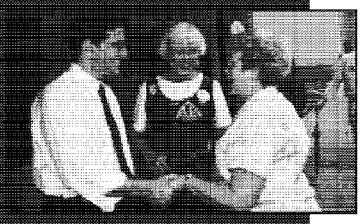
Republican Eric Cantor
Honest, conservative leadership for the 7th District.



For the past two years, Republican Eric Cantor has been a serious, hardworking Congressman, solving problems and getting results for Virginia. Congressman Cantor brings integrity, character, and a fresh voice to Washington. As our Congressman, Republican Eric Cantor is focused on the issues that are important to you and your family — representing our common sense, conservative values in educating our children, protecting jobs, and ensuring economic and national security.

Now Republican Eric Cantor needs your vote on Tuesday, November 5th — to go back to Congress and fight for your values in the 7th District.

Vote Eric Cantor for Congress.

Republican Eric Cantor. Real Results for the 7th District.

Protecting our Economic Security

Reviving our economy is a top priority, and Congressman Eric Cantor is finding ways to return tax dollars to the people so they can invest in the American economy. Growth through reinvestment is the fastest way to revive the economy, create jobs, and keep people working.

Protecting Social Security

Republican Eric Cantor remains committed to protecting and strengthening Social Security. As co-sponsor for the Social Security Benefits Tax Relief Act, Eric Cantor is working to end the tax on Social Security Benefits for seniors. With the price of prescription drugs skyrocketing, Eric Cantor continues to fight for a prescription drug benefit, so that seniors living on a fixed income won't have to choose between food and critical medication they need to live happy, healthy lives.

Improving Education for our Children

Congressman Eric Cantor is the sponsor of the Education Empowerment Tax Credit Act — which provides all parents with a refundable tax credit of up to $1000 for education expenses for each of their children (K-12). This tax credit could be used to pay for new computers, educational software, tuition, tutoring, or any other education expense. Eric Cantor has worked with White House officials to advance his education initiative, giving parents an opportunity to help better educate their children. Our children are our future, and Republican Eric Cantor stands by President Bush's plan to leave no child behind.

Protecting our National Security

Congressman Eric Cantor supports America's continued effort to eliminate international terrorist organizations and their state sponsors. Whether it's the war against al Qaeda or eliminating the threat of Iraq, Eric Cantor stands beside President Bush in his efforts to bring peace throughout the world. Earlier this year, Eric Cantor introduced the Peace With Security Act that cuts off all American taxpayer dollars being sent to the Palestinian Authority. The safety of you and your family is always a top priority for Eric Cantor.

On Tuesday, Vote for a Congressman who gets real results.

BY ORRIN G. HATCH

ÿÿÿ Editorial boards are entitled to their own opinions, but not to their own set of facts. The Salt Lake Tribune's editorial against President Bush's plan to reform the judicial selection process ("Federal Bench Fiasco," Nov. 5) puts The Tribune in the extremely rare company of those who argue against speeding up a process that virtually every sensible observer thinks is too slow.

ÿÿÿ No one can honestly defend the current 77 empty seats in the federal judiciary, which means that 9 percent of the judicial branch sits vacant. This is one of the highest vacancy rates in modern times.

ÿÿÿ The Senate's goal -- regardless of who is president and which party controls the Senate -- should be to evaluate and confirm judicial nominees in a timely way in order to ensure a fully functioning federal judiciary. That is difficult to achieve due to the amount of work involved in researching the personal and professional backgrounds of nominees. It is also complicated by too much partisan politics. President Bush's plan to start the process earlier, and to establish a time frame for hearings and votes, is an honorable and practical way to streamline the review process and minimize divisive partisanship.

ÿÿÿ It is difficult to understand The Tribune's opposition to the idea of judges announcing their retirements in advance. Most other high-level public officials are selected before their offices are vacated; we elect presidents, senators, representatives and governors -- to name just a few -- while their predecessors remain in office. This method ensures continuity.

ÿÿÿ Moreover, it is entirely possible for the Senate to hold a hearing within three months, and a vote within six months, of the president's nominations. A rule forcing such a timetable would go a long way toward removing the partisan power to slow the process.

ÿÿÿ Selective statistics from narrow time periods in the past, such as those included in your editorial, only confuse the issues. My record as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee demonstrates that, contrary to your assertion, the Republicans who controlled the Senate during the past six years of the Clinton administration did not start the current controversy. In fact, those six years saw the number of judicial vacancies decrease by three.

ÿÿÿ Overall, during President Clinton's eight years in office, the Senate confirmed 377 judges, essentially the same (only five fewer) as it confirmed for President Reagan, who, by the way, had more judges confirmed than any other president in history. Note that President Reagan had six years of a Senate controlled by his own party, while President Clinton had

ÿÿÿ Finally, although the Republicans get a lot of blame for the 41 Clinton nominees who did not receive hearings, that number is 13 fewer than the 54 nominees who suffered the same fate at the hands of Democrats during the first Bush administration. By the way, nine of the Clinton 41 were nominated so late in Clinton's eighth year that they could not possibly have been processed by the Senate.
ÿÿÿ Although neither party has a perfect record in the Senate, President Bush came to the judicial selection process with clean hands, having had no involvement in any of the prior controversies. And he began his term with an astonishing olive branch: The first-ever renomination of a circuit court nomination first submitted by a president of the other party.
ÿÿÿ It is even more ludicrous to accuse President Bush of failing to nominate fast enough. President Bush has responded to the vacancy crisis in the appellate courts by nominating a total of 32 top-notch men and women. The Senate Democrats have simply stalled them, confirming only 14 and leaving 17 more pending in committee. This disregards precedent. At the end of President Clinton's first year in office, there were only two circuit court nominees left pending in committee without hearings or votes; after President Bush's first year, there were 23.
ÿÿÿ There is great wisdom behind President Bush's call for the Senate to hold timely hearings and votes for all judicial nominees, regardless of who is president and who controls the Senate. By streamlining the process and limiting the power of partisan politicians on both sides of the political aisle, such a rule would serve the long-term interests of the judiciary and the American people. I simply don't understand The Salt Lake Tribune's concern here.

HUME: Senator, the president's team came forth in the final days of the campaign with a plan on judicial nominations that would have had retiring judges announce their retirements a year before they did. It would have had a timetable for the consideration of appointments to fill the seats.
And it would have provided for a vote on the Senate floor on judicial nominees.
At the time, of course, it was looked as a eleventh-hour proposal, politics. The administration clearly intends to follow up on it and press for it.
What is your view of that proposal? Is that something you'd be interested in seeing passed?
BAYH: I'm willing to give it serious consideration, Brit. I think we need to get away, both parties--you know, this happened when Clinton was president. It's now happening a little bit now. We need to get a more orderly process in place for dealing with these nominations.
The big fight, though, won't be on the district and appellate court nominees. The big fight will be if there's a Supreme Court vacancy and what to do then.
HUME: Right, but do you believe that a president should be entitled at least to a floor vote on judicial nominees?
BAYH: I think in most cases yes. If someone is just clearly beyond the pale, then the committees do have their rights.
HUME: True, but if someone is clearly...
BAYH: In most cases, yes.
HUME: Clearly beyond the pale presumably means, reported out of the Judiciary Committee with a negative recommendation to the floor, where the Senate, presumably, in its wisdom, if the nominee is beyond the pale, would reject it.
BAYH: In most cases, yes. Unless there's something exceptional.

Not sure we responded to this specific. Again, the political paper is most appropriate for these though we have discretion.

if it answers your questions, then i'm comfortable with it. one conern: it addresses the logistical and volunteer personnel, but not the actual participants (the ones that would typically be for HS) in the events - the candidate, his family, other event hosts, etc.

for example, which stationery should the president use to thank the kennedy's, who hosted a finance event for gov. jeb bush at their residence on friday?

MEMORANDUM FOR KATHARINE BALLS

FROM: BRETT KAVANAUGH

SUBJECT: THANK YOU NOTES

You asked about use of stationery for thank-you notes to people who may have assisted the President on a political trip or the mixed portion of an official-political trip. As a general matter, you should use political stationery only for those who assisted directly and solely with political events. You should use official stationery for notes to those who assisted with official events, who assisted on both aspects of a mixed trip, who assisted with official functions on an otherwise political trip, and for whom a clear determination cannot be made. As a general matter, for example, notes to airport greeters and motorcade drivers can be on official stationery regardless of the nature of the trip.

We will revisit these guidelines if and when the President becomes a candidate for re-election to the Presidency.

Per your suggestion, I've added a sentence in the last paragraph. I've also made a few tweaks to the language so that it concludes that the Secretary's right exists whether or not a section 107 cause of action has yet been brought in court.

Maybe, but I don't know enough to know just how the common-law rule operated.
It's possible, for example, that the insurer's role is spelled out in the insurance contract.

Looks good. Does it make sense to add a sentence that references the traditional role that insurers play in litigation involving their insureds; i.e., that the commmon-law background is such that it would contemplate a role in settlement for all entities whose $$ are at stake, which here means the federal government.

The usage that I'm more familiar with would be "conference report on H.R. 3210".
(That would distinguish it from the explanatory statement that accompanies the conference report.) Any problems with that? I attach a version with only very minor revisions.

HEADLINE: Justice White and judicial excellence

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, May 3

BODY:
In eulogizing Justice Byron White, Jack Miller, himself a lion of the bar, got it right. Quoting Shakespeare's Hamlet, Miller told the hundreds assembled that we "shall not look upon his like again."

Miller was right in two senses.

First and most obviously, Justice White accomplished more in one life than most could in three. He grew up on a sugar beet farm in the smallest of towns in Colorado, but finished first in his college class. At the same time, he led the NCAA in point s scored -- 122 -- and all-purpose yards -- rushing, receiving, pass interceptions, as well as punt and kickoff returns. Justice White set collegiate records that would stand over 50 years. H e was the highest paid player of his day in the National Football League -- $15,000 a season in those days. But he was also a Rhodes scholar, a war hero, top of his class at Yale Law School, and a leading private practitioner.

As Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy's deputy at the Justice Department, Justice White defended the desegregation efforts o f the "freedom riders" in Alabama. And then, of course, he served 31 years on the United States Supreme Court. As President John F. Kennedy remarked when announcing his nomination, Justice White excelle d in everything he attempted.

There is another sense in which we shall no t look upon the like of Justice White again. He was confirmed less than two weeks after his nomination; his hearing lasted 90 minutes.

He was selected not because of partisan ideology, but because of his integrity, accomplishment, and life experience. Justice White's subsequent tenure on the bench was characterized by an utter indifference to partisan agendas. He voted against Miranda warnings, against extending the Firs t Amendment in novel ways to protect the media against meritorious libel charges, and against Roe vs. Wade.

At the same time, he voted for one-man, one-vote reforms, insisted on school desegregation even if it required raising taxes and busing, and supported Congress's use of racial preferences to remedy past discrimination.

If one theme ran through Justice White's jurisprudence, it was a confidence in the people's elected representatives, rather than the unelected judiciary, to experiment and solve society's problems, so long as the procedures used were fair and the opportunity to participate was open to all. But in each and every area, Justice White sought, as he put it often, to "decide the case," not to advance any ideology.

Despite his independence (or maybe because of it) , many on both the left and right grudgingly came to respect the justice that the y could never take for granted and whose vote they had to win in each and every case with their best legal arguments.

The judicial confirmation process today bears no resemblance to 1962.

Today, there are too many who are concerned less with promoting the best public servants and more with enforcing litmus tests and locating unknown "stealth candidates" who are perceived as likely to advance favored political causes once on the bench.

Politicians and pressure groups on both sides declare that they will no t support nominees unless they hew to their own partisan creeds. When a favored candidate is voted down for lack of sufficient political sympathy to those in control, grudges are held for years, and retaliation is guaranteed.

Whatever else might be said about the process today, excellence plainly is no longer the dispositive virtue, as it was to President Kennedy.

Th e facts are undeniable. Today, half of the seats on the Sixth Circuit remain unfilled because of partisan bickering over ideological "control" of that circuit. The D.C. Circuit operates at just two-thirds strength. Almost 20 percent of the seats on the courts of appeals and nearly 100 judgeships nationwide are vacant. The administrative office of the U.S. Courts has declared 32 judicial vacancy "emergencies" in courts where filings are in excess of 600 cases per district judge or 700 cases per appellate panel.

Meanwhile, some of the most impressive judicial nominees are grossly mistreated. Take Merrick Garland and John Roberts, two appointees to the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C. Both were Supreme Court clerks. Both served with distinction at the Department of Justice. Both are widely considered to be among the finest lawyers of their generation. Garland, a Clinton appointee, was actively promoted by Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah. Roberts, a Bush nominee, has the backing of Seth Waxman, President Bill Clinton's solicitor general. But neither Garland nor Roberts has chosen to live his life as a shirker; both have litigated controversial cases involving "hot-button" issues.

