indifference to the suffering of others. In some reports Army officials have listed such a diagnosis as the reason for Mr. Green's discharge.

"These are generally rough-and-ready types who tend to be trouble makers, who have no loyalty to groups or commanders," said Dr. Michael Stone, a professor of clinical psychiatry at Columbia University, who said he could not comment directly on the Army case. He added: "But they don't have to be pushed to act ruthlessly toward enemy combatants. It comes very naturally, which can be an admirable quality. And some small percentage of them are bound to slip through the cracks."

This is especially likely if they have a measure of charisma, of superficial charm, a glib talent for telling lies, criminologists say. These are hallmark traits of what some experts call psychopathy, a potent blend of antisocial instincts and grandiosity. From 25 percent to 30 percent of people who commit deliberate crimes of violence score highly on a test called the psychopathy checklist, said Robert Hare, an emeritus professor of psychology at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver, who devised the test.

Dr. Hare said he had not reviewed the Iraq case and could not comment on it specifically. "I can say that when you have a psychopathic offender, quite often he will manipulate others, he can be a puppet-master type," he said. "Others are attracted to his sense of certainty, his sense of power, to the fact that he can do things others have trouble doing."

A person with psychopathic tendencies may appear to others as clearheaded as an elite soldier when under fire, or when on the attack. But the internal psychological reality is much different, research suggests.

In several experiments conducted in 2001 and 2002, Dr. Andy Morgan of Yale University found that Special Operations soldiers, the Army's most elite fighters, had higher levels of stress hormones in their blood than regular infantrymen when under extreme stress during training. But they also had higher levels of another hormone that is thought to be a natural relaxant. In short, Dr. Morgan concluded, the elite soldiers were very much aware of the danger and moral implications of their actions but able keep their heads, and relax quickly when the danger passed.

By contrast, the psychopath functions well under pressure because he does not feel the moral tension at all.

At a time when recruiting has become increasingly difficult, the distinctions between the cool-headed, aware soldier and the psychopath may sometimes be overlooked. Would-be enlistees who have misdemeanors and even felonies on their records can and do obtain waivers to join the military if they're seen as fit, said Beth Asch, a specialist in military manpower at the RAND Corporation.

"These people do get looked at closely, but what it means is that even though there is a recruiting standard, that standard is not rock hard, and that's how we might get people in the service who have had mental problems," or black marks on their record, she said.

The number of atrocities against civilians is still small given the large number of troops deployed in the region. But as recent events make clear, just a few soldiers cause big trouble.

One Family's Grief (WP)

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

On Jan. 18, 2005, Chris Hondros, a photographer for Getty Images embedded with the Army's 25th Infantry Division in Tall Afar, Iraq, captured the scene when a car carrying the Hassan family home in time for curfew didn't stop soon enough at the soldiers' command. They fired into the vehicle, killing Hussein and Kamila Hassan. Five of the couple's children and a young cousin were in the back seat. After Hondros's award-winning photos were published, the Hassan family's plight caught the attention of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), among others, who helped arrange for the injured Rakan, 12, to come to Boston for medical treatment. He and his younger siblings now live with their oldest sister and her husband in Mosul.

Blast Kills 3 GIs In Western Iraq (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

The troops were hunting for roadside bombs when their armored vehicle was destroyed by a massive explosive device in restive Ramadi.

RAMADI, Iraq — Three U.S. soldiers scouring the treacherous roads of western Iraq for remote-controlled explosive devices were killed by a massive roadside bomb that destroyed their heavily protected vehicle, military officials said Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0039337

In Baghdad, U.S. and Iraqi forces launched the third operation in two days targeting leaders of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia.

And at least 10 Iraqi civilians were reported killed in political violence around the country.

The three soldiers were part of the U.S. Army 1st Armored Division's Task Force Dagger, which sweeps major roads in Ramadi for bombs under the command of the Marines.

They were riding in a heavily armored Cougar, a vehicle designed to withstand roadside bombs and used in minesweeping operations.

The Pentagon last year ordered 122 of the minesweeping Cougars, worth a total of $87 million, from Force Protection Inc., the Ladson, S.C., firm that makes the vehicle and its spare parts.

The Cougars "feature armor-plated V-shaped bottoms designed to deflect the upward explosive power of roadside bombs," the company's website says.

But some Marines say they believe that, since the 1st Armored Division units moved into the area, insurgents have been placing larger roadside bombs to take out the Germany-based unit's fleet of armored tanks and Bradley fighting vehicles.

Bombs assembled in makeshift factories, then planted discreetly along roadways and detonated by remote control have become Sunni Arab insurgents' weapon of choice in their three-year guerrilla war against U.S. forces and the Iraqi government.

American and Iraqi troops also have had to confront Shiite militiamen. In Saturday's operation, the troops surrounded a southeastern Baghdad mosque suspected of playing host to an Al Mahdi militia leader.

An Iraqi Defense Ministry source said the U.S. and Iraqi forces withdrew from the area shortly before midnight without detaining anyone.

Political leaders in Sadr City, a Baghdad slum, announced that they were suspending their cooperation with U.S. forces and Iraqi troops after a massive raid Friday meant to capture a militia leader there.

U.S. and Iraqi officials said the leader, a well-known crime boss nicknamed Abu Daraa, had been caught in the raid, but other officials Saturday cast doubt on the account.

Another Al Mahdi militia leader was detained Friday south of the capital.

The militia leader is suspected of involvement in kidnapping-for-ransom rings as well as death squad operations against Sunni Arabs.

Elsewhere in the capital, a car bomb explosion near a Shiite mosque killed three Iraqis and injured 12, all passersby on their way to nearby shops.

A barrage of mortar shells struck an area of houses and shops in the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, killing three civilians and injuring four.

Two Iraqi civilians were killed in gunfire from an insurgent attack on a U.S. convoy near the northern city of Kirkuk.

In the southern city of Basra, gunmen killed two civilians, including one working for a cellphone company.

Barnes reported from Ramadi and Daragahi from Baghdad. Special correspondents in Basra and Kirkuk contributed to this report.

3 GIs Killed In Western Iraq Province (AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub

AP, July 9, 2006

Three U.S. soldiers and an Iraqi woman translator were killed in separate incidents Saturday, while the country's largest Sunni Arab party appealed to authorities to end a military crackdown in Sunni villages northeast of Baghdad.

The three Americans were assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, which has some attached Army units, and died in fighting in the western province of Anbar, the U.S. military said.

They were the first U.S. fatalities reported in Iraq since Tuesday, raising the number of U.S. personnel killed this month to eight. The average of one death a day is down sharply from a rate of more than two a day in recent months.

Iraqi police said the translator, whose name was not released, was slain in a drive-by shooting in southwestern Baghdad. She worked for the Americans but was off-duty at the time, police Capt. Maithem Abdul-Razaq said.

Interpreters and others working for the Americans have long been targeted by insurgents who accuse them of "collaborating" with "occupation forces."

In a statement Saturday, the Iraqi Islamic Party said U.S. and Iraqi troops had surrounded 15 mostly Sunni villages near Muqdadiyah, about 60 miles northeast of Baghdad, making it difficult for civilians to move around.

The statement called on Iraqi and U.S. forces to allow food and medicine to enter the villages and compensate farmers for damage to their crops.

DOJ_NMG_0039338

Last week, the Iraqi military announced operations in the Muqdadiyah area after an increase in insurgent activity. The mostly farm area sits astride a highway between Baghdad and Kurdish areas to the north and is in a province where tensions are high between Shiites and Sunnis.

The Iraqi Islamic Party is headed by one of Iraq's two vice presidents, Tariq al-Hashimi, who the Americans hope can persuade disaffected fellow Sunnis to abandon the insurgency and participate in political life so the United States can begin withdrawing troops.

Two influential U.S. senators visiting Iraq said they were assured on Saturday by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, that his unity government will reach out to Sunni Arabs and crack down on Shiite militias blamed for much of the country's sectarian violence.

Sen. Jack Reed (news, bio, voting record), D-R.I., said al-Maliki told them it would be "feasible" to redeploy a small portion of U.S. troops "perhaps this year" because more Iraqi soldiers have been trained and sent into the fight.

Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record), D-Del., said the prime minister also seems serious about encouraging insurgents to accept amnesty and rejoin the mainstream and "appears to be prepared to take concerted action against militias" blamed for rising sectarian violence.

Nevertheless, the government, which took office in May, faces a formidable task as it strives to calm sectarian tensions, cut a deal to end the insurgency and restore stability.

Iraqi police reported several killings in Baghdad on Saturday and many seemed tied to the animosities between Shiites and Sunnis.

Gunmen opened fire on a Shiite family trying to move out of a religiously mixed neighborhood for the Shiite city of Karbala. Police said five relatives were wounded in the attack in Dora, where sectarian tensions run high.

Also in Dora, gunmen in two cars stopped a vehicle on a street, forced the two passengers to get out and killed them in front of horrified bystanders, police reported.

Gunmen killed three people working in an ice cream shop in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Nahrawan, police Lt. Fikrat Mohammed said.

Three mortar shells exploded in a mostly Shiite area of southern Baghdad, killing three people and wounding three children, police said.

A car bomb exploded in a public garage near a Shiite mosque late Saturday in the city's western Jihad district, killing two people and wounding nine and causing slight damage to the mosque, said police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razzaq.

Police also reported finding four bodies in eastern and western Baghdad that appeared to be victims of sectarian death squads.

Gunmen in two speeding cars opened fire on a Sunni mosque in west Baghdad's Ghazaliya neighborhood. Mosque guards returned fire and the attackers fled, police Capt. Jamil Hussein said.

The incidents occurred a day after at least 17 people died in a wave of bombings and mortar attacks on mostly Sunni mosques in the Baghdad area and northern Iraq. A Sunni cleric was also kidnapped in the capital, a Sunni official said.

Sectarian violence has forced thousands of Iraqis to move to different neighborhoods or cities where their sect is predominant. The Interior Ministry estimated earlier this month that nearly 4,000 families had been forced to relocate in the Baghdad area alone.

Three US Soldiers Killed In Western Iraq Battle (AFP)

By Jay Deshmukh

AFP, July 9, 2006

Three American soldiers were killed in fighting in Al-Anbar amid reports that senior military officers could be accused of negligence in a probe into the alleged killing of 24 Iraqi civilians by US marines in the same province.

In rebel attacks at least five people were killed, while 70 suspected insurgents were arrested by the Iraqi army in an operation in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad.

The US military said it lost three soldiers in western Al-Anbar Saturday to "enemy action," pushing its losses in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion to 2,543, according to an AFP count based on Pentagon figures.

The province remains an active battleground in the fight against the insurgency, despite several US-led operations in the area since 2004.

At present the military is carrying out operations to regain control over the provincial capital of Ramadi, a stronghold of Sunni insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0039339

Meanwhile, the New York Times reported Saturday that Lieutenant General Peter Chiarelli, the number two commander of US troops in Iraq, had faulted a number of officers for "dereliction of duties" during the probe into the alleged killings of two dozen Iraqis in the town of Haditha in Anbar province.

The report, quoting an unnamed Defense Department official, said Chiarelli concluded that in the deaths, which included 10 women and children and an elderly man in a wheelchair, "senior officers failed to follow up on inaccuracies and inconsistencies in the initial reporting of the incident that should have raised questions."

It said Chiarelli faulted senior staff of the Second Marine Division, then commanded by Major General Richard Huck, and the Second Regimental Combat Team headed by Colonel Stephen Davis and "recommended unspecified disciplinary action for some officers".

If the officers are disciplined, they would be among the most senior American military personnel punished since the Iraq war began in March 2003, the report added.

On Friday the military said Chiarelli had "completed his review of the investigation conducted by Major General Eldon Bargewell into reporting, training and command climate as it related to circumstances surrounding the deaths of 24 Iraqis in Haditha on November 19, 2005."

Bargewell was asked to determine how the Haditha killings were reported up the chain of command, and to see if there had been a cover-up.

The report said Chiarelli has recommended that all American forces in Iraq must receive more counterinsurgency training, first in the United States before deploying and again in Iraq.

The US Marine Corps initially reported that 15 civilians and a marine were killed by a roadside explosion in Haditha.

But the military opened an investigation after Time magazine reported in March that witnesses, backed by a videotape of the scene, said the marines went on a rampage after a roadside explosion killed one of their comrades.

They allegedly went from house to house deliberately killing men, women and children. Five unarmed men in a taxi near the site of the bombing were also killed, according to accounts leaked to the press.

The US military has battled a series of other abuse allegations in the past few months -- the most recent being the alleged rape and murder of an Iraqi woman in March by American soldiers.

In rebel violence five people were killed and three wounded Saturday in a mortar attack in the village of Abu Dsheir, south of Baghdad, security sources said.

General Rahman al-Janabi of the Iraq army's 5th division said his forces detained 70 suspected insurgents and freed 10 hostages over the past five days in an operation in Muqdadiyah in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad.

"The objective is to clean up the area of insurgents," he said.

The Iraqi army took control of the area from US forces on Monday.

But Sunni MP Alaa Maki warned of a looming humanitarian crisis in the town, accusing the army of sealing off nearly 15 villages in the area.

"This siege signals a grave danger if it goes on much longer," he said. "The medical clinic is closed, there is no power and water. Farms have been destroyed and some homes have been used as bases."

Diyala province, part of Iraq's agricultural heartland and containing an explosive mix of Sunnis and Shiites, is one of the main fault lines in the country's ongoing sectarian violence.

It was here that militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed on June 7.

Meanwhile, at least 368 detainees were freed Saturday as part of a peace plan by Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

Sunni Politicians May Expand Boycott Over Kidnapping (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, July 8 — Sunni Arab politicians are considering withdrawing from executive offices in the Shiite-led government because militiamen have yet to free a Sunni legislator kidnapped this month, a Sunni leader said Saturday.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leader of the main Sunni Arab political group, which holds 44 of the 275 seats in Parliament, said the bloc would also continue its boycott of the legislature for a second week.

The boycott began after Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, a member of the bloc, was abducted with eight bodyguards on July 1 at a checkpoint in Baghdad while driving from her home north of the city. Members of her party say a bodyguard who escaped has described the abductors as Shiite militiamen.

Sunni politicians have long criticized the ruling Shiite political parties for supporting militias and filling the ranks of the government security forces with militiamen.

DOJ_NMG_0039340

"Everything is possible," Mr. Dulaimi said in a telephone interview, addressing the possibility of a Sunni pullout from the government. "The issue needs to be studied and an agreement must be reached to arrive at a solution."

The abduction of Ms. Mashhadani has plunged the new government, approved in May and led by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, into its first major political crisis. Before parliamentary elections last December, American officials worked hard to coax Sunni Arab politicians to participate, in the hope that political engagement would help dissipate the Sunni-led insurgency. But the Sunni Arab boycott of Parliament just weeks after the government began to operate has underscored the fragility of the ethnic and sectarian power-sharing agreement.

In the executive branch, the Sunni Arabs, who make up one-fifth of the population, hold several cabinet seats and run a handful of ministries. Tariq al-Hashemi, the leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, to which Ms. Mashhadani belongs, is one of two vice presidents.

The Sunni Arabs, increasingly anxious over the power accrued by Iranian-backed Shiites, have temporarily withdrawn from the political process in the past. They did so during negotiations over the drafting of the permanent Constitution, after some members of the Sunni committee were assassinated. They also walked out on talks to form the new government after Shiite militiamen killed many Sunni Arabs last February after the bombing of a Shiite shrine.

When the Sunni legislators announced their boycott after Ms. Mashhadani's kidnapping, they warned that they might also resort to withdrawing cabinet members. Now, talk of that appears more serious. Mr. Dulaimi said that Sunni Arab politicians were also concerned about the ongoing attacks against Sunni mosques; on Friday, four such mosques were assaulted, he said.

An official in the Iraqi Islamic Party told reporters on Wednesday that he had received a call from one of Ms. Mashhadani's kidnappers. The man had demanded that the government release all Shiite detainees in Diyala province; that all Shiite detainees be freed from American prisons in Iraq; and that Sunni groups cease attacks against Shiite mosques, all within 72 hours.

Sunni Arab politicians have suffered other woes this week. Two members of the Iraqi Islamic Party were killed by Shiite militiamen on Thursday on the road between Baghdad and Mahmudiya, a party official, Omar al-Jubouri, said Saturday.

"The Iraqi people ask the Americans for an iron fist to crush the Sadr militia in Baghdad," Mr. Jubouri said in an interview, referring to the volatile militia commanded by the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

The American military and Iraqi troops fought Sadr militiamen early Friday in Baghdad and captured a commander.

The military said Saturday that three American marines had been killed by "enemy action" in Anbar province, the insurgent stronghold west of Baghdad.

On Saturday night, a car bomb outside a Shiite mosque in Baghdad killed at least three people.

Three mortar rounds killed at least three Iraqi civilians and wounded at least seven on Saturday, police officials said. And on Friday night, a mortar attack on a children's playing field in northern Baghdad killed four children and injured 38, the American military said.

Police Abuses In Iraq Detailed (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Confidential documents cover more than 400 investigations. Brutality, bribery and cooperation with militia fighters are common, a report says.

BAGHDAD — Brutality and corruption are rampant in Iraq's police force, with abuses including the rape of female prisoners, the release of terrorism suspects in exchange for bribes, assassinations of police officers and participation in insurgent bombings, according to confidential Iraqi government documents detailing more than 400 police corruption investigations.

A recent assessment by State Department police training contractors echoes the investigative documents, concluding that strong paramilitary and insurgent influences within the force and endemic corruption have undermined public confidence in the government.

Officers also have beaten prisoners to death, been involved in kidnapping rings, sold thousands of stolen and forged Iraqi passports and passed along vital information to insurgents, the Iraqi documents allege.

The documents, which cover part of 2005 and 2006, were obtained by The Times and authenticated by current and former police officials.

The alleged offenses span dozens of police units and hundreds of officers, including beat cops, generals and police chiefs. Officers were punished in some instances, but the vast majority of cases are either under investigation or were dropped because of lack of evidence or witness testimony.

The investigative documents are the latest in a string of disturbing revelations of abuse and corruption by Iraq's Interior Ministry, a Cabinet-level agency that employs 268,610 police, immigration, facilities security and dignitary protection officers.

DOJ_NMG_0039341

After the discovery in November of a secret Interior Ministry detention facility in Baghdad operated by police intelligence officials affiliated with a Shiite Muslim militia, U.S. officials declared 2006 "the year of the police." They vowed a renewed effort to expand and professionalize Iraq's civilian officer corps.

President Bush has said that the training of a competent Iraqi police force is linked to the timing of an eventual withdrawal of U.S. troops and a key element in the war in Iraq.

But U.S. officials say the renegade force in the ministry's intelligence service that ran the bunker in Baghdad's Jadiriya neighborhood continues to operate out of the Interior Ministry building's seventh floor. A senior U.S. military official in Iraq, who spoke on condition of anonymity in an interview last month, confirmed that one of the leaders of the renegade group, Mahmoud Waeli, is the "minister of intelligence for the Badr Corps" Shiite militia and a main recruiter of paramilitary elements for Interior Ministry police forces.

"We're gradually working the process to take them out of the equation," the military official said. "We developed the information. We also developed a prosecutorial case."

Bayan Jabr, a prominent Shiite, was interior minister at the time of the investigations detailed in the documents and has been accused of allowing Shiite paramilitary fighters to run rampant in the security forces.

U.S. officials interviewed for this article said the ability of Jabr's replacement, Jawad Bolani, to deal with the corruption and militia influence in the police force will be a crucial test of his leadership.

The challenges facing Bolani, a Shiite engineer who has no policing experience and entered politics for the first time after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, are highlighted in a recent assessment by police trainers hired by the State Department. According to the report, corruption in the Interior Ministry has hampered its effectiveness and its credibility with Iraqis.

"Despite great progress and genuine commitment on the part of many ministry officials, the current climate of corruption, human rights violations and sectarian violence found in Iraq's security forces undermines public confidence," according to the document, titled "Year of the Police In-Stride Assessment, October 2005 to May 2006."

Elements of the Ministry of the Interior, or MOI, "have been co-opted by insurgents, terrorists and sectarian militias. Payroll fraud, other kinds of corruption and intimidation campaigns by insurgent and militia organizations undermine police effectiveness in key cities throughout Iraq," the report says.

The report increased tensions between the Pentagon, which runs the police training program, and the State Department, which has been pushing to expand its limited training role in Iraq, said a U.S. official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The report strikes contradictory tones, saying that the Interior Ministry continues to improve and that its forces are on track to take over civil security from U.S. and Iraqi military elements by the end of the year, while outlining shocking problems with corruption and abuse.

"The document basically shows that Interior Ministry management has failed," the U.S. official said. "The document didn't directly address U.S. policy failures, but I guess it does show that too."

Interior Ministry officials have taken steps to "improve detainee life," the report says. "However, there are elements within the MOI which continue to abuse detainees."

Referring to Sunni Arab insurgent groups and Shiite paramilitary organizations, the report says "these groups exploit MOI forces to further insurgent, party and sectarian goals. As a result, many Iraqis do not trust the police. Divisions falling along militia lines have led to violence among police.

"MOI officials and forces are widely reported to engage in bribery, extortion and theft," the report says. "For example, there are numerous credible reports of ministry and police officials requiring payment from would-be recruits to join the police."

The report's findings are borne out in hundreds of pages of internal investigative documents.

The documents include worksheets with hundreds of short summaries of alleged police crimes, letters referring accused officers to Iraq's anti-corruption agencies and courts, citizen complaints of police abuse and corruption, police inspector general summaries detailing financial crimes and fraudulent contracting practices and reports on alleged sympathizers of Saddam Hussein's former regime.

In crisp bureaucratic Arabic, the documents detail a police force in which abuse and death at the hands of policemen is frighteningly common.

Police officers' loyalties appear to be a major problem, with dozens of accounts of insurgent infiltration and terrorist acts committed by ministry officials.

In one case, a ring of Baghdad police officers — including a colonel, two lieutenants and a captain — were accused of stealing communications equipment for insurgents, who used the electronics for remote bomb triggers. In another case, a medic with the Interior Ministry's elite commando force in Baghdad was fired after he was accused of planting improvised explosives and conducting assassinations.

DOJ_NMG_0039342

In Diyala province, where last month U.S. forces killed Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, investigators were looking into allegations that a police officer detonated a suicide vest in the bombing of a police station. In a separate case, a brigadier general, a colonel and a criminal judge were accused of taking bribes from a suspected terrorist.

Police officers have also organized kidnapping rings that abduct civilians for ransom — in some of the cases, the victims are police officers. Two Baghdad police commanders kidnapped a lieutenant colonel, stole his ministry car and demanded tens of thousands of dollars from the victim's family, the documents allege. In that case, the two accused, Maj. Gen. Naief Abdul Ezaq and Capt. Methaq Sebah Mahmoud, were fired and taken to court.

The abbreviated notes on the case do not make clear whether the two officers received further punishment, but the fact that the documents mention the courts being involved in the incident at all makes it stand out from the rest of the cases.

In another case, the bodyguards of a police colonel in the Zayona neighborhood of Baghdad kidnapped merchants for ransom, according to the documents. In the capital's Ghazaliya neighborhood, a lieutenant and his brother-in-law kidnapped a man and demanded a huge ransom from his family.

Abuse by police is also a common theme. The victims include citizens who tried to complain about police misbehavior, drivers who disobeyed traffic police commands and, in several cases, other police officers.

But detainees appear to be targeted most often. The U.S. military has been working with the Iraqi government to standardize detention facilities and policies, and the U.S. assessment claims that several site visits turned up no serious human rights abuses. But the ministry documents reveal a brutal detention system in which officers run hidden jails, and torture and detainee deaths are common.

The documents mention four investigations into the deaths of 15 prisoners at the hands police commando units.

In the Rusafa section of Baghdad, a predominantly Shiite area known for its strong militia presence, police tortured detainees with electricity, beatings and, in at least one case, rape, according to the internal documents. Relief was reserved for those detainees whose relatives could afford to bribe detention officers to release them.

The Wolf Brigade, a notorious commando unit, illegally detained more than 650 prisoners, according to the documents. During a mass release of Wolf Brigade prisoners last November, a Times reporter saw dozens of malnourished men among the released detainees; several were so weak that they could not walk without assistance.

Female detainees are often sexually assaulted. According to the documents, the commander of a detention center in the Karkh neighborhood of the capital raped a woman who was an alleged insurgent in August. That same month, two lieutenants tortured and raped two other female detainees.

Among the strongest reprimands — and the most outrageous corruption — detailed in the documents are the cases involving two provincial police chiefs who were removed.

Brig. Gen. Adil Molan Ghaidan, the former Diyala province police chief, was accused of drinking on the job, illegally confiscating real estate from citizens, knowingly paying ghost employees and harboring suspected terrorists. He was removed from the force about six months ago, police sources say.

Before his removal several months ago, Maj. Gen. Ahmad Mohammed Aljiboori, the former Nineveh province police chief, allegedly assigned a private army of 1,400 officers to personal security detail. According to an internal inquiry, Aljiboori claimed the force was not under the Interior Ministry's control.

The document also accuses Aljiboori of detaining 300 Iraqis for two months without charges, wasting thousands of dollars on extravagant banquets and neglecting antiterrorism efforts to focus on arresting car dealers. The document says Aljiboori confiscated most of the cars for personal gain and gave some of them away to friends as gifts.

U.S. officials say they have known about Interior Ministry abuses for years but have done little to thwart them, choosing instead to push Iraqi leaders to solve their own problems.

"The military had been at the bunker prior to the raid in November," said the U.S. official, referring to the Jadiriya facility. "But they said nothing."

Some U.S. military leaders want American officials to have a stronger hand with the Interior Ministry, arguing that continuing corruption and militia influence are dashing any hope for a speedy American withdrawal.

Another senior military official said U.S. policy in regard to the ministry was confused and disengaged. The official, who asked not to be identified because his comments impugned his superiors, said the Pentagon and State Department had failed to coordinate their efforts and were disengaged from the Iraqi police leaders.

"They sit up there on the 11th floor of the ministry building and don't talk to the Iraqis," the official said of U.S. police trainers assigned to the Interior Ministry headquarters tower. "They say they do policy and [that] it's up to the Iraqis — well, they're just doing nothing. The MOI is the most broken ministry in Iraq."

‘Everybody Must Make Sacrifices’ (NSWK)

DOJ_NMG_0039343

By Sarah Childress
Newsweek, July 9, 2006
One of the few women in Iraq's Army says she's proud to protect her country.

July 7, 2006 - Since she was a little girl in Sulemaniya, Shahla always wanted to be a soldier in the Iraqi Army. But women weren't allowed to fight under Saddam. So as soon as Hussein was gone in 2003, the attractive young mother put her name on the list. Shahla is now a first lieutenant. (Because of the sensitive nature of her work, Coalition officials asked that her real name not be used.)

Recently, she was handpicked by Iraq's Minister of Defense to take leadership courses at Zahko Military Training Academy in northern Kurdistan. At 35, she's a Sunni Kurd who wears dark eyeliner with her fatigues and says she lives to hunt down terrorists. She recently sat down with two visitors at Zahko, including NEWSWEEK's Sarah Childress, for a conversation in English. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: Why did you decide to join the Army?

Shahla: I like the army, and I like my country. I've been through many dangerous situations, but everybody must make sacrifices. It's hard, because in our community, it's very difficult for women to prove themselves in the army. You hear that the army's only for men. Before, during Saddam's time, women in the army could only be doctors. They didn't recognize their rank. Now, we see the difference. Now, they respect us. Now they call us by our ranks.

What is the training like at Zahko?

One thing I like is PT [physical training]. Not many women in the community do PT. Even if a woman is educated and gets a degree, she sits at home. But now that I've joined the army, I know it's important for women to get in physical shape.

How does your family feel about your enlistment?

I've never been in the army without family support. It's often difficult to convince families in this situation.

Are you afraid of being targeted by insurgents?

The threat isn't on me. It's on my family, and my neighbors. But we all must make sacrifices. Most of the problems we have are with people who work both sides. The terrorists are educated. They're not stupid. They have plans. They recognize our uniforms, but we don't know them. So they join the army. Sometimes they do join the units, to mark us as targets.

Is sectarianism a problem in the army?

At the beginning, no. But it's increasing. I've seen conflicts. Things happen, and you're supposed to act out against a mosque or husseiniya [another name for a Shiite mosque]. You have to, because bad people use these places for kidnapping and torture. But [a few soldiers may] refuse. We talk with them, and tell them that it's not the end of the world. It's for Iraq, for security and freedom.

What's difficult about being here?

I haven't seen my daughter, who is six, in one and a half months. It's very hard, but I do this for her, for the future. I'd like to stay in the army. It's my career. … And PT. At the start, it was so hard. I like exercises, but not running, because I smoke. They understand the situation. (Nearby American officers overhear and laugh.) It's a new thing. Before, I just walked. In the last week I've started running.

What do you like about being in the army?

We're chasing the terrorists. It makes me proud of myself. [My commanders] trust me. They trust my judgment.

Baghdad Water Plant OK But Delivery Hard (AP)

By Kim Gamel
AP, July 9, 2006

After nearly three years and $45 million, a treatment plant in northern Baghdad is pumping enough drinking water for a quarter of Baghdad's people. But the trick is getting it to them because of losses to broken pipes and scavengers.

Officials with the U.S. Agency for International Development are preparing to wrap up work in September after restoring one Saddam Hussein-era plant and building another at the Shark Dijlah water treatment facility, which serves 1.5 million people mostly in eastern Baghdad.

"We've successfully been providing water for over a year now," USAID expert Chris Serjak said during a tour Saturday, standing outside the nearly 30-year-old original plant as motors from filtration pools rumbled in the background.

Western and Iraqi reconstruction officials have pinned their hopes on U.S.-funded projects like the improvements at the plant to overcome severe shortages of water and poor sewage systems.

"Basically there is a water crisis," city spokesman Adel al-Ardawi said by telephone, blaming the shortages on a lack of electricity and violence by insurgents.

But there is more to the problem than infrastructure.

DOJ_NMG_0039344

"You can build a brand new plant and pump tons of water out, but if the lines aren't there to handle it you're not getting full volume," Serjak said.

Desperate Iraqis tap into mains and use generators to pump water to their homes in several areas where water is scarce. That lessens the flow to others.

Shihab Ahmed, a 48-year-old clerk who lives in the southeastern neighborhood of New Baghdad, said he gets up about 3:30 a.m. because his faucets only run at full force for about an hour and he needs to fill plastic bottles for use throughout the day.

"This water is for cooking and drinking, after my wife boils it to purify it," he said.

Serjak said water also seeps from decayed distribution mains, and that defect can bring health problems.

"The country has broken sewer mains lying alongside broken water lines, and so you get contamination not at the treatment plant but actually at the distribution line," the 31-year-old Los Angeles native said.

He said USAID spent $13 million last year to improve water delivery in the city's crowded Shiite slum of Sadr City, where they replaced 61 miles of old, cracked asbestos pipes with new mains and provided more than 15,000 house connections.

They used local laborers to win the community's support and avoid security problems.

Serjak said the water infrastructure in Sadr City, which suffered from decades of neglect under Saddam's Sunni-dominated regime, was in particularly bad shape, with concrete pipes susceptible to cracking buried just below the surface, exposing them to traffic.

In addition, he said, "People were making a lot of illegal taps because of the growth of the area."

While authorities had looked to public works to build a new Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion, the insurgency has forced the diversion of billions of dollars to security from projects to improve water, sewage and power systems.

About $2.1 billion of the more than $4 billion initially allocated for water and sanitation projects was shifted in 2005 to address new priorities and security needs, according to the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad.

Just 49 of the originally planned water and sewer projects will be completed, and 300 of the planned 425 electrical projects will be done, according to a U.S. government audit released in late January.

Saad Salman, general manager of the Shark Dijlah plant, said it had not been attacked, but he worries constantly it could be. Security is provided by the Facility Protection Services, which was recently criticized by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for being ineffective and having links to insurgents.

Serjak acknowledged relief officials had to scale back efforts because of spiraling costs and violence.

"When we first came in we put together a wish list," he said. "And as you go in and further define what can be done, you make tradeoffs, you make decisions. Going back to what's cost effective."

The USAID team made the decision to both build a new water plant and expand the old one at Shark Dijlah after discovering they had a head start. The U.N. Development Fund had done designs and ordered equipment for improvements to the plant before the invasion in March 2003.

Serjak said he found it more efficient to work with what is available in Iraq, where transporting equipment safely is difficult.

"There are some plants that are too far gone," he said. "But where possible, rehabilitation has been quicker and more cost effective."

L.A. Man Detained In Iraq Sues U.S. (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post/AP, July 9, 2006

Military Officials, Rumsfeld Named

LOS ANGELES, July 8 -- An aspiring Iranian American filmmaker who spent nearly two months in a prison in Iraq without being charged has sued Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and other military officials, calling the government's detention policies unconstitutional.

Cyrus Kar, 45, of Los Angeles, seeks unspecified damages and major changes in the government's detention policies overseas.

The suit was filed this week in federal court by the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California. It is the first civil case challenging detention policies in Iraq, said Mark Rosenbaum, the organization's legal director.

A phone message left for a Pentagon spokesman was not immediately returned Saturday.

When Kar was released, military officials said that he had been properly detained as "an imperative security threat" and that the matter had been handled and resolved appropriately.

"This case highlights the effectiveness of our detainee review process," spokesman Air Force Brig. Gen. Donald Alston said after Kar's release.

DOJ_NMG_0039345

Kar was taken into custody in May 2005 after he visited Iraq to make a documentary film about Cyrus the Great, the Persian king who wrote the world's first human rights charter. Potential bomb parts were found in a taxi in which Kar was riding.

He was released July 10, 2005, after his family sued, accusing the federal government of violating his civil rights and holding him after the FBI cleared him of suspicion. He is a former U.S. Navy Seal, according to news reports.

The new lawsuit said his 55-day detention violated not only his civil rights, but also the Geneva Conventions and the law of nations.

"Human rights monitors note that the vast majority of the over 15,000 detainees in U.S. military custody in Iraq have never been charged, tried, provided counsel, or allowed to challenge their detention in court, and over one-fifth of them have been detained for over a year in this manner," the suit states.

Kar said that while he was imprisoned, he was at various times hooded and threatened, taunted and insulted by U.S. soldiers. One soldier slammed Kar's head into a concrete wall, the suit said.

What happened to him in Iraq was "a life-altering experience," Kar told the Los Angeles Times.

In addition to Rumsfeld, the defendants include Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., commanding general of the multinational forces in Iraq, and Maj. Gen. William H. Brandenburg, who was in charge of detainee operations in Iraq at the time of Kar's detention.

No Political Timetable For Iraq (WT)

By Jack Reed

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

We do not need an artificial timetable for Iraq, especially not a political one, but we do need a plan from the White House on how and when we can succeed. Democrats support beginning a phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq by the end of 2006.

This proposal would protect American interests and give the commander in chief flexibility to bring our troops home in a safe and timely manner. It also recognizes a strong residual U.S. force will remain in Iraq to provide training and support, and Special Forces who can seek out and kill terrorists.

The days of young American soldiers manning most Iraqi checkpoints and getting caught in the cross-fire of sectarian violence must end. That mission can, should, and must be accomplished by the Iraqis themselves.

The Senate passed a similar measure last year -- a nonelection year. Seventy-nine senators, from both sides of the aisle, joined together and urged the president to make 2006 a year of transition.

Though the Republicans backed off this commitment, it is highly likely significant numbers of U.S. troops will start redeploying from Iraq in 2006 and continue to draw down in 2007. America's top military commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, recently stated: "I'm confident we'll be able to continue to take reduction over the course of this year."

Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak Rubaie offered a similar forecast: "Iraq's ambition is to have full control of the country by the end of 2008," Mr. Rubaie said in an op-ed article in The Washington Post. "In practice, this will mean a significant foreign troop reduction. We envisage the U.S. troop presence by year's end to be under 100,000, with most of the remaining troops to return home by the end of 2007."

It is imperative we support the Iraqi government and pay attention to what they say. Ultimately, the Iraqis will determine their country's future and whether it succeeds or fails. America's greatest chance to help Iraq become a stable nation that respects human rights, and not a harbor for terrorists, is through nonmilitary support for Iraqi reconstruction.

Several months ago, President Bush announced a proposal to develop and deploy reconstruction teams in all 18 Iraqi provinces. But today, there are still only four such teams operating in the entire country. They lack resources, personnel and meaningful support from the White House.

Unless we can fix the reconstruction, redevelopment and political mentoring process, our military efforts will buy time but not guarantee success. Americans know we need a new direction in our Iraq policy.

Democrats have offered a thoughtful plan -- tactically, strategically, politically -- that will change the course from the president's failed policy. Republicans defeated this common-sense proposal. Now they must deliver a clear road map of their own, and a plan to pay for it.

The president must level with the American people and tell them he is committing more resources to Iraq, including personnel from our State and Justice Departments and our Agency for International Development. He must also be more candid about the cost. American taxpayers have already paid $320 billion for the Iraq war, and will be forced to spend hundreds of billions more.

Our national security demands we bring Iraq to a successful conclusion as quickly as possible. The timing and placement of our military forces is the president's responsibility. He should step up and take on that responsibility, beginning today.

DOJ_NMG_0039346

Our fighting men and women should not be left on the front lines of Iraq for one day longer than is absolutely necessary.

Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, is a member of the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee and is a retired United States Army captain.

The Breakup (NYT)

By Peter W. Galbraith interview Compiled By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Q: Your new book, "The End of Iraq: How American Incompetence Created a War Without End," argues that the Bush administration should stop insisting that Iraq can ever be a unified nation.

Iraq still exists on a map, but it no longer functions as a single country. We're trying to build national institutions right now — like the army and the police — when there is no nation.

As someone who has held various exalted government positions — you were the first U.S. ambassador to Croatia as well as a longtime Near East specialist for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee — how exactly are you defining the word "nation"?

A nation is a collection of people who share a common identity. You would expect that Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis would have their religious or ethnic identity. What they do not share is an Iraqi identity.

That point has been made countless times, but you're one of the first writers to suggest that the U.S. government totally abandon its current policy and just slice Iraq into three states.

Absolutely. A confederation of three states.

What would you call them?

How about Kurdistan, Sunnistan and Shiastan?

Catchy. What religion are the Kurds?

They are overwhelmingly Sunni Muslim.

So why do Saddam Hussein and his fellow Sunni Muslims hate them so vehemently?

Because he was a fascist in a classic sense. He believed in a master race, which was the Arabs, and that the Kurds were therefore a lesser people in this greater Arab land.

Who are the most famous Kurds?

Beyond the presidents of Iraq and Kurdistan, the most famous, historically, is Saladin, the Muslim warrior who took Jerusalem from the crusaders.

That's fascinating, considering that Saddam Hussein famously proclaimed himself the Saladin of modern times.

He wrapped himself in the mantle of Saladin, even naming his native province after him. Saladin is worshiped by the Arabs, who fudge on his ethnicity.

Before the first gulf war, you documented Saddam's genocide against the Kurds, at a time when few in the West were paying attention.

I actually stumbled across the start of the genocide in 1987, when I traveled to Kurdistan and saw the systematic destruction of villages along the road. Later, I arranged for 14 tons of documents, including lists of people who were rounded up and massacred, to come to the U.S.

And Harvard, your alma mater, declined to house them. That wasn't very brave.

They were concerned about a possible terrorist attack on Widener Library. The documents went to the National Archives.

Aren't you a little bit old to be publishing your first book?

Even though I am a late bloomer in the book area, it's original.

You mean the book is original?

It's original that you have a 55-year-old first-time author who actually wrote it himself.

Of course, you had a great teacher — your father, John Kenneth Galbraith, the world-class economist who died in April, at the age of 97.

He had a clear mind until basically the day he died. He was very interested in this book. He actually read the first four chapters, and he liked it every much. He had some small editorial comments, which I took.

He certainly got a lot done, some 40 books including the campus classics "American Capitalism" and "The Affluent Society."

He was very disciplined in his writing. My father always said that in the fifth draft he introduced that note of spontaneity for which his writing was well known.

In other words, great books aren't written, they're rewritten.

I believe in that.

DOJ_NMG_0039347

Is it true that your father coined the phrase "conventional wisdom"? That, at any rate, is the conventional wisdom.
And, in this case, the conventional wisdom is right.

Among The Ghosts: Heroes And Grand Plans (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins
The New York Times, July 9, 2006
BAGHDAD, Iraq

AT the end of a long week, I went searching for her tomb. I spoke first to the priest at the Armenian Orthodox Church, who pointed me to a cemetery down the road. I went there, and a toothless old blue-eyed lady pointed me to the next one. Then, in the quiet of a compound off clamorous Tehran Square, I found her.

Gertrude Margaret Lowthian Bell — or Miss Bell, as the Iraqis still call her — is interred in the Anglican Church's cemetery in a raised tomb. It's dried up and crumbling in the Iraqi sun. The British delegations that used to pay homage stopped coming months ago because of the danger. A ring of jasmine trees and date palms planted last year by Ahmad Chalabi's daughter, Tamara, "in recognition of Gertrude Bell's historic contribution to Iraq" are mostly dead.

"The soil is too salty," said Mansour Ali, the grave keeper, jabbing a finger at the earth.

Miss Bell, the British adventurer and diplomat, was as decisive in the creation of the modern Iraqi state as any single person. She imagined it in the ruins of the Ottoman Empire, then ending its 600-year run. The First World War was over, and the Middle East seemed as blank as a sheet of paper. The borders of the new state would be long and straight like a ruler, cutting across deserts, tribes and languages. It was a thrilling time to be alive.

"I feel at times like the Creator about the middle of the week," Miss Bell said at the time. "He must have wondered what it was going to be like, as I do."

.

On the other side of town lie the soldiers. The British war cemetery sits in a fenced-in field across the road from the Turkish Embassy in the Waziriya neighborhood in northern Baghdad. The gates are high and locked, but with a little persistence, an Iraqi named Jasim Koli will let you in.

Back when the British Empire reigned supreme, and refrigeration was scarce, the men who gave their lives for the Crown were buried where they fell. It took too long to ship them home. Even now, across the old realm, in places like Trincomalee, Sri Lanka and Kohima, India, the British war cemeteries are lovingly maintained, prideful reminders of a vanished world.

At the Baghdad North Gate War Cemetery, the grass in some places reaches to your chest. The chiseled faces of some of the tombstones are too worn to read. Some are toppled and crumbling. The sign at the entrance announcing a renovation, dated Nov. 20, 1997, has been worked over with a machine gun. It's a dangerous neighborhood.

Still, the work goes on. The Iraqis come out at 6 p.m., when the sun begins to cool, and hack at the tall grass with their scythes. Every couple of weeks, an Iraqi shows up to pay them.

About 1,000 British soldiers lie together at the North Gate War Cemetery. The story of each is reduced to fit on the face of a headstone, but it is still large enough to suggest its own epic:

George Percy Wilder
Middlesex Regiment
11th July 1918 Age 38
In ever loving memory of my only child
From his sorrowing
Widowed mother

Most of those buried here were younger than Mr. Wilder by 20 years. About a dozen are unidentified: "Here Lies a Soldier of the Great War," the headstones read. "Known Unto God."

Some of the inscriptions read like bits of poetry, written in language of almost unbearable dignity. This, for example, was chiseled into a stone at the north end of the graveyard:

These here have been recovered
And interred
The bodies of
British officers and men
Who after the fall of Kut
Being prisoners
In the hands of the Turks

DOJ_NMG_0039348

Perished during the march
From Kut
Or in the prison camps
Of Anatolia
These are they who came
Out of great tribulation

Behind the inscription lie about 200 graves. The British lost about 30,000 men in the Mesopotamian campaign against the Ottoman Turks and their German advisers, a sideshow to a greater catastrophe that killed 10 million. Many of those British soldiers, like those arrayed at the north end of the cemetery, died during and after the siege of Kut, some from starvation. Others died closer to Baghdad, some during combat and some, like Lt. Gen. Sir Stanley Maude, the commander of the Mesopotamia Expeditionary Force, of cholera; in his case, a year before the Great War ended. He lies in his own small temple inside the cemetery. The 30,000 British dead represent a total more than 10 times the number of Americans killed in 39 months of war here.

Private J. Bleakley
Royal Army Ordnance Corps
6th July 1918 Age 21
He Died For Us
.

The marines gathered in a cement building not much larger than a garage. Most of them took a seat in one of the plastic chairs arranged for the occasion. A platoon stood off to one side, holding the battalion's flag. In the middle of the room were a fallen comrade's boots, his rifle and his helmet, arranged in a kind of headstone, and a framed photograph of a square-jawed, bespectacled young man.

"Lance Corporal Nicholas J. Whyte," the program said. "23 Jun 1984 - 21 Jun 2006."

Corporal Whyte was killed by a sniper last month while on a patrol in Ramadi. The bullet hit him in the throat and severed his spinal cord.

In all likelihood, it was not a lucky shot. Four of the 11 marines from his battalion who have been killed in Ramadi since March have been shot in a similar way in the same neighborhood. Corporal Whyte was shot in the throat. Another marine was shot through the forehead, just below the rim of his helmet. A third was shot through the heart. A fourth was shot through the collarbone. "We think it's the same guy," said Maj. Thomas Hobbs, the executive officer of the Third Battalion, Eighth Marines.

Earlier last week, after the marines moved into Ramadi General Hospital — in the same neighborhood where Corporal Whyte was killed — someone with a rifle went to work again. Within 12 hours after the marines had left, leaving behind a fledgling team of Iraqi police, a sniper had shot two of them, one through the face; he died. At last notice, the second Iraqi police officer, shot in the gut, was still hanging on.

Corporal Whyte was from Brooklyn; like the overwhelming majority of the marines in the Third Battalion, he signed up after Sept. 11, 2001. He was on his second tour in Iraq. He'd gone to Northeastern boarding schools on scholarship before graduating public high school, and his parents expected him to head to the Ivy League. In a unit of young men proud of their aggressiveness, Corporal Whyte was one of its softer touches.

"He was practically a pacifist," said one member of his platoon. "If someone gave him a hard time, he'd just let it go."

A marine with bagpipes played "Amazing Grace." The Marine chaplain said a prayer. "It is appropriate to ask this evening," he intoned, "how can we use Corporal Whyte's example to become better leaders?"

Lt. Col. Steven Neary, Corporal Whyte's battalion commander, stepped to the podium and read a verse from the marine's prayer book.

"I am not fighting to preserve the kind of world we had just before this war," he read. "If I were, I would be fighting to preserve a world that produced tyrants and dictators. The new world must be a better world than that, or it is not worth fighting for."

In the end, the colonel said, there was no explanation. "None of us can understand why he was taken from us," he said.

In the Marine tradition, the roll of his platoon was called; when it came to Corporal Whyte's name and no one answered, the platoon's leader read it aloud two more times.

With that, each of the members of weapons company, about 150 men in all, walked past Corporal Whyte's helmet, boots and rifle, paused, touched it a final time and gave a salute.

"Goodbye, brother," one of them said.

What's An Iraqi Life Worth? (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0039349

By Andrew J. Bacevich

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

In Iraq, lives differ in value -- and so do deaths. In this disparity lies an important reason why the United States has botched this war.

Last November in Haditha , a squad of Marines, outraged at the loss of a comrade, is said to have run amok, avenging his death by killing two dozen innocent bystanders. And in March, U.S. soldiers in Mahmudiyah allegedly raped a young Iraqi woman and killed her along with three of her relatives -- an apparently premeditated crime for which one former U.S. soldier has been charged . These incidents are among at least five recent cases of Iraqi civilian deaths that have triggered investigations of U.S. military personnel. If the allegations prove true, Haditha and Mahmudiyah will deservedly take their place alongside Sand Creek, Samar and My Lai in the unhappy catalogue of atrocities committed by American troops.

But recall a more recent incident, in Samarra . On May 30, U.S. soldiers manning a checkpoint there opened fire on a speeding vehicle that either did not see or failed to heed their command to stop. Two women in the vehicle were shot dead. One of them, Nahiba Husayif Jassim, 35, was pregnant. The baby was also killed. The driver, Jassim's brother, had been rushing her to a hospital to give birth. No one tried to cover up the incident: U.S. military representatives issued expressions of regret.

In all likelihood, we will be learning more about Haditha and Mahmudiyah for months to come, whereas the Samarra story has already been filed away and largely forgotten. And that's the problem.

The killing at the Samarra checkpoint was not an atrocity; most likely it was an accident, a mistake. Yet plenty of evidence suggests that in Iraq such mistakes have occurred routinely, with moral and political consequences that have been too long ignored. Indeed, conscious motivation is beside the point: Any action resulting in Iraqi civilian deaths, however inadvertent, undermines the Bush administration's narrative of liberation, and swells the ranks of those resisting the U.S. presence.

Gen. Tommy Franks, who commanded U.S. forces when they entered Iraq more than three years ago, famously declared: "We don't do body counts." Franks was speaking in code. What he meant was this: The U.S. military has learned the lessons of Vietnam -- where body counts became a principal, and much derided, public measure of success -- and it has no intention of repeating that experience. Franks was not going to be one of those generals re-fighting the last war.

Unfortunately, Franks and other senior commanders had not so much learned from Vietnam as forgotten it. This disdain for counting bodies, especially those of Iraqi civilians killed in the course of U.S. operations, is among the reasons why U.S. forces find themselves in another quagmire. It's not that the United States has an aversion to all body counts. We tally every U.S. service member who falls in Iraq, and rightly so. But only in recent months have military leaders finally begun to count -- for internal use only -- some of the very large number of Iraqi noncombatants whom American bullets and bombs have killed.

Through the war's first three years, any Iraqi venturing too close to an American convoy or checkpoint was likely to come under fire. Thousands of these "escalation of force" episodes occurred. Now, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the commander of U.S. ground forces in Iraq, has begun to recognize the hidden cost of such an approach. "People who were on the fence or supported us" in the past "have in fact decided to strike out against us," he recently acknowledged.

In the early days of the insurgency, some U.S. commanders appeared oblivious to the possibility that excessive force might produce a backlash. They counted on the iron fist to create an atmosphere conducive to good behavior. The idea was not to distinguish between "good" and "bad" Iraqis, but to induce compliance through intimidation.

"You have to understand the Arab mind," one company commander told the New York Times, displaying all the self-assurance of Douglas MacArthur discoursing on Orientals in 1945. "The only thing they understand is force -- force, pride and saving face." Far from representing the views of a few underlings, such notions penetrated into the upper echelons of the American command. In their book "Cobra II," Michael R. Gordon and Gen. Bernard E. Trainor offer this ugly comment from a senior officer: "The only thing these sand niggers understand is force and I'm about to introduce them to it."

Such crass language, redolent with racist, ethnocentric connotations, speaks volumes. These characterizations, like the use of "gooks" during the Vietnam War, dehumanize the Iraqis and in doing so tacitly permit the otherwise impermissible. Thus, Abu Ghraib and Haditha -- and too many regretted deaths, such as that of Nahiba Husayif Jassim.

As the war enters its fourth year, how many innocent Iraqis have died at American hands, not as a result of Haditha-like massacres but because of accidents and errors? The military doesn't know and, until recently, has publicly professed no interest in knowing. Estimates range considerably, but the number almost certainly runs in the tens of thousands. Even granting the common antiwar bias of those who track the Iraqi death toll -- and granting, too, that the insurgents have far more blood on their hands -- there is no question that the number of Iraqi noncombatants killed by U.S. forces exceeds by an order of magnitude the number of U.S. troops killed in hostile action, which is now more than 2,000.

Who bears responsibility for these Iraqi deaths? The young soldiers pulling the triggers? The commanders who establish rules of engagement that privilege "force protection" over any obligation to protect innocent life? The intellectually bankrupt policymakers who sent U.S. forces into Iraq in the first place and now see no choice but to press on? The culture that, to put it mildly, has sought neither to understand nor to empathize with people in the Arab or Islamic worlds?

DOJ_NMG_0039350

There are no easy answers, but one at least ought to acknowledge that in launching a war advertised as a high-minded expression of U.S. idealism, we have waded into a swamp of moral ambiguity. To assert that "stuff happens," as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is wont to do whenever events go awry, simply does not suffice.

Moral questions aside, the toll of Iraqi noncombatant casualties has widespread political implications. Misdirected violence alienates those we are claiming to protect. It plays into the hands of the insurgents, advancing their cause and undercutting our own. It fatally undermines the campaign to win hearts and minds, suggesting to Iraqis and Americans alike that Iraqi civilians -- and perhaps Arabs and Muslims more generally -- are expendable. Certainly, Nahiba Husayif Jassim's death helped clarify her brother's perspective on the war. "God take revenge on the Americans and those who brought them here," he declared after the incident. "They have no regard for our lives."

He was being unfair, of course. It's not that we have no regard for Iraqi lives; it's just that we have much less regard for them. The current reparations policy -- the payment offered in those instances in which U.S. forces do own up to killing an Iraq civilian -- makes the point. The insurance payout to the beneficiaries of an American soldier who dies in the line of duty is $400,000, while in the eyes of the U.S. government, a dead Iraqi civilian is reportedly worth up to $2,500 in condolence payments -- about the price of a decent plasma-screen TV.

For all the talk of Iraq being a sovereign nation, foreign occupiers are the ones deciding what an Iraqi life is worth. And although President Bush has remarked in a different context that "every human life is a precious gift of matchless value," our actions in Iraq continue to convey the impression that civilian lives aren't worth all that much.

That impression urgently needs to change. To start, the Pentagon must get over its aversion to counting all bodies. It needs to measure in painstaking detail -- and publicly -- the mayhem we are causing as a byproduct of what we call liberation. To do otherwise, to shrug off the death of Nahiba Husayif Jassim as just one of those things that happens in war, only reinforces the impression that Americans view Iraqis as less than fully human. Unless we demonstrate by our actions that we value their lives as much as the lives of our own troops, our failure is certain.

Andrew J. Bacevich is a professor of history and international relations at Boston University.

Fighting Insurgents, By The Book (WP)

By Fred Kaplan

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Two messages flutter between the lines of the Army's new field manual on counterinsurgency wars, its first document on the subject in 20 years.

One is that Pentagon planning for the Iraq war's aftermath was at least as crass, inattentive to the lessons of history, and contrary to basic political and military principles as the war's harshest critics have charged.

The other is that as a nation we may simply be ill-suited to fighting these kinds of wars.

The field manual's chief authors -- Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus and retired Lt. Col. Conrad C. Crane -- would never make these points explicitly. When Petraeus was commander of the 101st Airborne Division in Iraq, he combined combat power and community-building more astutely than any other officer. Crane, director of the U.S. Army Military History Institute, is one of the leading scholars of "irregular warfare." They both support the war's aims. And they outline their new doctrine -- or, rather, their revival of a very old doctrine -- thoughtfully and thoroughly.

Yet the undertone of this 241-page guidebook -- not yet publicly released, but obtained by Steven Aftergood and posted last week on Secrecy News , his online newsletter -- is one of grim caution.

Counterinsurgency involves rebuilding a society, keeping the population safe, boosting the local government's legitimacy, training a national army and fighting off insurgents who are trying to topple the government -- all at the same time. As the manual puts it, "The insurgent succeeds by sowing chaos and disorder anywhere; the government fails unless it maintains order everywhere."

From the first page to the last, the authors stress that these kinds of wars are "protracted by nature." They require "firm political will and extreme patience," "considerable expenditure of time and resources," and a large deployment of troops ready to greet "hand shakes or hand grenades" without mistaking one for the other.

"Successful . . . operations require Soldiers and Marines at every echelon to possess the following," the authors write. They then list a daunting set of traits: "A clear, nuanced, and empathetic appreciation of the essential nature of the conflict. . . . An understanding of the motivation, strengths, and weaknesses of the insurgent," as well as rudimentary knowledge of the local culture, behavioral norms and leadership structures. In addition, there must be "adaptive, self-aware, and intelligent leaders."

DOJ_NMG_0039351

Meanwhile, one high-profile infraction can undo 100 successes. "Lose moral legitimacy, lose the war," the authors warn, noting that the French lost Algeria in part because their commanders condoned torture.

Two big questions emerge: First, can American armed forces maintain such exacting standards over a long, hazy conflict? The all-volunteer U.S. military is full of extraordinarily smart, dedicated and disciplined troops. But there are sluggards, too, and the Army has also been lowering standards lately to meet recruitment targets.

Second, can Americans maintain a long-term commitment to civil or insurgent wars at a cost of hundreds of billions of dollars and perhaps thousands of lives? The issue isn't whether we should, but whether we can -- whether the political system, with its competing demands and aversion to risk, is capable of it.

The panel of officers and experts that put together the manual had no mandate to address such questions. But one consultant on the project who spoke on the condition of anonymity told me, "If we did, we would have probably put in some caveat like: 'If the nation and its leaders are not prepared for the long, hard fight that counterinsurgency entails, they should not begin it in the first place.' "

Certainly, one cause of the missteps in Iraq was the failure of top U.S. officials to foresee that after Saddam Hussein fell, they might find themselves battling an insurgency. As recently as last November, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was still refusing to call the enemy " insurgents ."

The manual at one point lists various practices that have proved successful and unsuccessful in past counterinsurgency campaigns. The list came from a memo written in November 2004 by Kalev Sepp, a professor at the Naval Postgraduate School who was advising Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the U.S. military commander in Iraq.

It must have been clear that U.S. forces had followed many of the unsuccessful practices, among them: "Place priority on killing and capturing the enemy, not on engaging the population; Concentrate military forces in large bases for protection; . . . Focus special operations forces primarily on raiding"; and "Ignore peacetime government processes, including legal procedures."

The manual cites other principles of counterinsurgency that the U.S. military violated:

"The more force used, the less effective it is."

"An operation that kills five insurgents is counterproductive if the collateral damage or the creation of blood feuds leads to the recruitment of fifty more."

"A defection is better than a surrender, a surrender better than a capture, and a capture better than a kill."

One page of the manual summarizes Napoleon's occupation of Spain in 1808: "Napoleon believed the conquest of Spain would be little more than a 'military promenade.' [He achieved] a rapid conventional military victory over Spain's armies but ignored the immediate requirement to provide a stable and secure environment for the people. . . . The French failed to analyze the history, culture, and motivations of the Spanish people, or to seriously consider their potential to support or hinder the achievement of French political objectives. Napoleon's cultural miscalculation resulted in a protracted struggle that lasted nearly six years and ultimately required approximately three-fifths of the French Empire's total armed strength."

No reader can miss the parallel to Rumsfeld and Iraq.

Would a smarter U.S. strategy have produced a more stable Iraq? Or were the long-suppressed sectarian feuds destined to gush forth once Hussein was removed?

A better question: Should we follow the authors' advice in the hope of waging a better counterinsurgency the next time around? Or should we give up these sorts of wars as futile and -- do what instead?

war_stories@hotmail.com

Fred Kaplan writes the "War Stories" column for Slate, the online magazine at www.slate.com.

THE COSTS OF WAR (WP)

By Rachel Dry

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

The civilian death toll in Iraq is either 100,000, or 50,000, or 43,273, or, as President Bush said in December, "30,000, more or less."

Most people doing the counting say that the number is more than the president's 30,000, but hedge the total, as he did, because of the impossibility of accurately recording every fatality throughout the war-torn country.

One of the most frequently cited numbers is the total from Iraq Body Count, an organization of antiwar British researchers who've been working since 2003 on maintaining civilian death statistics. John Sloboda, co-founder of the group, said that he and his colleagues compile civilian death statistics from media reports and the Baghdad morgue, carefully documenting incidents where possible, to avoid double counting. Their current count ranges from 38,843 to 43,273, reflecting that numbers vary from report to report and that some deaths are recorded simply as "Iraqi" with no distinction made for civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0039352

Late last month, the Los Angeles Times offered its own tally: at least 50,000 Iraqi deaths, mostly civilian, since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. That count is from the morgue, the Iraqi Health Ministry and other sources.

Michael E. O'Hanlon at the Brookings Institution maintains the Iraq Index, with a civilian casualty count of 20,600 to 37,200, not including deaths from crimes.

In 2004, a team of public health researchers published a study in the British medical journal the Lancet estimating a death toll based on a sample of documented deaths. It was a big, round and roundly disputed number: at least 100,000 Iraqi civilians dead in the 18 months following the invasion.

Though the Lancet study stirred up a fight over methodology, Sloboda thinks the real battle shouldn't be over how the counting is being done, but over who is doing the counting. He'd prefer that the Pentagon take charge. "We consider it a disgrace and obscenity that the world's largest superpower leaves this job to 12 unpaid volunteers."

-- Rachel Dry

Medical Oaths Betrayed (WP)

By Steven H. Miles

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

In November 2003, an Iraqi guard smuggled a pistol into the U.S. military prison at Abu Ghraib and gave it to a prisoner, Ameen Saeed al-Sheik. Tipped off, military police quickly began a cell-to-cell search. When they reached his cell, Sheik went for the hidden pistol; gunfire was exchanged and a sergeant was hit. According to sworn testimony, the soldiers wrestled the prisoner to the {fllig}oor and sent him to the hospital with a dislocated shoulder and shotgun wounds to his legs.

When Sheik returned to prison, he was beaten with a baton and his arms were handcuffed over his head, putting stress on his injured shoulder and leg. On a cold night, a medic, Sgt. Theresa Adams, saw Sheik naked and bleeding from a catheter that should have been connected to a bag to prevent infection. According to a sworn statement, the physician on call (who held the rank of colonel) agreed that the hospital had erred in leaving the catheter open but refused to remove it or to transfer Sheik to a hospital. When Adams asked him whether he had ever heard of the Geneva Conventions, the physician answered, "Fine, Sergeant, you do what you have to do; I am going back to bed."

In May 2004, photographs of prisoners being abused at Abu Ghraib shocked the world. When I saw the pictures, a simple question came to mind: Where were the prison doctors, nurses and medics while this abuse was happening?

Based on my review of tens of thousands of pages of declassi{filig}ed government documents, congressional testimony, press accounts and reports by human rights organizations, the answer is clear: Many armed forces physicians, nurses and medics have been passive and active partners in the systematic neglect and abuse of prisoners. At facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the United States often failed to provide prisoners with minimally adequate medical and health systems. Some physicians and psychologists provided information that was used to determine the harshness of physically and psychologically abusive interrogations, which were then monitored by health professionals. Some doctors responsible for the medical records of detainees omitted evidence of abuse from their official reports. Medical personnel who knew of this system of neglect, abuse and torture remained silent.

Certainly, the vast majority of military clinicians are responsible and competent. But even silence or indifference concerning prisoners' injuries was common enough to enable prison abuse to continue in Iraq, Afghanistan and at Guantanamo Bay. My new book on this subject cites incidents involving 120 to 150 clinicians at these locations -- most remaining quiet in the face of abuse, at least 10 delaying or suppressing death certificates in cases of abuse, and at least 30 involved in designing or monitoring harsh interrogations.

These were not isolated acts of medical complicity; rather, they formed a pattern of abuse authorized (or ignored) by senior U.S. officials.

In November 2002, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld appointed a working group to develop an interrogation policy for the prison at Guantanamo Bay. Upon receiving the working group's reports, Rumsfeld approved techniques such as isolation, interrogation for 20 hours, deprivation of light and sound and the use of loud sounds, as well as "manipulation of the detainees' emotions and weaknesses."

But his April 2003 directive also proposed three roles for medical professionals in interrogations. First, "the use of isolation as an interrogation technique requires detailed implementation instructions, including . . . medical and psychological review." Second, application of such interrogation methods was contingent on the detainee being "medically and operationally evaluated as suitable." Third, the interrogations required "the presence or availability of quali{filig}ed medical personnel."

Rumsfeld's vision was {fllig}eshed out in Army prisons in Iraq, Afghanistan and at Guantanamo Bay, with health professionals cooperating in all phases of coercive interrogation. Some provided information from medical records and clinical interviews for use in designing interrogation plans. Others recommended ways to break down prisoners, using insights from cross-cultural psychology to degrade and demoralize them.'The Man Was Old'

DOJ_NMG_0039353

Although few records describing interrogations have been declassified, investigative files con{filig}rm that clinicians were present during some harsh inquiries. Guantanamo Bay interrogators and officers reported that doctors observed such questioning from behind a mirror or were in the room while it was occurring. And in Samarra, various soldiers offered sworn testimony about a particular interrogation:

[Linguist -- name redacted]: I witnessed concern on the part of the primary interrogator toward preventing the detainee from going into a medical crisis as a result of the questioning. He stopped the questioning several times so that a medical professional could examine him and determine if he was still doing {filig}ne. All indications were that, aside from the stress of being captured and questioned, he was suffering no health crisis.

Q: During any interrogations did Staff Sergeant [name redacted] ever have to stop it because of medical problems?

A: I don't think so. The only one was [same inmate as above] but Staff Sergeant never stopped it. He only voiced concern that we ease up on the detainee so he could remain calm and keep his blood pressure down. . . .

[Interrogator -- name redacted]: [Name redacted] and I were the agents while [name redacted] sat in as the medic on standby. . . . Every time, maybe two or three times, the [detainee] showed any sign of difficulty, [co-interrogator] would take a break to allow [medic] to attend to him. . . . We took several breaks that night. The man was old and in the middle of the interrogation, we gathered up his pills (or medication) and gave it to him .

One log that detailed the medical monitoring of interrogations was leaked from Guantanamo Bay, excerpted in Time magazine and later authenticated by the Pentagon. According to the log, in 2002 psychologist John Leso monitored the interrogation of Mohamed al-Qahtani, making suggestions on how to increase the stress on the prisoner. The 50-day chronology details the techniques employed: isolation, sleep deprivation, masking, head shaving, shackling, threatening with a dog and so on. The log shows regular monitoring by medics, who, at one point, administered nearly three bags of medical saline intravenously while the prisoner was tied to a chair. When Qahtani asked to urinate, he was told to do so in his pants. He was treated twice for a slow heart rate caused by hypothermia that was intentionally induced by air conditioning.

Medical examinations of prisoners -- both before and after interrogations -- were often skipped. In 2005, the Army's surgeon general found that 15 to 50 percent of prisoners in Iraq, Afghanistan and at Guantanamo Bay were examined before being questioned, and less than 15 percent were examined for injuries afterward. Even when such exams took place, however, they were not necessarily for the prisoners' bene{filig}t. According to the 2004 report by Army Maj. Gen. Antonio M. Taguba on abuse at Abu Ghraib, medical personnel vetted prisoners for interrogations that were designed in accordance with the medical {filig}ndings to include stress positions, sleep deprivation, isolation and dietary manipulation.

This process required the use of Behavioral Science Consultation Teams (BSCTs or "biscuits"), which helped design interrogation plans to exploit prisoners' psychological and physical vulnerabilities. The BSCTs used clinical information to clear prisoners for harsh interrogation plans; they also used medical information to develop a plan to break a prisoner's resistance to questioning. Clinicians at Guantanamo Bay met with BSCT personnel to offer insight on prisoners' weaknesses, according to the report by Maj. Gen Geoffrey D. Miller, who took command of the Abu Ghraib prison after the abuse scandal broke out.

At times, behavioral clinicians reportedly micromanaged some interrogations; one Guantanamo Bay psychiatrist even suggested rationing toilet paper to seven sheets per day and limiting water for bathing. Similarly, a military intelligence specialist in Iraq applied her background in psychology to design approaches to "interrogate those who could not be broken." She approved coercive interrogation plans involving sleep deprivation but vainly protested the use of dogs or nudity. She eventually asked to be relieved of interrogation duties.'The Dude Eventually Died'

In December 2002, Rumsfeld empowered Guantanamo Bay interrogators to deny a prisoner's "medical visits of a non-emergent nature." Although he later revoked the order on advice of legal counsel, the practice of punitive denial of treatment apparently continued throughout the prison system.

In Iraq, Army investigators reviewed a video showing a prisoner with bound wrists lying on the ground near a checkpoint. Entry and exit gunshot wounds are visible. While the soldiers discuss whether to summon medical care, one soldier tells the moaning prisoner to "shut up" and kicks him in the face or upper chest, according to the report of an Army criminal investigation. A soldier who was present during the videotaping later joked that they "weren't in any hurry to call the medics," adding that he "thought the dude eventually died."

A recently filed lawsuit and an FBI memo describe four prisoners, three at Guantanamo Bay and one apparently in Afghanistan, who were denied a prosthetic limb, antibiotics for wounds (two cases), and treatment for constipation until they cooperated with interrogators. An FBI memo tells of a prisoner, arrested in Afghanistan, who was denied treatment for a gunshot wound and was tortured for at least three days before being taken to a hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0039354

At Guantanamo Bay, a psychology technician complained to an officer who refused to allow a prisoner to receive a medical evaluation for back pain. According to "Inside the Wire," a 2005 book co-written by former Army linguist Erik Saar, the officer answered, "I run this cellblock the way I see {filig}t. If I think a detainee is complaining about back pain just to get to walk across the camp to the medical clinic one sunny afternoon, then I'm not going to put it in my log. Now leave my block and next time stay in your lane."

Another Guantanamo Bay interrogator, who had read a prisoner's medical files, asked for medical treatment for the prisoner's eyes, according to a June 2005 report by Jane Mayer in the New Yorker. His commander replied, "He should have gotten the medical help before he went on jihad.'"Blood on the Wall'

Investigations of prison abuse describe clinicians who could not "see" abuse. A Navy medic, Petty Officer Carlton Blay, testified in a prison-abuse trial that he watched a guard slap and punch prisoners at Camp Whitehorse in Iraq. Blay said that the beatings were meant to get the prisoners "to know that these people were now in charge." He testified that he did not report the beatings because he thought they were reasonable.

The records also show instances of clinicians who did not confront abusive acts. In late 2003, Sgt. Neil Wallin, a medic, was called to a cell after Abu Ghraib guards slammed a prisoner into a wall, lacerating his chin. He saw the prisoner with a sandbag over his head and blood running down his clothes from a 2 1/2 -inch cut. According to a sworn statement, he saw "blood on the wall near a metal weld, which I believed to be the place where the detainee received his injury." He sutured the wound with 13 stitches but did not report it because he said he did "not know how he was injured or if it was done by himself or another."

Physicians are responsible for collecting medical evidence from patients who report being assaulted. Bruises disappear, fractures heal and witnesses move on, so a physician's job includes describing and, if possible, photographing injuries. One Abu Ghraib record recounts a prisoner's story of beatings, stress positions, being forced underwater until he vomited and being sodomized with an "industrial penis."

But such records were the exception. Red Cross medical monitors described a number of prisoners with injuries from beatings or burns that had not been recorded in clinical notes. In 2003, U.S. soldiers arrested Sadiq Zoman and imprisoned him at their base in Tikrit. A month later, soldiers dropped him off at a hospital, according to a New York Times account. His family found him there four months later, unconscious, with three skull fractures, a broken thumb and burns on the soles of his feet. The Army had given the hospital a medical record saying that Zoman had suffered a heart attack and heatstroke.'The Authority of God'

A medic who beat prisoners during his service in Iraq described his experience to a reporter like this: "You get a burning in your stomach, a rush, a feeling of hot lead running through your veins and you get a sense of power. . . . Imagine wearing point-blank body armor, an M-16 and all the power in the world and the authority of God."

In his 1973 study of Vietnam veterans, psychiatrist Robert Jay Lifton wrote that "atrocity-producing situations" arise at the con{fllig}uence of extreme stress, a dehumanized enemy and the assurance from authorities that ordinary limits on conduct do not apply. However, a torturing society also needs the passive assent or active complicity of its medical profession. In the 20th century, such circumstances came together on several occasions. How does U.S. medical culpability in the war on terrorism compare to the role physicians played in the horrific abuse in Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, or to medical complicity in the "dirty wars" of Argentina and Chile?

Nazi and Soviet physicians were architects of torture. Nazi doctors put their profession at the service of the party. They built a pseudoscienti{filig}c foundation for anti-Semitism, called race hygiene. Physicians and politicians then used that "science" to build and operate the machinery for fascist eugenics, {filig}rst killing the chronically ill and then, in the Holocaust, committing genocide. Soviet physicians constructed a diagnosis of "sluggish schizophrenia" and put it at the service of the state for incarcerating political dissidents. By contrast, the torture physicians of Argentina and Chile simply went to work in the prisons. They did what was asked of them and did not report what they saw.

The complicity and silence of U.S. clinicians and military medical commanders are more like the behavior of physicians in this second category. There were enough clinicians who were willing to be culpably ignorant, silent or actively complicit to staff the prisons and to allow the abuse to continue without medical challenge. Many civilian and military health professionals knew nothing of the abuse and bear no responsibility. But some senior military medical commanders, and the leadership of civilian medical associations, should have known or should have taken steps to know.

Clinicians are frontline monitors for human rights abuse in prisons. We are in prisons in which the Red Cross never goes and we are there when it is not. We can discern physical and psychic injuries even if they are not disclosed. Torturers need medical accomplices to keep prisoners alive as trauma is in{fllig}icted, to predict how severely detainees can be twisted. Such complicity shows a prisoner that he or she is utterly beyond help; complicit clinicians thus in{fllig}ict the torment of despair.

DOJ_NMG_0039355

It will require tenacious professionalism for medicine to remove the stain of its complicity with torture. We might start by recalling the story of the birth of Western medicine in ancient Greece. In grief over his beloved's death, Apollo, the god of healing and reason, dedicated their son, Asclepius, to healing. Asclepius ("Unceasingly gentle") married Epione ("Soothing"), and Hippocrates descended from that lineage. Greek medicine of 2,500 years ago had two foundations: medicine as a natural science and medical practice as a moral enterprise. The Hippocratic Oath speaks of those values in its vow to society, to patients and even to the prisoners at Abu Ghraib: "I will use regimens for the bene{filig}t of the ill in accordance with my ability and my judgment, but from what is to their harm or injustice I will keep them."

miles001@umn.edu

Steven H. Miles is a professor of medicine at the University of Minnesota Medical School and a member of its Center for Bioethics. He is author of "Oath Betrayed: Torture, Medical Complicity, and the War on Terror" (Random House), from which this article is adapted.

Afghan And Coalition Forces Strike Taliban (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, July 8 — Afghan police officers raided mosques across the volatile southern city of Kandahar late Thursday night and arrested more than 100 people sleeping in compounds, according to Afghan officials. The arrests appeared to be the first large-scale raids of mosques carried out by the country's American-backed government and immediately set off a backlash from Afghan religious leaders.

Two clerics in Kandahar condemned the raids, saying they resulted in the arrest of innocent people following a longstanding Afghan tradition of travelers being allowed to spend the night in mosques. The men requested anonymity, fearing reprisal from the government.

Police officials said they had received intelligence that unidentified men were meeting in mosques in Kandahar, which has experienced a sharp increase in suicide bombings this spring.

"Some strange people stay the night at mosques, having meetings," said the Kandahar police chief, Said Aziz Ahmad Wardak.

Mr. Wardak, speaking in a telephone interview Saturday evening, said that all but seven of the people arrested were held overnight and released on Friday. He said seven men who did not have identification cards were released Saturday afternoon.

Crowds of people gathered Friday and Saturday outside police headquarters in Kandahar, he said, but they remained peaceful while while waiting for the prisoners to be released. Local religious leaders also met with police officials after the raids.

Mr. Wardak denied it was Afghan tradition to allow travelers from other regions to stay in mosques, and he called on local clerics to halt the practice. "This is not part of tradition in Kandahar," he said. "A mosque is not a restaurant."

Afghanistan Bomb Kills Peruvian Soldier (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

A roadside bomb killed a Peruvian soldier and wounded four other NATO troops patrolling western Afghanistan on Sunday, the Spanish Defense Ministry said.

The soldiers were patrolling in an armored convoy near the city of Farah after sunset when a bomb exploded near their vehicles, said Maj. Ian Clooney, spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

Clooney would not identify the troops, but the Spanish Defense Ministry said the slain soldier was from Peru and had been serving with Spanish forces under an agreement allowing Peruvians with Spanish ancestry to form part of its forces.

Marine Recruiter In 'Fahrenheit' Mourned (AP)

By Sharon Cohen

AP, July 9, 2006

He was a stern-faced sniper — and a soft-hearted Marine who handed out candy to kids in Iraq. He was a warrior who wrote poetry about life and death.

He was featured in Michael Moore's antiwar documentary, "Fahrenheit 9/11," portrayed as an overzealous Marine recruiter who targeted poor kids.

But Staff Sgt. Raymond Plouhar was far more complicated than that.

And it was that complicated man who died in Iraq in late June, as he served with some of the same men he had recruited years ago. It was that complex man who was buried Friday, by a family that honored his service but would never forget his humanity.

DOJ_NMG_0039356

"He had a huge heart," says his widow, Leigha.

Plouhar was a Marine for 10 of his 30 years, but he had dreamed of joining the military ever since he was a little boy who liked to watch "M-A-S-H" on television and dress in fatigues and a camouflage shirt.

He entered the Corps straight out of high school, was trained as a sniper and traveled the world — Bosnia, Sudan and Israel. He had a ramrod posture and a fierce pride in his appearance: He once ironed his uniform and polished its brass buttons for two hours before allowing his mom to photograph him.

"He told me lots of times that he learned what could be accomplished .. if you put your heart and soul in it — and he put his heart and soul in the Marine Corps," says his father, also named Raymond. "He was gung-ho from the time he signed his name until the day he died."

His signature was a memorable one.

His birth certificate read Raymond James Byron Anthony Charles Plouhar — he was named after all his grandfathers. He followed a long family tradition of military service that included a grandfather who earned a Purple Heart in World War II and an older sister, Toni, who was in the Army.

Plouhar carried a Bible from his grandfather, Raymond, to Iraq. He kept it in his left shirt pocket next to his heart. Tucked inside was a photo of his wife and their two sons, Raymond, 9, and Michael, 5.

As devoted as he was to the Marines, Plouhar had a full life outside the military. He liked to hunt and camp, take canoe trips and fish with his boys.

He was known as a charmer, a good talker, a champion of the underdog (always defending and befriending kids picked on in school) and though he was trained to fight and kill, he preferred the role of peacemaker.

"He didn't like turmoil," recalls his mother, Cynthia. "He wanted everybody to be happy, to get along. ... He'd say 'Life's too short to sweat the small stuff.'"

As family members gathered last week in their lakefront home 30 miles north of Detroit, they lined the walls and windows with photo collages that tell Raymond Plouhar's life in chapters.

There's the grinning kid with the protruding ears (a coach once joked he looked like a Volkswagen with the doors open) proudly holding up the bass he caught.

There's the sturdy athlete grappling with an opponent around a wrestling circle and posing in the green-and-white football uniform of the Lake Orion Dragons.

There's the young man in love, sitting with high school sweetheart, Leigha, on his dad's Harley on their way to the prom, then years later, together again, he in Marine blue, she in white, on their wedding day.

Then there's the tough-minded Marine in helmet and combat gear — doling out candy from a plastic bag two months ago to schoolchildren in Iraq.

"He admired the Iraqi people," his father says. "He said, 'Dad, even though I can't understand a word they're saying, if we were back home ... we'd be buddies.'"

Plouhar was killed on June 26 by a roadside bomb in Anbar province in his second tour of duty in Iraq, weeks before he was to return home. He was assigned to the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, I Marine Expeditionary Force in Camp Pendleton, Calif.

Plouhar's family says he had no qualms about returning to Iraq and he believed conditions had improved since his first tour in 2005.

"I never worried," Leigha says, "because ... in my head, he was indestructible and nothing could ever happen to him because he was so good at what he did."

His mother says her son preferred to be at the center of the action. In an undated entry in a blog on MySpace.com, Plouhar said "you can call me crazy" but he liked being in Iraq. "Someone has to do it plus I love what I do," he wrote.

Plouhar did step back from active duty for four years and worked as a recruiter in Flint so he could donate a kidney to his uncle.

It was as a recruiter that Plouhar was seen in Moore's award-winning "Fahrenheit 9/11." The segment shows Plouhar and another Marine in a mall parking lot in a depressed suburb of Flint; it suggests the two men were cynically hunting for poor teens to sign up, rather than go to a wealthy suburb where they'd likely be rejected.

Plouhar's father says his son told him he had been misled and believed he was being filmed for a documentary that would appear on the Discovery Channel. (Moore's office didn't return calls or e-mail messages seeking comment.)

"He cried when he found out what it really was," his father says. "He never dreamed that it was going to be something to slam the country, which he dearly loved."

The movie, to be precise, is primarily a criticism of the Bush administration's actions after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0039357

And yet, the elder Plouhar also says he doesn't see anything wrong with his son's actions. "If you really watched just the part with my son in it," he asks, "how could you not say that he was standing tall and proud?"

His parents say they've seen only the segment featuring their son. Leigha Plouhar says her husband asked her not to watch the film — and she never has. Nor has Stephen Wandrie, his friend of 20 years, who says Plouhar was hurt by the film, but told him:

"'You know what? I know what I do is good for this country and every one of those people I'm recruiting — those guys are my brothers.' "

In the past month, the bloodshed that has become part of the daily life in Iraq seemed to edge closer and closer. He was shaken up in two explosions.

Two weeks before he died, his mother says, he called and she could hear the strain in his voice. But he tried to be reassuring. "He said, I'll be all right. I don't have much longer. ... I'm ready to come home. I'm ready."

And yet he seemed prepared for the possibility he wouldn't.

In a poem he sent to his family last year — a poem now enlarged to floor-to-ceiling size, and covering a wall of the Plouhar home — Plouhar said he knew he could die serving his country and was ready to make the sacrifice.

"I will leave my loved ones, my kids, my wife ...," he wrote. "Do not feel pity for me, for this is my choice. ... This is me. This is who I am. I am a Marine to the very end."

DOJ:

Book Review: There's Less To The Attorney General Than Meets The Eye (AAS)

By Sanford Levinson, SPECIAL TO THE AMERICAN-STATESMAN

Austin American-Statesman, July 9, 2006

Local journalist's book suggests Alberto Gonzales does not challenge his president's views.

Very few attorneys general of the United States have been the subject of biographies. To this short list Austin journalist Bill Minutaglio now adds his study of current Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, though the book concludes just as Gonzales is taking his oath of office. Only a few pages at the end discuss the first year of his tenure.

There are two major problems with "The President's Counselor." The first, which is no fault of Minutaglio's, is that Gonzales is an almost completely opaque subject. The second, for which Minutaglio does bear some responsibility, is that there is no evidence that Gonzales has risen to "power" so much as "prominence." The two are not the same.

As to the first problem, it is widely acknowledged that Gonzales is a taciturn individual. (One infers that he did not cooperate with this book inasmuch as there is no indication that Minutaglio ever interviewed Gonzales.) Former Texas Supreme Court justice Raul Gonzalez is quoted as saying that his friend is "very difficult to read because he plays everything close to the vest." State Rep. Pete Gallego, a West Texas Democrat who is described as a "good friend" of Gonzales, describes him as "just very reserved. . . . Al's a difficult to guy to get to know. . . ."

Minutaglio himself describes Gonzales as displaying "a mortician's calm" at all times. While giving a speech in Virginia, his response to learning about the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, was, "Well, keep me informed. Call me if there is anything else." Similarly, there is no evidence that he ever truly engaged in the debates swirling around the topics of torture and executive power that have turned out to be the leitmotifs of his service as White House Counsel and U.S. Attorney General. He was the passive conduit through which zealots such as John Yoo in the Department of Justice and David Addington in Vice President Dick Cheney's office led the government to adopt as policy what most people would describe as torture, coupled with an extravagant theory of presidential power that threatens the basic structures of American democracy.

Perhaps in this day of confessional memoirs, when millions can be made by publicizing — or even making up — childhood tales of woe, one ought to be grateful for a public figure who adamantly resists letting the public in on the emotional details of what has been an extraordinary life. Gonzales was born to parents who initially worked as migrant laborers; he once commented that his grandparents lived in a home with "no telephone, no television, no hot running water, no porcelain toilet, we went to the outhouse by the railroad tracks that ran along the back of their property."

His father, an alcoholic, built with his own hands a small home in Humble, Texas — if this were a novel, one would object to placing the family in a town called Humble! — where Gonzales was raised. He was the only one of eight children to go to college, graduating from Rice University, where, we repeatedly read, he sold peanuts in the football stands. From Rice he went to Harvard Law School, where, typically, he left no traces. From Harvard he went to the Houston law firm of Vinson & Elkins LLP, where he became one of the first Hispanic partners, specializing in real estate law (including work for one of V&E's largest clients, Enron Corp.). Gonzales went on to serve as Gov. George W. Bush's general counsel and then to sit on the Texas Supreme Court before moving to the White House with his sponsor.

Gonzales does exemplify one version of the American dream, though he appears to be notably unreflective about what is to be learned from it. Does he believe that such success is available to anyone with similar ambition and perseverance? Has he pondered the meaning of the fact that none of his siblings went to college? Does the possibility that he benefited from affirmative action at various points in his career lead him to have any qualms about the Bush administration's attempt to invalidate such programs at the University of Michigan?

If Gonzales has ever offered an answer to any of these questions — or even a single truly interesting observation about any of the great events of our time — it is absent from this book. The closest exception concerns a moderate abortion opinion he wrote during his brief service on the Texas Supreme Court, involving exceptions to parental notification requirements. He castigated his far-right colleague Priscilla Owen for engaging in aggressive judicial activism in the service of her anti-abortion commitments. This opinion received much attention when President Bush nominated Owen to serve on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, for it contradicted Bush's assurances that she believed in judicial restraint. Moreover, it generated great suspicion on the part of social conservatives who publicly opposed the possibility, once much-rumored, of Bush naming Gonzales as the first Hispanic to the United States Supreme Court. Still, it is impossible, as Minutaglio admits, to infer much, if anything, about what Gonzales himself believes about abortion or how he might respond were he to become a Supreme Court justice free to overrule unacceptable precedents.

Gonzales might simply be stunningly unreflective. Or he might be remarkably self-disciplined for reasons going back to his childhood, when he seemingly developed a tendency to keep hidden what he considered problematic aspects of his life. As a child, he never invited his school friends over to his home; Minutaglio suggests that this is because he was ashamed of his family's poverty. Similarly, he seems unwilling to invite anyone — or at least anyone willing to speak to Minutaglio — into his interior life.

The second, and possibly more serious, problem with this book is captured in the title itself, which leads us to believe that Gonzales is a more significant political figure than the evidence in the book supports. It is true that Alberto Gonzales has been George W. Bush's "counselor" both in the Texas Governor's Office and then in the White House. The problem is that nothing in this book suggests that Gonzales has ever once genuinely "counseled" George W. Bush, in the sense of asking probing questions or offering challenges to his client's already well-known views. Minutaglio twice compares Gonzales to Tom Hagen, Don Corleone's consigliere in "The Godfather." Some readers might find the comparison to be in questionable taste; more to the point, Hagen is a genuinely powerful person who commands the Godfather's respect, as distinguished from merely being well-liked for the use that can be made of him. If Gonzales has a genius, it is, as Minutaglio himself says, for telling his clients exactly what they want to hear, not challenging them to reflect on what it is they believe they want.

Gonzales, for example, was in charge of bringing Bush appeals for executive clemency before prisoners were executed in Texas. Alan Berlow published a devastating article in The Atlantic, on which Minutaglio draws, that suggests that Gonzales never thought seriously about the grievously flawed process of the Texas capital punishment system. Although we cannot know the details of private conversations between the two men, the written record of the memoranda that Gonzales prepared for Bush's review, and what is known about their personalities, leads one to believe that Gonzales simply reinforced Bush's own complacence. Characteristically, his one visit to Huntsville to observe an actual execution seems to have made no impression on him.

Perhaps the most illuminating paragraph in the book is drawn from an article that appeared in the Austin American-Statesman in 2001, shortly after Gonzales left the Texas Supreme Court to join Bush in the White House. Dan Shelley, who had been the governor's legislative director, described what he no doubt viewed as Gonzales' "growth" during his time serving Gov. Bush as his counsel: "Al would say, 'This piece of legislation is unconstitutional, veto it.' He was probably absolutely right. But then it would come to me, and I was the political guy. If Al had marked veto and the reason was it was unconstitutional, I would say, 'Go ahead and sign it, Governor.' It's not up to us to say whether it's unconstitutional. That's for the Supreme Court to decide. Al, I don't think, was comfortable with that at first."

It speaks well for Gonzales that he was uncomfortable, at least "at first." But, presumably, he learned to place any constitutional scruples to one side and to view himself, first and foremost, as serving the governor's (and then the president's) political interests. One term for this is the betrayal of a lawyer's oath to uphold the Constitution at all times.

Gonzales has never given Bush anything other than what Bush primarily values, which is absolute loyalty, and nothing in the first year and a half of his attorney generalship suggests any deviation. Most of his time has been spent defending unrestrained presidential power, including threatening to prosecute journalists who are attempting to engage in the oversight that a Republican Congress has failed to do. (Freedom of the press seems to be yet another issue that Gonzales has not seriously thought about.)

DOJ_NMG_0039359

This book is no doubt as illuminating as it could be about Alberto Gonzales, which is not very, save for detailing his remarkable rise from poverty to the halls, if not the actuality, of power. It is ultimately more illuminating about George W. Bush, who has no desire to welcome into his political family anyone who will seriously challenge any of his views. He found the kind of man he was looking for in Alberto Gonzales.

Sanford Levinson teaches constitutional law at the University of Texas and is the author, most recently, of 'Wrestling With Diversity.'

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

When Manipulation Might Equal Fraud (LAT)

By Tom Petruno, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

The investigation of companies' stock-options practices has the look of a regulatory free-for-all: The Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service all are interested in whether executives manipulated options contracts.

The companies may have violated SEC rules on accounting and disclosure. They may have violated criminal statutes if deception was deliberate. And they, and their executives, may have cheated the tax man in the process.

Many companies aren't waiting for a prosecutor to knock on the door.

"Right now boards all over the country are hiring outside counsel and forensic accounting experts to look at their option practices," said Kevin Cameron, president of shareholder advisory firm Glass, Lewis & Co.

"But that's not something you can do quickly," he said. Which means it could be a long second half of the year for investors who are worried that their companies could be implicated.

Prosecutors don't announce their investigations, but many companies choose to disclose to shareholders if they've become a target of a civil or criminal probe. That is how most of the companies implicated so far have come to light — firms such as Irvine-based semiconductor maker Broadcom Corp., computer hardware producer Brooks Automation Inc. and tax software giant Intuit Inc.

Yet it isn't clear that some of the games played with options in the past actually broke any laws. Backdating of options, without public disclosure, may be cut-and-dried fraud. But simply timing option awards ahead of expected favorable company news makes good business sense, SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins said at a conference in Washington last week.

He suggested that such so-called spring-loaded option awards were in "the best interests of shareholders," because the options would be worth more to the executives, and the companies therefore could issue fewer options to reach a desired level of capital gain for the executives.

Fewer option grants would mean that existing shareholders would face less dilution from additional shares in the marketplace, Atkins said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

But It Will Remain In Effect For Awhile (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A 45-day seal on materials seized in a raid on U.S. Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office legally expires today -- but will be continued anyway, as lawyers and politicians wrangle over unprecedented constitutional issues.

On May 25, President Bush ordered the seal in hopes that his Justice Department and House negotiators could "in good faith and with mutual institutional respect" resolve their disagreement over the legality of the first-ever search of a congressional office.

Agents seized documents and computer hard drives as part of a federal corruption probe of the eight-term New Orleans Democrat.

The seal will remain in place consistent with a previous statement by the chief judge for the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., Thomas Hogan, that the president's directive should continue until "further order of the court."

DOJ_NMG_0039360

On June 16, Hogan heard oral arguments during which Jefferson's lawyer and the attorney for the bipartisan leadership of the House of Representatives accused the Justice Department of an attack on the constitutionally established separation of powers.

Hogan, who had granted the government's request for a search warrant for Jefferson's office, strongly suggested during the hearing that he didn't find the legal arguments by Jefferson's lawyers and the House counsel's office convincing. He promised a quick ruling. But as of late Friday, both sides were still awaiting his ruling, which is now expected early next week.

"I think he sees the need to lay out a carefully crafted written opinion because this is an historic first," said Carl Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond. "He knows the difference between the routine search warrants he handles all the time, and the first one in the history of the nation in which a congressional office has been searched."

Jefferson has said he has an honorable explanation for the allegations that he engaged in a bribery scheme to promote projects in West Africa and predicts he will be cleared of any wrongdoing.

Probably won't be last word

Hogan's ruling, while eagerly anticipated, probably won't be the last word in the case. If the judge accepts the Justice Department's argument that the search didn't violate the separation of powers or the speech or debate clause of the Constitution, Jefferson's lawyers and probably the House counsel's office will almost certainly appeal the ruling.

The still-open question is whether Hogan, appointed to the federal bench in 1982 by President Reagan, will continue to keep the material taken from Jefferson's office sealed until the appeal is decided.

Tobias said it's likely the Justice Department will argue that the material should be made available immediately so the government can move expeditiously with its investigation of Jefferson and decide whether to seek an indictment from the Northern Virginia grand jury hearing the case.

Tobias said that, as with other issues in this case, there isn't a lot of precedent on whether the documents should remain sealed while the appeals process continues. If an appeal is filed, it initially would be heard by a three-judge panel in the district court. After that, it most likely would go the U.S. Supreme Court.

For now, according to a recent Justice Department filing, the documents remain in "heat-sealed evidence envelopes" placed inside a General Services Administration-approved combination safe.

. . . . . .

Bruce Alpert can be reached at bruce.alpert@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7861.

30 In State Charged In FEMA Fraud (BN)

By Val Walton, News Staff Writer

The Birmingham News (AL), July 9, 2006

More investigations are under way

At least 30 people have been charged in Alabama federal courts with scamming the Federal Emergency Management Agency of thousands of dollars by posing as Hurricane Katrina victims.

As federal officials try to get a handle on the scope of FEMA aid fraud, questionable disaster-relief claims continue to mount in Alabama and across the country months after the August storm.

In the North Alabama District, which includes the 31 northernmost counties and is based in Birmingham, nine people have been charged with FEMA-related fraud. The latest three were indicted in May:

Joshua D. Moscato, 22, of Huntsville is accused of giving a fake residence to get $2,000 in FEMA money.

Jennifer L. Young, 22, of Huntsville lied about her place of residence to get $4,348, prosecutors say.

Christy L. Smith, 33, of Gadsden also is accused of giving bogus information to get $2,000 in assistance.

In the state's Middle District, based in Montgomery, 13 cases have been charged, said Retta Goss, a court spokeswoman.

So far in the Mobile-based Southern District, eight cases have been filed, with officials expecting more. "Many investigations are under way," said Charlie McNichol, a spokesman for the district's U.S. attorney's office.

Nationally, prosecutors in 23 districts have charged more than 212 people with hurricane-related crime, according to the Department of Justice's Hurricane Katrina Task Force February statistics, the latest available. The task force was initiated in September 2005 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"There will be consequences for those who have engaged in such fraud and deceit," U.S. Attorney Alice Martin of north Alabama said.

After Hurricanes Katrina and Rita pummeled Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi, millions of people were left homeless and living out of motels and shelters. FEMA had the challenge of providing quick assistance while having adequate controls to assure that benefits were paid to eligible people.

DOJ_NMG_0039361

FEMA provided $2,000 per household in Individual Household Program payments through check, debit card or bank deposit.

The payments were supposed to go to speed aid to disaster victims. FEMA estimates more than 2.5 million people applied for Katrina or Rita benefits.

A Government Accountability Office review released last month found that the program was riddled with fraud. The agency estimates that it cost FEMA at least $1 billion.

Misspent aid:

While debit cards were used to get cash, food, clothing and other personal necessities, some went for adult entertainment, bail bond services and to buy guns. The government sent checks to thousands of people who registered with FEMA using information belonging to prison inmates or provided a post office box as the address of their damaged home.

Like other Louisiana residents, Theresa Clark and Angie Harris applied for $2,000 in financial assistance from FEMA. The women told federal officials their home in Slidell, La., was damaged, though Clark misspelled her place of residence as "Slydell." The American Red Cross paid for their stay at a motel in Attalla.

Instead of being hurricane victims, federal prosecutors said, the women are among the dozens of Alabama residents who turned out to be con artists.

"We knew they didn't live in Slidell," said Dennis Weaver, chief investigator for the Attalla Police Department. "They were a couple of people we dealt with before."

Clark and Harris, indicted by a Birmingham-based federal grand jury, pleaded guilty to their crimes. Clark is to be sentenced Aug. 2. Harris received 36 months of probation and was ordered to pay $2,000 in restitution.

Two identities:

In Birmingham, Gladys Mae Whitt was arrested by Birmingham Police on Nov. 23, 2005, for shoplifting. At the time, Whitt had a hospital bracelet, an open piece of mail, an Alabama Electronic Benefit Transfer card and a red plastic hospital card identifying her as Margaret Shear, a Hurricane Katrina evacuee.

Whitt, posing as Shear, gave an address of Walker Street in New Orleans. On. Sept. 15, 2005, a $2,000 check was mailed to Margaret Shear at a Birmingham address. That address, prosecutors said, was where Gladys Whitt lived with her mother through October 2005.

Whitt pleaded guilty. She is to be sentenced Aug. 17.

In March, a Montgomery grand jury indicted Bernetta Willis, 27, charging her with submitting applications to FEMA claiming that the property she rented in Louisiana sustained damage. The indictment said Willis lived in Montgomery and got four benefit checks totaling $8,716.

Willis also is charged with using a gun to threaten a witness who was to testify about her FEMA claims.

Weaver, the Attalla investigator, said it's not unusual for con artists, who may have substance abuse problems, to try to scam.

"You have to figure if they will steal from their own parents, they don't mind stealing from the government or taxpayer," he said. "They are not upstanding citizens."

E-mail: vwalton@bhamnews.com

Law Enforcement Officials Lurking All Over The Web (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 9, 2006

Open season on predators

A 53-year-old press secretary for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security uses the Internet to arrange a tryst with a young girl but worries she's a cop.

"Law enforcement is very good at this," he writes to "Ashlynne." "I have soooo much to lose."

He did. "Ashlynne" was a Florida sheriff's deputy.

A 44-year-old Georgia school superintendent uses a computer at work to arrange sex with 15-year-old "Holly" but worries about "loosing [sic] everything."

He did. "Holly" was a local police officer.

A 52-year-old sports editor at the Washington, Pa. Observer-Reporter arranges for sex with 12-year-old "Jessica," according to an e-mail transcript, but worries that he "could get in really big trouble."

He did. "Jessica" was an agent from the Pennsylvania attorney general's Child Predator Unit.

Across America, online sex stings are booming.

DOJ_NMG_0039362

Arrests have doubled since 2001, and so many cops are online that the federal Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force program is expanding its intelligence database so that police don't trip over each other in cyberspace.

Cyberstings also are getting unprecedented exposure with Dateline NBC's controversial "To Catch a Predator" series, which features a civilian group called Perverted Justice nabbing suspects while cameras roll.

The growth of this phenomenon raises big questions:

Are stings deterring predators? Or is the Internet creating more of them? And why are so many men -- almost all of them white and many well-educated -- trolling online for teens when they know they're being hunted?

The short answers: Probably, maybe and because they can't help themselves.

But as is often the case with the subject of child molestation, the issues are a good deal more complicated than that.

The best evidence, for example, indicates that there has been a dramatic overall decline in sexual abuse of children in America over the past 15 years.

Yet at the same time, those who examine this sort of thing -- and those who put predators in jail for a living -- are pretty sure that Internet sex crimes are increasing.

Federal prosecutions certainly are. Cases against those who prey on children or collect kiddie porn have jumped from 344 in 1995 to 1,576 last year.

Chart: Online predators / Arrests and characteristics

"I know we're getting better at catching them," said William Shore, a supervisory agent for the Pittsburgh FBI office. "I think the Internet is breeding this stuff."

Dennis Guzy, head of Pennsylvania's Child Predator Unit, thinks so, too. He's been working stings for 25 years. In pre-Internet days, he worked with U.S. postal inspectors to catch predators by placing fake ads in hard-to-find porn magazines.

Now he and his six agents cast their net online, setting up Yahoo profiles in which they pose as 11- or 12-year-olds. They're not hurting for targets.

The unit has arrested 53 men since January 2005, including suspects from Latrobe, Baldwin Township and Oakland just last month.

"This whole problem is driven by the Internet," said Agent Guzy, a veteran of the Philadelphia Police Department's sex crimes unit. "Child porn is so readily available on the Internet. I think individuals get out there and see the numerous teen sites, they see the wealth of child porn, and it starts to take them into a new world. I think that's what drives them into the chat rooms."

Even when they know better -- or should.

One suspect on the Dateline show wrote to his pen pal: "now a days you have to be careful ... you know cops pulling stings."

Agent Guzy remembers a case in which agents arranged to meet a suspect in the parking lot of a Harrisburg hotel. Before the meeting, the man warned them that they had to be careful because he'd heard that the attorney general's office was setting up stings in hotel parking lots around Harrisburg.

It's not that these people are dumb.

"It's an irresistible urge," said Agent Guzy. "You might think the guy has to be the stupidest guy in the world. But when you ask him about it, he says, 'Yeah, but in spite of all that, I couldn't pass up the opportunity to have sex with a 9-year-old girl. So I took the risk.' "

Many suspects will write in their correspondence, "I hope you're not a cop," but they accept the answer when a cop says that he's not.

"Why do they accept that [lie]? Because they need to," said consultant Kenneth Lanning, formerly of the FBI's Behavioral Sciences Unit. "This is need-driven behavior, not thought-driven behavior."

Police prowling this netherworld have to keep up with accelerating technology. Stings have moved from snail mail to e-mail and now instant messenger, requiring cops to react more quickly or risk losing their mark.

The Bush administration has been trying to streamline investigations.

Across the country, 46 Internet Crimes Against Children Task Forces funded by the Justice Department supply money and training for state and local police.

The program is expanding, adding more law enforcement agencies and beefing up a "deconfliction" computer system that allows police to share intelligence.

Lt. Dave Peifer of the Delaware County district attorney's office, who heads Pennsylvania's task force, says officers need to avoid duplicating efforts.

"You could have a situation where four other task forces are communicating with the same guy," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0039363

Authorities also occasionally bump into each other online. Not every cop in cyberspace is posing as a 12-year-old. Some investigators, such as postal inspectors, work reverse stings in which they pose as adults trading child pornography or as parents offering young children for sex.

With a central data base, everyone will know what everyone else is doing in this vast hunting ground.

Civilians with organizations like Perverted Justice probably won't have access; many in law enforcement consider them vigilantes.

But Dateline is getting huge ratings covering Perverted Justice sting operations, exposing a seedy subculture to millions of Americans.

One man was shown bringing his little boy to a tryst. Another showed up with whipped cream. Another stripped off all his clothes the instant he arrived.

It's enough to make a viewer wonder just how many of these men are out there. Researchers don't know, but they have examined who gets caught.

The most recent study by David Finkelhor, a Point Breeze native who heads the Crimes Against Children Research Center at the University of New Hampshire, shows that 91 percent of suspects are white men with full-time jobs.

"The people that law enforcement are accessing tend to be your white-collar technical people," says Mr. Finkelhor. "Minorities are not as represented in that group."

Many are married, too, and police have noticed that in most cases, women stand by their husbands throughout a prosecution.

How big a threat are these men?

Those caught in stings clearly planned to molest a child, but no one knows how many times Internet predators may have been successful. But many obviously are.

Former Baden police officer Kenneth Jones, for example, cruised homosexual chat rooms and arranged a tryst with a 14-year-old boy who also was victimized by several other local men. Those are the cases that motivate police in undercover efforts.

"We capture these predators before they steal the innocence of a child for the first time or molest a child again," said Kevin Harley, spokesman for the attorney general's office. "A lot of these guys have real victims."

Once stung, defendants offer a number of excuses, according to law enforcement officials. Among the more popular: they were trying to teach a young target about the dangers of the Internet; they were doing their own investigation; they weren't really going to have sex.

In court, they typically argue that they were entrapped or merely engaging in fantasy. A newer defense is the "impossibility" claim, which recently surfaced before the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia.

Todd Tykarsky of Trenton, N.J., had traveled to Philadelphia to have sex with a 14-year-old who turned out to be an FBI agent. Because the girl wasn't real, he said, he could not have formed a true intent to have sex with her.

The 3rd Circuit rejected that argument. Few defense strategies succeed -- the conviction rate for online stings is nearly 100 percent.

The proliferation of Internet sex cases involving children worries law enforcement, because cyberspace forums provide places where people can find kindred spirits no matter what their passions.

Chat rooms can serve to validate even the most deviant behavior, said Mr. Lanning. "No one is telling you it's wrong," he said.

The increasing availability of online child pornography -- much of it produced in the states of the former Soviet Union -- also could be lowering inhibitions and driving some men to seek trysts with children.

"Child porn is more accessible, so people are maybe developing a taste for it. There seems to be a market for these images," said Mr. Finkelhor. "But we don't have any evidence that it is [creating more predators]."

Mr. Finkelhor, Mr. Lanning and others encourage a sense of perspective. That's difficult in an era of 24-hour news, when a child abduction halfway across the country gets saturation coverage that in the old days would have been limited to the place where it happened.

But the cases that strike the most fear in parents -- stranger abductions of children -- are not increasing. There are between 100 and 150 annually in the U.S., a number that has remained steady for years.

Other crimes against children also seem to be declining.

The most complete study by the Crimes Against Children Research Center shows that substantiated cases of sex abuse dropped nearly 50 percent between 1992 and 2004. The rate per 1,000 children also went down, although the figures represent only abuse reported to youth agencies and don't reflect stranger abductions or most Internet crimes.

Mr. Finkelhor said more awareness of child abuse, better parenting, improved social services and more effective law enforcement seem to be making a difference.

DOJ_NMG_0039364

"Overall," he says, "I do think child sex abuse is declining."

(Torsten Ove can be reached at tove@post-gazette.com or 412-263-2620.)

Pacific Bases Grapple With Series Of Child Porn Incidents (S&S)

By David Allen, Stars and Stripes Pacific edition

Stars & Stripes, July 9, 2006

Expert: Recent prosecutions reflect national epidemic

CAMP FOSTER, Okinawa — The best way to protect children from online predators is to know what they are doing when they log on to the Internet, military investigators say.

"It's dangerous for kids to know more about computers than their parents," said Lt. Col. Janice Pegram, commander of Detachment 624 of the Air Force Office of Special Investigation on Kadena Air Base, Okinawa. "Never allow them to download anything from an unknown source, and have them tell you if they get any unsolicited instant messages.

"As parents, we try to give our children some liberty and support their privacy," she said. "But some things (like child porn) they have to be aware of. There are pedophiles and predators out there and they have a lot of tricks."

Some Web services, such as AOL, have special blocks on teen chat rooms, Pegram said. And parents can get their own accounts on other Web services that offer homepage and blog sites, such as the popular MySpace.com, so they can sign on and examine the content of the sites their children visit.

Special Agent Randy Dulay of the Okinawa branch of the Naval Criminal Investigative Service said parents should never allow a child to have a computer in his or her bedroom.

"Put the computers in a general area of the house, the living room or dining room, someplace where they can be monitored," he said. "Also, give them set hours for using the computers and have them ask you for permission before they log on."

He also suggests parents learn how to view the history section of the computer's Web browser to see what Web sites have been visited.

To report an incidence of child pornography or an online predator, servicemembers should call their base criminal investigations office.

Parents also can get more information from the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children's Web site at www.missingkids.com.

— David Allen

CAMP FOSTER, Okinawa — There's an epidemic of child pornography and exploitation in the United States, the government says, and don't think you're immune if you're stationed overseas.

In recent months, several servicemembers on Okinawa have been court-martialed on charges of downloading child pornography on the Internet.

In one case, an Air Force technical sergeant on Kadena Air Base was found guilty of using his home computer to solicit sex from a 13-year-old girl who also lived on base. In April he was sentenced to 5 years in prison and a bad-conduct discharge for child solicitation and downloading child porn.

Child pornography, the images of people younger than 16 engaged in sex, is illegal "anywhere at any time," said Lt. Col. Janice Pegram, commander of the Air Force Office of Special Investigation's Detachment 624.

In the past year, Pegram said, there have been five cases of child pornography on Kadena and other investigations are ongoing. Most of the cases involve downloading the pictures from the Internet, she said. A few involved sharing child porn with other Internet users.

"Only one was a predator," someone who tries to solicit sex from a minor directly, Pegram said.

During the investigations, all computer equipment seized is sent to the Defense Computer Forensics Laboratory in Virginia, part of the Defense Cyber Crime Center. Earlier this year, center director Steven Shirley said child porn made up 50 percent of the cases the center handled.

Pegram emphasized there is nothing harmless about downloading and viewing child porn.

"The children depicted have all been abused," she said. "They have all been exploited and victimized."

People found guilty of downloading and possessing child porn face lengthy prison sentences and bad-conduct or dishonorable discharges, and they also must register as sex offenders.

Pegram said there is not a greater incidence of child pornography in the military than among civilians.

"We're just a smaller version of what exists on the outside," she said, adding that dependents of military members and civilian workers can be charged and tried in a stateside federal court.

DOJ_NMG_0039365

Most of the child porn cases on Okinawa Marine bases have involved individuals being turned in by others who came across the material on the suspect's personal computer, said Randy Dulay, a special agent with the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

"We've had cases where the material was discovered by a family member or a friend who had been looking for something else on the computer and this stuff turned up," Dulay said. He said none of the three cases in the past year or so investigated by NCIS involved a predator.

"Most of the time they were just visiting Web sites and downloading pictures," he said. In the most recent case, a Navy hospitalman at the U.S. Naval Hospital on Camp Lester was handed a dishonorable discharge and sentenced to 30 months in prison for downloading and possessing child porn.

"It's a violation of a federal statute," Dulay said. "You could get up to five years in prison for just one picture."

He said most of the suspects at first claim they regularly viewed legal adult porn and downloaded the child porn by accident. But an examination of their hard drives, the search terms they used and the Internet cache history usually shows they were seeking child porn.

Supervisory Special Agent Joe Kennedy, also with the Okinawa NCIS office, said he's encouraged by people stepping forward to report child porn.

"Our cases were initiated by our Marines coming forward and doing what's right," he said. "They knew this was wrong and that it had to be reported."

Recently, all of the supervisors in the Okinawa NCIS office went to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children for a three-day seminar on child porn.

In April, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales visited the headquarters of the center in Alexandria, Va., and spoke about child pornography on the Internet. He praised the center's new CyberTipline (www.missingkids.com/cybertip) and said he supported a bill that would strengthen criminal penalties for Internet service providers who fail to report child pornography on their systems.

Gonzales said child porn collectors evolve into producers, "driving them to molest even more children and to make new and increasingly vulgar material."

Most troubling, he said, new forms of abuse have taken root on the Web. One form is molestation on demand, where pedophiles molest children while others watch the act live through streaming video.

In May, the Department of Justice launched Project Safe Childhood, which will focus on the online exploitation and victimization of children.

Powerful GOP Activist Sees His Influence Slip Over Abramoff Dealings (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

For more than a decade, Grover G. Norquist has been at the nexus of conservative activism in Washington, becoming a Bush administration insider whose weekly strategy sessions at his Americans for Tax Reform have drawn ever-larger crowds of lawmakers, lobbyists and even White House political adviser Karl Rove.

Over the past six years, Norquist has been a key cheerleader and strategist for successive White House tax cuts, extracting ironclad oaths from congressional Republicans not to even think about tax increases. And even before President Bush's election, he positioned himself as a gatekeeper for supplicants seeking access to Bush's inner circle.

But in the aftermath of reports that Norquist served as a cash conduit for disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the irascible, combative activist is struggling to maintain his stature as some GOP lawmakers distance themselves and as enemies in the conservative movement seek to diminish his position.

"People were willing to cut him a lot of slack because he's done a lot of favors for a lot of people," said J. Michael Waller, a vice president of the right-leaning Center for Security Policy who for several years was an occasional participant at Norquist's Wednesday meetings. "But Grover's not that likable."

Norquist has lashed back at his critics, accusing them of dishonesty, personal vendettas and political gamesmanship. He has saved his choicest words for Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whose Senate Indian Affairs Committee last month stated in a report that for a small cut, Americans for Tax Reform served as a "conduit" for funds that flowed from Abramoff's clients to surreptitiously finance grass-roots lobbying campaigns.

"The idea that our friend John McCain yelling at me would hurt me misses McCain's position" among conservatives, Norquist said. "John McCain thinks he can't be president if I'm standing here saying he's got a problem with taxes."

Mark Salter, McCain's longtime aide, replied: "Obviously, Grover is not well. It would be cruel of us to respond in kind."

DOJ_NMG_0039366

For now, Norquist's well-publicized financial links to Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to corruption charges and is cooperating with prosecutors, have had little obvious impact on Norquist's prominence. Nor have they affected his signature event: the meeting every Wednesday morning at Americans for Tax Reform, where officials of conservative organizations, activists and lobbyists gather with Republican politicians to swap notes, make plans and coordinate messages. The June 28 meeting in downtown Washington was packed.

"I don't think he's lost one iota of influence in conservative circles," said Cesar Conda, a Republican lobbyist and a former top aide to Vice President Cheney.

But beneath the outward signs of normalcy, the infighting is taking a toll on Norquist's standing. Some social conservatives who have jousted with him over his more libertarian views on the regulation of television and its depictions of violence and depravity are exploiting his weakness to press their positions on Capitol Hill. Security-minded defense hawks who for years have questioned his ties to Muslim activists are resurrecting charges that Norquist has turned a blind eye to terrorist sympathizers.

Republican lawmakers who have chafed at his dogmatic position on taxes are also ready to shrug off his heavy hand. In recent interviews, a half-dozen conservative GOP lawmakers said they are consciously avoiding Norquist's meetings, and they have begun questioning the purity of an activist who has always portrayed himself as motivated by ideals, not money.

"For someone like Grover Norquist, his influence stems from the sense that he is not doing this for the money," said Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.). "To the extent that he may be seen playing both sides of an issue, that will give people pause."

One Republican lobbyist with close ties to the House leadership said doors are not swinging open for Norquist the way they once did.

"Grover is about action and achievement; money has always been way down the list," said Gary Maloney, a political consultant and Norquist friend. "Something like this tying him to Washington-as-usual is unhelpful. But it will be short-lived in impact, assuming, as most expect, that this is the sum of it."

At the heart of his troubles is the Indian Affairs Committee report, which depicted Norquist as an avid participant in Abramoff's schemes to channel money from affluent clients, especially Indian gaming interests, to former Christian Coalition executive director Ralph Reed.

"Call Ralph re Grover doing pass through," Abramoff wrote in an e-mail reminder to himself in 1999, a year in which Norquist moved more than $1 million in Abramoff client money to Reed and Christian anti-gambling groups. In another e-mail, from 1995, Abramoff told a colleague that Norquist would fight a tax opposed by a beverage company client, if the firm became "a major player in ATR."

"What is most important however is that this matter is kept discreet," Abramoff wrote in the e-mail. "We do not want the opponents to think that we are trying to buy the taxpayer movement."

In 1999, when ATR was receiving large donations from the Choctaw tribe, Norquist e-mailed Abramoff: "What is the status of the Choctaw stuff? . . . I have a 75g hole in my budget from last year. ouch."

Norquist said McCain and his aides "dishonestly" and selectively published e-mails that take ATR's work out of context. The group's collaboration with the Choctaws went back more than a decade, as the tribe sought to create a low-tax, free-enterprise government, he said. The $75,000 referred to in the e-mail, he said, was simply a promised contribution that was late.

But for Norquist, defending his business practices rather than fighting political battles is a vulnerability. Rivals and foes in the conservative movement have pounced on the report to stir up suspicions that Americans for Tax Reform may not be the pure free-market, small-government group Norquist says it is.

L. Brent Bozell III, president of the conservative Media Research Center, has been pushing hard for legislation that would allow cable subscribers to purchase channels "a la carte," rather than in large packages prescribed by cable companies. That way, he said, indecent and profane channels will not be subsidized by consumers who have no interest in viewing them.

Now, Bozell is accusing Norquist of forsaking his principles by opposing a la carte cable choice. Norquist says the bill would give federal regulators the ability to set prices and play favorites with cable programming.

"With cable choice, you do have to wonder whose interests Grover is serving," Bozell said.

Frank J. Gaffney Jr., the firebrand director of the Center for Security Policy, has developed an anti-Norquist presentation, complete with charts and graphs, that he has shopped around to other conservatives, saying it shows Norquist's ties to terrorist sympathizers.

"This is the perfect moment to get the truth, because guys like Abramoff . . . have a powerful incentive to cooperate and get out the truth. At the very least, the questions should be asked," Gaffney said.

At issue is the Islamic Free Market Institute, which Norquist created in 1998 to steer Muslim voters to the GOP. To run the institute, Norquist tapped Khaled Saffuri, whose dealings with the American Muslim Council linked him to Abdurahman M. Alamoudi, a founder of the council, who pleaded guilty in 2004 to accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars from top Libyan officials and admitted participating in a Libyan plot to assassinate then-Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia.

DOJ_NMG_0039367

Norquist dismisses Gaffney's charges as anti-Muslim bigotry and part of a long-standing vendetta against him. And he says he has never violated his small-government principles to raise a buck.

But he conceded that there are Republican lawmakers who want to see him weakened. He has been brutal at enforcing the no-new-taxes pledge he extracts from the candidates he endorses, so much so that many in the party are beginning to chafe, he said.

But the apparatus he has created for conservatives -- with fundraisers, social dinners and weekly meetings not just in Washington but in 43 states and even Europe -- has become too important to destroy.

"Grover supplies grass-roots power, which is why lobbyists want him on their side," said John Feehery, executive vice president of the Motion Picture Association of America. "He senses where he can get activists around the country riled. He's a master organizer on specific issues."

As for Wednesday mornings at ATR, Feehery added, "I still think it's still the place to be."

Cunningham Probe Zeros In On Contractor (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) -- The prosecutors who sent former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison for taking bribes now are focusing their attention on his friend Brent Wilkes, a San Diego defense contractor who won nearly $100 million in contracts in the past decade.

Mr. Wilkes also has links to other corruption investigations.

Cunningham was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes -- including payments for a 7,628-square-foot mansion, a Rolls-Royce and a 65-foot yacht -- in return for funneling contracts to certain companies.

Mr. Wilkes' attorneys have confirmed he is the unidentified "Co-Conspirator No. 1" in Cunningham's plea agreement. Prosecutors won't comment on their investigation but purport he paid Cunningham more than $600,000 to win government contracts.

No one else has been indicted in the Cunningham case. However, a grand jury is meeting regularly and is focusing on Mr. Wilkes, according to two attorneys close to the investigation. The attorneys spoke on the condition of anonymity because grand jury proceedings are secret.

A second co-conspirator in Cunningham's plea agreement, Mitchell Wade, is cooperating with prosecutors after pleading guilty in February to bribing Cunningham in exchange for more than $150 million in government contracts since 2002.

Bringing a public corruption case is not easy, says Randall Eliason, former head of the public corruption section of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington.

"There's a lot of stuff that goes on that's sleazy and unethical that does not rise to the level of a crime," he said. "The key is always an expressed deal, where someone says, 'I give you this and you do that for me.' "

Mr. Wilkes, 52, has not spoken publicly since his name surfaced in the investigation last year. Attempts to reach him were unsuccessful. Through his attorneys, Michael Lipman and Nancy Luque, he has denied any wrongdoing.

Public corruption has become a major campaign issue this election year, and Mr. Wilkes has been connected to several of the investigations.

He has been subpoenaed in the Texas case against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. He gave money to Rep. John T. Doolittle, California Republican, who has acknowledged helping Mr. Wilkes win contracts and whose name has surfaced in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Mr. Wilkes is a childhood friend of Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the former high-ranking CIA official whose home and office were raided by FBI agents in May as part of the Cunningham investigation. Mr. Foggo left his job after disclosures that he participated in poker games organized by Mr. Wilkes. FBI officials also have been investigating whether Mr. Wilkes provided prostitutes for the parties.

Last week, the California Fair Political Practices Commission released a complaint purporting Mr. Wilkes tried to circumvent rules on campaign contributions by reimbursing two persons, including one of his own employees, for donations to a San Diego mayoral candidate in 2000.

CIVIL LAW:

Carnival Puts Bite On Hillary's Brother (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

DOJ_NMG_0039368

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

A bankruptcy trustee for a carnival company whose owners received a pardon from President Clinton is seeking to garnish the bank accounts of Mr. Clinton's brother-in-law to recoup more than $100,000 in loans.

Anthony D. Rodham, one of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's two brothers, got the loans from United Shows of America Inc. after its owners obtained the presidential pardon in March 2000 over the objections of the Justice Department.

Michael E. Collins, trustee for United Shows, filed papers in Alexandria bankruptcy court seeking the return of $107,000 plus $46,034 in interest from Mr. Rodham, 51, for the loans he received from the carnival company, which went bankrupt in 2002.

Mr. Rodham "received the benefit of the loans without making any repayment," reads a related document filed last year in bankruptcy court in Nashville, Tenn.

United Shows' owners, Edgar Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo Gregory, were convicted of bank fraud in 1982 on charges of illegally giving loans to friends. Mr. Gregory died in 2004, within four years of the presidential pardons.

At the time Mr. Clinton pardoned the Gregorys, Mr. Rodham reportedly said he worked for Tennessee-based United Shows as a consultant and denied taking money to lobby for presidential favors.

Mr. Collins, in his June 26 bankruptcy filing, said each of 16 checks from United Shows written to Mr. Rodham had a note at the bottom indicating the payments were loans.

Mr. Rodham, known as Tony and a resident of Vienna, Va., did not return several calls seeking comment.

His being named in the bankruptcy case is the latest distraction to Mrs. Clinton's political aspirations caused by her two younger brothers. Mrs. Clinton, a Democrat, is seeking re-election in November to her Senate seat from New York and is weighing a presidential bid in 2008.

Mr. Rodham got into a brawl in August 2001 at the Rodham family's summer cottage in Pennsylvania with a man who said he caught Mr. Rodham having sex with the man's girlfriend.

Mrs. Clinton's other brother, Hugh E. Rodham Jr., intervened in that fight. Hugh Rodham, 56, also came under scrutiny for his role in Mr. Clinton's pardons. An attorney, he returned about $400,000 he received for lobbying for a presidential pardon and prison commutation for two clients.

Both brothers were criticized in 1993 when they sought corporate contributions to pay for festivities surrounding their brother-in-law's first inauguration.

Neither Mrs. Clinton nor the former president returned messages seeking comment on the new court filing.

According to bankruptcy court records, Tony Rodham began to receive the loan checks on May 10, 2000. The final loan of $2,500 was made on Feb. 12, 2002, about six months before United Shows filed for bankruptcy protection.

Mr. Collins won a default judgment in the Tennessee court against Mr. Rodham because Mrs. Clinton's brother filed no legal papers to contest the matter, records show.

Mr. Collins said the recent filing in Alexandria begins the process of determining Mr. Rodham's assets, placing liens and garnishing wages.

"The default judgment is only as good as your ability to collect on it," he said.

United Shows also placed a judgment lien certificate against Mr. Rodham in the District, according to records in the D.C. office of the Recorder of Deeds.

If a lien on his property is enforced, creditors eventually could force a sale.

The House Government Reform Committee criticized Mr. Rodham in a 2002 report on President Clinton's pardons. The report said he lobbied for pardons for Mr. Gregory and his wife while receiving $244,769 in salary and $79,000 in loans from the couple since 1997.

The committee report found the loans to Mr. Rodham were consolidated into a $72,000 promissory note due in December 2001.

However, there is "no evidence that Rodham has repaid this loan, and the Gregorys' attorney informed committee staff that he believes that Rodham has not repaid the loan," the committee report stated.

The Gregorys had sought pardons because they thought their criminal records would disqualify them from winning state carnival contracts, according to the report. The committee found that the Gregorys asked Mr. Rodham at a party in late 1999 or early 2000 for help in winning approval for their pardon applications.

"According to Edgar Gregory, Rodham gave them the impression that he could not help much with their pardon petition but that 'if he could do anything, he would,' " the report said.

The committee also found Mr. Gregory had no documentation showing what kind of work Mr. Rodham performed for United Shows.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

OFFICER-INVOLVED SHOOTINGS : Police Defend Practices (LVRJ)

By Francis Mccabe, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, July 9, 2006

Officials say criminal element has grown more prone to violence

The image of Tarance Hall's limp body being pulled from a car onto the Strip and cuffed after he was fatally shot by Las Vegas police late Tuesday resonated across the valley and was broadcast nationwide.

And though critics wonder whether the Metropolitan Police Department is resorting to deadly force too soon, police continue to defend their use of guns because, they say, the criminal element has become less cooperative and more prone to engage officers violently.

Hall's shooting was the 18th officer-involved shooting this year by the police department and the 15th since police Sgt. Henry Prendes, 37, was slain by Amir Rashid Crump on Feb. 1. Hall's shooting also was the eighth fatal shooting this year. In at least three of the 18 shootings, nobody was injured.

Some national experts suggest an officer's death can play a role in the mentality of other officers to reach more quickly for their firearms.

Lt. Nelson Andreu, a retired detective for the Miami Police Department and an expert on officer-related shootings, said the shooting of a police officer can cause other officers to become more concerned with their own safety, which can lead to officer-related shootings.

But local police say that's not a factor.

The numbers don't tell the whole story, said Undersheriff Doug Gillespie.

"It's really important we don't overreact, as an organization, to the numbers," Gillespie said. "We look very closely at what led up to the situation and the decisions the officers made."

THE NUMBERS

Last year, there were 12 officer-related shootings involving Las Vegas police, nine of which were fatal. In 2004, there were 21, 10 of which were fatal.

So far, seven of the eight fatal shootings by officers this year have been found to be justified after Clark County coroner's inquests. An inquest has yet to be set for Hall's death.

Those fatal shootings include officers shooting a murder suspect in the back while he was handcuffed and running from police, and officers shooting unarmed men who police say were using their cars as a weapon while trying to escape.

Gillespie, who is one of 16 candidates running to be Clark County's next sheriff, said the department reviews officer-involved shootings on a case-by-case basis to determine whether the officers acted properly or whether any changes are needed to department policies or training.

In the past five years, the number of officer-involved shootings has been as high as 33 and as low as 13, Gillespie said, citing annual totals different from those provided by the department's public information office. Gillespie said he did not think the recent spike in shootings is attributable in any way to Prendes' slaying.

Department leaders review policies on a regular basis and after police shootings, he said. Policies change from time to time, but Gillespie said he has no plans to change current protocols.

Allen Lichtenstein, general counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union of Nevada, said officers "have the right and the duty to engage in the use of deadly force in situations where there is a serious threat of loss of life or bodily injury to them or other people."

"But a shoot-first-ask-questions-later attitude is clearly unacceptable for both the public as well as the officers themselves," he said.

"It does appear that there is a pattern where police officers lack either the training or the supervision to take situations where deadly force is not required, such as where people are not armed, are not threatening anyone, or perhaps under the influence or mentally ill, and being too quick to use deadly force," Lichtenstein said.

An informal survey of major cities across the country shows fluctuation in the number of officer-involved shootings. In the past year and a half, San Jose, Calif., with a population of 912,000, has seen just two fatal shootings compared with Las Vegas' 17 during the same period. Los Angeles, a city of 3.8 million, has had 17 fatal shootings since the beginning of 2005.

Philadelphia, the sixth most dangerous large city, according to Kansas-based research group Morgan Quitno Press, has seen its officer-related fatal shootings jump from two last year to 15 this year to date.

DOJ_NMG_0039370

A Philadelphia police officer was shot and killed May 8, said Philadelphia police Capt. Ben Nash. The shooting, which occurred when the officer was responding to a robbery, has taken a toll on the officers mentally, he said. But the spike in the city's shootings reflects the violent crime in the community, he said.

"A lot of bad guys have guns," Nash said.

PRENDES SHOOTING

It was a sunny February day when 14-year veteran Sgt. Henry Prendes responded to a domestic violence call at 8336 Feather Duster Court, near Durango Drive and the Las Vegas Beltway.

He was confronted by a fledgling rapper with an assault-style rifle.

Prendes was shot and fell to the ground. As he began to get back up, 21-year-old Amir Rashid Crump went up to him, aimed and fired the rifle into the sergeant's head, executing him.

Crump was killed after engaging other officers in a gunbattle.

Prendes was the first Las Vegas police officer in 17 years to be slain in the line of duty.

Several sheriff's candidates disagreed with the notion that Prendes' death foreshadowed the recent officer-involved shootings, arguing instead that the increase is a symptom of the increasing violence in the community.

"I think segments of society are getting more violent and more prone to confronting officers," said candidate Bill Conger, a 29-year veteran of the department.

"I'm sure that when we have an officer lost due to a police shooting, that would be on officers' minds," he said. "But I don't think there is now more of a willingness to use deadly force. I think it heightens their awareness of what's going on and the potential danger."

Retired Lt. Moe Mattingly, a 20-year department veteran and also a candidate for the sheriff's job, agreed.

"Officers are briefed daily on officers killed in the country," he said.

The reason is twofold, he said: to heighten the awareness of officers and remind them how dangerous the job is and to look at what the officers did or did not do that would have allowed them to be alive today.

"You also have to put the numbers in perspective. There have already been a half million (calls) so far this year, and all of those can be dangerous, and we have only had 18 officer-involved shootings," Mattingly said. In that regard, he said, the numbers are not that high.

"The 20 years I served, I never fired my weapon," Mattingly said. "But there were many times that I have come close."

Las Vegas police officer Laurie Bisch, a 13-year veteran and the only female sheriff's candidate, said the Prendes shooting was a wake-up call for many officers.

"We have criminals out there who are not afraid to use deadly force," she said. "With the population growth there comes a whole new element, and those criminals are brazen."

Bisch works patrol in the South Central Area Command, an area inundated with gangs and drug use. She said Las Vegas has developed a reputation among criminals in California and Arizona.

"They think it's easy to beat the system here. In California, they are tough with their three-strikes rule, and Arizona has tough new laws that are keeping criminals in jail for longer periods of time. Vegas is often the place of choice for these criminals."

And there are not enough officers to patrol Las Vegas, she added.

"We used to have two to three officers handling a call. Now there may only be one officer."

'LACK OF ACCOUNTABILITY'

Lichtenstein said the coroner's inquest system, which he labeled a farce, leads to a "real lack of accountability."

"When an officer knows he will go before a coroner's inquest and not be asked important, tough questions before the event, maybe the unacceptable number of police shootings is not that surprising."

One candidate running to be Clark County's next sheriff agrees.

Lt. Ron Williams said he would like to see a Blue Ribbon commission review what he believes is an outdated inquest process.

"The public trust has deteriorated in our police department because of the current system," he said. "The bottom line is we need to be more open with the public in what goes on in these situations."

Williams added that he doesn't have a problem with the current use-of-force policies.

Dean Ishman, president of the Las Vegas branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said his group is looking at the number of shootings and the situations that led to them. Five of the suspects killed this year were black.

The group is planning to present suggestions and ask for changes to the police department's deadly-force policy and the coroner's inquest process Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0039371

"We are not coming and pointing fingers," Ishman said. "These guys do have a tough job to do, but we are still concerned about the ... surging number of officer-involved shootings."

Lichtenstein said it might be helpful for an agency such as the U.S. Justice Department to look into the matter.

But Gillespie said the system of checks and balances that includes the coroner's inquest process helps ensure that police shootings are thoroughly reviewed.

"I think our policies and procedures are sound," he said.

Bisch concurred, defending the police department's training as being the best in the nation and saying officers must abide by a strict "use of force" policy.

Bisch also pointed to the internal investigation done after an officer-involved shooting. She praised the coroner's inquest process as one that "leaves no stone unturned."

"Personally, I think it is fine the way it is. And the families have the option of pursuing the case in civil court."

Bisch said the public needs to be better educated on what to expect when contacted by the police.

"None of us (police officers) want to be involved in a shooting," she said. "But I don't want one officer to have to worry what the public is going to think when they are doing their job. A deadly force scenario can take place in a split second. It's important the public realizes we don't have trigger-happy cops."

Review-Journal writers Adam Aasen, Brian Haynes, David Kihara and Carri Geer Thevenot contributed to this report.

Sarasota Says Proposed Fines By Feds Too Onerous (HTRIB)

By Doug Sword

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), July 9, 2006

SARASOTA COUNTY -- Federal civil rights officials want to levy $5 million in fines, penalties and damages against Sarasota County as part of what would amount to the county admitting it discriminated against people with disabilities.

That was the negotiating stance of the U.S. Justice Department's Civil Rights Division before it filed a lawsuit June 30 against the county alleging violations of the federal Fair Housing Act.

County officials say the proposed penalties are too onerous and believe they can defend their 2004 actions which prevented Renaissance Manor, a nonprofit organization, from operating six group homes known as Tammi House in Warm Mineral Springs. The Justice Department, however, has been aggressive in defending the disabled in housing discrimination cases and has filed 94 such lawsuits against local governments, businesses and individuals since 2000. The federal demand from Sarasota County appears to be bigger even than a high-profile lawsuit that led last year to the housing authority in Baltimore agreeing to $1 million in penalties and spending several million dollars on housing for the disabled.

The Tammi House group homes are all near one another on Sevilla Street, and each house has up to six residents. The federal suit says Renaissance Manor lost more than $1 million in grants because of the county's actions. The county violated the Fair Housing Act, a federal law prohibiting discrimination against buyers or renters because of a handicap, the suit says.

County officials deny the allegations, saying they objected to the clustering of the six homes in one neighborhood. State law requires "community residential homes" to be licensed and located at least 1,000 feet from each other. Renaissance Manor, which has also sued the county, and the justice department say these are "family" homes that don't require licensing or separation.

Sarasota County commissioners are set to meet Tuesday in a rare behind-closed-doors session to discuss the new federal lawsuit and the ongoing suit with Renaissance Manor.

The last time county commissioners met in a closed-door session was in December 2004 about a legal dispute with North Port, said County Commissioner Jon Thaxton.

Thaxton called the federal lawsuit "the most serious charge" against the county during his six years as a commissioner.

Thaxton said his younger brother Bob is mentally disabled and lives in a group home in Texas with four others. The suburban setting and sense of "home" is "the best thing that ever happened to him."

"I'm a big fan of these things, and I want to support them," Thaxton said. "So for me, a member of the Board of County Commissioners, to be accused by the Department of Justice of discriminating, I not only take it seriously, I take it personally."

The consent decree proposed by the federal government was too onerous to accept, said County Administrator Jim Ley. Besides the magnitude of the fines and penalties, the document would have included an admission of wrongdoing by the county and a requirement to hire an employee to monitor the county's compliance with the Fair Housing Act.

Locating six group homes adjacent to one another defeats the purpose of what state law requires and the county wants to accomplish, Ley said. Clustering the homes creates a small "ghetto" instead of making the disabled persons in the house a part of the surrounding suburban community, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0039372

The Economics Of Discrimination (WP)

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Discrimination and economic development just don't mix. For proof, look at the Jim Crow South, where economic growth lagged the rest of the nation from the end of World War II until the mid-1960s. Racism undermined prosperity. Then, as segregation waned, economic growth accelerated.

In November, Virginians will have the chance to self-inflict a fresh discriminatory wound on their economy. The Marshall-Newman amendment, the so-called "marriage amendment," seeks to amend Virginia's Constitution to ban gay marriage and to impose other legal limitations on unmarried couples, including heterosexual couples. The amendment is not only useless -- gay marriage has been outlawed in Virginia for 30 years -- but it is downright harmful to the state's economy in two important ways.

First, the amendment makes Virginia less attractive to companies that seek top employees without regard to race, religion or sexual orientation. Capital One, for example, is one of Virginia's biggest and best employers. It provides domestic-partner benefits for unmarried employees' partners, both for same-sex and heterosexual couples. The Marshall-Newman amendment could prohibit Capital One from providing these benefits. That would make it harder for Capital One and for the 15 other Fortune 500 companies based here that provide such benefits to hire the people they want to hire in Virginia.

Second, the amendment marks our Commonwealth as a place where people who are "different" or who have "different" ideas are not welcome -- be they gay or straight. This consequence is perhaps the most serious. Economic development today is all about attracting the best, most talented and most creative employees. These workers will determine in large part whether Virginia's economy roars or whimpers and whether Virginia companies can compete against overseas firms with cheaper labor pools.

Not surprisingly, these talented workers and the high-tech, high-wage companies that employ them tend to locate in communities that are diverse and open-minded. These communities are also ones that attract gays and lesbians, and for the same reasons. In his influential book "The Rise of the Creative Class," Richard Florida notes that the most statistically reliable indicator of a successful high-tech-friendly environment is the size and vitality of the gay population. Gays and lesbians "signal a diverse and progressive environment that fosters the creativity and innovation necessary for success in high-tech industry." That environment attracts talented gays but, in far larger numbers, it also attracts talented heterosexuals who want to work for companies and in communities that respect diversity and individual freedom. Virginia needs that type of environment if it wants to attract the best companies and most talented employees.

Virginia tried the economics of discrimination once before. It didn't work in the 1950s and '60s, and it left our state's economy at the bottom of the national heap. Surely we have learned from that.

Virginians should vote no this fall on the Marshall-Newman amendment not only because it's wrong but also because it's bad for business.

-- Michael Schewel Richmond was Virginia's secretary of commerce and trade under Gov. Mark R. Warner (D).

Gay Marriage Fight Crosses The Hudson (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Now that New York's highest court declined to legalize gay marriage last week, where's the next battleground?

Next door, in New Jersey. Gay rights advocates are storing hopes in that state's Supreme Court, which will most likely rule on the issue sometime this summer; a similar case is also pending in Washington State.

Lawyers on both sides of the issue said New Jersey might legalize gay marriage when New York did not.

"As a general matter, the court has maintained an expansive view of its Constitution," said Lawrence S. Lustberg, who argued before the New Jersey court in February in favor of gay marriage. "The focus has long been on safeguarding rights."

The New Jersey court usually applies a more flexible standard in discrimination cases than the New York court. And in arguments, the New Jersey judges did not dwell on child-rearing or the needs of parents, central issues in the New York decision.

Even if the court legalizes same-sex marriage, it might not reverberate nationally. "I'm not sure New Jersey will matter much in the nationwide contest over gay marriage, simply because of the reputation of the New Jersey Supreme Court," said Monte Stewart, president of the Marriage Law Foundation, which opposes gay marriage.

'Gettysburg' For Gay Marriage? (WP)

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

The decision by a New York court changes little.

DOJ_NMG_0039373

THE DECISION last week by New York's highest court not to legalize same-sex marriage is being portrayed as a big defeat for gay rights activists. Monte Stewart, president of the traditionalist Marriage Law Foundation, told the New York Times: "When people look back and write the history of this issue, they will view the New York decision as the Gettysburg in this big contest." New York was among a relatively small number of states whose courts might plausibly have followed the lead of the Massachusetts high court in requiring marriage equality. Its refusal to do so suggests that the high-water mark of judicial recognition of marriage rights for gay men and lesbians might not be all that high.

Yet since the Massachusetts decision in 2003, it's become clear that democratic majorities, not judges, ultimately will decide how evenhanded state marriage laws are going to be. In many states, ballot initiatives have preempted any litigation by amending state constitutions to prohibit same-sex marriage. In others, legislatures have moved to liberalize marriage laws. Even in Massachusetts, where the courts purported to resolve the issue, an amendment to overturn the decision could be in front of voters in 2008.

In other words, the most a state court can do is change the legal baseline. State laws, and even state constitutions, are generally easy enough to change that courts cannot force same-sex marriage on an unwilling populace. The fight for marriage equality in New York will simply move to the legislative arena.

So the task for Americans who support same-sex marriage, as we do, has not changed. It is to convince a majority that couples who love each ought to have the state's recognition for lifelong relationships -- and that such recognition poses no threat to heterosexual marriage. Once that happens, it won't matter what the New York court thinks. And until that happens, no victory there, or in any state court, will be safe.

Long Haul To Acceptance (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

30 Years On, Gains and Trials for Women at Annapolis

The words were spoken 30 years ago, and yet they are as jarring as they were the day when Sharon Hanley arrived at the U.S. Naval Academy -- 17 years old and about to make history as one of the first female undergraduates.

"I don't like you here," she recalls an upperclassman telling her. "I don't like women at my school, and so I'm going to be on your butt every waking minute. . . . If my plan works, you're going to be long gone before I graduate. Is that clear?"

She remembers her shock and dismay, then her momentary confusion about how to answer. As a plebe, she was not allowed to object or comment.

"Yes, sir," was all she could say.

Now, on the 30th anniversary of the integration of women in the Naval Academy, Sharon Hanley Disher finds herself in history's view again, the first of the earliest female graduates to be followed to Annapolis by a daughter. She watched teary-eyed in the late June heat as her daughter and son, who are twins, stood solemnly in Navy whites for their swearing-in on the campus's tree-lined grounds.

They are part of an academy class that includes a record number of women -- 22.4 percent, compared with 6 percent in the beginning -- and comes together as the country is at war, with women serving on destroyers and in fighter planes.

But though much has improved since women first arrived -- and many female graduates express great loyalty to the storied 161-year-old institution -- a complex and sometimes troubling portrait of student life emerges from three recent studies sponsored by the Defense Department.

The most recent study found that in the 2004-05 school year, 59 percent of female midshipmen and 14 percent of men reported sexual harassment, defined as crude and offensive behavior, unwanted sexual attention or sexual coercion. Sexist behavior -- put-downs and offensive comments -- was reported by 93 percent of women and 50 percent of men.

What the academy experience is like for young women is coming into greater focus as Congress looks into the subject and as the quarterback on the academy's football team faces a court-martial trial starting tomorrow on a charge of raping a female midshipman.

All of this happens as three decades of gender integration are marked this month, with women recalling their unsettling early days in a college dedicated to the making of military men.

"The name of our game was survival," Disher said. The attitude was "boys will be boys and 'You're coming to an all-male school; what did you expect?' " At her home in Annapolis last week, Disher happened upon a C-SPAN broadcast of Vice Adm. Rodney P. Rempt, the academy's superintendent, testifying before Congress.

"Sexual harassment and misconduct and assault should not be tolerated in the Navy-Marine Corps," he said, "and I can assure you that they are not tolerated at your Naval Academy."

To Disher, this was another sign of changed times. "You have to talk about the problem to fix it," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0039374

Meagan Varley was 10 when she decided to become a fighter pilot. She had seen the movie "Top Gun" and set her heart on flying. Her father, a teacher, suggested the Naval Academy, and in 1998 she found herself on the Annapolis campus as part of a class that was 16 percent female.

"You're aware that the things you do are going to be watched more closely and that you could be stereotyped more easily," she said. But as time went on, she found that her sex "kind of faded into the background."

Flight school followed graduation, and now, four years later, she is a fighter pilot, having flown F-14 Tomcats and F/A-18F Super Hornets, opportunities not open to the first female graduates. "They really broke the way for the rest of us," she said.

In the early years, women had fewer job choices because, under law, they could not serve on combatant ships or aircraft. Those who did not want women at the academy often complained that they were taking men's slots but could not do men's jobs.

That complaint grew louder in 1979, when Washingtonian magazine published an article, "Women Can't Fight," by James Webb, a much-heralded academy graduate and Marine war hero who is now the Democratic candidate for U.S. Senate in Virginia. He wrote then that the presence of women poisoned the academy's mission and that the academy's massive dormitory was "a horny woman's dream."

"The men went crazy; they loved it," recalled Disher, who wrote a book, "First Class," about women's experiences.

Webb has said recently that the article was published a long time ago and that as secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration he tripled the number of jobs that were open to women and ordered a crackdown on sexual harassment.

An array of jobs opened to women in the early 1990s, and after that, said Georgia Sadler, a retired Navy captain and the academy's first female faculty member, women "didn't feel so much like second-class citizens."

As more women enter the academy -- 273 this year, up from 81 in 1976 -- they have come closer to achieving a "critical mass" that ceases to be seen as a minority, said Mady Wechsler Segal of the Center for Research on Military Organizations at the University of Maryland. She put the tipping point at 25 to 35 percent.

Meghan O'Mara, Class of 2002, was never sexually harassed, but she said she "certainly had people who said inappropriate things" to her.

O'Mara, 26 and honorably discharged from the Navy, said more openness is needed, recalling the time one of her friends reported a rape. Academy officials, she said, "were definitely trying to make her keep quiet about it. . . . I don't think the environment makes a lot of women feel they can come forward and there will be a fair response."

That kind of concern touched off a 2003 scandal at the Air Force Academy, amid revelations of more than 140 reported rapes and sexual assaults over 10 years.

Since then, government studies have looked into harassment and sexual assault at the service academies. A recent Defense Department survey of midshipmen found that more than half of women who said they had been sexually assaulted did not report it. In all, 83 of 652 women -- more than 12 percent -- said they were victims of sexual assault between 1999 and 2004, the report said.

It also noted that women "do not report sexual harassment because they live and deal with it daily; it almost becomes normal. . . . They fear being ostracized and abandoned by their peers, both male and female."

One woman wrote that the academy was "one of the most emotionally devastating places I can imagine. Most of the women came here expecting mental and physical challenges. We thought we'd have to put up with overdoses of testosterone. What we did not expect was to be looked down upon for being women -- to be suddenly less than human in their eyes."

Before Congress, Rempt spoke of efforts to improve training and reporting. He cited an academy survey that found that 5 percent of women believe they would be resented by peers for reporting harassment, down from 50 percent five years ago.

In 2001, surrounded by hundreds of classmates, Candice Sarlese climbed up a lard-slicked granite monument, called Herndon, at the end of her plebe year. It is a tradition, and Sarlese had heard about women being pushed off. For her, it was different. A fellow midshipman turned to her and said, "Don't worry. I'm not going to let you fall."

Sarlese, 25 and now a first lieutenant in the Marines, said she believes some women "look for things. Some guys will make a joke, and they will take it as hurtful."

Over 30 years, relations between women and men have become better and more complex.

Sandee Irwin, part of the first class, recalls the insult of a midshipman two years her junior. "Why are you here, anyway?" he sniped.

Irwin took the young man aside and told him squarely: "You knew we were here when you signed your name on that piece of paper. If you don't like it, go home!"

Disher, the 1976 plebe, recalls blatant hostility after she joined the cheerleading team.

Worst of all was an Army-Navy football pep rally, in her second year on campus, she said. As Disher and the other cheerleaders came bouncing out onstage, the crowd stopped clapping.

"Get off the stage!" she heard. Then boos. "Get out of my school!"

DOJ_NMG_0039375

A generation and more than 2,770 female graduates later, Disher had no reservations about sending her twins to the academy, where they will be part of the Class of 2010, with women such as Ashley Houston, 18.

"I think women are just as capable as men," said Chelsea Wright, 18, of Valley Forge, Pa., getting her hair cut to above the collar -- not far from where men were being shorn to the nub -- as she imagined herself on a Navy ship or jet, possibly in combat.

"I'm sure the level of respect has changed" over 30 years, ventured Margaret Boyle, 17, of Leonardtown.

The young man next to her in line nodded in agreement.

"I'd rather have them here than not," said John Howser, 17. "I've grown up with them."

ANTITRUST:

Talk Of Alliance Is Opening Floodgate Analysis (FREEP)

By John Gallagher, Free Press Business Writer

Detroit Free Press, July 9, 2006

GM drama offers many endings

As General Motors Corp. formally began Friday to explore a possible alliance with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA, the process seemed firmly in the hands of GM Chairman and CEO Rick Wagoner.

But in the world of corporate mergers and acquisitions, events can quickly spin out of control.

So far, there's nothing in the proffered Nissan-Renault overture to buy part of GM to indicate it's anything but friendly. But even this mild-mannered gesture could lift the lid off a box of snakes.

A rival suitor could ante up a better offer. At some point, GM's Board of Directors might launch a spirited, even ugly, defense. And talk of a GM deal might stimulate merger or takeover offers to cross-town rival Ford Motor Co.

Auto insiders doubt any of those possibilities will happen this time. Most GM watchers expect the company to politely study the Nissan-Renault overture before turning it down.

Even so, with the fate of the world's biggest automaker on the line, along with the jobs and livelihoods of tens of thousands of metro Detroiters, the unexpected becomes the expected.

Beyond a potential three-way alliance, other possibilities include:

Another suitor turns up. Once two or more companies initiate friendly discussions about a deal, it is common for another, unfriendly suitor to make a rival offer.

Wall Street's most notorious example came in 1988. As recounted in the popular book and movie "Barbarians at the Gate," F. Ross Johnson, RJR Nabisco's chief executive, initiated a buyout plan to take his own company private. Other bidders suddenly jumped in, most notably the leverage-buyout experts at Kohlberg Kravis Roberts.

The battle escalated into a frenzy of bidding and defensive moves. KKR finally won, paying $25 billion for the company.

Jim Seward, professor of finance at the University of Wisconsin at Madison who has studied mergers and acquisitions, said something like that could happen with GM.

"This certainly puts them in play, as far as I'm concerned," he said. "If anybody is out there waiting in the wings, this will probably nudge them to step up and move forward."

A multi-party battle is possible, but some industry watchers think it's unlikely, given GM's daunting problems, including its high labor, pension and health-care costs, and its declining market share.

"Anything is possible, I suppose," said M.P. Narayanan, professor of finance at the University of Michigan. "But I can't see why GM is such an attractive takeover candidate for most car companies."

Ford becomes a target. David Cole, chairman of the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, said the proposed GM deal has Wall Street analysts talking about a similar deal for Ford.

"Once something like this starts, then you have a lot of people thinking, 'What does that mean for us? Maybe we better get moving. What other deals are out there?' In that sense, Ford is really inexpensive, too, and could be a good partner for somebody," Cole said.

Experts on mergers and acquisitions say the auto industry long has been ripe for consolidation.

"Certainly throughout history, M&A transactions have occurred in waves," said Seward of the University of Wisconsin. "And those waves tend to have an industry concentration to them."

He cited telecommunications as an industry that has been consolidating rapidly in recent years. A century ago, steel, oil and auto manufacturing all went through waves of mergers and takeovers.

"Once something like this starts, it's kind of like a disease. It's contagious," Cole said. "There are too many players in the game right now, and we're going to see some form of consolidation, and this is often the way something starts."

DOJ_NMG_0039376

Politicians get involved. In late 2002, Simon Property Group of Indianapolis launched a hostile takeover bid for Taubman Centers Inc., the Bloomfield Hills-based mall company founded by A. Alfred Taubman. The nasty fight dragged on for almost a year, costing each side millions of dollars.

Simon finally withdrew its offer after Taubman-friendly Michigan lawmakers passed anti-takeover legislation to thwart the attempt.

Over the past several years, proposed combinations between Northwest and Continental airlines in one case, and United and US Airways in another, collapsed after the U.S. Justice Department raised anti-trust objections.

Since the GM-Nissan-Renault alliance would be international, other governing bodies, such as the European Union, could raise their own objections.

The least likely outcome. In a way, the least likely outcome is that nothing happens -- that Nissan-Renault simply goes away after GM rejects its overture.

Kirk Kerkorian, the mercurial investor and GM shareholder who prompted the alliance talks, gives no indication that he's in any mood for a letdown. As GM's largest individual shareholder, Kerkorian has pushed relentlessly to unlock what he perceives to be the company's unrealized value.

Seward suggested this week that if the Nissan-Renault plan doesn't work, Kerkorian would try again with someone else.

"In the end," he said, "Kerkorian is the kind of guy who doesn't care who pays him, as long as he gets paid."

Free Press business writer Michael Ellis contributed to this report. Contact JOHN GALLAGHER at 313-222-5173 or gallagher@freepress.com.

ENVIRONMENT:

Texas Lawsuit Includes A Mix Of Race And Water (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

DeBERRY, Tex. — Frank and Earnestene Roberson no longer need to drive the 23 miles to a Wal-Mart near Shreveport for a safe drink of water.

Instead, it is delivered to them in five-gallon jugs, courtesy of the Environmental Protection Agency.

But they and neighbors in this historically black enclave in the East Texas oilfields seem no closer to being able to drink, cook or bathe safely from their own wells since the E.P.A. found the groundwater contaminated with pollutants that included arsenic, benzene, lead and mercury.

Calling themselves victims of "environmental racism," community members in June filed suit in federal court, accusing the Texas Railroad Commission, which regulates the state's oil and gas industry, of failing to enforce safety regulations and of "intentionally giving citizens false information based on their race and economic status."

The commission said it had yet to receive formal notice of the lawsuit and had no comment on it.

But almost two decades after Mrs. Roberson first began complaining, setting off years of inconclusive state inquiries, the agency says it is now moving against a large oilfield services company that deposited wastes at a nearby disposal site that has since been closed.

The inspector general of the E.P.A. is also concluding a separate investigation into the handling of the problem.

With 30,000 oilfield waste disposal sites throughout Texas, there is no clear evidence that the community here was singled out for dumping, although residents said it followed a pattern, documented by the E.P.A., of pollution hazards that disproportionately affect minorities.

They said that pleas for help, including letters to President Bush, were bounced from one agency to another, and that their treatment stood in sharp contrast to a $1.7 million cleanup last summer by the railroad commission in Manvel, a largely white suburb of Houston.

"They worked very fast and were very diligent," said Mayor Delores M. Martin of Manvel.

Resentment is dying hard among the Robersons and their relatives on County Road 329. They are the descendants of a black settler, George Adams, who paid $279 and a mule for 40 acres here in 1911.

"This is America? It looks worse than the third world," said the Rev. David Hudson, the Robersons' nephew. Mr. Hudson, a retired California radio and television station manager, pointed out where wells had been plugged and where an elderly relative died last year in a home cut off from running water.

"I look at this as poisoning the only source of groundwater," he said, "as tantamount to lynching."

DOJ_NMG_0039377

The tangled history of the disposal site, which began around 1980 as a deep injection well for saltwater wastes from drilling operations, makes apportioning blame difficult. Since then, according to records of the railroad commission, the disposal site has been under the control of six different operators. It was last operated by Basic Energy Services of Midland, which describes itself on its Web site as the nation's third largest contractor servicing oil and gas wells and used open holding tanks to store waste for pumping to a second injection well nearby.

The railroad commission said that Basic Energy had operated the tanks for more than two years without a permit, resulting in a demand by Panola County in 2003 that the disposal line under the county road be shut down. The commission has been asking the company to track any migration of pollution.

"Basic has been slow to respond to our requests," said John Tintera, the commission's assistant director for site remediation.

Ken Huseman, the president and chief executive of Basic Energy, would not respond to specific questions but said in a statement that the company's goal was to have no adverse impact on the environment, and that it would be responsive to the railroad commission.

But Mr. Hudson, who runs a local family ministry and teaches at the Church of the Living God, said the commission had close ties to the industry and had denied that DeBerry had a problem.

Mr. Hudson said he had directed his appeals, in vain, to the sole black member of the commission, Michael L. Williams, a former assistant secretary of education for civil rights at the federal Department of Education. A spokeswoman said Mr. Williams could not comment on the DeBerry case because it was "still in enforcement."

Mr. Hudson recently settled a state civil lawsuit against Basic Energy under terms that remain confidential. "We didn't get enough to get shoelaces," he said.

The lawsuit was settled, he said, after his lawyer found that the railroad commission had fined one of the site's operators, Falco S & D Inc. of Shreveport, La., $27,747 in 2000 for having illegally dumped about 3,000 barrels of chemical waste there. That made it difficult to determine Basic Energy's liability, Mr. Hudson said.

The E.P.A. has acknowledged a potential danger in the groundwater. "We found that the groundwater in the Panola County community is indeed contaminated with several substances," wrote Johnny D. Ross, project manager in the Inspector General's office in a January memo. Those substances, Mr. Ross wrote, "pose a threat to human health and the environment."

In 2003, the railroad commission found in residents' wells benzene, barium, arsenic, cadmium, lead and mercury "at concentrations exceeding primary drinking water standards," said Peter Pope, a specialist with the commission.

But the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, in tests taken last August, found no excessive contamination there, said Andrea Morrow, a spokeswoman. She said she could not explain the discrepancy.

The problems go back at least to 1987 when, railroad commission records show, Mrs. Roberson began complaining of spillovers from the injection well. Her well water was discoloring her bathtub, she reported, "and it causes bad stomach problems when consumed."

The railroad commission took samples in October 1996, finding "no contamination in the Robersons' household supply water that can be attributed to oilfield sources."

By April 2003, however, commission tests found barium and chloride above maximum contaminant levels in Mr. Hudson's well, along with traces of two oilfield chemicals. The source was unclear. He plugged his well and moved to another house connected to the Bethany-Panola Public Water System.

Last year, Mr. Hudson said he obtained a $375,000 federal loan to connect the community to the same municipal supply, but the water company, concerned that the residents would be unable to repay the money, rejected the application.

The E.P.A. arranged last August for the delivery of bottled water to the Robersons and others with tainted wells. Some residents, however, have been less fortunate. Maggie Golden, a 73-year-old cousin of Mr. Hudson's mother, had been getting water piped in by Basic Energy to replace her hand-pumped spring-fed system which had been contaminated, said her sister, Mary Lee Kellum, a Houston teacher.

"Then all of a sudden they cut it off," Ms. Kellum said.

Mr. Hudson said he appealed to Basic Energy, which restored the water for about a month but then shut it off after the disposal site was closed down. They drank bottled water, but to bathe, Ms. Kellum said, "we'd go to the church and borrow water in big barrels and heat it up: the pioneer days were back again."

Her sister died in the house on June 17, 2005, Ms. Kellum said. "She just went to sleep during the night," she said. "It was stressful stuff. She said, 'I'm tired of struggling.' "

DOJ_NMG_0039378

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Immigration Tactic: Blast Away, But Be Nice (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi And Mark Z. Barabak, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Still split themselves, candidates hammer Democrats but try not to alienate Latino voters.

DENVER — Hoping to use the volatile issue of illegal immigration to avert a November election disaster, Republican candidates across the country increasingly are attacking their Democratic opponents on the subject.

But mindful of a possible voter backlash, they are attempting to do so without seeming intolerant or divisive.

In Pennsylvania, Sen. Rick Santorum has launched an ad accusing his challenger of favoring amnesty for people in the country illegally and giving them "preference over American workers." Rep. Bob Beauprez criticizes his Democratic opponent in the Colorado governor's race for supporting state benefits for illegal immigrants. In the Chicago suburbs, congressional hopeful David McSweeney is attacking Democratic incumbent Melissa Bean on immigration — even though she voted in favor of the crackdown bill that passed the House in December.

Immigration is a tricky issue for Republicans, and there are deep divisions in the party over what policy and strategy to pursue.

Many blame former California Gov. Pete Wilson's backing in 1994 of anti-illegal-immigrant Proposition 187 for alienating Latinos nationwide.

In California, it sparked a wave of Latino political activism that hurt the GOP's political standing — a blow from which the party has yet to fully recover.

Still, Republican strategists have "made a decision that, whatever the risk, this is simply a very bad year and the issue is too hot not to put it in the quiver," said Floyd Ciruli, a Denver-based independent pollster.

The stepped-up Republican assault comes as House GOP leaders began a nationwide series of hearings last week bashing the Senate's bipartisan immigration bill, which they have branded the "Kennedy-Reid" bill — focusing on two prominent Democratic supporters while ignoring the lead Republican sponsor, Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

The linguistic dodge reflects the wide split in the GOP over two competing approaches to immigration. President Bush and pro-business Republicans favor a guest worker program and path to citizenship contained in a bill approved by the Senate.

The president reiterated his support for a guest worker program Friday during a press conference in Chicago. "To enforce this border, we've got to have a rational way that recognizes there are people sneaking across to do work Americans aren't doing," he said.

But hard-liners in the party back the tough measures contained in the House's enforcement-only legislation and fiercely oppose the president's guest worker approach.

The official GOP position is that the party will not use immigration as a political bludgeon against Democrats. Karl Rove, the president's chief political advisor, has made courting Latinos a priority through his years in the White House and has avoided the harsh rhetoric used to rally partisans on other issues.

"It's extremely important that our party be a party of principle, which is to say we're a pro-law enforcement and pro-immigrant party," said Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, who worked alongside Rove in Bush's 2004 reelection campaign.

Still, many Republicans hope a tough-on-illegal-immigration platform can help overcome the political drag of an unpopular president and growing public sentiment against the war in Iraq in November's midterm election.

"That is voiced around here often," Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), a House leader in the immigration debate, said in a telephone interview from the Capitol. "The plates have shifted politically, and if you want to get elected, you better not be perceived as being soft on illegal immigration."

Democrats say the GOP assault comes at the party's own peril, especially with immigration bills stalled by infighting in Washington.

"Republicans have signaled they're going to run a single-issue campaign on an issue on which they ultimately don't have a single accomplishment," scoffed Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

In some states, Democrats are more hawkish on illegal immigration than their GOP rivals. In Nebraska, for instance, Sen. Ben Nelson is running to the right of his Republican challenger, who backs Bush's proposed guest worker program.

But analysts say the immigration issue could be most potent in the hands of Republicans, who traditionally are associated with a tougher stance against lawbreaking.

DOJ_NMG_0039379

"The focus in Washington has been almost exclusively on the risk among Republicans," said Amy Walter, who tracks congressional races for Washington's nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "But there are also Democrats, especially Democrats in conservative-leaning districts, who may also have to find themselves distancing themselves from the national party."

With the election four months away and several key states still conducting primaries, the shape of the fall contests is evolving. In some places, including California, immigration does not seem to be as significant in the major statewide contests. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and his challenger, Democratic state Treasurer Phil Angelides, show no sign of making it a campaign wedge issue.

Republicans were encouraged last month, though, when their candidate for California's 50th Congressional District, Brian Bilbray, won with a tough-on-illegal-immigration platform in a special election to fill the seat vacated by Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

But in an example of the issue's treacherous terrain, efforts by Tancredo and other hard-liners to unseat incumbent Republican Rep. Chris Cannon in Utah failed a few weeks later. Cannon, who supports a guest worker program but also voted for the House bill, won 56% of the vote June 27 in a state that prides itself on welcoming newcomers.

In Colorado, illegal immigration has become a defining issue in both the gubernatorial race and in statehouse contests. The state Supreme Court last month removed from the November ballot a proposed initiative to ban state services to illegal immigrants.

The state's termed-out Republican governor, Bill Owens, has called a special session of the Legislature to pass a ban on services such as the one called for in the initiative — or to put it back on the ballot in November. Democrats objected but, under intense political pressure, eventually agreed to a compromise agenda and started the session Thursday.

Bill Ritter, the Democratic nominee for governor, opposed the ballot initiative and spoke against the special session. His opponent, Beauprez, seized on that in his first radio ad: "It's an outrage, isn't it?" Beauprez says in the spot. "When our own government refuses to enforce our laws against illegal immigration … Bill Ritter and I disagree on this, but I oppose taxpayer benefits for illegal immigrants."

In an interview, Beauprez said it was logical to talk about illegal immigration. "It's the top issue for everyone," he said.

Ritter has struck back, accusing Beauprez of being part of the logjam in the Capitol that has allowed problems to fester. "This has been a failure on the part of Washington, D.C.," Ritter said in an interview. He added that his role model on the issue was none other than Bush. "The person I'm closest to on this is the president of the United States," Ritter said, underscoring the paradox the issue often presents.

Bush's agreement with many Democrats on a guest worker program and on finding a way to legalize the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country makes it tougher for party hard-liners to draw contrasts in the fall. "It makes brand distinction more difficult," said Tancredo.

Some Republicans say they're trying to be careful so they don't offend legal immigrants as they go after those here illegally.

"The language that has been used in the past … turned off people in the Hispanic community," said McSweeney, a Republican investment banker challenging Bean in Illinois' 8th Congressional District. "As a party, we need to make sure we're being inclusive and framing this issue as law and order, not some kind of measure to keep out of this country just a certain group of people."

McSweeney has attacked Bean for taking varying stands on immigration. The Bean campaign rejects that assertion, saying she has been consistent and contending that the challenger has been taking procedural votes in Congress out of context.

In Pennsylvania, Santorum's first TV ad stresses that his grandparents were legal Italian immigrants, then decries illegal immigration.

In a separate radio spot, he bashes his Democratic challenger, Bob Casey, for supporting the Senate immigration bill. "How liberal has Casey become?" the ad asks. Santorum voted against the bill.

"There's a huge contrast between Sen. Santorum and his opponent on this issue, and Pennsylvania citizens deserve to know that," said Virginia Davis, a campaign spokeswoman.

Larry Smar, a spokesman for Casey, contended that Santorum is trying to exploit an issue he's rarely talked about or acted upon. "Santorum was pretty quiet on illegal immigration until the Senate vote," he said.

Recently, Santorum made a point of dropping by a Philadelphia cheesesteak stand made famous for hanging a sign demanding that all customers speak English.

Riccardi reported from Denver and Barabak from San Francisco. Times staff writers Robert Salladay in Sacramento and Nicole Gaouette in Washington contributed to this report.

A 2004 Call For Overhaul Set Showdown In Motion (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

The nation's immigration policies are a hot topic both in Congress and around the country. Following are some frequently asked questions.

--

Question: What sparked the current furor over immigration laws?

Answer: Early in 2004, President Bush called for a general overhaul of the U.S. immigration system. Speaking of "millions of hardworking men and women condemned to fear and insecurity in a massive, undocumented economy," Bush urged Congress to rewrite the laws to allow the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to gain legal status "as temporary workers." This would allow the U.S. to draw people out of the shadows and improve security, Bush argued. Then, as now, Bush stressed four other elements of an overhaul: controlling the country's borders, imposing sanctions on employers who hire illegally, creating a guest worker program for seasonal industries, and emphasizing assimilation for immigrants already here. Soon after, the House and Senate began drafting their own legislation.

--

Q: What did Congress do?

A: Without holding public hearings, the House, in less than two weeks in December 2005, passed a bill that addressed only border control issues. That enforcement-only bill would build a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, make illegal presence a felony, criminalize those who help illegal immigrants, and increase fines for noncompliant employers. After months of tough negotiations — and after large rallies in Los Angeles, New York, Washington and other major cities by pro-immigrant advocates — the Senate responded in May with a bill that included not only enforcement, but also a guest worker program and a path toward legal status for most illegal immigrants.

--

Q: What is happening with the immigration bills now?

A: Instead of starting negotiations on a final bill, the House announced that it would spend the summer holding town-hall-style hearings on the Senate bill. The Senate then announced its own summer hearings.

--

Q: Why are the House and Senate holding these hearings?

A: House Majority Leader Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) has said the hearings are intended to "strengthen our hand going in" to talks with the Senate. Critics say House leaders are demagoguing the issue, using the hearings to stir passion among the Republican Party's conservative base in advance of the fall elections. Senators say their sessions are meant to inform the public about why they think their approach is best.

--

Q: How common is it for the House to announce public hearings on a Senate bill?

A: It is highly unusual. House historian Robert Remini told Bloomberg News that he was "unaware of any other instance" when congressional leaders held hearings on the other chamber's proposal before negotiating on a final bill.

--

Q: Why does it matter if the House takes the time to hold hearings?

A: The hearings, which cost taxpayer dollars, increase the possibility that attempts to revamp immigration law will fail because this session of Congress will run out of time. The hearings continue into August, so negotiations on a final bill will not start until after Labor Day. But lawmakers traditionally avoid serious business in the run-up to November elections, and Congress has other issues on its plate. The issue may not be resolved until a lame-duck session after the elections. If lawmakers cannot pass a law at that point, they will have to start from scratch in the next Congress.

--

Q: Why are the Senate and House having trouble reaching an agreement?

A: The core conflict between the two chambers is about current illegal immigrants. House Republicans decry the Senate's "amnesty" provision, as they call it, which gives illegal immigrants a way to gain legal status. They see it as rewarding lawbreakers, and they argue that tough enforcement measures at work sites would force people to leave the United States because they would no longer be able to find jobs. Senate bill supporters say that approach is not enough, pointing to estimates that 500,000 people enter the country illegally every year despite more than $20 billion in government spending on enforcement over the last decade. Many senators are skeptical that illegal immigrants would go home, and say that Congress has to deal with them to avoid creating a permanent fugitive underclass. Bush has said that illegal immigrants come to support their families by accepting jobs that "Americans won't do."

--

Q: Why do House Republicans oppose an approach Bush backs?

A: With elections looming and Bush's approval ratings in a slump, House Republicans feel they can ignore the president. They argue that they are more in tune with American opinion than the president or the Senate, and that the people want border security first.

--

Q: What is the White House doing?

A: In recent weeks, as it appeared that the hearings would delay and possibly derail talks, Bush and administration officials such as Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez have been speaking often about the need to act and about the benefits of a Senate-style bill. Tuesday in Los Angeles, White House political strategist Karl Rove is scheduled to speak about immigration at the annual conference of the National Council of La Raza, a Latino civil rights and advocacy organization.

--

Q: What are the chances of a House-Senate compromise?

A: Speaking in Chicago on Friday, Bush sounded upbeat about the prospects for compromise. "We're working in Washington to reconcile the differences…. It's not an easy assignment. But I'm confident … we can get a comprehensive bill done," he said.

One possibility lawmakers are considering is adding "triggers" into a final bill, so that provisions such as a guest worker program could start only after certain benchmarks were met. That would enable the House to claim victory for its enforcement-first approach, and still allow the Senate's other proposals to follow. Senators argue that their bill works this way in practice, and say that border security improvements have already begun. The crucial question involves what kind of triggers might be chosen. One senator tried to add an amendment to the Senate bill that would have required the secretary of Homeland Security to certify that the border was secure before any other steps could be taken. That measure was defeated, because critics said it would be impossible ever to certify complete security along the 3,000-mile southern border.

--

Q: What is the next step for organizers of the pro-immigrant rallies earlier this year?

A: Immigrant advocates are working on a "Democracy Summer" campaign, registering voters for the November elections and helping immigrants who are legal permanent residents to gain U.S. citizenship.

Clinton Praises Bush On Immigration Reform (AP)

By Robert Jablon

AP, July 9, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton praised President Bush on Saturday for supporting reforms that would allow millions of illegal immigrants to seek citizenship but said the debate in Congress is being fomented by Republicans who want to divide America.

"I'm proud of him for doing it and I thanked him for doing it," he said of Bush during a "Cafe con Clinton" breakfast speech to the annual conference of the National Council of La Raza, the nation's largest Hispanic civil rights advocacy group.

Clinton said Bush's roots in Texas — which has one of the nation's largest Hispanic populations — have helped him view immigrants as people rather than statistics.

"It's hard to demonize people if you know them," he said.

But Clinton also argued that the nation's government is controlled by Republican ideological hard-liners who want to use immigration to divide Americans and distract them from issues such as the war in Iraq and the health care crisis.

Instead of equal opportunity, they support a "financial elite" because they favor "concentrated wealth and power," Clinton said.

"They believe in a government that is secret, unaccountable and that maximizes its own power," he said. "They really believe the world works better if they run it and we keep our mouths shut."

Clinton supported an immigration reform measure passed by the Senate that would provide a way for many of the estimated 12 million foreigners living in the country illegally to become citizens. A House-approved bill would make illegal immigrants felons and build 700 miles of border walls. House and Senate negotiators so far have not been able to work out a compromise.

DOJ_NMG_0039382

Bush has said he wants to enforce the borders so fewer people sneak across but also provide a way for those already in the United States to become legal. He has praised Hispanic immigrants as hardworking and family oriented. Clinton used similar language in his own speech.

The message played well with La Raza, which opposes the House bill and whose current president, Janet Murguia, was an assistant in the Clinton White House.

Before Clinton's speech, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa noted a string of rallies over the immigration issue, including one in March that sent 500,000 people into the streets of Los Angeles and garnered international attention.

"You literally reshaped the political landscape of our nation ... we can still see a movement blooming before our very eyes," he said.

Both Democrats and Republicans have been looking for ways to court Hispanics, whose fast-growing population gives them the potential to become an enormous voting force. Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, was scheduled to address the convention on Tuesday.

Clinton Speaks Out On Illegal Workers (LAT)

By Jeffrey L. Rabin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Addressing the La Raza event, he calls the debate a divisive distraction.

Former President Clinton told one of the nation's largest Latino civil rights groups Saturday that the conservative wing of the Republican Party is using the immigration issue to divide Congress and the nation.

"It is a way of creating a divided community and distracting people from the real challenges facing the country, whether it is in Iraq and Afghanistan, or homeland security, or how to build a clean energy future, or how to solve the healthcare crisis, or how to create new jobs for America," he said.

Clinton made the remarks, some of his most extensive since the issue of illegal immigration heated up in Washington this year, before several thousand people at the opening session of the four-day National Council of La Raza convention in Los Angeles.

He was welcomed to the event, key for those who hope to sway Latino voters, by Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and later greeted Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in the parking area. Clinton's appearance comes as competing congressional proposals for immigration reform are being debated this summer in committee hearings around the country.

Clinton said hard-liners are "basically saying these undocumented broke the law, send them home — never mind that they are 5% of the workforce and a far bigger percentage in certain critical areas."

"It's crazy to think about sending 11 million people home" to their native countries, said the former president, who called the recent demonstrations for immigrant rights "incredibly moving."

He said he favors the Senate's approach to changing immigration laws, although there are some elements of the bill he dislikes. The Senate legislation would enhance border security, create a guest worker program and put most of the nation's illegal immigrants in line for citizenship.

"At least it says we ought to provide a path to citizenship for these hard-working, law-abiding people," Clinton said. "We ought to do it in a way that does not put them ahead of those who patiently waited in the legal process."

Clinton, perhaps in deference to his wife, Hillary's, presidential ambitions, has been all but silent on the immigration issue in recent months. He was careful Saturday to stake out middle ground, crediting prominent members of both parties who had shown a willingness to collaborate. (After a lengthy silence of her own, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in May endorsed a legalization process for illegal immigrants, but emphasized the importance of protecting national security.)

Bill Clinton thanked President Bush for siding with moderates in his own party regarding immigration. He suggested that Bush had a different understanding of the immigration issue because of his ties to Texas, where Latinos have been part of the history and culture for many generations. "It's hard to demonize people if you know 'em."

Clinton said he agreed with New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a Republican, that it was important to talk about the enormous consequences to the nation's economy if the House of Representatives version of immigration reform becomes law. That bill stresses enforcement, making illegal immigration a crime and beefing up sanctions against employers of undocumented workers.

Clinton also praised Villaraigosa's view of "America as a family, an inclusive family, a family that will let everyone in."

Clinton received a sustained standing ovation from the members of the council, which includes Latino officials and activists from across the nation. Clinton, 59, appeared rested, healthy and cheered by his warm welcome. He enjoyed strong support from Latinos during his two terms as president.

DOJ_NMG_0039383

Clinton's speech underscored some of his core political values. "America is and always will be a nation of immigrants," he said. "We have to create one America based on our diversity, not trying to deny it."

He urged his audience to acknowledge that steps must be taken to strengthen border security.

As Clinton left the Los Angeles Convention Center he briefly crossed paths with Schwarzenegger.

The Republican governor, who is seeking reelection in November, joined Villaraigosa in officially opening the convention's vast exhibit area, where major corporations and businesses seek to build ties with the nation's growing Latino population.

As they toured the exhibit hall, Villaraigosa and Schwarzenegger stopped at a booth honoring Latinos in the military who had received Medals of Honor. The pair later discussed efforts to combat childhood obesity by removing calorie-rich refreshments from California schools.

Before a crush of television cameras and reporters, the governor reiterated that he came to California as an immigrant from Austria.

Schwarzenegger has not taken a position on the pending bills in Congress. Without addressing the immigration issue, the governor said: "I want to make sure that other people have the chance to realize their dreams."

In his luncheon speech to the convention, Schwarzenegger recalled receiving a check in the early 1970s from champion boxer Sugar Ray Robinson. "He never asked any question about my papers or anything like that."

The remark drew applause but not of the same intensity accorded Clinton.

Schwarzenegger, however, offered advice similar to Clinton's: "Don't just reach out to one party, because you need both parties in order to be successful. You need the Democrats. And you need the Republicans."

Rudy For President? (NOVAK)

By ROBERT D. NOVAK

Robert Novak, July 8, 2006

Well-connected public figures report that they have been told recently by Rudolph Giuliani that, as of now, he intends to run for the Republican Presidential nomination in 2008.

The former mayor of New York was on top of last month's national Gallup poll measuring Presidential preferences by registered Republicans, with 29 percent. Sen. John McCain's 24 percent was second, with former House Speaker Newt Gingrich third at 8 percent. National polls all year have shown Giuliani running either first or second to McCain, with the rest of the Presidential possibilities far behind.

Republican insiders respond to these numbers by saying rank-and-file GOP voters will abandon Giuliani once they realize his position on abortion, gay rights and gun control. Party strategists calculate that if he actually runs, he must change on at least one of these issues.

DEMOCRAT LIEBERMAN

Supporters of Sen. Joseph Lieberman promise he will continue as a member of the Senate Democratic caucus even if he loses the Democratic primary in Connecticut Aug. 8 and is elected as an independent.

Lieberman's decision announced last week to seek petitions to give him an independent ballot position probably helped businessman Ned Lamont's antiwar Democratic primary campaign. Although Lieberman's support of President Bush on the Iraq war is not popular in Connecticut, he would be heavily favored in a three-way race against Lamont and Republican former state Rep. Alan Schlesinger.

Lieberman's Republican Senate colleagues privately despair of the GOP picking up the Connecticut seat. But they hope Lieberman, if elected as an independent, would be more inclined to vote with Republicans than he is now, even if he still caucuses with the Democrats.

WOOING HISPANICS

Presidential adviser Karl Rove and Sen. Sam Brownback, two conservative Republicans who favor a guest-worker program for immigrants, will address the left-wing Hispanic advocacy group La Raza in Los Angeles this week.

La Raza was active in increasing participation in nationwide work stoppages and demonstrations April 10 after the House passed a tough border enforcement bill. La Raza in Spanish means "The Race."

Former President Bill Clinton heads the list of speakers for the annual meeting of La Raza's national council. The Rev. Jesse Jackson will appear on a panel.

TRIAL LAWYER POLITICS

Although it attracted no news media attention, a subcommittee hearing of the normally bipartisan House Financial Services Committee erupted in partisan furor June 28 when Republican Rep. Richard Baker of Louisiana proposed controls on lawyers engaged in securities litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0039384

Baker's subcommittee focused on the recent federal indictment of the Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman law firm in connection with class-action lawsuits. The firm in recent years has contributed $2.78 million to Democratic candidates and $22,000 to Republicans.

The Financial Services Committee's top two Democrats -- Barney Frank of Massachusetts and Paul Kanjorski of Pennsylvania -- vigorously objected to a federal judge testifying about current defendants in a federal prosecution. Vaughn R. Walker, chief district judge for Northern California, gave the subcommittee his views on the indictments and Baker's legislation.

NO DIRTY TRICKS

Independent, pro-labor candidate Bill Scheurer remained on the ballot after last Monday's deadline without challenge in the Chicago suburban congressional district where freshman Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean is a priority Republican target for 2006.

It had been widely expected that state House Speaker Mike Madigan, the Illinois Democratic chairman, would challenge Scheurer collection of the necessary 14,000 petition signatures for ballot access. Scheurer had filed a lawsuit alleging dirty tricks by Madigan and other Democratic leaders.

Bean was the most spectacular Democratic winner in the 2004 elections with a victory over Phil Crane, the senior Republican member of the House. She had considerable labor support in that campaign, but she lost Teamsters and state AFL-CIO backing after reneging on her campaign commitment to oppose the Central American Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA). Labor votes switching over to Scheurer would benefit the Republican candidate, investment banker David McSweeney.

Robert D. Novak is a syndicated columnist and a commentator for the FOX network.

The Immigration Equation (NYT)

By Roger Lowenstein

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

The day I met George Borjas, cloistered in his office at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard while graduate students from Russia, India, China and maybe Mexico mingled in the school cafe, sipping coffee and chattering away in all their tongues, the United States Senate was hotly debating what to do about the country's immigration policy. Borjas professed to be unfazed by the goings-on in Washington. A soft-spoken man, he stressed repeatedly that his concern was not to make policy but to derive the truth. To Borjas, a Cuban immigrant and the pre-eminent scholar in his field, the truth is pretty obvious: immigrants hurt the economic prospects of the Americans they compete with. And now that the biggest contingent of immigrants are poorly educated Mexicans, they hurt poorer Americans, especially African-Americans, the most.

Borjas has been making this case — which is based on the familiar concept of supply and demand — for more than a decade. But the more elegantly he has made it, it seems, the less his colleagues concur. ''I think I have proved it,'' he eventually told me, admitting his frustration. ''What I don't understand is why people don't agree with me."

It turns out that Borjas's seemingly self-evident premise — that more job seekers from abroad mean fewer opportunities, or lower wages, for native workers — is one of the most controversial ideas in labor economics. It lies at the heart of a national debate, which has been encapsulated (if not articulated) by two very different immigration bills: one, passed by the House of Representatives, which would toughen laws against undocumented workers and probably force many of them to leave the country; and one in the Senate, a measure that would let most of them stay.

You can find economists to substantiate the position of either chamber, but the consensus of most is that, on balance, immigration is good for the country. Immigrants provide scarce labor, which lowers prices in much the same way global trade does. And overall, the newcomers modestly raise Americans' per capita income. But the impact is unevenly distributed; people with means pay less for taxi rides and household help while the less-affluent command lower wages and probably pay more for rent.

The debate among economists is whether low-income workers are hurt a lot or just a little — and over what the answer implies for U.S. policy. If you believe Borjas, the answer is troubling. A policy designed with only Americans' economic well-being in mind would admit far fewer Mexicans, who now account for about 3 in 10 immigrants. Borjas, who emigrated from Cuba in 1962, when he was 12 (and not long after soldiers burst into his family's home and ordered them at gunpoint to stand against a wall), has asserted that the issue, indeed, is "Whom should the United States let in?"

Such a bald approach carries an overtone of the ethnic selectivity that was a staple of the immigration debates a century ago. It makes many of Borjas's colleagues uncomfortable, and it is one reason that the debate is so charged. Another reason is that many of the scholars who disagree with Borjas also hail from someplace else — like gardeners and seamstresses, a surprising number of Ph.D. economists in the U.S. are foreign-born.

Easily the most influential of Borjas's critics is David Card, a Canadian who teaches at Berkeley. He has said repeatedly that, from an economic standpoint, immigration is no big deal and that a lot of the opposition to it is most likely social or cultural. "If Mexicans were taller and whiter, it would probably be a lot easier to deal with," he says pointedly.

DOJ_NMG_0039385

Economists in Card's camp tend to frame the issue as a puzzle — a great economic mystery because of its very success. The puzzle is this: how is the U.S. able to absorb its immigrants so easily?

After all, 21 million immigrants, about 15 percent of the labor force, hold jobs in the U.S., but the country has nothing close to that many unemployed. (The actual number is only seven million.) So the majority of immigrants can't literally have "taken" jobs; they must be doing jobs that wouldn't have existed had the immigrants not been here.

The economists who agree with Card also make an intuitive point, inevitably colored by their own experience. To the Israeli-born economist whose father lived through the Holocaust or the Italian who marvels at America's ability to integrate workers from around the world, America's diversity — its knack for synthesizing newly arrived parts into a more vibrant whole — is a secret of its strength. To which Borjas, who sees a different synthesis at work, replies that, unlike his colleagues, the people arriving from Oaxaca, Mexico, are unlikely to ascend to a university faculty. Most of them did not finish high school. "The trouble with the stories that American journalists write about immigration," he told me, "is they all start with a story about a poor mother whose son grows up to become. . . . " and his voice trailed off as if to suggest that whatever the particular story — that of a C.E.O., a ballplayer or even a story like his own — it would not prove anything about immigration. What economists aim for is to get beneath the anecdotes. Is immigration still the engine of prosperity that the history textbooks describe? Or is it a boon to business that is destroying the livelihoods of the poorest workers — people already disadvantaged by such postmodern trends as globalization, the decline of unions and the computer?

{ The Lopsided-Skill-Mix Problem }

This spring, while militias on the prowl for illegal immigrants were converging on the Arizona border and, on the other side of the political fence, immigrant protesters were taking to the streets, I sampled the academic literature and spent some time with Borjas and Card and various of their colleagues. I did not expect concurrence, but I hoped to isolate what we know about the economic effects of immigration from what is mere conjecture. The first gleaning from the Ivory Tower came as a surprise. All things being equal, more foreigners and indeed more people of any stripe do not mean either lower wages or higher unemployment. If they did, every time a baby was born, every time a newly minted graduate entered the work force, it would be bad news for the labor market. But it isn't. Those babies eat baby food; those graduates drive automobiles.

As Card likes to say, "The demand curve also shifts out." It's jargon, but it's profound. New workers add to the supply of labor, but since they consume products and services, they add to the demand for it as well. "Just because Los Angeles is bigger than Bakersfield doesn't mean L.A. has more unemployed than Bakersfield," Card observes.

In theory, if you added 10 percent to the population — or even doubled it — nothing about the labor market would change. Of course, it would take a little while for the economy to adjust. People would have to invest money and start some new businesses to hire all those newcomers. The point is, they would do it. Somebody would realize that the immigrants needed to eat and would open a restaurant; someone else would think to build them housing. Pretty soon there would be new jobs available in kitchens and on construction sites. And that has been going on since the first boat docked at Ellis Island.

But there's a catch. Individual native workers are less likely to be affected if the immigrants resemble the society they are joining — not physically but in the same mix of skills and educational backgrounds. For instance, if every immigrant were a doctor, the theory is, it would be bad for doctors already here. Or as Borjas asked pointedly of me, what if the U.S. created a special visa just for magazine writers? All those foreign-born writers would eat more meals, sure, but (once they mastered English, anyway), they would be supplying only one type of service — my type. Bye-bye fancy assignments.

During the previous immigrant wave, roughly from 1880 to 1921 (it ended when the U.S. established restrictive quotas based on country of origin), the immigrants looked pretty much like the America into which they were assimilating. At the beginning of the 20th century, 9 of 10 American adults did not have high-school diplomas, nor did the vast majority of immigrants. Those Poles and Greeks and Italians made the country more populous, but they did not much change the makeup of the labor market.

This time it's different. The proportion of foreign-born, at 12 percent, remains below the peak of 15 percent recorded in 1890. But compared with the work force of today, however, the skill mix of immigrants is lopsided. About the same proportion have college degrees (though a higher proportion of immigrants are post-graduates). But many more — including most of the those who have furtively slipped across the Mexican border — don't have high-school diplomas.