As a result, Garland was left waiting for 18 months before being confirmed over the opposition of 23 senators. Roberts, nominated almost a year ago, still waits for a hearing -- and sees no end to the waiting in sight. In fact, this is the second time around for Roberts: he was left hanging without a vote by the Senate at the end of the first Bush administration. So much for promoting excellence in today's confirmation process.

Justice White's passing is a deep loss. He lived a full life in servic e of his country and the rule of law. When he retired in 1993, he commented that it was time for others "to have a like experience." It would be a beneficent thing if Justice White's passing served as a wake-up call to both political parties that their responsibility in picking judges is to help the nation find objectively excellent public servants, not to turn the process into an ideological food fight where the most able are mistreated while trimmer s and the mediocre are rewarded.

Responsibility for the current morass does not rest with any one party or group; ample blame can be doled out all around. But litmus tests, grudge matches and payback are not the ways forward. Excellence is.

As Lloyd Cutler, White House counsel to President Clinton, explained in testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee las t year, "to make ideology an issue in the confirmation process is to suggest that the legal process is and should be a political one. That is not only wrong as a matter of political science; it also serves to weaken the public confidence in the courts."

Though we will never see the like of Justice White again, here's hoping we again see a time in whic h the excellence he so richly embodied serves as the essential standard for picking and confirming our nation's judges.

HEADLINE: U.S.-HEALTH: SENATE OUTCOME COULD ALTER FUTURE OF FEDERAL COURTS

BYLINE: By Rebecca Vesely

BODY:
When the U.S.ÿSenate Judiciary Committee rejected Priscilla Owen as a nomineeÿfor the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in September by a vote of 10ÿ to 9, the razor-thin margin suggested that Tuesday's mid-termÿelections could have far-reaching implications on the laws of theÿland.

Owen, a Texas Supreme Court judge, had denied minors judicialÿbypass of parental-notification laws in all but one case and hadÿsupported further restricting abortion laws.

"Ideologues are not going to make it," Democratic committeeÿChairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont said at Owen's hearing.

President Bush is strongly anti-choice. And his anti-choiceÿpicks for the nation's federal courts will likely face fewerÿobstacles if anti-choice Republicans gain control of the Senate.ÿPro-choice Democrats currently hold a one-seat majority and faceÿclose competition in a handful of key races that, just a dayÿbefore the election, are too close to call. When asked recently whether President Bush would considerÿnominating a pro-choice conservative to the bench, AlbertoÿGonzales, counsel to President Bush and active in the judicialÿscreening process, said: "We don't ask that question." He addedÿthat the president's judicial nominees would "enforce the law."

Pro-Choice Advocates Worried About 9th Circuit CourtÿThe impact of an anti-abortion Republican-controlled Senate wouldÿbe felt in all courts, but perhaps in none more than the nation'sÿlargest and most controversial court of appeals--the 9th U.S.ÿCircuit in San Francisco. The 9th Circuit is widely viewed asÿbringing issues concerning consumer protection, the environment,ÿand women's rights to the forefront of national debate. In aÿ landmark case, the court ruled in 2000 that a United Airlinesÿpolicy imposing employee weight standards unfairly targeted womenÿemployees and imposed a burden on them that had nothing to doÿwith their work.

President Bush has the opportunity to fill five spots on theÿ9th Circuit, which covers nine states. One Bush nominee,ÿRepublican activist Richard Clifton of Honolulu, was confirmed inÿMay without opposition. But Democrats are blocking anotherÿnominee, Carolyn B. Kuhl.

A Los Angeles Superior Court Judge, Kuhl co-authored a briefÿfiled with the U.S. Supreme Court in 1986 when she was a deputyÿdistrict attorney supporting a reversal of Roe v. Wade, whichÿlegalized abortion. Reproductive rights groups such as NARAL andÿthe Center for Reproductive Law and Policy strongly oppose Kuhl'sÿnomination. Her confirmation chances in a pro-choice DemocraticÿSenate are slim to none.

Kuhl's nomination could be forever blocked by Democratic Sen.ÿBarbara Boxer of California. Boxer has not signed a "blue slip,"ÿmeaning that the home-state senator of the court where theÿnominee will be appointed has not returned the blue piece ofÿpaper indicating approval. Some legal experts are now criticizingÿthis "blue slip" rule, and observers say it is possible that ruleÿwould be revoked under an anti-choice Senate.

"Such tactics skirt the edges of constitutional legitimacy,"ÿChapman University law professor John C. Eastman wrote in the LosÿAngeles Daily Journal. "The founders viewed the confirmationÿpower more as a check on possible favoritism by the presidentÿthan a means to thwart the president's policy preferences."

Arthur Hellman, a law professor at the University ofÿPittsburgh and former director of the central legal staff of theÿ9th Circuit, says how Kuhl will rule as a judge cannot be basedÿon her actions as a lawyer.

"Any good lawyer recognizes the role of a judge is muchÿdifferent," Hellman says. "Lawyers are expected to takeÿprovocative stances to make their mark, while the role of theÿjudge is to uphold the law."

But abortion rights advocates say that the stakes are too highÿto believe that federal judges will not rule based on personalÿpolitics.

"It's naive and ahistorical to think that judges will not ruleÿbased on ideology," says Betsy Cavendish, legal director ofÿNARAL. "Many cases are not ideological, but in critical cases,ÿideology does play a role."

Cavendish cites a recent decision in the 7th U.S. CircuitÿCourt of Appeals in Chicago upholding an Indiana law requiringÿface-to-face counseling 18 hours before a woman can have anÿabortion. The two more conservative judges ruled in favor of theÿlaw.

"State legislatures are innovative in the way they restrictÿchoice," Cavendish says. "We need the courts to challenge stateÿactions."

The 9th Circuit gained national attention last summer byÿdeclaring the Pledge of Allegiance unconstitutional because itÿincludes the words "under God." Though written by a judgeÿappointed by Republican president Richard Nixon, the decisionÿcemented the 9th Circuit's reputation as a rogue and liberalÿcourt--a reputation many in the Senate would like to change. Everÿ controversial, last Wednesday a three-judge panel of the courtÿruled unanimously that the Justice Department could notÿinvestigate doctors who recommend marijuana to sick patients.

Critics argue that the court has had more decisions reversedÿby the U.S. Supreme Court than any other appeals court. Mostÿnotably, in 1996-1997, the Supreme Court reversed 28 of 29 casesÿfrom the 9th Circuit. But Hellman notes that the reversal rateÿhas declined since that year, and that 29 cases is "a tiny, tinyÿproportion of overall cases heard by the 9th that year."

Changing Court Balance Is a Slow ProcessÿIt would take some time to turn the 9th Circuit into a trulyÿconservative court. Former President Bill Clinton appointed 13 ofÿthe 24 judges on the court, which covers California, Arizona,ÿNevada, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Alaska and Hawaii.ÿBecause a three-judge panel often determines the outcome ofÿ cases, observers say that adding five new judges to the courtÿcould have an impact on court rulings.

"The Clinton nominees were actually fairly moderate," saysÿMarcia Kauntz, director of judicial selection process at theÿAlliance for Justice. "Given the court-packing by formerÿpresidents Reagan and Bush Sr., Clinton did not provide anÿideological balance to the federal courts. If President Bush isÿable to get his nominees through the Senate, the court would skewÿ even more conservative."

Kauntz says that the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals,ÿcovering Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee, would alsoÿbecome more conservative if the Senate approves Bush's nomineesÿbecause of the six vacancies on that court.

"Given the types of nominees Bush has chosen for the 6thÿCircuit, it would become more anti-environment andÿanti-abortion," Kauntz says.

On Wednesday, President Bush unveiled a plan to speed up theÿconfirmation process, requiring Senate Judiciary Committeeÿhearings within 90 days of receiving a nomination from theÿpresident, and a full Senate vote within 180 days. The proposalÿcame as a surprise to senators on both sides of the aisle.

"It's a political tactic to call attention to the nominationÿissue and mobilizes the right-wing base knowing full well theÿSenate cannot accept a proposal they had no input in making,"ÿKauntz says. "From our perspective, Sen. Leahy has moved nomineesÿfairly quickly; 80 nominees have been voted on, which isÿcomparable to previous administrations."

White House press secretary Ari Fleischer denied that the planÿwas a political tactic.

Hi Libby,
I hope you are well! We have recently had some changes in personal. As you may already know, John McConnell and Joe Shattan, have switched departments, from VP to EOP and vise versa. I have been told by IS&T office, that their email exchanges need to be changed in order to reflect their new offices. However in order to have the email that is currently in each of their respective accounts, copy into their new accounts, I need permission from your office. I spoke to Dotty Crumbling about this and she said that essentially I need an email from someone in Counsel's office saying that IS&T has permission to copy all of the current emails in Joe Shattan's inbox (his EOP account) and place the copy in his new inbox (his VP account). We need your office's permission because of Presidential records issues. Please let me know if this is something you can do and if you have any questions please do not hesitate to call me.

Thank you,
Anne

Brett -

I have a reporter from Las Vegas - who is being flacked by liberal interest groups - that the administration is "ducking many FOIA requests." I am just trying to find out if we have any sort of general talking points on FOIA requests - if I recall - they don't apply to the WH - but, just want to check prior to calling them back.

That was my reaction as well. Apparently the event is going on right now and will be over shortly, so its not clear what we could do even if we had a concern.

Who pays when Public Liaison hosts these sorts of events, do you know?

CONFIRMED

THE BIGGEST CONSEQUENCE of the midterm elections may well concern judges. Because the Republicans now control the Senate, President Bush is in a far better position than he was during his first two years in office to change the confirmation process for the better and to see his nominees confirmed. For all of that, and it is a lot, Bush has himself mainly to thank. In case you wonder, he hasn't done that. His reluctance to take any credit for his party's capture of the Senate is a testimony to his political prudence. Yet when histories of the Bush presidency are written, his labors in behalf of Republican Senate candidates in 2002 may well deserve their own chapter, precisely because the outcome now gives him the upper and potentially pacifying hand in the judges' wars.
Not incidentally, in choosing to campaign as he did, Bush eschewed conventional political counsel, which holds that incumbent presidents lose seats in midterm elections and, therefore, shouldn't bother to waste political capital by hitting the trails. But there was Bush in his five-day sprint to Election Day, in which he flew 10,000 miles, touching down in no fewer than 15 states, Texas the last. And everywhere he went he talked about judges. Here, for example, was Bush in Missouri on Monday: "And I'll tell you another big issue and another big difference in this campaign, and that has to do with our federal judiciary. I have a responsibility to name good people to the bench. I've named a lot of really good people . . . but the bunch running the Senate [i.e., the Democrats] has done a lousy job on my nominees."
Bush implied that the Senate needed to change hands for it to do a better job and appealed for votes for Jim Talent in his race to unseat the Democratic incumbent, Jean Carnahan. (Talent won.)

Bush addressed other issues during his stops--homeland security and tax cuts in particular. Without reliable national surveys to indicate whether and, if so, the extent to which judges mattered in a given race, it is difficult to assess the impact of the issue. And it bears noting that conventional political analysis holds that it is hard, if not impossible, for a president to make judges an issue in midterm elections. That analysis has persuaded some presidents not to even try.

Still, there are reasons to think that judges mattered to some extent, perhaps decisively, inasmuch as a mere 22,000 votes shifted the Senate to the GOP. And it may have mattered not just in the three GOP pickups but also in states the Republicans held, including Texas.

Republican political strategists say the issue aroused the party's base. Discount that if you like, but it is true that no issue is more likely to stimulate the rank and file of the Republican party than judges, which also work as a proxy for certain social issues (such as abortion). And there is this fact: More Republicans than Democrats did show up at the polls. In midterms, the party opposite the president's usually has the better turnout.

The opportunity on judges that Bush now has is evident. Six days before the elections, he endorsed two changes in the way the Senate handles nominations: first, that the Senate Judiciary Committee hold a hearing within 90 days of receiving a nomination, and second, that the full Senate hold an up-or-down floor vote within 180 days.

Such changes have merit regardless of which party controls the presidency or the Senate. The failure to hold reasonably timely hearings disrespects the president's power to nominate, and the Judiciary Committee shouldn't be allowed to act for the full Senate, especially since the full body might have confirmed a nominee that the committee, voting along purely partisan lines, rejected. (Recall the case of Priscilla Owen.)

Significantly, Orrin Hatch, who will be the committee's new chairman, supports the Bush proposals.

As for his nominees, Bush will see them moved without undue delays through the committee to the floor. Most if not all will be approved. The Democrats, now in the minority, are down to the filibuster.

Ultimately at stake here are the role of the courts and the ways in which judges interpret the law. Bush hardly has hidden where he comes down on those matters. His is a conservative judicial philosophy. But what will enable him to advance his philosophy through his appointees is the remarkable campaign he waged, one that defied historical trends and usual political wisdom. It continues to be a mistake to underestimate George W. Bush.

We may be scrambling tomorrow to get out of here, but folks think we still need to try to do the meeting. I don't think I'm going to get around to doing an agenda, but the focus should be on what we need to do to get ready for Jan. of next year, and what we can reasonably expect to be able to do in Jan.
next year.

I am sure you are extremely busy, but I was wondering if before I left there would be any way for me to get a signed picture of or with President Bush. It would just be such a great thing to have, but I don't know how hard that is to orchestrate.

Let me know if there is someone else who would be able to help me.

Thanks.

Q Scott, on another issue from the news conference last week, President Bush talked about Pickering and Owens in the Senate committee, Judiciary Committee. What is the work right now that's happening on that process with them to make it through and to actually --

MR. McCLELLAN: I'm glad you brought that up. I understand Congress is moving on a couple of the nominations. The President has made it very clear that the voice of the entire Senate deserves to be heard on his nominees. There are far too many vacancies in the judiciary and far too many very qualified individuals who have been held up, their nominations have been held up. And that's why the President said the voice of the entire Senate needs to be heard. There are currently 18 pending court of appeals nominees being held up, almost all of whom have received very strong bipartisan support. So we urge Congress to -- urge the Senate to allow those nominees to be voted on, on the floor.

Q You're vocally urging from the podium, but what has the President done since the news conference in talking about what could be done for these nominees?

MR. McCLELLAN: I think the White House staff continues to work with Congress to move these nominees forward. We work very closely with them on an individual basis. I would also point out -- I would also point out on nominations that there are over -- this is beyond just judicial nominees -- there are over 95 nominations awaiting floor action, and over 150 nominations awaiting committee and floor action. And it's important that Congress move forward on those nominees, as well, so that we have people in place to carry out their responsibilities.

Thank you.

SUMMARY OF SECTION 107, LITIGATION MANAGEMENT:

This section ensures that a single federal court will handle all tort cases arising out or resulting from an act of terrorism. The section creates a federal cause of action for any tort claim arising out of or resulting from an act of terrorism (including any claim for property damage, personal injury, or death), thereby ensuring federal court jurisdiction over all tort cases arising out of an act of terrorism. The section expressly preempts all state causes of action of any kind for property damage, personal injury, or death arising out of or resulting from the act of terrorism. The section further provides that, within 90 days of an act of terrorism, the federal Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shall assign a single federal district to exercise original and exclusive jurisdiction, at both the pre-trial and trial stages, over all cases relating to or arising out of the act of terrorism. If necessary, the Judicial Panel may assign more than one federal district court. The Judicial Panel shall select and assign the cases to a particular federal district court based on the convenience of the parties and the just and efficient conduct of the proceedings. The federal district court assigned by the Judicial Panel shall apply the substantive law of the State in which the act occurred for liability and damages issues.

The section further provides that punitive damages are not insured losses for purposes of the Program.

The section provides that the United States have retain the right of subrogation with respect to any payment or claim paid by the United States under the Act.

EXPLANATORY POINTS:

1. This section will significantly improve the legal system. It will ensure that all cases are consolidated in a single federal court for pre-trial and trial proceedings. That important procedure will prevent the conflicting rulings, forum shopping, and outrageous verdicts and judgments that the tort system too often produces in multiple local courts around the country. With the bill, the existing state laws on liability and damages will continue to apply, but in a single federal court that will hear and decide all cases.

2. The section is a major improvement from the Senate bill, which did not provide for consolidation in a single federal court.

3. We would have preferred to improve the legal system even more, particularly improvement of existing state laws on punitive damages, but the choice was between no bill and a bill that will both improve the legal system and help American workers and the economy.

4. The bill grants the Secretary of Treasury authority to require that insurance companies meet any "criteria that the Secretary may reasonably prescribe," which will allow the Secretary to require approval of settlements arising out of an act of terrorism.

HEADLINE: Hutchison: Bush to renominate Owen to federal bench

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:
President Bush is expected to renominate Priscilla Owen to the federal bench after the first of the year, Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said Thursday.

The Texas senator said top White House officials have assured her of the president's plans. Owen, a Texas Supreme Court justice, saw her nomination to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected by the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee in September amid Democrats' criticism that she is too conservative.

U.S. Sen.-elect John Cornyn, R-Texas, said recently that he hoped the president would renominate Owen.

The Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee voted 10-9, along party lines, to block Owen's nomination.

Democrats contended that Owen, a Republican, has been a pro-business and an anti-abortion judicial activist who let her personal beliefs influence her opinions and rulings.

Owen, who was elected to the Texas Supreme Court in 1994, was nominated to the post by Hutchison and retiring Texas Republican Sen. Phil Gramm.

Owen, 47, is the first judicial nominee who was rated unanimously "well-qualified" by the American Bar Association to be rejected on a vote by the committee.

HEADLINE: Hutchison: Bush to renominate Owen to federal bench

BYLINE: By SUZANNE GAMBOA, Associated Press Writer

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:
President Bush will renominate Texas Supreme Court Justice Priscilla Owen to the federal bench after the first of the year, Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said Thursday.

"She's going to be nominated again," the Texas senator said. "I did talk to the White House about that because I wanted her to come up at the end of this year if we were going to have the majority. But it's going to be next year, early next year."

Democrats remain in the majority for a lame-duck session, but Republicans take control of the Senate for the 108th session beginning in January.

Owen's nomination to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was rejected by the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee in September amid Democrats' criticism that she is too conservative.

The committee voted 10-9, along party lines, to block Owen's nomination.

U.S. Senator-elect John Cornyn, R-Texas, said the treatment she received is one of the reasons he was elected. He opposed the vote during his campaign.

"I think the voters rejected an approach in the United States Senate, at least in its leadership, that they were going to try and thwart the president's judicial nominees," Cornyn said.

"Sen. Cornyn and I will both be able to vote for her and vote for her wholeheartedly," Hutchison said.

Democrats contended that Owen, a Republican, has been a pro-business and an anti-abortion judicial activist who let her personal beliefs influence her opinions and rulings.

Owen, who was elected to the Texas Supreme Court in 1994, was nominated to the post by Hutchison and retiring Texas Republican Sen. Phil Gramm.

Owen, 47, is the first judicial nominee who was rated unanimously "well-qualified" by the American Bar Association to be rejected on a vote by the committee.

DRAFT

Mr. William J. Van Devender
Southern Timber Venture
P. O. Box 5327
Jackson, MS 39296-5327

Dear Billy:

It was a pleasure speaking with you today regarding our November 21 meeting in Washington concerning President Bush's new Healthy Forest initiative, which will impact not only U.S. forestlands, but also all private lands and the timber manufacturing industry in the U.S. As we discussed, this is to be a plan in which the businessmen, conservationist, and Administration work together implementing favorable results for everyone. We particularly need the input from public and private industry so as to make sure we do not do anything to exacerbate the already depressed timber economy.

I would appreciate very much you letting your associates know how important this issue is to myself, Karl Rove and President Bush. He is taking a very active role and wants to see this completed in the near future. Please contact the following associates regarding this meeting next week and I will be glad to talk, if necessary, to anyone to let them know how important it is to seek their advice and counsel.

Mr. Ken Hines, John Hancock
Mr. Fred Stimpson, Stimpson Lumber
Mr. James Cummins, Wildlife MS
Mr. Marshall Thomas, F & W Forestry
Mr. Robert P. Crozer, Wayham Capitol
Mr. Otis Ingram, Ingram & LeGrand Lumber

I will need confirmation from these gentlemen as soon as possible so that we may make arrangements at the Capitol Hilton.

Sincerely,

Barry Jackson

I'm looking to set up the Lott meeting on the President's plan on Wed or Thur., as well as the meetings w/Kyle Simmons and Eric Ueland. Just let me know if there are any times I need to stay away from on those two days.

I got you voice mail re: Lindsey Graham. I'll certainly not encourage it (I've never spoken with his folks), but there's nothing that we can do to prevent it. The Senate works on a very strict seniority system, and if a slot is open when they get to him, he can take it. I will however flag this tort reform problem for Hatch and Lott.

On Thursday, I am wide open.

Cornyn ready for challenges, including housing

New senator gets eye-opener on prices, discusses priorities

By DAVID JACKSON / The Dallas Morning News

WASHINGTON - Texas' newest senator says he is eager to get to work on national security and confirming judges, but first he needs an office and a house.

Congressional leaders haven't assigned workspace to John Cornyn and other freshman lawmakers, and he and his wife are finding Washington's real estate market steep, the state attorney general said Thursday in his first news conference as senator-elect.

"Even for a fairly modest hovel here in the district, it's pretty pricey," he said.

Mr. Cornyn, a Republican who defeated former Dallas Mayor Ron Kirk in the Nov. 5 election to replace retiring Sen. Phil Gramm, said he believes voters sent him to the Senate to help quiet partisan fights over things like homeland security and judicial nominations. Republicans, at least, will find that an easier task, having won control of the Senate that takes office in January.

"I think the voters in part ... responded to the gridlock that they saw in the management of the Senate and felt like it was not serving the public interest well," Mr. Cornyn said.

While wife Sandy house-hunted, Mr. Cornyn has spent recent days speaking with future colleagues and other government officials, such as Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. One subject of senatorial conversation is Mr. Cornyn's possible committee assignments.

"The great thing about the United States Senate is that even if you're not on a particular committee, you can still be a player on virtually any issue," Mr. Cornyn said. "To me, that's very appealing."

The former Texas Supreme Court justice said he would be interested in the Judiciary Committee, an arena of particularly intense political combat because of its role in reviewing President Bush's judicial nominees. But, Mr. Cornyn noted, committee assignments are at the mercy of the seniority system.

"I guess the most important consideration is, 'What's a new guy likely to get?' " Mr. Cornyn said.

Mr. Cornyn said he wants the Senate to confirm Priscilla Owen, the Texas Supreme Court justice whose nomination to the federal appellate bench was blocked by the Democratic majority on the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Cornyn raised that issue during his campaign against Mr. Kirk.

"I think the way she was treated was one of the reasons I got elected," Mr. Cornyn said.

Mr. Cornyn also said he is interested in promoting national security, particularly through Texas military installations, and improving access to health care, including a prescription drug plan for seniors. He also wants to see what can be done to help the economy, including assistance to businesses with terrorism insurance.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, paid tribute to her new junior colleague. Ms. Hutchison said she is talking to Mr. Cornyn about the new demands he will face on his time, especially given responsibility for a large and diverse state.

"Texas is like having 10 children in trouble," she said. "There's always somebody that is in a crisis."

Mr. Cornyn does come in with one advantage, Ms. Hutchison added: He doesn't have to worry about being in the minority.

"He's going to be spoiled," she joked. "He doesn't know what it's like."

Mr. Cornyn also tipped his hat to Mr. Gramm, calling him a "giant" who did a "fantastic job."

"I'm not Senator Gramm; I'm not a Ph.D. in economics," Mr. Cornyn said. "My background is different, but I'm going to do the best that I can to try to fill those shoes."

WASHINGTON)) The Supreme Court agreed Monday to take a new look at federal limits on campaign contributions to candidates.
The court will decide whether certain advocacy groups can contribute to candidates' campaigns. Currently, only individuals, political action committees, political parties and other campaign committees can give to candidates.
This case is unrelated to the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, which bans unlimited corporate, labor and individual contributions to the political parties. Opponents have challenged that law in the lower courts. The Supreme Court has been more willing to uphold limits on contributions, which justices have said could give the appearance of corruption. In June 2001, a very divided court ruled 5-4 that political parties could not spend unlimited amounts of money if they coordinated their efforts with a candidate. And in January 2000, the court voted 6-3 to back Missouri's contribution limits to state campaigns.
On the other hand, the court has struck down spending restrictions on First Amendment grounds, likening money to free speech. Such reasoning led the court in 1976 to uphold post-Watergate limits on campaign contributions but throw out restrictions on how much candidates could spend on their campaigns.
At issue is in this case is whether North Carolina Right to Life and other nonprofit advocacy corporations) groups that raise money not through business ventures but through donations from supporters) can make campaign contributions. Such groups have neither business interests nor shareholders.

U.S. Sen. John Edwards may lose a plum committee assignment -- his Judiciary panel seat -- when Republicans assume control of the Senate in January.
The North Carolina senator is the committee's most junior Democrat, and the number of Democrats on the panel will probably shrink when Republicans take over.
Edwards, a former trial lawyer, was added to the committee after U.S. Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont left the Republican party in May 2001, flipping control of the chamber to Democrats. Since then, Democrats have had a 10-9 majority on Judiciary.
None of the other nine Democrats on the panel were defeated in last week's elections or plan to retire, though senators sometimes switch committee assignment by choice.
"I'd like to keep the seat, but I don't know whether that'll be possible under the circumstances," Edwards said Thursday.
Members of the panel may get some prime national exposure in the coming year or two, if one or more U.S. Supreme Court justices step down, as is widely expected. The Judiciary panel will play a key role in the confirmation President Bush's nominees.

Dear Billy:

It was a pleasure speaking with you today regarding our November 21 meeting in Washington concerning President Bush's new Healthy Forest initiative, which will impact not only U.S. forestlands, but also all private lands and the timber manufacturing industry in the U.S. As we discussed, this is to be a plan in which the businessmen, conservationist, and Administration work together implementing favorable results for everyone. We particularly need the input from public and private industry so as to make sure we do not do anything to exacerbate the already depressed timber economy.