The latest estimate is that the United States has 11.5 million undocumented foreigners, and it's those immigrants — the illegal ones — who have galvanized Congress. The sponsor of the House legislation, Representative James Sensenbrenner, a Republican from Wisconsin, says bluntly that illegals are bad for the U.S. economy. His bill would require employers to verify the status of their workers from a national database and levy significant penalties on violators. But H.R. 4437 isn't primarily an economics bill — it's an expression of outrage over the porousness of America's borders. Among many other enforcement measures, the bill forces the U.S. to build hundreds of miles of fencing on its Southern border.

DOJ_NMG_0039386

The Senate bill is irreducibly complex (more than 800 pages), but basically, it seeks to cure the problem of illegals by bringing them in from the shadows. Those already here would be able to continue working and get on track toward a more normalized status. In the future, employers could bring in guest workers — what Senate draftsmen refer to hopefully as temporary workers — as long as they paid them the going wage.

This latter bill, the product of an alliance between John McCain and Edward Kennedy, isn't really an economics bill, either, at least not the way economists see it. Its premise is that if you legalize undocumented people and reinforce the borders, then whatever negative impact immigrants have on the labor market will go away. The theory is that newly minted green-card holders, no longer having deportation to fear, will stick up for their rights and for higher wages too. Interestingly, some big labor unions, like the Service Employees International Union, are supporters. But economists are skeptical. For one thing, after the U.S. gave amnesty to the nearly three million undocumented workers who were in the country in 1986, their wages didn't budge. Second, economists, as you might expect, say market forces like supply and demand, not legal status, are what determine wages.

It baffles some economists that Congress pays so little heed to their research, but then immigration policy has never been based on economics. Economic fears played a part in the passage of the exclusionary acts against Chinese in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, and in the 1920's of quotas (aimed in particular at people from southern and eastern Europe), but they were mostly fueled by xenophobia. They were supplanted in the Civil Rights era by the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, which ended quotas and established a new priority based on family reunification. That law, also sponsored by Kennedy, had nothing to do with economics, either. It made the chief criterion for getting in having a relative who was already here.

If economists ran the country, they would certainly take in more immigrants who, like them, have advanced degrees. (The U.S., which is hugely dependent on foreigners to fill certain skilled occupations like scientific research and nursing, does admit a relative handful of immigrants each year on work visas.) Canada and Australia admit immigrants primarily on the basis of skills, and one thing the economists agree on is that high earners raise the national income by more than low earners. They are also less of a burden on the tax rolls.

With the exception of a few border states, however, the effect of immigration on public-sector budgets is small, and the notion that undocumented workers in particular abuse the system is a canard. Since many illegals pay into Social Security (using false ID numbers), they are actually subsidizing the U.S. Treasury. And fewer than 3 percent of immigrants of any stripe receive food stamps. Also, and contrary to popular wisdom, undocumented people do support local school districts, since, indirectly as renters or directly as homeowners, they pay property taxes. Since they tend to be poor, however, they contribute less than the average. One estimate is that immigrants raise state and local taxes for everyone else in the U.S. by a trivial amount in most states, but by as much as $1,100 per household per year in California. They are certainly a burden on hospitals and jails but, it should be noted, poor legal workers, including those who are native born, are also a burden on the health care system.

{ Parsing the Wage Gap }

Economists focus on Mexicans not because many are undocumented but because, relative to the rest of the labor force, Mexicans have far fewer skills. And Mexicans and other Central Americans (who tend to have a similar economic background) are arriving and staying in this country at a rate of more than 500,000 a year. Their average incomes are vastly lower than those both of native-born men and of other immigrants.

Native-born workers: $45,400

All immigrants: $37,000

Mexican immigrants: $22,300

The reason Mexicans earn much less than most Americans is their daunting educational deficit. More than 60 percent of Mexican immigrants are dropouts; fewer than 10 percent of today's native workers are.

That stark contrast conveys, to economists, two important facts. One is that Mexicans are supplying a skill level that is much in demand. It doesn't just seem that Americans don't want to be hotel chambermaids, pick lettuce or repair roofs; it's true. Most gringos are too educated for that kind of work. The added diversity, the complementariness of skills, that Mexicans bring is good for the economy as a whole. They perform services that would otherwise be more expensive and in some cases simply unavailable.

The Americans who are unskilled, however, must compete with a disproportionate number of immigrants. One of every four high-school dropouts in the U.S. was born in Mexico, an astonishing ratio given that the proportion of Mexicans in the overall labor force is only 1 in 25. So it's not magazine writers who see their numbers expanding; it's Americans who are, or would be, working in construction, restaurants, household jobs, unskilled manufacturing and so forth.

That's the theory. But economists have had a hard time finding evidence of actual harm. For starters, they noticed that societies with lots of immigrants tend, if anything, to be more prosperous, not less. In the U.S., wages in cities where immigrants have clustered, like New York, have tended to be higher, not lower. Mississippi, on the other hand, which has the lowest per-capita income of any state, has had very few immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0039387

That doesn't necessarily mean that immigrants caused or even contributed to high wages; it could be they simply go where the demand is greatest — that their presence is an effect of high wages. As statisticians are wont to remind us, "Correlation does not imply causation." (The fact that hospitals are filled with sick people doesn't mean hospitals make you sick.) Maybe without immigrants, wages in New York would be even higher.

And certainly, wages of the unskilled have been a source of worry for years. From 1970 to 1995, wages for high-school dropouts, the group that has been the most affected by immigrants, plummeted by more than 30 percent, after adjusting for inflation. Look at the following averages (all for male workers):

College graduates: $73,000

People with some college: $41,000

High-school grads: $32,000

Dropouts: $24,800

These figures demonstrate a serious problem, at least if you care about wage inequality, and a quick glance at this list and the previous one shows that native-born dropouts are earning only a shade more than Mexicans working in this country. But that hardly proves that cheap Mexican labor is to blame. For one thing, economists believe that other factors, like the failure of Congress to raise the minimum wage, globalization (cheap Chinese labor, that is) and the decline of unions are equally or even more responsible. Another popular theory is that computer technology has made skilled labor more valuable and unskilled labor less so.

Also, when economists look closely at wage dispersion, the picture isn't wholly consistent with the immigrants-as-culprits thesis. Look again at the numbers: people at the top (college grads) make a lot more than average but from the middle on down incomes are pretty compressed. Since only dropouts are being crowded by illegal immigrants, you would expect them to be falling further behind every other group. But they aren't; since the mid-90's, dropouts have been keeping pace with the middle; it's the corporate executives and their ilk at the top who are pulling away from the pack, a story that would seem to have little to do with immigration.

This isn't conclusive either, Borjas notes. After all, maybe without immigrants, dropouts would have done much better than high-school grads. Economists look for the "counterfactual," or what would have happened had immigrants not come. It's difficult to tell, because in the real world, there is always a lot more going on — an oil shock, say, or a budget deficit — than the thing whose effect you are studying. To isolate the effect of immigrants alone would require a sort of lab experiment. The trouble with macroeconomics is you can't squeeze your subjects into a test tube.

{ Marielitos in Miami, Doctors in Israel and Other Natural Experiments }

The academic study of immigration's economic effects earned little attention before the subject started to get political traction in the 1980's. Then, in 1990, Borjas, who was on the faculty at the University of California at Santa Barbara, published a book, "Friends or Strangers," which was mildly critical of immigration's effects.

That same year, David Card realized that a test tube did exist. Card decided to study the 1980 Mariel boat lift, in which 125,000 Cubans were suddenly permitted to emigrate. They arrived in South Florida with virtually no advance notice, and approximately half remained in the Miami area, joining an already-sizable Cuban community and swelling the city's labor force by 7 percent.

To Card, this produced a "natural experiment," one in which cause and effect were clearly delineated. Nothing about conditions in the Miami labor market had induced the Marielitos to emigrate; the Cubans simply left when they could and settled in the city that was closest and most familiar. So Card compared the aftershocks in Miami with the labor markets in four cities — Tampa, Atlanta, Houston and Los Angeles — that hadn't suddenly been injected with immigrants.

That the Marielitos, a small fraction of whom were career criminals, caused an upsurge in crime, as well as a more generalized anxiety among natives, is indisputable. It was also commonly assumed that the Marielitos were taking jobs from blacks.

But Card documented that blacks, and also other workers, in Miami actually did better than in the control cities. In 1981, the year after the boat lift, wages for Miami blacks were fractionally higher than in 1979; in the control cities, wages for blacks were down. The only negative was that unemployment rose among Cubans (a group that now included the Marielitos).

Unemployment in all of the cities rose the following year, as the country entered a recession. But by 1985, the last year of Card's study, black unemployment in Miami had retreated to below its level of 1979, while in the control cities it remained much higher. Even among Miami's Cubans, unemployment returned to pre-Mariel levels, confirming what seemed visible to the naked eye: the Marielitos were working. Card concluded, "The Mariel influx appears to have had virtually no effect on the wages or unemployment rates of less-skilled workers."

Although Card offered some hypotheses, he couldn't fully explain his results. The city's absorption of a 7 percent influx, he wrote, was "remarkably rapid" and — even if he did not quite say it — an utter surprise. Card's Mariel study hit the cloistered world of labor economists like a thunderbolt. All of 13 pages, it was an aesthetic as well as an academic masterpiece that prompted Card's peers to look for other "natural" immigration experiments. Soon after, Jennifer Hunt, an Australian-born Ph.D. candidate at Harvard, published a study on the effects of the return migration of ethnic French from Algeria to France in 1962, the year of Algerian independence. Similar in spirit though slightly more negative than the Mariel study, Hunt found that the French retour had a very mild upward effect on unemployment and no significant effect on wages.

DOJ_NMG_0039388

Rachel Friedberg, an economist at Brown, added an interesting twist to the approach. Rather than compare the effect of immigration across cities, she compared it across various occupations. Friedberg's curiosity had been piqued in childhood; born in Israel, she moved to the U.S. as an infant and grew up amid refugee grandparents who were a constant reminder of the immigrant experience.

She focused on an another natural experiment — the exodus of 600,000 Russian Jews to Israel, which increased the population by 14 percent in the early 1990's. She wanted to see if Israelis who worked in occupations in which the Russians were heavily represented had lost ground relative to other Israelis. And in fact, they had. But that didn't settle the issue. What if, Friedberg wondered, the Russians had entered less-attractive fields precisely because, as immigrants, they were at the bottom of the pecking order and hadn't been able to find better work? And in fact, she concluded that the Russians hadn't caused wage growth to slacken; they had merely gravitated to positions that were less attractive. Indeed, Friedberg's conclusion was counterintuitive: the Russians had, if anything, improved wages of native Israelis. She hypothesized that the immigrants competed more with one another than with natives. The Russians became garage mechanics; Israelis ran the garages.

{ Measuring the Hit to Wages }

By the mid-90's, illegal immigration was heating up as an issue in the United States, prompting a reaction in California, where schools and other public services were beginning to feel a strain. But academics were coalescing around the view that immigration was essentially benign — that it depressed unskilled native wages by a little and raised the average native income by a little. In 1997, a panel of the National Academy of Sciences, which reviewed all of the literature, estimated that immigration during the previous decade had, at most, lowered unskilled-native wages by 1 percent to 2 percent.

Borjas didn't buy it. In 1999 he published a second, more strident book, "Heaven's Door." It espoused a "revisionist" view — that immigration caused real harm to lower-income Americans. Borjas argued that localized studies like Mariel were flawed, for the simple reason that labor markets in the U.S. are linked together. Therefore, the effects of immigration could not be gauged by comparing one city with another.

Borjas pointed out, as did others, that more native-born Americans started migrating out of California in the 1970's, just as Mexicans began arriving in big numbers. Previously California was a destination for Americans. Borjas reckoned that immigrants were pushing out native-born Americans, and that the effect of all the new foreigners was dispersed around the country.

The evidence of a labor surplus seemed everywhere. "If you wanted a maid," he recalled of California during the 90's, "all you had to do was tell your gardener, and you had one tomorrow." He felt certain that Mexicans were depressing unskilled wages but didn't know how to prove it.

After Borjas moved East, he had an inspiration. It was easy to show that high-school dropouts had experienced both lower wage growth and more competition from immigrants, but that didn't settle the point, because so many other factors could have explained why dropouts did poorly. The inspiration was that people compete not only against those with a like education, but also against workers of roughly the same experience. Someone looking for a first job at a McDonald's competes against other unskilled entry-level job seekers. A reporter with 15 years' experience who is vying for a promotion will compete against other veterans but not against candidates fresh out of journalism school.

This insight enabled Borjas to break down the Census data in a way that put his thesis to a more rigorous test. He could represent skill groups within each age as a point on a graph. There was one point for dropouts who were 10 years out of school, another for those who were 20 years and 30 years out. Each of these points was repeated for each decade from 1960 to 2000. And there was a similar set of points for high-school graduates, college graduates and so forth. The points were situated on the graph according to two variables: the horizontal axis measured the change in the share of immigrants within each "point," the vertical axis measured wage growth.

A result was a smattering of dots that on casual inspection might have resembled a work of abstract art. But looking closer, the dots had a direction: they pointed downward. Using a computer, Borjas measured the slope: it suggested that wages fell by 3 to 4 percent for each 10 percent increase in the share of immigrants.

With this graph, Borjas could calculate that, during the 80's and 90's, for instance, immigrants caused dropouts to suffer a 5 percent decline relative to college graduates. In a paper published in 2003, "The Labor Demand Curve Is Downward Sloping," Borjas termed the results "negative and significant."

But what about the absolute effect? Assuming businesses did not hire any of the new immigrants, Borjas's finding would translate to a hefty 9 percent wage loss for the unskilled over those two decades, and lesser declines for other groups (which also received some immigrants). As we know, however, as the population grows, demand rises and business do hire more workers. When Borjas adjusted for this hiring, high-school dropouts were still left with a wage loss of 5 percent over those two decades, some $1,200 a year. Other groups, however, showed a very slight gain. To many economists as well as lay folk, Borjas's findings confirmed what seemed intuitive all along: add to the supply of labor, and the price goes down.

DOJ_NMG_0039389

To Card, however, what seems "intuitive" is often suspect. He became a labor economist because the field is full of anomalies. "The simple-minded theories that they teach you in economics don't work" for the labor market, he told me. In the 90's, Card won the prestigious Clark Medal for several studies, including Mariel and another showing that, contrary to theory, raising the minimum wage in New Jersey (another natural experiment) did not cause fast-food outlets to cut back on employment.

In a recent paper, "Is the New Immigration Really So Bad?" Card took indirect aim at Borjas and, once again, plumbed a labor-market surprise. Despite the recent onslaught of immigrants, he pointed out, U.S. cities still have fewer unskilled workers than they had in 1980. Immigrants may be depriving native dropouts of the scarcity value they might have enjoyed, but at least in a historical sense, unskilled labor is not in surplus. America has become so educated that immigrants merely mitigate some of the decline in the homegrown unskilled population. Thus, in 1980, 24 percent of the work force in metropolitan areas were dropouts; in 2000, only 18 percent were.

Card also observed that cities with more immigrants, like those in the Sun Belt close to the Mexican border, have a far higher proportion of dropouts. This has led to a weird unbalancing of local labor markets. For example, 10 percent of the work force in Pittsburgh and 15 percent in Cleveland are high-school dropouts; in Houston the figure is 25 percent, in Los Angeles, 30 percent. The immigrants aren't dispersing, or not very quickly.

So where do all the dropouts work? Los Angeles does have a lot of apparel manufacturers but not enough of such immigrant-intensive businesses to account for all of its unskilled workers. Studies also suggest that immigration is correlated with a slight increase in unemployment. But again, the effect is small. So the mystery is how cities absorb so many unskilled. Card's theory is that the same businesses operate differently when immigrants are present; they spend less on machines and more on labor. Still, he admitted, "We are left with the puzzle of explaining the remarkable flexibility of employment demand."

Card started thinking about this when he moved from Princeton in the mid-90's. He noticed that everyone in Berkeley seemed to have a gardener, "even though professors are not rich." In the U.S., which has more unskilled labor than Europe, more people employ housecleaners. The African-American women who held those jobs before the war, like the Salvadorans and Guatemalans of today, weren't taking jobs; they were creating them. { The Personal Is Economic } Though Card works on immigration only some of the time, he and Borjas clearly have become rivals. In a recent paper, Card made a point of referring to the "revisionist" view as "overly pessimistic." Borjas told Business Week that Card's ideas were "insane." ("Obviously I didn't mean he is insane; he is a very bright guy," Borjas clarified when we talked. "The idea that you can add 15 or 20 million people and not have any effect seems crazy.") Alan B. Krueger, an economist who is friendly with each, says, "I fear it might become acrimonious." Card told me twice that Borjas's calculations were "disingenuous." "Borjas has a strong view on this topic," Card said, "almost an emotional position."

Card is more comfortable with anecdote than many scholars, and he tells a story about his wife, who teaches English to Mexicans. In one class, she tapped on a wall, asking a student to identify it, and the guy said, "That's drywall." To Card, it signifies that construction is one of those fields that soak up a disproportionate number of Mexicans; it's a little piece of the puzzle. "Even when I was a kid in Ontario 45 years ago," he notes, "the tobacco pickers were Jamaicans. They were terrible jobs — backbreaking." Card is a political liberal with thinning auburn air and a controlled, smirky smile. His prejudices, if not his emotions, favor immigrants. Raised by dairy farmers in Guelph, Ontario, he remembers that Canadian cities were mostly boring while he was growing up. The ones that attracted immigrants, like Toronto and Vancouver, boomed and became more cosmopolitan. "

Everyone knows in trade there are winners and losers," Card says. "For some reason it doesn't stop people from advocating free trade." He could have said the same of Wal-Mart, which has put plenty of Mom-and-Pop retailers out of business. In fact, any time a firm offers better or more efficient service, somebody will suffer. But the economy grows as a result. "

I honestly think the economic arguments are second order," Card told me when we discussed immigration. "They are almost irrelevant."

Card's implication is that darker forces — ethnic prejudice, maybe, or fear of social disruption — is what's really motivating a lot of anti-immigrant sentiment. Borjas, a Hispanic who has written in blunt terms about the skill deficits of Mexicans, in particular arouses resentment. "Mexicans aren't as good as Cubans like him," Douglas S. Massey, a demographer at Princeton, said in a pointed swipe.

DOJ_NMG_0039390

Borjas lives an assimilated life. He has a wife who speaks no Spanish, three kids, two of whom study his mother tongue as a foreign language, and a home in Lexington, a tony Boston suburb. Yet his mind-set often struck me as that of an outsider — an immigrant, if you will, to his own profession.

When I asked the inevitable question — did his exile experience influence his choice of career? — he said, "Clearly it predisposed me." The seeds of the maverick scholar were planted the year before he left Cuba, a searing time when the revolution was swinging decisively toward Soviet-style communism. His family had owned a small factory that manufactured men's pants. The factory was shut down, and the family made ready to leave the island, but their departure was delayed by the death of Borjas's father. The son had to attend a revolutionary school, where the precepts of Marxism-Leninism were drilled into the future economist with notable lack of success. One day he marched in the band and drummed the "Internationale" in front of Fidel Castro and the visiting Yuri Gagarin, the Soviet cosmonaut. "Since that year I have been incredibly resistant to any kind of indoctrination," he told me — an attitude that surfaces in wry references to the liberal Harvard environs as the "People's Republic of Cambridge" and to American political correctness in general.

Borjas's family arrived with virtually no money; they got some clothing from Catholic Charities and a one-time stipend of, as he recollects, $100. His mother got a factory job in Miami, where they stayed several years. Then the family moved to New Jersey. He at tended Saint Peter's College in Jersey City and got his Ph.D. at Columbia.

I asked him whether the fact that he was Cuban, the most successful Latin subgroup, had affected his views of other Hispanics. "Look, I've never been psychoanalyzed," he said with an air of resignation, as if he were accustomed to hearing such loaded questions. One thing Borjas shares with Card is a view that others treat immigration emotionally. But Borjas takes comfort not in anecdote but in empiricism. As he said to me often, "The data is the data."

{ Immigrants Can Be Complementary }

Economists on Card's side of the debate recognize that they at least have to deal with Borjas's data — to reconcile why the local studies and national studies produce different results. Card shrugs it off; even 5 percent for a dropout, he observes, is only 50 to 60 cents an hour. Giovanni Peri, an Italian working at the University of California, Davis, had a more intriguing response. Peri replicated Borjas's scatter diagram, and also his finding that unskilled natives suffer a loss relative to, say, graduates. He made different assumptions, however, about how businesses adjust to the influx of new workers, and as a result, he found that the absolute harm was less, or the gain was greater, for all native-born groups. By his reckoning, native dropouts lost only 1 percent of their income during the 1990's.

Peri's theory is that most of the wage losses are sustained by previous immigrants, because immigrants compete most directly with one another. It's a principle of economics that a surplus in one part of the production scheme raises the demand for every other one. For instance, if you have a big influx of chefs, you can use more waiters, pushing up their wages; if you have a lot of chefs and waiters, you need more Sub-Zeros, so investment will also rise. The only ones hurt, in this example, are the homegrown chefs — the people who are "like" the immigrants.

Indeed, workers who are unlike immigrants see a net gain; more foreign doctors increases the demand for native hospital administrators. Borjas assumes that a native dropout (or a native anything) is interchangeable with an immigrant of the same skill level. Peri doesn't. If enough Mexicans go into construction, some native workers may be hurt, but a few will get promotions, because with more crews working there will be a greater demand for foremen, who most likely will be natives.

Natives have a different mix of skills — English, for instance, or knowledge of the landscape. In economists' lingo, foreigners are not "perfect substitutes." (Friedberg also observed this in Israel.) In some cases, they will complement rather than compete with native workers. Vietnamese manicurists in California cater to a lower-price, less-exclusive market than native-run salons. The particular skills of an Italian designer — or even an economist — are distinct from an American's. "My work is autobiographical to a large extent," notes Peri, who got into the field when the Italian government commissioned him to study why Italy was losing so many professionals. The foreigners he sees in California are a boon to the U.S. It astonishes him how people like Sensenbrenner want to restrict immigration and apply the letter of the law against those working here.

This is a very romantic view. The issue is not so much Italian designers as Mexican dropouts. But many Mexicans work jobs that are unappealing to most Americans; in this sense, they are not exactly like natives of their skill level either. Mexicans have replenished some occupations that would have become underpopulated; for instance, 40,000 people who became meat processors immigrated to the U.S. during the 1990's, shoring up the industry. Without them, some plants would have raised wages, but others would have closed or, indeed, relocated to Mexico.

{ Are All Dropouts the Same? }

I talked to half a dozen vintners and a like number of roofing-company owners, both fields that rely on Mexican labor, and frequently heard that Americans do not, in sufficient numbers, want the work. In the case of the vineyards, if Mexicans weren't available, some of the grapes would be harvested by machine. This is what economists mean by "capital adjusting." If the human skills are there, capital will find a way to employ them. Over the short term, people chase jobs, but over the long term jobs chase people. (That is why software firms locate in Silicon Valley.)

DOJ_NMG_0039391

If you talk to enough employers, you start to gather that they prefer immigrant labor over unskilled Americans. The former have fewer problems with tardiness, a better work ethic. Some of this may be prejudice. But it's possible that Mexican dropouts may be better workers than our dropouts. In Mexico, not finishing high school is the norm; it's not associated with an unsuitability for work or even especially with failure. In the U.S., where the great majority do graduate, those who don't graduate have high rates of drug use and problems with the law.

The issue is charged because the group with by far the highest rate of incarceration is African-American dropouts. Approximately 20 percent of black males without high-school diplomas are in jail. Indeed, according to Steven Raphael, a colleague of Card's at Berkeley, the correlation between wages and immigration is a lot weaker if you control for the fact that so many black men are in prison. But should you control for it? Borjas says he thinks not. It's pretty well established that as the reward for legal work diminishes, some people turn to crime. This is why people sold crack; the payoff was tremendous. Borjas has developed one of his graphs to show that the presence of immigrants is correlated with doing time, especially among African-Americans. Incarceration rates, he notes, rose sharply in the 70's, just as immigration did. He doesn't pretend that this is the whole explanation — only that there is a link. Card retorts: "The idea that the way to help the lot of African-Americans is to restrict Mexicans is ridiculous." Black leaders have themselves mostly switched sides. In the 20's, A. Philip Randolph, who led the Pullman Porters, spoke in favor of immigration quotas, but the civil rights establishment no longer treats immigration as a big issue; instead it tends to look at immigrants as potential constituents. (One person who takes issue with the prevailing view is Anthony W. Williams, an African-American pastor in Chicago who is running for Congress against Representative Jesse Jackson Jr. Black leaders have forsaken their mission, he told me. "Immigration will destroy the economic base of the African-American community.")

In the spring, as the Senate Judiciary Committee was trying to parse these issues into a piece of legislation, Borjas and Card were invited to air their views. Each declined, in part because they don't think politicians really listen. As if to prove the point, the effort to write a joint bill has stalled, following Sensenbrenner's announcement that the House intends to stage a series of public hearings on immigration around the country over the summer. There will be a lot said about border control, many heartfelt stories and probably very little about natural experiments.

The economists do have political opinions, of course. Borjas leans to a system like Canada's, which would admit immigrants on the basis of skills. He also says that, to make sure the problem of illegals does not recur, the U.S. should secure its borders before it adjusts the status of its present illegals.

Advocates of a more open policy often cite the country's history. They argue that the racists of bygone eras were not only discriminatory but also wrong. Card, for instance, mentioned an article penned by a future U.S. senator, Paul Douglas, titled "Is the New Immigration More Unskilled Than the Old?" It was written in 1919, when many people (though not Douglas) held that Jews, Slavs and Italians were incompatible with the country's Anglo and Teutonic stock. Nativism has always been part of the American scene, and it has tended to turn ugly in periods when the country was tired of or suspicious of foreigners. In 1952, quotas were maintained in a law sponsored by Senator Pat McCarran, a prominent McCarthyite. There remains today a palpable strain of xenophobia in the anti-immigrant movement. Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, remarked to me, rather meanly, "If someone comes here from China and they go swimming in a dangerous river, a sign in English is enough, but the Mexicans want it in Spanish." Ninety years ago, some signs were in German, as were 500 newspapers on American soil.

But U.S. history, as Borjas observes, can be read in two ways. For sure, earlier waves of immigrants assimilated, but America essentially closed the gate for 40 years. Antipathy toward Germans during World War I forced German-Americans to hide all traces of their origins. The quotas of the 1920's were reinforced by the Depression and then by World War II. The country had time to let assimilation occur.

A reverse process seems to be occurring with Mexican-Americans. Very few Mexicans came north in the decades after 1920, even though they were relatively free to do so. As recently as 1970, the U.S. had fewer than one million Mexicans, almost all of them in Texas and California. The U.S. did bring Mexican braceros to work on farms during the 1940's, 50's and 60's. The program was terminated in 1964, and immigration officials immediately noticed a sharp rise in illicit border crossings. The collapse of the Mexican economy in the 70's gave migrants a further push. Finally, Mexicans who obtained legal status were (thanks to the 1965 reform) able to bring in family members.

The important point is that, ultimately, there was a catalytic effect — so many Mexicans settled here that it became easier for more Mexicans to follow. One story has it that in a village in central Mexico people knew the price of mushrooms in Pennsylvania sooner than people in the next county over. Even if apocryphal, it illustrates what economists call a network effect:

DOJ_NMG_0039392

with 12 million people born in Mexico now dispersed around the U.S., information about job-market conditions filters back to Mexico with remarkable speed.

Now that the network is established, the exodus feels rather permanent; it is not a wave but a continuous flow. This has led to understandable anxiety, even among economists, about whether Mexicans will assimilate as rapidly as previous groups. Although second-generation Mexicans do (overwhelmingly) speak English, and also graduate from high school at far higher rates than their parents, Borjas has documented what he calls an ethnic "half-life" of immigrant groups: with each generation, members of the group retain half of the income and educational deficit (or advantage) of their parents. In other words, each group tends toward the mean, but the process is slow. Last year he wrote that Mexicans in America are burdened if not doomed by their "ethnic capital," and will be for several generations. In "Heaven's Door," Borjas even wrote forgivingly of the quota system enacted in the 20's, observing that it "was not born out of thin air; it was the political consensus . . . reached after 30 years of debate." These are distasteful words to many people. But Borjas does not advocate a return to quotas. His point is that Americans shouldn't kid themselves: "National origin and immigrant skills are so intimately related, any attempt to change one will inevitably change the other."

{ The Limits of Economics }

Economists more in the mainstream generally agree that the U.S. should take in more skilled immigrants; it's the issue of the unskilled that is tricky. Many say that unskilled labor is needed and that the U.S. could better help its native unskilled by other means (like raising the minimum wage or expanding job training) than by building a wall. None believe, however, that the U.S. can get by with no limits. Richard B. Freeman of Harvard floated the idea that the U.S. simply sell visas at a reasonable price. The fee could be adjusted according to indicators like the unemployment rate. It is unlikely that Congress will go for anything so cute, and the economists' specific prescriptions may be beside the point. As they acknowledge, immigration policy responds to a host of factors — cultural, political and social as well as economic. Migrant workers, sometimes just by crowding an uncustomary allotment of people into a single dwelling, bring a bit of disorder to our civic life; such concerns, though beyond the economists' range, are properly part of the debate.

What the economists can do is frame a subset of the important issues. They remind us, first, that the legislated goal of U.S. policy is curiously disconnected from economics. Indeed, the flow of illegals is the market's signal that the current legal limits are too low. Immigrants do help the economy; they are fuel for growth cities like Las Vegas and a salve to older cities that have suffered native flight. Borjas's research strongly suggests that native unskilled workers pay a price: in wages, in their ability to find inviting areas to migrate to and perhaps in employment. But the price is probably a small one.

The disconnect between Borjas's results and Card's hints that there is an alchemy that occurs when immigrants land ashore; the economy's potential for absorbing and also adapting is mysterious but powerful. Like any form of economic change, immigration causes distress and disruption to some. But America has always thrived on dynamic transformations that produce winners as well as losers. Such transformations stimulate growth. Other societies (like those in Europe) have opted for more controls, on immigration and on labor markets generally. They have more stability and more equality, but less growth and fewer jobs. Economists have highlighted these issues, but they cannot decide them. Their resolution depends on a question that Card posed but that the public has not yet come to terms with: "What is it that immigration policy is supposed to achieve?"

Immigration — And The Curse Of The Black Legend (NYT)

By Tony Horwitz

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Vineyard Haven, Mass.

COURSING through the immigration debate is the unexamined faith that American history rests on English bedrock, or Plymouth Rock to be specific. Jamestown also gets a nod, particularly in the run-up to its 400th birthday, but John Smith was English, too (he even coined the name New England).

So amid the din over border control, the Senate affirms the self-evident truth that English is our national language; "It is part of our blood," Lamar Alexander, Republican of Tennessee, says. Border vigilantes call themselves Minutemen, summoning colonial Massachusetts as they apprehend Hispanics in the desert Southwest. Even undocumented immigrants invoke our Anglo founders, waving placards that read, "The Pilgrims didn't have papers."

These newcomers are well indoctrinated; four of the sample questions on our naturalization test ask about Pilgrims. Nothing in the sample exam suggests that prospective citizens need know anything that occurred on this continent before the Mayflower landed in 1620. Few Americans do, after all.

This national amnesia isn't new, but it's glaring and supremely paradoxical at a moment when politicians warn of the threat posed to our culture and identity by an invasion of immigrants from across the Mexican border. If Americans hit the books, they'd find what Al Gore would call an inconvenient truth. The early history of what is now the United States was Spanish, not English, and our denial of this heritage is rooted in age-old stereotypes that still entangle today's immigration debate.

DOJ_NMG_0039393

Forget for a moment the millions of Indians who occupied this continent for 13,000 or more years before anyone else arrived, and start the clock with Europeans' presence on present-day United States soil. The first confirmed landing wasn't by Vikings, who reached Canada in about 1000, or by Columbus, who reached the Bahamas in 1492. It was by a Spaniard, Juan Ponce de León, who landed in 1513 at a lush shore he christened La Florida.

Most Americans associate the early Spanish in this hemisphere with Cortés in Mexico and Pizarro in Peru. But Spaniards pioneered the present-day United States, too. Within three decades of Ponce de León's landing, the Spanish became the first Europeans to reach the Appalachians, the Mississippi, the Grand Canyon and the Great Plains. Spanish ships sailed along the East Coast, penetrating to present-day Bangor, Me., and up the Pacific Coast as far as Oregon.

From 1528 to 1536, four castaways from a Spanish expedition, including a "black" Moor, journeyed all the way from Florida to the Gulf of California — 267 years before Lewis and Clark embarked on their much more renowned and far less arduous trek. In 1540, Francisco Vázquez de Coronado led 2,000 Spaniards and Mexican Indians across today's Arizona-Mexico border — right by the Minutemen's inaugural post — and traveled as far as central Kansas, close to the exact geographic center of what is now the continental United States. In all, Spaniards probed half of today's lower 48 states before the first English tried to colonize, at Roanoke Island, N.C.

The Spanish didn't just explore, they settled, creating the first permanent European settlement in the continental United States at St. Augustine, Fla., in 1565. Santa Fe, N.M., also predates Plymouth: later came Spanish settlements in San Antonio, Tucson, San Diego and San Francisco. The Spanish even established a Jesuit mission in Virginia's Chesapeake Bay 37 years before the founding of Jamestown in 1607.

Two iconic American stories have Spanish antecedents, too. Almost 80 years before John Smith's alleged rescue by Pocahontas, a man by the name of Juan Ortiz told of his remarkably similar rescue from execution by an Indian girl. Spaniards also held a thanksgiving, 56 years before the Pilgrims, when they feasted near St. Augustine with Florida Indians, probably on stewed pork and garbanzo beans.

The early history of Spanish North America is well documented, as is the extensive exploration by the 16th-century French and Portuguese. So why do Americans cling to a creation myth centered on one band of late-arriving English — Pilgrims who weren't even the first English to settle New England or the first Europeans to reach Plymouth Harbor? (There was a short-lived colony in Maine and the French reached Plymouth earlier.)

The easy answer is that winners write the history and the Spanish, like the French, were ultimately losers in the contest for this continent. Also, many leading American writers and historians of the early 19th century were New Englanders who elevated the Pilgrims to mythic status (the North's victory in the Civil War provided an added excuse to diminish the Virginia story). Well into the 20th century, standard histories and school texts barely mentioned the early Spanish in North America.

While it's true that our language and laws reflect English heritage, it's also true that the Spanish role was crucial. Spanish discoveries spurred the English to try settling America and paved the way for the latecomers' eventual success. Many key aspects of American history, like African slavery and the cultivation of tobacco, are rooted in the forgotten Spanish century that preceded English arrival.

There's another, less-known legacy of this early period that explains why we've written the Spanish out of our national narrative. As late as 1783, at the end of the Revolutionary War, Spain held claim to roughly half of today's continental United States (in 1775, Spanish ships even reached Alaska). As American settlers pushed out from the 13 colonies, the new nation craved Spanish land. And to justify seizing it, Americans found a handy weapon in a set of centuries-old beliefs known as the "black legend."

The legend first arose amid the religious strife and imperial rivalries of 16th-century Europe. Northern Europeans, who loathed Catholic Spain and envied its American empire, published books and gory engravings that depicted Spanish colonization as uniquely barbarous: an orgy of greed, slaughter and papist depravity, the Inquisition writ large.

Though simplistic and embellished, the legend contained elements of truth. Juan de Oñate, the conquistador who colonized New Mexico, punished Pueblo Indians by cutting off their hands and feet and then enslaving them. Hernando de Soto bound Indians in chains and neck collars and forced them to haul his army's gear across the South. Natives were thrown to attack dogs and burned alive.

But there were Spaniards of conscience in the New World, too: most notably the Dominican priest Bartolomé de Las Casas, whose defense of Indians impelled the Spanish crown to pass laws protecting natives. Also, Spanish brutality wasn't unique; English colonists committed similar atrocities. The Puritans were arguably more intolerant of natives than the Spanish and the Virginia colonists as greedy for gold as any conquistador. But none of this erased the black legend's enduring stain, not only in Europe but also in the newly formed United States.

DOJ_NMG_0039394

"Anglo Americans," writes David J. Weber, the pre-eminent historian of Spanish North America, "inherited the view that Spaniards were unusually cruel, avaricious, treacherous, fanatical, superstitious, cowardly, corrupt, decadent, indolent and authoritarian."

When 19th-century jingoists revived this caricature to justify invading Spanish (and later, Mexican) territory, they added a new slur: the mixing of Spanish, African and Indian blood had created a degenerate race. To Stephen Austin, Texas's fight with Mexico was "a war of barbarism and of despotic principles, waged by the mongrel Spanish-Indian and Negro race, against civilization and the Anglo-American race." It was the manifest destiny of white Americans to seize and civilize these benighted lands, just as it was to take the territory of Indian savages.

From 1819 to 1848, the United States and its army increased the nation's area by roughly a third at Spanish and Mexican expense, including three of today's four most populous states: California, Texas and Florida. Hispanics became the first American citizens in the newly acquired Southwest territory and remained a majority in several states until the 20th century.

By then, the black legend had begun to fade. But it seems to have found new life among immigration's staunchest foes, whose rhetoric carries traces of both ancient Hispanophobia and the chauvinism of 19th-century expansionists.

Representative J. D. Hayworth of Arizona, who calls for deporting illegal immigrants and changing the Constitution so that children born to them in the United States can't claim citizenship, denounces "defeatist wimps unwilling to stand up for our culture" against alien "invasion." Those who oppose making English the official language, he adds, "reject the very notion that there is a uniquely American identity, or that, if there is one, that it is superior to any other."

Representative Tom Tancredo of Colorado, chairman of the House Immigration Reform Caucus, depicts illegal immigration as "a scourge" abetted by "a cult of multiculturalism" that has "a death grip" on this nation. "We are committing cultural suicide," Mr. Tancredo claims. "The barbarians at the gate will only need to give us a slight push, and the emaciated body of Western civilization will collapse in a heap."

ON talk radio and the Internet, foes of immigration echo the black legend more explicitly, typecasting Hispanics as indolent, a burden on the American taxpayer, greedy for benefits and jobs, prone to criminality and alien to our values — much like those degenerate Spaniards of the old Southwest and those gold-mad conquistadors who sought easy riches rather than honest toil. At the fringes, the vilification is baldly racist. In fact, cruelty to Indians seems to be the only transgression absent from the familiar package of Latin sins.

Also missing, of course, is a full awareness of the history of the 500-year Spanish presence in the Americas and its seesawing fortunes in the face of Anglo encroachment. "The Hispanic world did not come to the United States," Carlos Fuentes observes. "The United States came to the Hispanic world. It is perhaps an act of poetic justice that now the Hispanic world should return."

America has always been a diverse and fast-changing land, home to overlapping cultures and languages. It's an homage to our history, not a betrayal of it, to welcome the latest arrivals, just as the Indians did those tardy and uninvited Pilgrims who arrived in Plymouth not so long ago.

A Run For The Border (WP)

By P.w. Singer

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Those of us who track federal contracting come across unusual announcements all the time. Sometimes they are a useful indicator of preparations for a policy soon to be enacted. Other times they signify nothing more than a government bureaucracy in all its inane glory. How, then, should we react to the solicitation at right -- a Department of Homeland Security request for an "indefinite quantity, indefinite delivery" of burritos to be stockpiled along the Texas border?

The contract raises a feast of questions: Why didn't Homeland Security just get the super-value meal? More important, is Taco Bell disqualified from bidding because of its slogan "Make a run for the border"?

Posted in late June, the solicitation came on the heels of another spicy tidbit on the same government database -- a contract for as much as $385 million awarded just a few months ago to Dick Cheney's old firm Halliburton to be on call in case the government ever needs to build 5,000-person camps for "temporary detention and processing." Could we have here a bean-and-beef-stuffed sign that the administration is contemplating a showy border sweep before the congressional elections?

That such conspiracy theories should even come to mind is a sad statement about our politics. Rather than serious public debate, we've been served a summer of faux outcries, such as describing flag burning and same-sex marriage as epidemics and treating immigration as a national security crisis. It's enough to give anyone indigestion.

P.W. Singer, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, always gets the Gorditas.

Border Insecurity (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0039395

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

'OUR BORDER MUST BE SECURE," Rep. Ed Royce (R-Fullerton) said Friday in Laredo, Texas, kicking off the second day of legislative field hearings on immigration reform. Only after this condition is met, he said, should we even begin to think about guest worker programs, visa policies and paths to citizenship.

This is a popular and seductive notion, one that is shaping up as the basis for a tenuous possible compromise between the enforcement-only immigration bill in the House and the comprehensive version in the Senate. It also is a practical pipe dream, one that fails to recognize the reason the border is so porous is that U.S. farms, construction sites, packing plants and restaurants have been relying on undocumented workers for years. To say you want to clamp down on the border before addressing the underlying labor issues is to vote for economic suicide. As New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg aptly put it at the Senate's competing committee hearing in Philadelphia last week: "It's as if we expect Border Patrol agents to do what a century of communism could not: defeat the natural market forces of supply and demand and defeat the natural human desire for freedom and opportunity. You might as well sit on your beach chair and tell the tide not to come in."

An impregnable border cannot prevent illegal immigration. One statistic you probably won't hear much during this silly season is that an estimated two out of five illegal immigrants residing in the United States came here legally, according to the Pew Hispanic Center. You could build a 2,000-mile-long wall along the southern border, as Royce has proposed; sentence ranchers to 10 years in prison if someone else builds a border-crossing tunnel on their land, as Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon) has proposed; send the U.S. military down there, as Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Rancho Santa Fe) has proposed … yet all you'd have to show for it is a crippled economy and an increase in other forms of illegal immigration.

As long as there are foreign tourists, border cards for Canadians and Mexicans and international enrollment at U.S. universities, there will be opportunities aplenty for some legal visitors to linger past their visa expiration dates.

Securing the border and ignoring the rest does nothing to reduce the legal thicket and interminable waiting lists facing those who wish to migrate by the rules. A sane approach would recognize that demand on both sides of the border is far outstripping the supply of legal visas; instead, House supporters of HR 4437 would choke off the number of annual employment visas at a nearly nonexistent 5,200.

House Republicans claim they want to first "certify" that the border is secure. To fully do that, they will need not just 2,000 miles of fence but another 3,145 miles for the northern border, untold thousands of new port inspectors, plus homing devices attached to every foreigner who dares set foot on U.S. soil. The border would be secure, but at the expense of the land of the free becoming a police state.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Surprising Jump In Tax Revenues Is Curbing Deficit (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 8 — An unexpectedly steep rise in tax revenues from corporations and the wealthy is driving down the projected budget deficit this year, even though spending has climbed sharply because of the war in Iraq and the cost of hurricane relief.

On Tuesday, White House officials are expected to announce that the tax receipts will be about $250 billion above last year's levels and that the deficit will be about $100 billion less than what they projected six months ago. The rising tide in tax payments has been building for months, but the increased scale is surprising even seasoned budget analysts and making it easier for both the administration and Congress to finesse the big run-up in spending over the past year.

Tax revenues are climbing twice as fast as the administration predicted in February, so fast that the budget deficit could actually decline this year.

The main reason is a big spike in corporate tax receipts, which have nearly tripled since 2003, as well as what appears to be a big increase in individual taxes on stock market profits and executive bonuses.

On Friday, the Congressional Budget Office reported that corporate tax receipts for the nine months ending in June hit $250 billion — nearly 26 percent higher than the same time last year — and that overall revenues were $206 billion higher than at this point in 2005.

Congressional analysts say the surprise windfall could shrink the deficit this year to $300 billion, from $318 billion in 2005 and an all-time high of $412 billion in 2004.

Republicans are already arguing that the revenue jump proves that their tax cuts, especially the 2003 tax cut on stock dividends, would spur the economy and ultimately increase revenues.

DOJ_NMG_0039396

"The tax relief we delivered has helped unleash the entrepreneurial spirit of America and kept our economy the envy of the world," President Bush said in his weekly radio address on Saturday.

Democrats and many independent budget analysts note that overall revenues have barely climbed back to the levels reached in 2000, and that the government has borrowed trillions of dollars against Social Security surpluses just as the first of the nation's baby boomers are nearing retirement.

"The fact is that revenues are way below what the administration said they would be a few years ago," said Thomas S. Kahn, staff director for Democrats on the House Budget Committee. "The long-term prognosis is still very, very bleak, and the administration doesn't have any kind of long-term plan."

One reason the run-up in taxes looks good is because the past five years looked so bad. Revenues are up, but they have lagged well behind economic growth.

The surge could also evaporate as quickly as it appeared. Over the past decade, tax revenues have become much more volatile, alternately soaring and plunging in the wake of swings in the stock market and repeatedly defying government projections.

Nevertheless, the short-term change has been striking. At the beginning of the year, the Congressional Budget Office projected that this year's deficit would be $371 billion and the White House Office of Management and Budget put the figure at $423 billion.

Corporate tax payments are expected to exceed $300 billion, up from $131 billion three years ago. The other big increase is an extraordinary jump in individual taxes that were not withheld from paychecks, usually a reflection of taxes on investment income and executive bonuses.

The jump in receipts is providing Mr. Bush and Republicans in Congress with a new opportunity to assert that tax cuts of 2001 and 2003 are working and that Congress should make them permanent.

Pat Toomey, president of the Club for Growth, a conservative political fund-raising group, said: "The supply-siders were absolutely right. All the major sources of revenue have grown, especially in areas where we said they would."

But budget analysts, supporters and critics of Mr. Bush alike, cautioned that this year's windfall would do little to improve the government's long-term budget woes.

Government spending under Mr. Bush continued to climb rapidly this year, more than twice as fast as the economy. Spending on the war in Iraq has accelerated, to about $120 billion this year.

Far more ominously, the nation's oldest baby boomers will be eligible for Social Security benefits in just two years. Conservatives and liberals alike predict a huge escalation in costs of Social Security and Medicare over the next several decades.

"The long-term outlook is such a deep well of sorrow that I can't get much happiness out of this year," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office and a former White House economist under President Bush.

Despite almost five years of economic growth, individual income taxes — the biggest component of federal tax revenues — have yet to reach the levels of 2000. Even with surging payments for investment profits and business income, individual tax payments in 2005 were only $972 billion — below the $1 trillion reached in 2000, even without adjusting for inflation.

Over all, individual and corporate taxes have lagged well behind the economy's growth over the past five years. Government spending, by contrast, mushroomed far faster than the economy.

And federal debt has ballooned to $8.3 trillion, up from $5.6 trillion when Mr. Bush took office. Republicans are trying to raise the authorized debt ceiling to $9.6 trillion.

War costs for Iraq and Afghanistan have totaled more than $300 billion since 2003, and the Bush administration has not included any war costs in its budget estimates beyond next year.

Domestic discretionary programs, like education and space exploration, have slowed their growth after climbing rapidly in Mr. Bush's first term. But entitlement programs, particularly Medicaid and Medicare, are climbing rapidly as a result of rising medical prices and Mr. Bush's prescription drug program.

Outlays for Medicare have climbed 15 percent this year and are expected to hit $300 billion. About half of that increase results from the new prescription drug program, which is expected to cost nearly $1 trillion over the next 10 years.

"Even if spending is not going up as fast as it was before, it's not coming down," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a bipartisan group that advocates budget discipline.

Despite a public outcry this year over pork-barrel spending sought by individual lawmakers for local projects, Mr. Bixby said, the main causes of higher spending stem from the war in Iraq and entitlement programs.

Both supporters and critics of Mr. Bush cautioned against attributing much long-term significance to the recent fiscal improvement, in part because tax revenues have become more volatile.

DOJ_NMG_0039397

In the late 1990's, revenues exceeded predictions by more than $100 billion a year. After the recession of 2001, revenues plunged about $100 billion below what could be explained by slower economic growth and higher unemployment.

One reason for the increased volatility may be that, contrary to a popular assumption, a disproportionate share of income taxes is paid by wealthy households, and their incomes are based much more on the swings of the stock market than on wages and salaries. About one-third of all income taxes are paid by households in the top 1 percent of income earners, who make more than about $300,000 a year. Because those households also earn the overwhelming share of taxable investment income and executive bonuses, both their incomes and their tax liabilities swing sharply in bull and bear markets.

"These people have incomes that fluctuate much more rapidly, so when the economy is doing well and the stock market is doing well, tax revenues will be up," said Brian Riedl, a budget analyst at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research organization. "Rapidly fluctuating tax revenues will continue to be the norm for years to come."

Compared with the size of the economy, tax revenues are still below historical norms and far below what the administration predicted as recently as 2003.

Tax receipts amounted to about 17.5 percent of the nation's gross domestic product in 2005, far below the level five years ago and still slightly below the average of 18 percent since World War II. Spending, by contrast, is running at about 20 percent of gross domestic product .

"Spending has not been restrained," Mr. Riedl said. "One hundred percent of the reduced deficit is because taxpayers are sending more money to Washington."

Agency Sees Record Corporate Tax Receipts (LAT)

By From Bloomberg News

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

The report will let the White House announce a $100-billion cut in the U.S. budget deficit.

WASHINGTON — Corporate tax receipts this year will probably cross the $300-billion threshold for the first time, boosting efforts to trim the U.S. budget deficit, the Congressional Budget Office said.

The budget agency, in its monthly review released Friday, estimated that corporate receipts would exceed $330 billion in fiscal 2006, up 18% from 2005. That is double the increase that the agency estimated at the beginning of the government's fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30.

The White House Office of Management and Budget is expected to announce Tuesday that, because of the increased tax receipts, the deficit will be about $100 billion less than what was projected six months ago. President Bush pledged in his 2004 State of the Union address to halve the deficit by 2009.

"We are on track to meet the president's goal," said Rob Portman, White House budget director.

Congressional analysts say the deficit could drop this year to $300 billion, down from $318 billion in 2005 and from an all-time high of $412 billion in 2004.

A smaller deficit might give Republicans ammunition to rebut criticism of their economic policies ahead of the November congressional elections and to deflect arguments that U.S. fiscal policy risks hurting the global economy.

The Congressional Budget Office said federal spending through June was 8.6% higher than in the first nine months of fiscal 2005. It attributed much of the increase to Katrina and Rita recovery efforts, interest on the public debt, and the Medicare prescription drug plan.

The Treasury is drawing an increased share of its revenue from corporations, with companies providing 13% of total tax revenue in fiscal 2005, up from 10% in 2004 and from about 7% in 2003.

Individual tax payments, which make up the bulk of the government's tax revenue, total an estimated $791 billion so far this year, up about 14.1%, the Congressional Budget Office said.

Why U.S. Companies Shouldn't Whine About Taxes (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

TO hear some people talk, the United States is the scourge of the Fortune 500. Despite all the tax cuts that President Bush and Congress have passed in the last five years, business groups and their supporters in Washington complain that the United States imposes higher tax rates on corporate profits than almost any other industrialized country.

"Foreign-based competitor companies operate under tax rules that are often more favorable than our own," warned R. Glenn Hubbard, a former economic adviser to President Bush and now dean of the Columbia Business School, at a House hearing two weeks ago. "Current law can result in circumstances that harm the competitiveness of U.S. companies."

DOJ_NMG_0039398

Around Washington, the rumblings are growing for "reform" of corporate taxes to improve the global competitiveness of American companies.

Henry M. Paulson Jr., the incoming Treasury secretary, declared at his confirmation hearing that he wanted to increase "competitiveness" in the tax code.

Can it be true that the United States, where bare-knuckled capitalism is a romantic ideal and being nouveau riche is a badge of honor, is harder on big corporations than "old Europe" welfare states like Germany, France and Sweden?

Don't believe it. There are plenty of problems with the corporate tax code — rococo complexity, perverse incentives, antique ideas — but overly high taxes is not one of them.

By most measures, the corporate tax burden is lower in the United States than it is in the European Union or in Japan or most other industrialized countries.

The political danger, at least from a fiscal standpoint, is that arguments for corporate tax reform will be hijacked to justify another round of corporate tax cuts. That was what happened with the corporate tax overhaul of 2004, which became a grab bag of tax breaks to almost every corner of business, at a net cost of $60 billion over 10 years.

Those who see the American corporate tax as oppressive point to a striking fact: the standard corporate tax rate of 35 percent is now higher than that of most other industrialized countries. The average top rate is 25.8 percent in the European Union, where most nations have cut rates to attract investment.

But official tax rates are not the same as actual tax burdens. What American companies lose in high tax rates they more than make up in higher tax breaks.

One indicator of the true tax burden is corporate tax revenue as a share of gross domestic product. According to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a research organization based in Paris and financed by governments of industrialized nations, corporate taxes in 2003 were 2.1 percent of G.D.P. in the United States, 3.2 percent in the European Union and 4.3 percent in industrialized countries in Asia.

Though comparisons of true tax rates are treacherous, the evidence suggests that the United States more than makes up for high statutory rates with generous tax breaks. Robert S. McIntyre, director of Citizens for Tax Justice, has calculated that the average corporation paid taxes of about 18 percent in 2004.

The European Commission, using a more theoretical approach, calculated that the average effective tax rate in 15 Western European nations has hovered between 20 and 22 percent since 1998. When the 10 new Central European members of the European Union are included, the average corporate tax bite was 17.7 percent.

"There is good reason to believe that the corporate tax burden in the United States could be less than the rest of the world because the rest of the world has been broadening their tax bases while we have been cutting ours," said Martin A. Sullivan, an analyst at the journal Tax Notes.

To be sure, many experts contend that the American tax code does impose some competitive disadvantages. One big complaint is that the United States is one of the very few countries that taxes corporate profits worldwide. Almost all other nations use "territorial" systems, taxing only profits inside their borders.

The difference is significant. Thyssen-Krupp, the German steel conglomerate, owes no German taxes on profits from its operations in Brazil, China or Poland. And European value-added tax on domestic sales does not apply to exports to the United States. United States Steel, by contrast, potentially owes American taxes on profits from its subsidiary in Slovakia and must also charge value-added taxes on exports sold in Germany.

In practice, the disadvantage is smaller than it appears. For one thing, American companies receive tax credits for taxes paid in other countries. More important, American companies have proved extremely adept at shifting profits into low-tax countries like Ireland and then deferring the American taxes on those profits by keeping them outside the United States.

Under current federal law, companies can postpone taxes on foreign profits until those profits return to the United States. By some estimates, American multinationals had accumulated more than $400 billion in profits outside the country.

Last year, Congress rewarded that behavior. First, it widened companies' ability to claim tax credits against their foreign taxes, at a cost to the Treasury of almost $40 billion over 10 years. Second, it gave companies a one-time chance to repatriate their vast hoard of overseas profits at a tax rate of only 5.25 percent — a bonanza for many pharmaceutical and electronics businesses.

"The current U.S. rules, while complex, represent the best of all worlds for multinational taxpayers," declared Stephen E. Shay, a former international tax counsel to the Treasury Department, at a hearing last month of a House Ways and Means subcommittee.

MANY analysts agree that today's rules are a mess: they do not raise much revenue from foreign profits, they encourage companies to invest outside the United States, they encourage profit-shifting schemes and they probably put some American companies at a competitive disadvantage.

DOJ_NMG_0039399

The challenge is to change the system without cutting taxes yet again. Michael J. Graetz, a professor at Yale Law School and a proponent of radical tax overhaul, told lawmakers last month that the top corporate tax rate ought to be cut from 35 percent to as little as 15 percent.

But Mr. Graetz said Congress would have to make up for the lost revenue. "It is not possible to achieve this kind of corporate rate reduction without a major restructuring of our domestic tax system," he said.

President Bush called for exactly such a revenue-neutral restructuring during his re-election campaign. But any overhaul would provoke intense battles between potential winners and losers. With Republicans terrified about losing control of Congress in the midterm elections this year, Mr. Bush has postponed making any proposals until at least next year.

Bush Asks Senate To Raise Science Spending (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, July 9, 2006

President Bush on Saturday urged the Senate to back increased government spending on basic scientific research.

The proposal is part of Bush's initiative to boost U.S. competitiveness in the global marketplace through innovation. He also wants to train thousand of new science and math teachers and extend a popular tax credit businesses can receive for investing in research and development. The total price tag over 10 years would be $136 billion.

Some Democrats have expressed concern that Bush is increasing federal math and science education spending while cutting overall discretionary spending on education by trimming money in areas such as the arts, parent-resource centers and drug-free schools.

But Bush said in his weekly radio address that his proposals are vital for America to "remain an innovative nation that competes with confidence" and would help ensure that every U.S. child has the math and science skills needed for the jobs of the future.

The president devoted part of a two-day trip to Illinois to his American Competitiveness Initiative, visiting Cabot Microelectronics Corp., headquartered in Aurora, Ill., in Chicago's exurbs.

Donning protective eyewear and a white lab coat, Bush toured a laboratory of the supplier of products used in making semiconductors. Cabot is in the district of House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., who accompanied Bush to the facility.

"Cutting-edge firms like Cabot are creating good jobs for our workers and helping to keep America competitive in the global economy," Bush said in his radio remarks.

He said the Senate should follow the House's lead and approve full funding of the basic research component of his initiative, which would double federal spending on basic research in the physical sciences.

The president also put a rosy spin on a new jobs report that showed U.S. employers added a disappointing 121,000 jobs last month.

The count of new jobs added to the economy in June did mark an improvement from the 92,000 new positions logged in May — the fewest in seven months. But it still fell short of economists' forecasts for an increase of around 175,000, and the Dow Jones industrials lost 134.63 points Friday to close at 11,090.67.

The April-to-June average of 108,000 jobs a month also was down from the average of 176,000 a month for the previous quarter. The moderation in job growth comes as companies cope with rising energy prices and interest rates and try to determine how much of a slowdown in overall economic activity the country is likely to encounter in the months ahead.

Still, Bush celebrated 34 straight months of job increases.

"Our economic expansion is lifting the lives of millions of Americans," he said.

Democrats focused on the tepid nature of the growth, noting it was smaller than needed to keep up with population increases.

"Instead of doing something to address sky-high gas prices, expensive loans and outsourced jobs, this president is holding photo ops touting his policies that are failing small businesses," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass.

Bush Can't Provide Power For Nationals (WP)

By Adam Kilgore

The Washington Post/AP, July 9, 2006

The former owner of the Texas Rangers came out to RFK Stadium last night to sit with his wife, Laura, watch a little baseball and, hopefully, see the Washington Nationals win, as had happened in both games he attended last season.

As word spread through the Nationals' dugout in the second inning that President Bush had come to his first game this season, players and coaches turned and gazed up at the owner's box, pointing and talking to each other.

DOJ_NMG_0039400

Before the game ended, another Ivy League graduate born in Texas -- 6-foot-10, 260-pound right-hander Chris Young -- had stolen Bush's spotlight, limiting the Nationals to just one run after Alfonso Soriano blasted Young's first pitch over the center field fence. Young's counterpart, Pedro Astacio, allowed three home runs, and the Nationals lost, 5-2, to the San Diego Padres.

"Tell him to keep coming out," Nationals shortstop Royce Clayton said. "See how his record stands up."

Make it 2-1 lifetime for Bush, as not even his presence could stop San Diego's dominance in D.C. The Padres swept the Nationals here last season, and last night won their second straight in Washington.

The Nationals had been making progress toward their goal of reaching a .500 record on this homestand, taking the first two series against the Tampa Bay Devil Rays and Florida Marlins. But last night's loss made winning this series impossible and halted any momentum Washington had gathered heading into the all-star break.

"We play good, bad, good, bad," second baseman Jose Vidro said. "That's where we are right now."

By the time Bush left in the seventh inning, the Nationals had used four pitchers because of a short and unsuccessful outing by Astacio, who was making only his second start this season. Nationals Manager Frank Robinson had Astacio on an 85-pitch count, but Astacio couldn't last even that long. He exited after 66 pitches and 3 2/3 innings, having surrendered five runs, four earned, on nine hits.

Many of hits came when he was ahead in the count but left pitches at belt level.

"That's not good pitching," Robinson said. "You just don't do that. He didn't locate the ball well."

The outing contrasted with Astacio's first start this season, when he allowed just one run on three hits in five strong innings on Monday. He equaled that run total in just two batters last night when Mike Cameron hit a long solo home run off the clock in right center.

Astacio navigated through the next two innings without harm, but Adrian Gonzales greeted him in the fourth and knocked the first pitch over the left field fence to give the Padres a 2-1 lead.

After Khalil Greene singled for his fifth hit in two games this series, Mark Bellhorn drove the first pitch he saw into the Nationals' bullpen. The Padres led 4-1, and Astacio's pitch count was growing less and less relevant. Fatigue would not knock him out of this game; the Padres would. They added one more in the inning on a sacrifice fly by Dave Roberts, and Cameron finally chased him with a hard single.

Meanwhile, Astacio's opposite number, Young, mowed down batter after batter. A Princeton grad born in Dallas, Young is becoming one the league's most dominant pitchers in just his second full season. He was the National League pitcher of the month in June after going 3-0 with a 1.17 ERA and striking out 34 in 30 2/3 innings. He entered last night's start with a 3.13 ERA this season, seventh in the National League.

"He's deceptive," Clayton said. "He's a big-framed guy, and the ball kind of jumps out at you. He changed eye levels and pitched well."

But not well enough for Soriano, who crushed Young's first offering, an inside fastball, deep to left center, tying the game at 1. It was Soriano's third leadoff home run this season and 26th off his career.

"I was thinking it was going to be a good night for us," Soriano said afterward.

But Young, who was originally signed by Nationals scouting director Dana Brown when Brown worked for the Pittsburgh Pirates, cruised through the rest of the first and through the next five innings. The Nationals drew four hits off Young over that span and never threatened to score as the Padres wailed away at Astacio.

The Nationals have scored only four runs in two games against San Diego, which may not be enough if they want to salvage what had been a successful homestand.

"We got to really beat up on them," Robinson said with a sly grin. "Score about three or four runs."

Bush Attends Padres-Nationals Game (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

President Bush made a low-key appearance at Saturday night's game between the Washington Nationals and the San Diego Padres.

Bush sat between first lady Laura Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice as they and several guests settled into a VIP box during the first inning.

Unlike Bush's previous visits to RFK Stadium, there was no red, white and blue bunting in front of the box to identify the important visitor, and there were no obvious signs of extra security before the game.

There was no advance word that Bush would be attending and reporters accompanying him were not told where he was going until the presidential motorcade neared the ballpark.

The president and his party left at the middle of the seventh inning with San Diego leading 5-1 and were back at the White House minutes later. The Padres went on to win 5-2.

DOJ_NMG_0039401

Among others attending the game with the president were his brother Marvin, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Chief of Staff Josh Bolten.

Bush, a former part-owner of the Texas Rangers, has attended three Nationals games at RFK since major league baseball returned to Washington last year. He threw out the ceremonial first pitch amid much fanfare at the 2005 home opener, the stadium's first game since 1971. He and Rice also attended a game in June. The Nationals won both games.

Vice President Cheney threw out the first pitch at this year's home opener and was greeted with what seemed to be more boos than cheers as he walked on the field.

Padres Continue To Rule RFK (WT)

By Ken Wright

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

Washington Nationals right-hander Pedro Astacio, who pitched for the San Diego Padres last season when they swept a three-game series at RFK Stadium, couldn't keep the Padres from staying perfect in the nation's capital last night.

Padres starter Chris Young outpitched Astacio and the Nationals in a 5-2 victory before 27,060, including President Bush and Laura Bush, who unexpectedly dropped by for the first time this season, accompanied by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. It was the third game President Bush has attended -- and the first loss he has witnessed -- and the first for the first lady since baseball returned to the District last year.

Young (8-4) allowed two runs on seven hits and no walks in six innings. He struck out nine Nationals (38-51), his second-highest total of the season. In his last eight starts, the 6-foot-10 right-hander is 5-1 with a 1.75 ERA. The Padres (47-40) are now 5-0 at RFK since the Nationals moved from Montreal.

"He has a sneaky fastball, changeup and a very good curveball," Nationals manager Frank Robinson said. "He moved the ball around in the strike zone, up, down, in and out with his fastball and mixed in breaking balls."

In 2003, Young was a member of the Montreal Expos organization. The former Princeton basketball player advanced that season to Class AA Harrisburg from Class A Brevard County.

"I don't remember facing him or seeing him around," said second baseman Jose Vidro, the franchise's longest-tenured player. "I heard he was with us. It's another player that left us I guess."

As for Astacio (1-1), the long ball was his downfall last night. He gave up three homers in his 32/3 innings, accounting for four of the five runs he allowed to the National League West-leading Padres.

Mike Cameron hit his 10th homer of the season in the first inning, blasting Astacio's fastball off the clock beyond the center-field fence -- well more than 400 feet away.

The Padres knocked Astacio out of the game in the fourth. San Diego first baseman Adrian Gonzalez hit his second home run in as many nights and 13th of the season -- a towering home run to right field for a 2-1 San Diego lead.

After shortstop Khalil Greene singled following Gonzalez's home run, Mark Bellhorn delivered his seventh home run of the season for a 4-1 lead.

The Padres added their fourth run of the inning on Dave Roberts' sacrifice fly to center. Astacio gave up five runs on nine hits.

"I left a couple pitches on top of the plate," Astacio said.

Coming in, Astacio had not allowed more than two runs in any of his last eight starts. Granted, those starts spanned 1½ seasons, including a win in Washington last season. The Nationals signed Astacio to a free agent deal during the offseason soon after Brian Lawrence, acquired in a trade from the Padres, blew out his rotator cuff in spring training.

The Nationals signed Astacio to a one-year, $1 million deal March 2. Astacio arrived to camp late and was unimpressive most of the spring. On April 1, in the final exhibition game of the season against the Baltimore Orioles at Camden Yards, Astacio pulled himself from the game before the third inning because of right forearm tightness. That problem turned into a three-month absence from the Nationals for Astacio.

When he finally made his season debut on Monday against the Florida Marlins, the 36-year-old looked good. In the Nationals' 9-1 win, Astacio allowed just one run on three hits in five innings.

Astacio's counterpart last night allowed a homer on his first pitch of the game. Alfonso Soriano's blast off Young was his third leadoff home run of the season and 27th overall.

"When I tied the game at 1-1, I thought it was going to be a good night for us," Soriano said. "Chris Young is a very strong guy and pitched a very good game. It's hard to see the ball."

Soriano, who was voted by fans and players to start in the National League's outfield in Tuesday's All-Star Game, produced the 26th leadoff home run of his career and the second of this 10-game homestand. Soriano also homered to Monday to lead off.

DOJ_NMG_0039402

Soriano is the Nationals' lone All-Star this season.

Several of the Padres pitchers, including ace Jake Peavy and closer Trevor Hoffman, thought Young should have been named to the NL's All-Star team. Young was the NL pitcher of the month for June, going 3-0 with a 1.17 ERA in five starts (302/3 innings) with 34 strikeouts.

Young was one of five finalists for the final spot on the NL All-Star team that went to Los Angeles Dodgers first baseman Nomar Garciaparra by a fans vote on the Internet.

The Nationals produced their second run of the game in the seventh when center fielder Alex Escobar doubled to center and then scored on Royce Clayton's RBI single to make it 5-2.

Got a question about the Nats? Mark Zuckerman has the answers. To submit a question, go to the Sports Page.

His Hipness, John G. Roberts (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

WRITING in April for a unanimous Supreme Court, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. found that the police in Brigham City, Utah, acted properly in entering a home without a warrant after they peered through a window and saw a fight in progress that had left one man spitting blood.

"The role of a police officer includes preventing violence and restoring order, not simply rendering first aid to casualties," the chief justice said, rejecting the argument that the police should have waited until the altercation ended more conclusively. "An officer is not like a boxing (or hockey) referee, poised to stop a bout only if it becomes too one-sided," he explained.

The chief justice's sports imagery galvanized the legal blogs. Some found his boxing reference inapt. "The whole point of boxing is fighting!" wrote a participant on the Althouse blog, run by Ann Althouse, a law professor at the University of Wisconsin.

Others took issue with the hockey reference. "Given all the padding that hockey players wear, being punched by an opponent hardly is more significant than being hit by a toddler," one said.

Finally, another writer took a step back and observed that "this shows another side of Roberts as a good writer: displaying some wry humor and hipness."

It is no surprise that the new chief justice's every vote is being tabulated and scrutinized. But so is his every metaphor. Beyond John Roberts the chief justice, what has this first term revealed about John Roberts the judge?

He wrote eight majority opinions, roughly his fair share, given that there were 69 opinions to divide among the nine justices. He also wrote three dissenting opinions and two concurrences. While not a huge body of work, it is enough to convey at least a preliminary sense of his judicial voice.

It is direct, straightforward, free of legal jargon, the voice of a lawyer who made a living selling complicated ideas to busy appellate judges under tight time constraints.

Prof. Erwin Chemerinsky of Duke University Law School, who spent the past week editing the term's cases for inclusion in his constitutional law textbook, said that the Roberts opinions were refreshingly easy to edit compared with those of most other justices. "His prose style is clear and easy to follow," Professor Chemerinsky said. "He tells you right in the first paragraph exactly what the case is about."

Prof. Akhil Amar of Yale Law School praised the Roberts style for "elegance and economy" as well as for the "occasionally snappy line" that could crystallize a case for lay readers. He gave two examples. One was a majority opinion that rejected the government's application of federal narcotics law to stop a Brazil-based religious group from importing a hallucinogenic tea for use in its rituals. "The government's argument echoes the classic rejoinder of bureaucrats throughout history: If I make an exception for you, I'll have to make one for everybody, so no exceptions," the chief justice wrote.

The second was a majority opinion that found that the state of Arkansas had denied due process to a homeowner by seizing and selling his house for nonpayment of property taxes without taking reasonable steps to notify him of his jeopardy. Referring to Gary K. Jones, the homeowner, Chief Justice Roberts wrote: "In response to the returned form suggesting that Jones had not received notice that he was about to lose his property, the state did — nothing."

"That little dash is brilliant," Professor Amar said. "Every ordinary citizen can understand the frustration of dealing with government stupidity."

Among legal academics, the Roberts opinion that received by far the most attention was the one rejecting a constitutional challenge to the Solomon Amendment, under which universities forfeit all federal grants if they fail to open their doors to military recruiters. A group of law schools argued that the statute violated their rights to free speech and association.

As the case reached the court, many law professors who had supported the challenge began to have second thoughts, fearful that the First Amendment argument, if accepted, would undermine many anti-discrimination laws by permitting bigots to opt out in the name of free association. Even liberals, or perhaps especially liberals, were therefore relieved by the chief justice's conclusion that because the law regulated neither speech nor association, but merely conduct, it raised no First Amendment problem.

DOJ_NMG_0039403

Jack Balkin, a professor at Yale Law School, said on his blog that the chief justice's opinion "was carefully and skillfully written to make almost no new law." Professor Balkin said the opinion made the case "look easy by artfully dodging every interesting constitutional law question in sight."

That raises the question of whether the chief justice's performance conforms to his own stated goal: to be a "minimalist" judge who decides no more than necessary, an umpire simply calling balls and strikes. The answer is yes, and no.

"He's 'minimalist' in recognizing that the court is an ongoing enterprise with precedents and history and tradition," said Frederick Schauer, a professor at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard. "He is not coming in with a big new theory or a big new perspective."

On the other hand, the chief justice joined opinions by Justice Antonin Scalia in environmental and criminal cases that reached beyond the specific disputes at hand to call long-settled assumptions into question. And several of his opinions had a rhetorical edge. "It is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race," he wrote in dissent from a decision that enforced the Voting Rights Act to invalidate a Texas Congressional district.

His seeming allergy to citing law review articles, or any other sources outside the body of the court's published opinions, is a striking feature of the Roberts approach. "It's as if the answers to all questions are already there, completely internal to the court, to be teased out of the existing cases," said David Barron, a professor at Harvard Law School.

Chief Justice Roberts, a former managing editor of the Harvard Law Review, has cited only a single law review article, one written by Judge Henry Friendly, for whom he clerked on the federal appeals court in New York. It was a tip of the hat in his first opinion.

Relying on precedent as the only source of law is an approach with strengths and weaknesses, Professor Barron said, noting that on the one hand, precedent can be a smokescreen, "a rhetorical device to hide the inevitable policy making," while on the other, "it has its own constraining effects," making a judge less likely to embrace dramatic change in the status quo.

Whether John Roberts's first year is a good predictor of his 10th, 20th or 30th is an open question. According to a new study by the political scientists Lee Epstein and Jeffrey A. Segal, Chief Justice Earl Warren voted against criminal defendants and civil rights litigants 62 percent of the time during his first term. Eventually, of course, he became their champion.

But such a trajectory is rare. The other chief justices of the last 50 years, Fred M. Vinson, Warren E. Burger and William H. Rehnquist — Chief Justice Roberts's mentor — all stayed true to their early form.

What Chief Justice Roberts Forgot In His First Term: Judicial Modesty (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

At the confirmation hearings for John Roberts, there were two theories about what kind of a chief justice he would be. His critics maintained that he was an extreme conservative whose politics would drive his legal rulings. Judge Roberts, on the other hand, insisted that he was "not an ideologue," and that his judicial philosophy was to be "modest," which he defined as recognizing that judges should "decide the cases before them" and not try to legislate or "execute the laws."

Judicial modesty is an intriguing idea, with appeal across the political spectrum. For all the talk of liberal activist judges, anyone who is paying attention knows that conservative judges are every bit as activist as liberal ones; they just act for different reasons. A truly modest chief justice could be more deferential to the decisions of the democratically elected branches of government, both liberal and conservative, and perhaps even usher in a new, post-ideological era on the court.

That is not, however, how Chief Justice Roberts voted in his first term. He was modest in some cases, certainly, but generally ones in which criminal defendants, Democrats and other parties conservatives dislike were asking for something. When real estate developers, wealthy campaign contributors and other powerful parties wanted help, he was more inclined to support judicial action, even if it meant trampling on Congress and the states.

The term's major environmental ruling was a striking case in point. A developer sued when the Army Corps of Engineers denied him a permit to build on what it determined to be protected wetlands. The corps is under the Defense Department, ultimately part of an elected branch, and it was interpreting the Clean Water Act, passed by the other elected branch. Courts are supposed to give an enormous amount of deference to agencies' interpretations of the statutes they are charged with enforcing.

But Chief Justice Roberts did not defer. He joined a stridently anti-environmentalist opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia that sided with the developer and mocked the corps's interpretation of the law — an interpretation four justices agreed with — as "beyond parody." The opinion also complained that the corps's approach was too costly. Justice John Paul Stevens dryly noted that whether benefits outweighed costs was a policy question that "should not be answered by appointed judges."

DOJ_NMG_0039404

In an opinion on assisted suicide, Chief Justice Roberts was again a conservative activist. The case involved Attorney General John Ashcroft's attempt to invoke an irrelevant federal statute to block Oregon's assisted suicide law, which the state's voters had adopted by referendum. Even though it meant overruling the voters, intruding on state sovereignty and mangling the words of a federal statute, Chief Justice Roberts dissented to support Mr. Ashcroft's position.

Chief Justice Roberts voted against another democratically enacted, progressive law when the court struck down Vermont's strict limits on campaign contributions. He joined an opinion that not only held that the law violated the First Amendment, but also engaged in the kind of fine judicial line-drawing — in this case, about the precise dollar limits the Constitution allows states to impose — that is often considered a hallmark of judicial activism.

One of the court's most nakedly activist undertakings in recent years is the series of hoops it has forced Congress to jump through when it passes laws that apply to the states. Judge John Noonan Jr., a federal appeals court judge appointed by President Ronald Reagan, has complained that the justices have set themselves up as the overseers of Congress. But Chief Justice Roberts voted to put up yet another hoop, requiring Congress to put the states on "clear notice" — whatever that means — before requiring them to pay for expert witnesses in lawsuits involving special education. It is a made-up rule that shows little respect for the people's representatives.

These cases make Chief Justice Roberts seem like a raging judicial activist. But in cases where conservative actions were being challenged, he was quite the opposite. When a whistle-blower in the Los Angeles district attorney's office claimed he was demoted for speaking out, Chief Justice Roberts could find no First Amendment injury. When Democrats challenged Republicans' partisan gerrymandering of Texas's Congressional districts, he could find no basis for interceding.

The Roberts court's first term was not radically conservative, but only because Justice Anthony Kennedy, the swing justice, steered it on a centrist path. If Chief Justice Roberts — who voted with Justice Scalia a remarkable 88 percent of the time in nonunanimous cases — had commanded a majority, it would have been an ideologically driven court that was both highly conservative and just about as activist as it needed to be to get the results it wanted.

Chief Justice Roberts still probably views himself as judicially modest, and in some ways he may be. He has been reasonably respectful of precedent, notably when he provided a fifth vote to uphold Buckley v. Valeo, a critically important campaign finance decision that is under attack from the right. He has also been inclined to decide cases narrowly, rather than to issue sweeping judicial pronouncements. But at his confirmation hearings, he defined judicial modesty as not usurping the legislative and executive roles.

His approach to his new job is no doubt still evolving, which could be a good thing. The respect for the elected branches that he invoked while testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee is hardly a perfect judicial philosophy, especially today, when we need the court to resist the president's dangerous view of his own power. Still, that principled approach would do more for the court and the nation than the predictable arch-conservatism the chief justice's opinions have shown so far.

Army, Taxed By War Costs, Struggles To Pay Bills At Home (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times/AP, July 9, 2006

FORT SAM HOUSTON, Tex., July 8 (AP) — A diversion of money for the war in Iraq has helped create a $530 million shortfall for Army posts at home and abroad, leaving some of them unable to pay utility bills or even cut the grass, military officials say.

In San Antonio, Fort Sam Houston has not paid its $1.4 million monthly utility bill since March, prompting workers in many of the post's administrative buildings to receive automated disconnection notices.

Fort Bragg in North Carolina says it will not buy any office supplies until the new fiscal year starts in October.

And in Kentucky, Fort Knox closed one of its eight dining halls for a month and laid off 133 contract workers.

"Every time something goes away, it impacts a person: a soldier or their family or one of our civilians," said Col. Wendy Martinson, garrison commander at Fort Sam Houston, which has 27,300 military and civilian workers. "I'm charged with taking care of them, not taking things away from them."

Garrisons function as the city halls of Army installations, providing services like garbage removal, mail delivery and firefighting. The Installation Management Agency of the Army is $530 million short of what it needs through Oct. 1 to finance garrisons at the 117 installations it oversees in the United States, Europe and Asia, said an agency spokesman, Stephen Oertwig.

The increasing cost of fuel is partly to blame, and it costs more to pay civilians in Asia and Europe, Mr. Oertwig said. Another major factor is the practice of financing the war through spending bills outside the annual budget.

As Congress spent months debating a supplemental spending bill, the Army had to divert money from the Installation Management Agency's budget to cover the cost of the war, Mr. Oertwig said.

DOJ_NMG_0039405

The Army often diverts operations money for other programs, in times of war and peace, said Jeremiah Gertler, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. The supplemental spending bill usually replenishes those funds.

This year, though, most of the military money in the $94.5 billion bill was earmarked for the war, leaving little to pay back operations accounts, Mr. Gertler said.

Military officials could have asked for more money to ease the garrison budget crunch, but they knew a bigger request would have created a bigger fight in Congress, Mr. Gertler said.

"The Pentagon is reluctant to ask for any more than they need for the war because it all looks like it's going to the war and becomes a very controversial bill," Mr. Gertler said.

But Michael O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution, the liberal-leaning research organization, said money management seemed to be the larger problem. The Defense Department spends about as much on maintenance and operations as it does on weapons and personnel combined, Mr. O'Hanlon said, so there should be more than enough for the bills.

"It makes me worry if the Pentagon can't do its accounting well enough to find money for its electric bills," he said. "It just boggles my mind a little bit."

The legislation that Congress approved on June 15 included $722 million for the Installation Management Agency, to be split among its installations.

Colonel Martinson did not know how much Fort Sam Houston would get, but she said she expected it would be enough to pay the electricity bill. A spokesman for CPS Energy said the company understood the problem and would not turn off the lights any time soon.

However, the new money will not save the jobs of about 100 contract workers Colonel Martinson dismissed.

Astronauts: Daring Spacewalk Method Works (AP)

By Seth Borenstein, Ap Science Writer

AP, July 9, 2006

A key test of a daring yet wobbly spacewalking technique that could be used someday to repair space shuttle heat shields worked well Saturday and got good reviews from two astronauts from the shuttle Discovery, NASA officials said.

The repair simulation put them at the end of an oscillating, 100-foot combination of a robotic arm and an extension pole that astronaut Piers Sellers said made him feel "like a bug on the end of a fishing rod here."

In a 7 1/2-hour spacewalk, the first of three orbital excursions planned for this mission, Sellers and Michael Fossum said they could do most of the mock tasks they were assigned with only moderate difficulty.

And that's what NASA wanted to hear.

"It was above and beyond" what engineers expected, flight director Tony Ceccacci said after the spacewalk ended. "Hopefully, we'll never have to use it (the boom for repairs) but we know we have the capability."

The technique using the extension on the robotic arm was developed to make sure there is never a repeat of the Columbia disaster, which killed seven astronauts in 2003. A piece of foam from the shuttle's external fuel tank struck Columbia's wing during launch, creating a breach that allowed fiery gases to penetrate the shuttle during the return flight to Earth.

Last year, emergency spacewalking repairs were needed because of heat shield damage to Discovery.

Fossum and Sellers may get a chance to use the boom for a real repair on their third spacewalk, now scheduled for next Wednesday. NASA managers on Saturday were still evaluating whether a piece of fabric filler protruding from the thermal tiles on Discovery's belly needs to be removed. If it does, Fossum and Sellers would have to go back on the boom and yank out the filler.

Orbiter project manager Steve Poulos said a decision will be made Sunday on whether this gap filler — which is cracked, partially broken and just a couple inches at its longest point — must be removed. The early consensus is that it probably will be all right the way it is for re-entry, but engineers will pull an all-nighter to recommend what, if anything, needs to be done, he said.

Every other possible worry with the space shuttle heat shield has proven to be no big deal, deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon said. On Sunday, NASA may say Discovery is safe to land, he said, noting that Discovery's flight has "by far" the fewest problems he has ever seen.

NASA officials had been concerned that astronauts wouldn't be able to work well from the 50-foot extension boom attached to the similar-sized shuttle robotic arm. The agency's top spacewalk officer had compared it to painting a house from the top of a rickety ladder.

But as Fossum and Sellers were finishing up Saturday, NASA officials said they found less sway and oscillating than expected.

Fossum said one simulated operation was "beyond my ability" and "too much motion to handle" from the boom. But another way of doing the same job worked well, so that's not a concern, lead spacewalking officer Tomas Gonzalez-Torres said.

DOJ_NMG_0039406

Aside from that operation, however, the worst Fossum reported was one he rated a 5 on a 1-to-10 scale, which translates to doable but with "moderately objectionable deficiencies."

"I think we got all we needed there," Discovery pilot Mark Kelly told Fossum and Sellers after the simulation.

During Sellers' time on the boom-arm combo, he remarked as he was being moved into position that the ride was "a very slow gentle sway in and out of the bay."

Before their work on the boom-arm combo, the astronauts had an assignment on the outside of the space station, immobilizing a cable cutter on the station's mobile transporter, or railroad car, and rerouting a cable through it. A duplicate cable cutter accidentally cut a cable leading to the transporter late last year, and NASA wanted to make sure it doesn't happen again because the cable is a conduit for power, data and video images.

The transporter moves along the space station exterior and is used for constructing the complex. The severed cable will be replaced during a second spacewalk set for Monday.

The two astronauts also managed to enjoy themselves on the spacewalk which lasted an hour longer than normal because of glitches with tethers. At one point while waiting for Fossum, Sellers did a couple of flips. Both let out frequent "woo-hoos" during their time in space.

The also had time to marvel at the view from 210 miles above Earth.

"It's beautiful," Fossum said. "The thin glow of the moonlit Earth below."

And when Mission Control pointed out to Sellers that he could view Britain over his left shoulder, the British-born spacewalker said: "Wow! Oh, my goodness. It's a beautiful day in Ireland."

Looking down at the Caspian Sea several minutes later, Fossum said: "This is a good view ... I'm in a dream; nobody wake me up."

___

On the Net:

NASA: http://spaceflight.nasa.gov/

NASA's Balancing Act Passes Test (LAT)

By Michael Cabbage, Orlando Sentinel

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

After a successful run-through on a boom held by the shuttle's robotic arm, the agency expects repairs will not be needed this time.

HOUSTON — Two spacewalkers bounced around on the end of a "skinny little pole" 210 miles above Earth on Saturday in a daring test for future shuttle repairs.

Astronauts Piers J. Sellers and Michael E. Fossum spent 7 1/2 hours outside shuttle Discovery on the fourth day of the ship's visit to the International Space Station. Anchored to a boom held by Discovery's robotic arm, the pair checked whether the 100-foot-long appendage was stable enough to support delicate maintenance work on the shuttle's heat shield.

Sellers, who performed three spacewalks during a 2002 shuttle visit to the station, was the first to stand at the end of the boom. As he was hoisted to a spot above the shuttle's cargo bay, he noted the smoothness of the ride.

"Very steady," Sellers said. "It's like being on a slow elevator."

Moments later, Sellers performed three sets of movements, leaning back and forth to simulate motions that would be used during repair work. The movements resembled a calisthenics session.

"It gets easier as you go along, doing all these tasks, you know, at the end of a skinny little pole," Sellers said. "A little practice makes perfect — or adequate."

When his turn came, Fossum, a rookie astronaut making his first spacewalk, mimicked the motions of someone making repairs to the orbiter's heat-resistant tiles and reported the operation was "no problem." Later, with both spacewalkers at the end, the boom showed more movement, but the swaying appeared to quickly stop.

Engineers had expected the vibrations to last up to a minute. Most dissipated in 15 to 20 seconds. The preliminary results led shuttle managers to conclude the test was a success.

"That's given us very good confidence," said Tony Ceccacci, the mission's lead flight director. "Hopefully, we'll never have to use it, but we know we have the capability."

Saturday's success bode well for a possible repair: plucking a card-like piece of ceramic-coated fabric from between heat-resistant tiles on Discovery's belly.

Engineers have been analyzing whether a gap filler protruding more than an inch from the rear of Discovery's heat shield could raise temperatures to dangerously high levels during the ship's descent through Earth's atmosphere.

DOJ_NMG_0039407

A spacewalker performed two similar repairs during Discovery's flight last year. NASA officials are expected to announce today that a fix will not be needed this time.

NASA also finished its evaluation of questionable spots on two thermal panels that line the leading edge of Discovery's right wing. Engineers concluded Saturday that the spots would not pose a hazard for the shuttle's return flight.

'Very Smooth' New Crane Stars During Spacewalk Tests (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

HOUSTON, July 8 -- Tethered like two lures at the end of a fishing rod, astronauts Piers Sellers and Michael Fossum rode space shuttle Discovery's spindly crane 70 feet into space on Saturday in an unprecedented test to see if the crane would remain stable enough to serve as a repair platform.

"Very smooth, very nice," said Sellers, as Discovery's sensor boom lifted him out of the cargo bay. "It's actually like a very slow elevator."

For several hours, first Sellers, then Fossum and Sellers together, bent, twisted, pushed and pulled at their restraints and at the side of the international space station to see how much the shuttle's cargo arm and its 50-foot boom extension would whiplash them.

Although few trips were as gentle as Sellers's initial liftoff, both astronauts reported sways of only one to two feet in most cases. At the conclusion of the spacewalk, Fossum performed simulated repairs at the end of the station's "P-1" truss, a distance of about 70 feet. When fully extended, the combination of arm and boom reaches 100 feet.

At the end of the day, Tomas Gonzalez Torres, NASA's extravehicular activities officer, said engineers were astonished at how effectively the boom performed. He noted that the astronauts got in and out of foot restraints without returning to the cargo bay, and that the boom took only "15 to 20 seconds" -- instead of the anticipated minute -- to stop swaying after it had been disturbed.

"Everybody is very happy," Gonzalez Torres told reporters at Houston's Johnson Space Center. He pronounced the boom ready for use as a repair platform: "I think we're set."

Saturday was the fifth day in Discovery's 13-day mission, which has unfolded almost without a hitch. Steve Poulos, the Orbiter Project Office manager, said that analysts had "cleared" all but two blemishes on Discovery's heat shield and that the other two should be cleared Sunday.

John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team, said this meant that on Sunday he could clear Discovery for reentry, guaranteeing the orbiter's soundness. Shannon said Discovery's heat shielding was in "by far" the best shape of any shuttle he had ever seen.

Sellers and Fossum began their trip outside at 9:17 a.m. Eastern time, leaving the space station's Quest air lock for a spacewalk that ended 7 hours 31 minutes later. Their first task -- repairing the station's mobile tramway -- took a bit over an hour.

The next hours were devoted to testing the repair techniques. Astronauts are frequently lifted out of the cargo bay on the orbiter's 50-foot robotic arm, but Discovery's mission marked the first time spacewalkers have extended the crane with the 50-foot boom.

The boom is a relatively recent innovation. It was developed after the Columbia tragedy in 2003 as a mount for cameras and sensors that could scan the belly of the orbiter during onboard inspections to check for post-launch damage.

The boom performed so well last year that NASA planners decided to test it as a repair platform, enabling astronauts for the first time to reach any part of the orbiter by riding on the end of the arm-boom combination. The only question was whether the extension would be too whippy to allow an astronaut to use it without anchoring himself to his work site.

With shuttle astronauts Lisa M. Nowak and Stephanie Wilson operating the arm and boom, Sellers guided the crane to a cocked position "above" the orbiter. Fossum watched from the cargo bay.

"Pick up the camera, take two pictures and re-stow the camera," ordered shuttle pilot Mark Kelly, supervising the spacewalk from inside Discovery.

"I have the camera in my hand," began Sellers. He proceeded to describe his every movement and the effect on the stability of the arm -- "no perceptible motion," "a smooth, gentle sway," "motion stopped."

Kelly ordered other motions: "slow layback," "forward lay position -- hold position for five seconds." Sellers stepped out of his foot restraints and climbed around to the end of the boom, then put the restraints back on.

"Just a general comment," Sellers remarked after half an hour of this. "It gets easier as you go along, doing all these tasks on the end of a skinny little pole. A little practice makes perfect, or at least adequate."

Each movement was designed to mimic something that an astronaut would do if the shuttle needed repair -- taking pictures of damage, leaning forward to inspect, seeking a better vantage point by abandoning foot restraints for a tether.

DOJ_NMG_0039408

Most important, Gonzalez Torres said, anything but inspections that could happen at the end of the crane-boom would involve two astronauts, so the second half of the test had Fossum in the foot restraints while a tethered Sellers grabbed hold of a tool stanchion.

As the shuttle dipped into darkness, leaving the spacewalkers spotlighted by the shuttle in the middle of nothingness, Kelly said, "You guys look lonely out there."

"Well, I'm just looking at Mike," Sellers replied.

The two astronauts performed a new series of movements on Kelly's command, then migrated to the end of the P-1 truss. There, Fossum mimicked repair techniques, using a simple "strain gauge" to measure force vectors as he pushed against the work surface.

Asked to rate the difficulty of each movement on a scale described by Kelly, Fossum relayed positive results, and noted that his technique improved with practice.

"This isn't bad," he said at one point. "I got the desired performance. It's a little bit annoying."

War Veterans Denied GI Bill Benefits (AJC)

By Ron Martz, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 9, 2006

SUMMERVILLE — Andy Rowe thought he had life after the Army pretty well figured out before he came home from eight months in Afghanistan in November 2003.

An Army reservist since high school, Rowe, 27, planned to serve out the remaining four months of his military obligation in the inactive Reserve, get his honorable discharge and then use his GI Bill education benefits to go to college, just as his father did more than 30 years ago.

But Rowe soon realized that, despite his time in a combat zone, he didn't qualify for those education benefits unless he remained in the Reserves or Guard.

It's the same for tens of thousands of National Guard and Army Reserve troops mobilized since 9/11 — the largest deployment of reservists since World War II.

When military benefits were updated in 1984 through a law called the Montgomery GI Bill, members of Congress and even the military did not envision reservists being called into active duty as frequently as they are today. The law did not extend full college benefits to citizen soldiers and terminated them once they left the Guard or Reserve.

But since 2001, more than 500,000 reservists and Guard troops have been deployed for homeland security duties or sent to wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Yet when they get home, they don't get the same benefits as those who were active-duty servicemembers.

"Looking at how the Reserve forces are being used now, it really upset me," said Rowe, called up from the inactive Reserves to serve in Afghanistan.

Retired Army Col. Bob Norton is deputy director for government relations for the Washington-based Military Officers Association of America, which is lobbying for an extension of benefits.

"Under the law, [reservists and Guard troops] are veterans for every single benefit except the education benefits," Norton said.

Primary opposition to changing the education benefit for reservists and Guard troops — those on duty one weekend a month and two weeks in summer unless they are called to active duty — is coming from the Pentagon's Office of Reserve Affairs. Pentagon officials fear changes could hurt attracting and keeping men and women who sign up for the Guard or Reserve.

"It has proven to be a very attractive recruiting tool, and its effectiveness as a retention tool is certainly equally important to the Reserve components," Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs Thomas Hall testified in March before the House Veterans Affairs Committee.

The Military Officers Association has helped put together a consortium of about 40 groups and service organizations that represent more than 5.5 million vets — including such stalwarts as the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Association of the U.S. Army and Military Order of the Purple Heart — collectively known as the Partnership for Veterans Education. Several higher education associations such as the American Association of State Colleges and Universities and the American Council on Education also are part of the consortium. Its aim: to try to persuade Congress to provide more equality in education benefits for citizen soldiers.

The group is pushing especially hard for what it is calling the Total Force Montgomery GI Bill. One major selling point of this proposal is the portability of GI Bill education benefits. That would allow reservists such as Rowe to earn credits for education while mobilized, just like active-duty troops do, and then use them after they leave the service.

DOJ_NMG_0039409

Current law gives troops who serve on active duty three or more years to collect up to $1,034 a month for 36 months as full-time students. That benefit is available up to 10 years after discharge.

Reserve and Guard troops can earn 60 percent of that, or about $22,000, if they are mobilized for 15 months — the average length of deployment — and then go to school full time. However, they can collect only if they remain in a Guard or Reserve unit. If they go into the inactive Reserve — also known as the Individual Ready Reserve — as Rowe did, or are discharged, they no longer are eligible for education benefits.

"Right now, it's a double standard. They are treating these reservists like second-class citizens," Norton said. U.S. Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) said Marine reservists in his congressional district who were deployed after 9/11 alerted him to the disparity in benefits.

"When I heard about it, I didn't think it was right," Matheson said.

Last year, he co-sponsored with Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) legislation that would enable Guard and Reserve troops who have accrued 24 months of active service within the last five years to be eligible for 100 percent of GI Bill education benefits.

Some unofficial cost estimates of the Total Force Montgomery GI Bill run as high as $4.5 billion for the first 10 years, although the Congressional Budget Office has yet to weigh in with more detailed figures.

Despite its cost, which could become a key obstacle in Congress, the bill now has 140 co-sponsors from both sides of the aisle, including Georgia Democrats John Barrow, Sanford Bishop, John Lewis and David Scott and Republican Nathan Deal.

"This is truly a bipartisan issue because it's about veterans," Matheson said.

The MOAA's Norton said another measure in the works is an amendment offered by Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.) to the fiscal year 2007 Defense Authorization Bill.

This amendment would enable Guard and Reserve members mobilized for active duty to use their GI Bill education benefits after they leave military service.

Hall, the assistant secretary of defense who also is a retired rear admiral, told members of Congress that such a change could affect troop retention.

"The fact that a member must continue to serve in the Reserves to maintain eligibility has greatly assisted the Reserve components as a whole in maintaining consistently high retention rates over the years and has increased the education level of our Reserve forces," he said.

But Norton contends that the Defense Department's own survey data show education is not a major factor in an individual's decision to re-enlist or extend in the Guard or Reserves.

Rowe said education benefits he thought he would receive as a reservist were only part of his decision to enlist in 1996, when he was 17 and still a high school junior in his hometown of Summerville.

"My father instilled a true sense of patriotism in me, and I wanted to do something for the country," Rowe said.

His father, Tim, had served in the Air Force and used his GI Bill benefits to obtain an education degree and become a teacher.

Rowe went to basic training between his junior and senior years in high school and then was assigned to a unit — first in Chattanooga, and later in Atlanta — as an information systems specialist. He served nearly six years in the active Reserve force before transferring to the Individual Ready Reserve.

In April 2003 he was recalled to active duty and sent to Afghanistan, giving up his civilian job as a project manager for a telecommunications company.

"All I wanted to do when I came home was get another job and go back to school. But then when I applied I found out I couldn't use the GI Bill so I had to reconsider things," he said.

Rowe now works for Covista Communications out of Chattanooga and said that the issue for him is not so much the money as the principle.

"I don't think there's anything that will be done to help me now, but I think it's something that definitely needs to be done for soldiers in the future," he said.

Congressman Paul's Legislative Strategy? He'd Rather Say Not. (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Republican Ron Paul missed out on the 19th century, but he admires it from afar. He speaks lovingly of the good old days before things like Social Security and Medicaid existed, before the federal government outlawed drugs like heroin.

In his legislative fantasies, the amiable Texas congressman would do away with the CIA and the Federal Reserve. He'd reinstate the gold standard. He'd get rid of the Department of Education and leave the business of schooling to local governments, because he believes that's what the Constitution intended.

DOJ_NMG_0039410

"Article 1, Section 8 gives me zero amount of authority to do anything about public education," says Paul on a recent weekday. He's seated in his congressional office near a sign than says, "DON'T STEAL; THE GOVERNMENT HATES COMPETITION . "

Paul, 70, has earned the nickname Dr. No for his habit of voting against just about anything that he sees as government overreach or that interferes with the free market. No to the Iraq war. No to a federal ban on same-sex marriage. No to a congressional gold medal for Pope John Paul II and Ronald Reagan and Rosa Parks. He says the medals are an unconstitutional use of taxpayer money and once suggested each House member instead contribute 100 bucks from his or her own pocket.

Last year, Congress decided to send billions of dollars to victims of Hurricane Katrina. Guess how Ron Paul voted.

"Is bailing out people that chose to live on the coastline a proper function of the federal government?" he asks. "Why do people in Arizona have to be robbed in order to support the people on the coast?"

There have been periods in history when the maverick congressman was not such a rare breed, but this is not one of those periods. Democrats and Republicans have been quite disciplined in recent years -- when party leaders say "jump," the savvy congressman had better inquire how high.

This makes the presence of a politician like Ron Paul something of a refreshing peculiarity. He continually bucks the wishes of Republican leaders -- so much so, Paul recalls, that once while exhorting every other Republican to vote the party line, then-Speaker Newt Gingrich announced that Ron Paul was exempt.

Paul is not always alone in his dissent, but more than anyone else in Congress, he is legendary for it. "When I'm the only no vote," says fiscal conservative Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), "I can usually rest assured he's on a plane somewhere."

Paul left his party and ran for president in 1988 on the Libertarian ticket, traveling the country and speaking to crowds as small as 10. His iconoclasm may explain why, despite his years in Congress -- first in the late '70s and early '80s, and more recently since 1997 -- Paul doesn't hold a leadership post, doesn't chair a committee or subcommittee. He sees this as the price of being right.

"I never had a goal of working up the seniority ladder," he says.

Paul has an easy chuckle and a down-home, friendly manner that tempers his strong language. (In his columns, which appear online and are sometimes published in local newspapers, he pronounces a proposed government program "Orwellian" and calls former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan a "master of evasion." He once said on C-SPAN he feared being "bombed by the federal government at another Waco.")

He is father to five, grandfather to 17, and delivered something like 4,000 babies during his career as an obstetrician and gynecologist. Before he largely retired from his practice in 1996, he refused on principle to accept Medicare and Medicaid, and sometimes treated patients for free.

In Texas's 14th District, which runs along the northern Gulf Coast and includes the cities of Galveston and Victoria, Paul is either a beloved figure or a mystifying one. He calls himself the "taxpayers' best friend," and this has led him to controversial stands, such as voting against federal farming subsidies despite the wide swaths of agricultural land in his district. Because he won't cooperate with fellow Republicans in the House unless a bill is in line with his principles, some constituents feel he puts his libertarian agenda over the district's needs.

"He's certainly the taxpayer's friend if the taxpayer doesn't want to get anything done," says John W. Hancock Jr., a rice farmer and banker in El Campo. "All he does is go to Washington and write articles and vote no."

Paul's supporters see him as principled. He is known for constituent services such as getting medals for veterans who never received theirs. He is also a proponent of gun rights and he personally opposes abortion, though he thinks the matter should be left to the states.

"He's just consistent, consistent, consistent," says Debra Medina, the Wharton County Republican chairwoman. "He always talks about the Constitution and what the federal government ought to be doing, and he consistently articulates this basic mistrust of big government, which I think most people have."

Republican Party leaders supported a rival Republican in 1996, when Paul campaigned to return to Congress after a 12-year absence. Paul proved himself to be a strong fundraiser, gathering much of his money from out-of-state donors. He won a primary runoff, then eked out a three-point victory against his Democratic opponent in the general election.

The next time around, Democrats made him a top target, supporting a rice farmer named Loy Sneary. (Be "leery of Sneary," Paul warned. "Be cheery about Sneary," his opponent replied.) Paul won again. Since then, his margin of victory has gotten bigger in every election. This time around, he faces a Democrat named Shane Sklar, who is trying to paint Paul as out of touch with his district.

Paul's wife of nearly 50 years, Carol, quilts and came up with the idea to put together cookbooks that his campaign sends to constituents, many of whom also receive cards on their birthdays. His campaign Web site recently featured a recipe for chicken salad casserole, "a favorite of Brazoria County Republican Women." Paul almost always goes home to Lake Jackson on weekends.

DOJ_NMG_0039411

"He doesn't want Potomac fever -- he thinks it's very contagious," says Carol Paul, who happens to be in Washington on a visit.

"I have a meeting with veterans on Saturday, and I have to check my tomato plants," the congressman says.

Ron Paul may seem an unlikely advocate for the repeal of federal drug laws, but this stance stems from the same impulse that leads him to call for the abolition of the Food and Drug Administration and its "health nannies." He says that decades of government programs can soften Americans' sense of personal responsibility and that the free market can do a better job of keeping people safe and healthy than the government can.

He also wants America to withdraw from the United Nations and NATO. He is against the government's "delusional, feel-good" policies of giving aid to needy countries in places like Africa; instead, private citizens and private groups should give charity if they want to. He has written that Americans "don't need to be forced to pay for foreign welfare at the barrel of a government gun."

Mainstream party platforms are riddled with inconsistencies; Paul tries to run what he believes is a straight course through every vote. Smaller government is better. That's why he winds up aligned with the most liberal of Democrats and the most conservative of Republicans. He takes inspiration from free-market economist Ludwig von Mises, whose photograph is mounted on a wall by his desk.

"He's like a gyroscope," says Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), who is allied with Paul in opposition to the Iraq war. "No matter what happens, boom , he comes back up and goes exactly where he wants to go."

Paul doesn't just question conventional wisdom. He stomps all over it. According to him, Abe Lincoln should never have gone to war; there were better ways of getting rid of slavery. He often attempts to prove his political theories by pointing to how things used to be. For instance, the federal government banning drugs like heroin doesn't work for the same reasons Prohibition didn't. The IRS doesn't need to exist for the same reasons it didn't exist before.

"We had a good run from 1776 to 1913," he says, referring to the years before the modern income tax. "We didn't have it; we did pretty well."

As for Social Security, "we didn't have it until 1935," Paul says. "I mean, do you read stories about how many people were laying in the streets and dying and didn't have medical treatment? . . . Prices were low and the country was productive and families took care of themselves and churches built hospitals and there was no starvation."

("Where to begin with this one?" asks Michael Katz, a historian of poverty at the University of Pennsylvania who has studied charity case records from the early 20th century. "The stories just break your heart, the kind of suffering that people endured. . . . Stories of families that had literally no cash and had to kind of beg to get the most minimal forms of food, who lived in tiny, little rooms that were ill-heated and ill-ventilated, who were sick all the time, who had meager clothing . . .")

Paul views his opposition to the status quo practically. He'd prefer no federal income tax, but barring that, he'd love the government to cut spending enough to bring the income tax rate down to 2 percent. He envisions a transition period for eradicating the Federal Reserve and for Social Security, to ensure that no one is cheated of the money they put in.

He figures party leaders get irritated with him sometimes, but for the most part, they leave him alone. On his opposition to war in Iraq, he told a radio interviewer a few years ago, "I'm generally very much ignored." He says he doesn't trade votes and as a result is rarely pressured.

Still, he says, if his fellow Republicans are "very desperate," he may allow himself to be talked into changing a "no" vote to "present."

Research database editor Derek Willis contributed to this report.

OTHER NEWS:

Social Security Battle Reignites (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

The seemingly dead issue of Social Security reform came to life again in recent weeks, with President Bush saying it should be high on the agenda and Democrats warning that Republicans are resurrecting their plan to privatize the system.

Mr. Bush, in a June 27 speech extolling the line-item veto, vowed to keep fighting to fix the impending financial crises in both Social Security and Medicare.

DOJ_NMG_0039412

"If we can't get it done this year, I'm going to try next year. And if we can't get it done next year, I'm going to try the year after that because it is the right thing to do," Mr. Bush said in a speech in Washington hosted by the Manhattan Institute think tank. "Now is the time to solve the problems of Medicare and Social Security and I want your help."

Democrats immediately went on the attack, saying the president intends to bring back his plan to divert a portion of the Social Security payroll tax into personal accounts for individual taxpayers -- a plan that failed to gain traction last year.

"For President Bush to call for his allies in Congress to dismantle Social Security with the same old reckless and hugely unpopular privatization plan signals just how hopelessly out of touch he really is. Privatization was a terrible, irresponsible idea in 2005; it's every bit as bad today," said Brad Woodhouse, spokesman for Americans United (AU), a group that fought the president's Social Security plan last year and is gearing up for a rematch this election year.

AU plans an effort in 20 states to "hound members of Congress to sign anti-privatization pledges before the election," Mr. Woodhouse said.

Annual reports released in May by trustees of both programs said Social Security's trust fund will run out of money in 2040, and Medicare's trust fund will be depleted in 2018.

AU officials have met with top House and Senate Democratic leadership staff to let them know they will focus their attention on Social Security in the run-up to November's elections.

"They're completely on board and they are ready to hit it hard this summer and throughout the fall," Mr. Woodhouse said.

That's already happening.

During a recent, unrelated event on prescription drug coverage, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi brought up Social Security twice, at one point criticizing the drug plan and adding, "This plan was brought to you by the same people who want to privatize Social Security."

AU and top Democrats also criticized statements made last month by Rep. Jim McCrery, Louisiana Republican and chairman of the House Ways and Means Social Security subcommittee. Mr. McCrery told members of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce that Social Security reform should be high on the agenda next year.

Mrs. Pelosi was among the Democrats who fired off angry statements warning that Republicans plan to "dismantle" Social Security and telling voters it was another reason to elect Democrats in the fall.

"This is simply not a priority of the American people, yet Republicans continue their relentless quest to privatize Social Security," she said. "Americans want to go in a new direction. Democrats are working to strengthen Social Security and address the real concerns of everyday Americans."

Mr. McCrery said his words were distorted for political gain.

"What I said was Congress should make it a high priority," he said.

After failing to gain traction on the personal accounts idea last year, he explained, "we have to go back to square one and we all should work together to get something we can all embrace." That solution, he said, "may not have personal accounts ... but it may."

Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, said House Republicans probably won't try for another personal accounts bill next year, but could opt for a "lockbox" proposal that would seal away the Social Security surplus so it can't be used to pay for general government expenses, as is currently the case.

And Michael Franc, vice president for government relations at the Heritage Foundation, predicted Social Security reform probably will return to the legislative scene only as part of a broader effort to save all major entitlement programs from financial ruin.

"The lesson [lawmakers] took away from Social Security is if you try to deal with this coming fiscal catastrophe one program at a time, you're never going to get there," Mr. Franc said. Instead, he said, Republicans probably will try to create a "synergy to act broadly."

Democrats anticipate that as well. After Senate Republicans recently introduced a broad budget reform bill that included changes to entitlement programs, Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, top Democrat on the Finance Committee, called it a "backdoor" attempt by Republicans to get their Social Security plan approved.

Mr. Bush, however, continues to call for a bipartisan approach.

"Oh, I know this town is full of all kinds of politics, but we ought to set politics aside," the president said at the end of his June 27 speech. "We need to set politics aside when it comes to reforming Social Security and Medicare, and we need to set politics aside so that the president can work with the Congress to bring fiscal discipline to our budgets."

Democrats Rip GOP On Social Security Plan (AP)

By Mike Wilson

AP, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039413

The Republican plan to privatize Social Security could cause huge debt for decades, a Democratic candidate seeking a House seat in Iowa, a state with a high concentration of elderly residents, said Saturday.

"If the Republican plan is allowed to pass, future generations both here and across the country will be saddled with decades of debt and no guaranteed retirement security," Bruce Braley said in the Democrats' weekly radio address.

Braley, 48, a lawyer from Waterloo, faces Republican Mike Whalen in the contest to fill the seat being vacated by Republican Rep. Jim Nussle, who is running for governor. The race is considered one of the more competitive in the country.

Braley said Social Security is under attack, with President Bush and congressional Republicans making privatization a top priority in 2007. He also accused the Bush administration of "plundering the Social Security trust fund while giving billions away to special interests, like big oil."

"They are spending the money seniors rely on while making no effort to balance the budget or protect the limited funds we have for retirement security," he said.

According to the 2000 census, Iowa ranks fourth in the nation in percentage of population 65 and older, at 14.9 percent, behind Florida, Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

Bush had called for a complete overhaul of Social Security, including creation of personal savings accounts and a reduction in future benefits promised to younger workers. But legislation failed to make it to the floor of either the House or Senate.

Braley said the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress have failed to reform Medicare and the nation's energy policy and should not be trusted with Social Security.

"This is the same team that set out to reform Medicare but instead let lobbyists create a confusing, expensive program that was little more than a payoff to the big pharmaceutical and insurance companies," Braley said of the Medicare prescription drug plan.

Braley said it's time for a change in Washington with a Democratic-led Congress.

"Because after six years of misplaced priorities, George Bush and his rubber-stamp Republican Congress cannot be trusted to protect something as vital as Social Security," he said.

Plumbing Iowa For Democratic Caucus Votes? Bring Money (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

To most people, all the national Democrats beating a path to Iowa this month look an awful lot like presidential candidates. But to the state Democratic Party, they look like something else: revenue enhancers.

Showing its entrepreneurial spirit, the state party is offering potential candidates access to its detailed voter database -- for a price. Specifically, they can mine the valuable data for $50,000 (act now, urges the party, and get a discount from the usual fee of $75,000). The details were reported by the political newsletter the Hotline and the Des Moines Register.

For an additional $50,000 next year, candidates can secure access to a database buttressed by information derived from the 2006 primary and general elections. Or campaigns can ignore the current offer and purchase the full database next year for $85,000.

Candidates have until Saturday to decide whether to take advantage of the discount.

Eighteen months before the often-pivotal Iowa caucuses, potential candidates are already swarming the Hawkeye State.

This weekend, Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.) was to honor a state representative at a coffee shop in Muscatine, while former senator John Edwards (N.C.), the 2004 vice presidential nominee, planned to attend a barbecue for party faithful in Indianola, among other events.

Edwards and Bayh have made the biggest splashes in Iowa since the 2004 election. But they are being joined in Iowa this month by the 2004 presidential nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), and former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner.

Also active in Iowa is Tom Vilsack, who will retire from the governorship at the end of his term as he ponders a 2008 bid. He and Bayh are the only two potential candidates to have political staff workers already on the ground, according to the Register.

A poll last month by the Register showed Edwards leading other potential Democratic contenders, with 30 percent of the vote of people likely to participate in the caucuses. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), who has not made a priority of visiting Iowa, came in second, followed by Kerry and Vilsack.

Two years ago, Kerry won the Iowa caucuses.Clearer Path for Sen. Cantwell

Faced with the prospect of a primary fight over her support for the war in Iraq, Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) is working behind the scenes to assure antiwar activists that she is no Joe Lieberman.

DOJ_NMG_0039414

Michael Meehan, Cantwell's chief of staff, was in Seattle last week to huddle with Dal LaMagna and Mark Wilson, vocal opponents of the Iraq war who have floated the idea of running themselves, giving her an intraparty battle of the sort Sen. Lieberman (D) is facing from antiwar candidate Ned Lamont in Connecticut. Cantwell, who voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq, has also held more than a dozen meetings with antiwar constituents.

That legwork appears to be paying off.

LaMagna announced Thursday that he would not run and instead would serve as a co-chairman of Cantwell's campaign. Cantwell sources were optimistic that Wilson would follow LaMagna's lead. But one Iraq war critic, Seattle attorney Hong Tran, is a declared candidate in the Democratic primary.

Cantwell was recently endorsed by the King County Democratic Party, which takes in the city of Seattle and has a reputation as the state's most liberal enclave.

Meehan said, "Cantwell is not in the same boat as Lieberman," noting she supported a recent amendment by Sens. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and Jack Reed (D-R.I.) calling on President Bush to set a timeline for troop withdrawal.

Lieberman, who until recently had been assumed to have an easy reelection, voted against the amendment, which the Senate defeated, and has been vigorous in his support of the war, if not always the Bush administration's handling of it.

Cantwell won her seat in 2000 by 2,229 votes, upsetting Sen. Slade Gorton (R). She is likely to face former Safeco Insurance Co. CEO Mike McGavick (R) in the fall.Running Interference for Osborne

A coach is supposed to cheer his team after a big loss. But in this case, it's the team that's cheering on the coach.

Rep. Tom Osborne (R-Neb.), who gained fame as head coach of the state university's triumphant Cornhuskers football team, was coasting toward the GOP's gubernatorial nomination. But when President Bush snapped up Gov. Mike Johanns for a Cabinet position and Lt. Gov. Dave Heineman became governor and declared he would run to keep his job, the primary turned into a hard fight.

In May, Osborne lost that fight.

Undeterred, Osborne supporters Johnny Rodgers, 1972 winner of the Heisman Trophy and one of the best players in Cornhusker history, and football trainer Doak Ostergard hoped to launch a campaign to write in Osborne's name this November.

But Nebraska law prohibits a candidate defeated in a primary election from being a write-in candidate in a general election. Rodgers and Ostergard sued last week to overturn the law.

"Tom really believes he can do some good things for Nebraska, and we do, too," said Rodgers, who played under Osborne when he was the team's offensive coordinator. "It's a grass-roots effort."

Osborne said in a statement: "As nice as it is of my former players and associates to be concerned about my future, none of their efforts have involved consultation with me."

Sen. Bayh Seeks Edge In Democratic Field (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, July 9, 2006

In a quiet, methodical style reflecting his Midwestern roots, Sen. Evan Bayh is laying the foundation for a presidential campaign and prompting some Democrats to talk about a candidate with a realistic shot.

"The chatter that you hear is that he's a good guy and nice and he has that honest, Midwestern feel to him, kind of like Harry Truman," said veteran Democratic strategist Dane Strother. "That's all appealing."

In his fifth trip to Iowa in the last year, the centrist Indiana Democrat opened a three-day swing Thursday with a fundraiser in downtown Des Moines for legislative candidates. He mingled easily with about 50 party activists for more than an hour and made a point of chatting with everyone in the room.

"He's a Midwesterner and that will help him in Iowa," said state Senate Democratic leader Michael Gronstal. "It's up to him to sell himself, and so far he's been fairly impressive."

As he makes his way around the state, which launches the primary process with caucuses, Bayh sets aside ample time for private meetings with top Democrats, introductory sessions in which he often trades stories about campaigning for his father, former Sen. Birch Bayh.

The elder Bayh served from 1963-81 and spent time in Iowa in his unsuccessful bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1976. The son finds that the campaign war stories are an effective way of building ties, particularly with older Democrats who remember his dad.

While New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton looms as the front-runner for 2008, other Democrats are fighting to distinguish themselves from the pack. Bayh has the distinction of having won statewide election five times in one of the most Republican states in the nation, serving as secretary of state, governor and senator.

DOJ_NMG_0039415

"I don't think you can get elected five times in a state that hasn't gone Democratic since 1964 without learning how to campaign," said Anita Dunn, a Democratic media consultant who has signed on with Bayh.

Bayh has assembled a solid team of advisers operating under the auspices of his political action committee, the All America PAC. He's tapped a former Democratic National Committee fundraiser, a onetime pollster for Howard Dean's presidential campaign and a chief of staff to the late Missouri Gov. Mel Carnahan.

Dunn was a top adviser to former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley during his 2000 bid for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Bayh has $9.8 million in his campaign account, according to March filings. His All America PAC had $967,453 cash on hand.

Bayh, 50, casts himself as a centrist who can win over independents and moderate Republicans, and his political resume is his base appeal.

"I have a proven track record of doing something this president said he would do and never did, and that's being more of a uniter than a divider, reaching out to independents, reasonable Republicans as well as all of our Democrats," Bayh said.

There's plenty of competition for the backing of moderate Democrats. Bayh is seeking to separate himself from rivals like former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner by focusing on his national security resume, which includes membership on the Senate Armed Services and Intelligence committees.

"One thing we need to do is prove to this country that we can be tough and smart," said Bayh. "We need to take Karl Rove and this administration on this issue. We know they are going to attack us on this."

"Warner does have a paucity of foreign policy experience," said Democratic consultant Steve Murphy, who said the jury is still out on the competition. "We have elected a one-term governor in the recent past. It all depends on Warner's performance in the campaign."

Warner spokeswoman Ellen Qualls dismissed the notion of a competition.

"If Governor Warner decides to throw his hat in the ring, I don't think he's going to be fighting for a label. He's going to be asking folks to look at his record," said Qualls.

Bayh's close attention to retail politics has earned him high marks as Iowa Democrats head into a competitive election with an open governor's race, toss-up House races and a legislature that's virtually tied. Bayh planned to attend eight events raising money for local candidates.

"He is making inroads here," said former Iowa Democratic Chairman Gordon Fischer. "He is doing what it takes to be successful in the Iowa caucuses, and that is a lot of retail politics."

Tom Courtney, a state senator from Burlington, Iowa, was getting some help from Bayh.

"When I'm around town, I'm starting to hear Bayh's name mentioned," Courtney said. "Democrats are looking for somebody who is new and fresh."

Though Bayh is making an impression in some early states, he remains little known around the country.

"Honestly, there's only one person on anybody's radar screen and that's Senator Clinton," said Democratic strategist Chris Lehane, who is not working for any candidate. "None of these other folks have begun to register in a meaningful way."

___

On the Net:

Sen. Evan Bayh: http://bayh.senate.gov/

Democrats' Fundraising Letter Is Bankrupt On Ideas (LAT)

By Steve Lopez, Points West

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

It's not often that I reach into my mailbox at home and find a letter from Ted Kennedy, so I was eager to see what was on the mind of the saber-rattling senator from the great state of Massachusetts.

The letter began "Dear Friend," which is a little impersonal, if you ask me. When my friends at the Republican National Committee wrote to ask me to sign President Bush's birthday card — and send along a few bucks — they began their letter, "Dear Steve."

Kennedy, you'll be shocked to know, was also hitting me up for money, in this case for the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee.

"Yes, Senator Kennedy," said the contribution form I was supposed to check off and return, "I share your concern over the arrogance and incompetence of the Bush Administration."

In anticipation of my generosity, Kennedy enclosed a complimentary bumper sticker:

HAD ENOUGH?

DOJ_NMG_0039416

Vote Democrat in '06

As a matter of fact, I do share Kennedy's concern about the Bush administration, and so I was eager to read the four-page letter and other enclosed materials to find out more about the alternative vision being offered up by the Democratic Party.

Page 1, however, contained no such clues. It just fired more bazooka shots at the president and his "extreme right-wing allies," so I figured the fresh ideas from the Dems had to be on Page 2.

Wrong again. Page 2 was nothing but groveling for money for contested races in Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Minnesota. ("It's urgent for each of us to do as much as possible as soon as possible!")

Page 3 suggested the Republicans will burn in hell for sins against humanity ("They've poisoned our air and water"), and Page 4 warned, "They'll never stop unless we stop them. They're shameless!"

That's quite a cavalry call, but it seems to me the Democrats are once again rushing to the front lines with empty muskets.

I'm not asking for the Democratic equivalent of a 10-point Contract With America, having lowered my expectations while on the campaign trail with Al Gore and bearing witness to his nationally televised identity crisis.

I'd settle for a five-point "Contract With Western Blue States." Heck, I'd be happy with a warmed-over crumb of an idea or two.

Instead all we get from the Democrats is the reminder that they stand for … wait, let's see, where was that platform draft?

Oh, yeah. They're anti-Iraq war, or at least they are now that it's turned out so miserably.

And they're passionately … hold on a second. What else was there?

Anti-Republican. That's it.

Write a check today because "They're shameless!"

Craig Smith, a former speechwriter for Gerald Ford and the first President Bush, said the Kennedy letter is a direct response to polls that show declining support for the war in Iraq and for the president.

But he finds it astounding that the Democratic Party still can't move beyond its attack strategy and figure out how to define and sell itself with a specific, alternative agenda.

Smith, who teaches campaign persuasion at Cal State Long Beach, has a simple piece of advice for his political rivals:

Go back to your roots.

"They have not been the loyal opposition," said Smith, who believes Democrats sold their souls under the influence of the Democratic Leadership Council, which pushed the party toward the center after Walter Mondale was blown out by Ronald Reagan.

There's an intellectual distinction to be made in the essence of what it means to be a Republican or a Democrat, Smith said, and Democrats ought to embrace the difference.

"For me, it always goes back to this: If you put a gun to a Republican's head and say, 'Choose between individuality or equality,' they'll pick individual freedom. A good liberal will pick equality over individual freedom."

Democrats, he said, need to get back to the social agenda. They ought to put healthcare reform back at the top of their to-do list, and not cut and run the way Bill Clinton did.

They ought to be screaming about wages that keep millions in abject poverty, and they ought to put up or shut up on education, doing something more than attacking Bush's "no child left behind" program.

It's a sad day in America when a Republican can deliver a more coherent agenda in a single paragraph than Ted Kennedy can in a four-page screed.

I guess what I'm trying to say here is that instead of writing a check to Mr. Kennedy, I tossed his letter — along with the bumper sticker — into the can.

My decision was endorsed by Ken Khachigian, the GOP consultant who worked with Reagan. He recalled Kennedy's speech at the 1980 Democratic National Convention, referring to it as the speech "left-wingers" love to quote:

"The work goes on, the cause endures, the hope still lives and the dream shall never die."

"So," Khachigian said, "regarding this letter, these are my questions for Ted: What work goes on; which cause endures; where does hope live; and, by the way, what IS the dream?"

Reach the columnist at steve.lopez@latimes.com and read previous columns at http://www.latimes.com/lopez .

The Liberal Inquisition (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Sometimes history comes with previews. In the 1930's, the Spanish Civil War served as a precursor to the global conflict that was World War II. And in a smaller fashion, the primary battle playing out on the smiling lawns of upscale Connecticut serves as a preview for the national conflict that will dominate American politics for the next two years.

DOJ_NMG_0039417

This isn't a fight between left and right. It's a fight about how politics should be conducted. On the one hand are the true believers — the fundamentalists of both parties who believe that politics should be about party discipline, passion, purity, orthodoxy and clear choices. On the other side are the quasi-independents — the heterodox politicians who distrust ideological purity, who rebel against movement groupthink, who believe in bipartisanship both as a matter of principle and as a practical necessity.

In 2008, heterodox politicians like John McCain, Rudy Giuliani and even Hillary Clinton are going to have to face zealous assaults from within their own parties. But for the moment that war has come to Joe Lieberman.

What's happening to Lieberman can only be described as a liberal inquisition. Whether you agree with him or not, he is transparently the most kind-hearted and well-intentioned of men. But over the past few years he has been subjected to a vituperation campaign that only experts in moral manias and mob psychology are really fit to explain. I can't reproduce the typical assaults that have been directed at him over the Internet, because they are so laced with profanity and ugliness, but they are ginned up by ideological masseurs who salve their followers' psychic wounds by arousing their rage at objects of mutual hate.

Next has come the effort to expel Lieberman from modern liberalism. In a dark parody of the old struggle between Eugene McCarthy and Hubert Humphrey, the highly educated, highly affluent, highly Caucasian wing of the Democratic Party has turned liberalism from a philosophy into a secular religion, and then sought to purge a battle-scarred warhorse on the grounds of insufficient moral purity.

So these days, for example, one hears that Lieberman is a crypto-conservative, a Bible-Belter. In reality, of course, this is a man who has been endorsed by Planned Parenthood and the Human Rights Campaign. He has a Christian Coalition rating of 0.

But a lifetime's record is deemed not to matter any longer. For in the midst of the inquisition all of American liberalism has been reduced to one issue, the war. Just as some edges of the pro-life movement reduce all of conservatism to abortion, the upscale revivalists on the left reduce everything to Iraq, and all who are deemed impure must be cleansed away.

Lieberman's opponent, Ned Lamont, has neither expertise in foreign affairs nor any specific knowledge of Iraq, and he has struggled to come up with a plan for what we should now do there. But that is not the point, for the opposition to Lieberman is not about future actions or even politics as it is normally understood. It is about impurity, the scarlet letter, and the need to expunge those who have transgressed.

Liberal interest groups that seek practical goals, like the A.F.L.-C.I.O. and the League of Conservation Voters, back Lieberman. But the netroots now seek to purge what's left of the Scoop Jackson Democrats, and to eliminate those who have had contact with the evildoers in the other party, because movements are deemed to prosper to the extent they achieve holiness unmarred.

Ned Lamont is a strange vessel for all this passion. Based on the candidate debate Thursday night, he seems a genial if under-prepared politician who would be an innocuous presence in the Senate if he were elected to it.

The big story out of the campaign last week was the aggressiveness Lieberman has finally brought to his side of the fight. Over the past few years, polarizers have dominated Congress because people who actually represent most Americans have been too timid or intellectually vacuous to stand up. Even today many Democrats who privately despise the netroots lie low, hoping the anger won't be directed at them.

But Lieberman has had no choice but to fight, and he will probably prevail. If he doesn't, and if his opponents go from statewide victory in Connecticut to a national primary assault in 2008, then I hope the Republicans will be smart enough to scoop up what is sure to come — yet another wave of disaffected Democrats looking for a political home.

Corzine Ends Shutdown And Approves New Budget (NYT)

By Richard G. Jones And David W. Chen

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

TRENTON, July 8 — Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed a budget for New Jersey Saturday evening, after a seven-day government shutdown and an acidic standoff with the Legislature that paralyzed state operations, frayed nerves and cost the state millions of dollars.

Mr. Corzine, in a crowded public ceremony, approved the $30.9 billion budget but also cut $51 million in proposed new spending, much of it inserted by legislators before they approved the budget.

"This crisis should never have occurred and it must never be repeated," Mr. Corzine said. While many had cast the weeklong standoff as a political turf battle, he said, "this crisis was about something much more basic: change."

On Saturday morning, Mr. Corzine signed an executive order ending the first-ever shutdown of state government in New Jersey and allowing nearly 100,000 workers — including about 45,000 state employees — to return to their jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0039418

Although government offices like the Motor Vehicle Commission were not expected to reopen until Monday, the 12 Atlantic City casinos, the most high-profile casualties of the shutdown, reopened Saturday morning, and lottery tickets were on sale soon after.

As he signed the budget at 7:00 Saturday evening, Mr. Corzine drew a red pen through 53 items on the Legislature's appropriations list. Mr. Corzine is the first governor to use his line-item-veto authority, a power not enjoyed by most governors or the president of the United States, since Gov. Donald T. DiFrancesco cut $153 million in spending in 2001. Gov. Christie Whitman vetoed legislators' projects in every one of her budgets, but usually in small amounts.

State parks and beaches will begin the process of reopening on Sunday. The state's courts, which had been ordered to handle only emergency matters, were expected to resume operations on Monday morning.

"The lives of the people of New Jersey can now, at long last, begin to return to normal," a bleary-eyed Mr. Corzine said shortly after 6 a.m. Saturday. Mr. Corzine added that he was working on three hours' sleep.

The shutdown was a result of an impasse between Mr. Corzine and the Legislature over the budget for the fiscal year that began on July 1. Although the impact of the shutdown was blunted by the July 4 holiday, the crisis peaked on Wednesday when the casinos were closed for the first time in the 28 years that gambling has been legal in Atlantic City, sending a work force of 50,000 home without pay. The state lost $1.2 million a day in tax revenue from the casinos, and $2 million a day in revenue from the lottery, officials said.

On Thursday, the impasse ended when Mr. Corzine reached an agreement with the speaker of the General Assembly, Joseph J. Roberts Jr., on a proposal to raise the sales tax to 7 percent from 6 percent.

Under a compromise, Mr. Corzine agreed to use half of the revenue from the increase, or about $550 million, to help offset the state's property tax rates, which are among the highest in the nation.

Mr. Corzine also agreed to allow Mr. Roberts to put forth a ballot question for an amendment to the state's Constitution guaranteeing that the money would be used to offset property tax rates. The governor and the Legislature agreed on additional budget cuts to make up for the money going to property tax relief.

The budget was passed after an all-night debate by the Legislature. The votes ran largely along party lines. But one Republican senator, William L. Gormley of Atlantic County, whose constituents were most directly affected by the casino shutdown, joined the Democratic majority in supporting the bill. The budget passed the Senate by a vote of 23 to 17. In the Assembly, where opposition to Mr. Corzine's tax plan had been the stiffest, the vote was 44 to 35. Six Democrats voted against the budget, but Mr. Corzine picked up the support of one Republican, Francis J. Blee, also of Atlantic County.

The Assembly's final vote came around 5:30 Saturday morning, came about an hour after the Senate's vote. The voting ended what political veterans said was the state's most contentious budget season. The dispute centered on Mr. Corzine's plan to use the sales tax increase to help close a $4.5 billion deficit.

Besides the intensity of the opposition to the sales tax increase, the budget debate was particularly noteworthy because all of the major players are Democrats.

Democrats, who control both houses of the Legislature, have said that they fear the potential political consequences of the tax increase.

When A Government Just Can't Go On (NYT)

By Henry Fountain

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

Budget disputes like the one that was resolved in New Jersey last week are not uncommon in state governments. California lawmakers, for instance, are chronically late in passing their budgets.

"In a bad fiscal year you'll have maybe a dozen" late budgets across the country, said Arturo Perez, a fiscal analyst for the National Conference of State Legislatures.

But the seven-day government shutdown that resulted from the New Jersey impasse was unusual. There have only been two other shutdowns, in Minnesota and Tennessee, since 1991.

Why?

Most states have laws or constitutional clauses that allow government to continue operating, even if no money has been appropriated. "States have the ability to keep things going through the use of continuing resolutions," which finance government at the levels of previous budgets, Mr. Perez said. "The average person on the street sees no difference in the operation of the state."

New Jersey, however, has no law or language that addresses what to do if a budget is late. So when state lawmakers couldn't agree last week on Gov. Jon S. Corzine's plan to raise sales taxes, parks, public beaches and many agencies were closed, as were casinos, because gambling inspectors were among the 45,000 state workers who were furloughed without pay.

DOJ_NMG_0039419

But no shutdown can be complete. In many states, the budget is considered in multiple bills, so if some are approved before the deadline, those parts of the government can keep operating. And even if a state has a single budget bill, it can't shut some services.

"There are things the state must continue to do," Mr. Perez said. "It cannot simply close down the prisons and let the prisoners out."

Stem Cells Back In Political Spotlight (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Issue Is Key in Wisconsin's Gubernatorial Election

MADISON, Wis. -- From the back patio of his official residence here, Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle can look across Lake Mendota to the campus of the University of Wisconsin and see a forest of construction cranes at the medical research complex and the new Institute of Discovery. Doyle calls the facilities "the epicenter of the world's work on embryonic stem cells."

Those cells may offer hope for curing crippling diseases, but at the moment, they are also at the center of an impassioned political debate, one that will occupy the Senate this summer and may provoke President Bush's first veto. It is an issue that may swing the outcome of Doyle's reelection race and a U.S. Senate contest in Missouri, where a stem cell research referendum is on the ballot.

University of Wisconsin scientists were the first to isolate embryonic stem cells, and the state, the alumni association and private firms have invested millions in building facilities and attracting scientists to work here. Doyle said in an interview that stem-cell-based bioscience will become, in time, "a $100 billion enterprise" and that his goal is to capture 10 percent of the bounty for his state.

But Doyle faces a difficult campaign, after four contentious years in office, against U.S. Rep. Mark Green, a personable Republican who points to polls suggesting that a majority of Wisconsin residents "think this great state is sliding, that its best days are behind us," even though its economy looks healthier than that of neighboring Michigan.

Green, a protege of Tommy G. Thompson, the popular former Republican governor and U.S. secretary of health and human services, is trying to present himself as a Thompson-style pragmatist who will reenergize the state.

But where Thompson, like Doyle, is an outspoken advocate of embryonic stem cell research, Green has voted to ban work on cells donated by fertility clinics or created from embryos in medical labs. The fourth-term House member supports Bush's policy of limiting work to the relatively few cell lines created before a 2001 executive order setting forth terms for government-funded research.

"I was in the Congress that doubled funding for the National Institutes of Health, the funding that actually helped create the national stem cell bank in Madison," Green said in an interview. "I'm excited about stem cell research. But I don't believe we have to leave our moral compass behind in pursuing the promise of stem cell research."

But Doyle has called Green "a relentless opponent of stem cell research," pointing to eight votes in which he says Green "tried to ban or even criminalize proven methods of stem cell research."

A similar debate is taking place in Missouri, where supporters of stem cell research have placed on the ballot an initiative protecting all forms of the research permitted by federal law. Republican Sen. James M. Talent has come out against it, while state Auditor Claire McCaskill, his Democratic challenger, favors it. The two are in a very close race, and early polls show majority support for the initiative.

In Wisconsin, the Republican-controlled legislature has placed on the ballot two initiatives designed to pull out conservative voters -- one reinforcing the ban on same-sex marriage and extending it to civil unions, the other an advisory referendum to reinstate the death penalty.

Doyle opposes both, and is hoping that the stem cell issue will motivate his supporters. The issues that Green says he will emphasize in his campaign are taxes and jobs, plus some issues of gambling and corruption new to Wisconsin. Doyle was the beneficiary of an independent expenditure campaign in his last race by some Indian tribes with casinos, and he signed contracts giving the tribes expanded gaming licenses in perpetuity -- authority that the state supreme court later overruled.

As for scandal, four legislative leaders of both parties have been convicted of various crimes, and last month a mid-level career employee was found guilty of handing a contract to a Doyle donor.

Last week, the battle heated up as an independent committee supporting Doyle ran a radio ad accusing Green of voting for benefits for Big Oil. An independent group backing Green replied with a TV ad linking Doyle to the convicted procurement officer.

In an interview, Doyle noted that testimony at the officer's trial showed he had never met her or talked with her about the contract.

DOJ_NMG_0039420

Nonetheless, Democrats acknowledge that Doyle will face a tough race. Four years ago, when he was attorney general, he edged out Republican Scott McCallum, who had inherited the job from Thompson. Doyle had only 45 percent of the vote in a three-way race in which Thompson's brother, Ed Thompson, captured 10 percent as a third-party candidate.

"He hasn't been able to get over 45 percent in any poll since then," Green said.

Other Wisconsin Democrats privately attribute Doyle's political problems to his personal style. A moderate who has presented himself as pro-business, he has not developed fervent support among teachers, minorities or liberals, the backbone of the state's Democratic Party.

"He has to worry about the turnout in any of those core groups," said one Democratic insider.

Green, on the other hand, faces some challenges of his own. In the election of 1998, he was the only GOP challenger in the country to defeat a Democratic incumbent, but he has had a low profile on Capitol Hill and is little known outside his own Green Bay-Appleton area in the Fox River Valley of east-central Wisconsin.

Green has an unusual personal history. His physician father and nurse-midwife mother emigrated from South Africa. After college and law school, Green and his bride spent a year teaching in Kenya. "That was the formative year of my life," he said, and set him on the path of politics and public service.

The stakes in the race are big -- and go beyond stem cells. Republicans already control the legislature and have forced Doyle to veto measures on taxes and social policy, which are likely to become law if Green were to win.

But one Democrat who otherwise paints a gloomy picture of Doyle's prospects remarked: "If he can make this a case of the Republicans being know-nothings who are opposed to science and progress, it might really hurt Green with suburban independents. Green doesn't fit the stereotype, but people don't know much about him yet."

Governor's Race Follows 2 Orbits (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Contest Highlights Baltimore Region's Political Pull Over Washington Suburbs

Maryland voters who happen to live in the Baltimore region have already been treated to $850,000 worth of television ads in the governor's race, candidates appearing regularly on the nightly news and a literal parade of politicians through their streets on the Fourth of July.

The view from suburban Washington is quite different.

Most voters in Montgomery, Prince George's and other Maryland counties in the region have yet to see a single one of those ads. TV news coverage of the race has been spotty. And the sole representative of a gubernatorial ticket at the region's Independence Day celebrations was the Democratic lieutenant governor candidate, Prince George's Del. Anthony G. Brown.

Even as the population and legislative clout of the Washington region have grown, Maryland still tilts toward Baltimore when it comes to statewide elections, recent developments suggest.

The result is two versions of Maryland politics for voters living in the state's two dominant media markets. Nowhere is this more evident this election year than in the early stages of the governor's race.

"I feel cheated," said Sandy Rovner, a Democratic activist who lives in a Montgomery retirement community. "We read about the campaign, but we don't really feel part of it."

The candidates are not ignoring the state's Washington suburbs. For months, they have been building grass-roots operations, recruiting volunteers and making personal appearances.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D), for instance, staged a well-attended event in Rockville last week at which he won dozens of endorsements from former supporters of Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D), who dropped out of the race last month to battle depression. And after Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) announced his running mate choice in Annapolis, he and Kristen Cox put in appearances in Montgomery.

But no one denies that Baltimore is getting more attention -- and that there are consequences.

"The reality is, voters in Baltimore have a huge advantage over voters in the Washington market," said Anita Dunn, a Democratic consultant who worked for Duncan. "If you're in the Washington suburbs, you're going to have far less information about the candidates and their records."

Even the Fourth of July schedules for Ehrlich and O'Malley were telling. Both marched in a half-dozen parades, all in the Baltimore region.

Their itineraries reflect the battleground that suburban Baltimore is expected to be in November's general election. In 2002, Ehrlich was able to claim victory in a largely Democratic state by running up large margins in Baltimore County and other jurisdictions in the region where Democratic voters are more willing to vote Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0039421

O'Malley advisers say his key to victory in the fall will be undercutting that advantage while holding on to the Democratic base in counties such as Montgomery and Prince George's -- more than 30 percent of Maryland's registered voters live in those jurisdictions.

Evidence of the stakes in the Baltimore region was hard to miss at a parade Tuesday morning in Dundalk, where Ehrlich and O'Malley appeared only minutes apart. As the candidates rounded a corner in a leafy residential area, neighbors sat side by side in lawn chairs with dueling navy blue and neon green campaign signs.

Had Duncan still been in the race, his day would have been dominated by Baltimore area parades as well, former aides said.

In a Washington Post poll last month, 46 percent of Maryland's registered voters said they get their local TV news from Baltimore stations; 37 percent said they get it from Washington stations. The remainder cited another city or said they did not know.

Advertising rates for network affiliates in Washington are two to three times as expensive as in Baltimore, campaign media consultants said. Moreover, ads on Baltimore stations are seen almost exclusively by Maryland residents. Candidates who buy time on network affiliates in Washington wind up wasting money on viewers who live in the District and Virginia. Thus far, only one Maryland candidate, Democratic Senate hopeful Josh Rales, has taken to the Washington airwaves on network affiliates.

Ehrlich and O'Malley aides say they will advertise on Washington television well in advance of the November election, as gubernatorial candidates have in the past.

"The campaign in the Washington region will probably begin at the time it would normally be expected to," said Ehrlich campaign manager Bo Harmon. Because the Baltimore region is considered such a battleground and ads there are less expensive, he said, "Baltimore is getting started earlier."

In an interview Friday on Washington Post Radio, Ehrlich -- who has spent more than $300,000 on Baltimore TV in recent weeks portraying himself as someone who governs from the center -- acknowledged the importance of the Washington region.

Branding himself "a realist," Ehrlich said he is unlikely to outpoll O'Malley in Montgomery and Prince George's, but he said he would appeal to voters there based on his record.

In an interview, O'Malley, who has spent more than $200,000 on Baltimore TV portraying himself as a consumer advocate, said he is offering the same message of "working family" empowerment across the state. Most of his campaign appearances have been outside his home region, he said.

Some allies were more blunt when assessing the importance of the mayor's performance in the Baltimore suburbs.

"There's enough swing vote in Baltimore County and the other Baltimore suburbs to warrant a concerted, nonstop presence in those areas," said Derek Walker, executive director of the Maryland Democratic Party. He suggested that Democrats will likely rely more heavily on grass-roots campaigns to spread their message in the Washington suburbs.

In the meantime, even catching a glimpse of the advertising campaign of the Green Party's nominee requires a trip to Baltimore. There, Ed Boyd's sole billboard can be found in Charles Village, proclaiming: "O'Malley Arrests Us. Ehrlich Abandons Us. Boyd is one of us."

Staff writer Mary Otto contributed to this report.

An Uphill Opportunity For The GOP (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS -- Rep. Mark Kennedy, a 49-year-old former small-town accountant and businessman, is carrying the hopes of the national Republican Party in one of the few Senate races in the country in which the GOP has a chance of gaining a seat.

The voluntary retirement of Sen. Mark Dayton this year has opened the way for a newcomer, and Dayton's Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party has given its endorsement to Amy Klobuchar, the two-term elected attorney of Hennepin County (Minneapolis).

In one sense, Kennedy is on familiar ground. After beating the male Democratic incumbent in his first race in 2000, he faced female candidates in both his reelection bids. Despite their spending about $2 million each against him, he won with votes to spare while spending less.

Minnesota has become a two-party battleground, with Republicans holding the governorship and the other Senate seat. President Bush lost the state by less than 3 percent of the vote in each of his races.

But now, as Gov. Tim Pawlenty put it in an interview, "the president continues to struggle here," with approval scores below 40 percent. When I asked Kennedy in an interview if he agreed with the opening words of his profile in the current edition of Congressional Quarterly, the authoritative source on Congress, describing him as "a dedicated conservative and loyal Bush supporter," he seemed surprised.

DOJ_NMG_0039422

"I don't know if I'd use any of those words to describe me," he said. And he offered an alternative. "I'd say I'm a common-sense Minnesota conservative informed by the values we care about from a Midwest perspective."

Kennedy said, "The attack on me is that I'm a lap dog of the president. It's saying that I don't think independently, that I don't have a set of core values that I was raised with and have been living by. To have an organization as reputable as CQ fall into that trap, I just don't know."

But in an interview here, Klobuchar said, "He supports the president's position 97 percent of the time." CQ did score Kennedy as voting in agreement with Bush's wishes on 98 percent of the roll calls in 2003 and 97 percent in 2004, before he dropped to 87 percent last year, as he began to prepare for the Senate race.

Kennedy points out that, even as a freshman in 2001, he opposed the president by voting against oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and against creation of the No Child Left Behind education program.

Klobuchar dismisses those as easy votes for any Minnesota politician responsive to local opinion. But Kennedy says he is genuinely bipartisan in approach and cites "at least 15" issues on which he has teamed with Democrats to work for passage, such as environmental protection and a program to make it easier for scientists to become teachers.

Kennedy's struggle to prove his independence is typical for Republicans running in competitive races from New Jersey to Washington state, as Bush's ratings have sunk. And this race is clearly a challenge for the GOP. Klobuchar's political base in this population center of the state has given her more media exposure in her six years than Kennedy has gained from his work on the Agriculture and Transportation and Infrastructure committees from his suburban-rural House seat in a similar period.

Klobuchar's record of criminal prosecutions and consumer advocacy was strong enough that she ran unopposed for reelection. The Klobuchar name is further enhanced by her father, a longtime favorite local sports columnist now retired but on the speaking circuit for his daughter.

Klobuchar faces nominal opposition in a September primary from an underfinanced advocate of an immediate pullout from Iraq. She says she opposed the war from the beginning but supports the view taken by most Senate Democrats that a pullout should begin this year but that no deadline should be set for completing it.

Kennedy says that he believes Iraq is "important to winning the war on terror, and my opponent wants to pull the troops out without regard to the commanders in the field and without achieving the milestones" marking the road to victory.

They have similarly sharp differences on taxes and health care. But the biggest question, as both of them see it, is who can capture the "change vote." Kennedy says, "Clearly, there is a frustration with what is going on in Washington. The spending and the partisanship is a big part of it. But I have a track record to talk about. I work in this institution the way Minnesotans would want."

Klobuchar says that won't wash. Her slogan is simple. "He's followed the Lone Star. I'll follow the North Star."

davidbroder@washpost.com

Interstate Ribbons Of Progress (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

On Tuesday, July 11, the United States will become more geographically stable than it has ever been. It will have been 17,126 days since the admission of Hawaii to statehood on Aug. 21, 1959. The longest previous span between expansions of the nation was the 17,125 days between the admission of Arizona on Feb. 14, 1912, and the admission of Alaska on Jan. 3, 1959. Since then the nation has become, in a sense, smaller through the annihilation of distance and, to some extent, of difference.

An important part of the groundwork -- literally, it covered a lot of ground -- for today's America was begun 50 years ago this summer. A conservative Republican president who grew up in a Kansas town where hitching posts for horses lined unpaved streets launched what was, and remains, the largest public works project in the nation's history -- the Interstate Highway System. Its ribbons of concrete represent a single thread of continuity through the nation's history.

With that program, Dwight Eisenhower, the 13th Republican president, helped heal the wounds of the war won by another general, U.S. Grant, the second Republican president. That war was related to "internal improvements," as infrastructure projects such as roads and canals used to be called.

In 1816 South Carolina's Rep. John Calhoun -- then a nationalist, later a disunionist -- introduced legislation for a federal program of internal improvements. The legislation passed, but President James Madison vetoed it because he thought Congress was not constitutionally empowered to do such things. So, prosperous Northern states built their own improvements while the South sank into inferiority and increasing dependence on slavery.

DOJ_NMG_0039423

The military handicap of an inferior transportation system was one reason the South lost the Civil War. Another reason was the industrialization of the North. Its transportation system (the Erie Canal, railroads) cut the price of shipping a ton of wheat from Buffalo to New York City from $100 to $10, and the difference between the wholesale price of pork in Cincinnati and New York plunged from $9.53 to $1.18. Suddenly, workers flooding into the North's cities had more disposable income to spend on the North's manufactured goods.

The first Republican president began his public life as a 23-year-old candidate for the Illinois General Assembly by telling voters of Sangamon County his "sentiments with regard to local affairs," the first sentiment being "the public utility of internal improvements." The vigor of the Union also was a preoccupation of Teddy Roosevelt, the eighth Republican president, whose great internal improvement, the Panama Canal, was external, although he thought of Panama as America's private property. And Eisenhower's message to Congress advocating the interstate system began, "Our unity as a nation is sustained by free communication of thought and by easy transportation of people and goods."

No legislator more ardently supported the IHS than the Tennessee Democrat who was chairman of the Senate Public Works subcommittee on roads. His state had benefited handsomely from the greatest federal public works project of the prewar period, the Tennessee Valley Authority, which, by bringing electrification to a large swath of the South, accelerated the closing of the regional development gap that had stubbornly persisted since the Civil War. This senator who did so much to put postwar America on roads suitable to bigger, more powerful cars was Al Gore Sr. His son may consider this marriage of concrete and the internal combustion engine sinful, but Tennessee's per capita income, which was just 70 percent of the national average in 1956, today is 90 percent.

The IHS -- combined, as Fortune magazine's Justin Fox writes, with another bright idea from 1956, the shipping container -- made America's distribution system more flexible. This benefited manufacturers, foreign and domestic, especially in America's hitherto lagging region, the South. This is one reason there is a thriving Southern-based automobile industry (BMW in South Carolina; Mercedes in Alabama; Honda in both Carolinas, Georgia and Alabama; Toyota in Tennessee, Alabama and Kentucky). Furthermore, the South is home to some of today's "big box" retailers -- Wal-Mart (Bentonville, Ark.), Home Depot (Atlanta) -- as well as FedEx (Memphis).

American scolds blame the IHS and the automobile for everything from obesity (fried food at every interchange) to desperate housewives (isolated in distant suburbs without sidewalks). Nikita Khrushchev, during his 1959 visit to America, told Eisenhower, "Your people do not seem to like the place where they live and always want to be on the move going someplace else." Eisenhower knew that wherever people are going on their nation's roads, they are going where they live.

georgewill@washpost.com

When A Stranger Calls (NYT)

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

As consumer debt in America balloons to previously unimaginable levels, currently $2.2 trillion and growing, the dark underside of abusive debt collection is growing along with it. Legislators and regulators should take further steps to curb the lies, harassment and intimidation coming from out-of-control collectors. At the same time, they should also look at irresponsible lending: giving additional credit cards and high-interest loans to those already deep in the red.

Sewell Chan reported in The Times last week that the number of complaints lodged against third-party debt collectors has soared, rising faster than those for any other industry. From 1999 to 2005 the number of complaints received by the Federal Trade Commission increased by a factor of six. Complaints to New York City officials have more than doubled just since 2003. With last year's draconian new bankruptcy law pushing the last resort for the financially desperate farther out of reach, those numbers are only going to rise without stepped-up enforcement.

Third-party collectors are not the original lenders — the banks or credit-card companies that set the original terms with consumers. The collection agencies buy up debt for a fraction of its value and then try their hands at shaking loose payments. Most are law-abiding, and perform a legitimate service. Debts should be settled and someone has to track down deadbeats and absconders who make borrowing more expensive for the rest of us who pay our bills on time. But a growing number of financial bounty hunters can be extremely aggressive, not to mention indiscriminate.

According to the commission, some collectors call at all hours of the night, use obscene language, falsely threaten imprisonment or the seizure of property, and even humiliate their victims by contacting family members and employers. They sometimes seek a larger amount than the borrower actually owes — if indeed it was owed in the first place. Debt collectors have gone after people who have already paid their debts and even those who never had them to begin with. Sometimes that is a result of mistaken identity, but it is also increasingly due to identity theft.

DOJ_NMG_0039424

Consumers should know that they are not powerless and that they do have rights. Collectors may not call late at night without permission. In most states family members or workplaces may be called only once, and then only to locate the borrower. It is up to the collection agency to furnish written proof that the debt is valid and it cannot bother a borrower in the meantime.

If harassment continues, consumers can call 1-877-FTC-HELP (1-877-382-4357) toll-free. Last year the commission won a judgment of $10.2 million against a company for use of illegal collection tactics. Once in a while the bullies are bullied back.

Unsightly Evidence Of U.S. Trade Gap Piles Up (LAT)

By Deborah Schoch, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Wilmington Has Thousands of Cargo Containers, Some Stacked Seven High

To understand the trade deficit, residents of Sandison Street do not need the help of world-class economists.

They can just glance across the street at the mountain of faded brown cargo containers blocking the Wilmington sky.

The equation is simple. As the deficit grows, the mountain gets higher.

"It's getting taller; it's spreading out," said resident Maria Lopez, eyeing the pile that stretches for two blocks.

Tens of thousands of containers sit empty today in Wilmington — stark testimony that America buys more from other countries than it sends overseas to sell.

Millions of the 40-foot-long steel containers arrive in Los Angeles each year, jampacked with toys, MP3 players and designer handbags made in Asia.

Although some are shipped back empty, others land in storage lots, like old cardboard cartons stuffed away in a closet.

Eventually, many of the containers are reused. But some are forgotten, and they pile up — in Wilmington and nearby cities, in communities lining the Long Beach Freeway, near rail yards in the Inland Empire.

They have transformed Wilmington into Container Land, stacked like mammoth Lego blocks five, six, even seven high, with the names of shipping firms such as Maersk, COSCO and China Shipping painted on their sides.

While experts analyze the economic problems that the containers symbolize, Wilmington residents worry about the problems with the containers themselves — from the overgrown weeds to the earthquake dangers to the ugly views they create and the better ones they block.

Rats inspire the most anger. Residents say the rodents live in the storage yard, venturing out at night to forage. Several people described how rats creep through their wrought-iron fences, past the roses on their front lawns, and sneak right into their neat stucco homes.

That's where homeowners — many of whom have small children and work hard to improve their properties — draw the line.

Where Sandison Street meets Sanford Avenue, the fence encircling the pile is topped with coiled razor wire, but neighborhood children crawl underneath and scramble up containers stacked five high. Seen from the south, the mound appears to be tilted ever so slightly to the right, a steel-block variation on the Tower of Pisa. That raises a question: In an earthquake, just how far would a steel box tumble?

As if the pile weren't eyesore enough, scraggly weeds at its edges grow so tall that Lopez has paid from her own pocket to have them trimmed. Midnight dumpers have turned the sidewalk in front of the fence into an impromptu junkyard, leaving it littered last week with a turquoise mattress and box springs and two matching upholstered chairs.

Lopez's next-door neighbor, Diane Richardson, has lost all patience after years of watching the mountain grow. It's always been something, she said.

She grew up on the street in the pre-container 1960s, when what is now the storage yard was a sandy, vacant lot that she and her friends called "the dumps" because trucks dumped garbage there. Now she watches trucks dump containers instead.

"I would love to have this whole view gone," Richardson said while gazing at the mountain from her frontyard, where she was scrubbing an inflatable pool for her great-grandchildren playing nearby. "It's terrible. The whole thing."

Local officials say they are trying to shrink the piles in Wilmington, a lower-income, largely Latino neighborhood of Los Angeles that has borne the brunt of the city-owned port's rapid expansion.

Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents the area, calls the growth of such yards in residential neighborhoods one of the worst abuses imposed by the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach, the nation's first- and second-largest seaports, respectively.

"Kids are walking to school past containers stacked 40 feet high," Hahn said recently in a statement. "Containers are literally stacked outside homes and schools. You won't find this kind of blight in any other areas of the city."

Hahn spearheaded a new city ordinance that prohibits new container yards in residential areas and limits their height. The city has assigned inspectors to enforce it, but the job is not easy.

DOJ_NMG_0039425

Some lots are clustered together like patchwork quilts, and inspectors are still studying who operates them and whether they are in compliance.

The mountain north of Sandison Street is in an area that includes at least five lots. City officials on Friday said inspectors are investigating the site but they still have not confirmed who is responsible for it. The city attorney's office has determined that the ordinance cannot force current yards to close, a spokesman said.

So, residents on Sandison, Dolores Street and others who hoped to see the piles disappear instead sigh as new containers arrive, delivered by trucks that clog narrow roadways and belch black diesel fumes.

No one knows how many empty containers are scattered in Wilmington and other communities around the port.

The numbers fluctuate, depending on the season, shipping costs and the cost of steel. A preliminary 2004 survey by the Alameda Corridor Transportation Authority, which operates the rail corridor serving the ports, put the number at roughly 100,000 empty containers in 2002, dropping sharply to 28,000 two years later.

The current total is somewhere in between, said John T. Doherty, the corridor agency's chief executive officer. Wilmington residents say they did their own count last year and found 200,000.

The state Air Resources Board staff recently counted 23 storage lots in Wilmington alone.

"We were stunned, not only by the number of containers, but by the number of container yards," said Jerry Martin, spokesman for the state agency, which is studying the yards as part of a review of Wilmington's environmental problems.

Container colors vary.

Viewed from a distance, the reddish-brown Sandison Street mountain resembles a steep, sandstone butte. Red and blue mounds to the east near Long Beach look like stacked children's blocks.

Trade tallies for the two ports illustrate why the mounds form. Of the more than 14 million containers that traveled back and forth through the ports last year, more than 7 million arrived full, moving goods into the United States, while only 2.4 million left full, taking U.S. exports abroad.

Though some of the rest returned empty to Asia, others lingered in area storage yards.

Empties not only keep yards full, they also take up room on congested area freeways.

"The single greatest commodity being moved in the Los Angeles-Long Beach area right now is fresh air inside containers," said Phil Behenna, senior vice president of International Asset Systems, an Oakland-based transportation technology company.

Behenna is helping the ports assemble a "virtual container yard" program that would match empty containers with shipments in need of containers. That could make a dent in some of the steel mountains, he said.

But such solutions take time, and Wilmington residents are losing patience.

On Sandison, an occasional metallic "clang" punctuated the warm humid air on a recent afternoon as machinery hidden behind the mound of old steel moved containers around.

Some neighbors report that the same containers sit there month after month, but yard operators say they constantly move out containers and bring in new ones.

"It's an urban legend that containers come into storage yards and just rot away," said Patrick L. Wilson, president of the Wilmington Chamber of Commerce and of Fast Lane Transportation Inc., which operates a Wilmington yard.

He and other yard operators work hard to address neighbors' concerns, Wilson said. Although his yard is not in a residential neighborhood, he said, he tries to keep it clean and to haul away promptly any furniture or trash dumped nearby.

At the prodding of one local resident, he said, he even bought 40 extra containers, painted them a uniform brown and stacked them at the edge of his lot to give "a somewhat neat and ordinary appearance."

Wilson said that it was unfair to blame the storage yards for neighborhood rat problems, but that if some yards have indeed become rat breeding grounds, operators surely will try to control them. "These are responsible business owners," he said.

In her statement, Hahn said she has asked the Port of Los Angeles to identify and buy land in the largely industrial eastern corner of Wilmington so that container yards could be relocated farther from more populated areas.

But Wilson said that if yard operators were forced to move, the cost would be considerable. "To expect these legitimate business owners to go away without adequate financial compensation is unreasonable," he said.

The port's focus at the moment is on how to obtain land rather than how to compensate operators, a port spokeswoman said.

Soon after Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa took office last July, he visited Wilmington and vowed that the neighborhood — long used as a dumping ground by the city's port — would be treated with more respect under his administration. For now, residents try to live with the containers — or, in rare cases, within them.

Dan Ziemer, 49, a ponytailed diesel mechanic from San Pedro, makes his home part time in an air-conditioned container at the Wilmington repair yard where he works. It is just large enough for a double bed, a computer and a small kitchen area.

DOJ_NMG_0039426

And Lopez jokes that she and her neighbors would be hard pressed to find parking spaces on Sandison Street if its north side were filled with homes instead of a container mountain and the turquoise mattress set.

"That's the only good thing I can think of," she said.

U.S. Offers To Meet N.Korea On Sidelines (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang

AP, July 9, 2006

A U.S. envoy expressed support for China's proposal to hold informal six-nation talks on the North Korean nuclear threat and offered to meet bilaterally with the North on the sidelines of those discussions.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill was in Seoul as part of a regional tour to coordinate the international response to the North's test-firing Wednesday of seven missiles. The tests caused international outrage but also division over whether North Korea should be punished.

Over Chinese and Russian objections, Japan on Friday proposed a U.N. Security Council resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea and order the communist regime to stop developing ballistic missiles.

Backed by the United States, Britain and France, the new resolution came as President Bush expressed frustration with the slow pace of diplomacy and urged world leaders to send Pyongyang a strong message condemning the missile tests, staged in defiance of international warnings.

"What matters most of all is for Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice," Bush said Friday during a trip to Chicago. "That's the purpose, really."

He has ruled out direct talks between just the United States and North Korea and said he hoped the six-party talks would resume.

Beijing has floated the idea of an informal meeting between members of the six-party nuclear talks — the two Koreas, China, Russia, Japan and the United States. Pyongyang has for months refused to attend formal negotiations, protesting U.S. financial restrictions imposed over the North's alleged counterfeiting, money-laundering and other illegal practices.

"As many of you know, the Chinese have talked about putting together a six-party informal, and we both support that and we think that all countries are prepared to come to that informal meeting," Hill told reporters after meeting with Chun Young-woo, South Korea's top nuclear negotiator.

Asked about the possibility of a bilateral meeting with the North, he said: "Within the informal six-party talks, yes, I can."

"I just can't do it when they are boycotting the six-party talks."

But Hill rejected North Korea's demand that the U.S. drop restrictions imposed on a Macau bank for allegedly aiding the North's illicit activities. The U.S. has argued that the nuclear talks and financial restrictions are separate issues and should not be linked.

"This is not a time for so-called gestures of that kind," Hill said in response to the North Korean demand. "We have a country that has fired off missiles in a truly reckless way that affects ... regional security."

The North has defended its right to test missiles and said the launches could continue.

Japan urged the United Nations to vote soon on the Security Council resolution and warned it would not compromise on its stern wording. The measure would call for other countries to "take those steps necessary" to keep the North from acquiring items that could be used for its missile program.

"Japan will not give in. It definitely must be a resolution containing sanctions," Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso was quoted by Kyodo News agency as saying during a speech in Osaka on Saturday. Japan "will not back off from the resolution. We will hold on until the end."

Japanese Senior Vice Minister Yasuhisa Shiozaki said Security Council members were privately "having positive discussions" about the resolution and were chipping away at Russian and Chinese doubts. Supporters decided at a meeting Friday not to call for a vote over the weekend after some council members asked for more time to consider the resolution.

"It is strongly expected that the Security Council will put it to vote as soon as possible," Shiozaki told a news conference in Tokyo. "The timing is very important."

China, a traditional ally of North Korea, has been reluctant to impose sanctions on Pyongyang. But Japan's Yomiuri newspaper reported Saturday that Beijing appeared to have clamped down on the flow of industrial materials to North Korea in a sign of disenchantment with the missile tests.

In a report from the Chinese city of Dandong on the North Korean border, the newspaper said the normally steady cross-border stream of supply trucks from China had all but stopped as of Friday. The paper quoted a trader on the Chinese side as saying traffic had plummeted after the missile tests.

DOJ_NMG_0039427

South Korea's Yonhap news agency, however, cited business people in China as saying that any slowdown in trade in the past couple of days was likely due to seasonal factors, not political ones.

South Korea, which has worked for warmer ties with Pyongyang since a 2000 North-South summit, has withheld aid shipments and rejected a Northern request for military talks. At the same time it is planning Cabinet-level meetings with the communist country next week.

Unification Minister Lee Jong-seok said Seoul would hold off sending 500,000 tons of rice and 100,000 tons of fertilizer to North Korea.

_____

Associated Press reporter Kana Inagaki in Tokyo contributed to this story.

US Hints Of NKorea Talks But Presses On With Sanctions (AFP)

By Park Chan-kyong

AFP, July 9, 2006

The United States and Japan vowed to ram through UN sanctions against North Korea, but Washington also offered an olive branch by agreeing to meet one-on-one with Pyuongyang if it joined international talks.

Yet Washington also rejected an offer from the hermetic Stalinist state to rejoin the six-nation table if the United States lifted sanctions against a Makau bank with North Korean accounts suspected of counterfeiting and money laundering.

"To be very frank, I think this is not a time for so-called gestures of this kind," said US special envoy Christopher Hill while on a whirlwind tour of Asian players in the crisis.

The diplomatic fallout from North Korea's decision to launch seven missiles Wednesday came as an ultramodern US destroyer capable of intercepting new missiles that the North has already threatened to test docked in a Japanese port.

The United States and Japan are engaged in a standoff with Russia and China over the need to adopt a binding UN Security Council resolution condemning the launches and introducing trade sanction that also carry the implicit threat of force.

Hill called on China to close ranks on the draft after receiving only a lukewarm response while on visiting Beijing on Friday.

"We had very good discussions with the Chinese and made very clear our very deep concern about what is going on in the DPKR (North Korea) and I called upon the Chinese to understand that we will be much more effective if we speak in one voice."

Japan's foreign minister was even more blunt. He said Tokyo would never compromise on a non-binding resolution and called the positions of Russia and China "unreasonable."

"We may amend the draft but we are firm on the binding resolution that includes sanctions," said Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso.

Russia and China argue that sanction might only entrench the North's position and lead to more tests without the possibility of dialogue.

"If this resolution is put to a vote, there will be no unity in the Security Council," said China's UN ambassador Wang Guangya. He said "all possibilities are open" when asked specifically about Beijing possible use of its veto power.

And a top official in South Korea -- which is also a member of the six-nation talks that the North has now shunned -- also said it was "time to focus on diplomacy rather than coercive measures."

The North meanwhile has threatened to strike back with a more "physical" response if sanctions are adopted. Its UN representative said a binding referendum would amount to "an act of war."

"If anyone tries to put us under pressure, we will have no choice but to take stronger physical measures," said the North's ambassador for diplomatic normalization with Japan, Song Il Ho.

Washington has treated the North's first -- although unsuccessful -- test of a long-range Taepodong-2 missile which theoretically could reaching Alaskan shores as the last straw that broke international patience with Kim Kim Jong-Il's regime.

"Now that he's made that defiance, it's best for all of us to go to the UN Security Council and say, loud and clear, 'Here's some red lines,'" US President George W. Bush said in Chicago on Friday.

"And that's what we're in the process of doing."

Bush himself has not publicly spoken of sanctions -- although they are written into the Japanese UN draft -- and his envoy Hill said in more conciliatory tones that Washington was ready to meet the North's envoy's eye-to-eye if he joined the six-nation table.

"I just can't do it when they are boycotting the six-party talks," Hill said.

Meanwhile the Unites States shored up its defenses in the Asian seas with a planned upgrade of its Navy fleet docked in Japan.

The USS Mustin guided-missile destroyer arrived in Yokosuka, south of Tokyo, as Japanese officials rush to build a new ballistic missile defense system with the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0039428

A US Navy spokesman said the arrival of the high-tech destroyer had been planned for months and was not a direct reaction to North Korea's missile tests.

The USS Mustin -- equipped with the advanced Aegis technology, which enables the tracking and possible shooting down of ballistic missiles such as the Taepodong-2 -- arrived in Yokosuka Saturday for a short "routine port visit" as part of the vessel's long-term deployment to Japan, the spokesman said.

The destroyer would replace an older vessel, he added.

NKorea Braced For 'All-out War' Ahead Of UN Sanctions Vote (AFP)

By Jun Kwanwoo

AFP, July 9, 2006

North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il vowed no compromise and said he was braced for "all-out war" as the United States and Japan pushed for the United Nations to impose new sanctions on Pyongyang for its missile tests.

With China and Russia holding out against further isolating the impoverished communist state, a US envoy visiting the region also stressed a diplomatic solution on disarmament and urged the North to come back to stalled six-nation talks on its nuclear program.

But Kim Jong-Il, in his first reported remarks since his regime lobbed seven missiles into the sea Wednesday, pledged not to give up his weapons programs.

"The General has declared that not even a tiny concession will be made to the imperialist US invaders, our arch enemy," said a broadcast on North Korean state television, as monitored by South Korea's Yonhap news agency.

Kim, who never speaks in public with his own voice, said that if the United States took "revenge," it would mean "all-out war."

"It is not empty talk for the DPRK (the Democratic People's Republic of Korea) to respond with revenge to any revenge by the enemy and with all-out war to an all-out war," the television said.

Kim mocked US assertions that his regime was on the verge of collapse.

"As the imperialists fussed loudly over our republic's collapse and attempted to plot against us, the General dealt them a blow by firmly declaring, 'Do not expect any change from me'," the television said.

North Korea, which declared last year it had nuclear weapons, walked out in November of six-way talks on ending its nuclear program, protesting a set of US financial sanctions.

Last week's missile launch included the new Taepodong-2, which was believed to be capable of reaching Alaska or Hawaii but quickly crashed into the Sea of Japan (East Sea).

China, the North's main ally and host of the six-party talks, was embarrassed by the defiant missile tests. It was to send an envoy Monday to Pyongyang.

Beijing hopes to persuade the North to take part in an informal round of six-nation talks this month in the northeastern Chinese city of Shenyang.

Christopher Hill, the US delegate to the six-party nuclear negotiations, has said he is ready to meet one-on-one with the North if it takes part in the unofficial talks.

"What it needs to do is get back to the talks and implement what we already agreed to do and to get out of this dirty nuclear business it is in, to get on (with) its task with modernizing the country," Hill told reporters in Seoul on an emergency regional tour.

Hill was due later in the day in Japan, one of the closest US allies, which pledged to push ahead with the UN resolution supported by the United States that includes new sanctions.

"If we give in to just one veto power, then we will end up sending a wrong message to the international community," Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said.

"History tells us that any messages without binding effect is meaningless," Aso said, referring to a non-binding UN statement in 1998 after Pyongyang launched its last long-range missile, which flew over Japan.

The Security Council is set to decide Monday when to schedule a vote on the draft resolution. Japan has called for an early vote and has said it expects wide support.

But China and Russia, which regularly oppose punitive actions over international crises, oppose the draft. Both have veto power, a privilege Japan has long sought in vain although it is a non-permament member of the Council.

South Korea, which is not a member of the Security Council and has been reconciling with its neighbor, has ministerial-level talks scheduled with the North from Tuesday.

Hill said Unification Minister Lee Jong-Seok, who will lead South Korea's delegation in the talks with the North, pledged to him that he would raise the missile launch in his meetings.

DOJ_NMG_0039429

Japan Won't Compromise On Korea Resolution (AP)

AP, July 9, 2006

Japan won't compromise on the stern wording of a U.N. resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea and order the communist regime to stop developing ballistic missiles, Foreign Minister Taro Aso said Sunday.

Japan is pushing for a vote on the resolution Monday despite opposition from China, Aso said.

"To compromise because of one country which has veto power, even though most other countries support us, sends the wrong message," Aso told national broadcaster NHK. "We can't alter our stance."

Japan proposed the resolution over Chinese and Russian objections but with backing by the United States, Britain and France, the other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council.

Aso said China would be isolated if it cast the lone veto against the resolution.

Taro also said there is a possibility that Russia will abstain from voting on the resolution, leaving China to decide whether to be the sole country voicing opposition.

"China will be backed into a corner," Aso said on the morning talk show Sunday Project. "It's only common sense not to do that."

Pyongyang triggered an international furor Wednesday when it test-fired seven missiles, which plunged into the Sea of Japan without causing damage or injury.

Aso and Japanese Defense Agency Chief Fukushiro Nukaga both said Sunday that another North Korean launch is expected, but does not appear imminent.

U.S. May Meet North Korea Directly If It Returns To Talks (BLOOM)

By Kevin Cho

Bloomberg, July 8, 2006

(Bloomberg) -- The U.S. is willing to meet with North Korea and engage in direct talks with the communist nation if it returns to the nuclear disarmament negotiations that include South Korea, China, Russia and Japan.

``If there are six-party talks, we will meet all the delegations, and we've always met" the North Korean delegation, Christopher Hill, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for East Asia and Pacific, told reporters in Seoul today after he met with South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon.

``Within informal six-party talks, yes," Hill said. ``I just can't do it when they are boycotting the six-party talks, because that means they don't want six-party talks. They just want bilateral talks."

The U.S. and China yesterday urged North Korea to resume the six-nation talks in an attempt to steer the reclusive country away from conducting further missile tests.

Hill earlier today said the U.S. wouldn't be drawn into direct talks with North Korea as a result of its missile tests, and urged that country to resume the six-nation talks.

``We are not going to turn this into a bilateral issue," Hill said after a meeting with Chun Young Woo, South Korea's chief delegate to those talks. ``We want to support the early resumption of the six-party process. And if the DPRK wants to get back into that process, they know where to find me."

DPRK stands for Democratic People's Republic of Korea, North Korea's formal name.

China

Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator in the six-nation talks, yesterday met with China's Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing and the chief Chinese nuclear negotiator Wu Dawei.

North Korea said it may return to the talks if the U.S. lifts financial sanctions against it, the Hankyoreh newspaper reported earlier today, citing an interview with Han Song Ryol, North Korea's deputy United Nations envoy.

Still, the sanctions may not be lifted. ``To be very frank, I think this is not a time for so-called gestures of that kind," Hill said. ``We have a country that has fired off missiles in a truly reckless way that affects regional tranquility, and indeed, affects regional security."

Hill made South Korea his second stop after China in his four-nation journey. He will also visit Japan and Russia. The U.S. is trying to persuade China to join in condemnation of North Korea's missile tests.

China yesterday opposed a Japanese resolution introduced at the United Nations that would impose sanctions on North Korea over its missile launches, saying such a measure could deepen tensions in Asia.

North Korea on July 6 vowed to continue missile tests after firing seven rockets, including a long-range Taepodong 2 missile on July 5.

DOJ_NMG_0039430

The last round of six-nation talks ended in November 2005 without agreement after the parties had signed a September 2005 declaration calling for a nuclear-free Korean peninsula.

North Korea Knows How To Get Attention (AP)

By Calvin Woodward

AP, July 9, 2006

North Korea is well practiced in getting some of what it wants through provocation. Bullying through a bullhorn has worked time and again for a small nation with an outsized military force and an even bigger capacity for bluster and threat.

It's called coercive diplomacy. North Korean-style, it has involved antagonizing everyone on and over the horizon, foes and allies alike, and then pulling back. Sometimes just in the nick of time.

While few would call the North Korean leadership predictable, certain things are expected of it. That's the case now, in the storm of condemnation and diplomatic maneuvering set off by North Korea's in-your-face missile tests.

"When diplomacy is stalled, North Korea escalates tension to break the deadlock," Wonhyuk Lim, a Brookings Institution fellow for northeast Asian studies, says in an analysis for the think tank.

"In sum, as twisted as the North Koreans' logic may be, it is based on their negotiating experience with the Americans. North Korea's brinkmanship is the evil twin of America's halfhearted engagement."

The risk is that North Korea's attention-grabbing actions may bring bombs in reprisal instead of diplomacy, as almost happened in the Clinton administration.

In 2003, North Korea pulled out of a nuclear arms treaty, vowing to bring "defeat and ruin" on the United States, warning of World War III and declaring, "Let us see who will win and who will be defeated in the fire-to-fire standoff."

This was followed by the first substantive talks between the two nations since President Bush came to office.

As a propaganda gambit, the missile tests that North Korea put on during America's Independence Day were hardly a smashing success. On a day when the space shuttle arced into the heavens on a mission of science and international cooperation, North Korea's star long-range missile is said to have failed like a bum firecracker on its mission of defiance and military advancement.

A half-dozen tests of shorter range missiles were conducted to uncertain effect, but no failures as far as known. The results, in short, spoke to North Korea's apparent ability to wreak havoc in its region and its inability any time soon to reach the U.S. mainland with a nuclear missile.

For the United States, "the main risk seems to be that North Korea is beginning early testing of a missile that could throw the equivalent of a rock at Alaska," said Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Yet North Korea has massive combat forces on the border with South Korea; long-range artillery capable of reaching Japan and destroying up to 40 percent of the South Korean economy; and huge stocks of chemical weapons as well as its rising nuclear weapons capability.

An impoverished country of some 23 million people, it fields the world's fifth largest army, behind China, the U.S., Russia and India. It is considered no match in any protracted fight with South Korea's lethal modern forces, America's unmatched power or a devastating combination of both.

Still, any conflict could bring horrific consequences to both sides and risk pitting China against the United States.

Like many students of the region, Cordesman protests the tendency to regard Kim Jong Il as a reckless poseur without a purpose.

"North Korea may or may not face a few hard weeks or months of reprisal, but it has reminded everyone of just how serious a threat North Korea can be, how limited most military options are, and how serious the risks of any major war would be," Cordesman said.

North Korea's declaration back in 1993 that it would pull out of the nuclear weapons nonproliferation treaty brought the peninsula close to war and isolated the country through international censure, in the process leading to breakthrough negotiations with Washington that produced an agreement to freeze North Korea's nuclear activities in exchange for U.S. energy assistance.

North Korea's first test of a multistage rocket in 1998, also a flop, spurred bilateral talks. The current framework of six-nation negotiations was set up after North Korea resumed its plutonium program in 2002 and expelled international inspectors.

That pattern of edging toward confrontation, then edging back, has persisted, always accompanied by tough words. More are being heard now. "Catastrophic effects will arise," North Korean envoy Song Il Ho warned last week after Japan took steps to punish North Korea for firing the missiles.

"We're certainly not going to overreact ... to these wild statements," Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said. "We've seen them before."

DOJ_NMG_0039431

Tensions Over Missile Tests Rattle Investors (NYT)

By Jeff Sommer

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

North Korea fired test missiles while Wall Street rested on the Fourth of July, rattling stock markets around the world. The next day, when Wall Street returned to work, stocks fell sharply. Despite a modest rally on Thursday, the market finished lower for the week.

On Friday, there was another apparent cause for the market's weakness — a warning by 3M, the technology company, that second-quarter earnings would be lower than expected because the demand for flat-panel TV screens was soft. Its shares dropped 8.7 percent for the week, and 3M's problems set off declines for a host of other stocks.

General Motors' shares, however, rose 7.4 percent for the week. Its board decided to study an alliance with Nissan Motor and Renault, which Kirk Kerkorian, a dissident G.M. shareholder, had demanded.

For the week, the Dow Jones industrial average shed 59.55 points, or 0.5 percent, to close at 11,090.67. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dropped 4.72 points, or 0.4 percent, to close at 1,265.48. The Nasdaq composite index fell 42.03 points, or 1.9 percent, to close at 2,130.06.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury bond fell slightly, to 5.13 percent from 5.14 percent the previous week. JEFF SOMMER

High-tech Missile Destroyer Sails To Japan (AP)

By Hans Greimel

AP, July 9, 2006

A new U.S. guided missile destroyer docked in Japan on Saturday amid tensions over North Korea's missile tests, but the military said the arrival was routine and had been planned months ago.

The USS Mustin sailed into the port of Yokosuka, home to the Navy's 7th Fleet, with a crew of 300 for permanent assignment to the region, fleet spokeswoman Hanako Tomizuka said.

The Mustin, commissioned in 2003, is one of the most advanced in the fleet. The 509-foot ship carries surface-to-air missiles and Tomahawk cruise missiles.

Its deployment to Yokosuka was previously planned and not in response to North Korea's missile tests, the Navy said.

"The Mustin is replacing the USS Vandegrift as part of the Navy's long-range plan to routinely replace older ships in its forward-deployed naval force with newer, more capable surface combatants," said Lt. Trey Brown, a Navy spokesman at the Pentagon.

"It's routine. We do this all the time."

Pyongyang stunned the region Wednesday by test-firing seven missiles.

In August, Yokosuka also will welcome the USS Shiloh, which last month demonstrated its ability to shoot down missile warheads in a landmark test off Hawaii. The Shiloh is replacing the USS Chancellorsville.

Both the Mustin and the Shiloh are equipped with radar systems that employ Aegis technology, which is geared toward tracking and shooting down enemy missiles. The system was instrumental in identifying and assessing Wednesday's launchings in which all the missiles apparently fell into the Sea of Japan.

At least one of those missiles was believed capable of reaching the U.S. mainland.

The U.S. Navy now has eight Aegis-equipped vessels at Yokosuka.

The Case For A Preemptive Strike On North Korea's Missiles (TIME)

By Ashton B. Carter And William J. Perry

Time, July 9, 2006

Viewpoint: Former Clinton administration officials Ashton Carter and William Perry argue that the most effective way to curb the threat from Pyongyang is to destroy its missiles at their test sites

The Bush Administration has tried to downplay the mounting danger posed by North Korea. That might be the understandable reaction of officials necessarily preoccupied with the ongoing campaign in Iraq. But it is not prudent or safe. Although the July 4 test of the Taepo Dong 2 missile—which is intended to carry nuclear warheads to U.S. territory—appears to have failed, North Korea conducted the test so its engineers could learn how to perfect the missile, and even a failed test provides critical data. More important is the test's symbolic significance: once again North Korea has crossed a line in the sand clearly drawn by the U.S. and its partners.

We anticipated that North Korea would ignore the U.S.'s warnings. That's why, in an opinion piece published in the Washington Post on June 22, we urged the Bush Administration to strike the Taepo Dong 2 on its launchpad before the test could be conducted. "Surgical strike" is a much abused term, but destroying a test missile as it is being readied for launch qualifies for this category because only one U.S. cruise missile or precision bomb with an ordinary high-explosive warhead could easily puncture and ignite the multistory test booster. As with space-shuttle launches from Cape Canaveral, all personnel would normally be a safe distance away from the rocket at the time, so there should be no collateral damage.

DOJ_NMG_0039432

Critics of our article, including members of the Bush Administration, say that a pre-emptive strike is too risky. But if the U.S. is ever going to defend a line in the sand with North Korea, that is the least provocative way to do it, and next time it will only be riskier. Such a strike could be seen by the North Korean leadership for what it is: a limited act of defense of the U.S. homeland against a gathering threat, and not an overall attack on North Korea. Pyongyang tries carefully to cultivate the impression that it will lash out in response to any action against it, however limited. But would it truly retaliate against South Korea, which has been working hard to improve North-South relations, in response to a U.S. airstrike? Such a war would surely and swiftly end in the elimination of the North Korean regime. Pyongyang's leaders are bold, but they are not suicidal.

For the U.S., the risk of inaction will prove far greater. The Pyongyang regime will view its stockpile of missiles and nuclear material as tipping the regional balance in its favor and providing a shield behind which it can pursue its interests with impunity. Worse, North Korea has a long history of selling its advanced weapons to countries in the Middle East, and it operates a black market in other forms of contraband. Like Pakistan's rogue nuclear engineer A.Q. Khan, North Korean officials might be tempted to sell the ingredients of their arsenal to terrorists. Finally, many expect North Korea's failed economy to lead one day to the regime's collapse. Who then might get its loose nukes?

So what should be done to begin to rein in the runaway North Korean nuclear and missile programs? First, we continue to advise the U.S. government to strike any further Taepo Dong test missiles before they can be launched. Second, the North should be penalized for defying the international community's unanimous appeal not to conduct its July 4 tests. China and South Korea are the main economic benefactors of North Korea, and President Bush is right to seek a United Nations Security Council action that would compel all nations to suspend trade with Pyongyang.

For years, the U.S. has been paralyzed by a division in the Bush Administration between one camp that favors diplomacy with Pyongyang and another camp that hopes for the early collapse of the regime. But the net result has been that neither policy has been pursued consistently. Instead, Washington has outsourced the North Korea issue to regional players in the form of the "Six Party" talks, a strategy that has has failed to produce any results except plutonium and missile tests. South Korea, China and Russia have offered only carrots while carefully avoiding the threat of sticks—yet both carrots and sticks are essential ingredients of any successful diplomacy.

The "Six Party" talks are the right forum for diplomacy, but ultimately, what matters less than who is at the table is whether the U.S. has a clear strategy. We won't know whether North Korea's ambitions can be blunted by anything short of the use of force unless and until the U.S. takes the danger seriously and gets in the game.

Ashton B. Carter and William J. Perry are professors at Harvard and Stanford universities, respectively. Perry served as Secretary of Defense and Carter as Assistant Secretary of Defense in the Clinton Administration

Four Scenarios, And Not One Ends Happily (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

THOSE North Korean missiles that splashed down harmlessly in the Sea of Japan last week prompted a lot of jokes about the country that couldn't shoot straight. But they were also a reminder that North Korea has defied more than a decade of predictions that it would shrivel up and go away; the choices for dealing with it look as grim as ever.

What could happen next? The truth is that for years, both sides have been gaming plans for everything from negotiations to bombing runs, coexistence to collapse. Here are a few:

ONE-ON-ONE TALKS

Mr. Bush's critics say that he should do what President Clinton did: Hold his nose, and negotiate directly. That's how the 1994 "Agreed Framework" happened, when North Korea agreed to freeze its nuclear program in return for fuel oil and, some day, for "proliferation resistant" light-water reactors to provide energy. The deal has since died.

Mr. Bush says nothing doing. The North Koreans started cheating on the 1994 agreement, he says, almost immediately. But his big worry is that if America negotiates alone, it will be hung out to dry when talks go bad.

He insists that China and South Korea — which are reluctant to crack down on the North, but have the most to lose — must be at the table. Negotiate alone, he said on Friday in Chicago, and "you run out of options very quickly," especially if the North manages to "turn the tables and make a country like the United States the problem."

Mr. Bush has a point. Talk one on one, and the dynamic changes. China and South Korea will likely portray Washington as the obstacle. The downside to Mr. Bush's approach: When six nations talk, clarity is the first victim. The North can play each country against the others. No wonder that in the three years of talks the result has been one agreement in principle, with no timetables, which everyone interpreted differently the day it was signed.

DOJ_NMG_0039433

TAKING OUT YONGBYON

In 1994, when North Korea threatened to throw out international inspectors and turn its stockpile of spent nuclear-reactor fuel into plutonium for weapons, Brent Scowcroft, who had served as the national security adviser to the first President Bush, advocated pre-emption. It would be better to destroy North Korea's nuclear facilities at Yongbyon, he argued, than to let the country build a nuclear arsenal.

That suggestion struck a chord in the Clinton White House.

"My belief is that President Clinton was prepared to do it," said William J. Perry, the defense secretary at the time. But a last-minute deal with North Korea was struck.

Nine years later, in January 2003, the North Koreans made good on their threat. American spy satellites saw the North Koreans carting the rods off for what appeared to be reprocessing into bomb fuel, but President Bush, preoccupied with Baghdad, not Pyongyang, decided not to act.

What about now? Many believe it is too late. By the C.I.A.'s estimate, North Korea now has the fuel for six or more weapons, and it is producing roughly a bomb's worth every year. (Whether they have turned the fuel into weapons is unclear.) The fuel could be stored anywhere — in caves, tunnels, Kim Jong Il's shoe closet. Moreover, the United States has accused North Korea of starting up a second nuclear weapons program, using uranium, with the help of Pakistan's former nuclear architect, A. Q. Khan. That makes bombing pretty useless.

THE NIGHTMARE: NORTH KOREA SELLS

This chain of events worries the Bush administration the most. Rightly or wrongly, the Pentagon assumes that because Mr. Kim, for all his other oddities, values his survival, he would not risk an attack with a return address.

But the North Korean leader may soon find himself with a small surplus of the world's most coveted weapons material, bomb-grade plutonium. David Albright and Paul Brannan of the Institute for Science and International Security estimated in a recent report that North Korea's stock of plutonium "is enough for 4 to 13 weapons." Countries that have four weapons worth of bomb material probably aren't willing to give up any. But when you have enough for more than a dozen — and you are broke — the black market must look attractive.

Of course, making bomb fuel is one thing; getting caught selling it is another. During the six-party talks in Beijing, the North once threatened to sell a weapon, and American officials made clear that the results for Pyongyang would be disastrous.

Would the North Koreans dare do it? "Who knows," said Michael Green, who recently left the administration after running Asian affairs at the National Security Council. "But their strategy is steady escalation, and their next step may be a nuclear test" to prove the quality of their wares.

LIVE WITH IT

There is always the Cuba strategy: Wait out the Kim dynasty, and hope that the starving, bankrupt, gulag-ridden state of North Korea finally collapses.

After all, the North is hardly in a position to lash out. Its military, while among the world's largest, can't afford to train its pilots. The thought that it would restart the Korean War, still considered plausible through the early 90's, seems almost laughable today.

But as Dick Cheney once famously said about the North, "time is not on our side." It may take years, experts say, but they will straighten out that Taepodong 2 missile. Eventually they may figure out how to miniaturize a nuclear warhead to fit on top of it.

That is why, while Mr. Bush talks about finding a diplomatic solution, the Pentagon is mapping every corner of the country, trying to figure out how to deal with a nuclear outbreak.

And it is why the Chinese and the South Koreans fear a collapse — because the only thing harder than dealing with a nuclear-armed North Korea may be handling millions of hungry, confused refugees headed for Seoul, Tokyo and Harbin.

Failure Can Be Successful (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

ON June 11, 1957, the Atlas, America's first Intercontinental Ballistic Missile, took its inaugural flight from Cape Canaveral in Florida.

It lasted 24 seconds. The missile roared off the launching pad and soared to about 10,000 feet before its engines failed. Tumbling out of control, the rocket fell through its own trail of fire before the safety officer on the ground sent a radio signal that told the wayward rocket to blow itself up.

DOJ_NMG_0039434

The rocket's designers, though disappointed, learned a lot. It was clear that, despite the pummeling the Atlas took as it careered out of control, the rocket had remained intact. That proved its structural integrity, ending a major debate over the design's soundness.

Perhaps everyone can learn from failure, even the North Koreans.

Their missile, the Taepodong 2, took flight briefly last week, and seems to be in no shape to send an atom bomb whizzing halfway around the globe toward the United States. Experts judge that many years of testing beyond that inaugural flight on Tuesday will probably be needed before the North would entrust the new missile with anything as costly and precious as a nuclear warhead.

"It would take five or six tests of their final design before they'd be confident it could go someplace," said Harold M. Agnew, a former director of the Los Alamos weapons laboratory, which designed most of the nation's nuclear arms.

In the hours and days after the missile test Tuesday, military experts and administration officials expressed relief at the apparent failure, some calling the North Koreans inept. Stephen Hadley, President Bush's national security adviser, lightly disparaged the troubled launching, saying it "tells you something about capabilities."

But in interviews, arms and aerospace experts said that such setbacks were a normal part of rocket and warhead science. In time, they said, the North Koreans will likely make the vehicle reliable enough to wage intercontinental war.

"It would have been more surprising if they had a success" on the first try, said John M. Logsdon, director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University. "Developing rockets is hard to do."

The missile test, many said, was a reasonable step forward. "The fact that something flies for 40 seconds before it blows up means the design is probably fundamentally sound," said Jonathan McDowell, a Harvard astronomer who publishes the online Jonathan's Space Report, which tracks global rocket launchings.

Even if failures cut short a vehicle's debut, Dr. McDowell said, the flight can "give you an incredible amount of information about such things as how well your engines are working and what the aerodynamic stability of the vehicle is."

If the North Koreans launched 10 Taepodong 2 missiles and none worked, he added, "then you can make fun of them."

In fact, the test flight was actually longer than at first reported. American military officials said on Thursday that the test flight's overall duration was closer to two minutes, not the 42 seconds initially reported.

Rocket experts said that, in general, new designs typically blow up repeatedly in flight tests before engineers can find and fix all the problems.

"It's a trial-and-error process," said Charles P. Vick, an expert on the North Korean rocket program at GlobalSecurity.org, a research group based in Alexandria, Va. "They're trying to build and test to wring out the problems. It's the process any nation has to go through."

Mr. Vick said that rocket designers typically conducted from 2 to 20 test flights before gaining reasonable assurance that a new model can be fairly reliable. Even then, he added, rockets declared operational often have failure rates of 1 in 10 or 1 in 20 flights.

So it's reasonable to expect that North Korea is busy learning from the failure, fixing flaws before it launches another Taepodong 2. South Korea's defense minister told reporters on Friday that the North appears to be holding another long-range missile near the launching pad.

The daunting nature of the aerospace game is reflected in other American programs, as well as American tragedies.

On Tuesday — as the nation celebrated its birth and North Korea lighted the skies with its own red glare — experts held their collective breath as the space shuttle Discovery blasted off with fire and thunder into a nearly cloudless Florida sky.

The winged spaceships, though considered highly reliable by industry standards, have failed catastrophically on 2 of 115 missions, killing a total of 14 astronauts, including the first teacher meant to fly in space. The space agency now puts the odds of disaster at roughly 1 in 100 flights.

Similar problems have dogged America's update of the "Star Wars" antimissile system, which is now based on land in California and Alaska, and is meant to shoot down North Korean missiles. It has hit targets in 5 of 10 tests, said Dr. Philip E. Coyle III, a former head of weapons testing at the Pentagon. "That's the good news," he said. "The bad news is that there's been no interception success for four years. And in the two most recent attempts, the interceptor never got off the ground."

President Bush, asked Friday at a news conference about the North's missile firing, said he thought the nation's antimissile system "had a reasonable chance of shooting it down."

As for warheads, North Korea has declared publicly that it already possesses nuclear arms. But Dr. Agnew, the former director of Los Alamos, noted that the North Koreans appear to have never conducted a nuclear test — often considered a necessary step to proving a weapon's reliability. "Once they do that, it's serious," he said. "Otherwise, they're just pulling our string."

DOJ_NMG_0039435

American intelligence agencies have told President Bush they believe the North has made enough fuel for six or more weapons, but it is unclear if it has been used to fashion warheads.

Dr. Agnew noted that if the North succeeded in developing a reliable warhead it would face a daunting series of technical hurdles in preparing to hurl it aloft. "There's a lot of subtleties in missile-warhead mating that can affect the accuracy," he said of long-range targeting.

Missiles also have the inherent disadvantage of advertising where they arise. If the North Koreans really wanted to wreak havoc by sending a nuclear weapon overseas, Dr. Agnew said, they might consider loading it onto an inconspicuous boat.

"Most of our attractive targets," he remarked, "are on the East Coast."

Anthony H. Cordesman, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, estimated that the North Koreans might need five years to perfect a long-range missile. Its warhead, he added, would likely be a crude atom type rather than the much more destructive hydrogen type that powers the city busters of most global arsenals.

"It seems very doubtful that North Korea is close to a real-world capability to attack the U.S.," he said.

Dr. McDowell of Harvard agreed. "Maybe they could do it five years from now, but that depends on how often they test," he said. "It would be 5 to 10 years before I'd start to worry — even a little."

U.S. To Negotiate Russian Storage Of Atomic Waste (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 8 — The Bush administration said Saturday that it would open formal negotiations with Russia on a long-discussed civilian nuclear agreement that would pave the way for Russia to become one of the world's largest repositories of spent nuclear fuel.

President Vladimir V. Putin has been looking to expand the country's role in the multibillion nuclear power business. The United States has traditionally opposed any such arrangement, in part because of concerns about the safety of Russian nuclear facilities, and because the country has helped Iran build its first major nuclear reactor.

But administration officials said that once Mr. Bush endorsed Mr. Putin's proposal last year for Iran to conduct uranium enrichment inside Russia — rather than in Iran, where the administration fears it would be diverted to weapons — it made little sense to bar ordinary civilian nuclear exchanges with Russia.

In announcing the change of course, the White House made it clear that in return, it expected Mr. Putin's cooperation in what promises to be a tense confrontation with Iran on forcing it to give up the enrichment of uranium. Mr. Bush has charged that the enrichment is intended to feed a secret nuclear weapons program. "We have made clear to Russia that for an agreement on peaceful nuke cooperation to go forward, we will need active cooperation in blocking Iran's attempts to obtain nuclear weapons," said Peter Watkins, a White House spokesman.

So far, Russia has backed the United States in its fundamental demands but balked at the imposition of sanctions or the passage of any United Nations Security Council resolution that Mr. Bush could later use as a justification for military action.

The Washington Post first reported the shift on Saturday.

A spokesman for Mr. Putin declined to comment. But Sergei G. Novikov, a spokesman for Russia's Atomic Energy Agency, said in a telephone interview that Russia and the United States had been talking about the subject in recent months.

He added that he did not expect that an agreement would be signed during the Group of 8 summit meeting in St. Petersburg next weekend, but rather that Mr. Bush and Mr. Putin might issue a vaguely worded statement on increased nuclear cooperation, and then instruct their governments to work on an agreement that might lift the current restrictions. The United States has similar deals with a variety of nations, including China.

If such a statement is issued, Mr. Novikov said, negotiations on the details would probably take at least several months. "I would rather not talk about any expectations, so as not to experience any frustration should they not come true," he said.

For Mr. Bush, an accord could help solve two problems: where to send a growing stockpile of waste from nuclear fuel that originated in the United States, and how to keep Russia on board in pressuring Iran to give up its uranium enrichment programs.

Under American law, the United States retains control over nuclear fuel, and nuclear waste, made from uranium that originated in the United States. As a result it has barred South Korea, Taiwan and other states that bought American fuel from transferring it to Russia, which changed its laws several years ago to enter the multibillion dollar business of storing nuclear waste. The proposed agreement does not appear to be intended to allow storage in Russia of waste from reactors in the United States.

But a negotiation would also help provide Mr. Putin with an economic incentive for giving up nuclear aid to Iran, which has long been one of the Bush administration's objectives. On Friday, in Chicago, Mr. Bush alluded to the difficulty in getting Russia and China to join in sanctions against Iran or North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0039436

"You know, some nations are more comfortable with sanctions than other nations, and part of the issue we face in some of these countries is that they've got economic interests," Mr. Bush told reporters.

In two previous trips to St. Petersburg as president, Mr. Bush tried to persuade Mr. Putin to give up a lucrative contract to supply the reactors to Iran's Bushehr nuclear plant. But Russia resisted, and eventually Mr. Bush accepted a deal in which any nuclear fuel Russia sells to Iran would have to be returned to Russia after use, so that plutonium could not be removed from the waste for military use.

Congress would have the right to review any agreement. But since the administration just concluded an accord with India, which requires a more intensive nuclear review, administration officials said they thought Russia would win approval.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York and a regular administration critic, offered tentative approval of the idea. "While the devil is certainly in the details, given that our greatest danger right now is a nuclear Iran and North Korea, we very much need Russia's help," he said in an e-mail message.

Congressman Edward R. Royce, Republican of California and the chairman of the House Subcommittee on International Terrorism and Nonproliferation, said that he was supportive of the idea but that he expected to hold hearings.

Rep. Edward J. Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat who is the co-chairman of the Bipartisan Task Force on Nonproliferation, harshly criticized Mr. Bush over the move.

"President Bush's foreign policy has become so hollow that his favorite bargaining position is to give everything away. He is repeatedly rewarding bad behavior," he said in a statement.

Outside experts with whom the administration had been consulting on the deal said they had sensed a recent cooling off on the idea as Russia continued to hold out on bringing sanctions against Iran. The idea seemed to pick up again several weeks ago when Russia's top atomic energy official, Sergei V. Kiriyenko, lobbied hard for it during meetings with counterparts in Washington.

At the same time, the administration seemed to come around to thinking that the negotiations for the deal — which could take place over months or even years — could help bring Russia more fully on board with the administration's efforts to rein in Iran, said Robert J. Einhorn, senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies and a former assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation in the Clinton administration and briefly in Mr. Bush's.

"They had reached the conclusion that entering the negotiations would provide continuing leverage," Mr. Einhorn said.

The idea is not new, and some outside experts have been calling for just such an arrangement for months. The Council of Foreign Relations did so in a report on United States-Russian relations in March that was highly critical of Mr. Putin's policies.

"The idea was to create a greater foundation for nuclear cooperation with the Russians to support staying on the same track with Iran," said Stephen Sestanovich, a senior fellow at the council and an adviser on Russia for former President Bill Clinton.

But the report also cited such an agreement as a way to foster cooperation on securing spent fuel and providing nuclear energy to nonnuclear nations seeking to develop their own enrichment facilities.

Bush To Pursue Nuclear Deal With Russia (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, July 9, 2006

President Bush will pursue a nuclear cooperation agreement when he meets Russian leader Vladimir Putin next week during a summit of industrialized nations in St. Petersburg, the White House said Saturday.

But any agreement would be conditioned on Russia helping to pressure Iran to give up its alleged desire to develop nuclear weapons, said Frederick Jones, spokesman for Bush's National Security Council.

"We have made clear to the Russians that for an agreement on peaceful nuclear cooperation to go forward, we will need Russia's active cooperation in blocking Iran's attempt to obtain nuclear weapons," Jones said.

The two presidents will announce the start of negotiations on the agreement when they meet on the sidelines of the July 15-17 Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg, the White House confirmed.

Nuclear cooperation between the two countries has stalled for more than a decade because of Washington's objections to Russia's nuclear cooperation with Iran, including construction of an atomic power plant in Bushehr.

The Bush administration's willingness to reverse course and pursue a nuclear cooperation agreement reflects the U.S. view that Moscow is now a partner in the effort to persuade Tehran to abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions, rather than a hindrance to it.

"Now that Russia has been more cooperative in putting pressure on Iran to abandon its" alleged nuclear weapons program, the United States "won't allow the Iran relationship to get in the way of this particular activity," said Jon Wolfstahl, an analyst at the Carnegie Endowment for Peace in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0039437

The White House sees an agreement with Russia as a win-win, despite concerns that Putin is backtracking on democratic advances, about the security of Russian nuclear material, and that Moscow has so far opposed imposing sanctions on Iran if it refuses to abandon suspected nuclear weapons development.

Bush wants the use of nuclear power increased, especially in developing countries, to reduce the global demand for oil. Russia, meanwhile, sees a lucrative market in playing a role in providing such capabilities to other countries.

"Such an agreement would benefit both the United States and Russia, and indeed the world, by enabling advances in and greater use of nuclear energy," said Jones, the Security Council spokesman.

The two leaders, who have been promoting nuclear energy as a clean alternative, have made proposals on providing nuclear power to developing countries while building in safeguards for nonproliferation of weapons.

Rose Gottemoeller, director of the Carnegie Moscow Center, said the potential joint project was "probably the biggest story coming out of the Petersburg summit."

"This is a field where Russia has a clear technological advantage because over the past 30 years, the U.S. has essentially abandoned nuclear power technology development" in the wake of the 1979 Three Mile Island nuclear accident in Pennsylvania and the Chernobyl accident in 1986, Gottemoeller said at a round table discussion on U.S.-Russian relations.

In January, Putin proposed establishing an international nuclear center in Russia that would provide full fuel cycle services. He said the center could be the start of a network of such centers around the world.

At about the same time, Bush introduced his Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, which would provide fresh fuel to countries that agree to use it only for power generation and would recover spent fuel.

"President Bush is very anxious to move his nuclear energy proposals forward and he sees his relationship with President Putin as a natural way to add momentum," said Wolfstahl of the Carnegie Endowment for Peace.

"The Russians have probably more modern nuclear reactor technology than we do but they need our endorsement and our cooperation if they are going to bring it to the international market," he said.

Environmentalists have criticized Russia's efforts to develop such a business, arguing it will turn the country into a dumping ground for nuclear waste.

Russia has 31 reactors at 10 nuclear power plants, accounting for about 16 percent of the country's electricity generation, and Putin has called for raising the share to 25 percent.

Last month, Russia's atomic energy agency signed a contract with a military shipbuilding plant to build the world's first floating nuclear reactor near the Arctic port of Severodvinsk.

___

AP Writer Judith Ingram in Moscow contributed to this story

No G-8 Seat For China, Other Big Economies (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, July 9, 2006

The G-8 summit that President Bush and seven other world leaders are attending next weekend in Russia is often billed as a gathering of the world's leading economic powers. It is not. Consider: China, now the world's fourth-largest economy and the nation with the most influence over renegade North Korea, is not a member.

Neither is India, the world's largest democracy and one of its fastest-growing economies. Nor is South Korea, Brazil, Mexico or Spain, each with a larger economy than G-8 member Russia's. In fact, Spain recently inched past member Canada as the world's No. 8 economy, according to a World Bank tabulation.

Often officials from developing nations are invited as observers to the summit but have no formal roles. Among those invited to this year's gathering is Chinese President Hu Jintao.

Critics view the annual economic summit as a Cold War relic that needs to be reconstituted. It was formed in the 1970s, but economic dynamics are far different three decades later. The astonishing growth of some Asian nations and parts of Latin America have altered the math.

Yet expanding or changing the membership is not on this year's agenda, nor is it likely to be on next year's. Few officials from member nations seem eager to talk about the subject.

White House aides insist the president is more focused on substantive issues.

Igor Shuvalov, Russian President Vladimir Putin's top summit adviser, acknowledges that Russia lags behind the other seven members in terms of current economic output. But stay tuned, he says.

"We believe the importance of Russia in our global world will change. We have very talented people and well-educated labor. We have oil and gas," said Shuvalov in a telephone interview with U.S. reporters. "We will develop very quickly as one of the major G-8 countries."

DOJ_NMG_0039438

Even now, Russia is economically "stronger than some G-8 members," Shuvalov asserted without offering backup data. "I don't want to name those countries," he said.

What is now known as the G-8 was formed in 1975 as the Group of Major Industrialized Democracies. At the time, it consisted of the United States, Japan, Britain, France and Germany — undisputedly the world's five biggest economic powers at the time. Italy was added in 1976, Canada in 1977 and Russia in 1998.

The group holds annual summits. Economic themes are supposed to prevail, but often are overshadowed by events of the day and global politics.

Last year's summit in Scotland was jolted by multiple terrorist bomb blasts on London's transit system. This year's session probably will dwell on North Korea's recent barrage of missile tests and the nuclear aspirations it shares with Iran.

Robert Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman Sachs International and an expert on economic summitry, advocates expanding the G-8 to include other modern economic powers, especially China.

"When this group was formed in the 1970s, the members were the main influences on the globe. Now you've got a lot of other countries that have a lot more influence than they did 30 years ago and who are not in the process," said Hormats, who helped Presidents Carter, Ford and Reagan prepare for economic summits.

China's membership could help the G-8 this year deal with North Korea, Hormats said. He noted that last year, the summit partners called on the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to produce more oil, yet neither Saudi Arabia nor any other OPEC member are participants.

This year's summit is in Putin's hometown, St. Petersburg. It is Russia's first time to hold the rotating G-8 presidency, a controversy itself given Putin's moves to restrict political and economic freedoms.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., and former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright have said Russia should be excluded. A London-based think tank, the Foreign Policy Center, issued a report saying Putin's record makes a mockery of G-8's commitment to free markets and open societies.

But others want Russia to stay and for other nations to join, including nondemocracies that are big economies.

Johannes Linn and Colin Bradford, both former World Bank officials now with the Brookings Institution, have proposed expanding the group to 19 to 20 members.

They would add Australia, Argentina, Brazil, China, India, Indonesia, Korea, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, South Africa and Turkey. They also would add the country of the rotating presidency of the European Union if it was not already a member.

"The problem in a sense for the G-8 is that it has set itself up as a quasi-steering group for the world, but it cannot effectively and cannot legitimately deal with many of the key issues," Linn said.

And it will only get worse. "Five years from now, I cannot possibly see how a G-8 would still be relevant," he said.

Gee whiz.

But will the G-8 transform itself anytime soon? "Probably not," he said.

___

On the Net:

G-8 site: http://en.g8russia.ru/

Kremlin Tightens Reins On Free Market (WT/AP)

By Judith Ingram, Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 9, 2006

MOSCOW -- When President Vladimir Putin calls a staff meeting, the heads of some of Russia's most prominent companies are at his beck and call.

Alongside his drive to re-establish Kremlin control over the nation's political life, Mr. Putin aggressively has reasserted state domination over major economic sectors -- in part by installing members of his own team, many dating back to his days in St. Petersburg, into key positions in some major state-controlled companies.

Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev, a Putin protege, chairs the board of Gazprom, the world's largest gas company. A Kremlin deputy chief of staff, Igor Sechin, is chairman of the board of the Rosneft oil company, which plans a high-profile, $10 billion initial public offering on the London Stock Exchange this summer.

And Mr. Putin's chief of staff, Sergei Sobyanin, recently was named chairman of the nuclear fuel company TVEL, the springboard for what the Kremlin hopes will be a renaissance of the Russian nuclear industry.

The list of government officials doubling as captains of industry goes on, reflecting deeply intertwined state and business interests. Mr. Putin's influence in so many industries raises questions about whether politics won't trump economics in the end when business decisions are made.

DOJ_NMG_0039439

"We're at a stage where in order to get control ... President Putin wants to make sure the person he has confidence in is overseeing all this stuff," says Andrew Somers, head of the American Chamber of Commerce in Moscow. "But we do think in the long run it's inefficient, it raises questions on how decisions are made and complicates the negotiation process."

It also means Russia is out of step with the developed countries that make up the Group of Eight, the elite club of nations to which Mr. Putin plays host this year.

Russia's G-8 partners have expressed concern about the state's growing role -- especially the Kremlin's influence in the volatile energy market, where many European countries fear they could become hostage to a Russian monopoly.

Mr. Putin also has come under criticism from other G-8 leaders for the government-sanctioned carving up of one-time tycoon Mikhail Khodorkovsky's Yukos oil company.

Khodorkovsky, who sponsored opposition parties in the run-up to parliamentary elections in 2003, now is in prison in Siberia, while the remainder of his company -- once the nation's largest -- is in receivership. Rosneft snapped up the choicest pieces after a murky state auction.

The Yukos example made clear how far the Kremlin is prepared to go to press Mr. Putin's campaign to tighten not just economic but also political control in Russia. It is a topic that G-8 leaders likely will raise -- if gingerly -- at the three-day summit in St. Petersburg that opens Saturday.

Mr. Putin's approach is more than the instinctive retreat from free markets of a Soviet-trained former bureaucrat. It is also a reaction to Russia's 1998 financial crisis, when the state was forced to write off $40 billion in debt and sharply devalue its currency -- a humiliating comedown for a one-time superpower and a lesson for Mr. Putin's circle of the perils of lax state involvement in the economy.

"We've heard from the government several times over the past five, six years that they believe one of the reasons Russia ran into the crisis of 1998 was not only because the oil price went down but simply because the government had removed itself from an active role in managing the economy," says Chris Weafer, chief strategist with Moscow's Alfa Bank.

So Mr. Putin's administration has consolidated control over strategic industries, such as oil and natural gas, and worked to cobble together "national champion" companies in sectors such as aviation and nuclear power.

"We are talking about the creation of major international private corporations and promoting them on the world market," says Arkady Dvorkovich, Mr. Putin's economic adviser.

"Yes, part of these companies are under state control and this is because the period we are living in -- the transitional period from one model of economic development to another," he says. "These companies would be expected to adhere to standards of efficiency and transparency associated with privately run corporations."

But economists say state involvement is fraught with negative consequences, including increased bureaucratic red tape and discouragement of entrepreneurship -- with a resulting slowdown in growth.

No company better illustrates those pitfalls than Gazprom, the natural-gas giant.

"Gazprom is one of the most inefficient companies in the country, because it survives due to two things: tax subsidies and continual borrowing," says Georgy Satarov, a former aide to Mr. Putin's predecessor, Boris Yeltsin, and head of the Indem think tank.

In a letter to minority shareholders last year, Vadim Kleiner, research director for the Hermitage Capital Management fund, said some of the worst mismanagement at Gazprom had ended, but significant inefficiencies and soaring operating costs remained.

"Operating and capital expenditures continue to rise alarmingly, apparently untethered to any notions of fiscal restraint," Mr. Kleiner wrote.

The company, with 330,000 employees on its payroll, has played a critical role not only in economic affairs but in Mr. Putin's political maneuvering.

Gazprom's media arm was used during Mr. Putin's first term to eliminate several critical newspapers and television channels, leading to a near-state monopoly on the airwaves. The Kremlin has wielded it as an instrument of pressure against former Soviet republics, most notably Ukraine, to which it cut gas supplies in an ugly price dispute that led to brief but alarming supply disruptions to Europe.

Gazprom is also the Russian partner in one of the biggest gas development tenders in decades, the 131 trillion-cubic-foot Shtokman field in the Barents Sea. Gazprom last year shortlisted U.S.-based Chevron Corp., ConocoPhillips, Norway's Statoil ASA and Norsk Hydro ASA, and France's Total SA as potential partners. A decision was expected in April, but Gazprom has dragged its feet.

The Kremlin's harshest critics contend that much as in the Yeltsin era, when a class of Kremlin-connected magnates amassed enormous wealth out of state assets, Mr. Putin and his circle are motivated less by patriotism than by the desire to spin power into personal wealth.

DOJ_NMG_0039440

Many critics speculate that Mr. Putin himself has his eyes on the helm of the Gazprom behemoth after 2008, when he constitutionally is required to step down from the presidency after two terms.

"His wish is to become a super-oligarch," Mr. Satarov says.

India Test-fires Nuclear-capable Missile (AP)

By Gavin Rabinowitz

AP, July 9, 2006

India test-fired its nuclear-capable Agni III missile Sunday for the first time, the Defense Ministry said.

The launch took place at India's main missile testing center in the eastern state of Orissa, Defense Ministry spokesman Sitanshu Kar told the Associated Press.

The launch of India's longest-range missile, able to fly 1,865 miles, has been viewed as a routine test — not saber-rattling with the country's nuclear-armed archrival and neighbor, Pakistan.

New Delhi and Islamabad regularly test-fire missiles, but normally only give each other prior notice for long-range launches. It was not immediately clear whether India informed Pakistan ahead of Sunday's test.

The missile was launched at 11:03 Indian time and "took off successfully," Kar said. "Details of the flight performance are being analyzed by the mission team."

The missile splashed down near the Nicobar islands in the Bay of Bengal.

Indian Defense Minister Pranab Mukherjee was at the launch complex, on Wheeler Island off Orissa, to witness the test, the Press Trust of India news agency reported.

The Agni III further boosts India's homegrown missile arsenal, which includes the short-range Prithvi ballistic missile, the medium-range Akash, the anti-tank Nag and the supersonic Brahmos missile, developed jointly with Russia.

India Tests Nuclear-capable Missile (AFP)

AFP, July 9, 2006

India successfully carried out its first test of a nuclear-capable ballistic missile with a range of 4,000 kilometres (2,480 miles), defence officials said.

The Agni-III missile was launched on Sunday from Wheeler Island, 180 kilometres northeast of Bhubaneshwar in the eastern state of Orissa, they said on condition of anonymity.

In May Defence Minister Pranab Mukherjee had said the Agni-III, India's longest-range ballistic missile, was ready but that the country was observing "self-imposed restraint" before testing.

Opposition parties criticised the announcement, saying testing was being delayed because of pressure from the United States. New Delhi and Washington reached a landmark deal in March that will see sanctions lifted on India's access to civilian nuclear technology.

Sunday's test launch comes just four days after North Korea sparked an international outcry by test-firing seven missiles.

A highly-placed Defence Research and Development Organisation (DRDO) source said the Indian test was "successful".

He said scientists had detected a snag in the booster rocket system of the Agni-III two weeks ago and had delayed its test. "Now we have papered over the problem and hence the launch window was chosen as Sunday," he said.

The missile was tracked during take-off, re-entry into the Earth's atmosphere and splashdown in the Bay of Bengal, another defence official said.

The Agni (Fire) is one of five missiles being developed by the DRDO under its Integrated Guided Missile Development Programme launched in 1983. The others are the Prithvi, the surface-to-air Trishul (Trident), multi-purpose Akash (Sky), and the anti-tank Nag (Cobra).

Nuclear rivals India and Pakistan, who have fought three wars since independence in 1947, routinely notify each other of missile tests.

The two countries came to the brink of a fourth war in the summer of 2002 following a December 2001 attack on India's parliament by suspected Pakistan-backed militants. Islamabad denied any role in the attack.

But in January 2004 the two sides began a peace process that has led to a ceasefire in the divided Himalayan state of Kashmir, the cause of two of the wars.

In May 1998, India conducted five nuclear tests citing China as a security threat. The tests were matched two weeks later by Pakistan which India says has received Beijing's assistance for its nuclear programme, a claim denied by China.

But tensions between China and India have abated in the past two years including direct military talks and the reopening last week of a famed Silk Road pass in the Himalayas, the first direct border trade between the Asian giants since a brutal frontier war 44 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0039441

C. Uday Bhaskar, deputy head of the government funded Institute of Defence Studies and Analyses, said India's nuclear and missile programmes should not be seen as country specific.

"Countries acquire strategic capabilities that are generic nature. Our programme is not predicated on a single point threat. It is always in relation to the international strategic environment," Bhaskar said.

Asia Going Nuclear Amid Rising Oil Prices (AP)

By Michael Casey

AP, July 9, 2006

Led by fast-growing China and India, Asia is going nuclear in a big way to feed its ravenous appetite for energy.

The strains of economic growth are already showing. Energy shortages have forced Chinese factories to scale back production, and farmers in India often have power for only half the day. Both countries say their future growth is at risk unless they diversify their energy mix.

So does South Korea, where Yoon Ho-taek scans a construction site the size of 10 football fields in the southeastern city of Ulsan, points to what looks like a partly built amphitheater, and declares: "The future of nuclear power is bright."

South Korea, the world's second biggest coal importer and third biggest oil importer, already depends on nuclear reactors for 40 percent of its power and is talking of increasing that to 60 percent by 2035.

Yoon's company, Korea Hydro and Nuclear Power, is building four reactors and plans four more by 2017. Two of them are 1,000-megawatt reactors going up in Ulsan, lighting as many as 2.4 million homes in South Korea's industrial heartland.

Along with homemade reactors, Asia's plans hold out the promise of a bonanza for American companies such as Westinghouse Electric Co. and General Electric Co. which already have a strong presence in the region. Westinghouse has helped build 14 nuclear plants in South Korea and provided technology for almost half of Japan's 55 nuclear units. GE, meanwhile, has helped build 36 reactors in Japan, India and Taiwan.

"We expect Asia to become a leader in the use of commercial nuclear power," Timothy Collier, president of Westinghouse Korea, told The Associated Press. Asia needs a reliable electricity source, he says, and "Nuclear offers the opportunity to do that free of the dependence on oil."

Eighteen reactors — about 70 percent of the world's total under construction — are going up in Asia, and another 77 are planned or proposed, according to the Nuclear Energy Institute, an industry advocacy group based in Washington, D.C.

Japan depends on nuclear plants for a third of its power and plans to double its nuclear capacity by 2050. Australia wants to build its first plant, and Indonesia has vowed to go nuclear, even though it's vulnerable to earthquakes, floods and landslides.

According to the World Nuclear Association, a group that promotes nuclear energy, China plans to increase its nuclear capacity from 6.6 gigawatts to 40 gigawatts by 2020 with the addition of 30 nuclear plants, mostly in heavily populated, industrialized coastal regions where demand and pollution levels are highest.

India intends to go from just under 3 gigawatts to 20 gigawatts by 2020 with the addition of 31 plants, mostly in the west where much of its heavy industry lies.

India's nuclear industry received a boost in March after it signed a civilian nuclear pact with the U.S. Under the deal awaiting Congressional approval, the United States will give India nuclear technology and fuel in return for India's permission for international inspections and safeguards at 14 reactors.

"Nuclear power has to play an increasing role in our electricity generation plans," Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh told Parliament last year.

"Our desire is to attain energy security to enable us to leapfrog stages of economic development obtained at the least possible cost," he said.

Greenpeace, the environmental movement, continues to lead the charge against nuclear power, warning that Asian countries about to embrace the atom need to think hard about the potential consequences.

No country in Asia has a permanent site for the estimated 40,000 tons of toxic spent fuel produced so far, according to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog, which opponents say could become a target for terrorists or end up polluting the groundwater. There is also the fear that nuclear power could become a cover for countries with weapons ambitions such as North Korea.

"We think nuclear energy is inherently unsafe," said Gerd Leipold, executive director of Greenpeace International. "You have the waste problems. You have the accident problems. For all of these reasons, we think countries should invest in renewable energy and energy efficiency."

Many of the biggest concerns revolve around Indonesia, which has said that it will build its first reactor by 2015 on Java — the same island where an earthquake killed more than 5,700 people in May, and where the Mount Merapi volcano is threatening to erupt.

DOJ_NMG_0039442

The announcement prompted a warning from the Australian Institute in Canberra that "Although the risks of a major (nuclear) accident are very low, a cloud of radiation blowing over northern Australia would pose a severe danger to public safety."

But with oil prices spiking, and fossil fuel emissions being blamed for global warming, the allure of atomic power is growing worldwide, and the nuclear accidents at Three Mile Island and Chernobyl which set back the industry for a generation are receding from the forefront of public memory.

The United States and Russia are reviving long-dormant nuclear plans while France, which gets 80 percent of its power from nuclear plants, is a leader of the industry's renaissance.

Every 1,000 megawatt reactor, the NEI says, saves 7.9 million barrels of oil or 3.4 million tons of coal a year and eliminates 34,000 tons of polluting sulfur dioxide and 11,000 tons of nitrogen oxide.

China's energy supply leans heavily on coal, says Andy White, president of GE's nuclear division, told AP. "They realize if they are going to play a senior role in the world's economy, they have to do something about the environment ... I think nuclear is the key answer to their portfolio."

Twenty nuclear power plants dot the South Korean countryside and what public reaction there is tends to be mixed. In the 1990s residents demonstrated against the Yonggwang Nuclear Power plant on the southwest coast and vendors still complain they have difficulty marketing their fish and vegetables because of the plant's stigma.

But the area is poor, and some residents say they're more annoyed that it wasn't chosen last year for a permanent nuclear waste site since that would have brought in millions of dollars in government aid.

"Some people are concerned about the dangerous effects of nuclear power," said Kim Byoung-Kwon, a taxi driver. "But to meet our power needs, we need nuclear power. I've got no problem with the plant being near my village. It's become like any other building."

Asia's biggest problem isn't new reactors, but what to do with the spent fuel.

It took South Korea 19 years just to find a burial site for low-level waste such as contaminated clothing and spare reactor parts, and it still has nowhere to dump its 6,500 tons of fuel.

Taiwan, which has three plants and is building a fourth, has been thwarted at every turn in finding a long-term solution for its waste. First it tried North Korea and the Marshall Islands but was blocked by protests. Taiwan has stored 100,000 barrels of nuclear waste on a tiny island but protests from aboriginal group are forcing it move the waste to another site, as yet unchosen, by 2013.

"After nearly 50 years of the nuclear power experiment, nobody has demonstrated a solution to this problem. In the absence of a viable solution, expanding the rate of waste production is just irresponsible," professor Ian Lowe of Griffith University in Brisbane, Australia, wrote in a September report released by a coalition of Australian environmental groups.

Britain, France, Russia and Japan have opted for fuel reprocessing, which can extract plutonium and combine it with uranium to create oxide fuel, or MOX. But the extracted plutonium can be weaponized and is therefore vulnerable to theft for misuse, warns the Union of Concerned Scientists, a U.S. advocacy group.

In Asia, nuclear reactors seem to have their biggest problems in Japan. Nuclear power has always been a tough sell in the only country ever hit by an atomic bomb, and opposition has grown following a series of deadly accidents and shutdowns.

A 1999 reprocessing plant accident outside Tokyo killed two workers and exposed hundreds to radioactivity, while in 2004 five workers were killed at a plant in western Japan in the country's worst nuclear plant accident.

Safety problems have also left its nuclear fuel-cycle program in a shambles. The country's first experimental fast-breeder reactor, Monju, was shut down after more than a ton of volatile liquid sodium leaked from its cooling system in 1995.

"The Japanese public is extremely sensitive toward radioactive materials and there is no doubt that they are very concerned about the incidents," Kyoto University professor Hajimu Yamana said.

"Since any accident of this nature is creepy from the public's perspective, it is only natural that such accidents will undermine the public's support for nuclear power."

Palestinian Prime Minister Calls For A Truce With Israel And New Talks (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

GAZA, July 8 — The Palestinian prime minister from Hamas, Ismail Haniya, on Saturday called for a mutual cease-fire with Israel after Israeli forces pulled out of most of the northern Gaza Strip, perhaps responding to Israeli hints that a package deal might be possible to end a military and political crisis.

Eleven days after Israeli forces entered Gaza to free an abducted Israeli soldier and stop rocket fire by militants, they continued to hold territory in northern Gaza, east of Beit Hanun and the Erez crossing, and in the south, near Rafah. Early

DOJ_NMG_0039443

Saturday, the military also moved into eastern Gaza near the Karni crossing with Israel, where there were fierce clashes with militants on the eastern edge of Gaza City.

An Israeli official said in response to Mr. Haniya that there would be no cease-fire until the release of the Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit.

The violence continued Saturday evening, when an Israeli airstrike near Karni killed four Palestinians, including three members of the Hajaj family, who were sitting in their garden. Among the dead were Rawan Hajaj, 6, her brother Muhammad, 20, and their mother, Um Ayman Hajaj. The Israeli Army said it had been aiming at "a cell of armed gunmen" walking in the area and was checking to see whether a missile fired at them might have been responsible.

In fighting earlier in the day, another four Palestinians died, bringing the death toll to at least 44 Palestinians and one Israeli since Thursday. Nearly 20 Palestinians were wounded Saturday, including a 1-year-old, bringing the total of wounded to more than 130, according to Dr. Jumaa al-Saqqa of Al Shifa hospital, Gaza's largest.

In Israel, a cabinet minister, Ophir Pines-Paz of the Labor Party, suggested that the crisis could end through a package deal of the kind that Egypt had been trying to promote — the release of Corporal Shalit, coupled with a more formal cease-fire and an Israeli promise to release a number of Palestinian prisoners as the cease-fire is shown to have taken hold.

"We have a great interest in changing the rules of the game," said Mr. Pines-Paz, who is also a member of Israel's inner security cabinet. "If we reach a situation in which there are no kidnappings, no rockets, no tunnels, no raids into our territory, certainly Israel will have to reciprocate," he told Israel Radio.

On Friday, Avi Dichter, the minister of internal security, said that once the soldier was released, "if Israel will be obliged to in the framework of this agreement, within the calm that will be imposed on the ground by the Palestinian Authority, to release Palestinian prisoners as a gesture to this calm, Israel knows how to do that."

"In fact," he said, "Israel has done it before in the past."

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has ruled out a prisoner trade, and Israel is eager to try to deter kidnappings by showing that it will not bargain for the corporal with his militant captors. But Mr. Olmert had promised to release prisoners to the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, at their first formal summit meeting, Mr. Abbas said Friday. Former Prime Minister Ariel Sharon did something similar when the two leaders met in February 2005.

In his statement, Mr. Haniya said, "In order to get out of the current crisis, it is necessary that all parties restore calm on the basis of mutually stopping all military operations," and he called for the renewal of talks.

His spokesman, Ghazi Hamad, said: "We asked for a mutual cease-fire and a return to the place of calmness. Israeli forces should pull out of the Gaza Strip and stop their aggression."

An Israeli military spokesman said the army's objectives in northern Gaza had been met, even though the number of Qassam rockets hitting Israel had increased, with 14 launched Friday. Capt. Noa Meir said the Israelis "are in an ongoing operation, and we're not ruling out going back into the north again." She said Israel had damaged "the terrorist infrastructure, the rocket-launching infrastructure and put general pressure on the Hamas government to release Corporal Shalit."

The Israelis say they also destroyed Qassam rocket manufacturing sites and storehouses.

Israeli troops moved in through the Karni crossing to look for tunnels and explosives, the army said, with engineering troops supported by armor. Early Saturday morning, the Israelis blew up a tunnel near Karni from the air, Captain Meir said. Later on Saturday, there were some serious clashes with Palestinian militiamen, with exchanges of machine-gun fire and some helicopter-fired missiles.

Palestinian militants in the area, a Hamas stronghold known as Shijaia, were seen planting explosives along streets and guarding street corners.

Overhead was the steady buzzing of a missile-armed Israeli drone aircraft, which the Palestinians here call the zananah, a made-up word for the aircraft's buzzing sound. Late Saturday, the Israelis pulled back through the crossing.

In Beit Lahiya, the scene of the worst fighting so far, residents cleaned up their houses on Saturday after the Israeli troops departed. The troops began moved out at about 1 a.m. and were mostly back into Israel by 9 a.m. They left behind them broken walls, smashed houses and angry Palestinians.

In the Atatrah neighborhood, Muhammad Erheem, shaken, showed a reporter through his large house on a hill, which 25 Israeli soldiers commandeered on Thursday night before leaving Saturday morning. They locked the 13 members of the Erheem family in a single storeroom, letting them in small groups, under guard, only to use the toilet, Mr. Erheem said.

The troops moved into the compound behind an armored bulldozer that crushed two smaller buildings — a stable and a water pump house — and also killed a number of prize goats, who were buried alive in the sand as the bulldozer passed over.

"I could hear my goats screaming above the noise," Mr. Erheem said. "Then they banged on the door and I opened it, and 10 soldiers came in, very agitated, and ordered me to strip, and one cocked his pistol at me and shouted, 'Where is the weapon?' I speak fluent Hebrew, thank God, and I said I had no weapon and there was no weapon in the house."

DOJ_NMG_0039444

The soldiers made holes in the walls to establish sniper positions, he said, and dismantled furniture, propping beds up against walls to help protect them from any incoming fire and "using my house like a hotel."

But Mr. Erheem was shocked that the soldiers brought wine into his house, and that one of them stripped down to his underwear in the heat and walked around that way in front of the women. Mr. Erheem also pointed out a Koran that had been ripped apart and scattered.

His son, Bakr Erheem, 25, had been married five days before, and there was a big party, the house still full of wedding bouquets and unopened gifts. Their wedding bed was dismantled and broken, holes tore through the concrete walls. Outside, his two water-tanker trucks — he had a business selling filtered water — were smashed, their engines pushed into the driver's cab.

Mr. Erheem said one soldier took a gold necklace, and he showed a purse he said had had gold jewelry in it. The soldiers had replaced the gold, he charged, with a gold-colored piece of metal that looked to be part of an antenna.

The Israeli Army said that troops had regulations about requisitioning houses and that it would investigate all allegations of wrongdoing.

Israel Rejects Hamas' Bid For Cease-fire (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, July 9, 2006

The head of the Hamas-led Palestinian government called Saturday for a truce to halt the Israeli offensive in Gaza, but Israel demanded that Hamas first free a captured Israeli soldier and halt rocket attacks on its southern towns.

Israeli troops scaled back their operations to two spots in Gaza as fighting claimed the lives of six Palestinians, raising the death toll to at least 44 since the incursion began last week.

Israeli aircraft targeted militants in western Gaza City early Sunday, firing a missile at them and wounding four, one seriously, Palestinian hospital officials said. The Israeli military had no immediate comment.

Aircraft also fired a missile at a bridge in northern Gaza, collapsing it and knocking out a power transformer serving the town of Beit Hanoun, witnesses said. The military said it hit the bridge to stop militants using it to move rockets.

Israeli troops entered the Gaza Strip on June 28, three days after Hamas militants captured an Israeli soldier during a cross-border raid. Since then Israel has been battering the coastal strip with heavy artillery barrages and airstrikes.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh urged Israel on Saturday to halt the offensive, release Palestinian prisoners and resume indirect talks about the captured soldier through international mediators. But he did not offer to free Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19.

"We want to activate this initiative to bring the region out of this whirlpool of blood," Haniyeh said while touring Beit Lahiya, the hardest-hit Gaza town.

Hamas often sends out conflicting signals, however, in part because of divisions between its more militant leaders in Syria and more pragmatic politicians in Gaza. Israel has accused the Hamas political chief, Syrian-based Khaled Mashaal, of ordering Shalit's capture.

Aides to Israel Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said he would not accept a truce until Shalit was freed. Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said rocket attacks must also stop first.

The militants have demanded the release of Palestinian prisoners held by Israel in exchange for Shalit.

Israeli aircraft, intensifying their operations around Gaza City, carried out two strikes Saturday evening in an outlying neighborhood. The military was investigating whether one of the strikes, which it said was aimed at militants, hit a house, killing a mother and two of her children, including a 6-year-old girl. Four other family members were wounded.

The force of the blast tore open one of the house's outer walls. The courtyard outside was stained with blood. The lifeless body of 6-year-old Rawan Hajaj was carried inside a Gaza City hospital, wrapped in a red blanket. Her mother, Amona, and 20-year-old brother Mohammed were also killed, and six other people were wounded.

The United Nations blamed Israel for a burgeoning crisis, including deaths, injuries and harm to children, created by its offensive in Gaza.

"Unless urgent action is taken," a three-page statement released Saturday said, "we are facing a humanitarian crisis that will have far-reaching consequences."

Israel pulled its tanks out of Beit Lahiya, leaving a wide swath of destruction after trying to carve out a buffer zone against rockets there. Tanks driving through narrow streets sheared off outer walls of buildings, tore down electricity poles and chopped up asphalt. Bulldozers churned fields and knocked down trees and greenhouses.

Israeli troops also left nearby Beit Hanoun and three Jewish settlements in northern Gaza that Israel abandoned nearly a year ago when it unilaterally withdrew from the territory.

Palestinian witnesses said Israeli tanks moved into an abandoned Israeli settlement in northern Gaza early Sunday, a day after pulling back.

DOJ_NMG_0039445

An Israeli military spokesman denied the claim.

On Sunday morning, Israeli soldiers were in position only at the defunct airport just across from the Israeli border in southern Gaza and in the Gaza City-Karni area, the military said.

Capt. Jacob Dallal, an army spokesman, said troops repositioned Saturday because they had accomplished their objectives in northern Gaza — drawing militants into direct combat.

"We much prefer to engage these people with the army as opposed to having these people fire rockets at schools in Ashkelon and Sderot," he said, referring to two southern Israeli cities that have come under militant rocket fire.

___

Associated Press writer Sarah El Deeb in Beit Lahiya, Gaza Strip contributed to this report.

Israelis Withdraw From North Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Palestinian Woman, Son, Daughter Killed

BEIT LAHIYA, Gaza Strip, July 8 -- Israeli tanks and bulldozers withdrew from northern Gaza before dawn Saturday after two days of heavy fighting, leaving behind a strip of churned fields, wrecked roads and a few heavily damaged homes.

Along Gaza's eastern border, where more Israeli armor entered the strip very early Saturday, the military stepped up its activity. On Saturday night, an explosion killed a woman and two of her children on the eastern edge of Gaza City.

The cause of the explosion, which left four other children of the Hajaj family wounded, remained unclear. Palestinian witnesses said an Israeli artillery shell struck the family's house, but an Israeli spokesman said the military was investigating whether the house had been hit in an airstrike.

"Without warning, without reason, the shell came into my first floor," Fareed Hajaj, the husband and father of the dead, said outside the morgue at al-Shifa Hospital as he prepared to identify the bodies of his wife and two children inside.

The Israelis' abrupt pullback from the northern end of the Gaza Strip sharply reduced the overall intensity of their military operations in Gaza, which have been aimed at recovering a captured soldier, reducing the Palestinians' steady rocket fire into southern Israel and weakening the radical Hamas movement's hold on the Palestinian government. More than 40 Palestinians, most of them gunmen, and one Israeli soldier have been killed in 11 days of fighting.

Although military officials warned that operations had not ended, Israel's departure from its deepest position inside Gaza may signal the government's desire to pursue talks to win the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, who was taken by Palestinian gunmen in a June 25 raid on an army post just outside Gaza. But it was unclear how the deaths of the Hajaj family members, which drew a crowd to the morgue, would influence developments.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, whose armed wing is one of the groups holding Shalit, issued a statement Saturday calling on both sides to cease military action and to revive talks with Egyptian mediators attempting to broker Shalit's release. The groups holding Shalit have demanded that Israel release some Palestinian prisoners in exchange for his release.

"To get out of the current crisis, it is necessary that all parties restore calm on the basis of mutually stopping all military operations," the statement said.

Israeli officials reiterated the government's unwavering rejection of a prisoner swap. In addition, officials in the office of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said he did not support the suggestion by his public security minister, Avi Dichter, on Friday that an end to the rocket attacks and Shalit's safe release would prompt Israel to free some Palestinian prisoners in the future.

"There will be no cease-fire until the Palestinians return Israel's soldier safe and the firing of rockets is ceased," an Israeli official said Saturday.

Early Saturday, Israeli tanks and bulldozers entered Gaza near the Karni crossing, the main passage for cargo into the strip, in search of cross-border tunnels like the one used by Palestinian gunmen to attack Shalit's post farther south. Hospital officials said two Palestinian gunmen and a local journalist were killed in fighting.

The blast that killed Amna Hajaj, 45, her son Mohammed, 23, and her 6-year-old daughter, Rawan, occurred just after nightfall. Fareed Hajaj said he was standing in the street outside his house in the east Gaza City neighborhood of Shajaiyeh when a blast destroyed much of it.

As friends and relatives sought to console him outside the morgue, Hajaj said Israeli artillery shells had been landing a football field away from his home since the previous day. An Israeli military spokesman said no artillery was being fired near the area when the blast occurred but that an airstrike had targeted suspected Palestinian gunmen in the neighborhood at about the same time.

DOJ_NMG_0039446

After several days in which fighting was centered here in the orchards, houses and sandy streets of Atatara, in Beit Lahiya, hundreds of Palestinian residents combed through the damaged neighborhood.

Like the fighting, most of the damage was confined to a swath of dunes, olive and citrus groves and houses roughly a half-mile long and equally wide along this city's western edge. The Israeli military pushed into the area to increase the distance between fields that officials say are used by Palestinian rocket launchers and their targets in southern Israel.

"This is terror," said Hussein Zayed, 28, a member of the Palestinian presidential guard, as he looked over his ravaged home behind a wall where palm, lemon and olive trees uprooted by Israeli bulldozers were being gathered into piles. "Not a single shot was fired from this place."

Dozens of Israeli troops took up positions in houses here as the operation began, including in Zayed's living room. His second story was strewn with the pieces of a shattered television set, sofa cushions and masonry from the blown-out wall that now offers a view of a ruined greenhouse in the courtyard below.

A breeze through the jagged hole slowly pushed a twisted fan dangling from a ceiling pocked with shrapnel marks and bullet holes. The computer Zayed used to pursue an accounting degree at Al-Quds Open University was in pieces, the hens and pigeons he kept in a coop on the first floor gone. The soldiers had left behind only a bag of sandwich rolls.

Itidal al-Ajouri had dashed from her family's apartment during intense fighting Friday afternoon, along with her six children. Her husband, Salah, a colonel in the Palestinian National Forces, was at work at the time and said he could hear gunfire crackling behind her when she phoned him for help.

The family returned Saturday to a picture of devastation: piles of cassette tapes, splintered cabinet doors, clothes hangers and blankets thrown about the previously neat apartment. Bullet holes in the building behind theirs suggested the apartment had been caught in intense crossfire, probably leaving the family with little choice but to find a new place to live.

"We will close this up now and stay somewhere else," said Rasha, who is studying microbiology at Al-Azhar University in Gaza. "What else can we do?"

Gaza Death Toll Mounts As Israel Rejects Ceasefire (AFP)

By Sakher Abu El Oun

AFP, July 9, 2006

Three Palestinian family members, including a six-year-old girl, have been killed in an air strike near Gaza City as Israel rejected a call by Hamas premier Ismail Haniya for a mutual ceasefire.

The girl, her elder brother and her mother were killed in the air raid, which according to an army spokesman targeted a group of militants east of Gaza City.

Despite initial denials, the Israeli army later confirmed carrying out an airstrike in the neighbourhood of Sejayun.

"We are currently examining the exact details of the strike," an army source told AFP.

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan meanwhile demanded immediate access for UN workers and humanitarian relief supplies to the Gaza Strip, saying he was "extremely concerned about the dangerous situation in the occupied Palestinian Territory."

Four more Palestinians were killed earlier as Israeli forces shifted the focus of their Gaza campaign to end militant rocket fire and free a captured soldier to the seaside strip's eastern frontier.

As Israel pushed on into Gaza, officials brushed aside Haniya's call for a "return to a situation of calm on the basis of a halt to all military operations by both sides".

"We do not hold negotiations with terrorists. They must first return the kidnapped soldier unharmed and cease their fire," an official in Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office told AFP.

"We will decide on our next moves according to the steps taken by the Palestinian government," he said, asking not to be named.

Haniya stressed that his Hamas government was determined to solve the problem through diplomatic channels in a "peaceful" manner.

"It is necessary that Israel halt its military operation in the Gaza Strip and withdraw its forces," said a statement from Haniya.

"More efforts are required from all parties to resolve the current crisis in order to bring an end to the Israeli aggression and resolve the question of the Israeli soldier through serious negotiations," it added.

A Hamas spokesman slammed Israel for brushing aside the Hamas ceasefire offer.

"The Israeli rejection is wrong," said Ghazi Hamad. "This initiative must be seized on in order to find a suitable solution."

Earlier, dozens of Israeli tanks backed by helicopter gunships and drones passed through the Karni and Nahal Oz crossings, advancing one kilometer (half a mile) to the outskirts of Gaza City where clashes broke out.

DOJ_NMG_0039447

Armored vehicles fired missiles, killing a member of the Palestinian security forces in Zeitun, while three more Palestinians were reported killed by Israeli tank shelling in the nearby Shujaya neighborhood.

Israeli armored vehicles took up positions in open farmland on Gaza's eastern border and assembled in industrial areas.

Israeli units meanwhile pulled back from northern Gaza, three days after launching a deadly incursion in the area, Israeli and Palestinian sources said.

On Thursday, Israel sent troops deep into the northern Gaza Strip, occupying a buffer zone in the territory from which it withdrew last September.

Israel has vowed to use everything in its power to increase the pressure on the embattled Hamas-led government to free 19-year-old Corporal Gilad Shalit and to stop rocket attacks.

Another Hamas militant died from wounds suffered during a gunfight with Israeli forces Thursday.

Forty Palestinians and one Israeli soldier have been killed since Israel launched its massive military operation in Gaza late Wednesday.

As efforts to reach a breakthrough in the crisis stalled, Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas left the Gaza Strip for the first time in two weeks to travel to his home in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

He has called on the international community to stop Israel's "inhumane aggression" to give mediators a chance to free Shalit.

UN chief Annan has called for an immediate halt to what he called Israel's "disproportionate use of force" but added that Palestinian militants should nonetheless release the captured soldier.

He said in Saturday's statement: "The passage of foodstuffs and other essential supplies through the Karni commercial crossing should be ensured and restrictions on movement and access for UN agencies should be lifted forthwith.

"I am appealing for urgent action to alleviate the desperate humanitarian situation of the civilian population."

Annan noted that Israeli airstrikes on Gaza's only power plant have impacted Gaza's hospitals, flour mills, water and sanitation systems, and called for the Israeli government to "act expeditiously" to replace the destroyed equipment.

Hamas -- whose government offices have been targets of Israeli missile strikes -- warned that the assault was complicating the fate of Shalit, who it said was being well looked-after.

"Soldier Gilad is being well treated, in a humane manner in keeping with the values of our religion," said the movement, whose armed wing claimed joint responsibility for the June 25 attack in which Shalit was seized.

"Continued Zionist crimes will only harden the Palestinian side even more," it warned.

Calls For Truce Fuel Hope In Gaza Standoff (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Both sides appear to be open to a larger accord that would give them room to maneuver.

GAZA CITY — Both Israel and the Hamas-led Palestinian government expressed hope Saturday of arranging a cease-fire to end their bloody 2-week-old confrontation over the capture of an Israeli soldier.

Israeli troops and armor also pulled back from a swath of northern Gaza they had held for two days, though military commanders warned that they could reenter the area at any time to quell rocket fire by Palestinian militants. Israeli forces remained dug in at a disused airport in the southern Gaza Strip.

Early today, Israeli airstrikes targeted a bridge in northern Gaza, an area in southern Gaza described by the army as a training camp for militants, and a group of gunmen near the main commercial crossing at Karni. Several Palestinians were reported injured.

The calls for a cease-fire came from Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a senior Hamas official, and an Israeli Cabinet minister, Ophir Pines-Paz, who raised the possibility of a comprehensive accord that would free the captive and halt rocket attacks.

It was the second consecutive day that a senior Israeli official had spoken publicly of the prospect of a compromise in the standoff over the soldier, 19-year-old Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was seized June 25 in a cross-border raid.

Both sides have powerful incentives for finding a negotiated solution, but serious obstacles remain to any agreement. With thousands of Israeli troops and heavily armed Palestinian guerrillas in close proximity to densely populated areas of Gaza, conflict could flare again at any moment.

And if the young soldier is killed by his captors, Israel almost certainly will unleash a prolonged and punishing onslaught. Israeli officials say they believe he is alive and unharmed except for minor injuries suffered during the raid, in which two other Israeli soldiers were killed.

DOJ_NMG_0039448

Although Israel appears to be dropping its insistence that it will not trade Palestinian prisoners for Shalit, the government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Saturday that the soldier's safe return must precede any concessions. A day earlier, Cabinet minister Avi Dichter had spoken of freeing prisoners as a "reciprocal gesture" if Shalit's captors released him.

One major question is whether Haniyeh has the clout to force militant factions who hold Shalit — and who are thought to answer primarily to the Islamist group's exiled leadership in Damascus, the Syrian capital — to agree to any deal.

Haniyeh's statement, issued through government spokesman Ghazi Hamad, was vaguely worded but appeared to hold out the prospect that militants would halt their rocket fire if Israel withdrew its troops.

"If we want to get out of the current crisis, it is necessary to return to calm, on the basis of a mutual halt to all military operations," the statement said.

The Hamas government, already broke and diplomatically isolated, has been under increasing pressure since the capture of Shalit. Israel has bombed Haniyeh's office and a key ministry building and threatened to assassinate senior figures in the government.

But in the course of the fighting, Hamas' street following has appeared to be as strong as ever, if not stronger.

Framing a prisoner swap in the context of some larger accord could offer a face-saving way out for both Olmert's and Haniyeh's governments. Hamas is unlikely to defy Palestinian street sentiment and release the soldier without some gains to point to. Olmert would need to somehow justify an about-face in his unequivocal declarations that no prisoners would be freed.

There has been no direct diplomatic contact between the two sides. Mediation is being carried out primarily by Egypt.

Pines-Paz, a member of Olmert's "security Cabinet" of senior advisors, suggested Saturday that Israel was interested in "changing the rules of the game" in Gaza.

"If we reach a situation in which there are no kidnappings, no rockets, no tunnels, no raids into our territory, certainly Israel will have to reciprocate," Pines-Paz told Israel Radio.

Fighting during Israel's 11-day-old offensive reached a peak Thursday. Twenty-six Palestinians were killed that day or died later of wounds, and an Israeli soldier was also killed.

There were scattered exchanges of fire Saturday between Israeli troops and Palestinian gunmen, including an early-morning confrontation in the Shajaiya neighborhood on the outskirts of Gaza City that left three Palestinians dead. It was the first time during the incursion that a clash had taken place so close to the territory's main metropolis.

At nightfall, an explosion rocked a house in Shajaiya, and Palestinian medics said a father and his young daughter were killed.

However, the Israeli military said there was no artillery or tank fire in the area at the time.

The army said it launched an airstrike Saturday evening near Karni, which is near Shajaiya, a longtime Hamas stronghold. But a spokesman said the strike took place in an open area, not the neighborhood itself.

In the northern village of Beit Lahiya, the scene of Thursday's fiercest fighting, departing Israeli troops left behind a landscape of shell-pocked buildings, toppled power poles and streets chewed up by tank treads.

Many Palestinians who huddled in their homes for two days emerged blinking and shaken to survey the damage inflicted by airstrikes, artillery barrages and firefights.

"My kids were so frightened the entire time that they wet their beds and vomited — we simply couldn't comfort them," said Bassam Kanwa, 30.

Even with a relative lull in fighting, which coincided with the Jewish Sabbath, Gaza remained so dangerous that U.S. officials sought to ensure that American citizens could leave the territory if they wished.

Gaza is effectively sealed off, but U.S. consular officials Saturday arranged for a convoy to evacuate 65 American citizens, most of them Palestinians holding dual nationality.

Rockets Create A 'Balance Of Fear' With Israel, Gaza Residents Say (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

JERUSALEM, July 8 — The pattern has recurred time and again for several years: Palestinians fire rockets from northern Gaza that cause damage or casualties only occasionally, yet prompt a tough Israeli response, like the offensive now under way.

Why, then, do the Palestinians persist in firing the crude, inaccurate rockets when there is virtual certainty that the damage they inflict will be far less than the punishment they will suffer?

Palestinians in Gaza offer a host of reasons, all based on the emotion of the conflict rather than the logic of warfare.

"We know we can't achieve military equality," said Salah Bardawil, a Palestinian legislator who serves as spokesman for the Hamas faction in parliament. "But when a person suffers huge pain he has to respond somehow. This is how we defend ourselves. This is how we tell the world we are here."

DOJ_NMG_0039449

Palestinians often talk about their rockets and suicide bombings creating a "balance of fear" with Israel, even if they cannot match Israel's weaponry.

"Why should we be the only ones who live in fear?" said Muhammad Abu Oukal, a student at the Islamic University in Gaza City. "With these rockets, the Israelis feel fear, too. We will have to live in peace together, or live in fear together."

Palestinians also see the rockets as retaliation for Israeli airstrikes, or an act of solidarity with West Bank Palestinians when fighting heats up on that front.

Israel, meanwhile, describes the rocket attacks as terrorism and argues that any rationale for firing the rockets evaporated when the government withdrew its soldiers and settlers from Gaza last summer.

"We left Gaza," Brig. Gen. Ido Nehushtan said. "There can be no possible justification for launching these rockets, and we cannot tolerate a situation where they are being fired at our citizens every day."

Since Israel made a push into northern Gaza on Thursday, at least 40 Palestinians and one Israeli soldier have been killed. The Palestinians have fired more than 25 rockets. Only one resulted in injuries, lightly wounding three people in Sderot on Friday. Several misfired so badly that they came down in Gaza, and one splashed in the Mediterranean, the Israeli military said.

"These rockets are all improvised and are not accurate, but they are still lethal," General Nehushtan said.

Palestinians in Gaza fired several thousand mortar shells and rockets from 2001 to 2005, killing 12 Israelis — 8 of them in Israel and 4 in Gaza, the Israeli military said.

Since the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, the Palestinians have fired about 700 rockets at southern Israel, causing injuries and damage, but no deaths.

Palestinians fire most of the rockets in and around two northern Gaza farming towns, Beit Hanun and Beit Lahiya, which in turn have been hardest hit by the Israeli attacks.

Many residents belong to households that prospered from lemon and orange groves in their families for generations. In contrast, the militants firing the rockets tend to come from the slums in and around Gaza City, several miles to the south. The citrus groves allowed the militants to get close enough to the border to reach targets in Israel, and the endless rows of trees provided cover.

When Israeli forces began bulldozing the citrus groves several years ago, some Palestinian residents in the towns confronted the militants and even fought with them when they came to launch rockets.

"But when we see this Israeli escalation, I think that any means of resistance is justified," said Said al-Masri, a 38-year-old engineer from Beit Hanun.

Today, with tensions boiling over, support for the rockets is widespread in the northern towns, even if it means local communities will endure another heavy assault from the Israelis.

Khadija Abu Odah, a 57-year-old Beit Hanun resident, said her home was destroyed during an Israeli attack two years ago, and now, "we have nothing to lose."

"I hope we can build rockets to hit Tel Aviv."

"Why did the Israelis destroy my house?" she said. "My family didn't shoot any rockets."

She said militants previously fired rockets from the areas around her home, though she said she could do nothing to stop it. Today, she said, the rockets can reach Israel from farther away, and the militants do not need to come to her area, which is relatively close to the border.

The militant Islamic faction Hamas raised the stakes considerably when it fired three rockets on Tuesday and Wednesday that traveled farther than usual, reaching the coastal city of Ashkelon, about six miles beyond Gaza's border.

Israel is thinly populated in the region, and the primary target for the Palestinian rockets has been Sderot, a poor town of about 30,000 that is barely a mile beyond Gaza's perimeter fence and well within the range of the Qassams, which can travel about five miles.

The Palestinians had been trying, with only limited success, to increase the range of the rockets and had been hitting the outskirts of Ashkelon recently.

On Tuesday, a rocket with two engines instead of the usual one traveled about 7.5 miles and landed in the center of the city, hitting a deserted high school. It appeared to have been fired from Dugit, a Jewish settlement on Gaza's border that was evacuated last year, the military said. Ashkelon is one of Israel's larger cities, with about 120,000 residents, increasing the likelihood that a rocket could cause many casualties.

The Palestinians have not yet fired any rockets from the West Bank — a development that would cause even greater alarm in Israel because they could be launched within a few miles of several main cities.

The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, has sharply criticized the Palestinian rocket fire as counterproductive. He has tried to persuade the militants to hold their fire, though he has never made a concerted push with the Palestinian security forces. Even Hamas, which initiated the rocket campaign in 2001, largely held its fire after agreeing to a truce early last year.

DOJ_NMG_0039450

But Hamas has shared its technology and rockets with other factions, which now have their own rockets, and within days of Israel's departure from Gaza last summer, the factions resumed the shelling of Israel.

The Hamas-led government has not sought to stop the rockets, and Hamas recently resumed its own attacks after Israeli airstrikes in Gaza that killed many militants and civilians.

Last month, the Israeli security forces killed 42 Palestinians, including 24 who were not involved in the fighting, according to B'Tselem, an Israeli human rights group. Most of the deaths were in Gaza. Three Israelis were killed in June, two of them soldiers and one a civilian.

Contender Alleges Mexico Vote Was Rigged (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

Lopez Obrador's Allegations and Plans for Legal Challenge Fire Up Supporters at Rally

MEXICO CITY, July 8 -- Downtown Mexico City swelled Saturday with the accumulated frustration and rage of the poor, who were stoked into a sign-waving, fist-pumping frenzy by new fraud allegations that failed populist candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador hopes will overturn the results of Mexico's presidential election.

López Obrador ignited the smoldering emotions of his followers Saturday morning, alleging for the first time that Mexico's electoral commission had rigged its computers before the July 2 election to ensure the half-percentage-point victory of Felipe Calderón, a champion of free trade. In a news conference before the rally, López Obrador called Calderón "an employee" of Mexico's powerful upper classes and said a victory by his conservative opponent would be "morally impossible."

López Obrador added a new layer of complexity to the crisis by saying he not only would challenge the results in the country's special elections court but also would attempt to have the election declared illegal by Mexico's Supreme Court. That strategy presages a constitutional confrontation because according to many legal experts the special elections court is the only body that can hear election challenges.

Calderón was declared the winner Thursday and has begun publicly presenting his plans for Mexico, even though López Obrador has refused to concede. European Union election observers have said they found no significant irregularities in the vote, and many Mexicans appeared to accept Calderón as their next president.

López Obrador's approach pairs legal maneuvers with mass public pressure. On Saturday, he gave a mega-display of street power, drawing an estimated 280,000 people into the city center on a humid, drizzly afternoon, according to a Mexico City government estimate.

The crowd chanted, "Strong, strong!" when López Obrador stepped to the microphone. The former Mexico City mayor then declared that the electoral commission had "played with the hopes" of millions of Mexicans by allegedly rigging the vote total. Thousands chanted back: "You are not alone!"

López Obrador also told the crowd that he was organizing a march to the capital Wednesday from all over Mexico, including states hundreds of miles distant.

"This is, and will continue to be, a peaceful movement," he said. Seconds later, he announced another mass rally, this one for July 16, at which the crowd raucously yelled back: "What time?"

During his 40-minute address, López Obrador stressed Mexico's class divide, accusing "powerful interests" of trying to deny democratic freedoms to "us, the poor." The crowd, which spilled into side streets off the square and may have been the largest of the presidential campaign, chanted, "Presidente, Presidente!"

Blaring kazoos competed with the thump and boom of massive speakers blasting salsa rhythms and a Spanish-language homage to López Obrador set to the tune of the American pop song, "Love Is in the Air."

López Obrador had called his followers into the large downtown square, the Zocalo, the backdrop for generations of Mexican revolutionary fervor, to lay out his long-shot case for overturning Calderón's apparent presidential victory. But he got more than that: He got a moment of mass catharsis, an outrageously loud, communal venting.

"The Mexican people are awakening," said Martín García Trujillo, a farm laborer from the state of Michoacan who had left at midnight for the six-hour bus ride to the capital. "We know Andrés Manuel won. They just won't let it happen. We can't take this anymore."

López Obrador wants a vote-by-vote count, which would require opening sealed vote packets from more than 130,000 polling stations. Electoral commission officials have sided with Calderón's strategists, who argue that the law does not allow for the packets to be opened unless tally sheets attached to the packets appear to have been altered. López Obrador said that only

DOJ_NMG_0039451

2,600 vote packets were opened Tuesday and Wednesday during a marathon official count, which shrank Calderón's lead from 400,000 votes after a preliminary vote to 230,000.

Thousands of López Obrador's supporters, many of whom had marched across the city for hours, chanted "Voto por voto, casilla por casilla" -- vote by vote, polling place by polling place -- as they streamed into the Zocalo on Saturday. Many entered the square waving the yellow flags of López Obrador's Democratic Revolutionary Party, or PRD.

Street vendors hawked T-shirts bearing the now-ubiquitous cartoon depiction of López Obrador's face next to the word "Smile." Speakers screamed, "Vote by vote!" as their images flickered across a huge screen suspended above the stage.

x "They stole this from us," said Concepción Myen, 68, a lifelong Mexico City resident who is unemployed. "This is the worst thing that can happen to Mexico."x

Myen personifies the López Obrador target voter. She is a senior citizen and said she had looked forward to the monthly pensions López Obrador promised. She is also a single mother, who struggled to raise her child alone, and said her life would have been much better if the aid program López Obrador had vowed to give single mothers had existed when she needed it.

The anger on display in the square grows from decades of perceived indignities and a sense of persecution by a succession of ruling parties. García Trujillo, the farm worker from Michoacan, recalled feeling the same anguish in 1988 when the PRD candidate, Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, lost a presidential race that many international observers have said was stolen by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI. He said he felt the same rage two years ago when outgoing President Vicente Fox's administration unsuccessfully attempted to impeach López Obrador, who was then the mayor of Mexico City.

Now García Trujillo's anger is directed at another institutional power, Mexico's Federal Electoral Institute, which has a stellar international reputation but is accused by López Obrador of "manipulating" the results.

The electoral institute will cede control of the election to Mexico's special elections court, which has until Sept. 6 to decide whether to certify the results. Calderón has not waited for the elections court, and neither have world leaders. He accepted congratulatory calls on Friday from President Bush and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. But López Obrador cautioned against such formalities, saying, "Right now, there is no president-elect."

After López Obrador left the stage Saturday, the crowd lingered. Someone started singing the national anthem, and countless voices joined in its rallying cry: "Mexicans, to the shout of war!"

Leftist Predicts Unrest Without Complete Recount Of Mexican Election (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr. And Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY, July 8 — While the announced winner of last Sunday's presidential election, Felipe Calderón, kept a low profile on Saturday, his leftist rival led a rally of at least 150,000 people, charged the polling had been marred by fraud and suggested there would be civil unrest without a vote-by-vote recount.

"If there is not democracy, there will be instability," said the rival, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, at a news conference just hours before he addressed his angry and defiant supporters in Mexico City's central plaza.

At 5:50 p.m., he took the stage in the Zócalo, the historic central square in front of the National Palace, to fire a broadside at what he described as an oligarchy of top-level politicians and businessmen.

"We are aware we are confronting a powerful group, economically and politically, that are accustomed to winning at all costs, without moral scruples," he told the crowd. He maintained that this group had "conspired against democracy" and that "they are the ones who now want to put a servant in the presidency."

Mr. López Obrador called on his supporters to march Wednesday from every electoral district in the country to the capital, an echo of his 1994 march from Tabasco to the capital to protest his defeat in the governor's race.

"Let it be clear, " he said. "This is a peaceful movement, and we will never fall for the provocations of our adversaries."

Mr. Calderón, of the conservative National Action Party, effectively ceded the day's spotlight to Mr. López Obrador. After he was announced the victor on Thursday by a narrow margin of 243,000 votes, he had begun to give hints about how he would approach issues like trade, globalization and dealings with the United States on immigration. And on Friday he kept a whirlwind schedule of meetings and appearances.

But on Saturday, Mr. Calderón, the former energy minister, stayed out of the public eye.

Mr. López Obrador, the former Mexico City mayor and firebrand leader of the leftist Democratic Revolutionary Party, spent the day laying out his arguments for a recount and revving up his followers.

He said his opponent's supporters had resorted to fraud and vote-buying in northern states where the conservative party is dominant, like Jalisco and Guanajuato. He also said he had been the victim of a smear campaign on television and radio that far exceeded campaign spending limits.

DOJ_NMG_0039452

He said that the Federal Electoral Institute should have recounted Sunday's ballots during the official tally. He pointed out that mistakes favoring Mr. Calderón were found in about 2,600 cases where officials did recount votes, when tally sheets were missing or contained errors.

He said he would present a case for recounting the votes to the Federal Electoral Tribunal on Sunday, and that he would also challenge the validity of the election before the Supreme Court, arguing that President Vicente Fox had interfered with it.

Later, he took his case to the people. Tens of thousands of angry and defiant people wearing his party's yellow colors and carrying banners and flags gathered in the Zócalo throughout the afternoon. They were young and old, unemployed and professional, dark-skinned and light-skinned, and they had traveled from places as far as the states of Michoacán and Tabasco.

Mr. López Obrador spoke for about 40 minutes, calling his adversaries traitors to democracy. The crowd chanted, "You are not alone."

Gloria Aceves, 63, had been waiting next to the stage since 9 a.m. Her husband died trying to cross the Rio Grande into the United States, she said, and she depends on a monthly grant from the city established by Mr. López Obrador, who championed the poor in his campaign. "If I have to die here," she said, "here I will die supporting him."

At his Saturday news conference, Mr. López Obrador declined to answer several times when asked what he would do if the courts refused a recount, saying he had faith the judges would order one. "Peace is the fruit of justice," he said.

"What are they afraid of?" he asked. "What is it they don't want to open the packets and count them again?" He added: "Why the hurry if we are talking about such a fundamental issue?"

On Friday afternoon, Mr. Calderón seemed confident that no legal challenge would stand up in court.

"My triumph is clear and definitive," he told a meeting of foreign reporters. "There are no legal elements that sustain the possibility of a complaint. In this election, the votes have already been counted, vote by vote, at the time they should have been counted, at the closing of the polls, as happens in all the world."

Mr. Calderón's campaign cited the volatile protests Mr. López Obrador led after his 1994 loss in arguing that he could be a danger to Mexico. And several political analysts have said that Mr. López Obrador's behavior since Thursday has proven Mr. Calderón right.

"What marks López Obrador's attitude is not the construction of democracy, nor the consolidation of his own political force, but an evident ambition for personal power," wrote Jorge Fernández Menéndez, an investigative journalist and political commentator. "If it was said that López Obrador was messianic, he is confirming it with each one of his acts since Sunday."

At the same time, in the daily newspaper Excelsior, José Antonio Crespo wrote in favor of a recount.

"If I were Felipe Calderón, I would try to legitimize my electoral victory," he wrote, to rob Mr. López Obrador's party of "its arguments for questioning my victory, narrow, but genuine."

After the results were announced on Thursday, Mr. Calderón and some of his aides began publicly addressing some policy issues. Arturo Sarukhan, a foreign policy adviser to Mr. Calderón, said Mr. Calderón intended to put Mexico at the center of the region's debate over globalization.

"We will lead the debate on how Latin America will keep competitive in the world, how to keep it from losing ground to Asia," Mr. Sarukhan said. "We have to figure out how to demonstrate to our societies that free markets, transparency and democracy really can deliver the goods for all."

Mr. Calderón would seem a certain ally for the United States, and political analysts have suggested that a Calderón presidency could signal an end to the advance of left-wing politics across Latin America, as neoliberal economic policies from Washington have fallen from favor.

On Friday, he said he would not seek to renegotiate agricultural clauses of the North American Free Trade Agreement, and that he would urge the United States and Canada to join with Mexico to create a fund for the construction of infrastructure and other development projects to generate jobs in high-migration states in Mexico.

"The solution to migration is not walls," Mr. Calderón said. "The only real solution to stop or slow the migration phenomenon is the generation of good-paying jobs."

Mr. López Obrador said that Mr. Calderón was wrong to begin assuming the role of president-elect before the results of last Sunday's contests had been upheld in court. And he objected to the congratulatory messages that had been sent to Mr. Calderón from the United States, Spain and Canada.

He said it was all part of a strategy by Mr. Calderón to end a process that was not yet over.

"They want to turn the page, but things are not that way," Mr. López Obrador said. "This is just started."

Ex-President Wins Genocide Ruling

MEXICO CITY, July 8 (AP) — Genocide charges were dropped against former President Luis Echeverría on Saturday when a judge ruled that the statute of limitations had expired, his lawyer said.

DOJ_NMG_0039453

The lawyer, Juan Velazquez, said that the federal judge had overturned a June 30 house arrest order on the charges, which stemmed from a 1968 student massacre.

The decision was the latest blow to prosecutors' efforts to charge the Mr. Echeverría, 84,with the deaths and disappearances of dozens of students and leftist dissidents in the late 1960's and early 1970's, a period known here as the dirty war.

Mexico's Runner-Up Remains Unbowed (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY — About a quarter of a million people chanting "Fraud! Fraud!" jammed Mexico City's central square Saturday to back leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador's bid to overturn his narrow electoral defeat with court appeals and mass marches.

Lopez Obrador told the rowdy but peaceful crowd that he would present allegations of fraudulent vote tallies to the Federal Electoral Tribunal before tonight's deadline and demand a recount. He called for nationwide marches that would converge on Mexico City for another rally July 16 as the seven-judge panel weighed his appeal.

"There is convincing evidence that they took votes away from us," Lopez Obrador said. "We are certain that we won on July 2, and we are going to defend our victory."

Many in the crowd said they were ready for a fight if Lopez Obrador did not prevail. "To the death!" shouted Maria Irene Ramirez, a 53-year-old retired railroad worker from Hidalgo state.

Saturday's huge gathering, summoned on two days' notice, marks a critical point in what has been a peaceful challenge to the official result of the election, which gave governing-party candidate Felipe Calderon a winning margin of 244,000 votes out of 41 million cast.

Lopez Obrador, a fiery populist, has made a career of organizing mass demonstrations, several of which turned violent in the 1990s. That legacy and the tone of his statements last week have fed concern that the former Mexico City mayor could destabilize the country, undermining democratic institutions just six years after Mexico's emergence from decades of one-party rule.

But Saturday, he stopped short of calling for civil disobedience, eliciting groans from demonstrators when he asked them not to block highways.

"This is a peaceful movement, and we are never going to allow ourselves to be provoked by our adversaries," he said. "We have enough strength to validate our democracy using only peaceful demonstrations."

The crowd filled the Zocalo, the vast downtown square, and spilled into surrounding streets.

Mexico City police, subordinate to a government run by Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party, estimated the crowd at 280,000 people. Notimex, the semiofficial news agency of the conservative-led federal government, said slightly more than 200,000 people were there.

The challenger's party, known as the PRD, bused in loyalists from around the country. Organizers said they came from 18 states, some as far as Chiapas, on Mexico's southern border, and Southern Baja California.

They turned the Zocalo into a sea of yellow party flags and banners with slogans such as "No solution means revolution." They blew noisemakers, set off fireworks and sang the national anthem. One group carried a giant abacus, illustrating the demand, chanted incessantly by the crowd, for a recount — "vote by vote, poll by poll."

Carmen Garcia, 38, a Puebla homemaker, was defiant.

"We're not going to let them take it away from him," she said. "We're going to fight with everything against all who don't want him in power. He will be our next president, whether they like it or not."

Most political analysts say Lopez Obrador's campaign faces an uphill battle.

The European Union, which monitored the vote, has said it found no evidence of major fraud or irregularity in the preliminary count July 2 or in the official count that ended Thursday.

Calderon, the candidate of President Vicente Fox's National Action Party, said Friday that he was not worried about a legal challenge to the election because irregularities found in the initial count were minor. He said he opposed a full recount.

Lopez Obrador was hedging his bets. Meeting with foreign journalists Saturday before the rally, he said his party planned to file a separate appeal to the Supreme Court later alleging that the entire election was unfair.

Top aides to Lopez Obrador called Friday for a recount of nearly half of the votes cast.

Officially, Calderon cannot be declared president-elect until the electoral tribunal decides his case. It has until Sept. 6 to declare a winner.

DOJ_NMG_0039454

Lopez Obrador ridiculed his rival for acting like a president-elect, and rebuffed Calderon's offer to join a unity Cabinet. He called Calderon "an employee" of Mexico's upper classes and said a victory by his opponent would be "morally impossible."

"It's illogical, therefore, that there could be any agreement with him," he told journalists.

Later, at the rally, the challenger spoke confidently and forcefully. Wearing a dark suit and yellow tie, he addressed the crowd from a raised platform after being introduced by a party leader as "the only one who deserves to be called president."

Anticipating the case to be filed in the Supreme Court, Lopez Obrador called the Federal Electoral Institute, which conducted and counted the vote, "a battering ram" for Calderon. He alleged that the ruling party candidate was allowed to defame him in TV ads, exceed the legal limit for campaign spending and tap government funds for the campaign.

And he denounced Fox, Mexico's first freely elected president, as "a traitor to democracy" for campaigning, in violation of the country's norms, on Calderon's behalf.

Lopez Obrador's speech was frequently interrupted by applause and chants of "You are not alone!"

The militancy of the crowd suggested that Lopez Obrador could sustain his movement at least until a ruling by the tribunal.

Last year, facing a legal challenge to keep Lopez Obrador off the presidential ballot, the PRD built a nationwide grass-roots network that mobilized for weeks of protest, culminating in a rally that filled the Zocalo in April 2005. The legal challenge failed, and the network evolved into a campaign organization that now serves as the engine of Lopez Obrador's protest movement.

The leftist leader proposed that his followers gather at 300 district vote-counting offices around the country Wednesday and begin marching to Mexico City. He urged everyone in the Zocalo on Saturday to bring 10 more people with them.

"Do you approve of this proposal?" he asked. The crowd roared in agreement.

Despite the potency of his protest movement, its long-term staying power is uncertain. Nor is it clear whether Lopez Obrador would continue to send his supporters into the streets if he lost his case in the tribunal.

Under questioning by foreign journalists, he said he was confident of prevailing in the tribunal, but declined eight times to say what he would do if he did not. Asked whether the tribunal was a fair and respectable body, he said, "That's what I wish, but it remains to be seen."

As for the risk that his protests will unsettle the country, he said it was the government that created an atmosphere of instability by having supported what he called an unfair election.

"If there is no democracy, there can be no stability," he said.

Political analysts said Lopez Obrador must walk a tightrope as he decides how far to push the protests.

If they turn violent, he could undermine the legitimacy of his party, which doubled its percentage of the national vote, enlarged its bloc in Congress and kept control of Mexico City. But if he concedes the election without a fight, he will risk losing support within his party. He is 52 and conceivably could run for president again.

"The PRD was born as a protest movement against electoral fraud, and he has to honor its culture of fighting to the end," said Juan E. Pardinas of the Center of Research for Development. "But if it wants to win a bigger share of the vote next time, the party has to move to the center."

Times staff writer Cecilia Sanchez contributed to this report.

Mexican Tells Crowd He'll Seek Recount (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, July 9, 2006

Leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador called on a huge crowd of supporters Saturday to keep peacefully protesting as he goes to court to challenge what he called his fraudulent electoral defeat.

The fiery former Mexico City mayor said he would present fraud allegations to Mexico's electoral court on Sunday and formally request that all 41 million votes be recounted.

The ruling party's Felipe Calderon can't be declared president-elect until the electoral court weighs allegations of fraud or unfair campaign practices. The court has until Sept. 6 to declare a winner.

"We are going to ask that they clean up the elections. We are going to ask that they count all the votes, vote-by-vote, poll-by-poll," Lopez Obrador said, calling on the army to protect the integrity of every ballot box.

Election monitors from the European Union said they found no irregularities in the count. Calderon says the vote was clean and has taken congratulatory phone calls from President Bush and the leaders of Canada, Spain and Colombia, among others, despite Lopez Obrador's plea for foreign governments to hold off on recognizing the result.

Lopez Obrador called for nationwide marches beginning Wednesday and converging on Mexico City for a July 16 rally.

He provoked groans of disappointment when he told the crowd of more than 100,000 packing Mexico City's central plaza not to block highways during the marches.

"This has been and goes on being a peaceful movement," he said. "We are not going to fall for any provocations."

DOJ_NMG_0039455

The likelihood of continuing demonstrations suggests how difficult it will be for Calderon to unify Mexicans, many of whom believe the nation has yet to overcome the decades of institutional corruption and fraud that kept its leaders in power.

Lopez Obrador has repeatedly evaded questions about whether he would accept court decisions that go against him.

Lopez Obrador took direct aim at President Vicente Fox, accusing him of conspiring with Mexico's autonomous elections agency, known as IFE, to engineer a Calderon victory.

Election officials say Calderon, of Fox's National Action Party, beat Lopez Obrador by less than 244,000 votes out of 41 million ballots — or a margin of about 0.6 percent.

Lopez Obrador said Fox had betrayed the Mexicans whose outrage over repeated election fraud swept him into power in 2000 after 71 years of single-party rule by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI.

"He dedicated himself to attacking us and ended up being a complete traitor of democracy," Lopez Obrador said. "And if that weren't enough, the IFE, which should act with impartiality, turned into the pawn of the party of the right."

Evoking a computer crash that flipped Mexico's 1988 elections in the PRI's favor, he claimed the government used a computer program to intentionally skew initial reports of vote counts.

Lopez Obrador has millions of devoted followers who believe only he can help Mexico's poor and downtrodden. Most of his supporters come from Mexico City and poor southern states, while Calderon's strength is in Mexico's industrialized north.

Lopez Obrador claims a manual recount would confirm that hundreds of thousands of votes for him remain uncounted, miscounted or voided. The law allows such a recount only for specific polling places where credible evidence of irregularities exist. The leftist's supporters say that applies to at least 50,000 of the approximately 130,000 polling places.

The crowd in Mexico City's famed Zocalo plaza would accept nothing less than victory.

"We are never going to recognize this man (Calderon)," said Apolinario Fernandez, 37, a teacher from Lopez Obrador's home state of Tabasco in the southeast. "If he wants, let him govern in the north for the rich, but not in the south."

Smaller demonstrations were held Saturday in Tijuana on the U.S. border and San Cristobal de las Casas in the south.

Many traveled all night to arrive at the Zocalo, joining a sea of yellow, the color of Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party.

"We are ready to do whatever is necessary," said Belisario Cruz, 32, a farmer from Tabasco. "We are tired of the rich having everything and the poor having nothing."

There were no immediate reports of arrests or violence.

Lopez Obrador must walk a tightrope in coming days. If he appears too radical, he risks hurting his party and its chances in the next presidential elections in 2012. If he appears too moderate, he risks disappointing his core supporters.

Political analyst Oscar Aguilar predicted that he will never concede defeat.

"Once the election results are certified, he will open a permanent campaign of criticizing the government," Aguilar said.

Apparent Loser In Mexican Presidential Election Disputes Results (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Knight Ridder, July 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY - Mexican presidential hopeful Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador made it clear Saturday he won't go down without a fight, calling on a gathered multitude to join him in nationwide protests as he tries to prove to the courts that he was defrauded in last Sunday's election.

Speaking before hundreds of thousands of supporters dressed in the yellow and black of his Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD), Lopez Obrador told his supporters across the nation to join him in launching a National March for Democracy beginning Wednesday and vowed to prove he was the winner in the photo-finish balloting.

"Cheer up, we are sure that despite all the anti-democratic practices, we won on July 2," he told the throngs gathered in Mexico City's picturesque Zocalo, the ancient city square where the National Cathedral sits atop ruins of the vanquished Aztec empire.

Lopez Obrador's call for the march, which will culminate with another massive "informative rally" in Zocalo on July 16, also guarantees difficult weeks ahead for Mexico. Its stock market bounced around last week and investors are sure to worry as Mexico's young democracy appears headed for its toughest test to date.

Addressing his supporters Saturday night - under a massive red, white and green Mexican flag - Lopez Obrador made it clear he would seek the presidency at nearly any cost because "beyond the technical arguments or legal foundations is democracy and the stability of the country."

Lopez Obrador finished second in July 2 voting, but his conservative rival Felipe Calderon won by about 243,000 votes out of more than 41 million cast, or a scant 0.58 percent margin.

DOJ_NMG_0039456

Lopez Obrador overcame attempts last year to impeach him on a technicality when he was mayor of Mexico City, a move that would have prevented his presidential bid. He believes President Vicente Fox and electoral authorities conspired to deny him the presidency.

Speaking earlier Saturday to foreign correspondents, Lopez Obrador announced he'd bring several different allegations of irregularities to the special Federal Electoral Tribunal, known by its Spanish initials TRIFE. Using the word "fraud" for the first time, he alleged he was the victim of a rigged computer count.

Current and former IFE officials deny the computerized vote count is open to manipulation. Foreign and domestic election observers saw no signs of fraud, but Lopez Obrador said he disagreed with them and called the elections "plagued by irregularities."

Tens of thousands of angry and vocal supporters streamed into square throughout the day, some carrying signs that read "This is just beginning" and "Vote by Vote, Booth by Booth," a reference to the candidate's demand for a complete recount of every single vote cast.

As people massed at the historic square late Saturday, Lopez Obrador was interrupted repeatedly by the chants of "Fraud, Fraud, Fraud."

Protestor Alberto Hernandez Culebro, owner of a small business, predicted that if the courts did not overturn the election, his nation could expect future disruptions, including street demonstrations, mass labor strikes and face-to-face confrontations with President Fox and apparent President-elect Calderon - both members of the ruling National Action Party (PAN).

"There must be new elections," he said.

Jose Valtierra Campos, a university professor, joined Lopez Obrador in chiding President Bush for calling Friday to congratulate Calderon on his victory.

"Tell Mr. Bush to keep his hands out of here. We can manage things," he said. "I think Bush doesn't have a reason to intervene in matters that don't involve him!"

Lopez Obrador sees those calls as an affront because Mexico officially does not have a president-elect until the TRIFE validates the election results. It has until Sept. 6 to do so.

Although he didn't provide much detail, Lopez Obrador said party lawyers would begin filing complaints Sunday in five regional electoral courts that belong to the TRIFE. Those regional courts immediately pass challenges to the presidential election up to a supreme electoral tribunal in Mexico City. Lopez Obrador has until Monday to bring all challenges to the TRIFE.

Additionally, Lopez Obrador said he'd pursue a challenge with Mexico's Supreme Tribunal, the highest civil court, alleging that Fox used the lever of government to boost his party's candidate. Mexico's election authorities in May ordered Fox to stop using public appearances to bolster his party's candidate. In 2003, the electoral court voided a state election in Colima on the same charges that Lopez Obrador intends to bring - that presidential support did irreparable harm.

"Without a bit of shame, and without caring for the presidential investiture, (Fox) dedicated himself to attacking us and has ended up being a total traitor to democracy," said Lopez Obrador, in an unusually harsh attack on the president.

On Friday, Calderon held a news conference with foreign correspondents and assumed the air of a president-elect. His camp has started publicly discussing transition issues and cabinet positions. He tried to make it appear as a fait accompli that he's Mexico's next president.

"But that's not how things are, this is just the beginning," vowed Lopez Obrador in his own news conference Saturday.

During the final weeks of the bitter campaign, Lopez Obrador made a concerted effort to look as if he were a center-left candidate that would stick to basic free-market economic policies that Mexico has followed for nearly two decades. He was forced to modify his image, in part, because of attack ads by Calderon that scared middle-class voters. They described Lopez Obrador as a radical who would chase away investment and bring economic ruin.

On Saturday, Lopez Obrador didn't shy from scary rhetoric. He engaged in class warfare, dubbing the apparent winner of the presidential elections as a tool of the rich. He added that, win or lose, his party wouldn't work with Calderon in Congress.

"There is a project that the Right defends that consists of continuing the same economic policies that have impoverished the majority of Mexicans, and that we can not be a part of any coalition while this economic policy doesn't change," he said.

Lopez Obrador added, "At the core, the candidate of the right is a tool of a group that created powerful interests in Mexico, who for some time have converted the government into a committee that's at the service of minority."

Lopez Obrador rejected charges that his protests are destabilizing the country.

"I think the main factor of destabilization, in this case, is the violation of the right people to freely elect their authorities," he said. "If there isn't democracy, there is instability."

Lopez Obrador Vows To Challenge Mexico's Presidential Results (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

DOJ_NMG_0039457

Knight Ridder, July 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY - In a scene eerily reminiscent of the U.S. elections in 2000, Mexican presidential hopeful Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador said Saturday that he was defrauded by a rigged computer count and vowed a legal challenge before a special electoral court and Mexico's highest civil court.

In a hastily called news conference with foreign correspondents on Saturday morning, six days Mexican's cast their vote, Lopez Obrador, of the left-leaning Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD) accused the Federal Electoral Institute of conspiring with the government to arrange his narrow defeat by a margin of 0.58 percent.

"They manipulated the electronic computer system," he said. The electoral body, known by its Spanish initials IFE, "introduced a computer model with a determined factor, where they beforehand knew how it would behave the entire day."

Specifically, Lopez Obrador believes the IFE, which has trained electoral authorities around the world and which polls show is held in high regard by Mexicans, conspired to shave points from his count and gave them to his opponent. Elections experts said conservative Felipe Calderon's tight margin of victory was akin to a difference of about two ballots per voting booth.

"This electoral organ folded completely before the government and its (ruling) party," said Lopez Obrador.

Current and former IFE officials deny the computerized vote count is open to manipulation. Foreign and domestic election observers saw no signs of fraud, but Lopez Obrador said he disagreed with them and called the elections "plagued by irregularities."

Lopez Obrador addressed journalists just hours before a massive "informative assembly" he called in Mexico City's picturesque Zocalo, an ancient city square that houses the National Cathedral. It was built by Spanish conquerors atop the ruins of the vanquished Aztec empire.

Tens of thousands of angry and vocal supporters streamed into square throughout the day, some carrying signs that read "This is just beginning" and "Vote by Vote," a reference to the candidates demand for a complete recount of every single vote cast.

Security was tight and organizers hoped crowds would swell above 200,000 people. Lopez Obrador told reporters he would continue peaceful street demonstrations in response to the faulty vote tally.

As people massed at the historic square late Saturday afternoon, many chanted "No Electoral Fraud."

Alberto Hernandez Culebro, one protestor, predicted that if the courts did not overturn the election, his nation could expect future disruptions, including street demonstrations, mass labor strikes and face-to-face confrontations with President Vicente Fox and president-elect Calderon. "There must be new elections," he said.

Jose Valtierra Campos, a university professor, called the election "a fraud, a theft." He also chided Bush for congratulating Calderon on his victory. "Tell Mr. Bush to keep his hands out of here. We can manage things. I think Bush doesn't have a reason to intervene in matters that don't involve him."

Although he didn't provide much detail, Lopez Obrador said party lawyers would begin filing complaints Sunday in five regional courts that belong to the Federal Electoral Tribunal, known by the Spanish acronym TRIFE. Those regional courts immediately pass challenges to the presidential election up to a supreme electoral tribunal in Mexico City. Lopez Obrador has until Monday to bring all challenges to the TRIFE.

Additionally, Lopez Obrador indicated he'd pursue a challenge with Mexico's Supreme Tribunal, the highest civil court, alleging that President Vicente Fox, who like Calderon belongs to the National Action Party (PAN), used the lever of government to boost his party's candidate. Mexico's election authorities in May ordered Fox to stop using public appearances to bolster his party's candidate, and Lopez Obrador alleges this support did irreparable harm.

The fiery populist bristled Saturday at the fact that President George W. Bush and Spain's Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero called Calderon on Friday to congratulate him for winning Wednesday's official count. Lopez Obrador sees those calls as an affront because Mexico officially does not have a president-elect until the TRIFE validates the election results. It has until Sept. 6 to do so.

On Friday, Calderon held a news conference with foreign correspondents and assumed the air of a president-elect. His camp has started publicly discussing transition issues and cabinet positions. He tried to make it appear as a fait accompli that he's Mexico's next president.

"But that's not how things are, this is just the beginning," vowed Lopez Obrador.

During the final weeks of the bitter campaign, Lopez Obrador made a concerted effort to look as if he were a center-left candidate that would stick to basic free-market economic policies that Mexico has followed for nearly two decades. He was forced to modify his image, in part, because of attack ads by Calderon that scared middle-class voters. They described Lopez Obrador as a radical who would chase away investment and bring economic ruin.

On Saturday, Lopez Obrador didn't shy from scary rhetoric. He engaged in class warfare, dubbing the apparent winner of the presidential elections as a tool of the rich, and said that, win or lose, his party wouldn't work with Calderon in Congress.

"There is a project that the Right defends that consists of continuing the same economic policies that have impoverished the majority of Mexicans, and that we can not be a part of any coalition while this economic policy doesn't change," he said.

Lopez Obrador added, "At the core, the candidate of the right is a tool of a group that created powerful interests in Mexico, who for some time have converted the government into a committee that's at the service of minority."

Declining to say how he'd respond if the courts reject his bids to overturn election results, Lopez Obrador rejected charges that his protests are destabilizing the country.

"I think the main factor of destabilization, in this case, is the violation of the right people to freely elect their authorities," he said. "If there isn't democracy, there is instability."

Mexico Faces Its Own Red-Blue Standoff (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY

NO matter who wins the election in Mexico, where the leftist and conservative candidates are locked in a legal battle over the outcome, the voters have pulled the curtain back on a new political landscape for the country. In the end, who won may not be nearly as important as who lost. The candidate of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, which ruled the country with an iron hand for 70 years, did not win a single state. Worse, the P.R.I., as the party is known, lost its hold on Congress, slipping from the largest faction to third largest.

In short, the declining former ruling party finally crashed and burned. And from the wreckage have risen two invigorated, growing — and quite evenly matched — parties, Felipe Calderón's National Action Party, or P.A.N., and Andrés Manuel López Obrador's Party of the Democratic Revolution, the P.R.D.

"What's happened, I think, is that in fact we have a new panorama," said Daniel Lund, a pollster and political analyst. "Two parties have emerged that are not the dual heirs of the P.R.I."

And they look a lot like the Republicans and Democrats or Britain's Tories and Labor.

The two parties are roughly divided along the left-right lines that appear throughout Latin America today. The right supports free trade and privatization; the left opposes globalization and favors more welfare programs. But they are not so much at odds on the country's broad needs and goals — national pride, a rate of development that matches that of countries like Brazil and Chile, and avenues by which the poor can move upward.

One striking feature is a split along regional lines. Mr. Calderón took most of the northern states, while Mr. López Obrador dominated the central and southern states. So Mexico's new map has its own version of America's red state-blue state phenomenon, and it is so evenly balanced that the presidential race produced a virtual tie.

Last week, when Mr. Calderón was declared the victor by a margin of less than 1 percent of the vote and Mr. López Obrador vowed to fight in the courts for a recount, the stalemate raised the prospect of more polarization — and, perhaps, a bitter stalemate.

The new map depicts an industrialized north, where business ties to the United States have played an enormous role in the rise of the right-leaning, conservative party, and a more agricultural south that is a hotbed of leftist discontent and anti-globalization sentiment. Political scientists say this has a little to do with history and a lot to do with economics.

For starters, the benefits of the 1994 free trade agreement with the United States and Canada have never trickled down to southern states like Chiapas, Oaxaca and Guerrero. While the economy in the north has grown at 4.5 percent a year, the southern states have barely grown 1 percent each year. They remain largely agricultural and poor, with big indigenous populations.

It was in Chiapas in 1994 that the Zapatista rebels, mostly descendants of Mayan Indians, rose up and became heroes for opponents of globalization everywhere.

In the north, meanwhile, border cities have swollen as migrants continue their inexorable march northward, and maquiladoras, the factories that assemble products for American companies, spring up like wildflowers along the Rio Grande and the rest of the border.

Even in agriculture there is a clear difference. The south holds on to the old system of ejidos, or cooperative farms, that was established after the 1910 revolution. Most farmers produce only for their own consumption or a little for the local market.

The north, however, is dominated by large modern farms, much like those in California, producing everything from tomatoes to chiles for export. Many people from the south are moving north to work as pickers, because the pay is better.

The P.A.N. has its roots in the north. Founded in 1926, it served as a haven there for those fed up with the P.R.I. machine, which was little more than a dictatorship in democratic clothing. The P.A.N. won its first governorship in the north, in the late 1980's, and began the long march to power that led to the victory in 2000 by its candidate, Vicente Fox.

DOJ_NMG_0039459

Now, that march is being followed by the emergence of a vigorous two-party system. Even if he ultimately loses, Mr. López Obrador has united his party's warring factions and doubled its presence in Congress. "Andrés Manuel is the P.R.D.," said Federico Arreola, a former columnist and newspaper owner who worked on the López Obrador campaign.

The P.R.D.'s ability to dislodge the old rulers of the P.R.I. in the south crystallized only in the late 1990's, when Mr. López Obrador, the national chairman of his party, tapped longstanding anger over the oppressive tactics of the old ruling party. He won a term as mayor of Mexico City in 2000, and last year the party won the governorship of Guerrero.

Now, with the P.R.I. unraveling, its members have been drifting into the other two parties. In the south, they have flocked to Mr. López Obrador, who has promised to renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement, subsidize farmers, fix prices for corn and beans, cut prices for energy, spend more on welfare programs, and build refineries, trains and roads to provide jobs.

The biggest question now is whether the two main parties can learn to work together after a divisive election. During Mr. Fox's six-year term, the P.R.I. sabotaged most of his reforms in Congress.

In the new landscape, such tactics from whichever side loses the presidency could paralyze Mexico's development and spur an even greater flood of immigrants to the United States. Multiparty democracy is young here, the idea of bipartisan cooperation has yet to take root, and the prospect that a razor-thin election will yield only partisanship already scares some Mexicans.

"We cannot have another six years of a country in gridlock," said Rossana Fuentes Berain, the editor of the Spanish-language Foreign Affairs.

Hire Lawyers - And Caterers (WP)

By Benjamin L. Ginsberg

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

I still remember the shock I felt -- that mix of abject fear and utter disbelief -- when I realized we would be in a recount after the 2000 presidential vote. Now, following their own ferociously contested election, our friends in Mexico may be joining us in that memorable (but not necessarily desirable) experience.

So, after living though the 2000 Florida recount as national counsel to the Bush-Cheney campaign, I offer a few tips for Felipe CalderÃ²n, AndrÃ©s Manuel Lopez Obrador and those who will handle the recount for them in the coming days and weeks:

First, get the right people. It makes all the difference. Recruit the smartest, ablest, toughest ones you can find. We immediately started lining up former Supreme Court clerks, red-meat litigators, wily political operatives and top communicators. Be sure they're committed to your candidate -- that commitment makes it possible to manage all that talent.

Second, organize. Former secretary of state James A. Baker III led our recount effort. He brought a career's worth of assets to the endeavor, including vast experience in complex missions. His first charge was the creation of a detailed organizational chart, which paid dividends throughout. The effort had structure and people had defined responsibilities in what was otherwise the most unpredictable, fast-paced and high stakes time of our professional lives.

Next, get a good caterer and some extra phone lines. In other words, pay attention to logistics. You'll have many people to feed (you won't want them taking the time to forage on their own) and many people to keep in touch with minute by minute. Our Florida headquarters received a remarkable number of hang-up calls that swamped the system until we installed new exchanges. One memorable early conference call included so many people around the state that it collapsed after 30 minutes.

Make sure you line up top lawyers, which in a recount are a necessary (and underappreciated) evil. Lawyers don't always win the congeniality prize during campaigns; after all, a big part of the job is saying no. But recounts are -- don't forget -- legal proceedings. Mexico's Federal Electoral Tribunal will have until September to rule. That will require many lawyers. Analyze the various skills your legal team will need under Mexican law and recruit the best for each.

An awful lot will be going on in each counting center, so be sure to develop a strong ground game. Have enough people (with an emphasis on those wily political operatives) to cover everything that happens. Be sure your staff members take detailed notes on each tally sheet, vote packet and ballot they see. That will prove crucial in an eventual court case.

From the start, you'll need communications specialists. It's important that your candidate's victory be legitimized so that he can govern effectively. To achieve that, you need to tell your side of every development every day. Communicators must also manage the deluge of inquiries you'll receive. If the lawyers and the staff in the counting centers have to manage this process, they'll be distracted from their real responsibilities.

Ignore editorials. Sure, if there's one criticizing your opponent, use it for all it's worth. But don't pay attention if they don't like something you're doing. You're doing it for a reason -- stick with that. Also, remember there's so much going on that even the best reporters won't know a third of what is happening on any given day. So trust your people, and pay attention to newspapers and television only for breaking news and for a flavor of what the public is seeing.

DOJ_NMG_0039460

The hardest thing to do in a recount -- with all its speed, surprises and changes -- is to keep your effort consistent. Avoid what befell the Gore camp in 2000: First calling for a recount in only their strongest counties, then switching to a "count all the votes" strategy statewide but simultaneously trying to exclude overseas military ballots and 30,000 absentee ballots in two counties. So find a very smart person to focus solely on the big picture, and empower him or her to speak up when the unexpected makes it seem expedient to change everything you've been doing. Your credibility rides on it.

Learn to deal with the wild accusations; it's a presidential recount, after all. Your opponents will issue baseless charges with utter conviction. Remember the butterfly ballot, which can be challenged under Florida law before an election, but not after? Or the charge of voter intimidation, which was loudly publicized although neither Al Gore's state chairman (who was Florida's attorney general) nor Bill Clinton's attorney general (who was from Miami) ever brought any cases? Don't overreact, just debunk the allegations as best you can. Trust me, especially if you win, the bleating will continue long after the country has moved on. Don't worry about it.

Finally, take time to smell the roses or, in Mexico, the dahlias. This is the wildest ride you'll ever be on, but take a moment each day to remember that you're part of history. It may feel like root canal right now, but you'll be eternally thankful you were there. Savor it. And appreciate the people around you. When this is over, you'll have a rare bond that will last forever.

bginsberg@pattonboggs.com

Benjamin L. Ginsberg, a partner at Patton Boggs, served as national counsel to the Bush-Cheney campaigns in 2000 and 2004.

Don't Take The High Road (WP)

By Ronald Klain

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

For the presidential campaign of AndrÃ©s Manuel Lopez Obrador, narrowly declared the loser to Felipe CalderÃ²n in Mexico's much-disputed returns, there is good news and bad news. The good news is that he has avoided the two biggest problems that confronted Al Gore in Recount 2000: being forced to contest the election in a jurisdiction where the governor was his opponent's brother, and being tormented by a chief election official who was a partisan operative with a bizarre Queen Esther complex. The bad news, however, is that, where Gore trailed in the initial tally in Florida by fewer than 2,000 votes, Lopez Obrador is more than 200,000 votes behind. It's only a matter of time before the Mexican equivalent of our pundit class begins its demands for "finality."

For Lopez Obrador, the clock is ticking loudly. If he wants to keep his candidacy alive, he must take decisive -- and quite divisive -- action. He must bring meaningful and documented claims of fraud in the election. He must call his supporters to the streets and question the legitimacy of the vote casting and counting process. He must demand that, notwithstanding Mexican law, every ballot be recounted, by hand, to ensure an accurate tally. Above all, he must reject any suggestion that CalderÃ²n received more votes -- indeed, he must insist that any fair count would show that he is the rightful winner.

This, of course, was not the playbook that Gore followed in 2000. The vice president rejected advice to do these things. Instead of claiming victory, he limited himself to suggesting that the result was in doubt -- and unknown -- until a "full and fair" count could be completed. He urged calm among his supporters and called off street protests by progressive groups and allies. He never, ever questioned the legitimacy of the institutions -- the courts or the canvassers -- responsible for the tallies, and he forbade his lawyers and operatives from doing anything of the sort.

The Gore approach was dignified, responsible, reasonable -- and unsuccessful.

The playbook that Lopez Obrador must follow, if he wants to keep his prospects alive, is the Bush 2000 playbook. Remember the protesters with "Sore Loserman" signs and the crowds near Observatory Circle shouting, "Get out of Cheney's house"? Remember the "Brooks Brothers Riot," bringing an end to the recount in Miami-Dade County? Remember former secretary of state James A. Baker III's condemnation of the Florida courts, and his harsh words for judges who ruled against the Bush campaign? And above all, remember then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush's repeated refusal to accept Gore's offers of reconciliation, and his unflinching (though counter-factual) insistence that the votes had "already been counted and recounted" and that he was the undisputed winner? If Lopez Obrador has a hope at this point, the Bush 2000 strategy is probably his only option.

But Lopez Obrador isn't the only one with a hard choice. CalderÃ²n, too, must decide what his next steps will be. For now, he is resisting demands for a full hand recount of all the votes. In the short run, this may maximize his chance of occupying Los Pinos -- but at what price?

For the past six years, President Bush has suffered bitter domestic opposition (suppressed for a time after 9/11), that is, in no small part, an echo of the doubts about how he came into office: in a process in which his campaign systematically attempted to stop legitimate recounts and in which our nation's highest court ordered local election officials to stop tabulating votes.

DOJ_NMG_0039461

CalderÃ²n can likewise use his power and influence to stifle recounts -- but he would do better to take a very different stance than Bush did in 2000. He would do better to take the Gore approach, and balance the risk of defeat after a full recount against the added legitimacy of his power if he prevails in such a transparent and fulsome process.

Hence, ironically, even though he is trailing, Lopez Obrador's only hope of victory is a Bush-like, scorched-earth approach; and, though he is leading, CalderÃ²n's best hope for leveraging a narrow margin into governing authority as president would be a Gore-like commitment to a full and fair recount. For CalderÃ²n and Lopez Obrador, the choices -- and consequences -- are firmly in their own hands.

Ronald Klain was general counsel for the Gore-Lieberman Recount Committee in 2000, and is now a lawyer in Washington.

Ex-Mexican Leader Freed From House Arrest (AP)

By Ioan Grillo

AP, July 9, 2006

A federal judge threw out genocide charges on Saturday against former President Luis Echeverria, ruling that a 30-year statute of limitations had run out, his lawyer said.

Echeverria, 84, had been under house arrest for more than a week on charges that he organized a student massacre as interior secretary in 1968. He went on to become president from 1970-1976.

The charges were the first to have been filed against a former Mexican president.

Prosecutors still can appeal the decision, but Echeverria's lawyer, Juan Velazquez, was confident that the ruling would be upheld.

"The case is not finished but it's dead," he said.

Saturday's decision was the latest blow to prosecutors' attempts to bring Echeverria to justice for alleged crimes committed during Mexico's "dirty war," a violent crack down on leftist dissidents in the 1960s and 1970s.

Ignacio Carrillo, a special prosecutor appointed by President Vicente Fox, also has attempted to bring charges against Echeverria for a 1971 student massacre and for the disappearance of leftist activists during his presidency.

All of the charges have been thrown out or blocked by courts.

A phone call to Carrillo's office on Saturday went unanswered.

The 1968 massacre took place in Mexico City's Tlatelolco Plaza on Oct. 2, just before the capital hosted the Olympics. Officially, 25 people were killed, though human rights activists say as many as 350 may have died.

Special prosecutors say they have reviewed military documents indicating 360 sharpshooters fired from buildings surrounding Tlatelolco Plaza. The attack is considered one of the darkest moments of 71 years of rule by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI.

After President Vicente Fox ended seven decades of PRI rule with his historic 2000 election victory, he promised to prosecute crimes committed by the old regime.

The order for Echeverria's house arrest came two days before the July 2 presidential election, which Felipe Calderon, the candidate from Fox's conservative National Action Party, appears to have narrowly won.

The Little Tramp's Classic Labor Lesson (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Venezuela's socialist government is using a 1936 Chaplin film to educate workers about their rights. Employers are not applauding.

LOS TEQUES, Venezuela — In his classic 1936 film, "Modern Times," Charlie Chaplin has to work so fast tightening bolts in a steel factory that he finally goes crazy. In a memorable scene that has become a metaphor for labor exploitation, the Little Tramp is run through the factory's enormous gears.

For President Hugo Chavez's socialist government, the film is more than just entertainment: It's become a teaching tool. Since January, in a bid to expose the evils of "savage capitalism," the Labor Ministry has shown the Chaplin film to thousands of workers in places such as this rundown industrial suburb of Caracas.

When the screenings at factories or meeting halls end, Labor Ministry officials then take their cue, and use Chaplin's plight to spell out worker rights under occupational safety laws passed last year and now being applied. They are part of Chavez's sweeping reform agenda that he calls Socialism for the 21st Century.

DOJ_NMG_0039462

Chaplin wanted his Depression-era movie to make a point, that "once inside the factory, workers had no meaningful rights," said Los Angeles-based film historian and Chaplin authority Richard Schickel. "It was very relevant in the moment it was released, a time of social unrest and the emerging U.S. labor movement."

Seventy years later, Chaplin's fable is all too relevant in Venezuela, said several factory workers who saw the film recently.

"The owners still value their machines more than their workers," said Roberto Maldonado, a 29-year-old minimum-wage worker at the Pollo Premium poultry plant, which processes 75,000 chickens a day. "Charlie Chaplin ends up crazy, and I feel that way too sometimes. When I go home, I'm too tired to pay attention to my wife or family."

Freddy Colmenari, a 35-year-old worker at a pasta factory here, said that just as Chaplin's bosses do in the film, his supervisors frequently speed up the assembly line to nerve-racking levels and zealously monitor workers' trips to the bathroom. "There is always pressure and stress," he said.

But the business community here is hardly applauding the film. In a formal complaint to Chavez last month, the four main employer associations in Venezuela said that showing a movie depicting the boss as a "vulgar exploiter of workers" was designed to "generate hate and resentment in the labor sector" and "demonize the employer."

An official at the Venezuelan Confederation of Industries, one of the four signatories, said that the new workplace laws were another example of Chavez punishing private industry, a process the groups say has been unrelenting since a failed 2002 coup led by businessman Pedro Carmona.

While insisting they don't oppose workplace safety improvements, business groups here say that they weren't consulted before the new laws were drafted and that now workers and their delegates have too much power to intervene in factory operations.

Jhonny Picone, a top Labor Ministry official, said employees needed all the power they could get. He noted that Venezuelan workers were more likely to describe their job as "a curse from God than as something positive."

The grim and dehumanizing factory conditions depicted in the Chaplin film are still the "norm," he said — more than 1,500 workers die and thousands are injured annually in industrial accidents.

Largely at Picone's insistence, the film has been shown 1,000 times in 14 states and has been effective in educating workers who usually have no clue about their health and safety rights. Labor Ministry officials say it's because the most recent workplace regulations, passed in 1986, were unobserved, a "dead letter."

Workers are told they have a right to demand safety and hygiene precautions, and, through an employee-elected delegate that represents each factory, even to shut down production if owners don't comply. Egregious and repeated safety violations can result in the government taking over a plant.

"With Charlie Chaplin, it's easier to catch the attention of workers who are often too tired or don't trust the government in the first place," said Picone, a doctor named by Chavez to head a new Labor Ministry agency that he compared to the U.S. Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

The workplace laws are a facet of Chavez's often-mentioned goal of installing a new socialist economic model to replace the globalized free-market version that the president says has failed.

The "popular economy" model includes a return to state-controlled central planning that reminds many of the Soviet era. Bankrolled by the country's oil wealth, Chavez has financed a number of worker-owned cooperatives that run factories and farms that the government has built or taken over.

"It's by no means dominant yet. It's gradually being built up by a process of trial and error," said a Chavez administration official who asked not to be named. "But in the longer term, the popular economy model will be dominant."

But one industrial leader who asked not to be identified said that the business climate was abysmal, and that factory production, industrial jobs and private investment had plummeted since Chavez took power in 1999.

"How much of this policy is revolution and how much is castigation, I don't know," he said.

Critics say Chavez is merely recycling the failed protectionist economic policies that many South American nations tried to impose after World War II to keep out foreign capital and competition. The policies were largely jettisoned in the 1980s as countries began embracing free markets and foreign investment.

Business interests also cite Chavez's decision to pull Venezuela out of the Andean Community as another example of his bias against the private sector. The regional trade group, known as CAN, was too U.S.-dominated, the president said. But one member, Colombia, is Venezuela's second-largest trading partner, and businesspeople here are worried that they will lose tens of millions of dollars in trade as a result.

On Tuesday, Venezuela formally joined the Mercosur trade bloc, whose members include Brazil, Argentina, Paraguay and Uruguay. Chavez told delegates in Caracas, Venezuela's capital, that he made the switch to avoid being "devoured by imperialist strategies, as happened with CAN."

DOJ_NMG_0039463

But Venezuelan producers will have a tougher time competing in the Mercosur arena, said Jose Luis Betancourt, president of Fedecamaras, Venezuela's largest business chamber.

He criticized the new workplace measures. "The law will only generate less efficiency, less [industrial] capacity and make the Venezuelan economy more dependent on high oil prices, which won't last all our lives."

Chavez's adversaries in the business sector scoff at the Chaplin film screenings as an example of the president's simplistic, outdated and decidedly business-unfriendly economic policies.

But for poultry plant worker Maldonado, Charlie Chaplin has made a difference at work.

Inspired by the film and the talk from Labor Ministry officials, he demanded gloves and soap from his employer — and got them. But the assembly line still goes too fast, he said.

Metalworker Miguel Moreno also has seen some improvement. "We have more power because we know more," he said. "They've given me earplugs for the noise, at least."

Film historian Schickel said, "Chaplin would just love that his film is still relevant to modern social conditions, that a modern-day leftist politician in Latin America would find this film to be a useful tool."

Keep Pressing On U.N. Reform (2 Letters) (NYT)

By Diplomat's Letters to Editor

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

To the Editor:

Re "Crisis Postponed at the U.N." (editorial, July 3):

The European Union concurs with your view on the importance and necessity of United Nations reform.

The share of the member states of the European Union in the United Nations budget is 37 percent and more than 40 percent of the financing of United Nations peacekeeping.

The European Union is the single largest contributor to the United Nations budget. We attach great importance to reforms that would bring about efficiencies under budget and management rules.

For the European Union, management reform is also central. We have welcomed the proposals put forward by Secretary General Kofi Annan. We are disappointed that more far-reaching results have not yet been achieved.

The lifting of the spending cap was important because it is in our shared interest that the United Nations continue its crucial mission to deliver services around the world.

All the member states must now redouble their efforts to reach concrete results soon. Reform is a continuing process, and a lot remains to be done.

Kirsti Lintonen

New York, July 6, 2006

The writer is Finland's ambassador to the United Nations. Finland holds the rotating six-month presidency of the European Union.

.

To the Editor:

Your editorial unfairly tends to stereotype developing countries as blockers of United Nations reform.

Pakistan has played a useful and constructive role. For a vast majority of the United Nations membership, progress on development resolution and implementation of agreed development commitments is a matter of the highest priority.

As co-head of the mandate review process, Pakistan, along with Canada, has made a significant contribution toward advancing the process despite major disagreements among the membership.

On management reforms, Pakistan and other members of Group of 77 recognize the need for managerial discretion for the secretary general. But we believe that delegation of authority must be accompanied by robust accountability mechanisms.

Pakistan supports an efficient, accountable and effective United Nations Secretariat and is committed to carrying out all reform decisions adopted by the World Summit last September.

Mansoor Suhail

Minister (Press)

Pakistan Mission to the U.N.

New York, July 5, 2006

A Double Act Takes Center Stage In Poland (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039464

Despite Earlier Promise to Voters, Twin Brother of President Is Named Prime Minister

BERLIN, July 8 -- Ever since their party scored big in Poland's elections last fall, the Kaczynski brothers -- identical twin movie stars with equally big political ambitions -- were widely assumed to be running the country in tandem behind the scenes. Now, it's official.

On Saturday, Poland's governing Law and Justice Party voted to name its party leader, Jaroslaw Kaczynski, the country's new prime minister. With his brother, Lech, already holding the Polish presidency, there is no longer any doubt that the 57-year-old, chubby-faced twins are in charge of the eastern European country.

"There is a certain risk for the president and prime minister to be brothers," Jaroslaw Kaczynski said at a news conference in Warsaw after he accepted his party's nomination for the top job in Parliament. "But for various reasons, we came to the conclusion that, at this time, putting forward a different candidate -- of which we have many good ones -- would be a worse way out than recommending me."

Jaroslaw Kaczynski replaces Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz, who unexpectedly announced his resignation on Friday. Marcinkiewicz said he was giving up the prime minister's post so he could run for mayor of Warsaw in November. He insisted that the Kaczynskis, who had put him in the job last year, did not maneuver him out the door.

Many Poles were skeptical of the official explanation, given the fact that Marcinkiewicz had among the highest approval ratings of any politician in Poland. The Kaczynskis' political enemies, of whom there are many, warned that the brothers wouldn't be satisfied until they were able to vanquish all their rivals.

"Poles are right to fear the concentration of power in the four hands of two brothers," said Donald Tusk, leader of the opposition Civic Platform party and the loser to Lech Kaczynski in last October's presidential race.

The Kaczynskis have been famous in Poland since the 1962, when as child actors they starred in a hit movie, "Those Two Who Would Steal the Moon." As adults, they resisted communist rule and joined the leadership of the Solidarity trade union movement.

Even today, they are difficult to tell apart. Lech is distinguished by two extra moles on his face; Jaroslaw is known as the unmarried brother who lives with their mother.

They entered democratic politics after the fall of the Iron Curtain but enjoyed limited success, gaining reputations as uncompromising scrappers on the fringe of national politics. In 1993, based on a reader survey, a Polish publication declared Jaroslaw Kaczynski the country's "biggest political loony." The runner-up in the rankings? His twin.

Their fortunes changed last September when voters tossed out a government dominated by former communists and gave a plurality in parliamentary elections to Law and Justice, which vowed to stamp out corruption.

As party leader, Jaroslaw Kaczynski had dibs on the prime ministership. But he promised voters he would not take the job if his brother won the upcoming presidential race, saying he realized Poles would be uncomfortable at the prospect of being ruled by twins whom they could barely tell apart.

The pledge, however, sounded as if it was made grudgingly. "My brother said that if I win, he won't serve as prime minister," Lech Kaczynski said with a grin in an interview with The Washington Post last September. "I think that would be a limitation of our civil rights."

Lech Kaczynski won the presidency a month later after a hard-fought contest. Afterward, the brothers made good on their promise at first by naming Marcinkiewicz as prime minister. But they did little to dispel the perception that they were controlling the government behind the scenes, speaking by phone several times a day and rarely making decisions without consulting each other.

Since then, they've displayed an eagerness for bare-knuckled politics, taking a hard line against former communists, gays, Russia, Germany and the European Union. They also kept the government in turmoil by waiting months to form a ruling coalition in Parliament.

On Saturday, Jaroslaw Kaczynski tried to reassure voters that the official change at the top would not lead to more political instability.

"In a formal sense, we will have a new government," he said. "I repeat formal sense, because in a practical way, this is going to be a continuation government."

Power Twins Poised To Take Over In Poland (AFP)

AFP, July 9, 2006

Poland prepared for a unique political double act as Jaroslaw Kaczynski, the head of the ruling conservatives and identical twin of the president, stood poised to take over as prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0039465

The conservative Law and Justice (PiS) party voted in the afternoon to accept the resignation of Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz and proposed he be replaced with party chief Kaczynski -- the man who named him as premier just nine months ago.

If Jaroslaw Kaczynski, 57, is approved by parliament as prime minister, he will be breaking a vow he made during his twin brother Lech Kaczynski's successful presidential election campaign last year.

"I announced before the elections that I would by no means be prime minister if my brother, Lech, was elected president," Jaroslaw Kaczynski told AFP in October, a week after his brother scored a surprise win in the presidential race.

Jaroslaw said then that neither the Polish people nor Poland's international partners would tolerate a fraternal double act in the two key posts of Polish politics.

But on Saturday Jaroslaw Kaczynski boldly announced a U-turn, telling a press conference: "We are taking a risk in having a president and a prime minister who are brothers.

"However, we have come to the conclusion that putting forward another candidate (for prime minister) at this time would be a worse solution than putting me forward."

Donald Tusk, head of the business-friendly Civic Platform (PO), the main opposition party, claimed Jaroslaw Kaczynski lacked experience in economics and that Poland's image abroad would suffer under the power-hoarding twins.

"Poles are afraid of power concentrated in the four hands of the two brothers. This is power being concentrated by one family, with an intensity unknown in the civilized world," Tusk told reporters.

Pressed by the media to explain Friday's bombshell announcement of a change in prime minister, Jaroslaw Kaczynski gave just one explanation: Marcinkiewicz quit so he could turn his attention to contesting November 12 elections for Warsaw mayor.

"The victory of our candidate will allow the reform processes we have started in the country to be carried out at local level," said Kaczynski, whose party topped the poll in legislative elections last year.

Kaczynski said that he was planning to nominate a new finance minister, who would continue public finance reform and maintain the budget deficit at 30 billion zlotys (7.5 billion euros, 9.5 billion dollars.)

The current finance minister, Pawel Wojciechowski, was officially named only two weeks ago. Kaczynski said at the time he had not been consulted over Marcinkiewicz's choice of Wojciechowski.

Analysts have warned of economic turbulence in Poland following the departure of Marcinkiewicz, seen as the last economic liberal in a populist government.

Jacek Wisniewski of Raiffeisen Bank predicted that the national currency, the zloty, and bonds would fall when markets reopen on Monday.

Meanwhile Marcinkiewicz, 46, said he would formally hand in his resignation to the president on Monday. He rejected media suggestions of a rift between him and Jaroslaw Kaczynski.

"Politics is a team game about team work for the good of the country," he insisted.

But analysts were unconvinced. Political scientist Kazimierz Kik said Marcinkiewicz's departure was forced by Jaroslaw Kaczynski, annoyed by the increasingly independent and high-profile stance the premier was taking.

"Marcinkiewicz was openly abused and replaced like an old, worn-out glove when Jaroslaw Kaczynski decided he didn't want anyone rising above him any more," Kik was quoted by PAP news agency as saying.

Analyst Stanislaw Mocek said that Marcinkiewicz probably began moving toward the exit in May, when PiS formed a coalition with the far-right League of Polish Families (LPR) and the populist Samoobrona parties.

"Marcinkiewicz felt the government was not his own any more," Mocek said.

Polish Leader's Twin Tapped To Become PM (AP)

By Vanessa Gera

AP, July 9, 2006

The United States has its political power families — the Kennedys, the Clintons, the Bushes. But nothing quite like what is developing in Poland, which faced the almost certain prospect Saturday of having identical twins as prime minister and president.

President Lech Kaczynski was preparing to swear in his twin, Jaroslaw, as the head of a new Cabinet after Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz submitted his resignation.

Though both men have the same round faces and short, stout builds, many Poles have learned to distinguish them, thanks to the fact that Lech has two moles on his face, and wears a wedding ring. Jaroslaw is unmarried, and has no moles.

The 57-year-old twins — who happen to be Geminis — first won fame as child actors in the 1962 hit film "The Two Who Stole The Moon." Though their show-business careers stopped there, they became politically active when they joined the anti-communist opposition in the 1970s. They later served as advisers to the Solidarity movement in the 1980s.

DOJ_NMG_0039466

After the fall of communism, they served briefly as advisers to Solidarity leader Lech Walesa during his 1990-95 presidency, but later fell out with him.

Jaroslaw Kaczynski has used his role as chairman of the ruling Law and Justice party to guide the government from the sidelines since his social conservatives won elections last fall. The popular Marcinkiewicz has represented the government abroad.

The two apparently fell out over Marcinkiewicz's choice of a new finance minister. On Saturday, party officials accepted Marcinkiewicz's resignation and said they had chosen Jaroslaw Kaczynski to replace him. The nominee said at a news conference that he accepted.

The prospect of having portly, gray-haired identical twins in the two top posts has loomed as a possibility since Lech Kaczynski embarked on his presidential campaign last year.

But Jaroslaw Kaczynski had pledged to refrain from becoming prime minister, saying he wanted to spare the country the confusion of identical leaders.

As quirky as the situation might seem to outsiders, the strangeness of two identical men dominating the political scene has worn off to some extent for Poles, in part because the two have been a public presence for nearly half a century.

Jacek Kucharczyk, an analyst with the Institute of Public Affairs think tank, says that, even if their looks might confuse foreign dignitaries, the issue no longer looms as a domestic predicament.

"It was a kind of aesthetic problem during the elections, and some people thought it was strange looking," Kucharczyk said. "But the main problem is their track record in politics."

Poland has been beset by political instability and bickering since Law and Justice formed a government in October. Attempts to form a coalition with a pro-business party collapsed in the fall. After months of serving as a weak, minority administration, Law and Justice stabilized its government by forming a coalition with two smaller parties in May.

The deal sparked controversy because of the two small groups' reputations.

The farm-based Self-Defense is led by Andrzej Lepper, a rowdy former leader of occasionally violent anti-European Union street protests in the 1990s.

The League of Polish Families has sparked protests because of its close links with a far-right radical youth movement, All-Polish Youth, that has attacked gay rights parades and whose members have made Nazi gestures.

Marcinkiewicz still has to submit his resignation to the president for the change to become official, but it was expected to be a formality that the outgoing premier said he would happen Monday.

Oil's Promise Still A Dream (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

A pipeline has given Chad hundreds of millions of dollars to fight poverty but critics say corruption and waste have kept the money from those most in need.

Outside the gleaming white fences of a multibillion-dollar American petroleum complex here, a slum dreams of becoming a boom town.

Thousands of people have flocked to this village in southern Chad over the years, hoping their country's newfound oil wealth would translate into jobs and prosperity. But most remain unemployed, living in huts on garbage-strewn, dirt streets with neither electricity nor running water.

Relations between the village and an ExxonMobil Corp.-led consortium across the street are so strained that oil workers are now banned by their employer from patronizing local bars and other shops in the village. When fire raced through the slum in March, oil company fire trucks watched from the other side of the fence, witnesses said.

"They said our children would get jobs," said Benoit Djimrane Njarounda, who moved to the area more than a decade ago and now serves as the village's chief. "There were so many promises. What happened?"

Three years after this poor, landlocked Central African country joined the league of oil-producing nations, there are growing — and familiar — complaints that petroleum money is not getting to those most in need. For most of this year, Chad's oil wealth has been frozen in London bank accounts after a dispute with the World Bank.

As he led an ox across a plot of dirt to plant millet for his family, Joseph Bailessem, 27, lamented that he lacked the skills and education needed for a job at the plant. Worse yet, he said, his children, who were helping him till the soil, are missing out on their education because promised classrooms have yet to open.

"Where is the oil money going?" he asked. "White people are the only ones benefiting."

Just a few years ago, Chad was held up as an international model for how a developing nation could avoid the curse of oil and ensure that money did not disappear into bureaucrats' bank accounts, as seen in Nigeria, Sudan and Gabon.

DOJ_NMG_0039467

Thanks to decades of internal strife and its reputation as one of the world's most corrupt countries, this former French colony was unable to attract investment partners to develop its oil fields until the World Bank agreed in 2000 to back a $4-billion deal to build a pipeline from Chad to the Atlantic coastline of neighboring Cameroon.

In return for its participation, the World Bank secured strict conditions on how the Chad government's share of the profit could be spent. Some 10% would be set aside in a "future generations" fund; 72% was earmarked to fight poverty by spending on health, education and roads; 13.5% would go to government coffers and the remaining 4.5% to local communities affected by the development.

By the end of 2005, the government of Chad had received about $420 million, nearly doubling its annual income.

But tracking where the money went is not so simple. A major chunk, more than $74 million in 2005, was allocated for new roads, according to Chad's independent oil oversight committee.

Oil funds helped lay one new toll road to the south and are being used for a 400-mile highway to the east. Still, paved roads remain a rarity in Chad — three times the size of California — even in the capital of N'Djamena.

Aside from the new roads, government officials are hard-pressed to describe large-scale benefits of the oil funds. They talk about smaller projects: a new school fence and some renovated classrooms in the capital, HIV testing clinics, a water tower in the southern city of Doba.

Much of the work remains unfinished. Government leaders have urged patience.

"People are complaining because the programs haven't reached them yet, but they will," said Njarindo Milongar, a member of parliament who also chairs the committee that controls money earmarked for communities affected by oil development.

Critics, however, say much of the money is being squandered. Mekombe Therese, vice president of the independent oversight committee charged with monitoring the use of oil proceeds, said her group's analysis of spending in 2004 and 2005 found that 40% to 45% of oil money fell victim to waste, corruption, nepotism, shoddy work or delinquent contractors.

For example, a venture involving the brother of Chadian President Idriss Deby received one of the biggest road construction contracts; committee examiners found a $1-million university grant was being held in the rector's personal bank account; a year after spending $800,000 for three new schools, none had been completed despite a six-month deadline. And new desks provided by another contractor are already falling apart, Therese said.

"The government needs to take action against those who have not fulfilled their obligations, but they are not doing enough," Therese said.

Instead, Deby launched a campaign against the World Bank to seize control over more of Chad's oil royalties. Late last year, Chad's parliament unilaterally scrapped the 10% "future generations" fund, doubled the government's take of profit to 30% and expanded the definition of "poverty reducing" sectors to include such things as the military, energy development and legal reform.

Deby supporters said the revisions reflected Chad's dire needs and worsening finances. They pointed to the Darfur crisis in neighboring Sudan to the east, which has sent more than 200,000 refugees across the border into Chad.

Much of the criticism was aimed at the future generations fund.

"If the current generation is dying of hunger and disease, there won't be a future generation," said Milongar, the parliament member. "We need the money now."

The revisions were widely viewed as a survival strategy by Deby, whose 16-year regime is facing growing public frustration. Unpaid government employees have gone on strike. Soldiers began receiving their salaries only late last year, when rebellions broke out in the eastern part of the country. One coup attempt in April made its way to the distant capital in southwestern Chad.

"He needs the money to buy more guns," said a diplomat in N'Djamena whose government would not authorize him to speak publicly.

Chad's oil riches represent both opportunity and peril for Deby, experts say. If Deby survives another year in office, he'll control assets worth billions of dollars. On the other hand, oil money has made the once-obscure African nation a much more attractive target, to both rebels and other countries.

Chadian officials accuse Sudan and China of backing its rebels. The U.S., which gets about 18% of its imported oil from Africa, also is taking a more active interest.

"The oil war in Chad is beginning," said Chadian economist Ali A. Haggar, a former advisor to Deby.

The World Bank has responded by suspending activities in Chad, effectively freezing the bank accounts holding the nation's oil funds. As a result, none of the estimated $270 million in 2006 royalties has been released.

At one point, Deby angrily threatened to shut down the oil fields if the funds weren't released. Under a truce, the World Bank is preparing to disburse some money as long as Chad pledges to abide by some of the original conditions. Negotiations over a long-term settlement continue.

DOJ_NMG_0039468

Officials in Chad blame the World Bank for halting their poverty projects. "We have so much work to do in Chad and our investments have been blocked by the World Bank," said Mahamat Ali Hassan, minister of economy, planning and cooperation. "I'm really confused."

World Bank officials said they were left with little choice after the government altered the terms of the original agreement.

"It was a decision taken very reluctantly, yet one which we believed was necessary in order to protect the original goals of the project, namely to ensure that the money went to poverty-reducing public spending," Ali Khadr, the director of the World Bank's Chad operation, wrote in an e-mail to The Times.

In some ways, rising oil prices have weakened the World Bank's hand in negotiations.

The oil consortium, including ExxonMobil, Chevron and Petronas of Malaysia, originally predicted that profit would not flow until 2008, based on projected oil prices of $15 a barrel for crude. With prices above $70 a barrel, the consortium began reporting a profit this year.

By taxing the consortium's earnings, the government now stands to receive a windfall next year that officials in Chad say could total $1 billion, far exceeding the royalties they've been receiving.

So far there are no laws or World Bank provisions that restrict the use of such tax revenue, though World Bank officials hope to include that money in the new agreement.

Executives at ExxonMobil and its Esso Exploration & Production Chad Inc. subsidiary declined to comment.

A recent quarterly report by the consortium expressed hope that the government and the World Bank would resolve the dispute.

On its website, ExxonMobil cites its contributions to assisting Chadians, saying it has spent nearly $610 million on goods and services from local suppliers, $8.75 million on community projects such as schools and wells, and more than $9 million in compensation to individuals and landowners affected by its operations. The consortium says 83% of its 7,300 workers are Chadian.

But few of those jobs have gone to the hopeful men and women living outside the gates of the oil facility. A few years ago, they dubbed their slum "Satan" for its bars and brothels. Later, they dropped the first letter and changed the name to Atan, which sounds like the French word for "wait," to reflect their growing impatience.

The only success story in Atan was the Phoenix bar, which once attracted scores of Americans and other foreigners each weekend with its lure of beer, music and women. Some oil workers even installed a generator to keep the drinks cold. But in December, the Phoenix was deemed off limits to oil company employees, according to bar owner Miskine Mougaye. His profit immediately evaporated.

On a recent Saturday afternoon, the place was nearly deserted except for a table of drunken young women, loudly lamenting the lack of men available for sex or to buy them beer.

"It's not the same since the Americans left," Mougaye said. "When they left, they took the generator with them."

In War-Torn Congo, Going Wireless To Reach Home (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

For Poor, Cellphones Bridge Digital Divide

KINSHASA, Congo -- Until not long ago, if Zadhe Iyombe wanted to talk to his mother, he had to make the eight-day boat trip up the Congo River to the jungle town where he was raised. In a country with almost no roads, mail or telephone system and a grisly guerrilla war raging, making that exhausting and dangerous trip was about the only way he could find out if his 59-year-old mother was still alive.

Then he got a cellphone.

Now he talks to his mother every day. And once a week, with a simple new feature in African cellphones, he uses a text message to transfer five minutes of airtime to her phone to make sure she can always call him.

"Now I know immediately how she is doing," said Iyombe, who lives here in the capital, 400 miles southwest of his mother's home. "These phones make everything easier. It has totally changed life in Congo."

As surely as the light bulb and the automobile before them, the cellphone and text messaging are radically changing the way people live in the developing world. In widespread use for about five years in much of Africa, technology long taken for granted by the world's rich has made life easier, safer and more prosperous for the world's poor.

For the first time, millions of Africans are able to communicate easily with people who are beyond shouting distance. Farmers and fishermen, for example, use text messaging to check market prices, eliminating middlemen and increasing profits -- and preventing long trips to the market on days it is canceled.

DOJ_NMG_0039469

In cities, cellphones are becoming a basic tool of electronic commerce, allowing consumers to transfer money to merchants with a few presses on the keypad.

Restaurant owners now can advertise by sending bulk texts to their customers, promising something delicious for lunch. People call a doctor, mechanic or police officer instead of walking miles to find one. News of births, deaths and illnesses instantly reaches the farthest corners of the jungle, where mothers like Iyombe's struggle with the concept of their children's voices emerging from a little plastic box with buttons.

"Before, if you had a sick baby in the middle of the night, he could easily die," Iyombe said, holding the Nokia phone that has raised his ambitions and expectations of life. "Now you can call somebody to help."

Worldwide, there are more than 2.4 billion cellphone users, with more than 1,000 new customers added every minute, according to industry analysts. About 59 percent of users are in developing countries, making cellphones the first telecommunications technology in history to have more users there than in the developed world.

Cellphone usage in Africa is growing faster than in any other region and jumped from 63 million users two years ago to about 152 million today, according to David Pringle, a spokesman for the GSM Association, a trade group that represents cellular companies whose customers account for 80 percent of the global total.

Few places are seeing faster growth than Congo, which has 3.2 million cellphone customers and just 20,000 conventional land lines. At least 8,000 new cellphone customers sign up each day here; the number of users has increased more than tenfold in the past five years.

When one of Congo's first cellphone networks opened in 1999, it had capacity for 4,000 customers, but 30,000 people lined up outside the office demanding a phone, said Gilbert Nkuli, of Vodacom Congo, the largest of the five cellphone companies competing in the country's booming market.

Africa has attracted multimillion-dollar investments from many of the world's major cellphone companies, including Finland-based Nokia and U.K.-based Vodafone. Vodacom Congo is co-owned by Vodafone and a South Africa-based company, while Celtel, the second-largest provider in Congo, is owned by a Netherlands-based company that has operations in 14 African countries.

The two operators have built about 700 cellphone towers across Congo. Vodacom's Nkuli estimated that 70 percent of the country's 60 million people now live in areas with cellphone coverage.

"People would rather be without a shirt and trousers," Nkuli said, "and they'd rather go for days without food, instead of not having a phone."Dealing in Minutes

Down a rutted dirt road on the tattered outskirts of Kinshasa, Iyombe, 36, sat in the tiny two-room house he shares with his wife. He had been hoping for a career as an electrician, but when he finished his training in 2001, he couldn't find a job. The Congolese economy had been run into the ground by three decades of corrupt dictatorial rule by Mobuto Sese Seko. Then, after Mobutu was overthrown in 1997, the country dissolved into a war that has left 4 million people dead.

Amid all the despair, Iyombe spotted something new and promising: people carrying cellphones. The more he looked, the more he saw his future in the little gadgets. So he saved and borrowed, spending $500 for his first phone (the average price has since come down to about $40), and started charging people to make calls.

Now he's at the heart of Kinshasa's new airtime economy, in which minutes on a cellphone are a commodity that can be used, bartered or sold for cash.

In Kinshasa's noisy street markets, thousands of people sit at little wooden benches with signs that say appel , French for "call." They keep one or two -- sometimes four -- cellphones in their laps. They buy airtime in bulk from phone companies, then charge customers a small premium to make calls.

Amid the exhaust-choked chaos, airtime dealers sit patiently under colorful umbrellas or in wobbly plastic chairs offering exactly the same service as perhaps 30 or 40 other dealers working the same corner. They're all busy all the time.

At his little stand, which was the first one in his neighborhood, Iyombe said, he sells hundreds of calls a week and makes a profit of about $20 -- a fantastic weekly wage in a country where most people live on $1 a day. Iyombe supports his wife and pays rent for an aunt and school fees for two nephews. "I love my work," he said, wearing the bright red T-shirt of Celtel.

A large part of Iyombe's business is transferring airtime for his customers. They give him cash, and he transfers the minutes from his phone to wherever the customer wants them sent -- a friend, a relative or a business partner, often in some distant corner of this country the size of Western Europe.

The transfer takes only a few seconds: Iyombe needs only to enter the amount of airtime and the phone number of the person receiving it. Cellphone companies have added that function to phones in the past year.

Iyombe said many of his customers transfer airtime so that family members in the countryside can resell it. Customers in Kinshasa send airtime to a brother or parent in a distant village, who then sets up under a shady tree and acts as a human phone booth. They sell calls on their phone and earn enough cash to feed their families. In many Congolese villages, cellphone ownership marks the divide between haves and have-nots.

DOJ_NMG_0039470

Iyombe said text messaging has been slowed by widespread illiteracy but has started taking off in recent months as people learn key words to text, such as "Call me." He said it is becoming more popular largely because a text message costs five cents, compared with 26 cents for a one-minute voice call. When his mother wants to talk to him, he said, she sends a text telling him to call.

"It was a little difficult getting her to use texts, but now she's very good at it," he said, smiling at the thought.

The demand for cellphone calls has sprouted several offshoot industries. For a fee, people type text messages for the illiterate. In places where there is little or no electricity -- which means most of Congo -- entrepreneurs set up small diesel-powered generators and connect plug boards with 30 sockets. People plug in their phones to charge for a couple of hours for about 30 cents.

Iyombe keeps his own small generator to make sure he's never without battery power.

"Without these cellphones, we wouldn't be able to move forward," he said.Mobile Accounts

Iyombe spoke while sitting in the larger room of his house, which is just big enough for a bed -- and a television he bought in a cellphone transaction.

Last year he walked into an electronics shop in the city center and picked out the 20-inch TV. To pay, he punched a few buttons on his cellphone and transferred a down payment of $150 into the shop's bank account. The shopkeeper received a text message confirmation that the money had been transferred successfully, and Iyombe walked out with his new TV. Iyombe settled his bill with three more $50 payments via his cellphone.

"I went in empty-handed, but I could still buy something because I had my phone," he said.

Conveniences such as laptops, Internet access, ATMs and credit cards are rare or nonexistent in Congo, so entrepreneurs are devising ways to use cellphones to serve the same functions.

Iyombe is one of about 25,000 Congolese subscribers to Celpay, a company that offers Internet banking through cellphones. Celpay customers make cash deposits into their Celpay accounts and can access their accounts, transfer money or pay bills with their phones.

Dozens of businesses, including gas stations and grocery stores, now allow customers to pay for goods through Celpay. The company that distributes Coca-Cola and Heineken beer also uses the system to collect payment, which means drivers no longer have to carry a safe full of cash on their trucks and constantly worry about bandits.

When Iyombe wants to make a deposit to his account, he can go to one of more than 100 "cash points" set up across the country. Most are small booths with a person sitting inside with a cellphone and a cash box, known here as "human teller machines." Iyombe gives cash to the clerk, who sends a text message to Celpay noting the deposit. Iyombe then receives a text message confirmation that the money has been credited to his account.

Lazarus Muchenje, chief executive of Celpay, said his company is trying to capitalize on the Congolese embrace of cellphone technology: "We are using the credibility of the cellphone network." Celpay is owned by FirstRand Banking Group, a major South African financial institution.

At a busy gas station in Kinshasa, manager Tharcisse Tshimanga said he gets six or eight customers a day paying with their phones.

"People trust this," he said. "It's made everything easier."Tool of Corruption, Peace

Cellphones have also created a new kind of corruption in a country rife with it: People here tell of government officials demanding bribes in the form of airtime transferred to their cellphones. Local officials said they believe armed rebel groups use cellphones and texts to coordinate their operations in the country's eastern provinces, where they fight regularly with 17,000 U.N. peacekeepers, the largest U.N. force in the world.

But the technology is also being used to create peace, as with a program to disarm more than 150,000 men and women who fought in Congo's gruesome war.

One recent morning in downtown Kinshasa, Fiston Disundi walked up to a little white Celpay cash point booth and handed over his government ID.

The woman in the booth entered his ID number into her cellphone and sent a text message to Celpay's computer database. Ten seconds later the response came back. Disundi, 27, was a former soldier who had turned in his AK-47 rifle in January. That meant he was entitled to a monthly $25 cash payment, which she promptly handed over to him.

The World Bank, Britain, France and other big donors have put up $200 million for the year-old program, designed to turn Congo's warriors into wage earners. So far more than 75,000 people have handed over their guns in exchange for job training and a cash incentive: an initial $110 payment, followed by monthly $25 payments for a year.

DOJ_NMG_0039471

Initially, clerks using thick account books with handwritten entries were having trouble making the thousands of payments efficiently. So, in February the program contracted with Celpay to modernize the process.

Disundi said when he received his first two $25 payments, he waited nearly six hours in long lines while clerks dug through record books to find his details. But when he went to the Celpay booth recently, the transaction took less than a minute. The system also confirmed that Disundi was where he was supposed to be: Ex-combatants must agree to stay in their home regions rather than gathering with others in hotspots.

Sitting in the shade in the intense morning heat, Disundi, a thin man with a scruffy beard, said he'd been carrying a gun since 1997, when his parents were killed by a mortar shell that fell on their house. "I saw so many terrible things," he said. "I felt nothing anymore. I was just waiting to die."

He said he's relieved not to be carrying a weapon. He wants to become a mechanic so he can support his two children.

"I don't want them to go through what I've been through," he said.

He has no job and almost no money. But he has a cellphone, which rang over and over as he talked.

After TV Debates, Pakistan May Ease Laws On Rape Reporting (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, July 8 — The young audience fell into confused silence and then buzzed with whispers after Mir Ibrahim Rahman announced that there was no difference between an apple and an orange.

Mr. Rahman, 28, chief executive of the immensely popular Geo TV network, was speaking last Sunday at a youth conference in Rawalpindi, the garrison city adjacent to the capital, Islamabad. His absurd statement, he immediately made clear, was meant to illustrate the failings of a set of Islamic decrees known collectively as the Hudood Ordinance.

The laws, introduced in 1979 and criticized internationally since, include a clause stating that to prove rape, a woman must have at least four male witnesses. If the woman fails to provide proof, she herself faces the charge of adultery.

"The Hudood Ordinance makes no distinction between rape and adultery," Mr. Rahman explained to his audience. "It is just like saying there is no difference between an apple and an orange."

That flaw, critics say, has put many women behind bars. Of about 6,000 women in Pakistani custody awaiting trial as of March, 4,621 were being held on Hudood violations, according to the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, an independent group. Some 1,300 women awaiting trial were ordered released on Friday, after President Pervez Musharraf allowed bail in nonviolent offenses.

Pakistani society has remained bitterly divided over the laws. Orthodox clergymen have often portrayed the laws as divine ("hudood" refers to punishments in the Koran for adultery and fornication, as well as for consuming alcohol, making false accusations and stealing). Rights advocates have demanded absolute repeal since 1980's. They maintain that the Hudood Ordinance not only negates the rights of women but is also a misinterpretation of Islam.

Now, there are signs that the laws may be, at the least, softened. And Mr. Rahman — who has pressed for public debate over them in television shows, advertising campaigns and personal appearances at seminars, like the one last Sunday — may be a major reason.

Most prominently, Geo put together and broadcast four groundbreaking episodes of a program called "Zara Socieye" ("Just Think") in June, on which 27 top religious scholars debated various clauses of the Hudood Ordinance and agreed on a series of amendments.

Mr. Rahman, the son and grandson of Pakistani media magnates, studied in the United States and worked at Goldman Sachs in New York. He returned to Pakistan four years ago to lead Geo, one of more than a dozen private television channels that were founded after President Musharraf liberalized media laws.

"On the flight back, I wrote a letter to myself, explaining why I am going back," Mr. Rahman recalled. "I poured all of my idealism in that letter." One of the goals he wrote down, he said, was raising public awareness of the Hudood laws.

Last week, President Musharraf asked the Council of Islamic Ideology, which advises the legislature on whether a certain law is repugnant to Islam or not, to draft an amendment to the Hudood Ordinance.

The Law Ministry is also proposing changes.

"Now, there is a lot of consensus," Wasi Zafar, Pakistan's law minister, said Wednesday in an interview. "Many religious scholars have admitted that certain laws are required to be amended." But he maintained that misuse of the laws is the problem, rather than their intrinsic flaws. "Major defect is the misuse of the law," Mr. Zafar said while acknowledging that legal experts have called it "bad legislation."

Mr. Zafar said his ministry would complete a draft of amendments this month and the government would present it in the next session of the Parliament, which is expected to be held this month as well. A simple majority is needed to change the law.

DOJ_NMG_0039472

Shahid Shamsi, a spokesman for Jamaat-e-Islami, the country's largest Islamic party, said his party was not averse to changing the Hudood Ordinance but did not support repealing it.

At the same time, some critics of the law say that only repeal will satisfy them.

"No amendment to the law will be able to make these 'black laws' acceptable to civil society," read a statement released this week by Pakistan's leading nongovernmental and rights organizations.

Nasreen Azhar of Action Aid, one of the signers of the statement, said in an interview: "It is beyond amendment. We all have seen the negative effects it has had on women."

'150 Dead' In Russian Jet Crash (CNN)

CNN, July 9, 2006

MOSCOW, Russia (CNN) -- An Airbus A-310 passenger jet with 200 people on board left the runway early Sunday while landing at Irkutsk Airport in eastern Siberia, crashed into a concrete barrier and burst into flames, killing 150 people, according to the Russian news agency Interfax.

The front of the plane was crushed, and more than 40 people were hospitalized with burns, the agency said, quoting emergency officials.

The jet, flying from Moscow, hit a building before catching fire, and the blaze was under control, the agency said.

Emergency crews were attempting to retrieve bodies and rescue anyone left on board.

Scores Feared Dead In Siberia Runway Crash (AP)

By Henry Meyer

AP, July 9, 2006

An airplane carrying about 200 people crashed Sunday in the Siberian city of Irkutsk and most on board were feared dead, officials said.

The regional prosecutor's office said a preliminary count showed that more than 150 people died, the Interfax news agency reported.

The plane was carrying 192 passengers, Emergency Situations Ministry spokeswoman Irina Andrianova said.

Andrianova said 43 people had been hospitalized and another 10 managed to escape.

The Interfax report said that the dead were believed to include the eight crew members.

The Airbus A-310 operated by Sibir, Russia's second-largest airline, crashed on landing, went off the runway and burst into flames, Andrianova said.

"The aircraft veered off the runway on landing. It was traveling at a terrific speed," Andrianova said.

The plane hit a concrete barrier, collapsing the front section of the aircraft, she said. It then burst into flames.

The aircraft was on a flight from Moscow to Irkutsk, near Lake Baikal.

It took five emergency services more than two hours to extinguish the flames, Andrianova said.

Former Soviet airlines had a grisly record of crashes in the 1990s, following the whittling of much of Soviet monopoly carrier Aeroflot into hundreds of regional airlines plagued by scant money, aging equipment and cavalier disregard for safety.

In recent years, crashes from equipment failure or pilot error have declined sharply.

Sibir came under new ownership amid a 1998 financial crisis and installed a dynamic young team to reinvent what remained of Aeroflot's Siberian wing with the help of Western consultants.

Those plans were dealt a blow when a Sibir Tu-154 was one of two planes lost in near-simultaneous crashes blamed on terrorist bombs in 2004.

Three years earlier, another Sibir plane was shot down by a stray Ukrainian missile fired during military exercises. All 78 people on board died.

Woman Dies On Boat Carrying Cubans To U.S. (AP)

By Kelli Kennedy

AP, July 9, 2006

A boat overloaded with Cubans being smuggled into the U.S. tried to ram a Coast Guard vessel in rough seas early Saturday, and a woman aboard the boat died, authorities said.

The 36-foot, go-fast boat ignored orders to stop when the Coast Guard tried to intercept it 4 miles south of Boca Chica around 6:30 a.m., said Petty Officer James Judge, a spokesman for the Coast Guard.

Coast Guard crew then fired two shots into the vessel's engine to disable it, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0039473

"The boat was bouncing around like crazy. It was very rough, choppy waters," Judge said. "They repeatedly attempted to ram the vessel more than five times, but they never made contact."

The boat carried 31 Cubans and three people authorities said were smugglers.

The woman who died suffered a head injury and severe bruising to her face, and an autopsy was scheduled Sunday.

Judge said three men on the boat were treated for minor injuries. Authorities said none of the injuries was caused by the Coast Guard gunfire. A pregnant woman also was hospitalized, but her condition was not immediately known.

The remaining migrants were still aboard the Coast Guard cutter and will be processed as usual, he said. Under the "wet foot/dry foot" policy, most Cubans who reach U.S. soil are allowed to remain, while those intercepted at sea are generally sent home.

It was not immediately known where in Cuba the migrants began their journey. Go-fast boats from Cuba can typically reach South Florida in a couple hours, Judge said.

"The boat was severely overloaded," he said. "All those add up for dangerous possibilities."

Authorities detained three people as suspected smugglers, though criminal charges were not immediately filed.

"Smugglers often treat migrants as if they were human cargo, with blatant disregard for individual life and safety. This must stop," U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said in a statement. "The United States Attorney's Office is determined to use all prosecutorial tools at our disposal to investigate and prosecute these smuggling incidents."

A spokesman for the Cuban American National Foundation said the shots fired by the Coast Guard were "of grave concern."

"The people who are culpable are those who engage in the smuggling of humans," said Alfredo Mesa, the group's executive director. "At the same time, we call upon the U.S. Coast Guard to remember that these are human beings fleeing tyranny."

Ramos-Horta Is Appointed New Premier Of East Timor (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

DENPASAR, Indonesia, July 8 — In a move designed to bring stability to East Timor after months of unrest, the Nobel peace laureate José Ramos-Horta was named prime minister on Saturday.

President Xanana Gusmão selected Mr. Ramos-Horta to lead a new government after Mari Alkatiri was forced to resign as prime minister two weeks ago amid allegations that he had helped to organize and arm a civilian militia.

Mr. Gusmão, speaking in the capital, Dili, on Saturday evening, said he hoped Mr. Ramos-Horta, a close friend of his who enjoys popular support at home and is respected abroad, would "bring about the process of healing."

The selection was praised by the Australian government, which sent more than 1,000 soldiers to East Timor in late May to lead an international peacekeeping force in putting down an insurrection among members of the army and the police.

"We welcome the fact that the political leaders of East Timor are starting to sort their problems out," the Australian foreign minister, Alexander Downer, said Saturday.

In Dili, residents said they were relieved. "I guarantee Horta is the best we have," said Oldegar Massinga, who works for a United Nations agency, in a telephone interview. "Now he has to send the refugees back home and put a police post in every place in Dili."

The immediate challenge for Mr. Ramos-Horta, who was foreign minister in the previous government, will be to convince the more than 100,000 people who fled Dili and outlying areas during violence last month to return home. The refugees are living in makeshift camps but have said they were reluctant to leave the camps, watched over by the Australians and other members of the 2,700-troop peacekeeping force, while armed groups still roam the capital.

The violence in the capital, Dili, spun out of control in May after 600 soldiers were dismissed from East Timor's army of 1,400. Battles between members of the army and the police spread into general gang warfare and looting, bringing the government to a standstill.

It was the first major breakdown of law and order since East Timor, with a population of less than a million, declared independence in 2002 after three years of rule by the United Nations, and three decades of occupation by neighboring Indonesia.

The recent violence came after the United Nations and the World Bank had praised East Timor as a model example of a new nation. Several billion dollars in international aid was spent to help East Timor build its own army, police force and judicial system, and on the United Nations peacekeeping force that came to East Timor after a vote in favor of independence in 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0039474

Mr. Ramos-Horta, 56, shared the Nobel Peace Prize in 1996 with the Roman Catholic bishop of Dili, Carlos Ximenes Belos. They were cited for their courage in resisting and campaigning against occupation by Indonesia, which invaded the former Portuguese colony in 1975.

While the bishop stayed in East Timor, Mr. Ramos-Horta traveled the world after the invasion, trying to raise awareness about the plight of his people. A recent United Nations-backed commission estimated that more than 100,000 people were killed in East Timor by the Indonesian military.

Two weeks ago, a special envoy of the United Nations, Ian Martin, arrived in East Timor with a team of experts to assess what kind of new aid the United Nations might provide. Mr. Martin has said that a United Nations police force would likely be dispatched, and that a peacekeeping force was a possibility.

In the past two weeks, Mr. Ramos-Horta has been critical of Mr. Alkatiri, the ousted prime minister, saying that he was almost certainly involved in arming a civilian militia. He also criticized the former prime minister's failure to organize public-works programs for the large numbers of unemployed young men in East Timor.

While East Timor has one of the world's lowest per capita incomes, it possesses large oil deposits and has recently accrued more than $600 million in oil revenue that remains virtually untouched. Mr. Ramos-Horta said in a recent interview that it was imperative for a new government to provide employment programs.

East Timor Gets New Leadership (LAT)

By Richard C. Paddock

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Jose Ramos-Horta, who received the Nobel Peace Prize a decade ago for his efforts to win East Timor's independence, was named prime minister of the tiny nation Saturday as it tried to overcome months of violence and internal strife.

Ramos-Horta replaces Mari Bin Amude Alkatiri, who stepped down June 26 as prime minister after months of violence that claimed at least 30 lives and prompted 150,000 people — 15% of the population — to flee their homes and take refuge in makeshift camps.

Alkatiri had been accused of encouraging factional fighting between residents from the eastern and western parts of the country in an attempt to hold on to power. East Timorese authorities are investigating whether he authorized the arming of civilian hit squads to silence his political opponents.

The appointment of Ramos-Horta, 56, was announced by President Jose Alexandre Gusmao, who is immensely popular as the former leader of the guerrilla resistance against Indonesian rule but who has limited power under the constitution.

Gusmao said he hoped the appointment of Ramos-Horta would help "bring about the process of healing and bring peace and stability to the people of East Timor."

East Timor, the world's newest nation, won independence from Indonesia in 1999 but only after pro-Indonesian militia groups killed more than 1,000 people and destroyed 70% of the country's buildings.

The United Nations helped rebuild East Timor, which officially became a nation in 2002, but the world body withdrew its peacekeepers last year in a move that U.N. officials now recognize was premature.

Violence erupted in April after Alkatiri fired 600 soldiers, or nearly half the army, for protesting that they faced discrimination because they came from the western part of the country. Alkatiri called in loyal troops to quell the protests and they opened fire on civilians, killing at least six people.

The country destabilized further when the police and army began fighting each other, then fled the capital, Dili, leaving the city in the hands of arsonists and gangs armed with machetes.

A 2,700-member international peacekeeping force led by Australia arrived May 25 and has succeeded in restoring order, although arsonists continue to set fire to homes and businesses belonging to their rivals. A house in Dili was set ablaze hours after Ramos-Horta's appointment was announced, the Associated Press reported.

Ramos-Horta, whose name has been floated as a possible successor to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, held the posts of foreign minister and defense minister until he quit last month in protest over Alkatiri's refusal to step down. Alkatiri's resignation came the next day.

Gusmao and Ramos-Horta are said to be close allies in a government that is dominated by the Fretilin party, which led the independence movement in East Timor and now controls 55 of parliament's 88 seats. Gusmao and Ramos-Horta once were members of Fretilin, which Ramos-Horta helped found.

Elections are scheduled for next year, and Fretilin's popularity has suffered under Alkatiri. In meetings with Gusmao, Fretilin leaders agreed to nominate Ramos-Horta as one of four possible candidates for prime minister even though he was no longer with the party.

DOJ_NMG_0039475

Ramos-Horta fled East Timor, a former Portuguese colony, just before it was invaded in 1975 by Indonesian troops. For more than two decades, he traveled around the world campaigning for East Timor's independence. He and Bishop Carlos Ximenes Belo, who stayed behind in East Timor, were jointly awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1996.

In an interview with The Times last month, Ramos-Horta said the impoverished country had not managed its resources well, noting that $600 million in oil revenue was waiting to be allocated.

He said he would favor using some of that money to provide food, healthcare and education for the poorest residents. He also said he would like to rebuild the nation by offering tax-free status for up to 10 years for foreign businesses willing to invest there.

When Genocide Worsens (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof column

The New York Times, July 9, 2006

A genocide by its nature would seem to be the rock bottom of human behavior. But in Darfur, we see a genocide that is growing worse.

The Darfur Peace Agreement, signed on May 5, signaled a ray of hope in a desperate land. But on the ground, its deadlines are not being met, security is deteriorating, and the violence is rippling from Sudan ever wider into both Chad and the Central African Republic.

One measure of how awful the situation has become in eastern Chad is that at least 15,000 villagers have fled ... into Darfur!

In one broad swath of the Chad border region, the only Westerners brave enough (and crazy enough) to stay are French doctors with Doctors Without Borders. Hats off to them.

In just the last six months, aid groups in eastern Chad have lost 26 vehicles to armed hijackers. A Spanish woman working for Unicef was shot and nearly killed in May when her vehicle was stolen — and the car was later spotted in Sudan, sailing through government checkpoints. This insecurity puts relief agencies in a terrible situation, for they don't want to risk having their aid workers murdered or raped, and yet if they pull out many thousands of Darfuris will die.

"We cannot play with the lives of our own staff beyond a certain limit," frets Jan Egeland, an under secretary general of the United Nations, adding, "Our people in the field are increasingly desperate."

"I think we're headed toward total chaos," he said. "Will we have collapse in nine days, nine weeks, nine months? I don't know. But the situation is unsustainable."

One problem is that provisions of the Darfur Peace Agreement aren't actually being carried out so far — and in the meantime it has inflamed tensions among the African tribes that have been victimized by the genocide. The Fur tribe, one of the biggest in Darfur ("Darfur" means "Homeland of the Fur"), has mostly opposed the deal, and so there has been fighting between Fur and men of the Zaghawa tribe, whose top commander signed the agreement.

"There is a significant risk that the Darfur Peace Agreement will collapse," the U.N. special envoy for Sudan, Jan Pronk, wrote in his blog. "The agreement does not resonate with the people of Darfur. ... It is not yet dead, but severely paralyzed."

Meanwhile, Sudan is as adamant as ever that it will never accept United Nations peacekeepers, and the international community isn't prepared to push back hard.

The two most important Bush administration officials on Darfur, Robert Zoellick and Michael Gerson (who has been the conscience of the White House), have both announced their resignations, so there is a vacuum in Washington as well. President Bush should address this vacuum by appointing a top-level envoy for the crisis. Mr. President, how about calling in James Baker, or else Colin Powell?

In talking to experts about Darfur over the last three years, I usually have encountered both optimists and pessimists. These days, I just can't find an optimist. The range of opinion is between those who think the crisis will deteriorate slowly and those who think the situation will disintegrate so precipitously that soon 100,000 people will be dying each month, unless the peace agreement can somehow be revived.

There are specific measures I can suggest. We need to amplify (though not reopen) the peace agreement to bring the Fur in, and we need to ensure that its deadlines are met. We need a U.N.-led or French-led protection force in eastern Chad. We need to bolster the African Union force in Darfur immediately and push harder for Sudan to admit U.N. peacekeepers. We need a no-fly zone. We need to press Europeans to become more involved and to remind Arabs that the slaughter of several hundred thousand Muslims in Darfur is every bit as worthy of protest as cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

But most of all, we must put genocide squarely on the international agenda. One lesson of history is that world leaders always prefer to ignore a genocide, but when forced to face the horrors — as in Bosnia or Kosovo — they figure out ways of responding. The most acute need is not for policies but for political will.

DOJ_NMG_0039476

So here's a suggestion: Let's charter a few cargo planes to carry the corpses of hundreds of new victims from Darfur and Chad to the U.N. The butchered victims of Darfur could lie in state as a memorial to global indifference — and as a spur to become serious about the first genocide of the 21st century.

Bush's Unintended Internationalism (WP)

By Jim Hoagland column

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

In spite of itself, the Bush administration is reshaping and revitalizing international law as a governing concept and a force in world politics. This White House gives new meaning to the notion of unintended and devoutly unwanted consequences.

Its highhanded policies in the war on global terrorist networks and the occupation of Iraq have provoked sharp reaction at home and abroad. Over time, this reaction has turned into a search by others for legal and political frameworks to contain President Bush's campaign to concentrate national security power in his hands and shield it from even cursory scrutiny and consultation.

This is the unwritten subtext of the Supreme Court's recent rebuke to the administration for mishandling the prosecution of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Guantanamo Bay detainee who was once Osama bin Laden's chauffeur.

The majority's legal reasoning in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld was mundane and mechanical, which was all that was needed to demolish the administration's shoddy case. But the majority's political argument was extraordinary and explosive for its heavy reliance on "customary international law" and "the law of war" to prescribe Hamdan's treatment in the American criminal justice system.

This appeal to international standards was a stretch for the court. But it is justified as a wake-up call to the administration on an obvious point: What is reasonable -- legally speaking -- in emergency conditions is not necessarily reasonable on an enduring or permanent basis.

The White House has had sufficient time to work with Congress on long-term national security legislation covering detainees, the court pointedly noted. The same reasoning applies to telecommunications surveillance and other aspects of the administration's self-described "long war" on terrorism.

But Bush has resolutely refused to do this until now. The irreducible working principle of this White House has been that only the president can be relied on to resist the pressures and temptations that will cause Congress to leak, vacillate or turn tail on even the gravest national security problems. The same misperception has also applied in large part to allies abroad.

The Bush White House is still determined to entrench its secretive and autocratic methods, run through intelligence agencies, as the way future administrations must operate in an era of new, unpredictable dangers. Bush and Vice President Cheney put a positive spin on Napoleon's dictum that nothing endures as long as the temporary.

The fact is that most in Congress -- and for that matter the Supreme Court's majority in Hamdan and most of America's global allies -- agree with Bush that new methods for fighting a significant danger are needed. They just don't agree that Bush and a few trusted aides should determine those methods alone and in secret.

Bush and Cheney are no doubt sincere in their misplaced concerns, which just happen to reinforce Karl Rove's political strategy of running against Congress, the media, pusillanimous foreigners and other reputed national security weaklings. But Bush and Cheney underestimate the costs of their policies and the countervailing forces they inevitably trigger.

European governments and civil liberties groups are pressing for new laws to prevent CIA secret renditions of terrorism suspects from or through European territory. They may also seek to limit other cooperation of their own secret services with Washington, especially after the arrest last week of two Italian secret service officials for allegedly helping the CIA abduct a terrorism suspect in Milan and fly him to Egypt.

Even in Iraq, the administration is creating a strong local and international backlash by refusing resolutely to discuss with Iraqi politicians a status-of-forces agreement, or SOFA, which would provide a vital new measure of Iraqi sovereignty and stability by putting foreign troops under nominal Iraqi control. The lack of a SOFA and of accountability to Iraqi authorities is rapidly becoming a major irritant in U.S.-Iraqi relations.

Before the invasion of Iraq, Bush made a strong case that international law had failed to deal with Saddam Hussein's murderous regime. Three years later he has not produced a workable alternative that commands general consent or respect. His secretive methods -- rather than the dangers that still threaten -- have too often become the center of attention.

The contrast with the majority's reasoning in Hamdan is illuminating. The decision is everything al-Qaeda hates and wages war upon: an exaltation of the individual and of individual rights protected by transparent secular institutions.

A new framework for international law is being developed in reaction to Bush's global policies -- without other significant American input. That is the message from America's allies, from Congress and now from the Supreme Court that the president should finally heed.

DOJ_NMG_0039477

Voices Of Iranian Reform, Silenced (WP)

By Fotini Christia

The Washington Post, July 9, 2006

TEHRAN -- Today marks the seventh anniversary of the student protests that took post-revolutionary Iran by storm. On July 9, 1999, after the forcible closure of several liberal media outlets and a coordinated attack on a dormitory at the University of Tehran, Iranian students poured into the streets by the thousands, calling for political reform. Just as at Tiananmen Square a decade before, the Iranian students gave the world a glimpse of what might be -- only to be quickly silenced by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei's Revolutionary Guard.

Naturally, Iran's regime will not celebrate today's anniversary, but neither will Iran's opposition. The Iranian student movement is a shambles -- divided, confused and lacking any cause for celebration. In extensive conversations with students and student veterans of the 1999 protests, who asked to remain anonymous because of fears about their safety, I found that one message emerged loud and clear: Iran does not need another revolution, but it is in desperate need of reform.

The atmosphere at the University of Tehran is eerily quiet these days. Nothing remains from the 1999 protests, which were in fact the most notable outbreak of unrest since the Islamic Revolution 20 years earlier.

The protests were directed at the rule of the ayatollahs, and they revealed the pronounced internal divisions between the reformist president, Mohammed Khatami -- then in the middle of his first term -- and Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Khamenei. Khatami, who was trying to loosen Khamenei's tight control of the judiciary, security services and media, was facing strong resistance from the clerics when the students came to his aid. But unlike the Islamic Revolution, in which the legitimacy of the country's whole system was called into question, the 1999 protests sought reform within the existing regime, and for an Islamic democracy, that would be in accordance with Iran's constitution.

That reform didn't happen, and now, under President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's leadership, the process has been completely sidelined. The Iranian political scene is dominated by the nuclear issue. Confrontation with the West has made the public more tolerant of authoritarian methods, damaging reformers and making concern for individual rights and civil liberties seem utterly irrelevant. The student movement very much wants a reemergence of the reform process, but it has no good ideas on how to make it happen.

Indeed, the student movement has found no place in Iran's new political reality, and its stance has moved from the politics of realistic change to the politics of survival through inaction. The old guard -- the 1999 student leaders -- is either in jail or abroad, and those of its members still in Iran desperately want out. Their successors -- the new leaders of the liberal student union Daftare Tahkim Vahdat -- have no organized structure and are weak and fragmented. Their manifestos espouse a Marxist ideal -- the orthodox left as they call it -- and surreal plans for communist change. These are mostly poor students from Iran's provinces who find themselves repelled by the big city's bourgeois way of life. They see the move to the left as an outlet for change, but they have no real ideological base or sense of direction. "The government could crush them any day, but they don't because it is convenient to have some sort of weak opposition," said a student participant in the 1999 protests and a former member of the group. "It makes the regime look more democratic."

Said another disillusioned veteran of the 1999 student uprising: "Everyone talks about radical change, but nobody wants to do anything about it, and they don't want it to come from America. . . . We need to bring together the student movement, the women's movement, the workers' movement and the ethnic minority movements and create a united front to face the regime's radical ideas."

When I asked this person about his contribution to the student movement, he told me he is working on a book. "I am using the U.S. student protests from the late 1960s to show the students that revolution and radicalism is a bust," he said, adding that "lessons may come from America after all, but they will be for reform, not revolution."

The writer is a fellow at the Weatherhead Center for International Affairs at Harvard. She is currently at the International Center for Persian Studies, University of Tehran.

This Just In: [censored] (LAT)

By Editorial

The Los Angeles Times, July 9, 2006

Beijing's move to limit breaking news reports sparks one of the biggest free-speech debates to hit China.

THE MEDIA AND THE GOVERNMENT might occasionally bump heads in the United States over issues like newspaper reports on secret anti-terrorism programs, but it could be a lot worse. In China, the National People's Congress is on the verge of approving a law that would forbid the media from reporting on breaking news without permission from government officials.

DOJ_NMG_0039478

The draft law plumbs new depths of censorship even in China, already among the most regressive countries when it comes to press freedoms. It would impose fines of up to $12,500 on media operations that publish reports on "sudden incidents" without authorization — terminology so vague it could apply to just about any news event. The law targets stories that are false or "damaging to the social order," empowering local government apparatchiks to suppress pretty much anything they find embarrassing.

The draft law is particularly unusual in that, apparently, it would target foreign as well as domestic media. Though reporters for papers such as The Times are closely monitored, the government seldom tries to censor stories meant for outside consumption. Yet an official involved in preparing the legislation recently said he thought it should apply to all news organizations operating in China.

Beijing is trying to keep a tight rein on a fast-changing society. The country's rapid development is aided by new technologies, wider access to information and higher education standards, all of which its communist leadership promotes and fears simultaneously. Hence the occasional impulse for such clumsy clampdowns. The good news is that Internet access is so widespread as to make censorship difficult.

The "sudden incidents" Beijing is most worried about are outbreaks of civil unrest in the countryside. Then there are all sorts of events that could undermine the people's faith in their government's competence. China's suppression of news on the outbreak of SARS in 2003 contributed to the spread of the disease, attracted international condemnation and triggered pledges of greater openness. More recently, Beijing's attempt to cover up news of an industrial accident that spilled toxins into the Songhua River prompted a confrontation with Russia and led to a public outcry against government censorship.

If there's a silver lining to this naked attempt at repression, it's that China's media and public are strongly resisting it. Newspaper editors in the south have been surprisingly outspoken in their opposition, something that only a few years ago would have been unthinkable. Sooner or later, China's leaders will learn that now that the genie of free speech and thought has been let out of the bottle, there's no putting it back in.

DOJ_NMG_0039479

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, July 10, 2006 8:21 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, July 08, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060708.pdf; agnb060708.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, JULY 8, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bush Says Court "Tacitly" Supports Administration Decision To Use Guantanamo ... 3
Stewart Seeks Non-Prison Sentence ... 3
Hastert Says US Must Remain Steadfast In War On Terror ... 4
Filmmaker Sues US Over Iraq Detention ... 4
Italy Angered By Investigation Of 2003 CIA Abduction ... 4
London Marks First Anniversary Of Terrorist Bombings ... 4

Homeland Response:

FBI Foils New York Terror Plot ... 5
Chertoff Says Intelligence Sharing Is Improving ... 6
Draft Legislation Would Give FBI Internet-Tapping Access ... 6
Chertoff Touts Federal Antiterrorism Funding ... 6
New York Area To Receive More Antiterror Funds ... 7
American Al Qaeda Member Criticizes US Troops ... 7
US Passenger Detained After Trying To Break Into Delta Cockpit ... 7
Pittsburgh Mosque Leaders Decry FBI Raid ... 7
Port Authority To Takeover Construction Of WTC Memorial ... 8
Louisiana Delegation Requests Extension Of Federal Coverage Of Debris Removal Costs ... 8

War News:

Iraqi Troops Clash With Shiite Militia, Arrest A "Significant" Suspect ... 8
Pentagon Will Buy New Materiel For War ... 8
US Works To Rebuild "Fragile" Iraqi Army ... 9
Marine Officers May Have Been Negligent In Haditha Probe ... 9
Ex-GI Alleged Rapist Case Goes To Grand Jury ... 9
American Al Qaeda Member Criticizes US Troops ... 9
US Treatment Of Saddam Resonates In Arab World ... 10
US Forces Face Hurdles In Battling "Resurgent Taliban." ... 10
US Coalition Accused Of Attacking Afghan Legislators Family ... 10
Cheney Praises Troops In Speech At Norfolk Naval Station ... 10
Army Discharges 1,000 For Personality Disorders ... 10
Internet Allows US Troops To Keep In Touch With Families ... 10

DOJ:

Fitzgerald's DC Future Uncertain ... 10

Corporate Scandals:

SEC Divided On "Spring Loading" Of Options ... 11
Nicor To Pay $10 Million Fine To Settle SEC Accounting Probe ... 11
Asyst Technologies Gets Delisting Letter From Nasdaq ... 11

Criminal Law:

Abramoff Had Seven Appointments At White House ... 12
US To Probe Rape Allegations Against New Orleans Investigator ... 12
Louisiana Man Pleads Guilty To Katrina Fraud ... 12
Federal Prosecutors Seek Prison Time For Philadelphia Mayor's Former Law Partner ... 12
Jefferson Hires High Profile Defense Advisor ... 13

Civil Law:

Senators Question Settlement With Boeing ... 13
Columnist Questions Justice Department Arguments In Deficit Reduction Act Suit ... 13

Civil Rights:

Judge Approves Settlement To End Hollywood, FL, Synagogue Dispute ... 13
DOJ Report Faults Arkansas County Jail ... 13
NAACP Pushes For Quick Renewal Of Voting Rights Act ... 14
Judge Postpones Trial In Florida Voting Rights Case ... 14
World Cup Highlights Global Sex Trafficking Problem ... 14
Justice Kennedy Backs San Diego's Cross Stand ... 15
Georgia Judge Rules Voter ID Requirement Violates State Constitution ... 15

Antitrust:

General Motors Board Votes To Consider Alliance With Renault And Nissan ... 15
Judge Mulls Modifications To Terms Of Two Phone Mergers ... 15
Suit Alleges Price-Fixing Conspiracy In Rubber Industry ... 16

Environment:

US Allows BP To Delay Alaska Testing ... 16
US, Ohio Sue Fostoria Over Sewage Violations ... 16
Green Attitudes Spread To Faiths' Mainstream ... 16
Lawyer Advocates Giving Most Environmental Questions To State, Local Levels ... 17

NYTimes Emphasizes Importance Of Environmental Case 17

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Attorney Shelves Cases After FBI Informers' Misconduct 17
SF Chronicle Argues For Dismissal Of Reporters' Subpoenas .. 17
Clark County, WA, Joins Anti-Gang Task Force 18
Hatch Plays Role In Freeing Music Producer In Dubai Jail For Cocaine Possession 18
Columnist Criticizes UN Gun Control Program 18

Immigration:

Bush Reiterates Support For Comprehensive Immigration Reform 18
Border Security Hearing In Texas Highlights Terrorist Threat 19
ICE Official Calls For More Criminal Prosecution Of Employers 20
Former Agents Plead Guilty To Accepting Bribes To Release Immigrant Smugglers 20

Congress-Administration:

Bush Takes Message To US Public 20
Roberts Said To Be More Influential Than Kennedy On Court... 21
House Agenda Criticized By Moderates As Not Helpful To Holding Majority 21
Discovery Crew Supplies Space Station, Checks Shuttle For Damage 22
Information On Sailors Accidentally Exposed 22
Columnist Condemns Effort To Limit Judicial "Junkets." 22
House GOP Leaders Said Not To Be Serious About Pork-Barrel Spending 23
Deficit Expected To Fall Below $300 Billion With "Surging Tax Revenues." 23
Specter Seeks Renewal Of Funds For Pennsylvania Foster Care Program 23
Medicare Warning Blamed For Some Companies Ending Drug "Giveaways." 23
LATimes Muses On Bush's Aging 23

Other News:

Jobs Report Seen As Sign Economy Slowing 23
Oil Prices Climbing 24
Election Experts Say Democrats Will Seek To Nationalize Congressional Elections 24
Senator Clinton Campaigns For Angelides 24
Gore To Speak To Wal-Mart Managers 25
Edwards Urges Regulation Of "Payday Lenders" In Iowa 25
Biden Defends Remark About Indian-Americans 25
Democratic Divisions Over War Revealed In Primary Contests. 25
Lieberman's Stance On Iraq Is Not His Only Liability For Liberal Voters 25
Steele Continues To Raise More Than Cardin 25
Harris To Undergo Surgery 25
DeLay Seen As Possible Candidate In TX22 25
LATimes Urges Americans To Save More 26
Pastor Allied With The President And Governor Bush Calls Islam A "Dangerous…Cult." 26
Veterans Issues At Forefront In Minnesota Races 26
Bush Stresses Patience, Diplomatic Approach To North Korea. 26
Economists Say AIDS Should Be World's Top Priority 29
US, Russia To Create Civilian Nuclear Pact 29
G-8 Talks To See Push For Energy Security Pact 30
Strategic Accord On Agenda For Kazakh President's Visit 31
Pro-Moscow Parties Ascendant In Ukraine After Orange Revolution Bloc Collapses 31
US Trade Representative Chastises Europe, Rising Economic Powers For WTO Trade Talk Deadlock 31
Israel Hints It Might Free Palestinians If Soldier Is Freed 31
Tension Rises As Obrador Prepares Protests Of Mexican Election Count 32
Brazil And Venezuela Compete For Leadership Of South America 33
US Considering Further Restrictions Upon Cuban Diplomats 33
China May Force Foreign Companies To Unionize 33
Spain Finds First Case Of Avian Flu 33
French Debate Over Immigration Heats Up 33
Mittal To Build Steel Plant In India 34

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 34

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 34
Other 34

DOJ_NMG_0039482

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Says Court "Tacitly" Supports Administration Decision To Use Guantanamo. The New York Times (7/8, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "In his most detailed comments to date on the Supreme Court's rejection of his decision to put detainees on trial before military commissions, President Bush said Friday that the court had tacitly approved his use of the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba." Bush said, "It didn't say we couldn't have done -- couldn't have made that decision, see? … They were silent on whether or not Guantánamo -- whether or not we should have used Guantánamo. In other words, they accepted the use of Guantánamo, the decision I made." His "remarks put a favorable spin on a ruling that has been widely interpreted as a rebuke of the administration's policies in the war on terror." The Times states, "The question of whether Mr. Bush had properly used Guantánamo Bay to house detainees was not at issue in the case. At issue was whether the president could unilaterally establish military commissions with rights different from those allowed at a court-martial to try detainees for war crimes."

The Boston Globe (7/8, Klein, 484K) in its coverage of Bush's remarks about North Korea also reports, "Bush said he drew no broader implications from last week's Supreme Court ruling striking down the military commissions he ordered to try detainees held in the US Navy base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Although the high court ruled that Bush had overstepped his authority, the president quickly noted that the court was silent on the question of whether Guantanamo is an appropriate place to hold suspected terrorists." Bush said, "The Supreme Court said that in this particular case, when it comes to dealing with illegal combatants who were picked up off a battlefield and put in Guantanamo for the sake of our security, that we should work with the United States Congress to develop a way forward. … They accepted the use of Guantanamo, the decision I made."

The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Wallsten, 958K) in its article on Bush's new strategy to connect with the public also notes, "Answering a question about his authority to try detainees before military tribunals, Bush reiterated his belief that the Geneva Convention does not apply to detainees being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." Bush's "comments appeared to contradict last week's 5-3 ruling by the Supreme Court," He "said Friday that he was 'willing to abide by the ruling.' But coming as administration officials continue to examine the ruling, Bush's comments were another indication that the White House was moving toward a very narrow interpretation of the court decision." But Bush critics "have insisted the ruling means the Geneva Convention covers all detainees at Guantanamo and, possibly, Al Qaeda leaders being held in undisclosed locations."

Documents Indicate Gitmo Suicides Part Of Wider Plot. In a front page article, the Washington Post (7/8, A1, White, 744K) reports three suicides at the US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay last month "may have been part of a broader plot by detainees who were using confidential lawyer-client papers and envelopes to pass handwritten notes their guards could not intercept," according to documents filed Friday in federal court by government lawyers. Detainees were able to "hide documents in their cells—including instructions on how to tie knots and a classified US military memo regarding cell locations of detainees and camp operational matters at Guantanamo—by keeping the materials in envelopes labeled as lawyer-client communications," the Post reports. After the suicides on June 10, investigators found the notes "written on the back of notepaper stamped 'Attorney Client Privilege,'" government officials said. In response to the discoveries, military commanders have suspended allowing detainees to have paper provided by defense lawyers. Government lawyers have also asked a judge on the US District Court for the District of Columbia to allow them to assemble "filter teams" to "scour more than 1,100 pounds of documents seized by investigators, some of which are protected by lawyer-client privilege and would usually be off-limits to authorities."