I would appreciate very much you letting your associates know how important this issue is to myself, Karl Rove and President Bush. He is taking a very active role and wants to see this completed in the near future. Please contact the following associates regarding this meeting next week and I will be glad to talk, if necessary, to anyone to let them know how important it is to seek their advice and counsel.

I will need confirmation from these gentlemen as soon as possible so that we may make arrangements at the Capitol Hilton.

Sincerely,

Barry Jackson

Nat Hentoff

ÿÿÿÿÿThe American Bar Association accurately charges that an emergency situation exists in the federal courts. The empty seats on those benches are caused by the fiercely politicized confirmation procedures in the Senate Judiciary Committee which slow down and sometimes just block nominations for partisan ideological reasons.

ÿÿÿÿÿWith many judicial vacancies, those who suffer are litigants around the country, as their cases are delayed. This happens no matter which political party controls the Senate Judiciary Committee and keeps slowing the process. The one proposal by the president that is crucial is: "I call on the full Senate to commit to an up or down floor vote on each nominee no later than 180 days after the nomination is submitted."

ÿÿÿÿÿ The 180-day provision is debatable, but requiring all the senators to vote on a nomination * regardless of whether the Senate Judiciary Committee has approved it * was called for by Alexander Hamilton in Federalist Papers Nos. 76 and 77: The president is "bound to submit the propriety of his choice to . . . an entire branch of the legislature." The Constitution designates the Senate as that branch.

ÿÿÿÿÿ Furthermore, as Sen. Arlen Specter, a Judiciary Committee member, makes clear, "Neither the text of the Constitution nor any contemporaneous or subsequent history says anything about the ability of one senator or one committee to defeat a judicial nomination by the president."

ÿÿÿÿÿ President Bush made a big mistake by issuing his proposal on the eve of the elections, thereby giving his critics an opening to scorn it as a political ploy, which it was. If he is serious about actually restoring the Constitution to the battered confirmation process (now that the Republicans control the committee), the president should bring the issue up again on prime-time television, focusing only on the requirement that the entire Senate eventually vote on the judicial nominees. If he does that, then the citizenry can understand the cynical power game that has been played for so long on the Judiciary Committee by both parties (Republican majorities have killed nominations by Democratic presidents).

ÿÿÿÿÿ In his book, "God Save This Honorable Court: How the Choice of Justices Shapes Our History," professor Laurence H. Tribe * whose casebook on constitutional law is often referred to by the Supreme Court * wrote that "what matters most (in the process) is that 100 senators of diverse backgrounds and philosophies" vote on the judicial nominees of any president.

ÿÿÿÿÿ By the way, do you think that the Constitution's framers would have approved of the current "blue slip" rule on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which allows a single senator to kill a nomination made by a president? Or imagine James Madison watching the recent nomination of Miguel Estrada for the D.C. Court of Appeals. Sen. Charles Schumer pounded Mr. Estrada with accusations by two anonymous sources who could not be cross-examined. Hard to justify, when you consider the basis of our entire system of justice is "due process" * fairness.

ÿÿÿÿÿ The very same Mr. Schumer, the Democrat's chief ideology enforcer, is quoted approvingly in a clueless Newsday editorial as saying that, "The problem isn't the process, it's with whom he (Bush) is nominating." But it is Mr. Schumer who exemplifies the problem with the senators on both sides of the aisle that is contorting the process. Through the years, members of the committee have been pressing nominees to pledge they would vote, if confirmed, just as these ideological senators would vote if they were judges.

ÿÿÿÿÿ The Democratic Party's rigidity was recently shown before the midterm elections, during a hearing on Mr. Estrada's nomination when he was hit with charges by those anonymous sources: Not even civil libertarians Patrick Leahy and Russell Feingold protested.

ÿÿÿÿÿ Ralph Neas, president of the often-valuable People for the American Way, is a critic of Mr. Bush's proposals * including sending each nominee to the Senate floor after the Judiciary Committee votes. People For the American Way goes hunting for judicial nominees who don't fit its ideological passions.

ÿÿÿÿÿ Mr. Neas, knowing my position on the need for a floor vote, asked me in a note, "Are you sure it is a good idea to jettison two centuries of Senate history and precedents?"

ÿÿÿÿÿ For many years, Senate precedents prevented women from voting and denied equal protection of the laws to black Americans. The pettifogging on the Senate Judiciary Committee is a precedent well-worth jettisoning so that nominees can get judicious hearings. A clear statement to this effect * supporting Mr. Bush's proposal * by the new Judiciary Committee chairman, Orrin Hatch, would be most valuable for the future of the judiciary and, therefore, for the rest of us.

letter is okay, but if there is going to be a meeting with the folks listed in there, whoever is running it needs to be sensitive to the FACA issues (don't suggest they are committee, we aren't seeking a consensus, we want individual views, etc.). don't want someone going back to their company and writing an email to the world proudly appointing themselves to some President's Healthy Forests Working Group that in fact does not exist.

WASHINGTON)) The Supreme Court agreed Monday to take a new look at federal limits on campaign contributions to candidates.
The court will decide whether certain advocacy groups can contribute to candidates' campaigns. Currently, only individuals, political action committees, political parties and other campaign committees can give to candidates.
This case is unrelated to the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, which bans unlimited corporate, labor and individual contributions to the political parties. Opponents have challenged that law in the lower courts.
The Supreme Court has been more willing to uphold limits on contributions, which justices have said could give the appearance of corruption. In June 2001, a very divided court ruled 5-4 that political parties could not spend unlimited amounts of money if they coordinated their efforts with a candidate. And in January 2000, the court voted 6-3 to back Missouri's contribution limits to state campaigns.
On the other hand, the court has struck down spending restrictions on First Amendment grounds, likening money to free speech. Such reasoning led the court in 1976 to uphold post-Watergate limits on campaign contributions but throw out restrictions on how much candidates could spend on their campaigns.

At issue is in this case is whether North Carolina Right to Life and other nonprofit advocacy corporations) groups that raise money not through business ventures but through donations from supporters) can make campaign contributions. Such groups have neither business interests nor shareholders.

This case is unrelated to the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, which bans unlimited corporate, labor and individual contributions to the political parties. Opponents have challenged that law in the lower courts.
The Supreme Court has been more willing to uphold limits on contributions, which justices have said could give the appearance of corruption. In June 2001, a very divided court ruled 5-4 that political parties could not spend unlimited amounts of money if they coordinated their efforts with a candidate. And in January 2000, the court voted 6-3 to back Missouri's contribution limits to state campaigns.
On the other hand, the court has struck down spending restrictions on First Amendment grounds, likening money to free speech. Such reasoning led the court in 1976 to uphold post-Watergate limits on campaign contributions but throw out restrictions on how much candidates could spend on their campaigns.
At issue is in this case is whether North Carolina Right to Life and other nonprofit advocacy corporations) groups that raise money not through business ventures but through donations from supporters) can make campaign contributions. Such groups have neither business interests nor shareholders.

From HHS's website. I'll find a copy of his transition-era resume and forward shortly.
Biography of Claude A. Allen
Deputy Secretary of Health and Human Services
U.S. Department of Health and Human Services
Claude A. Allen was confirmed by the Senate as the Deputy Secretary for the Department of Health and Human Services on May 26, 2001.
HHS is the federal government's principal agency for protecting the health of all Americans and providing essential human services, especially for those who are least able to help themselves. The department includes some 300 programs, covering a wide spectrum of activities, including medical and social science research, preventing outbreak of infectious disease, assuring food and drug safety, Medicare and Medicaid, financial assistance for low-income families, Head Start, substance abuse treatment and prevention and services for older Americans. The department's budget in fiscal year 2001 is $429 billion.
As Deputy Secretary, Allen works closely with HHS Secretary Tommy G. Thompson on all major policy and management issues, and he serves as the department's chief operating officer.
Prior to joining HHS, Allen was Secretary of Health and Human Resources for the Commonwealth of Virginia, leading 13 agencies and 15,000 employees. Allen led Governor Gilmore's initiative for Virginia's new Patients Bill of Rights passed in 1999, allowing patient appeals for adverse coverage decisions made by health plans, and direct access to physician specialists. Allen also spearheaded Virginia's welfare reform initiative and provided leadership to overhaul the state's mental health institutions and community services. Additionally, Allen was responsible for implementing the Governor's private health insurance program for children and families, offering lower-cost coverage options to thousands of uninsured Virginians.
Before joining the Gilmore administration, Allen was Counsel to the Attorney General, and later, Deputy Attorney General for the Civil Litigation Division in the Office of the Attorney General, Virginia. He reported directly to then-Attorney General Gilmore on legal, legislative, and policy matters, including all health, education and welfare issues.
Before joining the Office of the Attorney General, Allen practiced law in Washington, D.C., specializing in government contracts, litigation, and legislative affairs.
Allen holds both a Juris Doctorate and a Masters of Law in International and Comparative Law from Duke University Law School. He completed his undergraduate education at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, earning degrees in Political Science and Linguistics.
Allen and his wife are the proud parents of three children.

To be clear I am talking about the room that is on the 17th St side of the OEOB.

Is there anything in there?

We need that room for Nanette to have OGE people in there the week of Dec. 2-7 for "program review".

Please let me know if this isn't doable for some reason.

Circuit and District Court Judicial Nominations

First Two Years of Recent Administrations

(Bush Nomination Tallies as of November 20, 2002)

President	Congress	TOTAL Nominations Submitted	TOTAL Nominations Confirmed	Circuit Nominations Submitted	Circuit Nominations Confirmed	District Nominations Submitted	District Nominations Confirmed
Bush 43 2001-2002	107th	131	100 (76%)	32	17 (53%)	99	83 (84%)
Clinton 1993-1994	103rd	140	126 (90%)	22	19 (86%)	118	107 (91%)
Bush 41 1989-1990	101st	74	70 (95%)	23	22 (96%)	51	48 (94%)
Reagan 1981-1982	97th	88	87 (99%)	20	19 (95%)	68	68 (100%)
Carter 1977-1978	95th	69	64 (93%)	13	13 (100%)	56	51 (91%)

Vacancies: as of Nov. 20 at the end of the second year of each Administration: Clinton = 59 (7.0%), Bush 41 = 37 (4.9%), Reagan = 23 (3.4%) -- Current Vacancies: Bush = 60 (7.0%) [Note: 15% vacancy rate in circuit courts; 5% vacancy rate in district courts]

Of President Bush's first 11 circuit nominations announced May 9, 2001: 5 were confirmed (Gregory, Parker, Clement, McConnell, and Shedd). 4 did not receive a hearing (Roberts, Cook, Sutton, and Boyle), 1 received a hearing but not a committee or floor vote (Estrada), and 1 received a hearing but not a floor vote (Owen). [Note: Each of the previous three Presidents enjoyed a 100% confirmation rate for their first 11 circuit nominees, in under a year. President Reagan's first 11 circuit nominees were confirmed in an average of 39 days, President G.H.W. Bush's first 11 averaged 88 days, and President Clinton's first 11 averaged 115 days. None of their first 11 nominees waited more than 199 days before being confirmed.]

Hearing delay: As of November, 15 of President Bush's appeals court nominees waited more than a year for a hearing. That number is more than the number of appeals court nominees who had to wait a year for a hearing in the last 50 years combined.

DRAFT

Mr. William J. Van Devender
Southern Timber Venture
P. O. Box 5327
Jackson, MS 39296-5327

Dear Billy:

It was a pleasure speaking with you today regarding our November 21 meeting in Washington concerning President Bush's new Healthy Forest initiative, which will impact not only U.S. forestlands, but also all private lands and the timber manufacturing industry in the U.S. As we discussed, this is to be a plan in which the businessmen, conservationist, and Administration work together implementing favorable results for everyone. We particularly need the input from public and private industry so as to make sure we do not do anything to exacerbate the already depressed timber economy.

I would appreciate very much you letting your associates know how important this issue is to myself, Karl Rove and President Bush. He is taking a very active role and wants to see this completed in the near future. To be clear I am talking about the room that is on the 17th St side of the OEOB.

Is there anything in there?

We need that room for Nanette to have OGE people in there the week of Dec. 2-7 for "program review".

Please let me know if this isn't doable for some reason.

Vacancies: as of Nov. 20 at the end of the second year of each Administration: Clinton = 59 (7.0%), Bush 41 = 37 (4.9%), Reagan = 23 (3.4%) -- Current Vacancies: Bush = 60 (7.0%) [Note: 15% vacancy rate in circuit courts; 5% vacancy rate in district courts]

Of President Bush's first 11 circuit nominations announced May 9, 2001: 5 were confirmed (Gregory, Parker, Clement, McConnell, and Shedd). 4 did not receive a hearing (Roberts, Cook, Sutton, and Boyle), 1 received a hearing but not a committee or floor vote (Estrada), and 1 received a hearing but not a floor vote (Owen). [Note: Each of the previous three Presidents enjoyed a 100% confirmation rate for their first 11 circuit nominees, in under a year. President Reagan's first 11 circuit nominees were confirmed in an average of 39 days, President G.H.W. Bush's first 11 averaged 88 days, and President Clinton's first 11 averaged 115 days. None of their first 11 nominees waited more than 199 days before being confirmed.]