Stewart Seeks Non-Prison Sentence. The AP (7/8, Neumeister) reports, "Attorneys for U.S. civil rights lawyer Lynne Stewart have asked a judge to spare her a prison sentence for her conviction in a terrorism case despite a recommendation by the federal probation department that she serve 30 years." The AP continues, "The attorneys filed papers Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan asking that the judge take into consideration Stewart's bout with breast cancer, her age, 66, and three decades of selfless service as a lawyer in sentencing her on Sept. 25." The AP adds, "Stewart was convicted in February 2005 of providing material support to terrorists by releasing the message of a notorious jailed client, Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman. She also was convicted of defrauding the government and making false statements. … Abdel-Rahman, a blind cleric from Egypt, was convicted of seditious conspiracy for his advisory role in a plot to blow up five New York City landmarks, including the United Nations in 1995." The AP notes, "One of Stewart's lawyers, Elizabeth Fink, called a U.S. Probation Department pre-sentencing report that recommended Stewart serve the maximum possible sentence of 30 years 'draconian, inhumane and ludicrous.' … Stewart was diagnosed with breast cancer last year, and her sentencing has been delayed while she undergoes treatment."

DOJ_NMG_0039483

Hastert Says US Must Remain Steadfast In War On Terror. In a front page report, the Washington Times (7/8, A1, Seper, 90K) says House Speaker Dennis Hastert called the "interruption" of a terrorist plot targeting New York's train tunnels "yet another reminder that we must remain steadfast in our fight against terrorism." In the past few months, Hastert noted that law-enforcement officials "have thwarted several terror plots including threats against Chicago's Sears Tower and federal buildings in Miami, and they have disrupted a terror cell in Canada. House Republicans will continue to provide the brave men and women fighting to win the global war on terror the resources they need to finish the job."

Filmmaker Sues US Over Iraq Detention. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Weinstein, 958K) reports a Los Angeles filmmaker "who was imprisoned in Iraq for 55 days sued Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and other high-ranking military officials Friday, alleging that his detention violated his civil rights, the law of nations and the Geneva Convention." Mark D. Rosenbaum, legal director of the ACLU of Southern California, said the suit is "the first civil action challenging the constitutionality of the US government's detention and hearing policies in Iraq." Cyrus Kar, a US citizen and Navy veteran, was freed a year ago, just days after the American Civil Liberties Union sued seeking his release. The new lawsuit, filed in federal court in Los Angeles, seeks damages for Kar and broad changes in the government's detention policies. On Friday, a Pentagon spokesman said the Defense Department "does not discuss matters under litigation until the court has rendered a decision."

Italy Angered By Investigation Of 2003 CIA Abduction. The New York Times (7/8, Grey, Povoledo, 1.19M) reports on an investigation by Italian police into the suspected kidnapping by the US Central Intelligence Agency of a radical Egyptian cleric in 2003. According to the Times, the recent "disclosure that the police were eavesdropping on the [Italian] intelligence service is the latest twist in a case that has riveted Italy." The kidnapping of the cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, by intelligence agents "abruptly cut short a criminal investigation of the imam by Italian prosecutors." The prosecutors then "struck back, with an investigation of both American and Italian intelligence agents whom they accuse of carrying out the abduction." Wiretapped telephone calls "allowed prosecutors to make the case that Italian intelligence had advance knowledge of the abduction of Mr. Nasr, who is also known as Abu Omar—something the Italian government had steadfastly denied," the Times writes. Earlier this week, prosecutors arrested two Italian intelligence officials, "charging that they had known about the kidnapping and helped plan it."

London Marks First Anniversary Of Terrorist Bombings. Londoners Friday marked the first anniversary of the terrorist bombings that struck the city's transit system, killing 52 people. The CBS Evening News (7/7, story 2, 2:24, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "Terror experts in this country have been studying the London bombings closely to try to prevent a similar attack here." CBS (Stewart) added, "No terrorist incident since 9/11 has been studied as much for clues since the London subway attack and its lessons are now clear. The suicide bombers acted on their own without any known al-Qaeda assistance and built their bombs from local store-bought items. New York, with the nation's largest subway system, responded immediately by beginning to monitor stores selling the same items like simple hydrogen peroxide."

NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 2, 2:00, Friesen, 9.87M) reported, "The police have, they say, foiled three, possibly four terrorist plots since last year, have 70 active investigations underway and have 1,200 suspicious people under surveillance. But one year later, no one has been arrested in connection with July 7." However, NBC notes that "apart from a few visible signs of tighter security, daily life has changed little."

The Financial Times (7/8, Burns) reports tributes were given to the dead, "while senior police warned the country not to lower its guard against the threat of further attack." Sir Ian Blair, commissioner of the Metropolitan police, told the BBC he had "no doubt there would be further attacks, and the security services were doing all they could to prevent them." Earlier this week, police said they were investigating an "unprecedented number of plots and had thwarted at least three attacks since last July." However, the Times notes that there are "continuing gaps in firm intelligence and government concerns that some suspects had escaped the intensified surveillance and disruption operations led by MI5, the Security Service."

Similarly, the New York Times (7/8, Cowell, 1.19M) reports that while the victims were being remembered Al Jazeera broadcast "images of Ayman al-Zawahiri, the No. 2 commander of Al Qaeda, suggesting that the group was trying to claim responsibility for the attacks." In new video excerpts released Friday, Zawahiri "specifically claimed that two of the bombers— [Shehzad] Tanweer and Mohammad Sidique Khan, the supposed ringleader of the attacks—had prepared for the bombings at a Qaeda camp." Both men were known to have visited Pakistan before July 7, but the Times says Zawahiri's remarks were "the closest that Al Qaeda has come to a direct claim that it planned and supervised the bombings." The Washington Times/AP (7/8, A1, Dodds) also reports in a front page article that Zawahiri's comment "was the first claiming they had been taught by al Qaeda."

DOJ_NMG_0039484

However, the AP (7/8, Mortimer, Sinan) reports a security analyst at the London think-tank Chatham House, Bob Ayers, said the claim "contradicted the British police finding that there was no evidence linking the four London bombers to al-Qaida." Ayers said Zawahiri's statement "means the investigation was either wrong, or they had identified links, but were reluctant to reveal them."

"Hybrid" Approach Urged Dealing With Security Issues. Weekly Standard senior editor Christopher Caldwell writes in the Financial Times (7/8) that the British and Dutch governments have "abruptly changed their approach" to so-called "security-and-identity issues" by "confusing area where citizenship, immigration, culture and national security meet." The Netherlands, Caldwell says, "appears to be abandoning the hard line at the very moment Britain picks it up. However, "the language of hard lines and soft ones has proved inadequate to describe the problems of regulating immigration, fighting extremism and protecting culture. Both Britain and the Netherlands are trying to combine persuasion and enforcement. The hybrid systems that result are not particularly elegant or logical. But they may be the only way to fight a problem that is not always built on logic," Caldwell concludes.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Foils New York Terror Plot. News that the FBI has thwarted a terrorist plot to attack transit tunnels under New York City' commuter trains led all three nightly news broadcasts, receiving more than ten minutes of coverage. ABC World News Tonight (7/7, lead story, 2:45, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported Mark Mershon, Assistant Director FBI, said, "This was a plot that would have involved martyrdom, explosives, and certain of the tubes that connected New Jersey with lower Manhattan." ABC (Ross) added, "Other law enforcement officials tell ABC News the plotters had already accessed detailed blueprints and drawings of the PATH tunnel, available on the internet. Like the bombers who blew themselves up in London a year ago today, the plan was to load backpacks full of explosives. All 15 to 20 bombers were to board one car and detonate together when the train was under the river, according to officials." Officials told ABC News the plot was "uncovered more than a year ago by US and Canadian intelligence agents watching a jihadist internet chat room," where the suspects "communicated freely, thinking that no one could trap them."

The CBS Evening News (7/7, lead story, 2:40, Smith, 7.66M) reported that although New York City Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said the plot was "in the planning stage," US counterterrorism officials "said they were so concerned about a potential attack they contacted authorities in Beirut who in late April arrested the plot's so-called mastermind 31-year-old Assem Hammoud, a Lebanese national, at his home."

In a front page article, the New York Times (7/8, A1, Baker, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports officials said the main subject of the investigation, Assem Hammoud, would "likely be tried in Lebanon and that no charges were pending against him in the United States." The Washington Post (7/8, A1, Hsu, Wright, 744K) says two other suspects reportedly arrested in connection with the plot, authorities provided "few details," but an FBI official said "one was Canadian but was not being held in Canada."

The AP (7/8, Milton) reports, "Eight suspects—including an al-Qaeda loyalist arrested in Lebanon and two others in custody elsewhere—had hoped to pull off the attack in October or November," federal officials said. Investigators are "working with their counterparts in six other countries," but the other five suspects remain at large, the AP notes. CNN (7/8) reports on its Web site that the FBI's Mershon said six countries participated in the investigation, including Canada, Pakistan and Iraq. "The real story here is the symphony of cooperation and coordination not just in the New York-New Jersey metropolitan area, but frankly, around the world with a number of intelligence and investigative services," Mershon said.

Severity Of Threat Disputed By Officials. NBC Nightly News (7/7, lead story, 4:30, Williams, 9.87M) said "not all the authorities we spoke to today agree on the severity of the threat," but one American official "says Hammoud was at one point in contact with associates of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." In a front page article, the New York Times (7/8, A1, Baker, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports law enforcement authorities said the plan "presented a genuine threat even though it was in its earliest stages and no attack was imminent." Similarly, the Washington Post (7/8, A1, Hsu, Wright, 744K) reports in a front page article that authorities "said there was no evidence that the plotters had taken any actions, such as buying explosives or sending money," casting "doubt on the feasibility of initial reports."

Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (7/8, A1, Meyer, Barry, 958K) reports in a front page article, "Mershon's contention that the suspects were about to enter an operational phase of the plot is a matter of some dispute." Sen. Charles Schumer (D-NY) said in a televised interview that the alleged co-conspirators were just "talking to one another" when authorities intervened. And New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said, "There is not one shred of evidence that the plan continued beyond the planning stage. New Yorkers should feel safe." By late Friday, the Times says there were "some discrepancies about whether any of the alleged plotters had ever been to the United States." At the news conference, Mershon said the FBI believed that none of the principal players had visited the country. But the Lebanese Broadcasting Corp. issued a report Friday saying Hammoud had traveled to New York and New Jersey "on several occasions using a Canadian passport to survey possible targets." Later, an FBI official confirmed that Hammoud had visited the United States at least once. But, the official added, "We have no reason to believe it had anything to do with this plot."

DOJ_NMG_0039485

The Financial Times (7/8, Sevastopulo, Grimes) reports New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg said there was "not one shred of evidence that [the plot] had proceeded beyond the planning stage." Ray Kelly, the New York police commissioner, said it had "not reached anything close to being operational", while stressing that "New York remains in the crosshairs of the terrorists."

And the New York Daily News (7/8, A1, Meek, 729K) today profiles the plot's suspected mastermind, Assem Hammoud, who the newspaper says "lived the life of an international playboy -- on orders from Al Qaeda."

US Sought To Keep News Of Plot Quiet. The New York Times (7/8, A1, Baker, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports a senior security official in Beirut said Hammoud's arrest in April "came under an Interpol order." Lebanese authorities wanted to publicize his arrest at the time, the official said, but American authorities "sought to keep the issue quiet, believing the investigation would lead to other information." The Los Angeles Times (7/8, A1, Meyer, Barry, 958K) adds, Assistant FBI Director Mark Mershon said authorities had not planned to disclose Hammoud's arrest or other elements of the plot disruption, and that the "unwanted publicity" had "greatly complicated" efforts to catch the five remaining fugitives. Similarly, the Washington Post (7/8, A1, Hsu, Wright, 744K) says Mershon "criticized the leak to the media, saying it upset cooperation between the United States and six foreign governments assisting in the investigation."

Chertoff Says Intelligence Sharing Is Improving. The AP (7/8, Milton) reports Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said, "It was never a concern that this would actually be executed." The Boston Globe (7/8, Bender, 484K) reports Chertoff told reporters after an event in Boston, "We don't wait until someone has lit the fuse before stepping in. It is a reminder of the fact that this type of threat remains with us. We cannot drop our guard." Chertoff also "hailed" the foiled plot as an example of "how law enforcement and intelligence communities have improved their ability to monitor potential terrorist plots" well before they enter the operational stage. "Intelligence is better and intelligence sharing is better. We are able to detect more things that are going on. Sometimes that causes skeptics to say the people you are arresting aren't really serious," the secretary told reporters. However, the Globe says the plan was described by officials of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey as "unfeasible and by some terrorism specialists as amateurish, in part for discussing it in public Internet chat rooms." The Boston Herald (7/8, Wedge, Ross, 220K) also reports on Chertoff's comments to reporters in Boston.

Draft Legislation Would Give FBI Internet-Tapping Access. CNET News (7/8, McCullagh) reports, "The FBI has drafted sweeping legislation that would require Internet service providers to create wiretapping hubs for police surveillance and force makers of networking gear to build in backdoors for eavesdropping, CNET News.com has learned." CNET continues, "FBI Agent Barry Smith distributed the proposal at a private meeting last Friday with industry representatives and indicated it would be introduced by Sen. Mike DeWine, an Ohio Republican, according to two sources familiar with the meeting. … The draft bill would place the FBI's Net-surveillance push on solid legal footing. At the moment, it's ensnared in a legal challenge from universities and some technology companies that claim the Federal Communications Commission's broadband surveillance directives exceed what Congress has authorized." CNET adds, "The FBI claims that expanding the 1994 Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act is necessary to thwart criminals and terrorists who have turned to technologies like voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP. … 'The complexity and variety of communications technologies have dramatically increased in recent years, and the lawful intercept capabilities of the federal, state and local law enforcement community have been under continual stress, and in many cases have decreased or become impossible,' according to a summary accompanying the draft bill. … Complicating the political outlook for the legislation is an ongoing debate over allegedly illegal surveillance by the National Security Administration--punctuated by several lawsuits challenging it on constitutional grounds and an unrelated proposal to force Internet service providers to record what Americans are doing online. One source, who asked not to be identified because of the sensitive nature of last Friday's meeting, said the FBI viewed its CALEA expansion as a top congressional priority for 2007."

Chertoff Touts Federal Antiterrorism Funding. The Boston Globe (7/8, Daniel, 484K) reports Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff marked the one- year anniversary of the London terrorist bombings by riding the

DOJ_NMG_0039486

MBTA's Green Line Friday where he touted federal aid to combat terrorist threats. At the same time, he cautioned that no one can guarantee security. "I would not hesitate…to get on the subway, here or all over the country," Chertoff said. "We should not be bullied out of getting on the train. We shouldn't give terrorists the idea that they can scare us off our trains. I have no hesitation in saying this is a safe mode of transportation. On the other hand, we do live with a certain amount of risk in life," he added.

The Boston Herald (7/8, Wedge, Ross, 220K) says Chertoff "visited Boston yesterday to talk up the administration's focus on protecting the nation's railways, noting that Boston received $9.6 million for rail security in 2006 - the fourth-highest amount in the nation." The newspaper also calls Chertoff's " strong remarks on improving rail safety" a "departure from comments he made last year, when he downplayed train threats and insisted the department's main focus should remain on protecting airlines."

New York Area To Receive More Antiterror Funds. The New York Times (7/7, Lipton, 1.19M) reports the New York City metropolitan area will receive $53.8 million in federal antiterrorism grants "to protect its rail, bus and ferry systems, a 25 percent increase over last year," the Department of Homeland Security announced Friday. The additional money "may curtail some of the criticism" of a 40 percent cut announced on May 31 in a separate, larger antiterrorism grant program, the AP writes. The move was welcomed by New York Senator Chuck Schumer, who said, "The Department of Homeland Security is finally putting some of its money where its mouth is and seems to have realized that New York City's subways and buses remain under constant threat."

American Al Qaeda Member Criticizes US Troops. CNN (7/8) reports on its Web site California-born al Qaeda member Adam Gadahn spoke out "against US troops" on a recently released video. The video deals primarily with the London subway bombings of 2005, but includes a five-minute speech from Gadahn, in English, in which he "lashes out at allegations of war crimes recently leveled at US troops in Iraq." In the video, Gadahn says the incidents "represent a pattern of US and British brutality toward Muslims, and he says he saw US soldiers kill civilians in Afghanistan." While Gadahn has appeared in previous al Qaeda videos wearing a mask, in the latest video, which was broadcast Thursday on Al-Jazeera, his face is uncovered i.

US Passenger Detained After Trying To Break Into Delta Cockpit. AFP (7/8) reports US authorities detained "a male airline passenger who repeatedly tried to break into the cockpit during a flight to Florida before being restrained by passengers," an airport spokeswoman told AFP. The incident occurred late Thursday as a Delta Air Lines flight from New York was descending for landing at the Tampa International Airport, airport spokeswoman Brenda Geoghagan said. The man reportedly :refused a flight attendant's order to sit down, became agitated and ran toward the cockpit, where he tried twice to knock down the door," she said. Police identified the man as Nefpali Alexander Liemenbez, who Geoghagan described as "a Hispanic US soldier with a mental problem whose active duty was to end next Tuesday."

The Tampa Bay Tribune (7/8, Kalfrin) identifies him as "Neftali Laimendez, 24, a U.S. Army specialist who was days away from discharge." His brother said to the Tribune, "He asked for help while he was in the Army. They didn't give it to him. Now this happened." The AP (7/8) reports similar details.

Pittsburgh Mosque Leaders Decry FBI Raid. The AP (7/7) reports, "Leaders of a Muslim mosque accused the government of religious and racial profiling for a raid last week, but government officials said they were only looking for man wanted on weapons charges." The AP continues, "The FBI raided the Light of the Age mosque on the city's North Side on June 30 and arrested a man on an illegal weapons charge. The man, Larry M. Williams, has a felony record and cannot legally own a gun. … Mosque leaders held a news conference on Friday to say that the raid disrupted a religious service and that its members felt harassed. … 'The FBI is charged with safeguarding the domestic security of the nation, not the violation of the civil and human rights of its citizens,' Tahir Abdullah, the mosque's assistant director said."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/8, Dyer, 261K) reports, "The FBI arrested Larry M. Williams of Lincoln-Lemington, who has felony convictions in Washington state and other outstanding warrants, including one for failing to register as a sex offender. … The arrest took place during prayer hours, and some members of the largely African-American congregation were detained and questioned on the street, group members said. The facility was searched and streets blocked off for several hours during the FBI action." The Post-Gazette continues, "Jeff Killeen, a spokesman for the FBI, could not confirm if the bureau knew the facility was a mosque. He said the agency tries to respect the civil and constitutional rights of everyone. … 'But we had a warrant for the arrest of a convicted felon in possession of a weapon -- a semi-automatic pistol. We can't take that lightly.'" The Post-Gazette notes, "Federal officials detailed the reasons for the arrest in a statement yesterday and have not linked the group to terrorism. … 'Under federal law, it is illegal for any person who has been convicted of a crime which carries a punishment of more than one year in prison to possess a firearm or ammunition,' said the statement from U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan. 'Larry M. Williams is such a person.'"

DOJ_NMG_0039487

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (7/8, Greenwood) reports, "During the raid, law-enforcement officers ransacked closets and kicked in doors -- leaving holes in the mosque's walls, said Tahir Abdullah, assistant director of the mosque. … Williams had been coming to the mosque for about three years. He showed up the night of June 29 seeking a place to stay, Abdullah said, adding that mosque members did not know about Williams' criminal past."

Port Authority To Takeover Construction Of WTC Memorial. The New York Times (7/7, Dunlap, 1.19M) reports the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey agreed Firday to take over construction of the World Trade Center memorial and museum. The move is expected to make the "tortuous development process more efficient and less expensive," the Times writes. Also Friday, the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation announced that it was "back in the fund-raising business with a national television, radio and print campaign."

Louisiana Delegation Requests Extension Of Federal Coverage Of Debris Removal Costs. The Baton Rouge Advocate (7/8, Shields) reports, "Most of the Louisiana congressional delegation sent a letter to President Bush on Friday asking that the federal government extend 100 percent reimbursement for debris removal to nine parishes damaged mostly by Hurricane Rita." The letter was not signed by Rep. Williams Jefferson (D) but his office said he supported the extension. The letter "came one week after the White House announced that it would pick up the costs for debris removal through Dec. 31 for five parishes damaged by Hurricane Katrina. That move saved those parishes an estimated $71 million." The letter seeks the benefit be extended to Calcasieu, Cameron, Iberia, Jefferson, Lafourche, St. Charles, St. Mary, Terrebonne and Vermilion parishes. FEMA is "reviewing the request after getting similar correspondence from Gov. Kathleen Blanco, FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said."

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Troops Clash With Shiite Militia, Arrest A "Significant" Suspect. The Washington Post (7/8, Partlow and Finer, 744K) reports, "Iraqi troops rumbled into the teeming Baghdad slum of Sadr City before dawn Friday and confronted the neighborhood's reigning militia, setting off an intense firefight that left 30 to 40 insurgents dead or wounded." The forces captured a "'very significant criminal' who leads 'multiple insurgent cells' responsible for kidnappings and killings." The Post also writes, "In a separate operation, U.S.-led forces captured an insurgent commander in Babil province, whom news services identified as Adnan al-Unaybi, the Mahdi Army leader in areas south of Baghdad." It identifies the two operations as evidence "that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has begun to follow through on his pledge to dismantle violent Shiite militias." The New York Times (7/8, Semple, 1.19M) reports of the same raid, "Residents said the building that came under attack was a base of operations for a man known as Abu Deraa, a top commander of the Mahdi Army." Similar to the Post, the Times says that the operations "suggested that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki was making good on his vow to crack down on Sunni Arab and Shiite militias alike. The WT/AP (7/7, Reid) reports, "But the raid enraged many of the 2.5 million Shiites in Sadr City as rumors spread through the crowded slum district that most of the dead were civilians killed as they slept on their rooftops." The AP (7/7) reports that, on the same day, "Explosions struck four Sunni mosques in Baghdad and northeast of the capital, while a car bomb exploded near a Shiite mosque in northern Iraq Friday in a series of attacks that killed 17 people and wounded more than 50. ... The Baghdad mosque explosions came despite a four-hour driving ban in the capital aimed at preventing such attacks that often target the main weekly Islamic religious service." The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Daragahi, 958K) reports, "U.S. officials hailed the raid as a success because of the capture of a 'high-level insurgent,' who they said was responsible for killing and kidnapping civilians and attacking American and Iraqi forces." Yet "the 3 a.m. raid, which caused no American casualties, drew swift condemnation from many Shiite religious leaders." Before thousands gathered for prayer in Sadr City, Sheik Abdul Zahra Swaidi said, "The infidel American troops supported by the so-called Iraqi [soldiers] raided the city, killing and injuring a lot of innocent people using all kinds of weapons."

Most Baghdad Security Is Reportedly Under Iraqi Control. AFP (7/7) reports, "The ranks of Iraqi-trained security personnel grew by nearly 30,000 since April and now control more than half of Baghdad and large swathes of the countryside, a quarterly State Department report to Congress said." The State Department study, however, "stressed ... hat the figures still did not point to a timetable for a US troop withdrawal." According to Brig. Gen. Kurt Chichowski, "the first province to be turned over for complete Iraqi control will be Muthana in south-central Iraq."

Pentagon Will Buy New Materiel For War. The AP (7/7, Flaherty) reports, "President Bush would spend a quarter of the $50 billion down payment he wants for next year's Iraq and Afghanistan war costs to replace damaged weapons and equipment, while an additional $3 billion would go to train and equip Iraqi and Afghan forces. A document detailing the plan, obtained by The Associated Press, proposes spending $2.3 billion for new armor for troops and vehicles and efforts aimed at thwarting missiles. Another $2.1 billion would be for protecting troops from roadside bombs." The New York Times (7/8, 1.19M) prints an abbreviated version of this AP story.

DOJ_NMG_0039488

US Works To Rebuild "Fragile" Iraqi Army. Newsweek (7/7, Childress) reports in a fairly optimistic article about training at the "Zahko Military Training Academy, one of three schools in Iraq that train military officers." The academy has integrated Arab and Kurdish graduating classes, "a delicate situation in a country rife with ethnic and sectarian tension. The nation's other academies are less balanced. Rustamiyah, near Baghdad, is 98 percent Arab, and Qualachulon in Sulemaniyah is 95 percent Kurdish." The article quotes cadets and instructors who want to build a new Iraqi army.

Marine Officers May Have Been Negligent In Haditha Probe. All three networks covered the Haditha investigation and the alleged disclosures to come. ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 3, 1:20, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "Breaking news tonight on that Hadithah investigation. Jonathan Karl has learned that general Peter Chiarelli has completed his review of the killings and how the military handled the initial investigations. ABC (Karl) adds, "The general's view is based on an exhaustive investigation. An official who read it tells me, quote it will be painful, not just to the troops involved, but also to the top Marine commanders in Iraq who, it says, did virtually nothing about an incident that left so many civilians dead." The CBS Evening News (7/7, story 3, 1:50, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "There is a major development tonight in the story of one of the worst alleged crimes by U.S. troops in Iraq, the killing of civilians in Haditha. CBS (Martin) adds, "An investigation into the cover-up of the alleged murder of 24 Iraqi civilians in the town of Haditha last November concludes Marine officers at every level up to and including the colonel who commanded the regiment failed to investigate inaccurate and conflicting reports of how the civilians were killed."

NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 7, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There's a late update tonight on a story we've covered here. An alleged attack on Iraqi civilians by U.S. Marines in the town of Haditha. NBC (Miklaszewski): "A U.S. military investigation has found that several Marines, including officers up the chain of command, have been implicated and accused now of either allegedly falsifying reports or refusing to recognize the evidence that U.S. Marines may have killed innocent civilians in Haditha last November. ... First reports from the Marines said they had been killed by an I.E.D. But photographic evidence strongly suggested the civilians were deliberately killed allegedly by U.S. Marines, execution style."

The New York Times (7/8, Schmitt and Cloud, 1.19M) reports that Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli "has concluded that some senior Marine officers were negligent in failing to investigate more aggressively the killings of 24 Iraqi civilians by marines in Haditha last November, two Defense Department officials said Friday." Chiarelli reportedly "faulted the senior staff of the Second Marine Division, commanded at the time by Maj. Gen. Richard A. Huck, and the Second Regimental Combat Team, then headed by Col. Stephen W. Davis, and recommended unspecified disciplinary action for some officers. ... A senior Pentagon official said it could be several days before Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld receives a complete briefing on the matter, and before a redacted version of General Chiarelli's findings are made public." The AP (7/8, Gamel) calls the case "one of several allegations of U.S. abuse of Iraqi civilians that threaten to further weaken popular support for the Iraq war in the United States and tarnish the military's image."

Ex-GI Alleged Rapist Case Goes To Grand Jury. The AP (7/7, Dunbar) reports, "The case of a former Army private charged with slaying and raping an Iraqi woman and killing her family will be presented to a grand jury this month. Steven D. Green, 21, entered a plea of not guilty through his public defenders Thursday."

Father Of Accused Ex-GI Rapist Expresses Shock. The San Francisco Chronicle (7/7, Campbell and Sissom) reports, "The father of a former soldier accused of rape and murder in Iraq is 'shocked' by allegations against his son." The article quotes military-veteran residents of Midland, Tex., who express concern about the case's impact on US-Iraqi relations and on negative perceptions it could arouse toward other troops.

Mahmudiyah Is Not "Just Another Abuse Scandal." In an angry op-ed piece for the Washington Post (7/8, 744K), Colbert King writes, "Please don't lump what happened in Mahmudiyah with the alleged attacks by U.S. troops on unarmed Iraqi civilians in Fallujah, Haditha, Qaim or Salahuddin province ... Mahmudiyah was about murder. It was also about the deliberate, calculated violation of a woman. Such malevolence should never find its way into a U.S. military uniform."

American Al Qaeda Member Criticizes US Troops. CNN (7/8) reports on its Web site California-born al Qaeda member Adam Gadahn spoke out "against US troops" on a recently released video. The video deals

DOJ_NMG_0039489

primarily with the London subway bombings of 2005, but includes a five-minute speech from Gadahn, in English, in which he "lashes out at allegations of war crimes recently leveled at US troops in Iraq." In the video, Gadahn says the incidents "represent a pattern of US and British brutality toward Muslims, and he says he saw US soldiers kill civilians in Afghanistan." His face is uncovered on screen for the first time.

US Treatment Of Saddam Resonates In Arab World. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Stack, 958K) reports that with some Iraqis continuing to support Saddam Hussein, "it's America that has ended up standing trial in the eyes of the Arab public." He "and his lawyers have repeatedly compared Iraq's fate under his heavy thumb to the blood-spattered security vacuum created by the U.S. invasion." The Times states, "This debate -- in essence, whether the invasion improved life for Iraqis -- resonates loudly in the Arab world, where many people are concerned about how Hussein's fall has shifted the region's power structure. Iraq's Sunni-dominated neighbors are fearful of the emergence of the Shiite majority in Iraq and terrified of expanded Iranian influence. (The trial has included allegations that Iran tried to assassinate Hussein.)"

US Forces Face Hurdles In Battling "Resurgent Taliban." The New York Times (7/8, Hicks, 1.19M) reports, "American and allied troops are engaged in their biggest operation against Taliban forces in Afghanistan since they drove the fundamentalist movement from power in 2001." They "face the hard job of trying to tell local farmers from Taliban insurgents, who have gained strength across southern Afghanistan. The Americans set up a base, then probed into villages. They were soon ambushed. The Taliban can easily persuade or coerce villagers to assist them. They arm the villagers or equip them with radios. Almost any man is suspect. During one raid, which was typical, the Americans separated the men. Homes were searched, and the men were marched to the base for questioning."

Karzai Urges Pakistan To Dismantle Terror Camps. The AP (7/8) reports, "President Hamid Karzai urged neighboring Pakistan to prevent militants from training on its soil as fighting Friday in southern Afghanistan killed a U.S.-led coalition soldier and at least eight suspected Taliban militants."

US Coalition Accused Of Attacking Afghan Legislators Family. The New York Times (7/8, Gall, 1.19M) reports, "An Afghan member of Parliament accused the American-led coalition of opening fire on his family as they traveled by car in one of the most troubled provinces of southern Afghanistan, killing his brother-in-law and wounding five others, including his wife and two of his children." Uruzgan province legislator Haji Abdul Khaliq said "that the shooting occurred on Wednesday and that American and Australian troops were responsible for it." But "A statement from the American-led coalition said it was 'deeply saddened' by the reports, but added that 'coalition forces are confident the coalition is not responsible for this attack.'"

Cheney Praises Troops In Speech At Norfolk Naval Station. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (7/8, Hansen) reports on Vice-President Cheney's address to 3,000 Marines and sailors who "belonged to two battle groups - led by the aircraft carrier Theodore Roosevelt and the amphibious assault ship Nassau - that returned in March and May." The positive article quotes service member's enthusiastic reactions to the speech and describes the returning troops' duty: "During their six-month deployment, the two strike groups fought in Iraq, captured pirates in the Indian Ocean and secured the commercial channels in the Mediterranean Sea and Persian Gulf."

Army Discharges 1,000 For Personality Disorders. The AP (7/7, Baldor) reports, "The Army discharged more than 1,000 soldiers last year citing personality disorders, the reason it gave for this year's discharge of a private now accused of raping an Iraqi woman and killing her and her family. That total represents about 1.2 percent of the soldiers given early discharges during the year ending Sept. 30, 2005." The army surgeon general "told reporters Friday that usually the disorder is not associated with combat trauma ... [and] soldiers exhibiting such traits would not be automatically discharged, because many can continue to perform well."

Internet Allows US Troops To Keep In Touch With Families. The New York Times (7/8, Alvarez, 1.19M) reports, "Military deployments have a way of chewing up marriages, turning daily life upside down and making strangers out of husbands and wives. But for this generation of soldiers, the Internet, which is now widely available on bases, has softened the blow of long separations, helping loved ones stay in daily touch and keeping service members informed of family decisions -- important and mundane."

DOJ:

Fitzgerald's DC Future Uncertain. WBBM, News Radio 780, Chicago (7/7, Roberts) reports, "The future of U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald may be moving to the front burner, following today's news conference by President Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0039490

WBBM continues, "WBBM Newsradio 780's Bob Roberts reports Fitzgerald wears two hats: United States Attorney for the northern district of Illinois, and Washington-based special prosecutor in the CIA leak investigation and related cases. … The local investigations have reached the top levels of city and state government; the CIA leak probe has reached top levels at the White House. … As a result, some pundits say that Fitzgerald already has become a recurring nightmare not only for Mayor Daley, former Gov. George Ryan and Gov. Rod Blagojevich, but for the President as well. … Instead, Mr. Bush said, it has not been a high priority for him. … 'I don't have any plans to reappoint him because I haven't thought about it,' he said, adding quickly, 'I'll now think about it, now that you brought it up.'" WBBM adds, "Mr. Bush said he is not familiar with the locally-based corruption investigations, but commented on Fitzgerald's stewardship of the CIA leak investigation. … 'I thought in Washington he handled the case with professionalism, very professionally,' Mr. Bush said. 'You didn't see a lot of leaks. You didn't see a lot of speculation. You didn't see a lot of people dropping a little crumb here and there for the press to chew on.' … Ultimately, the President said, the decision is one for U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to make."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Divided On "Spring Loading" Of Options. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Scannell, Forelle, Bandler) reports, "New controversy is brewing over the way companies dole out stock options, this time over the practice of granting them just days before announcing good news -- an effort to give executives a quick profit on paper." The Journal continues, "Known as 'spring loading,' such options grants have generated heat in recent days. While spring loading is different from 'backdating,' another type of options timing, corporate critics blast it as a form of insider trading. Defenders call it a legitimate form of compensation -- and their ranks include a commissioner of the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Journal adds, "The SEC is investigating at least 50 companies for the timing of their options, and while there is wide agreement that backdating is wrong in most cases, there appears to be division over spring-loading. The divisions underscore a broader debate over the myriad ways companies grant options and whether or not some practices are, or should be, banned. … In a speech Thursday before the International Corporate Governance Network, Republican SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins gave a spirited defense of spring loading, calling it a legitimate and low-cost way for boards to efficiently compensate executives. He rejected claims that such awards amount to trading on inside information. … Quickly, some investor groups cried foul. 'Let's step back and take it out of the legal domain. This is just not fair,' said Ann Yerger, executive director of the Council of Institutional Investors. 'I don't think any rational individual or director or executive could argue it is fair. The whole point is to motivate and incentivize. To do this and set up an award so they're already in the money is so unfair. I think it's a mark of poor integrity.'"

Nicor To Pay $10 Million Fine To Settle SEC Accounting Probe. The Chicago Tribune (7/8, Manor) reports, "Nicor Inc. said Friday that it has reached a tentative settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission and is willing to pay a $10 million penalty to settle allegations of misleading accounting." The Tribune continues, "The SEC has been investigating Naperville-based Nicor, natural gas supplier to most of northern Illinois outside Chicago, for allegedly inflating profits from its gas trading business from 1999 through the first quarter of 2002. … The company eventually restated its earnings for that period. … 'We wonder how Nicor is getting off paying only a $10 million fine,' said Rob Kelter, general counsel for the Citizens Utility Board. CUB believes ratepayers were overcharged, and a case against Nicor is pending before the Illinois Commerce Commission." The Tribune adds, "CUB has contended in the past that Nicor Gas owes consumers up to $190 million for the alleged improper accounting of gas purchases. … Nicor made the announcement after the SEC had closed, and government officials were not available for comment."

Asyst Technologies Gets Delisting Letter From Nasdaq. The AP (7/8) reports, "Asyst Technologies Inc., a maker of technology for semiconductors and flat-panel displays, said Friday it received a letter from Nasdaq stating that the company is not in compliance with listing requirements because it is delinquent in filing its annual report for the fiscal year ended March 31. … Nasdaq has begun a process that could lead to the stock's delisting." The AP continues, "Asyst has requested a hearing with Nasdaq to address the filing delay. The request will postpone delisting pending the hearing and the panel's decision, although the panel will not necessarily find that Asyst should continue to be listed on the exchange." The AP adds, "Asyst delayed filing its annual report because it is in the midst of a widening inquiry into stock-option granting practices by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission. On June 9, the board established a special committee to look into Asyst's stock option practices during that period, the company said."

DOJ_NMG_0039491

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Had Seven Appointments At White House. The New York Times/AP (7/8, Press) reports, "Secret Service records show four more visits to the White House in 2001 by the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including one to see an aide to Vice President Dick Cheney. The newly released records bring the total number of his known visits to seven."

The AP (7/8, Yost) reports, "One Abramoff White House visit, according to Secret Service logs, was on April 20, 2001, to see Cesar Conda, at the time Cheney's assistant for domestic policy." The Washington Post (7/8, A2, Schmidt, Grimaldi, 744K) reports, "The appointments included a meeting with a domestic policy aide to Vice President Cheney and a meeting in the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives attended by about 40 people. The logs also reflect that Abramoff attended one or more social events, as well as a gathering of Indian tribal officials and state legislators at which President Bush appeared." The Secret Service "released the White House visit data yesterday in response to Freedom of Information Act requests and a lawsuit filed by the government watchdog group Judicial Watch." The Secret Service said that "the data reflect appointments but 'do not necessarily reflect actual visits to the White House complex.'"

US To Probe Rape Allegations Against New Orleans Investigator. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (7/8, Filosa) reports, "The U.S. Attorney's Office has issued grand jury subpoenas as part of a federal civil rights investigation into a complaint that Orleans Parish District Attorney Eddie Jordan's chief homicide investigator raped a witness he was assigned to protect." The Times-Picayune continues, "Federal agents started the investigation last week after meeting with high-ranking New Orleans Police Department officials and Jordan, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Friday. … An unidentified woman in the state witness protection program told the NOPD's Public Integrity Bureau that Dwight Deal, a veteran homicide detective who joined Jordan's administration in June 2003 as the chief investigator for murder cases, raped her while she was under his watch." The Times-Picayune adds, 'Deal, 50, worked for more than 20 years with NOPD and at one time was among the most senior of homicide detectives, known for cracking murder cases and making them stick in court to win convictions. Deal played a key role in helping police solve and bring to court the culprits behind the 1997 triple murder at the French Quarter's Louisiana Pizza Kitchen, a case that sent Phillip Anthony to death row. … In June 2003, Deal retired from the NOPD and joined Jordan's staff. Deal was placed on paid administrative June 30, a move that adheres to the office policy, said Jordan spokeswoman Leatrice Dupre. … In his announcement of the federal probe Friday, Letten made reference to the recent conviction of Henry A. Dillon III, the former New Orleans assistant city attorney convicted on federal civil rights charges for raping two young women who crossed paths with him while dealing with traffic tickets in 2004."

Louisiana Man Pleads Guilty To Katrina Fraud. The Baton Rouge Advocate (7/8, Kimbrell) reports, "A Baton Rouge man pleaded guilty Thursday to making a false claim for disaster relief benefits after Hurricane Katrina." The Advocate continues, "A grand jury indicted Terry Watson, 675 Wooddale Blvd., in March for making a false claim and for making false and fraudulent statements to the Federal Emergency Management Agency. … According to the indictment, Watson made a FEMA claim stating that his home had been damaged during Hurricane Katrina. He received a $2,000 check." The Advocate adds, "In his plea agreement, Watson pleaded guilty to false claim. The U.S. Attorney's Office agreed to drop the charge of making false and fraudulent statements. … Watson could be sentenced to up to five years in prison or fined $250,000 or both plus other court costs. … In September, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales created the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force. It is designed to investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes, such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud."

Federal Prosecutors Seek Prison Time For Philadelphia Mayor's Former Law Partner. The Philadelphia Inquirer (7/8, Shiffman) reports, "Mayor Street's former law partner should spend at least two years in prison for corruption related to the development of the city's waterfront, prosecutors said in a new court filing." The Inquirer continues, "Leonard N. Ross, who helped Street raise campaign cash and chaired a city committee to select a developer for Penn's Landing, pleaded guilty to corruption and extortion charges last year. … He is scheduled to be sentenced Thursday before U.S. District Judge Michael Baylson. Prosecutors said the advisory federal guidelines call for a term of 24 to 30 months."

The Philadelphia Daily News (7/8, Hinkelman) reports, "The feds filed a 36-page sentencing memo Thursday night that also called for Ross, 58, to pay a $50,000 fine, which they said he had the ability to pay immediately." The Daily News continues, "Ross pleaded guilty in December to charges of fraud and conspiracy to commit extortion. … Prosecutors said Ross had used his position as the chairman of a selection committee evaluating Penn's Landing development proposals to extract $50,000 in campaign contributions for Street from prospective developers; to get himself a $150,000 loan to help pay off a personal debt, and to assist the late attorney Ron White in an attempted extortion of developer Bart Blatstein. … Calling his 'outrageous criminal conduct' an 'egregious breach of trust,'" federal prosecutors "said Ross 'betrayed' the people of Philadelphia and viewed public service as 'a way to line his own pockets.' … Prosecutors are also asking Baylson for permission to play 'brief excerpts' from three FBI-recorded conversations between Ross and White in 2003 as the two discussed the bidding process to develop the 13-acre site on the city's waterfront."

DOJ_NMG_0039492

Jefferson Hires High Profile Defense Advisor. The Baton Rouge Advocate (7/8, Shields) reports Rep. William Jefferson "is beefing up his legal defense against bribery allegations, hiring a high-powered spokeswoman who has represented Monica Lewinsky and the family of Chandra Levy. … Judy Smith of the Washington firm, Impact Strategies, will join Jefferson's legal defense team."

CIVIL LAW:

Senators Question Settlement With Boeing. The Financial Times (7/8, Cameron and Kirchgaessner) reports, "Lawmakers have raised concerns over the tax treatment of Boeing's $615m potential settlement with the US government, which resolved a host of civil and criminal claims connected to the company's procurement practices. In a letter last month to Alberto Gonzales, attorney-general, Republican senators Chuck Grassley, John McCain and John Warner said they were concerned that the $565m civil portion of the settlement could be structured in a way that would allow Boeing to make its payment tax deductible."

Columnist Questions Justice Department Arguments In Deficit Reduction Act Suit. In a column in the New York Times (7/8, 1.19M), Dorothy Samuels opines that the Justice Department's argument for dismissal of a lawsuit challenging the "phony" Deficit Reduction Act "sharply conflicts with my understanding — and most Americans' understanding — of what it takes for a bill to become law. If that reasoning prevails, it will be very bad for democracy." Samuels that because of an "accidental" change to the bill, the version that passed the House by a mere two votes differed from the Senate measure. … Made aware of the discrepancy, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist apparently made a command decision not to try to fix it by having their chambers vote again, this time on the same measure." She adds, "In briefs filed last week, the Justice Department does not dispute this rendition of what happened, or the constitutional rule against transmitting one-house bills to the president's desk. Instead it contends that a musty 1892 Supreme Court ruling requires courts to accept as fact Mr. Hastert's fictional certification that both chambers passed the same bill. In other words, to enact large budget cuts affecting millions of Americans, the House and Senate needn't bother to go through the tedious and politically fraught exercise of passing the same legislation. It suffices for leaders of each chamber to fudge and say it happened."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Judge Approves Settlement To End Hollywood, FL, Synagogue Dispute. The Miami Herald (7/8, Wright) reports, "A federal judge approved a legal settlement Friday between the city of Hollywood and an Orthodox synagogue, officially ending the five-year feud." The Herald continues, "The unexpected close to the case came a day after six angry neighbors of the synagogue filed a motion to join the case at the last minute in hopes of dismantling the settlement, which would allow the congregation to stay in two single-family homes permanently." The Herald adds, "The religious group has used the houses as a synagogue since 2001, and their presence has sparked a debate over the rights of people to worship where they choose versus a city's right to protect residential neighborhoods from noise, trash and traffic. … After several pretrial defeats, city commissioners offered a settlement that will pay the synagogue $2 million and not only allow the congregation to stay but also to expand to three other houses in the Hollywood Hills neighborhood. … Synagogue leaders accepted the deal Wednesday." The Herald notes, "The deal means the city and Commissioner Sal Oliveri will avoid facing a federal religious discrimination lawsuit from the Chabad and the U.S. Justice Department. … The city also is required to rewrite the zoning criteria used to grant permits to religious groups that want to operate in single-family districts."

DOJ Report Faults Arkansas County Jail. The Times Record (Fort Smith, Arkansas) (7/8, Garrett) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has put Sebastian County on notice that conditions at the county jail violate the constitutional rights of inmates confined there." The Record continues, "A 23-page report on the findings of a 2005 investigation said the jail fails 'to provide for inmates' serious medical needs, serious mental health needs, right to protection from physical harm and right to be confined in sanitary and safe environmental conditions.' … The assessment is based upon an inspection of the jail that was performed May 9-12 last year. It included an on-site inspection of the jail as well as interviews with the sheriff, jail staff, medical care providers and inmates. .. The report was delivered to the county in May." The Record adds, "In the area of medical care, the study is critical of the jail intake process, which it says 'fails to identify inmates' urgent or ongoing health needs, and fails to provide routine health assessments to determine the health status or chronic health care needs of inmates.' … The study said the county does not train jail staff to identify symptoms of drug and alcohol withdrawal, communicable diseases, acute or chronic illness and potential suicide risk. Ongoing medical needs of chronic illnesses do not receive care and treatment, according to the study. … The document also contains a warning that failure to 'reach a resolution' could result in a lawsuit to correct deficiencies identified in the report."

DOJ_NMG_0039493

NAACP Pushes For Quick Renewal Of Voting Rights Act. The Charleston (SC) Post & Courier (7/8) reports, "NAACP leaders want to jumpstart renewal of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which stalled in the U.S. House last month." The P&C continues, "The landmark civil rights act, fueled by bipartisan support, was expected to easily chug through a 25-year extension. … But on June 10 the House Judiciary Committee, responding to a letter from 42 Republican congressmen from 14 states, put renewal on hold indefinitely." The P&C adds, "The lawmakers wanted discussion on and possibly amendments to two sections of the act. One of those sections requires nine mostly Southern states, including South Carolina, to get approval from the U.S. Justice Department on any changes in electoral practices. Another requires certain jurisdictions to offer language assistance to citizens with limited English skills. … Local and national officials called a press conference Friday at the Charleston branch office of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to encourage a swift extension of the act, which was designed to prevent racial discrimination at the polls. … One of the sections that riles lawmakers requires Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia to get Justice Department approval on voting changes. The requirement unfairly singles out and holds accountable states that practiced discriminatory voting policies decades ago, legislators said."

Judge Postpones Trial In Florida Voting Rights Case. The Orlando Sentinel (7/8, Pino) reports, "Osceola County won a two-month delay Friday in the trial of a federal voting-rights lawsuit. … Still, officials said they remain focused on defending their countywide method of electing commissioners, not settling the case with a compromise. … 'Right now, it is too early to pursue options until the judge comes out with a ruling,' commission Chairman Paul Owen said Friday. 'There have been no negotiations at this time with anybody. At this time, we are focused on defending ourselves.'" The Sentinel continues, "The ruling to delay the trial until Sept. 18 was granted by U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell in Orlando, a day after the motion was filed and on the heels of the first public comment about the suit by a commissioner. The trial had been scheduled to begin July 19. … County Commissioner Ken Shipley gave the audience at a Republican women's club meeting Thursday night a rundown of possible outcomes to the suit brought by the Justice Department, including expanding the commission from five to seven members and creating a combination of at-large and single-member districts. … The suit alleges that the current at-large system dilutes Hispanics' voting power and prevents them from electing candidates of their choice." The Sentinel adds, "Lawyers for the county asked the judge for a delay in order to take depositions for close to 30 potential witnesses in the wake of a three-day hearing that resulted in Presnell's June 26 injunction halting commission elections. Presnell's ruling to move the trial to September came after a telephone hearing Friday."

World Cup Highlights Global Sex Trafficking Problem. The Kansas City Star (7/8, Grathoff, McCollough) reports from Hamburg, Germany, "Here in Germany, prostitution is legal. Here, there are no pimps. They are sex businessmen, supported by the government with the benefits of a legitimate profession. With a climate like this already in place, it was widely predicted in the months before the World Cup that tens of thousands of women would be trafficked to Germany to fill the brothels. … 'Trafficking is a major worldwide problem,' the Rev. Carrie Pemberton, CEO of Churches Alert to Sex Trafficking Across Europe, wrote to The Star in an e-mail. 'We are aware that there are (nongovernmental organizations) in Germany and the German police themselves who have been very (concerned) about this problem during the last few weeks. … We have been working with this issue since 2003 and know of definite examples where sporting events have been used for trafficking women into and across Europe for sexual exploitation.'" The Star continues, "For those reasons, human trafficking has become a hot-button topic at the World Cup, as the U.S. State Department, the European Parliament and countless nongovernmental organizations pleaded with the German government to implement a plan to stop the traffickers. … Mandi says she hasn't seen any increase in trafficked women. … Most reports out of Germany back Mandi's assessment. Christian Sachs, a spokesman for the German Interior Ministry, told the International Herald Tribune this week that 'it looks as if the fears that were mentioned — that the World Cup would lead to a rise in cases of forced prostitution and sex trafficking — have fortunately not been the case.' … The biggest problem in the fight against trafficking is that there's no true way of measuring success or failure. Everything is an estimate. … Ambassador John Miller, the U.S. State Department's director of the office that monitors and combats trafficking, says there is no way to know how many women were taken involuntarily into Germany for the World Cup."

DOJ_NMG_0039494

Justice Kennedy Backs San Diego's Cross Stand. The AP (7/8) reports, "San Diego won a Supreme Court justice's backing Friday to leave a large cross standing on city property." The AP continues, "Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said a temporary stay he authorized last week should protect the cross until the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, based in San Francisco, hears arguments this year in a long-running dispute over the cross." The AP adds, "Kennedy also took the unusual step of explaining his decision, in a four-page opinion, and suggested that he and his colleagues may be interested in a broader review of the case. … 'The equities here support preserving the status quo while the city's appeal proceeds,' Kennedy wrote. 'Compared to the irreparable harm of altering the memorial and removing the cross, the harm in a brief delay pending the Court of Appeals' expedited consideration of the case seems slight.'" The AP notes, 'A lower court judge had ordered the city of San Diego to remove the cross or be fined $5,000 a day. The judge ruled that the cross, a symbol of Christianity, was an unconstitutional endorsement of a specific religion. … The 29-foot cross, on a half-acre site atop Mount Soledad in the La Jolla area just outside San Diego, had been contested in 1989 by atheist Philip Paulson. … The Supreme Court refused three years ago to get involved in the dispute between Paulson and the city. Since then, Congress agreed to make the area a national veterans memorial, and San Diego residents voted to transfer the land to the federal government. Paulson is a veteran of the Vietnam War."

Georgia Judge Rules Voter ID Requirement Violates State Constitution. The New York Times (7/8, Goodman, 1.19M) reports Fulton County Superior Court Judge Melvin K. Westmoreland "has blocked a Republican-sponsored effort to require Georgia voters to present government-issued photo identification cards before they can cast a ballot." Westmoreland ruled "the requirement violated the State Constitution by placing an undue burden on the fundamental right to vote." Former Gov. Roy E. Barnes (D) challenged the requirement, arguing that it "would make it harder for minorities, the elderly and the poor to vote." State officials "vowed to appeal the ruling to the Georgia Supreme Court." Meanwhile, "a consortium of voter rights groups" has challenged the requirement in federal court, claiming it "violates the United States Constitution." The AP (7/8, McCaffrey) also carried the story.

ANTITRUST:

General Motors Board Votes To Consider Alliance With Renault And Nissan. ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 5, 2:00, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "American icon General Motors sent out a shockwave today" by "signaling that GM might become part of a giant global partnership" with "Renault of France and Nissan of Japan." ABC (Reynolds) adds, "The idea of a three-part auto-making alliance comes from billionaire GM shareholder Kirk Kerkorian." Kerkorian "evidently believes that Carlos Ghosn -- the hard-charging boss of both Nissan and Renault -- is better suited to lead a reconstituted General Motors than its current chairman, Rick Wagoner." But "there are a lot of people who believe the corporation is already implementing an effective cost-cutting strategy and doesn't need any help from an outsider." And "because GM's problems dwarf those at Nissan and Renault, industry analysts are skeptical about Ghosn's prospects in Detroit."

CBS Evening News (7/7, story 5, 2:40, Smith, 7.66M) reports, "General Motors may soon be joining forces with two foreign carmakers. The GM board gave the go-ahead today for talks with Nissan and Renault about forming an alliance."

NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street -- General Motors board of directors said they're willing to talk to Nissan and Renault about the possibility of an alliance. The move was made under pressure from G.M.'s largest stockholder and investor who thinks G.M.'s turnaround efforts aren't moving fast enough for him."

Corporations Cut Employee Pensions But Not For Executives. CBS Evening News (7/7, story 5, 2:40, Smith, 7.66M) reports, "GM is looking for ways to become more competitive which includes cutting costs. The company recently froze some of its employee pensions. More and more companies are doing that but many workers are complaining that while they are taking cuts, top executives are still retiring with huge pensions." CBS (Mason) adds, "The Wall Street Journal found that 45% of AT&T's pension costs go to just 1,500 top executives; the rest covers the over 189,000 employees."

Judge Mulls Modifications To Terms Of Two Phone Mergers. The New York Times (7/8, Labaton) reports, "A federal district judge in Washington is considering the imposition of major modifications to the two largest telephone mergers in history: SBC Communication's acquisition of AT&T and Verizon's purchase of MCI." The Times continues, "In a surprising order issued Friday afternoon, Judge Emmet G. Sullivan raised a series of questions about the Bush administration's review of the two deals that he said should be answered by the Justice Department and the phone companies at a hearing next week. … Both deals have already closed, and lawyers said that the judge could not unravel them, although he could try to impose significant conditions or divestitures." The Times adds, "The proceedings will probably shed light on the administration's antitrust enforcement program at a time when officials have put up virtually no roadblocks to deals and imposed few restrictions in other areas of antitrust law. … Still, the proceedings could affect the government's review of BellSouth's proposed acquisition by AT&T, the name the company took after AT&T was swallowed by SBC. The proceedings are also the first significant test of changes in the law that have given federal judges greater authority to scrutinize antitrust settlements."

DOJ_NMG_0039495

Suit Alleges Price-Fixing Conspiracy In Rubber Industry. The Knoxville News Sentinel (TN)/AP (7/8, Schelzig) reports, "Three tire companies are suing rubber-chemicals maker Chemtura Corp. in federal court in Nashville, seeking refunds and triple damages for goods purchased during a global price-fixing conspiracy." The AP continues, "Middlebury, Conn.-based Chemtura, which last year changed its name from Crompton Corp., has pleaded guilty in a federal case and has been fined by European regulators for its role in artificially boosting prices of chemicals used to make rubber between 1995 and 2001." The AP adds, "The lawsuit was filed late last week by the Nashville-based North American subsidiaries of Japanese tire maker Bridgestone Corp.; tire retread company Bandag Inc. of Muscatine, Iowa; and Pirelli Tire LLC of Rome, Ga. … Chemtura and subsidiary Uniroyal Chemical Corp. are named as defendants. … 'Defendants conspired in a global price-fixing scheme that had the direct and substantial effect of keeping prices paid by purchasers in the United States artificially high,' the lawsuit states." The AP notes, "The U.S. Justice Department and European regulators began their investigation into several rubber companies in 2002. Chemtura pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in San Francisco in 2004 and was fined $50 million. … The European Commission in December levied a $91 million fine on Flexsys NV, Bayer AG and Chemtura for breaking European Union antitrust rules by secretly agreeing to control both the European and global markets for rubber chemicals."

ENVIRONMENT:

US Allows BP To Delay Alaska Testing. The AP (7/8, Volz) reports, "Too much sediment had built up inside two Prudhoe Bay transit pipelines for BP Exploration (Alaska) Inc. to safely run sensors to detect corrosion levels within an ordered timeline, the head of the federal agency demanding the tests said Friday." The AP continues, "The head of the U.S. Transportation Department's Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration says he will permit a delay of the tests for an undetermined length of time. .. 'We would not allow it to continue to operate if we didn't think it was safe,' said Administrator Thomas Barrett. 'In the long term, it's not a good solution. We've got to get the sensors through there.'" The AP adds, "The agency in March ordered that three low-pressure transit pipelines in Prudhoe Bay be inspected with an internal sensing device known as a "smart pig" within three months, putting the deadline at June 15. … The order came as a result of the largest oil spill in North Slope history, in which an estimated 201,000 gallons of oil and liquids leaked over several days and was not discovered until March 2. … BP, which operates the nation's largest oil field, last month asked to postpone the tests; the request was denied."

US, Ohio Sue Fostoria Over Sewage Violations. The Toledo Blade (OH) (7/7) reports, "U.S. and Ohio regulators filed two federal civil suits yesterday against the city of Fostoria over violations at its wastewater treatment plant, but officials said the legal actions are part of a consent decree the city agreed to earlier this year." The Blade continues, "The state EPA names Fostoria as defendant, while the U.S. EPA names the city and the state of Ohio as defendants. … The lawsuits, filed in U.S. District Court in Toledo, said Fostoria's treatment plant and sewage system have illegally discharged untreated water into the east branch of the Portage River and into the Caples-Flack Ditch since September, 1997." The Blade adds, "Bill Rains, Fostoria's safety-service director, said the two lawsuits represent part of the legal actions related to a consent decree that 'we have been working on for just about a year.' … In May, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency levied a $30,000 fine against the city of Fostoria as part of a consent agreement to replace its outdated sewer system. The city had been negotiating the sewer issue with the EPA, the Justice Department, and the Ohio Attorney General's office. … The city said at the time that it had hired an engineering firm to create a long-term plan to separate storm-water and waste-water sewers. Mr. Rains said yesterday the city hopes to have that plan developed by next year."

Green Attitudes Spread To Faiths' Mainstream. The Washington Times/AP (7/8, Murphy) reports, "More than a decade ago on an Aegean island, the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians made a startling proposition: That pollution and other attacks on the environment could be considered sins." At the time, this "earned him little more than" the nickname "green patriarch," but his revelation is "no longer such a radical view," as "[e]co-friendly attitudes have increasingly moved into the mainstream of many faiths -- from Muslim clerics urging water conservation in the fast-growing Persian Gulf states to evangelical preachers in the United States calling attention to global warming." The Times adds, "Evidence of an expanding environmental ethos can be found in nearly every faith."

DOJ_NMG_0039496

Lawyer Advocates Giving Most Environmental Questions To State, Local Levels. In a column in the New York Times (7/8, 1.19M), John Tierney examines ideas put forward by David Schoenbrod, a lawyer who "started the litigation that forced the E.P.A. to take lead out of gasoline. Technically, it was a victory for environmentalists, but it took so long that Schoenbrod decided his comrades in the movement had made a big mistake — the same mistake they're now making with carbon dioxide. They keep expecting the E.P.A. do an impossible job." Tierney writes, "Schoenbrod's modest proposal for saving the environment is to strip the E.P.A. of its rule-making powers and convert it into an advisory and enforcement agency. It would do technical studies and make recommendations, leaving the lawmaking up to legislators — usually legislators outside Washington. Except for some large-scale problems, like acid rain or global warming, Schoenbrod thinks that most environmental questions should be settled at the state and local level."

NYTimes Emphasizes Importance Of Environmental Case. The New York Times (7/8, 1.19M) editorializes, "In a move that has caused both delight and apprehension among those who worry about global warming, the Supreme Court has agreed to rule next fall on whether the Environmental Protection Agency has the authority under the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases. … The outcome will have much to say about whether the country will be able to act more aggressively on a problem with potentially grave consequences for the earth and its inhabitants. It could also determine whether states that have acted on their own to limit global warming emissions from vehicles — as California and 10 other states have done — can proceed without fear of a federal veto." The Times concludes, "This is a case of global importance, not least because America's failure to act decisively has discouraged the rest of the world from acting decisively."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Attorney Shelves Cases After FBI Informers' Misconduct. The Arizona Republic (7/8, Wagner) reports, "U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton refused to prosecute a major Arizona corruption case after learning that FBI informers sexually abused an unconscious prostitute during a Las Vegas hotel orgy, according to a letter sent by Charlton to the bureau's top Arizona agent at the time." The Republic continues, "There are no allegations that FBI personnel participated in the orgy. However, Charlton's letter complained that agents did not mention the incident in official reports nor did they advise prosecutors of possible crimes committed in the hotel room, including knowledge that "one of the women in the suite may have been raped." … Charlton's conclusion: 'Our office will not prosecute any additional cases involving any of these individuals (informers) until the circumstances of the Oct. 16, 2002, incidents in Las Vegas are fully investigated.'" The Republic adds, "Seventy-one U.S. military personnel, prison guards and law enforcement workers have been convicted in the sting known as Operation Lively Green, which involved undercover operatives and agents posing as Mexican narcotics traffickers. The government employees were bribed to haul cocaine from southern Arizona to Phoenix and Las Vegas, sometimes wearing uniforms and using military vehicles. … Charlton's letter of March 29, 2004, to Charlene Thornton, then-FBI special agent in charge for Arizona, suggests that crimes by informers and questionable conduct by agents were so troubling that he backed away from the case entirely. … Thornton said in an interview that she recalls the letter and Charlton's decision to drop the case. She said Charlton sought an investigation by the Inspector General's Office. After that request was declined, she said, the FBI's Office of Professional Responsibility reviewed the allegations and exonerated all agents. .. The Justice Department's Office of Public Integrity wound up pressing charges, allowing each defendant to plead guilty to a single felony with no public trials or disclosures in U.S. District Court."

SF Chronicle Argues For Dismissal Of Reporters' Subpoenas. The San Francisco Chronicle (7/8, Page B1, Egelko) reports, "Lawyers for two Chronicle reporters accused the federal government Friday of trying to mislead a federal judge into concluding that BALCO founder Victor Conte was the source of grand jury testimony leaked to the reporters regarding star athletes' use of performance-enhancing drugs." The Chronicle continues, "In papers filed in federal court, lawyers for Hearst Corp. argued that subpoenas issued to the newspaper and the two reporters, demanding their confidential sources, should be dismissed because of government misconduct and prosecutors' failure to show any pressing need for the information." The Chronicle adds, "The reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, wrote articles in 2004 disclosing testimony by the Giants' Barry Bonds, the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi, sprinter Tim Montgomery and others to the federal grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO. The disclosures about star athletes' use of performance-enhancing drugs led Major League Baseball to impose a new steroid-testing policy. Conte and three others pleaded guilty to distributing illegal drugs. … The Justice Department has asked U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White to enforce the subpoenas and order Fainaru-Wada and Williams to reveal who gave them the grand jury transcripts in violation of another judge's order. … The reporters could be jailed if they refuse to testify. White has scheduled a hearing for Aug. 4."

DOJ_NMG_0039497

The San Diego Union-Tribune/AP (7/8) reports, "In papers filed in federal court Friday, the attorneys argue the subpoenas should be dismissed because of government misconduct and prosecutors' failure to demonstrate a pressing need for the information. .. . 'There is no breach of national security, no act of terrorism, no violent crime that would go unpunished,' Hearst lawyers wrote." The AP adds, "Bush administration attorneys said it was a crime to leak grand jury materials to the media. They argued that California's shield law protecting reporters from divulging their sources does not apply to the federal probe into who leaked the documents. … On Friday, Hearst attorneys said ordering the reporters to disclose their sources would send a message to journalists and the public that 'the government would and could harass the press at will, compelling them to disclose confidential sources on the basis of any sort of investigation.'"

Clark County, WA, Joins Anti-Gang Task Force. The Vancouver (WA) Columbian (7/8, Hamilton) reports, "Clark County joined 13 federal and local law enforcement agencies Friday in launching a new metropolitan area task force aimed at crippling gang crime." The Columbian continues, "The task force will employ racketeering statutes, drug statues and career criminal statutes to impede gang activities before the criminal organizations can develop and mature, said Karin J. Immergut, U.S. attorney for Oregon." The Columbian adds, "The Metropolitan Gang Task Force, as it will be known, will begin operations Monday in its base at the Portland Police Bureau's Northeast Precinct with gang leaders as the immediate target. … The task force includes an impressive array of police and prosecutorial firepower, including the FBI; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Portland, Beaverton, Gresham, Hillsboro, Milwaukie and Vancouver police departments; the U.S. Attorney; and prosecuting attorneys for Clark, Multnomah, Washington and Clackamas counties. Chairman will be David Bishop, the Beaverton police chief. … Each agency will pay the salaries of their participating officers. Other expenses, including vehicles, overtime and equipment, will come from the FBI, which recently received $450,000 from the U.S. Justice Department for the program. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez has made combating gang activity a priority."

Hatch Plays Role In Freeing Music Producer In Dubai Jail For Cocaine Possession. The New York Times (7/8, Leeds, Waxman, 1.19M) reports, "Although collaborations happen all the time in pop music, they do not generally involve R & B hitmakers and Senator Orrin G. Hatch. But the release of a music producer from a Dubai jail this week, quick on the heels of his conviction for drug possession, turns out to be a story of high-level string-pulling on the part of" Sen. Hatch "along with Lionel Richie, the singer; Quincy Jones, the music entrepreneur; and an array of well-connected lawyers, businessmen and others, spanning cities and continents." Dallas Austin "had been sentenced to four years in prison for carrying just over a gram of cocaine with him when he entered the country on May 19." Sen. Hatch "made numerous phone calls on Mr. Austin's behalf to the ambassador and consul of the United Arab Emirates embassy in Washington."

Columnist Criticizes UN Gun Control Program. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M), David B. Kopel writes, "Yesterday the United Nation's Review Conference on Small Arms ended, barely noticed by the media. That's too bad, because this meeting, and the initiative of which it is a part, deserves much more public attention -- and censure -- than it gets." Kopel notes, "The U.N. has long urged that firearms must never be transferred to 'non-state actors' -- that is, entities which are neither governments nor government-approved. Only John Bolton's intransigence prevented the 'non-state actors' rule from being inserted into the Program of Action at the previous U.N. small arms conference in 2001. But the U.N. continues to insist on the 'non-state actors' rule -- which would, if adopted, make it a violation of international law to sell arms to Taiwan (according to the U.N., not a state). It would also make illegal arms sales to any and every current group resisting tyranny or genocide." Kopel concludes, "The U.N. gun control program, of which this week's small arms conference is a part, has already caused massive suffering and the loss of civil liberties in many nations around the world. Americans would be foolish to imagine that they will always be immune."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Reiterates Support For Comprehensive Immigration Reform. Among the major US newspaper, the Wall Street Journal (7/8, McKinnon, 2.11M) was the only one to focus on Bush's domestic policy focus, reporting, "Bush renewed his call for immigration reform that includes a guest-worker program, a sign that despite resistance from the heart of his own party he isn't throwing in the towel on his troubled initiative in this election year." He "offered a strong defense of his stalled proposals to overhaul the broken U.S. system. 'The system we've got today isn't working, and it needs to be changed and reformed,' Mr. Bush said at a news conference Friday at Chicago's Museum of Science and Industry." He "promised stronger enforcement, both through increased manpower and new technologies such as tamper-proof identification cards. But, he added, 'in order to enforce this border, we've got to have a rational way that recognizes there are people sneaking across to do work Americans aren't doing.'" The Journal notes, "The administration and its allies also appear to be betting that the future for Republicans requires attracting more Latino voters, not driving them away with anti-immigrant rhetoric"

DOJ_NMG_0039498

The Boston Globe (7/8, Klein, 484K) in its coverage of Bush's remarks about North Korea also reports, "Bush used the news conference to push for his top domestic priority this year: comprehensive immigration reform. The House and Senate have passed vastly different immigration bills, and Bush restated his support for the Senate approach, which pairs new border-enforcement mechanisms with a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants now in the United States." Bush said, "In order to enforce this border, we've got to have a rational way that recognizes there are people sneaking across to do work Americans aren't doing."

WPost Urges Bush To Demand Path To Citizenship In Immigration Bill. The Washington Post (7/8, A14, 744K) writes in an editorial, "As Republicans this week began a series of hearings on immigration policy, President Bush was reportedly signaling new openness to compromise designed to produce legislation this year. The compromise, according to a report in the New York Times, would center on 'enforcement-first.'" But "the danger…is that 'enforcement-first' will devolve into 'enforcement-only.'" So President Bush should "insist that enforcement and a path to citizenship remain part of one legislative package."

Border Security Hearing In Texas Highlights Terrorist Threat. The New York Times (7/8, Hastings, Preston, 1.19M) reports at a House Subcommittee on International Terrorism and Nonproliferation hearing held in Laredo, Texas, "law enforcement and immigration agents" said that "terrorists as well as illegal immigrants could slip across" the border "that is porous and vulnerable." "House Republicans…highlighted the threat of terrorist infiltration to justify their tough plan for border enforcement and to suggest that a Senate immigration bill was weak on security." The hearings are described as an attempt to "build public pressure on the Senate to focus primarily on immigration enforcement." Democratic members of the committee "participated in the hearings but denounced them as divisive and called on the Republicans to address the immigration problem as a whole." Among the witnesses was Reynaldo Garza, acting chief of the Border Patrol for the Laredo sector, who said that "last year, agents in his area…caught illegal crossers from 70 countries other than Mexico, including some from countries linked by the United States to terrorism."

The Washington Post (7/8, A3, Moreno, 744K) reports the hearing helped House Republicans "to make their case for tightening the border as a way to prevent terrorist incursions." Democrats "called the event here political theater." But Republicans "raised the specter of well-funded terrorist organizations using Mexican drug rings and human-smuggling rings to penetrate the southern border of the United States." Garza was cited saying that "additional agents and high-technology tools such as unmanned aerial vehicles and remote surveillance cameras are critical to border security."

The Washington Times (7/8, Hurt, 90K) reports in a front-page story, the hearing "was part of a series" held to "gauge voter opinion on reforming the nation's immigration laws." Garza was cited sying that "the number of violent incidents at points of entry to the U.S. have increased dramatically in recent years." House Republicans "want to secure the border first and deal with thorny issues such as a guest-worker program after the borders have been bolstered."

The AP (7/8, White) called it "an unusual field hearing" intended to "push the Senate to focus on enforcing immigration law." Democrats "participated, but denounced them as political theater." Garza was cited saying that he "worries about possible links between drug cartels and terrorists."

The Houston Chronicle (7/8, Gonzalez, 581K) reports the hearing contained "disturbing testimony…about the dangers that federal and local law enforcement agencies face." Witnesses also "acknowledged terrorists could cross the river laden with weapons, and a federal auditor testified he's proven how porous the northern and southern borders are by using bogus documents to import nuclear bomb-making materials."

New York Appeals Court Rules DMV May Require Proof Of Legal Residency. The Washington Times/AP (7/8) reports a New York state appeals court ruled 5-0 that the Department of Motor Vehicles "can require immigrants to prove they are in this country legally before allowing them to have driver's licenses." The ruling "reversed a decision by Justice Karen S. Smith" who, the court said, had "erred in barring the identity procedures DMV Commissioner Raymond Martinez put in place and said they were 'within his authority and enforceable.'"

Latino Advocacy Group Targets Immigration. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Watanabe, 958K) reports one of the nation's largest Latino advocacy and civil rights organizations plans to meet in Los Angeles this weekend "to instruct people how to mobilize and vote out those who fail to back generous new immigration laws." The National Council of La Raza will highlight immigration at its annual conference beginning today, featuring a bipartisan lineup of such high-profile speakers as former President Clinton, Republican presidential political strategist Karl Rove, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa.

DOJ_NMG_0039499

ICE Official Calls For More Criminal Prosecution Of Employers. Julie Myers, assistant secretary of homeland security for immigration and customs enforcement, writes in the Washington Post (7/8, A15, 744K), "The lure of well-paid jobs continues to be the primary magnet for most people who come to this country illegally. A comprehensive immigration strategy that includes a temporary worker program, as proposed by President Bush, is critical to stemming this flow. This strategy must also include work-site enforcement with real consequences for those who knowingly employ illegal aliens." Myers argues that "the most effective strategy in combating illegal employment is criminal prosecution of unscrupulous employers" and "seizing assets derived from illegal employment schemes." ICE "has arrested more than 382 people on criminal charges in work-site enforcement cases and apprehended another 2,100 on immigration violations" this year.

Former Agents Plead Guilty To Accepting Bribes To Release Immigrant Smugglers. The AP (7/8, Spagat) reports, "Two former Border Patrol agents," Mario Alvarez and Samuel McClaren, "pleaded guilty Friday to accepting nearly $200,000 in bribes for releasing immigrant smugglers and illegal immigrants from federal custody." They "each face up to 18 years in prison when they are sentenced Sept. 29, U.S. District Judge John Houston said."

Knight Ridder (7/8, Hall) reports Mexico's president-elect Felipe Calderon "Friday took sides in the battle over immigration, blasting a U.S. congressional plan to build a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border while endorsing a U.S. Senate proposal that would offer a route to legal citizenship for millions of undocumented Mexicans living in the United States." Calderon "also called for a joint development fund among Mexico, the United States and Canada that would finance public works construction in poor areas of Mexico."

The Washington Post (7/8, A9, Roig-franzia, 744K) reports, "Calderon took a firm stance against building a wall along the United States-Mexico border to stem illegal immigration." He said that "the best solution to the immigration crisis was creating jobs in Mexico." The statement "angered" Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) and Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) said that "he was 'hopeful Mexico's president-elect will also look more closely at the benefits security fencing brings to both sides of the border.'"

Migrants' Journey Through Mexico Full Of Dangers. The Washington Post (7/8, A1, Aizenman, 744K) reports that for "tens of thousands" of "impoverished Central Americans who sneak into the United States each year, the real border begins here, at Guatemala's frontier with Mexico" and "the dangerous trek through the desert into Arizona or Texas is merely the final chapter." The article gives an account of the journey from Guatemala and its hardships.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Takes Message To US Public. The White House's new strategy to garner favorable coverage in the local media met with mixed results as the national media focused on international issues. Bush's remarks on domestic issues and prediction that Republicans would keep their majority in the Congress was noted by newspapers Saturday morning.

The Washington Post (7/8, A2, Fletcher, 744K) reports called Bush's press conference "unusual and said, "Despite widespread public discontent with GOP congressional leaders, Bush predicted that Republicans will keep control of the House and Senate, allowing them to continue setting the nation's legislative agenda for the next two years." When asked if his poll numbers might hurt GOP candidates, Bush said, "You win elections by having a plan to protect the American people from terrorist attack. You win elections by having a philosophy that has actually produced results -- economic growth, for example -- or kind of changing the school systems for the better, or providing prescription drug coverage for elders."

The New York Times (7/8, Stolberg, 1.19M) notes, "members of the Chicago press did not serve up softball questions. The issue of Mr. Bush's polls came up when a reporter asked about a fund-raiser the president planned to attend for Judy Baar Topinka, the Republican candidate for Illinois governor." He "also gave an endorsement of sorts to Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special prosecutor who handled a leak investigation involving Karl Rove." He said Fitzgerald "had done a 'very professional job' in handling the leak investigation."

The AP (7/8, Burghart) reports, "Larry J. Sabato, director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics, said trips like the one to Chicago demonstrate that Bush does connect better with voters in informal sessions out of the Beltway. But he said the main problem is the unpopularity of the Iraq war." In an email Sabato said, "Until things look up in Iraq, and American troops are coming home in significant numbers, Bush's own numbers won't improve much."

DOJ_NMG_0039500

Bloomberg (7/8) notes, "The administration is stressing the strength of the economy to bolster Republicans in the November elections. ``People are better off, things are working," Bush said this morning, adding that the U.S. has added more jobs for 34 straight months." But the "economy added fewer jobs in June than economists expected, reducing the urgency for further Federal Reserve interest-rate increases even as wages rose the most in five years, the Labor Department reported today."

The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Wallsten, 958K) reports, "Reinforcing the message that Bush was far outside the Beltway, he stood before a giant picture of the city skyline displaying, in giant letters, 'CHICAGO.'" The Times adds, "The overwhelmingly Democratic city in a blue state seemed a peculiar choice as a kickoff for the new White House communications strategy, particularly in light of headlines that greeted the president and his entourage Friday morning."

The Chicago Tribune (7/8, Pearson, 643K) reports, "President Bush offered a staunch defense of Mayor Richard Daley Friday, calling him 'a great mayor' and a friend despite the federal convictions of former top Daley patronage aides on charges of rigging jobs for mayoral campaign workers." Speaking "at the Museum of Science and Industry, Bush said he could not provide an assessment of the job U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald has done on the local level in bringing corruption charges against officials in city and state government." The Tribune also notes, "In a bit of topsy-turvy politics, Bush touted the health of the state's economy by echoing Blagojevich in noting the state led the nation for job creation in April. And Bush's 2004 presidential opponent, U.S. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), appeared to side with Topinka's criticism of the Democratic governor on the issue of job creation." In a statement Kerry said, "The president praises the optimism of Illinois businesses, yet more of the state's businesses closed their doors in 2004 than new businesses were opened."

The Chicago Sun Times (7/8, Herrmann) reports, "National and local reporters asked him about a range of topics, including the North Korean crisis, the war in Iraq, foreign ownership of defense companies and skyrocketing gasoline prices." While "Daley sat to the side of the podium, Bush was reminded by a reporter that last summer, he had called Daley a 'great mayor.' ' Given the conviction Thursday of Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three others for doling out jobs and promotions to reward the mayor's political workers, the president was asked whether his assessment had changed." Bush replied, "I still think he's a great mayor. ... I'm proud to call him my friend."

New media Strategy Seen As Ineffective. In a negative analysis of the White House's new media strategy, the Chicago Tribune (7/8, Tackett, 643K) reports, "What the White House didn't say, but what was highly apparent, was that the president has decided to fully engage in the 2006 midterm elections, perhaps the last clear referendum on his presidency, and this could be a sign of the unofficial start of a campaign. Bush emphasized the good news he found in the jobs data and first quarter growth, then noted bluntly that his tax cuts were the answer. The subtle read? Democrats would raise taxes. He continued to push progress in Iraq, honoring a sacrifice made by a soldier from Hoffman Estates. Democrats, the implicit argument was, would cut and run. These are messages that he will likely be reinforcing as he travels throughout the country between now and November." And "There is logic in that. No matter how skeptical the local press corps, there is still a reflex for a red carpet for a president. Positive coverage – locally, anyway – is typically assured. WGN-TV carried the press conference live." But "if the communications czars in the White House were hoping for questions about cheesecake or the Cubs, they were roundly disappointed. And if they thought that by taking the president away from the Beltway that somehow he would be bathed in different light, the morning in Chicago proved that wrong."

Roberts Said To Be More Influential Than Kennedy On Court. Douglas W. Kmiec, professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/8, 958K), "The received wisdom at the end of the most recent Supreme Court term is that because of his swing vote, Justice Anthony Kennedy is more in control of the court than the new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr." But "it's a misleading picture" because "Kennedy alone is often deliberately speculative and partly because Roberts has at least the nascent but constructive capacity to span partisan division." And "Kennedy's theorizing reveals a mind of great intelligence but makes it more difficult to strike bargains with him." Roberts "has a conservative mind but a diplomat's nature. His abiding concern is to keep the court within bounds on legal, rather than ideological, grounds. Because that is so, he has the capacity to draw votes from both sides on controversial and pedestrian cases alike." That "overwhelms Kennedy's ability to deploy his swing vote."

House Agenda Criticized By Moderates As Not Helpful To Holding Majority. The New York Times (7/8, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "Moderate Republicans say a planned summer push by the House leadership on conservative causes like gun rights and new abortion restrictions threatens the re-election prospects of embattled centrists, who are key to the party's drive to hold Congress." Moderates are described as "frustrated and angry" due to the agenda they say is "heavy on ideological themes" and "short-sighted and ill-timed." The also "fear that this new agenda could backfire by stirring independent voters to reject centrist candidates." House leaders said that moderates "could establish their independence by voting against select initiatives if they choose" but the Times reports, "many of the must-win races are in more moderate regions of the Northeast, Midwest and suburban South and West." Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said the agenda "would allow lawmakers to vote on basic values like the 'sanctity of life' while defending the nation's founding principles."

DOJ_NMG_0039501

Discovery Crew Supplies Space Station, Checks Shuttle For Damage. NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 4, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Astronauts continued to pore over the shuttle Discovery today with the space age equivalent of a fine-toothed comb. They used a camera on the shuttle's robotic arm to snap extreme close-ups of the shuttle's external thermal skin. The crew also moved more than two tons of supplies over to the International Space Station."

The AP (7/8), in a story carried by the Washington Times, reports, "It was moving day yesterday for the crew of Discovery, which transferred thousands of pounds of supplies and cargo from the space shuttle to the International Space Station." The AP notes, "For the first time in three years, the International Space Station has three crew members -- European Space Agency astronaut Thomas Reiter on Thursday joined Pavel Vinogradov and Jeff Williams, who marked their 100th day at the space station yesterday."

NASA Examines Detailed Photos Of Discovery's Exterior. The AP (7/8, Borenstein) reports, "NASA engineers examined new detailed pictures of space shuttle Discovery's heat shield Friday, a day before two astronauts were to embark on the most disorienting task of their 13-day mission: a wobbly spacewalk. … Astronauts spent several hours focusing the cameras on six specific 'areas of interest' on the shuttle that had been seen in earlier photographs. Engineers need more information about the heat shield to ensure there is no damage like the kind that doomed Columbia's flight in 2003." The New York Times (7/8, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "On a day devoted to moving thousands of pounds of supplies from the space shuttle Discovery to the International Space Station, engineers and analysts on the ground scrutinized images of the shuttle on Friday for damage that might cause problems in the brutal heat of re-entry. Officials said that the shuttle came through the rigors of ascent in a remarkably clean state and that they had narrowed their analysis to a few unresolved issues." The Washington Post (7/8, A7, Gugliotta, 744K) reports, "Late Friday, analysts at Houston's Johnson Space Center were still examining two slight scars on the brittle 'reinforced carbon-carbon' protecting the front edge of Discovery's starboard wing."

Discovery Mission Extended One Day For Additional Spacewalk. The AP (7/8, Borenstein) reports, "NASA managers announced that Discovery has enough fuel to stay up for a 13th day to squeeze in a third spacewalk."

ABC News Honors Discovery Astronauts As "Person Of The Week." ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 7, 3:00, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "And finally, from us, our 'Person of the Week.' We held our breath as they made history this week on top of the world. The astronauts aboard the space shuttle Discovery looked beyond the known risks, beyond the cracks of the falling foam, and set their eyes on the stars."

Information On Sailors Accidentally Exposed. Coverage of the May VA data theft is largely absent today. However, media outlets report that the Navy accidentally posted the information of 100,000 sailors. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (7/8, Hansen) reports, "Personal information from 100,000 Navy and Marine Corps aviators and crew was removed from the Naval Safety Center Web site after being accidentally posted and available to the public for six months, the center announced Friday. The information included the full names and Social Security numbers of active- and reserve-duty service members who have logged flight information with the Norfolk-based command since 1985, said spokeswoman Evelyn Odango." The Virginian-Pilot notes, "The safety center mistake is the latest in a series of public blunders by government record-keepers. In May, a laptop computer containing data for 26.5 million active-duty and retired service members was stolen from the home of an employee for the Department of Veterans Affairs. Police recovered the laptop last week."

The Washington Post (7/8, A03, White, 744K) adds, "Investigators are working to determine how the records landed on the Navy Safety Center's Web site, which officials shut down Thursday after a member of the public reported finding the full names and Social Security numbers posted. Evelyn Odango, a spokeswoman for the safety center in Norfolk, said the list had been posted since December and appeared to be 'inadvertent' and the result of 'human error.'"

Columnist Condemns Effort To Limit Judicial "Junkets." In a column in the Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M) James Q. Wilson notes efforts by the Community Rights Counsel to curtail the seminars the judges attend. Wilson writes, "The CRC regards university efforts to educate judges as 'junkets.' I am puzzled by this view because for many years I have spoken or led seminars at meetings run by the George Mason University School of Law. Most of these meetings are strictly academic exercises in which scholars talk about economic principles, statistical techniques, tort and contract law, criminal and family law, the logic and methods of science, and similar matters." Wilson also writes, "The other reason CRC calls them junkets instead of educational activities is that it thinks, for reasons that baffle me, that the groups who donate funds to these activities will influence the judges and shape their opinions. That possibility is farcical -- no donors attend the meetings, the judges do not know who the donors are, and no subject about which a donor may have a legal interest is a topic for discussion."

DOJ_NMG_0039502

House GOP Leaders Said Not To Be Serious About Pork-Barrel Spending. The Boston Globe (7/8, Klein, 484K) reports, "Top leaders of the House of Representatives, who last month decried pork-barrel spending while voting to give the president a line-item veto, have helped block 40 attempts this year to remove individual special-interest 'earmark' projects from spending bills." And "the three top House leaders…have not cast a single vote against any of the projects that have been challenged by fiscal conservatives on the House floor." Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) said that "the leaders can't credibly claim to be against wasteful spending as long as they support the earmarks."

Deficit Expected To Fall Below $300 Billion With "Surging Tax Revenues." The AP (7/8, Taylor) reports the Congressional Budget Office said Friday that, "the federal deficit appears on track to register less than $300 billion for the budget year ending Sept. 30, as surging tax revenues continue to signal significant improvement over White House estimates released in February." The administration will update its estimate on Tuesday and "put its own spin on the deficit picture." President Bush is "expected to tout the numbers as proof of the success of Bush-sponsored tax cuts in reviving economic growth and, in turn, tax revenues." And "tax collections are surging at a 13 percent growth rate."

Specter Seeks Renewal Of Funds For Pennsylvania Foster Care Program. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/8, Sherman, 261K) reports, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Penn.) "yesterday said he and other members of Pennsylvania's congressional delegation are pressuring federal officials to release $170 million meant for the state's foster care program for children." The money is "on hold" because federal Administration for Children and Families officials "discovered that the state wasn't following guidelines for reporting expenses. The state Department of Public Welfare recently adjusted its reporting procedures." Specter and Rep. Tim Murphy (R-Upper St. Clair) said that the withholding "could soon hurt thousands of children at risk of being sent into foster care." Wade F. Horn, assistant secretary for children and families, said that Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt would "carefully consider any requests from a U.S. senator."

Medicare Warning Blamed For Some Companies Ending Drug "Giveaways." CBS Evening News (7/7, story 6, 3:00, Smith, 7.66M) reports, "When a new Medicare drug plan rolled out in January the idea was to help tens of millions of older Americans and the disabled afford the prescription drugs they need." But "in some cases prescriptions that once cost them nothing, are now becoming a big financial burden." CBS (Andrews) adds, "Drugs that used to be donated by the pharmaceutical companies" were stopped by firms "because of a monumental misunderstanding." Medicare notified drug companies that "drug giveaways could be prosecuted for fraud and abuse if the companies counted the value of the donated drugs to file for reimbursement." As a result some firms reportedly stopped their "giveaways" and cited the Medicare notification as the reason. HHS inspector general Daniel Levinson was shown saying, "I just can't imagine why there would be a feeling of threat."

LATimes Muses On Bush's Aging. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, 958K) writes in an editorial, "Why was there so much fascination with George W. Bush's attainment of three-score years?" It "represents the aging of a youthful persona. Younger men than Bush have served as president…but this president is known for a number of traits associated with youthfulness." And "the question is whether that will change now that the 'frat boy' has embarked on his seventh decade."

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Report Seen As Sign Economy Slowing. ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 6, 0:20, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "In other economic news, a sign the overall economy is slowing. Today, the government said employers created 121,000 new jobs. A number below expectations. That news helped drive stocks down on Wall Street, where the Dow Jones average closed 132 points lower. On the NASDAQ, stocks were down 25 points."

NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 8, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A disappointing jobs report. Employers added 121,000 jobs to their American payrolls in June. Problem is analysts had expected 175,000. The unemployment rate was unchanged at 4.6%."

The New York Times/AP (7/8) reports, "Corporate profit warnings and record oil prices overshadowed a benign jobs creation report and sent stocks sharply lower Friday as investors worried that the economy was cooling too quickly. The Dow Jones industrials shed 134 points as stocks ended the week with a loss." The AP adds, "With the unemployment rate steady at 4.6 percent, the report was exactly what Wall Street had hoped for -- low unemployment, but modest job growth that won't spark a sharp increase in consumer demand, which could foreshadow inflation and interest rate hikes."

DOJ_NMG_0039503

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, McKay, 2.11M) notes, "Investors lately have welcomed such disappointing economic data, seeing a reason for the Federal Reserve to stop tightening the U.S. money supply. But that was not the case Friday, because the weak payroll number was accompanied by a rise in average hourly wages, which gained eight cents to $16.70 in June, after remaining nearly flat in May."

The New York Times (7/8, Porter, 1.19M) said the "economy was slowing under the combined weight of high energy prices and rising interest rates." Yet "the government also reported that hourly wages rose at their fastest pace in five years, while the unemployment rate remained at 4.6 percent. This suggests that the labor market remains tight and may yet spur higher inflation." The Times notes, "The disparate data underscored the uncertain economic situation facing the Federal Reserve as it ponders whether to continue raising interest rates over the summer to cool the economy further or whether it is time to pause. Over the last two years, the Fed has steadily increased the benchmark federal funds rate from 1 percent to 5.25 percent."

The Washington Post (7/8, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports, "Employers hired cautiously last month as the economy lost steam, but they added enough new jobs to hold the nation's unemployment rate steady at 4.6 percent, the Labor Department reported yesterday." Some experts "said the increase in average wages may partly reflect a shift in the job mix, as higher-paying manufacturers added to their payrolls while lower-paying retailers trimmed theirs. That could reverse in coming months as U.S. automakers proceed with plans to eliminate tens of thousands of jobs." The Washington Times (7/8, Hill, 90K) and the Financial Times (7/8, Swann, Hughes) report similar details.

The Bloomberg (7/8) adds, "The Dow average tumbled 134.63, or 1.2 percent, to 11,090.67, the most since June 5. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index fell 8.60, or 0.7 percent, to 1265.48. The Nasdaq Composite Index, which gets 41 percent of its value from computer-related shares, dropped 25.03, or 1.2 percent, to 2130.06."

Oil Prices Climbing. NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 6, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It's summer and the price of gas and oil is climbing along with the temperatures outside. During today's trading, oil surged to a record $75.55 a barrel before falling back down to $74.09. In plain English, in the last four years, a barrel of oil has gone up in price almost $50 in four years' time. With gas pushing $3 a gallon, we are in for a rough patch on the American road."

The Financial Times (7/8, Hoyos) reports, "International oil prices rose to a new record on Friday as US drivers took to the roads on their annual summer holiday." An increase "to $75.78 a barrel – stoked fears that inflation could rise, leading share prices in the US and Europe lower." Experts "said the rise made it more likely that the US Federal Reserve and other central banks would increase interest rates, especially as pressure from high oil prices showed no sign of weakening soon."

Election Experts Say Democrats Will Seek To Nationalize Congressional Elections. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (7/8, Skiba, 266K) reports under the headline, "All Bets Off For Midterm Elections," that "most election-watchers aren't wagering on which party will control the House and Senate. But some say the House appears more up for grabs than the Senate." Still "one thing is certain, though. Democrats will try to nationalize the races while Republicans cast them as local contests." At a George Washington University event this week, six experts "were split on whether trends predict an anti-incumbent year or even an anti-Washington year."

Senator Clinton Campaigns For Angelides. The Oakland Tribune (7/8, Richman) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton campaigned for California Treasurer and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides. Clinton "keynoted the minimum-$1,000-per-head event at the St. Regis Hotel and briefly addressed reporters afterward. But the purported 2008 presidential candidate departed amid reporters' shouted questions on topics such as same-sex marriage, which Angelides supports and she opposes. She said she has known Angelides since he was the California Democratic Party's chairman as her husband, Bill Clinton, first ran for president."

Angelides Advisor Won't Apologize For Comparing Schwarzenegger To Kim Jong Il. The San Francisco Chronicle's Politics blog (7/8,Marinucci) reports on the "increasingly crazy dustup over State Treasurer Phil Angelides' strategist Bob Mulholland, and his comments comparing Governor Schwarzenegger's lifts, or shoes, or whatever, to Korean dictator Kim Jong Il. Angelides, appearing in Sacramento this morning, was asked about the comment, said the comments were 'inappropriate and I've told my team let's knock off the personal attacks.' But that didn't satisfy Fox News conservative talk show bulldog Sean Hannity, who tried to engaged liberal bulldog Mulholland this afternoon." Hannity: "Mr. Mulholland, why don't you just apologize and say you're wrong?" Muholland: "Oh, It was a joke. Schwarzenegger loves making fun of people and he loves people making fun of him ... so if Schwarzzennger can stand the heat, he can get out of the kitchen."

DOJ_NMG_0039504

Gore To Speak To Wal-Mart Managers. The AP (7/8, Kabel) reports, "Former Vice President Al Gore will take his campaign against global warming to Wal-Mart Stores Inc. next week, speaking at Wal-Mart headquarters to executives seeking to make the world's largest retailer more environmentally friendly." Gore "will talk to a quarterly conference of Wal-Mart managers working on ways to implement Chief Executive Lee Scott's plans to make the retailer a leader in cutting emissions, energy use and solid waste and selling more environmentally friendly products."

Edwards Urges Regulation Of "Payday Lenders" In Iowa. The AP (7/8) reports former Sen. John Edwards, "a White House hopeful, focused on the problem of predatory lenders in his first swing through Iowa since a statewide poll gave his potential presidential campaign a boost." Edwards called for new regulations on "payday lenders." He "spent Friday raising money for Democratic candidate David Loebsack's long-shot challenge against Rep. Jim Leach."

Biden Defends Remark About Indian-Americans. The AP (7/8, Sidoti) reports, "Facing criticism, potential 2008 presidential candidate Joe Biden on Friday defended his recent remark that 'you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent.'" Biden is "known as one of the more long-winded senators." He said that he "has had an 'incredibly strong' relationship with the Indian-American community in Delaware and that his comment was misinterpreted."

Democratic Divisions Over War Revealed In Primary Contests. The Washington Post (7/8, 4:58 AM, Sidoti, 744K) reports, "Intent on seizing control of Congress, Democrats want to keep the focus on President Bush's missteps in Iraq. Yet the war is fracturing the party in a handful of House and Senate races" which "pit the party's liberal wing…against moderates favored by Democratic leaders in Washington." And "such primary clashes are drawing unwanted attention to Democratic divisions on the war while raising questions about whether the Democrats' competing factions are, in effect, torpedoing the party's chances to make 2006 a referendum on Bush's handling of Iraq." Still "Democrats remain optimistic about winning control of the GOP-run Congress by capitalizing on voter dissatisfaction with Bush, Republicans and the war."

Lieberman Challenge Is Chief Example. Newsweek (7/8, Darman, Braiker) reports in a "Web Exclusive," Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) is "fighting off a tough challenge from Greenwich businessman Ned Lamont. Lieberman's main vulnerability: steadfast support for the war in Iraq." In an interview Lieberman said that "Mostly people are talking about the economy" when he travels the state on his campaign. And "If it was not for my position on the war in Iraq, I don't believe there would be a primary against me." Lieberman's challenger Ned Lamont said that "the No. 1 question I get" is "rather than spending $250 million a day in Iraq, how come we're not investing in universal health care for every American?"

Lieberman's Stance On Iraq Is Not His Only Liability For Liberal Voters. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Cummings, 2.11M) reports that Sen. Joseph Lieberman has lost support not only because of his support for the war in Iraq, but because "the moderate persona that helped Mr. Lieberman…score an upset victory for the Senate seat in 1988 dulls his appeal today to an energized partisan base. Time spent away from home to campaign for higher office in 2000 and 2004 -- when he sought the presidential nomination -- weakened critical home-state ties. And his penchant for lacing policy or political choices with moral or religious messages now sounds patronizing to some voters. 'His problems have been building over time and the war was the last straw for many of the party's more liberal voters,' says Jennifer Duffy, a political analyst with the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

Steele Continues To Raise More Than Cardin. The Washington Times (7/8, Ward, 90K) reports Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) "raised more than $1.8 million for his U.S. Senate campaign in this year's second quarter, according to an internal campaign memo." That is "Steele's highest quarterly fundraising total since announcing his candidacy last fall." He has also "raised more money per quarter since entering the race than the leading Democratic fundraiser, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin."

Harris To Undergo Surgery. The AP (7/8) reports Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.) "announced Friday she will undergo surgery later this month to remove an ovarian mass, which will be tested to determine if it is malignant." She will "visit Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington for preoperative testing Monday, her campaign office said in a statement."

DeLay Seen As Possible Candidate In TX22. The AP (7/8) reports, "Former U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay suggested Friday that he may not be ready for retirement just yet, a day after a federal judge ruled that his name must remain on the November ballot even though he resigned from Congress." DeLay "also criticized U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks' ruling that the former House majority leader's name had to remain on the ballot." DeLay, asked if "he now planned to run" said that he would "wait and see what the 5th Circuit does on appeal." The Texas Republican Party

DOJ_NMG_0039505

"appealed to the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans immediately after Sparks' ruling Thursday in Austin." DeLay "won the Republican primary in March" and Democrats "sued to keep the GOP from removing DeLay's name from the ballot. Republicans want to name a replacement nominee."

The Houston Chronicle (7/8, Mack, 581K) reports DeLay "told a friendly crowd Friday that Democrats seeking to force him onto the November ballot 'may get exactly what they want.' After savoring a standing ovation, he quickly said the comment was not an announcement that he will seek the office he vacated last month." DeLay spoke at a "previously scheduled tribute, co-sponsored by the Greater Houston Partnership and the Fort Bend Chamber of Commerce." DeLay also said, "Only in this country can the federal judiciary force someone to run for office."

LATimes Urges Americans To Save More. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, 958K) writes in an editorial, "According to a string of recent gloomy studies, most people are kidding themselves if they think they'll have enough gold during their golden years." But "if there is a silver lining in all this doom and gloom, it's the small but growing number of employers who are trying to help workers save more." Meanwhile, "it would be nice if instead of focusing on tax relief for the wealthy, Congress were more inventive in devising savings programs for less-affluent workers." Yet "any of these savings plans also requires a bit of a cultural readjustment for Americans to put aside more for retirement."

Pastor Allied With The President And Governor Bush Calls Islam A "Dangerous…Cult." The Miami Herald (7/8, Simon, 323K) reports the Rev. O'Neal Dozier, "a Broward clergyman who has advised President Bush and is a political appointee of Gov. Jeb Bush, took to the air waves Friday to criticize Islam as a 'cult' religion." Dozier is quoted as saying, "'The Islamic religion in my view is a cult" and "dangerous." The Herald adds, "The radio appearance by Dozier, who serves on the governor's committee that screens Broward judicial nominees, startled a local Muslim leader, and prompted the governor to immediately distance himself from the statements. Reached later in the day by The Miami Herald, a contrite Dozier said he was 'concerned' his comments could jeopardize his position on Broward's Judicial Nominating Commission. But he did not disavow those comments." The Herald goes on to report, "On Friday, the White House referred a reporter to previous remarks by the president on Islam, including a 2002 meeting in the Oval Office with United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan. At that time, the president condemned blanket criticisms of Islam, saying they 'do not reflect the sentiments of my government or the sentiments of most Americans. Islam, as practiced by the vast majority of people, is a peaceful religion, a religion that respects others,' Bush said. On Friday, Gov. Bush's office issued a statement distancing him from Dozier. 'Gov. Bush in no way shares Rev. Dozier's views on Islam,' said Alia Faraj, Bush's spokeswoman."

Veterans Issues At Forefront In Minnesota Races. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (7/8, Smith, 424K) reports, "A proposal to protect soldiers' homes from foreclosure is a sign of the prominence veterans' issue may have in this year's election. A preview of the importance of issues involving soldiers and the Iraq War in this summer's election campaigns went on display at the state Capitol Thursday. Stiffer state and federal penalties for companies that attempt illegal foreclosures on deployed members of the military were proposed by two DFLers, state Rep. Matt Entenza, a candidate for attorney general, and Tim Walz, a 24-year Minnesota National Guard member who is running for Congress." The Star Tribune adds, "Appearing with Entenza and Walz was U.S. Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., a 2008 exploratory presidential candidate who was in the Twin Cities for a little politicking of his own. Bayh is a member of the Armed Services Committee and is proposing similar legislation toughening the foreclosure violations."

Bush Stresses Patience, Diplomatic Approach To North Korea. At what was described as a wide-ranging press conference designed by the White House to emphasize domestic issues, the national media focused mainly on President Bush's response to North Korea's recent missile launches. The two main themes on the subject involved questions about the Administration's diplomatic efforts to convince the international community to pressure North Korea to end its nuclear weapons program and the capability of the US' missile defense system. Bush reiterated his intention to convince the international community to pressure North Korea and avoid direct talks, but an AP (7/8) story published early this morning reports, "A U.S. envoy expressed support for China's proposal to hold informal six-party talks on the North Korean nuclear threat and offered to meet bilaterally with North Korea on the sidelines of those discussions."

Bush's remarks stressing a patient, diplomatic approach to North Korea were carried on all three nightly network news programs. Providing the most extensive characterization of Bush's remarks, NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 3, 2:20, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush repeatedly lowered expectations today, not only over what North Korea will do next but he played down the pace of diplomatic progress and even the expectations of U.S. missile defense." He "exhibited caution, careful not to oversell." President Bush: "I think we had a reasonable chance of shooting it down." O'Donnell: "While the president labeled the North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il a dangerous man who must disarm, the president was notably careful to distance himself when asked today about intelligence assessments that North Korea has increased its nuclear weapons capability while Mr. Bush has been in office." President Bush: "I just thought for a minute you might have known more than I do about, when you say, definitively say, he's increased the number of weapons. I don't think we know that."

DOJ_NMG_0039506

Focusing on Bush's cautious assessment of the US missile defense system, ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 4, 2:00, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported Bush "said there was no certainty that America's $95 billion missile defense system could have intercepted the North Korean missile." President Bush: "Our missile systems are modest. Our anti-ballistic missile systems are modest. I think we had a reasonable chance of shooting it down. At least that's what the military commanders have told me." At the end of its story ABC's Sawyer noted that "a number of us watching that press conference today noted how many times the President talked about hard problems with long-term solutions. You, too?" Raddatz: "Yes, Patience, Patience, Patience. The President said that six times today during that press conference. He is trying to calm the situation. He does not want to turn it into a crisis. Diplomacy is the keyword here."

The CBS Evening News (7/7, story 4, 2:00, Smith, 7.66M) focused mainly on Japan's response to North Korea, but opened its story noting, "Bush stressed again that he wants a peaceful solution to the North Korean missile dispute but said diplomacy takes time." At the end of its story CBS (Petersen) added, "Amid these tensions, U.S. Envoy Christopher Hill met with Chinese officials hoping they can pressure North Korea into returning to talks on the north's nuclear weapons." Hill: "At the same time we are also going to take measures to protect ourselves." Petersen: "Could harsh words between Japan and North Korea escalate into military conflict? That's the problem with the North, that its leader is prone to irrational actions. So the Japanese military is being told tonight keep your eyes open and your ammunition ready."

President Bush was characterized as frustrated and on the defensive by some newspapers. The Washington Post (7/8, A2, Fletcher, 744K) says Bush "defended his response to the budding crisis spawned by North Korea's missile tests, saying he will not 'get caught in the trap of sitting alone with North Korea at the table.'"

The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Wallsten, Farley, 958K) in an article titled "Bush Strongly Defends His N. Korea Policies" reports, "President Bush on Friday defended his administration's policies on North Korea, questioning claims that the regime in Pyongyang had grown more dangerous since he entered the White House." The Times notes, "White House officials fear that the issue of North Korea's missiles has contributed to public doubts about Bush's foreign policy record in an election year. Republicans hope that Bush's tough stand on national security will be a winning issue for them with voters."

The Boston Globe (7/8, Klein, 484K) reports, "Despite his frustrations over the process, Bush's comments signaled a patient approach toward North Korea." The Globe notes, "Asked whether the US military, stretched by simultaneous wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, could sustain a third conflict with North Korea, Bush said he wouldn't answer hypothetical questions. A few minutes later, he questioned a reporter's assertion that North Korea -- which tested medium- and long-range missiles earlier this week -- has increased its nuclear arsenal. 'I don't think we know that,' Bush said."

The AP (7/8, Hunt) in an article titled "Bush Expresses Frustration With Diplomacy" reports, "Asked if he felt a sense of urgency in dealing with North Korea and Iran, Bush said, 'I'm realistic about how things move in the world.' He said he wanted diplomatic rather than military solutions."

The New York Times (7/8, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "Bush by turns argued that Mr. Kim was untrustworthy -- he cited the country's violation of a 1994 accord with the Clinton administration -- and that the only path was to negotiate with him. But he rejected conducting one-on-one negotiations, insisting that he needed China and other neighbors at the table so that Mr. Kim did not make the United States to appear the blockade to an agreement." He rejected "the criticism by Democrats who say such talks would be the only way to break the logjam." Yet "in citing anew the need to team up with China and South Korea, Mr. Bush was skipping past the warnings of members of his own administration that neither country would agree to sanctions. Both are worried about a North Korean collapse, and both have continued supplying North Korea with food, energy and investment -- even while Japan and the United States try to turn off the spigot." He "has been careful never to criticize either country publicly. But he seemed to do so obliquely when he said, with some frustration in his voice."

The Financial Times (7/8, Daniel) reports, "Bush ruled out bilateral talks with North Korea on Friday, saying that the US would respond to Pyongyang's long-range missile tests through the United Nations Security Council." He "admitted that the diplomatic route could be 'slow and cumbersome' but said he was 'not going to get caught in a trap of sitting at a table alone with North Korea.' He added: 'What matters most of all is for Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice.'"

The Washington Times (7/8, Curl, 90K) notes, "Japan's Ambassador Kenzo Oshima said he wanted a vote on the draft today if possible, yet he and other diplomats said negotiations continued on the resolution. That raised the possibility that the decision to introduce the resolution was, in part, a negotiating tactic meant to win concessions from China and Russia."

DOJ_NMG_0039507

Bloomberg (7/8) notes Bush said the UN "must send a clear message to North Korea's leader to disarm and that 'rallying world opinion' takes time." He also "said next weekend's meeting of the Group of Eight leaders…will be an opportunity to send a clear message as Iran considers an incentives package aimed at curtailing the country's program. China and Russia have opposed harsh sanctions."

North Korea Will Return To Talks If Foreign Funds Unfrozen. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Demick, 958K) reports, "North Korea will return to talks on its nuclear program if the United States releases $24 million in frozen funds held in a bank in Macao, a senior diplomat said in an interview published today." The Times continues, "In the most explicit statement of its demands since a barrage of missile tests Wednesday, North Korea's deputy ambassador to the United Nations, Han Song Ryol, said his country was looking for a 'minimal gesture to restore trust.'"

US Supports Resolution Against North Korea, But Seeks Unified Voice. The Washington Post (7/8, A8, Lynch, 744K) reports, "Japan presented the Security Council on Friday with a tough revised draft resolution that would condemn North Korea's missile tests and ban states from supplying or buying goods or technology that could help Pyongyang upgrade its ballistic missile program or advance its nuclear weapons program. The resolution is backed by the United States and European allies, over Chinese and Russian concerns that it will exacerbate tensions in the region, according to U.N. diplomats." U.S. ambassador John R. Bolton said, "We are very pleased with this draft," but he added "that Washington and its allies are receptive to further negotiations with Beijing and Moscow." Still, "Bolton and others have expressed confidence they have the support of 13 of the council's 15 members for a binding resolution under Chapter Seven of the U.N. Charter, a provision that can be enforced by sanctions or, in some cases, the use of military force," and "U.S. and European officials remain confident that Russia and China will not veto the resolution." However, But China's ambassador, Wang Guangya, said that 'all options are open,'" and "warned the council in a closed-door meeting that a vote on the sanctions resolution would 'destroy' the prospects for a unified response."

The New York Times (7/8, Hoge, Onisho, 1.19M) adds, "The decision to put the resolution to a vote followed meetings Thursday and Friday involving Japan and the five permanent members of the Council…that failed to establish common ground." Bolton said "We want a resolution. It should be Chapter VII, and I think that's clear. The level of provocation engaged in by these North Korean missile launches warrants that, and we're going to proceed." The UPI (7/8) reports, "Bolton also said those countries that have 'leverage' over North Korea 'bear the responsibility' for bringing the country back to the negotiating table." Kyodo (7/8) adds that Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "confirmed to continue bilateral cooperation in efforts to have the international community issue a united, resolute, and clear message from the Security Council."

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, A4, Fairclough, King, 2.11M) notes, "President Bush, speaking in Chicago, said the whole effort going into the weekend was to get all members of the Security Council to say 'loud and clear, here are some red lines.'" However, the AFP (7/8, Aziakou) reports, "the US president noticeably did not make a public push for sanctions against Pyongyang, as the haggling went on at the UN."

AP (7/8, Wadhams) adds, "One senior U.S. official said it was unlikely that the draft would be voted on over the weekend, because diplomats want to give China, the North's main ally, time to talk to Pyongyang." Knight Ridder (7/8, Landay) reports that a "U.S. official, who sought anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said the United States was trying to persuade Japan not to call for an immediate vote in order to allow more diplomacy, including talks that a senior Chinese official is scheduled to hold in Pyongyang next week. Meanwhile, the Bush administration was refining a number of punitive measures it could take unilaterally, including pressuring foreign banks that deal with North Korea to stop doing so, said five U.S. officials, who requested anonymity."

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M) lists facts leading up to and about the current confrontation, and quotes several people about it, including Ivan Oelrich, of the Federation of American Scientists, who said, "I think that Kim Jong Il is insane. It's a very bad situation. It's unfortunate. It's very, very difficult to see how this is going to end nicely."

US Trying To Gain China's Support For North Korea Response. The New York Times (7/8, Hoge, Onisho, 1.19M) reports, Assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs "Christopher R. Hill, the top American negotiator with North Korea, was in Seoul, South Korea, trying to rally support in that region for a tough, unified response to the North's testing of seven missiles on Wednesday." He previously "met with Chinese officials, including Li Zhaoxing, the foreign minister, in Beijing before arriving in Seoul on Friday evening," but "it did not appear that he had made progress in persuading the Chinese to endorse sanctions." Next, "Hill is expected to meet South Korean officials over the weekend before flying to Tokyo and Moscow, but he gave an indication on Friday of the message he is expected to convey," saying, "We shouldn't have business as usual with a country that's been firing off missiles like this in this rather reckless way." The Financial Times (7/8, Turner, Fifield) notes, "Mr Hill can expect a slightly warmer reception during talks in South Korea on Saturday, although he will still encounter difficulties in persuading Seoul to take actions that would hurt Pyongyang financially."

DOJ_NMG_0039508

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, A4, Fairclough, King, 2.11M) adds, "President Bush, in a Chicago news conference Friday, touched on" China's reluctance to confront North Korea. While the missile tests put China in a tough spot, calling into question its policy of patient diplomacy and its economic support to encourage change in Pyongyang," it remains "far from clear" if they "will be enough to overcome Beijing's extreme reluctance to use pressure as a diplomatic tool." Still, "Calling the moment a critical test of China's new high-profile role on the international stage, the U.S. is urging Beijing to alter course and use its considerable leverage as North Korea's most important trading partner to get Pyongyang to return to talks on its nuclear program," and "has appealed to Beijing's pride, saying that it risks diminishing its standing on the world stage if it can't use its influence even to moderate the behavior of one of its closest neighbors."

The AP (7/8, Coleman) reports, "U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill held talks Saturday with Chun Young-woo, South Korea's top negotiator in international nuclear talks, on the North Korean missile tests." Hill said, "We will be much more effective if we can speak with one voice." Also, South Korea's Yonhap news agency quoted Han Song Ryol, deputy chief of North Korea's mission to the United Nations in New York, "as saying North Korea is willing to return to the six-nation talks if it is allowed to withdraw its money frozen in accounts of a bank blacklisted by the United States."

South Korea Brings Pressure To Bear On North. The New York Times (7/8, Hoge, Onisho, 1.19M) reports, "South Korea said Friday that it would go ahead with four-day, high-level ministerial talks with North Korea next week in Pusan, South Korea. But South Korea said that it would delay shipments of food and fertilizer to the North and that it had turned down an offer, made by North Korea several days before the launchings, to hold military talks."

The Financial Times (7/8, Turner, Fifield) adds, "South Korea is breaking with its usual placatory approach towards the North" and "moving away from its traditional stance of trying to avoid antagonising Pyongyang in a bid for longer-term reconciliation." However, "economic co-operation projects with the North will continue, meaning its actions will have little effect on Kim Jong-il's regime."

Japan Takes Threat From North Korea Seriously. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Wallace, 958K) reports, "North Korea's rockets may have landed short of Japan, but they still made a strong impression on a country with a collective loathing for its Stalinist neighbor." Japan's trade with North Korea has declined in recent years, so it has lost some leverage economically over North Korea. To make up for it, "Japan has focused on building a capability to shoot down incoming missiles, as well as proceeding with a faster, deeper integration of its military alliance with the United States." For example, "Japan's spending on missile defense is growing even as it cuts its overall defense budget. Research has given way to acceptance of the idea of having missiles on its soil. And restrictions on military exports were lifted to allow Japanese companies to share technology with U.S. firms."

WSJournal Argues Against Appeasing North Korea. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M) editorializes that it is "amazing…that serious people purport to believe…after 20 years of contrary evidence," that Kim Jong Il "wants direct talks with the U.S. leading to security guarantees, normalization of ties and an end to Pyongyang's economic isolation" and that "North Korea and the U.S. were headed" there "until the Bush crew started talking about the 'axis of evil' and pre-emption, thereby provoking Kim's current discontent." Actually, with a history of threats leading to concessions, "Kim is hardly crazy to conclude that if he just threatens enough, the U.S. will deliver what he wants sooner or later." We should not "repeat the mistakes of the past. And the worst mistake would be to reward Kim once again for violating his commitments by sending him more money and more diplomatic prestige."

Economists Say AIDS Should Be World's Top Priority. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M), Kimberley A. Stassel writes about Bjorn Lomborg. Stassel writes, "In 2004, he invited eight of the world's top economists -- including four Nobel Laureates -- to Copenhagen, where they were asked to evaluate the world's problems, think of the costs and efficiencies attached to solving each, and then produce a prioritized list of those most deserving of money. The well-publicized results (and let it be said here that Mr. Lomborg is no slouch when it comes to promoting himself and his work) were stunning. While the economists were from varying political stripes, they largely agreed. The numbers were just so compelling: $1 spent preventing HIV/AIDS would result in about $40 of social benefits, so the economists put it at the top of the list (followed by malnutrition, free trade and malaria). In contrast, $1 spent to abate global warming would result in only about two cents to 25 cents worth of good; so that project dropped to the bottom."

US, Russia To Create Civilian Nuclear Pact. The Washington Post (7/8, A1, Baker, 744K) reports, "President Bush has decided to permit extensive U.S. civilian nuclear cooperation with Russia for the first time, administration officials said yesterday, reversing decades of bipartisan policy in a move that would be worth billions of dollars to Moscow but could provoke an uproar in Congress." He "plans to announce his decision at a meeting with Putin in St. Petersburg next Saturday before the annual summit of leaders from the Group of Eight," and "Administration officials confirmed the president's decision yesterday only after it was first learned from outside nuclear experts privy to the situation." Although "Bush resisted such a move for years, insisting that Russia first stop building a nuclear power station for Iran near the Persian Gulf," U.S. officials have "concluded that President Vladimir Putin has become a more constructive partner in trying to pressure Tehran to give up any aspirations for nuclear weapons." The move "would be critical to Bush's plan to spread civilian nuclear energy to power-hungry countries because Russia would provide a place to send the used radioactive material," and, "Since Russia is already a nuclear state, such an agreement, once drafted, presumably would conform to the Atomic Energy Act and therefore would not require congressional approval."

DOJ_NMG_0039509

G-8 Talks To See Push For Energy Security Pact. The Washington Times (7/8, Stuhldreher, 90K) reports, "American and European officials are pressing for an agreement on energy security with Russia at the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg next week." Assistant energy secretary for international affairs Karen Harbert "stressed energy as a main theme for President Bush in the talks, including a bilateral summit with Russian President Vladimir Putin." She "insisted an agreement could be reached in St. Petersburg because the United States and Russia have the same interest in maximizing Russia's energy exports." However, "critics…say lack of a unified front from Europe on the issue and necessity for Russian cooperation on negotiations with Iran greatly limit the United States' leverage to push Mr. Putin for reform."

NYTimes Calls On G-8 Leaders To Demand Russian Democracy. The New York Times (7/8, 1.19M) editorializes, "the international acceptance that Mr. Putin craves will quickly disappear if the Kremlin continues its march toward what critics call a 'staged democracy instead of a real one." A "list of concerns has grown steadily during Mr. Putin's stewardship," including the disappearance of a free press, the lack of an independent judiciary, and government harassment of nongovernmental organizations. While "Mr. Putin's Russia is still far better than it was during the bleak decades of Communism," the G-8 leader "need to make it clear to Russia that membership demands not only the power of wealth but also a democratic government to go with it."

Investors Appear Willing To Overlook Russian Flaws In Return For Oil Shares. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, White, 2.11M) reports, "When President Bush meets with Vladimir Putin Friday, he will have a chance to express his concerns about the Russian leader's policies. The day before, investors will have a chance to do the same" with when "the $10 billion initial public offering by the state oil company, OAO Rosneft, is scheduled to be priced." However, "investors seem so eager for a piece of Russia's oil riches that they are willing to overlook Mr. Putin's curbs on democracy and heavy-handed economic policies." Still, James Fenkner, a Moscow fund manager, warns, "Betting against the Kremlin has been a very poor strategy over the last few years."

Gazprom Reports Record Profits. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Walters, Smith, 2.11M) reports," OAO Gazprom reported 2005 net profit of 311.1 billion rubles, or $10.98 billion based on last year's exchange rates -- higher than any Russian company has ever recorded -- on the back of rising natural-gas prices and its acquisition of Sibneft." However, "State-owned Gazprom's international ambitions have raised concerns that the company may be focusing on infrastructural projects that create headlines -- like new gas pipelines under the Baltic Sea to Germany and across Siberia to China -- at the expense of developing its vast reserves to meet future demand." Still, "Many people say rising revenues from oil and gas exports have allowed Russian politicians to assume a new assertiveness in world affairs."

Kremlin Curtails US-Financed Radio Broadcasts To Russians. The New York Times (7/8, Chivers, 1.19M) reports American-financed radio news broadcasts to Russia have been "sharply curtailed in recent months under legal pressure from the Russian government," according to Russian and American officials. The pressure has "knocked programs off the air in much of the country, limiting the Russian-language news broadcasts of Voice of America and Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty almost entirely" to Moscow and St. Petersburg. The suppression of the Western-financed news, which the Times notes began last year "weeks after a journalist for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty infuriated the Kremlin" by interviewing Chechen rebel leader Shamil Basayev, has been "indirect but highly effective," officials said. An official at the State Department told the Times Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other officials had "raised the issue with Russia, without result."

As Economy Rebounds, Russian Tourism Industry Declines. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, P1, Sesser, 2.11M) reports that as nations in Eastern Europe and the Baltic states "are now opening up to travelers," the number of tourists visiting Russia is declining. According to the Journal, travelers are "being driven away by a severe shortage of hotel rooms in major cities like Moscow and St. Petersburg, as well as apartment-rental scams; prices that are shockingly high for food, hotels and private transport; and by a visa system so draconian that you can literally be snatched off the street by the police if just one stamp on the papers you're required to carry with you at all times isn't in order." With Russia experiencing "an economic rebound driven by surging prices for its main exports, oil and gas," the Journal says tourism "simply isn't a top priority at the moment" for Russia's leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0039510

Racism "Sweeping Across Russia." The Boston Globe (7/8, Parfitt, 484K) reports that St. Petersburg is "an incubator for one of Russia's most pressing crises: violent racism." There has been "a wave of racist beatings and slayings sweeping across Russia," and the problem is "compounded by government missteps and inaction." Amnesty International this year "accused Russian police of consistently downplaying hate crimes throughout the country by classifying them as hooliganism."

Strategic Accord On Agenda For Kazakh President's Visit. The Washington Times (7/8, Sands, 90K) reports that in "the latest sign of the Bush administration's desire for closer ties with the huge, oil-rich Central Asian nation, despite lingering concerns over" resident Nursultan Nazarbayev 's "record on press freedoms and political liberties," Kazakh Foreign Minister Kasymzhomart Tokayev said "the United States and Kazakhstan hope to sign a wide-ranging 'strategic partnership' accord when President Nursultan Nazarbayev travels to Washington in September." Somewhat "by default, Kazakhstan has emerged as the critical U.S. ally in the region," but "closer ties are still complicated by aspects of Mr. Nazarbayev's rule, at a time when President Bush has put promoting democracy at the heart of his foreign policy agenda."

Pro-Moscow Parties Ascendant In Ukraine After Orange Revolution Bloc Collapses. The New York Times (7/8, Myers, 1.19M) reports that President Viktor A. Yushchenko of Ukraine "suffered a new political defeat on Friday when his fragile coalition collapsed in acrimony two weeks after it was formed." Now "His opponents, joined by a former ally of the president, announced a new coalition and pledged to nominate as prime minister the man Mr. Yushchenko ultimately defeated" in 2004. This "cast new doubts on Mr. Yushchenko's presidency, undermining his efforts to steer Ukraine on a course more closely entwined with Europe. He faces the possibility of an opposition government and prime minister opposed to his policy of joining the European Union, NATO and the World Trade Organization."

The Washington Post (7/8, A11, Finn, 744K) adds, "the unstable alliance that led the Orange Revolution" had "dissolved into familiar back-stabbing after its smallest member, the Socialists, broke ranks to get its own man elected to a parliamentary post." This "recent political turmoil and indecision in Ukraine have frustrated the European Union and the United States," which "had hoped to see the country well along in restructuring necessary to open it to Western institutions and greater foreign investment."

US Trade Representative Chastises Europe, Rising Economic Powers For WTO Trade Talk Deadlock. The Washington Times (7/8, Sparshott, 90K) reports that U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab "said the U.S. would not give up on global trade talks that have deadlocked, and she chastised India, Brazil and other rising economic powers for contributing too little to negotiations." She "faulted Europe for proposals she called 'vague' and 'full of loopholes.' But she also called on India, Brazil and China to acknowledge their growing economic clout, rather than seeking some of the same protection as the world's poorest nations."

Israel Hints It Might Free Palestinians If Soldier Is Freed. The Financial Times (7/8, Biedermann) reports, "The Israeli government, under increasing criticism for its Gaza offensive, indicated for the first time on Friday that it might be willing to free Palestinian prisoners in exchange for the release of a captured soldier," when "Public security minister Avi Dichter said jailed Palestinians could be freed as a 'reciprocal gesture' after the 19-year-old corporal Gilad Shalit was returned." Meanwhile, the European Union "levelled its harshest criticism at Israel yet," when Finnish prime minister Matti Vanhanen, whose country holds the EU's rotating presidency, said, "The EU condemns the loss of lives caused by disproportionate use of force by the Israeli Defence Forces and the humanitarian crisis it has aggravated."

The AP (7/8, El Deeb) adds, "Israel sent conflicting signals Friday on whether it would be willing to swap Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Shalit's release. Public Security Minister Avi Dichter suggested Israel could be ready to cut a deal that would include Israel freeing some Palestinian prisoners as a goodwill gesture," while "Officials close to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert later said Dichter's statement did not reflect the views of the government and that Israel insists on the soldier's unconditional release. However, the government did not issue a formal statement distancing itself from the minister." On the other side, "moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said he has won Israeli assurances that it would reciprocate for Shalit's release by freeing some prisoners, as well as Hamas politicians it has rounded up in recent days." The Washington Post (7/8, A8, Wilson, 744K) and New York Times (7/8, Erlanger, 1.19M) also mention Dichter's comments.

Israel Continues Push Into Gaza. NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) was the only network news program to cover the continuing violence in Gaza, reporting that Israel's push into Gaza "showed no signs of letting up," and "Palestinian militants are taking it into a nasty street fight." Israeli Chief of Staff Dan Halutz: "There is no excuse whatsoever to operate from Gaza against Israel once we left Gaza totally." Fletcher: "But the militants here say their aim is to draw the Israelis into urban war and they think they're succeeding."

DOJ_NMG_0039511

The Washington Post (7/8, A8, Wilson, 744K) reports that Israelis continue to make progress "so slowly against gunmen outwardly undaunted… many from the armed wing of the governing Hamas movement." The "Hamas forces were joined in large numbers by gunmen from the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the armed wing of the Fatah movement, which suffered the bulk of the day's casualties." Meanwhile "Israeli officials acknowledged Friday that ground operations in Gaza -- Israel's first in nearly a year since evacuating the area -- could last for some time." The New York Times (7/8, Erlanger, 1.19M) adds, "Israeli troops mostly held their ground, securing positions in northern Gaza taken on Thursday."

Israeli Incursion Unifies Palestinians. The New York Times (7/8, Erlanger, 1.19M), "There is a sudden, pressured unity of Palestinian factions, whose militants have been fighting one another for months in Gaza since Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority after winning at the polls. Even the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, and prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, have been thrown together in their inability to resolve the case of Corporal Shalit, which seems to be in the hands of Hamas leaders in exile. But few here expect this unity to last much beyond this current crisis.

Reporter Argues Progress Will Come Slowly. Eleanor Clift writes in a column in Newsweek (7/8), "Brinkmanship is a way of life in the Middle East," and we must "decipher whether the ongoing crisis is the first phase of the next war, or just another roadblock on the ever elusive path to peace." Part of the problem is, "as one Israeli journalist told us, this conflict is not about lines on a map; it's about intimacy" as well as "legitimacy and safety, and until both sides achieve some modicum of well being, or deterrence, there will be no peace." Still, former Prime Minister Shimon Peres, "does point to glimmers of progress. There are Arab voices speaking up for the first time against the taking of the Israeli soldier." Such "change in the Middle East is made slowly and painfully if it's made at all."

Tension Rises As Obrador Prepares Protests Of Mexican Election Count. The New York Times (7/8, Mckinley, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "Mexico hung in limbo on Friday, as tensions rose between those seeking a recount in the presidential race and those seeking to accept Felipe Calderón as the winner and move on." This "election has exposed deep divides in society, along class and regional lines" and "put the strength of the young democracy to its toughest test." Supporters of Andrés Manuel López Obrador "girded for fights in court and on the streets, beginning with a rally scheduled for Saturday," and "Mr. López Obrador, who has made a career of challenging elections, prepared to try to prove that the electoral system remained flawed." He "left little doubt at a news conference on Thursday that he was considering mass marches as a next step" should the court not order a recount."

The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Tobar, Boudreaux, 958K) adds, "Top aides to leftist candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador… edged close to demanding that the entire vote be nullified." His "camp revealed a two-part strategy to deny a victory to conservative Felipe Calderon:" They are "insisting on a recount" and alleging "that President Vicente Fox improperly influenced the vote," saying his "many TV and radio commercials touting his administration's successes were a thinly veiled attempt to aid his party's candidate." If accepted, that claim would require a new election. However, "Beyond the legal issue, it was uncertain whether" Mexico's electoral tribunal "would be willing to risk the political and social conflict sure to follow the nullification of a presidential election."

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Luhnow, Lyons, De Cordoba, 2.11M) notes that Obrador's "support among many may already be flagging, including his allies on the left. Three other political parties that took part in the election, including the country's former ruling party, the Institutional Revolutionary Party, said Friday that the vote was clean. Two of the parties extended their congratulations to winning conservative-party candidate Felipe Calderón." Also, "some senior members of his own party declined to RSVP" for the rallies. Meanwhile, "Obrador must hope the turnout is both massive and peaceful, or risk frightening middle-class Mexicans." Still, "Obrador's political skills and ability to mobilize protests are legendary."

Professor Says US Policies Are Causing Mexican Upheaval. Greg Grandin, a professor of history at New York University, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (7/8, 1.19M), "For the last decade and a half, Washington and its allies in Mexican politics, including Mr. Calderón, have promoted a free-trade economic model that has failed to deliver the prosperity its advocates promised." Now, "Mexico's current electoral crisis likewise is propelled by rural unrest — this time largely brought about by the anger of agricultural workers displaced by the North American Free Trade Agreement," and "these problems, combined with Mexican anger over the immigration debate in the United States, run the risk of souring relations between our two countries for the foreseeable future. But there is a way the Bush administration can help to set things on a different course." It "should not rush to embrace" Calderón as the election's victor." Instead, "the best thing the United States can do now is to support the push for a recount and to refrain from calling on Mr. López Obrador to concede." Finally, "the White House should renegotiate Nafta, allowing Mexico to set its own policy in support of its rural economy." Otherwise, the Bush administration could "help begin yet another season of Mexican upheaval."

DOJ_NMG_0039512

WPost Warms Both Candidates To Tread Cautiously. The Washington Post (7/8, A14, 744K) editorializes, "Mexico now enters a perilous political moment." Obrador "has called a mass demonstration today in Mexico City to protest what he calls the fraudulent election results," and "his own unproven allegations of 'manipulation' in the vote's tallying are worrying." Obrador "ought not use the power of his oratory, or the adulation of his followers, to nudge the country toward class warfare while he pursues a legal challenge that could last up to two months." That "would hurt Mexico's international reputation and its allure to investors." However, "Calderon should tread carefully, too," as, if he "is to succeed as the leader of Mexico and its 106 million people, he will need to convince the have-nots -- not just the haves who already believe it -- that they stand to gain from his policies."

Brazil And Venezuela Compete For Leadership Of South America. Knight Ridder (7/8, Chang) reports, "tensions are growing between" Brazil and Venezuela as "the two countries over who will lead South America." Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez "attempted to unite Latin America under his leadership" and "angered Brazilian officials with what they see as confrontational tactics." This "began in May when Bolivian President Evo Morales nationalized natural gas fields in Bolivia," but "the hostility deepened this week when Venezuela formally joined the South American trade bloc Mercosur, which includes Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay." Brazil "has long dominated" the bloc, "and Brazilian officials worry that Chavez will use the bloc to expand his power at Brazil's expense." Now "some Brazilian diplomats are questioning Chavez's value as an ally and are calling for a tougher approach," but, "despite the growing rift, Chavez and Lula remain political allies, at least publicly."

US Considering Further Restrictions Upon Cuban Diplomats. The Miami Herald (7/8, Bachelet, 323K) reports, "The Bush administration is said to be considering retaliation for what it claims are harassments that U.S. diplomats face in Havana, including the poisoning of family pets and the dumping of feces in U.S. diplomats' homes." An anonymous U.S. government official "said reprisals against the Cuban mission in Washington were 'always under consideration,'" and "Rep. Lincoln Díaz-Balart, R-Miami, is pushing a measure that would force diplomats from countries designated as state sponsors of terrorism -- including Cuba -- to register all their lobbying contacts in Congress, presumably making congressional offices more reluctant to talk to the Cubans." Still, "U.S. officials insist that the Cubans have it easy next to their U.S. counterparts in Havana," who can't buy many things locally and have no access to government officials.

China May Force Foreign Companies To Unionize. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Fong, 2.11M) reports, "China may force foreign companies to allow trade unions under a proposed legal amendment apparently aimed at union-free companies such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc." Under a law proposed by Wang Zhaoguo, China's top trade-union official and lawmaker, it would be "compulsory for foreign-funded companies to unionize." This is "likely to escalate tensions between the world's largest retailer and China, a crucial manufacturing source of its merchandise." While "Wal-Mart appeared to adopt a relatively conciliatory stance in China when it agreed to allow its Chinese workers to form unions if they wanted to" in 2004, All-China Federation of Trade Unions officials "complained that the company was obstructing union officials from recruiting Wal-Mart workers. ACFTU also threatened official reprisals such as fines and additional workplace inspections."

China To Prosecute Violations Of One-Child Policy. The Washington Post (7/8, A12, Pan, 744K) reports the Chinese government is preparing to prosecute "a blind peasant who exposed excesses by authorities" in enforcing the one-child policy in eastern China, where local officials were accused by residents of "forcing thousands of people to undergo sterilization or to abort pregnancies." The AP says the decision "highlights the growing clout of hard-liners in the party since President Hu Jintao took office three years ago."

Spain Finds First Case Of Avian Flu. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, 958K) reported that Spain's Agriculture Ministry said Friday that it "has recorded its first case of H5N1 bird flu" from "a water fowl in a marsh area outside the northern city of Vitoria." Already "outdoor poultry farming had been banned within six miles of marshlands where migratory birds tend to gather," and now "a protective area of two miles was declared around the area."

French Debate Over Immigration Heats Up. The New York Times (7/8, Smith, 1.19M) reports France's immigration debate "heated up Friday with opposition Socialists demanding to know how many undocumented immigrants the government plans to deport before the start of the new school year." Under recently tightened immigration rules, the government has "begun tracking down families lacking residency papers through children registered at French schools, vowing to expel them during the summer holidays." The new policy has "already led to a handful of deportations and threatened to split families," but in order to "assuage critics and the news media, the government said in mid-June that it would grant residency papers to a limited number of families on a case-by-case basis." However, the Times says that has "brought a crush of anxious immigrants to government offices around the country hoping that they might be granted residence papers before the August deadline."

DOJ_NMG_0039513

Mittal To Build Steel Plant In India. The New York Times (7/8, Gentleman, Timmons, 1.19M) reports the chief of Dutch steel Mittal, Lakshmi Mittal visited India Friday where he announced plans to invest "as much as $9 billion in a steel plant in an impoverished eastern area of the country." The plant would be one of India's largest, with a capacity of 12 million tons a year, the Times notes.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Plot On N.Y. Tunnels Alleged."
"Ultimate Penalty In Graft Case."
"Class Of '76 Got Chatty."
"In Arabs' Eyes, The US Is On Trial, Not Hussein."
"Leftist To Seek Recount In Mexican Election."
"Saluting A Marine And Angels Fan."

New York Times:
"General Faults Marine Response To Iraq Killings."
"3 Held Overseas In Plan To Bomb New York Target."
"An Internet Lifeline For Troops In Iraq And Loved Ones At Home."
"A Drive To Root Out The Resurgent Taliban."
"That's What Friends In High Places Are For."
"Here's Proof That New Yorkers Like To Complain."

Washington Post:
"US And Russia To Enter Civilian Nuclear Pact."
"Plot To Attack N.Y. Foiled."
"Meeting Danger Well South Of The Border."
"Signs Of Detainees' Planning Alleged."
"Va. Police Chief Apologizes For Raid Of Homeless Camp."

Washington Times:
"Missile Defense 'Modest,' Says Bush."
"FBI Foils New York Terror Plot."
"Britain's 2 Minutes Of Silence Honor Transit Bomb Victims On Anniversary."
"House Told Criminals Swelling Alien Tide."
"Israel Pursues Palestinians With Warplanes And Tanks."
"Writer's Suit Throws Book At 'Deep Throat.'"

Detroit Free Press:
"GM TO Kerkorian: We'll Do It Our Way."
"New York City Tunnels Targeted."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Voter ID Law On Hold."
"Attack On N.Y. Tunnels Thwarted."
"Political Hand-Holding."
"Heavy Hitters Went To Bat For Austin."

Dallas Morning News:
"Calderón: No Walls Needed."
"For Mayor, Split Image Intact."
"Report May Conquer Fear Of Flying With Pets."
"Plot To Hit NYC Trains Disrupted."

Houston Chronicle:
"Moving Day On Discovery."
"Texas' Patient Care Law At Hub Of Local Dispute."
"Fighting For A Texas Treasure."
"Haditha Inquiry Points To Brass."
"8 Suspected In Plot To Bomb NYC Train Tunnels."
"DeLay Back In DC? Never Say Never."
"Air Is More Breathable In One East End Area; Others Worsen."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: New York Bomb Plot; London Bombing Anniversary; Haditha Investigation; North Korea Missiles; General Motors Partnership; Jobs Report; Artificial Blood Experiment; Shuttle Astronauts.
CBS: New York Bomb Plot; London Bombing Anniversary; Haditha Investigation; North Korea Missiles; GM & Corporate Pensions; Medicare Drug Plan;
NBC: New York Bomb Plot; London Bombing Anniversary; North Korea Missiles; Shuttle Docks At Space Station; Gaza Invasion; Oil Prices; Haditha Investigation; Jobs Report; General Motors Partnership.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:
PRESIDENT BUSH – No schedule available.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY -- No schedule available.

US Senate: -- No events scheduled.

US House: -- No events scheduled.

Other. ALL DAY
July 6 - 8. AIRLINE COLLECTIBLES SHOW _ Sellers, buyers, pilots, engineers, flight afficianados, historians, authors and airline memorabilia collectors gather for the Airliners International 2006. Highlights: 8:30 p.m. - 10 p.m. Keynote address by Igor Sikorsky, Jr., son of Igor Sikorsky, Sr. Topic: ``Memories of an Aviation Pioneer." Location: Sheraton Premiere Hotel at Tysons Corner, 8661 Leesburg Pike, Vienna. Contacts: Marc Wojno, 703-803-1412

DOJ_NMG_0039514

July 7 - 11. FOLKLIFE FESTIVAL _ Second session of the Smithsonian Folklife Festival, focusing on life in the Canadian province of Alberta, evening concerts celebrating African American music from New Orleans, Latino music of Chicago, basketweavers from a wide variety of geographical regions, and others. Location: On the Mall between 7th and 14th Streets, NW. Contacts: Becky Haberacker, 202-633-5183

July 7 - 8. 8:45 a.m. YOUNG ONSET PARKINSON CONVENTION _ The National Parkinson Foundation hosts the fourth annual Young-Onset Parkinson Network Convention. Presentations and workshops on research, medical treatments, support and networking for young Parkinson's patients. Highlights: 11:45 a.m. Luncheon keynote by Cherie Zaun, former LPGA pro golfer, diagnosed in 2003. Location: Hyatt Regency-Reston, 1800 President St., Reston. Contacts: Christie Lowey, 305-448-2930

July 8 - 12. CANCER CONFERENCE _ The International Union Against Cancer and the American Cancer Society hold the 2006 World Cancer Conference, international cancer and tobacco control conferences. Highlights: 6 p.m. - 7:30 p.m. Plenary session: ``Bridging the Gap: The Global Cancer Challenge." With Barbara Bush, former first lady; former president George H. Bush Sr., C-Change; Sally West Brooks, USA board chair, American Cancer Society; John Seffrin, past president, UICC; Franco Cavalli, president, UICC; Harmon Eyre, program chair, UICC World Cancer Congress 2006. Location: Washington Convention Center, Mt. Vernon Square. Contacts: Becky Steinbeck, 678-613-6892

2 p.m. INDIA-HIV/AIDS _ Activists hold a rally to urge India not to adopt new legislation that would limit affordable AIDS medications worldwide. Location: Indian Embassy, 2107 Massachusetts Ave., NW. Contacts: Dr. Vineeta Gupta, 202-789-0432

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, JULY 8, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Bush Says Court "Tacitly" Supports Administration Decision To Use Guantanamo ... 3
Stewart Seeks Non-Prison Sentence ... 3
Hastert Says US Must Remain Steadfast In War On Terror ... 4
Filmmaker Sues US Over Iraq Detention ... 4
Italy Angered By Investigation Of 2003 CIA Abduction ... 4
London Marks First Anniversary Of Terrorist Bombings ... 4

Homeland Response:
FBI Foils New York Terror Plot ... 5
Chertoff Says Intelligence Sharing Is Improving ... 6
Draft Legislation Would Give FBI Internet-Tapping Access ... 6
Chertoff Touts Federal Antiterrorism Funding ... 6
New York Area To Receive More Antiterror Funds ... 7
American Al Qaeda Member Criticizes US Troops ... 7
US Passenger Detained After Trying To Break Into Delta Cockpit ... 7
Pittsburgh Mosque Leaders Decry FBI Raid ... 7
Port Authority To Takeover Construction Of WTC Memorial ... 8
Louisiana Delegation Requests Extension Of Federal Coverage Of Debris Removal Costs ... 8

War News:
Iraqi Troops Clash With Shiite Militia, Arrest A "Significant" Suspect ... 8
Pentagon Will Buy New Materiel For War ... 8
US Works To Rebuild "Fragile" Iraqi Army ... 9
Marine Officers May Have Been Negligent In Haditha Probe ... 9
Ex-GI Alleged Rapist Case Goes To Grand Jury ... 9
American Al Qaeda Member Criticizes US Troops ... 9
US Treatment Of Saddam Resonates In Arab World ... 10
US Forces Face Hurdles In Battling "Resurgent Taliban." ... 10
US Coalition Accused Of Attacking Afghan Legislators Family ... 10
Cheney Praises Troops In Speech At Norfolk Naval Station ... 10
Army Discharges 1,000 For Personality Disorders ... 10
Internet Allows US Troops To Keep In Touch With Families ... 10

DOJ:
Fitzgerald's DC Future Uncertain ... 10

Corporate Scandals:
SEC Divided On "Spring Loading" Of Options ... 11
Nicor To Pay $10 Million Fine To Settle SEC Accounting Probe 11
Asyst Technologies Gets Delisting Letter From Nasdaq ... 11

Criminal Law:
Abramoff Had Seven Appointments At White House ... 11
US To Probe Rape Allegations Against New Orleans Investigator ... 12
Louisiana Man Pleads Guilty To Katrina Fraud ... 12
Federal Prosecutors Seek Prison Time For Philadelphia Mayor's Former Law Partner ... 12
Jefferson Hires High Profile Defense Advisor ... 13

Civil Law:
Senators Question Settlement With Boeing ... 13
Columnist Questions Justice Department Arguments In Deficit Reduction Act Suit ... 13

Civil Rights:
Judge Approves Settlement To End Hollywood, FL, Synagogue Dispute ... 13
DOJ Report Faults Arkansas County Jail ... 13
NAACP Pushes For Quick Renewal Of Voting Rights Act ... 14
Judge Postpones Trial In Florida Voting Rights Case ... 14
World Cup Highlights Global Sex Trafficking Problem ... 14
Justice Kennedy Backs San Diego's Cross Stand ... 14
Georgia Judge Rules Voter ID Requirement Violates State Constitution ... 15

Antitrust:
General Motors Board Votes To Consider Alliance With Renault And Nissan ... 15
Judge Mulls Modifications To Terms Of Two Phone Mergers ... 15
Suit Alleges Price-Fixing Conspiracy In Rubber Industry ... 16

Environment:
US Allows BP To Delay Alaska Testing ... 16
US, Ohio Sue Fostoria Over Sewage Violations ... 16
Green Attitudes Spread To Faiths' Mainstream ... 16
Lawyer Advocates Giving Most Environmental Questions To State, Local Levels ... 16
NYTimes Emphasizes Importance Of Environmental Case ... 17

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
US Attorney Shelves Cases After FBI Informers' Misconduct ... 17

SF Chronicle Argues For Dismissal Of Reporters' Subpoenas... 17
Clark County, WA, Joins Anti-Gang Task Force 18
Hatch Plays Role In Freeing Music Producer In Dubai Jail For Cocaine Possession 18
Columnist Criticizes UN Gun Control Program..... 18

Immigration:

Bush Reiterates Support For Comprehensive Immigration Reform 18
Border Security Hearing In Texas Highlights Terrorist Threat..... 19
ICE Official Calls For More Criminal Prosecution Of Employers. 19
Former Agents Plead Guilty To Accepting Bribes To Release Immigrant Smugglers..... 20

Congress-Administration:

Bush Takes Message To US Public 20
Roberts Said To Be More Influential Than Kennedy On Court ... 21
House Agenda Criticized By Moderates As Not Helpful To Holding Majority 21
Discovery Crew Supplies Space Station, Checks Shuttle For Damage 21
Information On Sailors Accidentally Exposed..... 22
Columnist Condemns Effort To Limit Judicial "Junkets." 22
House GOP Leaders Said Not To Be Serious About Pork-Barrel Spending..... 22
Deficit Expected To Fall Below $300 Billion With "Surging Tax Revenues."..... 23
Specter Seeks Renewal Of Funds For Pennsylvania Foster Care Program 23
Medicare Warning Blamed For Some Companies Ending Drug "Giveaways." 23
LATimes Muses On Bush's Aging 23

Other News:

Jobs Report Seen As Sign Economy Slowing..... 23
Oil Prices Climbing..... 24
Election Experts Say Democrats Will Seek To Nationalize Congressional Elections 24
Senator Clinton Campaigns For Angelides..... 24
Gore To Speak To Wal-Mart Managers 24
Edwards Urges Regulation Of "Payday Lenders" In Iowa 24
Biden Defends Remark About Indian-Americans 25
Democratic Divisions Over War Revealed In Primary Contests.. 25
Lieberman's Stance On Iraq Is Not His Only Liability For Liberal Voters..... 25
Steele Continues To Raise More Than Cardin..... 25
Harris To Undergo Surgery..... 25
DeLay Seen As Possible Candidate In TX22 25
LATimes Urges Americans To Save More 26
Pastor Allied With The President And Governor Bush Calls Islam A "Dangerous…Cult." 26
Veterans Issues At Forefront In Minnesota Races 26
Bush Stresses Patience, Diplomatic Approach To North Korea . 26
Economists Say AIDS Should Be World's Top Priority 29
US, Russia To Create Civilian Nuclear Pact..... 29
G-8 Talks To See Push For Energy Security Pact 29
Strategic Accord On Agenda For Kazakh President's Visit..... 30
Pro-Moscow Parties Ascendant In Ukraine After Orange Revolution Bloc Collapses 31
US Trade Representative Chastises Europe, Rising Economic Powers For WTO Trade Talk Deadlock 31
Israel Hints It Might Free Palestinians If Soldier Is Freed..... 31
Tension Rises As Obrador Prepares Protests Of Mexican Election Count..... 32
Brazil And Venezuela Compete For Leadership Of South America..... 33
US Considering Further Restrictions Upon Cuban Diplomats..... 33
China May Force Foreign Companies To Unionize..... 33
Spain Finds First Case Of Avian Flu..... 33
French Debate Over Immigration Heats Up 33
Mittal To Build Steel Plant In India 33

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 33

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 34
Other 34

DOJ_NMG_0039517

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Says Court "Tacitly" Supports Administration Decision To Use Guantanamo. The New York Times (7/8, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports, "In his most detailed comments to date on the Supreme Court's rejection of his decision to put detainees on trial before military commissions, President Bush said Friday that the court had tacitly approved his use of the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba." Bush said, "It didn't say we couldn't have done -- couldn't have made that decision, see? … They were silent on whether or not Guantánamo -- whether or not we should have used Guantánamo. In other words, they accepted the use of Guantánamo, the decision I made." His "remarks put a favorable spin on a ruling that has been widely interpreted as a rebuke of the administration's policies in the war on terror." The Times states, "The question of whether Mr. Bush had properly used Guantánamo Bay to house detainees was not at issue in the case. At issue was whether the president could unilaterally establish military commissions with rights different from those allowed at a court-martial to try detainees for war crimes."

The Boston Globe (7/8, Klein, 484K) in its coverage of Bush's remarks about North Korea also reports, "Bush said he drew no broader implications from last week's Supreme Court ruling striking down the military commissions he ordered to try detainees held in the US Navy base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Although the high court ruled that Bush had overstepped his authority, the president quickly noted that the court was silent on the question of whether Guantanamo is an appropriate place to hold suspected terrorists." Bush said, "The Supreme Court said that in this particular case, when it comes to dealing with illegal combatants who were picked up off a battlefield and put in Guantanamo for the sake of our security, that we should work with the United States Congress to develop a way forward. … They accepted the use of Guantanamo, the decision I made."

The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Wallsten, 958K) in its article on Bush's new strategy to connect with the public also notes, "Answering a question about his authority to try detainees before military tribunals, Bush reiterated his belief that the Geneva Convention does not apply to detainees being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." Bush's "comments appeared to contradict last week's 5-3 ruling by the Supreme Court," He "said Friday that he was 'willing to abide by the ruling.' But coming as administration officials continue to examine the ruling, Bush's comments were another indication that the White House was moving toward a very narrow interpretation of the court decision." But Bush critics "have insisted the ruling means the Geneva Convention covers all detainees at Guantanamo and, possibly, Al Qaeda leaders being held in undisclosed locations."

Documents Indicate Gitmo Suicides Part Of Wider Plot. In a front page article, the Washington Post (7/8, A1, White, 744K) reports three suicides at the US detention facility at Guantanamo Bay last month "may have been part of a broader plot by detainees who were using confidential lawyer-client papers and envelopes to pass handwritten notes their guards could not intercept," according to documents filed Friday in federal court by government lawyers. Detainees were able to "hide documents in their cells—including instructions on how to tie knots and a classified US military memo regarding cell locations of detainees and camp operational matters at Guantanamo—by keeping the materials in envelopes labeled as lawyer-client communications," the Post reports. After the suicides on June 10, investigators found the notes "written on the back of notepaper stamped 'Attorney Client Privilege,'" government officials said. In response to the discoveries, military commanders have suspended allowing detainees to have paper provided by defense lawyers. Government lawyers have also asked a judge on the US District Court for the District of Columbia to allow them to assemble "filter teams" to "scour more than 1,100 pounds of documents seized by investigators, some of which are protected by lawyer-client privilege and would usually be off-limits to authorities."

Stewart Seeks Non-Prison Sentence. The AP (7/8, Neumeister) reports, "Attorneys for U.S. civil rights lawyer Lynne Stewart have asked a judge to spare her a prison sentence for her conviction in a terrorism case despite a recommendation by the federal probation department that she serve 30 years." The AP continues, "The attorneys filed papers Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan asking that the judge take into consideration Stewart's bout with breast cancer, her age, 66, and three decades of selfless service as a lawyer in sentencing her on Sept. 25." The AP adds, "Stewart was convicted in February 2005 of providing material support to terrorists by releasing the message of a notorious jailed client, Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman. She also was convicted of defrauding the government and making false statements. … Abdel-Rahman, a blind cleric from Egypt, was convicted of seditious conspiracy for his advisory role in a plot to blow up five New York City landmarks, including the United Nations in 1995." The AP notes, "One of Stewart's lawyers, Elizabeth Fink, called a U.S. Probation Department pre-sentencing report that recommended Stewart serve the maximum possible sentence of 30 years 'draconian, inhumane and ludicrous.' … Stewart was diagnosed with breast cancer last year, and her sentencing has been delayed while she undergoes treatment."

DOJ_NMG_0039518

Hastert Says US Must Remain Steadfast In War On Terror. In a front page report, the Washington Times (7/8, A1, Seper, 90K) says House Speaker Dennis Hastert called the "interruption" of a terrorist plot targeting New York's train tunnels "yet another reminder that we must remain steadfast in our fight against terrorism." In the past few months, Hastert noted that law-enforcement officials "have thwarted several terror plots including threats against Chicago's Sears Tower and federal buildings in Miami, and they have disrupted a terror cell in Canada. House Republicans will continue to provide the brave men and women fighting to win the global war on terror the resources they need to finish the job."

Filmmaker Sues US Over Iraq Detention. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Weinstein, 958K) reports a Los Angeles filmmaker "who was imprisoned in Iraq for 55 days sued Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and other high-ranking military officials Friday, alleging that his detention violated his civil rights, the law of nations and the Geneva Convention." Mark D. Rosenbaum, legal director of the ACLU of Southern California, said the suit is "the first civil action challenging the constitutionality of the US government's detention and hearing policies in Iraq." Cyrus Kar, a US citizen and Navy veteran, was freed a year ago, just days after the American Civil Liberties Union sued seeking his release. The new lawsuit, filed in federal court in Los Angeles, seeks damages for Kar and broad changes in the government's detention policies. On Friday, a Pentagon spokesman said the Defense Department "does not discuss matters under litigation until the court has rendered a decision."

Italy Angered By Investigation Of 2003 CIA Abduction. The New York Times (7/8, Grey, Povoledo, 1.19M) reports on an investigation by Italian police into the suspected kidnapping by the US Central Intelligence Agency of a radical Egyptian cleric in 2003. According to the Times, the recent "disclosure that the police were eavesdropping on the [Italian] intelligence service is the latest twist in a case that has riveted Italy." The kidnapping of the cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, by intelligence agents "abruptly cut short a criminal investigation of the imam by Italian prosecutors." The prosecutors then "struck back, with an investigation of both American and Italian intelligence agents whom they accuse of carrying out the abduction." Wiretapped telephone calls "allowed prosecutors to make the case that Italian intelligence had advance knowledge of the abduction of Mr. Nasr, who is also known as Abu Omar—something the Italian government had steadfastly denied," the Times writes. Earlier this week, prosecutors arrested two Italian intelligence officials, "charging that they had known about the kidnapping and helped plan it."

London Marks First Anniversary Of Terrorist Bombings. Londoners Friday marked the first anniversary of the terrorist bombings that struck the city's transit system, killing 52 people. The CBS Evening News (7/7, story 2, 2:24, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "Terror experts in this country have been studying the London bombings closely to try to prevent a similar attack here." CBS (Stewart) added, "No terrorist incident since 9/11 has been studied as much for clues since the London subway attack and its lessons are now clear. The suicide bombers acted on their own without any known al-Qaeda assistance and built their bombs from local store-bought items. New York, with the nation's largest subway system, responded immediately by beginning to monitor stores selling the same items like simple hydrogen peroxide."

NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 2, 2:00, Friesen, 9.87M) reported, "The police have, they say, foiled three, possibly four terrorist plots since last year, have 70 active investigations underway and have 1,200 suspicious people under surveillance. But one year later, no one has been arrested in connection with July 7." However, NBC notes that "apart from a few visible signs of tighter security, daily life has changed little."

The Financial Times (7/8, Burns) reports tributes were given to the dead, "while senior police warned the country not to lower its guard against the threat of further attack." Sir Ian Blair, commissioner of the Metropolitan police, told the BBC he had "no doubt there would be further attacks, and the security services were doing all they could to prevent them." Earlier this week, police said they were investigating an "unprecedented number of plots and had thwarted at least three attacks since last July." However, the Times notes that there are "continuing gaps in firm intelligence and government concerns that some suspects had escaped the intensified surveillance and disruption operations led by MI5, the Security Service."

Similarly, the New York Times (7/8, Cowell, 1.19M) reports that while the victims were being remembered Al Jazeera broadcast "images of Ayman al-Zawahiri, the No. 2 commander of Al Qaeda, suggesting that the group was trying to claim responsibility for the attacks." In new video excerpts released Friday, Zawahiri "specifically claimed that two of the bombers— [Shehzad] Tanweer and Mohammad Sidique Khan, the supposed ringleader of the attacks—had prepared for the bombings at a Qaeda camp." Both men were known to have visited Pakistan before July 7, but the Times says Zawahiri's remarks were "the closest that Al Qaeda has come to a direct claim that it planned and supervised the bombings." The Washington Times/AP (7/8, A1, Dodds) also reports in a front page article that Zawahiri's comment "was the first claiming they had been taught by al Qaeda."

DOJ_NMG_0039519

However, the AP (7/8, Mortimer, Sinan) reports a security analyst at the London think-tank Chatham House, Bob Ayers, said the claim "contradicted the British police finding that there was no evidence linking the four London bombers to al-Qaida." Ayers said Zawahiri's statement "means the investigation was either wrong, or they had identified links, but were reluctant to reveal them."

"Hybrid" Approach Urged Dealing With Security Issues. Weekly Standard senior editor Christopher Caldwell writes in the Financial Times (7/8) that the British and Dutch governments have "abruptly changed their approach" to so-called "security-and-identity issues" by "confusing area where citizenship, immigration, culture and national security meet." The Netherlands, Caldwell says, "appears to be abandoning the hard line at the very moment Britain picks it up. However, "the language of hard lines and soft ones has proved inadequate to describe the problems of regulating immigration, fighting extremism and protecting culture. Both Britain and the Netherlands are trying to combine persuasion and enforcement. The hybrid systems that result are not particularly elegant or logical. But they may be the only way to fight a problem that is not always built on logic," Caldwell concludes.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Foils New York Terror Plot. News that the FBI has thwarted a terrorist plot to attack transit tunnels under New York City' commuter trains led all three nightly news broadcasts, receiving more than ten minutes of coverage. ABC World News Tonight (7/7, lead story, 2:45, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported Mark Mershon, Assistant Director FBI, said, "This was a plot that would have involved martyrdom, explosives, and certain of the tubes that connected New Jersey with lower Manhattan." ABC (Ross) added, "Other law enforcement officials tell ABC News the plotters had already accessed detailed blueprints and drawings of the PATH tunnel, available on the internet. Like the bombers who blew themselves up in London a year ago today, the plan was to load backpacks full of explosives. All 15 to 20 bombers were to board one car and detonate together when the train was under the river, according to officials." Officials told ABC News the plot was "uncovered more than a year ago by US and Canadian intelligence agents watching a jihadist internet chat room," where the suspects "communicated freely, thinking that no one could trap them."

The CBS Evening News (7/7, lead story, 2:40, Smith, 7.66M) reported that although New York City Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said the plot was "in the planning stage," US counterterrorism officials "said they were so concerned about a potential attack they contacted authorities in Beirut who in late April arrested the plot's so-called mastermind 31-year-old Assem Hammoud, a Lebanese national, at his home."

In a front page article, the New York Times (7/8, A1, Baker, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports officials said the main subject of the investigation, Assem Hammoud, would "likely be tried in Lebanon and that no charges were pending against him in the United States." The Washington Post (7/8, A1, Hsu, Wright, 744K) says two other suspects reportedly arrested in connection with the plot, authorities provided "few details," but an FBI official said "one was Canadian but was not being held in Canada."

The AP (7/8, Milton) reports, "Eight suspects—including an al-Qaeda loyalist arrested in Lebanon and two others in custody elsewhere—had hoped to pull off the attack in October or November," federal officials said. Investigators are "working with their counterparts in six other countries," but the other five suspects remain at large, the AP notes. CNN (7/8) reports on its Web site that the FBI's Mershon said six countries participated in the investigation, including Canada, Pakistan and Iraq. "The real story here is the symphony of cooperation and coordination not just in the New York-New Jersey metropolitan area, but frankly, around the world with a number of intelligence and investigative services," Mershon said.

Severity Of Threat Disputed By Officials. NBC Nightly News (7/7, lead story, 4:30, Williams, 9.87M) said "not all the authorities we spoke to today agree on the severity of the threat," but one American official "says Hammoud was at one point in contact with associates of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." In a front page article, the New York Times (7/8, A1, Baker, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports law enforcement authorities said the plan "presented a genuine threat even though it was in its earliest stages and no attack was imminent." Similarly, the Washington Post (7/8, A1, Hsu, Wright, 744K) reports in a front page article that authorities "said there was no evidence that the plotters had taken any actions, such as buying explosives or sending money," casting "doubt on the feasibility of initial reports."

Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (7/8, A1, Meyer, Barry, 958K) reports in a front page article, "Mershon's contention that the suspects were about to enter an operational phase of the plot is a matter of some dispute." Sen. Charles Schumer (D-NY) said in a televised interview that the alleged co-conspirators were just "talking to one another" when authorities intervened. And New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said, "There is not one shred of evidence that the plan continued beyond the planning stage. New Yorkers should feel safe." By late Friday, the Times says there were "some discrepancies about whether any of the alleged plotters had ever been to the United States." At the news conference, Mershon said the FBI believed that none of the principal players had visited the country. But the Lebanese Broadcasting Corp. issued a report Friday saying Hammoud had traveled to New York and New Jersey "on several occasions using a Canadian passport to survey possible targets." Later, an FBI official confirmed that Hammoud had visited the United States at least once. But, the official added, "We have no reason to believe it had anything to do with this plot."

DOJ_NMG_0039520

The Financial Times (7/8, Sevastopulo, Grimes) reports New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg said there was "not one shred of evidence that [the plot] had proceeded beyond the planning stage." Ray Kelly, the New York police commissioner, said it had "not reached anything close to being operational", while stressing that "New York remains in the crosshairs of the terrorists."

And the New York Daily News (7/8, A1, Meek, 729K) today profiles the plot's suspected mastermind, Assem Hammoud, who the newspaper says "lived the life of an international playboy -- on orders from Al Qaeda."

US Sought To Keep News Of Plot Quiet. The New York Times (7/8, A1, Baker, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports a senior security official in Beirut said Hammoud's arrest in April "came under an Interpol order." Lebanese authorities wanted to publicize his arrest at the time, the official said, but American authorities "sought to keep the issue quiet, believing the investigation would lead to other information." The Los Angeles Times (7/8, A1, Meyer, Barry, 958K) adds, Assistant FBI Director Mark Mershon said authorities had not planned to disclose Hammoud's arrest or other elements of the plot disruption, and that the "unwanted publicity" had "greatly complicated" efforts to catch the five remaining fugitives. Similarly, the Washington Post (7/8, A1, Hsu, Wright, 744K) says Mershon "criticized the leak to the media, saying it upset cooperation between the United States and six foreign governments assisting in the investigation."

Chertoff Says Intelligence Sharing Is Improving. The AP (7/8, Milton) reports Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said, "It was never a concern that this would actually be executed." The Boston Globe (7/8, Bender, 484K) reports Chertoff told reporters after an event in Boston, "We don't wait until someone has lit the fuse before stepping in. It is a reminder of the fact that this type of threat remains with us. We cannot drop our guard." Chertoff also "hailed" the foiled plot as an example of "how law enforcement and intelligence communities have improved their ability to monitor potential terrorist plots" well before they enter the operational stage. "Intelligence is better and intelligence sharing is better. We are able to detect more things that are going on. Sometimes that causes skeptics to say the people you are arresting aren't really serious," the secretary told reporters. However, the Globe says the plan was described by officials of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey as "unfeasible and by some terrorism specialists as amateurish, in part for discussing it in public Internet chat rooms." The Boston Herald (7/8, Wedge, Ross, 220K) also reports on Chertoff's comments to reporters in Boston.

Draft Legislation Would Give FBI Internet-Tapping Access. CNET News (7/8, McCullagh) reports, "The FBI has drafted sweeping legislation that would require Internet service providers to create wiretapping hubs for police surveillance and force makers of networking gear to build in backdoors for eavesdropping, CNET News.com has learned." CNET continues, "FBI Agent Barry Smith distributed the proposal at a private meeting last Friday with industry representatives and indicated it would be introduced by Sen. Mike DeWine, an Ohio Republican, according to two sources familiar with the meeting. … The draft bill would place the FBI's Net-surveillance push on solid legal footing. At the moment, it's ensnared in a legal challenge from universities and some technology companies that claim the Federal Communications Commission's broadband surveillance directives exceed what Congress has authorized." CNET adds, "The FBI claims that expanding the 1994 Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act is necessary to thwart criminals and terrorists who have turned to technologies like voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP. … 'The complexity and variety of communications technologies have dramatically increased in recent years, and the lawful intercept capabilities of the federal, state and local law enforcement community have been under continual stress, and in many cases have decreased or become impossible,' according to a summary accompanying the draft bill. … Complicating the political outlook for the legislation is an ongoing debate over allegedly illegal surveillance by the National Security Administration--punctuated by several lawsuits challenging it on constitutional grounds and an unrelated proposal to force Internet service providers to record what Americans are doing online. One source, who asked not to be identified because of the sensitive nature of last Friday's meeting, said the FBI viewed its CALEA expansion as a top congressional priority for 2007."

Chertoff Touts Federal Antiterrorism Funding. The Boston Globe (7/8, Daniel, 484K) reports Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff marked the one- year anniversary of the London terrorist bombings by riding the MBTA's Green Line Friday where he touted federal aid to combat terrorist threats. At the same time, he cautioned that no one can guarantee security. "I would not hesitate…to get on the subway, here or all over the country," Chertoff said. "We should not be bullied out of getting on the train. We shouldn't give terrorists the idea that they can scare us off our trains. I have no hesitation in saying this is a safe mode of transportation. On the other hand, we do live with a certain amount of risk in life," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0039521

The Boston Herald (7/8, Wedge, Ross, 220K) says Chertoff "visited Boston yesterday to talk up the administration's focus on protecting the nation's railways, noting that Boston received $9.6 million for rail security in 2006 - the fourth-highest amount in the nation." The newspaper also calls Chertoff's " strong remarks on improving rail safety" a "departure from comments he made last year, when he downplayed train threats and insisted the department's main focus should remain on protecting airlines."

New York Area To Receive More Antiterror Funds. The New York Times (7/7, Lipton, 1.19M) reports the New York City metropolitan area will receive $53.8 million in federal antiterrorism grants "to protect its rail, bus and ferry systems, a 25 percent increase over last year," the Department of Homeland Security announced Friday. The additional money "may curtail some of the criticism" of a 40 percent cut announced on May 31 in a separate, larger antiterrorism grant program, the AP writes. The move was welcomed by New York Senator Chuck Schumer, who said, "The Department of Homeland Security is finally putting some of its money where its mouth is and seems to have realized that New York City's subways and buses remain under constant threat."

American Al Qaeda Member Criticizes US Troops. CNN (7/8) reports on its Web site California-born al Qaeda member Adam Gadahn spoke out "against US troops" on a recently released video. The video deals primarily with the London subway bombings of 2005, but includes a five-minute speech from Gadahn, in English, in which he "lashes out at allegations of war crimes recently leveled at US troops in Iraq." In the video, Gadahn says the incidents "represent a pattern of US and British brutality toward Muslims, and he says he saw US soldiers kill civilians in Afghanistan." While Gadahn has appeared in previous al Qaeda videos wearing a mask, in the latest video, which was broadcast Thursday on Al-Jazeera, his face is uncovered i.

US Passenger Detained After Trying To Break Into Delta Cockpit. AFP (7/8) reports US authorities detained "a male airline passenger who repeatedly tried to break into the cockpit during a flight to Florida before being restrained by passengers," an airport spokeswoman told AFP. The incident occurred late Thursday as a Delta Air Lines flight from New York was descending for landing at the Tampa International Airport, airport spokeswoman Brenda Geoghagan said. The man reportedly :refused a flight attendant's order to sit down, became agitated and ran toward the cockpit, where he tried twice to knock down the door," she said. Police identified the man as Nefpali Alexander Liemenbez, who Geoghagan described as "a Hispanic US soldier with a mental problem whose active duty was to end next Tuesday."

The Tampa Bay Tribune (7/8, Kalfrin) identifies him as "Neftali Laimendez, 24, a U.S. Army specialist who was days away from discharge." His brother said to the Tribune, "He asked for help while he was in the Army. They didn't give it to him. Now this happened." The AP (7/8) reports similar details.

Pittsburgh Mosque Leaders Decry FBI Raid. The AP (7/7) reports, "Leaders of a Muslim mosque accused the government of religious and racial profiling for a raid last week, but government officials said they were only looking for man wanted on weapons charges." The AP continues, "The FBI raided the Light of the Age mosque on the city's North Side on June 30 and arrested a man on an illegal weapons charge. The man, Larry M. Williams, has a felony record and cannot legally own a gun. … Mosque leaders held a news conference on Friday to say that the raid disrupted a religious service and that its members felt harassed. … 'The FBI is charged with safeguarding the domestic security of the nation, not the violation of the civil and human rights of its citizens,' Tahir Abdullah, the mosque's assistant director said."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/8, Dyer, 261K) reports, "The FBI arrested Larry M. Williams of Lincoln-Lemington, who has felony convictions in Washington state and other outstanding warrants, including one for failing to register as a sex offender. … The arrest took place during prayer hours, and some members of the largely African-American congregation were detained and questioned on the street, group members said. The facility was searched and streets blocked off for several hours during the FBI action." The Post-Gazette continues, "Jeff Killeen, a spokesman for the FBI, could not confirm if the bureau knew the facility was a mosque. He said the agency tries to respect the civil and constitutional rights of everyone. … 'But we had a warrant for the arrest of a convicted felon in possession of a weapon -- a semi-automatic pistol. We can't take that lightly.'" The Post-Gazette notes, "Federal officials detailed the reasons for the arrest in a statement yesterday and have not linked the group to terrorism. … 'Under federal law, it is illegal for any person who has been convicted of a crime which carries a punishment of more than one year in prison to possess a firearm or ammunition,' said the statement from U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan. 'Larry M. Williams is such a person.'" closets and kicked in doors -- leaving holes in the mosque's walls, said Tahir Abdullah, assistant director of the mosque. … Williams had been coming to the mosque for about three years. He showed up the night of June 29 seeking a place to stay, Abdullah said, adding that mosque members did not know about Williams' criminal past."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (7/8, Greenwood) reports, "During the raid, law-enforcement officers ransacked

DOJ_NMG_0039522

Port Authority To Takeover Construction Of WTC Memorial. The New York Times (7/7, Dunlap, 1.19M) reports the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey agreed Firday to take over construction of the World Trade Center memorial and museum. The move is expected to make the "tortuous development process more efficient and less expensive," the Times writes. Also Friday, the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation announced that it was "back in the fund-raising business with a national television, radio and print campaign."

Louisiana Delegation Requests Extension Of Federal Coverage Of Debris Removal Costs. The Baton Rouge Advocate (7/8, Shields) reports, "Most of the Louisiana congressional delegation sent a letter to President Bush on Friday asking that the federal government extend 100 percent reimbursement for debris removal to nine parishes damaged mostly by Hurricane Rita." The letter was not signed by Rep. Williams Jefferson (D) but his office said he supported the extension. The letter "came one week after the White House announced that it would pick up the costs for debris removal through Dec. 31 for five parishes damaged by Hurricane Katrina. That move saved those parishes an estimated $71 million." The letter seeks the benefit be extended to Calcasieu, Cameron, Iberia, Jefferson, Lafourche, St. Charles, St. Mary, Terrebonne and Vermilion parishes. FEMA is "reviewing the request after getting similar correspondence from Gov. Kathleen Blanco, FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said."

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Troops Clash With Shiite Militia, Arrest A "Significant" Suspect. The Washington Post (7/8, Partlow and Finer, 744K) reports, "Iraqi troops rumbled into the teeming Baghdad slum of Sadr City before dawn Friday and confronted the neighborhood's reigning militia, setting off an intense firefight that left 30 to 40 insurgents dead or wounded." The forces captured a "'very significant criminal' who leads 'multiple insurgent cells' responsible for kidnappings and killings." The Post also writes, "In a separate operation, U.S.-led forces captured an insurgent commander in Babil province, whom news services identified as Adnan al-Unaybi, the Mahdi Army leader in areas south of Baghdad." It identifies the two operations as evidence "that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has begun to follow through on his pledge to dismantle violent Shiite militias." The New York Times (7/8, Semple, 1.19M) reports of the same raid, "Residents said the building that came under attack was a base of operations for a man known as Abu Deraa, a top commander of the Mahdi Army." Similar to the Post, the Times says that the operations "suggested that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki was making good on his vow to crack down on Sunni Arab and Shiite militias alike. The WT/AP (7/7, Reid) reports, "But the raid enraged many of the 2.5 million Shiites in Sadr City as rumors spread through the crowded slum district that most of the dead were civilians killed as they slept on their rooftops." The AP (7/7) reports that, on the same day, "Explosions struck four Sunni mosques in Baghdad and northeast of the capital, while a car bomb exploded near a Shiite mosque in northern Iraq Friday in a series of attacks that killed 17 people and wounded more than 50. ... The Baghdad mosque explosions came despite a four-hour driving ban in the capital aimed at preventing such attacks that often target the main weekly Islamic religious service." The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Daragahi, 958K) reports, "U.S. officials hailed the raid as a success because of the capture of a 'high-level insurgent,' who they said was responsible for killing and kidnapping civilians and attacking American and Iraqi forces." Yet "the 3 a.m. raid, which caused no American casualties, drew swift condemnation from many Shiite religious leaders." Before thousands gathered for prayer in Sadr City, Sheik Abdul Zahra Swaidi said, "The infidel American troops supported by the so-called Iraqi [soldiers] raided the city, killing and injuring a lot of innocent people using all kinds of weapons."

Most Baghdad Security Is Reportedly Under Iraqi Control. AFP (7/7) reports, "The ranks of Iraqi-trained security personnel grew by nearly 30,000 since April and now control more than half of Baghdad and large swathes of the countryside, a quarterly State Department report to Congress said." The State Department study, however, "stressed ... hat the figures still did not point to a timetable for a US troop withdrawal." According to Brig. Gen. Kurt Chichowski, "the first province to be turned over for complete Iraqi control will be Muthana in south-central Iraq."

Pentagon Will Buy New Materiel For War. The AP (7/7, Flaherty) reports, "President Bush would spend a quarter of the $50 billion down payment he wants for next year's Iraq and Afghanistan war costs to replace damaged weapons and equipment, while an additional $3 billion would go to train and equip Iraqi and Afghan forces. A document detailing the plan, obtained by The Associated Press, proposes spending $2.3 billion for new armor for troops and vehicles and efforts aimed at thwarting missiles. Another $2.1 billion would be for protecting troops from roadside bombs." The New York Times (7/8, 1.19M) prints an abbreviated version of this AP story.

DOJ_NMG_0039523

US Works To Rebuild "Fragile" Iraqi Army. Newsweek (7/7, Childress) reports in a fairly optimistic article about training at the "Zahko Military Training Academy, one of three schools in Iraq that train military officers." The academy has integrated Arab and Kurdish graduating classes, "a delicate situation in a country rife with ethnic and sectarian tension. The nation's other academies are less balanced. Rustamiyah, near Baghdad, is 98 percent Arab, and Qualachulon in Sulemaniyah is 95 percent Kurdish." The article quotes cadets and instructors who want to build a new Iraqi army.

Marine Officers May Have Been Negligent In Haditha Probe. All three networks covered the Haditha investigation and the alleged disclosures to come. ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 3, 1:20, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "Breaking news tonight on that Hadithah investigation. Jonathan Karl has learned that general Peter Chiarelli has completed his review of the killings and how the military handled the initial investigations. ABC (Karl) adds, "The general's view is based on an exhaustive investigation. An official who read it tells me, quote it will be painful, not just to the troops involved, but also to the top Marine commanders in Iraq who, it says, did virtually nothing about an incident that left so many civilians dead." The CBS Evening News (7/7, story 3, 1:50, Smith, 7.66M) reported, "There is a major development tonight in the story of one of the worst alleged crimes by U.S. troops in Iraq, the killing of civilians in Haditha. CBS (Martin) adds, "An investigation into the cover-up of the alleged murder of 24 Iraqi civilians in the town of Haditha last November concludes Marine officers at every level up to and including the colonel who commanded the regiment failed to investigate inaccurate and conflicting reports of how the civilians were killed."

NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 7, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There's a late update tonight on a story we've covered here. An alleged attack on Iraqi civilians by U.S. Marines in the town of Haditha. NBC (Miklaszewski): "A U.S. military investigation has found that several Marines, including officers up the chain of command, have been implicated and accused now of either allegedly falsifying reports or refusing to recognize the evidence that U.S. Marines may have killed innocent civilians in Haditha last November. ... First reports from the Marines said they had been killed by an I.E.D. But photographic evidence strongly suggested the civilians were deliberately killed allegedly by U.S. Marines, execution style."

The New York Times (7/8, Schmitt and Cloud, 1.19M) reports that Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli "has concluded that some senior Marine officers were negligent in failing to investigate more aggressively the killings of 24 Iraqi civilians by marines in Haditha last November, two Defense Department officials said Friday." Chiarelli reportedly "faulted the senior staff of the Second Marine Division, commanded at the time by Maj. Gen. Richard A. Huck, and the Second Regimental Combat Team, then headed by Col. Stephen W. Davis, and recommended unspecified disciplinary action for some officers. ... A senior Pentagon official said it could be several days before Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld receives a complete briefing on the matter, and before a redacted version of General Chiarelli's findings are made public." The AP (7/8, Gamel) calls the case "one of several allegations of U.S. abuse of Iraqi civilians that threaten to further weaken popular support for the Iraq war in the United States and tarnish the military's image."

Ex-GI Alleged Rapist Case Goes To Grand Jury. The AP (7/7, Dunbar) reports, "The case of a former Army private charged with slaying and raping an Iraqi woman and killing her family will be presented to a grand jury this month. Steven D. Green, 21, entered a plea of not guilty through his public defenders Thursday."

Father Of Accused Ex-GI Rapist Expresses Shock. The San Francisco Chronicle (7/7, Campbell and Sissom) reports, "The father of a former soldier accused of rape and murder in Iraq is 'shocked' by allegations against his son." The article quotes military-veteran residents of Midland, Tex., who express concern about the case's impact on US-Iraqi relations and on negative perceptions it could arouse toward other troops.

Mahmudiyah Is Not "Just Another Abuse Scandal." In an angry op-ed piece for the Washington Post (7/8, 744K), Colbert King writes, "Please don't lump what happened in Mahmudiyah with the alleged attacks by U.S. troops on unarmed Iraqi civilians in Fallujah, Haditha, Qaim or Salahuddin province ... Mahmudiyah was about murder. It was also about the deliberate, calculated violation of a woman. Such malevolence should never find its way into a U.S. military uniform."

American Al Qaeda Member Criticizes US Troops. CNN (7/8) reports on its Web site California-born al Qaeda member Adam Gadahn spoke out "against US troops" on a recently released video. The video deals primarily with the London subway bombings of 2005, but includes a five-minute speech from Gadahn, in English, in which he "lashes out at allegations of war crimes recently leveled at US troops in Iraq." In the video, Gadahn says the incidents "represent a pattern of US and British brutality toward Muslims, and he says he saw US soldiers kill civilians in Afghanistan." His face is uncovered on screen for the first time.

DOJ_NMG_0039524

US Treatment Of Saddam Resonates In Arab World. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Stack, 958K) reports that with some Iraqis continuing to support Saddam Hussein, "it's America that has ended up standing trial in the eyes of the Arab public." He "and his lawyers have repeatedly compared Iraq's fate under his heavy thumb to the blood-spattered security vacuum created by the U.S. invasion." The Times states, "This debate -- in essence, whether the invasion improved life for Iraqis -- resonates loudly in the Arab world, where many people are concerned about how Hussein's fall has shifted the region's power structure. Iraq's Sunni-dominated neighbors are fearful of the emergence of the Shiite majority in Iraq and terrified of expanded Iranian influence. (The trial has included allegations that Iran tried to assassinate Hussein.)"

US Forces Face Hurdles In Battling "Resurgent Taliban." The New York Times (7/8, Hicks, 1.19M) reports, "American and allied troops are engaged in their biggest operation against Taliban forces in Afghanistan since they drove the fundamentalist movement from power in 2001." They "face the hard job of trying to tell local farmers from Taliban insurgents, who have gained strength across southern Afghanistan. The Americans set up a base, then probed into villages. They were soon ambushed. The Taliban can easily persuade or coerce villagers to assist them. They arm the villagers or equip them with radios. Almost any man is suspect. During one raid, which was typical, the Americans separated the men. Homes were searched, and the men were marched to the base for questioning."

Karzai Urges Pakistan To Dismantle Terror Camps. The AP (7/8) reports, "President Hamid Karzai urged neighboring Pakistan to prevent militants from training on its soil as fighting Friday in southern Afghanistan killed a U.S.-led coalition soldier and at least eight suspected Taliban militants."

US Coalition Accused Of Attacking Afghan Legislators Family. The New York Times (7/8, Gall, 1.19M) reports, "An Afghan member of Parliament accused the American-led coalition of opening fire on his family as they traveled by car in one of the most troubled provinces of southern Afghanistan, killing his brother-in-law and wounding five others, including his wife and two of his children." Uruzgan province legislator Haji Abdul Khaliq said "that the shooting occurred on Wednesday and that American and Australian troops were responsible for it." But "A statement from the American-led coalition said it was 'deeply saddened' by the reports, but added that 'coalition forces are confident the coalition is not responsible for this attack.'"

Cheney Praises Troops In Speech At Norfolk Naval Station. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (7/8, Hansen) reports on Vice-President Cheney's address to 3,000 Marines and sailors who "belonged to two battle groups - led by the aircraft carrier Theodore Roosevelt and the amphibious assault ship Nassau - that returned in March and May." The positive article quotes service member's enthusiastic reactions to the speech and describes the returning troops' duty: "During their six-month deployment, the two strike groups fought in Iraq, captured pirates in the Indian Ocean and secured the commercial channels in the Mediterranean Sea and Persian Gulf."

Army Discharges 1,000 For Personality Disorders. The AP (7/7, Baldor) reports, "The Army discharged more than 1,000 soldiers last year citing personality disorders, the reason it gave for this year's discharge of a private now accused of raping an Iraqi woman and killing her and her family. That total represents about 1.2 percent of the soldiers given early discharges during the year ending Sept. 30, 2005." The army surgeon general "told reporters Friday that usually the disorder is not associated with combat trauma ... [and] soldiers exhibiting such traits would not be automatically discharged, because many can continue to perform well."

Internet Allows US Troops To Keep In Touch With Families. The New York Times (7/8, Alvarez, 1.19M) reports, "Military deployments have a way of chewing up marriages, turning daily life upside down and making strangers out of husbands and wives. But for this generation of soldiers, the Internet, which is now widely available on bases, has softened the blow of long separations, helping loved ones stay in daily touch and keeping service members informed of family decisions -- important and mundane."

DOJ:

Fitzgerald's DC Future Uncertain. WBBM, News Radio 780, Chicago (7/7, Roberts) reports, "The future of U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald may be moving to the front burner, following today's news conference by President Bush." WBBM continues, "WBBM Newsradio 780's Bob Roberts reports Fitzgerald wears two hats: United States Attorney for the northern district of Illinois, and Washington-based special prosecutor in the CIA leak investigation and related cases. … The local investigations have reached the top levels of city and state government; the CIA leak probe has reached top levels at the White House. … As a result, some pundits say that Fitzgerald already has become a recurring nightmare not only for Mayor Daley, former Gov. George Ryan and Gov. Rod Blagojevich, but for the President as well. … Instead, Mr. Bush said, it has not been a high priority for him. … 'I don't have any plans to reappoint him because I haven't thought about it,' he said, adding quickly, 'I'll now think about it, now that you brought it up.'" WBBM adds, "Mr. Bush said he is not familiar with the locally-based corruption investigations, but commented on Fitzgerald's stewardship of the CIA leak investigation. … 'I thought in Washington he handled the case with professionalism, very professionally,' Mr. Bush said. 'You didn't see a lot of leaks. You didn't see a lot of speculation. You didn't see a lot of people dropping a little crumb here and there for the press to chew on.' … Ultimately, the President said, the decision is one for U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to make."

DOJ_NMG_0039525

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Divided On "Spring Loading" Of Options. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Scannell, Forelle, Bandler) reports, "New controversy is brewing over the way companies dole out stock options, this time over the practice of granting them just days before announcing good news -- an effort to give executives a quick profit on paper." The Journal continues, "Known as 'spring loading,' such options grants have generated heat in recent days. While spring loading is different from 'backdating,' another type of options timing, corporate critics blast it as a form of insider trading. Defenders call it a legitimate form of compensation -- and their ranks include a commissioner of the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Journal adds, "The SEC is investigating at least 50 companies for the timing of their options, and while there is wide agreement that backdating is wrong in most cases, there appears to be division over spring-loading. The divisions underscore a broader debate over the myriad ways companies grant options and whether or not some practices are, or should be, banned. … In a speech Thursday before the International Corporate Governance Network, Republican SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins gave a spirited defense of spring loading, calling it a legitimate and low-cost way for boards to efficiently compensate executives. He rejected claims that such awards amount to trading on inside information. … Quickly, some investor groups cried foul. 'Let's step back and take it out of the legal domain. This is just not fair,' said Ann Yerger, executive director of the Council of Institutional Investors. 'I don't think any rational individual or director or executive could argue it is fair. The whole point is to motivate and incentivize. To do this and set up an award so they're already in the money is so unfair. I think it's a mark of poor integrity.'"

Nicor To Pay $10 Million Fine To Settle SEC Accounting Probe. The Chicago Tribune (7/8, Manor) reports, "Nicor Inc. said Friday that it has reached a tentative settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission and is willing to pay a $10 million penalty to settle allegations of misleading accounting." The Tribune continues, "The SEC has been investigating Naperville-based Nicor, natural gas supplier to most of northern Illinois outside Chicago, for allegedly inflating profits from its gas trading business from 1999 through the first quarter of 2002. … The company eventually restated its earnings for that period. … 'We wonder how Nicor is getting off paying only a $10 million fine,' said Rob Kelter, general counsel for the Citizens Utility Board. CUB believes ratepayers were overcharged, and a case against Nicor is pending before the Illinois Commerce Commission." The Tribune adds, "CUB has contended in the past that Nicor Gas owes consumers up to $190 million for the alleged improper accounting of gas purchases. … Nicor made the announcement after the SEC had closed, and government officials were not available for comment."

Asyst Technologies Gets Delisting Letter From Nasdaq. The AP (7/8) reports, "Asyst Technologies Inc., a maker of technology for semiconductors and flat-panel displays, said Friday it received a letter from Nasdaq stating that the company is not in compliance with listing requirements because it is delinquent in filing its annual report for the fiscal year ended March 31. … Nasdaq has begun a process that could lead to the stock's delisting." The AP continues, "Asyst has requested a hearing with Nasdaq to address the filing delay. The request will postpone delisting pending the hearing and the panel's decision, although the panel will not necessarily find that Asyst should continue to be listed on the exchange." The AP adds, "Asyst delayed filing its annual report because it is in the midst of a widening inquiry into stock-option granting practices by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission. On June 9, the board established a special committee to look into Asyst's stock option practices during that period, the company said."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Had Seven Appointments At White House. The New York Times/AP (7/8, Press) reports, "Secret Service records show four more visits to the White House in 2001 by the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including one to see an aide to Vice President Dick Cheney. The newly released records bring the total number of his known visits to seven."

DOJ_NMG_0039526

The AP (7/8, Yost) reports, "One Abramoff White House visit, according to Secret Service logs, was on April 20, 2001, to see Cesar Conda, at the time Cheney's assistant for domestic policy." The Washington Post (7/8, A2, Schmidt, Grimaldi, 744K) reports, "The appointments included a meeting with a domestic policy aide to Vice President Cheney and a meeting in the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives attended by about 40 people. The logs also reflect that Abramoff attended one or more social events, as well as a gathering of Indian tribal officials and state legislators at which President Bush appeared." The Secret Service "released the White House visit data yesterday in response to Freedom of Information Act requests and a lawsuit filed by the government watchdog group Judicial Watch." The Secret Service said that "the data reflect appointments but 'do not necessarily reflect actual visits to the White House complex.'"

US To Probe Rape Allegations Against New Orleans Investigator. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (7/8, Filosa) reports, "The U.S. Attorney's Office has issued grand jury subpoenas as part of a federal civil rights investigation into a complaint that Orleans Parish District Attorney Eddie Jordan's chief homicide investigator raped a witness he was assigned to protect." The Times-Picayune continues, "Federal agents started the investigation last week after meeting with high-ranking New Orleans Police Department officials and Jordan, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Friday. … An unidentified woman in the state witness protection program told the NOPD's Public Integrity Bureau that Dwight Deal, a veteran homicide detective who joined Jordan's administration in June 2003 as the chief investigator for murder cases, raped her while she was under his watch." The Times-Picayune adds, 'Deal, 50, worked for more than 20 years with NOPD and at one time was among the most senior of homicide detectives, known for cracking murder cases and making them stick in court to win convictions. Deal played a key role in helping police solve and bring to court the culprits behind the 1997 triple murder at the French Quarter's Louisiana Pizza Kitchen, a case that sent Phillip Anthony to death row. … In June 2003, Deal retired from the NOPD and joined Jordan's staff. Deal was placed on paid administrative June 30, a move that adheres to the office policy, said Jordan spokeswoman Leatrice Dupre. … In his announcement of the federal probe Friday, Letten made reference to the recent conviction of Henry A. Dillon III, the former New Orleans assistant city attorney convicted on federal civil rights charges for raping two young women who crossed paths with him while dealing with traffic tickets in 2004."

Louisiana Man Pleads Guilty To Katrina Fraud. The Baton Rouge Advocate (7/8, Kimbrell) reports, "A Baton Rouge man pleaded guilty Thursday to making a false claim for disaster relief benefits after Hurricane Katrina." The Advocate continues, "A grand jury indicted Terry Watson, 675 Wooddale Blvd., in March for making a false claim and for making false and fraudulent statements to the Federal Emergency Management Agency. … According to the indictment, Watson made a FEMA claim stating that his home had been damaged during Hurricane Katrina. He received a $2,000 check." The Advocate adds, "In his plea agreement, Watson pleaded guilty to false claim. The U.S. Attorney's Office agreed to drop the charge of making false and fraudulent statements. … Watson could be sentenced to up to five years in prison or fined $250,000 or both plus other court costs. … In September, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales created the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force. It is designed to investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes, such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud."

Federal Prosecutors Seek Prison Time For Philadelphia Mayor's Former Law Partner. The Philadelphia Inquirer (7/8, Shiffman) reports, "Mayor Street's former law partner should spend at least two years in prison for corruption related to the development of the city's waterfront, prosecutors said in a new court filing." The Inquirer continues, "Leonard N. Ross, who helped Street raise campaign cash and chaired a city committee to select a developer for Penn's Landing, pleaded guilty to corruption and extortion charges last year. … He is scheduled to be sentenced Thursday before U.S. District Judge Michael Baylson. Prosecutors said the advisory federal guidelines call for a term of 24 to 30 months."

The Philadelphia Daily News (7/8, Hinkelman) reports, "The feds filed a 36-page sentencing memo Thursday night that also called for Ross, 58, to pay a $50,000 fine, which they said he had the ability to pay immediately." The Daily News continues, "Ross pleaded guilty in December to charges of fraud and conspiracy to commit extortion. … Prosecutors said Ross had used his position as the chairman of a selection committee evaluating Penn's Landing development proposals to extract $50,000 in campaign contributions for Street from prospective developers; to get himself a $150,000 loan to help pay off a personal debt, and to assist the late attorney Ron White in an attempted extortion of developer Bart Blatstein. … Calling his 'outrageous criminal conduct' an 'egregious breach of trust,'" federal prosecutors "said Ross 'betrayed' the people of Philadelphia and viewed public service as 'a way to line his own pockets.' … Prosecutors are also asking Baylson for permission to play 'brief excerpts' from three FBI-recorded conversations between Ross and White in 2003 as the two discussed the bidding process to develop the 13-acre site on the city's waterfront."

DOJ_NMG_0039527

Jefferson Hires High Profile Defense Advisor. The Baton Rouge Advocate (7/8, Shields) reports Rep. William Jefferson "is beefing up his legal defense against bribery allegations, hiring a high-powered spokeswoman who has represented Monica Lewinsky and the family of Chandra Levy. … Judy Smith of the Washington firm, Impact Strategies, will join Jefferson's legal defense team."

CIVIL LAW:

Senators Question Settlement With Boeing. The Financial Times (7/8, Cameron and Kirchgaessner) reports, "Lawmakers have raised concerns over the tax treatment of Boeing's $615m potential settlement with the US government, which resolved a host of civil and criminal claims connected to the company's procurement practices. In a letter last month to Alberto Gonzales, attorney-general, Republican senators Chuck Grassley, John McCain and John Warner said they were concerned that the $565m civil portion of the settlement could be structured in a way that would allow Boeing to make its payment tax deductible."

Columnist Questions Justice Department Arguments In Deficit Reduction Act Suit. In a column in the New York Times (7/8, 1.19M), Dorothy Samuels opines that the Justice Department's argument for dismissal of a lawsuit challenging the "phony" Deficit Reduction Act "sharply conflicts with my understanding — and most Americans' understanding — of what it takes for a bill to become law. If that reasoning prevails, it will be very bad for democracy." Samuels that because of an "accidental" change to the bill, the version that passed the House by a mere two votes differed from the Senate measure. … Made aware of the discrepancy, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist apparently made a command decision not to try to fix it by having their chambers vote again, this time on the same measure." She adds, "In briefs filed last week, the Justice Department does not dispute this rendition of what happened, or the constitutional rule against transmitting one-house bills to the president's desk. Instead it contends that a musty 1892 Supreme Court ruling requires courts to accept as fact Mr. Hastert's fictional certification that both chambers passed the same bill. In other words, to enact large budget cuts affecting millions of Americans, the House and Senate needn't bother to go through the tedious and politically fraught exercise of passing the same legislation. It suffices for leaders of each chamber to fudge and say it happened."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Judge Approves Settlement To End Hollywood, FL, Synagogue Dispute. The Miami Herald (7/8, Wright) reports, "A federal judge approved a legal settlement Friday between the city of Hollywood and an Orthodox synagogue, officially ending the five-year feud." The Herald continues, "The unexpected close to the case came a day after six angry neighbors of the synagogue filed a motion to join the case at the last minute in hopes of dismantling the settlement, which would allow the congregation to stay in two single-family homes permanently." The Herald adds, "The religious group has used the houses as a synagogue since 2001, and their presence has sparked a debate over the rights of people to worship where they choose versus a city's right to protect residential neighborhoods from noise, trash and traffic. … After several pretrial defeats, city commissioners offered a settlement that will pay the synagogue $2 million and not only allow the congregation to stay but also to expand to three other houses in the Hollywood Hills neighborhood. … Synagogue leaders accepted the deal Wednesday." The Herald notes, "The deal means the city and Commissioner Sal Oliveri will avoid facing a federal religious discrimination lawsuit from the Chabad and the U.S. Justice Department. … The city also is required to rewrite the zoning criteria used to grant permits to religious groups that want to operate in single-family districts."

DOJ Report Faults Arkansas County Jail. The Times Record (Fort Smith, Arkansas) (7/8, Garrett) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has put Sebastian County on notice that conditions at the county jail violate the constitutional rights of inmates confined there." The Record continues, "A 23-page report on the findings of a 2005 investigation said the jail fails 'to provide for inmates' serious medical needs, serious mental health needs, right to protection from physical harm and right to be confined in sanitary and safe environmental conditions.' … The assessment is based upon an inspection of the jail that was performed May 9-12 last year. It included an on-site inspection of the jail as well as interviews with the sheriff, jail staff, medical care providers and inmates. .. The report was delivered to the county in May." The Record adds, "In the area of medical care, the study is critical of the jail intake process, which it says 'fails to identify inmates' urgent or ongoing health needs, and fails to provide routine health assessments to determine the health status or chronic health care needs of inmates.' … The study said the county does not train jail staff to identify symptoms of drug and alcohol withdrawal, communicable diseases, acute or chronic illness and potential suicide risk. Ongoing medical needs of chronic illnesses do not receive care and treatment, according to the study. … The document also contains a warning that failure to 'reach a resolution' could result in a lawsuit to correct deficiencies identified in the report."

DOJ_NMG_0039528

NAACP Pushes For Quick Renewal Of Voting Rights Act. The Charleston (SC) Post & Courier (7/8) reports, "NAACP leaders want to jumpstart renewal of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which stalled in the U.S. House last month." The P&C continues, "The landmark civil rights act, fueled by bipartisan support, was expected to easily chug through a 25-year extension. … But on June 10 the House Judiciary Committee, responding to a letter from 42 Republican congressmen from 14 states, put renewal on hold indefinitely." The P&C adds, "The lawmakers wanted discussion on and possibly amendments to two sections of the act. One of those sections requires nine mostly Southern states, including South Carolina, to get approval from the U.S. Justice Department on any changes in electoral practices. Another requires certain jurisdictions to offer language assistance to citizens with limited English skills. … Local and national officials called a press conference Friday at the Charleston branch office of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to encourage a swift extension of the act, which was designed to prevent racial discrimination at the polls. … One of the sections that riles lawmakers requires Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia to get Justice Department approval on voting changes. The requirement unfairly singles out and holds accountable states that practiced discriminatory voting policies decades ago, legislators said."

Judge Postpones Trial In Florida Voting Rights Case. The Orlando Sentinel (7/8, Pino) reports, "Osceola County won a two-month delay Friday in the trial of a federal voting-rights lawsuit. … Still, officials said they remain focused on defending their countywide method of electing commissioners, not settling the case with a compromise. … 'Right now, it is too early to pursue options until the judge comes out with a ruling,' commission Chairman Paul Owen said Friday. 'There have been no negotiations at this time with anybody. At this time, we are focused on defending ourselves.'" The Sentinel continues, "The ruling to delay the trial until Sept. 18 was granted by U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell in Orlando, a day after the motion was filed and on the heels of the first public comment about the suit by a commissioner. The trial had been scheduled to begin July 19. … County Commissioner Ken Shipley gave the audience at a Republican women's club meeting Thursday night a rundown of possible outcomes to the suit brought by the Justice Department, including expanding the commission from five to seven members and creating a combination of at-large and single-member districts. … The suit alleges that the current at-large system dilutes Hispanics' voting power and prevents them from electing candidates of their choice." The Sentinel adds, "Lawyers for the county asked the judge for a delay in order to take depositions for close to 30 potential witnesses in the wake of a three-day hearing that resulted in Presnell's June 26 injunction halting commission elections. Presnell's ruling to move the trial to September came after a telephone hearing Friday."

World Cup Highlights Global Sex Trafficking Problem. The Kansas City Star (7/8, Grathoff, McCollough) reports from Hamburg, Germany, "Here in Germany, prostitution is legal. Here, there are no pimps. They are sex businessmen, supported by the government with the benefits of a legitimate profession. With a climate like this already in place, it was widely predicted in the months before the World Cup that tens of thousands of women would be trafficked to Germany to fill the brothels. … 'Trafficking is a major worldwide problem,' the Rev. Carrie Pemberton, CEO of Churches Alert to Sex Trafficking Across Europe, wrote to The Star in an e-mail. 'We are aware that there are (nongovernmental organizations) in Germany and the German police themselves who have been very (concerned) about this problem during the last few weeks. … We have been working with this issue since 2003 and know of definite examples where sporting events have been used for trafficking women into and across Europe for sexual exploitation.'" The Star continues, "For those reasons, human trafficking has become a hot-button topic at the World Cup, as the U.S. State Department, the European Parliament and countless nongovernmental organizations pleaded with the German government to implement a plan to stop the traffickers. … Mandi says she hasn't seen any increase in trafficked women. … Most reports out of Germany back Mandi's assessment. Christian Sachs, a spokesman for the German Interior Ministry, told the International Herald Tribune this week that 'it looks as if the fears that were mentioned — that the World Cup would lead to a rise in cases of forced prostitution and sex trafficking — have fortunately not been the case.' … The biggest problem in the fight against trafficking is that there's no true way of measuring success or failure. Everything is an estimate. … Ambassador John Miller, the U.S. State Department's director of the office that monitors and combats trafficking, says there is no way to know how many women were taken involuntarily into Germany for the World Cup."

Justice Kennedy Backs San Diego's Cross Stand. The AP (7/8) reports, "San Diego won a Supreme Court justice's backing Friday to leave a large cross standing on city property." The AP continues, "Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said a temporary stay he authorized last week should protect the cross until the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, based in San Francisco, hears arguments this year in a long-running dispute over the cross." The AP adds, "Kennedy also took the unusual step of explaining his decision, in a four-page opinion, and suggested that he and his colleagues may be interested in a broader review of the case. … 'The equities here support preserving the status quo while the city's appeal proceeds,' Kennedy wrote. 'Compared to the irreparable harm of altering the memorial and removing the cross, the harm in a brief delay pending the Court of Appeals' expedited consideration of the case seems slight.'" The AP notes, 'A lower court judge had ordered the city of San Diego to remove the cross or be fined $5,000 a day. The judge ruled that the cross, a symbol of Christianity, was an unconstitutional endorsement of a specific religion. … The 29-foot cross, on a half-acre site atop Mount Soledad in the La Jolla area just outside San Diego, had been contested in 1989 by atheist Philip Paulson. … The Supreme Court refused three years ago to get involved in the dispute between Paulson and the city. Since then, Congress agreed to make the area a national veterans memorial, and San Diego residents voted to transfer the land to the federal government. Paulson is a veteran of the Vietnam War."

DOJ_NMG_0039529

Georgia Judge Rules Voter ID Requirement Violates State Constitution. The New York Times (7/8, Goodman, 1.19M) reports Fulton County Superior Court Judge Melvin K. Westmoreland "has blocked a Republican-sponsored effort to require Georgia voters to present government-issued photo identification cards before they can cast a ballot." Westmoreland ruled "the requirement violated the State Constitution by placing an undue burden on the fundamental right to vote." Former Gov. Roy E. Barnes (D) challenged the requirement, arguing that it "would make it harder for minorities, the elderly and the poor to vote." State officials "vowed to appeal the ruling to the Georgia Supreme Court." Meanwhile, "a consortium of voter rights groups" has challenged the requirement in federal court, claiming it "violates the United States Constitution." The AP (7/8, McCaffrey) also carried the story.

ANTITRUST:

General Motors Board Votes To Consider Alliance With Renault And Nissan. ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 5, 2:00, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "American icon General Motors sent out a shockwave today" by "signaling that GM might become part of a giant global partnership" with "Renault of France and Nissan of Japan." ABC (Reynolds) adds, "The idea of a three-part auto-making alliance comes from billionaire GM shareholder Kirk Kerkorian." Kerkorian "evidently believes that Carlos Ghosn -- the hard-charging boss of both Nissan and Renault -- is better suited to lead a reconstituted General Motors than its current chairman, Rick Wagoner." But "there are a lot of people who believe the corporation is already implementing an effective cost-cutting strategy and doesn't need any help from an outsider." And "because GM's problems dwarf those at Nissan and Renault, industry analysts are skeptical about Ghosn's prospects in Detroit."

CBS Evening News (7/7, story 5, 2:40, Smith, 7.66M) reports, "General Motors may soon be joining forces with two foreign carmakers. The GM board gave the go-ahead today for talks with Nissan and Renault about forming an alliance."

NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street -- General Motors board of directors said they're willing to talk to Nissan and Renault about the possibility of an alliance. The move was made under pressure from G.M.'s largest stockholder and investor who thinks G.M.'s turnaround efforts aren't moving fast enough for him."

Corporations Cut Employee Pensions But Not For Executives. CBS Evening News (7/7, story 5, 2:40, Smith, 7.66M) reports, "GM is looking for ways to become more competitive which includes cutting costs. The company recently froze some of its employee pensions. More and more companies are doing that but many workers are complaining that while they are taking cuts, top executives are still retiring with huge pensions." CBS (Mason) adds, "The Wall Street Journal found that 45% of AT&T's pension costs go to just 1,500 top executives; the rest covers the over 189,000 employees."

Judge Mulls Modifications To Terms Of Two Phone Mergers. The New York Times (7/8, Labaton) reports, "A federal district judge in Washington is considering the imposition of major modifications to the two largest telephone mergers in history: SBC Communication's acquisition of AT&T and Verizon's purchase of MCI." The Times continues, "In a surprising order issued Friday afternoon, Judge Emmet G. Sullivan raised a series of questions about the Bush administration's review of the two deals that he said should be answered by the Justice Department and the phone companies at a hearing next week. … Both deals have already closed, and lawyers said that the judge could not unravel them, although he could try to impose significant conditions or divestitures." The Times adds, "The proceedings will probably shed light on the administration's antitrust enforcement program at a time when officials have put up virtually no roadblocks to deals and imposed few restrictions in other areas of antitrust law. … Still, the proceedings could affect the government's review of BellSouth's proposed acquisition by AT&T, the name the company took after AT&T was swallowed by SBC. The proceedings are also the first significant test of changes in the law that have given federal judges greater authority to scrutinize antitrust settlements."

DOJ_NMG_0039530

Suit Alleges Price-Fixing Conspiracy In Rubber Industry. The Knoxville News Sentinel (TN)/AP (7/8, Schelzig) reports, "Three tire companies are suing rubber-chemicals maker Chemtura Corp. in federal court in Nashville, seeking refunds and triple damages for goods purchased during a global price-fixing conspiracy." The AP continues, "Middlebury, Conn.-based Chemtura, which last year changed its name from Crompton Corp., has pleaded guilty in a federal case and has been fined by European regulators for its role in artificially boosting prices of chemicals used to make rubber between 1995 and 2001." The AP adds, "The lawsuit was filed late last week by the Nashville-based North American subsidiaries of Japanese tire maker Bridgestone Corp.; tire retread company Bandag Inc. of Muscatine, Iowa; and Pirelli Tire LLC of Rome, Ga. … Chemtura and subsidiary Uniroyal Chemical Corp. are named as defendants. … 'Defendants conspired in a global price-fixing scheme that had the direct and substantial effect of keeping prices paid by purchasers in the United States artificially high,' the lawsuit states." The AP notes, "The U.S. Justice Department and European regulators began their investigation into several rubber companies in 2002. Chemtura pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in San Francisco in 2004 and was fined $50 million. … The European Commission in December levied a $91 million fine on Flexsys NV, Bayer AG and Chemtura for breaking European Union antitrust rules by secretly agreeing to control both the European and global markets for rubber chemicals."

ENVIRONMENT:

US Allows BP To Delay Alaska Testing. The AP (7/8, Volz) reports, "Too much sediment had built up inside two Prudhoe Bay transit pipelines for BP Exploration (Alaska) Inc. to safely run sensors to detect corrosion levels within an ordered timeline, the head of the federal agency demanding the tests said Friday." The AP continues, "The head of the U.S. Transportation Department's Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration says he will permit a delay of the tests for an undetermined length of time. .. 'We would not allow it to continue to operate if we didn't think it was safe,' said Administrator Thomas Barrett. 'In the long term, it's not a good solution. We've got to get the sensors through there.'" The AP adds, "The agency in March ordered that three low-pressure transit pipelines in Prudhoe Bay be inspected with an internal sensing device known as a "smart pig" within three months, putting the deadline at June 15. … The order came as a result of the largest oil spill in North Slope history, in which an estimated 201,000 gallons of oil and liquids leaked over several days and was not discovered until March 2. … BP, which operates the nation's largest oil field, last month asked to postpone the tests; the request was denied."

US, Ohio Sue Fostoria Over Sewage Violations. The Toledo Blade (OH) (7/7) reports, "U.S. and Ohio regulators filed two federal civil suits yesterday against the city of Fostoria over violations at its wastewater treatment plant, but officials said the legal actions are part of a consent decree the city agreed to earlier this year." The Blade continues, "The state EPA names Fostoria as defendant, while the U.S. EPA names the city and the state of Ohio as defendants. … The lawsuits, filed in U.S. District Court in Toledo, said Fostoria's treatment plant and sewage system have illegally discharged untreated water into the east branch of the Portage River and into the Caples-Flack Ditch since September, 1997." The Blade adds, "Bill Rains, Fostoria's safety-service director, said the two lawsuits represent part of the legal actions related to a consent decree that 'we have been working on for just about a year.' … In May, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency levied a $30,000 fine against the city of Fostoria as part of a consent agreement to replace its outdated sewer system. The city had been negotiating the sewer issue with the EPA, the Justice Department, and the Ohio Attorney General's office. … The city said at the time that it had hired an engineering firm to create a long-term plan to separate storm-water and waste-water sewers. Mr. Rains said yesterday the city hopes to have that plan developed by next year."

Green Attitudes Spread To Faiths' Mainstream. The Washington Times/AP (7/8, Murphy) reports, "More than a decade ago on an Aegean island, the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians made a startling proposition: That pollution and other attacks on the environment could be considered sins." At the time, this "earned him little more than" the nickname "green patriarch," but his revelation is "no longer such a radical view," as "[e]co-friendly attitudes have increasingly moved into the mainstream of many faiths -- from Muslim clerics urging water conservation in the fast-growing Persian Gulf states to evangelical preachers in the United States calling attention to global warming." The Times adds, "Evidence of an expanding environmental ethos can be found in nearly every faith."

Lawyer Advocates Giving Most Environmental Questions To State, Local Levels. In a column in the New York Times (7/8, 1.19M), John Tierney examines ideas put forward by David Schoenbrod, a lawyer who "started the litigation that forced the E.P.A. to take lead out of gasoline. Technically, it was a victory for environmentalists, but it took so long that Schoenbrod decided his comrades in the movement had made a big mistake — the same mistake they're now making with carbon dioxide. They keep expecting the E.P.A. do an impossible job." Tierney writes, "Schoenbrod's modest proposal for saving the environment is to strip the E.P.A. of its rule-making powers and convert it into an advisory and enforcement agency. It would do technical studies and make recommendations, leaving the lawmaking up to legislators — usually legislators outside Washington. Except for some large-scale problems, like acid rain or global warming, Schoenbrod thinks that most environmental questions should be settled at the state and local level."

DOJ_NMG_0039531

NYTimes Emphasizes Importance Of Environmental Case. The New York Times (7/8, 1.19M) editorializes, "In a move that has caused both delight and apprehension among those who worry about global warming, the Supreme Court has agreed to rule next fall on whether the Environmental Protection Agency has the authority under the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases. … The outcome will have much to say about whether the country will be able to act more aggressively on a problem with potentially grave consequences for the earth and its inhabitants. It could also determine whether states that have acted on their own to limit global warming emissions from vehicles — as California and 10 other states have done — can proceed without fear of a federal veto." The Times concludes, "This is a case of global importance, not least because America's failure to act decisively has discouraged the rest of the world from acting decisively."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Attorney Shelves Cases After FBI Informers' Misconduct. The Arizona Republic (7/8, Wagner) reports, "U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton refused to prosecute a major Arizona corruption case after learning that FBI informers sexually abused an unconscious prostitute during a Las Vegas hotel orgy, according to a letter sent by Charlton to the bureau's top Arizona agent at the time." The Republic continues, "There are no allegations that FBI personnel participated in the orgy. However, Charlton's letter complained that agents did not mention the incident in official reports nor did they advise prosecutors of possible crimes committed in the hotel room, including knowledge that "one of the women in the suite may have been raped." … Charlton's conclusion: 'Our office will not prosecute any additional cases involving any of these individuals (informers) until the circumstances of the Oct. 16, 2002, incidents in Las Vegas are fully investigated.'" The Republic adds, "Seventy-one U.S. military personnel, prison guards and law enforcement workers have been convicted in the sting known as Operation Lively Green, which involved undercover operatives and agents posing as Mexican narcotics traffickers. The government employees were bribed to haul cocaine from southern Arizona to Phoenix and Las Vegas, sometimes wearing uniforms and using military vehicles. … Charlton's letter of March 29, 2004, to Charlene Thornton, then-FBI special agent in charge for Arizona, suggests that crimes by informers and questionable conduct by agents were so troubling that he backed away from the case entirely. … Thornton said in an interview that she recalls the letter and Charlton's decision to drop the case. She said Charlton sought an investigation by the Inspector General's Office. After that request was declined, she said, the FBI's Office of Professional Responsibility reviewed the allegations and exonerated all agents. .. The Justice Department's Office of Public Integrity wound up pressing charges, allowing each defendant to plead guilty to a single felony with no public trials or disclosures in U.S. District Court."

SF Chronicle Argues For Dismissal Of Reporters' Subpoenas. The San Francisco Chronicle (7/8, Page B1, Egelko) reports, "Lawyers for two Chronicle reporters accused the federal government Friday of trying to mislead a federal judge into concluding that BALCO founder Victor Conte was the source of grand jury testimony leaked to the reporters regarding star athletes' use of performance-enhancing drugs." The Chronicle continues, "In papers filed in federal court, lawyers for Hearst Corp. argued that subpoenas issued to the newspaper and the two reporters, demanding their confidential sources, should be dismissed because of government misconduct and prosecutors' failure to show any pressing need for the information." The Chronicle adds, "The reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, wrote articles in 2004 disclosing testimony by the Giants' Barry Bonds, the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi, sprinter Tim Montgomery and others to the federal grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO. The disclosures about star athletes' use of performance-enhancing drugs led Major League Baseball to impose a new steroid-testing policy. Conte and three others pleaded guilty to distributing illegal drugs. … The Justice Department has asked U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White to enforce the subpoenas and order Fainaru-Wada and Williams to reveal who gave them the grand jury transcripts in violation of another judge's order. … The reporters could be jailed if they refuse to testify. White has scheduled a hearing for Aug. 4."

The San Diego Union-Tribune/AP (7/8) reports, "In papers filed in federal court Friday, the attorneys argue the subpoenas should be dismissed because of government misconduct and prosecutors' failure to demonstrate a pressing need for the information. .. . 'There is no breach of national security, no act of terrorism, no violent crime that would go unpunished,' Hearst lawyers wrote." The AP adds, "Bush administration attorneys said it was a crime to leak grand jury materials to the media. They argued that California's shield law protecting reporters from divulging their sources does not apply to the federal probe into who leaked the documents. … On Friday, Hearst attorneys said ordering the reporters to disclose their sources would send a message to journalists and the public that 'the government would and could harass the press at will, compelling them to disclose confidential sources on the basis of any sort of investigation.'"

DOJ_NMG_0039532

Clark County, WA, Joins Anti-Gang Task Force. The Vancouver (WA) Columbian (7/8, Hamilton) reports, "Clark County joined 13 federal and local law enforcement agencies Friday in launching a new metropolitan area task force aimed at crippling gang crime." The Columbian continues, "The task force will employ racketeering statutes, drug statues and career criminal statutes to impede gang activities before the criminal organizations can develop and mature, said Karin J. Immergut, U.S. attorney for Oregon." The Columbian adds, "The Metropolitan Gang Task Force, as it will be known, will begin operations Monday in its base at the Portland Police Bureau's Northeast Precinct with gang leaders as the immediate target. … The task force includes an impressive array of police and prosecutorial firepower, including the FBI; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Portland, Beaverton, Gresham, Hillsboro, Milwaukie and Vancouver police departments; the U.S. Attorney; and prosecuting attorneys for Clark, Multnomah, Washington and Clackamas counties. Chairman will be David Bishop, the Beaverton police chief. … Each agency will pay the salaries of their participating officers. Other expenses, including vehicles, overtime and equipment, will come from the FBI, which recently received $450,000 from the U.S. Justice Department for the program. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez has made combating gang activity a priority."

Hatch Plays Role In Freeing Music Producer In Dubai Jail For Cocaine Possession. The New York Times (7/8, Leeds, Waxman, 1.19M) reports, "Although collaborations happen all the time in pop music, they do not generally involve R & B hitmakers and Senator Orrin G. Hatch. But the release of a music producer from a Dubai jail this week, quick on the heels of his conviction for drug possession, turns out to be a story of high-level string-pulling on the part of" Sen. Hatch "along with Lionel Richie, the singer; Quincy Jones, the music entrepreneur; and an array of well-connected lawyers, businessmen and others, spanning cities and continents." Dallas Austin "had been sentenced to four years in prison for carrying just over a gram of cocaine with him when he entered the country on May 19." Sen. Hatch "made numerous phone calls on Mr. Austin's behalf to the ambassador and consul of the United Arab Emirates embassy in Washington."

Columnist Criticizes UN Gun Control Program. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M), David B. Kopel writes, "Yesterday the United Nation's Review Conference on Small Arms ended, barely noticed by the media. That's too bad, because this meeting, and the initiative of which it is a part, deserves much more public attention -- and censure -- than it gets." Kopel notes, "The U.N. has long urged that firearms must never be transferred to 'non-state actors' -- that is, entities which are neither governments nor government-approved. Only John Bolton's intransigence prevented the 'non-state actors' rule from being inserted into the Program of Action at the previous U.N. small arms conference in 2001. But the U.N. continues to insist on the 'non-state actors' rule -- which would, if adopted, make it a violation of international law to sell arms to Taiwan (according to the U.N., not a state). It would also make illegal arms sales to any and every current group resisting tyranny or genocide." Kopel concludes, "The U.N. gun control program, of which this week's small arms conference is a part, has already caused massive suffering and the loss of civil liberties in many nations around the world. Americans would be foolish to imagine that they will always be immune."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Reiterates Support For Comprehensive Immigration Reform. Among the major US newspaper, the Wall Street Journal (7/8, McKinnon, 2.11M) was the only one to focus on Bush's domestic policy focus, reporting, "Bush renewed his call for immigration reform that includes a guest-worker program, a sign that despite resistance from the heart of his own party he isn't throwing in the towel on his troubled initiative in this election year." He "offered a strong defense of his stalled proposals to overhaul the broken U.S. system. 'The system we've got today isn't working, and it needs to be changed and reformed,' Mr. Bush said at a news conference Friday at Chicago's Museum of Science and Industry." He "promised stronger enforcement, both through increased manpower and new technologies such as tamper-proof identification cards. But, he added, 'in order to enforce this border, we've got to have a rational way that recognizes there are people sneaking across to do work Americans aren't doing.'" The Journal notes, "The administration and its allies also appear to be betting that the future for Republicans requires attracting more Latino voters, not driving them away with anti-immigrant rhetoric"

DOJ_NMG_0039533

The Boston Globe (7/8, Klein, 484K) in its coverage of Bush's remarks about North Korea also reports, "Bush used the news conference to push for his top domestic priority this year: comprehensive immigration reform. The House and Senate have passed vastly different immigration bills, and Bush restated his support for the Senate approach, which pairs new border-enforcement mechanisms with a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants now in the United States." Bush said, "In order to enforce this border, we've got to have a rational way that recognizes there are people sneaking across to do work Americans aren't doing."

WPost Urges Bush To Demand Path To Citizenship In Immigration Bill. The Washington Post (7/8, A14, 744K) writes in an editorial, "As Republicans this week began a series of hearings on immigration policy, President Bush was reportedly signaling new openness to compromise designed to produce legislation this year. The compromise, according to a report in the New York Times, would center on 'enforcement-first.'" But "the danger…is that 'enforcement-first' will devolve into 'enforcement-only.'" So President Bush should "insist that enforcement and a path to citizenship remain part of one legislative package."

Border Security Hearing In Texas Highlights Terrorist Threat. The New York Times (7/8, Hastings, Preston, 1.19M) reports at a House Subcommittee on International Terrorism and Nonproliferation hearing held in Laredo, Texas, "law enforcement and immigration agents" said that "terrorists as well as illegal immigrants could slip across" the border "that is porous and vulnerable." "House Republicans…highlighted the threat of terrorist infiltration to justify their tough plan for border enforcement and to suggest that a Senate immigration bill was weak on security." The hearings are described as an attempt to "build public pressure on the Senate to focus primarily on immigration enforcement." Democratic members of the committee "participated in the hearings but denounced them as divisive and called on the Republicans to address the immigration problem as a whole." Among the witnesses was Reynaldo Garza, acting chief of the Border Patrol for the Laredo sector, who said that "last year, agents in his area…caught illegal crossers from 70 countries other than Mexico, including some from countries linked by the United States to terrorism."

The Washington Post (7/8, A3, Moreno, 744K) reports the hearing helped House Republicans "to make their case for tightening the border as a way to prevent terrorist incursions." Democrats "called the event here political theater." But Republicans "raised the specter of well-funded terrorist organizations using Mexican drug rings and human-smuggling rings to penetrate the southern border of the United States." Garza was cited saying that "additional agents and high-technology tools such as unmanned aerial vehicles and remote surveillance cameras are critical to border security."

The Washington Times (7/8, Hurt, 90K) reports in a front-page story, the hearing "was part of a series" held to "gauge voter opinion on reforming the nation's immigration laws." Garza was cited sying that "the number of violent incidents at points of entry to the U.S. have increased dramatically in recent years." House Republicans "want to secure the border first and deal with thorny issues such as a guest-worker program after the borders have been bolstered."

The AP (7/8, White) called it "an unusual field hearing" intended to "push the Senate to focus on enforcing immigration law." Democrats "participated, but denounced them as political theater." Garza was cited saying that he "worries about possible links between drug cartels and terrorists."

The Houston Chronicle (7/8, Gonzalez, 581K) reports the hearing contained "disturbing testimony…about the dangers that federal and local law enforcement agencies face." Witnesses also "acknowledged terrorists could cross the river laden with weapons, and a federal auditor testified he's proven how porous the northern and southern borders are by using bogus documents to import nuclear bomb-making materials."

New York Appeals Court Rules DMV May Require Proof Of Legal Residency. The Washington Times/AP (7/8) reports a New York state appeals court ruled 5-0 that the Department of Motor Vehicles "can require immigrants to prove they are in this country legally before allowing them to have driver's licenses." The ruling "reversed a decision by Justice Karen S. Smith" who, the court said, had "erred in barring the identity procedures DMV Commissioner Raymond Martinez put in place and said they were 'within his authority and enforceable.'"

Latino Advocacy Group Targets Immigration. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Watanabe, 958K) reports one of the nation's largest Latino advocacy and civil rights organizations plans to meet in Los Angeles this weekend "to instruct people how to mobilize and vote out those who fail to back generous new immigration laws." The National Council of La Raza will highlight immigration at its annual conference beginning today, featuring a bipartisan lineup of such high-profile speakers as former President Clinton, Republican presidential political strategist Karl Rove, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa.

ICE Official Calls For More Criminal Prosecution Of Employers. Julie Myers, assistant secretary of homeland security for immigration and customs enforcement, writes in the Washington Post (7/8, A15, 744K),

DOJ_NMG_0039534

"The lure of well-paid jobs continues to be the primary magnet for most people who come to this country illegally. A comprehensive immigration strategy that includes a temporary worker program, as proposed by President Bush, is critical to stemming this flow. This strategy must also include work-site enforcement with real consequences for those who knowingly employ illegal aliens." Myers argues that "the most effective strategy in combating illegal employment is criminal prosecution of unscrupulous employers" and "seizing assets derived from illegal employment schemes." ICE "has arrested more than 382 people on criminal charges in work-site enforcement cases and apprehended another 2,100 on immigration violations" this year.

Former Agents Plead Guilty To Accepting Bribes To Release Immigrant Smugglers. The AP (7/8, Spagat) reports, "Two former Border Patrol agents," Mario Alvarez and Samuel McClaren, "pleaded guilty Friday to accepting nearly $200,000 in bribes for releasing immigrant smugglers and illegal immigrants from federal custody." They "each face up to 18 years in prison when they are sentenced Sept. 29, U.S. District Judge John Houston said."

Knight Ridder (7/8, Hall) reports Mexico's president-elect Felipe Calderon "Friday took sides in the battle over immigration, blasting a U.S. congressional plan to build a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border while endorsing a U.S. Senate proposal that would offer a route to legal citizenship for millions of undocumented Mexicans living in the United States." Calderon "also called for a joint development fund among Mexico, the United States and Canada that would finance public works construction in poor areas of Mexico."

The Washington Post (7/8, A9, Roig-franzia, 744K) reports, "Calderon took a firm stance against building a wall along the United States-Mexico border to stem illegal immigration." He said that "the best solution to the immigration crisis was creating jobs in Mexico." The statement "angered" Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) and Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) said that "he was 'hopeful Mexico's president-elect will also look more closely at the benefits security fencing brings to both sides of the border.'"

Migrants' Journey Through Mexico Full Of Dangers. The Washington Post (7/8, A1, Aizenman, 744K) reports that for "tens of thousands" of "impoverished Central Americans who sneak into the United States each year, the real border begins here, at Guatemala's frontier with Mexico" and "the dangerous trek through the desert into Arizona or Texas is merely the final chapter." The article gives an account of the journey from Guatemala and its hardships.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Takes Message To US Public. The White House's new strategy to garner favorable coverage in the local media met with mixed results as the national media focused on international issues. Bush's remarks on domestic issues and prediction that Republicans would keep their majority in the Congress was noted by newspapers Saturday morning.

The Washington Post (7/8, A2, Fletcher, 744K) reports called Bush's press conference "unusual and said, "Despite widespread public discontent with GOP congressional leaders, Bush predicted that Republicans will keep control of the House and Senate, allowing them to continue setting the nation's legislative agenda for the next two years." When asked if his poll numbers might hurt GOP candidates, Bush said, "You win elections by having a plan to protect the American people from terrorist attack. You win elections by having a philosophy that has actually produced results -- economic growth, for example -- or kind of changing the school systems for the better, or providing prescription drug coverage for elders."

The New York Times (7/8, Stolberg, 1.19M) notes, "members of the Chicago press did not serve up softball questions. The issue of Mr. Bush's polls came up when a reporter asked about a fund-raiser the president planned to attend for Judy Baar Topinka, the Republican candidate for Illinois governor." He "also gave an endorsement of sorts to Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special prosecutor who handled a leak investigation involving Karl Rove." He said Fitzgerald "had done a 'very professional job' in handling the leak investigation."

The AP (7/8, Burghart) reports, "Larry J. Sabato, director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics, said trips like the one to Chicago demonstrate that Bush does connect better with voters in informal sessions out of the Beltway. But he said the main problem is the unpopularity of the Iraq war." In an email Sabato said, "Until things look up in Iraq, and American troops are coming home in significant numbers, Bush's own numbers won't improve much."

Bloomberg (7/8) notes, "The administration is stressing the strength of the economy to bolster Republicans in the November elections. ``People are better off, things are working," Bush said this morning, adding that the U.S. has added more jobs for 34 straight months." But the "economy added fewer jobs in June than economists expected, reducing the urgency for further Federal Reserve interest-rate increases even as wages rose the most in five years, the Labor Department reported today."

The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Wallsten, 958K) reports, "Reinforcing the message that Bush was far outside the Beltway, he stood before a giant picture of the city skyline displaying, in giant letters, 'CHICAGO.'" The Times adds, "The overwhelmingly Democratic city in a blue state seemed a peculiar choice as a kickoff for the new White House communications strategy, particularly in light of headlines that greeted the president and his entourage Friday morning."

DOJ_NMG_0039535

The Chicago Tribune (7/8, Pearson, 643K) reports, "President Bush offered a staunch defense of Mayor Richard Daley Friday, calling him 'a great mayor' and a friend despite the federal convictions of former top Daley patronage aides on charges of rigging jobs for mayoral campaign workers." Speaking "at the Museum of Science and Industry, Bush said he could not provide an assessment of the job U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald has done on the local level in bringing corruption charges against officials in city and state government." The Tribune also notes, "In a bit of topsy-turvy politics, Bush touted the health of the state's economy by echoing Blagojevich in noting the state led the nation for job creation in April. And Bush's 2004 presidential opponent, U.S. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), appeared to side with Topinka's criticism of the Democratic governor on the issue of job creation." In a statement Kerry said, "The president praises the optimism of Illinois businesses, yet more of the state's businesses closed their doors in 2004 than new businesses were opened."

The Chicago Sun Times (7/8, Herrmann) reports, "National and local reporters asked him about a range of topics, including the North Korean crisis, the war in Iraq, foreign ownership of defense companies and skyrocketing gasoline prices." While "Daley sat to the side of the podium, Bush was reminded by a reporter that last summer, he had called Daley a 'great mayor.' ' Given the conviction Thursday of Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three others for doling out jobs and promotions to reward the mayor's political workers, the president was asked whether his assessment had changed." Bush replied, "I still think he's a great mayor. ... I'm proud to call him my friend."

New media Strategy Seen As Ineffective. In a negative analysis of the White House's new media strategy, the Chicago Tribune (7/8, Tackett, 643K) reports, "What the White House didn't say, but what was highly apparent, was that the president has decided to fully engage in the 2006 midterm elections, perhaps the last clear referendum on his presidency, and this could be a sign of the unofficial start of a campaign. Bush emphasized the good news he found in the jobs data and first quarter growth, then noted bluntly that his tax cuts were the answer. The subtle read? Democrats would raise taxes. He continued to push progress in Iraq, honoring a sacrifice made by a soldier from Hoffman Estates. Democrats, the implicit argument was, would cut and run. These are messages that he will likely be reinforcing as he travels throughout the country between now and November." And "There is logic in that. No matter how skeptical the local press corps, there is still a reflex for a red carpet for a president. Positive coverage – locally, anyway – is typically assured. WGN-TV carried the press conference live." But "if the communications czars in the White House were hoping for questions about cheesecake or the Cubs, they were roundly disappointed. And if they thought that by taking the president away from the Beltway that somehow he would be bathed in different light, the morning in Chicago proved that wrong."

Roberts Said To Be More Influential Than Kennedy On Court. Douglas W. Kmiec, professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/8, 958K), "The received wisdom at the end of the most recent Supreme Court term is that because of his swing vote, Justice Anthony Kennedy is more in control of the court than the new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr." But "it's a misleading picture" because "Kennedy alone is often deliberately speculative and partly because Roberts has at least the nascent but constructive capacity to span partisan division." And "Kennedy's theorizing reveals a mind of great intelligence but makes it more difficult to strike bargains with him." Roberts "has a conservative mind but a diplomat's nature. His abiding concern is to keep the court within bounds on legal, rather than ideological, grounds. Because that is so, he has the capacity to draw votes from both sides on controversial and pedestrian cases alike." That "overwhelms Kennedy's ability to deploy his swing vote."

House Agenda Criticized By Moderates As Not Helpful To Holding Majority. The New York Times (7/8, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "Moderate Republicans say a planned summer push by the House leadership on conservative causes like gun rights and new abortion restrictions threatens the re-election prospects of embattled centrists, who are key to the party's drive to hold Congress." Moderates are described as "frustrated and angry" due to the agenda they say is "heavy on ideological themes" and "short-sighted and ill-timed." The also "fear that this new agenda could backfire by stirring independent voters to reject centrist candidates." House leaders said that moderates "could establish their independence by voting against select initiatives if they choose" but the Times reports, "many of the must-win races are in more moderate regions of the Northeast, Midwest and suburban South and West." Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said the agenda "would allow lawmakers to vote on basic values like the 'sanctity of life' while defending the nation's founding principles."

Discovery Crew Supplies Space Station, Checks Shuttle For Damage. NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 4, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Astronauts

DOJ_NMG_0039536

continued to pore over the shuttle Discovery today with the space age equivalent of a fine-toothed comb. They used a camera on the shuttle's robotic arm to snap extreme close-ups of the shuttle's external thermal skin. The crew also moved more than two tons of supplies over to the International Space Station."

The AP (7/8), in a story carried by the Washington Times, reports, "It was moving day yesterday for the crew of Discovery, which transferred thousands of pounds of supplies and cargo from the space shuttle to the International Space Station." The AP notes, "For the first time in three years, the International Space Station has three crew members -- European Space Agency astronaut Thomas Reiter on Thursday joined Pavel Vinogradov and Jeff Williams, who marked their 100th day at the space station yesterday."

NASA Examines Detailed Photos Of Discovery's Exterior. The AP (7/8, Borenstein) reports, "NASA engineers examined new detailed pictures of space shuttle Discovery's heat shield Friday, a day before two astronauts were to embark on the most disorienting task of their 13-day mission: a wobbly spacewalk. … Astronauts spent several hours focusing the cameras on six specific 'areas of interest' on the shuttle that had been seen in earlier photographs. Engineers need more information about the heat shield to ensure there is no damage like the kind that doomed Columbia's flight in 2003." The New York Times (7/8, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "On a day devoted to moving thousands of pounds of supplies from the space shuttle Discovery to the International Space Station, engineers and analysts on the ground scrutinized images of the shuttle on Friday for damage that might cause problems in the brutal heat of re-entry. Officials said that the shuttle came through the rigors of ascent in a remarkably clean state and that they had narrowed their analysis to a few unresolved issues." The Washington Post (7/8, A7, Gugliotta, 744K) reports, "Late Friday, analysts at Houston's Johnson Space Center were still examining two slight scars on the brittle 'reinforced carbon-carbon' protecting the front edge of Discovery's starboard wing."

Discovery Mission Extended One Day For Additional Spacewalk. The AP (7/8, Borenstein) reports, "NASA managers announced that Discovery has enough fuel to stay up for a 13th day to squeeze in a third spacewalk."

ABC News Honors Discovery Astronauts As "Person Of The Week." ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 7, 3:00, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "And finally, from us, our 'Person of the Week.' We held our breath as they made history this week on top of the world. The astronauts aboard the space shuttle Discovery looked beyond the known risks, beyond the cracks of the falling foam, and set their eyes on the stars."

Information On Sailors Accidentally Exposed. Coverage of the May VA data theft is largely absent today. However, media outlets report that the Navy accidentally posted the information of 100,000 sailors. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (7/8, Hansen) reports, "Personal information from 100,000 Navy and Marine Corps aviators and crew was removed from the Naval Safety Center Web site after being accidentally posted and available to the public for six months, the center announced Friday. The information included the full names and Social Security numbers of active- and reserve-duty service members who have logged flight information with the Norfolk-based command since 1985, said spokeswoman Evelyn Odango." The Virginian-Pilot notes, "The safety center mistake is the latest in a series of public blunders by government record-keepers. In May, a laptop computer containing data for 26.5 million active-duty and retired service members was stolen from the home of an employee for the Department of Veterans Affairs. Police recovered the laptop last week."

The Washington Post (7/8, A03, White, 744K) adds, "Investigators are working to determine how the records landed on the Navy Safety Center's Web site, which officials shut down Thursday after a member of the public reported finding the full names and Social Security numbers posted. Evelyn Odango, a spokeswoman for the safety center in Norfolk, said the list had been posted since December and appeared to be 'inadvertent' and the result of 'human error.'"

Columnist Condemns Effort To Limit Judicial "Junkets." In a column in the Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M) James Q. Wilson notes efforts by the Community Rights Counsel to curtail the seminars the judges attend. Wilson writes, "The CRC regards university efforts to educate judges as 'junkets.' I am puzzled by this view because for many years I have spoken or led seminars at meetings run by the George Mason University School of Law. Most of these meetings are strictly academic exercises in which scholars talk about economic principles, statistical techniques, tort and contract law, criminal and family law, the logic and methods of science, and similar matters." Wilson also writes, "The other reason CRC calls them junkets instead of educational activities is that it thinks, for reasons that baffle me, that the groups who donate funds to these activities will influence the judges and shape their opinions. That possibility is farcical -- no donors attend the meetings, the judges do not know who the donors are, and no subject about which a donor may have a legal interest is a topic for discussion."

House GOP Leaders Said Not To Be Serious About Pork-Barrel Spending. The Boston Globe (7/8, Klein, 484K) reports, "Top leaders of the House of Representatives, who last month decried pork-barrel spending while voting to give the president a line-item veto, have helped block 40 attempts this year to remove individual special-interest 'earmark' projects from spending bills." And "the three top House leaders…have not cast a single vote against any of the projects that have been challenged by fiscal conservatives on the House floor." Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) said that "the leaders can't credibly claim to be against wasteful spending as long as they support the earmarks."

DOJ_NMG_0039537

Deficit Expected To Fall Below $300 Billion With "Surging Tax Revenues." The AP (7/8, Taylor) reports the Congressional Budget Office said Friday that, "the federal deficit appears on track to register less than $300 billion for the budget year ending Sept. 30, as surging tax revenues continue to signal significant improvement over White House estimates released in February." The administration will update its estimate on Tuesday and "put its own spin on the deficit picture." President Bush is "expected to tout the numbers as proof of the success of Bush-sponsored tax cuts in reviving economic growth and, in turn, tax revenues." And "tax collections are surging at a 13 percent growth rate."

Specter Seeks Renewal Of Funds For Pennsylvania Foster Care Program. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/8, Sherman, 261K) reports, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Penn.) "yesterday said he and other members of Pennsylvania's congressional delegation are pressuring federal officials to release $170 million meant for the state's foster care program for children." The money is "on hold" because federal Administration for Children and Families officials "discovered that the state wasn't following guidelines for reporting expenses. The state Department of Public Welfare recently adjusted its reporting procedures." Specter and Rep. Tim Murphy (R-Upper St. Clair) said that the withholding "could soon hurt thousands of children at risk of being sent into foster care." Wade F. Horn, assistant secretary for children and families, said that Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt would "carefully consider any requests from a U.S. senator."

Medicare Warning Blamed For Some Companies Ending Drug "Giveaways." CBS Evening News (7/7, story 6, 3:00, Smith, 7.66M) reports, "When a new Medicare drug plan rolled out in January the idea was to help tens of millions of older Americans and the disabled afford the prescription drugs they need." But "in some cases prescriptions that once cost them nothing, are now becoming a big financial burden." CBS (Andrews) adds, "Drugs that used to be donated by the pharmaceutical companies" were stopped by firms "because of a monumental misunderstanding." Medicare notified drug companies that "drug giveaways could be prosecuted for fraud and abuse if the companies counted the value of the donated drugs to file for reimbursement." As a result some firms reportedly stopped their "giveaways" and cited the Medicare notification as the reason. HHS inspector general Daniel Levinson was shown saying, "I just can't imagine why there would be a feeling of threat."

LATimes Muses On Bush's Aging. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, 958K) writes in an editorial, "Why was there so much fascination with George W. Bush's attainment of three-score years?" It "represents the aging of a youthful persona. Younger men than Bush have served as president…but this president is known for a number of traits associated with youthfulness." And "the question is whether that will change now that the 'frat boy' has embarked on his seventh decade."

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Report Seen As Sign Economy Slowing. ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 6, 0:20, Sawyer, 8.78M) reported, "In other economic news, a sign the overall economy is slowing. Today, the government said employers created 121,000 new jobs. A number below expectations. That news helped drive stocks down on Wall Street, where the Dow Jones average closed 132 points lower. On the NASDAQ, stocks were down 25 points."

NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 8, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A disappointing jobs report. Employers added 121,000 jobs to their American payrolls in June. Problem is analysts had expected 175,000. The unemployment rate was unchanged at 4.6%."

The New York Times/AP (7/8) reports, "Corporate profit warnings and record oil prices overshadowed a benign jobs creation report and sent stocks sharply lower Friday as investors worried that the economy was cooling too quickly. The Dow Jones industrials shed 134 points as stocks ended the week with a loss." The AP adds, "With the unemployment rate steady at 4.6 percent, the report was exactly what Wall Street had hoped for -- low unemployment, but modest job growth that won't spark a sharp increase in consumer demand, which could foreshadow inflation and interest rate hikes."

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, McKay, 2.11M) notes, "Investors lately have welcomed such disappointing economic data, seeing a reason for the Federal Reserve to stop tightening the U.S. money supply. But that was not the case Friday, because the weak payroll number was accompanied by a rise in average hourly wages, which gained eight cents to $16.70 in June, after remaining nearly flat in May."

The New York Times (7/8, Porter, 1.19M) said the "economy was slowing under the combined weight of high energy prices and rising interest rates." Yet "the government also reported that hourly wages rose at their fastest pace in five years, while the unemployment rate remained at 4.6 percent. This suggests that the labor market remains tight and may yet spur higher inflation." The Times notes, "The disparate data underscored the uncertain economic situation facing the Federal Reserve as it ponders whether to continue raising interest rates over the summer to cool the economy further or whether it is time to pause. Over the last two years, the Fed has steadily increased the benchmark federal funds rate from 1 percent to 5.25 percent."

DOJ_NMG_0039538

The Washington Post (7/8, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports, "Employers hired cautiously last month as the economy lost steam, but they added enough new jobs to hold the nation's unemployment rate steady at 4.6 percent, the Labor Department reported yesterday." Some experts "said the increase in average wages may partly reflect a shift in the job mix, as higher-paying manufacturers added to their payrolls while lower-paying retailers trimmed theirs. That could reverse in coming months as U.S. automakers proceed with plans to eliminate tens of thousands of jobs." The Washington Times (7/8, Hill, 90K) and the Financial Times (7/8, Swann, Hughes) report similar details.

The Bloomberg (7/8) adds, "The Dow average tumbled 134.63, or 1.2 percent, to 11,090.67, the most since June 5. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index fell 8.60, or 0.7 percent, to 1265.48. The Nasdaq Composite Index, which gets 41 percent of its value from computer-related shares, dropped 25.03, or 1.2 percent, to 2130.06."

Oil Prices Climbing. NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 6, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It's summer and the price of gas and oil is climbing along with the temperatures outside. During today's trading, oil surged to a record $75.55 a barrel before falling back down to $74.09. In plain English, in the last four years, a barrel of oil has gone up in price almost $50 in four years' time. With gas pushing $3 a gallon, we are in for a rough patch on the American road."

The Financial Times (7/8, Hoyos) reports, "International oil prices rose to a new record on Friday as US drivers took to the roads on their annual summer holiday." An increase "to $75.78 a barrel – stoked fears that inflation could rise, leading share prices in the US and Europe lower." Experts "said the rise made it more likely that the US Federal Reserve and other central banks would increase interest rates, especially as pressure from high oil prices showed no sign of weakening soon."

Election Experts Say Democrats Will Seek To Nationalize Congressional Elections. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (7/8, Skiba, 266K) reports under the headline, "All Bets Off For Midterm Elections," that "most election-watchers aren't wagering on which party will control the House and Senate. But some say the House appears more up for grabs than the Senate." Still "one thing is certain, though. Democrats will try to nationalize the races while Republicans cast them as local contests." At a George Washington University event this week, six experts "were split on whether trends predict an anti-incumbent year or even an anti-Washington year."

Senator Clinton Campaigns For Angelides. The Oakland Tribune (7/8, Richman) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton campaigned for California Treasurer and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides. Clinton "keynoted the minimum-$1,000-per-head event at the St. Regis Hotel and briefly addressed reporters afterward. But the purported 2008 presidential candidate departed amid reporters' shouted questions on topics such as same-sex marriage, which Angelides supports and she opposes. She said she has known Angelides since he was the California Democratic Party's chairman as her husband, Bill Clinton, first ran for president."

Angelides Advisor Won't Apologize For Comparing Schwarzenegger To Kim Jong Il. The San Francisco Chronicle's Politics blog (7/8,Marinucci) reports on the "increasingly crazy dustup over State Treasurer Phil Angelides' strategist Bob Mulholland, and his comments comparing Governor Schwarzenegger's lifts, or shoes, or whatever, to Korean dictator Kim Jong Il. Angelides, appearing in Sacramento this morning, was asked about the comment, said the comments were 'inappropriate and I've told my team let's knock off the personal attacks.' But that didn't satisfy Fox News conservative talk show bulldog Sean Hannity, who tried to engaged liberal bulldog Mulholland this afternoon." Hannity: "Mr. Mulholland, why don't you just apologize and say you're wrong?" Muholland: "Oh, It was a joke. Schwarzenegger loves making fun of people and he loves people making fun of him ... so if Schwarzzennger can stand the heat, he can get out of the kitchen."

Gore To Speak To Wal-Mart Managers. The AP (7/8, Kabel) reports, "Former Vice President Al Gore will take his campaign against global warming to Wal-Mart Stores Inc. next week, speaking at Wal-Mart headquarters to executives seeking to make the world's largest retailer more environmentally friendly." Gore "will talk to a quarterly conference of Wal-Mart managers working on ways to implement Chief Executive Lee Scott's plans to make the retailer a leader in cutting emissions, energy use and solid waste and selling more environmentally friendly products."

Edwards Urges Regulation Of "Payday Lenders" In Iowa. The AP (7/8) reports former Sen. John Edwards, "a White House hopeful, focused on the problem of predatory lenders in his first swing through Iowa since a statewide poll gave his potential presidential campaign a boost." Edwards called for new regulations on "payday lenders." He "spent Friday raising money for Democratic candidate David Loebsack's long-shot challenge against Rep. Jim Leach."

DOJ_NMG_0039539

Biden Defends Remark About Indian-Americans. The AP (7/8, Sidoti) reports, "Facing criticism, potential 2008 presidential candidate Joe Biden on Friday defended his recent remark that 'you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent.'" Biden is "known as one of the more long-winded senators." He said that he "has had an 'incredibly strong' relationship with the Indian-American community in Delaware and that his comment was misinterpreted."

Democratic Divisions Over War Revealed In Primary Contests. The Washington Post (7/8, 4:58 AM, Sidoti, 744K) reports, "Intent on seizing control of Congress, Democrats want to keep the focus on President Bush's missteps in Iraq. Yet the war is fracturing the party in a handful of House and Senate races" which "pit the party's liberal wing…against moderates favored by Democratic leaders in Washington." And "such primary clashes are drawing unwanted attention to Democratic divisions on the war while raising questions about whether the Democrats' competing factions are, in effect, torpedoing the party's chances to make 2006 a referendum on Bush's handling of Iraq." Still "Democrats remain optimistic about winning control of the GOP-run Congress by capitalizing on voter dissatisfaction with Bush, Republicans and the war."

Lieberman Challenge Is Chief Example. Newsweek (7/8, Darman, Braiker) reports in a "Web Exclusive," Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) is "fighting off a tough challenge from Greenwich businessman Ned Lamont. Lieberman's main vulnerability: steadfast support for the war in Iraq." In an interview Lieberman said that "Mostly people are talking about the economy" when he travels the state on his campaign. And "If it was not for my position on the war in Iraq, I don't believe there would be a primary against me." Lieberman's challenger Ned Lamont said that "the No. 1 question I get" is "rather than spending $250 million a day in Iraq, how come we're not investing in universal health care for every American?"

Lieberman's Stance On Iraq Is Not His Only Liability For Liberal Voters. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Cummings, 2.11M) reports that Sen. Joseph Lieberman has lost support not only because of his support for the war in Iraq, but because "the moderate persona that helped Mr. Lieberman…score an upset victory for the Senate seat in 1988 dulls his appeal today to an energized partisan base. Time spent away from home to campaign for higher office in 2000 and 2004 -- when he sought the presidential nomination -- weakened critical home-state ties. And his penchant for lacing policy or political choices with moral or religious messages now sounds patronizing to some voters. 'His problems have been building over time and the war was the last straw for many of the party's more liberal voters,' says Jennifer Duffy, a political analyst with the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

Steele Continues To Raise More Than Cardin. The Washington Times (7/8, Ward, 90K) reports Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) "raised more than $1.8 million for his U.S. Senate campaign in this year's second quarter, according to an internal campaign memo." That is "Steele's highest quarterly fundraising total since announcing his candidacy last fall." He has also "raised more money per quarter since entering the race than the leading Democratic fundraiser, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin."

Harris To Undergo Surgery. The AP (7/8) reports Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.) "announced Friday she will undergo surgery later this month to remove an ovarian mass, which will be tested to determine if it is malignant." She will "visit Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington for preoperative testing Monday, her campaign office said in a statement."

DeLay Seen As Possible Candidate In TX22. The AP (7/8) reports, "Former U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay suggested Friday that he may not be ready for retirement just yet, a day after a federal judge ruled that his name must remain on the November ballot even though he resigned from Congress." DeLay "also criticized U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks' ruling that the former House majority leader's name had to remain on the ballot." DeLay, asked if "he now planned to run" said that he would "wait and see what the 5th Circuit does on appeal." The Texas Republican Party "appealed to the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans immediately after Sparks' ruling Thursday in Austin." DeLay "won the Republican primary in March" and Democrats "sued to keep the GOP from removing DeLay's name from the ballot. Republicans want to name a replacement nominee."

The Houston Chronicle (7/8, Mack, 581K) reports DeLay "told a friendly crowd Friday that Democrats seeking to force him onto the November ballot 'may get exactly what they want.' After savoring a standing ovation, he quickly said the comment was not an announcement that he will seek the office he vacated last month." DeLay spoke at a "previously scheduled tribute, co-sponsored by the Greater Houston Partnership and the Fort Bend Chamber of Commerce." DeLay also said, "Only in this country can the federal judiciary force someone to run for office."

DOJ_NMG_0039540

LATimes Urges Americans To Save More. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, 958K) writes in an editorial, "According to a string of recent gloomy studies, most people are kidding themselves if they think they'll have enough gold during their golden years." But "if there is a silver lining in all this doom and gloom, it's the small but growing number of employers who are trying to help workers save more." Meanwhile, "it would be nice if instead of focusing on tax relief for the wealthy, Congress were more inventive in devising savings programs for less-affluent workers." Yet "any of these savings plans also requires a bit of a cultural readjustment for Americans to put aside more for retirement."

Pastor Allied With The President And Governor Bush Calls Islam A "Dangerous…Cult." The Miami Herald (7/8, Simon, 323K) reports the Rev. O'Neal Dozier, "a Broward clergyman who has advised President Bush and is a political appointee of Gov. Jeb Bush, took to the air waves Friday to criticize Islam as a 'cult' religion." Dozier is quoted as saying, "'The Islamic religion in my view is a cult" and "dangerous." The Herald adds, "The radio appearance by Dozier, who serves on the governor's committee that screens Broward judicial nominees, startled a local Muslim leader, and prompted the governor to immediately distance himself from the statements. Reached later in the day by The Miami Herald, a contrite Dozier said he was 'concerned' his comments could jeopardize his position on Broward's Judicial Nominating Commission. But he did not disavow those comments." The Herald goes on to report, "On Friday, the White House referred a reporter to previous remarks by the president on Islam, including a 2002 meeting in the Oval Office with United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan. At that time, the president condemned blanket criticisms of Islam, saying they 'do not reflect the sentiments of my government or the sentiments of most Americans. Islam, as practiced by the vast majority of people, is a peaceful religion, a religion that respects others,' Bush said. On Friday, Gov. Bush's office issued a statement distancing him from Dozier. 'Gov. Bush in no way shares Rev. Dozier's views on Islam,' said Alia Faraj, Bush's spokeswoman."

Veterans Issues At Forefront In Minnesota Races. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (7/8, Smith, 424K) reports, "A proposal to protect soldiers' homes from foreclosure is a sign of the prominence veterans' issue may have in this year's election. A preview of the importance of issues involving soldiers and the Iraq War in this summer's election campaigns went on display at the state Capitol Thursday. Stiffer state and federal penalties for companies that attempt illegal foreclosures on deployed members of the military were proposed by two DFLers, state Rep. Matt Entenza, a candidate for attorney general, and Tim Walz, a 24-year Minnesota National Guard member who is running for Congress." The Star Tribune adds, "Appearing with Entenza and Walz was U.S. Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., a 2008 exploratory presidential candidate who was in the Twin Cities for a little politicking of his own. Bayh is a member of the Armed Services Committee and is proposing similar legislation toughening the foreclosure violations."

Bush Stresses Patience, Diplomatic Approach To North Korea. At what was described as a wide-ranging press conference designed by the White House to emphasize domestic issues, the national media focused mainly on President Bush's response to North Korea's recent missile launches. The two main themes on the subject involved questions about the Administration's diplomatic efforts to convince the international community to pressure North Korea to end its nuclear weapons program and the capability of the US' missile defense system. Bush reiterated his intention to convince the international community to pressure North Korea and avoid direct talks, but an AP (7/8) story published early this morning reports, "A U.S. envoy expressed support for China's proposal to hold informal six-party talks on the North Korean nuclear threat and offered to meet bilaterally with North Korea on the sidelines of those discussions."

Bush's remarks stressing a patient, diplomatic approach to North Korea were carried on all three nightly network news programs. Providing the most extensive characterization of Bush's remarks, NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 3, 2:20, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush repeatedly lowered expectations today, not only over what North Korea will do next but he played down the pace of diplomatic progress and even the expectations of U.S. missile defense." He "exhibited caution, careful not to oversell." President Bush: "I think we had a reasonable chance of shooting it down." O'Donnell: "While the president labeled the North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il a dangerous man who must disarm, the president was notably careful to distance himself when asked today about intelligence assessments that North Korea has increased its nuclear weapons capability while Mr. Bush has been in office." President Bush: "I just thought for a minute you might have known more than I do about, when you say, definitively say, he's increased the number of weapons. I don't think we know that."

Focusing on Bush's cautious assessment of the US missile defense system, ABC World News Tonight (7/7, story 4, 2:00, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported Bush "said there was no certainty that America's $95 billion missile defense system could have intercepted the North Korean missile." President Bush: "Our missile systems are modest. Our anti-ballistic missile systems are modest. I think we had a reasonable chance of shooting it down. At least that's what the military commanders have told me." At the end of its story ABC's Sawyer noted that "a number of us watching that press conference today noted how many times the President talked about hard problems with long-term solutions. You, too?" Raddatz: "Yes, Patience, Patience, Patience. The President said that six times today during that press conference. He is trying to calm the situation. He does not want to turn it into a crisis. Diplomacy is the keyword here."

DOJ_NMG_0039541

The CBS Evening News (7/7, story 4, 2:00, Smith, 7.66M) focused mainly on Japan's response to North Korea, but opened its story noting, "Bush stressed again that he wants a peaceful solution to the North Korean missile dispute but said diplomacy takes time." At the end of its story CBS (Petersen) added, "Amid these tensions, U.S. Envoy Christopher Hill met with Chinese officials hoping they can pressure North Korea into returning to talks on the north's nuclear weapons." Hill: "At the same time we are also going to take measures to protect ourselves." Petersen: "Could harsh words between Japan and North Korea escalate into military conflict? That's the problem with the North, that its leader is prone to irrational actions. So the Japanese military is being told tonight keep your eyes open and your ammunition ready."

President Bush was characterized as frustrated and on the defensive by some newspapers. The Washington Post (7/8, A2, Fletcher, 744K) says Bush "defended his response to the budding crisis spawned by North Korea's missile tests, saying he will not 'get caught in the trap of sitting alone with North Korea at the table.'"

The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Wallsten, Farley, 958K) in an article titled "Bush Strongly Defends His N. Korea Policies" reports, "President Bush on Friday defended his administration's policies on North Korea, questioning claims that the regime in Pyongyang had grown more dangerous since he entered the White House." The Times notes, "White House officials fear that the issue of North Korea's missiles has contributed to public doubts about Bush's foreign policy record in an election year. Republicans hope that Bush's tough stand on national security will be a winning issue for them with voters."

The Boston Globe (7/8, Klein, 484K) reports, "Despite his frustrations over the process, Bush's comments signaled a patient approach toward North Korea." The Globe notes, "Asked whether the US military, stretched by simultaneous wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, could sustain a third conflict with North Korea, Bush said he wouldn't answer hypothetical questions. A few minutes later, he questioned a reporter's assertion that North Korea -- which tested medium- and long-range missiles earlier this week -- has increased its nuclear arsenal. 'I don't think we know that,' Bush said."

The AP (7/8, Hunt) in an article titled "Bush Expresses Frustration With Diplomacy" reports, "Asked if he felt a sense of urgency in dealing with North Korea and Iran, Bush said, 'I'm realistic about how things move in the world.' He said he wanted diplomatic rather than military solutions."

The New York Times (7/8, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "Bush by turns argued that Mr. Kim was untrustworthy -- he cited the country's violation of a 1994 accord with the Clinton administration -- and that the only path was to negotiate with him. But he rejected conducting one-on-one negotiations, insisting that he needed China and other neighbors at the table so that Mr. Kim did not make the United States to appear the blockade to an agreement." He rejected "the criticism by Democrats who say such talks would be the only way to break the logjam." Yet "in citing anew the need to team up with China and South Korea, Mr. Bush was skipping past the warnings of members of his own administration that neither country would agree to sanctions. Both are worried about a North Korean collapse, and both have continued supplying North Korea with food, energy and investment -- even while Japan and the United States try to turn off the spigot." He "has been careful never to criticize either country publicly. But he seemed to do so obliquely when he said, with some frustration in his voice."

The Financial Times (7/8, Daniel) reports, "Bush ruled out bilateral talks with North Korea on Friday, saying that the US would respond to Pyongyang's long-range missile tests through the United Nations Security Council." He "admitted that the diplomatic route could be 'slow and cumbersome' but said he was 'not going to get caught in a trap of sitting at a table alone with North Korea.' He added: 'What matters most of all is for Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice.'"

The Washington Times (7/8, Curl, 90K) notes, "Japan's Ambassador Kenzo Oshima said he wanted a vote on the draft today if possible, yet he and other diplomats said negotiations continued on the resolution. That raised the possibility that the decision to introduce the resolution was, in part, a negotiating tactic meant to win concessions from China and Russia."

Bloomberg (7/8) notes Bush said the UN "must send a clear message to North Korea's leader to disarm and that 'rallying world opinion' takes time." He also "said next weekend's meeting of the Group of Eight leaders…will be an opportunity to send a clear message as Iran considers an incentives package aimed at curtailing the country's program. China and Russia have opposed harsh sanctions."

North Korea Will Return To Talks If Foreign Funds Unfrozen. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Demick, 958K) reports, "North Korea will return to talks on its nuclear program if the United States releases $24 million in frozen funds held in a bank in Macao, a senior diplomat said in an interview published today." The Times continues, "In the most explicit statement of its demands since a barrage of missile tests Wednesday, North Korea's deputy ambassador to the United Nations, Han Song Ryol, said his country was looking for a 'minimal gesture to restore trust.'"

DOJ_NMG_0039542

US Supports Resolution Against North Korea, But Seeks Unified Voice. The Washington Post (7/8, A8, Lynch, 744K) reports, "Japan presented the Security Council on Friday with a tough revised draft resolution that would condemn North Korea's missile tests and ban states from supplying or buying goods or technology that could help Pyongyang upgrade its ballistic missile program or advance its nuclear weapons program. The resolution is backed by the United States and European allies, over Chinese and Russian concerns that it will exacerbate tensions in the region, according to U.N. diplomats." U.S. ambassador John R. Bolton said, "We are very pleased with this draft," but he added "that Washington and its allies are receptive to further negotiations with Beijing and Moscow." Still, "Bolton and others have expressed confidence they have the support of 13 of the council's 15 members for a binding resolution under Chapter Seven of the U.N. Charter, a provision that can be enforced by sanctions or, in some cases, the use of military force," and "U.S. and European officials remain confident that Russia and China will not veto the resolution." However, But China's ambassador, Wang Guangya, said that 'all options are open,'" and "warned the council in a closed-door meeting that a vote on the sanctions resolution would 'destroy' the prospects for a unified response."

The New York Times (7/8, Hoge, Onisho, 1.19M) adds, "The decision to put the resolution to a vote followed meetings Thursday and Friday involving Japan and the five permanent members of the Council…that failed to establish common ground." Bolton said "We want a resolution. It should be Chapter VII, and I think that's clear. The level of provocation engaged in by these North Korean missile launches warrants that, and we're going to proceed." The UPI (7/8) reports, "Bolton also said those countries that have 'leverage' over North Korea 'bear the responsibility' for bringing the country back to the negotiating table." Kyodo (7/8) adds that Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "confirmed to continue bilateral cooperation in efforts to have the international community issue a united, resolute, and clear message from the Security Council."

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, A4, Fairclough, King, 2.11M) notes, "President Bush, speaking in Chicago, said the whole effort going into the weekend was to get all members of the Security Council to say 'loud and clear, here are some red lines.'" However, the AFP (7/8, Aziakou) reports, "the US president noticeably did not make a public push for sanctions against Pyongyang, as the haggling went on at the UN."

AP (7/8, Wadhams) adds, "One senior U.S. official said it was unlikely that the draft would be voted on over the weekend, because diplomats want to give China, the North's main ally, time to talk to Pyongyang." Knight Ridder (7/8, Landay) reports that a "U.S. official, who sought anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said the United States was trying to persuade Japan not to call for an immediate vote in order to allow more diplomacy, including talks that a senior Chinese official is scheduled to hold in Pyongyang next week. Meanwhile, the Bush administration was refining a number of punitive measures it could take unilaterally, including pressuring foreign banks that deal with North Korea to stop doing so, said five U.S. officials, who requested anonymity."

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M) lists facts leading up to and about the current confrontation, and quotes several people about it, including Ivan Oelrich, of the Federation of American Scientists, who said, "I think that Kim Jong Il is insane. It's a very bad situation. It's unfortunate. It's very, very difficult to see how this is going to end nicely."

US Trying To Gain China's Support For North Korea Response. The New York Times (7/8, Hoge, Onisho, 1.19M) reports, Assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs "Christopher R. Hill, the top American negotiator with North Korea, was in Seoul, South Korea, trying to rally support in that region for a tough, unified response to the North's testing of seven missiles on Wednesday." He previously "met with Chinese officials, including Li Zhaoxing, the foreign minister, in Beijing before arriving in Seoul on Friday evening," but "it did not appear that he had made progress in persuading the Chinese to endorse sanctions." Next, "Hill is expected to meet South Korean officials over the weekend before flying to Tokyo and Moscow, but he gave an indication on Friday of the message he is expected to convey," saying, "We shouldn't have business as usual with a country that's been firing off missiles like this in this rather reckless way." The Financial Times (7/8, Turner, Fifield) notes, "Mr Hill can expect a slightly warmer reception during talks in South Korea on Saturday, although he will still encounter difficulties in persuading Seoul to take actions that would hurt Pyongyang financially."

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, A4, Fairclough, King, 2.11M) adds, "President Bush, in a Chicago news conference Friday, touched on" China's reluctance to confront North Korea. While the missile tests put China in a tough spot, calling into question its policy of patient diplomacy and its economic support to encourage change in Pyongyang," it remains "far from clear" if they "will be enough to overcome Beijing's extreme reluctance to use pressure as a diplomatic tool." Still, "Calling the moment a critical test of China's new high-profile role on the international stage, the U.S. is urging Beijing to alter course and use its considerable leverage as North Korea's most important trading partner to get Pyongyang to return to talks on its nuclear program," and "has appealed to Beijing's pride, saying that it risks diminishing its standing on the world stage if it can't use its influence even to moderate the behavior of one of its closest neighbors."

DOJ_NMG_0039543

The AP (7/8, Coleman) reports, "U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill held talks Saturday with Chun Young-woo, South Korea's top negotiator in international nuclear talks, on the North Korean missile tests." Hill said, "We will be much more effective if we can speak with one voice." Also, South Korea's Yonhap news agency quoted Han Song Ryol, deputy chief of North Korea's mission to the United Nations in New York, "as saying North Korea is willing to return to the six-nation talks if it is allowed to withdraw its money frozen in accounts of a bank blacklisted by the United States."

South Korea Brings Pressure To Bear On North. The New York Times (7/8, Hoge, Onisho, 1.19M) reports, "South Korea said Friday that it would go ahead with four-day, high-level ministerial talks with North Korea next week in Pusan, South Korea. But South Korea said that it would delay shipments of food and fertilizer to the North and that it had turned down an offer, made by North Korea several days before the launchings, to hold military talks."

The Financial Times (7/8, Turner, Fifield) adds, "South Korea is breaking with its usual placatory approach towards the North" and "moving away from its traditional stance of trying to avoid antagonising Pyongyang in a bid for longer-term reconciliation." However, "economic co-operation projects with the North will continue, meaning its actions will have little effect on Kim Jong-il's regime."

Japan Takes Threat From North Korea Seriously. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Wallace, 958K) reports, "North Korea's rockets may have landed short of Japan, but they still made a strong impression on a country with a collective loathing for its Stalinist neighbor." Japan's trade with North Korea has declined in recent years, so it has lost some leverage economically over North Korea. To make up for it, "Japan has focused on building a capability to shoot down incoming missiles, as well as proceeding with a faster, deeper integration of its military alliance with the United States." For example, "Japan's spending on missile defense is growing even as it cuts its overall defense budget. Research has given way to acceptance of the idea of having missiles on its soil. And restrictions on military exports were lifted to allow Japanese companies to share technology with U.S. firms."

WSJournal Argues Against Appeasing North Korea. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M) editorializes that it is "amazing…that serious people purport to believe…after 20 years of contrary evidence," that Kim Jong Il "wants direct talks with the U.S. leading to security guarantees, normalization of ties and an end to Pyongyang's economic isolation" and that "North Korea and the U.S. were headed" there "until the Bush crew started talking about the 'axis of evil' and pre-emption, thereby provoking Kim's current discontent." Actually, with a history of threats leading to concessions, "Kim is hardly crazy to conclude that if he just threatens enough, the U.S. will deliver what he wants sooner or later." We should not "repeat the mistakes of the past. And the worst mistake would be to reward Kim once again for violating his commitments by sending him more money and more diplomatic prestige."

Economists Say AIDS Should Be World's Top Priority. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (7/8, 2.11M), Kimberley A. Stassel writes about Bjorn Lomborg. Stassel writes, "In 2004, he invited eight of the world's top economists -- including four Nobel Laureates -- to Copenhagen, where they were asked to evaluate the world's problems, think of the costs and efficiencies attached to solving each, and then produce a prioritized list of those most deserving of money. The well-publicized results (and let it be said here that Mr. Lomborg is no slouch when it comes to promoting himself and his work) were stunning. While the economists were from varying political stripes, they largely agreed. The numbers were just so compelling: $1 spent preventing HIV/AIDS would result in about $40 of social benefits, so the economists put it at the top of the list (followed by malnutrition, free trade and malaria). In contrast, $1 spent to abate global warming would result in only about two cents to 25 cents worth of good; so that project dropped to the bottom."

US, Russia To Create Civilian Nuclear Pact. The Washington Post (7/8, A1, Baker, 744K) reports, "President Bush has decided to permit extensive U.S. civilian nuclear cooperation with Russia for the first time, administration officials said yesterday, reversing decades of bipartisan policy in a move that would be worth billions of dollars to Moscow but could provoke an uproar in Congress." He "plans to announce his decision at a meeting with Putin in St. Petersburg next Saturday before the annual summit of leaders from the Group of Eight," and "Administration officials confirmed the president's decision yesterday only after it was first learned from outside nuclear experts privy to the situation." Although "Bush resisted such a move for years, insisting that Russia first stop building a nuclear power station for Iran near the Persian Gulf," U.S. officials have "concluded that President Vladimir Putin has become a more constructive partner in trying to pressure Tehran to give up any aspirations for nuclear weapons." The move "would be critical to Bush's plan to spread civilian nuclear energy to power-hungry countries because Russia would provide a place to send the used radioactive material," and, "Since Russia is already a nuclear state, such an agreement, once drafted, presumably would conform to the Atomic Energy Act and therefore would not require congressional approval."

G-8 Talks To See Push For Energy Security Pact. The Washington Times (7/8, Stuhldreher, 90K) reports, "American and European officials are pressing for an agreement on energy security with Russia at the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg next week." Assistant energy secretary for international affairs Karen Harbert "stressed energy as a main theme for President Bush in the talks, including a bilateral summit with Russian President Vladimir Putin." She "insisted an agreement could be reached in St. Petersburg because the United States and Russia have the same interest in maximizing Russia's energy exports." However, "critics…say lack of a unified front from Europe on the issue and necessity for Russian cooperation on negotiations with Iran greatly limit the United States' leverage to push Mr. Putin for reform."

DOJ_NMG_0039544

NYTimes Calls On G-8 Leaders To Demand Russian Democracy. The New York Times (7/8, 1.19M) editorializes, "the international acceptance that Mr. Putin craves will quickly disappear if the Kremlin continues its march toward what critics call a 'staged democracy instead of a real one." A "list of concerns has grown steadily during Mr. Putin's stewardship," including the disappearance of a free press, the lack of an independent judiciary, and government harassment of nongovernmental organizations. While "Mr. Putin's Russia is still far better than it was during the bleak decades of Communism," the G-8 leader "need to make it clear to Russia that membership demands not only the power of wealth but also a democratic government to go with it."

Investors Appear Willing To Overlook Russian Flaws In Return For Oil Shares. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, White, 2.11M) reports, "When President Bush meets with Vladimir Putin Friday, he will have a chance to express his concerns about the Russian leader's policies. The day before, investors will have a chance to do the same" with when "the $10 billion initial public offering by the state oil company, OAO Rosneft, is scheduled to be priced." However, "investors seem so eager for a piece of Russia's oil riches that they are willing to overlook Mr. Putin's curbs on democracy and heavy-handed economic policies." Still, James Fenkner, a Moscow fund manager, warns, "Betting against the Kremlin has been a very poor strategy over the last few years."

Gazprom Reports Record Profits. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Walters, Smith, 2.11M) reports," OAO Gazprom reported 2005 net profit of 311.1 billion rubles, or $10.98 billion based on last year's exchange rates -- higher than any Russian company has ever recorded -- on the back of rising natural-gas prices and its acquisition of Sibneft." However, "State-owned Gazprom's international ambitions have raised concerns that the company may be focusing on infrastructural projects that create headlines -- like new gas pipelines under the Baltic Sea to Germany and across Siberia to China -- at the expense of developing its vast reserves to meet future demand." Still, "Many people say rising revenues from oil and gas exports have allowed Russian politicians to assume a new assertiveness in world affairs."

Kremlin Curtails US-Financed Radio Broadcasts To Russians. The New York Times (7/8, Chivers, 1.19M) reports American-financed radio news broadcasts to Russia have been "sharply curtailed in recent months under legal pressure from the Russian government," according to Russian and American officials. The pressure has "knocked programs off the air in much of the country, limiting the Russian-language news broadcasts of Voice of America and Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty almost entirely" to Moscow and St. Petersburg. The suppression of the Western-financed news, which the Times notes began last year "weeks after a journalist for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty infuriated the Kremlin" by interviewing Chechen rebel leader Shamil Basayev, has been "indirect but highly effective," officials said. An official at the State Department told the Times Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other officials had "raised the issue with Russia, without result."

As Economy Rebounds, Russian Tourism Industry Declines. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, P1, Sesser, 2.11M) reports that as nations in Eastern Europe and the Baltic states "are now opening up to travelers," the number of tourists visiting Russia is declining. According to the Journal, travelers are "being driven away by a severe shortage of hotel rooms in major cities like Moscow and St. Petersburg, as well as apartment-rental scams; prices that are shockingly high for food, hotels and private transport; and by a visa system so draconian that you can literally be snatched off the street by the police if just one stamp on the papers you're required to carry with you at all times isn't in order." With Russia experiencing "an economic rebound driven by surging prices for its main exports, oil and gas," the Journal says tourism "simply isn't a top priority at the moment" for Russia's leadership.

Racism "Sweeping Across Russia." The Boston Globe (7/8, Parfitt, 484K) reports that St. Petersburg is "an incubator for one of Russia's most pressing crises: violent racism." There has been "a wave of racist beatings and slayings sweeping across Russia," and the problem is "compounded by government missteps and inaction." Amnesty International this year "accused Russian police of consistently downplaying hate crimes throughout the country by classifying them as hooliganism."

Strategic Accord On Agenda For Kazakh President's Visit. The Washington Times (7/8, Sands, 90K) reports that in "the latest sign of the Bush administration's desire for closer ties with the huge, oil-rich Central Asian nation, despite lingering concerns over" resident Nursultan Nazarbayev 's "record on press freedoms and political liberties," Kazakh Foreign Minister Kasymzhomart Tokayev said "the United States and Kazakhstan hope to sign a wide-ranging 'strategic partnership' accord when President Nursultan Nazarbayev travels to Washington in September." Somewhat "by default, Kazakhstan has emerged as the critical U.S. ally in the region," but "closer ties are still complicated by aspects of Mr. Nazarbayev's rule, at a time when President Bush has put promoting democracy at the heart of his foreign policy agenda."

DOJ_NMG_0039545

Pro-Moscow Parties Ascendant In Ukraine After Orange Revolution Bloc Collapses. The New York Times (7/8, Myers, 1.19M) reports that President Viktor A. Yushchenko of Ukraine "suffered a new political defeat on Friday when his fragile coalition collapsed in acrimony two weeks after it was formed." Now "His opponents, joined by a former ally of the president, announced a new coalition and pledged to nominate as prime minister the man Mr. Yushchenko ultimately defeated" in 2004. This "cast new doubts on Mr. Yushchenko's presidency, undermining his efforts to steer Ukraine on a course more closely entwined with Europe. He faces the possibility of an opposition government and prime minister opposed to his policy of joining the European Union, NATO and the World Trade Organization."

The Washington Post (7/8, A11, Finn, 744K) adds, "the unstable alliance that led the Orange Revolution" had "dissolved into familiar back-stabbing after its smallest member, the Socialists, broke ranks to get its own man elected to a parliamentary post." This "recent political turmoil and indecision in Ukraine have frustrated the European Union and the United States," which "had hoped to see the country well along in restructuring necessary to open it to Western institutions and greater foreign investment."

US Trade Representative Chastises Europe, Rising Economic Powers For WTO Trade Talk Deadlock. The Washington Times (7/8, Sparshott, 90K) reports that U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab "said the U.S. would not give up on global trade talks that have deadlocked, and she chastised India, Brazil and other rising economic powers for contributing too little to negotiations." She "faulted Europe for proposals she called 'vague' and 'full of loopholes.' But she also called on India, Brazil and China to acknowledge their growing economic clout, rather than seeking some of the same protection as the world's poorest nations."

Israel Hints It Might Free Palestinians If Soldier Is Freed. The Financial Times (7/8, Biedermann) reports, "The Israeli government, under increasing criticism for its Gaza offensive, indicated for the first time on Friday that it might be willing to free Palestinian prisoners in exchange for the release of a captured soldier," when "Public security minister Avi Dichter said jailed Palestinians could be freed as a 'reciprocal gesture' after the 19-year-old corporal Gilad Shalit was returned." Meanwhile, the European Union "levelled its harshest criticism at Israel yet," when Finnish prime minister Matti Vanhanen, whose country holds the EU's rotating presidency, said, "The EU condemns the loss of lives caused by disproportionate use of force by the Israeli Defence Forces and the humanitarian crisis it has aggravated."

The AP (7/8, El Deeb) adds, "Israel sent conflicting signals Friday on whether it would be willing to swap Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Shalit's release. Public Security Minister Avi Dichter suggested Israel could be ready to cut a deal that would include Israel freeing some Palestinian prisoners as a goodwill gesture," while "Officials close to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert later said Dichter's statement did not reflect the views of the government and that Israel insists on the soldier's unconditional release. However, the government did not issue a formal statement distancing itself from the minister." On the other side, "moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said he has won Israeli assurances that it would reciprocate for Shalit's release by freeing some prisoners, as well as Hamas politicians it has rounded up in recent days." The Washington Post (7/8, A8, Wilson, 744K) and New York Times (7/8, Erlanger, 1.19M) also mention Dichter's comments.

Israel Continues Push Into Gaza. NBC Nightly News (7/7, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) was the only network news program to cover the continuing violence in Gaza, reporting that Israel's push into Gaza "showed no signs of letting up," and "Palestinian militants are taking it into a nasty street fight." Israeli Chief of Staff Dan Halutz: "There is no excuse whatsoever to operate from Gaza against Israel once we left Gaza totally." Fletcher: "But the militants here say their aim is to draw the Israelis into urban war and they think they're succeeding."

The Washington Post (7/8, A8, Wilson, 744K) reports that Israelis continue to make progress "so slowly against gunmen outwardly undaunted… many from the armed wing of the governing Hamas movement." The "Hamas forces were joined in large numbers by gunmen from the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the armed wing of the Fatah movement, which suffered the bulk of the day's casualties." Meanwhile "Israeli officials acknowledged Friday that ground operations in Gaza -- Israel's first in nearly a year since evacuating the area -- could last for some time." The New York Times (7/8, Erlanger, 1.19M) adds, "Israeli troops mostly held their ground, securing positions in northern Gaza taken on Thursday."

Israeli Incursion Unifies Palestinians. The New York Times (7/8, Erlanger, 1.19M), "There is a sudden, pressured unity of Palestinian factions, whose militants have been fighting one another for months in Gaza since Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority after winning at the polls. Even the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, and prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, have been thrown together in their inability to resolve the case of Corporal Shalit, which seems to be in the hands of Hamas leaders in exile. But few here expect this unity to last much beyond this current crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0039546

Reporter Argues Progress Will Come Slowly. Eleanor Clift writes in a column in Newsweek (7/8), "Brinkmanship is a way of life in the Middle East," and we must "decipher whether the ongoing crisis is the first phase of the next war, or just another roadblock on the ever elusive path to peace." Part of the problem is, "as one Israeli journalist told us, this conflict is not about lines on a map; it's about intimacy" as well as "legitimacy and safety, and until both sides achieve some modicum of well being, or deterrence, there will be no peace." Still, former Prime Minister Shimon Peres, "does point to glimmers of progress. There are Arab voices speaking up for the first time against the taking of the Israeli soldier." Such "change in the Middle East is made slowly and painfully if it's made at all."

Tension Rises As Obrador Prepares Protests Of Mexican Election Count. The New York Times (7/8, Mckinley, Thompson, 1.19M) reports, "Mexico hung in limbo on Friday, as tensions rose between those seeking a recount in the presidential race and those seeking to accept Felipe Calderón as the winner and move on." This "election has exposed deep divides in society, along class and regional lines" and "put the strength of the young democracy to its toughest test." Supporters of Andrés Manuel López Obrador "girded for fights in court and on the streets, beginning with a rally scheduled for Saturday," and "Mr. López Obrador, who has made a career of challenging elections, prepared to try to prove that the electoral system remained flawed." He "left little doubt at a news conference on Thursday that he was considering mass marches as a next step" should the court not order a recount."

The Los Angeles Times (7/8, Tobar, Boudreaux, 958K) adds, "Top aides to leftist candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador… edged close to demanding that the entire vote be nullified." His "camp revealed a two-part strategy to deny a victory to conservative Felipe Calderon:" They are "insisting on a recount" and alleging "that President Vicente Fox improperly influenced the vote," saying his "many TV and radio commercials touting his administration's successes were a thinly veiled attempt to aid his party's candidate." If accepted, that claim would require a new election. However, "Beyond the legal issue, it was uncertain whether" Mexico's electoral tribunal "would be willing to risk the political and social conflict sure to follow the nullification of a presidential election."

The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Luhnow, Lyons, De Cordoba, 2.11M) notes that Obrador's "support among many may already be flagging, including his allies on the left. Three other political parties that took part in the election, including the country's former ruling party, the Institutional Revolutionary Party, said Friday that the vote was clean. Two of the parties extended their congratulations to winning conservative-party candidate Felipe Calderón." Also, "some senior members of his own party declined to RSVP" for the rallies. Meanwhile, "Obrador must hope the turnout is both massive and peaceful, or risk frightening middle-class Mexicans." Still, "Obrador's political skills and ability to mobilize protests are legendary."

Professor Says US Policies Are Causing Mexican Upheaval. Greg Grandin, a professor of history at New York University, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (7/8, 1.19M), "For the last decade and a half, Washington and its allies in Mexican politics, including Mr. Calderón, have promoted a free-trade economic model that has failed to deliver the prosperity its advocates promised." Now, "Mexico's current electoral crisis likewise is propelled by rural unrest — this time largely brought about by the anger of agricultural workers displaced by the North American Free Trade Agreement," and "these problems, combined with Mexican anger over the immigration debate in the United States, run the risk of souring relations between our two countries for the foreseeable future. But there is a way the Bush administration can help to set things on a different course." It "should not rush to embrace" Calderón as the election's victor." Instead, "the best thing the United States can do now is to support the push for a recount and to refrain from calling on Mr. López Obrador to concede." Finally, "the White House should renegotiate Nafta, allowing Mexico to set its own policy in support of its rural economy." Otherwise, the Bush administration could "help begin yet another season of Mexican upheaval."

WPost Warms Both Candidates To Tread Cautiously. The Washington Post (7/8, A14, 744K) editorializes, "Mexico now enters a perilous political moment." Obrador "has called a mass demonstration today in Mexico City to protest what he calls the fraudulent election results," and "his own unproven allegations of 'manipulation' in the vote's tallying are worrying." Obrador "ought not use the power of his oratory, or the adulation of his followers, to nudge the country toward class warfare while he pursues a legal challenge that could last up to two months." That "would hurt Mexico's international reputation and its allure to investors." However, "Calderon should tread carefully, too," as, if he "is to succeed as the leader of Mexico and its 106 million people, he will need to convince the have-nots -- not just the haves who already believe it -- that they stand to gain from his policies."

DOJ_NMG_0039547

Brazil And Venezuela Compete For Leadership Of South America. Knight Ridder (7/8, Chang) reports, "tensions are growing between" Brazil and Venezuela as "the two countries over who will lead South America." Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez "attempted to unite Latin America under his leadership" and "angered Brazilian officials with what they see as confrontational tactics." This "began in May when Bolivian President Evo Morales nationalized natural gas fields in Bolivia," but "the hostility deepened this week when Venezuela formally joined the South American trade bloc Mercosur, which includes Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay." Brazil "has long dominated" the bloc, "and Brazilian officials worry that Chavez will use the bloc to expand his power at Brazil's expense." Now "some Brazilian diplomats are questioning Chavez's value as an ally and are calling for a tougher approach," but, "despite the growing rift, Chavez and Lula remain political allies, at least publicly."

US Considering Further Restrictions Upon Cuban Diplomats. The Miami Herald (7/8, Bachelet, 323K) reports, "The Bush administration is said to be considering retaliation for what it claims are harassments that U.S. diplomats face in Havana, including the poisoning of family pets and the dumping of feces in U.S. diplomats' homes." An anonymous U.S. government official "said reprisals against the Cuban mission in Washington were 'always under consideration,'" and "Rep. Lincoln Díaz-Balart, R-Miami, is pushing a measure that would force diplomats from countries designated as state sponsors of terrorism -- including Cuba -- to register all their lobbying contacts in Congress, presumably making congressional offices more reluctant to talk to the Cubans." Still, "U.S. officials insist that the Cubans have it easy next to their U.S. counterparts in Havana," who can't buy many things locally and have no access to government officials.

China May Force Foreign Companies To Unionize. The Wall Street Journal (7/8, Fong, 2.11M) reports, "China may force foreign companies to allow trade unions under a proposed legal amendment apparently aimed at union-free companies such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc." Under a law proposed by Wang Zhaoguo, China's top trade-union official and lawmaker, it would be "compulsory for foreign-funded companies to unionize." This is "likely to escalate tensions between the world's largest retailer and China, a crucial manufacturing source of its merchandise." While "Wal-Mart appeared to adopt a relatively conciliatory stance in China when it agreed to allow its Chinese workers to form unions if they wanted to" in 2004, All-China Federation of Trade Unions officials "complained that the company was obstructing union officials from recruiting Wal-Mart workers. ACFTU also threatened official reprisals such as fines and additional workplace inspections."

China To Prosecute Violations Of One-Child Policy. The Washington Post (7/8, A12, Pan, 744K) reports the Chinese government is preparing to prosecute "a blind peasant who exposed excesses by authorities" in enforcing the one-child policy in eastern China, where local officials were accused by residents of "forcing thousands of people to undergo sterilization or to abort pregnancies." The AP says the decision "highlights the growing clout of hard-liners in the party since President Hu Jintao took office three years ago."

Spain Finds First Case Of Avian Flu. The Los Angeles Times (7/8, 958K) reported that Spain's Agriculture Ministry said Friday that it "has recorded its first case of H5N1 bird flu" from "a water fowl in a marsh area outside the northern city of Vitoria." Already "outdoor poultry farming had been banned within six miles of marshlands where migratory birds tend to gather," and now "a protective area of two miles was declared around the area."

French Debate Over Immigration Heats Up. The New York Times (7/8, Smith, 1.19M) reports France's immigration debate "heated up Friday with opposition Socialists demanding to know how many undocumented immigrants the government plans to deport before the start of the new school year." Under recently tightened immigration rules, the government has "begun tracking down families lacking residency papers through children registered at French schools, vowing to expel them during the summer holidays." The new policy has "already led to a handful of deportations and threatened to split families," but in order to "assuage critics and the news media, the government said in mid-June that it would grant residency papers to a limited number of families on a case-by-case basis." However, the Times says that has "brought a crush of anxious immigrants to government offices around the country hoping that they might be granted residence papers before the August deadline."

Mittal To Build Steel Plant In India. The New York Times (7/8, Gentleman, Timmons, 1.19M) reports the chief of Dutch steel Mittal, Lakshmi Mittal visited India Friday where he announced plans to invest "as much as $9 billion in a steel plant in an impoverished eastern area of the country." The plant would be one of India's largest, with a capacity of 12 million tons a year, the Times notes.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

DOJ_NMG_0039548

Los Angeles Times:
"Plot On N.Y. Tunnels Alleged."
"Ultimate Penalty In Graft Case."
"Class Of '76 Got Chatty."
"In Arabs' Eyes, The US Is On Trial, Not Hussein."
"Leftist To Seek Recount In Mexican Election."
"Saluting A Marine And Angels Fan."

New York Times:
"General Faults Marine Response To Iraq Killings."
"3 Held Overseas In Plan To Bomb New York Target."
"An Internet Lifeline For Troops In Iraq And Loved Ones At Home."
"A Drive To Root Out The Resurgent Taliban."
"That's What Friends In High Places Are For."
"Here's Proof That New Yorkers Like To Complain."

Washington Post:
"US And Russia To Enter Civilian Nuclear Pact."
"Plot To Attack N.Y. Foiled."
"Meeting Danger Well South Of The Border."
"Signs Of Detainees' Planning Alleged."
"Va. Police Chief Apologizes For Raid Of Homeless Camp."

Washington Times:
"Missile Defense 'Modest,' Says Bush."
"FBI Foils New York Terror Plot."
"Britain's 2 Minutes Of Silence Honor Transit Bomb Victims On Anniversary."
"House Told Criminals Swelling Alien Tide."
"Israel Pursues Palestinians With Warplanes And Tanks."
"Writer's Suit Throws Book At 'Deep Throat.'"

Detroit Free Press:
"GM TO Kerkorian: We'll Do It Our Way."
"New York City Tunnels Targeted."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Voter ID Law On Hold."
"Attack On N.Y. Tunnels Thwarted."
"Political Hand-Holding."
"Heavy Hitters Went To Bat For Austin."

Dallas Morning News:
"Calderón: No Walls Needed."
"For Mayor, Split Image Intact."
"Report May Conquer Fear Of Flying With Pets."
"Plot To Hit NYC Trains Disrupted."

Houston Chronicle:
"Moving Day On Discovery."
"Texas' Patient Care Law At Hub Of Local Dispute."
"Fighting For A Texas Treasure."
"Haditha Inquiry Points To Brass."
"8 Suspected In Plot To Bomb NYC Train Tunnels."
"DeLay Back In DC? Never Say Never."
"Air Is More Breathable In One East End Area; Others Worsen."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: New York Bomb Plot; London Bombing Anniversary; Haditha Investigation; North Korea Missiles; General Motors Partnership; Jobs Report; Artificial Blood Experiment; Shuttle Astronauts.
CBS: New York Bomb Plot; London Bombing Anniversary; Haditha Investigation; North Korea Missiles; GM & Corporate Pensions; Medicare Drug Plan;
NBC: New York Bomb Plot; London Bombing Anniversary; North Korea Missiles; Shuttle Docks At Space Station; Gaza Invasion; Oil Prices; Haditha Investigation; Jobs Report; General Motors Partnership.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH – No schedule available.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY -- No schedule available.

US Senate: -- No events scheduled.

US House: -- No events scheduled.

Other. ALL DAY

July 6 - 8. AIRLINE COLLECTIBLES SHOW _ Sellers, buyers, pilots, engineers, flight afficianados, historians, authors and airline memorabilia collectors gather for the Airliners International 2006. Highlights: 8:30 p.m. - 10 p.m. Keynote address by Igor Sikorsky, Jr., son of Igor Sikorsky, Sr. Topic: ``Memories of an Aviation Pioneer." Location: Sheraton Premiere Hotel at Tysons Corner, 8661 Leesburg Pike, Vienna. Contacts: Marc Wojno, 703-803-1412

July 7 - 11. FOLKLIFE FESTIVAL _ Second session of the Smithsonian Folklife Festival, focusing on life in the Canadian province of Alberta, evening concerts celebrating African American music from New Orleans, Latino music of Chicago, basketweavers from a wide variety of geographical regions, and others. Location: On the Mall between 7th and 14th Streets, NW. Contacts: Becky Haberacker, 202-633-5183

July 7 - 8. 8:45 a.m. YOUNG ONSET PARKINSON CONVENTION _ The National Parkinson Foundation hosts the fourth annual Young-Onset Parkinson Network Convention. Presentations and workshops on research, medical treatments, support and networking for young Parkinson's patients. Highlights: 11:45 a.m. Luncheon keynote by Cherie Zaun, former LPGA pro golfer, diagnosed in 2003. Location: Hyatt Regency-Reston, 1800 President St., Reston. Contacts: Christie Lowey, 305-448-2930

July 8 - 12. CANCER CONFERENCE _ The International Union Against Cancer and the American Cancer

DOJ_NMG_0039549

Society hold the 2006 World Cancer Conference, international cancer and tobacco control conferences. Highlights: 6 p.m. - 7:30 p.m. Plenary session: ``Bridging the Gap: The Global Cancer Challenge." With Barbara Bush, former first lady; former president George H. Bush Sr., C-Change; Sally West Brooks, USA board chair, American Cancer Society; John Seffrin, past president, UICC; Franco Cavalli, president, UICC; Harmon Eyre, program chair, UICC World Cancer Congress 2006. Location: Washington Convention Center, Mt. Vernon Square. Contacts: Becky Steinbeck, 678-613-6892

2 p.m. INDIA-HIV/AIDS _ Activists hold a rally to urge India not to adopt new legislation that would limit affordable AIDS medications worldwide. Location: Indian Embassy, 2107 Massachusetts Ave., NW. Contacts: Dr. Vineeta Gupta, 202-789-0432

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, July 10, 2006 8:21 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, July 08, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060708.pdf; dojclips060708.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, JULY 8, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Justices Tacitly Backed Use Of Guantánamo, Bush Says (NYT) 4
Bush Asks UN To Lean On N. Korea (BOS) 4
GOP Will Keep Its Majorities, Bush Predicts (LAT) 5
Signs Of Detainees' Planning Alleged (WP) 7
Convicted U.S. Civil Rights Lawyer Seeks Non-prison Sentence (FINDLAW/AP) 8
FBI Foils New York Terror Plot (WT) 9
Filmmaker Sues U.S. Over Iraq Detention (LAT) 10
Inquiry In 2003 Abduction Rivets Italy (NYT) 11
London Remembers Victims Of Terrorist Bombings (FT) 13
Britain Pays Homage To Bombing Victims (NYT) 14
Britain's 2 Minutes Of Silence Honor Transit Bomb Victims On Anniversary (WT/AP) 15
Video: 2 London Bombers Al-Qaida Trained (AP-Y2) 16
Lines Blur On Extremism (FT) 18

Homeland Response:

3 Held Overseas In Plan To Bomb New York Target (NYT) 19
Plot To Attack N.Y. Foiled (WP) 21
FBI Thwarts Terrorist Plot Against NYC (AP-Y2) 22
FBI: Three Held In New York Tunnel Plot (CNN) 23
US Foils New York Terror Plot, Says FBI (FT) 25
Playboy's Life: Girls & Booze (NYDN) 25
New York Terror Plot Is Foiled, FBI Says (BOS) 26
Secretary Unveils Details Of Plot To Flood N.Y. Subway Tunnels (BOSH) 27
FBI Plans New Net-tapping Push (CNET) 28
Subways Are Safe, US Security Official Says After Riding T (BOS) 29
Bay State Polls Say Chertoff Off-track (BOSH) 30
More Antiterror Funds For New York Area (NYT) 31
American Al Qaeda Member Lambastes U.S. Troops (CNN) 31
US Passenger Detained After Trying To Break Into Delta Cockpit (AFP) 32
Passengers Pin Man Charging Cockpit (TBT) 32
Soldier Held After Ramming Cockpit Door (SFC/AP) 34
Mosque Members Denounce FBI Raid As Desecration (PPG) 34
For Thrift, Port Authority Will Build 9/11 Shrine (NYT) 35
Delegation Sends Letter Asking For Rita Help (BRADV) 36

War News:

Iraqi Troops Clash With Shiite Militia (WP) 37
Joint Raid Captures 2 Linked To Rebel Shiite Leader (NYT) 38
U.S., Iraqi Forces Raid Shiite Stronghold (AP) 40
Explosions Rock Baghdad Mosques As Troops Crack Down On Militias (WSJ/AP) 41
At Least 12 Iraqis Killed In Mosque Attacks (LAT) 42
Most Baghdad Security Under Iraqi Control: US Report (AFP-Y2) 44
Pentagon To Buy New Equipment For War (AP) 44
Detailing Proposed War Spending (NYT/AP) 45
Marching Forward (NSWK) 45
General Faults Marine Response To Iraq Killings (NYT) 47
U.S. Commander Finishes Haditha Review (AP) 48
Ex-soldier's Case Now Goes To Grand Jury (AP) 49
Father Said To Be Shocked At Charges Against Ex-GI Son (SFC) 50
Not Just Another Abuse Scandal (WP) 50
In Arabs' Eyes, The US Is On Trial, Not Hussein (LAT) 51
A Drive To Root Out The Resurgent Taliban (NYT) 53
Pakistan Urged To Dismantle Terrorist Camps (WSJ/AP) 54
Afghan Legislator Says Coalition Attacked His Family, Killing 1 (NYT) 54
Cheney Lauds Troops For Aid They Provided, Message They Sent (NVP) 55
Army Cuts 1,000 For Personality Disorders (SFC/AP) 56

An Internet Lifeline For Troops In Iraq And Loved Ones At Home (NYT) 57

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Fitzgerald's Future Examined (WBBM) 59

Corporate Scandals:

Can Companies Issue Options, Then Good News? (WSJ) ... 60
Nicor To Pay $10 Million Fine (CHIT) 61
Asyst Gets Delisting Letter From Nasdaq (AP) 62

Criminal Law:

Records Show Abramoff At White House (NYT/AP) 62
Secret Service Reveals More Abramoff Visits (AP-Y2) 63
New Links Between Abramoff, White House (WP) 63
U.S. To Investigate Witness Rape Charge (NOTP) 64
Local Man Pleads Guilty To Filing False Disaster Claim (BRADV) 65
Rep. Jefferson Hires Lewinsky Spokeswoman (BRADV) 65

Civil Law:

Senators Query Boeing Settlement (FT) 66
The Deficit Reduction Act? What Deficit Reduction Act? (NYT) 67

Civil Rights:

Judge Ends City-Chabad Feud (MH) 68
County Jail On Notice After Probe (TRECAK) 69
NAACP Wants Quick Renewal Of Voting Rights Act (CPC) 70
Voting Trial In Osceola Postponed 2 Months (ORS) 71
World Cup Spotlight Exposes Sex Trafficking (KCS) 72
Kennedy Says San Diego May Leave Cross Standing On City Property (LAW/AP) 74
Judge Blocks Requirement In Georgia For Voter ID (NYT) 75
Judge Issues Restraining Order Ga. ID Law (AP-Y2) 76

Antitrust:

Judge Looks Into Modifying Terms Of 2 Phone Mergers (NYT) 76
Rubber Conspiracy Alleged (KNOXNS/AP) 77

Environment:

Feds Allow BP To Delay Testing (AP) 78
Fostoria Sued Over Sewage Violations (TOLB) 79
Faiths Embrace View Of 'Green Patriarch' (WT/AP) 79
The Environmental Procrastination Agency (NYT) 81
Global Warming And The Courts (NYT) 82

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Informers' Hotel Orgy Led U.S. Prosecutor To Shelve Cases (AR) 83
Chronicle Argues For Subpoenas' Dismissal (SFC) 84
Chronicle Lawyers Ask Judge To Dismiss Reporters' Subpoenas (SDUT/AP) 85
County Joins Gang Task Force (VANCC) 85
That's What Friends In High Places Are For (NYT) 86
The U.N. Wants Your Gun (WSJ) 88

Immigration:

Bush Continues To Push His Plan On Immigration (WSJ) 90
Enforcement-Plus Is Critical (WP) 91
Threat Of Terrorist Crossings Is Stressed At Border Hearing (NYT) 91
GOP Hearing Alleges Risks Of Terrorism Along Border (WP) 92
House Told Criminals Swelling Alien Tide (WT) 93
Immigration Hearing Held At Border (AP-Y2) 94
Funding, Agents Urged For Border (HC) 95
N.Y. Court OKs Legal Alien Test For License (WT/AP) 96
La Raza Forum Targets Immigration (LAT) 96
Cracking Down On Borders And Bosses (WP) 97
Ex-border Agents Plead Guilty To Bribery (AP-Y2) 98
Calderon Blasts Plan For Wall Along U.S.-Mexico Border (KRT) 98
Apparent Mexican Winner Attacks Border Wall (WP) 100
Meeting Danger Well South Of The Border (WP) 100

Congress-Administration:

Bush Rejects Solo Talks With North Korea (WP) 103
Bush In Chicago In Bid To Boost Standing (AP-Y2) 104
Bush Says UN Must Send A Clear Message To North Korea (BLOOM) 105
Bush Salutes Daley; Boosts Topinka Campaign (CHIT) 106
Bush Gets Taste Of Chicago Politics (CHIST) 107
Beltway Follows Bush To Chicago (CHIT) 108
Who Really Rules The Supreme Court? (LAT) 109
G.O.P. Agenda In House Has Moderates Unhappy (NYT) 111
Discovery Unloads Supplies At Station (WT/AP) 112
NASA Engineers Assess New Shuttle Pictures (AP) 113
Seeking Signs Of Trouble, NASA Studies Shuttle Images (NYT) 114
Spacewalkers Take Center Stage (WP) 115
Private Data For 100,000 Pilots, Crew Listed Online (NVP) .. 116
Personal Data Were Posted On Navy Web Site (WP) 116
'Junket' Science (WSJ) 117
House GOP Leaders Decry 'Pork,' But Back It (BOS) 118
Federal Deficit May Fall Below $300B (AP-Y2) 120
Congressmen Press Washington To Relinquish Foster Care Funds (PPG) 121

DOJ_NMG_0039553

The President Who Would Not Grow Up (LAT) 121

Other News:

Dow Ends Down 134, Nasdaq Closes Down 25 (AP) 122
Dow Drops 134.63 On 3M's Woes, Jobs Data (WSJ) 123
Jobs Data Indicates Economy Is Slowing (NYT) 124
US Payrolls Up Slightly; Jobless Rate Still 4.6% (WP) 125
Wage Gains Surge, But Job Growth Slows (WT) 126
US Jobs Growth Weaker Than Expected (FT) 127
US Stocks Fall; 3M Sends Dow Average To Biggest Loss In Month (BLOOM).....128
Oil Price Rise Fuels Fears On Inflation (FT).....130
All Bets Off For Midterm Elections (MJS).....130
Hillary Clinton Stumps For Angelides (OKTRIB) 132
Mulholland To Fox News: Arnold Can Take A Joke (SFC) ..133
Gore To Address Wal-Mart Executives (AP-Y2).....133
John Edwards: Stop Predatory Lenders (AP-Y2).....134
Biden Defends Remarks (AP).....134
Democratic Party Divided On Iraq (AP).....135
Competing For Connecticut (NSWK).....136
Lieberman's Struggle At Home (WSJ).....139
Steele Raised $1.8 Million In Quarter For Bid (WT) 140
Rep. Katherine Harris To Have Surgery (AP-Y2).....141
DeLay Suggests He Might Not Retire (AP-Y2).....141
DeLay Back To D.C.? Never Say Never (HC).....141
Not-so-golden Years (LAT).....143
Jeb Bush Ally Slams Islam (MH) 143
Soldiers' Issues In Play At Capitol (MINNST).....145
S. Korea Pledges To Talk Soon With North (AP).....145
Bush Strongly Defends His N. Korea Policies (LAT).....147
Bush Expresses Frustration With Diplomacy (AP-Y2).....149
Bush Says U.S. May Have Been Able To Intercept North Korean Missile (NYT).....150
Bush Rules Out Bilateral Talks With N Korea (FT).....151
Missile Defense 'Modest,' Says Bush (WT).....152
N. Korea Says It Wants Its Money Back, Then It'll Talk (LAT)153
Stronger Resolution Offered On N. Korea (WP).....154
China Fights Sanctions To Punish North Korea (NYT).....155
U.N.: No Resolution Yet On North Korea (UPI).....156
Japan Seeks Support Of Envoys Of Russia, UNSC Members On Resolution (KYDN) 156
U.S. Urges Beijing To Pressure Pyongyang Back To Arms Talks (WSJ).....157
US, Japan Raise Stakes With UN Vote On North Korea (AFP)158
Japan Pushes For U.N. Sanctions On N.Korea (AP) 160
Japan Pushes For Tougher Sanctions Against North Korea (KRT).....161
North Korea's July 4th Display: How Big A Threat? (WSJ).....162
US And Japan Table Draft UN Resolution (FT).....163
North Korean Missile Tests Put Japan On The Defensive (LAT) 163
Pyongyang Highlight Reel (WSJ).....165
Bjorn Lomborg Get Your Priorities Right (WSJ).....166
US And Russia To Enter Civilian Nuclear Pact (WP).....168
Energy Security Pact Eyed At G-8 (WT) 170
A St. Petersburg Story (NYT).....171
Russia: Investors Line Up For An Oil Stake (WSJ).....171
Gazprom Posts Net Of $10.98 Billion, Best Ever In Russia (WSJ).....172
Kremlin Curtails U.S.-Financed Radio Broadcasts To Russians (NYT).....173
Destinations Cracking The Russia Code (WSJ) 174
Racism Haunts Russia Ahead Of G-8 Talks (BOS).....176
'Strategic' Accord Planned For Nazarbayev's US Visit (WT) .178
Ukraine's Coalition Unravels In A New Setback (NYT) 179
Defeated Candidate Reemerges In Ukraine (WP).....180
Official Hits Stalled WTO Talks (WT) 181
Israel 'might Free Palestinians' In Return For Soldier (FT) ..182
Israeli Forces Broaden Gaza Incursion (AP).....182
Palestinians Dig In As Israel Advances (WP).....184
A Day Of Funerals Across The Northern Gaza Strip (NYT)...185
Slow, Painful Change (NSWK).....186
Tensions Grow Over Mexico Vote As Opposition Plans Rally Saturday (NYT).....187
Leftist To Seek Recount In Mexican Election (LAT) 189
Lopez Obrador May Lack Support For Vote Protest (WSJ) ...191
How To Be A Good Neighbor (NYT) 192
A Victor In Mexico (WP).....193
Brazil, Venezuela Jockeying For Leadership Of South America (KRT).....193
Cuban Envoys Facing New Curbs (MH).....194
China May Force Foreign Firms To Allow Unions (WSJ) 196
Chinese To Prosecute Peasant Who Resisted One-Child Policy (WP).....196
Bird Flu Virus Reported In Spain For First Time (LAT).....198
Furor Over A French Immigration Crackdown (NYT) 198
Mittal Announces Plan For Steel Plant In India (NYT) 199

DOJ_NMG_0039554

TERRORISM NEWS:

Justices Tacitly Backed Use Of Guantánamo, Bush Says (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 7 — In his most detailed comments to date on the Supreme Court's rejection of his decision to put detainees on trial before military commissions, President Bush said Friday that the court had tacitly approved his use of the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

"It didn't say we couldn't have done — couldn't have made that decision, see?" Mr. Bush said at a news conference in Chicago. "They were silent on whether or not Guantánamo — whether or not we should have used Guantánamo. In other words, they accepted the use of Guantánamo, the decision I made."

Mr. Bush's remarks put a favorable spin on a ruling that has been widely interpreted as a rebuke of the administration's policies in the war on terror. The court, ruled broadly last week in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld that military commissions were unauthorized by statute and violated international law.

The question of whether Mr. Bush had properly used Guantánamo Bay to house detainees was not at issue in the case. At issue was whether the president could unilaterally establish military commissions with rights different from those allowed at a court-martial to try detainees for war crimes.

Mr. Bush has said since the ruling that he will work with Congress to figure out how to use military commissions to try detainees, a promise he repeated on Friday in Chicago.

"I am willing to abide by the ruling of the Supreme Court," the president said.

The Chicago news conference, which featured local reporters asking the president questions alongside the regular members of the White House press corps, was designed by the White House to give the president more exposure in the country at a time when his poll numbers are declining and Americans are uneasy with his leadership on the economy and the war in Iraq.

But members of the Chicago press did not serve up softball questions. The issue of Mr. Bush's polls came up when a reporter asked about a fund-raiser the president planned to attend for Judy Baar Topinka, the Republican candidate for Illinois governor.

"An aide to Judy Topinka was quoted as saying that given your low approval ratings in the polls, they prefer you to come here in the middle of the night," the reporter said.

"Didn't work," Mr. Bush replied. "I'm coming to lunch."

The president also gave an endorsement of sorts to Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special prosecutor who handled a leak investigation involving Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's chief political adviser.

Mr. Bush said Mr. Fitzgerald, who is also the United States attorney in Chicago, had done a "very professional job" in handling the leak investigation, which resulted in the indictment of I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Rove was not indicted.

Bush Asks UN To Lean On N. Korea (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush yesterday called on the United Nations to send a clear message of disapproval to North Korea in the wake of this week's missile tests, asserting his faith in a diplomatic solution to the foreign policy crisis despite his frustration with the pace of international negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0039555

In a news conference in Chicago, Bush said the diplomatic process can be ``slow and cumbersome" and ``painful in a way for some to watch," but he believes that diplomacy will resolve the standoff over North Korea's nuclear weapons capabilities. The president added that he has confidence in the UN Security Council and in multiple-nations talks with North Korea.

``What matters most of all is for [North Korean President] Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice," Bush said at Chicago's Museum of Science and Industry. ``What I believe is we can solve the problem diplomatically."

Despite his frustrations over the process, Bush's comments signaled a patient approach toward North Korea, a nation he famously placed alongside Iraq and Iran in the ``axis of evil."

``We've created a framework that will be successful," he said. ``It takes time to get things done."

Pressed repeatedly on why he pushed to topple Saddam Hussein in Iraq but is hesitant to even discuss the use of force against North Korea, Bush deflected the questions, insisting that diplomacy remains the first option.

Asked whether the US military, stretched by simultaneous wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, could sustain a third conflict with North Korea, Bush said he wouldn't answer hypothetical questions. A few minutes later, he questioned a reporter's assertion that North Korea -- which tested medium- and long-range missiles earlier this week -- has increased its nuclear arsenal.

``I don't think we know that," Bush said .

Earlier this week, North Korea fired seven missiles, all of which fell harmlessly into the sea, in defiance of international warnings and despite a self-imposed moratorium on the testing of long-range missiles. One of the missiles was thought to be capable of reaching the west coast of the United States.

Washington is pushing the UN Security Council for quick condemnation of the tests, but China and Russia -- two permanent members of the council -- are resisting sanctions against North Korea. China and Russia have not said whether they will veto any action .

On another issue with national security implications, Bush said he drew no broader implications from last week's Supreme Court ruling striking down the military commissions he ordered to try detainees held in the US Navy base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Although the high court ruled that Bush had overstepped his authority, the president quickly noted that the court was silent on the question of whether Guantanamo is an appropriate place to hold suspected terrorists.

``The Supreme Court said that in this particular case, when it comes to dealing with illegal combatants who were picked up off a battlefield and put in Guantanamo for the sake of our security, that we should work with the United States Congress to develop a way forward," Bush said. ``They accepted the use of Guantanamo, the decision I made."

Bush used the news conference to push for his top domestic priority this year: comprehensive immigration reform. The House and Senate have passed vastly different immigration bills, and Bush restated his support for the Senate approach, which pairs new border-enforcement mechanisms with a guest-worker program and a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants now in the United States.

``In order to enforce this border, we've got to have a rational way that recognizes there are people sneaking across to do work Americans aren't doing," Bush said.

The president also said he is certain that Republicans will retain control of the House and Senate this fall. He laughed when asked whether he would stay away from the campaign trail because of his dismal approval ratings.

``That's up to the candidates to decide," Bush said. He noted that he is still a draw at Republican fund-raisers -- including a $500-a-plate gubernatorial candidate luncheon he attended in downtown Chicago just a few hours after the news conference.

``You win elections by believing something," Bush said in a swipe at Democrats. ``You win elections by having a plan to protect the American people from terrorist attacks. You win elections by having a philosophy that has actually produced results."

Yesterday's news conference was atypical for its location: In the past, Bush has favored the White House for full-scale, question-and-answer sessions with reporters. The location is part of a new strategy to have the president interact more with local reporters -- and make a bigger media splash in the towns he visits outside of Washington.

``I like to see what it's like to have a major press conference outside of Washington," said Bush, who stood in front of a giant banner featuring the Chicago skyline.

GOP Will Keep Its Majorities, Bush Predicts (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0039556

By Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

On a swing through Chicago, the president says: 'You win elections by believing something.' He also hints at a tack on the Guantanamo ruling.

CHICAGO — Vowing that the Republican Party would fend off Democratic gains in the November congressional elections, President Bush on Friday demonstrated part of his new strategy for victory: Stay close to the usual script — but do it in an unusual place.

Bush took the uncommon step of holding a formal news conference away from the White House, and he cast aside his typical practice of one-day trips in favor of spending a night and a day in the city. In Chicago, he cracked, the locals might not be so bored of his old stories.

In addition to headlining a fund-raiser for the Republican candidate for governor — a traditional role for the president — Bush toured a museum, went out for a fancy dinner with the mayor, and lingered at a crowded breakfast joint for an hour. They were unusual moves for a man who is not known for a love of tourism and prefers sleeping in his own bed after a quiet dinner at home.

"I like to see what it's like to have a major press conference outside of Washington," he said, standing in the cavernous rotunda of the Museum of Science and Industry, with old airplane models hovering overhead.

"It might do me some good," he added.

His hourlong exchange with local reporters and the traveling White House press corps contained little news, and was notable mainly for the setting and for Bush's insistence that he intended to be a factor in this year's elections — low approval ratings or not.

Asked about a published remark by an aide to Judy Baar Topinka, the GOP gubernatorial candidate, that the campaign would be better off if the president came in the middle of the night, Bush shot back: "I'm coming to lunch."

What's more, he proclaimed that the $1.2-million fundraiser would be a success. And he brought into sharper focus what is likely to become the White House's campaign message for future road trips: Republicans will keep Americans safe, keep taxes low, and offer more ideas than the Democrats.

"You win elections by believing something," Bush said. "You win elections by having a plan to protect the American people from terrorist attack. You win elections by having a philosophy that has actually produced results — economic growth, for example — or kind of changing the school systems for the better, or providing prescription drug coverage for elders."

Despite polls that indicate Democrats are positioned to make gains in November, Bush said Republicans would retain control of the House and Senate. "I'm looking forward to these elections," he said. "I think you'll be surprised."

Answering a question about his authority to try detainees before military tribunals, Bush reiterated his belief that the Geneva Convention does not apply to detainees being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"The Geneva Conventions were set up to deal with armies of nation-states," he said. "You've got standard rules of war. So, this is new ground. This is different than any president has been through before, in terms of how to deal with these kind of people that you're picking up off a battlefield and trying to protect the American people from."

His comments appeared to contradict last week's 5-3 ruling by the Supreme Court, written by Justice John Paul Stevens, that said a provision of the Geneva Convention governing combatants not tied to nation-states applies to the fight against Al Qaeda.

Bush said Friday that he was "willing to abide by the ruling." But coming as administration officials continue to examine the ruling, Bush's comments were another indication that the White House was moving toward a very narrow interpretation of the court decision.

Legal experts and detainees' advocates have insisted the ruling means the Geneva Convention covers all detainees at Guantanamo and, possibly, Al Qaeda leaders being held in undisclosed locations.

Reinforcing the message that Bush was far outside the Beltway, he stood before a giant picture of the city skyline displaying, in giant letters, "CHICAGO."

DOJ_NMG_0039557

The overwhelmingly Democratic city in a blue state seemed a peculiar choice as a kickoff for the new White House communications strategy, particularly in light of headlines that greeted the president and his entourage Friday morning.

On Thursday, a former top aide to Mayor Richard M. Daley and three other city officials were convicted of directing city jobs to campaign workers. The convictions were the work of a prosecutor familiar to Bush, U.S. Atty. Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who as a special prosecutor has been leading the investigation into who leaked the name of former CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media. That investigation has led to the indictment of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff.

Though Daley is a Democrat whose family name symbolizes that party's dominance in Chicago politics, the mayor and Bush have built a friendship. The two dined together Thursday night at the famed Chicago Firehouse Restaurant.

Asked how he viewed Daley in light of the convictions, Bush said: "I still think he's a great mayor."

As for Fitzgerald, who last month informed White House strategist Karl Rove that he would not be charged in the CIA leak investigation, Bush lauded the prosecutor for his professionalism and his ability to stay out of the news. "You didn't see a lot of people kind of dropping a little crumb here for the press to chew on," Bush said.

Times staff writers Peter Spiegel in Washington and P.J. Huffstutter in Chicago contributed to this report.

Signs Of Detainees' Planning Alleged (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

Three suicides at the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, may have been part of a broader plot by detainees who were using confidential lawyer-client papers and envelopes to pass handwritten notes their guards could not intercept, according to documents that government lawyers filed yesterday in federal court.

Detainees could apparently hide documents in their cells -- including instructions on how to tie knots and a classified U.S. military memo regarding cell locations of detainees and camp operational matters at Guantanamo -- by keeping the materials in envelopes labeled as lawyer-client communications. Notes that investigators found after the suicides on June 10 were apparently written on the back of notepaper stamped "Attorney Client Privilege," which allowed detainees to communicate secretly without interference, according to government officials.

The alleged discoveries have led military commanders to suspend allowing detainees to have paper provided by defense lawyers. Government lawyers have also asked a judge on the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to allow them to assemble "filter teams" to scour more than 1,100 pounds of documents seized by investigators, some of which are protected by lawyer-client privilege and would usually be off-limits to authorities.

Defense lawyers for Guantanamo detainees said that their clients are closely monitored and should have no way to pass such notes, and that the filing yesterday is designed to complicate their efforts.

In an affidavit filed with the court, Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., the facility's commander, said the Naval Criminal Investigative Service has information that suggests the suicides "may have been part of a larger plan or pact for more suicides that day or in the immediate future."

He also said that on June 22, he asked NCIS to investigate whether the suicides were "otherwise encouraged, ordered, or assisted by other detainees or third persons" -- implying that the probe could extend to lawyers for the men -- and whether their private communications could have included improper materials.

Lawyers are permitted to share with detainees legal communications or publicly filed documents, but they are not allowed to pass classified or "protected" information to clients.

Barbara Olshansky of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents most of the Guantanamo detainees, said the allegations that lawyers could have played a role in the suicides are "patently offensive" and "outrageous." She said the government is again trying to make it difficult for lawyers to represent the 450 detainees held there.

"I can't imagine what they think they've found," Olshansky said last night. "All I can see this as is an elaborate ruse to take away whatever these people have so they have absolutely nothing, and to make these lawyers fight for yet another thing."

Investigators impounded detainees' written materials on June 14, taking them from plastic bins the detainees use to store personal items and papers, according to the court filing and an affidavit by Carol Kisthardt, an NCIS special agent in charge of the agency's Southeast field office. Four days later, investigators focused on materials related to 11 detainees, though government lawyers did not detail why they picked those men.

DOJ_NMG_0039558

"The materials uncovered in these initial searches comprising a very small amount of detainee materials demonstrated, however, that detainees had developed practices for misusing the existence of a privileged attorney-client communication system," the government lawyers wrote, "presumably to shield the communications from the suspicion or scrutiny of JTF-Guantanamo guards, who have not been permitted to inspect or review attorney-client communications."

The court papers say that investigators found suicide notes written in Arabic on the bodies of the detainees and that they found notes hidden in the wire mesh of their cells and neighboring cells.

The discovery of the papers "indicated the passing of materials and messages between detainees and that some level of planning or coordination of the suicides had taken place" because two of the men had never been visited by attorneys, yesterday's filing says. The three detainees used torn bedsheets and clothing to hang themselves, military officials have said.

Defense lawyers have called the suicides acts of desperation by detainees who saw no hope of being released or of having a fair trial.

"The whole concept that these suicides are a plot or a plan is of a piece with the absurd contention that suicide is an act of warfare in this setting," said David Remes, a Washington lawyer who represents a group of Guantanamo detainees. "What comes through to me is that the military has found a way to use the suicides to break through a very carefully constructed and painstakingly negotiated mechanism of protecting the attorney-client privilege."

David Engelhardt, who represented Ali Abdullah Ahmed, a Yemeni detainee who killed himself June 10, said there is no way to know if there was a suicide plot because he was never granted access to his client.

"A plot to do what?" Engelhardt said. "Who exactly did he hurt by hanging himself? What do you have to gain besides the stretching of your own neck? This is offensive and ignorant."

Convicted U.S. Civil Rights Lawyer Seeks Non-prison Sentence (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, July 8, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Attorneys for U.S. civil rights lawyer Lynne Stewart have asked a judge to spare her a prison sentence for her conviction in a terrorism case despite a recommendation by the federal probation department that she serve 30 years.

The attorneys filed papers Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan asking that the judge take into consideration Stewart's bout with breast cancer, her age, 66, and three decades of selfless service as a lawyer in sentencing her on Sept. 25.

Stewart was convicted in February 2005 of providing material support to terrorists by releasing the message of a notorious jailed client, Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman. She also was convicted of defrauding the government and making false statements.

Abdel-Rahman, a blind cleric from Egypt, was convicted of seditious conspiracy for his advisory role in a plot to blow up five New York City landmarks, including the United Nations in 1995.

One of Stewart's lawyers, Elizabeth Fink, called a U.S. Probation Department pre-sentencing report that recommended Stewart serve the maximum possible sentence of 30 years "draconian, inhumane and ludicrous."

A message left with a spokeswoman for the federal prosecutors' office was not immediately returned Thursday.

Stewart was diagnosed with breast cancer last year, and her sentencing has been delayed while she undergoes treatment.

In her court papers, Fink quoted the nonpublic pre-sentencing report as saying: "We hope that this sentence of 30 years will not only punish Stewart for her actions but serve as a deterrent for other lawyers who believe that they are above the rules and regulations of penal institutions or otherwise try to skirt the laws of this country."

Pre-sentencing reports are advisory documents prepared by court employees and considered by judges before they determine sentences.

Fink said lawyers for criminal defendants perform their constitutional duties every day under difficult and depressing circumstances and for little money.

"The deterrence they want to accomplish here is to frighten lawyers into submission and destroy zealous advocacy," she wrote.

Fink said the conviction, disbarment and a non-prison sentence would serve adequate deterrence to other lawyers.

"To put Lynne Stewart in prison in order to teach criminal lawyers how to behave is outrageous," she said.

The lawyer wrote that there was no question that Stewart made a serious mistake "and by doing so, ruined her life."

But Fink added that Stewart improved the lives of thousands during three decades of practicing law and "restored faith in America and its justice system to thousands of people."

Stewart was convicted along with Mohamed Yousry, an Arabic interpreter, and Ahmed Abdel Sattar, a U.S. postal worker.

Yousry and Stewart, both convicted of providing material support to terrorists, face up to 30 years in prison. Sattar, convicted of conspiracy to kill and kidnap people in a foreign country, could face life in prison.

The three will be sentenced by U.S. District Judge John G. Koeltl. He already has upheld the jury verdict, rejecting Stewart's claim that her client Abdel-Rahman was engaging in protected speech when he expressed his opinion about a cease fire by Islamic militants in Egypt that Stewart passed along in a 2000 press release.

Besides the material support conviction, Stewart also was convicted of defrauding the government and making false statements for breaking her promise to abide by special rules the government imposed on the sheik to prevent him from communicating with his followers.

FBI Foils New York Terror Plot (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

Federal agents, working with security officials in Lebanon and other foreign law-enforcement and intelligence agencies, have disrupted a terrorist network planning to attack train tunnels between New York and New Jersey, authorities said yesterday.

Lebanese security officials, acting on a U.S. request, have arrested Assem Hammoud, 31, a Beirut native, and said he admitted belonging to an "extremist organization" planning to carry out "a significant act of terrorism."

FBI Assistant Director in Charge Mark Mershon, who heads the bureau's New York field office, said the attacks tentatively were scheduled for October or November, but that none of the eight "principal players" identified in a yearlong investigation had yet been in the United States.

Mr. Mershon said Hammoud pledged his allegiance to al Qaeda and its leader, Osama bin Laden, and that the suspected conspirators were focusing on Port Authority of New York and New Jersey train tunnels that carry tens of thousands of commuters under the Hudson River daily.

"The planning or the plotting for this attack had matured to the point where it appeared the individuals were about to go to a phase where they would attempt to surveil targets, establish a regimen of attack and acquire the resources necessary to effectuate the attacks," Mr. Mershon said.

"At that point, I think it's entirely appropriate to take it down."

Law-enforcement officials said FBI agents, who monitored Internet chat rooms and e-mail messages used by suspected terrorists, discovered the scheme. At least two other arrests reportedly were made, but details were unavailable. The U.S. Embassy in Beirut declined comment.

The other five suspects remain at large.

FBI officials in Washington said that while al Qaeda continues to have an interest in attacking the United States, there is no credible information about any specific threat or target.

"At this time, we have no indication of any imminent threat to the New York transportation system or anywhere else in the U.S.," said FBI spokesman Richard Kolko at the bureau's Washington headquarters, adding that the FBI, through the New York Joint Terrorism Task Force, is continuing to investigate suspected terrorist activities in this country and abroad.

Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, told CNN he had been aware of the investigation for nine months and described the conspiracy as "serious." He said authorities had monitored the suspected terrorists "very closely," adding that the New York transit system is "as safe as it can be."

DOJ_NMG_0039560

"This certainly was a serious plot against the New York transit system," he said, adding that his knowledge of the investigation was, in part, one of the reasons for his anger last month when the Department of Homeland Security announced cuts in anti-terrorism grants for New York City.

The grant for New York, where 3,000 people were killed on September 11, 2001, when al Qaeda terrorists slammed two jetliners into the World Trade Center, dropped from $207 million to $124 million.

At the time, the seven-term lawmaker said Homeland Security and the Bush administration had "declared war on New York."

"It's a knife in the back to New York, and I'm going to do everything I can to make them very sorry they made this decision," Mr. King said.

The proposed attack was first reported yesterday by the New York Daily News, which said it was intended to coincide with the first anniversary of a terrorist strike on the London transportation system that killed 52 persons. The newspaper said the Holland Tunnel, a roadway for cars and trucks, was a major target. Authorities yesterday said the Holland Tunnel was not a target.

Mr. King suggested federal authorities were not yet ready to make arrests, but acted after the Daily News story broke. He said, "I wish it had been held. It would have been better if this had not been disclosed."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, called the "interruption" of a terrorist plot targeting New York's train tunnels "yet another reminder that we must remain steadfast in our fight against terrorism."

"In the past few months, law-enforcement officials have thwarted several terror plots including threats against Chicago's Sears Tower and federal buildings in Miami, and they have disrupted a terror cell in Canada. House Republicans will continue to provide the brave men and women fighting to win the global war on terror the resources they need to finish the job," he said.

The Lebanese Security Service and Beirut's intelligence agency, working with U.S. authorities, have vigorously sought to counter ongoing efforts by al Qaeda to establish a stronghold in that country.

In January, Lebanese authorities arrested 13 suspected al Qaeda terrorists, charging them with "establishing a gang to carry out terrorist acts, forging official and private documents and possessing unlicensed arms." Those arrested included seven Syrians, three Lebanese, a Saudi Arabian, a Jordanian and a Palestinian.

On June 23, seven men also were indicted in a conspiracy to bomb the Sears Tower in Chicago and five government buildings in Miami. The men, called "homegrown terrorists" by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, were accused of providing material support to terrorist organizations, including al Qaeda. They also were charged with conspiracy to maliciously destroy buildings by means of an explosive device and conspiracy to levy war against the United States.

The seven include five U.S. citizens, one legal permanent resident and one Haitian national in the United States illegally, ranging in age from 22 to 32.

FBI Deputy Director John Pistole described that suspected plot as "aspirational, rather than operational."

Filmmaker Sues U.S. Over Iraq Detention (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

A Los Angeles filmmaker who was imprisoned in Iraq for 55 days sued Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and other high-ranking military officials Friday, alleging that his detention violated his civil rights, the law of nations and the Geneva Convention.

Mark D. Rosenbaum, legal director of the ACLU of Southern California, said the suit is the first civil action challenging the constitutionality of the U.S. government's detention and hearing policies in Iraq.

Cyrus Kar, 45, of Los Feliz was freed a year ago, just days after the American Civil Liberties Union sued seeking his release. The new lawsuit, filed in federal court in Los Angeles, seeks damages for Kar and broad changes in the government's detention policies.

"The abuses experienced by Mr. Kar — prolonged arbitrary detention without charge, the systematic denial of access to counsel, and the absence of any court in which to challenge the legality of his detention — are the norm for thousands of persons held in U.S. military detention in Iraq," the suit asserts, citing reports by the United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq, the International Committee of the Red Cross and Amnesty International.

DOJ_NMG_0039561

"Human rights monitors note that the vast majority of the over 15,000 detainees in U.S. military custody in Iraq have never been charged, tried, provided counsel, or allowed to challenge their detention in court, and over one-fifth of them have been detained for over a year in this manner," according to the suit.

In addition, the suit cites a 2004 Red Cross report that said military intelligence officers of coalition forces acknowledged "between 70% and 90% of the persons deprived of their liberty in Iraq had been arrested by mistake."

Kar, a U.S. citizen and Navy veteran, went to Iraq 14 months ago to make a documentary film about Cyrus the Great, the Persian king who wrote the world's first human rights charter.

On May 17, 2005, the taxi he was riding in was stopped at a Baghdad checkpoint and authorities found components in the trunk that are commonly used in improvised explosive devices. The taxi driver told military authorities that Kar and his cameraman knew nothing about the items, which the driver said he was bringing to his brother-in-law.

Kar also submitted to a polygraph examination and allowed the FBI to search his apartment. They found nothing incriminating, but he was held for many more weeks in various prisons around Iraq, including the notorious facility at Abu Ghraib.

Even after he was cleared by a military court at Camp Cropper, Kar was held another week. Eventually, the camp commandant gave him a letter stating that military judges found him to be an "innocent civilian" under the Geneva Convention.

While in confinement, the suit states, Kar was at various times hooded, restrained "in painful flexi-cuffs" and "repeatedly threatened, taunted and insulted" by U.S. soldiers.

At one point, according to the suit, a U.S. soldier slammed Kar's head into a concrete wall at Abu Ghraib.

"Mr. Kar was and remains traumatized by his indefinite and virtually incommunicado detention, in solitary confinement, by the U.S. military without charge," the suit says.

Since returning to the U.S., Kar has continued to work on his film. He said Friday that he is trying to raise money for postproduction editing.

What happened to him in Iraq was "a life-altering experience," Kar said. "I am not a left-wing liberal. I agree with many of George Bush's policies."

But, he added, "I don't think the Constitution has to be gutted to achieve our objectives" in the war on terrorism. "I felt it was my duty as an American to take a stand for the constitutional rights guaranteed to all Americans."

The suit was filed by Rosenbaum and Ranjana Natarajan of the ACLU and volunteer attorney Dan Marmalefsky of the Morrison & Foerster law firm. In addition to Rumsfeld, the defendants include Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., commanding general of the multinational forces in Iraq; Maj. Gen. William H. Brandenburg, who was in charge of detainee operations in Iraq at the time of Kar's detention; Lt. Col. Carol Haas, who was commandant of Camp Cropper when Kar was held there in solitary confinement; and Lt. Col. John Dunlap, who was president of the military's Detainee Status Board in Iraq.

On Friday, a Pentagon spokesman said the Defense Department "does not discuss matters under litigation until the court has rendered a decision."

When Kar was released last July, military officials said he properly had been detained as "an imperative security threat" under the authority of a United Nations Security Council resolution and that the matter had been handled and resolved appropriately.

"This case highlights the effectiveness of our detainee review process," Brig. Gen. Don Alston said in a prepared statement after Kar's release.

Inquiry In 2003 Abduction Rivets Italy (NYT)

By Stephen Grey And Elisabetta Povoledo

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

MILAN, July 7 — The veteran spy made a mistake worthy of an amateur. On June 1, a senior Italian intelligence official placed a call from a public telephone booth to a fellow spy to discuss an investigation into the suspected kidnapping by the Central Intelligence Agency of a radical Egyptian cleric in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0039562

The Italian spies were also under investigation, for complicity in the abduction of the imam, who was seized on a Milan street and sent to his native Egypt for interrogation and imprisonment.

But in a country where the police and spies regularly tap more than 100,000 phone lines each year, Gustavo Pignero, the former head of military counterespionage at the Italian military intelligence agency, apparently ignored an obvious possibility — that investigators were listening in.

Mr. Pignero told his successor at the agency, Marco Mancini, that he had admitted to prosecutors that "Yankee" agents had asked the Italian agency to "identify and check out" the imam, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr.

Mr. Mancini began to fret. The C.I.A., both men knew, had actually wanted not only to watch the suspect but also "actually wanted to seize this guy," Mr. Mancini said. But he insisted, "I told my men that it was an illegal activity, and then I said no to this illegal activity."

The transcript of those calls is part of court documents provided to The New York Times on Friday by people close to the case.

The disclosure that the police were eavesdropping on the intelligence service is the latest twist in a case that has riveted Italy. The kidnapping of the cleric by intelligence agents abruptly cut short a criminal investigation of the imam by Italian prosecutors. The prosecutors struck back, with an investigation of both American and Italian intelligence agents whom they accuse of carrying out the abduction.

The wiretapped telephone calls allowed prosecutors to make the case that Italian intelligence had advance knowledge of the abduction of Mr. Nasr, who is also known as Abu Omar — something the Italian government had steadfastly denied.

On Wednesday, prosecutors arrested the two intelligence officials, charging that they had known about the kidnapping and helped plan it.

Mr. Pignero was placed under house arrest and Mr. Mancini was sent to a jail in Milan, where he was questioned by prosecutors on Friday. "I never kidnapped anyone, and I never participated in the kidnapping of anyone," he was quoted as saying in a statement released by his lawyer.

Last year, prosecutors issued arrest warrants for 22 Americans employed by or linked to the C.I.A., charging them with involvement in the abduction. The Americans had already left Italy.

The case marks the first time a foreign government has tried to prosecute American agents for "extraordinary rendition," in which terrorism suspects captured abroad are sent by the United States to be imprisoned and interrogated in third countries, some of which have records of torturing prisoners.

Intelligence operatives have no special immunity under Italian law. "A prosecutor can listen to any conversation, if he or she thinks a serious crime has been committed, and gets the authorization from a judge to do so," said Andrea Monti, a lawyer specializing in privacy and data protection cases.

The inside story of the abduction became known to prosecutors only this spring, after the police tracked down a military police officer who had taken part in the operation, the court documents show. Like some of the C.I.A. officers, he used his own mobile phone on Via Guerzoni, the street where the Egyptian cleric was abducted.

The man, identified in the documents as Luciano Pironi, who operated under the code name "Ludwig," was the first witness who had been present at the scene of the kidnapping to provide a confession. "I was convinced that I was participating in an intelligence operation," he said, according to the court documents.

He said a C.I.A. agent in Milan at the time had told him that the mission had "been organized and prepared with the Italian intelligence service and Interior Ministry."

Mr. Pironi told prosecutors last April that his role in the seizure was to stop Abu Omar and check his identity papers to distract him while the kidnap team approached in a van. He said it seemed to be ages before the agents "violently threw open" the van's back door.

"They grabbed Abu Omar, I can't remember by the hands or clothes, and they aggressively pulled him into the van, closing the door," he said. "He didn't have a chance to resist or call out."

DOJ_NMG_0039563

He said he was told by the C.I.A. agent that Abu Omar — identified in the court papers as "one of the heads of the Islamic terrorist organizations in Europe" — was not really going to be kidnapped, but rather recruited as an intelligence source for the United States and Italy.

Mr. Pironi's testimony was comical at points. He told prosecutors that the kidnapping "could only take place on weekends" because it was the only time he had free from his day job as a military police officer, the documents said. Accounts in the Italian press quoted Mr. Pironi as testifying that one of the kidnapping attempts was aborted because a "gattara," a neighborhood woman known for feeding the local cats, made an unscheduled round one day.

The C.I.A. agent was one of the 22 cited in the arrest warrant a year ago. When the agent's house was searched, the police reported that he had left e-mail messages on his computer that described warnings about the Milan investigation and, more damagingly, a surveillance photo of Abu Omar himself.

The C.I.A. team left behind a series of blatant clues. Before the abduction, the C.I.A. operatives stayed for days in Milan, running up a tab of more than $140,000 at some the city's most expensive hotels. They also talked frequently on cellphones that were not secure — allowing the police not only to trace their movements as they took Abu Omar to the Italian-American air base at Aviano in northern Italy but also to establish many of their identities.

The most recent details to emerge about the abduction have also opened a new, and potentially explosive, angle in the case. Of the many calls Mr. Mancini received, Italian newspapers reported Friday, one led investigators to an 11-room penthouse apartment on the Via Nazionale in Rome, a main shopping thoroughfare. The apartment turned out to be a previously unknown office of the Italian military intelligence agency.

According to a senior Italian law enforcement officer who refused to be identified because he did not have permission to speak publicly, the office was run by an intelligence agent who reported directly to Nicolo Pollari, the head of military intelligence.

The police raided the apartment on Wednesday and uncovered what appeared to be a center of "black propaganda," or misinformation, filled with files on leading journalists, investigative magistrates and businessmen.

He said the police also found evidence to suggest that the intelligence agency had been both recruiting some Italian journalists and illegally wiretapping others as a way of keeping track of the investigation in Milan.

Among the documents found in the apartment were receipts for cash made out to a journalist code-named Birch who was said to work at Libero, a conservative Milanese daily. Investigators also found what they said were drafts of articles, including one suggesting a smear campaign against Prime Minister Romano Prodi. It was later published in Libero.

London Remembers Victims Of Terrorist Bombings (FT)

By Jimmy Burns

Financial Times, July 8, 2006

Londoners prayed, laid wreaths and observed a two-minute silence in remembrance of the victims of the terrorist bombings last year that killed 52 innocent people and injured hundreds.

The Queen, Tony Blair, and Ken Livingstone, mayor of London, led tributes to the dead, while senior police warned the country not to lower its guard against the threat of further attack.

Sir Ian Blair, commissioner of the Metropolitan police, said: “No matter how dreadful the terrorists are, it is infinitesimal compared to the strength of Londoners.”

The most senior policeman told the BBC he had no doubt there would be further attacks, and the security services were doing all they could to prevent them.

Police said this week they were investigating an uprecedented number of plots and had thwarted at least three attacks since last July.

But Sir Ian spoke amid continuing gaps in firm intelligence and government concerns that some suspects had escaped the intensified surveillance and disruption operations led by MI5, the Security Service.

Sir Ian said: “It is not the police or the intelligence services that will defeat the terrorists. It is the communities. They must be our eyes and ears on the streets and tell us about their concerns.”

DOJ_NMG_0039564

In the morning, memorial plaques were unveiled in the presence of relatives of the dead and survivors at each of the sites where bombs were detonated. Three went off on the London Underground and a fourth on a double-decker bus.

At midday, offices, shops and public transport fell silent as people reflected on the memory of the worst terrorist attack on the capital.

In the afternoon, government ministers as well as opposition party leaders attended a ceremony of remembrance in London's Regent's Park.

The highest-profile event of the day was the creation of a giant tribute in the shape of the figure seven and filled with carnations. As the tribute took shape, the London Gospel Choir sang "Something Inside So Strong", "Lean on Me" and "Bridge Over Troubled Waters".

Earlier in the day, the prime minister marked the two-minute silence at the London Fire Brigade headquarters in Lambeth, south London. In a statement he called on the community to unite against terrorism.

However, the release on Thursday of a videotaped statement made by one of the bombers before last July's attack has focused the mind of the government on the challenges it faces in the days ahead.

In the tape aired on Qatar-based al-Jazeera television, Shehzad Tanweer, 22, warned of a further violence until UK troops pulled out of Iraq and Afghanistan.

While opinion polls show that a majority of British Muslims are against terrorism, they also show that even moderate members of the community blame British foreign policy for fuelling extremism.

Britain Pays Homage To Bombing Victims (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

LONDON, July 7 — On a day of warnings, memory and grief, Britons marked the first anniversary of the London bombings on Friday as much of the land fell silent at noon to mourn the dead.

On July 7, 2005, four jihadist bombers detonated homemade explosives concealed in backpacks, killing themselves and 52 travelers on three subway trains and a double-decker bus.

One year later, it was a time of public homage by civic leaders as much as the less chronicled grief of people drawn to remember lost friends in the privacy of their own memories. The city's mood recalled the quiet stoicism conjured by its worst terrorist attack.

"I think it's a very personal thing, so we don't need anything over the top," said Linsey Butler, who studied music with one of the victims, Jennifer Nicholson, 24, killed at the Edgware Road subway station. "It's up to people how they want to remember," she said, adding that she favored an understated commemoration.

Ms. Butler, 23, was speaking in Regent's Park before the names of the 52 dead were read out at a ceremony of poems, readings and songs on Friday evening after hundreds of people placed purple carnations in a huge seven-leaved floral mosaic.

Earlier Friday, Ms. Butler said, she attended a private memorial for her friend, whose mother, Julie Nicholson, an Anglican vicar, abandoned her parish priesthood last year because she could not forgive the bombers who killed her daughter.

Even now, 12 months later, Mrs. Nicholson said Friday: "I do not think they should be forgiven. Forgiveness comes with justice, and there is not going to be any justice."

At the service, a poem read by Saba Mozakka, who lost her mother, Behnaz Mozakka, in the bombings, said: "Where are you? Who says you are no more? Hold our hands, for we are so lonely."

The anniversary came one day after one of the bombers, Shehzad Tanweer, 22, was shown on Al Jazeera television delivering a videotaped testament and warning that "what you have witnessed now is only the beginning."

That same theme was echoed from a different perspective on Friday by London's police chief, Sir Ian Blair, who told the BBC that the threat of a new attack had "palpably increased" since July of last year.

"I fear that we have to accept that we live in an age for some years when the threat of an attack getting through is very real," he said. "Some of the threats that we have now interdicted in the last few months are from inside and outside. We are now in a position in which the threat is both internal and external."

DOJ_NMG_0039565

Al Jazeera's broadcast on Thursday also included separate images of Ayman al-Zawahiri, the No. 2 commander of Al Qaeda, suggesting that the group was trying to claim responsibility for the attacks.

In new video excerpts released Friday, Mr. Zawahiri specifically claimed that two of the bombers — Mr. Tanweer and Mohammad Sidique Khan, the supposed ringleader of the attacks — had prepared for the bombings at a Qaeda camp. Both men were known to have visited Pakistan before July 7, but Mr. Zawahiri's remarks were the closest that Al Qaeda has come to a direct claim that it planned and supervised the bombings.

"Both of them were seeking martyrdom and wished that they could carry out a martyrdom operation," Mr. Zawahiri said.

Earlier, Sir Ian said: "I don't think the video proves that Al Qaeda was responsible for the London bombings. They are a very opportunistic organization, and they may well have collected that video together to make it look as though they were."

In Scotland, Queen Elizabeth II bowed her head for those two minutes at noon after a service at St. Giles' Cathedral in Edinburgh. Prime Minister Tony Blair observed the silence at London's Fire Brigade headquarters. Mr. Blair joined political leaders and families of the dead in laying yellow flowers to complete the mosaic in Regent's Park.

Earlier, at the exact times of the bombings — 8:50 a.m. and 9:47 a.m. — politicians and public transport executives laid wreaths at King's Cross station and at Tavistock Square, where a bomb exploded on a No. 30 bus.

Families and friends also left messages and flowers. "A year on but never far from my thoughts — Richard," one message said.

John Falding, whose girlfriend, Anat Rosenberg, died in the bus bombing, told The Press Association, "I watched the clock go down at 9:47 a.m. and I felt I had lost her again."

The news agency also reported that that fresh flowers had been laid on the grave of the bus bomber, Hasib Mir Hussain, in the northern city of Leeds, but it was not clear who put them there.

Dr. Anand Sharma, 29, a physician, was among those who went to Queen Mary's Garden at Regent's Park on Friday to help build the floral tribute. "I just came to pay my respects," he said. He had traveled on the subway, which Londoners call the Tube, on Friday, he said, and had detected a heightened nervousness among travelers.

"I was not so much worrying," he said. "It was because a lot of people were looking at me." Dr. Sharma, a Hindu, said it had been common after July 7 for "dark-skinned people" like himself to draw suspicious looks from other passengers.

There were some whose rage had not diminished since a year ago.

"I felt a sense of anger at the pointlessness of it and that remains," said Shawn Henson, 38, who identified himself as a subway train operator. "There was no point to the loss of others for the sake of their cause, whatever their cause was."

For others, though, traveling on the subway had become a matter of trepidation and fatalism. "On the Tube you are more scared, because you are underground," said Clare Houliston, 23, a London pub worker, after she laid a flower in Regent's Park. "If they are going to attack again, they will if they want to. They are not warning. They are not telling you. They are just going out and killing other people and themselves."

Britain's 2 Minutes Of Silence Honor Transit Bomb Victims On Anniversary (WT/AP)

By Paisley Dodds, Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

LONDON -- Britain fell silent yesterday on the first anniversary of the suicide bombing assault on London's transit system -- a stunning attack that killed 52 commuters and wounded more than 700 in the country's deadliest attack since World War II.

Prime Minister Tony Blair, survivors and city workers bowed their heads during two minutes of national silence observed from the Wimbledon tennis tournament in London's suburbs to Scotland, a pause punctuated by the solemn tolling of bells at St. Paul's Cathedral in the heart of London.

Mourners carried flowers and candles to makeshift shrines near the sites of the four bomb blasts. Reflecting the widespread feeling of unease that grips London, one person left a small note that read: "We will never forget."

"This is a time when our country unites across all races, religions and divides and stands in solidarity with all those who have suffered so much, in sympathy with them and in defense of the values which we share," Mr. Blair said at Fire Brigade headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0039566

Relatives of the dead gathered later for a tearful private ceremony at Regent's Park, some reading poems to honor their loved ones. Names of all the victims were read one by one as many in the crowd wept and people lined up to place yellow flowers in a mosaic memorial.

Britain had not seen a major terror strike since 1974, when the Irish Republican Army set off bombs outside two pubs in Birmingham, killing 21 persons.

The September 11 terror strikes on U.S. soil ushered in a new era of terrorism in the West: The 2004 Madrid train bombings, the slaying of Dutch filmmaker Theo Van Gogh by an Islamic radical, the carnage in the heart of the British capital.

The terrorism has led many to wonder whether, in the post-Cold War era, the world is gripped by another clash of civilizations -- one in which the values of Western liberal democracies are in irreconcilable conflict with those of militant Islam, whose adherents are growing in numbers across Europe.

For Londoners, the attacks have shaken -- but not entirely overturned -- a conviction that the two cultures can coincide peacefully in the vibrant multicultural capital that is their home.

Still, the background of the bombers came as a shock to Britons: The four bombers were all British citizens raised in northern England. Three were of Pakistani descent and the other was a Jamaica-born convert to Islam.

In a video posted on the Internet for yesterday's anniversary, al Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, boasted that two of the subway bombers had trained for their suicide mission.

British authorities previously said they knew Shehzad Tanweer and Mohammad Sidique Khan had visited Pakistan, but the comment from al-Zawahri was the first claiming they had been taught by al Qaeda.

"Both of them were seeking martyrdom and wished that they could carry out a martyrdom operation," al-Zawahri said, using the Islamist euphemism for a suicide attack.

"Today is a very sad day," said Paul Dadge, a computer technician who was pictured in newspapers around the world leading a bandaged survivor from the wreckage last year. "It is also a day to mark those people who lost loved ones and the survivors."

Residents woke to the sound of police helicopters hovering over the city yesterday as some Londoners made a determined effort to continue their daily routine.

But at the same time, a sense of mourning descended on the city -- as well as apprehension at the knowledge that any repeat attacks had the potential to devastate the precarious security that the affluent, cosmopolitan city has regained.

Buses and subway cars were standing-room only during the morning rush hour. But the atmosphere on the Underground, as the subway is called, was tense and subdued as the city was reminded of the 52 persons who never made it to their destinations last July 7.

Memorial plaques were unveiled at each of the three Underground stations affected by the attacks.

Flowers also were laid at Aldgate station, the site of the first blast, when a suicide bomber detonated his explosives at 8:50 a.m., killing seven persons. Candles were lit at the Edgware Road where a bomb exploded minutes later, killing six, and between Russell Square and King's Cross where a third bomb killed 26.

One of the most striking images of the July 7 attacks was the fourth blast that killed 13 persons and ripped apart a No. 30 bus near Tavistock Square.

The bus driver, who survived, laid a large wreath of pink and white carnations, roses and lilies. On the card, he wrote: "You will never be forgotten. May you rest in peace. George Psaradakis. No. 30 bus driver."

Video: 2 London Bombers Al-Qaida Trained (AP-Y2)

By Jasper Mortimer And Omar Sinan, Associated Press Writers

AP2, July 8, 2006

Two of the four suicide bombers who attacked London last July 7 spent time at an al-Qaida camp to prepare themselves for a suicide mission, the deputy leader of the terror network claimed in a video Friday.

British authorities previously said they knew Shehzad Tanweer and Mohammad Sidique Khan had visited Pakistan, but the comment from al-Qaida No. 2 man Ayman al-Zawahri was the first to claim that they had been at an al-Qaida base.

DOJ_NMG_0039567

"Both of them were seeking martyrdom and wished that they could carry out a martyrdom operation," al-Zawahri said, using the Islamic euphemism for a suicide attack.

It was not possible to independently verify his claim, which was part of a video posted on the Internet on the first anniversary of the suicide bombings that killed 52 commuters on three subway trains and a bus in London.

The video also contained a harangue by an English-speaking al-Qaida member against British and U.S. involvement in the Middle East and Asia, saying no Muslim should "shed tears" for Westerners killed by al-Qaida attacks.

The speaker was identified with the Arabic nickname "Azzam al-Amriki" — Azzam the American. That name has been used in previous al-Qaida videos by a man identified as Adam Gadahn, a Californian who converted to Islam and has been sought by the FBI since in 2004 on suspicion of attending an al-Qaida training camps in Pakistan.

Al-Zawahiri did not say when the two London bombers trained at the al-Qaida camp or where it was. The group is believed to have bases along the Pakistani-Afghan border, a rugged region where many experts think Osama bin Laden and al-Zawahiri may be hiding.

Al-Zawahiri said that while at the camp, Tanweer and Khan paid no heed to militants who discussed matters unrelated to suicide attacks, "because the goal for which they came to al-Qaida's jihad base was to carry out a martyrdom operation."

A security analyst at the London think-tank Chatham House, Bob Ayers, said the claim contradicted the British police finding that there was no evidence linking the four London bombers to al-Qaida.

"It makes the police look pretty bad," Ayers said. "It means the investigation was either wrong, or they had identified links, but were reluctant to reveal them."

The 31-minute video appeared on an Islamic Web site known for carrying militant messages and was released to coincide with the first anniversary of the London bombings. A heavily edited version was broadcast Thursday by Al-Jazeera television.

"The coordinated timing of the tape shows these guys did not act independently and were at a minimum supported by al-Qaida if not recruited, trained and supported by them," Ayers said.

Spokesmen at the Foreign Office and London's Metropolitan Police said they could not comment because they had not seen the tape.

Part of the video was recorded recently, as the statement by the English-speaking man referred to the June 30 revelation that U.S. troops allegedly raped and murdered an Iraqi teenager.

He said Britain and the United States had only themselves to blame for attacks by Islamic militants "because they are the ones who started this dirty war."

Evan Kohlmann, a New York consultant on terror groups, said the speaker appeared to be Gadahn, who as a teenager converted to Islam in the mid-1990s while in contact with Muslims in Garden Grove, Calif.

Federal officials said two years ago that Gadahn was suspected of going to al-Qaida training camps and serving as a translator for the terror network.

"He's the only known individual of Britain or American background in senior levels of al-Qaida," said Kohlmann, whose globalterroralert.com studies al-Qaida.

The video also contained a long testimonial from one of the London bombers, Tanweer, in which he gave his motives for taking part in the attacks and warned of more to come. Some of it appeared in the edited version broadcast by al-Jazeera.

"For the non-Muslims in Britain, you may wonder what you have done to deserve this," Tanweer said in a thick north English accent.

Britons oppress "our mothers and children, brothers and sisters from the east to the west in Palestine, Afghanistan, Iraq and Chechnya," he said.

"Your government has openly support for the genocide of more than 150,000 innocent Muslims in Fallujah," he added, referring to the west Iraqi town where U.S. troops fought Islamic militants for several weeks.

"You have openly declared war on Islam," he said.

Glancing down at his text, which was off-camera, Tanweer said: "I tell every British citizen to stop your support to your lying British government and to the so-called war on terror. And ask yourselves: Why would thousands of men be ready to give their lives for the cause of Muslims?"

DOJ_NMG_0039568

"What you have witnessed now is only the beginning of a series of attacks that will continue and increase in strength until you withdraw your soldiers from Afghanistan and Iraq," he warned.

Lines Blur On Extremism (FT)

By Christopher Caldwell

Financial Times, July 8, 2006

Recent days gave pause to anyone who thinks that western governments are fighting terrorism shoulder-to-shoulder. In Britain and the Netherlands, governments abruptly changed their approach to what David Goodhart, editor of Prospect magazine, usefully calls "security-and-identity issues" – that confusing area where citizenship, immigration, culture and national security meet. Speaking before a parliamentary committee, Tony Blair lashed out at leaders of Muslim groups who, the UK prime minister said, had done little in the year since the July 7 terrorist attacks to isolate extremists. He rejected the sentiment that terrorism, however vile its means, expressed legitimate gripes. "We have got to defeat its ideas," he said, "and we have got to address the false sense of grievance against the west."

This was only days after the Dutch government fell. While Jan Peter Balkenende, prime minister, will keep power, his minority government faces early elections in November. The proximate cause was the insistence of Rita Verdonk, immigration minister, on following the logic of her hardline policies to the point of trying to strip citizenship from the country's most charismatic politician, the Somali-born feminist, Ayaan Hirsi Ali. So now the Netherlands appears to be abandoning the hard line at the very moment Britain picks it up. But the two approaches are not as different as they look.

Mr Blair was not speaking in a vacuum. His Home Office, under the leadership of John Reid, aims to "rebalance" the criminal justice system in favour of victims. A Times-Populus poll published the same day pointed to alienation between Muslim and other Britons. A quarter of the public considers Islam a "threat to the British way of life" and one-third of Muslims think British values threaten Islamic ways. Yet the same poll reveals signs of the complaisance that Britain is allegedly leaving behind. The share of the general public worried that Muslims might be offended by excessive scrutiny for carrying large backpacks on the underground railway (52 per cent) is higher than the percentage of Muslims who actually are offended by such scrutiny (49 per cent).

Attitudes towards various kinds of immodesty and unruliness, from drunkenness to skimpy skirts, do not differ much between Muslims and others. The oddest datum is that certain subcategories of Britons – 18 to 24-year-olds and skilled labourers – found "public displays of affection between people of the opposite sex" more offensive than "public displays of affection between people of the same sex". Political correctness still restrains expressions of disapproval of any minority group.

Even Mr Blair, seriously though he takes terrorism, showed a becoming humility towards Islam itself. "I am not the person," he said, "to go into the Muslim community and explain to them that this extreme view is not the true face of Islam." It was a welcome repudiation of the tendency of politicians, none of whom know enough Arabic to order a kebab, to lecture Koranic scholars on what Islam says about jihad, suicide and headscarves.

In the Netherlands it went differently. As immigration minister this spring, Ms Verdonk tried to show her ruthlessness towards immigrants by moving to denationalise Ms Hirsi Ali within hours of a partisan television show that accused her of giving false answers when she applied for political asylum in the early 1990s. The fact that Ms Hirsi Ali was the country's pre-eminent critic of political Islam and Ms Verdonk's fellow party member only enhanced Ms Verdonk's reputation for toughness.

For the centrist D66 party, which withdrew its ministers, toppling the government, the problem was not just that she had decreed Ms Hirsi Ali a stateless person. It was also that she made the return of Ms Hirsi Ali's passport conditional on the latter's signing of an affidavit inculpating herself for some of the slanders aired about her – and thus exonerating Ms Verdonk from any blame for swallowing them. This was duress. Ms Hirsi Ali required her passport to get a US visa, made necessary by Ms Verdonk's very actions.

Ms Verdonk's humiliation looks like a repudiation of the populist politics ushered in by the anti-immigrant firebrand, Pim Fortuyn, before he was assassinated in 2002. It is tempting to see a return to the Dutch "polder model" – the kind of government that arises when much of the country lives on reclaimed polder land below sea level and is protected from drowning only by its ability to co-operate. When this system brought the Dutch prosperity, they boasted of it. When it complicated the reception of immigrants, they followed Fortuyn and rejected it as a form of political correctness.

DOJ_NMG_0039569

But reports of Fortuynism's death are premature. First, Ms Verdonk has kept her ministerial post. Second, that British Populus survey looks like an inter-community love letter compared with recent Dutch polls. In one, taken for the GPD newspaper group, only 37 per cent of the Dutch found Islam "compatible with modern European life"; in another, commissioned by Ms Verdonk, half of Moroccan Dutch described themselves as anti-western, according to the Volkskrant newspaper. Ms Verdonk may be an heir to Fortuyn but she can also be accused of a form of political correctness. If "moral relativism" is the leftwing way of sidestepping arguments about values, "amoral absolutism" is the rightwing way. Ms Verdonk flinched at passing judgment on whether Ms Hirsi Ali was Dutch and took refuge in neutral rules.

Clearly, the language of hard lines and soft ones has proved inadequate to describe the problems of regulating immigration, fighting extremism and protecting culture. Both Britain and the Netherlands are trying to combine persuasion and enforcement. The hybrid systems that result are not particularly elegant or logical. But they may be the only way to fight a problem that is not always built on logic.

The writer is a senior editor at The Weekly Standard

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

3 Held Overseas In Plan To Bomb New York Target (NYT)

By Al Baker And William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

Authorities overseas have arrested one man and have taken two others into custody on suspicion of planning suicide bombings in train tunnels beneath the Hudson River between Manhattan and New Jersey, officials said yesterday.

Five other men are being sought in connection with the plan, which law enforcement authorities said presented a genuine threat even though it was in its earliest stages and no attack was imminent.

The F.B.I. and New York City police officials have been aware of the group and its discussions for about a year, said Mark J. Mershon, the special agent in charge of the agency's New York office. Police presence at the tunnels in Manhattan that could have been targets has been increased in recent weeks in response to the investigation.

"The planning or the plotting for this attack had matured to the point where it appeared the individuals were about to move forward," Mr. Mershon said.

"They were about to go to a phase where they would attempt to surveil targets, establish a regimen of attack and acquire the resources necessary to effectuate the attacks, and at that point I think it's entirely appropriate to take it down."

Federal and local law enforcement authorities identified the main subject of the investigation as Assem Hammoud, 31, a Lebanese man who was arrested on April 27 in Beirut and was still being held there. The locations of the other two men in custody were not revealed. The eight "principal players" planning the attack, the authorities said, had secured no financing, had gathered no explosives and had not visited New York — or even the United States — to conduct surveillance. At least one of the planners has been in Canada, the authorities said.

Officials said Mr. Hammoud would likely be tried in Lebanon and that no charges were pending against him in the United States.

Monitoring of Internet chat rooms used by Islamic extremists led to the arrest of Mr. Hammoud, according to Lebanese authorities. At least one American official said the members of the group had never even met one another.

"There was a lot of discussion, there was planning being done; but there was no indication that there was any movement toward these facilities," Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said yesterday. "There is no indication that materials were secured or that specific reconnaissance was done."

One counterterrorism expert who had been briefed on the plan, and who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to talk to the news media, said, "These are bad guys in Canada and a bad guy in Lebanon talking, but it never advanced beyond that."

DOJ_NMG_0039570

"Like most plots that you get before they develop, it doesn't look that serious, but you never know," he said. "It's busted up; I think it's another good success."

He added: "They never were in New York, they never were in the States, they never got materials together. So in that regard, it's less serious than some of the others. Until you get materials together, it's not that serious; it's still in the speculative stage."

Mr. Mershon said an attack was to have been carried out in October or November; Lebanese authorities confirmed that timing. Mr. Mershon said Mr. Hammoud told Lebanese interrogators that he had pledged "allegiance to Osama bin Laden and he proclaims himself to be a member of Al Qaeda." But it was not clear the suspect had ever interacted with Mr. bin Laden or his top deputies.

In a statement, the Lebanese Internal Security Directorate said that under questioning Mr. Hammoud had said he was a member of an extremist organization and had been planning a major bombing in the United States.

Separately, a senior security official in Beirut said Mr. Hammoud's arrest in April came under an Interpol order. Lebanese authorities wanted to publicize his arrest at the time, the official said, but American authorities sought to keep the issue quiet, believing the investigation would lead to other information.

Officials in Lebanon said Mr. Hammoud is from a religious family, lives with his mother and teaches at a private university.

The arrest and the bombing plan were first reported yesterday in The Daily News. It reported that the would-be suicide bombers had intended to blow a hole in the wall of the Holland Tunnel, allowing the Hudson River to flood the tunnel and Lower Manhattan.

But authorities said yesterday that the focus appeared to have been on two PATH railroad tunnels between Manhattan and New Jersey. Those tunnels exit Manhattan at the World Trade Center site and just south of Christopher Street.

Mr. Hammoud told his interrogators that one of the plans discussed was to put suicide bombers with explosives in backpacks on a PATH train to destroy the tunnel, said a law enforcement official who was granted anonymity because the investigation is continuing. Another official said the planners wanted to use seven or eight bombers.

The first official said, "There was discussion about where to do it, how to do it, what it would take, what effect it would have in different gradations, that a key player was getting ready to depart to a country where we know was an Al Qaeda presence." He noted, however, that Mr. Hammoud was not known to be "a major Al Qaeda player."

Last night, Mr. Kelly said during an appearance on "The NewsHour With Jim Lehrer" that the attackers "looked to, in some way, shape or form, open up the water — walls holding the water back — that would then go into the PATH tunnels that go under the Hudson River." Mr. Kelly suggested the plan involved the two tunnels and the PATH station near Pennsylvania Station. He said that way the water would enter the subway system as well.

Representative Peter T. King, a Long Island Republican and the chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said he had been briefed on the investigation for nine months. He said his understanding was that the target was not the Holland or Lincoln Tunnels, which carry cars and trucks, but one of the two PATH tunnels.

Six foreign governments are assisting in the investigation, federal officials said, though they declined to identify them. Of the five suspects still being sought, Mr. Kelly said, "Their whereabouts are known, and they're being observed."

The authorities seemed to have moved in very early in the plot, as with the recent arrests of terror suspects in Florida.

"We did not wait, and we do not wait, until the fuse is lit; we swoop in as early as possible," Secretary Michael Chertoff of the Department of Homeland Security said of the matter yesterday at a news conference in Boston. "We were not at a point where we were concerned that something might happen imminently."

He said, "There was never a concern that this would actually be executed."

Still, in recent weeks, the New York Police Department has increased its presence in Lower Manhattan, Mr. Kelly said. Officers focused on access points to the PATH system. Security on the subway system was also beefed up yesterday, the first anniversary of transit bombings in London in which four bombers killed 52 other people, Mr. Kelly added.

The Lebanese Internal Security Directorate said Mr. Hammoud, going by the nom de guerre Ameer Andalusi, was initially noticed on an Islamist Web site used to recruit jihadis.

DOJ_NMG_0039571

The Lebanese authorities located him based on the Internet Protocol address imbedded in his postings, which showed him to be in Beirut, the statement said. The authorities said Mr. Hammoud had sent out maps and plans for an operation to other members of his group over the Internet and said he had been planning to travel to Pakistan for a four-month training mission.

Plot To Attack N.Y. Foiled (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

A terrorist plot to attack transit tunnels under New York's Hudson River was broken up in its early planning stages, U.S. authorities said yesterday, with three suspects arrested overseas, including a Lebanese man the FBI said was an al-Qaeda follower.

FBI assistant director for New York Mark J. Mershon said investigators had disrupted the plot before the suspects could come to the United States and begin to gather intelligence and explosives for the attack. He said there was no threat now to the PATH commuter lines, which carry tens of thousands of people between New York and New Jersey each day.

The FBI uncovered the alleged plot last summer and intercepted e-mails and chat-room postings on Web sites used to recruit Islamic terrorists. U.S. authorities turned in April to Lebanese officials for help in tracking one of the suspects, Assem Hammoud. The 31-year-old man, who the FBI said was the group's leader, was arrested in Beirut on April 27 and has confessed, officials said.

"This is a plot that would have involved martyrdom, explosives and certain of the tubes that connect New Jersey with Lower Manhattan," Mershon said. He called the threat "the real deal."

Hammoud was arrested before leaving for four months of training in Pakistan, and Lebanese investigators discovered details of a terrorist "project" on his computer that included a map "with a lot of details about New York," Lebanon's acting Interior Minister Ahmed Fatfat said in a telephone interview.

But authorities said there was no evidence that the plotters had taken any actions, such as buying explosives or sending money. They cast doubt on the feasibility of initial reports, which first appeared in the New York Daily News, that terrorists sought to flood Lower Manhattan and the Financial District by bombing tunnels.

There were conflicting assessments among U.S. counterterrorism officials about the significance of the alleged plot.

Two U.S. counterterrorism officials, speaking on the condition that their names and agencies not be identified because the FBI is the government's lead agency, discounted the ability of the conspirators to carry out an attack.

One said the alleged plot was "not as far along" as described and was "more aspirational in nature." The other described the threat as "jihadi bravado," adding "somebody talks about tunnels, it lights people up," but that there was little activity to back up the talk.

Speaking to reporters, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said, "It was never a concern that this would actually be executed. We were . . . all over this."

Authorities provided few details on two of the suspects who were arrested, declining to say where they had been apprehended. An FBI official said one was Canadian but was not being held in Canada. Mershon said officials had not planned to announce the arrests yesterday and criticized the leak to the media, saying it upset cooperation between the United States and six foreign governments assisting in the investigation.

Authorities said Hammoud, who also used the name Amir Andalousli, told investigators that he had planned the attacks for October or November and had sworn allegiance to Osama bin Laden.

His family insisted he had no connection to al-Qaeda. His mother, Nabila Qotob, told the Associated Press in Beirut that Hammoud taught economics at a local university. "His morale is high because he is confident he is innocent," she told the AP.

Fatfat said Hammoud appeared to reaching out to al-Qaeda and did not appear to have been assigned a specific mission by the group. "It seems to us they are working as an independent group," the Lebanese official said. "It seems it was his idea. He contacted many others by Internet."

Fatfat said Hammoud, a Sunni Muslim, lived in Ain al-Hilweh, Lebanon's largest Palestinian refugee camp. Al-Qaeda members are reported to be active in the camp, according to the Middle East Intelligence Bulletin.

DOJ_NMG_0039572

The alleged plotters appear to reflect the ad hoc, self-organizing nature of many alleged terrorist groups. Connecting suspects directly to known terrorist organizers is often difficult, and many recent arrests have been of people who were allegedly at the beginning of their planning. Sorting bravado from real treachery can be difficult, according to terrorism experts.

Last month, the FBI arrested seven Miami men and charged them with terrorism. They had allegedly planned to attack the Sears Tower in Chicago. But the men had no contact with al-Qaeda, other than an FBI informant who was posing as a representative of the terrorist organization. And the group had neither money nor equipment before its members were arrested.

Like the plot announced yesterday, the Miami group's plans were described by investigators as "aspirational."

But U.S. authorities say that even if plots seem improbable, it is essential for arrests to be made as early as possible to prevent any real threat.

Speaking about yesterday's announcement, the FBI's Mershon said, "They were about to go to a phase where they would attempt to surveil targets, establish a regimen of attack and acquire the resources necessary to effectuate the attacks. And at that point, I think it's entirely appropriate to take it down."

The Hudson River tunnel threat appeared to combine several themes that have emerged as sources of anxiety for U.S. authorities over the past 18 months.

They include terrorists using the Internet to accomplish tasks that used to require travel and in-person meetings, such as casing targets and recruiting members. The alleged plots also brought a renewed focus on the vulnerability of rail and transit systems, which have gotten less federal aid for security than other transportation modes, such as commercial aviation.

Those financial concerns are often cited by local officials in New York and Washington, who say that federal authorities are not directing enough money their way. Yesterday, New York political leaders used the announcement of the alleged plot to renew their call for more funding.

Yesterday's report came one year after the London train and bus bombings that killed 52 people. In recent weeks, the New York Police Department had deployed additional personnel in Lower Manhattan. In Washington, Metro transit police said they were alerted to the threat along with national transit officials, and increased tunnel inspections over the past year.

FBI Thwarts Terrorist Plot Against NYC (AP-Y2)

By Pat Milton, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 8, 2006

A terrorist plot to flood lower Manhattan by attacking train tunnels under the Hudson River used by tens of thousands of commuters was thwarted before the conspirators could travel to the United States, authorities said Friday.

Eight suspects — including an al-Qaida loyalist arrested in Lebanon and two others in custody elsewhere — had hoped to pull off the attack in October or November, federal officials said. But federal investigators working with their counterparts in six other countries intervened. The other five suspects remained at large.

"It was never a concern that this would actually be executed," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said in Boston. "We were, as I say, all over this."

Initial reports said that the terrorists wanted to attack the Holland Tunnel, a major thoroughfare for cars entering the island of Manhattan. But officials said the group had specifically mentioned only the train tunnels under the Hudson River used by commuters on their way to New York and New Jersey.

"This is a plot that involved martyrdom and explosives" and focused on the "tubes that connect Jersey and lower Manhattan," said FBI Assistant Director Mark J. Mershon.

The men believed that by bombing the train tunnels they could unleash massive flooding in lower Manhattan, where Wall Street and the World Trade Center site are located, New York Police Department Commissioner Ray Kelly said.

A federal law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said investigators believe that an attack on a train tunnel, unlike the Holland Tunnel, could have achieved that goal. The official said the suspects hoped to inflict damage on the U.S. economy.

DOJ_NMG_0039573

Investigators decided in recent weeks that the "plotting for this attack had matured to a point where it appeared that the individuals were about to move forward," Mershon said. "They were about to go to a phase where they would attempt to surveil targets, establish a regimen of attack and acquire the resources necessary to effectuate the attacks."

Details of the plot — first reported by the Daily News — emerged on the one-year anniversary of the attacks on the London transportation system that killed 52 people. Officials said the timing of Friday's report in relation to the anniversary was coincidental.

New York's transportation system has emerged as a potential terrorist threat several times over the years. A June book by journalist Ron Suskind highlighted a reported plot by al-Qaida terrorists to kill thousands of New Yorkers by spreading cyanide gas in the subway. In May, a man was convicted of plotting to blow up a bustling subway station.

In 1993, the FBI rounded up more than a dozen men who allegedly conspired to blow up five New York City landmarks including the Lincoln and Holland tunnels. The prosecution resulted in more than a dozen convictions.

In the latest case, a federal official said FBI agents monitoring Internet chat rooms used by extremists learned of the plot in recent months and determined that tunnels were possibly being targeted after investigators pieced together code words from their conversations.

Another U.S. official, also speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, called the plot "largely aspirational" and described the Internet conversations as mostly extremists discussing and conceptualizing the plot. The official said no money had been transferred, nor had other similar operational steps been taken.

Officials cited the arrest of the Lebanese suspect — described as the scheme's mastermind — as a significant break in the investigation. A Lebanese official said the Beirut man confessed to plotting to attack New York City tunnels later this year, and that he was acting on Osama bin Laden's orders.

Police arrested the man on April 27, acting on information from the FBI. The 31-year-old suspect uses the alias Amir Andalousli, but his real name is Assem Hammoud.

The suspect's family denied any al-Qaida links and his mother, Nabila Qotob, said Hammoud taught economics at a local university. "His morale is high because he is confident he is innocent," she said.

A U.S. law enforcement official said one of the others accused in the plot is believed to be Canadian, but said there were no apparent links to the 17 people arrested last month in a plot to bomb buildings around Toronto.

Authorities close to the investigation told The Canadian Press that police there questioned a man but released him because there was not enough evidence to hold him.

Train riders took news of the plot in stride.

"It bothers us, it scares us, but you gotta keep living, you know?" said Dudley Nosy, 21, a security guard from Brooklyn who regularly takes the train to Jersey City to see his girlfriend. "You can't stay in the house all day long."

___

Associated Press Writers Pat Milton in New York; Lara Jakes Jordan, Katherine Shrader and Mark Sherman in Washington, D.C.; Sam F. Ghattas in Beirut, Lebanon; and Glenn Johnson in Boston contributed to this report.

FBI: Three Held In New York Tunnel Plot (CNN)

CNN, July 8, 2006

NEW YORK (CNN) -- U.S. and international authorities disrupted a plot by eight terrorists to blow up a commuter train tunnel connecting New Jersey and Manhattan, the FBI announced Friday.

Three of the eight men are in some form of custody, and the rest have been at least partially identified, FBI Assistant Director Mark Mershon told reporters. The identity of one suspect, a 31-year-old Lebanese man, has been released.

Mershon said the plan was "what we believe was the real deal," a scheme involving al Qaeda members on three continents.

Mershon said none of the suspects has been to the United States. The investigation remains classified, he said. (Watch the FBI's Mershon reveal what links the plot had to bin Laden -- 3:29)

DOJ_NMG_0039574

"They were about to go to a phase where they would attempt to surveil targets, establish a regimen of attack and acquire the resources necessary to effectuate the attacks," Mershon said. "At that point I think it's entirely appropriate to take it down."

Although Mershon would not divulge extensive details of the plot, law enforcement sources said the suspects wanted to cross the Canadian border into the United States.

Once in New York City, they would board trains with backpacks full of explosives, which they planned to detonate when the trains passed through a tunnel under the Hudson River.

The suspects discussed how much explosive material would be needed to breach the thick bedrock lining of the tunnels, the sources said.

Assem Hammoud is the only suspect who has been formally charged; he is in custody in Lebanon. Hammoud, who claims to be an al Qaeda member, has admitted to being the group's ringleader and has professed his loyalty to the terror network's leader, Osama bin Laden, Mershon said.Playboy poseur

Hammoud, who also goes by the name Amir Andalousli, is a professor of computer studies at a private university in the Lebanese capital of Beirut, and he has been parading as a playboy with a party lifestyle as a cover for his extremism, Lebanese General Security spokesman Elie Baradei said.

"He was requested not to show any religious inclinations during his time in Lebanon and to give the impression of being of a playboy," Baradei said. "He has done that perfectly."

The FBI began investigating Hammoud and his alleged cohort about a year ago, when talk of a tunnel attack popped up in Internet chat rooms and in e-mail discussions, Baradei said. The FBI helped track the chatter to Hammoud, who admitted to sending detailed maps of the targeted Port Authority Trans-Hudson, or PATH, tunnel and plans for the attack to his co-conspirators, he said.

A Syrian national recruited Hammoud into the realm of terrorism in 2003, and Hammoud received weapons training at the Ain Helweh Refugee Camp, which was then located in Syria-controlled Lebanon, Baradei said.

Hammoud was arrested April 27 in his Beirut apartment in a sting coordinated with the FBI before a planned trip to Pakistan, where he was to undergo more training, according to a statement from the Lebanese Interior Security Service.

"He was living a life of fun and indulgence away from all suspicions," the statement said.

Hammoud, who faces no charges in the United States and thus cannot be extradited, will be tried in Lebanon on terrorism charges, said Achraf Rifi, general director of Lebanon's internal security forces.An international effort

Mershon said six countries participated in the investigation. He would not say which countries, but sources said they include Canada, Pakistan and Iraq.

"The real story here is the symphony of cooperation and coordination not just in the New York-New Jersey metropolitan area, but frankly, around the world with a number of intelligence and investigative services," Mershon said. "It's beyond textbook; it's, in fact, been storybook."

Although the plot was in its preliminary stages, Mershon said the attack was slated to take place in October or November. Investigators moved in because they believed the suspects were about to begin assessing the target and obtaining explosives and other materials for the attack, he said.

Mershon would not name the specific tunnel but said it was one of the PATH tubes running under the Hudson River.

According to the port authority's Web site, "PATH presently carries 215,115 passengers each weekday." More than 60 million passengers used the system in 2005, the Web site states. There are five tunnels running beneath the Hudson. (Watch officials explain the vulnerability of transit tunnels and crossings -- 1:39)

The New York Daily News broke the story Friday morning, and Mershon expressed disappointment at what he called the "unprofessional behavior" of whomever leaked it to the paper.

The leaker was "clearly someone who doesn't understand the fragility of international relations," he said, adding that there have been a "number of uncomfortable questions" from the foreign intelligence services that participated in the investigation.

The FBI has been "working to shore up those relationships," Mershon said.

Friday marked the first anniversary of the London Underground bombings, in which four suicide bombers killed 52 people on the London subway and on a bus.

DOJ_NMG_0039575

US Foils New York Terror Plot, Says FBI (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Christopher Grimes

Financial Times, July 8, 2006

The US has disrupted an alleged terrorist plot to blow up underwater rail tunnels connecting New York and New Jersey, the Federal Bureau of Investigation said on Friday on the anniversary of the London bombings.

Law enforcement officials said the plan to attack the PATH rail system in October or November – just after the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks - had not progressed beyond initial stages. But Mark Mershon, a senior FBI official, told reporters that it was the "real deal" and would have involved "martyrdom" and "explosives".

Over the course of a year long investigation that involved cooperation with six countries, Mr Mershon said the FBI had identified eight "principal players". Three of those suspects were being held in custody outside the US, including Assem Hammoud, a 31-year-old Lebanese national who pledged allegiance to Osama bin Laden and allegedly confessed to being the mastermind of the plot.