Hearing delay: As of November, 15 of President Bush's appeals court nominees waited more than a year for a hearing. That number is more than the number of appeals court nominees who had to wait a year for a hearing in the last 50 years combined.

Drunk driving statistics today were alarming. Major human and economic costs to society in terms of lives lost, injuries suffered, health care costs incurred, and overall economic impact. I wonder if there is an opportunity to do something here at the federal level.

Below are 2 emailed questions that we got some time ago from the Minority and have either not answered yet or the answers we gave spawned more questions. Since we are about to implement a new procedure---- whereby all Hill questions will come in writing to your offices first and then you'll determine which will be "farmed out" for answers that you'll provide the formal answer back to the Committee---- I wonder if we should use these questions as the first one's to be handled by this new procedure?? If so, you can send them the notification letter to this effect and then follow the new procedure if they ask these questions via a letter from the Chairman or ranking Minority Member... whatcha' think??

Liz --

in the e-mail below, Chip asked for a list of all VP travel in FEY and FEY. The lists we were provided seem to leave off dozens of trips. I noticed this when I was looking back to see when he visited my hometown -- Fayetteville, AR. It's nowhere to be found on the list. As I looked further, I don't see most of the VP's trips. In April alone, I found mentions in the news of Cheney travel to Denver, Fayetteville, Charleston WV, Richmond, Long Island, Ft. Lauderdale and Orlando that aren't on the list. Also, what happened to the 100% political trips? Why aren't they on the list?

We asked for all the trips -- not just some of the list. Now that I've noticed so many trips missing, I'd like to see the entire list as originally requested (excluding travel to secure locations). I'd also like a list of the traveling VP staff positions that are classified as "official" travelers even on a 100% political trip.

I know you have a lot going so we can talk about this after the current CR crisis subsides. I just noticed this today and wanted to get it to you for a response as soon as possible.

Thanks.

Mike

Liz --

I have a couple of questions about reimbursements for political activities.

1) Who reimbursed the Executive Residence for the White House reception for Congressional leadership held earlier this week (on the 16th, I think)? Has the organization been billed for this event yet? Has the organization paid the bill yet?

2) What steps have been taken to reimburse the government for the political activity undertaken by Jennifer Hugo when she sent political e-mails using her official EOP e-mail account? What is the formula for determining the cost to the government of this political activity? What is the amount to be reimbursed to the government? To which organization was the bill sent? Has the organization reimbursed the government yet? To which EOP agency will the reimbursement be credited?

Thanks.

Mike

Circuit and District Court Judicial Nominations

First Two Years of Recent Administrations

President	Congress	TOTAL Nominations Submitted	TOTAL Nominations Confirmed	Circuit Nominations Submitted	Circuit Nominations Confirmed	District Nominations Submitted	District Nominations Confirmed
Bush 43 2001-2002	107th	131	100 (76%)	32	17 (53%)	99	83 (84%)
Clinton 1993-1994	103rd	140	126 (90%)	22	19 (86%)	118	107 (91%)
Bush 41 1989-1990	101st	74	70 (95%)	23	22 (96%)	51	48 (94%)
Reagan 1981-1982	97th	88	87 (99%)	20	19 (95%)	68	68 (100%)
Carter 1977-1978	95th	69	64 (93%)	13	13 (100%)	56	51 (91%)

Vacancies: as of Nov. 20 at the end of the second year of each Administration: Clinton = 59 (7.0%), Bush 41 = 37 (4.9%), Reagan = 23 (3.4%) -- Current Vacancies: Bush = 60 (7.0%) [Note: 15% vacancy rate in circuit courts; 5% vacancy rate in district courts]

Of President Bush's first 11 circuit nominations announced May 9, 2001: 5 were confirmed (Gregory, Parker, Clement, McConnell, and Shedd). 4 did not receive a hearing (Roberts, Cook, Sutton, and Boyle), 1 received a hearing but not a committee or floor vote (Estrada), and 1 received a hearing but not a floor vote (Owen). [Note: Each of the previous three Presidents enjoyed a 100% confirmation rate for their first 11 circuit nominees, in under a year. President Reagan's first 11 circuit nominees were confirmed in an average of 39 days, President G.H.W. Bush's first 11 averaged 88 days, and President Clinton's first 11 averaged 115 days. None of their first 11 nominees waited more than 199 days before being confirmed.]

Hearing delay: As of November, 15 of President Bush's appeals court nominees waited more than a year for a hearing. That number is more than the number of appeals court nominees who had to wait a year for a hearing in the last 50 years combined.

Drunk driving statistics today were alarming. Major human and economic costs to society in terms of lives lost, injuries suffered, health care costs incurred, and overall economic impact. I wonder if there is an opportunity to do something here at the federal level.

Just sent you another "good news," to help your peaceful slumber. Ohio has passed a new state ban on assisted suicide. The state had no specific statute on the issue before, and the legal situation had been so unclear that Jack Kevorkian once offered to move to Ohio to continue his work.

By the way, someone in the White House should be aware that at its December 7-11 House of Delegates meeting in New Orleans, the American Medical Association has to vote on a resolution from the California Medical Association (who else?) urging the AMA to file an amicus curiae brief AGAINST attorney general Ashcroft on his efforts to enforce the federal Controlled Substances Act in Oregon. I am told it might pass. Hint: If the Administration sends an envoy to testify at the Reference Committee hearing on this, please don't let it be Dan Brock!

POLITICS: Fill the vacancies

One of the top priorities of the U.S. Senate, when it convenes in January, should be to fill judicial openings.

Even with the confirmation of District Judge Dennis Shedd to an appellate court during the lame-duck session, there are still dozens of vacancies -- and that is causing a tremendous backlog of cases.

Most, if not all, of the nominees are well qualified in terms of legal expertise and judicial temperament. For the past two years, however, the Democratic leadership has refused to allow a floor vote on many of them.

With the Republicans now in control, at last the Senate is free to act.

That doesn't mean it will be easy to get them confirmed. The Democratic leadership wants only judges committed to pursuing a liberal political agenda from the bench -- and most of President Bush's nominees, believing judges should litigate instead of legislate, wouldn't do that.

The Democratic leadership says it may filibuster against some of them. The idea would be to shut down the Senate until the president withdraws the nominations -- an irresponsible strategy that would render Congress incapable of passing legislation, no matter how vital, during a particularly troubled period in American history when some leadership from Washington is sorely needed.

In 1998, Patrick Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee, said, "I would ... fight against any filibuster on a judge, whether it is somebody I opposed or supported." At the time, a Democratic president was trying to get his judicial nominees confirmed by a Republican Senate.

A few days ago, however, Leahy said, "If there's a really bad nominee, I think a filibuster is merited." He spoke knowing that in a few weeks, a Republican president would be submitting his selections to a GOP Senate.

Leahy's situational ethics proves he and his partisan sidekicks are driven by politics, not principle. Apparently, he learned nothing from his party's Nov. 5 election defeat.

War Over Judges

FOR MONTHS Senate Republicans and Democrats have been sparring over which side more severely abused the judicial confirmation process while in control. Democrats howl at the mistreatment of President Clinton's nominees by the Republican Senate. Republicans respond that President Bush's nominees have been victims of an unprecedented escalation. With the close of the 107th Congress, it is now possible to begin comparing the two. During Mr. Clinton's first two years as president he enjoyed a Democratic Senate keen to confirm his nominees, so the best period for comparison is the two years following his reelection in 1996. And for all the rhetoric, the performance of the Republican Senate in that 105th Congress was essentially identical to the Democratic Senate's performance in the Congress just past. Both confirmed exactly 100 judges. The spread between district court and circuit court nominees was similar, as was the number of vacancies at the end of the Congress and the number of nominees returned without a vote to the president. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) can take credit for doing the same work as his predecessor, Utah Republican Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, in a shorter period of time, because Democrats took over the Senate in midstream. And the number of confirmations during this Congress is significantly greater than the number of confirmations during the time that Mr. Clinton faced a Republican Senate in which Mr. Hatch slowed down confirmations in the run-up to presidential elections. But it seems wrong either to extol or decry Mr. Leahy's stewardship of the process as dramatically different from Mr. Hatch's during the most comparable period. Both moved a respectable number of judges overall and reduced vacancies. But both left relatively large numbers of nominees not acted upon at a time when individual courts were hurting, and both treated individual nominees quite unfairly.

So the problem is systemic, not resting in one or the other party. The answer is to adopt some version of President Bush's proposals for streamlining the nominations process. Mr. Bush suggests changes in Senate rules to ensure timely votes irrespective of who is president or who controls the Senate. He should be willing to make gestures of reconciliation on this subject -- including showing some flexibility on nominations to key courts -- by way of demonstrating his commitment to a new start. But his calls for a reformed process should be heeded before the problems grow still worse.

Because of Ed's scheduling conflict, we are moving the meeting to finally to allow the Outlook rollout to move forward.

Note that this is VERY likely to be leaked to the press and therefore the names publicized. I am not at all sure we want that, so I raise that as a caution against some kind of blast e-mail. Do we think it is necessary to do that? The people who won know they won, as do their family and friends and co-workers, I am sure.

The recent U.S. Senate confirmation battle over Bush nominee Judge D. Brooks Smith for the Third Circuit Court of Appeals resulted in a rare victory for a challenged Bush nominee in the Democratic-controlled Senate. It was a victory made possible by a surprising alliance of Pennsylvania Republicans and Democrats infuriated over the Senate's treatment of Pennsylvania judicial nominees put forward by presidents of both parties. Judge Smith was confirmed because both Republicans and Democrats had had enough, enough smear campaigns, enough sour memories of Robert Bork and a host of other Bush and Clinton nominees delayed or blocked.
The judicial confirmation process is broken, and the recent elections put the onus of fixing it on my own Republican Party.
Neither party has clean hands in this matter. Hearing delays or no hearings at all, combined with a flat refusal to hold votes on nominees either in the Senate Judiciary Committee or the full Senate itself became the norm as judicial nominees of both parties were treated with routine contempt in recent years. Not only was this unfair to the nominees themselves (one Clinton nominee from Pennsylvania waited 996 days for a hearing that never came); it has caused severe problems in the judicial system itself.
The American Bar Association says the confirmation delays have created an "emergency situation." Chief Justice William Rehnquist calls the problem "alarming." Sitting judges "borrow" judges from other circuits to help shoulder the overwhelming workload that crowds the federal docket. Justice for those caught in the maw of the system trickles down, its swiftness hobbled by Senate politics.
It's time to start fixing the problem. We need to separate process from policy when selecting federal judges. Policy is always separated from process when choosing legislators and executives. Candidates may be left, right or center - yet a neutral, precise calendar sets deadlines for elections that apply regardless of a candidate's views. On the first Tuesday after the first Monday in every November, America emerges with a slate of newly elected or re-elected officials, no matter their political affiliation.
Federal judges deserve no less.
Sen. Arlen Specter, the leader in the Smith fight, has put forward a protocol to end the sham of the current confirmation process once and for all. Along with President Bush, he has proposed a strict timetable for confirming federal judges. Setting schedules for hearings, committee votes and votes on the Senate floor, it would apply to judicial nominees of all Presidents regardless of which party controls the Senate.
It is also time for Senate hearings to discuss other problems with the process, such as:
The use of outside "experts," in reality ideological allies of either side willing to spout partisan lines disguised as disinterested observers.

The role of special interest groups whose financial and staff resources outpace those of any Republican or Democratic Justice Department and Judiciary Committee, resulting in senators depending on extremist group spin in the form of so-called "basic research."
The imbalance of power between wealthy interest groups who can wage campaign-style attacks against judicial nominees forbidden to fight back.
For those on all sides who consider the issues of abortion, civil rights, the environment, employment law, religious liberty, consumer protections, and much more to be important, reform of the process is the only way to ensure that nominees they support are treated fairly. Process reform should be bipartisan, approached with a spirit of good-faith compromise and consensus. And done by Republicans working with Democrats, as President Bush suggests.

Yes, I have been gathering and reading material (most of it a waste), and I am putting the basics in a simple memo format that you can read and distribute. The legal rules are pretty simple. I would have given you some of the raw material before you left, but that seemed (and seems) a major waste of your time until I cull out the important stuff into a memo/outline and we then discuss the draft.

I don't think they mean for Karl to take pictures. It is meant for his staff to take pictures for whenever they meet with people, or invite them to the WH or take them to a Marine One visit, so that they can distribute back to them as an extra favor to them or to distribute to the press.