The FBI disclosed elements of the foiled plot on the anniversary of the London bombings after the New York Daily News on Friday published details of the investigation.

Michael Bloomberg, the New York mayor, said there was "not one shred of evidence that [the plot] had proceeded beyond the planning stage". Ray Kelly, the New York police commissioner, said it had "not reached anything close to being operational", while stressing that "New York remains in the crosshairs of the terrorists".

Mr Mershon said none of the eight suspects had been in the US. He said Lebanese authorities felt comfortable arresting Mr Hammoud, who is facing criminal charges in Lebanon, after the group reached a point where they appeared ready to start surveilling targets and procuring materials for the planned attacks.

At a separate press conference, Michael Chertoff, secretary of homeland security, said the US had taken the threat "seriously".

"Any danger was disrupted and I think that speaks for itself," Mr Chertoff said.

Playboy's Life: Girls & Booze (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek

New York Daily News, July 8, 2006

The alleged ringleader of the tunnel terror plot lived the life of an international playboy - on orders from Al Qaeda.

Assem Hammoud, 31, even fooled his mother, if Lebanese police and U.S. anti-terror officials are correct.

His mother, Nabila Qotob, said Hammoud drinks alcohol, had girlfriends, traveled widely and showed no similarities to Islamic militants.

She also said Hammoud taught economics at a local university.

To prove her son was no jihadi, Qotob showed off photos yesterday of Hammoud with his father and lounging shirtless on a speeding motorboat in Germany.

There were also very un-Islamic pictures of Hammoud with three smiling women - none of them wearing veils - on his arm during an undated stay in Canada.

"His morale is high because he is confident he is innocent," said Qotob, who said she had recently visited her son in jail.

But Lebanese police, who arrested Hammoud on April 27, said in a statement that the suspect claimed he had been ordered to maintain a fun-loving, secular lifestyle to hide his Islamic militancy.

"He did just that with perfection," the police statement said.

Counterterror agents knew Hammoud by his Internet alias of Amir Andalousli and consider him a dedicated member of Al Qaeda.

"We questioned him and he unraveled the plot," a source said.

FBI Assistant Director Mark Mershon said, "We know that he has acknowledged pledging a bayat or allegiance to Osama Bin Laden, and he proclaims himself to be a member of Al Qaeda."

DOJ_NMG_0039576

Hammoud also told his captors that he was acting "on a religious order from Bin Laden and said, 'I am proud to carry out his orders,' " a Lebanese official said.

To carry out those orders, Hammoud planned to go to Pakistan for four months for training and had already undergone some light weapons instruction with a Syrian man who came to Lebanon this year, Lebanese cops said.

The Lebanese government said that instruction took place in the Ein Alhulwa camp, a Palestinian refugee camp that Middle East expert Nimrod Raphaeli called "an incubator of terrorism and a fountainhead of Islamist extremism."

Hammoud wouldn't be the first Islamic terrorist to live the good life to fool possible investigators.

Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, believed to be the mastermind of the 9/11 plot, had developed a reputation as a charming womanizer even as he plotted to blow up airplanes flying to the U.S. from Asia.

And some of the 9/11 attackers were known to frequent topless bars and pay for lap dances to keep their covers from being blown.

New York Terror Plot Is Foiled, FBI Says (BOS)

By Bryan Bender, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, July 8, 2006

Plan targeted tunnels on rail lines from N.J.

WASHINGTON -- The FBI in recent months foiled a terrorist plot to blow up transit tunnels leading into New York City after the agency spent a year monitoring Internet discussions between at least eight Al Qaeda sympathizers based on three continents, US officials said yesterday.

The suspected mastermind of the plot, Assem Hammoud , 31, was arrested a month ago in Beirut , the law enforcement officials said, while two more members of the group are in custody in other foreign countries. Five more suspects are being sought, but none are believed to be in the United States, the officials added, declining to provide further details because the investigation still is underway.

``We believe we interrupted this group early in their planning," Mark J. Mershon , the FBI's assistant director in charge of the New York office, told reporters yesterday after the case was first revealed by the New York Daily News. He said the terrorist plot, which appeared to be planned for this fall, ``has largely been disrupted."

New York Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly quickly sought to calm public fears. ``There was a lot of discussion" of the plot on the Internet, ``but there was no indication of any movement toward" launching the plan, Kelly said at a joint news conference in Manhattan. ``There is no indication that materials were secured."

The foiled operation, which came to light on the first anniversary of the London transit bombings, apparently called for suicide bombers to detonate explosives inside transit tunnels leading from New Jersey into lower Manhattan, causing water to flood into the financial district near where the World Trade Center once stood. Officials said the group appeared to be ready to begin conducting surveillance of potential targets and acquiring explosives.

``Any danger was disrupted," Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff told reporters yesterday after a media event in Boston. ``We don't wait until someone has lit the fuse before stepping in. It is a reminder of the fact that this type of threat remains with us. We cannot drop our guard."

But the plan was described by officials of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey as unfeasible and by some terrorism specialists as amateurish, in part for discussing it in public Internet chat rooms.

The tunnels leading into New York are highly reinforced and lower Manhattan is above the water levels of the Hudson River. The city would not be deluged with water if one of the automobile or railway tunnels were destroyed, the Port Authority specialists said.

And coming just weeks after the revelation of two other seemingly outlandish plots that were disrupted in their early stages -- one in Toronto, one in Miami -- the news of the New York plot left some observers wondering how to assess the seriousness of such threats.

DOJ_NMG_0039577

``The Miami plot was a setup [and] this one doesn't seem to have gotten very far along either," said Ian Cutbertson , director of the counterterrorism program at the World Policy Institute in New York, referring to the seven men arrested last month in an undercover FBI sting for allegedly plotting to bomb the Sears Tower in Chicago and other landmarks.

``It seems to be Internet chatter about what we can do that is spectacular," Cutbertson added. ``But it plays into New Yorkers' worst fear: being caught in the tunnel when it is blown up."

Still, officials insisted yesterday that the tunnel plot was ``serious" and they admonished unnamed counterterrorism officials cited in the Daily News report for revealing the ongoing FBI operation.

Mershon complained it will now be more difficult to nab the individuals who are still at large. He added that the public disclosure could hamper the FBI's ability to maintain the cooperation of foreign intelligence agencies in countries where the United States is unpopular -- including Lebanon's internal security service, which has long struggled with Islamic militant groups.

Mershon said six foreign countries are involved in the investigation and that anyone who discussed the plot with the media was ``someone who doesn't understand the fragility of international relations."

A US counterterrorism official told the Globe that three of the six countries were Iraq, Pakistan, and Canada, demonstrating the scope of international terrorist links.

Chertoff hailed the foiled plot as an example of how law enforcement and intelligence communities have improved their ability to monitor potential terrorist plots well before they enter the operational stage.

``We acted quickly," he told reporters in Boston. ``Intelligence is better and intelligence sharing is better. We are able to detect more things that are going on. Sometimes that causes skeptics to say the people you are arresting aren't really serious [but] if you look back at [the] London [suicide attacks], it is a mistake to assume that the only terrorist is the James Bond type. Mixing a bomb in a bathtub does not exactly take rocket science."

US counterterrorism officials have increasingly been monitoring the Internet, which has become a preferred mode of communication for many Islamic radicals. A Justice Department report released last month when the Miami plot was announced said that ``terrorists are using the Internet not only to solicit funds and for recruitment but also for training and operational planning. This remains a significant challenge to our counterterrorism efforts."

New York lawmakers quickly seized on the news as new evidence that major East Coast cities remain at the top of the terrorist target list and should not be deprived of homeland security funds, which have been reduced this year as federal grants were spread more evenly across the country.

New York and Washington, which were struck on Sept. 11, 2001, saw their federal homeland security funding cut by about 40 percent, while Boston and its surrounding communities were cut by about one-third.

``The fact that New York's monies and Washington's monies were cut while places like Dillingham, Alaska, and Modoc County, California, got increases in terrorist funds shows that they'd better go back and reexamine" the funding formula, said Senator Charles Schumer , Democrat of New York, on CNN.

Professional counterterrorism specialists were not overly concerned, said Vincent Cannistraro , former head of the CIA's Counterterrorism Center.

``These guys are extremists, but not professional terrorists," Cannistraro said . ``They had no access to explosives. The FBI had been monitoring this for eight months. It was on a public website and is not clandestine. Professional terrorists don't usually plan in public. These guys were basically wannabes."

Secretary Unveils Details Of Plot To Flood N.Y. Subway Tunnels (BOSH)

By Dave Wedge and Casey Ross

Boston Herald, July 8, 2006

A plot by foreign terrorists to bomb subway tunnels underneath New York City was disrupted by federal agents who uncovered a “threat stream” several months ago, the nation’s Homeland Security czar said.

Speaking yesterday in Boston, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said agents acted quickly on the information, sweeping in to bust up an alleged terror cell.

“We don’t wait until someone lights a fuse to do something,” Chertoff said. “That would be playing with people’s lives.”

DOJ_NMG_0039578

Chertoff refused to discuss specifics of the plot targeting trains beneath the Hudson River, but urged commuters nationwide to use subways as normal.

"The subways are safe. We have great (local) police and we are continuing to work with them to prevent any kind of terrorist activity," he said.

A joint FBI and Homeland Security statement said the attack was in the "planning stages." Agents picked up information by monitoring Internet chatrooms and through the recent arrest by Lebanese authorities of an alleged conspirator, officials said.

A senior Lebanese security official said the suspect is a Beirut native named Assem Hammoud, also known as Amir Andalousli.

The New York Daily News reported that the plotters wanted to cause Hurricane Katrina-like flooding on Wall Street and the city's financial district by blowing up the Holland Tunnel, a key commuter channel that connects Manhattan and New Jersey. A federal counterterrorism official, however, denied the report.

Details of the alleged plot emerged on the one-year anniversary yesterday of an al-Qaeda bombing of subway stations in London that killed 52 people.

FBI Plans New Net-tapping Push (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, July 8, 2006

New legislation, seen by CNET News.com, forces Net providers, networking-gear makers to build in Big Brother.

The FBI has drafted sweeping legislation that would require Internet service providers to create wiretapping hubs for police surveillance and force makers of networking gear to build in backdoors for eavesdropping, CNET News.com has learned.

FBI Agent Barry Smith distributed the proposal at a private meeting last Friday with industry representatives and indicated it would be introduced by Sen. Mike DeWine, an Ohio Republican, according to two sources familiar with the meeting.

The draft bill would place the FBI's Net-surveillance push on solid legal footing. At the moment, it's ensnared in a legal challenge from universities and some technology companies that claim the Federal Communications Commission's broadband surveillance directives exceed what Congress has authorized.

The FBI claims that expanding the 1994 Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act is necessary to thwart criminals and terrorists who have turned to technologies like voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP.

"The complexity and variety of communications technologies have dramatically increased in recent years, and the lawful intercept capabilities of the federal, state and local law enforcement community have been under continual stress, and in many cases have decreased or become impossible," according to a summary accompanying the draft bill.

Complicating the political outlook for the legislation is an ongoing debate over allegedly illegal surveillance by the National Security Administration--punctuated by several lawsuits challenging it on constitutional grounds and an unrelated proposal to force Internet service providers to record what Americans are doing online. One source, who asked not to be identified because of the sensitive nature of last Friday's meeting, said the FBI viewed its CALEA expansion as a top congressional priority for 2007.

Breaking the legislation down

The 27-page proposed CALEA amendments seen by CNET News.com would:

• Require any manufacturer of "routing" and "addressing" hardware to offer upgrades or other "modifications" that are needed to support Internet wiretapping. Current law does require that of telephone switch manufacturers--but not makers of routers and network address translation hardware like Cisco Systems and 2Wire.

• Authorize the expansion of wiretapping requirements to "commercial" Internet services including instant messaging if the FCC deems it to be in the "public interest." That would likely sweep in services such as in-game chats offered by Microsoft's Xbox 360 gaming system as well.

• Force Internet service providers to sift through their customers' communications to identify, for instance, only VoIP calls. (The language requires companies to adhere to "processing or filtering methods or procedures applied by a law enforcement agency.") That means police could simply ask broadband providers like AT&T, Comcast or Verizon for wiretap info--instead of having to figure out what VoIP service was being used.

DOJ_NMG_0039579

• Eliminate the current legal requirement saying the Justice Department must publish a public "notice of the actual number of communications interceptions" every year. That notice currently also must disclose the "maximum capacity" required to accommodate all of the legally authorized taps that government agencies will "conduct and use simultaneously."

Jim Harper, a policy analyst at the free-market Cato Institute and member of a Homeland Security advisory board, said the proposal would "have a negative impact on Internet users' privacy."

"People expect their information to be private unless the government meets certain legal standards," Harper said. "Right now the Department of Justice is pushing the wrong way on all this."

Neither the FBI nor DeWine's office responded to a request for comment Friday afternoon.

DeWine has relatively low approval ratings--47 percent, according to SurveyUSA.com--and is enmeshed in a fierce battle with a Democratic challenger to retain his Senate seat in the November elections. DeWine is a member of a Senate Judiciary subcommittee charged with overseeing electronic privacy and antiterrorism enforcement and is a former prosecutor in Ohio.

A panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C., decided 2-1 last month to uphold the FCC's extension of CALEA to broadband providers, and it's not clear what will happen next with the lawsuit. Judge Harry Edwards wrote in his dissent that the majority's logic gave the FCC "unlimited authority to regulate every telecommunications service that might conceivably be used to assist law enforcement."

The organizations behind the lawsuit say Congress never intended CALEA to force broadband providers--and networks at corporations and universities--to build in central surveillance hubs for the police. The list of organizations includes Sun Microsystems, Pulver.com, the American Association of Community Colleges, the Association of American Universities and the American Library Association.

If the FBI's legislation becomes law, it would derail the lawsuit because there would no longer be any question that Congress intended CALEA to apply to the Internet.

Subways Are Safe, US Security Official Says After Riding T (BOS)

By Mac Daniel

The Boston Globe, July 8, 2006

Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff marked the one-year anniversary of the London terrorist bombings by riding the MBTA's Green Line yesterday and touting federal aid to combat terrorist threats in Boston, but he cautioned that no one can guarantee security.

``I would not hesitate, and I wouldn't hesitate to tell my family, to get on the subway, here or all over the country," he said. ``I think that we should not be bullied out of getting on the train. We shouldn't give terrorists the idea that they can scare us off our trains. I have no hesitation in saying this is a safe mode of transportation. On the other hand, we do live with a certain amount of risk in life. . . . But our job is to reduce the risk as much as possible, and that's what we're doing."

Boston has received $11 million in federal transit security grants this year alone, the fourth largest recipient in the nation, behind New York City; Washington, D.C.; and Chicago. The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority is the nation's fourth largest public transit system, in terms of daily ridership.

Since 2003, the Department of Homeland Security has awarded the MBTA and other local agencies $29.1 million in such grants, funding closed-circuit television installation throughout the entire T rail system, transit police training and staffing, upgrades in communications, and even building a working duplicate of the T's operations control center, in case the current center is attacked or made inoperable.

Chertoff was introduced by MBTA Transit Police Chief Joseph C. Carter, who said, ``The cause of security and freedom in America remains an ongoing effort."

Chertoff's visit coincided with news of the foiling of a terrorist plot to bomb the transit system linking New York City and New Jersey. Chertoff said that the plot was discovered ``several months ago" and that the information was acted on immediately ``to disrupt the completion of any plot."

DOJ_NMG_0039580

``We take all threats seriously," Chertoff said during a press conference outside Government Center station. ``We don't wait until someone has lit the fuse to step in and prevent something from happening. That would be playing games with people's lives."

Chertoff came to the press conference after a short ride on the Green Line from North Station. He said that he had fond memories of the T from his days at Harvard University and Harvard Law School and that he does not want the threat of a terrorist attack to keep the public from riding.

In Boston to attend a Coast Guard ceremony, Chertoff also used the visit to mark the one-year anniversary of the London transit bombings that killed 52 people and injured hundreds.

``It is a sad anniversary," he said. ``A year ago in London, there was a terrible terrorist attack carried out, which cost the lives of over 50 people.

``And it's a reminder to us, just as 9/11 was a reminder to us, that terrorists will attack anywhere, they will use any method of transportation, and they continue to wage war against free people all over the world, including the people of the United States," Chertoff said.

MBTA Transit Police used the anniversary to hand out pamphlets about their ``See Something, Say Something" safety awareness campaign, which reminds transit riders to report suspicious packages.

``The subways are safe," Chertoff said . ``You've got great police officers here, and we've got great partnerships with them, and we're going to continue to work to make sure that we prevent and disrupt any kind of terrorist activity, whether it's underground or crossing Boston Harbor or flying up in the air."

In fiscal 2006, Boston received $9.6 million for rail security, accounting for 9 percent of the total nationwide mass transit security funds issued this year.

Bay State Polls Say Chertoff Off-track (BOSH)

By Dave Wedge And Casey Ross

Boston Herald, July 8, 2006

In the wake of a thwarted plot to bomb Big Apple subways, Bay State lawmakers yesterday blasted Homeland Security czar Michael Chertoff, saying trains remain virtually unprotected from possible terrorist attacks.

“In terms of rail safety, I think it’s one of the least-secure modes of transportation,” said Boston City Councilor Stephen Murphy, an outspoken railway security advocate. “Frankly, you can get at rail cars just about anywhere along the route.”

Chertoff, President Bush’s Homeland Security secretary, visited Boston yesterday to talk up the administration’s focus on protecting the nation’s railways, noting that Boston received $9.6 million for rail security in 2006 - the fourth-highest amount in the nation.

“We should not give terrorists the idea that they can scare us off our trains,” Chertoff said, speaking at the Government Center MBTA stop.

But his strong remarks on improving rail safety are a departure from comments he made last year, when he downplayed train threats and insisted the department’s main focus should remain on protecting airlines.

Chertoff also infuriated Bay State congressmen a week after the 2005 London subway bombings when he said local officials should bear the financial burden of protecting trains.

Yesterday, Chertoff denied his focus on transit security marked a change in course.

“It’s a partnership,” he said. “I don’t think (MBTA police Chief Joe) Carter would want us coming in and taking over responsibility. The idea is to give local chiefs the tools they need to do their jobs.”

But U.S. Rep. Edward Markey (D-Malden) argued that Homeland Security “needs to do much more to secure these systems against attack.”

“It’s clear that securing our subways, buses and rail cars is a low priority for the Bush administration,” Markey said.

U.S. Rep. Stephen Lynch (D-South Boston) said rail security is “grossly underfunded” because “97 percent” of transportation security money goes to the airways. Lynch has filed a bill in Congress three times to hike rail security spending from $150 million to $5 billion, but the measure has been blocked by Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0039581

"Right now we're spending $9 per passenger on airline security," Lynch said. "We spend less than 2 cents per passenger on rail security. It just shows the disparity."

He added: "It will take an attack on the rails to get something done."

Fearful of lax rail security nationwide, Murphy last year filed a plan still pending to ban trains carrying hazardous material in Boston.

"I don't think the priorites at the federal level are where they should be," Murphy said.

More Antiterror Funds For New York Area (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, July 7, 2006

The New York City metropolitan area will receive $53.8 million in federal antiterrorism grants to protect its rail, bus and ferry systems, a 25 percent increase over last year, the Department of Homeland Security announced yesterday. The additional money may curtail some of the criticism of a 40 percent cut announced on May 31 in a separate, larger antiterrorism grant program. The new grant money — $47 million for rail, $5.5 million for bus systems and $1.3 million for ferry security — means the New York area will get nearly 44 percent of the total transit grants distributed this year. "The Department of Homeland Security is finally putting some of its money where its mouth is and seems to have realized that New York City's subways and buses remain under constant threat," Senator Charles E. Schumer said.

American Al Qaeda Member Lambastes U.S. Troops (CNN)

CNN, July 8, 2006

(CNN) -- California-born al Qaeda member Adam Gadahn speaks out against U.S. troops on a video that has been released by As-Sahab, the terror network's video-production outfit.

The video deals primarily with the London subway bombings of 2005, but includes a five-minute speech from Gadahn, in English, in which the American lashes out at allegations of war crimes recently leveled at U.S. troops in Iraq.

Mentioned specifically are alleged incidents in Mahmoudiya and Haditha. A U.S. Army private faces charges of raping and killing an Iraqi woman in Mahmoudiya, and the U.S. military is investigating allegations that Marines killed 24 civilians in Haditha in November.

In the video, Gadahn says the incidents represent a pattern of U.S. and British brutality toward Muslims, and he says he saw U.S. soldiers kill civilians in Afghanistan.

"They have murdered thousands of Afghan civilians," he says. "I have seen it with my own eyes, carried the victims in my own arms. You name it, they have bombed it."

The video was broadcast Thursday on the Arabic-language television network Al-Jazeera.

Gadahn has appeared in previous al Qaeda videos wearing a mask, but his face is uncovered in the new video.

Gadahn is wanted in connection with possible terrorist threats against the United States, according to the FBI.

"Although the FBI has no information indicating this individual is connected to any specific terrorist activities, the FBI would like to locate and question this person," the agency's Web site states.

He has several aliases, including Abu Suhayb Al-Amriki, Abu Suhayb, Yihya Majadin Adams and Adam Pearlman, the FBI states.

According to a manifesto penned in 1995 and posted on a University of Southern California Web site, Gadahn was reared on a California goat farm and home-schooled by Christian parents.

He found Islam after moving into his grandparents' Santa Ana home, where he began exploring Internet message boards about religion and reading English translations of the Quran.

"You see, I discovered that the beliefs and practices of this religion fit my personal theology and intellect as well as basic human logic," Gadahn wrote in the essay.London bombings

The majority of the videotape deals with the London bombings and states that two of the suicide bombers received explosives training at al Qaeda camps.

DOJ_NMG_0039582

The narrator of the 30-minute tape says that suicide bomber Shehzad Tanweer "received, along with the martyr (Mohammad) Sidique Khan, focused and practical instruction on the manufacture of explosives and their use at the camps of Qaeda al-Jihad."

The tape includes footage of men mixing explosives and carrying out small explosions, but it's not clear if the men in the video are the London bombers.

Khan and Tanweer traveled to Pakistan in October 2004, returning to Britain in February 2005, five months before they carried out the London bombings, along with Germaine Lindsay and Hasib Hussain.

Al Qaeda's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, who last year first praised and then claimed credit for the London bombing on behalf of al Qaeda, said Tanweer was motivated by Britain's role in Iraq, Afghanistan, Gaza and the West Bank.

"That's why Shehzad came to the camps of Qaeda al-Jihad and spent a period of time with Mohammad Sidique," al-Zawahiri said on the tape. "Both of them were seeking martyrdom and wished they could carry out a martyrdom operation. They were both very insistent on that, and if the brothers discussed something else they would pay them no heed."

Tanweer, speaking in English on the video, says non-Muslims in Britain may wonder "what you have done to deserve this."

"You continue to oppress," he says. "Your government has openly supported the genocide of over 150,000 innocent Muslims in Falluja."

The video also contains recent clips from bin Laden and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by U.S. troops in Iraq last month.

US Passenger Detained After Trying To Break Into Delta Cockpit (AFP)

AFP, July 8, 2006

US authorities detained a male airline passenger who repeatedly tried to break into the cockpit during a flight to Florida before being restrained by passengers, an airport spokeswoman told AFP.

The incident occurred late Thursday as a Delta Air Lines flight from New York was descending for landing at the Tampa International Airport in western Florida, the airport spokeswoman, Brenda Geoghagan, said.

The flight departed La Guardia Airport and was on its landing approach shortly after 11:00 pm when a man refused a flight attendant's order to sit down, became agitated and ran toward the cockpit, where he tried twice to knock down the door, she said.

"Fifteen minutes before landing, the flight attendant wanted him to sit down and he wouldn't. He was uncooperative," the spokeswoman said.

"He started evidently running towards the front of the aircraft and started to run at full speed toward the cockpit door, which was secured, and he fell down and rammed the door again."

The airport spokeswoman said three passengers became concerned about his behavior and "wound up subduing him and holding him."

Police identified the man as Nefpali Alexander Liemenbez, 24.

The airport spokeswoman said Liemenbez was a Hispanic US soldier with a mental problem whose active duty was to end next Tuesday.

No one was injured in the incident.

Liemenbez was taken to a local hospital, where he will be held for 72 hours for observation, Geoghagan said.

The case was referred to the FBI for evaluation.

Passengers Pin Man Charging Cockpit (TBT)

By Valerie Kalfrin

Tampa Bay Tribune, July 8, 2006

TAMPA - Delta Flight 1850 wound toward Tampa International Airport on the final leg of its journey from New York, full of tired passengers.

Only one of them knew Neftali Laimendez, 24, a U.S. Army specialist who was days away from discharge. Now, few aboard can forget him.

DOJ_NMG_0039583

A pastor, two businessmen and a father jumped from their seats to subdue Laimendez as he raced up the aisle and banged on the locked cockpit door, airport officials said.

They pinned Laimendez to the floor for about five minutes, until the plane landed.

"There was no way anybody was going to let him up," said the pastor, Herb Freitag, 64, of Chapel by the Sea community church in Clearwater.

No one could say Friday what triggered the outburst. Laimendez's brother, Robert Cordero-Mendez, 19, was on the flight and explained to passengers that Laimendez had recently served in Iraq, Freitag and the others said. Cordero-Mendez apologized for his brother's behavior.

Laimendez was being evaluated Friday under the Florida Mental Health, or Baker, Act. The FBI and U.S. attorney's office had not determined whether he would face criminal charges.

Airport Police Chief Paul Sireci said officials thought Laimendez might have post-traumatic stress disorder and had him examined.

Reached by phone at his Tampa apartment, Cordero-Mendez declined an interview but said: "He asked for help while he was in the Army. They didn't give it to him. Now this happened."

An Army spokesman at the Pentagon said Laimendez, whose name is listed as Lai on his Florida driver's license, was stationed at Fort Riley, Kan., with a field artillery unit. He had taken terminal leave - similar to paid vacation - on May 25. His tour of duty was to expire next Wednesday.

An airport police report said Cordero-Mendez had wanted to get his brother medical treatment in New York, but their mother, who lives in Tampa, wanted them to come here. The brothers took off from LaGuardia Airport sitting in Row 24 at 8:05 p.m.

The plane, which has about 150 seats, was scheduled to land at 11:03 p.m. About 15 minutes before landing, Jason Moore, a passenger in Row 36, saw Laimendez walk past him and sit in the last row.

Laimendez began poking a woman in front of him in the shoulder, and she signaled to a flight attendant that the man was bothering her, Moore said. Laimendez also pointed at a man across the aisle, gesturing at the tattoos on his own forearms, according to Moore.

"I'm looking back, nervous, thinking, 'Can't they land this plane any faster?'" said Moore, 27, a television research analyst traveling to visit relatives in St. Petersburg.

Laimendez did not speak to the flight crew or his brother, who approached and spoke to him in Spanish, Moore said. "All of a sudden he gets up and sprints like he was doing a hundred-yard dash toward the front of the plane."

The man's heavy footfalls sounded at first like a child running, said Adam Davisberg of Monroe, N.Y., seated in Row 14 with his 3-year-old daughter.

"When I saw him slamming the cockpit door, I thought he was trying to do something," such as hijack or crash the plane, said Davisberg, 38.

The running man also startled first-class passengers Gordon Montoya, a Brandon businessman, and Freitag. Freitag and his wife, Lorraine, had been bumped to first class and were seated in the first row after missing a connecting flight at LaGuardia.

"He hit that cockpit door, pounding on the door, trying to open it," Herb Freitag said.

Montoya said that without thinking, he rushed forward and grabbed the man's legs. "I tried to get him up off the ground so I could get him down," he said.

As the two wrestled, Freitag said, he grabbed at Laimendez as well. By this time, Montoya had pinned his legs, and Davisberg placed his foot on Laimendez's chest.

"It was kind of this ad hoc group that acted together, and I was encouraged by that," said James Abbott, 37, a Sarasota businessman who also joined the fracas.

Richard Stevens, the Tampa airport's deputy federal security director, praised the passengers for remaining calm and acting swiftly.

"We would never recommend that someone put themselves in harm's way, but the entire culture of how people react to these things since 9/11 has made people not likely to stand by," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0039584

On Sept. 11, passengers on United Flight 93, the hijacked plane that went down in Pennsylvania, tried to thwart the terrorists.

As others called the Tampa plane passengers heroes, Abbott shrugged off the label.

"I think it's kind of a tragedy," he said. "I hope he gets whatever help he needs. He put himself in a dangerous situation."

Soldier Held After Ramming Cockpit Door (SFC/AP)

San Francisco Chronicle/AP, July 8, 2006

A U.S. Army soldier who had served in Iraq was tackled by airplane passengers after he ran down the aisle and rammed the cockpit door on a flight from New York to Tampa, an official said.

The soldier did not have any weapons and there was no evidence that he meant harm anyone on the flight Thursday night, Tampa International Airport spokeswoman Brenda Geoghagan said.

She said he was restrained until the flight landed, then taken into custody under a Florida law that allows a person to be held without charges if they are deemed to be a threat to themselves or others.

The soldier's brother told officials that he "has some mental problems related to his Army service," Geoghagan said. The brothers were traveling from New York to visit their mother in Tampa.

Army spokesman Sheldon Smith said the man was attached to Fort Riley, Kan., but his status was unclear. An incident report said the man was scheduled to get out of the service July 12 and was on leave.

No charges had been filed Friday morning.

Mosque Members Denounce FBI Raid As Desecration (PPG)

By Ervin Dyer

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 8, 2006

The congregation of the Light of the Age mosque yesterday denounced the June 30 FBI raid on the site as "unjust, unethical and unnecessary."

Tahir Abdullah, assistant director of the congregation, read a statement from the Muslim Alliance in North America, a coalition of primarily African-American Muslim organizations from across the United States, saying that the raid on the North Side mosque violated a house of worship during services.

The FBI arrested Larry M. Williams of Lincoln-Lemington, who has felony convictions in Washington state and other outstanding warrants, including one for failing to register as a sex offender.

The arrest took place during prayer hours, and some members of the largely African-American congregation were detained and questioned on the street, group members said. The facility was searched and streets blocked off for several hours during the FBI action.

The group and supporters who joined members at a news conference yesterday accused the FBI of harassing citizens of African-American descent and of religious insensitivity in conducting the raid during worship hours.

"We're concerned with the kind of terrorist label that is being attached to Muslims," said Yusef Ali, president of the Islamic Council of Greater Pittsburgh. "We're concerned the raid will lead the public to believe the stereotype and that more Muslims will be profiled."

Jeff Killeen, a spokesman for the FBI, could not confirm if the bureau knew the facility was a mosque. He said the agency tries to respect the civil and constitutional rights of everyone.

"But we had a warrant for the arrest of a convicted felon in possession of a weapon -- a semi-automatic pistol. We can't take that lightly."

Federal officials detailed the reasons for the arrest in a statement yesterday and have not linked the group to terrorism.

"Under federal law, it is illegal for any person who has been convicted of a crime which carries a punishment of more than one year in prison to possess a firearm or ammunition," said the statement from U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan. "Larry M. Williams is such a person."

He has also been convicted of robbery in Washington, and there are warrants issued in Pennsylvania and Washington for his failure to register as a sex offender following a rape conviction.

DOJ_NMG_0039585

Yesterday's news conference was held to show the mosque and study center to the public as well as to condemn the FBI action.

The Light of the Age mosque has been at 1320 Boyle St. for about three months and before that was based on Concord Street in Spring Garden for three years.

It is a provisional member of the Islamic Council of Greater Pittsburgh. It participates in council debate and observes meetings but is not allowed to vote. The group must sit on council for a year before getting voting privileges.

Unlike Christian churches or synagogues, Muslim worship centers are not identified by symbols such as a cross or Star of David. Several in Pittsburgh have no signs indicating that they are houses of worship.

In fact, said Ibrahim Hopper, a spokesman for the national Council on American-Islamic Relations, it is not unusual for a mosque to share space with a dwelling where there are apartments on the upper level and a prayer room below.

Khari Mosley, Democratic committee chair for the 22nd Ward, where the home is located, said it was no secret that the congregation was a worship and outreach center.

Light of Age is in a three-story 100-year-old building. On the first level is a library full of Islamic texts, a kitchen and a lounge. On the second level are two jummah, or prayer rooms. The women worship on one side of the stairs and the men on the other. On the third level are computer rooms and bedrooms.

The dozen congregation members and supporters who assembled yesterday said they considered the raid a desecration and many said they believe it would not have taken place at a church or synagogue.

"Our place of worship was ransacked," said Luqman abdus-Salaam, a spokesman for the North Side mosque. "Doors were kicked in and a storage closet turned upside down. The FBI left no list of what was taken."

For Thrift, Port Authority Will Build 9/11 Shrine (NYT)

By David W. Dunlap

The New York Times, July 7, 2006

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey agreed yesterday to take over construction of the World Trade Center memorial and museum. The move is expected to make the tortuous development process more efficient and less expensive.

"It appears that we're the party best suited to do that," said Anthony R. Coscia, the chairman of the authority, after the board approved an agreement with New York State, City Hall, the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation and the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation.

Three hours later, the foundation announced that it was back in the fund-raising business with a national television, radio and print campaign based on the theme, "It's time." Solicitations were suspended this spring as the cost of the memorial soared.

"We must all share the responsibility of building a memorial," Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said, acknowledging — with reluctance — that he was one of the anonymous donors who had already contributed to the foundation.

Under the new agreement, the authority will be responsible for building the plaza-level memorial, the underground memorial museum and the aboveground visitor, orientation and education center, which will serve as the museum entryway.

"It was clear," Gov. George E. Pataki said, "that having one entity in charge of all the construction going on within the confines of the very narrow space where the towers stood would not only be much more efficient, but would also be quicker and less expensive."

Originally, the foundation was to oversee construction of the memorial, while the authority was to build the surrounding infrastructure and the adjoining PATH terminal and transportation hub.

Last month, Frank J. Sciame, a construction executive recruited by the governor and the mayor to contain the cost of the memorial, urged that the authority be given responsibility for building the entire complex. He said that would provide "a single point of accountability," permit consolidation of project staffs and eliminate redundancies.

The foundation, a nonprofit corporation, will now be responsible for completing the design and protecting its integrity, for financing part of its construction cost, and for running the memorial complex and paying its operating costs. The memorial opening is planned for Sept. 11, 2009.

DOJ_NMG_0039586

Mr. Coscia said the authority had not yet decided whether it would retain Bovis Lend Lease, the construction manager chosen earlier this year by the foundation.

In all, construction of the entire memorial quadrant is now expected to cost at least $740 million: $510 million for the memorial and museum (slightly more than the $500 million budgetary goal set by the governor and the mayor), $80 million for the visitor center and $150 million for the infrastructure: foundations and footings, underground roadways, utilities and a central cooling plant.

The Port Authority is to pick up the infrastructure cost, with $100 million coming from its April agreement with Silverstein Properties, the commercial leaseholder on the site, and $50 million from its own capital budget, an extra contribution that Mr. Coscia announced yesterday.

The authority and the development corporation will each contribute up to $45 million to a reserve fund that would cover cost overruns once the project has begun, officials announced yesterday.

The development corporation will contribute $250 million to build the memorial and memorial museum. This money comes from federal grants through the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

New York State will contribute the $80 million needed for the visitor center, which is never counted as part of the memorial and museum by the budget-makers, even though it is integral to the project.

The foundation is expected to contribute $260 million to build the memorial and museum. It is also seeking $40 million to plan the museum, design the exhibits, and preserve and transport artifacts, as well as to finance its own operations for the next three years.

With $130 million already in pocket, according to the foundation's own account, that leaves its fund-raising goal at $170 million.

Its national advertising campaign, developed free by TBWA/Chiat/Day, began yesterday and is to run on broadcast networks and cable channels, in newspapers and magazines and as billboards.

The 60-second television ad voicelessly depicts people gathering up mementos — a baseball cap, a hard hat, a sports jersey, a teddy bear, a tool kit, a trophy, a snapshot, a bouquet — and depositing them at an impromptu memorial.

"We needed one then," the closing title says. "We need one now." (The commercial can be viewed on buildthememorial.org.)

In April, the foundation reported that two anonymous donors had each given more than $10 million, that one donor had given $1 million to $5 million, and that one donor had given $100,000 to $1 million.

Mayor Bloomberg said yesterday: "Generally, I don't discuss my personal philanthropy, but in this case, I will. I have made a donation already to the memorial." He declined to say how much.

Delegation Sends Letter Asking For Rita Help (BRADV)

By Gerard Shields

Baton Rouge Advocate, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Most of the Louisiana congressional delegation sent a letter to President Bush on Friday asking that the federal government extend 100 percent reimbursement for debris removal to nine parishes damaged mostly by Hurricane Rita.

The letter, signed by eight of the nine federal delegation members, came one week after the White House announced that it would pick up the costs for debris removal through Dec. 31 for five parishes damaged by Hurricane Katrina. That move saved those parishes an estimated $71 million.

The letter asks that the federal coverage be extended to Calcasieu, Cameron, Iberia, Jefferson, Lafourche, St. Charles, St. Mary, Terrebonne and Vermilion parishes. On July 1, those parishes had to begin picking up 10 percent of the removal costs.

In the letter, delegation members said that added cost will leave parishes not included in the coverage fiscally strained. Jefferson Parish is looking at a $12 million bill for debris removal, the letter says. Calcasieu Parish has more than $11 million of work remaining.

DOJ_NMG_0039587

And in Cameron Parish, 19 public schools, the local hospital and Cameron Elementary School need to be demolished. The inventory does not take in the many wrecked cars, trucks and boats that must be removed. The parish estimates its share will rise to $3 million from a total annual budget of $8 million.

"A decision to extend the federal reimbursement period for all of the parishes affected by last summer's destructive hurricanes would allow for continued progress and provide hope for Americans who have suffered greatly but feel they have been overlooked," the letter says.

White House officials directed calls to the Federal Emergency Management Agency. FEMA is reviewing the request after getting similar correspondence from Gov. Kathleen Blanco, FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said.

In extending the coverage last week, the Office of the Coordinator for Gulf Coast Rebuilding said the five Katrina parishes — Orleans, Plaquemines, St. Bernard, St. Tammany and Washington — were chosen because they comprised 96 percent of the state's debris removal. Donald Powell, coordinator for Gulf Coast Rebuilding, called the process "fair and equitable."

Susan Aspey, a spokeswoman for the office, stood by the decision on Friday.

"In making the decision, we had to prioritize where to provide additional taxpayer assistance to those areas with the greatest need," she said.

U.S. Rep. Charles Boustany, R-Lafayette, circulated the letter to his colleagues and has been critical of the Bush administration for leaving Rita-hit parishes off the reimbursement list. He expressed gratitude Friday to Blanco, who has pledged to support the parishes that were excluded.

"The fact is, the state should not have to step in on a problem that is the federal government's responsibility in the first place," Boustany said in a statement Friday. "President Bush owes it to the people of southwest Louisiana to reconsider last week's announcement."

The only member of delegation whose signature is not on the list is U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans.

A Jefferson spokeswoman said the office missed the deadline for submitting his signature.

"We do support the extension of the deadline," Melanie Roussell said.

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Troops Clash With Shiite Militia (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 7 -- Iraqi troops rumbled into the teeming Baghdad slum of Sadr City before dawn Friday and confronted the neighborhood's reigning militia, setting off an intense firefight that left 30 to 40 insurgents dead or wounded, according to U.S. military officials.

Using night-vision goggles and laser-guided weapons, the Iraqi army, supported by U.S.-led coalition troops, raided four homes and captured five men. One was a "very significant criminal" who leads "multiple insurgent cells" responsible for kidnappings and killings, including the deaths of two Iraqi soldiers, said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, a spokesman for the U.S. military.

The U.S. military did not name the opposing force in the clash, but Sadr City is controlled by the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite Muslim militia loyal to firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The cleric's formidable political influence makes his militia a sensitive target, and attacks against it have led to popular uprisings.

The fighting, which lasted 43 minutes, began when Iraqi troops returned fire after being shot at with rocket-propelled grenades, Caldwell said. Under the cover of U.S. military aircraft, Iraqi troops blew off the doors of four houses during the raid, while taking grenade and small-arms fire from rooftops, U.S. officials said.

The U.S. military did not identify the "significant" individual who was captured, but Caldwell said he was involved in a "punishment committee that carries out vigilante judgment." He also is said to have imported weapons from Syria into Iraq.

One of the most notorious members of the Mahdi Army, suspected of being behind several killings, is a man known as Abu Dura. But "there is no confirmation that Abu Dura was captured" in the raid, said Maj. James F. Lowe, a U.S. Army spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0039588

Mahdi Army members, who confirmed their involvement in the fight, said they were attacked without provocation. A Sadr spokesman in Baghdad, Abdul Hadi al-Daraji, called the fighting "a dangerous escalation and criminal act on the part of the American forces."

In a separate operation, U.S.-led forces captured an insurgent commander in Babil province, whom news services identified as Adnan al-Unaybi, the Mahdi Army leader in areas south of Baghdad. The captured insurgent was responsible for weapons smuggling, spying for Iran, bombings against coalition forces and inciting sectarian violence, the U.S. military said in a statement.

The Sadr City raid and the capture of the insurgent leader were evidence that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has begun to follow through on his pledge to dismantle violent Shiite militias.

Dealing with the Mahdi Army has long proved a thorny challenge for U.S. and Iraqi forces, which put down two Sadr-led uprisings in 2004. While U.S. officials have blamed the group for contributing to the surge in sectarian violence here in recent months, politicians loyal to Sadr control more than 30 seats in Iraq's parliament and several cabinet posts, making the militia a politically risky target.

In the southern Iraqi city of Najaf, Mahdi Army fighters gathered Friday to bury their dead in a vast cemetery holy to Shiites.

"We were all sleeping on the roofs of our houses because there was no electricity. We went out to the street to see what happened, and we were shocked to see the American helicopters bombing and shooting at the houses," said Jasim Muhammed, 36, a member of the Mahdi Army who said his cousin had died in the Sadr City clash.

Another Mahdi fighter, Qais Shawkat, 56, said U.S. and Iraqi forces attacked a funeral tent for a militiaman who died recently, killing one man and wounding several others. Iraqi television showed crowds of people escorting minivans carrying away coffins, and the wreckage of what was reported to be the funeral tent.

Shawkat said the Mahdi Army was under orders from Sadr not to fight U.S. forces. "So, we didn't. We were surprised. We did not expect the Americans to come and attack us," he said.

The clash with the militia came on a day when Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) and Jack Reed (R.I.) were touring Iraq. Their visit includes stops in Baghdad and Basra and meetings with Maliki and cabinet members.

Biden said he noticed little difference in security since his previous visit, during elections in December. "The incidents are up, the militias in the last couple months have grown, not diminished, so I'm not impressed," Biden said.

He said he found it "disturbing" the Shiite-led government did not seem to have a sufficient sense of urgency about incorporating Sunni Muslim leaders into the political process. Unless there is a trustworthy police force and a greater Sunni commitment to peace, Biden said, "I don't know how they can keep this thing together."

Biden said that one year from now, if there is not significant progress reducing sectarian violence and disbanding the militias, and much more stability, "there's going to be really no prospect, in my view, of keeping any large number of American forces here."

Meanwhile, the Friday holiday was disrupted by attacks on both Shiite and Sunni mosques. A car bomb exploded after prayers at the Sunni Mustafa mosque in western Baghdad, killing seven worshipers and three mosque guards, said Col. Sami al-Masrawi of the Interior Ministry.

South of Baghdad, rocket-propelled grenades struck at a joint Iraqi army and police patrol guarding the Shiite al-Sajad mosque, killing two worshipers and two policemen, Masrawi said.

Joint Raid Captures 2 Linked To Rebel Shiite Leader (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, July 7 — Iraqi soldiers backed by American troops and military aircraft stormed a building in a Shiite slum here early Friday, killing or wounding between 30 and 40 gunmen and capturing a high-level Shiite militia commander accused of attacking Iraqi and American troops, the American military command said.

DOJ_NMG_0039589

American and Iraqi authorities did not disclose the identity of the captured militia commander, but residents said the building that came under attack was a base of operations for a man known as Abu Deraa, a top commander of the Mahdi Army, the restless and potent Shiite militia that answers to the militant Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

In a concurrent operation on Friday, Iraqi police officers captured Adnan al-Unaybi, who, according to the American military command, is in charge of a wing of the Mahdi Army operating in Babil Province, south of Baghdad. The military said in a statement that he was accused of smuggling weapons, bankrolling terrorism, attacking American troops, inciting sectarian violence and "spying for two foreign governments." The statement did not identify the two governments.

Taken together, the raids were a rare strike by the Shiite-led government security forces against forces linked to Mr. Sadr, and suggested that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki was making good on his vow to crack down on Sunni Arab and Shiite militias alike in an effort to halt the accelerating cycles of sectarian violence that have begun to cleave Iraq into ethnic enclaves.

Mr. Sadr's militia has frequently been accused by Sunni Arab leaders and American officials of kidnapping and killing Sunni Arabs, sometimes in retaliation for similar crimes against Shiites by Sunni death squads.

But the Shiite-dominated government has been hesitant to tangle with Mr. Sadr, in part because of his wide political and social influence. He commands a vast Shiite following, and his allies control at least 30 of Parliament's 275 seats and several important ministries, making him one of Iraq's most powerful political leaders.

In the last large-scale government raid aimed at Mr. Sadr's allies, Iraqi forces, with the support of American troops, raided a Shiite mosque in Baghdad frequented by his followers, killing at least 16 people. The March raid infuriated Mr. Sadr's community and members of the national Shiite political leadership, who were appalled that soldiers had stormed a place of worship. But American officials said the building was not a mosque, but rather a citadel for Shiite militiamen to stage attacks against government forces.

Some Shiite leaders criticized the Friday raid and warned that it could provoke Mr. Sadr's followers to take up arms against government security forces. In 2004, Mr. Sadr led two bloody revolts against American forces.

"This attack seems to be a green light for another uprising," Fattah al-Sheik, a legislator and representative of the Sadr movement, said in a telephone interview, adding that the people in the teeming, impoverished neighborhood of Sadr City "are in a state of readiness and are very angry and upset." But he noted that Mr. Sadr had urged his followers to remain calm.

Neighbors who witnessed the Sadr City assault said the firefight began about 1:30 a.m. It lasted 43 minutes, according to American officials, as government forces overwhelmed militia members with the help of an American aircraft that fired three 105-millimeter rounds.

At least 13 people were killed, including women and children, and 39 were wounded, according to an official at Imam Ali Hospital in Sadr City, who requested anonymity out of concern for his safety.

American military officials said they could not confirm whether any civilians had died in the attack. "There are no known civilian casualties which the Iraqi forces observed," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, a top American military spokesman in Baghdad, said during a press briefing. "Doesn't mean there weren't any, but there were no observed Iraqi civilian casualties from this operation."

Maj. Todd Breasseale, another military spokesman, said in a telephone interview that government troops and aircraft attacked only those people who were firing weapons at them.

The American military command said the intended target of the operation was captured, along with four other suspects. The main suspect, the command said in a statement, is the head of "multiple insurgent cells in Baghdad," and is accused of attacking Iraqi and American government forces; kidnapping, torturing and killing Iraqi citizens; and smuggling weapons from Syria into Iraq to "facilitate his efforts to splinter away from his current insurgent organization."

Wusam al-Bahadali, 28, a midlevel member of the Mahdi Army, said in an interview in Sadr City that Abu Deraa had not been detained during the raid and that he remained at large.

In an eruption of what appeared to be sectarian violence on Friday, at least four mosques came under attack around the country, according to the police. In the deadliest of those attacks, at least 9 people were killed and 63 wounded when a car bomb exploded outside a Shiite mosque in northwestern Mosul, according to Iraqi police officials there.

DOJ_NMG_0039590

In a southwest neighborhood of Baghdad, a car bomb detonated outside a Sunni mosque, killing two people and wounding one, said an official with the Interior Ministry, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the record.

New agencies reported that a mortar landed near another Sunni mosque in northern Baghdad, killing three and wounding seven, and that a concealed, homemade bomb exploded as worshipers were leaving a Sunni mosque in Baquba, in Diyala Province, killing one person and wounding four.

The attacks occurred despite a four-hour ban on driving on Fridays in the capital and Diyala Province intended to help forestall attacks against mosques on the day of prayer.

Mr. Maliki, the prime minister, has made cracking down on sectarian militias, especially those tied to political factions, one of his priorities, and has vowed to remove weapons from all but the hands of authorized government forces.

In the criminal case involving Steven D. Green, the former Army private accused of raping an Iraqi teenager and killing her and three family members, a military official disclosed Friday that three other soldiers still under investigation include a sergeant, a specialist and a private first class.

The official, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the record about these details, said all four men were in the same platoon, which is part of the First Battalion, 502nd Infantry of the 101st Airborne Division.

U.S., Iraqi Forces Raid Shiite Stronghold (AP)

By Robert H. Reid

AP, July 8, 2006

Iraqi troops backed by U.S. jets raided a Shiite stronghold in the capital Friday, killing and wounding dozens of people in a crackdown on militias blamed for much of Iraq's worsening sectarian violence.

At least 17 others died in a wave of bombings and mortar attacks against mostly Sunni mosques in the Baghdad area and northern Iraq. A Sunni cleric was also kidnapped in the capital, a Sunni official said.

The raid began before dawn in Sadr City, a Shiite district of east Baghdad, as Iraqi troops backed by the Americans swooped down on a building where an undisclosed "insurgent leader" was holed up, a U.S. statement said.

Gunmen opened fire from the roof with automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades, triggering a firefight in which an estimated 30 to 40 "enemy fighters" were killed, the U.S. said. There were no American or Iraqi government casualties, the statement added.

The insurgent leader was captured, U.S. spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said. He would not identify him, but said he and his followers have kidnapped, tortured and murdered Iraqi citizens and had tried to smuggle weapons from Syria.

Residents of Sadr City said they believed the raid targeted Abu Diraa, a commander of a breakaway faction of the Mahdi militia, led by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Several residents insisted Abu Diraa had escaped but offered no proof.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, has promised to disband sectarian militias, blamed for the tit-for-tat killings that have heightened tensions between Shiites and Sunnis and raised fears of civil war.

But the raid enraged many of the 2.5 million Shiites in Sadr City as rumors spread through the crowded slum district that most of the dead were civilians killed as they slept on their rooftops. Many Iraqis sleep on roofs during the sweltering summer months because the electricity crisis means they don't have fans and air conditioning.

An al-Sadr aide, Sheik Abdul-Hadi al-Darraji, said 11 civilians were killed and dozens wounded.

"This is a big escalation from the American side," he said. "I condemn all the silence toward such violations and I call for the withdrawal of the American forces."

Lt. Kadim Abbas Hamza of the Sadr City police said nine people, including a woman, were killed and 14 were wounded. He also said eight people were arrested. A hospital official said seven people were killed and 34 wounded.

Caldwell said the operation was planned and directed by Iraqis with U.S. troops in a supporting role. However, an Iraqi army officer said the Americans gave them a list of people to be arrested in advance of the raid.

Caldwell said U.S. jets fired three precision weapons during the 45-minute battle and that U.S. troops manning a security cordon took fire from "multiple positions."

DOJ_NMG_0039591

The raid occurred a day after U.S. and Iraqi troops arrested a top regional commander of the Mahdi militia near the southern city of Hillah, a U.S. statement said. Adnan al-Unaybi was commander of Mahdi militiamen in the Euphrates valley south of the capital, the statement said.

Both moves appeared to signal a crackdown on Shiite militiamen. Shiite gunmen are believed to be holding Sunni parliament member Tayseer al-Mashhadani, who was seized in a Shiite neighborhood nearly a week ago.

In another sign of sectarian tensions, a series of bombs and a mortar blast struck four Sunni mosques in the Baghdad area and a Shiite mosque in the northern city of Sinjar, killing a total of 17 people and wounding more than 50, police said.

After sundown Friday, five mortar shells exploded on a Shiite neighborhood in western Baghdad, killing three people and wounding 40, according to police Lt. Mohammed Khayoun.

The attacks occurred on the main Muslim day of worship and followed a suicide car bombing Thursday that killed 12 people, mostly Iranian pilgrims, at a Shiite shrine in the southern city of Kufa.

During a Friday sermon, a leading Sunni official said a Sunni cleric had been abducted Friday in the capital. The official, Ahmed Abdul Ghafour al-Samaraie, said 181 Sunni preachers had been killed since Saddam Hussein's ouster in April 2003 and called on the government to disband Shiite militias.

Al-Samaraie accused police and Mahdi militiamen of killing a Sunni cleric at a checkpoint south of Baghdad. He did not say when the alleged killing occurred.

"After killing him, they started to dance and wave his turban in the air," al-Samaraie said, "We are fed up with these mean people. Either these people will be punished by the government or we will be forced to defend ourselves."

Also Friday, Japan began withdrawing its 600-member military contingent from Iraq. The first group of about 30 soldiers left their garrison in Samawah and flew to Kuwait, Japanese media said. Their departure marked the beginning of the end of Japan's biggest overseas military mission since World War II.

The rest of the troops are expected to leave within the next two weeks, although Japanese officials have announced no timetable for security reasons. Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi sent the troops to Iraq in early 2004 for a humanitarian mission.

Security in Samawah and the rest of Muthanna province is handled by British and Australian forces. However, they are due to hand over responsibility to the Iraqis this month.

Explosions Rock Baghdad Mosques As Troops Crack Down On Militias (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal/AP, July 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Explosions struck four Sunni mosques in Baghdad and northeast of the capital, while a car bomb exploded near a Shiite mosque in northern Iraq Friday in a series of attacks that killed 17 people and wounded more than 50.

Meanwhile, Iraqi forces backed by U.S. aircraft battled militants in a Shiite stronghold of eastern Baghdad early Friday, killing or wounding more than 30 fighters and capturing an extremist leader who was the target of the raid, Iraqi and U.S. officials said.

The Baghdad mosque explosions came despite a four-hour driving ban in the capital aimed at preventing such attacks that often target the main weekly Islamic religious service. The 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. driving ban has been imposed weekly amid a rise in ethnic and sectarian violence.

A mortar round landed in front of the al-Nidaa Sunni mosque in northern Baghdad about 2 p.m., killing five people, including a policeman, and wounding two worshippers, the army said. A car bomb also exploded about 10 minutes later as worshippers were leaving a Sunni mosque in western Baghdad, killing three people, a woman and two children, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razzaq said.

A bomb targeting the al-Furqan Sunni mosque in northeastern Baghdad wounded a passer-by, Sgt. Mohammed Nour said. Northeast of Baghdad, a roadside bomb struck worshippers leaving the Ahmed bin Hanbal Sunni mosque in Baqouba, killing one person and wounding five others, according to police.

A car bomb also exploded near a Shiite mosque as prayers were ending in the northern city of Sinjar, killing six people and wounding 46, police said.

U.S. Announces Capture of Militant

DOJ_NMG_0039592

The joint U.S.-Iraqi raid in eastern Baghdad appeared part of a crackdown on sectarian militias blamed for the escalation in Shiite-Sunni violence that has led to fears of civil war.

The U.S. military said the raid was launched to apprehend "an insurgent leader responsible for numerous deaths of Iraqi citizens." Iraqi troops came under fire from a rooftop, triggering a 43-minute gunbattle after which the insurgent leader was arrested, the U.S. said. There were no U.S. or Iraqi casualties, the Americans said.

U.S. officials did not identify the insurgent but residents of the Shiite slum Sadr City said he was Abu Diraa, a commander in the Mahdi militia of radical cleric Muqtada al Sadr.

The U.S. statement said the insurgent was involved "in the transfer of weapons from Syria into Iraq" in an effort to break away "from his current insurgent organization." The statement made no mention of any U.S. role but residents said they could hear American aircraft providing cover during the raid.

In another operation, Iraqi troops backed by U.S. soldiers arrested a top regional commander of a Shiite militia near Hillah, about 60 miles south of Baghdad. In a statement Thursday, the U.S. said Iraqi and U.S. forces arrested Adnan al Unaybi, commander of a Mahdi militia force south of Baghdad.

A Sadr aide, Sheik Abdul-Hadi al Darraji, denounced the Baghdad raid, saying 11 civilians were killed and dozens wounded as U.S. jets fired on the area as people were sleeping on their roofs amid searing summer temperatures and electricity shortages.

"This is a big escalation from the American side," he said. "I condemn all the silence toward such violations and I call for the withdrawal of the American forces."

There were conflicting casualty figures. Lt. Kadim Abbas Hamza of the Sadr City police said fighter planes fired from the air at about 3:15 a.m. and nine people, including a woman, were killed and 14 were wounded. He also said eight people were arrested. A hospital official said seven people were killed and 34 wounded.

An Iraqi officer with the army division responsible for the Baghdad area said the Americans had provided them with a list of names of people to be arrested in Sadr City. Iraqi soldiers led the raid while the Americans played a supportive role, but nobody was arrested because of the clashes, the officer said, speaking on condition of anonymity for security reasons.

The early morning raid also came as security forces are searching for Sunni legislator Tayseer al Mashhadani, who was abducted by gunmen in a nearby Shiite area nearly a week ago.

Meanwhile, the first batch of Japanese troops began pulling out of southern Iraq, with about 30 arriving in Kuwait on their way home. Japanese officials said the withdrawal of all 600 or so troops will be carried out over the next two weeks.

Sunni Cleric Reported Abducted in Baghdad

A Sunni cleric was abducted in Baghdad Friday, an influential religious leader said in an angry sermon as he called for an end to the unrelenting sectarian violence that has threatened to plunge the country into civil war.

Ahmed Abdul Ghafour al-Samaraie, the head of the Sunni Endowment, the state agency responsible for Sunni mosques and shrines, said he had just been informed that Sheik Alaa of the Ibn Taimya mosque had been kidnapped.

Mr. Samaraie said 181 Sunni imams have been killed since Saddam Hussein's ouster in March 2003, saying the attackers after one such recent killing had removed the sheik's turban and waved it to celebrate the capture, pulling his own white turban off his head to demonstrate.

"If we are going to talk about car bombs or mortar rounds, the bombing of airplanes or the raping of girls, there is no justice or law," he said.

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

At Least 12 Iraqis Killed In Mosque Attacks (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

BAGHDAD — Violence broke out between rival Shiite and Sunni Arab sects on the Muslim holy day Friday with two attacks on mosques killing at least 12 Iraqis and injuring dozens.

Meanwhile, both Shiite and Sunni prayer leaders denounced U.S. troops for acts of violence against Iraqis.

U.S. ground forces in armored vehicles backed by military aircraft, along with some Iraqi troops, early Friday launched an unusual raid in the Sadr City neighborhood of Baghdad, killing at least seven Shiite militiamen and wounding dozens in what the military described as a ferocious 43-minute fight.

U.S. officials hailed the raid as a success because of the capture of a "high-level insurgent," who they said was responsible for killing and kidnapping civilians and attacking American and Iraqi forces.

The suspected insurgent, a former fishmonger known as Abu Daraa, launched a Shiite criminal gang after the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime and joined radical cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi army, a Shiite militia, said a Shiite official who asked that his name not be used.

But the 3 a.m. raid, which caused no American casualties, drew swift condemnation from many Shiite religious leaders.

"The infidel American troops supported by the so-called Iraqi [soldiers] raided the city, killing and injuring a lot of innocent people using all kinds of weapons," Sheik Abdul Zahra Swaidi told thousands of worshipers gathered for prayers in Sadr City, the vast neighborhood in eastern Baghdad that is home to many Sadr loyalists.

"This is an inexcusable act," Sadruddin Qubanchi, a cleric linked to a rival Shiite group, told worshipers in the southern city of Najaf. "I demand that the Iraqi government show some explanation for this matter."

U.S. forces announced that another Al Mahdi commander had been captured south of the capital.

Adnan Anabi was suspected of arms smuggling, laying roadside bombs, kidnapping Iraqis, spying for the Iranian government and "financing the operations of his organization through contacts in both Lebanon and Iran," an American news release said.

The bombing Feb. 22 of a Shiite shrine complex in Samarra spurred a rise in sectarian hostility and militia activities, which have complicated U.S. efforts to stabilize the country and draw down its 130,000-troop contingent.

During Friday prayers, a mortar shell struck a Sunni mosque in the northern Baghdad neighborhood of Qahira, killing three worshipers and injuring seven, police said.

In northern Iraq, near the city of Mosul, a car bomb exploded at a Shiite mosque as worshipers were leaving, killing nine and injuring 59, hospital officials said. The victims were Shiites displaced from the nearby city of Tall Afar, which the Americans point to as a model of successful counterinsurgency efforts.

"We moved here to escape sectarian violence and radical terror," said Abbas Ali, a 25-year-old worshiper. "It followed us."

Sadr has called upon Iraqis of both Muslim sects to head to Samarra and help rebuild the damaged shrine.

"Samarra is where the conflict began," said a Sadr spokesman who goes by the name Abu Mostafa in his public comments. "In rebuilding the shrine, we will find the unity of Muslims."

Sunni religious leaders spoke out about allegations that U.S. soldiers raped an Iraqi teenager and killed her and three family members in March.

"Where do we start to reflect upon our calamities?" Sheik Ahmed Abdel Ghafour, an imam at Baghdad's influential Umm Qura mosque, told worshipers. "Shall we start with the Iraqi girl who was raped, killed, burned and then her family killed and her house burned? Is this American civilization? Is this the American liberation?"

Ghafour also blamed commandos of the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry for the slaying of a fellow Sunni cleric this week, accusing them of executing the man before "raising up his turban and dancing and chanting."

"If the Ministry of Interior is not purged and police forces are not dissolved, then Iraqis are forced to defend themselves," he told worshipers. "Iraq is now ruled by the law of the jungle."

In other developments Friday:

• Military officials announced that Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the No. 2 commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, had completed his review of the investigation of the "reporting, training and command climate" surrounding the alleged Nov. 19 massacre of 24 Iraqi civilians by U.S. troops in Haditha. Chiarelli has forwarded his review to his boss, Gen. George W. Casey Jr.

• Mortar shells struck a crowded market in a Shiite section of northern Baghdad, killing six and injuring 40 shortly before a 9 p.m. curfew went into effect, police said.

• A car bomb blast in front of the Baghdad home of a prominent Sunni businessman killed two of his children and injured a passerby.

DOJ_NMG_0039594

• Mortar rounds struck a government building in the western city of Ramadi, killing at least one Iraqi soldier and injuring four, police said.

• Clashes between suspected insurgents and U.S. and Iraqi troops continued for a fifth day in Muqdadiya, a Sunni enclave about 25 miles northeast of Baqubah. Helicopters hovered over the area and loud explosions could be heard.

• Officials in the southern city of Basra announced an 11 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew to stem growing lawlessness, including a barrage of rockets that struck compounds housing the British Consulate and the city's airport.

• Technical problems in Turkey led to the shutdown of oil pumping operations near the northern city of Kirkuk, which exports 250,000 barrels of oil a day to the terminal in Jihan, Turkey, an oil company official said.

• Soldiers of the 172nd Stryker Brigade discovered a field of marijuana in the Tikrit area this week, the military said, estimating the crop's value at $2 million. The field's owner was arrested by Iraqi police.

Most Baghdad Security Under Iraqi Control: US Report (AFP-Y2)

AFP, July 8, 2006

The ranks of Iraqi-trained security personnel grew by nearly 30,000 since April and now control more than half of Baghdad and large swathes of the countryside, a quarterly State Department report to Congress said.

The number of Iraqi-trained security personal was more than double that of US soldiers stationed there -- 268,400 as of June 26, compared with 127,000 current US troops -- the quarterly report said.

It stressed, however, that the figures still did not point to a timetable for a US troop withdrawal. The war began more than three years ago.

"Arbitrary deadlines or timetables for withdrawal -- divorced from conditions in Iraq and the region -- would be a strategic error as this would suggest to the enemy they can simply wait to win," the report said.

"No war has ever been won on a timetable, and neither will this one be."

Iraqi troops were policing 60 percent of Baghdad, and growing swathes of the country, meaning that the US deployment was shifting positions with time, the report said.

Separately, Brigadier General Kurt Chichowski said coalition forces would remain in an "overwatch" role in case of trouble and as trainers. However, responsibility for security would be turned over to Iraqis under detailed agreements with the new Iraqi government.

The first province to be turned over for complete Iraqi control will be Muthana in south-central Iraq, which will occur in the "very, very near future," he said.

The US administration and its supporters have cited preparedness of Iraqi troops as a benchmark for reducing the US troop presence.

The White House acknowledged last month that it was considering a reported plan to reduce US combat forces in Iraq by some 30,000 by the end of 2007 as Iraqi forces assume more responsibility.

Pentagon To Buy New Equipment For War (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, July 8, 2006

President Bush would spend a quarter of the $50 billion down payment he wants for next year's Iraq and Afghanistan war costs to replace damaged weapons and equipment, while an additional $3 billion would go to train and equip Iraqi and Afghan forces.

A document detailing the plan, obtained by The Associated Press, proposes spending $2.3 billion for new armor for troops and vehicles and efforts aimed at thwarting missiles. Another $2.1 billion would be for protecting troops from roadside bombs.

The summary provides a detailed look at how the Pentagon envisions distributing the $50 billion Bush has requested for the initial months of the government's 2007 budget year, which starts Oct. 1. When Bush asked Congress for the money in February, the Pentagon provided few details on how it would be spent.

The money is expected to tide over the military until another war spending request can be delivered to Congress, probably around February. Costs for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars since 2001 are approaching half a trillion dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0039595

The document — not yet released by the Pentagon — was intended as informal guidance to congressional committees as they prepare next year's budget, said Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Brian Maka.

According to the summary, $13 billion is needed to repair and replace equipment worn by battle and harsh desert conditions.

About $9 billion would go toward buying new equipment, including two V-22 Osprey helicopters, four C-130J cargo planes, one C-17 cargo plane, seven UH-60 Blackhawk helicopters, and 11 CH-47 Chinook helicopters.

The V-22 Osprey aircraft can fly like a plane and land like a helicopter. The Osprey are needed to replace older aircraft destroyed in combat that are no longer in production, the Pentagon states.

"Without sufficient funding, the department would be forced to strip combat units in the United States and in other locations for equipment and munitions, thus making these units ill equipped," the summary said.

Almost half the money — $24.3 billion — would be to provide food, water and medical support for troops, purchase parts and fuel for equipment and maintain military facilities in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Stating that more than 50 Iraqi battalions are controlling significant parts of Iraq, the document requests $1.7 billion to aid those forces "so the coalition can continue to hand over control of even more territory to Iraqi forces."

About $1.5 billion would go toward training and equipping Afghan forces. According to the document, 59,000 Afghan soldiers and police have been trained.

The House on June 20 passed a fiscal 2007 defense spending bill that included the $50 billion war fund. The Senate, which has not taken up its version of the bill, is expected to approve the money later this year.

Detailing Proposed War Spending (NYT/AP)

The New York Times/AP, July 8, 2006

President Bush would spend a quarter of the $50 billion down payment he wants for next year's Iraq and Afghanistan war costs to replace damaged weapons and equipment, while an additional $3 billion would go to train and equip Iraqi and Afghan forces. A Defense Department document detailing the plan, obtained by The Associated Press, also says that $13 billion is needed to repair and replace equipment worn by battle and harsh desert conditions. "Without sufficient funding, the department would be forced to strip combat units in the United States," the document said. The House passed a fiscal 2007 defense spending bill that included the $50 billion war fund. The Senate is expected to approve the money this year. Costs for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars since 2001 are approaching half a trillion dollars.

Marching Forward (NSWK)

By Sarah Childress, Newsweek

Newsweek, July 7, 2006

Iraqi and American officials have high hopes for the establishment of a strong Iraqi Army. NEWSWEEK visits a school that's trying to make it happen.

WEB EXCLUSIVE

July 7, 2006 - As a young Kurdish child growing up in northern Iraq, Berkew Babakir, now 21, watched his people suffer countless atrocities under the harsh rule of Saddam Hussein and his army—and nonetheless dreamed of becoming a soldier. After the regime fell, he signed up to become an officer at the Zahko Military Training Academy, one of three schools in Iraq that train military officers. "The old Iraqi Army used to kill people and destroy villages," says Babakir, who like the other cadets wears standard-issue brown camouflage. "I want to change that concept. The army is not to kill our own people, but to defend them."

Babakir is one of about 500 young cadets who now march across the sprawling campus a few miles from the Turkish border in the relatively peaceful Kurdistan region of Iraq. There, recruits train to be army officers away from the threats of mortar fire and sectarian killings that plague their hometowns to the south. The two classes currently training at Zahko are also the first to integrate Arabs and Kurds—a delicate situation in a country rife with ethnic and sectarian tension. The nation's other academies are less balanced. Rustamiyah, near Baghdad, is 98 percent Arab, and Qualachulon in Sulemaniyah is 95 percent Kurdish. (About a third of Zahko's students are Arab; the others are Kurdish. It's not known how many of the Arabs are Shia or Sunni.)

DOJ_NMG_0039596

Originally a training camp for Kurdish peshmerga, or military forces, the Zahko academy was given to the Ministry of Defense after the Coalition invasion. Since then, a small team of American soldiers has been living on campus, advising the instructors on better ways to train the cadets. Their success would be a major boon for the Iraqi Army. Well-trained officers who can lead their own soldiers (including Sunni Arabs, the group most underrepresented in security forces), Americans say, is what the Iraqi Army now needs most.

The man in charge, Major General Shihid Abdulrahman, twists his mouth into a smirk when he recalls the day he first arrived to take over at Zahko back in 1996, long before the downfall of Saddam. There was no electricity. The class of 21 cadets had nowhere to sleep because the barracks had been overtaken by squatters from nearby villages. The cadets trained on a dusty field with archaic methods, relying on British Army manuals dating to the 1920s. Instructors invented rules to toughen up the troops: morning exercises lasted two or three hours in their bulky army uniforms and boots, and they weren't given any water, even as the temperature exceeded 100 degrees.

A lot has changed since the Americans arrived. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has transformed the campus, spending $6 million to renovate the existing facilities and build new barracks, guard towers, dining facilities, a gym, pool and soccer field, and water and sewage treatment plants. They also added a rifle and grenade range, and a rappel tower. At the front gate, a row of five soldiers salutes incoming vehicles, guns at the ready. Lines of troops march in lockstep across a wide paved field, chanting songs in Kurdish and Arabic. Another set of cadets, their faces serious, jog in formation to class, a small notebook and pen clutched in each right hand.

The instructors have adopted most of the Americans' advice. "Whatever they tell us, they've been through it," Abdulrahman says. "So they know better than we do." Some are simple changes: cadets work out in shorts and T-shirts and they're allowed to drink water during drills. Instead of hopping up and down during physical training, they do pushups. Everyone is required to wear protective gear on the firing range and has been taught to hold their weapons properly. They've also learned how to plan in advance for missions and organize a convoy. The Americans also introduced them to GPS technology and PowerPoint. Of course, not everything is done according to the American way. "They place high importance on marching here, and we do that very well," Babakir says. "We spend hours marching."

On a recent training day, Abdulrahman, his maroon beret fitted perfectly over his bristly red hair, walked down to the paved parade ground to watch new recruits perform a drill in which they must attempt to balance on one leg. When asked how they're doing, his smile widens. "It's not even 24 hours since they've arrived, so I can't tell you," he says. He steps over to one especially tall cadet struggling to hold his position and lifts the young man's leg a few more inches. "None of my sons would join the army," he says, stepping back to watch the cadet with approval. (They instead chose medicine, law and engineering.) He watches the formation a few more moments, then strolls on. "Each one of them is like family to me," he says. "There is no difference—I have to take care of them."

In interviews conducted by a translator, four cadets, Arab and Kurd, said they were anxious to start piecing their country back together. "This training is good for us," says Lazim Mahjoub, a 22-year-old Arab from Kirkuk. "[It's] hard, but they are making us better officers to protect all of Iraq. The hardest thing for me is to hear of news of Iraqi citizens being killed by the terrorists for no reason—the training is not as hard as that."

The school isn't entirely isolated from the country's violence. There's no denying that the Iraqi Army has been infiltrated by insurgents, even if it's not to the extent that the country's police forces are dominated by Shiite militiamen. More applicants from the Shia-dominated south has made the school more cautious. Abdulrahman says Zahko runs background checks on every applicant, and searches cadets when they check in at the front gate. He also instructs platoon leaders to closely monitor cadets for suspicious words or behaviors. "The law of averages tells you that we've had a couple of bad guys here," says Lt. Col. Neal Norman, one of the academy's American advisers. Indeed, in February American intelligence uncovered evidence that a Zahko student from Mosul had insurgent ties. The cadet dropped out and disappeared before he could be arrested.

If there is hope for the Iraqi Army, it's in the resilience of these aspiring officers. A few months ago, one young cadet visiting home in Baghdad was gunned down outside his parents' front gate. It's unclear whether he was targeted specifically because he studied at the academy—violence in Baghdad is often too random to be sure of the killers or the cause. But for his friends and classmates, his death underscored the risks they all take just by showing up for physical training and history classes. When they heard the news, his classmates, some of them crying, gathered together, Arab and Kurd.

DOJ_NMG_0039597

Babakir was especially devastated. Because they both lived so far from home, they hung out together on weekends when other cadets went home to their families. "I promised myself that I would not forget him and that I would be a good officer to avenge his death and the death of other youths in Iraq," he says. The cadets hung a photograph of him in their barracks. And then they went back to their drills.

General Faults Marine Response To Iraq Killings (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 7 — The second-ranking American commander in Iraq has concluded that some senior Marine officers were negligent in failing to investigate more aggressively the killings of 24 Iraqi civilians by marines in Haditha last November, two Defense Department officials said Friday.

The officer, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, concluded that in the deaths, including those of 10 women and children and an elderly man in a wheelchair, senior officers failed to follow up on inaccuracies and inconsistencies in the initial reporting of the incident that should have raised questions.

General Chiarelli faulted the senior staff of the Second Marine Division, commanded at the time by Maj. Gen. Richard A. Huck, and the Second Regimental Combat Team, then headed by Col. Stephen W. Davis, and recommended unspecified disciplinary action for some officers, said the two defense officials, who have been briefed on General Chiarelli's findings. They said they would discuss the report, after being promised anonymity, because it showed that the military takes these incidents seriously and fully investigates them.

"He concludes that some officers were derelict in their duties," said one of the officials, who declined to identify which or how many officers were singled out.

If Marine commanders are found to have been negligent in pursuing the matter, the punishments could range from a relatively mild admonishment to a court martial that potentially could end their military careers.

It was not clear Friday whether General Huck or Colonel Davis, or Maj. Gen. Stephen T. Johnson, the senior marine officer in Iraq at the time, would be personally implicated. But if they were to be disciplined, they would be among the most senior American officers punished since the Iraq war started in early 2003.

An officer who served in Iraq with the Second Marine Division at the time of the killings in Haditha noted that a spate of recent cases in which American troops were being investigated for killing unarmed Iraqi civilians — including the rape and murder of a young Iraqi woman and the killing of her family in Mahmudiya — had raised concerns that commanders may be under pressure to make an example of Marine officers in the Haditha incident.

"We're all waiting anxiously to see how this one gets taken on," said the officer, who requested anonymity because he is not authorized to talk about the unit or any part of the investigation. "Major General Huck is about as thorough and detailed a guy as you are ever going to see."

In a brief statement issued from Iraq on Friday, General Chiarelli's headquarters said he had finished reviewing a lengthy investigation by Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell of the Army into the actions or absence of actions by Marine leaders in Haditha, as well as the training that marines had received and the command climate their superiors had fostered.

But the statement gave no details of General Chiarelli's findings or recommendations, which will now be sent to his boss, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq. A senior Pentagon official said it could be several days before Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld receives a complete briefing on the matter, and before a redacted version of General Chiarelli's findings are made public.

In addition to General Chiarelli's review, a separate inquiry by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service is examining whether crimes were committed when a squad of marines killed the 24 Iraqi civilians after a roadside bomb killed a member of the Third Platoon of Company K, Third Battalion, First Marine Regiment, in the early morning of Nov. 19.

DOJ_NMG_0039598

In April, when the Third Battalion returned to Camp Pendleton, Calif., from Iraq, the battalion and company commanders were relieved of their commands for what their commander said was "a lack of confidence in their leadership."

According to one of the defense officials, General Chiarelli embraced all of General Bargewell's findings and expanded upon some of them. In one instance of a missed opportunity to investigate further, the official said, General Bargewell noted that the comptroller of the Second Marine Division, who was responsible for making condolence payments to families of the Iraqis killed, told the unit's staff judge advocate that additional investigation was needed. That review never happened, and the Marines paid a total of $38,000 to families of 15 of the civilians killed.

In his own set of conclusions, General Chiarelli recommended that American forces in Iraq receive additional counterinsurgency training both in the United States before deploying, and once in Iraq. "From your basic recruit to commanders, he's calling for a refinement of the counterinsurgency approach," said one of the defense officials.

Since the military inquiries into the Haditha killings began, the accounts given by some marines involved and their lawyers have conflicted in important details with descriptions of what investigators have found, officials familiar with their findings have said.

After the roadside bomb went off, marines who survived the explosion said they believed they were under sustained attack and that they were entitled under their rules of engagement to use lethal force as they searched surrounding houses for those who they believed were responsible for the bombing.

But investigators and townspeople told reporters that the marines overreacted to a fatal roadside bombing and shot the civilians, only one of whom was armed, in cold blood. The 24 Iraqis killed included five men in a taxi and 19 other civilians in several houses, which marines and their lawyers say they cleared using grenades and blind fire.

But investigators have also concluded that most of the victims in three houses died from well-aimed rifle shots, not shrapnel or random fire, according to military officials familiar with the initial findings. The houses where the killings took place show no evidence of the violent room-clearing assault described by the marines and their lawyers, the officials said.

General Bargewell was assigned by General Chiarelli to look at how commanders responded to the incident, including whether there was any attempt at covering up what happened or whether discrepancies in accounts of the incident should have been investigated.

Marine commanders in Iraq have said that they became aware within two days of the killings that civilians had died from gunfire, not from the bomb explosion. They told investigators that they did not view the discrepancies in accounts of what happened as unusual in the aftermath of combat and that they had no reason to think at the time that any civilians had been killed deliberately.

U.S. Commander Finishes Haditha Review (AP)

By Kim Gamel

AP, July 8, 2006

A top U.S. commander completed a review Friday of an investigation into an alleged cover-up in the Haditha case, and a military official said it pointed to errors in the reporting of initial allegations after the killings.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli forwarded his findings and recommendations to Gen. George W. Casey, the top commander in Iraq, according to a statement.

The investigation was separate from an inquiry still under way into whether a small number of Marines from the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment murdered the 24 civilians — including unarmed women and children — on Nov. 19 after a roadside bomb in the town killed one of their comrades.

Chiarelli's report was based on an investigation conducted by Maj. Gen. Eldon Bargewell into whether the Marines followed proper procedures in reporting the incident to commanders, or whether anyone engaged in a cover-up.

His investigation also may consider whether any criminal charges should be brought.

The military initially said the Iraqi deaths were the result of the roadside bomb and a subsequent gunfight with insurgents.

The U.S. military official said Chiarelli agreed with Bargewell's findings for the most part, but there were some areas in which he recommended a different course of action. The official did not elaborate on that point.

DOJ_NMG_0039599

But he said the investigation found that errors were made in the reporting and follow up of initial allegations after the killings and suggested some were of a criminal nature.

"It essentially bolsters the ongoing criminal investigation and lays bare some of the administrative faults that existed during November 2005," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the findings have not been publicly released.

"What some of these people did wrong is certainly not illegal or criminal, but administratively their actions are something that Gen. Chiarelli wants to look at," the official said.

The official said the military hoped to release most of the findings in the next two weeks, but anything that could be used in the criminal investigation would not be made public.

"Some of the portions will be redacted because they could be used in a criminal investigation, either a current one or one in the future," he said.

The case is one of several allegations of U.S. abuse of Iraqi civilians that threaten to further weaken popular support for the Iraq war in the United States and tarnish the military's image.

Iraq has ordered its own probe of the killings, with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki using unusually strong language to condemn them.

Ex-soldier's Case Now Goes To Grand Jury (AP)

By Elizabeth Dunbar

AP, July 8, 2006

The case of a former Army private charged with slaying and raping an Iraqi woman and killing her family will be presented to a grand jury this month.

Steven D. Green, 21, entered a plea of not guilty through his public defenders Thursday. He also waived a detention hearing and a preliminary hearing, and agreed that his case would be prosecuted in the Western District of Kentucky.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Brian Butler said the case would be presented before a grand jury sometime in mid-July, probably in Paducah.

U.S. Magistrate Judge James Moyer set an arraignment date of Aug. 8 in Paducah for Green, who was arrested Friday by FBI agents in Marion, N.C.

Green answered Moyer's questions about his inability to pay for an attorney, saying he has about $6,000 in a checking account and owns a 1995 Lincoln Town Car.

"I don't have anything else," he told the judge.

According to a federal affidavit, Green and other soldiers targeted the young Iraqi woman after spotting her at a traffic checkpoint near Mahmoudiya. Green is being tried in federal rather than military court because he no longer is in the Army.

Based on interviews and records, the U.S. military now believes the young Iraqi woman Green is accused of raping and killing was between the ages of 14 and 20, Army spokesman Paul Boyce said Friday. While they initially said she was 20, Boyce said he has now seen documents that indicate she could have been about 14.

Military officials concluded Thursday that since Green had received his final discharge papers, he was no longer under the control of the Army and would not be subject to a court martial. No other soldiers have been charged in the case.

Green, who served 11 months with the 101st Airborne Division, based at Fort Campbell, Ky., received an honorable discharge and left the army in mid-May. He was discharged because of an "anti-social personality disorder," according to military officials and court documents.

A psychiatric condition, anti-social personality disorder is defined as chronic behavior that manipulates, exploits or violates the rights of others. Someone with the disorder may break the law repeatedly, lie, get in fights and show a lack of remorse.

President George W. Bush, speaking on CNN's "Larry King Live" on Thursday, said the Iraqis should understand that the allegations will be handled "in a very transparent upfront way."

"People will be held to account if these charges are true," Bush said.

An attorney for Green had filed an emergency motion to keep him in North Carolina, but the motion was denied by a federal judge, U.S. Attorney David Huber said Friday.

Father Said To Be Shocked At Charges Against Ex-GI Son (SFC)

By Ruth Campbell And Shanne Sissom

San Francisco Chronicle, July 8, 2006

(07-07) 04:00 PDT Midland, Texas -- The father of a former soldier accused of rape and murder in Iraq is "shocked" by allegations against his son, a lawyer for the father said.

John Green, father of former Army Pfc. Steven Dale Green, hired lawyer Hal Brockett to act as a spokesman in wake of international publicity about his son's case.

"The last time I talked to him, he was naturally shocked at the allegations made. I don't think he knows anything about it," Brockett said.

Charges brought against 21-year-old Steven Green by the U.S. attorney's office in Louisville, Ky., allege that on March 12, while stationed in Mahmoudiya with the 101st Airborne Division, Green and three other soldiers went to a home near Traffic Control Point 1 near Mahmoudiya to rape one of the women living there.

Using an AK-47, Green allegedly shot and killed a man, woman and girl in the house. The charges also allege that after participating in the rape of a second woman, Green shot and killed her.

Brockett said he has been acquainted with John Green since they attended Lee High School in Midland together. The attorney said John Green contacted him, anticipating media inquiries.

Green's son completed 10th grade at Coleman High School, according to Midland Independent School District communications director Melissa Hendrix-Beach.

Steven Green, honorably discharged from the Army with a personality disorder, was stationed in Fort Campbell, Ky., with the 101st Airborne Division, according to the arrest affidavit.

On Thursday in Louisville, Green entered a plea of not guilty and waived detention and preliminary hearings. U.S. Magistrate Judge James Moyer set Green's arraignment for Aug. 8 in Paducah, Ky.

Meanwhile in Midland, at the apartment complex where John Green lives, neighbors coped with the harsh glare of media attention.

"People have been here all day and were knocking on his door at 2 a.m.," one neighbor said of reporters representing news organizations across the country. "We don't want to say anything to add to his grief."

U.S. Marine Corps Cpl. Shaun Sanders, an Iraq veteran who lives at the complex, said: "I don't know him, and I don't know the facts, but it's disturbing something like this is alleged. It almost gives the rest of us a black eye, because it overshadows the many good things that we do."

Veterans at Midland's American Legion Post 19 were also saddened by the news.

"When it's from your hometown, it brings it a little closer," said retired Air Force Staff Sgt. Warren Teichmann, a World War II veteran. "It's a black eye for the city and everyone else."

Sanders fears repercussions in Iraq and the United States.

"We're trying to do good things for these people, and I'm afraid this will make American people lose hope and possibly cause more insurgency," he said. "It will potentially fuel a fire we're trying to put out in the first place."

Army Staff Sgt. Dale Hayden, also home from a tour of duty in Iraq, wondered how what is alleged could have happened and where Green's supervising officer was.

"To me, it's nothing but an accusation, and it could have happened, but I don't see it happening," Hayden said. "We're not allowed out in the public, and somebody had to be supervising him."

Not Just Another Abuse Scandal (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

Please don't lump what happened in Mahmudiyah with the alleged attacks by U.S. troops on unarmed Iraqi civilians in Fallujah, Haditha, Qaim or Salahuddin province. True, the murders of innocent noncombatants, and the humiliation and abuse of detainees at Abu Ghraib prison, are deplorable acts deserving condemnation and swift and severe punishment. But the event that occurred in Mahmudiyah, a village south of Baghdad, deserves a category all to itself.

DOJ_NMG_0039601

Mahmudiyah wasn't a case of soldiers exceeding their orders or authority in the interrogation of prisoners -- or an example of war-weary, stressed-out troops mistakenly assuming a villager was a member of the insurgency. Neither was it a situation in which U.S. service members, grief-stricken over the loss of a comrade, decided to take out their anguish on people who looked like the enemy.

Mahmudiyah, if the charges are true, was a case of something else; a vile event made all the more disgusting because a soldier, afforded the opportunity to serve his country, chose instead to indulge his private need to hurt, degrade and murder.

Twenty-one-year-old Steven D. Green, honorably discharged from the Army in May for a "personality disorder," is charged with entering an Iraqi home near Mahmudiyah in March and raping a young woman (Iraqis say she was 15 years old; the U.S. military says 20), shooting her in the head and setting her body aflame -- after he was done using it.

But first, it is alleged, he herded the young woman's mother, father and 5-year-old sister into a bedroom, where he shot and killed them. Arrested by the FBI this week, Green has pleaded not guilty.

The young woman's body and those of her family were found burned in an effort to cover up what happened. And Green, according to an FBI affidavit, wasn't the only rapist; another soldier in his unit is said to have taken part in the assault.

Some might call that a tactic of war. It was nothing of the sort. Yes, there are numerous cases of mass rape that were methodically carried out during times of war. Look no farther than Darfur and Kosovo.

But if the reporting out of Iraq is accurate, Mahmudiyah is a tale of sadism and degradation and of the desire of one man and possibly others to display mastery over the weak for reasons having nothing to do with why America is in Iraq.

The Post's Ellen Knickmeyer reports that the young woman had told her mother she was afraid because of the unwelcome attention of the American soldiers stationed at a checkpoint she had to pass through almost daily. She told her mother that the soldiers had been sexually aggressive toward her. Her mother feared the soldiers would come for her daughter at night.

Green and other soldiers, it has been reported, went to the young woman's house with the intent to rape her. That, if true, represents a premeditated use of power and intimidation to achieve gratification.

That's not a tactic of war; that is an act of tyranny.

They set out to devastate that young woman. Her family had been shot and killed in the next room before she was raped. Knowing that, she was already in agony when Green and the other soldier came for her.

Much is being made of the impact of this sex crime in Iraq and the Arab world and the backlash it could have on U.S. forces because of Islamic culture.

It's hard, at least for me, to get past the impact of this crime on the victims, and thoughts of the young woman's distress, and knowledge that in our civilized world she is not alone.

Her disgust with the harassment, her anxiety about her movements being studied and her fear of being raped are not peculiar to women living in Islamic cultures. Thinking twice about how to dress, when to go out, where to walk and how to speak are not a thing of the Middle East. Many women all over the world have to live with that. On the other hand, the men most able to relate to those concerns are those who themselves are prey behind prison walls.

Mahmudiyah was about murder. It was also about the deliberate, calculated violation of a woman. Such malevolence should never find its way into a U.S. military uniform.

In Arabs' Eyes, The US Is On Trial, Not Hussein (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

BAGHDAD — Boushra Khalil walked through the metal detectors and into the vast convention center, a crumbling relic of a fallen dictatorship with walls still emblazoned with murals of Scud missiles.

It took only a few minutes for one of the security guards prowling the halls to catch sight of her.

"Hey, excuse me," his voice rang out. "Aren't you Saddam's lawyer?" Soon they were all around her, five young men with U.S. military-issued badges clipped to their sports shirts. Their eyes were wide; they smiled.

DOJ_NMG_0039602

"Tell him you met young people here, youth that are sending their greetings to the president," one of the young men said. "We believe he is suffering injustice," said another. They spoke quickly and eagerly, and pressed Khalil for her autograph.

Iraqis who had been cleared to work in the drab nerve center of Iraq's U.S.-backed government, in the heavily fortified Green Zone, might appear to be unlikely fans of the ousted president.

But perhaps no supporter is more improbable than Khalil, a Shiite Muslim lawyer who has traveled from Lebanon to defend him.

Like most Arabs, Khalil, who is Lebanese, is no stranger to the hard reality of despotism: Her Iraqi cousins were put to death for rebelling against Saddam Hussein's Sunni-dominated regime.

But ever since the wintry afternoon she switched on Al Jazeera and caught sight of the bedraggled Hussein in U.S. custody, she has devoted herself to securing his release. Her work on his defense team has invited angry slurs from fellow Shiites, but Khalil views her work as an epic assignment on behalf of the pan-Arab "nation" — a cause Hussein espoused during his years in power. Khalil believes it eclipses religious divisions and the question of whether Hussein was a worthy leader.

"When I met [Hussein], he looked at me and smiled and said, 'These Americans think I am fighting to save my job as president, but I am fighting to defend my homeland,' " said Khalil, who is unabashedly enthusiastic about the Iraqi insurgency. "He never surrendered. He did not quit. If he'd quit, then the whole Arab nation would have been handed to America on a plate of gold."

Khalil's story illustrates an inherent irony in Hussein's war crimes trial, which is grinding through the first phase of closing arguments: The Americans pushed to get him into court, but it's America that has ended up standing trial in the eyes of the Arab public.

In ways both subtle and blunt, Hussein and his lawyers have repeatedly compared Iraq's fate under his heavy thumb to the blood-spattered security vacuum created by the U.S. invasion.

This debate — in essence, whether the invasion improved life for Iraqis — resonates loudly in the Arab world, where many people are concerned about how Hussein's fall has shifted the region's power structure. Iraq's Sunni-dominated neighbors are fearful of the emergence of the Shiite majority in Iraq and terrified of expanded Iranian influence. (The trial has included allegations that Iran tried to assassinate Hussein.)

Hussein blossomed into a cause celebre among Arab intelligentsia and legal experts. His plight drew the energy of dozens of lawyers from the Arab world and beyond, including such improbable volunteers as the daughter of Libyan President Moammar Kadafi and a Harvard-educated Saudi lawyer who is prevented by gender law from practicing in her homeland.

And then there's Khalil, who looked alien in the convention center with her high-heeled sandals, flared jeans and flashing chunks of jewelry that had been pressed upon her in gratitude by a Libyan jeweler who recognized her from the televised trial. After signing autographs all around, the lawyer, who wouldn't give her age but looks to be in her 40s, smiled, shrugged and moved away from the admiring gaggle of guards.

"I saw the same feeling in Libya," said Khalil, who had just returned from a conference in Tripoli, that country's capital. "They tried to carry me on their shoulders there." She reached into her purse and drew out notes to Hussein, scrawled on napkins and placemats by far-flung Arab admirers.

"To my master, to my beloved Saddam," read a note from a Libyan named Omar. "I'd sacrifice my soul and my family to you, my beloved master."

"Endure, endure, endure. We are all with you with everything we own," read another note. "You are the sunshine of Arabism and its glory. There is no dignity for Arabs except by liberating Iraq from the injustice and arrogance of the non-believers. There is no justice for us unless he is the president of the Arab nation."

The Arab public didn't have much love for Hussein during the years of his notoriously brutal rule. In a region where most people are unhappily familiar with the bloody repressions of dictators, Hussein was seen as a particularly ruthless leader.

But once the United States pushed into Baghdad, Hussein was held in a slightly more sympathetic light by Arabs leery of U.S. intentions in the region. To people who often complain angrily of their own governments' acquiescence to Washington's wishes, Hussein was, if nothing else, an Arab leader who had fought the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0039603

The image of Hussein as an anti-American icon was fortified by the famous video made by the U.S. military after his capture in December 2003. The footage showed a scraggly Hussein being checked for lice. A few months later, British newspapers published smuggled photographs of an imprisoned Hussein in his underwear.

The images were enough to convince former Qatari Justice Minister Najib Nuaimi, by his own admission no fan of Hussein during his presidency, to join the defense team.

"I said to him, 'As you know, there's no fair trial. There's no independence. The prosecutors are running the show, but the Americans are behind it,' " Nuaimi said.

"I told him clearly, 'You're the last card in the hands of Bush and Blair, and they won't waste it because they've lost all the other excuses to invade Iraq and occupy it. You should expect that they might put you to capital punishment.' "

To lead prosecutor Jaafar Mousawi, that kind of talk is an insult. He's adamant that the court is a legitimate arm of Iraqi law, and says that U.S. influence is limited to logistical help such as security and custody of the detainees.

"Before history, I say that there is no American interference in the court," he said.

The first phase of the trial, which has centered on his alleged role in the massacre of Shiite Muslim villagers in 1982, has been peppered with angry political quarrels between the Kurdish judge and defense lawyers or their clients. The gist is generally the same: The defense makes snide cracks about Americans running the court; Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel Rahman snaps angrily that he is presiding over an Iraqi court.

"We thank America for the transparency," a sneering Barzan Hassan, Hussein's half brother, codefendant and former intelligence chief, said to the judge in a typical courtroom exchange. "This is an American court.... If it weren't for the Americans, you would have no credibility."

Khalil has been particularly adept at dragging U.S. policy into the courtroom. She infuriated the judge early on by showing photographs of abuse victims in the Abu Ghraib prison. The last time she was in court, the judge called her a "gangster" and ordered her dragged from the room, slapping and swearing.

"I wanted to make a comparison between the democracy of America and the dictatorship of Saddam Hussein," she said in an interview later that week. "Compare all the things done by Saddam Hussein to defend his regime to all the measures taken by America after Sept. 11. America has done much more than what he has done."

The trial has weighed Hussein as a historical figure, a man who can make a claim unique among Arab rulers: He squared off militarily against Iran and the United States. Throughout the proceedings, he has repeatedly stood up to make speeches, chide the judge and say that he is the president of Iraq.

To Khalil, Hussein is a figure of martyrdom. Although she acknowledges that he was "hard" on those who opposed his reign, she also compares him to George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, and describes him as a man willing to follow his political vision all the way into death.

Nor does she accept the conventional view that it's unusual for a Shiite to defend a Sunni leader famous for persecuting Shiites.

"Saddam Hussein stood in the face of American occupation, so if Imam Ali were present, on which side would he stand?" she asked, invoking the cousin of the prophet Muhammad and a central figure in Shiite Islam. "America or Saddam Hussein? Definitely, Saddam Hussein. So because I am Shia, I stand with Saddam Hussein."

She believes the verdict has already been decided, and that Hussein will be put to death. She doesn't think it matters, though. She's working for public opinion, and for history. And she says Hussein, too, is preoccupied with his legacy.

When prosecutors last month asked the judge to put Hussein to death, the former president broke into a grin and chuckled quietly. "Well done," he said.

A Drive To Root Out The Resurgent Taliban (NYT)

By Tyler Hicks

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039604

American and allied troops are engaged in their biggest operation against Taliban forces in Afghanistan since they drove the fundamentalist movement from power in 2001. These photographs were taken over two weeks in June with Charlie Company, Fourth Brigade, 10th Mountain Division, near Hazarbuz, in Zabul Province.

The Americans face the hard job of trying to tell local farmers from Taliban insurgents, who have gained strength across southern Afghanistan. The Americans set up a base, then probed into villages. They were soon ambushed. The Taliban can easily persuade or coerce villagers to assist them. They arm the villagers or equip them with radios. Almost any man is suspect. During one raid, which was typical, the Americans separated the men. Homes were searched, and the men were marched to the base for questioning.

The Americans feel the hands of those who claim to be farmers, to make sure they are rough. They check under the men's shirts for calluses from carrying rifle clips, or for bruises from firing rocket-propelled grenades. As often is the case, almost all are released for lack of evidence.

Col. Tom Collins, the American military spokesman in Kabul, said, "We have intelligence that leads us to a certain village where there are antigovernment elements and we take in those we find, screen them, and some are then let go immediately, but they still have to be questioned."

The day after the raid, the Americans were ambushed again, this time at their base. Automatic rifle fire sprayed just inches above a row of soldiers as they lay resting.

On the final day of the operation, a raid on a village sent several men fleeing for the mountains. They were met by American Ranger Scouts. Three men were captured. They confessed to being Taliban fighters and were brought back to the base to be handed over to the Afghan authorities.

Pakistan Urged To Dismantle Terrorist Camps (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal/AP, July 8, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan -- President Hamid Karzai urged neighboring Pakistan to prevent militants from training on its soil as fighting Friday in southern Afghanistan killed a U.S.-led coalition soldier and at least eight suspected Taliban militants.

The violence came amid a surge in attacks by Taliban insurgents trying to reassert control over their former southern heartland. The escalation has prompted Britain to consider sending more forces. Hundreds of people, mostly militants, have died in fighting in recent weeks.

Mr. Karzai blamed foreign terrorists for the rising violence, and called on Pakistan to dismantle terrorist training grounds on its side of the border.

In the latest bloodshed, militants attacked a coalition convoy in Helmand province's Baghran Valley on Thursday, killing a coalition soldier and wounding another, said spokesman Sgt. Chris Miller. Five militants died when coalition forces returned fire, he said.

Miller gave no details about the dead soldier's identity or nationality, but another foreign military official, speaking on condition of anonymity said the soldier was American.

Elsewhere in Helmand, three suspected Taliban militants died Thursday night and two more were wounded when a bomb they were trying to plant exploded on the side of a main highway in Grishk district, said provincial police chief Ghulam Nabi Malakhail.

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

Afghan Legislator Says Coalition Attacked His Family, Killing 1 (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, July 7 — An Afghan member of Parliament accused the American-led coalition of opening fire on his family as they traveled by car in one of the most troubled provinces of southern Afghanistan, killing his brother-in-law and wounding five others, including his wife and two of his children.

Haji Abdul Khaliq, a legislator from Uruzgan province, said in a telephone interview that the shooting occurred on Wednesday and that American and Australian troops were responsible for it.

"My wife, my son, my daughter, my nephew and my wife's brother were traveling with a driver from Uruzgan to Kandahar for medical checkup at Kandahar hospital when they were attacked by American and Australian troops from the top of a hill," he said. It was the middle of the afternoon, he added.

"The coalition were on the top of the hill and start shooting toward their car, killing my wife's brother, Abdul Baqi, and injuring my wife, my son, my daughter and my nephew." His nephew and the driver were slightly injured, Mr. Abdul Khaliq said.

The family took cover in a ditch beside the road and lay on the ground for several hours, he said. The coalition kept firing on the car and after some time came to the scene, he said, but even when they saw the woman and children lying wounded they did nothing to assist them.

"They did not help them or even give them a bottle of water," he said.

A statement from the American-led coalition said it was "deeply saddened" by the reports, but added that "coalition forces are confident the coalition is not responsible for this attack."

Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, a coalition spokesman, said that there had been only one report of coalition forces "engaging the enemy" in the region, and that it took place at night when "four Taliban extremists on foot" fought a patrol "far off the road."

Colonel Fitzpatrick added that the claim that coalition forces were responsible for the attack on Mr. Abdul Khaliq's family "could very well be extremist propaganda."A few hours after the attack, Mr. Abdul Khaliq said, villagers and friends of the family came to help them and took them to hospital in Tirin Kot, the provincial capital of Uruzgan, 111 miles away. He moved the family to Kandahar hospital Thursday, he said.

"I am very sad and disappointed about this because the coalition is always saying that they are here to help the Afghans and they respect the rights, but first they shot women, and then when they came upon them they did not care to take them to hospital or treat them," he said.

"Even if this happens to the enemy of Afghanistan, they should take the injured to the hospital," Mr. Abdul Khaliq said. "They just left them in the desert and under the strong sun."

Coalition forces come under fire or ambush almost daily in southern Afghanistan and in a separate incident the coalition reported one soldier was killed and one wounded in an ambush Wednesday in the next province door, Helmand.

Cheney Lauds Troops For Aid They Provided, Message They Sent (NVP)

By Louis Hansen

Norfolk Virginian Pilot, July 8, 2006

NORFOLK - Two months after returning from a Middle East deployment, the amphibious assault ship Wasp overflowed with troops again Friday afternoon.

Nearly 3,000 Marines and sailors, including about 100 bused from Camp Lejeune, N.C., crowded the flight deck, packed metal bleachers and perched along the ship's upper decks.

They belonged to two battle groups - led by the aircraft carrier Theodore Roosevelt and the amphibious assault ship Nassau - that returned in March and May.

On Friday they mustered again aboard the Wasp for a 19-minute speech by Vice President Dick Cheney.

"By patrolling sea lanes, bringing help to the innocent and confronting the violent, you've shown a watching world that we're a powerful country with a very capable military," Cheney said. "You bring relief to the helpless and hope to the oppressed, and you are protecting the people of this nation in a time of war."

The two strike groups took part in the latest chapter in a war that began with the U.S. invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

Saddam Hussein was deposed , captured and stands trial. Iraqis have held three elections for national offices. Approximately 2,540 U.S. service members have been killed and 10,200 have been wounded, according to the Defense Department.

Cheney spoke before a group of sailors from the Nassau Expeditionary Strike Group who returned in May from a six-month deployment in the Middle East and Mediterranean.

During their six-month deployment, the two strike groups fought in Iraq, captured pirates in the Indian Ocean and secured the commercial channels in the Mediterranean Sea and Persian Gulf.

DOJ_NMG_0039606

The 22nd Marine Expeditionary Unit, based at Camp Lejeune and part of the Nassau strike group, lost three men during its deployment to Iraq .

Before the speech, Cheney met briefly with about a dozen service members.

Gunnery Sgt. Christopher Fritz, 37, met the vice president long enough to tell him where he was from - Springfield - and what he did - worked with Iraqis in the city of Hit .

After spending six months training and organizing Iraqi police forces, Fritz was grateful for the recognition. His unit's role, he acknowledged, was "not the glory stuff." But he said he hoped it would eventually stabilize the country.

From a podium mounted on the flight deck, Cheney thanked the commands one by one. The troops greeted him with brief applause and occasional shouts .

Cheney praised the Navy's role in Afghanistan and Iraq. "Naval operations are every bit as important, if not more so, than they were in the last century," Cheney said. He noted the ability to launch precision strikes, rockets and missiles, and to deploy SEALs and Marines in different environments.

He dismissed any timeline for troop withdrawal that would be set by elected leaders, not military commanders. "We want to complete the mission," he said. "We want to get it done right."

After the speech, Cheney shook hands with more service members . The troops filed slowly off the flight deck and into the weekend.

Petty Officer 1st Class Chilanda Steave, a 13-year Navy veteran, called the speech "a morale booster."

Ensign Jeffrey Kasting, stationed aboard the guided missile cruiser Cape St. George, said Cheney "made it clear we weren't going to back down."

Army Cuts 1,000 For Personality Disorders (SFC/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

San Francisco Chronicle/AP, July 8, 2006

(07-07) 15:44 PDT WASHINGTON, (AP) --

The Army discharged more than 1,000 soldiers last year for personality disorders, the reason it gave for this year's discharge of a private now accused of raping a young Iraqi woman and killing her and her family.

That total represents about 1.2 percent of the 83,000 soldiers given early discharges during the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30, 2005. That was a bit higher than the less than 1 percent discharged for those reasons during the 2001 fiscal year before the war in Iraq began.

Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the Army's surgeon general, told reporters Friday that the disorder usually is not associated with combat trauma and may be a lifelong problem that is not always easy to identify in military screenings. He said soldiers exhibiting such traits would not be automatically discharged because many can continue to perform well.

Steven D. Green, who pleaded not guilty through his public defenders Thursday, was discharged because of an "anti-social personality disorder" according to military officials and documents. That condition is defined as chronic behavior that manipulates, exploits or violates the rights of others, such as someone who repeatedly lies, fights or breaks the law.

According to a federal affidavit, Green, 21, and other soldiers targeted a young Iraqi woman after spotting her at a traffic checkpoint near Mahmoudiya. They later went to her house, raped and killed her and shot members of her family, the affidavit said.

Green is being tried in federal rather than military court because he no longer is in the Army

Kiley told Pentagon reporters that personality disorders — which are not forms of mental illness — do no necessarily exclude people from serving in the armed forces. In fact, he said that up to 4 percent to 5 percent of the soldiers have taken sleep medications or antidepressant drugs at one time or another during their combat service.

Altogether, there were nearly 493,000 people in the Army during the 2005 fiscal year, compared with about 481,000 in 2001. The Army discharged 805 soldiers for personality disorders in 2001, 734 in 2002, 980 in 2003, 988 in 2004 and 1,038 in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0039607

Mental disorders represented between less than 1 percent to 1.4 percent of the total early discharges for those years. The total number of early discharges ranged from about 69,000 to more than 87,000. Soldiers can receive early discharges for a number of reasons, but most often they are for physical fitness issues.

Kiley said the Army is allocating more resources that ever to combat stress and provide mental health counseling for soldiers on the battlefield.

Currently, he said, there are about 200 mental health and behavioral health personnel in Iraq and 25 in Afghanistan. Many of them are assigned to different regions of the country and travel in small teams to the forward operating bases to meet with soldiers.

The Army, he said, is trying to find ways to encourage soldiers to use the mental health services and overcome the perception among the military that seeking mental health counseling is a sign of weakness.

"There is something very demanding and tough about being in combat," said Kiley. "And anything that would be perceived as being weak and not ready and tough carries with it some stigma."

As a result, he said, the Army is trying to reach out regularly to soldiers while they are in combat, and officials are encouraging entire units to go through mental health screenings so that soldiers will feel more comfortable doing it if they see their commanders and unit leaders participating.

An Internet Lifeline For Troops In Iraq And Loved Ones At Home (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

With mortar shells exploding near him sometimes twice a day in Ramadi, Iraq, Sgt. Mark Grelak found a way to shut out the heat, the noise, and all the demands of his job — sweeping the local highway for bombs left by insurgents. In a tiny space in his barracks, he would flip open his laptop, adjust his Web camera and watch his daughter Katie take her first halting steps.

From 6,000 miles away, Sergeant Grelak, 35, drew flowers with Sara, Katie's older sister, and witnessed, almost in real time, her first day of preschool. The soldier and his wife, Jennifer, 26, even bought a house in Baltimore together, e-mailing pictures and appraisals back and forth. Through instant messaging, they discussed the new landscaping and camping equipment as if they were sitting just across the kitchen table from each other.

"Do you care if I take out the crape myrtle?" Ms. Grelak messaged him in March.

"Why not leave it for now," her husband suggested.

Later, she messaged, "If you have some time, take a look on eBay for a tent. I'd like to go camping this year."

Military deployments have a way of chewing up marriages, turning daily life upside down and making strangers out of husbands and wives. But for this generation of soldiers, the Internet, which is now widely available on bases, has softened the blow of long separations, helping loved ones stay in daily touch and keeping service members informed of family decisions — important and mundane.

Most soldiers deploy with a laptop in hand and a hookup to the Internet in their barracks. Others, particularly those with young children, pay for Web cameras, a trend that began in earnest two years ago.

Mental health experts and military commanders say that the tens of millions of dollars spent on technology in Iraq for Internet cafes, computers and Web cameras have helped ease the isolation of soldiers' lives, as well as the turbulence of coming home, an often-bumpy transition from combat to kiddie pool and from commanding to compromising.

"It's rejuvenating," said Sergeant Grelak, an Army National Guard soldier who was gone for 18 months and is now at Fort Benning, Ga., awaiting his release from active duty. "It keeps you from getting detached from the person you left behind. You go outside, and you run the risk of getting shot and blown up. That changes people. If I didn't have that connection, I would feel like a stranger."

Those who benefit most are often families with young children, said Jaine Darwin, a psychologist and the co-director of Strategic Outreach to Families of All Reservists, based in Cambridge, Mass., which counsels reservists and families. "They make families much more connected to the soldiers. A voice is not the same as seeing a person," Ms. Darwin said.

DOJ_NMG_0039608

Military spouses were once left to make all child-rearing, household and work decisions by themselves for months at a time; telephone calls were simply too brief, unpredictable and expensive. Now the burden is a little less lopsided and an answer is only a few hours away.

The constant communication makes for fewer unpleasant surprises after couples reunite, though there can be a downside: It brings the anxieties of the living room into the war. "Who wants to hear that your daughter got a tattoo?" Ms. Darwin asked. "Any piece of news that makes you preoccupied is not good for you in a war zone."

Sergeant Grelak, for example, became alarmed when he learned that Katie had an ear infection. "I had to be a shoulder for Jennifer," he said, but, he added, "I was 110 percent concentrating."

Ms. Darwin pointed out that soldiers, for their part, can have too much Web access between missions "and it's quite disruptive to a family," she said. "It poses a hard conflict between the wish to get every moment they can with their soldier and the need for life to go on. Talking to your soldier can become a full-time job."

Internet cafes with computers began to spring up at military camps during the crisis in the Balkans in the 1990's, but mostly in fits and starts. Since then the military and private organizations like the Freedom Calls Foundation have spent millions of dollars to wire camps in Iraqi war zones. The Defense Department alone has spent more than $165 million in the past two years to set up cybercafes in Iraq. In 2004, they began with 36 cafes, and now there are more than 170. The use of satellites has made the job considerably easier. Freedom Calls, which raises private funds to build satellite links and provide communications hardware for soldiers in Iraq, has enabled 30,000 service members in four camps to reach relatives free in the past two years, setting up live teleconferencing to broadcast the births of babies, birthday parties, weddings and graduations. About 1,000 families in the United States have been equipped with screens in their homes.

"A person can now keep his commitment to his family and keep his commitment to his country," said John Harlow, the executive director of Freedom Calls.

Specialist Kevin Groll, of the Michigan National Guard, took a virtual seat at the Thanksgiving Day children's table last year, a Groll family tradition. The family Web camera was positioned right next to the children's table. "Boy, you did it again," Specialist Groll joked with his mother, Vicki Groll. "I'm not even near the kiddies, and I still had to sit at the table. The kids just loved it."

While the divorce rate for returning soldiers remains relatively high, a testament to the difficulties of war and the number of pre-deployment leaps to the altar, commanders agree that the Internet has helped morale considerably. Yet such easy access to families also poses problems in terms of controlling the release of classified information. Service members are not allowed to discuss where they are going, what they are carrying, how they will get there or how long they will stay, for example. All communications on a base are typically shut down after a casualty or injury is reported until family members can be contacted, which can take anywhere from a few hours to two days.

Web logs relating to official duties must be registered with a service member's chain of command, but personal Web pages set up by people back home can run into trouble.

One mother, Robin Vaughan, whose son was a military policeman in Iraq and who created a Web site for people who wanted support and information about the unit, said soldiers and their relatives were told not to view her site because it was not an official, registered site.

But monitoring all calls, e-mails and Internet traffic is impossible, so to a large degree, the military relies on self-censorship. "It's a big challenge," said Maj. Sean Wilson, a public affairs officer at Fort Drum, N.Y.

"Soldiers are naturally proud of what they do. They want to tell somebody about it."

Juggling home and battle can prove stressful. The immediacy of the Internet allows little time for reflection, and rather than let a bad mood pass, a spouse may rush to the computer and rant, which is not always wise, Ms. Darwin said.

Rumors, too, can run rampant, even those about infidelity, she added. And not hearing from someone can be painful and frightening, on both sides of the divide, particularly when daily e-mail contact has been the rule, the families said. Breakups via the Internet do occur, in a contemporary equivalent of the Dear John letter.

Sherri Cropper, 30, said she e-mailed her husband, Sgt. William Cropper, in Iraq every day. It was her way of making sure he was all right. But it also helped her to cope with the demands of what seems the equivalent of single motherhood, and to express how she was changing, becoming more independent. "It did ease the transition a lot," said Mrs. Cropper, who lives at

DOJ_NMG_0039609

Fort Drum. "It wasn't bam, in your face, there are a thousand things that went on and I will sit here in the next two days and talk you to death."

The happiness of a reunion tends to wear off quickly, she said. "Then, it's, 'O.K., you missed nine months of baby-sitting and I'm out of here,' " Mrs. Cropper added. "I think this gives the person who is deployed a good grasp or perspective on how it will be when you get back."

Dixie Clark of Harrisburg, Pa., said she was lucky to get a quick phone call once a month from her husband in the 1980's when he was a marine.

Recently she had three family members to fret over. Her two oldest sons and her husband, all Army National Guardsmen, were all deployed to Iraq at the same time, posted to the same base.

This time around, she routinely watched her "three guys" on a Web camera. Once when a mortar shell hit the camp, Mrs. Clark e-mailed one son and demanded that all three appear in front of the camera to assure her that they were fine.

"My son comes running into the barracks saying, 'Mom is on the Internet and she wants us to get up there; she has to see everybody,' " Sgt. First Class James Clark Sr. recalled. "I didn't even know he had a Webcam set up at that time. We all huddled up and said, 'Here we are.' "

Every day, Mrs. Clark and her husband sat down for a 90-minute round of instant messaging, which cost a pittance compared with telephone calls.

They planned the renewal of their wedding vows together online. He chose the menu — chicken, roast turkey and broccoli and cheese. And when things went wrong with the house, she knew that an answer was a few hours away. "Honey, where is the furnace?" she messaged him. "I ran out of oil."

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Fitzgerald's Future Examined (WBBM)

By Bob Roberts

WBBM, News Radio 780, Chicago, July 8, 2006

CHICAGO (WBBM Newsradio 780) -- The future of U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald may be moving to the front burner, following today's news conference by President Bush.

WBBM Newsradio 780's Bob Roberts reports Fitzgerald wears two hats: United States Attorney for the northern district of Illinois, and Washington-based special prosecutor in the CIA leak investigation and related cases.

The local investigations have reached the top levels of city and state government; the CIA leak probe has reached top levels at the White House.

As a result, some pundits say that Fitzgerald already has become a recurring nightmare not only for Mayor Daley, former Gov. George Ryan and Gov. Rod Blagojevich, but for the President as well.

Instead, Mr. Bush said, it has not been a high priority for him.

"I don't have any plans to reappoint him because I haven't thought about it," he said, adding quickly, "I'll now think about it, now that you brought it up."

Mr. Bush said he is not familiar with the locally-based corruption investigations, but commented on Fitzgerald's stewardship of the CIA leak investigation.

"I thought in Washington he handled the case with professionalism, very professionally," Mr. Bush said. "You didn't see a lot of leaks. You didn't see a lot of speculation. You didn't see a lot of people dropping a little crumb here and there for the press to chew on.

The President said that has impressed him favorably.

"I really thought he handled himself well," Mr. Bush said.

Ultimately, the President said, the decision is one for U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to make.

The U.S. Attorney's office Thursday obtained the highest-profile convictions yet in its investigation of corruption at City Hall, with the conviction of the mayor's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich, and three others.

Fitzgerald signaled last week that he is conducting a wide-ranging investigation into hiring abuses in state government. And Ryan awaits sentencing on charges stemming from the Operation Safe Roads investigation.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Can Companies Issue Options, Then Good News? (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell, Charles Forelle And James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

SEC Is Divided on Practice Known as 'Spring Loading;' Critics See 'Insider Trading'

New controversy is brewing over the way companies dole out stock options, this time over the practice of granting them just days before announcing good news -- an effort to give executives a quick profit on paper.

Known as "spring loading," such options grants have generated heat in recent days. While spring loading is different from "backdating," another type of options timing, corporate critics blast it as a form of insider trading. Defenders call it a legitimate form of compensation -- and their ranks include a commissioner of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Options give recipients the right to buy a share of stock at a set price, typically the closing share price on the date a grant is made. Companies that backdate are setting the grant date retroactively to align with a stock's low point, creating an instant paper gain.

By contrast, spring-loaded options usually are priced the same day they are granted. The catch: Companies are aiming to build a quick, expected gain into a grant, by assuming that good news -- like an upbeat earnings forecast -- will push the stock price up in coming days.

The SEC is investigating at least 50 companies for the timing of their options, and while there is wide agreement that backdating is wrong in most cases, there appears to be division over spring-loading. The divisions underscore a broader debate over the myriad ways companies grant options and whether or not some practices are, or should be, banned.

In a speech Thursday before the International Corporate Governance Network, Republican SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins gave a spirited defense of spring loading, calling it a legitimate and low-cost way for boards to efficiently compensate executives. He rejected claims that such awards amount to trading on inside information.

"Boards, in the exercise of their business judgment, should use all the information that they have at hand to make option-grant decisions," Mr. Atkins said. "An insider-trading theory falls flat in this context, where there is no counterparty who could be harmed by an options grant. The counterparty here is the corporation -- and thus the shareholders."

Crying Foul

Quickly, some investor groups cried foul. "Let's step back and take it out of the legal domain. This is just not fair," said Ann Yerger, executive director of the Council of Institutional Investors. "I don't think any rational individual or director or executive could argue it is fair. The whole point is to motivate and incentivize. To do this and set up an award so they're already in the money is so unfair. I think it's a mark of poor integrity."

Mr. Atkins's speech came just a few weeks before commissioners are to vote on a rule overhauling rules for how executive compensation is disclosed. The agency is working to include guidance on options-timing, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has said.

Corporate lawyers and some SEC commissioners have said the pending disclosure rule tackles some of the concerns over backdating. Others already have been addressed by other rules, such as one shortening the amount of time in which executives must file beneficial-ownership forms, and the new accounting rule requiring all options to be expensed.

The question is whether other practices are, or should be, on the agenda. Mr. Atkins has "laid out a marker," says David B.H. Martin, a former SEC official who is now a partner at Covington & Burling. "He's not going to be swayed by public opinion. He wants to analyze things openly."

In an interview Friday, Mr. Atkins defended his position on spring loading, pointing out that options are designed to give executives a long-term incentive to boost performance. "You might have a temporary transfer of wealth from the shareholder to the employees in a case where there's a pop in the price, but again, these are options," he said. "If they are properly constructed and are meant to try to retain people for the long term, they're going to have to survive for 20 quarters, or 40 quarters or 200 quarters."

DOJ_NMG_0039611

The debate illuminates some of the challenges facing the SEC as it wades into the options-timing issue. The agency sees backdated options as at least problematic -- especially if not disclosed -- since they carry a strike price -- the price at which they can be redeemed -- lower than the market price on the date they really were granted.

Accounting rules demand that such "discount options" be expensed on the company's books. The tax code disqualifies them from certain corporate deductions and exemptions. And companies that didn't disclose the backdating -- or implied in their filings that they didn't backdate -- can face serious securities violations.

Options timed to news may not be as problematic, since their strike price is the market value on the date of grant. But no consensus has yet emerged from the SEC.

Consequently, the agency, which is looking at several different spring-loading cases, could do nothing, or take any of several tacks in arguing that spring-loaded options aren't kosher.

Misleading Investors

The simplest case is to argue that companies that engaged in spring-loading mislead investors by not disclosing that options are awarded with foreknowledge of the impending good news. That's how the SEC has approached the case of Analog Devices Inc., a Norwood, Mass., technology concern that is also being investigated for backdating.

A tentative settlement that Analog reached with the SEC states that it failed to adequately disclose that it priced stock options before the release of favorable financial results. In one of those instances involving options grants in November 2000, directors as well as officers were the recipient of the grants, according to the terms of the proposed settlement. The Analog case has not yet been brought before the full commission for a vote.

Cyberonics Inc., a Houston medical-device maker, drew questions for a June 2004 grant made to several executives on the day a Food and Drug Administration advisory panel recommended approval of a Cyberonics device. Trading in Cyberonics was halted that day. Grants carried as their exercise price the closing price of the prior day.

After trading began again, shares leapt 78%.

An analyst at SunTrust Robinson Humphrey questioned the grant in a research report last month. The SEC is conducting an informal inquiry of Cyberonics, and federal prosecutors in Manhattan have subpoenaed the company. Cyberonics has called the analyst report "misleading" and said it properly accounted for the options.

Insider-Trading Rules

Another approach for the SEC could be to argue that spring-loaded grants violate insider-trading rules, particularly if directors with knowledge of the news give options to themselves, or if executives conceal good news from directors in urging them to grant options. In a famous insider-trading case that the SEC brought against mining concern Texas Gulf Sulphur Co. in the 1960s, a court found that executives who received grants before the company announced a big mining discovery violated federal securities laws. In that case, the compensation committee was unaware of the pending news at the time of the grants.

As for taxes, the implications of spring-loading are "not as clear as with options backdating," says S. James DiBernardo, a partner at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP who specializes in compensation tax issues.

Mr. DiBernardo says he "wouldn't be surprised" if the IRS tries to make the argument that spring-loaded options are also discount options, and thus come with the same tax "parade of horrors" that follows backdated options. But, he says, such an argument would be "much, much more difficult" for the IRS to win. Among other things, the IRS would have to establish what was the "true" market value on the day the spring-loaded options were granted, and it isn't clear how that could be done, he says.

The IRS declined to comment Friday.

Write to Kara Scannell at kara.scannell@wsj.com1, Charles Forelle at charles.forelle@wsj.com2 and James Bandler at james.bandler@wsj.com3

Nicor To Pay $10 Million Fine (CHIT)

By Robert Manor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, July 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039612

Utility company says penalty to settle SEC probe of accounting

Nicor Inc. said Friday that it has reached a tentative settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission and is willing to pay a $10 million penalty to settle allegations of misleading accounting.

The SEC has been investigating Naperville-based Nicor, natural gas supplier to most of northern Illinois outside Chicago, for allegedly inflating profits from its gas trading business from 1999 through the first quarter of 2002.

The company eventually restated its earnings for that period.

"We wonder how Nicor is getting off paying only a $10 million fine," said Rob Kelter, general counsel for the Citizens Utility Board. CUB believes ratepayers were overcharged, and a case against Nicor is pending before the Illinois Commerce Commission.

CUB has contended in the past that Nicor Gas owes consumers up to $190 million for the alleged improper accounting of gas purchases.

Nicor made the announcement after the SEC had closed, and government officials were not available for comment.

"We are pleased to be taking another step in the direction of a final resolution regarding this matter," said Paul Gracey, Nicor senior vice president and general counsel, in a written statement.

"Most importantly, since these events surfaced nearly four years ago, the company has taken significant actions to improve the internal controls and oversight of our gas supply area and to prevent a recurrence of the activities that led to this investigation."

In 2004 Nicor settled a lawsuit filed on behalf of its shareholders for $38.4 million.

In addition, Nicor acknowledged at that time that a federal grand jury has been convened to consider criminal charges against the company.

The status of the Justice Department investigation could not be determined Friday.

The company said it will place the $10 million in escrow pending final approval of the tentative settlement by SEC commissioners, who have the authority to modify or reject the deal.

Under the terms of the settlement, Nicor would neither admit nor deny wrongdoing.

The utility's shares rose 11 cents, or 0.3 percent, to $41.80 in New York Stock Exchange trading on Friday.

---

rmanor@tribune.com

Asyst Gets Delisting Letter From Nasdaq (AP)

AP, July 8, 2006

Asyst Technologies Requests Hearing From Nasdaq to Avoid Delisting After Filing Delay

FREMONT, Calif. (AP) -- Asyst Technologies Inc., a maker of technology for semiconductors and flat-panel displays, said Friday it received a letter from Nasdaq stating that the company is not in compliance with listing requirements because it is delinquent in filing its annual report for the fiscal year ended March 31.

Nasdaq has begun a process that could lead to the stock's delisting.

Asyst has requested a hearing with Nasdaq to address the filing delay. The request will postpone delisting pending the hearing and the panel's decision, although the panel will not necessarily find that Asyst should continue to be listed on the exchange.

Asyst delayed filing its annual report because it is in the midst of a widening inquiry into stock-option granting practices by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission. On June 9, the board established a special committee to look into Asyst's stock option practices during that period, the company said.

Asyst expects the inquiry to be completed by June 29. Shares closed Thursday at $7.25.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Records Show Abramoff At White House (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0039613

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 7 (AP) — Secret Service records show four more visits to the White House in 2001 by the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including one to see an aide to Vice President Dick Cheney.

The newly released records bring the total number of his known visits to seven.

One of Mr. Abramoff's visits, according to Secret Service logs, was on April 20, 2001, to see Cesar Conda, who was Mr. Cheney's assistant for domestic policy at the time.

Secret Service Reveals More Abramoff Visits (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 8, 2006

The Secret Service on Friday revealed four more visits to the White House in 2001 by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including one to see a domestic policy aide to Vice President Dick Cheney.

The newly released records of Abramoff's access to the White House bring the total number of his known visits to seven.

One Abramoff White House visit, according to Secret Service logs, was on April 20, 2001, to see Cesar Conda, at the time Cheney's assistant for domestic policy.

Five days after the Conda meeting, one of Abramoff's former lobbying colleagues, Patrick Pizzella, was nominated by the president as assistant secretary of labor. The Secret Service logs do not state why Abramoff met with Conda.

One log entry indicates Abramoff visited the White House residence on Dec. 10, 2001, for two hours, as part of a large holiday party.

The Secret Service entry for Abramoff's name that day reads, "POTUS," "WH," "RESIDENCE," and lists the number of people present as 326, according to the documents. POTUS refers to the president of the United States.

The Secret Service material surfaced as a result of lawsuits by the conservative organization Judicial Watch and the Democratic National Committee. An earlier Secret Service search turned up just two Abramoff White House visits, and a further search turned up the additional contacts.

Judicial Watch said the public has a right to know "why an admitted felon had appointments with the Bush White House." The DNC said it will aggressively pursue additional questions about visits to the White House by Abramoff and his lobbying associates.

The government is asking a judge to dismiss the lawsuits, but another group that is suing, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, says it will also seek more information on the visits.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty in an influence-peddling scandal and is cooperating with a wide-ranging Justice Department probe of alleged corruption on Capitol Hill and in the executive branch.

A former White House aide, David Safavian, was convicted in a trial last month for covering up his relationship with Abramoff. Safavian was the Bush administration's top procurement official until his arrest last year.

Abramoff's other previously undisclosed trips to the White House complex in 2001 were on March 1 and May 17. Both were to meetings in the Old Executive Office Building adjacent to the White House.

It has been previously known that Abramoff was in the White House on May 9, 2001, when President Bush had his photograph taken with an Indian tribal official who was an Abramoff client.

The Secret Service earlier disclosed White House visits by Abramoff on Jan. 20, 2004, the day Bush delivered his State of the Union address, and on March 6, 2001.

New Links Between Abramoff, White House (WP)

By Susan Schmidt And James V. Grimaldi

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

Lobbyist Jack Abramoff had a half-dozen White House appointments in the early months of the Bush administration, according to logs released yesterday by the U.S. Secret Service.

DOJ_NMG_0039614

The appointments included a meeting with a domestic policy aide to Vice President Cheney and a meeting in the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives attended by about 40 people. The logs also reflect that Abramoff attended one or more social events, as well as a gathering of Indian tribal officials and state legislators at which President Bush appeared.

The lobbyist, once one of the most powerful Republicans on K Street, pleaded guilty earlier this year to conspiracy and fraud. He is a cooperating witness in the Justice Department's wide-ranging investigation of corruption in Congress and the executive branch.

The Secret Service released the White House visit data yesterday in response to Freedom of Information Act requests and a lawsuit filed by the government watchdog group Judicial Watch.

In May, the Secret Service released partial data showing two White House visits by Abramoff. In a letter faxed to Judicial Watch yesterday, a Justice Department lawyer said that the Secret Service had recently learned of other visits when it "unexpectedly discovered computer files" containing entry and exit logs on the visits.

In one of the previously disclosed visits -- March 6, 2001 -- Abramoff met with presidential adviser Karl Rove in an unsuccessful effort to have two allies placed in Interior Department jobs. That visit appears to have been the only one with a senior official.

The new data, combined with the two visits disclosed in May, show that Abramoff had appointments to attend White House events or meetings on seven occasions -- six in 2001 and a seventh in January 2004, on Inauguration Day. The Secret Service said the data reflect appointments but "do not necessarily reflect actual visits to the White House complex."

Among those with whom Abramoff met in the spring of 2001 was Cesar Conda, then assistant to the vice president for domestic policy, and Catharine Ryun, executive assistant to the director of the faith-based office and daughter of Rep. Jim Ryun (R-Kan.).

Conda, now a lobbyist, said in an interview that he invited Abramoff to a "casual social lunch" at the White House mess. "It was so long ago I don't remember anything about it," Conda said. "He was just a guy that I knew from the Hill. I invited folks from around town, K Street, think tanks, to chitchat."

The purpose of a March 1, 2001, appointment from 4 to 6 p.m. could not be determined from the logs. An appointment on Dec. 10, 2001, appeared to have been a holiday party for 300 guests attended by the president.

U.S. To Investigate Witness Rape Charge (NOTP)

By Gwen Filosa, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, July 8, 2006

DA's investigator is focus of FBI probe

The U.S. Attorney's Office has issued grand jury subpoenas as part of a federal civil rights investigation into a complaint that Orleans Parish District Attorney Eddie Jordan's chief homicide investigator raped a witness he was assigned to protect.

Federal agents started the investigation last week after meeting with high-ranking New Orleans Police Department officials and Jordan, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Friday.

An unidentified woman in the state witness protection program told the NOPD's Public Integrity Bureau that Dwight Deal, a veteran homicide detective who joined Jordan's administration in June 2003 as the chief investigator for murder cases, raped her while she was under his watch.

Deal, 50, worked for more than 20 years with NOPD and at one time was among the most senior of homicide detectives, known for cracking murder cases and making them stick in court to win convictions. Deal played a key role in helping police solve and bring to court the culprits behind the 1997 triple murder at the French Quarter's Louisiana Pizza Kitchen, a case that sent Phillip Anthony to death row.

In June 2003, Deal retired from the NOPD and joined Jordan's staff. Deal was placed on paid administrative June 30, a move that adheres to the office policy, said Jordan spokeswoman Leatrice Dupre.

Jordan declined to discuss Deal, citing privacy laws that hinder employers from discussing work records.

A message left on Deal's work-issued cell phone was not returned immediately Friday.

In his announcement of the federal probe Friday, Letten made reference to the recent conviction of Henry A. Dillon III, the former New Orleans assistant city attorney convicted on federal civil rights charges for raping two young women who crossed paths with him while dealing with traffic tickets in 2004.

Dillon is "a serial rapist who abused his position as a public official in exploiting and brutalizing young women," Letten said in a statement. "In (the Deal) case, our federal civil rights investigation, consistent with federal law and policy, will be fair and even-handed, but also swift and decisive."

At trial, Dillon, 48, a politically connected lawyer with longtime ties to former Mayor Marc Morial, said that he had sex with three of the four women who testified but said they pursued him. The jury called it rape, and federal prosecutors lauded the verdict as a message to public officials.

Dillon is due in court Sept. 21 for sentencing before U.S. District Court Judge Lance Africk.

Letten would not give an exact date of when the Deal investigation started, but said it began after his office met with NOPD brass.

The witness who made the complaint was immediately relocated under the federal protection program, where she remains in a secret location, Letten said.

Letten said he told Jordan that his office would start a federal civil rights investigation into the matter.

"I welcomed his intervention in this matter and further noted that my office would be fully cooperative with his investigation," Jordan said in a statement Friday.

Special Agent in Charge James Bernazzani of the FBI said that anyone with information about this or any other civil rights matter can call the FBI at (504) 816-3000.

The case is being investigated by the FBI and the NOPD Public Integrity Bureau. Assistant U.S. attorneys assigned to the case include Mark Miller, supervisor of the Organized Crime and Racketeering Strike Force Unit, and veteran prosecutor Mike McMahon.

. . . . . .

Gwen Filosa can be reached at gfilosa@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3304.

Local Man Pleads Guilty To Filing False Disaster Claim (BRADV)

By Sonya Kimbrell, Advocate Staff Writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, July 8, 2006

A Baton Rouge man pleaded guilty Thursday to making a false claim for disaster relief benefits after Hurricane Katrina.

A grand jury indicted Terry Watson, 675 Wooddale Blvd., in March for making a false claim and for making false and fraudulent statements to the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

According to the indictment, Watson made a FEMA claim stating that his home had been damaged during Hurricane Katrina. He received a $2,000 check.

In the days after hurricanes Katrina and Rita, FEMA provided victims with expedited relief for food, clothing and shelter.

In his plea agreement, Watson pleaded guilty to false claim. The U.S. Attorney's Office agreed to drop the charge of making false and fraudulent statements.

Watson could be sentenced to up to five years in prison or fined $250,000 or both plus other court costs.

In September, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales created the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force. It is designed to investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes, such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud.

The task force includes members of the FBI, the Federal Trade Commission, the Postal Inspector's Office and the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys.

Story originally published in The Advocate

Rep. Jefferson Hires Lewinsky Spokeswoman (BRADV)

By Gerard Shields

Baton Rouge Advocate, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans, is beefing up his legal defense against bribery allegations, hiring a high-powered spokeswoman who has represented Monica Lewinsky and the family of Chandra Levy.

In a related matter, the U.S. Justice Department has subpoenaed Jefferson e-mails from before the Aug. 3 raids of his homes.

Judy Smith of the Washington firm, Impact Strategies, will join Jefferson's legal defense team.

"Judy will be answering all questions about legal issues," said Melanie Roussell, Jefferson's congressional spokeswoman, who will retain her role.

Smith, a lawyer, could not be reached for comment Friday. A call to her office went unreturned.

Likewise, Jefferson's Washington attorney, Robert Trout, could not be reached for comment. A call to his office went unreturned.

The hiring of Smith appears to be a move to bolster Jefferson's tarnished image, observers say.

Federal prosecutors accuse the 16-year congressman of demanding hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash for himself and his family in return for brokering communications deals in Africa in the first half of this decade.

The Justice Department says it has Jefferson on audiotape and videotape accepting a $100,000 bribe. A subsequent raid by FBI agents on Jefferson's Washington home on Aug. 3 found $90,000 placed in a freezer.

Two men have pleaded guilty to bribing Jefferson or aiding in a bribe. Jefferson has not been charged with a crime and has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing.

"This case is going to be in the public spotlight and you need a special kind of lawyer for that," John Samples, director of responsive government for the Cato Institute, said of the Smith hire.

Samples views Smith's hiring as a sign that Jefferson will not be making any plea agreements with the government. "This is a white-collar lawyer who knows how to handle these kinds of cases," he said.

Smith did media relations for President George H.W. Bush but is best known for her work with Lewinsky, an intern who admitted having an affair with President Clinton.

Smith also spoke for the family of Levy, an intern who contended she was having an affair with former U.S. Rep. Gary Condit of California. Levy was found murdered in a Washington park in 2002.

As a Bush spokeswoman, Smith aided in then-U.S. Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas' rebuttal of sexual harassment allegations from law professor Anita Hill.

In a related matter, as part of its daily activities before the July Fourth recess, the U.S. House of Representatives announced that e-mails were being subpoenaed from a House member.

Though the clerk did not mention Jefferson by name, the Capitol Hill newspaper, Roll Call, reported that the e-mails were Jefferson's and the retrieval was negotiated by the Justice Department and House lawyers for months. The sides agreed to a system that would allow Jefferson to review e-mails retrieved by federal prosecutors.

Jefferson recently filed a motion to retrieve material obtained by FBI agents on a May 20 raid of his office. Jefferson argued the search was unconstitutional because it violated a clause that protects the legislative branch from overreach by the executive branch. U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan is expected to rule on the matter soon.

CIVIL LAW:

Senators Query Boeing Settlement (FT)

By Doug Cameron And Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, July 8, 2006

Lawmakers have raised concerns over the tax treatment of Boeing's $615m potential settlement with the US government, which resolved a host of civil and criminal claims connected to the company's procurement practices.

In a letter last month to Alberto Gonzales, attorney-general, Republican senators Chuck Grassley, John McCain and John Warner said they were concerned that the $565m civil portion of the settlement could be structured in a way that would allow Boeing to make its payment tax deductible.

The senators also wanted to ensure that the settlement would not allow Boeing to pass the bulk of the settlement on to insurers.

The legislators gave the Justice department until Wednesday to provide an analysis of the general tax treatment of the settlement. The DoJ declined to comment.

Boeing yesterday said it did not know whether it would be able to write off any portion of the fine against tax. Stephanie Kirchgaessner, Washington, and Doug Cameron, Chicago

The Deficit Reduction Act? What Deficit Reduction Act? (NYT)

By Dorothy Samuels

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

Perhaps I shouldn't take these things personally, but reading over new legal filings by the Justice Department in an unusual, and unusually important, federal lawsuit challenging the validity of the phony Deficit Reduction Act that President Bush signed in February, it suddenly struck me: could it really be that everything I learned back in junior high school about the basic workings of American government was wrong?

Maybe not everything. But the Justice Department's reasoning for why the suit should be dismissed sharply conflicts with my understanding — and most Americans' understanding — of what it takes for a bill to become law. If that reasoning prevails, it will be very bad for democracy.

Brought by Public Citizen, and set to be heard on Monday, the case I'm referring to is one of a handful of pending suits seeking to block the law's unfair cuts in student loans, Medicaid and Medicare. It bases its argument on the most elemental constitutional violation imaginable: although the measure was signed by the president and approved by the Senate, it was never approved in the same form by the House.

This travesty began last December with an inadvertent clerical error after the Senate approved the bill by the narrowest of margins, with Vice President Dick Cheney breaking a tie. Owing to that accidental change, the version that passed the House by a mere two votes differed from the Senate measure. A provision on Medicare calls for covering the rental of certain medical equipment, like wheelchairs, for 36 months, instead of the 13 months in the Senate version. Although that may sound like a minor deviation, it adds up to a $2 billion difference.

Made aware of the discrepancy, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist apparently made a command decision not to try to fix it by having their chambers vote again, this time on the same measure. Given the closeness of the first votes, after all, there was no guarantee a rerun would end in passage. Besides, rank-and-file Republicans weren't exactly pounding on their leaders' doors to demand another chance to go on record in favor of deep spending cuts in popular programs benefiting the needy.

Instead, the leaders barged ahead. Mr. Hastert signed a statement with the president pro tempore of the Senate attesting that the act had been approved in identical form by both chambers when everyone knew that hadn't happened. As for President Bush, his hands are hardly clean. He was well aware of the constitutional defect but chose to ignore it and sign the bill anyway — a dismaying reminder that the president's instinct to cut constitutional corners isn't limited to the war on terror.

In briefs filed last week, the Justice Department does not dispute this rendition of what happened, or the constitutional rule against transmitting one-house bills to the president's desk. Instead it contends that a musty 1892 Supreme Court ruling requires courts to accept as fact Mr. Hastert's fictional certification that both chambers passed the same bill. In other words, to enact large budget cuts affecting millions of Americans, the House and Senate needn't bother to go through the tedious and politically fraught exercise of passing the same legislation. It suffices for leaders of each chamber to fudge and say it happened.

Obviously, the government lawyers making these claims never took a class with my eighth-grade social studies teacher, Mr. Pagliaro. He told students it takes an approving vote of both the House and Senate for a bill to be enacted, and he cited what still seems to be pretty reliable authority: it says so in the Constitution.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ_NMG_0039618

Judge Ends City-Chabad Feud (MH)

By Todd Wright

The Miami Herald, July 8, 2006

It's finally over.

A federal judge approved a legal settlement Friday between the city of Hollywood and an Orthodox synagogue, officially ending the five-year feud.

The unexpected close to the case came a day after six angry neighbors of the synagogue filed a motion to join the case at the last minute in hopes of dismantling the settlement, which would allow the congregation to stay in two single-family homes permanently.

The religious group has used the houses as a synagogue since 2001, and their presence has sparked a debate over the rights of people to worship where they choose versus a city's right to protect residential neighborhoods from noise, trash and traffic.

After several pretrial defeats, city commissioners offered a settlement that will pay the synagogue $2 million and not only allow the congregation to stay but also to expand to three other houses in the Hollywood Hills neighborhood.

Synagogue leaders accepted the deal Wednesday.

"I'm extremely elated for the synagogue," said Franklin Zemel, attorney for the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch. ``And I am extremely pleased for the citizens of Hollywood that they will finally have a constitutional code, which benefits everybody."

The deal means the city and Commissioner Sal Oliveri will avoid facing a federal religious discrimination lawsuit from the Chabad and the U.S. Justice Department.

The city also is required to rewrite the zoning criteria used to grant permits to religious groups that want to operate in single-family districts.

In June, U.S. District Judge Joan Lenard ruled the old criteria were unconstitutional.

Lenard, who was scheduled to start vacation after Friday, had canceled a Thursday hearing that could have announced an end to the case. Later that day, neighbors requested they be allowed to intervene in the case, claiming the city and Chabad did not take into account the impact of the settlement on their properties.

The homeowners -- Lisa Self, Heidi O'Sheehan, Richard and Carolyn Johnson, and Patrick and Eva Petrillo -- were vocal opponents of the Chabad. The families all live within 300 feet of the synagogue.

Their argument did not sway Lenard, who already had postponed the start of trial several times to give the city and the Chabad time to agree to a settlement.

NO RESIDENT INPUT

"I think the residents should have a voice in how their neighborhood is going to change," said Vincent Vaccarella, the attorney representing the residents. ``The settlement gives the Chabad carte blanche to expand in the neighborhood. They shouldn't be given unlimited authority to do what hasn't been allowed in that neighborhood."

Vaccarella said he has received no response to his motion to enter the case, but he surmised from the judge's settlement order that she was denying it.

In 2001, the same group of residents, along with other neighbors, bombarded City Hall with complaints about noise, illegally parked cars and overflowing trash bins.

Commissioners responded by trying to kick the synagogue out of the neighborhood.

Oliveri, who has been silent in recent weeks about the issue, ordered code enforcement and police officers to beef up patrols at the two houses.

The city eventually filed a lawsuit against the Chabad, claiming the religious group violated zoning rules.

SUIT/COUNTERSUIT

The Chabad countered with several lawsuits of their own, claiming discrimination. The Justice Department joined the fray on the side of the synagogue.

Then came Lenard's pretrial rulings, which severely hampered the city's defense.

Commissioner Keith Wasserstrom pushed for the city to settle instead of going to trial and ultimately came up with the proposal that was accepted.

"I am thrilled to hear it's over," he said. ``We can finally get this dark part of our history behind us and move on to a new era."

County Jail On Notice After Probe (TRECAK)

By Rusty Garrett

Times Record (Fort Smith, Arkansas), July 8, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice has put Sebastian County on notice that conditions at the county jail violate the constitutional rights of inmates confined there.

A 23-page report on the findings of a 2005 investigation said the jail fails "to provide for inmates' serious medical needs, serious mental health needs, right to protection from physical harm and right to be confined in sanitary and safe environmental conditions."

The assessment is based upon an inspection of the jail that was performed May 9-12 last year. It included an on-site inspection of the jail as well as interviews with the sheriff, jail staff, medical care providers and inmates.

The report was delivered to the county in May.

In the area of medical care, the study is critical of the jail intake process, which it says "fails to identify inmates' urgent or ongoing health needs, and fails to provide routine health assessments to determine the health status or chronic health care needs of inmates."

The study said the county does not train jail staff to identify symptoms of drug and alcohol withdrawal, communicable diseases, acute or chronic illness and potential suicide risk. Ongoing medical needs of chronic illnesses do not receive care and treatment, according to the study.

The study is critical of the county's "fee for service" program, in which inmates are charged for treatment and the ability to pay "is often a determining factor in whether care...will be provided," the report says.

The county is also faulted for inadequate medical staffing by a nurse, who works a 40-hour week and a physician, who sees inmates about a half day every other week and who does not take emergency calls from the jail.

Deficiencies in mental health care are also listed. The report said the problem stems from failure to contract to provide psychiatric services for inmates who need them.

The report criticizes "unreasonable use of force" at the jail, including use of pepper spray and tasers, and says those incidents are the result of understaffing, with too few staff given the number of inmates and the design of the jail.

Inmates are not adequately protected from environmental hazards, according to the report. It says inmates are exposed to biohazards, such as blood, feces, vomit and urine when they are asked to clean up spills and not provided protective equipment. Inmates working in the laundry department are ordered to wash contaminated clothing with other clothes, rather than discarding it.

The report concludes with 20 recommended remedial measures. It expresses a willingness to "work with the county in an amicable and cooperative fashion to resolve our outstanding concerns" regarding the jail.

The document also contains a warning that failure to "reach a resolution" could result in a lawsuit to correct deficiencies identified in the report. It said attorneys assigned to the investigation "will be contacting the facility's attorney to discuss this matter in further detail."Sebastian County Judge David Hudson said he too is hopeful the county can resolve the concerns of the Justice Department amicably. He said the county operated its jail under a federal consent order once before. It covered a period from 1982, when the jail was housed on the top floor of the courthouse, to 1994, when the current detention center opened.

Hudson said Jason Owens with Rainwater, Holt and Sexton, the law firm that performs risk management services for the county, has been in discussion with officials of the Justice Department and others regarding the case. An attempt to contact Owens on Thursday afternoon was unsuccessful.

Hudson said he felt the level of medical services indicated in the report was beyond the services a county jail would be expected to provide. He said the policies and procedures of the jail have been developed and refined several times in recent years following the recommendations of consultants. “We’ve had several outside view of jail operation and we’ve done the best we can to implement those,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0039620

“We want to abide by the law and as far as I know we are,” Hudson said. But he said unlike the federal government, the county cannot operate on a deficit budget.

He said he looks at the report as “an opportunity to review operations and improve procedures” at the jail. “If we can do it without significant cost and impact we can turn this into a positive for all concerned.” He added, “there is only so much we can allocate” toward jail operations without cutting services in other areas or searching for new sources of revenue.”

The county pledges 44 percent of its 1 percent sales tax revenue to the jail. The jail’s $3.5 million annual budget represents about 19 percent of the county general fund.

Hudson pointed out the county is expanding the jail to increase capacity by 96 beds and expand administrative space. The county is spending about $4 million on the 26,005 square-foot expansion, which will give the jail a total capacity of 356 beds, which is about what the jail is now housing. Accompanying the construction will be a $350,000 increase in personnel and operational expenses to handle the increased population.

Sheriff Frank Atkinson also sees money as an obstacle to operating the jail at the level the report anticipates.

“I don’t know how in the world we can hire a psychiatrist 24/7 and that is basically what they are asking for. I don’t know any place that does that,” Atkinson said.

Atkinson also defends requiring inmates help pay for medical and dental services that taxpayers otherwise would fund. He said the policy was established as much to discourage unnecessary visits to the doctor as it was to cover costs. “When they found out it was going to cost them $10 to see a doctor, about 75 percent of them weren’t sick anymore,” he said.

He said he was also skeptical of why it took a full year to issue the report, given the reported severity of conditions. He said he suspected federal inspectors “were sent here to find something, so they were determined they were going to find something.” He maintains the Sebastian County Detention Center is “one of the best around.”

He also pointed out the jail passes the muster of the U.S. Marshal Service, which could send inmates in its custody anywhere but contracts with Sebastian County to house its prisoners.

The sheriff said some changes in jail operations were made after the study and some of the conditions outlined in the report no longer exist. He did not elaborate. Atkinson said the jail staff and the county are willing to work with the Justice Department on developing a correction plan.

NAACP Wants Quick Renewal Of Voting Rights Act (CPC)

Charleston (SC) Post & Courier, July 8, 2006

NAACP leaders want to jumpstart renewal of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which stalled in the U.S. House last month.

The landmark civil rights act, fueled by bipartisan support, was expected to easily chug through a 25-year extension.

But on June 10 the House Judiciary Committee, responding to a letter from 42 Republican congressmen from 14 states, put renewal on hold indefinitely.

The lawmakers wanted discussion on and possibly amendments to two sections of the act. One of those sections requires nine mostly Southern states, including South Carolina, to get approval from the U.S. Justice Department on any changes in electoral practices. Another requires certain jurisdictions to offer language assistance to citizens with limited English skills.

Local and national officials called a press conference Friday at the Charleston branch office of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to encourage a swift extension of the act, which was designed to prevent racial discrimination at the polls.

The Rev. Nelson Rivers III, NAACP chief operating officer and a Lowcountry native, called the act "the most important and effective civil rights legislation ever passed in the United States of America."

Dot Scott, president of the group's Charleston branch, said the legislators who are holding up the extension want to add amendments that would weaken it.

DOJ_NMG_0039621

One of the sections that riles lawmakers requires Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia to get Justice Department approval on voting changes. The requirement unfairly singles out and holds accountable states that practiced discriminatory voting policies decades ago, legislators said.

On Friday, Scott said "prejudice along the lines of race and class is still alive and chillingly well in our community, state and nation, and the protections offered by the Voting Rights Act are still needed and should not be weakened."

She also said that U.S. Rep. James Clyburn, D-S.C., already has stated unequivocal support for renewal of the law. And she called upon the Charleston area's other representative, Henry Brown, to do the same.

Brown, a Republican, did not sign the letter to House Judiciary Committee. It holds no South Carolina signatures.

But he said Friday that he thinks "the Voting Rights Act is flawed" because it's based on 1964 voter turnout data. "Things weren't good in 1964," he said, "but race relations have improved."

He supports discussion on the act and would like amendments added to the section that requires special actions for Southern states. "It's a stigma," he said.

He'd like to see the law updated, he said, and he'd like it to spell out a way that Southern states can demonstrate that they are no longer discriminating at the polls. When a state can demonstrate that, he said, it should no longer have to live under the thumb of the Justice Department.

As it stands now, the law is "skewed against the Southern states," he said.

The Rev. Joseph Darby, a vice president for the Charleston Branch NAACP, said the states specified in the act need Justice Department scrutiny because historically they had enacted laws and policies that limited blacks' rights in state elections.

Rivers said the scrutiny is needed because "South Carolina has no history of doing the right thing by black folks or poor folks because it's the right thing to do."

The racial make-up of Charleston County Council changed dramatically after the Justice Department and others sued the council alleging its at-large system discriminated against black voters, he said.

In the first election under the new single-member-district system in 2004, four seats were up for grabs. Black candidates won three of them.

Before that there had been only three black members on the council since it was formed in 1949.

Rivers said that in Charleston County, "It's clear that people still vote on the basis of race."

Clyburn said he's not sure when the House will revisit the act. It's a priority for the Democrats, he said. "We're pressing for this every day."

Voting Trial In Osceola Postponed 2 Months (ORS)

By Mark Pino, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, July 8, 2006

Osceola County won a two-month delay Friday in the trial of a federal voting-rights lawsuit.

Still, officials said they remain focused on defending their countywide method of electing commissioners, not settling the case with a compromise.

"Right now, it is too early to pursue options until the judge comes out with a ruling," commission Chairman Paul Owen said Friday. "There have been no negotiations at this time with anybody. At this time, we are focused on defending ourselves."

The ruling to delay the trial until Sept. 18 was granted by U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell in Orlando, a day after the motion was filed and on the heels of the first public comment about the suit by a commissioner. The trial had been scheduled to begin July 19.

County Commissioner Ken Shipley gave the audience at a Republican women's club meeting Thursday night a rundown of possible outcomes to the suit brought by the Justice Department, including expanding the commission from five to seven members and creating a combination of at-large and single-member districts.

The suit alleges that the current at-large system dilutes Hispanics' voting power and prevents them from electing candidates of their choice.

But Shipley said Friday that everything he told the crowd was speculative and not an indication of the county's strategy.

"My number one concern was to bring the community together," Shipley said. "I said that this will be a strong test of community, and when we are done, we have to make sure we still have a community."

Shipley said the judge could order five single-member districts with all five up for election at the same time. Or he might increase the number of districts, and the county could appeal whatever ruling the court makes.

"Right now, it is all out there on the table," Shipley said. "It all comes down to a federal judge's ruling. We have not decided on all this."

Lawyers for the county asked the judge for a delay in order to take depositions for close to 30 potential witnesses in the wake of a three-day hearing that resulted in Presnell's June 26 injunction halting commission elections. Presnell's ruling to move the trial to September came after a telephone hearing Friday.

There remains one unanswered question for experts to answer, the county said in paperwork asking for the delay.

It "concerns whether a constitutionally proper and proportionate district can be drawn using 2006 population and registration data which still provides for a Hispanic majority. To this point, no expert on either side has tried to do this, and defendants submit it cannot be done," the legal filing said.

The county argued it would take time for experts to flesh out that issue for trial.

Owen said he has no personal preference for single-member or at-large districts but that he has an obligation to respect the wishes voters expressed 10 years ago.

"For now, the decision to make is to uphold the intent of the voters," Owen said, referring to a 1996 referendum to return to at-large voting, which passed in every precinct of the county. "We're not thinking about anything until the attorneys come back with a judge's ruling."

Armando Ramirez, an activist who wants single-member districts, on Friday rejected any compromise that would include single-member and at-large districts.

"Why should we give up the hard-fought victory for racial equality for the sake of accommodating the commissioners to expedite the elections?" Ramirez asked.

When told of the trial's delay, Ramirez noted it would be past the qualifying period and primaries for other races.

"I don't like it," he said. "It will prolong the suspension of the elections. That's my main concern. They're going to need time to revamp the whole system of districts. I'll venture to say new districts will be drawn, and that's going to take time."

A new group called the Non-Partisan Concerned Citizens for Our Right to Vote plans to meet Monday in Kissimmee with the objective of having the lawsuit dropped and elections held as scheduled -- including a September primary.

"The idea of having my vote removed and given to somebody else really upset me," said Donna Sykes, who was on a committee that reviewed the county's charter in 2003-04. She said she is one of about 50 people involved in the group, which is not a registered political action committee.

"Hopefully, the people who filed this suit will be embarrassed about taking our vote away," she added. "We want to encourage the Justice Department to drop the lawsuit."

A judge delays it until Sept. 18, and county leaders say they have no intention of compromising.

Mark Pino can be reached at mpino@orlandosentinel.com or 407-931-5935.

World Cup Spotlight Exposes Sex Trafficking (KCS)

By Pete Grathoff And J. Brady Mccollough

The Kansas City Star, July 8, 2006

HAMBURG, Germany | - HAMBURG, Germany | With games, amusement rides and food, the World Cup Fan Fest is made for families looking for fun between soccer games.

Just three blocks away, down the Reeperbahn, businesses offer a different kind of fun. That's where you'll find Mandi, a 26-year-old prostitute. She's 5 feet 10 with blue eyes and blond hair, which she keeps in a long, flowing ponytail. She wears a white tank top, green shorts with "1954" written across her bottom, and stockings.

Mandi works the corner of Reeperbahn and Davidstrasse, in the heart of the red light district in the St. Pauli section of Hamburg. She and a dozen other women work across the street from a police station.

DOJ_NMG_0039623

"I have a friend, and she made it (as a prostitute) for a long time," says Mandi, who was born in East Germany and came to Hamburg to be a nurse. "I asked her about it, and now it's been four years. It's because we can charge what we want, and we can pick who we want."

Here in Germany, prostitution is legal. Here, there are no pimps. They are sex businessmen, supported by the government with the benefits of a legitimate profession. With a climate like this already in place, it was widely predicted in the months before the World Cup that tens of thousands of women would be trafficked to Germany to fill the brothels.

"Trafficking is a major worldwide problem," the Rev. Carrie Pemberton, CEO of Churches Alert to Sex Trafficking Across Europe, wrote to The Star in an e-mail. "We are aware that there are (nongovernmental organizations) in Germany and the German police themselves who have been very (concerned) about this problem during the last few weeks.

"We have been working with this issue since 2003 and know of definite examples where sporting events have been used for trafficking women into and across Europe for sexual exploitation."

For those reasons, human trafficking has become a hot-button topic at the World Cup, as the U.S. State Department, the European Parliament and countless nongovernmental organizations pleaded with the German government to implement a plan to stop the traffickers.

Mandi says she hasn't seen any increase in trafficked women.

"Business is a little bit better, but not a lot," Mandi says. "The papers said a lot of Polish and Russian girls would come, but I don't see that or hear that."

Most reports out of Germany back Mandi's assessment. Christian Sachs, a spokesman for the German Interior Ministry, told the International Herald Tribune this week that "it looks as if the fears that were mentioned — that the World Cup would lead to a rise in cases of forced prostitution and sex trafficking — have fortunately not been the case."

The biggest problem in the fight against trafficking is that there's no true way of measuring success or failure. Everything is an estimate.

Ambassador John Miller, the U.S. State Department's director of the office that monitors and combats trafficking, says there is no way to know how many women were taken involuntarily into Germany for the World Cup.

"I hope the reports will come back favorably," Miller says, "and if they do, the NGOs that raised the issue, the delegates to the European Parliament and the German government can all take credit. It's too early to do that, though."

An age-old problem

Miller says his goal is "the abolition of 21st century slavery."

Jolene Smith, the director of Free the Slaves, a nongovernmental organization devoted to fighting human trafficking, calls it "the modern-day slave trade."

"The trade of human beings is as old as human beings themselves," Smith says. "We see the buying and selling of people all the way back to ancient Egypt. Slavery never really stopped."

Smith says trafficking increased after World War II for three reasons: the population explosion in the regions of the world that could least absorb the increase, the movement of people from agricultural areas to the industrial cities, and government corruption around the globe.

Miller blames globalization, the increase in plane travel, television and the Internet.

In the 1980s, faith-based and feminist organizations began encountering trafficking victims. They sounded the alarm for many years before the U.S. government passed a trafficking victim protection act in 2000.

The act made trafficking a federal crime in the United States, created punishments, and provided funding for the Justice Department and nongovernmental organizations to fight the problem. The act also created the Traffic in Persons Office in the U.S. State Department, headed by Miller.

Each year, the office produces a country-by-country analysis of how well nations are doing in combating trafficking. Despite its legalized prostitution, Germany is among the best countries.

The 2006 report states that Germany identified 972 trafficking victims in 2004 and that "the government of Germany fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking." But it also says that "Germany is a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual and labor exploitation."

DOJ_NMG_0039624

Janice Raymond, co-executive director of the Coalition Against Trafficking in Women, goes further. She calls Germany, which has an estimated 400,000 prostitutes, compared with 20,000 to 40,000 in neighboring France, a magnet for traffickers.

"Police are no longer involved in prostitution," Raymond says. "The victim has to prove that she was forced and that she was trafficked, which is an immense burden."

Raymond estimates that 90 percent of the prostitutes in Germany are from other countries. That's why she sent the signatures of 150,000 concerned people to German embassies all over the world before the World Cup.

American groups aren't alone in taking action.

At the start of the World Cup, some Hamburg churches began information campaigns about trafficking. On the tournament's opening Saturday, a large television screen broadcast the England-Paraguay game outside St. Marien Church, which handed out fliers describing the troubles for the women, who often think they are immigrating for domestic or waitress jobs.

Even coach Raymond Domenech of France, whose team will play Italy on Sunday for the World Cup, felt compelled to weigh in.

"It is truly scandalous," Domenech told France Inter radio before the World Cup started. "People are talking about women, importing them to satisfy the base instincts of people associated with football. It is humiliating enough for me that football is linked with alcohol and violence. But this is worse. It is slaves that will come and be put into houses. Human beings are being talked about like cattle, and football is linked with that."

Window shopping

Sex is a huge seller in Germany. Some newspapers and magazines show topless women, and phone sex is advertised on television with women stripping. It's no wonder places like St. Pauli are booming. It would be impossible to kick a soccer ball here and not hit an X-rated video store or topless bar.

Herbertstrasse is only a block in length, with partitions on each side warning that women and boys under 18 are not allowed. Inside the houses, women sit in front of large windows that face the street, wearing little more than the smiles they flash when someone walks by. It's a base form of window shopping, although the girls do their best to convince the men to spend 50 euros (about $65) for a half hour of "fun."

Turn right at the end of Herbertstrasse and there's Hans-Albers Platz, where the girls are dressed like you might anywhere in public: jeans or skirts. The price is only 30 euros here, but the women are more aggressive, coming at men one after another. The brick-lined street is filled with cigarette butts, shards of glass and beer bottle caps.

It's only a block back to the Reeperbahn, where a line of 10 women is cooing to potential customers. Mandi plies her trade just a block away, with her friend Andrea.

"We can go across the street to the hotel," Andrea, who also has blond hair and blue eyes, says to a man. "We don't have pimps here by the police station."

Mandi also has a hotel room across the road, which she rents monthly. She doesn't live there; it's where she does her job.

Because prostitution is legal, the women must register and pay taxes. They get health insurance, and Mandi is tested for AIDS every two months.

"Our hygiene is very good," she says, "better than when you find a girl in a bar."

Mandi says that many American businessmen have been with her through the years, and U.S. soccer fans are now among the clientele.

Have any of her customers mentioned soccer this month?

"Oh yeah," Mandi says with a smile, "every one."

Kennedy Says San Diego May Leave Cross Standing On City Property (LAW/AP)

The Associated Press

AP, July 8, 2006

San Diego won a Supreme Court justice's backing Friday to leave a large cross standing on city property.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said a temporary stay he authorized last week should protect the cross until the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, based in San Francisco, hears arguments this year in a long-running dispute over the cross.

DOJ_NMG_0039625

Kennedy also took the unusual step of explaining his decision, in a four-page opinion, and suggested that he and his colleagues may be interested in a broader review of the case.

"The equities here support preserving the status quo while the city's appeal proceeds," Kennedy wrote. "Compared to the irreparable harm of altering the memorial and removing the cross, the harm in a brief delay pending the Court of Appeals' expedited consideration of the case seems slight."

A lower court judge had ordered the city of San Diego to remove the cross or be fined $5,000 a day. The judge ruled that the cross, a symbol of Christianity, was an unconstitutional endorsement of a specific religion.

The 29-foot cross, on a half-acre site atop Mount Soledad in the La Jolla area just outside San Diego, had been contested in 1989 by atheist Philip Paulson.

The Supreme Court refused three years ago to get involved in the dispute between Paulson and the city. Since then, Congress agreed to make the area a national veterans memorial, and San Diego residents voted to transfer the land to the federal government. Paulson is a veteran of the Vietnam War.

Kennedy, a California native, said "Congress' evident desire to preserve the memorial makes it substantially more likely" the high court would agree to hear the case now.

Judge Blocks Requirement In Georgia For Voter ID (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

ATLANTA, July 7 — For the second time, a judge has blocked a Republican-sponsored effort to require Georgia voters to present government-issued photo identification cards before they can cast a ballot.

The judge, Melvin K. Westmoreland of Fulton County Superior Court, said the requirement violated the State Constitution by placing an undue burden on the fundamental right to vote.

Although the legislature passed the requirement, Judge Westmoreland said, such a change would require citizens to approve an amendment to the State Constitution, which now says only that voters must be 18 years old, mentally competent and state residents.

The judge's temporary restraining order was in response to a legal challenge against the requirement filed by former Gov. Roy E. Barnes, a Democrat. Mr. Barnes argued that the requirement would make it harder for minorities, the elderly and the poor to vote.

State officials immediately vowed to appeal the ruling to the Georgia Supreme Court. Gov. Sonny Perdue, a Republican who signed the measure into law earlier this year, said it was needed to ensure the integrity of the ballot box.

"The sad fact is that dead people have cast votes in Georgia and — before this law is implemented — there was no way to tell how many deceased voters, felons or even illegal aliens may have been casting ballots in Georgia elections," Mr. Perdue said.

The law also faces a challenge in federal court, where a consortium of voter rights groups have sued on the grounds that it also violates the United States Constitution.

Since it was first passed in March 2005, the voter ID law has whipsawed between the legislature and the courts, with lawmakers struggling to find a way to put the measure into effect without violating federal or state voter protections. Its first version required voters to have a driver's license or other government ID, or to buy a special state card.

That law was struck down in October by a federal judge, who said the requirement that voters buy the card amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax.

The law was then rewritten by the Republican-led legislature to make the ID cards free. But the new version continued to draw strong criticism. Civil rights groups say those who lack a photo identification are more likely to be black or Hispanic, poor, or elderly — groups that traditionally cast their ballots for Democratic candidates.

"The law continues to impose an unnecessary burden on voters and does nothing to protect against fraud in voting," said Neil Bradley, associate director of the American Civil Liberties Union Voting Rights Project in Atlanta. Secretary of State Cathy Cox, a Democrat who oversees Georgia's elections and who is also vying for the Democratic nomination for governor, said there had not been a proven case of voter fraud in the state in nearly a decade. Her office has estimated that some 676,000 otherwise eligible voters lack a driver's license or state-issued photo ID.

DOJ_NMG_0039626

Without dwelling on the political implications of the law, Judge Westmoreland agreed with critics who said the legislature had pushed past constitutional protections in passing the measure.

"The General Assembly has wide latitude to legislate unless it undertakes to act where the Georgia Constitution enumerates a clear and unmistakable right to Georgia's citizens," the judge wrote. "It is a given that any illegal restriction of the fundamental right to vote is prohibited."

Mr. Perdue said the state's appeal would rest on ballot security. "I respectfully disagree with Judge Westmoreland and believe that Georgia's law is not only constitutional, but a common sense, prudent protection of the election process," he said.

The restraining order means the law will not be in effect for the state's primaries on July 18. He referred the matter back to state court for a civil trial.

Judge Issues Restraining Order Ga. ID Law (AP-Y2)

By Shannon Mccaffrey, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 8, 2006

With less than two weeks to go before the July 18 primary, a judge Friday issued a restraining order blocking Georgia's voter ID law, saying that requiring photos as proof of identity is an unconstitutional burden.

Superior Court Judge Melvin Westmoreland said in a sharply worded written ruling that the Legislature doesn't have the authority to enforce the law and an amendment to the state Constitution would be required instead.

The law, he said, "unduly burdens the fundamental right to vote rather than regulate it."

The law requires that every voter who casts a ballot in person provide a valid, government-issued photo ID. The state made such IDs available throughout the state, but former Georgia Gov. Roy Barnes, a Democrat, argued in court Thursday on behalf of two residents that the law would keep poor, elderly and minority voters from the polls.

Barnes said Friday he was pleased with the ruling.

"I think what we heard today loud and clear is don't allow the vagaries of political partisanship to change the basic fundamental rights of our people," he said. "All this law did was create a bureaucracy and a burden to vote."

The state plans to appeal the ruling to the state Supreme Court.

"Democracy only works because people have trust in the integrity of the ballot box," said Republican Gov. Sonny Perdue, who signed the voter ID measure into law earlier this year. "I respectfully disagree with Judge Westmoreland, and believe that Georgia's law is not only constitutional, but a common sense, prudent protection of the election process."

The 17 forms of identification — some with photos and some without — that had been allowed in previous elections can be used at the polls for the primary, Westmoreland ruled. Voters who lack one of those IDs can also continue to attest to their identity under oath, pending further court action.

Westmoreland referred the case back to the trial judge in a case Barnes filed on behalf of two people who he said lacked the photo ID needed to vote. No further hearings were immediately scheduled.

Georgia's Republican-led Legislature first adopted a voter ID law in 2005, but a federal judge blocked its enforcement, saying it amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax. Early this year, lawmakers amended the law to make the IDs free and to ensure they are available in each of the state's 159 counties.

A separate, federal challenge to the voter ID law is also pending. Arguments in that case were scheduled for Wednesday.

ANTITRUST:

Judge Looks Into Modifying Terms Of 2 Phone Mergers (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039627

WASHINGTON, July 7 — A federal district judge in Washington is considering the imposition of major modifications to the two largest telephone mergers in history: SBC Communication's acquisition of AT&T and Verizon's purchase of MCI.

In a surprising order issued Friday afternoon, Judge Emmet G. Sullivan raised a series of questions about the Bush administration's review of the two deals that he said should be answered by the Justice Department and the phone companies at a hearing next week.

Both deals have already closed, and lawyers said that the judge could not unravel them, although he could try to impose significant conditions or divestitures.

The proceedings will probably shed light on the administration's antitrust enforcement program at a time when officials have put up virtually no roadblocks to deals and imposed few restrictions in other areas of antitrust law.

Still, the proceedings could affect the government's review of BellSouth's proposed acquisition by AT&T, the name the company took after AT&T was swallowed by SBC. The proceedings are also the first significant test of changes in the law that have given federal judges greater authority to scrutinize antitrust settlements.

Federal judges have been examining such settlements since the 1970's, when they were given the authority under the Tunney Act, which was adopted in response to the scandal involving the Nixon administration's decision to settle an antitrust proceeding against ITT.

Ever since a federal appeals court ruled in 1995 that Judge Stanley J. Sporkin of Federal District Court had acted outside of his authority in striking down a proposed antitrust agreement between the government and Microsoft, judges have generally approved settlements with relatively little scrutiny. But in 2004, Congress gave judges greater latitude to consider such deals.

In his order Friday, Judge Sullivan asked the lawyers to address what authority he had to question the settlements. He then raised several questions that suggested he had concerns with the settlements.

"Through the eyes of a layperson, the mergers, in and of themselves, appear to be against public interest given the apparent loss in competition," he wrote. "In layperson's terms, why isn't that the case?"

Another question he posed asked, "What consideration should the court give the arguments of the attorney general of New York, Elliot Spitzer, that the mergers will adversely affect digital subscriber lines (DSL) and the Internet backbone?"

While he could ultimately reject the deals, lawyers involved said they did not expect it would unravel them. At most, they said, a rejection could lead to changes in the settlements and possible divestitures, although the government and phone companies would probably appeal any decision that sought to rewrite the deals substantially.

Challenges to the two telephone deals have been filed by Mr. Spitzer and by organizations representing smaller rivals, some of whom buy the lines of the telephone companies at wholesale rates and then resell them. The companies have asked the court to find that the deals are not in the public interest because the Justice Department failed to force the companies to shed some overlapping assets.

The top lawyer for the companies challenging the settlements has been Gary L. Reback, a California lawyer who was the intellectual and tactical leader in the effort in the 1990's by a group of companies that persuaded the government to prosecute Microsoft for antitrust violations.

In a court brief filed last month, Mr. Reback attacked the phone companies and the Justice Department.

"At issue is judicial review of the successful efforts of the two largest local telephone monopolists, SBC and Verizon, aided and abetted by the current administration of the antitrust division of the Department of Justice, to reconstitute as a nationwide local and long-distance duopoly what was formally the Bell System monopoly," he wrote.

The Bush administration said that it had carefully examined the deals and ordered the appropriate divestitures. It said the judge's authority to review the government's handling of the deals was limited.

"The purpose of a Tunney Act proceeding is for a court to examine the proposed remedy, and determine whether it is in the public interest," the Justice Department said in its brief. "It is not for a court to reinvestigate the underlying merger at the behest of disappointed competitors or put the Department of Justice on trial to justify its prosecutorial decision making."

Rubber Conspiracy Alleged (KNOXNS/AP)

By Erik Schelzig, Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0039628

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), July 8, 2006

Tire companies accuse chemical maker of fixing prices

NASHVILLE - Three tire companies are suing rubber-chemicals maker Chemtura Corp. in federal court in Nashville, seeking refunds and triple damages for goods purchased during a global price-fixing conspiracy.

Middlebury, Conn.-based Chemtura, which last year changed its name from Crompton Corp., has pleaded guilty in a federal case and has been fined by European regulators for its role in artificially boosting prices of chemicals used to make rubber between 1995 and 2001.

The lawsuit was filed late last week by the Nashville-based North American subsidiaries of Japanese tire maker Bridgestone Corp.; tire retread company Bandag Inc. of Muscatine, Iowa; and Pirelli Tire LLC of Rome, Ga.

Chemtura and subsidiary Uniroyal Chemical Corp. are named as defendants.

"Defendants conspired in a global price-fixing scheme that had the direct and substantial effect of keeping prices paid by purchasers in the United States artificially high," the lawsuit states.

The U.S. Justice Department and European regulators began their investigation into several rubber companies in 2002. Chemtura pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in San Francisco in 2004 and was fined $50 million.

The European Commission in December levied a $91 million fine on Flexsys NV, Bayer AG and Chemtura for breaking European Union antitrust rules by secretly agreeing to control both the European and global markets for rubber chemicals.

European regulators said they believed collusion may have been taking place as far back as the 1970s.

The tire companies in the Nashville lawsuit are seeking a return of the full amount paid for any goods bought during the conspiracy and "treble damages to remedy injuries they sustained as a result of defendants' illegal activities."

The companies said they bought "hundreds of millions of dollars" of rubber chemicals from the defendants and their fellow conspirators. Specific figures are not listed.

Chemtura last year agreed to pay $62 million to settle a class-action lawsuit over the price-fixing conspiracy in federal court in San Francisco. The three companies in the Nashville lawsuit were not participants in the California litigation.

Bridgestone has already settled with other companies involved in the conspiracy but couldn't reach an agreement with Chemtura, said spokesman Dan MacDonald.

"You always want to see if you can resolve things in the fastest, most effective, most efficient way," MacDonald said. "We've just been unable to reach a settlement."

Chemtura spokeswoman Debra Durbin said the company has not seen the complaint, hasn't been served and is unable to comment.

ENVIRONMENT:

Feds Allow BP To Delay Testing (AP)

By Matt Volz, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, July 8, 2006

'Gunk' blocking Prudhoe Bay transit pipelines

JUNEAU, Alaska - Too much sediment had built up inside two Prudhoe Bay transit pipelines for BP Exploration (Alaska) Inc. to safely run sensors to detect corrosion levels within an ordered timeline, the head of the federal agency demanding the tests said Friday.

The head of the U.S. Transportation Department's Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration says he will permit a delay of the tests for an undetermined length of time.

"We would not allow it to continue to operate if we didn't think it was safe," said Administrator Thomas Barrett. "In the long term, it's not a good solution. We've got to get the sensors through there."

The agency in March ordered that three low-pressure transit pipelines in Prudhoe Bay be inspected with an internal sensing device known as a "smart pig" within three months, putting the deadline at June 15.

DOJ_NMG_0039629

The order came as a result of the largest oil spill in North Slope history, in which an estimated 201,000 gallons of oil and liquids leaked over several days and was not discovered until March 2.

BP, which operates the nation's largest oil field, last month asked to postpone the tests; the request was denied.

One of the three transit lines was cleaned with an internal scraper pig last month and then inspected with the smart pig, in compliance with the order. But the other two lines, one containing the source of the leak and which is not operational, hold too many accumulated solids to run the scraper pig so the smart pig can get through.

The danger is that the scraper pig could push high levels of sediment into the Trans-Alaskan Pipeline System downstream of the transit lines, possibly affecting the operations of Prudhoe Bay and the main pipeline.

Complicating the cleaning and testing of the line that leaked is a federal Justice Department subpoena requiring that BP remove a 6-foot section of the pipeline intact.

"We are trying to work through that," BP spokesman Daren Beaudo said.

A federal grand jury is investigating the spill.

Barrett was in Anchorage and Prudhoe Bay this week to inspect the oil field's pipeline system and meet with BP officials about the agency's safety orders.

He would not address whether the accumulated gunk in the pipelines was the result of a negligent or ineffective maintenance system, saying he did not want to impede the Justice Department investigation.

The agency's orders to inject more corrosion inhibitor into the pipelines and conduct multiple external testing along the line still stand, Barrett said.

Beaudo said the company's inspection and monitoring programs met all regulatory requirements before the spill.

"In hindsight, we would have liked to have had a more aggressive" program, he said.

Fostoria Sued Over Sewage Violations (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), July 7, 2006

Legal actions part of consent decree

FOSTORIA - U.S. and Ohio regulators filed two federal civil suits yesterday against the city of Fostoria over violations at its wastewater treatment plant, but officials said the legal actions are part of a consent decree the city agreed to earlier this year.

The state EPA names Fostoria as defendant, while the U.S. EPA names the city and the state of Ohio as defendants.

The lawsuits, filed in U.S. District Court in Toledo, said Fostoria's treatment plant and sewage system have illegally discharged untreated water into the east branch of the Portage River and into the Caples-Flack Ditch since September, 1997.

Bill Rains, Fostoria's safety-service director, said the two lawsuits represent part of the legal actions related to a consent decree that "we have been working on for just about a year."

In May, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency levied a $30,000 fine against the city of Fostoria as part of a consent agreement to replace its outdated sewer system. The city had been negotiating the sewer issue with the EPA, the Justice Department, and the Ohio Attorney General's office.

The city said at the time that it had hired an engi-neering firm to create a long-term plan to separate storm-water and waste-water sewers. Mr. Rains said yesterday the city hopes to have that plan developed by next year.

The federal government gave the city 20 years to complete the updates, although Mr. Rains said the goal is to complete the project before then.

Fostoria's combined sewers make up about 80 percent of the city's system. But because of overflows caused by heavy rains, raw sewage is discharged into local waterways. Some of Fostoria's sewers date to the 1890s.

The treatment plant on Perrysburg Road was built in the 1950s.

"This is the legal part of the process," Mr. Rains said of the two lawsuits.

The city met recently with regional EPA executives from Chicago, and nothing was mentioned regarding potential new actions, he said.

Representatives from the EPA and the state attorney general's office could not be reached for comment.

Faiths Embrace View Of 'Green Patriarch' (WT/AP)

By Brian Murphy, Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

ATHENS -- More than a decade ago on an Aegean island, the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians made a startling proposition: That pollution and other attacks on the environment could be considered sins.

At the time, the idea earned him little more than a nickname -- the "green patriarch."

It's no longer such a radical view.

Eco-friendly attitudes have increasingly moved into the mainstream of many faiths -- from Muslim clerics urging water conservation in the fast-growing Persian Gulf states to evangelical preachers in the United States calling attention to global warming.

Next week, Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I will lead another high-profile group of religious leaders, scientists and activists on a trip to examine the interplay of faith and ecology. The weeklong voyage along the Amazon starting next Thursday will be Bartholomew's sixth green journey since the first in 1995 to the Greek island of Patmos -- where biblical tradition says the book of Revelation was compiled.

The efforts of Bartholomew and others have energized some of the most lively theological explorations in recent years -- with fresh studies and interpretation of Scripture along environmental lines. The global movement also offers rare common ground for religious groups at a time of confrontation on issues from homosexual clergy to suspicions between the Muslim world and the West.

"The environment brings a sense of urgency and shared purpose that few other issues can bring," said Mary Evelyn Tucker, a co-founder of the Forum on Religion and Ecology, a group that will begin a relationship with Yale University in September. "It cuts across all religious traditions."

Evidence of an expanding environmental ethos can be found in nearly every faith.

In New York, the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life draws clear links between Judaic traditions and the battles to ease global warming. In China, a Buddhist conference in April urged greater emphasis on environmental protection. Hindu religious scholars have raised alarms about potential environmental fallout from the rapid modernization in India.

In June, Pope Benedict XVI told a crowd in St. Peter's Square to shun "fake freedoms which destroy the environment and man," though he did not elaborate.

In Iran, Grand Ayatollah Yusef Saanei said it was "the duty of every Muslim" to protect the environment. Many fatwas, or religious edicts, across the Muslim world echo similar Koranic readings that God entrusted humans to protect the Earth.

"Religion is built on story telling. The stories reach people in ways that academics or activists or NGOs cannot," said Victoria Finlay, a spokeswoman for the Alliance of Religions and Conservation, a London-based group founded by Prince Philip, the husband of Queen Elizabeth.

"It took a while for the two sides to begin to understand each other. But now the NGOs [nongovernmental organizations] and others recognize what a powerful force religion can play."

Among the alliance's current projects is encouraging Muslim imams in Kenya to denounce the widespread use of dynamite to catch fish and push for a return of traditional nets, which trap large fish but allow smaller, breeding-age fish to escape.

"The environment is a great unifier," said the Rev. James Keenan, a Boston College theologian who is hosting a meeting of more than 400 Catholic scholars in Padua, Italy, starting today. "You are not going to find anyone saying, 'Well, there is no moral connection between religion and the environment.' All the faiths can bring something to the table."

Bartholomew's trip hopes to draw the attention of religious leaders to the critical pressures facing the Amazon, including clearing pristine rain forest for farmland. One goal is to tap the immense reach of Brazil's pentecostal- and evangelical-style churches, which continue to chip away at the Roman Catholic majority.

In the United States, many evangelical leaders have discovered the message of ecology -- drawing links between the biblical command for proper stewardship of the Earth and environmental activism.

DOJ_NMG_0039631

The Evangelical Environmental Network -- best known for its clean-air campaign "What Would Jesus Drive?" -- opened a new effort earlier this year against global warming, the Evangelical Climate Initiative, which drew some of its most prominent supporters to date, including the Rev. Rick Warren, author of the best-seller "The Purpose Driven Life."

But some skepticism remains within the evangelical community.

Christian leaders with close ties to the Bush administration, calling themselves the Interfaith Stewardship Alliance, said "the science is not settled on global warming," and argued that most evangelicals do not back the call for regulating greenhouse emissions. Among the alliance's supporters are James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, and the Rev. Richard Land, head of the public policy arm of the Southern Baptist Convention.

Still, small acts indicate the mood of many congregations, like the Unitarian church in Lewisburg, Pa., that's looking for a new building.

The congregation recently sold its historic home and is working with an architect who specializes in designing "green" places of worship. It techniques include recycled construction materials and aligning the structure to use the maximum natural light.

The Environmental Procrastination Agency (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

Now that the Supreme Court has gotten itself into the global warming debate, the justices face a choice: Should they rule in favor of environmental groups, or in favor of the environment?

The court agreed last week to hear a case brought by the Natural Resources Defense Council and other groups seeking to empower the Environmental Protection Agency to regulate emissions of carbon dioxide from cars. To David Schoenbrod, the case sounds unfortunately familiar.

In 1972, as a lawyer for the council, he started the litigation that forced the E.P.A. to take lead out of gasoline. Technically, it was a victory for environmentalists, but it took so long that Schoenbrod decided his comrades in the movement had made a big mistake — the same mistake they're now making with carbon dioxide. They keep expecting the E.P.A. do an impossible job.

They still believe in the Spaceship Earth management style, as Schoenbrod describes it in his book, "Saving Our Environment from Washington." They still imagine the planet as a ship that must be guided by a wise captain, aloof from politicians and voters, who issues orders from the bridge with the help of his trusty crew of technocrats and lawyers.

"The idea in creating the E.P.A. was that only an expert agency insulated from politics can protect the public and the environment," says Schoenbrod, now a professor at New York Law School. "But what it really does is insulate Congress from responsibility for making tough choices. The legislators can take credit for passing laws protecting the environment, and the agency takes the blame for the inevitable delays and compromises and costs."

When the E.P.A. was created in 1970, Schoenbrod naïvely expected it to quickly deal with the known dangers of lead in gasoline. But the agency stalled through both Republican and Democratic administrations because neither party wanted to be blamed for hurting oil refiners or raising gasoline prices. The E.P.A. didn't get the job done until 1985, when it was politically expedient because the economics had changed and oil refiners favored getting rid of leaded gasoline.

The E.P.A. would have a far tougher time regulating carbon dioxide because the issue is so much more complicated than lead pollution. There isn't an obvious technical fix for bureaucrats to mandate. The potential sacrifices are enormous and would inspire at least a decade of wrangling and litigation. Any serious solution requires international cooperation. The only way to come up with a workable plan is for politicians to debate and negotiate.

Schoenbrod's modest proposal for saving the environment is to strip the E.P.A. of its rule-making powers and convert it into an advisory and enforcement agency. It would do technical studies and make recommendations, leaving the lawmaking up to legislators — usually legislators outside Washington. Except for some large-scale problems, like acid rain or global warming, Schoenbrod thinks that most environmental questions should be settled at the state and local level.

His ideas, of course, are not popular in Washington. Corporate lobbyists find it easier to work behind the scenes at the E.P.A. than to conduct public fights on Capitol Hill or in state capitals. Environmental groups also prefer federalizing issues, partly because they've got centralized operations themselves, and partly because they espouse the "race to the bottom" theory: if Washington were to delegate power, the states would be so desperate to protect jobs and attract industry that they'd compete to have the weakest environmental rules.

DOJ_NMG_0039632

But in practice, as Schoenbrod demonstrates, Washington stops local officials from racing to the top. After the dangers of lead were recognized in the 1960's, New York City began taking steps to encourage unleaded fuel, but it and other localities were pre-empted from passing stricter rules once that became the job of the E.P.A.

While Congress and the E.P.A. have been dithering about global warming, California is requiring carmakers to reduce their emissions of carbon dioxide. New Hampshire has ordered power plants to restrict carbon dioxide and other pollutants. More than a dozen states, including Texas, require utilities to use renewable sources of energy.

While the Kyoto accord is dead in Washington, a coalition of Northeastern states is setting its own Kyoto-style limits on greenhouse emissions and establishing a market for trading carbon-dioxide credits.

If the states keep setting examples, Congress may finally feel enough pressure to do something itself on global warming. But if the Supreme Court decides to entrust that job to the E.P.A., don't expect any commands from the Spaceship's bridge any time soon.

Global Warming And The Courts (NYT)

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

In a move that has caused both delight and apprehension among those who worry about global warming, the Supreme Court has agreed to rule next fall on whether the Environmental Protection Agency has the authority under the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases. The case is among the most important environmental disputes ever to come before the court.

The outcome will have much to say about whether the country will be able to act more aggressively on a problem with potentially grave consequences for the earth and its inhabitants. It could also determine whether states that have acted on their own to limit global warming emissions from vehicles — as California and 10 other states have done — can proceed without fear of a federal veto.

President Bush has advanced many reasons for not pressing for strong controls on greenhouse gas emissions from vehicles, power plants and other industrial sources. But his ace in the hole has been the claim that the federal government has no authority to regulate greenhouse gases.