Patrick,
One idea that came out of the brainstorming session of a recent meeting between OSI, OPL, and OPA, was to have Karl purchase a digital camera that could be used by his staff to photograph events where the President is not in attendance (i.e. events with staff that are held here at the White House) and perhaps supplement the White House Photographers photos at events he does attend. The question came up as to whether there would be any legal restrictions on the use of this camera and the distribution (via e-mail) of the photographs that would be taken.

Would you be willing to run by the correct Associate Counsel (ethics??) to get an opinion on this matter.

Thanks,
Doug

Brett,
Is it ok for Karl and/or Ken and/or Matt to write thank you notes to individuals i n the Administration who volunteered for the RNC's 72 hour program? Should these notes/letters be on political/personal stationary?
Are there any other guidelines that shoul d be followed?
Thanks,
Doug

Brett, the email below is self-explanatory. I am inclined to deny the request and refer Ms. Shiner to the Clinton Library and/or the Archives, fearing we'd be setting a bad precedent. What are your thoughts? Am I being too cautious? Technically, the records she seeks should have been sent to the Clinton Library already with the end of the prior Administration.

Thanks.

Manny,

Thanks for your message. I do think it would be helpful for us to attend;
whether doing so would be appropriate for OLP folks as DoJ officials is a matter that I will have to consider after proper consultations. Many thanks,

Viet

Brett,
I mentioned to you that Makan thought it would be useful to schedule a visit from Ken Melman and others to do a presentation for all Judiciary counsel and staff on the results of the election, particularly if they can extrapolate any

conclusions regarding our issues, especially judges.
I thought that we might invite the OLP staff and you all to join us, and perhaps key others.
As Grover Norquist did, once the WH team is scheduled we will invite a couple of other outside groups with polling analysis to do their presentations to follow.
All of this will be very helpful as we develop message and strategy in the months to come.
The target date and time might be Wednesday, Dec 4 at 3:00, and if not on Thursday afternoon anytime.
Please let me know.
Thanks, Manny

Al, Tim, Brett, Jen:

Wanted to be sure you know that the Fed. Cir. issued its decision today in Haddon v. Executive Residence at the White House, Nos. 01-6001, 01-6002, 2002 WL 31662798 (Fed. Cir. November 27, 2002). Here is the bottom line:

". . . For the reasons set forth below, we affirm the EEOC's decision that the Executive Residence did not discriminate against Mr. Haddon when it discharged him and subsequently decided not to rehire him. We reverse the EEOC's decision that the Executive Residence violated Mr. Haddon's rights when it temporarily rescinded his access to the White House. . . ."

If not a political fundraiser, this would be akin to speaking to an outside interest group (i.e., official activity for Ken) and the invite therefore can stay as is.

If not a political fundraiser, this would be akin to speaking to an outside interest group (i.e., official activity for Ken) and the invite therefore can stay as is.

Politics rules the White House, former aide says
By SCOTT LINDLAW Associated Press Writer
WASHINGTON (AP) Politics and re-election concerns rule the White House at the expense of good public policy, says a former aide to President Bush.
Not so, White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said Monday, dismissing comments from John J. DiIulio as ``baseless and groundless.''
DiIulio issued two statements, the first generally standing by his criticism, the second similar to Fleischer's comment calling his own allegations ``groundless and baseless due to poorly chosen words and examples.''
DiIulio, a Democrat who led the White House office of faith-based initiatives until August 2001, said in an interview with Esquire magazine: ``There is no precedent in any modern White House for what is going on in this one: complete lack of a policy apparatus.''
``What you've got is everything, and I mean everything, being run by the political arm. It's the reign of the Mayberry Machiavellis,'' he was quoted as saying in the January issue. Rove, DiIulio said, is ``enormously powerful, maybe the single most powerful person in the modern, post-Hoover era ever to occupy a political-adviser post near the Oval Office.''
Fleischer said of the Esquire article, ``Any suggestion that the White House makes decisions that are not based on sound policy reasons is baseless and groundless.''
DiIulio did not back down in the first statement he released Monday through the University of Pennsylvania, where he teaches. He did dispute two quotes, neither of which involved his assertion that re-election interests are paramount in the Bush White House.
One was a passage in which he was quoted saying that what White House domestic policy adviser Margaret LaMontagne ``knows about domestic policy could fit in a thimble.'' DiIulio said Monday he had no recollection of making that statement but ``I humbly and sincerely apologize to her just the same.''

He said one unspecified exchange with Rove depicted in the article ``did not occur as such.'' He was apparently referring to a passage in which he complained to Rove about the heavy presence of Christian evangelical leaders in the White House. DiIulio tells Rove in the article: ``I'm not taking any (expletive) off of Jerry Falwell.''
DiIulio's first statement Monday said the article ``is unjustly hard on Mr. Rove and over-the-top complimentary to me, thereby creating a too-pat contrast that is, I feel, MOST UNFAIR TO MR. ROVE.'' DiIulio did not say how the article was unfair. But, he said, ``I regret any and all misimpressions.''
After DiIulio's first statement, Fleischer said DiIulio had ``issued an apology.''
Shortly after the press secretary's criticism, DiIulio issued a second statement that was strikingly similar to Fleischer's comments. ``John DiIulio agrees that his criticisms were groundless and baseless due to poorly chosen words and examples. He sincerely apologizes and is deeply remorseful,'' a university spokeswoman said.
DiIulio declined to elaborate.
He had led a White House office promoting Bush's ``faith-based initiative,'' which stalled in Congress amid fierce debate over how religious programs can get government money without running afoul of the constitutional separation of church and state. He is a professor of politics, religion, and civil society at the University of Pennsylvania.

I was asked to attend senior staff at 7:30 a.m. tomorrow. I have 5 interviews scheduled tomorrow (although I could have missed those). And I was asked to prepare Judge for his presentation tomorrow evening on the issue we discussed: That required a lengthy meeting today, a follow-up memo I am now preparing, and another meeting tomorrow. I did not want to go through all of that at the party in front of others (and that part is all confidential), but those are the relevant facts.

This is true. Be aware that there was a third nominee to the Fifth Circuit, Edith Clement of Louisiana, who was confirmed. But I do not think you need to change the wording below, which is accurate.

brett, is this an accurately worded stmt? for vp's briefing book...he is doing LA radio in the morning.

"The President nominated two highly qualified judges (Pickering and Owens) to the fifth circuit court of appeals, which covers Louisiana, but both were blocked by Democrats on a strictly partisan basis."

PRIMARY LEGAL/APPEARANCE ISSUES RELATED TO RE-ELECTION

What legal restrictions apply to White House officials with respect to the campaign?

The law expressly permits White House officials and Senate-confirmed officials in the Executive Branch to engage in extensive political activity, including while on duty and in their offices. White House officials therefore may exercise significant responsibility over the conduct of the President's re-election campaign (and White House officials have done so for past Presidents).

The main restrictions on White House officials are that they may not (i) solicit contributions, (ii) knowingly use their official titles on invitations to political events such as fundraisers, or (iii) "coerce" others such as subordinates or those with business before the government into political activity.

How do the legal restrictions on the President differ?

The President's title always may be used, and he may solicit contributions. But he should not solicit funds in a government office, including by use of the telephone in a government office. (This was the issue with Vice President Gore.) The President may solicit funds from calls made from the Residence, although appearance issues can arise with such calls.

What about the use for campaign purposes of government equipment such as computers, printers, paper, copiers, FAXes, telephones, and e-mail?

The government must be reimbursed for those non-incidental costs that the government would not have incurred but for the political activity. In practice, this principle applies primarily to paper and long-distance telephone calls that are charged on a per-call basis (no additional costs are ordinarily incurred from use of the other equipment listed above). Out of an abundance of caution, however, it may be prudent to ensure that those White House officials with significant involvement in the campaign have separate equipment or only campaign-provided equipment (as well as separate campaign e-mail addresses). The Office of Political Affairs has followed this practice. At a minimum, we should ensure that the campaign pays (in advance, where possible) a clearly sufficient amount for use of existing government equipment.

Who pays for travel costs when the President travels on campaign activity?

A long-standing formula is employed to divide costs between the government and the campaign. The campaign generally will pay equivalent first-class airfare, as well as hotel, food, and related costs, for the President and the other "political travelers," including those doing advance work. Costs related to security and secure communications are always paid by the government, and certain travelers are always deemed official, such as the Secret Service, personal aide, Chief of Staff, and National Security Advisor.

Are any additional rules or policies imposed on travel by Executive Branch officials other than the President?

As a matter of policy, we have prevented Executive Branch officials from flying on corporate-owned aircraft to political events, even if reimbursed by the political entity. This policy has worked well so far.

What about non-PAS employees in Cabinet departments?

These officials may engage in political activity, but may not do so while on duty or in a government building. They must take leave for any political activity that will keep them away from their official duties.

What about communications between campaign officials and White House officials?

There are no legal restrictions on communications between campaign officials and White House officials. Appearance issues can arise when campaign officials seek to improperly influence official decisions on particular matters (as distinct from broad policy decisions).

What are the likely "appearance" issues that will receive media scrutiny, and how can we avoid them or respond to them?

First, as in the mid-term cycle, we can expect stories about the costs of Presidential travel on Air Force One and the costs of the associated official personnel (such as Secret Service) who travel with the President.

Response: These stories are largely unavoidable; we would simply continue to emphasize that we are complying with law and bipartisan tradition and that the only alternative is for the President either not to travel at all or to travel without necessary security precautions and communications equipment.

Second, as revealed in the 1996 Presidential campaign, fundraising activities are closely scrutinized from many angles: (i) the location where fundraising activities occur (e.g., government office telephones), (ii) the nature and location of donor maintenance events (e.g., White House coffees), (iii) the identities of the people who contribute, and (iv) the White House benefits purportedly bestowed upon contributors (e.g., Lincoln bedroom sleepovers).

Response: We must continue to monitor all issues related to Presidential political fundraising. We would continue to caution against donor maintenance events or benefits (for donors qua donors) in government buildings. We also would recommend that donors be strictly scrutinized by the campaign officials.

Third, the use of government-purchased equipment for political purposes has received attention in the past.

Response: As outlined above, we recommend that we use precise and strict (and easily understood) procedures to ensure that the government incurs no additional costs as a result of campaign activity.

Fourth, there routinely are stories about official action allegedly taken for political purposes.

Special Report: Election 2002
By Taking Initiative, GOP Seized the Day
by John Berlau
Dec. 10-23, 2002
Insight on the News
Pundits predicted 2002 would be the first time the growing number of nonwhites in the "emerging Democratic majority" would put the Democratic Party over the top. Instead, Republicans won handily and both sides still are trying to figure how the demographics played in Peoria.
The usual task of figuring out which groups voted for what party and in which numbers has been made harder by the fact that the Voter News Service, which conducts national exit polls for the TV networks, announced it would not release this year's results because of flaws in the polling data. It may be months before other postelection polls are released. Still, a consensus has emerged that the traditional Republican white voters were more motivated to come to the polls than typically Democratic blacks and Hispanics. The New York Times credits (or blames) "white, rural, Republican-leaning voters" with providing the margin of victory in Georgia and other states.
If so, that's only half the story, say activists across the country who stumped for Republicans. It's certainly true that Republicans intensified the ground-war effort to get their traditional base to the polls (see "Message Received," Nov. 26-Dec. 9) - a fact that the establishment media are beginning to acknowledge after initial efforts to explain away the 2002 election results as a 9/11 fluke. But this same media has barely noticed that Republicans also made significant inroads into Democratic territory by taking the message directly to black and Hispanic voters.

This year, for the first time, the GOP did more than just showcase a few of its black and Hispanic faces. Its candidates campaigned in black and Hispanic neighborhoods and related media outlets with the same message they took to white voters. "It was a dialogue instead of a monologue," says Richard Nadler, a consultant to the Kansas City-based Council for Better Government, who produced pro-Republican issue ads on radio stations in 12 states.

One of the most dramatic examples of success from this outreach was the campaign of conservative incumbent Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.). Many polls taken just before the election, including those by the respected pollster John Zogby, showed Allard losing to his Democratic opponent, trial lawyer Tom Strickland. Yet Allard won by a five-point margin. How did this happen? Many say Allard's efforts to court his state's Hispanics made the difference. According to a poll by Fox News/Opinion Dynamics, Allard won 29 percent of the Hispanic vote. (Although not an exit poll, the Fox surveys were conducted by phone in 10 battleground states on the eve of the election and on Election Day. About 900 voters were polled in each state). This was a big increase over his showing among Hispanics in the 1996 election, and four points higher than President George W. Bush's share of the Hispanic vote in Colorado in 2000. And, according to the Fox poll, Hispanics comprised 10 percent of Colorado's electorate, making them a crucial voting bloc.

Observers credit both Allard's campaign and the Colorado Republican Party for getting their message to Hispanics. "In the past, we really didn't get out and tell people what we were doing for the Latino community," says Ada Diaz Kirby, a Denver public-relations executive who was hired to help the Colorado GOP with outreach efforts. "This time we went after it very aggressively. We did it in Spanish. We did it in English. We worked with the media, and we knocked on a lot of doors. We exposed our candidates a lot more. I think we did everything we could do just to get our message out."

Last February, Allard hired Denver consultant Juan B. Botero as director of strategic outreach. Allard put ads on Spanish-language radio and TV stations and in newspapers, and spoke at Hispanic churches and events. About a week before the election, the senator attended a mariachi concert where he was endorsed by the Christian band Mariachi Vasquez, a family of musicians popular in the region. The Sunday evening before the election, Allard and his wife went to the Iglesia del Cristo el Shadai, a large Hispanic evangelical Protestant church in Denver, where Allard spoke and visited with churchgoers for three hours. The speech was carried on local Hispanic radio.

Botero said that Allard stressed the traditional Republican issues of tax cuts and economic opportunity. "[Allard] made the point at events that he really appreciates the contributions of the Hispanic community in terms of culture and how much they contribute to Colorado's economy," Botero tells Insight. "[Allard's message on taxes] hit home quite a bit because, for the most part in the Hispanic community, they're working two jobs or several jobs to stay afloat, and they know that they're paying too much in taxes. We emphasized quite a bit that families are working one out of every three years just to pay off their federal taxes." Allard also emphasized his support for Bush's proposed American Dream Downpayment Fund to help renters purchase their first home. When the Republican Party was attacked as being the party of the rich, Botero said the Allard campaign and the Colorado GOP would counter, "Did you come to this country to be poor?"

Allard also stressed the blocking by Senate Democrats of Miguel Estrada, the president's nominee for a federal judgeship and a highly respected Hispanic attorney. For more than a year, the Senate Judiciary Committee had refused to give Estrada even a hearing. "Here's a guy that comes in from Honduras when he's a teen-ager, knows no English, learns English, goes to Princeton and then to Harvard," Botero says. "We made it very clear that the only people opposing Miguel Estrada's nomination in the Senate were Democrats."

Others who succeeded among Hispanics include Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who picked up 56 percent of the Hispanic vote, according to the Fox poll. While Florida has a high population of Republican-leaning Cuban-Americans, this was a 7 percent improvement from President Bush's exit-poll performance in 2000, meaning that Jeb Bush probably picked up a substantial portion of non-Cuban Hispanics as well. The victorious Texas Republican candidates for the U.S. Senate and governorship won between 33 and 35 percent of the Hispanic vote even though a Hispanic was running for governor as a Democrat.

And Colorado's Kirby says the conservative message wasn't compromised, just taken to more people. "Basically, our message is the same," she says. "It's just that we're starting to get better at telling people what we stand for and what we can help them with. We're going out in the street. I went to some of the poorest Hispanic neighborhoods and I knocked on doors. ... We always had the right message, but we just weren't getting the message out, and I think now we've gotten really aggressive in doing that."

This time, many Republican campaigns and issue groups also were aggressive in campaigning in black neighborhoods and reaching out to African-American media. For years, consultants have been telling Republicans that actively courting black votes was a waste of time. Since African-Americans vote so overwhelmingly for Democrats, they argued, better not to increase turnout by stirring up the pot. But after two election cycles of ads on black radio implying Republicans were all but Klansmen, many activists say, they decided that Republicans had to get their message out in the black media and in black neighborhoods. All sorts of Democratic ads calling Republicans racist ran in 1998 and 2000 on radio stations with mostly black audiences, predicting doomsday scenarios if Republicans won. One particularly strident ad featured the sound of cars dragging Texas lynching victim James Byrd and suggested that, as governor, George W. Bush was responsible for his death. This was despite the fact that Byrd's killers were caught promptly and sentenced to death during Bush's tenure.

Several GOP activists and campaigns decided that this year they not only wouldn't leave Democratic fear-mongering unchallenged, they would pre-empt it. In Kansas City, Republican activist John Altevogt, with Nadler and businessman John Uhlmann as consultants, formed the Council for Better Government (CBG) to launch a series of radio and TV ads directed to African-Americans in 12 battleground states including Colorado, Missouri, Georgia and North Carolina. Running during popular radio programs such as the Tom Joyner Morning Show, the ads featured blacks criticizing the Democratic Party and praising GOP ideas.

"Before my kids were born, I was a Democrat, but soon I started to wonder," a black man said on one of the spots. "Our leaders called school choice a Republican conspiracy, but they sent their own children to private schools. Mine went to schools I chose, and Republican charter-school laws helped me do it. ... Democrats advised me to scorn wealth; Republicans taught me to get some. I'm the first member of my family to vote Republican, but I won't be the last."

Other ads from the CBG talked about how military readiness declined under Clinton, hurting black soldiers, and continued the theme that the Social Security system forces blacks to pay "reverse reparations" because many blacks die before they can collect it. The Republican GOPAC political organization stopped running spots such as these and disavowed responsibility under pressure from Democrats, but many admired the fact that they dared lay it out straight.

Working with the CBG was Star Parker, a conservative black motivational speaker and Radio America commentator who is a former welfare mother. She recorded answering-machine messages talking about the parties' differences on abortion, education and Social Security.

Did these ads and other GOP outreach efforts to blacks work? Well, something clearly happened with the black vote. For instance, there were not the usual number of black voters for Democrats that the Dems counted on to carry them in Missouri and the states of the old Confederacy, but the lack of

data makes it hard to tell at this stage whether fewer turned out to vote or a higher share voted for Republicans. The Fox poll does not show that the GOP got a higher share of the black votes in most of the states it surveyed.

Parker argues that, even if there was a lower black turnout, it still represents a victory of sorts because it shows Republican efforts helped convince blacks that Democrats are not the saviors they crack themselves up to be. In fact, a few days before the elections, John Judis, coauthor of the much-heralded book The Emerging Democratic Majority, blasted the Republican ads in a New Republic article as part of "this year's GOP efforts to suppress the minority vote." But Parker counters that the ads never urged blacks not to vote, and that if blacks decided to stay home after learning the differences between the parties, this was an informed choice.
"Staying home on Election Day is a response," Parker tells Insight. "I want to stand against those who say we suppressed the black vote. We did not have dogs, we were not moving polling places, we did not have hoods on our heads.
What we did was inform them of what Democrats represent, and they made a clear choice. They chose not to go to the polls and vote for Democrats."
Parker adds that the ads were a first step for Republicans. The black voters who couldn't make themselves vote for Democrats this time should be ready affirmatively to vote for the GOP in 2004, she says. Judging from the outreach efforts, individual campaigns and state parties agreed that the GOP
should be telling blacks what it has to offer. In the race for the U.S.
Senate in Missouri, where many of the CBG ads were running, former Rep. Jim Talent campaigned in black neighborhoods and churches in his successful but very close race to unseat Democratic incumbent Jean Carnahan. He brought popular black Republicans such as his House colleague Rep. J.C. Watts of Oklahoma to talk about his work on tax cuts for inner-city business districts and support for school choice.
Responding to those consultants who say Republicans only should spend resources on getting their traditional base, Talent campaign manager Lloyd Smith says no segment of voters can be written off. "The key is, yeah, you get your base out, but you don't ignore all the other elements of the voting population," Smith tells Insight. "If you just write off a segment of the population, or even if you just write off a geographic area of a city or state, you're not doing the voters a service, and you're probably not doing the right political thing, either. This is a case where doing the right thing politically is also doing the right thing for the people who you're trying to represent."
Even in Georgia, where state party chairman Ralph Reed is credited with turning out white rural voters to vote GOP as never before, minority voters were not overlooked. Victorious Republican U.S. Senate candidate Saxby Chambliss and winning gubernatorial candidate Sonny Perdue campaigned in Hispanic neighborhoods, according to Sora Chavez McFarlane, the Hispanic outreach director for the Georgia Republican Party. And 300,000 brochures for blacks were sent out in which Eddie Slaughter, president of the Georgia chapter of the Black Farmers and Agriculturalists Association, touted Chambliss' efforts as a member of the House of Representatives in getting the U.S. Department of Agriculture to settle discrimination claims made by black farmers, state party spokeswoman Elizabeth Dewberry tells Insight.
And
Slaughter also touted Georgia Republicans for GOP ads on black radio stations.
Black farmers also may have played a role in former Republican Rep. Mark Sanford's defeat of incumbent Democratic governor Jim Hodges in South Carolina. As Insight previously reported, Hodges refused to speak out against a county "smart-growth" program backed by environmental groups such as the Sierra Club that had enraged black farmers by proposing to turn their land into "preservation areas" that couldn't be developed (see "'Smart-Growth' Plan Riles Black Farmers," Sept. 16). Sanford had told Insight that he would protect private-property rights and opposed "the idea of government dictating who can basically do what with their land." He added that if there are "shenanigans" with local governments "trying to downzone land so they can buy it cheaper, I would say that that's not right and try to take corrective measures."

After Insight 's story brought the issue to national attention, Sanford met with representatives of the farmers as part of an aggressive outreach effort to court blacks. Although Fox News did not poll the South Carolina race, the general consensus is that Hodges did not get the number of black votes he needed either because fewer African-Americans turned out or more voted Republican.

LaVerne Neal, who owns land in a proposed "preservation area" and whose son, Joe Neal, is a Democratic state representative and chairman of the Legislative Black Caucus, tells Insight that Sanford talked to her for 20 minutes on the phone and that she was very impressed. "He touched on a lot of things I was interested in," she recalls. "I think he'll make a good governor if he sticks to what he said he was going to do."

Mrs. Neal, 72 and a lifelong Democrat, would not reveal to Insight for whom she ended up voting. And that, after all, is every citizen's prerogative.

Who in this office, if anyone, worked on the Card memo referred to in the below N.Y. Times article?

Bush Restoring Cash Bonuses for Political Appointees
By ERIC LICHTBLAU

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 * The White House has decided that several thousand political appointees across the federal government will be eligible for cash bonuses, abandoning a Clinton-era prohibition that grew out of questionable practices in the first Bush administration.
Administration officials said the policy shift, ordered by the White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., earlier this year but never publicly disclosed, seeks to correct the inequity of political appointees' working side by side with civil servants who routinely receive bonuses.
The new policy is being instituted at many federal departments, and a few agencies have already begun distributing awards of several thousand dollars each to political appointees. For example, the Justice Department has given bonuses to political appointees who were deemed to have played important roles in counterterrorism and the Sept. 11 investigation, officials said.
The policy is causing rumblings of discontent from some career officials.
They say the policy threatens to reward employees for political loyalty and could force career civil servants to compete against well-connected political appointees for the millions of dollars in bonus money that their bosses distribute each year. The Bush administration did not help matters last week with the announcement that it was setting pay increases for career federal employees below what Congress was seeking.
An Oct. 8 Justice Department memorandum explaining how the bonuses will be distributed within the department says that awards for political appointees "will be limited to truly outstanding performance that contributes directly to achieving the president's and the attorney general's national goals and objectives."
For the first time in eight years, cabinet-level officials and agency chiefs have been authorized to approve annual awards of up to $10,000 * and possibly more * for the influential senior attorneys, policy advisers, confidential assistants and other appointees who are brought onto their political staffs. Awards can total $25,000 * or higher with approval from the White House. Senior political appointees typically earn from $115,000 to $140,000 a year.

Mr. Card said in a previously undisclosed March 29 memorandum to cabinet secretaries and agency chiefs that he wanted to reward "substantial work achievements that go well beyond the performance of routine duties." "Political employees should be judged and rewarded in the same manner as career employees," the memorandum said.

Mr. Bush's aides say the White House policy shift reflects the administration's emphasis on a "results-oriented government," rewarding excellence and productivity by all federal employees.

Critics, however, say they see the potential for abuse.

"I think it's a dangerous precedent to establish," said Leon E. Panetta, a White House chief of staff under President Bill Clinton. "If you start giving cash awards to political appointees, it can be abused by handing out cash because someone's doing a good job politically or just knows the right people."

In 1994, Mr. Panetta prohibited bonuses to senior political appointees after negative publicity surrounding bonuses given out in the waning days of the administration of President George Bush.

Among more than $100,000 in awards that Attorney General William Barr approved in January 1993, in his final weeks in office, were $7,500 bonuses to two of his closest political aides, who then went on to join him at the Washington law firm where he was a partner.

Mr. Panetta's restrictions caused years of frustrations for some senior political appointees who were restrained from rewarding political appointees who worked under them.

"I was giving out bonuses for career people and not giving bonuses to political staff who often worked a lot harder than the career people did," a former Justice Department official recalled. "It was frustrating."

But some departments have found ways to skirt the restrictions. Congressional investigators at the General Accounting Office found last year that several hundred political appointees received performance bonuses of as much as $17,000 from September 1999 to April 2001, apparently in violation of the 1994 policy. In 15 cases, political appointees had to give the money back because the payments violated a separate law banning bonuses to political appointees during a blackout period surrounding presidential elections.

The new White House bonus policy affects political appointees in two categories: noncareer Senior Executive Service officials, who fall just below presidential appointees in rank, and Schedule C employees, who are lower-ranking and lower-paid. They totaled at least 1,935 political appointees as of the most recent federal count.