The case turns largely on a simple reading of the Clean Air Act. The administration argues that the act mentions carbon dioxide only in passing, and that if Congress had been truly worried about global warming it would have given the gases that cause it more emphasis and instructed the E.P.A. to take aggressive steps to control them, as it did with sulfur dioxide and other pollutants. The administration argues further that the science on global warming is too "uncertain" to justify anything more than a voluntary effort to deal with it.

The plaintiffs — a formidable collection of state governments and environmental groups — argue that the plain language of the Clean Air Act gives the government jurisdiction over "any air pollutant" that threatens "public health or welfare" and, further, that "welfare" specifically includes effects on climate and weather. This interpretation of the act was first set forth by President Clinton's E.P.A. and stood as agency policy until Mr. Bush reversed it (without consulting his own E.P.A.) in 2001.

As for the science that the administration finds so shaky, the plaintiffs will argue that the science has grown steadily more persuasive since the Clean Air Act was last revised in 1990; that the administration has cherry-picked arguments about details while ignoring the vast preponderance of the evidence; and that the consensus among mainstream scientists — a consensus reinforced by a recent National Academy of Sciences report — is that the earth is inexorably heating up and that industrial emissions are largely responsible.

This is a case of global importance, not least because America's failure to act decisively has discouraged the rest of the world from acting decisively. On the face of it, the law plainly gives the government the power to regulate greenhouse gases. A ruling that tells the administration that it has that power does not mean that it will actually use it. But it will no longer be able to hide behind a legal fiction.

DOJ_NMG_0039633

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Informers' Hotel Orgy Led U.S. Prosecutor To Shelve Cases (AR)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

The Arizona Republic, July 8, 2006

U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton refused to prosecute a major Arizona corruption case after learning that FBI informers sexually abused an unconscious prostitute during a Las Vegas hotel orgy, according to a letter sent by Charlton to the bureau's top Arizona agent at the time.

There are no allegations that FBI personnel participated in the orgy. However, Charlton's letter complained that agents did not mention the incident in official reports nor did they advise prosecutors of possible crimes committed in the hotel room, including knowledge that "one of the women in the suite may have been raped."

Charlton's conclusion: "Our office will not prosecute any additional cases involving any of these individuals (informers) until the circumstances of the Oct. 16, 2002, incidents in Las Vegas are fully investigated."

Seventy-one U.S. military personnel, prison guards and law enforcement workers have been convicted in the sting known as Operation Lively Green, which involved undercover operatives and agents posing as Mexican narcotics traffickers. The government employees were bribed to haul cocaine from southern Arizona to Phoenix and Las Vegas, sometimes wearing uniforms and using military vehicles.

Charlton's letter of March 29, 2004, to Charlene Thornton, then-FBI special agent in charge for Arizona, suggests that crimes by informers and questionable conduct by agents were so troubling that he backed away from the case entirely.

Thornton said in an interview that she recalls the letter and Charlton's decision to drop the case. She said Charlton sought an investigation by the Inspector General's Office. After that request was declined, she said, the FBI's Office of Professional Responsibility reviewed the allegations and exonerated all agents.

Charlton declined to comment.

Deb McCarley, a bureau spokeswoman in Phoenix, describes Lively Green as "one of the most successful public-corruption cases in the FBI's history" but said she could not comment further because prosecutions still are pending.

The Justice Department's Office of Public Integrity wound up pressing charges, allowing each defendant to plead guilty to a single felony with no public trials or disclosures in U.S. District Court.

Charlton's letter to Thornton spells out the Nevada events of Oct. 16, 2002, in detail: Eleven suspects had just delivered 132 pounds of cocaine from southern Arizona to Las Vegas. FBI agents rented the presidential suite at the MGM Grand Hotel for three informers who invited a half-dozen targets to join them. That night, five prostitutes were hired to participate in an orgy with the men.

The letter says one of the prostitutes fell unconscious because of drug or alcohol consumption and was draped naked over a chair. It says she may have been sodomized by informers and suspects, who also posed for pictures with the woman.

Disclosure papers from a military court previously revealed that the photographic evidence was destroyed after an FBI agent told one of the informers he "did not want to see them again."

Charlton said in his letter that, under Justice Department rules, he felt obliged to tell state or county prosecutors in Las Vegas about the suspected criminal conduct of FBI informers.

Clark County, Nev., District Attorney David Roger said he never was contacted about the MGM Grand incident by the U.S. Attorney's Office or the FBI. Police in Las Vegas said they never were asked to investigate.

Thornton said Charlton's letter contained "some conclusions that wouldn't be supported by the facts," but she declined to elaborate.

She also disputed a disclosure report in military court that says a key FBI agent was removed from Operation Lively Green as a result of the Office of Professional Responsibility inquiry.

"There was no misconduct found," Thornton said, "so there was no action taken as a result of the internal investigation."

Five months after Charlton wrote the letter, Thornton was appointed by FBI Director Robert Mueller as assistant director at the bureau's Inspection Division, in charge of internal investigations and professional conduct. She said she had no part in reviewing behavior by agents in Lively Green.

According to the military court disclosure, there was no surveillance on the hotel suite during the night in question. It is unclear why FBI agents, amid a major sting operation, would not have set up eavesdropping devices in a room rented for informers.

McCarley, the Phoenix FBI spokeswoman, said Lively Green "underscores the FBI's commitment to fighting public corruption at all levels of government. . . . (When) all remaining prosecutive activity is complete, the FBI will be in a position to offer comment on this investigation.

Chronicle Argues For Subpoenas' Dismissal (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, July 8, 2006

Lawyers for two Chronicle reporters accused the federal government Friday of trying to mislead a federal judge into concluding that BALCO founder Victor Conte was the source of grand jury testimony leaked to the reporters regarding star athletes' use of performance-enhancing drugs.

In papers filed in federal court, lawyers for Hearst Corp. argued that subpoenas issued to the newspaper and the two reporters, demanding their confidential sources, should be dismissed because of government misconduct and prosecutors' failure to show any pressing need for the information.

The reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, wrote articles in 2004 disclosing testimony by the Giants' Barry Bonds, the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi, sprinter Tim Montgomery and others to the federal grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO. The disclosures about star athletes' use of performance-enhancing drugs led Major League Baseball to impose a new steroid-testing policy. Conte and three others pleaded guilty to distributing illegal drugs.

The Justice Department has asked U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White to enforce the subpoenas and order Fainaru-Wada and Williams to reveal who gave them the grand jury transcripts in violation of another judge's order.

The reporters could be jailed if they refuse to testify. White has scheduled a hearing for Aug. 4.

In the court papers filed Friday, Hearst lawyers attacked federal prosecutors for a June 22 filing that disclosed a series of e-mails between Conte and Fainaru-Wada, which authorities seized at Conte's home. Prosecutors did not directly accuse Conte of leaking the transcripts, but said the messages showed that he had provided information to Fainaru-Wada about the grand jury proceedings, and that the reporter had asked him for transcripts.

The government's papers "were crafted in a way to persuade the court that the government has its man in the crosshairs and its man is Victor Conte," the Hearst filing said.

"The problem is that the theory is untrue and the government knows it," Hearst lawyers wrote.

Hearst said the Justice Department failed to disclose that it had asked The Chronicle about those same e-mails weeks before and that the newspaper had denied, repeatedly and emphatically, that the messages contained any information about the source of the leaked transcripts.

Hearst Corp. counsel Eve Burton told the department in letters attached to the court filing that the newspaper had no documents, including the e-mails, that would identify the source.

Hearst lawyers wrote that "the government, knowing full well the lack of any connection between the e-mails and the subpoenas at issue, offered those e-mails without disclosing their irrelevancy. ... Surely for the government to continue to press this matter, knowing what it knows now, is nothing short of harassment."

Hearst also disputed prosecutors' assertion that the reporters were concealing a serious crime by not revealing their source. The company said prosecutors had failed to show any significant harm from the disclosure of the grand jury material or from the government's inability to pinpoint the source.

When the articles were published, Hearst noted, the BALCO defendants had already been indicted and had been given copies of the grand jury transcripts to prepare for trials at which the information would have been aired publicly.

DOJ_NMG_0039635

"There is no breach of national security, no act of terrorism, no violent crime that would go unpunished," Hearst lawyers said. "There is only the dissemination of information to the public -- information that was of genuine public interest, concern and import and, at the time, was intended by all concerned soon to be disclosed at a public trial -- which caused no demonstrable harm to anyone."

To order the reporters to disclose their sources, Hearst said, would send a message to journalists and the public that "the government would and could harass the press at will, compelling them to disclose confidential sources on the basis of any sort of investigation, on the basis of any sort of factual record, even where the only factual record is one of misrepresentation to the court."

In a separate filing earlier Friday, Hearst lawyers, on behalf of Fainaru-Wada and Williams, opposed prosecutors' request to reseal the Conte e-mails and other documents that the government accidentally unveiled in its June 22 filing.

Portions of the filing were intended to be sealed from the public, but the material that was redacted, or edited out, could be read when copied into a word-processing program.

When the Justice Department learned of the slipup, it withdrew the filing. On Monday, the government asked White to allow the same documents to be refiled under a more secure seal.

"The documents relate to an ongoing grand jury investigation and contain information about the nature and extent of the government's investigation, as well as a number of targets/subjects of the investigation," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Brian Hershman.

In Friday's filing, Hearst said the government was asking the judge to "perform the impossible" by making public information secret.

Chronicle Lawyers Ask Judge To Dismiss Reporters' Subpoenas (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, July 8, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO – Attorneys for Hearst Corp. asked a federal judge to dismiss subpoenas demanding that two San Francisco Chronicle reporters reveal who leaked secret grand jury testimony about alleged steroid use by Barry Bonds and other top athletes.

In papers filed in federal court Friday, the attorneys argue the subpoenas should be dismissed because of government misconduct and prosecutors' failure to demonstrate a pressing need for the information.

“There is no breach of national security, no act of terrorism, no violent crime that would go unpunished,” Hearst lawyers wrote.

The Justice Department last month asked U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White to enforce the subpoenas and order reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams to divulge who gave them the grand jury transcripts in violation of another judge's order.

Bush administration attorneys said it was a crime to leak grand jury materials to the media. They argued that California's shield law protecting reporters from divulging their sources does not apply to the federal probe into who leaked the documents.

The two reporters could be jailed if they refuse to testify. White has scheduled a hearing for Aug. 4.

On Friday, Hearst attorneys said ordering the reporters to disclose their sources would send a message to journalists and the public that “the government would and could harass the press at will, compelling them to disclose confidential sources on the basis of any sort of investigation.”

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote articles in 2004 disclosing testimony by Bonds and other athletes to the federal grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO.

County Joins Gang Task Force (VANCC)

By Don Hamilton, Columbian staff writer

Vancouver (WA) Columbian, July 8, 2006

Clark County joined 13 federal and local law enforcement agencies Friday in launching a new metropolitan area task force aimed at crippling gang crime.

DOJ_NMG_0039636

The task force will employ racketeering statutes, drug statues and career criminal statutes to impede gang activities before the criminal organizations can develop and mature, said Karin J. Immergut, U.S. attorney for Oregon.

The Metropolitan Gang Task Force, as it will be known, will begin operations Monday in its base at the Portland Police Bureau's Northeast Precinct with gang leaders as the immediate target.

"The focus of the group is to go after the leadership," said Brian Martinek, Vancouver police chief. "The way I look at it is cutting the head off the dragon."

Martinek joined Clark County Prosecuting Attorney Art Curtis at the news conference announcing the task Friday morning at the Mark O. Hatfield Federal Courthouse in downtown Portland.

The task force includes an impressive array of police and prosecutorial firepower, including the FBI; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Portland, Beaverton, Gresham, Hillsboro, Milwaukie and Vancouver police departments; the U.S. Attorney; and prosecuting attorneys for Clark, Multnomah, Washington and Clackamas counties. Chairman will be David Bishop, the Beaverton police chief.

Each agency will pay the salaries of their participating officers. Other expenses, including vehicles, overtime and equipment, will come from the FBI, which recently received $450,000 from the U.S. Justice Department for the program. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez has made combating gang activity a priority.

Immergut said the task force will observe traditional rules of conduct and seek court orders for wiretaps.

This is not a solution in search of a problem, officials said Friday. Gang activity may not be as severe in the Portland area as in other parts of the country, but it is still having an impact on police and the public. Interfering with gang activities now will put leaders out of business, deter wannabes and prevent them from growing, Immergut said.

Violent gang crimes are declining, but the number of low-level gang incidents has been increasing, said Capt. Eric Hendricks, who spent three-and-a-half years as head of the Portland Police Bureau's gang enforcement team.

In the past, he said, gangs confined their activities to relatively small areas, mostly inner Northeast Portland. Today, police find gang activity throughout the region, with arrest warrants served at times on gang leaders at their homes in Vancouver, Beaverton, Aloha and Hillsboro, Hendricks said.

"The pool at one time was fairly deep but relatively narrow," he said. "Now the pool is not nearly as deep, with not as much violent activity, but it's certainly a lot broader."

The scope of the problem varies from community to community. Portland, for example, has seen a rise in Latino gangs. Gresham, said police Chief Carla Piluso, sees white supremacists and eastern Europeans. And Vancouver, Martinek said, has seen increases in black and Eastern European gangs.

"In our area," he said, "we have a little bit of everything."

Gangs don't recognize city or state boundaries, and agencies throughout the region need to share information, Martinek said.

"We share gang members," he said.

"The gang members living in Vancouver commit crimes in Portland, and the ones living in Portland are committing crimes in Vancouver. That's the point of this."

Don Hamilton can be reached at 360-759-8010 or don.hamilton@columbian .com.

That's What Friends In High Places Are For (NYT)

By Jeff Leeds And Sharon Waxman

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

Although collaborations happen all the time in pop music, they do not generally involve R & B hitmakers and Senator Orrin G. Hatch.

But the release of a music producer from a Dubai jail this week, quick on the heels of his conviction for drug possession, turns out to be a story of high-level string-pulling on the part of Mr. Hatch, the conservative Utah Republican and songwriter, along with Lionel Richie, the singer; Quincy Jones, the music entrepreneur; and an array of well-connected lawyers, businessmen and others, spanning cities and continents.

DOJ_NMG_0039637

Dallas Austin, 35, who has produced hits for Madonna, Janet Jackson and others, flew home to Atlanta on Wednesday, after being released after midnight on Tuesday from a holding cell in a Dubai jail. Hours earlier Mr. Austin had been sentenced to four years in prison for carrying just over a gram of cocaine with him when he entered the country on May 19 to attend a birthday celebration for Naomi Campbell.

Senator Hatch made numerous phone calls on Mr. Austin's behalf to the ambassador and consul of the United Arab Emirates embassy in Washington — Dubai is one of the seven emirates — and served as an intermediary for Mr. Austin's representatives, the producer's lawyers said.

"The senator was one of a number of people who were very actively involved," said Joe Reeder, the Washington lawyer, who, with an Atlanta colleague, Joel A. Katz, spent 10 days in Dubai working to secure Mr. Austin's reprieve.

Mr. Katz, an entertainment lawyer, represents both Mr. Austin and the somewhat less musically successful Mr. Hatch, a singer and songwriter who has recorded religious-oriented albums. After hiring Mr. Katz's firm, the senator last year took in $39,092 in income from music publishing, according to financial documents filed in May under the Ethics in Government Act.

The senator declined to be interviewed or to confirm details of his efforts on Mr. Austin's behalf, but he issued a statement acknowledging his involvement and said he was asked by Mr. Austin's lawyers to help.

A spokesman for Mr. Hatch said that the senator was a proponent of rehabilitation for drug offenders, and that he had worked to revise federal sentencing guidelines regarding cocaine, and, through legislation in 2005, had advocated treatment for nonviolent offenders and the easing of restrictions on medication to treat heroin addiction.

In the statement Mr. Hatch said he was "confident that this talented young man will learn from this experience." He did not say if he requested that Mr. Austin seek treatment.

Until word of the pardon came through in a call to the One and Only Royal Mirage hotel along the Dubai beach, where Mr. Austin's lawyers waited nervously for news of their client's fate, the release of Mr. Austin was not a certainty.

"This involved multiple ambassadors, a prime minister, a prince, Lionel Richie, the senator and religious leaders in Atlanta," Mr. Reeder said.

"The uniting factor of all these people — the religious leaders, the political leaders, entertainment figures and prominent private citizens — was humanitarian considerations," he said. "Where should this man be under these circumstances?"

Randy Phillips, Mr. Richie's manager, said Mr. Austin "happened to know the right people, and better than that, the right people were ready to step out on a limb for him, which doesn't happen that often."

Although Mr. Phillips called the efforts on Mr. Austin's behalf "the difference between going home and being in 'Midnight Express' " — referring to the harrowing 1978 film about a novice American drug smuggler forsaken in the Turkish prison system — such pardons are not a rarity in Dubai, authorities said.

Mr. Austin's troubles began on May 19, when he landed in Dubai for the three-day birthday party of Ms. Campbell at the opulent Burj Al Arab hotel. While far from a household name, Mr. Austin is a leading figure in the pop music world who has worked with artists including Gwen Stefani, Michael Jackson, Pink, TLC and, lately, Mr. Richie.

According to published accounts, the police at the airport pulled Mr. Austin aside at customs and searched him, finding a small amount of cocaine. He was taken into custody and held at a detention center, the al-Rashidiya jail.

Several of the principal players in the negotiation recounted what followed, including Mr. Austin's lawyers, Mr. Richie and Mr. Phillips.

Almost immediately, several parallel initiatives were undertaken to try to influence the United Arab Emirates government to show clemency to Mr. Austin, his lawyers said.

Mr. Katz, of the firm Greenberg Traurig, hired three local lawyers, two from Dubai, and one from neighboring Bahrain, who ensured the reduction of the initial charge of drug trafficking to mere possession, the lawyers said. Drug trafficking can carry a life sentence in the United Arab Emirates, while possession carries a much shorter jail sentence. Discussions began over securing a pardon for Mr. Austin, focusing on the argument that he had carried only a small amount of drugs for personal use.

Mr. Katz also contacted colleagues, including Mr. Reeder in Greenberg Traurig's Washington office. A senior lawyer in the same office, Nancy Taylor, worked for many years on Mr. Hatch's staff in the Senate. Ms. Taylor enlisted Mr. Hatch, who is influential in Dubai because of his support for the United Arab Emirates-based company DP World in the controversy earlier this year over its contract to manage important American ports.

DOJ_NMG_0039638

At the time of the controversy earlier this year, which resulted in the jettisoning of the contract, Mr. Hatch said the United Arab Emirates was a good friend to the United States. "We don't want to kick the moderate Arab nations in the face," he said at the time.

Meanwhile, Mr. Jones, the legendary producer, and his friend Joe Robert, a Virginia real estate investor with interests in the Persian Gulf, became involved. Mr. Jones has played mentor to an array of current young pop and R&B stars, including Mr. Austin. Mr. Robert is also a friend of Mr. Austin's.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Robert began making calls to their contacts in the Middle East, including senior officials in the United Arab Emirates. Reached this week on a yacht off the coast of Spain, where he was with Mr. Jones, Mr. Robert said: "I know Dallas Austin; I consider him a very fine, upstanding individual, notwithstanding the mistake he made." He added, "This is not someone that belongs in a prison anywhere."

Meanwhile, other efforts continued, including a call from Mr. Katz to Prince Abdullah of neighboring Bahrain, and from Mr. Reeder to former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto, who was consulted for a legal reference. Some of the principals said they believed that Mr. Austin's pardon had been secured from early on. Still, uncertainty weighed heavily on others, particularly Mr. Austin's lawyers.

Enter Mr. Richie, who enjoys a cult status throughout much of the Arab world and had performed twice this year in Dubai, where he has met various senior government officials.

In an interview Mr. Richie said that Mr. Austin's advisers arranged for the United Arab Emirate's consul in Washington, Abdulla Ali Alsaboosi, to call Mr. Richie for a character reference. "It was, 'Tell me what kind of guy is Dallas Austin,' " Mr. Richie said. "I said: 'Listen, this is a great guy. A gangster, a hoodlum, a thug, he's not.' "

Last Sunday Mr. Austin pleaded guilty to possessing 1.26 grams of cocaine and capsules of Ecstasy, telling the court he did not mean to break the law. The stage was set for a pardon by the ruler of Dubai, Sheik Mohammed bin Rashid al-Maktoum. It came four hours after the plea, Mr. Austin's lawyers recalled. What remained was to execute the edict.

But that didn't happen until after the sentencing on Tuesday morning. Shortly after midnight, as American revelers half a world away celebrated Independence Day, Mr. Katz and Mr. Reeder got the call at their beachside hotel.

The lawyers quickly gathered their things and rushed to the airport, where they met Mr. Austin and boarded the next flight to New York.

On Friday Mr. Austin released a statement that said in part: "This unfortunate experience has had a profound effect on me, and I regret any grief caused to my family, friends and business associates."

The Dubai government gave no reason for the pardon. "In an issue like this it is not unusual," said Lt. General Dhahi Khalfan Tamim, head of Dubai Police, who said he was speaking in general terms and could not discuss the case in detail. "It is preferable to me that a foreigner who is caught in something like this be returned home rather than be kept here in prison for four years, costing us lots of resources."

Mr. Tamim noted, however, that Mr. Austin had technically been deported and would most likely not be allowed to return to Dubai.

The U.N. Wants Your Gun (WSJ)

By David B. Kopel

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

Yesterday the United Nation's Review Conference on Small Arms ended, barely noticed by the media. That's too bad, because this meeting, and the initiative of which it is a part, deserves much more public attention -- and censure -- than it gets.

To be sure, the conference did attract the hostile attention of the National Rifle Association, thanks to which some 100,000 letters and postcards flooded into the U.N. In response, the conference chair, Prasad Kariyawasam of Sri Lanka, stoutly insisted that the conference "does not in any way address legal possession," while Secretary General Kofi Annan promised that "we do not wish to deny law-abiding citizens their right to bear arms in accordance with national laws." Both statements are disingenuous.

DOJ_NMG_0039639

The U.N. has long urged that firearms must never be transferred to "non-state actors" -- that is, entities which are neither governments nor government-approved. Only John Bolton's intransigence prevented the "non-state actors" rule from being inserted into the Program of Action at the previous U.N. small arms conference in 2001. But the U.N. continues to insist on the "non-state actors" rule -- which would, if adopted, make it a violation of international law to sell arms to Taiwan (according to the U.N., not a state). It would also make illegal arms sales to any and every current group resisting tyranny or genocide.

Last year Unesco and Unicef funded the supporters of a Brazilian referendum to outlaw citizen firearms possession. It was rejected by a resounding 64% of the voters. A few months ago, in a warm-up meeting for this year's small arms conference, Rubem Fernandes, head of Viva Rio (the U.N.-funded prohibition group) explained what he had learned from the experience: "First lesson is, don't trust direct democracy."

The spearhead of the U.N. gun prohibition campaign is an NGO by the name of Iansa (International Action Network on Small Arms). This London-based consortium of gun prohibition groups, including American lobbies such as the Million Mom March and the Brady Campaign, sent a large staff to the small arms conference, some of them serving as national delegates. Iansa's head, Rebecca Peters, does not mince words: "We want to see a drastic reduction in gun ownership across the world."

Iansa member Barbara Frey has been appointed by the U.N. as "Special Rapporteur on the Prevention of Human Rights Violations Committed with Small Arms and Light Weapons." Ms. Frey, a law professor at the University of Minnesota, believes it is a human rights violation if a government does not require gun owners to have a restrictive license, under which "Possession of small arms shall be authorized for specific purposes only; small arms shall be used strictly for the purpose for which they are authorized." Were this doctrine accepted, it would instantly turn the U.S. government and every American state into international law-breakers.

Nevertheless, the U.N. does not talk about the extreme human rights violations being perpetrated on behalf of U.N. gun control. In the borderlands of Kenya and Uganda, joint military operations are burning villages, confiscating cattle from the pastoral tribes, torturing, murdering, pillaging and turning over 100,000 people into refugees, many of them starving. These atrocities are being perpetrated pursuant to the Nairobi Protocol, a U.N.-led regional treaty which obligates the signatory governments to eradicate unlicensed gun possession.

In practice, the Nairobi Protocol has been a justification for ethnic cleansing. On June 26, after five years of such atrocities, the United Nations Development Program itself finally cut off funding for Ugandan disarmament (the U.N. was funding voluntary gun surrender, not the military campaign). So far no steps have been taken regarding disarmament abuses in Kenya.

Similarly, the Economic Community of West African States (Ecowas) has under U.N. leadership banned the import of all firearms, except those for government use. Although human rights groups have warned that two Ecowas countries -- Ivory Coast and Guinea -- are on the brink of genocide, the U.N. seems determined to keep the potential genocide victims as helpless and defenseless as the genocide victims in Darfur.

The U.N. bureaucracy and the gun prohibition lobbies knew that they would not be able to get everything they wanted from the 2006 conference. Accordingly, they aim to keep the "small arms" process going, with more conferences in upcoming years -- when a new U.S. administration might welcome rather than resist international efforts to end-run the Second Amendment. There is a precedent for this: During the 1990s, as the U.N. campaign against small arms was building, the Clinton administration was an enthusiastic supporter -- refusing even to join with the Latin American delegations which stated that some countries had traditions of legitimate sporting gun ownership.

Moreover -- and this is a subtlety that Americans are only beginning to understand -- no "Program of Action" from this or any future small arms conference needs to be legally binding in order to make it legally binding. The gun prohibition lobbies are already working to claim that there is an international "norm" against citizen gun possession. (An international "norm" is similar to common law -- as opposed to international law created by formal treaties.)

Evidence of the norm, of course, comes from the gradual accumulation of international pronouncements, confiscations and national restrictions that the gun prohibition lobbies and their government allies labor so assiduously to institute. The U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0039640

Supreme Court has, meanwhile, recently cited unratified treaties as evidence of international norms which should guide the interpretation of our Constitution.

The U.N. gun control program, of which this week's small arms conference is a part, has already caused massive suffering and the loss of civil liberties in many nations around the world. Americans would be foolish to imagine that they will always be immune.

Mr. Kopel is research director of the Independence Institute.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Continues To Push His Plan On Immigration (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

CHICAGO -- President Bush renewed his call for immigration reform that includes a guest-worker program, a sign that despite resistance from the heart of his own party he isn't throwing in the towel on his troubled initiative in this election year.

On a political swing in the Midwest -- where voters are unusually worried about immigration, according to some polls -- Mr. Bush offered a strong defense of his stalled proposals to overhaul the broken U.S. system. "The system we've got today isn't working, and it needs to be changed and reformed," Mr. Bush said at a news conference Friday at Chicago's Museum of Science and Industry. (Read a transcript of his remarks1.)

Aides said later that the president had heard at length from local business leaders at dinner Thursday night about the need for reform, and decided to use his remarks Friday to tamp down speculation that he's backing away from his comprehensive overhaul proposal, which includes a guest-worker program for new immigrants and a path to citizenship for current illegal workers.

Both those items are controversial, especially among Republican conservatives on Capitol Hill, many of whom prefer tougher enforcement, including expulsion of those in the U.S. illegally. But the White House and many other Republicans believe that approach is unworkable, and doesn't command broad support even among Republican voters.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

2

President Bush speaks3 at a wide-ranging news conference in Chicago.

Friday, Mr. Bush promised stronger enforcement, both through increased manpower and new technologies such as tamper-proof identification cards. But, he added, "in order to enforce this border, we've got to have a rational way that recognizes there are people sneaking across to do work Americans aren't doing."

The administration and its allies also appear to be betting that the future for Republicans requires attracting more Latino voters, not driving them away with anti-immigrant rhetoric. Senate Republican moderates recently appeared to give Mr. Bush a chance to keep the debate going in Congress by suggesting adding more border enforcement; still, White House aides stopped short of predicting a deal on legislation ahead of the November election.

Democratic pollster Geoffrey Garin said the immigration debate is likely to hurt the president more than it helps, by adding to workers' worries over higher health care and energy costs, as well as competition for jobs from overseas.

"The majority of voters feel they are staggering under the weight of health costs and energy costs," Mr. Garin said, and "also believe that the new jobs being added to the economy aren't as secure and don't pay as well as the jobs we have lost."

Mr. Bush also touted his overall handling of the economy, pointing to relatively low unemployment, strong growth and compensation gains. He suggested at a midday fund-raiser that a soon-to-be-released budget-deficit projection will show improvement, too.

But a White House fact sheet appeared to rely on big compensation gains among higher-income earners to suggest strong across-the-board increases. The picture for hourly wage-earners has been less rosy, especially in the last couple of months. Senate Democrats said Friday's jobs report was "tepid."

DOJ_NMG_0039641

Enforcement-Plus Is Critical (WP)

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

AS REPUBLICANS this week began a series of hearings on immigration policy, President Bush was reportedly signaling new openness to compromise designed to produce legislation this year. The compromise, according to a report in the New York Times, would center on "enforcement-first": improve border security, as a majority of House Republicans want, and only then move on to the guest-worker program and legalization for illegal immigrants that Mr. Bush and a majority of senators favor.

In principle such a compromise makes sense, but there are many ways it could go wrong. The rationale goes something like this: Congress has tried immigration reform before, most recently in 1986. That measure provided a path to legalization for undocumented workers and promised tougher enforcement to discourage illegal immigration, but the tougher enforcement never came, so the illegal immigrants kept coming. This time, therefore, the government should prove its commitment to controlling the nation's borders before offering hope to the 11 million or so illegal immigrants here now. Some version of amnesty (though the word won't be used) would be more palatable if Americans knew it wouldn't be repeated every decade or two.

The danger, though, is that "enforcement-first" will devolve into "enforcement-only," which would be both inhumane and impractical. So Mr. Bush, if he is exploring a compromise, should insist that enforcement and a path to citizenship remain part of one legislative package. The path to citizenship should be generous enough, and free enough of bureaucratic requirements, to be meaningful to most immigrants who have followed every other law since arriving here (including paying taxes). The comprehensive package should include a healthy enough increase in legal immigration to meet the needs of a growing U.S. economy, on both the high-tech and low-wage ends.

Most important, the delay in implementing these measures can't be indefinite -- and can't depend on conditions that will never be met. The legalization part of the package could wait for a year or two while the administration beefs up border patrols and workplace inspections. But it can't depend on some promise of decreased immigration that can never be met or measured.

In the end, enforcement-only won't work; and Mr. Bush, who knows that, shouldn't accept a disguised version of enforcement-only simply because he wants some legislation this year.

Threat Of Terrorist Crossings Is Stressed At Border Hearing (NYT)

By Karen Hastings And Julia Preston

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

LAREDO, Tex., July 7 — Terrorists as well as illegal immigrants could slip across a southern United States border that is porous and vulnerable, law enforcement and immigration agents said Friday, as House Republicans took the debate over immigration overhaul to the Texas-Mexico border.

At a hearing in this bustling port of entry on the Rio Grande, House Republicans highlighted the threat of terrorist infiltration to justify their tough plan for border enforcement and to suggest that a Senate immigration bill was weak on security.

The hearing was the second to be led by Representative Ed R. Royce, Republican of California and chairman of the House Subcommittee on International Terrorism and Nonproliferation. House Republicans, facing an issue that has sharply divided their party, have tried through the hearings to build public pressure on the Senate to focus primarily on immigration enforcement. The first hearing was on Monday in San Diego.

Senate proposals would "tie the hands" of local law enforcement officers in working with immigration authorities, Mr. Royce said, and would require consultation with Mexico over construction of a proposed border fence.

Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr. of Zapata County, who has joined with 16 other sheriffs in the Texas Border Sheriff's Coalition, said a smuggling "infrastructure" that brought illegal workers and illegal drugs into the country could easily be exploited by terrorists.

A bill adopted by the House in December centers on security, calling for 700 miles of walls along the border and making it a crime to be in the United States illegally. A Senate bill passed in May would create a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants while enhancing border enforcement.

DOJ_NMG_0039642

Democrats on the panel participated in the hearings but denounced them as divisive and called on the Republicans to address the immigration problem as a whole. "The purpose of these hearings is totally political," said Representative Charlie Gonzalez, Democrat of Texas.

Outside the hotel where the hearing took place, a handful of protestors carried signs reading "Border Security Is National Security." Inside, whoops, applause and an "amen" or two came from a clearly divided audience.

Reynaldo Garza, acting chief of the Border Patrol for the Laredo sector, said that last year, agents in his area — which stretches along 170 border miles — caught illegal crossers from 70 countries other than Mexico, including some from countries linked by the United States to terrorism. Chief Garza said that an increase in Border Patrol officers alone would not stop the flow, and that more remote sensors, video systems and unmanned surveillance aircraft were also needed.

The sheriffs, seeking to avoid partisan debate, pleaded for federal action, saying they were swamped with illegal immigrants and increasingly violent gang members, drug runners and human smugglers.

"Our pleas for help are based largely on failures on the part of the U.S. government," said Sheriff Rick Flores of Webb County. "Many of our problems are federally caused."

A Mexican military ID card and a piece of Sudanese currency recently found discarded along the border offer hints, Sheriff Flores said, that illegal immigration has become more sophisticated. He described an episode in which "black-clad men with duffel bags" had surprised a group of quail hunters near the border.

"This is not a partisan issue," he said. "It's a red-white-and-blue issue."

GOP Hearing Alleges Risks Of Terrorism Along Border (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

LAREDO, Tex., July 7 -- House Republicans brought their get-tough immigration proposal on Friday to the city dubbed the nation's "Gateway to Mexico" to make their case for tightening the border as a way to prevent terrorist incursions.

"It's elementary that to defend ourselves against our determined and resourceful enemies, our border must be secure," said Rep. Ed Royce (R-Calif.), chairman of the House International Relations subcommittee on terrorism. "Border vulnerabilities are opportunities for terrorists."

Some House Democrats denounced the hearing as political grandstanding that would accomplish little, and some local officials said that closing the border would be detrimental to the legal flow of commerce and individuals.

"We face some very serious problems," but lawmakers should "not start scaring people just to get headlines," said Laredo Mayor Raul Salinas, a former FBI agent and U.S. Capitol Police officer.

"We must make our border safe, but not close it to trade and community," said Salinas, whose city is a transit point for hundreds of thousands of northbound trucks hauling imported goods. "We need to build bridges, bridges of friendship and not walls. This nation can be safe without closing or slowing down our borders."

The field hearing, the third this week, focused on a House-passed bill that would require tighter border controls and 700 miles of border fencing. It also calls for tougher deportation standards and stringent enforcement of rules governing employers who hire undocumented workers, and would provide funding for local law enforcement agencies along the border. Another Republican-sponsored hearing was held in San Diego on Wednesday.

The Senate's immigration bill was discussed at a hearing in Philadelphia on Wednesday. It includes provisions similar to the House bill, but also outlines a method for an estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to become U.S. citizens and calls for a temporary- or guest-worker program that would provide legal U.S. residency status for as long as six years.

Because the field hearings were proposed by Republicans last month after the Senate passed its version of an immigration bill, Democrats called the event here political theater.

"They say they are holding hearings on immigration; I call this the big mockery," said Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Tex.), who contended that the subcommittee has no jurisdiction over immigration legislation. Lee attended the hearing, although neither she nor other Democrats who were present are subcommittee members.

DOJ_NMG_0039643

"Instead of a traveling circus of field hearings that may make good politics but do little to advance sound policy, I believe Congress needs to get back to work in Washington to reach a compromise agreement on comprehensive border security and immigration reform legislation," said Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.).

But Royce, along with other Republicans, raised the specter of well-funded terrorist organizations using Mexican drug rings and human-smuggling rings to penetrate the southern border of the United States. Royce said the United States must gain "operational control" of the border as part of any overhaul of the country's immigration laws.

"Immigration reform must be national security reform," he said.

Reynaldo Garza, acting Border Patrol chief of the Laredo sector, which includes 170 miles along the Rio Grande, was among those invited to testify. He said that local agents had apprehended illegal immigrants from almost 70 countries last year, and that he is concerned about the potential link between terrorists and smuggling cartels.

"Terrorists and violent criminals may exploit smuggling routes used by migrants to enter the United States illegally and do us harm," said Garza.

He said additional agents and high-technology tools such as unmanned aerial vehicles and remote surveillance cameras are critical to border security. "Reducing illegal entries across our borders is now, more than ever, a matter of national security," Garza said.

Sheriff Rick Flores of Webb County, which includes Laredo, and Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr. of adjacent Zapata County said their deputies had answered calls about what they believed to be border infiltrations by "high-risk," heavily armed individuals who appeared not to be Mexican and who did not speak Spanish. A Sudanese currency bill was found along the fence line of a South Texas ranch during one of their investigations, Flores said.

"Homeland security rests in large part on border security," Flores said. "This concern, especially post-9/11, had placed an added responsibility on us as a nation to secure our borders."

Pressed by Democrats to say whether the House-passed provision to deport millions of illegal immigrants would help local authorities guard against terrorism or prevent a terrorist attack, Flores said, "I can tell you no. I've already said Mexicans are not terrorists."

Additional Republican-led field hearings on immigration are scheduled for later this month and for mid-August.

House Told Criminals Swelling Alien Tide (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

Most of the people who sneak across the border are no longer good people in search of honest work, the sheriff of a border county in Texas told a House subcommittee yesterday, but rather criminals who belong to gangs and drug cartels.

"For years we have seen individuals enter the country illegally," said Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr., sheriff of Zapata County. "However, recently we feel that many of these persons are no longer entering the country to look for legitimate employment. We are now seeing that many of these persons are members of ruthless and violent gangs."

Sheriff Gonzalez's testimony before the House International Relations subcommittee was part of a series of "field hearings" held across the country to gauge voter opinion on reforming the nation's immigration laws. Yesterday's hearing was held in Laredo, in Zapata County.

"Some areas can accurately be described as a war zone," panel Chairman Ed Royce, California Republican, told The Washington Times after touring the border near Laredo.

Sheriff Gonzalez told members of the subcommittee that the number of illegal aliens from places other than Mexico -- including countries on terrorist watch lists -- caught crossing the border has more than quintupled in the past four years. Increasingly, he said, they try blending in to look like Mexicans crossing the border in search of honest work.

With more than 165,000 illegal aliens caught in fiscal 2005, Sheriff Gonzalez said, he can only imagine how many succeed in getting across.

"I dare to say that at any given time, daytime or nighttime, one can get on a boat and traverse back and forth between Texas and Mexico and not get caught," he said. "If smugglers can bring in tons of marijuana and cocaine at one time and can smuggle 20-30 persons at one time, one can just imagine how easy it would be to bring in two to three terrorists or their weapons of mass destruction across the river and not be detected."

DOJ_NMG_0039644

Reynaldo M. Garza, acting chief patrol agent for the Laredo Sector, also told members of the subcommittee that the number of violent incidents at points of entry to the U.S. have increased dramatically in recent years.

The testimony comes as Congress tries to work out a compromise between House and Senate versions of immigration reform legislation.

House Republicans want to secure the border first and deal with thorny issues such as a guest-worker program after the borders have been bolstered. Senate Democrats, along with key Republicans such as Majority Leader Bill Frist, want a bill that handles all aspects of immigration reform at the same time.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, Texas Democrat, said the hearings were about politics, not policy.

"Congress needs to get back to work in Washington to reach a compromise agreement on comprehensive border security and immigration reform legislation," Mr. Reyes said.

The audience in Laredo was full of activists on both sides of the issue.

Rep. Ted Poe, Texas Republican, said to cheers that if the U.S. is protecting the borders of other nations, it should also be protecting its own.

"It's a national security issue to protect our borders from those who wish to do us harm," he said.

Rep. Ruben Hinojosa, Texas Democratic, said the proceedings were a "false promise."

"This hearing will do nothing to secure our borders," he said.

Immigration Hearing Held At Border (AP-Y2)

By Elizabeth White, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 8, 2006

A Republican-led House panel met at the Mexican border Friday in an unusual field hearing that the chairman said he hopes will push the Senate to focus on enforcing immigration law.

"It's elementary that to defend ourselves against our determined and resourceful enemies, our border must be secure," said Rep. Ed Royce (news, bio, voting record), the California Republican who chairs the International Relations Subcommittee on International Terrorism and Nonproliferation.

House GOP leaders called the series of hearings last month after the Senate approved a guest worker program and a possible path to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants. Royce said he favors the path of the House, which approved a bill focusing on enforcement, with no provision for illegal immigrants or future guest workers.

Royce said he wanted the out-of-Washington hearings so the immigration debate would not be kept secret from the public. Democrats participated, but denounced them as political theater.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes (news, bio, voting record), a Texas Democrat, said the hearings were political, not practical.

"Congress needs to get back to work in Washington to reach a compromise agreement on comprehensive border security and immigration reform legislation," Reyes said.

Reynaldo Garza, acting Border Patrol chief of the Laredo sector testified Friday that he worries about possible links between drug cartels and terrorists.

"Yes, there is an opportunity for them to infuse these types of persons that would do America harm into these" organizations, Garza said.

Garza said high-tech tools such as remote video systems and ground sensor equipment are critical in securing the border.

Sheriff Rick Flores of Webb County, which includes Laredo, described what he called "high risk" border infiltrations, noting that many arrests involve non-Mexicans.

"What needs to be made clear is that our pleas for help are based largely ... on the federal government's failure to meet its responsibilities," he said.

Also this week, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who backs the Senate bill, held a hearing in Philadelphia on the issue featuring New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

DOJ_NMG_0039645

Bloomberg testified Thursday that the economy of the country's largest city and the entire nation would collapse if illegal immigrants were deported en masse.

Republican-led House committees will hold hearings outside Washington later this month on making English the nation's official language, and how enforcement of immigration laws affects American workers.

A hearing the week of Aug. 14 in Arizona will focus on costs to local and state governments "caused by an unsecured border."

Funding, Agents Urged For Border (HC)

By John W. Gonzalez

Houston Chronicle, July 8, 2006

LAREDO - With the Rio Grande as a backdrop, members of Congress heard disturbing testimony Friday about the dangers that federal and local law enforcement agencies face trying to control a seemingly endless flow of illegal immigrants and contraband across the river into the United States.

The area's top U.S. Border Patrol agent and others testified they're still outmanned and outgunned by sophisticated smugglers, but increased personnel, advances in surveillance technology and stepped-up removal proceedings are leveling the battlefield.

Still, officials pleaded for more federal funds to provide additional agents and equipment along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico, 1,200 miles of which are in Texas.

In the meantime, they acknowledged terrorists could cross the river laden with weapons, and a federal auditor testified he's proven how porous the northern and southern borders are by using bogus documents to import nuclear bomb-making materials.

"The Customs and Border Protection inspectors never questioned the authenticity of the investigator's counterfeit bill of lading or the counterfeit NRC document authorizing them to receive, acquire, possess and transfer radioactive sources," the audit report said.

The audit was submitted to the U.S. House Subcommittee on International Terrorism and Nonproliferation during a field hearing that drew nine House members, including Reps. Ted Poe, R-Humble, and Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Houston.

A similar session for invited testimony only was held in San Diego on Wednesday, and it, too, provoked partisan clashes among Republicans who favor tougher border law enforcement and Democrats who also advocate a broad overhaul of immigration laws.

Some of the Democrats dismissed the hearing as a "sham" that wouldn't help border law enforcement. They chided GOP members for not fully funding previous requests for boosted personnel and equipment on the border.

"We made the point about various amendments that have been defeated because money is key," Jackson Lee said. Citing the "very potent" testimony of the auditor, she said "that's what Americans need to be concerned about."

GOP members said immigration policy wasn't their immediate focus because the border is out of control. That stance was embodied in a House-approved bill that addresses enforcement issues but, unlike a Senate-approved version, does not contemplate amnesty or a guest worker program for the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants.

The Senate bill would "tie the hands of local law enforcement," said subcommittee chairman Rep. Ed Royce, R-Calif. "(It) actually rolls back border protection. The House bill advances it."

In addition to hearing testimony at La Posada Hotel overlooking the river, Royce and other members spent time with Border Patrol agents as they used video surveillance equipment to monitor river crossings. They also met with Texas National Guard members who began arriving last month to temporarily bolster the patrol while new agents are being trained.

After seeing area operations, Royce said he believes this region would benefit from fences or other barriers erected near the river. Royce also said he would seek increased funds to reimburse sheriff's departments for their efforts supporting human and drug interdiction efforts.

Royce joined other members in calling for deployment of unmanned aerial vehicles as surveillance tools, and he praised federal prosecution and expedited removal programs that have curtailed so-called "catch-and-release" of immigrants from nations other than Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0039646

Yet, while Congress wrangles with funding issues and immigration policy, local residents remain concerned about their safety and their ability to do business along the border.

"I believe my ranchers who say they can't even check on their cattle anymore without having an armed guard if they live near the border," said Rep. Henry Bonilla, R-San Antonio, whose district stretches from Laredo to El Paso.

Bonilla raised concerns — shared by agents — that large numbers of Border Patrol officers assigned to Texas have been deployed to help reckon with an influx of immigrants in Arizona. Equipment, too, has been relocated, officials said.

"We are at odds with the executive branch on this," Bonilla said.

"It makes it more difficult here," conceded Laredo chief patrol agent Reynaldo Garza.

N.Y. Court OKs Legal Alien Test For License (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- New York's Department of Motor Vehicles can require immigrants to prove they are in this country legally before allowing them to have driver's licenses, a state appeals court ruled.

The 5-0 ruling Thursday by the Appellate Division in Manhattan reversed a decision by Justice Karen S. Smith, who ordered the DMV last year to stop denying driver's licenses to immigrants who didn't have Social Security numbers or proof they were here legally.

In dismissing the illegal aliens' complaint, the appeals court said Justice Smith had erred in barring the identity procedures DMV Commissioner Raymond Martinez put in place and said they were "within his authority and enforceable."

The court noted cases in which one Social Security number was used to get licenses for 57 persons and another in which one taxi driver used two numbers to get two licenses -- one for insurance and the other for traffic tickets.

Foster Maer, a lawyer for the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, which represented the plaintiffs, said his group was considering an appeal.

The DMV began lifting the licenses of illegal aliens in 2004, a move that advocates said would cost as many as 300,000 people their driving privileges.

The plaintiffs in the case had argued that their constitutional rights were being violated.

State officials defended the identity procedures as an effort to combat fraud and terrorism.

La Raza Forum Targets Immigration (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

One of the nation's largest Latino advocacy and civil rights organizations plans to meet in Los Angeles this weekend to instruct people how to mobilize and vote out those who fail to back generous new immigration laws.

The National Council of La Raza will highlight immigration at its annual conference beginning today, featuring a bipartisan lineup of such high-profile speakers as former President Clinton, Republican presidential political strategist Karl Rove, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa.

The conference comes as the two chambers of Congress hold competing summer hearings on the issue, with the House stressing stronger border enforcement and the Senate promoting a broader approach that includes legalization for undocumented immigrants and more visas for family members and guest workers. Efforts to reconcile the two approaches have stalled.

"We're in a stalemate…. It looks dismal," said Janet Murguia, La Raza's president and chief executive officer. "We want people to walk away from our conference with clear steps they can take if nothing happens."

Murguia criticized the hearings as a "delaying tactic" that would give immigration control forces a chance to use the volatile issue in the November elections.

"The hearings suggest to me that there are some in Congress — especially in the House — who would prefer to have an issue as opposed to a solution," she said.

The nonprofit organization, based in Washington, D.C., claims 40,000 members and a network of nearly 300 affiliated community organizations that focus primarily on civil rights, immigration, economics, education and health.

DOJ_NMG_0039647

Founded in 1968, the organization grew out of efforts to promote civil rights for Mexican Americans but soon expanded to embrace all of the subgroups among the nation's 40 million Latinos.

Murguia said those groups historically have championed separate issues tied to their ancestral countries: trade sanctions against Cuba, the political status of Puerto Rico. But the immigration issue has drawn all of them together in a striking way, she said.

"It has taken us a while to get comfortable under the same umbrella," Murguia said. But immigration "marches showed we can find solidarity and common ground to advance our community overall."

The conference, scheduled to run today through Tuesday at the Los Angeles Convention Center, is expected to draw 20,000 people. Forums will offer updates on the various immigration proposals and discuss such hot issues as tensions within the labor movement over guest worker programs and among various ethnic communities over immigration, poverty and other issues.

Clinton and Villaraigosa are scheduled to address the conference this morning, followed by a lunchtime speech by Schwarzenegger. A daylong workshop to help people apply for U.S. citizenship will be offered today in partnership with other Latino advocacy organizations. Murguia said the workshop would support Democracy Summer, a major national initiative to produce as many as 1 million new Latino citizens and voters this year.

In addition to immigration, the conference will focus on issues including health, education and economic empowerment.

Workshops will be offered on tax planning and mortgage lending, the universal preschool movement, teenage pregnancy and HIV and AIDS.

"Demographers say we are now the largest minority population in the country, but the challenge is how to leverage this growth into economic empowerment, political power and social advancement," Murguia said.

Cracking Down On Borders And Bosses (WP)

By Julie Myers

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

The lure of well-paid jobs continues to be the primary magnet for most people who come to this country illegally. A comprehensive immigration strategy that includes a temporary worker program, as proposed by President Bush, is critical to stemming this flow. This strategy must also include work-site enforcement with real consequences for those who knowingly employ illegal aliens.

My agency, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), was created in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001. At first we focused our work-site enforcement efforts on illegal workers at critical infrastructure locations such as nuclear and chemical plants, military installations, airports and seaports. While we continue to maintain these priorities, the agency is also focusing more on traditional work sites.

We believe the most effective strategy in combating illegal employment is criminal prosecution of unscrupulous employers and seizure of their ill-gotten assets. As the immigration debate has heated up, we have heard repeated charges that ICE is failing in its work-site enforcement efforts because the number of employer fines has decreased. In fact, our efforts have grown more robust. What has changed is our strategy.

One thing we have learned from the old Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) is that simply fining employers for hiring illegal workers doesn't work. INS agents invested substantial time and effort in issuing proposed administrative fines against unscrupulous employers, only to see the fines ignored, paid in an untimely manner or reduced to nothing. For many employers, these fines amounted to a cost of doing business. They were no deterrent.

We can achieve far greater respect for the law among employers by bringing criminal prosecutions and seizing assets derived from illegal employment schemes. The prospect of 10 years in federal prison and losing that new home and car to forfeiture has much sharper teeth than a small fine. This is the future of work-site enforcement. So how does this new approach differ from the strategy employed by the INS?

Take the Kawasaki restaurant chain in Baltimore, for example. In March, ICE executed warrants at three Kawasaki restaurants and four related residences, where we found 15 undocumented workers living in deplorable conditions. The restaurant owners exploited this cheap, illegal labor to maximize profits so that they could purchase luxury vehicles and other assets for themselves. ICE agents arrested the owners on criminal charges of money-laundering and harboring illegal aliens. We also seized eight luxury vehicles, 10 bank accounts and at least one home purchased with proceeds from this illegal hiring scheme. The owners have since pleaded guilty to the criminal charges and agreed to forfeit approximately $1.1 million in assets.

DOJ_NMG_0039648

How would this case have been handled in the past? INS agents would have simply conducted an inspection of Kawasaki's employment paperwork, which would have led to a minor fine based on paperwork violations. The maximum penalty would have been approximately $20,000, and the owners would have escaped without even misdemeanor charges. In many cases, such a fine would have been negotiated down considerably.

Already this fiscal year, ICE has arrested more than 382 people on criminal charges in work-site enforcement cases and apprehended another 2,100 on immigration violations. In fiscal 2002, the last full year of the INS, the total number of criminal arrests in work-site enforcement cases was a mere 25, while the total arrests for immigration violations numbered 485.

The president has requested $41.7 million in new funds to strengthen work-site enforcement efforts in fiscal 2007. These funds would support the hiring of an additional 171 special agents and 35 support personnel dedicated solely to work-site enforcement investigations.

ICE continues to watch the immigration debate in Congress with great interest. It is our hope that Congress will give full consideration to increasing civil penalties in work-site enforcement cases, as well as new access to Social Security "no-match" information. These steps would allow ICE to be alerted when companies are notified by the Social Security Administration that they have submitted Social Security data inconsistent with information on file -- often an indicator of an illegal worker problem at a company.

As the largest law enforcement agency in the Department of Homeland Security, ICE takes its responsibilities seriously. While most employers want to do the right thing, those who don't should know that they will face the full array of the agency's law enforcement tools and authorities.

The writer is assistant secretary of homeland security for immigration and customs enforcement.

Ex-border Agents Plead Guilty To Bribery (AP-Y2)

By Elliot Spagat, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 8, 2006

Two former Border Patrol agents pleaded guilty Friday to accepting nearly $200,000 in bribes for releasing immigrant smugglers and illegal immigrants from federal custody.

Mario Alvarez and Samuel McClaren each face up to 18 years in prison when they are sentenced Sept. 29, U.S. District Judge John Houston said. Each pleaded guilty to one count of bribery and one count of filing a false tax return.

"These are Border Patrol agents who smuggled illegal aliens," U.S. Attorney Carol Lam said. "It doesn't get much worse than that."

Alvarez admitted taking $100,300 from a smuggling organization from June 2003 to March 2006; McClaren admitted taking $85,940 from the same smuggling organization.

The former agents did not make any statements beyond acknowledging guilt. Alvarez is free on bond and McClaren planned to post bail soon, defense attorney Martin Molina said.

According to the indictment, the two agents took bribes while in the Border Patrol's El Centro sector, which covers the eastern half of California's border with Mexico.

The complaint said they brought two smugglers into the United States in a government vehicle in September 2004 and released one of them from federal custody three months later in exchange for $10,000. In October 2005, the agents dropped off an illegal immigrant who was to be deported to Mexico at a Wal-Mart parking lot for $6,000, the complaint said.

Calderon Blasts Plan For Wall Along U.S.-Mexico Border (KRT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Knight Ridder, July 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039649

MEXICO CITY - Felipe Calderon on Friday took sides in the battle over immigration, blasting a U.S. congressional plan to build a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border while endorsing a U.S. Senate proposal that would offer a route to legal citizenship for millions of undocumented Mexicans living in the United States.

"The solution for migration is not to build walls," he said.

Calderon also called for a joint development fund among Mexico, the United States and Canada that would finance public works construction in poor areas of Mexico.

"A kilometer of highway in Zacatecas or Michoacan can do more to reduce migration than 10 kilometers of wall in Texas or Arizona," he said.

He also ruled out reopening the agriculture provisions of the North American Free Trade Agreement, which took effect in 1994. Instead, he pledged a new government program focused on helping farmers hurt by imported U.S. corn.

Calderon's comments to foreign reporters were his first since the completion Thursday of the official ballot count that showed him the winner by a slim 0.58 percentage point. His leftist rival, Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, has promised to challenge the result. Calderon had met with Mexican reporters on Wednesday.

But Calderon appeared as confident in his victory as if he had won the election by a landslide. In addition to criticizing proposals for a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border, he rapped China for its human rights record and promised an aggressive foreign policy that would push Mexico into a leadership role in the Western Hemisphere.

He said a ballot-by-ballot recount demanded by Lopez Obrador was unnecessary and predicted that the Federal Electoral Tribunal would quickly validate his win.

He made a point of bolstering his democratic credentials, pointing out that his National Action Party, or PAN, fought for decades to make Mexico democratic when it was ruled for 71 years by the oft-corrupt Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI.

And he questioned his opponent's democratic pedigree, noting that Lopez Obrador's campaign coordinator, Manuel Camacho Solis, held the same job in 1988 for the PRI when it was largely seen as having stolen the presidential election from the founder of Lopez Obrador's Party of the Democratic Revolution, or PRD.

"Let me remind you that I was fighting for democracy when my political adversaries were fighting against democracy," Calderon said.

Calderon will be only the second Mexican president not affiliated with the PRI since the 1920s. In 2000, the current president, Vicente Fox, also a PAN member, became the first. For the first time, the PAN will also control the largest number of seats in Congress, though not a majority.

But Calderon said he would quickly reach out to small splinter parties and the PRI to build a majority.

Usually described as aloof, Calderon went out of his way to appear charming. Before answering questions for about an hour, he walked through the crowded conference room at a Mexico City hotel and shook each reporter's hand.

He said his foreign policy would respect the rights of countries to choose their own form of government but would stress such universal principles as civil liberty.

When asked by a Chinese correspondent about bilateral relations, Calderon noted China's rapid growth and large population as an opportunity for Mexican exports. But he then issued a cloaked call for greater human rights in China: "I hope that one day, there will vigilance around the world on human rights."

Calderon's apparent victory ends the streak of Latin American elections that put left-leaning governments in office. Mexico joins Colombia as the only other Latin nation with a conservative government, and Calderon said he'd work hard to bridge ideological differences and forge closer relations with neighbors in the hemisphere.

A key reason for Calderon's apparent win was his attack ads on Lopez Obrador, which compared him to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, a vocal U.S. critic. Calderon smiled broadly when a Venezuelan TV correspondent asked about Venezuela's vice president, Jose Vicente Rangel, who labeled Mexico's election results as "suspicious."

"I'm sorry to have disappointed them by winning," he said.

Mexico's relationship with Cuba was severely strained under Fox, who joined the United States in criticizing the lack of civil liberties on the island nation. Calderon said he'd seek a constructive relationship with Cuba because it would be in the interest of Mexicans. But he also took a backhanded jab as Castro by noting that "before I was even born, he was in power."

DOJ_NMG_0039650

Apparent Mexican Winner Attacks Border Wall (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

MEXICO CITY, July 7 -- Less than 24 hours after being named president-elect in a disputed official count, Felipe Calderon took a firm stance against building a wall along the United States-Mexico border to stem illegal immigration.

Echoing his campaign theme, Calderon said the best solution to the immigration crisis was creating jobs in Mexico, "not walls or troops," a reference to President Bush's decision to send National Guard troops to support the U.S. Border Patrol.

Calderon's remarks, delivered during his first post-election briefing for the international news media, angered a leading Capitol Hill proponent of increased border security. Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) said in a phone interview that he was "insulted" by Calderon's statement, "just as Mexico would be rightly offended if we were to not only condemn their immigration policies but actively work to aid and abet illegal immigration."

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) another proponent of increased border fencing, said Friday in an e-mailed statement that he was "hopeful Mexico's president-elect will also look more closely at the benefits security fencing brings to both sides of the border."

The reaction presages what is likely to be one of the most contentious issues facing Calderon if his victory is upheld by the special elections court that will a hear a challenge of the results by his main opponent, Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador. Attempts by Mexican presidents to influence U.S. policy have often received frosty receptions. The outgoing president, Vicente Fox, failed to reach an immigration accord with the United States.

Immigration legislation in the U.S. Congress is stalled. The House of Representatives voted in December to build 700 miles of new fences along the border, and the Senate has voted to approve 370 miles of fencing. But neither proposal has been passed into law.

Calderon was declared the winner of Mexico's presidential race Thursday after an all-night count yielded an official tally that showed him half a percentage point, slightly more than 200,000 votes, ahead of Lopez Obrador. Lopez Obrador alleges that the vote was marred by numerous "inconsistencies," such as more votes being recorded than the number of ballots delivered at thousands of polling places. He plans to hold a rally Saturday in Mexico City's large downtown square, the Zocalo. On Friday, 1,000 of his supporters began a 60-mile march to Mexico City from the town of Pachuca.

Mexico's special elections court has until Sept. 6 to decided whether to certify the results. But Calderon is talking and acting as if his victory is assured On Friday, he said there was no doubt about the results and predicted he would work well with opposing parties, even though his National Action Party does not have a majority in the legislature. He also said he would not privatize Mexico's Pemex oil company.

Calderon also wants measures that will protect what he called "vulnerable" crops, such as corn and beans. Lopez Obrador had vowed to defy provisions of the North American Free Trade Agreement that call for reducing tariffs on U.S. corn and beans. Many small Mexican farmers have said the reduced tariffs would put them out of business. Calderon said Friday he would not try to renegotiate the provisions. "The way the U.S. Congress is now," he said, "I don't see a large probability that the winner of the renegotiation would easily be Mexico."

Calderon said one of his first trips as president would be to the United States, where he wants to meet with Mexican Americans. More than 20.6 million people of Mexican origin live in the United States, representing 58 percent of the nation's Hispanic population, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. The Pew Hispanic Center says there are also 6.2 million Mexicans living in the United States illegally.

Meeting Danger Well South Of The Border (WP)

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

TECUN UMAN, Guatemala -- Mario Lobo stood on the muddy bank of the Suchiate River just after dawn, staring dispiritedly at the roiling current separating him from Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0039651

The slight, 22-year-old Honduran was still 1,500 miles from the U.S. boundary line. But for Lobo and tens of thousands of other impoverished Central Americans who sneak into the United States each year, the real border begins here, at Guatemala's frontier with Mexico -- and onward through the entire length of Mexico -- as they embark on a succession of ordeals of which the dangerous trek through the desert into Arizona or Texas is merely the final chapter.

Every step requires split-second decisions that can mean the difference between life and death. Should they ford a rushing river or spend precious pennies on a raft ride? Are the bandits on a remote path more dangerous than the immigration checkpoints along the main road? And will hopping a speeding freight train dramatically reduce the journey time, or will a slip and a fall permanently cut it short? Lobo had heard about these perils from others who had made this trip before. Yet as he contemplated the coffee-colored waves of the Suchiate, all other dangers paled in comparison with the one foremost in his mind.

"That water," he muttered to his two traveling companions, "looks very deep."

Most migrants cross the river on rafts built from two black inner tubes lashed to a couple of planks of wood. But the raft owners charge 10 Guatemalan quetzales per person -- about $1.30. Lobo and his friends had only seven quetzales between them.

"We can wade across like him," suggested one of Lobo's friends, Francisco Quintero, 28, pointing to a sinewy man who was pulling his raft against the current with a rope tied around his waist. "See, the water only reaches to his chest."

"No," answered Lobo glumly. "Look at him. He's not wading, he's swimming. You know how to swim. I don't."

Quintero gave a sigh that betrayed a touch of impatience. A veteran of the trip north with wide scars across his body to prove it, he had left a construction job in Reno, Nevada, to help guide one of his nephews from Honduras to the United States. Lobo and their third friend, Juan Vicente, 24, had decided to come along, drawn by the promise of jobs that pay more than $3 a day.

But Quintero's nephew had changed his mind on the bus from Honduras before the foursome ever reached the run-down border town of Tecun Uman, terrified by the stories he was hearing from fellow passengers.

Now it looked as though Lobo was going to bail as well.

"Okay," Quintero finally said. "What if I offer that rafter our seven quetzales to take only you? Juan and I can swim across."

Lobo silently nodded his assent.

About 20 minutes later the trio was standing on the opposite bank of the river, drying off with a towel supplied by a friendly Mexican woman. She watched from the doorway of her concrete-block hut as Vicente applied deodorant and Quintero carefully combed his hair. From this point forward, they knew, it would be crucial to blend in.

"Which way are you headed?" the woman asked.

"We're going to walk to Arriaga, then hop on the train from there," Quintero answered casually.

The woman clucked her tongue. "Very dangerous," she said with a shake of her head. "Lots of thieves about."The Train From Arriaga

About 160 miles farther north, at a shelter for migrants in Arriaga run by the local priest, a different set of Honduran friends were bent over a map of Mexico taped to the wall.

"My God, you mean we've only gotten this far!" Carlos Pineda, 22, exclaimed in dismay to Rafael Valencia, 18.

About 20 days earlier they had set off for the train station at Arriaga -- the southernmost terminus in Mexico -- from the same riverbank that Lobo and his friends had just reached. The slashes through each pocket of Valencia's jeans offered a hint at what the pair had endured since.

Their troubles began, they said, when six masked men wielding rifles and machetes ambushed them on a quiet stretch of the dirt path the two had chosen to skirt immigration checkpoints along the main road. "The bandits made us strip naked. Then they ripped through our clothes with their knives looking for money," Pineda recalled.

The thieves found 600 Mexican pesos -- about $50 -- that Pineda and Valencia, both bus drivers back in Honduras, had saved for the journey through Mexico. But the bandits missed an extra $7 that Pineda had stuffed down one of his socks. So he was still hopeful a few days later when he and Valencia met three Salvadoran women walking along the same path.

The prettiest had hair down to her shoulders and told Pineda she had left behind a 2-year-old girl, he recalled. She reminded Pineda of the wife and daughter he'd said a tearful goodbye to in Honduras.

Their conversation ended abruptly when seven men armed with pistols suddenly popped out of the foliage.

DOJ_NMG_0039652

Once again the migrants were forced to strip. This time the thieves found Pineda's $7 stash, he said. One of them also stole Valencia's sneakers, leaving him with a pair that was too small and falling apart.

Then one of the bandits grabbed the woman Pineda had been chatting with and ordered Pineda and Valencia to get lost as he began dragging her toward the forest.

"She was crying, begging him, 'Please, don't do this. Take everything you want. But don't do this,' " Pineda recounted in a miserable whisper. "The bandit punched her in the face and shouted, 'Shut up, stupid dog!' "

By the time a third gang of robbers accosted Pineda, Valencia, and another man on their path a few days later, Pineda recounted, they had nothing of value left. Enraged, the thieves began hacking at the third man with their machetes as Pineda and Valencia sprinted away.

"I knew this trip would be hard," Pineda said in a choked voice, blotting tears from his eyes with his white T-shirt. "But not like this."

Valencia, meanwhile, was more preoccupied with a rumor spreading through the shelter that a freight train would be leaving that night.

He pulled Pineda aside to share some train-hopping tips he had learned on previous trips north.

"See, when the train is moving, be careful not to run too close alongside it," Valencia explained, using his right hand to simulate a train moving along the dining table and his left hand to show a little man running toward it at top speed. "Otherwise the air will suck you right under the wheels."

The little finger-man slid under Valencia's right hand and collapsed on the table with a splat.

Pineda gave a weak chuckle. He looked like he wanted to vomit.

Yet as the afternoon gave way to evening, it was Pineda who seemed most eager to set out for the grassy expanse around the train station a few blocks away.

Several hundred migrants were already huddled there in the dimming twilight, waiting to stake out positions on the freight cars that rail workers were linking to form the train.

At about 10 p.m. the last car was rammed onto the back of the train with a bang that echoed in the pitch darkness. Migrants were now packed into every nook and cranny of the train.

For a moment there was total silence. Then the locomotive roared to life, and the train began to lurch forward with gathering speed.

Pineda and Valencia cheered from their perch atop a tanker car. "Woo-hoo!" the two friends could be heard yelling as the train thundered out of the station. "God is with us! To the North!"The Shelter at Tapachula

Alan Delgado gripped the edge of his mattress and clenched his teeth in agony. His right leg had been amputated above knee. Yet the nerves in his thigh continued to tingle and spasm as though it were still there. His friend Julio Cesar Lambert gave him an understanding smile from the next bed over. Lambert was missing his left leg.

Twelve days earlier the two Hondurans had boarded a 10 p.m. freight train from the same station in Arriaga that Pineda and Valencia had just left. Now they were the newest wards of the Shelter of Jesus the Good Shepherd, a refuge for injured migrants in the town of Tapachula, back toward the Guatemalan border. Police and hospital workers send at least 40 mangled migrants a month to the shelter, a collection of whitewashed concrete-block rooms.

Delgado, a short 22-year-old with impish features, said he could still remember the relief he'd felt as their train pulled out of Arriaga. But his optimism had been tempered by the pouring rain and his awareness of the 11-hour ride ahead.

About an hour-and-a-half into the journey, Delgado said, four masked bandits armed with guns emerged from a hiding place on the train and began leaping from car to car. One migrant apparently refused to give them his money. Three more simply had nothing to hand over. Delgado said the bandits grabbed each man by the shoulders and hurled him off the train.

The next morning, at the train's last stop in the town of Ixtepec, Delgado and Lambert said they hopped on a shorter train containing only a few freight cars. Soon afterward it rounded into a sharp curve so fast that the cars began to buck and sway with a sickening squeal. Sensing an impending derailment, Delgado tried to leap off.

The next thing he knew he was lying on the ground, a chunk of his right foot still stuck on the ladder of a freight car several feet away, the rest of his leg dangling from his thigh by a bloody shred of skin.

DOJ_NMG_0039653

Lambert's leg had been severed completely. So was that of a Honduran woman also brought to the shelter.

In the distance they could see the torso of a migrant whose body had been sliced in half. Two more migrants were crushed to death by a freight car, blood pooling from underneath.

For the next three-and-a-half hours Delgado and the other wounded waited for help under a broiling sun, wracked with a pain Delgado said was "indescribable, just un-erasable from your brain."

Delgado remembered screaming over and over again to keep from slipping into death.

When he came out of surgery that evening, Delgado said he wondered why he had struggled so hard.

"I looked at this stump and said, 'I'm a useless person now,' " he recalled. " 'What will I do in the world?' My American Dream ended on that train."

A few beds over, Hanibal Rodriguez, 28, had other plans. A burly Honduran headed to a landscaping job in New Jersey, Rodriguez said he was robbed and shot in the leg three times several weeks earlier by uniformed police near Arriaga.

But his wounds were healing nicely. He'd be ready to return to Honduras in about a week.

"I'll stay for two, maybe three months to recuperate," Rodriguez said. "After that," he added, flashing a toothy grin, "It's back to the north."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Rejects Solo Talks With North Korea (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

President Wants to Wait for Allies to Unite Over Nuclear Arms Program, Testing

CHICAGO, July 7 -- President Bush on Friday defended his response to the budding crisis spawned by North Korea's missile tests, saying he will not "get caught in the trap of sitting alone with North Korea at the table."

Bush said he will patiently wait for the other countries taking part in the six-party talks to speak with a single voice, urging North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons program and refrain from further long-range missile tests -- a process that he acknowledged will take time.

"The problem with diplomacy, it takes a while to get something done," Bush said. "If you're acting alone, you can move quickly. When you're rallying world opinion and trying to come up with the right language at the United Nations to send a clear signal, it takes a while."

The United States is working with China, Russia, Japan and South Korea to urge North Korea to abandon its nuclear program. The White House has encouraged tough economic sanctions since Tuesday's launch of seven missiles, including one with the capacity to reach Alaska. But China and Russia have resisted sanctions, even as Pyongyang has threatened to move ahead with more tests.

Bush's comments came during an unusual news conference here at the Museum of Science and Industry. With the exception of his foreign trips, Bush almost always holds news conferences at the White House. But Friday's event involved local reporters as well as the national news media who travel with him.

"I'm sure you're wondering why I would have a press conference in Chicago," Bush said. "It's a fabulous city; plus, I like to see what it's like to have a major press conference outside of Washington. It might do me some good. The truth of the matter is, it might do the White House press corps some good as well."

As campaigns heat up for November's midterm elections and with the president's popularity hovering below 40 percent in most public opinion polls, White House officials said Bush's appearance is his first in a series planned in coming months.

"You're going to see some times where the president goes out, spends a bit of time in a place, talks with the leaders, drills into the issues, listens to what they have to say, builds trips generally around one topic," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

DOJ_NMG_0039654

Typically when Bush travels domestically, he delivers a speech and quickly moves on. But Bush began his visit here Thursday evening with a dinner with Mayor Richard M. Daley (D) and local business leaders. Before his news conference Friday morning, he had breakfast with other local executives.

After his news conference, Bush attended a $1.2 million fundraiser for gubernatorial challenger Judy Baar Topinka, the three-term state treasurer who is the only Republican to hold statewide office in Illinois. He then traveled to nearby Aurora to tout his efforts to bolster high-tech research and education at Cabot Microelectronics, which makes substances that help in the manufacture of sophisticated semiconductors.

Despite widespread public discontent with GOP congressional leaders, Bush predicted that Republicans will keep control of the House and Senate, allowing them to continue setting the nation's legislative agenda for the next two years.

"You win elections by believing something," Bush said, when asked whether his poor poll numbers are hurting GOP candidates. "You win elections by having a plan to protect the American people from terrorist attack. You win elections by having a philosophy that has actually produced results -- economic growth, for example -- or kind of changing the school systems for the better, or providing prescription drug coverage for elders."

Bush ducked questions about a possible U.S. military response to North Korea, and he emphasized that he will continue pursuing diplomatic solutions, even if they prove "slow and cumbersome."

Asked whether he believes the U.S. missile defense system could have intercepted a missile aimed at this country, Bush said: "Yes, I think we had a reasonable chance of shooting it down. At least that's what the military commanders told me."

Some experts speculate that North Korea is stoking a crisis in hopes of drawing the United States into direct negotiations.

"It's an interesting question: Is he trying to force us to do something by defying the world? If he wants a way forward, it's clear," Bush said of North Korean President Kim Jong Il. "If he wants to have good relations with the world, he's got to verifiably get rid of his weapons programs."

The White House also is working to forge a diplomatic consensus against Iran, which is pursuing its own nuclear program. Bush said next week's meeting of the Group of Eight leaders in St. Petersburg, Russia, will be an opportunity to send a clear message as Iran considers an incentive package aimed at curtailing its nuclear program.

"Some nations are more comfortable with sanctions than other nations," Bush said. "Part of the issue we face in some of these countries is that they've got economic interests. And part of our objective is to make sure that national security interests, security-of-the-world interests, trump economic interests."

Bush In Chicago In Bid To Boost Standing (AP-Y2)

By Tara Burghart, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 8, 2006

President Bush had breakfast at a popular diner and met with business leaders during an overnight trip to Chicago, part of an effort to boost his sagging popularity by putting him on the road more often this summer.

Inside the diner Friday morning, Bush greeted customers, who said they appreciated what the president was doing. Guinn Gandy, a Texas native who now lives in suburban Aurora, said no one asked any difficult questions.

"It's not appropriate here," Gandy said. "The man's trying to have breakfast."

The president also had dinner with Democratic Mayor Richard M. Daley, who joined Bush at a news conference Friday.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said similar trips were being planned for the president throughout the summer, with Bush spending more time in communities to "really sink his teeth into the local market."

There also was some political fundraising on the trip, as Bush helped raise $1.2 million for Judy Baar Topinka, the Republican state treasurer who is trying to unseat Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich.

Outside the hotel where the fundraiser was held Friday, several dozen protesters carried anti-Bush and anti-war messages. A couple demonstrators burned American flags.

On Thursday, Bush dined with business leaders, including Juan Ochoa, president and CEO of the Illinois Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. He said Bush and his guests spent about 20 minutes talking about immigration reform and its prospects in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0039655

"It was comforting for me to know a Republican president would make an attempt to pass immigration reform," said Ochoa, who called himself a staunch Democrat. "President Clinton had eight years and at no point did I feel it was a priority for him."

They also spoke about the morale of troops in Iraq and leadership in South America, he said.

One protester at the restaurant, in a gentrifying neighborhood just south of the city's business district, said Bush needed to visit other spots in Chicago if he wanted to hear from average Americans.

"If he really wants to meet with real people, this is certainly not the place to do it," said Lindsie Chait, holding a sign reading "Bush Step Down." "He should go to poorer areas of the city."

Larry J. Sabato, director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics, said trips like the one to Chicago demonstrate that Bush does connect better with voters in informal sessions out of the Beltway. But he said the main problem is the unpopularity of the Iraq war.

"Until things look up in Iraq, and American troops are coming home in significant numbers, Bush's own numbers won't improve much," Sabato said in an e-mail.

___

Associated Press writers Don Babwin, Michael Tarm and Carla K. Johnson contributed to this report.

Bush Says UN Must Send A Clear Message To North Korea (BLOOM)

By Jay Newton-Small

Bloomberg, July 8, 2006

President George W. Bush said the United Nations must send a clear message to North Korea's leader to disarm and that ``rallying world opinion" takes time.

``What matters most of all is for Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice," Bush told a news conference today at Chicago's Museum of Science and Industry. Bush said the U.S. had a ``reasonable chance" of shooting down long-range missiles if necessary, while describing the U.S. anti-ballistic systems as ``modest."

The U.S. is working with China, Russia, Japan and South Korea to persuade North Korea to disarm after that country vowed yesterday to continue missile tests it began this week in Asia over the Sea of Japan.

If Kim ``wants to have good relations with the world, he has to verifiably get rid of his weapons programs," Bush said.

The U.S. chief negotiator in six-nation talks aimed at dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons is in the region meeting with his counterparts.

``China doesn't support North Korea's missile launches," Christopher Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asia and Pacific, told a press briefing in Beijing, before leaving for Seoul. ``North Korea did not heed China's advice to refrain from firing those missiles."

Hill made China, North Korea's staunchest international ally, the first stop in a four-nation trip as the UN Security Council considers a formal rebuke to North Korea. The U.S. is trying to persuade China to condemn North Korea's missile tests.

Appeal for Patience

China and Russia, both veto-wielding permanent members of the Security Council, have signaled disagreement with the U.S., U.K. and France, the other members, over how much international pressure should be brought to bear on North Korea.

South Korea will suspend aid to North Korea indefinitely in response to the communist regime's missile tests, Agence France-Presse said today, citing an unidentified South Korean official in Seoul.

Bush said today that North Korea's missile launches showed that the U.S. needs a ballistic missile defense system, without guaranteeing that it can shoot a missile down at this point. ``It's new research," he said. `It's hard for me to give you a probability of success."

The U.S. has 11 interceptors in silos in Alaska and California that could be directed by ground- and naval-based radar to destroy a target. The U.S. system's last successful intercept test was in October 2002. Several subsequent tests failed.

Iranian Program

DOJ_NMG_0039656

The U.S. also is working diplomatically to confront Iran, another threat, on its nuclear program. Bush said next weekend's meeting of the Group of Eight leaders in St. Petersburg, Russia, will be an opportunity to send a clear message as Iran considers an incentives package aimed at curtailing the country's program. China and Russia have opposed harsh sanctions.

``Some nations are more comfortable with sanctions than other nations," Bush said. ``Part of the issue we face in some of these countries is that they've got economic interests. And part of our objective is to make sure that national security interests, security-of-the-world interests, trump economic interests."

``These problems didn't arise overnight, and they don't get solved overnight," Bush said in response to a question on whether the missile launches represent a failed U.S. policy.

Strategy Shift

Today's news conference marked a shift in Bush's communications strategy, drawing in local and regional reporters as well as national media. ``I'd like to see what it's like to do a press conference outside of Washington," Bush said.

Bush also attended a $1.2 million fund-raiser for Republican gubernatorial challenger Judy Baar Topinka. Outside Chicago's Drake Hotel, where the fund-raiser was held, dozens of protesters held anti-Bush signs and burned at least two American flags.

Bush later toured Cabot Microelectronics Corp. in suburban Aurora, praising the facility for ``innovative" work in nanotechnology and superconductors.

The administration is stressing the strength of the economy to bolster Republicans in the November elections. ``People are better off, things are working," Bush said this morning, adding that the U.S. has added more jobs for 34 straight months.

The economy added fewer jobs in June than economists expected, reducing the urgency for further Federal Reserve interest-rate increases even as wages rose the most in five years, the Labor Department reported today.

Bush Salutes Daley; Boosts Topinka Campaign (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson

Chicago Tribune, July 8, 2006

President Bush offered a staunch defense of Mayor Richard Daley Friday, calling him "a great mayor" and a friend despite the federal convictions of former top Daley patronage aides on charges of rigging jobs for mayoral campaign workers.

Appearing at a near hourlong news conference at the Museum of Science and Industry, Bush said he could not provide an assessment of the job U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald has done on the local level in bringing corruption charges against officials in city and state government.

But the president credited Fitzpatrick for acting "very professional" in his role as a special federal prosecutor in Washington investigating the leaked identity of a CIA operativethat resulted in an indictment against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff.

Bush said he had not given any thought to formally reappointing Fitzgerald as U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Illinois. Though Fitzgerald's four-year term ran out in October, he continues to serve under federal statute until a vacancy exists—a factor that some observers say eliminates the need for a formal reappointment.

About 40 federal prosecutors nationally are operating under the same status as Fitzgerald.

With Daley sitting side-by-side with one of his chief critics, U.S. Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr. (D-Ill.), Bush said, "I haven't been following the cases here" in Chicago involving Fitzgerald's prosecution of alleged City Hall corruption. On Thursday, only hours before Bush arrived for his two-day Chicago stay, a federal jury convicted Robert Sorich, Daley's former top patronage aide, and three others charged with a scheme to steer jobs to campaign workers.

"I still think he's a great mayor," Bush said of Daley when asked about the latest federal convictions. "It is a well-run city and he gets a lot of credit for it. He doesn't get sole credit, but he gets a lot of credit. He's a leader."

Bush said he was "proud" to call Daley "a friend" and to have shared his 60th birthday on Thursday night with the mayor at a private dinner in the South Loop.

The Republican president has long saluted Daley's status as one of the nation's most powerful Democratic mayors.

DOJ_NMG_0039657

Bush praised the mayor again later on Friday in an unusual setting—while keynoting a fundraising luncheon for Republican gubernatorial candidate Judy Baar Topinka before an audience of 500 people that included U.S. House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Oswego, former Gov. Jim Edgar, state Republican Chairman Andy McKenna and the rest of the 2006 GOP statewide slate.

"Had a fabulous night last night with the mayor," Bush said. "They asked me at a press conference about the mayor. I said, 'The mayor is a man of his word.' He said, 'You're going to get clobbered in Chicago in 2000,' and he kept his word."

At the $500 per person fundraiser, Bush said Topinka was going to be "a fabulous governor" and called her "a good, fine, honest person, who knows what she's doing." Topinka, in her brief introduction of the president, referred to Bush as a "wonderful man."

During his news conference, Bush said he was unaware of an April column by George Will about Topinka in which an unidentified aide said of a presidential visit: "We just want him to raise money. Late at night. In an undisclosed location."

"Didn't work. I'm coming to have lunch," Bush said. "I think it's going to be a pretty successful fundraiser."

Bush made no mention of Topinka's opponent, Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich, whose name he had difficulty pronouncing during a visit to Hastert's district last summer to sign a massive federal transportation funding bill.

But Blagojevich, appearing at a bill-signing ceremony, contended Bush was only raising money for Topinka because "that's his team and he's got to help his team."

In a bit of topsy-turvy politics, Bush touted the health of the state's economy by echoing Blagojevich in noting the state led the nation for job creation in April. And Bush's 2004 presidential opponent, U.S. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), appeared to side with Topinka's criticism of the Democratic governor on the issue of job creation.

"The president praises the optimism of Illinois businesses, yet more of the state's businesses closed their doors in 2004 than new businesses were opened," Kerry said in a statement.

Bush Gets Taste Of Chicago Politics (CHIST)

By Andrew Herrmann

Chicago Sun-Times, July 8, 2006

President Bush got a taste of Chicago on Friday, noshing at a popular downtown breakfast spot before getting a helping of Illinois politics.

In a press conference here, Chicago reporters offered up two sour subjects: City Hall corruption and insulting remarks about Bush by an aide to Republican gubernatorial nominee Judy Baar Topinka.

Bush didn't bite.

President takes a soft poke at Cubs

In a bit of good-natured baseball banter, President Bush needled a Chicago Tribune reporter Thursday about the Tribune Co.-owned Cubs.

Following a press conference at the Museum of Science and Industry, the president joked that he would have talked about the Cubs, but "I didn't want to bring up a sore subject."

The hapless squad is a recurring theme with the president.

During a speech here last May, Bush noted that when he threw out the first pitch for the team's season opener, they beat the Cincinnati Reds 16-7.

"So I want to assure all the Cubs fans here that the last time I saw them play, they were undefeated," Bush said.

Despite a federal jury's verdict that city hiring and promotions were politically fixed, the president called Mayor Daley "a great mayor" who heads "a well-run city."

As for the Topinka camp remarks, made to columnist George Will in April, that her campaign would have preferred the embattled president come "in the middle of the night" at an "undisclosed location" -- a shot at his weak and possibly politically contagious levels of public support -- Bush shrugged it off.

"Didn't work. I'm coming to have lunch," a laughing Bush told reporters at the Museum of Science and Industry.

The $500-a-plate salmon and shrimp lunch at the Drake Hotel helped raise $1.2 million for Topinka's gubernatorial campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0039658

The president held the 55-minute news conference as part of a new effort to try to turn around his low poll ratings before the crucial midterm elections in November. Chicago-based reporters were given the opportunity to participate in questioning the president outside of Washington, a rare move that Bush said "might do me some good" and -- in a jab -- added "might do the White House press corps some good, as well."

'I'm proud to call him my friend'

National and local reporters asked him about a range of topics, including the North Korean crisis, the war in Iraq, foreign ownership of defense companies and skyrocketing gasoline prices.

As Daley sat to the side of the podium, Bush was reminded by a reporter that last summer, he had called Daley a "great mayor." Given the conviction Thursday of Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and three others for doling out jobs and promotions to reward the mayor's political workers, the president was asked whether his assessment had changed.

Bush turned to Daley and said, "I still think he's a great mayor. ... I'm proud to call him my friend.

"The thing I like about Daley is ... when he tells you something, he means it. Like, he told me, 'We're going to whomp you in the 2000 election.' He meant it," referring to Bush's loss of Illinois in his first presidential election.

As for the Topinka aide's remarks, undisputed by the nominee, Bush said he hadn't heard them but wasn't offended. He downplayed his effect on the outcome -- good or bad -- of elections.

"Here's how you win elections: You win elections by believing something," he said.

Topinka: 'This is doable'

After the luncheon at the Drake, Topinka dismissed the remarks as "a throwaway comment" and said the president's appearance, besides helping her "get a few dollars in the bank," helps give her campaign some legitimacy. Bush's visit, at the invitation of Topinka, "sends the message to the public that, you know, this is doable -- we can replace this current governor," said Topinka, who is facing Gov. Blagojevich for the post.

Bush's press conference was held in the museum's rotunda beneath a replica of the Wright Brothers plane. Afterward, he toured parts of the museum's new Leonardo da Vinci exhibit, examining a high-tech device that allows one to electronically flip through computer-scanned pages of da Vinci's workbook Codex Atlanticus.

After the press conference, a motorcade cruised up a shuttered Lake Shore Drive, accompanied by two boats from the Chicago Police Marine Unit buzzing alongside in Lake Michigan, and passed pockets of protesters and supporters. One man held a sign, "60 is the new 25" -- a reference to Bush's birthday celebrated here, while another carried a placard reading "Bush Hates Science," an apparent reference to the president's limited support for stem cell research.

In a park across from the Drake, several dozen anti-war protesters gathered in a showing that included the burning of an American flag.

At the fund-raiser, Bush lauded Topinka as a "good, fine, honest person, who knows what she's doing," and he thanked the crowd of GOP bigwigs -- including U.S. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and former Gov. Jim Edgar -- for supporting her. "People don't want to back somebody who can't win," Bush said.

'Really cool place'

After attending the fund-raiser the president visited west suburban Aurora's Cabot Microelectronics to discuss his American Competitiveness Initiative, which would funnel $5.9 billion into research and education but has yet to be passed by the Senate. The company makes products used in the manufacture of computer chips and disc drives.

Bush, who stayed Thursday night at the Intercontinental Hotel, seemed to relish his two-day stop in Chicago, calling it "a really cool place" to celebrate a birthday. He praised the Chicago Firehouse restaurant where he dined Thursday evening and his breakfast at Lou Mitchell's diner. He told the Drake crowd to "take your kids" to the museum because "it is a special place.

"I'm looking forward to shedding my entourage one of these days and spending a little quality time there at the museum," Bush said, smiling.

Beltway Follows Bush To Chicago (CHIT)

By Michael Tackett

Chicago Tribune, July 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0039659

You can take the president away from Washington, but you can't take Washington away from the president.

And no matter how hard the White House tries, no matter the venue it chooses, there are still hard, difficult facts and even unforeseen events that can tarnish even the most well-conceived scripting.

President Bush traveled to Chicago for a birthday dinner with Mayor Richard M. Daley, only to find out en route that Daley's top patronage chief had been convicted by a federal jury and that Daley's own status would be the most pressing question in town. He came to trumpet unemployment numbers only to find that they were not exactly unvarnished good news.

The White House said that holding a news conference in Chicago at the Museum of Science and Industry instead of in Washington was part of a strategic shift to put the president in more natural, out-in-the-country, in-touch-with-the-people settings. A spokesman said that having the president overnight in town would allow him the chance to get a deeper feel for the city. (Memo to White House: It's a pretty big place to get to know in one turn of the clock).

What the White House didn't say, but what was highly apparent, was that the president has decided to fully engage in the 2006 midterm elections, perhaps the last clear referendum on his presidency, and this could be a sign of the unofficial start of a campaign. Bush emphasized the good news he found in the jobs data and first quarter growth, then noted bluntly that his tax cuts were the answer. The subtle read? Democrats would raise taxes. He continued to push progress in Iraq, honoring a sacrifice made by a soldier from Hoffman Estates. Democrats, the implicit argument was, would cut and run. These are messages that he will likely be reinforcing as he travels throughout the country between now and November.

There is logic in that. No matter how skeptical the local press corps, there is still a reflex for a red carpet for a president. Positive coverage – locally, anyway – is typically assured. WGN-TV carried the press conference live. Bush said he might do him and the White House press corps that follows him, some good to get out of the capital. Bush's homage to breakfast at Lou Mitchell's and his "fabulous city" label for Chicago, even his "proud to call him friend" attaboy to Mayor Daley was sure to go down easy in the city. But when he lapsed into talking about "the Doha round of the WTO" it was a reminder that the argot of Washington has captured his speech as well.

Much of his opening statement could have been delivered anywhere. So, too, the first question, which was about the escalating conflict with North Korea. And the second, as Bush continued the convention of calling first on reporters for major wire services. The third dealt with the Supreme Court ruling that the president had overstepped his authority by ordering military tribunals. In other words, a news conference that might have well been in the Rose Garden.

The Tribune's Rick Pearson then was called upon and seemed to surprise the president when he asked if he were going to re-appoint special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, the very busy U.S. Attorney in Chicago. The president said he hadn't really thought about that, then recovered by saying that the decision would fall to Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales. And though he said he wanted to get to Chicago to experience more of the "real" America, he allowed that he hadn't paid much attention to Fitzgerald's investigations, which have been the subject of extensive coverage in the national media.

Other local reporters asked aggressive questions about national policy; and there was a pointed question about the president's presence at an appearance for Republican gubernatorial candidate Judy Baar Topinka. Bush tried to parry the question, not all that gracefully at first, before rallying with the boilerplate about core beliefs that voters have always seemed to respect in him.

So if the communications czars in the White House were hoping for questions about cheesecake or the Cubs, they were roundly disappointed. And if they thought that by taking the president away from the Beltway that somehow he would be bathed in different light, the morning in Chicago proved that wrong.

Who Really Rules The Supreme Court? (LAT)

By Douglas W. Kmiec

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

THE RECEIVED WISDOM at the end of the most recent Supreme Court term is that because of his swing vote, Justice Anthony Kennedy is more in control of the court than the new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0039660

It's a nominally plausible theory, given that Kennedy played a similar pivotal role in previous years with the now-retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. In those days, the two often found themselves disproportionately powerful as they staked out ground between the court's more ideological members.

But in my judgment, it's a misleading picture of what's happening now — partly because Kennedy alone is often deliberately speculative and partly because Roberts has at least the nascent but constructive capacity to span partisan division.

Kennedy without O'Connor is like Rodgers without Hammerstein. Oscar Hammerstein wrote lyrics that made songs both memorable and understandable. O'Connor had a comparable gift for creative expression, even as originalists sometimes wondered if she was always reading from the founders' constitutional songbook.

For better or worse, it was O'Connor who had to be satisfied. It was her "reasonable objective observer" who would cast a suspicious eye at public religious displays. And it was her assessment — not Kennedy's — of the University of Michigan's practices that allowed racial diversity to be a factor in admissions.

Kennedy, like Richard Rodgers, would often join O'Connor with an accompanying melody. But the words that lower courts would remember were hers.

Kennedy and O'Connor both concluded, for example, that it was wrong for Texas to single out private, consensual homosexual sex acts for criminal punishment. But it was O'Connor's separate concurrence that made sense of the judgment — pointing out that it is inequitable for a state to punish unmarried intimacy between people of one sexual orientation but not the other. Despite the troubling lack of deference to state law, O'Connor's rationale was at least anchored in the equal-protection text of the Constitution, while Kennedy's hung somewhere in midair exploring what he called "spatial and transcendent" liberties.

O'Connor's rationale was sufficient to keep the petitioner, John Lawrence, and his partner out of a Texas jail; Kennedy's expansive musings to this day provoke further litigation to allow same-sex marriage.

In writing her down-to-earth lyric for the court, O'Connor was pragmatic; Kennedy, as an explorer of the spatial heavens, was poetic. Commentators, including myself, would occasionally express frustration with O'Connor's balancing tests that only she could apply, but at least she decided the particular — and often sensitive — case before her. Kennedy's writing, while rhetorically eloquent, can be as maddeningly ambiguous as the abstract poetry of Dame Edith Sitwell or the art of Jackson Pollock. Having taught law for more than 20 years, Kennedy sees all kinds of potential permutations and is quite content to let them percolate unresolved — like provocative questions posed during an academic seminar.

Kennedy's theorizing reveals a mind of great intelligence but makes it more difficult to strike bargains with him. O'Connor knew what she wanted as a specific outcome, so the liberal and conservative coalitions could make reasonable bids for her affections. Kennedy as a solo act poses the perennial Father's Day dilemma: You know the old man needs something, but darned if you can put your finger on it.

Kennedy's ruminations produce cases that have outcomes but no settled rationale. Thus, the scope of the Clean Water Act remains a mystery, beyond Kennedy's requirement for some as-yet-undefined "significant nexus" to U.S. waters; the exclusionary rule does not apply in no-knock cases, but it should not be seen as "in doubt"; and Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the Guantanamo detainee, deserves a tribunal more jurisprudentially spiffy than the president's military commissions because of the influence of the Geneva Convention, but it is "not necessary to decide" how to apply the convention.

If Kennedy by manner and approach chooses to do-si-do rather than lead the judicial dance, who then emerges as the dominant influence on the court? By virtue of seniority (and sheer intellectual feistiness), Justice John Paul Stevens, 86, is the organizing voice of the four-vote liberal view. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas remain the rock-solid right. Neither is sufficient to decide.

That returns focus to the center seat. And, after a year, Roberts has had remarkable appeal in this position as the non-legislating umpire he described during his confirmation.

Roberts has a conservative mind but a diplomat's nature. His abiding concern is to keep the court within bounds on legal, rather than ideological, grounds. Because that is so, he has the capacity to draw votes from both sides on controversial and pedestrian cases alike.

DOJ_NMG_0039661

Consider just two examples: his unanimous opinion rejecting free speech and association claims against Congress' Solomon Amendment mandating equal campus access for military recruiters; and his opinion for the full court rejecting, on procedural grounds, a challenge to tax credits favoring in-state investment.

Roberts' collegial consensus-building here and elsewhere overwhelms Kennedy's ability to deploy his swing vote. The impact of the new chief justice was especially influential because he and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., the newest addition to the bench, share the founding vision of a more limited role for the court and have great affinity for each other (close to 90% agreement this term).

The fractious finale of Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld, invalidating the president's military commissions, obscures more than it reveals because there Roberts was sidelined by recusal and unable to urge his colleagues toward consensus — or at least a more carefully tailored and clearly stated, not to mention succinct, opinion.

Roberts' ability to influence justices across the spectrum of ideas suggests that the most apt modifier for the court is neither "Kennedy" nor "Roberts" but "open-minded." The strengthening of this quality for the nation's highest tribunal ought not to be missed by outworn efforts that either pigeonhole the court by partisan label or make it a cult of personality.

Douglas W. Kmiec is a professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University.

G.O.P. Agenda In House Has Moderates Unhappy (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 7 — Moderate Republicans say a planned summer push by the House leadership on conservative causes like gun rights and new abortion restrictions threatens the re-election prospects of embattled centrists, who are key to the party's drive to hold Congress.

Frustrated and angry, they say the leadership's new American Values Agenda, a list of initiatives heavy on ideological themes, seems short-sighted and ill-timed considering that few conservatives are at serious risk in November.

"It was stupid and gross," said Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut. "They have this obsession to satisfy conservative Republicans who will probably be re-elected no matter what happens. They get job satisfaction, but they are making it more difficult for me to win my race."

Mr. Shays and others said the announcement of the agenda took them by surprise, particularly after House Republicans seemed to be back on track after a few strong weeks of emphasizing new fiscal controls and a push on national security issues. House moderates have also been supportive of the leadership's hard line against the idea of potential citizenship for illegal immigrants, saying that reflects public sentiment.

But they fear that this new agenda could backfire by stirring independent voters to reject centrist candidates even if they do not totally embrace the party leadership's conservative tilt.

"I don't think it is a good agenda to go into the election cycle with," said Representative Michael N. Castle of Delaware, another moderate Republican.

Republican leaders disputed the idea that the values agenda could harm centrists, saying the lawmakers could establish their independence by voting against select initiatives if they choose. They say that members will be judged on their own records and that even Democratic-leaning seats held by Republicans have core groups of conservative voters who need to be motivated. And they know that the votes will also be difficult for Democratic incumbents in conservative locales.

"I don't mind people having to make tough votes," said Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, Republican of New York and chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

The unrest among House moderates reflects a seeming contradiction in the campaign strategy being mapped out by Republican leaders on Capitol Hill and at the White House: While the emphasis is being placed on rallying conservatives, many of the must-win races are in more moderate regions of the Northeast, Midwest and suburban South and West.

In the latest review of House races by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, more than 20 of the 35 Republican seats considered most threatened were closely divided areas of Connecticut, Illinois, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania and districts in Arizona, Colorado and Florida where independents could be crucial. Thirteen of the 35 were carried by the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0039662

"If you took the top 10 to 20 targeted races, it probably helps about three of them," said Mr. Shays, who said he was so upset by the leadership's agenda that he skipped a meeting of House Republicans rather than risk losing his temper over the initiatives.

In announcing the agenda, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois said that it would allow lawmakers to vote on basic values like the "sanctity of life" while defending the nation's founding principles.

Besides a potential series of votes on family tax breaks, the legislative lineup for the weeks ahead included initiatives that would prohibit any government from using federal money to confiscate guns during emergencies; ensure that local governments do not have to pay damages or lawyer fees in court battles over public expressions of religion, and protect the Pledge of Allegiance from being found unconstitutional.

The agenda also includes a measure to ban human cloning and one requiring that those performing late-term abortions inform women seeking the procedure that the fetus could feel pain and could receive anesthesia. House Republican leaders also plan a vote on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, even though it could not be adopted in this Congress because it has already been rejected by the Senate.

"There are no surprises here," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader. "We have members who want to vote on a number of these provisions, and we are going to vote. It is part of our job."

Democrats say the ideologically tinged votes could benefit their candidates in areas where they hope to defeat Republicans.

"It reminds people that the Republican Party is the party of Terri Schiavo," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, referring to Republican intercession this year in the case of the Florida woman whose husband wanted her removed from a feeding tube.

Critics of the agenda said the leadership acted with little fanfare in unveiling it, which they interpreted as a sign that it was undertaken mainly to appease conservatives and that the leadership was not committed to making it a centerpiece of the remaining weeks of Congress.

There are no guarantees that all the proposals will even reach the floor. The measure regarding the Pledge of Allegiance temporarily stalled in committee when too few Republicans showed up to vote, but the leadership said it planned to bring that bill and another piece of the agenda — a ban on Internet gambling — before the full House when lawmakers return next week.

Other Republicans are pushing the House to emphasize what advocates are calling a "suburban agenda," a series of bills pertaining to issues like online and school safety, health care and education savings. And moderates were cheered by a new Senate agreement to allow debate on expanded stem cell research.

But with Congress scheduled to be in session only for July and September before adjourning, moderates say that lawmakers need to be selective about where they put their energy and that the values issues could eat up scarce time.

"I am not going to disparage these particular initiatives," said Jonathan Stevens, policy director at the Republican Main Street Partnership, a moderate group. "I understand what they are trying to do. But what my members are much more concerned about are the more tangible, everyday major issues such as health care, the budget and defense."

Discovery Unloads Supplies At Station (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) -- It was moving day yesterday for the crew of Discovery, which transferred thousands of pounds of supplies and cargo from the space shuttle to the International Space Station.

And there was good news: The astronauts earned an extra day in space.

The astronauts also fired up their inspection boom to survey six questionable areas on the shuttle's thermal skin. Flight director Tony Ceccacci said engineers want extra views of these areas to determine whether there is any serious damage and any need for repairs.

DOJ_NMG_0039663

At a press conference, Mr. Ceccacci noted that Discovery has enough fuel to stay up an additional day in order to squeeze in an extra spacewalk for practicing thermal repairs. That stretches the flight to 13 days.

The astronauts moved a huge cargo container, nicknamed Leonardo, onto the space station by robotic arm. Among the amenities awaiting the space station crew were a new stationary bicycle for exercise, an oxygen generator that will eventually allow the space station to support six inhabitants, a machine that cools the station's cabin air and a lab freezer for scientific samples.

"Have fun putting a new room on the station today -- the float-in closet, every home needs one," flight controllers in Houston wrote the shuttle crew in a daily electronic message.

Unloading items 220 miles above Earth was more difficult than moving into a house because at least there's gravity on the ground, according to Air Force Col. Steve Lindsey, Discovery's commander.

"It's really kind of a challenge because you're in [zero gravity] ... you've got to go very, very slow because if you go fast, you kind of run into things and bump into other equipment," Col. Lindsey said in interviews with reporters on the ground. "It's kind of an interesting choreography we have to go through."

For the first time in three years, the International Space Station has three crew members -- European Space Agency astronaut Thomas Reiter on Thursday joined Pavel Vinogradov and Jeff Williams, who marked their 100th day at the space station yesterday.

Discovery's six remaining shuttle crew members awoke yesterday to a recording of the Beatles' "Good Day Sunshine," a choice of astronaut Lisa M. Nowak's family.

In the afternoon, Navy Cmdr. Nowak and astronaut Stephanie Wilson used the shuttle's robotic arm and an extended boom to take close-up pictures of areas on the orbiter's underside that engineers need more information about to reassure themselves that there's no damage like the kind that doomed Columbia's flight in 2003.

"We've got a couple of really minor problems," pilot Mark Kelly told reporters earlier in the day. "You know, they're not significant enough to be called nuisances."

The boom will look at the shuttle's nose cap area, which eluded earlier photography and may have some bird droppings on it, and three places where gap filler is sticking out, including one protrusion as long as an inch. Gap filler is material fitted between thermal tiles to prevent them from rubbing against each other.

Columbia's seven astronauts were killed during re-entry when fiery gases entered a breach in the shuttle's wing. The breach was caused by insulating foam hitting its external tank.

NASA Engineers Assess New Shuttle Pictures (AP)

By Seth Borenstein, Ap Science Writer

AP, July 8, 2006

NASA engineers examined new detailed pictures of space shuttle Discovery's heat shield Friday, a day before two astronauts were to embark on the most disorienting task of their 13-day mission: a wobbly spacewalk.

The astronauts beamed down up-close views of six areas of concern on the shuttle's thermal skin, and engineers agreed that three of them posed little risk, said Steve Poulos, manager of the orbiter project office. Two more areas have not been cleared but were unlikely to be an issue, Poulos said.

That left just one concern that cautious NASA managers said they could not discount yet: a piece of fabric filler protruding from the thermal tiles on Discovery's belly.

Poulos said it was "amazing" how clean the shuttle appeared in all the pictures taken in orbit.

"There is nothing that jumps out in terms of tile damage like we saw on the last flight. Can't explain it necessarily, but it's great to see that level of performance. Overall, it really made it kind of easy on the analysts," Poulos said.

But if that one remaining piece of fabric filler needs to be fixed, it will have to be yanked out by astronauts in emergency repairs during a third spacewalk on July 12.

Because the protruding filler is in a hard-to-reach area, astronauts Piers Sellers and Michael Fossum would have to use a never-before-tried maneuver of working on the end of the shuttle's 100-foot robotic arm and boom extension.

DOJ_NMG_0039664

That daring task is just what Sellers and Fossum were coincidentally scheduled to test Saturday morning during a six-and-a-half-hour spacewalk that is described as the zero-gravity equivalent of trying to paint a house while standing on a rickety ladder. They will stand at the end of the robotic arm and boom to test a technique for repairing the spacecraft's heat shield.

"You're standing at the end of it at night, so you'll feel like you're standing on a diving board or standing at the top of a telephone pole or hanging down from a ceiling," Sellers said in a June interview. "It's disorienting, there's no question."

And if that's not enough, mission control told Sellers and Fossum that they may also have to play "hot potato" with a potentially scorching replacement part for a broken transporter on the international space station. The railcar-like device must be fixed to help with future construction of the orbiting outpost.

The part is stored in a small bag that traps heat. If it gets too hot, mission controllers suggested the astronauts "let it hang from a tether or 'hot potato' it between your hands."

Also Friday, NASA managers announced that Discovery has enough fuel to stay up for a 13th day to squeeze in a third spacewalk for Sellers and Fossum on July 12.

"It's great news because it gives us a whole lot more capability and a little more bang for the buck, if you will, for this shuttle mission," space station astronaut Jeffrey Williams said in an interview with Associated Press Television News.

The shuttle is now scheduled to land at 9:12 a.m. EDT on July 17.

Astronauts spent several hours focusing the cameras on six specific "areas of interest" on the shuttle that had been seen in earlier photographs. Engineers need more information about the heat shield to ensure there is no damage like the kind that doomed Columbia's flight in 2003.

The fabric gap filler is material fitted between tiles to prevent them from rubbing against each other. Two pieces of gap filler had to be removed from Discovery's belly during a spacewalk last year because of concerns they would cause problems during re-entry.

Besides the filler, NASA was looking at a horseshoe-shaped white spot on the shuttle's nose cap that engineers have described to the crew as resembling bird droppings — but not the same as white splotches found earlier on the wing. The concern was that the spot could be a hole in the thermal-protection system and need repair, but Poulos said the close-up photographs convinced him that it was not a divot.

Two areas of concern that engineers had not discounted, but Poulos said were unlikely to be a problem, were discolorations on Discovery's right wing, including the area where it gets hottest during re-entry. If they need to be fixed, the crew already was slated to test a patch kit, he said.

Seeking Signs Of Trouble, NASA Studies Shuttle Images (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

HOUSTON, July 7 — On a day devoted to moving thousands of pounds of supplies from the space shuttle Discovery to the International Space Station, engineers and analysts on the ground scrutinized images of the shuttle on Friday for damage that might cause problems in the brutal heat of re-entry.

Officials said that the shuttle came through the rigors of ascent in a remarkably clean state and that they had narrowed their analysis to a few unresolved issues.

In a news briefing on Friday, Steve Poulos, the space shuttle orbiter projects manager, said analysts were still examining two blemishes on the hard panels that line the leading edge of the right wing.

Mr. Poulos added that teams were continuing to work through questions about a piece of stiff cloth known as a gap filler, which sits between tiles so they do not rub against each other as the shuttle flexes. The filler is poking out from the underside of the craft, toward the rear; a similar piece near the nose was removed by a spacewalking astronaut during the Discovery's mission last summer.

Analysts are also trying to determine whether a blemish on the nose of the vehicle was a weakened spot, Mr. Poulos said, or something as harmless as bird droppings.

DOJ_NMG_0039665

Neither Mr. Poulos nor John Shannon, the deputy shuttle chief and leader of the mission management team, appeared to be worried about any of the three issues, though they said they were withholding judgment until the analysis was complete.

"We don't rule out anything until the analysts come out and say it's not a problem," Mr. Shannon said.

At the briefing, the officials also announced that the National Aeronautics and Space Administration had decided to extend the mission by a day to add a third spacewalk.

If mission managers do decide to have an astronaut remove the gap fillers, that bit of maintenance would take place during the added spacewalk, on the ninth day of the mission. The walk, which mission planners had long considered but which depended on the condition of the shuttle's fuel cells, will be devoted to testing repair techniques that the space agency is developing for the shuttle's delicate insulating tiles and panels.

The first spacewalk of the mission will take six and a half hours starting Saturday morning and will involve repairs to a minirailcar system on the outside of the station that transports equipment. In another experiment on the first spacewalk, two astronauts, Piers J. Sellers and Michael E. Fossum, will ride at the end of the shuttle's robot arm and extension boom, which together stretch 100 feet, to get a feel for the swaying and bouncing that might occur during a repair.

If there is too much motion, NASA engineers may have to come up with another solution, like a platform that could be temporarily attached to the outside of the shuttle, to support repair work, Mr. Shannon said.

In a midday briefing, Anthony J. Ceccacci, the lead flight director for the mission, said it would be premature to try to use the first spacewalk to remove the gap filler until the characteristics of riding on the boom were well understood.

"One baby step at a time," he said.

Spacewalkers Take Center Stage (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

HOUSTON, July 7 -- The crew of space shuttle Discovery on Friday conducted painstaking inspections of possible damage to the orbiter's heat shield and prepared for a first-ever spacewalk in which two astronauts will ride a 100-foot boom on a spectacular journey into the void.

Late Friday, analysts at Houston's Johnson Space Center were still examining two slight scars on the brittle "reinforced carbon-carbon" protecting the front edge of Discovery's starboard wing. They also were assessing potential harm from a protruding shim, known as a "gap filler," in the stern of the orbiter.

NASA analysts had earlier puzzled over a horseshoe-shaped white streak on Discovery's nose cone, but Steve Poulos, manager of the Orbiter Projects Office, said it was not "anything to worry about," amid speculation it may have been bird droppings, such as a similar streak found on Discovery's wing.

If the protruding gap filler -- near a closed hatch where fuel is piped to the shuttle's main engines during launch -- is judged to be a serious problem, Mission Control could order spacewalkers to remove it. A shuttle astronaut plucked two offending gap fillers from the orbiter's underbelly during a flight last year.

The blemishes on the reinforced carbon-carbon could be even more dangerous, as the wings' leading edges must endure temperatures of 2,900 degrees Fahrenheit during reentry. "It's either not an issue or something we really need to worry about," Poulos said at a news conference.

But he said earlier that there were no problems "that leap right out." Both he and John Shannon, chairman of the mission management team, appeared unconcerned about the ongoing analysis and suggested Discovery would be cleared for reentry by the end of the weekend.

Shannon also formally announced, as expected, that Discovery's mission will be extended by an extra day; the 13th day is to be used for a third spacewalk to test repair techniques for the reinforced carbon-carbon.

Saturday's spacewalk should produce one of the highlights of the shuttle mission, when astronauts Piers J. Sellers and Michael E. Fossum test the shuttle's new 50-foot sensor boom as a repair platform.

The boom was added to the orbiter's tool kit after the Columbia disaster in 2003, when foam insulation from the external fuel tank breached the shuttle's heat shield, causing it to disintegrate during reentry.

DOJ_NMG_0039666

The boom, attached as an extension of the shuttle's 50-foot cargo-handling arm, has won rave reviews as an inspection tool, and shuttle officials last year said they would try using the combination as a 100-foot work platform.

During Saturday's spacewalk, first Sellers, then Sellers and Fossum together, are to ride the boom into the void, simulating repair activities to see whether pushing off the side of the orbiter will cause the boom to whiplash so badly that engineers will need to devise a way to pin it to the work surface.

Engineers will try to keep the boom moving within an arc of four feet. In the weightlessness of space, the mass of the spacewalkers by itself is of no importance, but the forces they can impart by pushing, pulling or twisting are translated into vectors that will not dissipate. An astronaut flexing his legs and springing into space would neither slow down nor stop.

Private Data For 100,000 Pilots, Crew Listed Online (NVP)

By Louis Hansen

Norfolk Virginian Pilot, July 8, 2006

NORFOLK - Personal information from 100,000 Navy and Marine Corps aviators and crew was removed from the Naval Safety Center Web site after being accidentally posted and available to the public for six months, the center announced Friday.

The information included the full names and Social Security numbers of active- and reserve-duty service members who have logged flight information with the Norfolk-based command since 1985, said spokeswoman Evelyn Odango.

The personal information was removed from the public Web site, www.safetycenter.navy.mil, Thursday afternoon, Odango said. About 1,000 computer disks with the information have been distributed to ships and bases around the world, she said. The center is recalling the computer disks, and sending letters to affected service members.

No one has reported an identity theft or improper use of the data because of the public posting, she said.

The safety center mistake is the latest in a series of public blunders by government record-keepers. In May, a laptop computer containing data for 26.5 million active-duty and retired service members was stolen from the home of an employee for the Department of Veterans Affairs. Police recovered the laptop last week.

The Navy also announced in late June that 28,000 records of Navy personnel and family members were posted on a civilian site in five spreadsheet files. The data included names, birth dates and Social Security numbers for sailors and their dependents.

The Government Accountability Office discovered last month that names, Social Security numbers and addresses of several hundred government employees were posted on their Web site. The GAO removed the records.

The Naval Safety Center employs 200 active-duty and government workers at Norfolk Naval Station. The center, established after World War II, tracks accidents and mishaps in Navy and Marine Corps vehicles, ships and aircraft.

On Thursday, a person surfing the safety center's Web site alerted the center about the personal information embedded in a file that could be publicly downloaded, Odango said. The file listed names and Social Security numbers. The data had been online since December 2005, she said.

The center shut down its site and is reviewing other files for personal data. The Navy is also urging anyone who might be affected to watch for suspicious activity on bank and credit card statements.

The safety center has established a hot line to handle questions and concerns, she said. The toll-free number for the Navy Personnel Center is (866) 827-5672 .

Personal Data Were Posted On Navy Web Site (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

Personal records for every Navy and Marine Corps aviator or aircrew member who has logged flight hours in the past 20 years have been posted on a public Navy Web site for the past six months, compromising more than 100,000 Social Security numbers, the Navy Safety Center announced yesterday.

Investigators are working to determine how the records landed on the Navy Safety Center's Web site, which officials shut down Thursday after a member of the public reported finding the full names and Social Security numbers posted. Evelyn

DOJ_NMG_0039667

Odango, a spokeswoman for the safety center in Norfolk, said the list had been posted since December and appeared to be "inadvertent" and the result of "human error."

The security breach involving personal information is among several data losses involving the federal government in recent weeks, including the loss of records related to more than 26.5 million retirees and active-duty military personnel on a laptop that was stolen in May from a Veterans Affairs employee's home. The laptop was recovered last month.

The Government Accountability Office, the Agriculture Department, the Energy Department and the Internal Revenue Service all announced that they have had similar personal data compromised recently via Web site postings, Internet hackers and loss of electronic equipment. Two weeks ago, the Navy announced that personal information on 28,000 sailors and their family members was compromised when it appeared on a public Web site.

Odango said the Navy Safety Center list was discovered Thursday by someone not affiliated with the command, who then immediately reported it. She said the list includes all retired, active-duty and reservist personnel who have logged flight hours in the past two decades. The center is a command dedicated to improving the safety of Navy operations.

"That's the kind of information that is not supposed to be put on the Web site, and it was inadvertently posted," Odango said. "We don't have any proof that any of the information has been accessed or that it has been used illegally."

The information was included on 1,083 computer disks that were sent to all Navy and Marine Corps commands, Odango said, and Navy officials are working on recalling those disks.

Navy officials are encouraging anyone whose name could have been on the list to carefully monitor bank accounts, credit cards and other financial transactions to make sure the information is not being used fraudulently.

Those who might have been affected can contact the Navy Personnel Command call center at 866-827-5672 for more information. The call center should be active by the end of the weekend.

'Junket' Science (WSJ)

By James Q. Wilson

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

Judges learn a lot in law school and as lawyers, but even after they put on black robes the training must continue, because the world they confront is becoming more complex, more litigious and less defined by well-understood legal maxims. In both civil and criminal trials, judges must evaluate competing claims about scientific evidence presented by experts hired by rival counsel who have only a modest interest in truth.

Much of that training today is carried on by private groups, including universities, that sponsor seminars. Judges are free to attend or ignore these programs as they wish, but that freedom, even when exercised by an independent branch of government, does not sit well with critics who fear that some self-serving ideology will be foisted upon tender judicial minds.

Sens. Russ Feingold, John Kerry and Pat Leahy want to put an end to university-based training programs. If they succeed, all such training will have to be approved by the Federal Judicial Center, a group of administrators governed by a board of seven judges, constituting the research arm of the federal judiciary. But the real motive of their bill is not to approve courses but to end them.

The bill is inspired by an organization, the Community Rights Counsel, which is funded to a significant degree by George Soros and chiefly concerned with environmental law. It has designed programs to help states and cities press ahead on environmental measures without worrying about the takings clause of the federal Constitution. It raised questions about the qualifications of John Roberts and Samuel Alito to be justices of the Supreme Court.

The CRC regards university efforts to educate judges as "junkets." I am puzzled by this view because for many years I have spoken or led seminars at meetings run by the George Mason University School of Law. Most of these meetings are strictly academic exercises in which scholars talk about economic principles, statistical techniques, tort and contract law, criminal and family law, the logic and methods of science, and similar matters. Some go well beyond these issues and involve lectures about Plutarch, Homer, Montesquieu, Locke, Blackstone, Tocqueville, Renaissance humanism and the founding of the American republic.

DOJ_NMG_0039668

In each two-day session that I have attended, every judge had to read about 250 pages of serious scholarly or humanistic writings; at six-day sessions, they had to read over 500 hundred pages. The discussions are lively and involve views from every political perspective. The discussion leaders have included John Searle, Orley Ashenfelter, Gordon Wood, Cass Sunstein, Donald Kagan, Michael Ignatieff and eight Nobel laureates. Every judge to whom I have spoken said they enjoyed the discussions. Over the 30 years that George Mason has run this program, more than 2,400 judges have attended, and they include about two-fifths of all of the federal judges appointed with life tenure.

One reason the CRC dismisses these ventures as junkets is that in the afternoon, following a tough morning of seminars, the judges play golf or take hikes. But there is a very good reason for letting them have fun at a nice resort. Since they are not paid a fee for attending, many would not come if they could not make it part of a vacation. (The university pays coach air fare and hotel room and food bills, but the golf comes at the judges' own expense.)

The other reason CRC calls them junkets instead of educational activities is that it thinks, for reasons that baffle me, that the groups who donate funds to these activities will influence the judges and shape their opinions. That possibility is farcical -- no donors attend the meetings, the judges do not know who the donors are, and no subject about which a donor may have a legal interest is a topic for discussion. Moreover, corporate donors supply less than 10% of George Mason's budget for this event, one of the largest in the country.

A typical session goes like this: Professor Orley Ashenfelter of Princeton describes statistical correlations and regression equations. Then I, or someone like me, uses these techniques to explain what scholars do and do not know about deterring crime, evaluating the impact of illegal drugs on crime, and understanding the ways in which private gun possession does or does not affect crime rates. Following that another scholar, such as David Popenoe of Rutgers, will describe how statistical analysis may help explain the strengths and weaknesses of families.

Or Gordon Wood from Brown will make clear how the Founders understood democracy, and another scholar, such as Jasper Griffin from Oxford, will compare that view to how the ancient Greeks understood popular rule. The notion that any of this biases judges is ludicrous. On the contrary. It helps them understand scientific techniques they may hear discussed in court and gives them a deeper understanding of the culture of which America is a part.

Despite the hard work through which we eggheads put the judges, the New York Times also refers also to these trips as "junkets" and endorses the Feingold-Kerry-Leahy bill. On the ABC program 20/20, a reporter, parroting the views of the CRC, kept asking judges who paid the bills for these seminars. They all said they did not know. The reporter then mused aloud about why this information was kept secret. But of course the judges did not know: George Mason keeps the identity of its contributors confidential precisely in order to prevent judges from thinking that anything they learn might be linked to the legal interests of a donor.

Any university can offer its own judicial training programs. The notion that the Federal Judicial Center has to pass on them before judges can be allowed to attend amounts to an effort to assert centralized political control that can only be based on one or both of two propositions: Judges are too stupid to decide for themselves whether to attend, or every program must contain whatever views the Judicial Center thinks it correct for judges to hear.

Mr. Wilson, a professor at Pepperdine University, is the author of "The Moral Sense" (Free Press, 1993).

House GOP Leaders Decry 'Pork,' But Back It (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Top leaders of the House of Representatives, who last month decried pork-barrel spending while voting to give the president a line-item veto, have helped block 40 attempts this year to remove individual special-interest ``earmark'' projects from spending bills, according to a Globe review of voting records.

The three top House leaders -- Speaker J. Dennis Hastert , majority leader John A. Boehner , and majority whip Roy Blunt , all Republicans -- have not cast a single vote against any of the projects that have been challenged by fiscal conservatives on the House floor. One of the projects -- $2.5 million for the Illinois Technology Transition Center -- was sought by Hastert himself and was affirmed quickly on a voice vote.

DOJ_NMG_0039669

Among the other earmarks that Hastert, Boehner, and Blunt have supported were $500,000 to renovate a municipal swimming pool in Banning, Calif.; $250,000 for a performing arts center in Plattsburgh, N.Y.; $1 million for a locomotive demonstration in Pennsylvania; $1 million for the Southern and Eastern Kentucky Tourism Development Association; $180,000 for tomato production in Ohio; and $1.4 million in two separate earmarks for Mystic Aquarium in Connecticut.

All of the projects were retained in lopsided votes, with only a core group of about 50 fiscal conservatives voting consistently to strike the spending. But House leaders continue to insist they're being tough on earmarks.

Representative Jeff Flake , an Arizona Republican who has led the effort to remove earmarks from spending bills, said the leaders can't credibly claim to be against wasteful spending as long as they support the earmarks.

``It's tough to take seriously that kind of talk when we see these votes," Flake said. ``I'm amazed that people are willing to go on record supporting some of these earmarks. It just shows how addicted we are to this sort of spending."

Flake said he will bring the issue to a head later this month, when a pork-laden bill covering labor, healthcare, and human-services programs comes to the House floor. He has informed House leaders that he will force a vote on each of the more than 1,000 earmarks in that bill unless the sponsors are publicly identified -- a move that would consume days on the House floor and grind other legislative business to a halt.

``I'm guaranteeing a challenge on every earmark that doesn't have a name," Flake said. ``We have to change this system. This is a black eye for all of us."

The reluctance of House leaders to vote against earmarks highlights the difficulty of reforming the system by which members of Congress win projects for their districts, said Representative John B. Shadegg , an Arizona Republican who has joined in Flake's attempts to remove earmarks.

``It does raise the question, are [House leaders] capable of reform?" said Shadegg, whose failed campaign for majority leader earlier this year focused heavily on earmark reform.

Last month, the House passed a bill giving President Bush the ability to veto specific budget items and thereby remove individual pork-barrel projects -- in essence, the same thing that Flake has been trying to do on the House floor.

``It will help make Congress more accountable for the spending that we propose and can clearly help eliminate some wasteful and worthless pork," said Boehner, an Ohio Republican . But the move was largely symbolic: The Senate, as Boehner and other House leaders were aware, is unlikely to approve the line-item veto.

The House also passed a bill that would require public identification of members who request earmarks and make it easier for lawmakers to challenge projects. But the bill is stalled in a House-Senate conference committee, raising questions among watchdog groups about how sincere the reform effort ever was.

``They're trying to spin their way out of the earmark problem," said Keith Ashdown , vice president for policy at Taxpayers for Common Sense. ``It's insulting, because they just believe this is their money to spend."

Ron Bonjean , a Hastert spokesman, said House leaders are allowing the earmarks Flake challenges to survive or be defeated on their own merits.

Boehner, who proudly notes that he has never personally requested or received an earmarked project, said he voted for other members' 40 earmarks out of respect for his colleagues. He added that, as majority leader, he feels a special obligation to support the decisions of the House Appropriations Committee, the panel that determines which earmarks to include in spending bills.

``What some people think are pork-barrel projects, others think are very worthy projects in their districts," said Boehner. ``As the majority leader, my job is to be supportive of our committee chairmen [and] subcommittee chairmen and the work they do. That basically helps drive my vote on most of those amendments."

Blunt's spokeswoman, Burson Taylor , said the Missouri Republican believes the appropriations committee does a good job determining where money should be directed, and believes that members should be able to set aside money for projects.

``He supports members' prerogative to slate federal dollars for specific programs in their districts," Taylor said.

A spokesman for the appropriations committee, John Scofield , said the committee asked members to begin limiting the number of special requests they make, resulting in a 37 percent drop in the number of earmarks requested this year. Total earmarks represent barely 1 percent of all federal spending on discretionary programs, and committee members are careful to determine that each serves an important purpose, Scofield said.

DOJ_NMG_0039670

Still, most members of Congress from both parties love earmarks because they allow them to brag about federal funding they've won for their districts. Representative Michael E. Capuano, a Somerville Democrat, said he thinks there are too few earmarks in the budget.

``Who is in a better position to know what's good for my district than me? I'm elected to do that," he said. ``I don't have chicken-farm museums in my district, but if I did, I'd defend them."

Capuano said he voted to retain all of the projects targeted by Flake because he'd like to see the projects he seeks accorded similar deference by his colleagues.

``We are equally qualified to know what we need in our districts," he said. ``I have not seen one yet that really makes me puke."

Fiscal conservatives say they haven't been successful in removing any earmarks because many House members are afraid of the enormous power of the appropriations committee, which determines who gets what in the budget.

``There are a lot of members who are afraid to buck the appropriations committee, because they feel they'll lose something -- either an earmark of their own or something else" that they want to pass , said Representative Charles Bass, a New Hampshire Republican.

In the meantime, Flake is treating his colleagues to some theatrical touches -- and no small amount of heartburn. The always-smiling congressman takes to the House floor to question about 10 earmarks in each spending bill, forcing the projects' sponsors in most cases to own up to them and defend them on C-SPAN.

``This project will be a big boost to the marketability of our manufacturing sector and help with new business activity for the region, which will lead to job retention and -- hopefully -- job creation," Representative Thomas Reynolds of New York, the head of Republicans' House campaign committee, said last week . He was defending a $250,000 earmark for the Tooling and Machining Association in Rochester, N.Y.

A few minutes later, Flake was on the floor again, this time targeting a $300,000 earmark for the Bronx Council on the Arts. He told his colleagues about an upcoming multimedia exhibition supported by the council known as ``Pay to Play," which was inspired by recent congressional scandals.

Flake read from the description of the project on the group's website: ``Please note that special consideration will be given to work that addresses corruption, greed, scandal, cover-ups, failures of democracy, the transparent veneer of public interest that masks rampant self-interest, and other such things."

``How would you define irony?" Flake said. ``We are funding artistic parodies of congressional earmarking with earmarks."

Representative Jose Serrano, a New York Democrat , issued a spirited defense touting the council's record of helping small businesses create jobs in poor neighborhoods -- and struck back at the Arizonan.

``I do not know what you are angry about; the Diamondbacks beat the Yankees in the World Series," Serrano said. ``But the fact of life is that the more you get up on these [earmarks], sir, the more I realize that you do not know what you are talking about."

The earmark survived, 343-74.

Federal Deficit May Fall Below $300B (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 8, 2006

The federal deficit appears on track to register less than $300 billion for the budget year ending Sept. 30, as surging tax revenues continue to signal significant improvement over White House estimates released in February — though only modest gains over last year.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, which makes estimates for lawmakers, said Friday that the deficit for the first three quarters of fiscal 2006 came in $41 billion less than the red ink recorded for the same period in 2005.

The 2005 deficit registered $318 billion. It would take major erosion in the fiscal picture in the final three months of the budget year for the deficit to exceed $300 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0039671

The administration is poised Tuesday to put its own spin on the deficit picture as it updates its earlier estimate of $423 billion for the 2006 deficit. President Bush is expected to tout the numbers as proof of the success of Bush-sponsored tax cuts in reviving economic growth and, in turn, tax revenues.

Indeed, tax collections are surging at a 13 percent growth rate, reflecting particularly strong growth in taxes paid on corporate profits and income taxes paid by wealthier people and small businessmen who pay taxes quarterly instead of having them withheld by employers.

White House critics say the Bush team always inflates its February numbers so as to trumpet good news later in the year. And they say that seemingly intractable deficits in the $300 billion range are nothing to celebrate.

The improvements in the deficit picture come despite the high cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and continuing federal outlays related to Hurricane Katrina and other disasters last year.

Congressmen Press Washington To Relinquish Foster Care Funds (PPG)

By Jerome L. Sherman

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 8, 2006

U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter yesterday said he and other members of Pennsylvania's congressional delegation are pressuring federal officials to release $170 million meant for the state's foster care program for children.

The money has been on hold since last year, when officials with the federal Administration for Children and Families discovered that the state wasn't following guidelines for reporting expenses.

The state Department of Public Welfare recently adjusted its reporting procedures, but the federal government won't resume funding until it conducts a new audit.

Mr. Specter, a Republican, was joined by Allegheny County Chief Executive Dan Onorato and U.S. Rep. Tim Murphy, R-Upper St. Clair, who warned that the issue could soon hurt thousands of children at risk of being sent into foster care.

"The last thing they need is a battle between the state and the federal government over bureaucratic paperwork," Mr. Murphy said.

That battle could cost Allegheny County as much as $11 million this year, and Mr. Onorato predicted drastic cuts in the county's Office of Children, Youth and Families if no resolution is reached by the fall.

About 2,600 children are in foster care at any given moment in the county, while another 6,400 are receiving some type of in-home services that try to keep them out of foster care.

Mr. Onorato said the county may have to close some of its more than two dozen family support centers.

"We have to cut $11 million in services to balance the budget," he said. "These are services we won't provide to children."

Last year, the state covered the gap in federal funding for local foster care programs. This year, however, state officials say they can no longer afford to help county governments.

Mr. Specter said he has received letters of concern from commissioners in more than half of the state's 67 counties.

David J. Lett, regional administrator for the Administration for Children and Families, has said his office is following rules created by Congress to safeguard billions of dollars in federal money.

Mr. Specter described the federal government's criticisms of Pennsylvania as "purely technical."

He said he would use his position on the Senate's Appropriations Committee to put pressure on Mr. Lett's boss, Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt.

"Secretary Leavitt has to come to my subcommittee for $52 billion a year," he said. "We have the leverage."

Wade F. Horn, assistant secretary for children and families, said Mr. Leavitt would "carefully consider any requests from a U.S. senator."

The President Who Would Not Grow Up (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

IN BRITAIN, FROM WHICH THIS country severed all "political bands" in 1776, the birthday of the monarch is a cause for national celebration. Not even the most ardent advocate of the unitary executive would suggest that Americans attach the same importance to a president's birthday. So why was there so much fascination with George W. Bush's attainment of three-score years?

DOJ_NMG_0039672

Not only did this event generate a plethora of news stories, PR geniuses also cleverly piggybacked on the media coverage. We were especially impressed by Nintendo's decision to provide the president with a cognition-honing game called Brain Age that, among other things, allows players to solve "simple math problems" (no fuzzy math, presumably) and count the number of people going in and out of a house.

Explanations abound for the focus on Bush's 60th. One is that he is the first baby-boomer president to turn 60 on the job (Bill Clinton, 60 next month, was 54 when he left office). The Bush-as-boomer angle has served as a springboard for yet further journalistic reflection on that over-analyzed generation.

Bush's 60th also provides a peg for the inevitable observations about how the presidency ages its occupants, as well as speculation about whether the graying at the president's temples was accelerated by Sept. 11 or the war in Iraq. Yet we think something else is going on here. Bush's 60th is good copy for the same reason Mick Jagger's was: It represents the aging of a youthful persona.

Younger men than Bush have served as president — Teddy Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy were in their 40s when they were inaugurated — but this president is known for a number of traits associated with youthfulness: his informality, his fondness for goofy nicknames, his habit of bantering with the media (which backfired recently when he kidded a reporter for this newspaper at a Rose Garden event about wearing dark glasses required by an eye condition).

Years ago, Michael Kinsley quipped that Al Gore was an old person's idea of a young person. Bush's brashness and playfulness — what critics call his "frat boy" persona — have put him closer to a young person's idea of a young person. The question is whether that will change now that the "frat boy" has embarked on his seventh decade. The president took pains last month to tell some real young people that 60 was just a number.

"When I was your age, I thought 60 was really old," Bush told some community college students. "It's all in your mind. It's not that old, it really isn't." We agree, but, given all the hoopla about this birthday, those students might have been skeptical.

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Ends Down 134, Nasdaq Closes Down 25 (AP)

AP, July 8, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Corporate profit warnings and record oil prices overshadowed a benign jobs creation report and sent stocks sharply lower Friday as investors worried that the economy was cooling too quickly. The Dow Jones industrials shed 134 points as stocks ended the week with a loss.

The Labor Department reported just 121,000 new jobs in May, short of the 175,000 economists expected. With the unemployment rate steady at 4.6 percent, the report was exactly what Wall Street had hoped for -- low unemployment, but modest job growth that won't spark a sharp increase in consumer demand, which could foreshadow inflation and interest rate hikes.

However, with 3M Co. warning of lower-than-expected earnings, investors grew concerned that slower economic growth, while good for keeping rates steady, could cut into corporate profits. Yet few other companies have warned the markets about falling profits, analysts noted.

"I think what you're seeing with 3M is a bit of a head-fake," said Joseph Battipaglia, chief investment officer at Ryan Beck & Co. "Overall, I think you'll see second-quarter profits come in strong across the board. Today could just be a tempest in a teapot."

Record oil prices also pressured stocks, with traders worrying that consumers hit with higher energy prices would spend less elsewhere. A barrel of light crude set an intraday record of $75.78 before settling at $74.09, down $1.05, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Dow fell 134.63, or 1.2 percent, to 11,090.67, with part of its fall due to a drop in component 3M.

Broader stock indicators also lost ground. The Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 8.60, or 0.67 percent, to 1,265.48, and the Nasdaq composite index dropped 25.03, or 1.16 percent, to 2,130.06.

DOJ_NMG_0039673

Bonds rallied for a second straight session, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note falling to 5.13 percent from 5.18 percent late Thursday. The dollar fell against most major currencies, while gold prices rose.

The early losses illustrated the acute balance investors, perhaps unrealistically, are seeking. On the one hand, a strong economy could spark inflation, but a weak economy would eat into corporate profits and send stocks lower. While the Federal Reserve seeks to maintain that balance, the selloff reflects investors' chronic worries that the balance will shift, or has already.

"You got people wondering here if the Fed has already overshot on rates," pushing them too high and halting economic growth, said Bill Groenveld, head trader for vFinance Investments. "And that fear has the market jumping over every little thing right now."

The holiday-shortened week showed Wall Street's edgy mood as stocks gyrated from session to session. For the week, the Dow lost 0.53 percent, the S&P slid 0.37 percent and the Nasdaq tumbled 1.91 percent due to weakness in technology and small-cap stocks.

The industrial conglomerate 3M, seen as something of a barometer for its sector, was particularly troubling Friday. 3M cut its second-quarter and 2006 profit forecasts due to lower-than-expected sales, and its stock tumbled $7.29, or 9 percent, to $74.10.

Other companies added to the dour mood with more warnings of sales shortfalls. Advanced Micro Devices Inc. fell 27 cents to $23.56 after cutting its revenue forecasts. Rival Intel Corp., a Dow industrial, dropped 29 cents to $18.56.

And Starbucks Corp. stock suffered after the coffeehouse chain reported June sales figures that fell short of analysts' forecasts. Starbucks slid $1.84, or 4.9 percent, to $36.04.

In other news, General Motors Corp. added 28 cents to $29.48 after the automaker's board voted to start talks with Renault SA and Nissan Motor Co. on a potential alliance.

Declining issues outnumbered advancers by about 5 to 3 on the New York Stock Exchange, where preliminary consolidated volume came to 2.12 billion shares, compared with 2.14 billion traded Thursday.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies was down 11.34, or 1.57 percent, at 709.30.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average slipped 0.09 percent. In Europe, Britain's FTSE 100 closed down 0.02 percent, France's CAC-40 fell 0.26 percent for the session and Germany's DAX index lost 0.24 percent.

Dow Drops 134.63 On 3M's Woes, Jobs Data (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average shed 134.63 points as stocks swooned, hurt by a profit warning from 3M and mixed employment data.

The consumer-products giant lowered its second-quarter profit projection, citing weak demand for its optical films used in flat-screen computer monitors and televisions. That led to a 9% plunge in 3M shares. The maker of Scotch Tape and Post-It Notes is a Dow component.

The Dow industrials finished at 11090.67, down 1.2%. For the week, it fell 59.55 points, or 0.5%.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.7%, or 8.60 points, to 1265.48, off 0.4% on the week. The Nasdaq Composite Index was off 1.2%, or 25.03 points, to 2130.06, down 1.9% on the week.

The Labor Department announced that nonfarm payrolls grew by 121,000 jobs in June, short of Wall Street's expectations for a 200,000-job increase.

Investors lately have welcomed such disappointing economic data, seeing a reason for the Federal Reserve to stop tightening the U.S. money supply. But that was not the case Friday, because the weak payroll number was accompanied by a rise in average hourly wages, which gained eight cents to $16.70 in June, after remaining nearly flat in May.

Goldman Sachs economist Jan Hatzius said there is still ample reason to be concerned about inflation. But he believes the Fed will leave its benchmark interest rate at its current level of 5.25%, or in a worst-case scenario, perhaps raise it to 5.5% at the policy makers' next meeting in August.

DOJ_NMG_0039674

"There are definitely different signals in the jobs report," Mr. Hatzius said. "But on the whole it still looks like the Fed is near the end of its cycle."

Oil prices continued their retreat from record highs. Crude futures for August delivery fell $1.05, or 1.4%, to $74.09, up 0.2% on the week.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell.1 Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.06 billion shares, as 2,052 stocks advanced and 1,254 fell.

Bond prices rose.2 The 10-year note gained 12/32 point, or $3.75 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 5.138%. The 30-year bond rose 21/32 to yield 5.177%.

The dollar weakened.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 113.93 yen, compared with 115.15. The euro rose to $1.2815, compared with $1.2777.

Jobs Data Indicates Economy Is Slowing (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

Employers added only 121,000 jobs in June, the government reported yesterday, indicating that the economy was slowing under the combined weight of high energy prices and rising interest rates.

But the government also reported that hourly wages rose at their fastest pace in five years, while the unemployment rate remained at 4.6 percent. This suggests that the labor market remains tight and may yet spur higher inflation.

The disparate data underscored the uncertain economic situation facing the Federal Reserve as it ponders whether to continue raising interest rates over the summer to cool the economy further or whether it is time to pause. Over the last two years, the Fed has steadily increased the benchmark federal funds rate from 1 percent to 5.25 percent.

"Today's numbers only tighten the vise the Fed finds itself in," said Carl Tannenbaum, chief economist of LaSalle Bank in Chicago. "The challenge is not to be overly restrictive as growth slows and still attentive to inflation risk."

Financial markets' reaction to the news was mixed, underscoring the difficulty in parsing an uncertain situation that seems poised between a cooling and an overheating economy.

Stocks slid, weighed down by concerns about the implications for inflation of the rising wages recorded in the employment report as well as an earnings warning from 3M and lower-than-forecast sales from Advanced Micro Devices. Both the Dow Jones industrial average and the Nasdaq composite index were down more than 1 percent. [Page B6.]

Most Wall Street economists had been expecting considerably higher payroll growth. So, the price of Treasury bonds rose and the dollar fell against major currencies as the weaker job growth supported the view held by some investors that a slowing economy would allow the Fed to pause in its monetary tightening.

Noting that the data suggested both that demand would slow and that the forces pushing inflation could intensify, Mr. Tannenbaum said, "There's a fine line between stagflation and a soft landing."

With consumer prices rising at an uncomfortable rate of around 4 percent, the Fed and its chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, have been expecting the economy to slow from the torrid pace of 5.6 percent growth recorded in the first quarter. A slowdown would help damp the inflationary pressures that have been strengthened by rising energy prices.

The weak payroll growth recorded in June by employers surveyed by the Labor Department appears consistent with this view, pointing to a cooling economy, weighed down by a slower housing market and moderating consumer borrowing and spending.

Added to lackluster job growth in April and May, the weak hiring pattern in June brought the pace of job creation to about 108,000 a month in the second quarter, down from 176,000 in the first three months of the year.

Employment in the construction sector remained essentially flat — declining by 7,000 jobs as a contraction in residential building was offset by growth in construction of factories and other nonresidential structures. Employment fell at temporary-help agencies while the retail sector shed jobs for the third consecutive month.

DOJ_NMG_0039675

"We have had three months of very modest employment growth, which is consistent with an economy that has changed its underlying path," said Laurence H. Meyer, a former Fed governor and now chief forecaster at Macroeconomic Advisers. "The economy has slowed consistently, and momentum doesn't look like it is building."

This would suggest, some economists argued, that the Fed's string of 17 interest rate increases since 2004 is starting to do its job. The Fed could thus leave interest rates at 5.25 percent at its next meeting in August, rather than raise them by another quarter of a percentage point. "I think the Fed's going to pause," said Scott Anderson, senior economist at Wells Fargo in Minneapolis.

Still, some economists noted that other indicators pointed to tightness in the labor market. In particular, hourly wages grew by 3.9 percent compared with June 2005, the fastest pace in five years. Moreover, the index of weekly hours worked, the broadest measure of labor use in the economy, increased by 0.4 percent in June.

"For me, it is not clear-cut that the labor market has downshifted," said John Ryding, chief economist at Bear Stearns. "Rather than there is lack of demand from employers, it may be that low unemployment has left fewer people to hire, so instead employers are paying their existing workers more and are working their work force for longer hours."

To be sure, since the economy emerged from recession in 2001, wages have been merely trying to catch up with inflation, not spurring it. Consumer prices rose by 4.1 percent in the 12 months to May — dwarfing wage gains. Though the inflation figure for June is not yet known, it could well overshadow the 3.9 percent annual gain in hourly wages last month.

Moreover, labor productivity has been growing rapidly, keeping a lid on the rise in employers' spending on labor.

"I've been surprised that wages have not already accelerated more than they already have in light of the strong economy and the low unemployment rate and the way headline inflation has constrained real wages," said Mickey D. Levy, chief economist at Banc of America Securities.

Still, several analysts observed that the overall employment data does not support an optimistic view of inflation prospects, and do not let the Fed off the hook. With unemployment at its lowest since July 2001, wage pressures could build up more.

"I expect the Fed will continue to go," said Richard Yamarone, chief economist at Argus Research. "The only part that supports a pause by the Fed is the headline payroll number. But on balance, the strength is still seen in the numbers."

Other indicators also suggest that the labor market remains tighter than the payroll numbers might suggest. Some 387,000 jobs were created in June, according to the survey of households, released by the Labor Department in tandem with the employer survey used to calculate payroll growth.

While the employer survey is considered a more reliable indicator of the strength of the labor market, the household survey is thought by some economists to better capture jobs created by small and newly formed companies.

And other unofficial indicators pointed to relatively strong hiring. This week, the payroll company Automatic Data Processing said that its payroll data suggested that employment increased by 368,000 in June.

The index of the online job search firm Monster.com — a leading indicator of job growth, based on help-wanted postings — recorded a solid increase in June, driven by demand for white-collar workers. Some skilled occupations, like accounting, auditing, information technology, health care and transportation, appeared to be facing worker shortages.

"Our employer customers continue to report concerns over turnover, particularly in occupations with acute skill shortages," said Steve Pogorzelski, president of Monster Worldwide. He added that the index showed growth in 18 of the 23 occupational categories used by the government and declined in only 2: personal care and services, and farming forestry and fishing.

US Payrolls Up Slightly; Jobless Rate Still 4.6% (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

Employers hired cautiously last month as the economy lost steam, but they added enough new jobs to hold the nation's unemployment rate steady at 4.6 percent, the Labor Department reported yesterday.

Workers landed 121,000 new payroll jobs in June, up from the lackluster 92,000 positions gained in May.

But employers added fewer jobs in the past three months than in the previous quarter, slowing the pace of job growth this year as the housing market cooled and rising energy prices and interest rates started crimping consumer spending.

DOJ_NMG_0039676

Home builders, lenders, insurers, auto dealers and department stores were among the employers that cut jobs last month, the Labor Department data show.

"Another soft employment report points to a slowing economy," said Nigel Gault, U.S. economist for Global Insight Inc., an economic forecasting and analysis firm.

One bright spot for workers was rising wages. Average hourly earnings rose by 8 cents, to $16.70. That added up to a 3.9 percent increase over the 12 months that ended in June and the biggest annual gain in five years.

Some analysts said the increase in average wages may partly reflect a shift in the job mix, as higher-paying manufacturers added to their payrolls while lower-paying retailers trimmed theirs. That could reverse in coming months as U.S. automakers proceed with plans to eliminate tens of thousands of jobs.

Employers more than offset the job cuts by hiring more accountants, computer system designers, health-care providers, government workers and others, the Labor Department report showed.

Stocks were mixed after the report was released, as analysts debated whether it would persuade the Federal Reserve to stop raising interest rates because of the slowing economy or to keep raising them because of inflation pressures. Oil prices rose to a new intraday record of $75.78 a barrel during trading yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Many analysts estimate that the economy expanded at an annual rate of about 2.5 percent in the second quarter, less than half the rapid 5.6 percent pace of the first quarter.

"That will raise hope that the Fed might be able to stop raising rates, or at least take a pause" at its next policymaking meeting in August, Gault said. But he noted that consumer inflation, excluding food and energy prices, has crept higher in recent months, which he said should justify another interest rate increase. "We still think . . . Fed has a bit more work to do," Gault said.

Fed policymakers raised their benchmark short-term rate to 5.25 percent from 5 percent last week and signaled that they might lift it again to lower inflation. They expect the economic slowdown to weaken inflation pressures. But with energy prices moving higher, wages rising and unemployment low, they are not sure whether more interest rate increases will be needed to get the job done.

Rising interest rates have already caused home sales and residential construction spending to cool in recent months, resulting in a predictable effect on employment: Construction payrolls lost 4,000 jobs in June. That meant builders added just 10,000 jobs in the second quarter, a steep plunge from the 79,000 added in the first three months of the year.

Payrolls were flat last month at stores selling building materials, garden supplies, furniture and home furnishings. All the figures are adjusted for seasonal variation.

Other retailers cut 7,000 jobs last month, for a total of 86,000 positions eliminated over the past three months as rising gasoline prices pinched household budgets.

Job growth should continue to be modest in the months ahead because economic growth is likely to be mild, several analysts said.

The unemployment rate may stay low because the labor force -- the number of workers holding or looking for jobs -- is expanding at about the same pace as hiring.

Economists had estimated that the economy needed to add about 150,000 jobs a month to absorb new entrants to the labor force and hold the unemployment rate steady. Now, as the population ages and workforce expands more slowly, about 100,000 new jobs a month appears to be sufficient, Michael H. Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, said in a speech last month.

The unemployment rate in June for white workers was unchanged in June at 4.1 percent. Black joblessness edged up to 9 percent from 8.9 percent, while unemployment among Hispanics and Latinos rose to 5.3 percent from 5 percent.

Wage Gains Surge, But Job Growth Slows (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

Wage gains jumped to a five-year high of 3.9 percent as employers added another 121,000 jobs last month, the Labor Department reported yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0039677

The tepid growth in jobs, mostly in service professions such as health care, education and government, along with a steady unemployment rate of 4.6 percent, suggested economic growth is slowing under the weight of near-record fuel costs, a housing slowdown and sharply higher interest rates engineered by the Federal Reserve.

The report showed that from April to June, job growth slowed to 108,000 a month on average from 176,000 a month in the first quarter.

While the Fed would welcome such moderating growth, economists said the 0.5 percent jump in average hourly wages to $16.70 stoked inflation worries and might prevent the central bank from pausing its two-year campaign of raising interest rates to forestall inflation, economists said.

"The worst of both worlds" said Nigel Gault, economist at Global Insight, of the combination of faster wage growth and a softening job market. The wage gain of 3.9 percent in the last year was the best since June 2001.

Some economists thought the wage growth meant workers are gaining some bargaining power in negotiating bigger paychecks. Others, however, thought it might be the result of a better mix of jobs, as employers shed low-paying retail positions and added high-paying factory and office jobs.

The stock market fell with fear the big wage gains might prompt the Fed to raise rates further this year. The Dow Jones Industrial Average lost 134 points. But bond prices rose on hope that the Fed will focus on the weaker-than-expected job gains and decide to put off raising rates for a while.

The strong wage gains combined with a 0.4 percent increase in hours worked suggests economic growth remains healthy, said Roger M. Kubarych, economist at HVB Group. That "strengthens the case of Fed officials who see serious inflation dangers and support further tightening of monetary policy."

Patrick Fearon, a senior economist at A.G. Edwards, agreed that concern about an uptick in wage inflation may tempt the Fed to raise rates despite the weak job growth.

The Fed has already raised interest rates 17 times, lifting mortgage rates to the highest levels in four years. The average rate on home equity lines of credit, at 8.2 percent, last week hit the highest level in five years and is up from 6.38 percent a year ago, according to Bankrate.com. The Fed next meets to decide on raising rates on Aug. 8.

The jobs report "suggests that the economy is cooling off a little bit, or cooled off a little bit in the second quarter, but it's not crashing," said Carl Tannenbaum, chief U.S. economist at ABN Amro. "If you take everything together, this doesn't move the Fed dramatically one way or another as it prepares for August."

President Bush cheered the latest snapshot on the job market in the world's largest economy, calling it "good news."

Despite the strong wages gains, consumers have been barely able to keep up with the soaring cost of fuel, health care and other necessities. Yesterday, premium crude prices hit another record of $75.78 in New York trading, driving up gasoline prices, which are once again approaching the $3-a-gallon threshold.

Consumers for the most part are forking over whatever it costs to fill their tanks with gas, but the high fuel prices have been prompting them to cut back in other areas such as eating out and entertainment. That is why economists expect them to help keep a lid on growth in the months ahead.

US Jobs Growth Weaker Than Expected (FT)

By Christopher Swann And Jennifer Hughes

Financial Times, July 8, 2006

The US produced fewer jobs than expected last month, adding to evidence that the economy is losing momentum.

Non-farm payrolls rose by 121,000 in June, following an upwardly revised 92,000 in May.

The outcome was shy of the consensus expectation for job creation at 175,000. Over the past three months job creation has averaged just 108,000, down from 176,000 over the previous three months and below the level necessary to prevent unemployment from rising over the longer term.

In June unemployment remained steady at 4.6 per cent but Peter Morici, professor of economics at the University of Maryland, said the jobless rate would rise unless employment growth accelerates.

DOJ_NMG_0039678

"Subpar job growth in April. May and June indicates that the economy is slowing as anticipated," he said. "A weaker housing market and higher gas prices have clamped down auto and retail sales, and this is feeding back into business investment, construction and job creation."

Economists had been bracing for a much stronger figure in part because of a robust report by ADP Employer Services, which estimated that 368,000 jobs had been created in June.

"One quarter is not quite enough to establish a new trend but given that every major indicator of gross demand has weakened in recent months we are inclined to take it seriously," said High Frequency Economics. "At the very least, it must suggest to the Fed that a pause in the rate hikes is now appropriate."

Global Insight, which provides economic analysis, said that it still expected another rate rise in August. "Another soft employment report points to a slowing economy (we think that real GDP grew only 2.3 per cent in the second quarter)," it said in a note. "That will raise hope that the Fed might be able to stop raising rates – or at least take a pause in August. But we still think that the upward creep in core consumer price inflation means that the Fed has a bit more work to do."

Stocks and bonds both rallied after the data on hopes that softer employment figures could lead the Fed to hold off raising rates.

But gains were soon curbed by the strong rise in hourly earnings - which if sustained in future reports, would imply growing inflation pressures, providing the Fed with a potential dilemma. With interest rates at a level considered neutral, further monetary tightening runs the risk of slowing the economy. But if inflation pressures do rise, the Fed may have little choice but to raise rates.

Fed funds futures contracts indicated about a 60 per cent chance that the central bank will raise rates for the 18th consecutive time to 5.5 per cent at its meeting in August, currently priced in from about a 72 per cent chance ahead of the report.

"Events are shaping up to provide a perfect test of what the 'new era' Bernanke Fed wishes to impart to the markets - a willingness to send a strong anti-inflation message and err on the side of tightening or not act, and reveal their trepidation that another tightening would be both a step too far, as they try to avoid the common 'over-tightening' mistake of many past tightening cycles," said Alan Ruskin, strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

As investors digested the inflation implications, the S&P 500 was off 0.1 per cent at 1,272.31. Ten-year Treasuries however held gains, leaving yields 3 basis points lower at 5.155 per cent. The dollar slipped on the news, falling from $1.278 to $1.285 against the euro before recovering to $1.282.

The disappointing job numbers were partly offset by the upward revision to the May payroll figure and the strong rise in average hourly earnings. Hourly earnings were up 3.9 per cent on the year, the strongest rise in five years.

Manufacturing employment rose by 15,000 and government employment by 31,000.

Average hours worked increased from 33.8 to 33.9.

The figures present a mixed picture to the Federal Reserve. At their last meeting, the members of the FOMC raised interest rates for the 17th consecutive time to 5.25 per cent.

US Stocks Fall; 3M Sends Dow Average To Biggest Loss In Month (BLOOM)

By Nick Baker

Bloomberg, July 8, 2006

U.S. stocks fell and the Dow Jones Industrial Average had its biggest decline in a month after 3M Co.'s quarterly earnings failed to match estimates and a government report showed wages rose the most in five years.

3M, the most heavily weighted stock in the Dow before today, accounted for more than 40 percent of the average's loss. Technology stocks tumbled after sales at Advanced Micro Devices Inc., the second-largest maker of personal-computer processors, were lower than forecast. Stocks also dropped for the week.

Rising labor costs reinforced speculation that second- quarter earnings reports, starting next week, will show higher expenses are slowing growth. Stocks were unable to benefit from June employment figures that trailed forecasts of economists, suggesting the Federal Reserve may stop raising interest rates.

``3M is probably a warning shot over the bow in terms of understanding how tough the corporate earnings environment is going to be," said Liam Dalton, who oversees $1.1 billion as chief executive officer at Axiom Capital in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0039679

The Dow average tumbled 134.63, or 1.2 percent, to 11,090.67, the most since June 5. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index fell 8.60, or 0.7 percent, to 1265.48. The Nasdaq Composite Index, which gets 41 percent of its value from computer-related shares, dropped 25.03, or 1.2 percent, to 2130.06.

Weekly Losses

All three gauges declined for the week. The Dow average fell 0.5 percent and the S&P 500 declined 0.4 percent. The Nasdaq lost 1.9 percent, the biggest weekly loss since the period ended June 9.

About three stocks fell for every one that rose on the New York Stock Exchange. More than 1.4 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 17 percent less than the three-month daily average.

3M, the maker of 50,000 products including Post-it Notes, dropped $7.29, or 9 percent, to $74.10. Second-quarter profit was $1.14 to $1.17 a share because of a gain. Excluding one-time items, earnings fell short of the company's estimate and revenue was ``near the low end'' of projections, 3M said.

3M blamed the shortfall on costs to start an optical film unit and slack demand from makers of flat-panel televisions, which use liquid-crystal displays. Corning Inc., the world's largest maker of LCD glass, lost $1.09 to $22.15.

Advanced Micro slipped 27 cents to $23.56. It said sales for the period ended July 2 fell 9 percent from the first quarter as larger rival Intel Corp. cut prices. Advanced Micro had forecast that sales would be unchanged or down slightly.

Labor Data

A Labor Department report showed hourly earnings for U.S. workers rose 3.9 percent last month compared with a year earlier. That's the biggest increase since June 2001.

``There's still a little bit of uncertainty about what the Fed's going to do,'' said Sean Clark, who oversees $1 billion as chief investment officer at Clark Capital Management in Philadelphia. ``That wage number may give the Fed reason to hike one more time in August.''

U.S. employers added 121,000 jobs in June, according to the report, less than the 175,000 increase economists predicted in a Bloomberg News survey. The unemployment rate stayed at 4.6 percent.

Alcoa Inc., the world's biggest aluminum producer, on July 10 will become the first member of the Dow average to release its second-quarter profit report. Alcoa rose 13 cents to $33.55.

Earnings Forecasts

During the past four weeks, analysts have reduced their earnings-growth forecasts for the quarter for all but two of 10 industry groups in the S&P 500. The exceptions are energy and materials companies.

Starbucks Corp. and LaBranche & Co. also disappointed investors with their sales and earnings announcements.

Starbucks dropped $1.84 to $36.04. The world's largest coffee-shop chain said June sales increased by 6 percent, trailing some analysts' estimates. UBS AG analyst David Palmer lowered his rating on the shares to ``neutral'' from ``buy,'' citing ``slowing sales momentum.''

LaBranche sank $3.02, or 24 percent, to $9.42, the biggest- ever decline. The largest market-maker on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange reported its first quarterly loss in a year and a half as a drop in U.S. stocks reduced revenue.

General Motors Corp. and RadioShack Corp. were standouts as other stocks slumped.

GM Alliance

GM gained 28 cents, or 1 percent, to $29.48 for the biggest advance in the Dow average. The board of the world's biggest automaker authorized CEO Rick Wagoner to study an alliance with Nissan Motor Co. and Renault SA.

Kirk Kerkorian, whose Tracinda Corp. is GM's fourth-largest investor, has urged the three automakers to consider linking up to reduce costs and make GM profitable.

RadioShack jumped $3.20, or 23 percent, to $16.96 for the S&P 500's biggest advance. The No. 3 U.S. electronics retailer hired the former head of Kmart Holding Corp., Julian Day, as chairman and CEO.

S&P 500 shares, called Spiders, declined 83 cents to $126.61. Nasdaq-100 tracking shares, known by their QQQQ symbol, lost 42 cents to $37.69.

S&P 500 futures expiring in September fell 7.80 to 1275 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Nasdaq-100 Index futures slipped 14.75 to 1550.25.

DOJ_NMG_0039680

The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for companies with a median market value of $599 million, lost 1.6 percent to 709.30. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares, dropped 98.73, or 0.8 percent, to 12,729.06. Based on the change in the Wilshire, the value of stocks decreased by $123.4 billion.

Advanced Micro Devices Inc. (AMD US) Alcoa Inc. (AA US) Corning Inc. (GLW US) General Motors Corp. (GM US) LaBranche & Co. (LAB US) RadioShack Corp. (RSH US) 3M Co. (MMM US) Starbucks Corp. (SBUX US)

Oil Price Rise Fuels Fears On Inflation (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, July 8, 2006

International oil prices rose to a new record on Friday as US drivers took to the roads on their annual summer holiday.

The increase – to $75.78 a barrel – stoked fears that inflation could rise, leading share prices in the US and Europe lower.

Analysts said the rise made it more likely that the US Federal Reserve and other central banks would increase interest rates, especially as pressure from high oil prices showed no sign of weakening soon.

Robert Laughlin, senior energy broker at Man Financial in London, said: "People are talking about $80 [a barrel]; quite frankly that looks like it could be hit sooner rather than later. Particularly if we get a large hurricane in the Gulf of Mexico over the next two months."

Demand for petrol in the US, the world's biggest consumer, has jumped to 9.6m barrels a day in the past four weeks. This has caused concern that refineries – still struggling after last year's hurricanes shut down more than 10 per cent of US capacity – could struggle to keep up.

Refiners are updating their plants so that they can process heavy, sour crude oil, which is now increasingly in supply, as well as the light, sweet crude oil, whose volumes are dwindling as oil fields on which the world has come to rely run dry.

A barrel of light, sweet oil produces more petrol than a barrel of the heavy, sour variety, which is more viscous and contains more sulphur.

Light, sweet oil is especially important in the production of the more environmentally friendly forms of petrol that governments want drivers to use.

Joseph Stanislaw, senior independent energy adviser to Deloitte Consulting, said: "The fears are related to the summer time. Consumers are still driving and using petrol and the light crude oils that produce a higher proportion of petrol are not in abundant supply."

The move by oil producers to develop heavy oil fields more quickly than new refinery units are being added was illustrated by Saudi Arabia this week. It cut the price of its heavier oil and raised the price of its light oil.

But high oil prices are also being caused by fears that geopolitical tensions could interrupt oil flows when the world has only a slim cushion of emergency supplies.

All Bets Off For Midterm Elections (MJS)

By Katherine M. Skiba

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, July 8, 2006

Washington - Four months from midterm elections, most election-watchers aren't wagering on which party will control the House and Senate. But some say the House appears more up for grabs than the Senate.

The numbers? Democrats need to gain 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate to end a largely unbroken 12-year Republican hold on Congress.

One thing is certain, though. Democrats will try to nationalize the races while Republicans cast them as local contests, all against a backdrop of considerable voter unease, said experts assembled this week by George Washington University.

They were split on whether trends predict an anti-incumbent year or even an anti-Washington year.

Democratic political consultant Peter Fenn, saying the anti-incumbent mood was "very, very palpable," envisions Nov. 7 as a referendum on the GOP.

"The Republicans are in charge," he said. "Some would say not only do they control the Senate, the House and the presidency, but the Supreme Court and other courts."

DOJ_NMG_0039681

He was alone among the six forecasters, a mix of both parties, to offer a prediction. He sees Democrats picking up 17 or 18 seats in the House and three to seven in the Senate. Prognostication perilous

Others insist that it's too early to predict, with a volatile mix of issues from Iraq to immigration, and a host of political , military and economic developments that will impact races.

Bernadette Budde, senior vice president of a political action committee that has favored Republican candidates, said if elections were held now, Democrats would take over the House.

"The House is in play far more than general observers believe it to be, and the House is more in play than the Senate," said Budde, a native of Beaver Dam, Wis.

Her group, the Business-Industry PAC, has given $1,000 to Assembly Speaker John Gard (R-Peshtigo), who is running for Congress.

Republican campaign strategist Ed Brookover said that while Democrats have done better in raising cash for their Senate and congressional committees, the Republican National Committee holds an "astounding edge" in fund-raising over the Democratic National Committee. Those dollars will let the GOP send its message and get the vote out.

He said voters in both parties are frustrated and that Democrats need an agenda to take over Congress.

Brookover said Republicans may get leverage from the healthy economy, citing job growth, steady unemployment and inflation being "somewhat under control."

That prompted a retort from Democratic pollster Mark Mellman, who said he would "love" to see Republicans talk more about the economy.

"The reality is voters out there don't think things are so good," he said, and the GOP risks seeming out of touch if they talk about gas prices and health insurance costs being under control.

A number of polls, such as the president's low approval ratings, show an "anti-Republican wave building in the country," Mellman said. But that wave is going to "crash up against a very stable political system."

He said no president going into midterm elections with an approval rating under 50% has seen his party lose fewer than 15 seats in the House. But he said when many seats change at once, they tend to be open seats (no incumbent) or mismatched seats (one party has the congressional seat but the district voted for the other party in recent presidential contests).

Mellman put the number of House Republicans in districts that favored Democrats in recent presidential races at 18. That has him loath to prognosticate.

"Anybody who says they know what's going to happen in this election is either a fool or an employee of a party committee," he said.

One unknown factor, tough to measure, is how many people are so disgusted with their party that they will sit out the elections, said Kellyanne Conway, a GOP pollster. She senses an "anti-Washington" mood, blaming lobbying and fund-raising scandals.

She took a shot at Democrats, saying their latest bywords, "A New Direction," suggest a "warm-up act for Barry Manilow." Who votes determines who wins

Rhodes Cook, who edits a non-partisan political newsletter, points to history but says the '06 elections could affirm or defy it.

Usually the president's party loses seats in midterms and loses big in elections when one party has had the presidency for six years.

In 1958 (President Eisenhower and a recession), 1966 (Lyndon Johnson and Vietnam) and 1974 (President Nixon and Watergate), the party in the White House saw major House losses. In '58, the GOP lost 47 seats and in '74, 43 seats; and in '66, Democrats lost 47 seats.

The midterm rule doesn't guarantee a wave, as the GOP's gain of 52 seats in 1994 (two years into President Clinton's White House) shows.

More recent midterms in 1998 (Clinton) and 2002 (the elder Bush) saw the president's party pick up House seats and hold its own in the Senate, Cook said.

What's ahead? The plain truth is that who wins depends on who votes.

DOJ_NMG_0039682

According to Cook, if this year resembles '94, when the "out" party energized its voters, that's good news for Democrats. But if it's more like '04, when both parties saw a record number of voters, it bodes well for Republicans.

Hillary Clinton Stumps For Angelides (OKTRIB)

By Josh Richman

Oakland Tribune, July 8, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO _ State Treasurer and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides has ``the right message for California," U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton said after a breakfast fund-raiser today.

Clinton, D-N.Y., keynoted the minimum-$1,000-per-head event at the St. Regis Hotel and briefly addressed reporters afterward. But the purported 2008 presidential candidate departed amid reporters' shouted questions on topics such as same-sex marriage, which Angelides supports and she opposes.

She said she has known Angelides since he was the California Democratic Party's chairman as her husband, Bill Clinton, first ran for president. Together they ``made the case for the kind of future we wanted our country to have," she said, overcoming forecasts of a Republican win in 1992.

Angelides has done ``a superb job" as treasurer by standing up to special interests and investing California's money and hopes in socially responsible ways, Clinton said. Reporters weren't allowed to hear her remarks at the breakfast, or to stand in the corridor outside to see attendees.

Former president George H.W. Bush reportedly will keynote a fund-raiser for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger later this month.

California GOP chairman Duf Sundheim of Palo Alto issued a statement today urging Clinton, ``as a national leader and member of the Senate Armed Forces Committee," to disavow the ``reckless comments" of Angelides campaign senior adviser Bob Mulholland, who reportedly noted the governor and North Korean dictator Kim Jong-Il both use shoe lifts to boost their height.

``The Angelides campaign seems to think that national security issues like North Korean missile tests are suitable material for political attacks," Sundheim wrote.

Angelides today reiterated his vows to expand education, health care and economic opportunity for Californians, and said he hopes this ``fight for the future of California" will ``ripple across the country," inspiring more Democratic victories.

Also at today's event was state Controller Steve Westly, whom Angelides bested in the vehement Democratic gubernatorial primary.

``Make no mistake, November 2006 is going to be a Democratic sweep," Westly said. ``Californians want a change in Sacramento _ we want a Democratic governor, and we will have a Democratic governor."

U.S. Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., thanked Clinton for being ``so generous with her support and time" and noted Westly's presence at his former rival's side. ``What you're seeing here is a united front... We also know we have a lot of work to do."

San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom; Assemblyman Mark Leno, D-San Francisco; and San Francisco Supervisor and Assembly candidate Fiona Ma also attended, but only Angelides and Newsom stayed to take reporters' questions.

Asked about Thursday's ruling by New York's highest court that same-sex marriage isn't a civil right but rather an legislative issue, Angelides said ``every Californian and every American ought to have the right to grow up in a loving family, and I would sign the Marriage Equality Bill." That's Leno's same-sex marriage bill, which Schwarzenegger vetoed last year.

Clinton in the past has said marriage should only be between a man and a woman. Her Capitol Hill office didn't return a call today.

Angelides has made his prison reform plan _ hiring staff faster, opening more prisons, appointing better managers and so on _ a campaign centerpiece this week, and he held an event on the issue with law enforcement officials and crime victims' advocates later today in Sacramento.

``Gov. Schwarzenegger has failed miserably" in dealing with it, he said in San Francisco. Asked whether overcrowding, poor health care and other prison problems predated Schwarzenegger's term, Angelides replied, ``They've gotten measurably worse... He can't lay blame for this prison crisis on anyone else."

DOJ_NMG_0039683

Schwarzenegger's campaign had issued a release Thursday noting the governor recently called for a special Legislative session on the prison crisis; has proposed building two new prisons; included $100 million in this year's budget for expanded rehabilitation; and is pursuing other reforms.

Newsom, after Angelides departed, said the state budget's on-time passage with bipartisan support was ``a win for the governor," but Schwarzenegger still must convince voters he's the centrist he now claims to be and not the conservative ideologue he seemed in 2005's special-election campaign.

``I don't know who he is, I'm not sure he knows who he is," Newsom said, noting the governor stumped for President Bush in the swing state of Ohio in 2004 and now has campaign advisors culled from the Bush/Cheney team. ``Those are his friends, and apparently those are his values."

Mulholland To Fox News: Arnold Can Take A Joke (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci

San Francisco Chronicle, July 8, 2006

Round II! Ding!

Back to the increasingly crazy dustup over State Treasurer Phil Angelides' strategist Bob Mulholland, and his comments comparing Governor Schwarzenegger's lifts, or shoes, or whatever, to Korean dictator Kim Jong Il.

Angelides, appearing in Sacramento this morning, was asked about the comment, said the comments were "inappropriate and I've told my team let's knock off the personal attacks."

But that didn't satisfy Fox News conservative talk show bulldog Sean Hannity, who tried to engaged liberal bulldog Mulholland this afternoon.

Hannity: Mr. Mulholland, why don't you just apologize and say you're wrong?

Muholland: "Oh, It was a joke. Schwarzenegger loves making fun of people and he loves people making fun of him ... so if Schwarzzennger can stand the heat, he can get out of the kitchen. This was just a little newsletter around the state capital, and for some reason, Republicans are all hot and bothered by it."

Hannity: "You're the same guy that said ... the bullets coming at him are going to be real bullets."

Mulholland: "I said it was the wrong statement, back in 2003 ... there's always hope for Bob Mulholland."

Hannity: "You're comparing the governor of California to a dictator, and you think you're being funny ... maybe you ought to consider resigning."

Mulholland: "Do you think Schwarzenegger, who loves making fun of people, shouldn't have fun made of him? ... In the political arena, you guys ... make fun of Democrats all the time, including Hillary ... Schwarzenegger can take a little joke."

Gore To Address Wal-Mart Executives (AP-Y2)

By Marcus Kabel, Ap Business Writer

AP2, July 8, 2006

Former Vice President Al Gore will take his campaign against global warming to Wal-Mart Stores Inc. next week, speaking at Wal-Mart headquarters to executives seeking to make the world's largest retailer more environmentally friendly, a company spokesman said Friday.

Gore will talk to a quarterly conference of Wal-Mart managers working on ways to implement Chief Executive Lee Scott's plans to make the retailer a leader in cutting emissions, energy use and solid waste and selling more environmentally friendly products.

Gore will speak about global warming, the subject of his recent documentary film, "An Inconvenient Truth," Wal-Mart spokesman Dan Fogleman said.

The daylong meeting Wednesday at Wal-Mart's Home Office in Bentonville, Ark., is a quarterly gathering of 14 individual groups it calls sustainability networks, which include Wal-Mart managers and outside experts.

Each network works on specific areas, such as logistics or food, to put into practice a broad environmental initiative launched by Scott last October.

DOJ_NMG_0039684

In recent months, Wal-Mart has taken steps including doubling the number of organic food items in its stores, reducing fuel consumption by its fleet of 7,000 trucks and installing energy-saving light bulbs in stores.

Wal-Mart is taking the environmental offensive at a time when it is under attack from organized labor and other groups for its business practices, including employee pay and health benefits.

John Edwards: Stop Predatory Lenders (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 8, 2006

John Edwards, a White House hopeful, focused on the problem of predatory lenders in his first swing through Iowa since a statewide poll gave his potential presidential campaign a boost.

"What we're doing is focusing on what can be done to stop predatory lenders and payday lenders from preying on our most vulnerable families," said Edwards, who called for new regulations for an industry in which annual interest rates for payday loans can soar to 300 percent to 400 percent.

The 2004 vice presidential nominee spent Friday raising money for Democratic candidate David Loebsack's long-shot challenge against Rep. Jim Leach (news, bio, voting record) and meeting with activists at a Warren County barbecue.

In his 2004 bid for the Democratic presidential nomination, Edwards scored a surprising second-place showing in Iowa's caucuses, giving him the momentum that eventually landed him on the ticket with the party's choice, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Soon after the Democrats lost, the former North Carolina senator returned to Iowa and has been rebuilding his campaign organization. A poll for the Des Moines Register last month showed Edwards leading the still evolving Democratic field, with New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton second, Kerry third and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack fourth.

"It was encouraging," Edwards said. "It means I still have some very good friends in Iowa, which I appreciate."

___

Associated Press Writer Mike Glover in Des Moines, Iowa, contributed to this report.

Biden Defends Remarks (AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Facing criticism, potential 2008 presidential candidate Joe Biden on Friday defended his recent remark that "you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent."

The Delaware senator said his words were taken out of context.

On a recent edition of the C-SPAN series "Road to the White House," Biden is shown in New Hampshire boasting about his support among Indian-Americans.

"I've had a great relationship. In Delaware, the largest growth in population is Indian-Americans moving from India. You cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent. I'm not joking," the senator said.

The clip made its way through cyberspace this week and caught fire in Washington, where Biden is known as one of the more long-winded senators.

Visiting troops and officials in Iraq this week, Biden was asked about the comment during an interview with CNN's "The Situation Room."

The senator said he has had an "incredibly strong" relationship with the Indian-American community in Delaware and that his comment was misinterpreted.

"I was making the point that up until now in my state, we've had a strong Indian community made up of leading scientists and researchers and engineers," Biden said. Lately, he said: "We're having middle- class people move to Delaware, take over Dunkin' Donuts, take over businesses, just like other immigrant groups have, and I was saying that ... they're growing, it's moving."

"I could have said that 40 years ago about walking into a delicatessen and saying an Italian accent in my state," Biden added.

___

DOJ_NMG_0039685

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) _ John Edwards, a White House hopeful, focused on the problem of predatory lenders in his first swing through Iowa since a statewide poll gave his potential presidential campaign a boost.

"What we're doing is focusing on what can be done to stop predatory lenders and payday lenders from preying on our most vulnerable families," said Edwards, who called for new regulations for an industry in which annual interest rates for payday loans can soar to 300 percent to 400 percent.

The 2004 vice presidential nominee spent Friday raising money for Democratic candidate David Loebsack's long-shot challenge against Rep. Jim Leach and meeting with activists at a Warren County barbecue.

In his 2004 bid for the Democratic presidential nomination, Edwards scored a surprising second-place showing in Iowa's caucuses, giving him the momentum that eventually landed him on the ticket with the party's choice, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Soon after the Democrats lost, the former North Carolina senator returned to Iowa and has been rebuilding his campaign organization. A poll for the Des Moines Register last month showed Edwards leading the still evolving Democratic field, with New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton second, Kerry third and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack fourth.

"It was encouraging," Edwards said. "It means I still have some very good friends in Iowa, which I appreciate."

___

Associated Press Writer Mike Glover in Des Moines, Iowa, contributed to this report.

Democratic Party Divided On Iraq (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Intent on seizing control of Congress, Democrats want to keep the focus on President Bush's missteps in Iraq. Yet the war is fracturing the party in a handful of House and Senate races.

Senate primary fights in Connecticut and Washington state as well as a few House contests pit the party's liberal wing _ proponents of candidates who want an immediate end to the conflict _ against moderates favored by Democratic leaders in Washington.

Arguably the most high-profile and contentious case is Connecticut, where three-term Sen. Joe Lieberman is under siege for his staunch support of the war and Bush's national security policies. Liberal bloggers and left-leaning groups are pushing the candidacy of multimillionaire businessman Ned Lamont, who wants U.S. troops to start coming home now.

Such primary clashes are drawing unwanted attention to Democratic divisions on the war while raising questions about whether the Democrats' competing factions are, in effect, torpedoing the party's chances to make 2006 a referendum on Bush's handling of Iraq.

"If Democrats don't get together, it's going to be hard to take on George Bush's Republicans," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist in Washington. However, she said, "There's room for different opinions in primaries, and there's room for the party to put aside their differences in the fall."

Maybe.

But for now, Democratic splits over Iraq _ and constant reminders of the fissures _ make life difficult for party leaders trying to project a united front on the war.

Former President Clinton, at a political fundraiser in Indianapolis on Wednesday, bemoaned his party's breaks. Clinton said the Iraq war was a mistake that diverted attention from al-Qaida and Afghanistan, but he added, "It bothers me to see our Democrats too divided on what we do now."

Four months before Election Day, Democrats remain optimistic about winning control of the GOP-run Congress by capitalizing on voter dissatisfaction with Bush, Republicans and the war.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll last month found that 59 percent of Americans say the United States erred in going to war in Iraq. Among Democrats, 84 percent said the war was a mistake, up from 59 percent in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0039686

In recent weeks on Capitol Hill, both parties have maneuvered for political advantage on the war. Republicans endorsed the president's Iraq policies while working to exploit Democratic divisions on the war. Democrats, in turn, accused Republicans of blindly walking in lockstep with Bush on Iraq and sought to unify their own rank-and-file.

"Democrats are united in the belief that George Bush has implemented a failed policy in Iraq and that the GOP Congress has allowed that to happen by abdicating its oversight responsibilities," said Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Senate Democrats' campaign effort.

Still, Democrats have varying views over just when the United States should end its military mission in Iraq and those differences are on display in some primary races.

In Illinois, Tammy Duckworth, an Iraq war veteran who lost both legs in a grenade attack in Iraq, cautioned against quick withdrawal from the war despite her criticism of the conflict. Democratic rival Christine Cegelis had the support of grass-roots activists who backed her call for the withdrawal of troops to begin. Duckworth, the party's preferred candidate, won the Democratic nomination in March in an open House race.

The outcome was the opposite in a Republican-leaning California congressional district.

Jerry McNerney said it was time to withdraw U.S. troops, and his campaign had the support of proponents of former anti-war presidential candidate Howard Dean. Moderate Democrat Steve Filson opposed an immediate withdrawal and was preferred by House Democratic leaders. McNerney won the June primary and will try to unseat seven-term Republican Rep. Richard Pombo.

Liberals also have targeted first-term Sen. Maria Cantwell, D-Wash., who supported the war but has criticized Bush's stewardship. She faces challenges from anti-war activists who want U.S. troops out, including one candidate who has the support of peace activist Cindy Sheehan. The challengers lack the cash and name recognition, but their candidacies have caused the state's political left to turn on Cantwell because of the war. The primary is Sept. 19.

In Connecticut, the race between Lieberman and Lamont has gotten so tight that the senator announced this week that he would run as an unaffiliated candidate in November if he loses the Aug. 8 primary.

Lieberman appeared combative at times during a televised debate with Lamont Thursday night, and he argued that voters were choosing between a veteran senator and an indecisive political unknown.

"Ned Lamont seems just to be running against me based on my stand on one issue, Iraq, and he is distorting who I am and what I've done," Lieberman said. His opponent countered: "Senator, this is not about anybody's career. ... This is about the people."

Eli Pariser, director of MoveOn, a liberal group backing Lamont, said: "We're trying to play a constructive role in helping amplify the boldest voices and quiet the ones which are undermining the way that the Democrats are different from the Republicans."

The November elections will be the arbiter on the effectiveness of liberal groups.

"Can they swing general elections is the big question, and so far we don't know the answer. But they certainly can have an impact on primaries," said Matt Bennett, co-founder of Third Way, a group of moderate Democrats.

If 1968 is any guide, Iraq could continue to have repercussions. Nearly 40 years ago, Vietnam so divided the party that Democrats lost to Richard M. Nixon.

Competing For Connecticut (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman And Brian Braiker

Newsweek, July 8, 2006

Joe Lieberman says he's running for reelection as a Democrat—no matter what anybody else thinks. After three terms representing Connecticut in the Senate, the former vice presidential candidate is fighting off a tough challenge from Greenwich businessman Ned Lamont. Lieberman's main vulnerability: steadfast support for the war in Iraq. In a state that is increasingly disdainful of the Bush administration's Iraq policy, Lieberman is hitting the trail hard to remind primary voters there are other issues besides the war.

DOJ_NMG_0039687

Still, Lieberman isn't taking any chances. This week, he announced he's gathering signatures to petition to run as an independent (who caucuses with Democrats) should he lose the Aug. 8 primary. With polls showing Lamont within striking distance in the primary, but well behind the incumbent in a three-way general election run, some Democrats are concluding an independent bid may be Lieberman's best shot. NEWSWEEK's Jonathan Darman and Brian Braiker caught up with Lieberman and Lamont, respectively, just before the senator announced his possible independent candidacy. Excerpts:

Sen. Joe Lieberman

NEWSWEEK: Are you hearing concern from your constituents about your position on the war in Iraq?

Joe Lieberman: This will come as a surprise to you but the only people who have asked me about that are the local media. Mostly people are talking about the economy.

What do you say, though, when you meet voters who say, "I like you personally, but I really dislike your support of the Iraq war?"

I say every campaign is about the future and I want to be judged on the totality of my record. Iraq is important but it's only one issue. When people get up in Connecticut they worry about many issues like the cost of energy and the cost of their health care, whether their kids are going to be able to go to a good school, environmental protection, homeland security. I say, "Your choice, Mr. or Mrs. Voter, is which of the two of us in this race can do better for you in the next six years; I'm offering you a strong record of fighting for Connecticut. My opponent, well, he doesn't have much of a record. I'm running to get some more things done over the next six years, he's mostly running against me."

What about voters whose No. 1 issue is Iraq?

Look, I have always tried to level with people in Connecticut, I've tried to do that on the war. Obviously, my position's not politically motivated because it doesn't help me at all to take the position. I honestly think it's right for our security. Then we talk about it and I listen. There's no question among Democratic voters, support for the war is low although I do think many of them are concerned about the consequences of a hasty retreat.

Is part of the problem a perception that you're too close to President Bush on Iraq?

I supported removing Saddam Hussein before George Bush was president. [Arizona Sen. John] McCain and [former Nebraska Sen.] Bob Kerrey and I put in the Iraq Liberation Act in 1998 after Saddam threw the U.N. inspectors out and that called for the overthrow of Saddam. Therefore when President Bush chose to do something about Saddam after 9/11 I supported it though I was critical of his unilateralist foreign policy before the war, which I think made it harder for us to get allied support after Saddam was overthrown. I was outspoken about the consequences of a failure of adequate planning and preparation by the Pentagon. I have supported the goals, the mission. I have been critical, when I thought it was justified, of the methods, the tactics that are being used. But I have said I will refuse to play politics with national security.

From a purely political standpoint, is it a smart move for the Democrats to sell themselves as the party that supports quicker withdrawal from Iraq?

That's up to the individuals in the party. I think it's wrong, as a matter of military policy and national security. On this, there needs to be debate, discussion—diversity of opinion is healthy. I'm not going to play politics with the war, I don't want to impute political motives to anybody else. They've got to measure their own political consequences.

You're not used to having tough primary challenges. Is this primary battle mainly about the war?

Totally. My opponent might try to say otherwise but there's no question about it: He is running a one-issue campaign. And it takes any life it has from that one issue. I'm trying to say there's a lot more issues than the war in Iraq, as important as it is, that are essential to Connecticut's future, and look at my record on all of those and then make a judgment about my record. I'd even state it a little more starkly: If it was not for my position on the war in Iraq, I don't believe there would be a primary against me. It's not a surprise to me because I went through this in the presidential primaries. It's something I feel very strongly about and it's one where I think I've got to take a principled position and hope that people in the primary and in the state respect me for it and are wiling to judge me on my whole record even if they disagreed with me on Iraq.

Liberal bloggers have been attacking you pretty hard. What do you think of all that anger?

I don't like it and I don't think it's healthy for our system. Speaking beyond [the attacks] toward me, we've seen two presidents, President Clinton and now President Bush, who've been the targets of just the worst vituperation and I'd call it hatred from people in our country. It's not healthy for the country. Our politics is much too partisan. We see it in Washington. Part of why the politics is partisan is it's a less mainstream group that dominates primaries in both parties and that's not healthy. As far as the vituperation on the blogs—periodically my staff will show me some of it and I don't recognize myself. It's not me. The personal attacks are just outrageous.

DOJ_NMG_0039688

Do you think you could take care of your primary problems tomorrow if you got up and gave a speech that was a straight-on attack, indicting Republicans?

I suppose some people might like that. My nature is not to be an attacker. I'm a person of very strong opinions, but I've never believed that one helps make one's case by attacking the target of one's position. I think you lay out the case and you hope that people will be reasonable in listening. The other thing I would say is that the big distortion in this campaign which my opponent is trying is through the one issue, the war, which I happen to share the goals of the president (though as I say I have criticized some of the tactics). They're attempting to go from that to somehow changing my party affiliation. I've opposed just about every initiative of this president: Taxes, environmental protection, Social Security privatization. I consider myself a Truman-Kennedy-Clinton Democrat which is: social justice, upward mobility, fairness at home and a strong idealistic foreign policy. That's what I'm fighting for so I feel alright about it.

Challenger Ned Lamont

NEWSWEEK: You're basically a political neophyte, unknown outside of Greenwich—what would you have to bring to Washington?

Ned Lamont: I started up a business from scratch, I'm a small-business guy, pulling cable for telecomm systems in college campuses for 20 years. I've been teaching school up in Bridgeport. I don't think Washington should be a sinecure for career politicians. We should have the small-business guys represented in the hallways of Congress.

Well, you're a small-business guy who's worth somewhere between $90 million and $300 million. Lieberman is trying to identify you as an out-of-touch plutocrat. How do you respond to that?

I respond by going all over the state, introducing myself, letting them know who I am, what I'm about. Hopefully some negative 30-second ad will not carry the day and people will take a fresh look at what we're about.

Is the seniority that Lieberman brings to the Senate not a good thing?

Seniority is great if you're on the right side of the issues. But if you're on the wrong side of the war, the wrong side of the energy bill, you find common ground with the president when it comes to privatization of Social Security or vouchers for education, then seniority doesn't help. Secondly, I might add we're 49th out of 50 states when it comes to return of every dollar sent to Washington, D.C. We get 68 cents back; we've lost half of our defense related jobs in the past 18 years.

Unlike Lieberman, you have been vocal about your opposition to the war in Iraq.

Look. There's a real difference of opinion about the war. As I go around the state, it's much bigger than the military invasion of Iraq. It's "rather than spending $250 million a day in Iraq, how come we're not investing in universal health care for every American?" That's the No. 1 question I get on the stump. How come we're not investing in grade schools so kids can compete in the 21st century? How are we going to keep good-paying jobs in the state? So the war ties right back to investing in our country again. That's the most important issue that I'm emphasizing.

Are you advocating pulling out of Iraq?

I'm advocating taking our very front line troops out of the Sunni triangle, out of harm's way. Reinforcing the fact that we've got to take an American face off of this occupation. Only the Iraqis can solve this. They can solve it politically. We're not going to be able to impose this at the barrel of a gun. And yes, we start bringing our troops home.

Would pulling out of Iraq now vindicate the insurgents?

No, I think just the opposite. Our very front line military presence is what's invigorating the insurgency. When we take the military face off of this perceived occupation, then I think it's a better opportunity for the different Shia and Sunni factions to have the incentive to reach political compromises that they need.

This is a primary election for a Senate race—turnout is not expected to be high. What are you doing to get the vote out?

DOJ_NMG_0039689

A) By being right on the issues, by being frank and clear about where we stand. B) This is a real grassroots operation. We've got thousands of volunteers that signed up on our Web site. We're doing friends, family and neighbors, word of mouth. We're going to make sure that the people who believe in the same issues we do turn out on Aug. 8.

In an election where every seat counts for the Democrats, do you worry at all about splitting the party in Connecticut?

No. I've said that come what may on Aug. 9, we rally behind the winner of the Democratic primary and we go forward united as a party. We'll be stronger and invigorated for it.

Lieberman's Struggle At Home (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

SIMSBURY, Conn. -- Sen. Joseph Lieberman's re-election margins have set records in Connecticut and, in 2000, home-state voters handed him two wins: a third term in the Senate and their nod as the Democratic vice presidential candidate.

So why is Mr. Lieberman facing his toughest campaign yet, against an inexperienced opponent from his own party, in a year when Democrats are outpolling Republicans?

The obvious answer is his support for the unpopular Iraq war and his defense of President Bush's decision to prosecute it. But that's not a full explanation.

The moderate persona that helped Mr. Lieberman, 64 years old, score an upset victory for the Senate seat in 1988 dulls his appeal today to an energized partisan base. Time spent away from home to campaign for higher office in 2000 and 2004 -- when he sought the presidential nomination -- weakened critical home-state ties. And his penchant for lacing policy or political choices with moral or religious messages now sounds patronizing to some voters.

"His problems have been building over time and the war was the last straw for many of the party's more liberal voters," says Jennifer Duffy, a political analyst with the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

Mr. Lieberman's challenger in next month's primary is Ned Lamont, 52 years old, a multimillionaire and onetime Republican voter who says Mr. Lieberman's support of the Iraq war compelled him to run. Since then, the cable-company founder has expanded his assaults to include the incumbent's positions on trade deals, school vouchers and changes in the Social Security system -- all of which, Mr. Lamont argues, demonstrate that Mr. Lieberman has failed to stand up for Democratic values. Mr. Lamont has put $1.5 million of his own money in the race and says he may spend $1 million more.

A recent Quinnipiac University poll recorded support among registered Democrats for Mr. Lamont rising to 32% from 19% in May. Though Mr. Lieberman still led in the poll, his support was down to 57% -- leaving him a relatively thin margin, since the state's Aug. 8 primary isn't expected to draw a high turnout.

Mr. Lieberman still has many advantages. He's a policy wonk and polished campaigner, willing to break into song -- and in the right key -- if that's what it takes to connect with voters. The latest campaign-finance reports indicate he had raised about $6 million by late spring and had most of that cash on hand. He is supported by most of the state party apparatus, his Senate colleagues and friendly interest groups, including the AFL-CIO, which can help get voters to the polls.

For now, he is considered likely to win the general election easily if he gets the Democratic nomination, given his popularity with independents and Republicans. A leading Republican candidate, Alan Schlesinger, is a former statehouse representative and two-term mayor of the city of Derby, Conn. As of April, his campaign had raised $20,000 and was $10,000 in debt.

Still, intense opposition within his party prompted Mr. Lieberman this week to say he will begin collecting signatures to allow him to run in November as an independent if he loses the primary.

People close to the campaign say the poll tightening left him few options. If he waited until after the primary, Mr. Lieberman would have 24 hours to collect 7,500 signatures to run as an independent. But his announcement risked showing weakness and could play into Mr. Lamont's charge that Mr. Lieberman is more interested in power than representing Connecticut Democrats. "Senator, this is not about anybody's career," Mr. Lamont said during the debate this week. On the other hand, it could be the spark needed to ensure that his supporters vote in a dead-of-summer primary.

In Thursday's debate, Mr. Lieberman said he is considering the independent run because his Senate seniority puts him in a better position to help Connecticut than a freshman Sen. Lamont. He touted items he wrote into the federal budget to help

DOJ_NMG_0039690

Connecticut's transportation and fuel-cell businesses as evidence of his influence. But, at the same time, he was forced to reaffirm his party roots. "I'm the Democrat in this race," he said, emphasizing that he has voted with the Democrats most of the time during his Senate career.

The seeds of Mr. Lieberman's struggle today may have been planted 18 years ago when he ran against former Sen. Lowell Weicker -- a seemingly entrenched Republican incumbent whose moderation drew the ire of his own party base. Back then, William F. Buckley, a philosophical leader for many conservatives, started a political action committee to help Mr. Lieberman defeat Mr. Weicker, whose aggressive stance during the Watergate hearings irked some Republicans.

In an echo of that intraparty spat, Mr. Lieberman in 1998 emerged as the harshest Democratic critic of President Clinton during his impeachment trial. "Such behavior is not just inappropriate. It is immoral," said Mr. Lieberman, in a Senate floor speech that many Democrats feared would end with a call for impeachment. Ultimately, Mr. Lieberman didn't vote to oust Mr. Clinton.

When Mr. Lieberman became Vice President Al Gore's running mate in 2000, he had to mollify the party's minority leaders upset with his previous criticism of racial quotas. During his 2004 campaign for president, teachers unions still chafed over his earlier support for private-school voucher experiments. And, when Mr. Bush won a second term, some Democrats were stunned when Mr. Lieberman offered to help broker a deal on Social Security overhaul -- although he said diverting funds to private accounts was no longer an option he would support.

When challenged, Mr. Lieberman often positioned himself as a principled, independent thinker -- a stance his opponents read as a suggestion that they are not. "He does come across as sanctimonious at times," says Howard Reiter, chairman of the University of Connecticut's political-science department.

Much of today's consternation serves as a backdrop to anger over Mr. Lieberman's support for the Iraq war. "Some in my party threaten to send a message that they don't know a just war when they see it," Mr. Lieberman said in 2003. Mr. Lieberman is critical of the administration's handling of Iraq's reconstruction. But he has lectured harsher critics to tone down the rhetoric lest they undermine Mr. Bush's ability to lead.

That was a turning point for Liz Skalski, of New Fairfield, who supported Mr. Lieberman in 2000 but now plans to put a Lamont bumper sticker on her car. "I always knew he was a conservative," she says. "But when everything changed so much after 9/11, then you saw who just went along and who stood up against the Bush policies."

Steele Raised $1.8 Million In Quarter For Bid (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

Maryland's Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele raised more than $1.8 million for his U.S. Senate campaign in this year's second quarter, according to an internal campaign memo.

The latest totals are "representative of the campaign's growing momentum," said Steele campaign manager Mike Leavitt.

The $1.8 million is Mr. Steele's highest quarterly fundraising total since announcing his candidacy last fall.

Mr. Steele, a Republican, has raised more money per quarter since entering the race than the leading Democratic fundraiser, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

In the final quarter of 2005, Mr. Steele raised $853,000 to Mr. Cardin's $850,000. In the first quarter of 2006, Mr. Steele raised $1.3 million to Mr. Cardin's nearly $1 million.

"Bush, Cheney and Rove are clearly making good on their promise to pump millions into Maryland for their favorite candidate," said Cardin spokesman Oren Shur.

Vice President Dick Cheney headlined a fundraiser for Mr. Steele in April, and Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican with presidential ambitions in 2008, was the marquee name at a Steele event last month.

Mr. Shur said that Mr. Cardin, a 10-term congressman from Baltimore, has "the strong campaign organization that it will take to defeat Michael Steele in November." However, Mr. Cardin trailed challenger Kweisi Mfume by six points in the latest poll by The Washington Post.

DOJ_NMG_0039691

Mr. Mfume, the former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, had $184,466 on hand at the end of the first quarter.

Rep. Katherine Harris To Have Surgery (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 8, 2006

Rep. Katherine Harris (news, bio, voting record) announced Friday she will undergo surgery later this month to remove an ovarian mass, which will be tested to determine if it is malignant.

The 49-year-old congresswoman, who is campaigning for the Republican nomination for U.S. Senate, will visit Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington for preoperative testing Monday, her campaign office said in a statement.

The minimally invasive surgical procedure is scheduled for July 17.

Harris rose to national prominence as Florida's secretary of state during the contentious presidential election recount in 2000.

She has held firm to her Senate aspirations despite lagging poll numbers, poor fundraising, and efforts by GOP leaders to find another candidate. Harris is spending $10 million of her own money to stay in the race.

DeLay Suggests He Might Not Retire (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 8, 2006

Former U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay suggested Friday that he may not be ready for retirement just yet, a day after a federal judge ruled that his name must remain on the November ballot even though he resigned from Congress.

DeLay, who came home to Sugar Land for a previously scheduled event, also criticized U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks' ruling that the former House majority leader's name had to remain on the ballot.

"For this guy to say he can't tell where I'm going to be on Election Day, and that I am forced to be on the ballot, well, they may get exactly what they want," DeLay told supporters to raucous applause. Sparks is a Democrat appointed by Republican former President George Bush.

Later, reporters asked Delay if he now planned to run. He didn't say no.

"We have to wait and see what the 5th Circuit does on appeal," he said.

The Texas Republican Party appealed to the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans immediately after Sparks' ruling Thursday in Austin. Attorney Jim Bopp said he hoped to have a decision from the higher court this month, allowing the GOP to nominate a new candidate.

DeLay, who is awaiting trial on Texas charges of money laundering and conspiracy in a campaign finance case, won the Republican primary in March but resigned from Congress on June 9 and said he has moved to Virginia.

He still owns — and his wife, Christine, still lives in — his Sugar Land house, where DeLay also spends time, the Democrats pointed out.

Democrats want to keep his name and his legal troubles on the minds of voters as Democrat Nick Lampson tries to capture DeLay's 22nd congressional district seat in suburban Houston. The party sued to keep the GOP from removing DeLay's name from the ballot.

Republicans want to name a replacement nominee, and several prominent Houston area politicians are vying for the spot.

The U.S. Constitution states a member of Congress on Election Day must be an inhabitant of the state where his district is located. Sparks said he was not convinced that DeLay would not return to Texas.

DeLay Back To D.C.? Never Say Never (HC)

By Kristen Mack

Houston Chronicle, July 8, 2006

Former U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay told a friendly crowd Friday that Democrats seeking to force him onto the November ballot "may get exactly what they want."

After savoring a standing ovation, he quickly said the comment was not an announcement that he will seek the office he vacated last month.

DOJ_NMG_0039692

On Thursday, a federal judge ruled Republicans could not replace him as their November nominee. If the ruling stands on appeal, DeLay would remain on the ballot and would have to decide whether to campaign for the 22nd Congressional District seat he held for more than 20 years.

He may be a reluctant candidate, having once abandoned the race and still facing a serious Democratic challenge.

"The last thing in the world Tom DeLay wants is to try and win this race and lose. That's why he quit the first time," said Southern Methodist University political scientist Cal Jillson.

"I do not think he will come back and make a significant effort to hold the seat."

GOP has appealed rulingU.S. District Judge Sam Sparks' ruling Thursday was a seen as a victory for Democrats who had challenged GOP efforts to replace DeLay. Democrats would rather run against DeLay, a former House majority leader whose recent history has been clouded by ethics allegations in Washington and a still-pending Travis County indictment relating to campaign finance.

The Texas Republican Party has appealed Sparks' decision to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and is asking for a decision this month.

On Friday, DeLay received a warm welcome from several hundred people at the Sugar Land Marriott for a previously scheduled tribute, co-sponsored by the Greater Houston Partnership and the Fort Bend Chamber of Commerce.

They lauded him for his business-friendly voting record and for bringing what they say was $1.3 billion worth of economic impact to the Houston region in the last year.

An ice sculpture with DeLay's name carved in the middle greeted guests as they walked into the hotel ballroom, where a giant American flag hung behind the podium. Centerpieces included DeLay bobbleheads. And there was a "gift table" of presents for the former congressman, his wife, Christine, and daughter, Danielle Ferro.

DeLay was typically feisty, criticizing the federal judiciary in general and Sparks' ruling in particular. He referred to the court's finding that the U.S. Constitution only requires a House candidate to "inhabit" the state he seeks to represent on Election Day. Republicans asserted that DeLay was ineligible and could be replaced on the ballot because he established residence in Virginia.

"For this guy to say he can't tell where I'm going to be on Election Day, and that I am forced to be on the ballot, well, they may get exactly what they want," DeLay said. "(Sparks) virtually declared Texas election law unconstitutional. Only in this country can the federal judiciary force someone to run for office."

He said he will await the court appeal before deciding what to do, but said he's ready for battle in whatever forum.

"I always have the fight in me," he said. "I'm not quitting, I'm not stopping the fight for the conservative cause. I'm just finding a different arena to fight in. I could be the Democrats' worst nightmare outside of Congress."

'May play into his favor'State Rep. Larry Taylor, R-Friendswood, said he would like to see DeLay back in the race.

"I say Tom DeLay gets in there and runs and wins and we are better off for it," Taylor said. "This whole thing may play into his favor. He picked up a lot of sympathy votes."

Jillson agrees there may be some sympathy for DeLay but also sees "a level of disgust that he didn't know what he was doing" in plotting his departure from Congress.

"He did it in a way that showed he had not mastered the rules, which is not typical Tom DeLay," Jillson said. "He either misunderstood them or chose to mischaracterize them and hope no one else understood them."

DeLay beat three challengers to win the March GOP primary for a 12th term. He announced in April he would resign from Congress, saying he thought he could win re-election but did not want to be a lightning rod for Democrats to use to attack Republicans nationally.

He has characterized as politically motivated the ethical and legal troubles that forced him to give up the majority leader's post and then to leave Congress.

GOP losing precious timeIf the GOP ultimately wins the appeal and is allowed to pick a new nominee, the person selected will have lost weeks of fundraising and campaigning time for the Nov. 7 election.

DOJ_NMG_0039693

Several candidates for the nomination attended the event Friday, including State Sen. Mike Jackson of La Porte, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, Fort Bend County Commissioner Andy Meyers and state Reps. Charlie Howard of Sugar Land and Robert Talton of Pasadena.

Some of the candidates seemed to defer to DeLay.

"If he remains on the ballot, he will be elected, we'll all support him and he'll probably resign," Howard said, describing a scenario in which DeLay returns to Congress and then resigns, forcing a special election. "The end result is we will have a Republican in CD22."

Whatever Republican eventually is on the November ballot will face Democrat Nick Lampson, a former U.S. representative, and Libertarian Bob Smither.

Jillson said DeLay's resignation after the primary "burned his plausibility as a candidate."

But he said that if Lampson wins he may be a one-term congressman in the Republican-leaning, suburban district.

"He'll be the best constituent service, local Kiwanis Club-type of congressman," Jillson said. "He'll work hard to create a solid base quickly. But Republicans would make a bold rush to get it back in 2008."

Not-so-golden Years (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

ABOUT RETIREMENT, IT'S BEEN said that it's nice to get out of the rat race … but you have to learn to get along with less cheese. That's a dilemma a lot more people are going to be facing pretty soon.

According to a string of recent gloomy studies, most people are kidding themselves if they think they'll have enough gold during their golden years.

Depending on how close they are to retirement, the news goes from bad to worse. Up to 35% of baby boomers, who start retiring in two years, haven't saved enough to maintain their standard of living once they stop punching the clock. As many as half of employees in their 30s and 40s are expected to have too teeny a nest egg to fall back on.

The main problem is that Americans continue to spend like sailors on shore leave rather than socking away even a small amount of cash. Indeed, last year the nation's savings rate dipped into negative territory for the first time since World War II.

Of course, Americans have never been renowned savers. And so what? As long as most people can remember, all they had to do was work hard and pay taxes and they'd get a cushy pension and a Social Security check that meant they were fine.

Those days are over, likely for good. As the population ages, it means the number of retirees is growing a lot faster than the number of younger workers who can support them. Eventually, something has to give. That's one reason companies are shedding their pension plans in favor of cheaper 401(k) retirement plans, and why anyone who didn't grow up with the Beach Boys should worry about cuts in Social Security benefits by the time they'll be old enough to get them.

If there is a silver lining in all this doom and gloom, it's the small but growing number of employers who are trying to help workers save more. One increasingly popular tactic is automatically enrolling employees into retirement savings plans rather than waiting for them to sign up. Research shows that up to a quarter of employees who qualify for retirement plans don't enroll. Another tactic is encouraging workers to save 1% or more of all raises.

Some people, of course, do not earn enough to save meaningful amounts. It would be nice if instead of focusing on tax relief for the wealthy, Congress were more inventive in devising savings programs for less-affluent workers. Is there a more portable individual retirement account (portable from one job to the next, that is) to which employers could be encouraged to contribute? Federal employees benefit from a government thrift plan that could serve as a model for businesses.

Still, any of these savings plans also requires a bit of a cultural readjustment for Americans to put aside more for retirement. It won't be easy, but those who don't shouldn't be surprised at what lies on the other side of the rat race's finish line.

Jeb Bush Ally Slams Islam (MH)

By Darran Simon

The Miami Herald, July 8, 2006

The Rev. O'Neal Dozier, a Broward clergyman who has advised President Bush and is a political appointee of Gov. Jeb Bush, took to the air waves Friday to criticize Islam as a "cult" religion.

DOJ_NMG_0039694

The radio appearance by Dozier, who serves on the governor's committee that screens Broward judicial nominees, startled a local Muslim leader, and prompted the governor to immediately distance himself from the statements.

Reached later in the day by The Miami Herald, a contrite Dozier said he was "concerned" his comments could jeopardize his position on Broward's Judicial Nominating Commission. But he did not disavow those comments.

"The Islamic religion in my view is a cult," Dozier said Friday, when asked to recap the controversial comments he made earlier on The Steve Kane Radio Show on WNN-AM 1470. "On the show I said that Islam is a dangerous religion."

Dozier was on the program to address efforts by him and other black ministers to block a plan by the Islamic Center of South Florida to build a center in Northwest Pompano Beach.

The ministers say they don't want the Islamic center, with its mosque, in their neighborhood. They have argued it will jeopardize the community's safety because of what one group member characterized as the religion's "track record" of terrorism.

Dozier, 57, of Pompano Beach, has been leading the charge.

His statements on Kane's talk show Friday were reported in an Internet blog by Bob Norman of the New Times.

Dozier, who has been a key player in efforts by the governor and the Republican Party to cultivate support in Broward's black community, said he was bothered by the strong reaction to his words.

"I don't look for everyone to believe what I believe, because everyone is not as astute about religion as I am," said Dozier, pastor of the Worldwide Christian Center in Pompano Beach. "That's my life."

The black ministers' stance in opposition to the mosque has surprised some experts on Islam.

"For the first time, you are seeing a group of black pastors following the white fundamentalist leaders of our country," said Lawrence Mamiya, an activist and professor of religion and Africana studies at New York's Vassar College.

Traditionally, blacks and Muslims in America have forged a healthy, harmonious relationship -- in part because their leaders tackle the same issues affecting their neighborhoods -- drugs, crime, racism and other social ills, Mamiya said.

If ministers' sentiments about Islam were to become a trend, it would cause a "serious serious split in the black community," and threaten that relationship, Mamiya said.

Asked on Friday to respond to Dozier's comments, Altaf Ali, executive director of the Florida Chapter of the Council of American-Islamic Relations, said he has tried unsuccessfully to meet with Dozier.

"I want a chance to respond and refute these accusations," Ali said Friday. "It appears that he doesn't have that much knowledge about Islam."

In an interview with The Miami Herald last week, Dozier had declared: "We don't want our area to be a breeding ground for terrorists."

On Friday, the White House referred a reporter to previous remarks by the president on Islam, including a 2002 meeting in the Oval Office with United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan.

At that time, the president condemned blanket criticisms of Islam, saying they "do not reflect the sentiments of my government or the sentiments of most Americans. Islam, as practiced by the vast majority of people, is a peaceful religion, a religion that respects others," Bush said.

On Friday, Gov. Bush's office issued a statement distancing him from Dozier.

"Gov. Bush in no way shares Rev. Dozier's views on Islam," said Alia Faraj, Bush's spokeswoman. "Florida's greatest strength is its diverse population, which is bolstered by the many faiths of our residents."

Dozier said later Friday that his comments "shouldn't be linked" to the governor.

He said he is concerned about political repercussions. Gov. Bush appointed Dozier to serve on Broward's Judicial Nominating Commission.

"I am concerned about the criticism in that I don't see where my personal opinion should cause an uproar in other people's hearts," he said.

Dozier, who has a degree from the John Marshall Law School in Atlanta, is among a growing number of black ministers who have embraced conservative Republican values on such issues as abortion and same-sex marriages.

In the past, Dozier has asked Gov. Bush's appointments to the Broward circuit and county courts if they were "God-fearing," and inquired about their parenting abilities.

DOJ_NMG_0039695

Last spring, Dozier visited the White House to discuss how President Bush's faith-based initiative could be expanded to help Africans with HIV.

The ministers are not against Islam, said the Rev. Alonzo C. Neal of the Antioch Missionary Baptist Church in Pompano Beach "It's not their religion. It's their track record," he said, referring to what he said are terrorist acts committed by some who practice Islam.

Dozier and other ministers are planning a protest at 6 p.m. Tuesday at a Pompano Beach Commission meeting to object to city-approved plans allowing the mosque to go forward.

While Dozier and others take issue with Islam, other black residents have expressed concerns about what they see as the city neglecting their community. Pompano Beach needs more low- to moderate-income housing, said Walter Hunter, a longtime Pompano Beach resident who lives near the site.

Soldiers' Issues In Play At Capitol (MINNST)

By Dane Smith

Minneapolis Star Tribune, July 8, 2006

A preview of the importance of issues involving soldiers and the Iraq War in this summer's election campaigns went on display at the state Capitol Thursday.

Stiffer state and federal penalties for companies that attempt illegal foreclosures on deployed members of the military were proposed by two DFLers, state Rep. Matt Entenza, a candidate for attorney general, and Tim Walz, a 24-year Minnesota National Guard member who is running for Congress.

Republican Party officials countered with a statement accusing Entenza of trying to hide a "checkered history on military and veterans issues," including his efforts as a college student opposing "mandatory selective service registration."

Entenza's Republican opponent, state Rep. Jeff Johnson, said Entenza, formerly the DFL minority leader, failed to add the provision to a package of veterans bills in the recently adjourned Legislature. Entenza "has done next to nothing" on veterans issues in his 12 years in the House," Johnson said.

Entenza brushed aside the attack, saying he was "very proud" of his record as a legislator supporting things such as increased supplemental pay and benefits for service members.

And if elected, Entenza said, he will set up a special unit in the attorney general's office "to protect our veterans."

Foreclosing mortgages on deployed service members already is illegal under federal and state law, but Entenza and Walz said that the penalties are slight, seldom enforced and lacking in financial consequences.

Entenza said he wants the state to impose a fine of up to $25,000, the same as for theft by swindle, on violators of the law. Efforts to educate military personnel about their rights also must be improved, Walz said.

Acknowledging that the exact extent of the problem is unknown, Walz said research has shown that about 30 percent of service members undergo serious financial problems while on duty. He said he personally intervened to help a Minnesota comrade in Iraq whose pick-up truck was being repossessed.

"Most spouses will do almost anything to avoid adding to a deployed service member's emotional burden," Walz said. "They hestitate to talk about the bills piling up but it's real and it's happening in Minnesota."

Bayh drops in

Appearing with Entenza and Walz was U.S. Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., a 2008 exploratory presidential candidate who was in the Twin Cities for a little politicking of his own. Bayh is a member of the Armed Services Committee and is proposing similar legislation toughening the foreclosure violations.

Bayh, who was a two-term governor of Indiana and is considered a party centrist, said about 60 people attended his fund-raiser at the St. Paul home of a friend. Bayh also was a featured guest at a fund-raiser for U.S. Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar.

"It's a marathon and we're on the second or third mile," Bayh said, adding that the central message of his has been on improving "middle-class opportunity" and bringing the political parties closer together.

S. Korea Pledges To Talk Soon With North (AP)

By Joseph Coleman

DOJ_NMG_0039696

AP, July 8, 2006

South Korea said Friday it would withhold food and fertilizer shipments to impoverished North Korea until the missile crisis is resolved, even as it pledged to hold high-level talks with the communist regime next week.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill held talks Saturday with Chun Young-woo, South Korea's top negotiator in international nuclear talks, on the North Korean missile tests. Hill, who arrived here following a visit to China, planned to travel to Japan on Sunday.

"We will be much more effective if we can speak with one voice," Hill said before meeting Chun. The U.S. envoy said the Chinese had made it clear that they don't want North Korea to develop missiles, and seek a return to six-party talks on the North's nuclear weapons program.

"They were very clear in their views of the North Korean missile launches, very clear that they have no interest in seeing this happen and do not regard this in any way positively," Hill said.

Pyongyang triggered an international furor Wednesday when it test-fired seven missiles that plunged into the Sea of Japan without causing damage or injury.

A draft U.N. resolution on sanctions against Pyongyang could be put to a vote Saturday, as regional powers moved to coordinate their response to North Korea's missile firings.

It remained unclear whether North Korea was planning to fire more missiles. South Korean officials said another long-range missile may be at a launch site, but the latest intelligence showed no signs the reclusive regime was getting ready for more tests.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency quoted a North Korean diplomat as saying North Korea is willing to return to the six-nation talks if it is allowed to withdraw its money frozen in accounts of a bank blacklisted by the United States.

Han Song Ryol, deputy chief of North Korea's mission to the United Nations in New York, made the remark, renewing the North's long-standing demand that the U.S. lift financial restrictions imposed on a Macau bank for allegedly aiding the North's illicit activities.

"Removing the freeze on Macau funds is the minimum threshold to resumption of talks," Han said. "If there is such a will, then how we talk, whether bilaterally or through six-party talks, is not important."

Chun, the South Korean negotiator, said in Seoul that North Korea's demand for the financial restrictions to be lifted was "unrealistic" and urged the North not to link the issue to the six-party nuclear talks.

Japan and the United States have led an effort for the U.N. to impose sanctions, but China and Russia have called for softer measures. On Friday, Japan circulated a draft resolution that would order countries to "take those steps necessary" to keep the North from acquiring items that could be used for its missile program. Diplomats said it could be put to a vote Saturday.

South Korea, which has worked for warmer ties with Pyongyang since a 2000 North-South summit, attempted to take a middle path, withholding aid shipments and rejecting a Northern request for military talks, but also announcing it would hold Cabinet-level meetings with the North next week.

Unification Minister Lee Jong-seok said Seoul would hold off on plans to send 500,000 tons of rice and 100,000 tons of fertilizer to North Korea.

"This will continue until there is an exit out of the missile problem," Lee's spokesman, Yang Chang-seok, quoted him as saying, without explaining what would constitute an exit.

The North had requested 450,000 tons of fertilizer this year, of which the South has already shipped 350,000 tons. Pyongyang, which is largely dependent on handouts of food and other supplies to maintain its poverty-stricken population, has also asked for 500,000 tons of rice.

South Korea also turned down a North Korean proposal to hold military talks this week, saying the time was not right. But Cabinet-level talks originally scheduled to start next Tuesday in the southern city of Busan were to go ahead, officials said.

"The government judged that it's necessary to continue with dialogue efforts to resolve the current situation over the North's missile launch," said Lee Kwan-se, a Unification Ministry official.

Uncertainty surrounded North Korea's next step. South Korea's defense agency said an additional long-range Taepodong-2 missile could be at the North's launch site, but that a further test was not imminent.

DOJ_NMG_0039697

The North, however, said it had the right to test missiles.

Yonhap on Friday quoted Choe Myong Nam, councilor at the North's U.N. mission in Geneva, as saying the launches were successful and could be continued, echoing an earlier statement by North Korea's Foreign Ministry.

"It's an unfair logic to say that somebody can do something and others cannot. The same logic applies to nuclear possession," Choe said. The missile launches are "not intended to strike anyone and it's the North position that missile launches could be continued," he said.

South Korea ordered two South Korean airlines to avoid a flight route near the path of the missiles fired this week. The Civil Aviation Safety Authority told the two airlines, Asiana Airlines and Korean Air, not to use a flight route over the sea between the Korean peninsula and Japan starting Friday until Tuesday.

The United States kept up its diplomatic drive to forge a common strategy among the main players in the region. On Thursday, the United States said the world must speak with one voice in pressing North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons and return to multinational talks.

Much of the focus is on China, which provides oil and other economic assistance to North Korea and is seen as a critical player in diplomacy with Pyongyang. The U.S. has urged Beijing to exert leverage on North Korea, though so far Chinese efforts have been largely limited to diplomatic appeals.

China, North Korea's closest ally, and Russia, which has been trying to re-establish Soviet-era ties with the Stalinist state, showed little interest in sanctions, saying diplomacy remains the only way to resolve the dispute.

—

Associated Press writers Audra Ang in Beijing and Kwang-tae Kim and Jae-soon Chang in Seoul contributed to this report.

Bush Strongly Defends His N. Korea Policies (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

CHICAGO — President Bush on Friday defended his administration's policies on North Korea, questioning claims that the regime in Pyongyang had grown more dangerous since he entered the White House.

The North Koreans test-fired seven missiles this week, and Bush said he still did not know whether one of them, a long-range intercontinental missile, was aimed at the U.S. or even could have flown that far.

He said the United States' controversial missile defense system might have been able to shoot the rocket out of the sky if that had become necessary.

"I think we had a reasonable chance of shooting it down. At least that's what the military commanders told me," Bush said at a news conference. "It's new research. It's hard for me to give you a probability of success."

Outside experts have given more pessimistic assessments of the missile defense program and its capabilities.

The president grew testy when asked why, if his policies were working, North Korea appeared to be improving its nuclear capabilities and growing more aggressive.

"These problems didn't arise overnight and they don't get solved overnight. It takes awhile," Bush said, offering the most strenuous defense of his policies since North Korea escalated its standoff with the U.S. with the test firings Wednesday.

Bush sought to counter the suggestion that North Korea had expanded its nuclear weapons capability in recent years, challenging a reporter when she asked a question that cited intelligence reports about the North's growing nuclear threat. Bush declined to dispute the basis of the question but asked the reporter, "Can you verify that?"

"We don't know — maybe you know more than I do — about increasing the number of nuclear weapons," Bush said, noting that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il has violated proliferation agreements before.

Several administration officials have talked publicly about North Korea's growing nuclear arsenal. In congressional hearings last year, top U.S. intelligence officials, including then-CIA Director Porter J. Goss, testified that Pyongyang's nuclear capability had increased since 2002, when intelligence assessments estimated that the nation possessed one or two nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0039698

In testimony Feb. 16, 2005, for example, Goss said the North Koreans "have a greater capability than that assessment .... It has increased since then."

In another 2005 hearing, then-Defense Intelligence Agency Director Lowell Jacoby said North Korea was believed to be able to arm a missile with a nuclear device, an apparent advance, although Defense Department officials later sought to clarify his remarks as theoretical.

National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte, asked during a Feb. 28, 2005, hearing about North Korea's weapons capability, said the government in Pyongyang was "regularly" producing fissile material for weapons.

White House officials fear that the issue of North Korea's missiles has contributed to public doubts about Bush's foreign policy record in an election year. Republicans hope that Bush's tough stand on national security will be a winning issue for them with voters.

Missile defense has been a part of that tough stance. Bush conceded that the anti-missile system he has backed is "modest" and unproven. But he said it had been ready to shoot down one of the North Korean missiles if necessary.

Bush's assessment was in line with that given recently by military commanders. Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering, director of the Missile Defense Agency, gave a similarly optimistic assessment during a National Defense University address last month.

But outside experts, including the Government Accountability Office, have been more critical in recent months.

The centerpiece of the system, nine interceptor missiles in Alaska and two at Vandenberg Air Force Base in Central California, has been plagued by glitches and has not had a successful test in nearly four years. Last year, Obering went so far as to shut down all tests in order to overhaul the system, and he only recently approved a new testing schedule, which is expected to be implemented next month.

Bush's statements came as diplomats at the United Nations continued working on ways to pressure North Korea to halt its drive for nuclear weapons and rejoin stalled international talks. Japan and the United States are pressing the U.N. Security Council to vote Monday on sanctions targeting North Korea's missile program, despite opposition from China and Russia, which hold veto power.

Japan's U.N. ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, said Friday that the time had come for the council to act "firmly, robustly and speedily."

He introduced a resolution calling for a global ban on buying or selling any technology materials and goods related to North Korea's missile program.

After days of talks, Japan slightly strengthened the language on the sanctions, deciding against diluting it in an effort to win support from China and Russia.

China drafted a less punitive "presidential statement" to convey the Security Council's concern, but U.S., British and Japanese diplomats rejected that approach Thursday evening, pressing Japan's resolution in the hope that China and Russia would not veto it. The two countries could abstain in the vote, allowing the resolution to pass while registering their opposition.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, on a diplomatic swing through Northeast Asia in search of a unified response to North Korea, told reporters Friday in Beijing that Pyongyang can join the world or remain cut off.

Hill, who is traveling to China, South Korea and Japan, chose to tackle his toughest assignment first. China is on record as opposing economic sanctions against North Korea.

The gap between the U.S. and China on the issue reflects differing assessments of North Korea's intentions and capabilities.

Where Washington sees a dangerous regime intent on threatening global stability, Beijing sees an impoverished neighbor engaged in bluffing — one that could implode under pressure, sending millions of refugees into China.

Hill's comments, following a day of meetings with Chinese officials, suggested Beijing shares Washington's displeasure with this week's launches. But Hill said nothing to suggest the two were on the same page over what to do next.

"This is a kind of acting," said Zhang Liangui, an analyst with the Central Party School's Institute of International Strategy in Beijing, referring to the missile launches. "The political significance of this action is bigger than its military significance."

DOJ_NMG_0039699

Bush Expresses Frustration With Diplomacy (AP-Y2)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

AP2, July 8, 2006

President Bush expressed frustration Friday with the slow pace of diplomacy in dealing with North Korea and Iran and prodded world leaders to send an unmistakable message condemning Pyongyang's long-range missile test.

He said the U.S. would have had "a reasonable chance" of shooting down the missile if it had been necessary, though America's missile-defense system is still in the testing phase and its capabilities are modest. More than $100 billion has been spent on the system since 1983.

On the terror war, the president said at a rare out-of-town news conference that the United States has not relaxed its nearly five-year search for Osama bin Laden and he vowed the terrorist leader would be found: "Absolutely. No ands, ifs or buts.

"And, my judgment, it's a matter of time, unless we stop looking. And we're not going to stop looking so long as I'm the president," Bush said.

The president's overnight stop in Chicago — including dinner with Democratic Mayor Richard M. Daley and breakfast with locals at a popular restaurant — was part of a strategy to boost Bush's sagging popularity by putting him on the road more often this summer in friendly settings.

Daley joined Bush at Friday's news conference, where the president called him a "great mayor" and said he was proud to call him a friend.

There was a heavy dose of political fundraising on the trip, too, as Bush helped raise $1.2 million for Judy Baar Topinka, the Republican state treasurer who is trying to unseat Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich.

Outside the Drake Hotel where the fundraiser was held, several dozen protesters carried sometimes vicious anti-Bush and anti-war messages. A couple of the demonstrators burned American flags.

At his news conference, Bush called the Iraq war "a noble and just cause" and said the United States would not leave before winning.

"We will lose if we leave too early," the president said. "The stakes of success are vital." He repeated his oft-stated position that it will be up to military commanders to say when it is appropriate to withdraw U.S. troops.

Bush came here as the United Nations struggled over how to deal with North Korea, which defied world appeals and test-fired a long-range missile that fell into the sea 42 seconds after launch this week. China and Russia have balked at a proposed Japanese resolution to impose sanctions on North Korea.

"What matters most of all is for Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice," Bush said. "That's the purpose, really."

In months of negotiations, Beijing and Moscow also have had reservations about penalizing Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

"You're watching the diplomacy work not only in North Korea but in Iran," the president said.

"And it's, kind of — you know, it's kind of painful in a way for some to watch, because it takes a while to get people on the same page," Bush said. "Not everybody thinks the exact same way we think. Different words mean different things to different people. And the diplomatic processes can be slow and cumbersome."

Asked if he felt a sense of urgency in dealing with North Korea and Iran, Bush said, "I'm realistic about how things move in the world." He said he wanted diplomatic rather than military solutions.

Bush said Kim Jong Il, in ordering the missile tests, had defied China, Japan, South Korea, Russia and the United States — the five countries that have been negotiating unsuccessfully with North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program.

"All of us said, `Don't fire that rocket.' He not only fired one, he fired seven. Now that he made that defiance, it's best for all of us to go to the U.N. Security Council and say, loud and clear, `Here's some red lines.' And that's what we're in the process of doing," Bush said.

He ruled out direct talks between just the U.S. and North Korea and said he hoped the six-party talks would resume.

"My judgment is you can't be successful if the United States is sitting at the table alone with North Korea. You run out of options very quickly if that's the case," he said. "In order to be successful diplomatically it's best to have other partners at the table"

DOJ_NMG_0039700

Bush Says U.S. May Have Been Able To Intercept North Korean Missile (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

CHICAGO, July 7 — President Bush said Friday that he believed the nation's nascent missile defense system would have had a "reasonable chance" of shooting down a long-range missile launched by North Korea had it come close to the United States, and he said he was determined to use the United Nations to set "some red lines" for future behavior by the North Koreans.

Mr. Bush said the launching of a prototype long-range missile that tumbled into the Sea of Japan showed why missile defenses were needed, but he acknowledged that the abilities of the unproven missile defense system based in Alaska and California were "modest," and he said it was "hard for me to give you a probability of success."

"I think we had a reasonable chance of shooting it down; at least that's what the military commander has told me," he said at a news conference in Chicago.

Although defensive sensors and missiles, while not fully tested, are theoretically available for use in an emergency, Pentagon officials have said there was little reason to think they would have been used this week, as the North Korean test missile was not thought to carry a live warhead.

In an hourlong news conference here that was part of a new White House strategy to bolster Mr. Bush's sagging popularity around the country, the president sounded mildly frustrated that diplomacy to disarm North Korea and halt Iran's nuclear program was so "slow and cumbersome." But he sidestepped questions about conditions under which he might be tempted to use military force, saying he was determined to find diplomatic solutions.

And, in a sharp contrast to the kind of less cautious statements he made about Iraq before the invasion in 2003, which were based on sometimes contradictory intelligence reports, he cast doubt on North Korea's claim that it possesses what it calls a "nuclear deterrent."

Mr. Bush challenged a reporter who, in posing a question, asserted that the North Korean leader Kim Jong Il had increased the size of his nuclear arsenal during Mr. Bush's presidency. "I don't think we know that," the president shot back. But, in what may have been a sign of his wariness about intelligence assessments of opaque nations, he pointedly declined to say what assessment he believed was correct.

"Maybe you know but you're not telling," one reporter said. Mr. Bush said, "That's an option," and then, to laughter, added, "Or maybe I don't know and don't want to tell you I don't know."

A new national intelligence estimate of North Korea's capabilities was completed earlier this year, but the administration has declined to publish a declassified version of it. According to officials who are familiar with its contents, it concludes that North Korea probably produced enough fuel for six or more nuclear weapons, from a supply of 8,000 spent reactor fuel rods that the country boasts it reprocessed after throwing inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency out of the country three years ago.

"What we don't know is whether they turned those into weapons," said one senior intelligence official in a recent interview who asked not to be named because he was discussing intelligence issues. "You can assume it, but it is just an assumption."

Mr. Bush's discussion of "red lines" — a term drawn from the cold war limits over steps the United States and Soviet Union agreed not to take for fear they could spiral into outright war — was important because until now his aides have said such limits do not work in North Korea's case. Three years ago, one of Mr. Bush's senior aides said it would be useless to tell North Korea that turning its spent fuel into plutonium was a "red line" because the United States had no effective way to enforce the threat. The North Koreans went ahead anyway, lines or no lines.

It was the ambitious North Korean program to extend the reach of its missiles — along with its work on producing nuclear warheads — that many proponents of the missile defense plan cited to justify the Pentagon's huge expenditures on the new defensive system, which is costing about $9 billion a year and is still in the early stages of a long and complex development process.

After deciding to field a first batch of interceptors without fully testing them, in what commanders have called a "thin line" of defense against a small-scale attack, the Pentagon interrupted its testing for more than a year after a series of failures. The testing of missiles and radars has now resumed, with an important set of test shots expected to begin as early as this summer. If they succeed, officials have told Congress, there will be better ground for confidence that the system would be able to intercept a missile launched from North Korea or from Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0039701

As things stand now, though, there is considerable uncertainty over both sides of the technology race: How long it will take North Korea to produce a missile capable of posing a serious risk to the United States, and how long it will take to build a reliable defensive system?

Though North Korea and the struggle over responding to the missile tests dominated the news conference, Mr. Bush denied that the United States was trimming back on its search for Osama bin Laden by disbanding a unit within the Central Intelligence Agency that focused on that hunt.

"We got a lot of assets looking for Osama bin Laden," Mr. Bush said. "So whatever you want to read in that story, it's just not true, period." He added later: "In my judgment, it's just a matter of time, unless we stop looking. And we're not going to stop looking so long as I'm the president, not only for Osama bin Laden, but anybody else who plots and plans attacks against the United States of America."

He repeated his conviction that the United States would prevail in Iraq, but also seemed intent on dampening speculation about significant reductions of forces in coming months. "An artificial timetable of withdrawal and early withdrawal before this finishes sends the message to the enemy: 'We were right about America,' " Mr. Bush said, repeating his argument that Al Qaeda seeks to turn Iraq into a haven for training.

But when the subject turned back to North Korea, Mr. Bush by turns argued that Mr. Kim was untrustworthy — he cited the country's violation of a 1994 accord with the Clinton administration — and that the only path was to negotiate with him. But he rejected conducting one-on-one negotiations, insisting that he needed China and other neighbors at the table so that Mr. Kim did not make the United States to appear the blockade to an agreement.

"One thing I'm not going to let us do is get caught in the trap of sitting at the table alone with the North Koreans," Mr. Bush insisted, rejecting the criticism by Democrats who say such talks would be the only way to break the logjam.

"If you want to solve a problem diplomatically, you need partners to do so," Mr. Bush said, adding later that his worry about "handling this issue bilaterally is that you run out of options very quickly."

But in citing anew the need to team up with China and South Korea, Mr. Bush was skipping past the warnings of members of his own administration that neither country would agree to sanctions. Both are worried about a North Korean collapse, and both have continued supplying North Korea with food, energy and investment — even while Japan and the United States try to turn off the spigot.

Mr. Bush has been careful never to criticize either country publicly. But he seemed to do so obliquely when he said, with some frustration in his voice: "The problem with diplomacy, it takes a while to get something done. If you're acting alone, you can move quickly. When you're rallying world opinion and trying to, you know, come up with the right language at the United Nations to send a clear signal, it takes a while."

Bush Rules Out Bilateral Talks With N Korea (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, July 8, 2006

President George W. Bush ruled out bilateral talks with North Korea on Friday, saying that the US would respond to Pyongyang's long-range missile tests through the United Nations Security Council.

Mr Bush admitted that the diplomatic route could be "slow and cumbersome" but said he was "not going to get caught in a trap of sitting at a table alone with North Korea". He added: "What matters most of all is for Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice.''

It was best to "go to the UN Security Council and say here's some red lines", Mr Bush said. "If you handle it bilaterally you run out of options quickly."

If Mr Kim "wants to have good relations with the world, he has to verifiably get rid of his weapons programmes'', he said.

Mr Bush was speaking in Chicago, at the Museum of Science and Industry, as part of a new White House strategy to host its news conferences outside Washington. Taking the press conferences on the road was supposed to encourage discussion of a broader range of domestic issues. However, Friday's conference was still dominated by concerns on North Korea, Iran and Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0039702

On Iran, Mr Bush said next week's meeting of the Group of Eight industrialised nations in St Petersburg provided an opportunity for "those of us concerned about the issue to make it clear to the Iranians we are firm in making sure they do not have nuclear weapons".

But he acknowledged differences remained over imposing sanctions on Iran, which Russia and China have resisted.

President Vladimir Putin of Russia "understands the dangers of Iran having a nuclear weapon", he said. However, "some countries have got economic interests as a focus. We think national security interests trump economic interests."

Asked about his falling opinion polls, and whether Republican candidates were shying away from public events with him, he said: "I'm looking forward to these elections. I think you'll be surprised."

Laying out some of the themes of the forthcoming mid-term campaign – national security and the economy – he predicted: "We will hold the House and Senate. I will spend a lot of time on the road. I like campaigning . . . you win elections by believing in yourself and having a plan to protect the American people from terrorist attacks."

Mr Bush added he would "abide by the decision" of the Supreme Court last week ruling against the holding of military commissions to try detainees at Guantánamo Bay. However, he noted that the court had been "silent on whether or not we should have used Guantánamo [to detain illegal combatants]".

Mr Bush was defensive on his foreign policy and denied that North Korea's continued pursuit of nuclear weapons meant that the US administration's policy was not working.

"What have we done? We have got the six-party talks going," he said, referring to stalled negotiations with Pyongyang.

Missile Defense 'Modest,' Says Bush (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

CHICAGO -- President Bush yesterday said the newly operational U.S. missile defense system had a "reasonable chance" of shooting down the long-range missile that North Korea fired Tuesday toward the United States, reportedly targeted to fall near Hawaii.

The president acknowledged that the ballistic missile defense shield remains "modest," but sent a message to dictator Kim Jong-il that the United States is capable of defending itself against an aerial strike.

"I think we had a reasonable chance of shooting it down, at least that's what the military commanders told me," Mr. Bush said at a press conference in the rotunda of Chicago's Museum of Science and Industry.

"Our anti-ballistic systems are modest, they're new, they're new research, we're testing them. And so ... it's hard for me to give you a probability of success," he said.

At the United Nations, Japan introduced a Security Council draft resolution that would prohibit any nation from transferring funds, material and technology that could be used in North Korea's missile or weapons of mass destruction programs. The United States, Britain and France are supporting the draft.

China, which is an economic lifeline to North Korea by providing it with trade, aid and oil, doesn't want to push too hard, worried that if the Pyongyang government fails, North Korean refugees would stream into China or that the North would unify with South Korea -- a strong U.S. ally.

Russia, also leery of sanctions, wants the Security Council to pass a nonbinding statement with the goal of getting North Korea back into six-party talks.

Japan's Ambassador Kenzo Oshima said he wanted a vote on the draft today if possible, yet he and other diplomats said negotiations continued on the resolution.

That raised the possibility that the decision to introduce the resolution was, in part, a negotiating tactic meant to win concessions from China and Russia.

South Korea has condemned the launches and called for patient dialogue with North Korea, rather than sanctions, although Seoul said it would withhold food and fertilizer shipments to its neighbor until the missile crisis is resolved.

DOJ_NMG_0039703

In Beijing, following brief talks with Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said there was no agreement on the contentious issue of sanctions.

The Bush administration was criticized by Democrats and others when it sought to create a shield that could take out a long-range missile, but the president said yesterday that because there are threats such as Mr. Kim's, that means "we need" an anti-ballistic missile system.

Although U.S. interceptor missiles were on alert before North Korea fired seven missiles, none was deployed. North Korea's missile launches on the Fourth of July began eight minutes after the space shuttle Discovery took off.

The Washington Times first reported last month that the Pentagon had activated its new U.S. ground-based defense system, which includes 11 long-range interceptor missiles -- nine deployed at Fort Greeley in Alaska and two at Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif. The system was switched from test to operational mode within the past two weeks, officials said.

Data from U.S. and Japanese Aegis radar-equipped destroyers and surveillance aircraft on the long-range Taepodong-2's angle of takeoff and altitude indicated that it was targeted for waters near Hawaii, the Sankei Shimbun reported in Japan, citing multiple sources in the United States.

The newspaper said North Korea may have chosen Hawaii to show that it was capable of landing a missile there, or because it is home port to the U.S. Pacific Fleet. But the missile broke up less than a minute into its flight, according to U.S. officials.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman declined to comment on whether the missile was heading toward Hawaii.

"There is some ongoing analysis," he said, noting that it will take more than technical flight information to determine the intent of the North Koreans on the long-range missile.

During yesterday's press conference the president fielded a half-dozen questions on the missile launches, which North Korea called "drills."

He said he was working through the diplomatic process -- which he called "slow and cumbersome" -- and again urged world powers to speak with a unified message in condemning the actions of North Korea.

Mr. Bush also vowed to keep hunting for terror leader Osama bin Laden, a search that has been fruitless in the nearly five years since the September 11 attacks.

"No ands, ifs or buts, my judgment is it's a matter of time, unless we stop looking, and we're not going to stop looking as long as I'm president," he said.

N. Korea Says It Wants Its Money Back, Then It'll Talk (LAT)

By Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

SEOUL — North Korea will return to talks on its nuclear program if the United States releases $24 million in frozen funds held in a bank in Macao, a senior diplomat said in an interview published today.

In the most explicit statement of its demands since a barrage of missile tests Wednesday, North Korea's deputy ambassador to the United Nations, Han Song Ryol, said his country was looking for a "minimal gesture to restore trust."

Han also said that an invitation to Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill to visit the North Korean capital, Pyongyang, was still open and that such a visit would be "advantageous for us to correctly understand the U.S. position and to precisely express our own position."

The interview with the New York-based diplomat was published in Hankyoreh, a left-wing South Korean newspaper frequently sympathetic to Pyongyang.

The money has been a bone of contention between the United States and North Korea since September, when the Treasury Department accused Banco Delta Asia in the tiny Chinese enclave of Macao of laundering proceeds of counterfeiting and other illicit activities on behalf of North Korea.

The Bush administration is likely to reject the North's demands. It has consistently said Pyongyang should make its position known within the context of multilateral talks and not set preconditions.

DOJ_NMG_0039704

But a U.S. official intimated that it was possible some of the $24 million would eventually be released if it was determined it was not linked to illicit activity. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Treasury investigators were painstakingly going through handwritten records trying to determine the origins of the money.

Stronger Resolution Offered On N. Korea (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, July 7 -- Japan presented the Security Council on Friday with a tough revised draft resolution that would condemn North Korea's missile tests and ban states from supplying or buying goods or technology that could help Pyongyang upgrade its ballistic missile program or advance its nuclear weapons program. The resolution is backed by the United States and European allies, over Chinese and Russian concerns that it will exacerbate tensions in the region, according to U.N. diplomats.

The draft resolution demands that North Korea immediately recommit itself to a 1998 moratorium on ballistic missile tests and return to six-nation talks aimed at persuading Pyongyang to abandon its nuclear weapons program.

The move sets the stage for a diplomatic standoff over the United Nations' response to North Korea's launch on Tuesday of at least seven missiles. China's ambassador, Wang Guangya, warned the council in a closed-door meeting that a vote on the sanctions resolution would "destroy" the prospects for a unified response to the missile tests, according to a council diplomat reading from notes of the session.

Pyongyang threatened to use "stronger physical actions" against Japan, according to Japan's Kyodo news service, quoting Song Il Ho, North Korea's ambassador in charge of diplomatic normalization talks with Japan.

Kenzo Oshima, Japan's U.N. ambassador, said he hopes to call for a vote on Saturday. But President Bush said he is prepared to give diplomacy time, even though the process is "slow and cumbersome."

"We are very pleased with this draft," said John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. "It provides for very strong restraints on the DPRK [the Democratic People's Republic of Korea] missile programs, very strong constraints on giving any assistance to their missile or WMD [Weapons of Mass Destruction] programs."

Bolton said that Washington and its allies are receptive to further negotiations with Beijing and Moscow. The two governments signaled that they would consider supporting a strong condemnation of North Korea's action in a nonbinding council statement without the threat of sanctions.

"We need a unanimous firm response" from the Security Council, "and for my delegation and for a number of others we feel the best way to achieve that is through a PRST [presidential statement] with strong messages," Wang said.

Diplomats said they expect a flurry of high-level talks over the direction of the council's North Korea policy. But Bolton and others have expressed confidence they have the support of 13 of the council's 15 members for a binding resolution under Chapter Seven of the U.N. Charter, a provision that can be enforced by sanctions or, in some cases, the use of military force.

"We're going to have a resolution under Chapter Seven," Bolton insisted.

U.S. and European officials remain confident that Russia and China will not veto the resolution. But China's ambassador said that "all options are open." Chinese officials say that they want to delay action on a resolution until a senior Chinese envoy, Vice Premier Hui Liangyu, travels to Pyongyang in an attempt to persuade North Korea to back down. Friday's draft resolution essentially would place a legal prohibition on North Korea's missile trade and institute a trade embargo on countries, companies or individuals that supply North Korea's missile and nuclear weapons program.

There is no international prohibition on the development or testing of ballistic missiles. A group of major countries that supply missile technology -- the Missile Technology Control Regime -- observes a voluntary ban on sales to nonmembers such as North Korea.

Analysts said that the resolution would strengthen the international community's legal basis for combating the proliferation of deadly weapons and missiles to rogue states but that it would have limited practical impact. Michael E. O'Hanlon, a North Korea expert at the Brookings Institution, said that the resolution would not have "much operational impact" because there is no system for verifying or monitoring compliance.

DOJ_NMG_0039705

China Fights Sanctions To Punish North Korea (NYT)

By Warren Hoge And Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, July 7 — Japan introduced a Security Council resolution on Friday calling for sanctions against North Korea for its missile test-firings, but China opposed the move, saying such action could disrupt diplomatic efforts under way in the region.

As the diplomacy unfolded, Christopher R. Hill, the top American negotiator with North Korea, was in Seoul, South Korea, trying to rally support in that region for a tough, unified response to the North's testing of seven missiles on Wednesday.

Mr. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, met with Chinese officials, including Li Zhaoxing, the foreign minister, in Beijing before arriving in Seoul on Friday evening.

China agreed that resuming the six-nation talks over North Korea's nuclear program was a priority, Mr. Hill said. But it did not appear that he had made progress in persuading the Chinese to endorse sanctions.

At the United Nations, Kenzo Oshima, the Japanese ambassador, said he hoped for a vote as early as Saturday, but Jean-Marc de la Sablière, the ambassador of France, which is president of the Council, said that a date would be announced Monday.

Britain, France and the United States are sponsors of the measure.

The decision to put the resolution to a vote followed meetings Thursday and Friday involving Japan and the five permanent members of the Council — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — that failed to establish common ground. China and Russia said they preferred the less forceful measure of a presidential statement, which is nonbinding and does not threaten punishment.

Entering the American mission for the gathering Friday morning, Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador, said, "A resolution might have negative reactions in the region." He added, "The Security Council's message should be responsible, taking into account the possible consequences."

Diplomats said Mr. Wang made the point forcefully in the closed consultations, and he told reporters afterward, "If this resolution is put to vote, there will be no unity in the Security Council."

Asked whether he might exercise China's veto, he said, "All possibilities are open."

The resolution condemns the missile firings, orders Pyongyang to cease missile development and recommit to a moratorium on launchings and urges member states to prevent missiles and missile-related items from reaching North Korea. It also calls on countries to keep the North from selling or transferring any such materiel.

Drawn up under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, the resolution "strongly urges" North Korea to rejoin the six-party talks on its nuclear program.

Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, which also favors a presidential statement instead of a resolution, remained silent during the consultations, according to diplomats. Emerging from the Council chamber, he brushed aside reporters' requests for comment.

John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador, signaled a willingness to continue negotiating the text of the resolution. "We're certainly prepared for further conversations as other diplomatic efforts in the region continue," he said.

But he added: "We want a resolution. It should be Chapter VII, and I think that's clear. The level of provocation engaged in by these North Korean missile launches warrants that, and we're going to proceed."

Mr. Hill is expected to meet South Korean officials over the weekend before flying to Tokyo and Moscow, but he gave an indication on Friday of the message he is expected to convey. "We shouldn't have business as usual with a country that's been firing off missiles like this in this rather reckless way," he said.

South Korea said Friday that it would go ahead with four-day, high-level ministerial talks with North Korea next week in Pusan, South Korea. But South Korea said that it would delay shipments of food and fertilizer to the North and that it had turned down an offer, made by North Korea several days before the launchings, to hold military talks.

North Korea fired the missiles, including the new long-range Taepodong 2, despite warnings not to by its friends in China and South Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0039706

U.N.: No Resolution Yet On North Korea (UPI)

United Press International, July 8, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, July 7 (UPI) -- Though united in condemning North Korea's missile tests, members of the U.N. Security Council remained at odds over how best to react.

Diplomats met Thursday at U.N. World Headquarters in New York for a second day of negotiations, with Russia and China clashing with the rest of the council over whether to impose sanctions.

A draft resolution, including sanctions, was circulated Wednesday morning by Japan and has the backing of the United States and most of the council. China and Russia said that they would not back a resolution that included punitive measures.

There was talk that the council may issue a presidential statement, which, unlike a resolution, would be non-binding.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said he was optimistic that the international community would present a united front.

"There may be a disagreement at the moment over the vehicle we use here in the council but no one speaks in favor of North Korea," Bolton told reporters. "Our objective here is to make it clear to North Korea that their understanding of how to conduct negotiations shouldn't include missile launching."

Bolton also said those countries that have "leverage" over North Korea "bear the responsibility" for bringing the country back to the negotiating table.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill is set to meet Wu Dawei, China's deputy foreign minister, Friday to discuss reviving the stalled six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program.

North Korea, meanwhile, issued a statement insisting that its missile launches did not violate any law, a contention that was echoed by Russian president, Vladimir Putin. North Korea has vowed to continue the tests and to answer any penalties imposed by the international community with "stronger physical actions," North Korea's official news agency, KCNA, said.

Japan Seeks Support Of Envoys Of Russia, UNSC Members On Resolution (KYDN)

Kyodo News, July 8, 2006

Japan stepped up its diplomatic drive Friday in seeking international support for a Japan-sponsored resolution that would impose sanctions against North Korea over its multiple missile launches, as Foreign Minister Taro Aso met Russia's top envoy in a bid to seek the support of reluctant Russia.

Aso also subsequently held a separate meeting with ambassadors of eight countries who hold nonpermanent Security Council member status together with Japan. A representative from the Republic of Congo, which is also among the 10 nonpermanent council members, was not present because it has no embassy in Japan.

North Korea fired seven missiles on Wednesday, including a Taepodong-2 long-range missile, which all landed in the Sea of Japan, prompting the international community including Japan and the United States to denounce the missile launch and demand that the North halt such acts.

Aso's meeting with the various envoys based in Japan came amid Tokyo's efforts to expand support in the Security Council for its proposed binding resolution amid opposition by Pyongyang sympathizers China and Russia. The two nations are permanent council members together with Britain, France and the United States.

In New York on Thursday, China circulated a draft nonbinding statement on North Korea's missile launches, countering the Japanese-led proposal, council sources said. Russia expressed support for the Chinese proposal, the sources said.

During Aso's meeting with Russian Ambassador to Japan Alexander Losyukov on Friday afternoon at the Foreign Ministry in Tokyo, the two agreed on the need to issue a clear, strong and resolute message to North Korea over the missile launches, according to Foreign Ministry officials.

Aso said Japan wants Russia's support for the Japanese proposal and noted that while a majority of the council members support the adoption of a resolution, only Russia and China are pressing for a council presidential statement, the officials said.

Losyukov did not say whether Russia supports the resolution or not, and simply responded by saying he will relay Aso's request to Russian President Vladimir Putin and Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, the officials said.

He declined to make a comment to reporters after his brief meeting with Aso.

DOJ_NMG_0039707

Aso made a similar appeal in a subsequent meeting with envoys of eight nonpermanent Security Council members -- Argentina, Denmark, Ghana, Greece, Peru, Qatar, Slovakia and Tanzania.

Aso was quoted by the officials as saying that Japan wants the support of the nonpermanent council members to adopt a resolution as promptly as possible, to which the eight envoys promised to relay Japan's message to their home countries and U.N. representatives.

Earlier in the day, Aso stressed in a news conference that Japan will push for a U.N. resolution, not a council presidential statement which has less impact.

In a telephone conversation late Friday, Aso and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice confirmed to continue bilateral cooperation in efforts to have the international community issue a united, resolute, and clear message from the Security Council, the officials said.

The Japanese government is also using the framework of the Group of Eight nations in pressuring North Korea as it seeks the adoption of a joint statement at the upcoming G-8 summit in Russia to denounce North Korea's missile launches.

In a telephone conversation Friday with his Russian counterpart, Sergei Lavrov, Aso made a similar overture to the one he made to the Russian ambassador in Tokyo, the officials said. Lavrov, in response, said Russia shares Japan's concern and is ready to discuss the issue at the July 15-17 G-8 summit which Russia will host in St. Petersburg.

Aso also talked to his German counterpart, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, and Italian counterpart, Massimo D'Alema, by phone, and agreed with them respectively to cooperate in issuing a resolute message against North Korea at the G-8 summit, the officials said.

The G-8 members are Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Russia and the United States.

U.S. Urges Beijing To Pressure Pyongyang Back To Arms Talks (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

North Korea's barrage of missile tests has put China in a tough spot, calling into question its policy of patient diplomacy and its economic support to encourage change in Pyongyang.

Calling the moment a critical test of China's new high-profile role on the international stage, the U.S. is urging Beijing to alter course and use its considerable leverage as North Korea's most important trading partner to get Pyongyang to return to talks on its nuclear program.

China has long pushed a noninterference line at the United Nations while seeking good relations around the world through a determined policy of not questioning the internal behavior of countries like Sudan or Venezuela where it seeks oil or other raw materials. But Beijing has also assumed a pivotal role in international efforts to wean Pyongyang away from nuclear weapons.

It is far from clear, however, whether even North Korea's July 4 rocket launches -- in the face of vocal Chinese opposition -- will be enough to overcome Beijing's extreme reluctance to use pressure as a diplomatic tool, especially against its communist ally.

President Bush, in a Chicago news conference Friday, touched on this reluctance, referring obliquely to Russia and China, both of whom hope to avoid a U.N. resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea after its missile launches.

"You know, some nations are more comfortable with sanctions than other nations, and part of the issue we face in some of these countries is that they've got economic interests," he said. The U.S., Mr. Bush said, was now trying to convince these countries to see that "security-of-the-world interests trump economic interests." (Read the full text of Bush's remarks3.)

Part of that job has fallen to Christopher Hill, the State Department's top diplomat for Asia, who met Friday with senior Chinese officials to express Washington's displeasure with North Korea's moves and call for the resumption of disarmament talks. Mr. Hill hurried to Beijing -- the first stop on a multiday trip to Asian capitals -- before a planned trip to North Korea by China's vice premier, Hui Liangyu. Mr. Hui is to start his six-day visit Monday.

Chinese officials expressed serious concern that North Korea's missile launches could encourage Japan to develop weapons to defend itself and lead to an arms race that could destabilize Northeast Asia, according to a senior U.S. official in Beijing. But the official, familiar with the content of the discussions, said "there was nothing said" by the Chinese "that would indicate" they are prepared to use the threat of economic sanctions to pressure Pyongyang.

DOJ_NMG_0039708

Chinese diplomats at the U.N. have opposed action in the Security Council that would seek to bar North Korea from importing materials and parts that could be used in its weapons programs. Japan circulated a toughened draft resolution to that effect Friday, which the council's 15 countries may vote on as soon as Saturday.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, indicated that China wasn't pleased with the measure, which otherwise has widespread support. "If this resolution is put to a vote, definitely there will be no unity in the Security Council," he said, indicating that China would either veto the measure or abstain from voting.

President Bush, speaking in Chicago, said the whole effort going into the weekend was to get all members of the Security Council to say "loud and clear, here are some red lines."

China has successfully used arm-twisting in the past. In 2003, China temporarily shut down a pipeline carrying oil to North Korea, apparently in an attempt to pressure Pyongyang to participate in multilateral talks on its nuclear programs, U.S. and Asian diplomats have said. North Korea later agreed to join the negotiations.

To prod China to toughen its stance this time, the U.S. has appealed to Beijing's pride, saying that it risks diminishing its standing on the world stage if it can't use its influence even to moderate the behavior of one of its closest neighbors.

When President Bush called his Chinese counterpart, Hu Jintao, earlier this past week, he said North Korea's missile tests represented a serious affront not just to the U.S., but also to China, U.S. officials said.

Washington has also said China's ability -- or inability -- to make headway with North Korea will be important in shaping the future of relations between the two countries.

"This is an important time in the U.S.-China relationship," said the senior U.S. official. "If they are successful, it will be considered a sign that China has indeed arrived."

China is North Korea's largest supplier of both food and energy. Two-way trade between the neighbors has grown rapidly, hitting $1.58 billion last year. The vast majority of consumer goods in North Korea's markets are from China. The country's air force can't fly its planes without Chinese jet fuel.

It was business as usual at border-crossing points between China and North Korea Friday, Chinese traders said. Convoys of trucks laden with supplies rumbled over the steel-girder bridge that connects the Chinese city of Dandong with North Korea. "We don't expect China to take drastic actions. Ties between China and North Korea are too close," said one Chinese businesswoman who handles North Korean imports and exports. Another trader said: "Our North Korean clients are very worried. But we tell them that our trade won't be affected."

While Washington pressed Beijing, Chinese policy makers worried that too much pressure could cause the collapse of the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, potentially leading to military conflict, refugee flows and economic dislocation.

US, Japan Raise Stakes With UN Vote On North Korea (AFP)

By Gerard Aziakou

AFP, July 8, 2006

The United States and Japan have challenged reluctant China and Russia to back sanctions against North Korea, calling for a UN Security Council vote on the Stalinist state's missile tests.

Japanese ambassador Kenzo Oshima presented a binding draft resolution to the council, hours after Pyongyang warned any imposition of sanctions would be regarded as "an act of war."

"We hope that it will be adopted when it is put to a vote with the broad unanimity of the council," Oshima said.

Veto-wielding China and Russia oppose the text, however, and would prefer a milder, non-binding statement condemning Wednesday's volley of tests, but stripped of punitive measures.

The push for a vote appeared to be a bid to dare China, which supplies impoverished North Korea with energy and economic aid, and which has been put in a difficult position by the crisis, to veto the measure.

"If this resolution is put to vote, there will be no unity in the Security Council," said Chinese envoy Wang Guangya. Asked whether he might use China's veto, Wang replied: "all possibilities are open."

DOJ_NMG_0039709

Beijing could also abstain, which would allow the resolution to stand but deprive it of much of its impact.

Western diplomats however played down the possibility of a Chinese veto. Asked whether he expected such a move, French ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere said: "I hope not."

Amid a flurry of diplomacy at the UN and in Asia over the missile tests, the timing of the vote was expected to be announced on Monday, a Western diplomat said.

Despite clear discord among key powers, US President George W. Bush said the world must unite to rebuke the reclusive state's Stalinist leader.

"What matters most of all is for Kim Jong-Il to see the world speak with one voice," Bush said during a press conference in Chicago.

"It's best for all of us to go to the UN Security Council and say loud and clear 'here's some red lines,' and that's what we're in the process of doing."

But the US president noticeably did not make a public push for sanctions against Pyongyang, as the haggling went on at the UN.

US ambassador to the UN John Bolton said sentiment in the Security Council was "overwhelmingly" in favor of the resolution. The full 15-member council debated the resolution Friday, following a morning meeting of the permanent five members.

The draft, also co-sponsored by Britain, was an amended version of a document circulated by Japan, condemning Wednesday's tests of seven North Korean missiles, including a new long-range Taepodong-2, which could theoretically reach US soil.

Two hours of talks at the UN on Friday failed to produce a consensus, and Japan and China's representatives admitted the impasse.

Chinese envoy Wang Guangya said there was a need for a "unanimous, firm response," adding: "We feel the best way to achieve that is through a PRST (non-binding presidential statement)."

But Japan's Oshima said: "China has one position, and we respect that."

"Unfortunately, I don't think there is any closing of the gap," he added.

The draft calls on member states to "prevent missiles and missile-related items, materials, goods, technology being transferred, including through intermediaries, to end users in or supplying DPRK's missile and weapons of mass destruction programs."

The draft also invokes Chapter 7 of the UN charter, which authorizes sanctions or even military action.

The document urges member states to stop procurement of missile-related goods and technology from North Korea and to block financial transfers to suppliers to Pyongyang's missile or weapons programs.

North Korea was instructed in the document to immediately stop developing, deploying and testing ballistic missiles and urged to return to six-party talks on its nuclear program.

North Korea itself was warned any adoption of sanctions could deepen the crisis.

Han Song-Ryol, the North's deputy ambassador to the United Nations, told South Korea's Yonhap news agency sanctions would be an "act of war."

He said North Korea was ready to return to six-way talks if the United States lifts sanctions on a bank in Macau accused of money laundering and counterfeiting on behalf of Pyongyang.

Earlier, Bush again rejected another of Pyongyang's demands: direct talks with Washington on the nuclear crisis, which erupted in 2002 when North Korea revealed a program to enrich uranium that infringed a 1994 anti-nuclear deal.

"My concern about handling this issue bilaterally is that you run out of options very quickly," Bush said, adding that he would not get "caught in the trap."

South Korea, meanwhile, ratcheted up the pressure by saying it would indefinitely put off crucial food aid to impoverished North Korea in response to the tests.

But Seoul said it would stand by its policy of engaging its neighbor and press ahead with July 11-14 ministerial talks with the North in the southern port of Busan.

DOJ_NMG_0039710

South Korea's Defense Minister Yoon Kwang-Ung warned Pyongyang had another long-range Taepodong-2 missile to test but there were no signs that a launch was imminent.

Japan Pushes For U.N. Sanctions On N.Korea (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, July 8, 2006

Over Chinese and Russian objections, Japan introduced a draft Security Council resolution Friday that would impose sanctions on North Korea for its series of rocket test-launches and also order a halt to its development of ballistic missiles.

Backed by the United States, Britain and France, the resolution condemns the series of missile launches that the North conducted Wednesday after both its enemies and allies around the world warned it not to.

By putting forth the resolution, Japan risked a showdown with China and Russia, which have said they oppose sanctions or even passing a legally binding resolution on the issue. They want a more mild council statement that would chastize the North for the launches, and go no further.

"If this resolution is put to a vote, definitely there will be no unity in the Security Council," China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said. He refused to say, however, if China would use its veto to sink the resolution or abstain.

Japan's Ambassador Kenzo Oshima said he wanted a vote on the draft Saturday if possible, yet he and other diplomats said negotiations continued on the resolution.

That raised the possibility that the decision to introduce the resolution was, in part, a negotiating tactic meant to win concessions from China and Russia.

Diplomats and U.S. officials also left the door open for more talks. One senior U.S. official said it was unlikely that the draft would be voted on over the weekend, because diplomats want to give China, the North's main ally, time to talk to Pyongyang.

Chinese officials said a delegation would go to Pyongyang early next week to discuss the issue.

"There is a hint that states want to see what the Chinese can do," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the strategy had not been made public.

North Korea set off an international furor Wednesday when it tested seven missiles, all of which landed in the Sea of Japan without causing any damage. The blasts apparently included a long-range Taepodong-2 — potentially capable of hitting the western United States. It broke up less than a minute after takeoff.

The draft introduced Friday was tougher than previous versions.

It would bar nations from procuring missiles or missile related "items, materials goods and technology" from North Korea, or transferring financial resources connected to the North's program. The North would also be barred from acquiring items that could be used to build missiles.

China and Russia fear that Security Council sanctions risk isolating North Korea further and spoiling any chance of resuming six-party talks on its nuclear program. Pyongyang has said sanctions from the Security Council would be tantamount to a declaration of war.

They could veto or abstain on the resolution. But even abstentions from the two nations risks weakening the message to North Korea, which leaders from around the world, including President Bush, don't want to do.

"What matters most of all is for Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice," Bush said at a news conference in Chicago, referring to the North Korean leader. "That's the purpose, really."

One possible compromise would be for Japan to strip out the sanctions from the resolution, as long as the draft retains a condemnation and the order for the North to stop developing and testing ballistic missiles. It would also still be written under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, which means it could be enforced militarily.

The draft followed a flurry of meetings among diplomats in New York. Japanese officials back home have also met with their counterparts from several nations to raise support for the draft.

Oshima said Japan was not willing to give up on Chapter 7 or the sanctions.

"It contains all elements that we believe are necessary at this point that a firm resolution of the council should contain," Oshima said. "We hope that it will be adopted when it is put to a vote with the broad unanimity of the council."

DOJ_NMG_0039711

Japan Pushes For Tougher Sanctions Against North Korea (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, July 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - Japan asked the U.N. Security Council on Friday to ban international sales of North Korean missiles as part of a response to provocative missile tests by the reclusive Stalinist regime.

The ban was contained in a draft resolution that was tougher than a version that circulated immediately after North Korea fired seven missiles, including a long-range rocket that exploded after liftoff, in defiance of demands to desist. The United States, Britain and France - all permanent members of the Security Council - back the resolution.

The two other permanent members, Russia and China, are opposed. All five permanent members have veto power in the council.

The United States has pushed intensive diplomatic efforts, including calls by President Bush this week to President Hu Jintao of China and President Vladimir Putin of Russia, to try to gain support for a united response.

"It's best for all of us to go to the U.N. Security Council and say loud and clear, `Here are some red lines.' And that's what we're in the process of doing," Bush said during a news conference in Chicago. "What matters most of all is for (North Korean leader) Kim Jong Il to see the world speak with one voice."

U.S. envoy Christopher Hill held talks in Beijing with Chinese officials. While they agreed to cooperate in preserving regional stability, Hill failed to persuade his counterparts to support the resolution.

Hill "hasn't gained much out there other than to get everyone on the same page of condemning the launches," said a U.S. official who closely follows North Korea and who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the diplomacy.

North Korea launched six short- and medium-range missiles and a long-range Taepodong-2 missile over a 14-hour period beginning Tuesday afternoon EDT.

The six short- and medium-range rockets splashed harmlessly into the Sea of Japan, and the Taepodong-2, believed capable of reaching U.S. territory with a light payload, exploded about 40 seconds after liftoff.

The draft resolution's proposed ban of purchases of North Korean missiles or missile-related technology by other countries was aimed at shutting off one of the regime's major sources of hard currency.

The measure condemned North Korea for the firings, declared them and future launches "a threat to international peace and security" and directed Pyongyang to resume a self-declared 1999 moratorium on missile tests, according to a copy obtained by McClatchy Newspapers.

It also directed U.N. members to "take those steps necessary" to prevent missiles and related technology and materials from reaching North Korea and to block financial transfers to any entities involved in its missile or nuclear weapons programs.

Finally, the draft resolution strongly urged Pyongyang to "immediately return" to six-nation talks on eliminating its nuclear weapons program. Those talks have been stalled since November.

China's envoy, Wang Guangya, said his government wanted a non-binding statement of condemnation containing no sanctions.

"If this resolution is put to a vote, definitely there will be no unity in the Security Council," he said, suggesting that China would abstain or veto it.

China, North Korea's only ally, opposes any actions that could destabilize the divided Korean peninsula or the North Korean government.

U.S. officials hoped that China and Russia, which also favors a non-binding statement, would abstain when the resolution is put to a vote.

Japan's ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, said his government wanted a vote as quickly as possible.

A second U.S. official, who sought anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said the United States was trying to persuade Japan not to call for an immediate vote in order to allow more diplomacy, including talks that a senior Chinese official is scheduled to hold in Pyongyang next week.

DOJ_NMG_0039712

Meanwhile, the Bush administration was refining a number of punitive measures it could take unilaterally, including pressuring foreign banks that deal with North Korea to stop doing so, said five U.S. officials, who requested anonymity. Two of them said Hill was discussing coordinating this effort with China, Japan and South Korea.

Washington applied such pressure to a bank in Macau, forcing it in February to freeze North Korean accounts containing millions of dollars. U.S. officials charged that the funds were from missile sales, the counterfeiting of U.S. currency and drug trafficking.

South Korea announced Friday that it was suspending indefinitely hundreds of thousands of tons of food and fertilizer shipments to North Korea.

At the same time, Seoul decided to proceed with previously scheduled Cabinet-level talks with North Korea next week.

North Korea's July 4th Display: How Big A Threat? (WSJ)

By Lauren Etter

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

North Korea's nuclear buildup also could instigate a weapons race in the region, prompting other countries, like Taiwan, to seek nuclear weapons.

At the same time, Chinese and South Korean leaders fear an economic collapse that would send tens of thousands of North Korean refugees across their borders. That's one reason they are less willing to impose economic sanctions than the U.S. and Japan.

Is U.S. military force an option? Not likely. The financial, human and political costs would be very high. An extended military campaign against North Korea might cost as much as $2 trillion, according to the Center for Nonproliferation Studies; U.S. military expenditures in Iraq have nearly reached $300 billion. Moreover, dense population on the Korean Peninsula means casualties would be high. Military analysts estimate that a Korean conflict could lead to a million deaths.

The mountainous terrain also presents a challenge. Most of North Korea's missiles are hidden in underground tunnels, making them hard to locate and destroy. And, of course, many U.S. troops remain tied up in the Middle East, for now.

A big question mark is the state of North Korea's military. It is large, but some analysts say years of famine likely have left soldiers frail and even malnourished.

POINTS OF VIEW

"It's their choice to make. What these firing of the rockets has done is they've isolated themselves further and that's sad for the people of North Korea."

--President George W. Bush

"Our military will continue with missile-launch drills in the future as part of efforts to strengthen self-defense deterrent. If anyone intends to dispute or add pressure about this, we will have to take stronger physical actions in other forms."

--Official statement by North Korea

"This should be a much-needed dose of reality for us. The threat from North Korea is not that they're going to attack us with a long-range ballistic missile. They are decades away from such a capability...North Korea will never have a ballistic missile that will deliver a nuclear warhead to the United States."

-- Joseph Cirincione, Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank

"I think that Kim Jong Il is insane. It's a very bad situation. It's unfortunate. It's very, very difficult to see how this is going to end nicely."

-- Ivan Oelrich, Federation of American Scientists * * *

FACTS

North Korea's military has about 1.1 million members, making it the world's fourth largest, according to the International Institute for Strategic Studies. China has the world's largest military, about 2.3 million strong, followed by the U.S. with 1.5 million and India.

North Korea's per capita gross domestic product is about $1,400. South Korea's is about $19,000. The per capita U.S. GDP is about $40,000.

DOJ_NMG_0039713

Kim Jong Il -- a recluse film-buff who wears a bouffant hairstyle and platform shoes -- is breaking out of his shell. Last year he made 131 public appearances, up from 35 in 1995.

North Korea's military expenditures amount to about a quarter of its gross domestic product -- more than any other country in the world, says the International Institute for Strategic Studies. The U.S. spends about 4% of GDP on defense.

The U.S. has about 5,735 active warheads, according to the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists. Russia has about 5,830, France about 350, the United Kingdom less than 200 and China more than 100. North Korea may be able to make at least two nuclear bombs.

North Korea is known to have provoked its neighbors in strange ways. From 1954 to 1992, North Korea sent 3,693 armed agents to South Korea. In 1978, it abducted at least 13 Japanese to teach their language to North Korean spies. Five were released in 2002.

US And Japan Table Draft UN Resolution (FT)

By Mark Turner And Anna Fifield

Financial Times, July 8, 2006

Japan and the US officially tabled a strengthened draft UN resolution calling for sanctions on North Korea's weapons programme, following Pyongyang's missile tests this week. China, however, warned it would not support the move.

The new text demanded an end to North Korean missile development, and called for countries to "take those steps necessary" to prevent the procurement from or transfer to North Korea of any "missile or missile related items, materials, goods and technology", as well as the "transfer of any financial resources to end users involved in or supplying DPRK's (North Korea's) missile or WMD programmes".

The move allows the sponsors, including the UK and France, to call for a vote 24 hours later, raising the possibility of a weekend decision.

But Wang Guangya, China's UN ambassador, said the text if tabled would "definitely" not win unanimous support, and did not rule out a veto. "All possibilities are on the table," he said. "We want a unified firm response," Mr Wang said. "The best way to achieve that is through a PRST (non-binding presidential statement). Our actions should be conducive to diplomatic efforts under way."

China had earlier reiterated its stance to Christopher Hill, chief US delegate to the six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear ambitions, who met Li Zhaoxing, foreign minister, Wu Dawei, Beijing's chief nuclear negotiator, and state councillor Tang Jiaxuan. China's official Xinhua news agency quoted Mr Tang as telling the US envoy merely that Beijing would "keep close contact with concerned sides to preserve peace and stability in the Korean peninsula". China is Pyongyang's closest ally and largest aid donor.

Mr Hill is on a whistle-stop tour of the other four parties in the talks – Beijing, Seoul, Tokyo and Moscow – as the international community mulls its response to North Korea's missile tests.

Mr Hill can expect a slightly warmer reception during talks in South Korea on Saturday, although he will still encounter difficulties in persuading Seoul to take actions that would hurt Pyongyang financially.

"We should not have business as usual with a country that is firing missiles . . . in this rather reckless way," Mr Hill told reporters as he arrived in South Korea last night. "What's important is we speak with one voice."

In the wake of the missile tests, South Korea is breaking with its usual placatory approach towards the North. Seoul on Friday refused Pyongyang's request, made two days before the tests, to hold a working-level inter-Korean military meeting to ease tension along the demilitarised zone that separates the two countries.

The government delivered a "strong expression of regrets that the North fired missiles with such a proposal pending".

This came after said it would not pledge any more rice or fertiliser to the impoverished North, moving away from its traditional stance of trying to avoid antagonising Pyongyang in a bid for longer-term reconciliation. Economic co-operation projects with the North will continue, meaning its actions will have little effect on Kim Jong-il's regime.

North Korean Missile Tests Put Japan On The Defensive (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace

DOJ_NMG_0039714

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

TOKYO — Anyone wondering how seriously Japan treated the salvo of ballistic missiles that North Korea fired its way Wednesday should consider this: National broadcaster NHK canceled the daily installment of its wildly popular morning TV drama to make way for continuous news coverage.

The last time NHK saw fit to cancel the show, which is part of the morning routine for millions of Japanese, was in 1995, when a massive earthquake devastated the port city of Kobe. North Korea's rockets may have landed short of Japan, but they still made a strong impression on a country with a collective loathing for its Stalinist neighbor.

Japan immediately slapped sanctions on Pyongyang, notably barring a North Korean cargo and passenger ferry from docking for the next six months. But Japan's trade with North Korea has shrunk by half in the last four years, and the volume is too small to provide much leverage over the regime.

Instead, Japan has focused on building a capability to shoot down incoming missiles, as well as proceeding with a faster, deeper integration of its military alliance with the United States.

"In addition to building monitoring radar networks, we would like to cooperate with the United States and put our joint missile interception into shape as quickly as possible," Fukushiro Nukaga, the head of Japan's Defense Agency, told lawmakers after the North Korean tests.

Japan and the U.S. already have been pushing ahead on missile defense, expanding budgets for development and announcing new plans for deployment. North Korea's latest missile test only reinforced the Japanese view of the regime in Pyongyang as a dangerous belligerent, sweeping away any remaining serious opposition to missile defense.

Kim Jong Il's regime is Villain No. 1 in Japan, and it wears the black hat in another — real-life — national drama here: the kidnapping of 13 Japanese citizens during the Cold War. North Korea admitted in 2002 to holding them captive and forcing them to teach Japanese language and customs to its spies.

Five of the victims have been released since then, but Tokyo has not been satisfied with North Korea's insistence that the other eight are dead. Many here also believe that the real number of abductees is much higher, and the issue has touched a deep nerve among the Japanese.

For its part, North Korea denounces Japan for what it says is a refusal to atone for the suffering it inflicted on the Korean peninsula during its 1910-45 occupation.

Given the bad blood, the Japanese took the provocative missile tests this week as being completely in character for North Korea. The Japanese were not caught by surprise, as they had been in 1998 when North Korea fired a Taepodong 1 missile over Japan.

Until then, Japan had taken a long look at missile defense and, wary of Chinese sensitivities about a military buildup, said no thanks.

"The missile defense talks were dead in 1998 — the Japanese thought it was too provocative," said Lance Gatling, an American aerospace consultant in Tokyo who worked at the time for Raytheon, a missile defense contractor.

"But everything changed after the North Korean test. People would jokingly say to us: 'How much did you have to pay those guys to fire that missile?' "

Still, Japan moved slowly, agreeing at first to a research phase only. In addition to worries about juicing an arms race in East Asia, it was uncertain whether a constitutional restriction against participating in collective self-defense meant Japan would have to distinguish between missiles fired at the nation and those aimed at an ally.

Those doubts have been eroded by the deteriorating relations with North Korea and by growing unease over China's arms buildup.

Japan's spending on missile defense is growing even as it cuts its overall defense budget. Research has given way to acceptance of the idea of having missiles on its soil. And restrictions on military exports were lifted to allow Japanese companies to share technology with U.S. firms.

When the U.S. Navy cruiser Shiloh tested its sea-based interceptor missiles off Hawaii last month, a Japanese Aegis ship participated.

DOJ_NMG_0039715

"The real wake-up call for Japan came in 1998, and the push for a missile shield is now well underway," said Peter Beck at the Seoul office of the International Crisis Group.

"But the Japanese have an obsession with North Korea. And by firing these missiles, North Korea has shown itself to be a clear and present danger that provides political cover for the hard-liners in Japan."

Pyongyang Highlight Reel (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

North Korea's Kim Jong Il joined our Independence Day celebrations this week by firing several medium-range missiles and one long-range Taepodong-2 missile, the latter capable of reaching Seattle had it not blown up a few seconds into its flight. The "Dear Leader" now threatens to conduct more tests. What does he want?

The conventional view is that he wants direct talks with the U.S. leading to security guarantees, normalization of ties and an end to Pyongyang's economic isolation. And this, it is further said, is the happy state toward which North Korea and the U.S. were headed in the late 1990s until the Bush crew started talking about the "axis of evil" and pre-emption, thereby provoking Kim's current discontent. All will be well, moreover, if President Bush drops his gratuitously hostile attitude toward Kim and picks up where the Clinton Administration left off.

The amazing thing is that serious people purport to believe this after 20 years of contrary evidence. So we thought it might be instructive to recount some history, a sort of diplomatic highlight reel, of U.S. negotiations with Kim over the years. It helps to explain how Kim thinks he can fire missiles toward his adversaries with impunity.

In December 1985, North Korea signed the nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) under pressure from the Soviet Union. Until that time, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the U.N. body charged with enforcing the NPT, was only aware of one nuclear power plant in the North, a small research reactor supplied by the Soviets in 1977. In their initial declaration to the IAEA, however, Pyongyang owned up to operating a second small reactor, a plutonium reprocessing plant, a fuel fabrication plant, as well as to building two larger reactors. The North also admitted it had separated about 100 grams of plutonium through reprocessing.

But according to a book by David Fischer (an excerpt of which is published on the IAEA's Web site), the IAEA quickly concluded that the North had probably separated more plutonium than it had declared, and that it had also disguised the existence of two additional nuclear facilities from the IAEA, facilities they refused to let the IAEA inspect. The North also demanded that the U.S. withdraw its 100 tactical nuclear weapons from South Korea as a condition to its adherence to the NPT.

In 1991, President George H. W. Bush agreed to do just that. That year, North and South Korea signed a joint declaration in which both sides promised not to "test, manufacture, produce, receive, possess, store, deploy or use nuclear weapons," or to "possess nuclear reprocessing and uranium enrichment facilities."

Yet in March 1993, Pyongyang reacted to an IAEA demand to visit the two suspect sites by announcing that it would withdraw from the NPT. The Clinton Administration pleaded with the North to suspend its withdrawal and accept IAEA inspections. But as Mr. Fischer recounts, "during the remainder of 1993 and the first half of 1994, [North Korea] continued to frustrate and harass IAEA inspections." Tensions between the U.S. and North Korea mounted until Jimmy Carter's intervention that June, which in turn led to the "Agreed Framework" of October 1994.

Under its terms, North Korea promised to freeze most of its existing nuclear programs, accept IAEA monitoring and comply with its denuclearization agreement with South Korea. In exchange, the U.S. would ease trade restrictions, offer security guarantees, arrange for the financing of two light-water reactors and supply oil. The U.S. met its end of the bargain: It supplied the fuel, arranged the reactor financing, eased economic sanctions and paved the way toward diplomatic recognition, culminating in a visit to Pyongyang by then Secretary of State Madeleine Albright in October 2000.

Contrary to myth, the Bush Administration continued to honor the terms of the Framework, despite its obvious misgivings. In August 2002, Charles Pritchard, Mr. Bush's special envoy to North Korea, attended the groundbreaking of one of the reactors; State Department spokesman Philip Reedker praised the event as "tangible progress made in construction and the importance to the reactor project's ultimate success."

DOJ_NMG_0039716

Pyongyang had a very different view of compliance. In 1998, it fired without warning a Taepodong-1 missile over Japan. In 1999, it delayed by five months a request to inspect a suspected underground nuclear facility. The Clinton Administration responded to the first provocation by attempting to negotiate a missile version of the Agreed Framework, and to the second by promising North Korea food aid in exchange for inspections.

In 2002, based on new intelligence, the Bush Administration accused North Korea of pursuing a secret, uranium-based nuclear-weapons program. Far from denying the accusation, the North readily admitted it and announced that it was a nuclear-weapons state. Pyongyang, it turned out, had been cheating on the Agreed Framework since at least 1997, long before the Bush Administration came to town. The standoff has continued since, punctuated by periodic threats from Kim, and now with more missile threats.

Given this history, Kim is hardly crazy to conclude that if he just threatens enough, the U.S. will deliver what he wants sooner or later. North Korea is a difficult problem, and we don't have any simple solutions. But the beginning of wisdom ought to be not to repeat the mistakes of the past. And the worst mistake would be to reward Kim once again for violating his commitments by sending him more money and more diplomatic prestige.

Bjorn Lomborg Get Your Priorities Right (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

NEW YORK -- Bjorn Lomborg is a political scientist by training, but the charismatic, golden-haired Dane is offering me a history lesson. Two hundred years ago, he explains, sitting forward in his chair in this newspaper's Manhattan offices, the left was an "incredibly rational movement." It believed in "encyclopedias," in hard facts, and in the idea that mastery of these basics would help "make a better society." Since then, the world's do-gooders have succumbed to "romanticism; they've become more dreamy." This is a problem in his view, and so this "self-avowed slight lefty" is determined to nudge the whole world back toward "rationalism."

Well, if not the whole world, at least the people who matter. In Mr. Lomborg's universe that means the lawmakers and bureaucrats who are charged with solving the world's most pressing problems -- HIV/AIDS, malaria, malnutrition, dirty water, trade barriers. This once-obscure Dane has in recent years risen to the status of international celebrity as the chief advocate of getting leaders to realize the world has limited resources to fix its problems, and that it therefore needs to prioritize.

Prioritization, cost-effectiveness, efficiency -- these are the ultimate in rational thinking. (It strikes me they are the ultimate in "free markets," though Mr. Lomborg studiously avoids that term.) They are also nearly unheard-of concepts among the governments, international bodies and aid groups that oversee good works.

Mr. Lomborg's approach has been to organize events around the globe in which leaders are forced to think in new ways. His task is certainly timely, with groups like the U.N. engaged in debate over "reform," and philanthropists such as Warren Buffett throwing billions at charitable foundations. But, I ask, can the world really become more rational? "It's no use just talking about all the great things you'd like to accomplish -- we've got to get there," says Mr. Lomborg. * * *

Bjorn Lomborg busted -- and that is the only word for it -- onto the world scene in 2001 with the publication of his book "The Skeptical Environmentalist." A one-time Greenpeace enthusiast, he'd originally planned to disprove those who said the environment was getting better. He failed. And to his credit, his book said so, supplying a damning critique of today's environmental pessimism. Carefully researched, it offered endless statistics -- from official sources such as the U.N. -- showing that from biodiversity to global warming, there simply were no apocalypses in the offing. "Our history shows that we solve more problems than we create," he tells me. For his efforts, Mr. Lomborg was labeled a heretic by environmental groups -- whose fundraising depends on scaring the jeepers out of the public -- and became more hated by these alarmists than even (if possible) President Bush.

Yet the experience left Mr. Lomborg with a taste for challenging conventional wisdom. In 2004, he invited eight of the world's top economists -- including four Nobel Laureates -- to Copenhagen, where they were asked to evaluate the world's problems, think of the costs and efficiencies attached to solving each, and then produce a prioritized list of those most deserving of money. The well-publicized results (and let it be said here that Mr. Lomborg is no slouch when it comes to promoting himself and his work) were stunning. While the economists were from varying political stripes, they largely agreed. The numbers were just so compelling: $1 spent preventing HIV/AIDS would result in about $40 of social benefits, so the economists put it at the top of the list (followed by malnutrition, free trade and malaria). In contrast, $1 spent to abate global warming would result in only about two cents to 25 cents worth of good; so that project dropped to the bottom.

DOJ_NMG_0039717

"Most people, average people, when faced with these clear choices, would pick the $40-of-good project over others -- that's rational," says Mr. Lomborg. "The problem is that most people are simply presented with a menu of projects, with no prices and no quantities. What the Copenhagen Consensus was trying to do was put the slices and prices on a menu. And then require people to make choices."

Easier said than done. As Mr. Lomborg explains, "It's fine to ask economists to prioritize, but economists don't run the world." (This sounds unfortunate to me, although Mr. Lomborg, the "slight lefty," quickly adds "Thank God.") "We now need to get the policy makers on board, the ones who are dealing with the world's problems." And therein lies the rub. Political figures don't like to make choices; they don't like to reward some groups and not others; they don't like to admit that they can't do it all. They are political. Not rational.

So all the more credit to Mr. Lomborg, who several weeks ago got his first big shot at reprogramming world leaders. His organization, the Copenhagen Consensus Center, held a new version of the exercise in Georgetown. In attendance were eight U.N. ambassadors, including John Bolton. (China and India signed on, though no Europeans.) They were presented with global projects, the merits of each of which were passionately argued by experts in those fields. Then they were asked: If you had an extra $50 billion, how would you prioritize your spending?

Mr. Lomborg grins and says that before the event he briefed the ambassadors: "Several of them looked down the list and said 'Wait, I want to put a No. 1 by each of these projects, they are all so important.' And I had to say, 'Yeah, uh, that's exactly the point of this exercise -- to make you not do that.'" So rank they did. And perhaps no surprise, their final list looked very similar to that of the wise economists. At the top were better health care, cleaner water, more schools and improved nutrition. At the bottom was . . . global warming.

Wondering how all this might go over with Al Gore, I ask Mr. Lomborg if he'd seen the former vice president's new film that warns of a climate-change disaster. He's planning to, but notes he wasn't impressed by the trailers: "It appears to be so overblown that it isn't helpful to the discussion." Not that Mr. Lomborg doesn't think global warming is a problem -- he does. But he lays out the facts. "The proposed way of fixing this -- to drastically reduce carbon emissions now and to solve a 100-year problem in a 10-year time frame, is just a bad idea. You do fairly little good at a fairly high price. It makes more sense to solve the 100-year problem in a 50-year time frame, and solve the 10-year problems, like HIV-AIDS, in a five-year time frame. That makes sense, and is the smart way to spend money."

Slipping into his environmentalist's shoes, he also says people need to get some perspective. "The U.N. tells us global warming will result in a sea-level change of one to two feet. It is not going to be the 30 feet Al Gore is scaring us with. Is this one to two feet going to be a problem? Sure," he says. "But remember that this past century sea levels rose between one-third and a full foot. And if you ask old people today what the most important things were that happened in the 20th century, do you think they are going to say: 'Two world wars, the internal combustion engine, the IT revolution . . . and sea levels rose'? It's not to say it isn't a problem. But we fix these problems."

* * *

Perhaps Mr. Lomborg's greatest coup at the recent Copenhagen Consensus event was getting the attention of John Bolton, a foe of U.N. inefficiency and bureaucratic wheel-turning. "I called Bolton's secretary and we finally got them to agree and she said 'Okay, you can have him for one hour.' And I said 'No, we need him for two days.' And she laughed her heart out and said 'That's never going to happen.'" But happen it did, and Mr. Bolton was an enthusiastic supporter, appearing with Mr. Lomborg to announce the results of the exercise and lamenting that too often at the U.N. "everything is a priority." There is already talk of a bigger U.N. event in the fall.

Still, it strikes me that simply getting the top folks to prioritize (which itself would be a minor miracle) is only a start. How does Mr. Lomborg intend to deal with a compartmentalized bureaucracy, where every unit claims it is sacred and each one is petrified of losing funding? Here, Mr. Lomborg himself turns a little less rational and a little more political. It's no accident that the consensus organizers tell its participants to consider what they'd do with an "extra" $50 billion. "Most of these guys, the day-to-day guys at the U.N., went into their business to 'do good.' And we need to appeal to that bigger sense of virtue. The best way to do that is talk about 'extra' money, so that they aren't worried about losing their own job."

DOJ_NMG_0039718

Mr. Lomborg hopes that prioritization up top will inspire "competition" down below. "Most people work in their own circles -- malaria guys talk to malaria guys, malnutrition guys to malnutrition guys. But if they understand that there are other projects out there, and that they also have price tags, and that the ones with the best performance are the ones that will get the extra money -- you start to have an Olympics for best projects. And that means smarter ideas for how to solve problems." In fact, Mr. Lomborg wishes there were more Al Gores. "It's good we have someone educating about global warming. But we need Al Gores for HIV/AIDS, Al Gores for malnutrition, Al Gores for free trade, Al Gores for clean drinking water. We need all these Al Gores passionately roaming the earth with power-point presentations, making the case for their project. Because at that point, the real Al Gore would be slightly sidelined, since he's arguing for the most expensive cure that would do the least good."

Mr. Lomborg is smart enough to realize that what really bothers political leaders with this approach is that "it would be launching a ship and it's unknown where it will land. That makes people uncomfortable." A Copenhagen Consensus exercise for the Inter-American Development Bank in Latin America or for the Environmental Protection Agency in the U.S. (both of which Mr. Lomborg is working to organize) could result in findings that suggest the leaders of these organizations have been throwing good money after bad for years.

"Right now, politicians know that in public they have to say they support all things, and suggest there is an infinite amount of money to give to an infinite amount of good causes. Semiprivately, they know that if they have 10 good causes, the easiest thing is to give one-tenth of the funds to each -- so there are no complaints. But privately they know there isn't enough money for everything and that they probably should have given most of it to the one or two groups that would do the most good."

At the very least, the Copenhagen Consensus might make it harder for public figures to defend bad decisions. "If you have a rational list that tells you that you do a lot more good preventing HIV/AIDS, then those in favor of such projects have slightly better arguments. Those arguing for climate change have slightly worse arguments." And while this may not change the world, it could be a start. "The Consensus isn't about getting it perfectly right," says Mr. Lomborg. "It's about getting it slightly less wrong."

Ms. Strassel is a member of The Wall Street Journal's editorial board.

US And Russia To Enter Civilian Nuclear Pact (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

President Bush has decided to permit extensive U.S. civilian nuclear cooperation with Russia for the first time, administration officials said yesterday, reversing decades of bipartisan policy in a move that would be worth billions of dollars to Moscow but could provoke an uproar in Congress.

Bush resisted such a move for years, insisting that Russia first stop building a nuclear power station for Iran near the Persian Gulf. But U.S. officials have shifted their view of Russia's collaboration with Iran and concluded that President Vladimir Putin has become a more constructive partner in trying to pressure Tehran to give up any aspirations for nuclear weapons.

The president plans to announce his decision at a meeting with Putin in St. Petersburg next Saturday before the annual summit of leaders from the Group of Eight major industrialized nations, officials said. The statement to be released by the two presidents would agree to start negotiations for the formal agreement required under U.S. law before the United States can engage in civilian nuclear cooperation.

In the administration's view, both sides would benefit. A nuclear cooperation agreement would clear the way for Russia to import and store thousands of tons of spent nuclear fuel from U.S.-supplied reactors around the world, a lucrative business so far blocked by Washington. It could be used as an incentive to win more Russian cooperation on Iran. And it would be critical to Bush's plan to spread civilian nuclear energy to power-hungry countries because Russia would provide a place to send the used radioactive material.

At the same time, it could draw significant opposition from across the ideological spectrum, according to analysts who follow the issue. Critics wary of Putin's authoritarian course view it as rewarding Russia even though Moscow refuses to support sanctions against Iran. Others fearful of Russia's record of handling nuclear material see it as a reckless move that endangers the environment.

DOJ_NMG_0039719

"You will have all the anti-Russian right against it, you will have all the anti-nuclear left against it, and you will have the Russian democracy center concerned about it too," said Matthew Bunn, a nuclear specialist at Harvard's Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs.

Since Russia is already a nuclear state, such an agreement, once drafted, presumably would conform to the Atomic Energy Act and therefore would not require congressional approval. Congress could reject it only with majority votes by both houses within 90 legislative days.

Administration officials confirmed the president's decision yesterday only after it was first learned from outside nuclear experts privy to the situation. The officials insisted on anonymity because they were not authorized to disclose the agreement before the summit.

The prospect, however, has been hinted at during public speeches in recent days. "We certainly will be talking about nuclear energy," Assistant Energy Secretary Karen A. Harbert told a Carnegie Endowment for International Peace event Thursday. "We need alternatives to hydrocarbons."

Some specialists said Bush's decision marks a milestone in U.S.-Russian relations, despite tension over Moscow's retreat from democracy and pressure on neighbors. "It signals that there's a sea change in the attitude toward Russia, that they're someone we can try to work with on Iran," said Rose Gottemoeller, a former Energy Department official in the Clinton administration who now directs the Carnegie Moscow Center. "It bespeaks a certain level of confidence in the Russians by this administration that hasn't been there before."

But others said the deal seems one-sided. "Just what exactly are we getting? That's the real mystery," said Henry D. Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center. Until now, he noted, the United States has insisted on specific actions by Russia to prevent Iran from developing bombs. "We're not getting any of that. We're getting an opportunity to give them money."

Environmentalists have denounced Russia's plans to transform itself into the world's nuclear dump. The country has a history of nuclear accidents and contamination. Its transportation network is antiquated and inadequate for moving vast quantities of radioactive material, critics say. And the country, they add, has not fully secured the nuclear facilities it already has against theft or accidents.

The United States has civilian nuclear cooperation agreements with the European atomic energy agency, along with China, Japan, Taiwan and 20 other countries. Bush recently sealed an agreement with India, which does require congressional approval because of that nation's unsanctioned weapons program.

Russia has sought such an agreement with the United States since the 1990s, when it began thinking about using its vast land mass to store much of the world's spent nuclear fuel. Estimating that it could make as much as $20 billion, Russia enacted a law in 2001 permitting the import, temporary storage and reprocessing of foreign nuclear fuel, despite 90 percent opposition in public opinion polls.

But the plan went nowhere. The United States controls spent fuel from nuclear material it provides, even in foreign countries, and Bunn estimates that as much as 95 percent of the potential world market for Russia was under U.S. jurisdiction. Without a cooperation agreement, none of the material could be sent to Russia, even though allies such as South Korea and Taiwan are eager to ship spent fuel there.

Like President Bill Clinton before him, Bush refused to consider it as long as Russia was helping Iran with its nuclear program. In the summer of 2002, according to Bunn, Bush sent Putin a letter saying an agreement could be reached only if "the central problem of assistance to Iran's missile, nuclear and advanced conventional weapons programs" was solved.

The concern over the nuclear reactor under construction at Bushehr, however, has faded. Russia agreed to provide all fuel to the facility and take it back once used, meaning it could not be turned into material for nuclear bombs. U.S. officials who once suspected that Russian scientists were secretly behind Iran's weapons program learned that critical assistance to Tehran came from Pakistani scientist A.Q. Khan.

DOJ_NMG_0039720

The 2002 disclosure that Iran had secret nuclear sites separate from Bushehr shocked both the U.S. and Russian governments and seemed to harden Putin's stance toward Iran. He eventually agreed to refer the issue to the U.N. Security Council and signed on to a package of incentives and penalties recently sent to Tehran. At the same time, he has consistently opposed economic sanctions, military action or even tougher diplomatic language by the council, much to the frustration of U.S. officials.

Opening negotiations for a formal nuclear cooperation agreement could be used as a lever to move Putin further. Talks will inevitably take months, and the review in Congress will extend the process. If during that time Putin resists stronger measures against Iran, analysts said, the deal could unravel or critics on Capitol Hill could try to muster enough opposition to block it. If Putin proves cooperative on Iran, they said, it could ease the way toward final approval.

"This was one of the few areas where there was big money involved that you could hold over the Russians," said George Perkovich, an arms-control specialist and vice president of the Carnegie Endowment. "It's a handy stick, a handy thing to hold over the Russians."

Bush has an interest in taking the agreement all the way as well. His new Global Nuclear Energy Partnership envisions promoting civilian nuclear power around the world and eventually finding a way to reprocess spent fuel without the danger of leaving behind material that could be used for bombs. Until such technology is developed, Bush needs someplace to store the spent fuel from overseas, and Russia is the only volunteer.

"The Russians could make a lot of money importing foreign spent fuel, some of our allies would desperately like to be able to send their fuel to Russia, and maybe we could use the leverage to get other things done," such as "getting the Russians to be more forward-leaning on Iran," Bunn said.

Energy Security Pact Eyed At G-8 (WT)

By Katie Stuhldreher

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

American and European officials are pressing for an agreement on energy security with Russia at the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg next week, which foreign policy specialists predict will fail.

Karen Harbert, assistant energy secretary for international affairs, stressed energy as a main theme for President Bush in the talks, including a bilateral summit with Russian President Vladimir Putin.

"We have a new energy environment and Russia needs to understand that there are certain responsibilities that go along with membership in the G-8. Russia needs to show commitment to democratic principles and rule of law that will make it a good place for investment," Mrs. Harbert told reporters.

Other issues on the agenda, she said, include Russia's commitment to democracy and its link to economic cooperation.

Mrs. Harbert insisted an agreement could be reached in St. Petersburg because the United States and Russia have the same interest in maximizing Russia's energy exports.

Critics, however, say lack of a unified front from Europe on the issue and necessity for Russian cooperation on negotiations with Iran greatly limit the United States' leverage to push Mr. Putin for reform.

Carlos Pascual, director of foreign policy studies at the Brookings Institution, said, "It's going to be hard to manage Russia in a world with many other problems in which we need them to play a key role."

Edward Chow, a former headquarters manager for international affairs at Chevron Corp., said negotiations with Russia may be useless.

"Looking to Russia as a solution to a volatile market may not be the right answer. We clearly have different agendas. Maybe we should come back and talk when they or the market is in a better mood," he said.

David G. Victor, an energy specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations, said, "I don't think that it's that the two sides don't understand one another. I think that we've reached a point of deadlock, and nothing will come out of the G-8 summit."

Mr. Chow added that lack of European unity on the issue served as another handicap for the United States in the talks.

Johannes Linn, senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, agreed that Russia won't be enthusiastic about adjusting policies.

DOJ_NMG_0039721

"Russia doesn't see a win-win solution. Russia thinks the only way to increase its energy security is at the expense of others, like Ukraine. This will make it hard to find an energy policy that everyone can sign onto," he said.

Recent concerns about global energy security arose in January, when Kremlin-controlled energy giant Gazprom temporarily cut off natural gas supplies to Ukraine over Ukrainian refusal to pay higher prices.

These actions prompted Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other U.S. leaders to criticize Russia for using energy for political purposes.

Mr. Chow said the United States' best hope at making progress with Russia is to court European support.

"Right now, Russia is getting mixed messages from Europe and can deal with different countries separately. The United States needs to work behind the scenes to promote a unified position on energy from Europe," he said.

A St. Petersburg Story (NYT)

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

Russia's meeting on July 15 with leaders of the world's richest democracies requires an important historical footnote. President Vladimir Putin will welcome the Group of Eight to St. Petersburg, where leaders are expected to talk about energy, Iran and terrorism. It is an event that would have appealed to Peter the Great, who built his beautiful but extravagant city over 300 years ago to win Russia a place at the European tables of his day.

Now it is Mr. Putin's turn to put Russia's post-Soviet power and progress on display. But the international acceptance that Mr. Putin craves will quickly disappear if the Kremlin continues its march toward what critics call a "staged democracy" instead of a real one.

The list of concerns has grown steadily during Mr. Putin's stewardship. The exuberant free press that erupted after the end of the Soviet Union 15 years ago is mostly gone now, and what passes for news increasingly comes straight from the Kremlin fax machine. National television networks now labor under the president's thumb, and the best newspapers are falling into line as well. The Internet, smaller publications and radio broadcasts are still exempt, but many Russian journalists fear it may be only a matter of time.

Then there are the upcoming presidential election in 2008. Mr. Putin's term is up, and he has said he will step down as required by law. But there are already troubling signs that if his loyal Parliament cannot find a way to keep him on, it will anoint his choice for successor. And woe unto any candidate who doesn't have the Kremlin's seal of approval.

Hopes for a rule of law are also dimming as the judicial system lands hardest on those out of favor with the Kremlin. Non-government organizations that sometimes criticize the government now see the Kremlin turning on them as well. Organizations like the Moscow Helsinki Group have come under attack for criticizing Mr. Putin's record on human rights and the treatment of ethnic minorities.

In the name of fighting extremism, Mr. Putin's government has enacted a new law that can easily be used to harass almost any activists who criticize the powerful. And one of Mr. Putin's TV stations falsely accused four important groups, including Moscow Helsinki, of taking money from British spies. This is a familiar tactic in Russia that should have been retired with the Soviet flag.

Mr. Putin's Russia is still far better than it was during the bleak decades of Communism. And Russia clearly has the economic clout to sit with France, Germany, Japan, the United States, Britain, Canada and Italy. But the leaders of this club need to make it clear to Russia that membership demands not only the power of wealth but also a democratic government to go with it.

Russia: Investors Line Up For An Oil Stake (WSJ)

By Gregory L. White

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

When President Bush meets with Vladimir Putin Friday, he will have a chance to express his concerns about the Russian leader's policies.

The day before, investors will have a chance to do the same. On Thursday, the $10 billion initial public offering by the state oil company, OAO Rosneft, is scheduled to be priced.

DOJ_NMG_0039722

So far, investors seem so eager for a piece of Russia's oil riches that they are willing to overlook Mr. Putin's curbs on democracy and heavy-handed economic policies. "Greed is taking precedence over fear," says one person close to the deal.

The reason: Russia is one of the world's largest producers of oil. Rosneft is the main beneficiary of the Kremlin's dismantling of OAO Yukos, the closely held company that had sought to be Russia's oil flagship until its chief executive and main shareholder was jailed in 2003.

Rosneft's takeover of Yukos's main asset -- a giant Siberian oil-producing company -- catapulted the state company into the top ranks of Russian oil producers, highlighting the Kremlin's drive to bring the country's energy riches under its tight control.

The IPO will be a test of whether foreign investors, who lost billions on Yukos when the government crushed the company with $30 billion in back-tax claims, are ready to put those losses behind them and bet on the Kremlin's horse.

International energy companies already are lining up. The Kremlin has steadily squeezed their access to Russia's rich oil and gas reserves, pushing for home-grown companies like Rosneft to get controlling stakes in any future large projects. Staying in the good graces of Rosneft and its Kremlin overseers is critical for any foreign company seeking to operate in Russia, say industry officials.

So isn't surprising that when Rosneft offered oil companies across Europe and Asia the chance to participate in the IPO, there was plenty of interest. BP PLC and Royal Dutch Shell PLC, both with substantial Russian operations, are likely to participate, taking as much as $1 billion or more each, according to people close to the deal.

State-owned companies in Asia, eager to curry favor with Moscow in the hope of getting more fuel, also are likely to invest. India is examining a proposal to invest as much as $3 billion in Rosneft through state-run energy firm Oil & Natural Gas Corp., a senior Oil Ministry official said Friday.

Russian investors, both individuals who can sign up to buy shares at banks across the country and the super-rich, also are showing strong interest.

Among Western investors, the biggest concern is whether the market capitalization of $60 billion to $80 billion that Rosneft is targeting is too rich a price for a company with little track record among investors. Worries about potential litigation from Yukos or any lingering anger about losses don't seem to be major concerns.

Says James Fenkner, a Moscow fund manager: "Betting against the Kremlin has been a very poor strategy over the last few years."

Gazprom Posts Net Of $10.98 Billion, Best Ever In Russia (WSJ)

By Greg Walters And Geoffrey T. Smith

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

MOSCOW -- OAO Gazprom reported 2005 net profit of 311.1 billion rubles, or $10.98 billion based on last year's exchange rates -- higher than any Russian company has ever recorded -- on the back of rising natural-gas prices and its acquisition of Sibneft. Gazprom, which supplies Europe with about a quarter of its gas consumption, said profit jumped 49% from 2004.

Gazprom is expanding into Europe -- the company's traditional foreign market -- and is moving into new regions such as East Asia and North America. Many people say rising revenues from oil and gas exports have allowed Russian politicians to assume a new assertiveness in world affairs.

State-owned Gazprom's international ambitions have raised concerns that the company may be focusing on infrastructural projects that create headlines -- like new gas pipelines under the Baltic Sea to Germany and across Siberia to China -- at the expense of developing its vast reserves to meet future demand. Gazprom's gas output is expected to be essentially flat this year at just under 550 billion cubic meters.

Gazprom's revenue and profitability rose sharply at all levels last year, reflecting higher prices for natural gas in Russia and abroad. Revenue rose 42% compared with a year earlier to 1.384 trillion rubles, on an increase of only 2.8% in natural-gas sales by volume. Andrei Gromadin, an analyst at MDM Bank in Moscow, said Sibneft -- since renamed Gazprom Neft -- contributed about 15 billion to 16 billion rubles in net income and 90 billion rubles in revenue in the fourth quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0039723

Gazprom bought a 72% stake in Sibneft for a little more than $13 billion in September. The acquisition, which was largely financed by debt, led to a 60% increase in net debt to 797.5 billion rubles at the end of the year. However, analysts note that Gazprom Neft's strong cash flow makes it easier for it to service that debt.

Gazprom's results were calculated according to international financial reporting standards, though the company had already reported earnings under Russian accounting standards for the full year.

Nadia Kazakova, an analyst with Alfa Bank in London, said the same buoyant fundamentals would likely lead to another record profit for Gazprom in 2006.

While record-breaking in Russia, Gazprom's profit is still below that of its international peers, even those with comparable market capitalizations. BP PLC reported net profit about twice as high as Gazprom's in 2005, at $22.34 billion. Gazprom's market capitalization was $248 billion, compared with BP's $234 billion.

Kremlin Curtails U.S.-Financed Radio Broadcasts To Russians (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

MOSCOW, July 7 — American-financed radio news broadcasts to Russia, a staple of the American government's outreach efforts since the cold war, have been sharply curtailed in recent months under legal pressure from the Russian government, according to Russian and American officials.

The pressure has knocked programs off the air in much of the country, limiting the Russian-language news broadcasts of Voice of America and Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty almost entirely to Moscow and St. Petersburg.

The suppression of the Western-financed news, which began last year weeks after a journalist for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty infuriated the Kremlin by interviewing Shamil Basayev, the Chechen rebel leader, has been indirect but highly effective, officials said.

Rather than confront the news services' operations directly, regulators from the Culture Ministry have audited the services' partners across the nation — the Russian radio stations that rebroadcast the programs as part of their formats.

The audits found that the stations had not complied with provisions of Russian media law requiring them to submit and adhere to "concepts of programming" that delineate how much air time will include material they produce themselves and how much will come from external sources, said Yevgeny Strelchik, an adviser to the arm of the ministry that monitors broadcasters' compliance.

Regulators warned the Russian stations that they would risk losing their licenses if they continued to broadcast the material provided by the American news services. As a result, one station after another has dropped the programming.

The crackdown, first reported by The Washington Post, has followed Kremlin efforts since President Vladimir V. Putin came to office in 2000 to control or restrict independent journalism in Russia, especially on the airwaves. Television stations fell under the Kremlin's sway and now principally act as instruments of the state.

Jeffrey N. Trimble, the acting president of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, said the pressure against his service's partners had resulted in all but four or five of the stations dropping the programs. Last year at least 30 stations carried the material.

He said the crackdown appeared to be part of the larger trend against independent journalism. "The media in Russia has become less free, and we are caught up in that," Mr. Trimble said.

An official at the State Department said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other officials had raised the issue with Russia, without result. Their efforts, while falling within larger concerns about press freedom here, have been complicated because the stations did appear to have technical violations that gave the Russian regulators some basis for action, the official said.

"High-level State Department officials have discussed these issues repeatedly with Russian officials, both in Moscow and in Washington," the official said. "These decisions have not yet led to a satisfactory resolution of these matters, and we will continue to push until a satisfactory solution is reached."

The official spoke anonymously, because of sensitivities about Russian-American relations before meetings next week between President Bush and President Putin.

DOJ_NMG_0039724

The audits began shortly after Andrei Babitsky, a journalist for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, interviewed Mr. Basayev last August. The news service chose not to broadcast the interview, but portions were shown on an ABC News program.

Russia promptly moved against ABC News operations, announcing that it would not renew the accreditations of its staff members, effectively stripping them of their ability to work in the country. It moved more quietly against Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, but the results have been clear.

"The partners have been rebroadcasting our content for years, and suddenly all of them gave up at once," said Yelena Glushkova, director of the news service's operations in Russia.

Mr. Strelchik, the government adviser, insisted there was no political or retaliatory motive. "We do not see any ideological problems in this," he said. "The federal service I work for has nothing to do with politics."

Destinations Cracking The Russia Code (WSJ)

By Stan Sesser

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

MOSCOW -- The great historic monuments are impeccably restored, landscaped and litter-free. Dozens of opulent new restaurants offer cuisines from around the world. Warm days breaking the long winter mean even the locals are smiling. All that's missing from this bucolic scene: tourists.

Even in the heart of the city -- in the grand Red Square -- it's quiet. At the entrance to the tomb of Communist revolutionary Vladimir Lenin, barriers are set up to rein in hundreds of visitors. But on a recent visit, a couple of dozen visitors wait five minutes to get in.

It's boom times in Eastern Europe and the Baltic states, former Soviet Union countries that are now opening up to travelers. But not in Russia. In 2005, the number of tourists to Russia dropped 14% to 2.4 million. Almost one million more people went to the Czech Republic last year for tourism and business than to Russia -- which has about 14 times the population.

Travelers are being driven away by a severe shortage of hotel rooms in major cities like Moscow and St. Petersburg, as well as apartment-rental scams; prices that are shockingly high for food, hotels and private transport; and by a visa system so draconian that you can literally be snatched off the street by the police if just one stamp on the papers you're required to carry with you at all times isn't in order.

The upshot for travelers: Getting there and then getting around takes a lot of planning -- and patience. For many people, booking a group tour through a specialist agency will be the best way to explore the country. Those who want to go it alone should consider spending just a few days in Moscow and more time in St. Petersburg, which is the most tourist-friendly part of the country, with multilingual subway signs. To avoid dangers and scams, hire a driver recommended by a reputable hotel, and book accommodations only through a reliable travel agent or rental agency (see Trip Planner).

For Russia's leadership, tourism simply isn't a top priority at the moment. The country is on an economic rebound driven by surging prices for its main exports, oil and gas, dwarfing tourism as a potential source of Western dollars. While they're pushing to diversify the economy, including some investment in tourism projects like a ski resort near the Black Sea, most of the focus is on traditional industries. And with President Vladimir Putin cultivating an assertive and nationalist foreign policy, there's little appetite for anything that looks like favoring foreigners.

Russian officials don't attempt to hide the reality of how much tourism is hurting. Sergei Sinitsyn, adviser to the chairman of the Federal Agency for Tourism, points out the slight the government has given tourism. His agency until a year ago was part of the sports ministry. It still has only a small marketing budget -- $3.6 million last year for the entire world, at a time some countries spend more than $100 million to draw tourists.

Although I had done my homework investigating the pitfalls for this trip, my first to the country, I was impressed with what I found. Russia is a vast country, with the sites in Moscow and St. Petersburg exceeding what the most effusive guidebooks had promised. There are also towering mountains and interesting ethnic minorities in the south; Lake Baikal, the world's largest freshwater lake in Siberia; and the Golden Ring, a string of historic towns with medieval cathedrals and monasteries largely unchanged for centuries, within a day's drive of Moscow. Even Russian food far surpassed its dubious reputation as being leaden and greasy, thanks to some splendid new restaurants that have arrived in capitalism's wake.

DOJ_NMG_0039725

Russia is so rich culturally that there are constant surprises. My first afternoon in St. Petersburg, I walked into a Russian restaurant called the Literary Cafe and discovered a pianist and violinist entertaining diners with classical music of concert-hall quality. At a monastery near Moscow, I entered a chapel and found a service in progress, featuring not only the priest, but also three women singing religious chants against a background of magnificent icons lining the walls.

But the pleasures of sightseeing can quickly turn to shell shock when it comes to prices. In Moscow, steep land costs give developers no incentive to build modestly priced hotels. "In the last year, Moscow lost 6,000 hotel rooms," says Sergey Shpilko, head of the Russian Tourism Union, a trade association of tour agencies. This included the gargantuan Moskva and Rossiya hotels near the Kremlin. "And our hotel prices are already the highest in the world," he says.

When I called the Baltschug Kempinski, one of Moscow's main luxury hotels, to see if they had an available room, they urged me to postpone my trip a few days to take advantage of a "special promotional rate" -- $573 a night plus 18% tax, without breakfast. The Kempinski offered an $80 Sunday brunch that didn't include drinks, as well as a three-hour tour of Moscow by private car for $347, which won't get you far in Moscow's notorious traffic jams. The Metropol, another of the grandes dames, where I finally managed to get a room for a more reasonable $280, said I could have access to high-speed Internet in my room for a $140 installation fee plus $40 a day.

Russian tourism continues to suffer from some remnants of the Communist era when visitors took their marching orders and didn't complain. Although the days of snarling stewardesses and missing seat belts are gone, Aeroflot, the national airline, still lives up to its reputation as one of the worst in the world. On the flight from my home in Bangkok to Moscow on board its Ilyushin 96-300 widebody jet, I couldn't read because there were no overhead reading lamps, I couldn't watch a movie because there was no entertainment system, and I couldn't sleep because several drunk Russian men were shouting at the top of their lungs.

At the Moscow airport, signs saying "passport control" led to a dead end, while signs saying "transit" led to passport control. Once in the city, it's hard to navigate. Moscow's street and subway signs are only in the Cyrillic alphabet.

The daunting visa process is another reminder of Soviet police-state days. It takes about two weeks for a regular tourist visa to be processed. You're required to have an invitation from a "sponsor," which can be a tour agency in Russia that has never head of you, but has connections to the travel agency in the U.S. you use to obtain the visa. (It's well worth the extra $100 or so to avoid going through the paperwork and delays imposed by the Russian Embassy, which will still ask you to go to a U.S. tour agency to get a sponsor.) When you get your passport back, the sponsor is identified only by a long number on the visa certificate.

Mr. Sinitsyn, from the Federal Agency for Tourism, explains that the hassles in the visa process are "based on the principles of equality." The length of time it takes for visas to be processed for Russians entering the U.S., he says, is about equivalent to the time it takes for the American visa process for Russia. U.S. authorities confirm that it can take up to a month for Russian applications to be processed for travel to the U.S.

While in Russia, you're required to carry your passport with you at all times to show police if they demand to see it. I just missed being checked on Moscow's Arbat pedestrian street, a favorite hangout of tourists, when a policeman stopped the foreigner in front of me instead. Travel guides warn that police will sometimes extort money from you, as much as $150, even if your papers are in perfect order.

Mr. Sinitsyn acknowledges that extortion happens, "but not that often." In response, a spokesman for Russia's Interior Ministry says police stop people to check documents only when they think they might be involved in criminal activity. He says he isn't aware of any cases of foreigners filing complaints with the police about extortion or bribes involving document checks.

It's no surprise that with obstacles like this most American tourists choose to visit Russia on group tours, whose flag-waving leaders deal with all the problems. "Everyone kept telling me you can't do this on your own," says Karen Zorn, vice president of academic affairs for Boston's Berklee College of Music, who in fact was doing it on her own in St. Petersburg -- her first trip to Russia. "I don't like being in a group when I travel, being herded around."

But being solo has its drawbacks. Ms. Zorn says she had booked a hotel for $120 a night several months in advance, and when she arrived, she discovered what $120 buys in Russia's second city. "The lobby is half demolished and smells of fried food," says Ms. Zorn. "The door to my room wouldn't lock." When I met her, she was looking for a new hotel -- and finding that everything else was full.

DOJ_NMG_0039726

I also did it on my own, negotiating the Moscow subway system by painstakingly matching the Cyrillic letters against the bilingual metro map in my guidebook. With the help of a man who spoke English standing in line for tickets, I managed to take the 75-minute train ride from Moscow to the Golden Ring town of Sergiev Posad to see an impressive monastery.

But to get from Moscow to Suzdal -- an ancient Russian town in the Golden Ring filled with churches and monasteries of stunning beauty -- arranging a car and driver for the four-hour trip was the only alternative to two bus rides. Finding the right bus in Moscow and then changing buses in a small town without knowing a word of Russian was more than I wanted to risk. Here again the staggering Russian prices came into play; the Metropol's travel agency quoted me $1,000 for an overnight trip. But using a recommendation from an Australian acquaintance who lives in Moscow, I managed to get an English-speaking driver with a car for $300.

However, I had even less success than Ms. Zorn in attempting to find a low-priced accommodation. From my home in Bangkok, on the Internet I booked an apartment within walking distance of the Kremlin for $120 a night. The Moscow-based apartment booking agency, with toll-free numbers in the U.S. and England, photos of each apartment posted on their Web site, and mobile-phone numbers listed by everyone who contacts you, seemed impressive.

But after I followed their instructions and wired them a $100 deposit via Western Union, all communications stopped. Neither their mobile phones nor the main Moscow office number answered, and emails drew no response. In this country known for scams, I embarrassingly fell victim to one before I had even left home.

As soon as I landed in Russia, fears of scams were overshadowed by other sensations that were unexpected. Moscow and St. Petersburg are some of the cleanest cities I've ever visited; the streets and sidewalks are flushed and scrubbed daily, and there isn't a piece of litter anywhere. All the central buildings seemed either newly restored or undergoing restoration.

Oil and other riches aren't just confined to a handful of oligarchs. Hip restaurants and bars are jammed late into the night with the newly affluent middle class. It also spills out onto the streets. A supermarket on Tverskoy Boulevard, Moscow's premier shopping strip, looks like a room from a 19th-century palace, and the GUM department store on Red Square is in a historic, glass-ceilinged shopping arcade.

Then there were the people -- brusque on the surface, yes, but friendly and helpful underneath. And highly literate. One day I took an elderly pensioner I met at a St. Petersburg tourist site, who spoke fluent English, to lunch. Although he had to live on $35 a month, he displayed an encyclopedic knowledge of the world, at one point discussing the recent political changes in Bolivia.

There are several ways of making a trip to Russia easier without joining a tour group. If it's your first time, stick to tourist-friendly St. Petersburg, a city as rewarding as Paris, Rome and other major European capitals. If you don't speak Russian and want to get a driver, it's much safer to rely on private transport arranged by hotels. Consider hiring a guide but inquire at modest hotels or at Russian tour agencies that guidebooks recommend as reliable, because the rates that major hotels charge can be extortionate. About $100 a day is reasonable.

And the combination of a good guidebook, a Russian phrase book, and a map that lists everything in both the Cyrillic and Latin alphabets, will get you through almost any difficulty.

For future travelers, there are a few signs of progress. St. Petersburg now has subway and street signs in both the Cyrillic and Latin alphabets, and apartment-rental agencies there -- honest ones -- are offering some good bargains relative to hotels. Lisa Kreutz, an American property consultant for Pulford Real Estate in St. Petersburg, which rented me an attractive, centrally located apartment for $150 a night, reports another sign of change: The police are shaking down tourists much less than they did five years ago. "I grew up in New York, but I feel safer here," she says. "I walk home in the dark through a park."

Racism Haunts Russia Ahead Of G-8 Talks (BOS)

By Tom Parfitt

The Boston Globe, July 8, 2006

St. Petersburg killings a focus of concern

ST. PETERSBURG -- With its golden spires and stuccoed palaces stretching languorously along winding canals, this former imperial capital is a beacon of Russian sophistication envisioned by Czar Peter I as a ``Window on the West."

DOJ_NMG_0039727

But even as St. Petersburg displays a touch of panache that evades Moscow and other big cities, it is also an incubator for one of Russia's most pressing crises: violent racism.

President Vladimir Putin will welcome the leaders of the Group of Eight industrial nations to the Konstantinovsky Palace on the shores of the Gulf of Finland, as Russia hosts its first G-8 summit July 15 to 17. Putin hopes the summit will allow Russia to display its most elegant, modern face.

Yet while Putin will be proud to show off his hometown, there is a darker side to Russia here -- a problem compounded by government missteps and inaction -- that is hard to hide.

Local authorities claimed a victory in May when police arrested eight young men who allegedly carried out a string of racist killings and beatings over the last three years. They were captured after armed officers followed up on a tip from the city's Agency for Journalistic Investigations , which owns several private media outlets.

Using such monikers as Fighter and Apostle, the alleged gang members had kept a low profile and did not name their group, calling it only a ``terrorist attack organization." Police said their heroes were a mix of mythic Slavs, Nazis, and such individuals as Timothy McVeigh, the Oklahoma City bomber. Police believe the gang was a splinter formation of the city's notorious ultranationalist gang, Mad Crowd.

As news of the arrests spread, media loyal to the local government were quick to say that the city's slew of racially motivated killings had been stopped.

According to human rights monitors, six people were slain in the city between September and April, either because of the color of their skin or because they campaigned against extremists. Those cases are part of a wave of racist beatings and slayings sweeping across Russia, mostly attributed to gangs of skinheads.

Police suspect, based on interrogations and the discovery of explosives, that besides xenophobic attacks, the ``terrorist attack organization" -- which blamed the federal government for allowing dark-skinned immigrants into the country -- planned to launch suicide bombings during the G-8 summit using belts of explosives like those employed by Chechen militants.

The group's alleged leader, Dmitry Borovikov, was shot dead during his arrest when he lunged at police with a knife, but seven other accused gang members are in custody and charges are soon expected.

The arrests were a coup for the veteran, well-connected reporters at the Agency for Journalistic Investigations , who had groomed an informer among the young suspects. ``There was the option to publish first, but we realized this was such serious stuff we had to take it straight to the law enforcement agencies," said director Andrei Konstantinov, a chain-smoking veteran reporter who keeps a World War I heavy machine gun next to his desk.

Statements by the alleged gang members appear to connect the group to several high-profile killings, including the 2004 knifing death of Khursheda Sultonova, a 9 -year-old Tajik girl, and the April slaying of Lamzar Samba, 28, a Senegalese student who was shot by a gunman using a rifle emblazoned with a swastika.

The journalists' agency -- said to be close to police and the St. Petersburg city authorities -- supported the government's stance , boasting in its magazine that ``exactly [the gang's] arrest shows there is no mass racist movement in out city."

Yet assertions by the agency and others that racism has been extinguished with the arrests are viewed by some as premature.

``No doubt there are some real villains among them, but finding this gang was responsible for every racist crime of the last few years is remarkably convenient just before the G-8 summit," said Nikolai Donskov, head of the St. Petersburg office of Novaya Gazeta, a liberal weekly.

Ali Nassor, a native of Tanzania and a cofounder of the St. Petersburg advocacy group African Union, agreed.

``It's just too much of a happy ending," he said. ``When you look at the kind of stuff that gets printed here every day, at the kind of extremists whom the law never touches, then you realize what a fantasy it is that racism is solved in this city."

This year, Amnesty International accused Russian police of consistently downplaying hate crimes throughout the country by classifying them as hooliganism.

Several racist groups continue to operate with impunity in St. Petersburg, the group says. The city has a branch of the ultraright Slavyansky Soyuz organization, which promotes Adolph Hitler's Mein Kampf on its website. Another group is the Party of Freedom, run by former police officer Yuri Belyaev.

DOJ_NMG_0039728

``The first thing these immigrants ought to think when they are leaving home in the morning is: Will I die today or not?" Belyaev said. ``They should move around like scared animals -- creeping along besides the walls."

Asked whether he was a racist, Belyaev said: ``Yes. This is a question of taste. Some people don't like apples. I don't like Negroes. They are biological parasites."

Nassor says that such bigotry proves that racism has not been defeated. ``What I'd like to see is some real leadership from President Putin," he said. ``Right now, it's too easy to conclude that he's keeping quiet for political gain. He knows there's a big nationalist contingent that votes for him."

Western countries are pushing to include Russia's alleged backsliding on democracy and meddling in the former republics of the Soviet Union on the summit agenda, but Putin's aides have succeeded in keeping those topics off the agenda.

While human rights activists hope that other G-8 countries will use the summit to pressure Moscow to tackle the country's social ills, some people here say that they are proud Putin pushes back at his foreign critics.

``What I like about Putin as a leader is his attitude toward the West," says Valentina Morozova, 56, an accountant in St. Petersburg. ``They're always complaining and lording it over us, but he tells them where to get off."

Donskov, the newspaper editor, thinks the United States and Western Europe will have little leverage with Putin when it comes to addressing Russia's social ills. ``With all its oil and gas, Russia knows it can dictate terms these days. It's going to do just as it wants, regardless of the critics."

'Strategic' Accord Planned For Nazarbayev's US Visit (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

The United States and Kazakhstan hope to sign a wide-ranging "strategic partnership" accord when President Nursultan Nazarbayev travels to Washington in September, Kazakh Foreign Minister Kasymzhomart Tokayev said in an interview yesterday.

The agreement is the latest sign of the Bush administration's desire for closer ties with the huge, oil-rich Central Asian nation, despite lingering concerns over Mr. Nazarbayev's record on press freedoms and political liberties.

"Our two countries share a common interest in sustaining stability and security across Central Asia," said Mr. Tokayev. "We are very much grateful for what the United States has done in Afghanistan, and I believe the U.S. side appreciates the political and strategic role we can play as well."

Mr. Nazarbayev, who has ruled Kazakhstan since independence from the Soviet Union in 1991, will be making his first trip to Washington in five years. Mr. Tokayev said his meetings this week with senior U.S. officials were devoted to setting the agenda for the September trip.

Vice President Dick Cheney lavishly praised Kazakhstan's economic and political progress during a visit in May.

Partly by default, Kazakhstan has emerged as the critical U.S. ally in the region. Uzbekistan, which also aided the U.S.-led war in Afghanistan, has closed a U.S. base and turned to Russia and China after U.S. criticisms of a violent political crackdown last year.

Kyrgyzstan has also moved closer to Moscow and is demanding a sharp increase in rents if the Pentagon wants to keep the key Manas Air Field for U.S. forces.

In a very uncertain region, "we are considered a very predictable partner," said Mr. Tokayev, who added that bilateral ties are as strong today as at any time since independence.

But the closer ties are still complicated by aspects of Mr. Nazarbayev's rule, at a time when President Bush has put promoting democracy at the heart of his foreign policy agenda.

Mr. Nazarbayev won another seven-year term as president in December in an election that Western monitors said was flawed, and just this month he consolidated his power by merging his party with one controlled by his eldest daughter.

Western press groups slammed a new law signed by Mr. Nazarbayev that they say greatly increases the state's control of news outlets. The country's information minister has also been quoted as saying the government plans to rein in Internet critics as well.

DOJ_NMG_0039729

Mr. Tokayev in the interview defended the new press law, saying there was "real legal disorder in the media sector." He said the law could be amended if it proved to have a chilling effect on critics.

He said U.S. officials have not pressured his country to reduce ties with its neighbors. He also dismissed reports in the Kyrgyz press that Kazakhstan might agree to host a U.S. military base if the Manas talks break down.

"That would not be feasible technically," he said.

Mr. Tokayev acknowledged that Kazakhstan is seeking a larger role on the international stage to match its growing energy clout and steady economic progress.

Kazakhstan is making a strong push to become the first former Soviet nation to chair the 56-nation Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in 2009 or 2010.

Mr. Tokayev said his country's bid is gaining support and will be discussed during Mr. Nazarbayev's visit.

"Considering our economic development and political reforms, Kazakhstan has every reason to claim its right to serve as head of the OSCE," he said.

But U.S. Ambassador to Kazakhstan John Ordway told reporters in Almaty that the international criticism of the new press law could hurt Kazakhstan's chances.

Ukraine's Coalition Unravels In A New Setback (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

MOSCOW, July 7 — President Viktor A. Yushchenko of Ukraine, a Western-leaning reformist who led a wave of popular protests to office, only to stumble badly when tested in parliamentary elections, suffered a new political defeat on Friday when his fragile coalition collapsed in acrimony two weeks after it was formed.

His opponents, joined by a former ally of the president, announced a new coalition and pledged to nominate as prime minister the man Mr. Yushchenko ultimately defeated after those protests overturned a rigged presidential election in 2004.

Friday's events, three and a half months after his party's humiliating showing in parliamentary voting in March, cast new doubts on Mr. Yushchenko's presidency, undermining his efforts to steer Ukraine on a course more closely entwined with Europe. He faces the possibility of an opposition government and prime minister opposed to his policy of joining the European Union, NATO and the World Trade Organization.

"This is certainly going to be a blow to the president's priority objectives," said Roman M. Zvarich, one of Mr. Yushchenko's supporters, who previously served as justice minister.

Viktor F. Yanukovich, Mr. Yushchenko's presidential rival and leader of the Party of Regions, seized on the disarray among the pro-presidential parties. Only two weeks ago, the parties negotiated a fragile compromise to create a government that would, largely, support Mr. Yushchenko's policies. Mr. Yanukovich, who has pledged closer economic, political and social ties with Russia, announced what he called an "anti-crisis coalition" uniting the Communists and the Socialist Party, which until this week had allied itself with what became known in 2004 as the Orange Revolution.

The crisis only seemed to worsen, though. Mr. Yushchenko, whose indecisiveness showed in weeks of tumultuous negotiations over forming a coalition after March's election, raised the specter of disbanding Parliament even before it effectively convened. By law, he could call new elections if Parliament cannot form a government within 60 days of the dismissal of the old one, a deadline now set for July 25. In a statement, Mr. Yushchenko said he did not want "the country to walk in some wrong direction for five years."

"No matter what coalition we speak about," he said in a statement published on his official Web site, "I would ask all the parties not to make hasty decisions." Mr. Yanukovich's party made haste nonetheless, nominating him as prime minister, a position that under constitutional changes approved in 2004 has enhanced powers over economic and domestic policy. The Party of Regions won the largest bloc of seats in the election, 186, but fell short of a majority in the 450-seat parliament.

With the Communists and Socialists, the party now claims to have 240 votes, enough to form a majority and elect Mr. Yanukovich prime minister, a post he held under the previous president, Leonid D. Kuchma.

DOJ_NMG_0039730

Mr. Yushchenko's coalition collapsed after two weeks of jockeying. For several days after the formation of a pro-presidential coalition, Mr. Yanukovich's supporters blocked Parliament from meeting by, literally, blocking the rostrum. They relented Thursday after reaching an agreement to hold an open vote for parliamentary speaker, a potentially influential position among parties allied with Mr. Yushchenko.

Mr. Yushchenko's party, Our Ukraine, nominated Petro O. Poroshenko, a chocolate manufacturer and television magnate who served as national security adviser until he resigned last September in the face of accusations of corruption. He was nominated as part of a deal that would have returned Yulia V. Tymoshenko, Mr. Yushchenko's partner-turned-rival, to the position of prime minister. Mr. Poroshenko's candidacy was seen by Our Ukraine as a way of balancing the power of Ms. Tymoshenko, who served as prime minister for eight months last year before the president dismissed her.

But facing opposition not only from the Party of Regions but also from some of Mr. Yushchenko's supporters, Mr. Poroshenko withdrew his candidacy on Thursday.

The Socialists joined with the opposition to elect their party leader, Oleksandr O. Moroz, who once vowed never to ally himself with Mr. Yanukovich. Mr. Moroz, a pragmatist who previously served as speaker, had strongly supported Mr. Yushchenko in the Orange Revolution. Mr. Moroz's defection provoked outrage. Mr. Zvarich accused him of political opportunism for personal ambitions. "Betrayal comes to mind," he said in a telephone interview.

In remarks earlier on Friday, cited by news agencies, Mr. Moroz said it was too early to discuss a coalition. He said all the parties' programs were "practically the same," suggesting he favored a broad coalition. He did not comment publicly on the announcement that his party had joined Mr. Yanukovich's.

Several members of the Socialist Party were reported to have broken with Mr. Moroz in protest. His press secretary said he was not available to comment Friday night. Mr. Zvarich said the president's supporters would challenge the formation of an opposition coalition in court, citing violations of parliamentary rules.

Mychailo Wynnyckyj, a professor of sociology at the University of Kiev-Mohyla Academy, said Ukraine faced a political division like France's, where a centrist president shared power with a leftist Parliament. But the situation was more volatile, he said. "In France, they call it cohabitation," he said in a telephone interview. And in Ukraine? "Chaos."

Defeated Candidate Reemerges In Ukraine (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

MOSCOW, July 7 -- Ukraine's new coalition government of pro-Western democratic parties was predicted to be fragile. It proved so weak that it collapsed on Friday before it even got started.

And out of the rubble emerged the man who was cast as the villain in Ukraine's democratic triumph known as the Orange Revolution. In a remarkable turnaround, Viktor Yanukovich, the losing, pro-Moscow candidate in the disputed presidential elections that led to massive street protests in 2004, appears set to become prime minister.

This week was supposed to bring the formal reconstruction of the unstable alliance that led the Orange Revolution, so-named for the color worn by the protesters. Instead, the bloc dissolved into familiar back-stabbing after its smallest member, the Socialists, broke ranks to get its own man elected to a parliamentary post.

The Socialists then signed onto what they called a new "anti-crisis" coalition with the Communists and Yanukovich's Party of Regions. The agreement was signed Friday evening in front of journalists in Kiev, the Ukrainian capital.

The recent political turmoil and indecision in Ukraine have frustrated the European Union and the United States. They had hoped to see the country well along in restructuring necessary to open it to Western institutions and greater foreign investment.

The White House had considered a plan for President Bush to travel to Ukraine to hail it as a new outpost of openness and free enterprise, but it put off the idea because of continuing uncertainty after the election. Instead he went to Hungary last month.

With Yanukovich as prime minister, Bush can write off such a trip. The pro-Moscow politician opposes or questions many of the goals of President Viktor Yushchenko, notably membership in the NATO alliance and the European Union. Yanukovich is interested in what is called the "single economic space," a concept promoted by the Kremlin to bind Russia, Ukraine, Kazakhstan and Belarus together.

DOJ_NMG_0039731

Because of constitutional changes that came into force after Yushchenko assumed the presidency, the post of prime minister is more powerful than it has been. The holder of the office is no longer appointed by the president, but is independently elected by parliament. The president retains the right to propose candidates for three key ministries, including foreign affairs, but his ability to constrain the prime minister is much reduced.

The Orange coalition fell apart for the first time last September. Yushchenko dismissed his prime minister, Yulia Tymoshenko, the charismatic crowd-pleaser who galvanized the popular revolt that swept Yushchenko into office. He said corruption was rampant under her stewardship; she accused some of the president's key advisers of corruption.

Elections followed in March. Yanukovich's Party of Regions emerged as the largest single party, but no single party won an overall majority.

The three that had led the Orange Revolution -- Yushchenko's Our Ukraine, Tymoshenko's bloc and the Socialists, led by Oleksander Moroz -- together had enough seats to form a government, but weeks passed with no agreement on how to overcome the bad feelings between them and form a government.

In June, the three parties finally agreed to a new coalition. Tymoshenko would be prime minister, and Petro Poroshenko, a controversial tycoon and member of Yushchenko's party, would be speaker of parliament. The two are fierce rivals.

But on Thursday, Moroz, the Socialist leader, appeared to have had sudden second thoughts about the deal.

"I've got evidence to show, which I am not going to do now, that the election of such charismatic people" as Poroshenko and Tymoshenko to the country's highest offices will inevitably create an explosive mixture," he said. "It would spell the end of the coalition in the course of several months with all the consequences to follow."

The Socialists then nominated Moroz as speaker. Yanukovich's Party of Regions, joined by the Communists, saw an opening and backed him. He was elected on Thursday evening.

His former partners were left to fume. "We consider that the coalition never took place," Tymoshenko said. "Thus, the coalition did not unravel; it never existed in the first place."

"Moroz is a professional betrayer and a greedy, cynical and a mercenary man," David Zhvania, a member of Our Ukraine, told reporters.

Moroz quickly adjourned parliament until Tuesday, when a new coalition led by Yanukovich might be put to a vote.

Official Hits Stalled WTO Talks (WT)

By Jeffrey Sparshott

The Washington Times, July 8, 2006

The Bush administration's top trade official yesterday said the U.S. would not give up on global trade talks that have deadlocked, and she chastised India, Brazil and other rising economic powers for contributing too little to negotiations.

World Trade Organization talks last week in Geneva broke up with no agreement on a deal that would promote commerce and boost the economies of the body's 149 members. It was the latest in a series of breakdowns as the U.S., Europe and developing nations have been unable to agree on a formula to cut rich country farm subsidies while opening all but the poorest markets to greater competition.

"The U.S. has no intention of giving up, but we also expect others to step up to the plate," said U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab.

The European Union and a number of developing countries have repeatedly complained that the United States is offering too little and demanding too much from its trading partners.

Differences between the United States and the European Union, in particular, have been the focal point of the negotiations. The 25-nation bloc has demanded that the U.S. make deeper cuts in agriculture subsidies that are expected to reach almost $22 billion this year. The U.S. has criticized European subsidies, which are even more lavish, and trade barriers that protect its farmers.

Mrs. Schwab yesterday faulted Europe for proposals she called "vague" and "full of loopholes." But she also called on India, Brazil and China to acknowledge their growing economic clout, rather than seeking some of the same protection as the world's poorest nations.

DOJ_NMG_0039732

"There are some developing countries ... arguably emerging or existing powerhouses, that would like to hide behind the least developed and poorest among us," said Mrs. Schwab. "The Brazils, the Chinas and the Indias of this world can and should be expected to participate in this negotiation including opening their markets to other developing countries."

Mrs. Schwab and trade officials from other nations are, in part, looking to avoid blame if the talks collapse completely, said Dan Ikenson, associate director of the Center for Trade Policy Studies at the Cato Institute, a Washington think tank.

"I think we're now in the public relations game," Mr. Ikenson said.

There is limited hope to save the talks. WTO chief Pascal Lamy is traveling to capitals trying to encourage a breakthrough, and leaders from the Group of Eight industrialized nations meet next week in St. Petersburg to discuss an array of issues, including trade.

"There is a session where the G-8 leaders will probably be talking about trade, and there is an outreach session where we will have some other leaders including [Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva], [Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh] and others," Mrs. Schwab said.

Israel 'might Free Palestinians' In Return For Soldier (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, July 8, 2006

The Israeli government, under increasing criticism for its Gaza offensive, indicated for the first time on Friday that it might be willing to free Palestinian prisoners in exchange for the release of a captured soldier.

Public security minister Avi Dichter said jailed Palestinians could be freed as a "reciprocal gesture" after the 19-year-old corporal Gilad Shalit was returned.

The European Union levelled its harshest criticism at Israel yet. "The EU condemns the loss of lives caused by disproportionate use of force by the Israeli Defence Forces and the humanitarian crisis it has aggravated," Finnish prime minister Matti Vanhanen, whose country holds the EU's rotating presidency, said in a statement.

Kofi Annan, UN secretary-general, said: "I call again for an immediate halt to the disproportionate use of force by Israel, which has already killed and wounded many civilians; for the release of Israeli army corporal Gilad Shalit; and for the cessation of rocket fire into Israel."

More than 20 people died on Thursday when Israeli forces moved into the north of the strip to prevent the firing of rockets and to exert more pressure over the captured soldier.

At least another six Palestinians died in the fighting on Friday, while the firing of rockets continued. Mr Dichter said the freeing of Palestinian prisoners was necessary to obtain the soldier's release. "Israel knows how to do this. Israel has done this more than once in the past."

Earlier, sources in the Hamas movement, whose members took part in the attack in which the corporal was seized, said the soldier could be released in exchange for all female Palestinian prisoners and some 20 men serving long sentences.

Israeli Forces Broaden Gaza Incursion (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, July 8, 2006

Israel sent troops and tanks into eastern Gaza on Saturday and clashed with militants in a broadened incursion aimed at forcing the release of a captured soldier.

The Israeli force entered Gaza early Saturday near the Karni commercial crossing, advancing into Gaza just a quarter mile from the Shajaiyeh and Zeitun neighborhoods. Hospital officials said an armed Palestinian was critically wounded in the fighting. The army had no immediate comment.

The air force fired missiles at a group of militants gathered at the outskirts of Shajaiyeh, injuring at least two people, Palestinian security and hospital officials said. Other troops used tanks to block a main road that used to lead to the Jewish settlement of Netzarim, witnesses and security officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0039733

Israel launched its offensive almost two weeks ago, after Palestinian militants carried out a brazen cross-border attack on a military outpost, capturing a 19-year-old Israeli soldier. The military campaign is meant to get Cpl. Gilad Shalit released, and carve out a temporary buffer zone to halt Palestinian rocket fire.

Israeli troops killed 32 Palestinians in two days of airstrikes and artillery barrages, Palestinian officials said.

Israel sent conflicting signals Friday on whether it would be willing to swap Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Shalit's release. Public Security Minister Avi Dichter suggested Israel could be ready to cut a deal that would include Israel freeing some Palestinian prisoners as a goodwill gesture.

If there is calm, "Israel will need to, after some time, release prisoners as a reciprocal gesture," Dichter said. "Israel knows how to do this. Israel has done this more than once in the past."

He was referring to previous prisoner swaps — usually in deals that free far more Palestinians than Israelis. Privately, Israeli officials have said they did not rule out talks in Shalit's case, either.

Moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said he has won Israeli assurances that it would reciprocate for Shalit's release by freeing some prisoners, as well as Hamas politicians it has rounded up in recent days.

Officials close to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert later said Dichter's statement did not reflect the views of the government and that Israel insists on the soldier's unconditional release. However, the government did not issue a formal statement distancing itself from the minister.

Israel does not want to be seen as cutting a deal with Hamas militants, but also does not seem to have a way to free the soldier by force.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan urged the Security Council on Friday to take a stand on Israel's violent standoff with Hamas. Qatar has circulated a draft resolution demanding that Israel end its offensive and release Palestinian officials detained during the operation.

Annan appealed to Israel and the Palestinians to "pull back from the brink for the sake of all civilians in the region."

He called on Israel to halt what he said was the disproportionate use of force, demanded Shalit's release, and reminded both sides of their humanitarian obligation to spare civilians from violence.

Hamas said Friday that Shalit, seized June 25, is alive and being treated well. It also urged Israel to negotiate. The Islamic militant group initially demanded the release of hundreds of prisoners, but then scaled back its demands, seeking freedom for some 150 female inmates and several dozen men serving long sentences.

The internal Israeli debate came as ground troops backed by tanks pursued militants in the streets of crowded Gaza towns, and aircraft struck northern Gaza.

Shalit is believed to be held in southern Gaza, and days after he was seized, Israel launched its biggest military campaign in the coastal strip since ending its 38-year occupation there nine months ago.

The incursion began in southern Gaza, then expanded Thursday to the north as troops seized control of a ribbon of land. On Friday, Israeli aircraft struck Palestinian gunmen in northern Gaza.

Palestinian health officials said a total of 32 Palestinians were killed over two days, including 24 on Thursday, in the bloodiest day of clashes since the renewed fighting began last week. An 11-year-old boy shot in the chest during fighting on Wednesday died of his wounds late Friday, Palestinian hospital officials said.

Egyptian mediators have proposed a two-stage deal in which Hamas would free Shalit and halt rocket attacks. In exchange, Israel would halt its offensive and promise to free some Palestinian prisoners in the future.

A Palestinian official close to the negotiations said Israel has agreed to the Egyptian formula, but wants the deal to be confidential, to avoid the impression of a direct prisoner exchange. Hamas wants the terms of the deal to be announced publicly, he said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the talks are confidential.

Israeli Cabinet minister Roni Bar-On, who is close to Olmert, said Israel would not negotiate with Hamas over the release of prisoners. However, his comment did not appear to contradict Dichter who also did not call for direct contact with the militants.

The fighting has compounded the misery that has deepened in Gaza and the West Bank since Hamas took power in March. International sanctions imposed to pressure the group to recognize Israel have rendered it unable to pay government salaries, but on Friday, Palestinian officials said about one-fifth of the 165,000 civil servants would receive a small down payment.

DOJ_NMG_0039734

Government employees sustain about one-third of the Palestinians. Small down payments have been paid twice before.

Palestinians Dig In As Israel Advances (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

BEIT LAHIYA, Gaza Strip, July 7 -- Israeli tanks and bulldozers edged deeper into a crowded residential neighborhood here Friday amid stiffening resistance from Palestinian gunmen, at least three of whom were killed by an Israeli missile that hissed over a hilltop mosque here and into their ranks.

The small Israeli armored force carved more space between the fields in this western Gaza city used by Palestinian gunmen to launch rockets and the southern Israeli towns that are their target. But it did so slowly against gunmen outwardly undaunted by the beating they took a day earlier when at least 21 Palestinians were killed, many from the armed wing of the governing Hamas movement. The battle over a hilltop here ebbed and flowed for hours Friday, as Hamas forces were joined in large numbers by gunmen from the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the armed wing of the Fatah movement, which suffered the bulk of the day's casualties.

"I felt like I was flying away," said Maher Abu Majed, 29, an al-Aqsa gunman recovering at Gaza's Shifa Hospital from shrapnel wounds from the midafternoon missile strike. "I passed out, and when I came to, I looked around me for my friends and all I saw were parts."

Israeli fire killed at least seven Palestinian gunmen, according to witnesses and hospital workers. Palestinians also fired at least seven rockets from northern Gaza into Israel, Israeli military officials said. Some of those rockets hit a market, an empty school campus and a factory in the city of Sderot, where three Israelis were treated for shrapnel injuries.

Israeli officials acknowledged Friday that ground operations in Gaza -- Israel's first in nearly a year since evacuating the area -- could last for some time. One Israeli soldier has been killed so far. Palestinian hospital officials say more than 35 Palestinians, most of them gunmen, have been killed.

The operation was staged to force the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, an army conscript captured by Palestinian gunmen during a June 25 raid on an army post just outside of Gaza, and reduce the rocket fire into southern Israel. Israeli military officials have also said the military pressure is designed to weaken Hamas's hold on the Palestinian government.

"This is not an overnight operation," said Capt. Noa Meir, an Israeli military spokeswoman. "It is not our intention to stay, but it is our intention to stay as long as we need to. It's going to take patience."

Hamas's military wing, one of the three armed groups holding Shalit, issued a statement Friday stressing that "negotiations are the only way out of this case and the sole way to preserve the life of the soldier and secure his safe return to his family." The statement noted that Shalit was safe and would remain so "as long as it is in the interest of Muslims."

Although Egyptian efforts to broker an exchange of Palestinian prisoners for Shalit's release have so far failed, Avi Dichter, Israel's public security minister, indicated for the first time Friday that if Shalit were freed and the rocket fire stopped, "Israel will need to, after some time, release prisoners as a reciprocal gesture." Dichter made his comments at a trade-association conference in Tel Aviv a day after Shalit's father endorsed a prisoner exchange to resolve the crisis.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, meanwhile, said at a news conference here that "I have called for Shalit's release from the start, but it must be remembered that we have 10,000 prisoners in Israeli jails, and they must return to their families as well."

Although the Hamas interior minister called Thursday for Palestinians to fight the Israeli forces, the more than 70,000 members of the Palestinian security services did not appear to heed it.

"If they get into this, it will mean the total destruction of the Palestinian Authority," said Abu Mohammed, 30, an al-Aqsa gunman. "All due respect to the minister, but I think he just wants to get them killed."

A line of Israeli tanks and bulldozers, working to clear fields used by rocket launchers, stood a quarter-mile away from a two-story house that appeared to be serving as a headquarters for dozens of gunmen. The sandy roadsides were laced with wires leading from buried mines to detonators behind concrete walls.

DOJ_NMG_0039735

Just after 3:30 p.m., a fleeting sizzle trailed over the mosque, followed seconds later by a powerful blast nearby. Ambulances rushed toward the blazing tires and returned carrying the dismembered remains of three al-Aqsa gunmen, the victims of the missile fired by a drone.

In the following minutes, Israeli tanks pushed down the coast road toward the mosque as heavy gunfire scattered hundreds of Palestinians from the hilltop into surrounding neighborhoods. Sniper fire rang out from buildings, filling the air with the zip of ricochets.

Sabreen Shilnar, a 27-year-old policewoman, hustled from the combat zone to get food for her mother and five sisters. Supplies in their home, only a dozen yards from an Israeli tank, were running low, but the women intended to stay.

"I'm not sleeping, and we're terrified," Shilnar said. "But my mother is old. If she dies, she will die in her home."

A Day Of Funerals Across The Northern Gaza Strip (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

BEIT LAHIYA, Gaza Strip, July 7 — It was a day of funerals across northern Gaza on Friday, with relatives and militants mourning those killed in Thursday's fierce fighting with Israeli troops, even as another five Palestinians were killed in more sporadic clashes.

Israeli troops mostly held their ground, securing positions in northern Gaza taken on Thursday. Palestinian militants, mostly armed with Kalashnikov rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, patrolled street corners or laid explosive charges.

In Israel, Avi Dichter, a government minister in charge of internal security, seemed to offer a way out of the current violent impasse.

He said the government did not rule out the possibility of releasing prisoners as a gesture in return for the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the Israeli soldier captured on June 25, and the re-establishment of a credible cease-fire, according to Israel radio.

"At the end of the day the release of the soldier, Gilad Shalit, will be a must," Mr. Dichter said at a news conference in Tel Aviv. "If Israel will be obliged to in the framework of this agreement, within the calm that will be imposed on the ground by the Palestinian Authority, to release Palestinian prisoners as a gesture to this calm, Israel knows how to do that. In fact, Israel has done it before in the past."

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has consistently ruled out a prisoner trade for Corporal Shalit, and Israel is eager to deter future kidnappings by showing that it will not bargain with the militants.

In the Atatrah neighborhood of Beit Lahiya in northern Gaza on Friday morning, an electric transformer and a house with its windows blown in were still smoking from an airstrike early in the morning that killed two militants.

A little later, Israeli troops raided the area and arrested two sons from the Attar family. In a nearby building, an Israeli sniper could be seen peering through a hole made in an exterior wall. Overhead was the steady buzzing of an Israeli drone, equipped with missiles.

Close by, a heavy machine gun chuttered, followed by the lighter, coughing sounds of a Kalashnikov. A neighbor, taking cover behind a wall of the house, said Ibrahim al-Attar, an elderly man in a white robe, had often driven militants away from the area, telling them not to shoot Qassam rockets from here. "Now I don't know," the neighbor said.

Another Palestinian died near here from tank fire, and another from a bullet wound. In the West Bank, a Palestinian militant was shot dead in clashes with Israeli forces in Nablus. On Thursday two Palestinians, both 16, died from Israeli fire during a contested arrest raid in Jenin.

The death toll is difficult to pin down, with news agencies' tallies differing. Dr. Jumaa al-Saqqa, a surgeon and spokesman for Al Shifa Hospital, Gaza's largest, said 26 Palestinians died in Gaza on Thursday and more than 80 were wounded. Two of the dead were children, Dr. Saqqa said. He estimated that 20 percent of the wounded were young men under the age of 17.

One Israeli soldier, Sgt. Yehuda Basel, 21, died Thursday from a head wound and was buried Friday. Israeli Army officials said Friday that they were investigating whether he had been killed by Israeli fire rather than a Palestinian sniper.

The Shifa hospital, which is running on a generator 18 hours a day, now has a three-week supply of emergency room and surgical drugs, Dr. Saqqa said. But he added: "Depending what happens, of course. It could be used up in a week."

DOJ_NMG_0039736

In Jabaliya refugee camp, near Beit Lahiya, mourners gathered for the funeral of Shadi al-Sakani, 24, a swimming coach and member of the military wing of Hamas since the age of 18. He died in Atatrah on Thursday from the impact of an Israeli missile fired from a helicopter.

"He said, 'I'm leaving to fight, and I may not come back,' " said his uncle, Zaki al-Sakani, 55, speaking at a makeshift condolence tent near the mosque.

Shadi al-Sakani was married to Widad, who is pregnant with their third child. Mara, 3, is their daughter; Abdul Rahman, 2, their son. His older brother also fought for Hamas, but was wounded in the head a few years ago.

Zaki al-Sakani, the uncle, said he was old enough to remember all of the wars with Israel from the Suez campaign of 1956 on. He said he had rejoiced when Israel withdrew its settlers and troops from Gaza a year ago. "We thought they'd left, but now we believe they never left," he said. "Now I feel the death machine is back, and many people are dying in this effort at resistance."

There is a sudden, pressured unity of Palestinian factions, whose militants have been fighting one another for months in Gaza since Hamas took over the Palestinian Authority after winning at the polls. Even the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, and prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, have been thrown together in their inability to resolve the case of Corporal Shalit, which seems to be in the hands of Hamas leaders in exile. But few here expect this unity to last much beyond this current crisis.

In a statement, Mr. Abbas said the Israeli incursion had unleashed "new crimes against humanity." Mr. Abbas, who has vainly urged militants to stop firing rockets at Israel or committing suicide bombings there, asked the international community and the United Nations Security Council to put pressure on Israel to end "this destructive policy immediately."

In a news conference on Friday night in Gaza, Mr. Abbas accused Israel "not only of trying to collapse the Hamas government but bring down the Palestinian Authority wholesale" by destroying schools, a power plant, bridges, roads and government buildings.

But at the same time, Mr. Abbas said he still hoped that Egyptian-led negotiations would lead to a package deal involving the release of Corporal Shalit and an Israeli withdrawal and release of some Palestinian prisoners, including women, youngsters and the sick. He called the Palestinians "prisoners of war" and said that "they are human beings with families, just like the Israeli prisoner is a human being."

Mr. Abbas also termed "invalid" an order by the Palestinian interior minister, Said Sayyam of Hamas, calling on all Palestinian security forces to fight the Israelis in Gaza.

Israel has taken over a wedge of northern Gaza to try to prevent the launching of Qassam missiles into its cities, and it has set up positions in southern Gaza to try to press for Corporal Shalit's release or rescue.

In a statement issued Friday, Hamas said that the corporal was being "well treated in a humane manner" but that the Israeli military operation "is complicating" any solution to the crisis.

Despite the Gaza operation, 14 Qassams were launched on Friday and 13 fell in Israeli territory, the Israeli Army said. Three landed in the center of Sderot, including one in a schoolyard; three people were lightly wounded from shrapnel when a Qassam landed on a factory. Other Qassams landed in open ground.

Slow, Painful Change (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, July 8, 2006

July 7, 2006 - We arrived at the prime minister's office an hour after the Hamas groups holding a captured Israeli soldier issued an ultimatum demanding the release of Arab prisoners in exchange for his freedom. In meetings with Israeli officials, we tried to decipher whether the ongoing crisis is the first phase of the next war, or just another roadblock on the ever elusive path to peace.

Brinkmanship is a way of life in the Middle East. Israel ignored the deadline and the standoff continued through the week as Hamas fired more rockets into Israeli towns and Israeli troops pushed deeper into Gaza—territory they only recently withdrew from, and that is now under the control of the new Hamas government. The military action would soon claim the lives of one Israeli soldier and some 23 Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0039737

When I told friends I was visiting Israel, they expressed concern for my safety. One friend sent me a St. Christopher's medal. "It's a Catholic thing," she said. Yet for all the tension over what Hamas might be planning or what the Israeli military might do next, the fullness of life overwhelms any sense of danger once you're in Israel. I never felt as a visitor that safety was an issue and I was surprised to learn from a disappointed government official that Kim Cattrall, the saucy actress from "Sex and the City," had cancelled her trip to Israel because of the dicey news out of Gaza. The shops and cafes are full of people, as are the beaches of Tel Aviv.

Political leaders talk about "realignment," a word that tested better in focus groups for American consumption than disengagement or consolidation. But the rise of Hamas in Gaza and the continuous rocket shelling has made the return of the occupied West Bank problematic, at least for now. As one Israeli journalist told us, this conflict is not about lines on a map; it's about intimacy. "Everyone is in everyone's face here," said one official. The analogies made for Americans are these: Israel is the size of New Jersey, Gaza is the size of Delaware, and the West Bank is a third of Rhode Island. This is about legitimacy and safety, and until both sides achieve some modicum of well being, or deterrence, there will be no peace. "The name of the game is perseverance," a Palestinian journalist told us. "What's the rush?"

The last time I visited Israel was as a member of the press corps following President Jimmy Carter as he negotiated the peace treaty between Israel and Egypt, which endures today. It was a time of great hope, most of which has gone unrealized. I was anxious to see for myself the changes in Israeli society so I welcomed an invitation from the American Israeli Education Foundation (AIEF) to accompany a group of journalists to Israel for a week of high-level briefings on everything from the security situation to the absorption of Ethiopian Jews from Africa. Israel is a wonderfully open and argumentative society. People speak freely in and out of government. Granted, we got a one-sided view in terms of the Palestinian situation, but one side in Israel has as many angles as an octagon.

I came away with some of my assumptions challenged, chief among them my ideas about the fence (or the wall or the security barrier, depending on your perspective). I expected to be horrified. I grew up loathing the Berlin Wall and all it stood for, and I'm no fan of the rapidly expanding fence along the U.S.-Mexican border. The Palestinians regard the Israeli fence as a form of apartheid. "It's turning us into big prisons," says PLO negotiator Dr. Saeb Erakat, who we met for coffee.

Maybe I've been desensitized to security because it's omnipresent. Washington has ugly barriers everywhere around official buildings. The Israeli barrier is a sensory fence with barbed wire on either side. If you cut through it, an alarm goes off in an Israeli control room. In populated areas, it's a wall that looks like the sound barriers on the Beltway around Washington. It's an eyesore in Jerusalem. But it works. Since it was built along the Gaza strip, no suicide bomber has gotten through.

The portion of the fence under construction along the West Bank will be complete in March 2007. Erakat says the fence "zigzags like a snake" to benefit Israel, and, to his point, the Israeli Supreme Court has ordered that parts of the fence already built be dismantled and re-routed to accommodate claims of hardship brought on behalf of the Palestinians.

We met late in the week with former Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who broke with the Labor Party to join Kadima, the new centrist party holding the governing coalition in the Knesset. At 82, Peres is the last of the generation who was there at Israel's creation. He's been to the brink and back many times. Asked if he expects to see a comprehensive peace settlement in his lifetime, he responds with a smile, "First of all, I'm not in a hurry to pass away."

But Peres does point to glimmers of progress. There are Arab voices speaking up for the first time against the taking of the Israeli soldier. "That's a change," he says. And change in the Middle East is made slowly and painfully if it's made at all.

Tensions Grow Over Mexico Vote As Opposition Plans Rally Saturday (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr. And Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

MEXICO CITY, July 7 — Mexico hung in limbo on Friday, as tensions rose between those seeking a recount in the presidential race and those seeking to accept Felipe Calderón as the winner and move on.

After a tally showed that the two top candidates were separated by 243,000 votes, the election has exposed deep divides in society, along class and regional lines. The voting has put the strength of the young democracy to its toughest test.

DOJ_NMG_0039738

A day after election officials said Mr. Calderón, an advocate of free trade, had won the narrowest of victories, the country seemed more on edge than on a high.

Supporters of Mr. Calderón's leftist rival, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, girded for fights in court and on the streets, beginning with a rally scheduled for Saturday. Mr. Calderón's supporters and allies called on Mr. López Obrador to concede defeat for the good of the country.

The uncertainty caused consternation among citizens of all political persuasions.

"This man López Obrador makes people afraid, and his worst fault is that he lies to people and can stir up violence," said Sandra Sánchez, 38, a designer who voted for Mr. Calderón. "He should recognize his defeat already, because if he says he defends the people, he should know the people don't want to fight."

Consuelo Castillo Guerrero, 63, an impeccably dressed retired saleswoman, plans to march in support of Mr. López Obrador. "We want absolute transparency, because we're not convinced," Ms. Castillo said. "I think that if things were as clean as they say, then what's the inconvenience of recounting?"

The White House was quick to support Mr. Calderón. President Bush called to congratulate him in the early afternoon for receiving the largest number of votes, even though he had not officially been declared president-elect. Mexican law requires the electoral court to ratify the results.

"The president also noted the solid foundation of the U.S.-Mexican relationship and his confidence in Mexican democratic institutions," said Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

Election observers, who visited a third of the country's 300 electoral districts during voting last Sunday, "did not report incidents or irregularities that could cloud the transparency of the counting process or affect the results," said Ignacio Salafranca, head of the European Union team.

Mr. Calderón took the role of president-elect on Friday in a meeting with foreign correspondents. He discussed plans to improve relations with the rest of Latin America, to strengthen the commitment to human rights and to making the country a magnet for investment to help generate jobs and keep Mexicans from migrating to the United States.

When asked about the polarization that threatens to undermine confidence in his government, Mr. Calderón, 43, said he would work to rebuild relations among his rivals in Mr. López Obrador's Democratic Revolutionary Party. Mr. Calderón also made clear that he was prepared to use his National Action Party's new plurality in Congress to sway support from other parties and govern without Mr. López Obrador's party if it tries to block him.

Mr. Calderón said he was not worried about a legal challenge to the election because most evidence indicated that he had won the most transparent presidential election in Mexican history. He said the irregularities found in the first count were minor. And he made clear that he would not support a new count.

"This is a plural country," he said. "And everyone's first responsibility, especially mine, is reconciliation." Mr. Calderón said he received a congratulatory call on Sunday from President Vicente Fox, who has withheld public comment on the election. Congratulations came from governments that included Canada and Spain, as well as the United States.

The Mexican stock market seesawed all week as the news changed. By the end of the week, it had gained 3.6 percent. Wall Street analysts agreed that Mr. Calderón's victory seemed unassailable, but warned investors to settle in for a long wait until the election was confirmed.

The United States ambassador here, Antonio O. Garza, wrote that although the electoral process was not complete, "I believe the actions of Mexico's current administration and the political parties, and the transparency of the I.F.E., have not only strengthened civic pride, but assured Mexico of its place in the world as a prime example of the world's strong and vital democracies."

The I.F.E., or Federal Electoral Institute, runs the elections.

Mr. López Obrador, who has made a career of challenging elections, prepared to try to prove that the electoral system remained flawed. His case before the Federal Electoral Tribunal could delay declaring a new president until September.

Advisers to Mr. López Obrador, a former mayor of Mexico City, said he would challenge the results in one-third of the 130,000 polling places, focusing on sites with many null votes or where his party did not have representatives to oversee the count.

DOJ_NMG_0039739

The advisers acknowledged that the errors found in each ballot box opened in the final count were small, but argued that together they could add up to enough votes to change the result.

"If they recount the votes and Calderón wins by one vote, then it ends," said Mayor-Elect Marcelo Ebrard of Mexico City, a close adviser to Mr. López Obrador. "If they don't count the votes, there will always be a doubt."

If the court does not order a recount, Mr. López Obrador left little doubt at a news conference on Thursday that he was considering mass marches as a next step. "It's our right," he said.

Rumbling beneath the confidence in one camp and outrage in the other was a debate on whether the most competitive elections in Mexican history had been good or bad. For some people, the cascade of results raised ghosts from a not-too-distant past when the state manipulated elections. Other people feared that if Mexico continued to bow to the old ghosts, it would never break free of them.

About the only thing that seemed clear was that Mexico has been polarized. Speaking randomly to average Calderón supporters and then to people who support Mr. López Obrador was like playing hopscotch across the gaping economic divide.

Manuel Arango, a wealthy real estate developer who is active in philanthropies, echoed the feelings of many supporters of Mr. Calderón when he said, "I hope that everything plays out within the institutions and not on the street."

Juan Huerta, 55, who works at a newsstand near a luxury department store, said he thought that the election was riddled with fraud. Mr. Huerta said he tried to cast a ballot for Mr. López Obrador, but was told that rain had soaked all the ballots. "This is a fraud against the people," he said.

"The PAN is playing with the country's social peace" he added about the governing party. "If there's violence, then so be it. People are fed up. That's why they had the revolution."

Leftist To Seek Recount In Mexican Election (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar And Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, July 8, 2006

Lopez Obrador's aides also allege interference by Fox. That could lead to a demand for a revote.

MEXICO CITY — Top aides to leftist candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador called Friday for a recount of nearly half the votes cast in Sunday's presidential election and edged close to demanding that the entire vote be nullified.

The statements by the Lopez Obrador camp revealed a two-part strategy to deny a victory to conservative Felipe Calderon, who on Thursday was proclaimed the winner by a margin of little more than half a percentage point.

By insisting on a recount of about 18 million of the 41 million votes cast, aides said, Lopez Obrador hopes to overcome Calderon's official 244,000-vote margin. The leftist has been insisting since Monday that there were widespread irregularities in the tally.

Simultaneously, Lopez Obrador's aides allege that President Vicente Fox improperly influenced the vote — an accusation that could provide grounds for asking Mexico's electoral tribunal to nullify the election and order a new one.

Calderon is with Fox's National Action Party, and Lopez Obrador's allies have been arguing that the president's many TV and radio commercials touting his administration's successes were a thinly veiled attempt to aid his party's candidate. Mexican law does not allow the incumbent to intervene in the election of a successor.

Fox "violated the principles of equity, impartiality and objectivity," said Ricardo Monreal, a top official with the Lopez Obrador campaign.

Calderon, for his part, said he would prevail in any legal battle. If his victory stands, he will take office Dec. 1.

In a news conference with foreign correspondents, Calderon said he had won a "clear victory" supported by "the will of millions of Mexicans." He pointed out that many ballot boxes were reopened and recounted Wednesday during the preparation of the final vote tally. Those recounts, he said, found only "minor variations" from the election night tally.

"There is no valid legal argument that will lead to" an annulment of the election, Calderon said.

Mexico's electoral tribunal has overturned the results of several gubernatorial and mayoral elections in recent years, ordering new votes. In those cases, the losing candidates made charges similar to those against Fox: that leaders used their influence over local media and control of government coffers to violate the principle of "equity" in the competition among the candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0039740

But legal experts said it was unclear whether the tribunal had the legal authority to void a presidential election.

Beyond the legal issue, it was uncertain whether the panel, made up of highly respected jurists elected by Congress to 10-year terms, would be willing to risk the political and social conflict sure to follow the nullification of a presidential election.

"Whether they would dare to do this at the presidential level is a different question" than nullifying a state vote, said John M. Ackerman, a professor at the National Autonomous University of Mexico. "But if Lopez Obrador decides to make such a case, they would have to take it seriously, because they have their own jurisprudence that requires them to do so."

Lorenzo Cordova, a specialist in electoral law and former member of Mexico's Federal Electoral Institute, said the judges "would have to find very grave circumstances" before they could annul the election. "It's an action of last resort," Cordova said.

Monreal, with Lopez Obrador's campaign, said asking for the ballot boxes from 50,000 precincts to be reopened would be the Democratic Revolution Party's chief request before the tribunal.

But, he said, the PRD lawyers would also target Fox, whose commercials inundated the airwaves here for months until a court barred them in April.

President Fox "is the person primarily responsible for creating this election of state," Monreal said, using a phrase synonymous here with election tampering. He stopped short, however, of explicitly saying that Lopez Obrador would ask to have the election nullified.

On Friday, PRD lawyers and activists across Mexico prepared to submit to the electoral tribunal paperwork challenging the count. The deadline to file is Sunday.

PRD officials say they have ample evidence of irregularities. In many instances, they said, vote totals at precincts in Calderon strongholds, such as the central state of Guanajuato, exceeded the number of ballots delivered to those precincts.

The election was monitored by hundreds of international observers, many of whom lauded the apparent orderliness of Sunday's vote. Some, however, did note irregularities during the official count of polling station reports that began Wednesday.

Ted Lewis of the San Francisco-based nonprofit Global Exchange was among the hundreds of observers.

"A lot of people are prepared to say there's election fraud," Lewis said. "I'm not at all prepared to say that. I don't think that's really the case. But the perception of election fraud is there. I wish I could say it was all clean, but I'm not in that position."

The tribunal has until September to validate the results of the election. Until it does, Calderon's victory has no legal standing.

Even so, Calderon received congratulations from several world leaders. White House officials said President Bush on Friday called both Calderon and Fox to congratulate them on the election result. Bush told Calderon that he looked forward to working with him.

In his news conference, Calderon signaled no changes in Mexico's relations with its northern neighbor, which have been close but occasionally contentious under Fox.

Calderon told reporters that he would not seek to revise the 12-year-old North American Free Trade Agreement.

"I don't see broad probabilities that Mexico would be the winner in a renegotiation," he said.

During the campaign, Lopez Obrador made a major issue of the trade pact, promising to negotiate a delay in the removal of the remaining tariffs protecting Mexican farmers against cheaper U.S. imports of corn and beans. Fox had sought such a postponement but was rebuffed. The tariffs are set to expire in 2008.

Calderon said that instead of renegotiating, he would provide aid programs for millions of small farmers unable to compete with the U.S. imports. To help corn and sugar cane farmers, he proposed expanding Mexico's modest effort to produce ethanol fuel from those crops.

He also said he would continue to lobby, as Fox had done in 14 meetings with Bush, for legalization of the millions of undocumented Mexican workers in the United States and for an expanded guest-worker program for others seeking jobs there.

But Calderon put equal emphasis on his campaign pledge to make Mexico a more attractive target for job-creating investment. He proposed that the United States and Canada expand a modest fund that finances infrastructure and helps launch productive enterprise in the poor regions from which Mexicans traditionally migrate north.

DOJ_NMG_0039741

Mentioning two such states, he said: "A kilometer of highway in Zacatecas or Michoacan can do more than 10 kilometers of [border] walls in Texas or Arizona to reduce migration.

"This should be understood on both sides of the border."

Cecilia Sánchez of The Times' Mexico City Bureau contributed to this report.

Lopez Obrador May Lack Support For Vote Protest (WSJ)

By David Luhnow, John Lyons And Jose De Cordoba

The Wall Street Journal, July 8, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Even as Mexico's combative leftist Andrés Manuel López Obrador gears up for a campaign to reverse his narrow defeat in Sunday's election, his support among many may already be flagging, including his allies on the left.

Three other political parties that took part in the election, including the country's former ruling party, the Institutional Revolutionary Party, said Friday that the vote was clean. Two of the parties extended their congratulations to winning conservative-party candidate Felipe Calderón.

Mr. López Obrador, who lost the election by just 244,000 votes, has called for rallies across the country Saturday to protest the outcome, raising fears of instability in the U.S.'s southern neighbor and trade partner. But even some senior members of his own party declined to RSVP. Zeferino Torreblanca, for instance, a popular state governor in Mr. López Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party, said he won't attend the rally.

"I am not in any way an opportunist, a vote-herder, or any kind of professional of gutter politics," said Mr. Torreblanca, explaining why he wouldn't attend the march.

The cracks in support for the former Mexico City mayor make the outcome of today's protest of critical importance. Mr. López Obrador must hope the turnout is both massive and peaceful, or risk frightening middle-class Mexicans. He must also build a convincing case for his calls to do a ballot-by-ballot recount of the 41 million votes cast -- a procedure that could extend the fight over the presidency for months.

"Andrés Manuel may be making the worst mistake of his political life by not admitting his defeat without delay and honestly," Carlos Marin, a columnist for Mexico City's Milenio newspaper, wrote in an editorial Friday. Milenio has been sympathetic to the leftist standard bearer. Mr. Marin predicted Mr. López Obrador's protests would become smaller in number as the days pass and would weaken his standing.

Despite the cracks, Mr. López Obrador's political skills and ability to mobilize protests are legendary. He won 14 million votes, and has millions of followers that retain an almost cultlike devotion. He also has union muscle that can help create a big turnout. Already, the head of the telephone worker's union has vowed to put his union behind the recount effort.

Mr. López Obrador's Party of the Democratic Revolution, or PRD, plans to pursue a variety of legal challenges at electoral tribunal, a group of seven judges that ratify all elections. PRD officials say they plan to allege fraud at tens of thousands of polling stations, as well as charge that the election process was tainted by government meddling and negative campaigning.

Yet growing numbers of those sympathetic to the leftist PRD wonder if the party has much evidence to back up its claims. PRD activists helped count the vote on Sunday night, and Mr. López Obrador praised the process that day.

José Woldenberg, a leftist intellectual who helped found the PRD in 1989 and headed the election agency for seven years, praised the vote as "authentic, clean, and transparent." In an interview, Mr. Woldenberg said the PRD had yet to present valid claims of fraud. "We need to wait to see the evidence they present to the tribunal, but from what they have said so far, I don't think they have a case," he said. His opinion will carry weight on Mexico's left because he is long known as a champion of Mexican democracy, who helped design the current election process.

Mexico's vote count is a labor-intensive process that may be subject to human error, but is widely seen as among the most transparent in the world.

On election day, voters cast a hand-marked ballot at one of 130,500 polling stations around the country. The polling stations are manned by ordinary citizens who volunteer to oversee the ballot count as well as representatives from the major political parties. In all, nearly a million Mexicans take part in the process.

DOJ_NMG_0039742

Once polls close, the poll stations workers and members of the parties count the ballots together, agreeing on a final tally for each party before putting them back into a sealed box and then posting the total figures outside the station for the public to see. Each party representative signs a copy of the tally and keeps it, copies that parties can refer to later.

The sealed boxes and a copy of the tally are then taken under armed guard to the district headquarters of the national election agency, where the tally is put into a computer and automatically appears on the Internet -- again, for the public to see. "I can't imagine a more transparent process," says Mr. Woldenberg. "The public can see what happens at every step."

Even if the tribunal agrees to a recount, the PRD is unlikely to overturn the result, say analysts. Assuming only a third of the annulled votes were indeed incorrectly marked, the PRD would have to get more than four out of every five ballots to overcome the PAN's 236,000 vote lead in the official tally. Given the PRD only got about 35% of the overall vote, that seems highly unlikely.

Mexico's election tribunal was created in 1996, after a string of state elections led to accusations of fraud and ended up being resolved in political backroom deals known as "concertacesiones" rather than the court.

How To Be A Good Neighbor (NYT)

By Greg Grandin

The New York Times, July 8, 2006

THE Aztecs used to believe that history is not linear but circular, with great events repeating themselves on a regular basis. That certainly seems to be the case with Mexico, which has a revolution once every hundred years.

In 1810, peasants thrown off their land by plantation owners led a violent five-year rebellion that paved the way for Mexico's independence from Spain. In 1910, an instance of electoral fraud ignited an agrarian revolution, which in turn kicked off a decade-long civil war in which millions of Mexicans died.

Nearly a century later, Mexico's current electoral crisis likewise is propelled by rural unrest — this time largely brought about by the anger of agricultural workers displaced by the North American Free Trade Agreement. Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the center-left presidential candidate who is contesting the declared victory of Felipe Calderón in last Sunday's election, draws much of his support from this increasingly restive population of rural poor.

Before Nafta, Mexico was self-sufficient in corn and bean production. Today, one out of three Mexican tortillas is made with cheap corn meal from the United States. In 1993, more than 10 million Mexicans made their living off the land. Today, even as Mexico's population has grown, that number has plummeted to about seven million.

Mexican farmers simply can't compete with capital-intensive United States agribusiness, which continues to enjoy generous government subsidies. Moreover, Mexican commodity importers receive low-interest loans to buy crops from the United States. Every year, nearly three million tons of harvested Mexican corn is left to rot because it is too expensive to sell.

Mexicans have reason to worry that this is not all the trouble Nafta has in store. In 2008, the agreement's final provision is set to go into effect, eliminating the last tariffs on United States corn and beans and ending the subsidies Mexico gives to its peasant farmers — all the while leaving untouched the far larger subsidies Washington doles out to its own agricultural sector. During his campaign, Mr. López Obrador pledged to renegotiate this provision, but J. B. Penn, the United States undersecretary of agriculture, last month pre-emptively responded by saying that "we have no interest in renegotiating any parts of the agreement."

For the last decade and a half, Washington and its allies in Mexican politics, including Mr. Calderón, have promoted a free-trade economic model that has failed to deliver the prosperity its advocates promised. Although the Mexican economy grew by 3 percent last year, the country's poverty and inequality indicators remain typical to bad by Latin American standards, with the richest 10 percent of citizens controlling 43 percent of the country's wealth, while some 40 percent of Mexicans live below the poverty line.

These problems, combined with Mexican anger over the immigration debate in the United States, run the risk of souring relations between our two countries for the foreseeable future.

But there is a way the Bush administration can help to set things on a different course. Although election officials say Mr. Calderón won the presidential vote, the United States should not rush to embrace him as the election's victor. The official tally gives Mr. Calderón a razor-thin lead, and there are credible reports of significant irregularities that could, at best, weaken the legitimacy of a Calderón presidency, and at worst, lead to escalating protests. The disputed votes include the 904,000 annulled ballots that come primarily from regions that went heavily for Mr. López Obrador, as well as discrepancies between the numbers handed in by polling stations and the actual ballots cast.

DOJ_NMG_0039743

The best thing the United States can do now is to support the push for a recount and to refrain from calling on Mr. López Obrador to concede. Then, no matter who finally wins the election, the White House should renegotiate Nafta, allowing Mexico to set its own policy in support of its rural economy. If the Bush administration does otherwise, it might help begin yet another season of Mexican upheaval — just as the Aztecs might have predicted.

A Victor In Mexico (WP)

The Washington Post, July 8, 2006

BY SCARCELY 240,000 votes out of 41 million ballots cast in Mexico's presidential election last Sunday, Felipe Calderon, a conservative, U.S.-trained technocrat, edged out Andros Manuel Lopez Obrador, a fiery populist and former mayor of Mexico City. Given Mr. Lopez Obrador's extravagant (and fanciful) promises to reshape Mexican society, the ascent of leftist politicians in parts of South America, and the traditional appeal of charismatic champions of the poor in Latin America, one might have handicapped Mr. Lopez Obrador as the easy victor. That Mr. Calderon was declared the winner, albeit by a hair, suggests that many Mexicans are at least open to the idea that free trade, open markets and sound fiscal management will eventually pay dividends -- even if the benefits of such policies to date have been spread unevenly.