Although political appointees make up only a tiny fraction of the 1.7 million federal work force, they often wield extensive influence at the highest reaches of government.

In setting the schedules and agendas of cabinet members, guiding political strategy and rendering legal opinions and policy advice, political appointees often play a critical behind-the-scenes role * sometimes to the consternation of career employees who view them as "short-timers" who are rewarded for their connections.

Schedule C appointees will be eligible for performance awards, while Senior Executive Service appointees will be eligible for cash awards "based on contributions to government economy, efficiency or effectiveness," though not for straight performance bonuses, Mr. Card's memorandum said.

"Due the sensitivity of this parity issue," Mr. Card added in the memorandum, cabinet secretaries and agency chiefs should review all awards for their political appointees.

Mr. Card required top-level review to ensure "that political appointees are not getting any special treatment," a White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, said.

Political appointees will continue to be ineligible for cash or time-off awards in the eight months surrounding presidential elections, Mr. Card noted in his memorandum.

Presidential appointees * cabinet secretaries, agency chiefs and senior deputies whose confirmations must go before the Senate * are still exempted from bonuses. Congress operates under a separate system, with individual members given discretion to award bonuses to their own staff members.

The White House directed departments to move ahead with the new awards policy on their own, and that has led to a somewhat disjointed implementation. The Justice Department and the Department of Housing and Urban Development, for instance, have already begun distributing awards of several thousand dollars each to some political appointees in recent weeks, officials said.

At many other departments, however, officials are still developing the criteria and, in some cases, are planning stricter standards than the White House suggested. The Environmental Protection Agency, for example, plans to require that political appointees be on the job at least a year to be eligible for an award.

At still other departments, officials plan to continue the ban on political bonuses.

Some career officials and good-government advocates said they were concerned by what apparently was a lack of oversight, direction or public and Congressional discussion surrounding a policy change with broad ramifications.

"If done well, this change can be a smart way to connect performance to rewards," said Max Stier, president of Partnership for Public Service, a nonprofit group that promotes federal civil service work.

"But obviously you need a system that's going to be viewed as fair, and to do that, you need the data to know what's happening and to know that expectations are being met," Mr. Stier said.

Some career officials said that what the White House saw as a move to reward strong performances may be seen instead as another slap at civil servants.

The Bush administration has moved in recent weeks to place as many as 850,000 government jobs up for competition from private contractors. On Friday, the White House announced that the raise for federal civil servants next year would be 3.1 percent, lower than the 4.1 percent sought by Congress.

The administration's effort to reward political appointees threatens to increase tensions, particularly because civil servants will apparently be competing with appointees for the limited bonus pools, some civil service advocates said. Administration officials said no extra money was planned to pay for the political bonuses.

NEC has some issues that include financial, internet/technology and others and is looking for a contact in our office. Patrick advises that we don't have anyone currently assigned to this issue. If that's right, does anyone want it?

Brad--Thanks for the disclaimer language. Here's an update on where we're going in case you have any thoughts.

--On amending the OA-62 access agreement form, I'm proposing to add the following paragraph:

10) I acknowledge the following:

a) Any and all e-mail sent and received through my EOP account may be automatically preserved, and I have NO EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY in the contents of these e-mails.

b) A disclosure statement may be automatically attached to e-mail originating from my account, and any attempt to alter or eliminate such a statement is strictly prohibited.

(We will also amend the paragraph on the Limited Unofficial Use Policy to reflect the date of Judge Gonzales's memo.)

--For the splash screen on logon (which will come after the current screen), Here's the language I came up with:

" I acknowledge that any e-mail and attachments sent or received by EOP account holders may be automatically preserved."

--Per my voice-mail, the CIO expressed a preference in sending a Postmaster. It might look something like the attachment below. If your office still prefers that we not go that route or abbreviate the content, just let me know and I'll pass that on.

Adam: attached please find the final text that Ed McNally, Brett Kavanaugh, and I developed for use with EOP e-mails as we transition to Outlook. Be careful about doing a cut-and-paste from this document, as the redline feature was used in the document, and certain electronic reproduction of a redlined Word document can inadvertently reveal edits or earlier versions.

As for procedure, we have concluded that this footer should be added only to e-mails being sent through the gateway to addresses outside the White House complex.

With respect to other warnings, please proceed with your idea to add a paragraph to the standard OA-62 form and to the logon after the security statement. Please do not arrange for a POSTMASTER message.

Beginning in December 2002, Microsoft Outlook will be distributed to selected offices within the EOP as a replacement for Lotus Notes. This new application includes E-mail, calendaring, and contact management, as well as integration with the Microsoft Office suite of tools.

Effective with this implementation, each time a user sends an E-mail to an external address, i.e., an E-mail address with a suffix other than eop.gov, the following disclaimer message will be appended to the message.

"NOTICE: All e-mail and attachments sent or received by staff of the Executive Office of the President of the United States may be automatically preserved. If you have any reason to believe that you may have received this message in error, please delete the e-mail and any attachments and notify the sender immediately."

This text will automatically be added to the bottom of the E-mail after the user clicks send. The appending of this legal disclaimer will be effective for both Microsoft Outlook and Lotus Notes E-mail users. In addition, an abbreviated version of the disclaimer will appear when a user opens Mircosoft Outlook. The user must acknowledge the message by pressing the OK button to continue.

Below are 2 emailed questions that we got some time ago from the Minority and have either not answered yet or the answers we gave spawned more questions. Since we are about to implement a new procedure---- whereby all Hill questions will come in writing to your offices first and then you'll determine which will be "farmed out" for answers that you'll provide the formal answer back to the Committee---- I wonder if we should use these questions as the first one's to be handled by this new procedure?? If so, you can send them the notification letter to this effect and then follow the new procedure if they ask these questions via a letter from the Chairman or ranking Minority Member... whatcha' think??

in the e-mail below, Chip asked for a list of all VP travel in FEY and FEY. The lists we were provided seem to leave off dozens of trips. I noticed this when I was looking back to see when he visited my hometown -- Fayetteville, AR. It's nowhere to be found on the list. As I looked further, I don't see most of the VP's trips. In April alone, I found mentions in the news of Cheney travel to Denver, Fayetteville, Charleston WV, Richmond, Long Island, Ft. Lauderdale and Orlando that aren't on the list. Also, what happened to the 100% political trips? Why aren't they on the list?

We asked for all the trips -- not just some of the list. Now that I've noticed so many trips missing, I'd like to see the entire list as originally requested (excluding travel to secure locations). I'd also like a list of the traveling VP staff positions that are classified as "official" travelers even on a 100% political trip.

I know you have a lot going so we can talk about this after the current CR crisis subsides. I just noticed this today and wanted to get it to you for a response as soon as possible.

Thanks.

Mike

Liz --

I have a couple of questions about reimbursements for political activities.

1) Who reimbursed the Executive Residence for the White House reception for Congressional leadership held earlier this week (on the 16th, I think)? Has the organization been billed for this event yet? Has the organization paid the bill yet?

2) What steps have been taken to reimburse the government for the political activity undertaken by Jennifer Hugo when she sent political e-mails using her official EOP e-mail account? What is the formula for determining the cost to the government of this political activity? What is the amount to be reimbursed to the government? To which organization was the bill sent? Has the organization reimbursed the government yet? To which EOP agency will the reimbursement be credited?

Thanks.

Mike

Liz --

I have a couple of questions about reimbursements for political activities.

1) Who reimbursed the Executive Residence for the White House reception for Congressional leadership held earlier this week (on the 16th, I think)? Has the organization been billed for this event yet? Has the organization paid the bill yet?

2) What steps have been taken to reimburse the government for the political activity undertaken by Jennifer Hugo when she sent political e-mails using her official EOP e-mail account? What is the formula for determining the cost to the government of this political activity? What is the amount to be reimbursed to the government? To which organization was the bill sent? Has the organization reimbursed the government yet? To which EOP agency will the reimbursement be credited?

Thanks.

Mike

kara,

attached are a video request and script that henry and izzy are familiar with for a video greeting to be included in the Walt Disney World X-mas parade broadcast on ABC. the video would need to be sent out by the 12th -- making the existing taping on the 10th the optimal date. as henry and izzy can attest, this matter was recently referred to our office as a follow up to the NBC broadcast of the Thanksgiving parade greeting. in essence, disney has long wanted a greeting in their parade and having seen the recent broadcast they have indicated that they would be thrilled ot have a slightly longer version of what was broadcast on the Macy's parade as customized to their X-mas broadcast.

we look forward to your feedback -- lindsey

Below are 2 emailed questions that we got some time ago from the Minority and have either not answered yet or the answers we gave spawned more questions. Since we are about to implement a new procedure---- whereby all Hill questions will come in writing to your offices first and then you'll determine which will be "farmed out" for answers that you'll provide the formal answer back to the Committee---- I wonder if we should use these questions as the first one's to be handled by this new procedure?? If so, you can send them the notification letter to this effect and then follow the new procedure if they ask these questions via a letter from the Chairman or ranking Minority Member... whatcha' think??

Liz --

in the e-mail below, Chip asked for a list of all VP travel in FEY and FEY. The lists we were provided seem to leave off dozens of trips. I noticed this when I was looking back to see when he visited my hometown -- Fayetteville, AR. It's nowhere to be found on the list. As I looked further, I don't see most of the VP's trips. In April alone, I found mentions in the news of Cheney travel to Denver, Fayetteville, Charleston WV, Richmond, Long Island, Ft. Lauderdale and Orlando that aren't on the list. Also, what happened to the 100% political trips? Why aren't they on the list?

We asked for all the trips -- not just some of the list. Now that I've noticed so many trips missing, I'd like to see the entire list as originally requested (excluding travel to secure locations). I'd also like a list of the traveling VP staff positions that are classified as "official" travelers even on a 100% political trip.

I know you have a lot going so we can talk about this after the current CR crisis subsides. I just noticed this today and wanted to get it to you for a response as soon as possible.

Thanks.

Hi Carolyn,
I'm trying to get approval to include a list of Federal Government Web Sites for students as an enclosure with our responses to student letters. The lists refers them to the kids links on each department's site. I'm not sure if your office would be the appropriate one to approve this, so if there is anyone else I should speak with please let me know. I would be happy to fax a copy of the enclosure to your office as well. Thanks for your help.

Yes, that was cleared, and the Macy's reference was considered unique and innocuous given the tradition with that long-standing Thanksgiving Day parade in New York. But we think it prudent not to extend the precedent (which, in turn, others would seek to extend even further). So we would suggest that the statement here not include a reference to Disney, if that is doable. We can discuss if you would like. Do not want to be difficult, but just thinking down the road about what comes next. Thanks.

Subject: Re:

actually it was with regard to the macys/nbc greeting that aired over thanksgiving for that parade that we had worked to clear two things: (1) whether it mattered if we paid for that one or if they did -- helgi's answer was that it did not, and (2) the script which included the line -- macy's and nbc join me in wishing you ..., which was cleared in staffing on the 11th of november (honestly i don't know who b/c it was a holiday but i know we made sure we received the clearance from counsel because i always make sure we get your shop, karl and dan covered -- which i think i got by fax but will also check emails).

i do want to be clear that this is not something that will sink the deal -- we would just have to explain it to disney (meaning need an explanation) as the precedent is there with macy's/nbc. in this case walt disney co is the equivalent as they are the parade host (through disney world) and the broadcaster (through abc). the only thing that is different in the fact pattern is that they are going to pay the costs of the film. nbc was supposed to do that but told us they had no cash at the last minute so we picked up the tab with cncs -- not something i plan to do again.

for reference i will include below the version of the macy's parade script as it was recorded and as it aired:

Good Morning.

As we gather to celebrate Thanksgiving, let us remember to share our blessings and make this holiday season a time for giving to those in need. By helping a neighbor, we serve our nation, and we serve a cause greater than self-interest.

Everyone can do something, and through the USA Freedom Corps, you can find ways to help at a school, food pantry or any other organization near you.

Macy,s and NBC join me in wishing you a happy Thanksgiving, and we ask you to make this holiday the start of a season of service.

Thank you very much.

After I told them to make the changes, they informed me that the agenda has already been printed with Mary as an invited guest and "White House Legislative Representative, White House Political Representative, and White House Representative, Economic Advisor's Office" on it. Should I tell them to reprint?

i will give it a go -- are you okay with my telling disney generally that our counsel thought it was best for both if we turned away from the naming practices?

also are you okay if i insert something to the effect of -- enjoy the parade -- or say something about regis philben and kelly rippa as hosts -- or here is the one i think you will not like ... regis, kelly and everyone enjoying the parade at walt disney world? -- just trying to come up with alternatives that make them feel we are customizing this.

Yes, that was cleared, and the Macy's reference was considered unique and innocuous given the tradition with that long-standing Thanksgiving Day parade in New York. But we think it prudent not to extend the precedent (which, in turn, others would seek to extend even further). So we would suggest that the statement here not include a reference to Disney, if that is doable. We can discuss if you would like. Do not want to be difficult, but just thinking down the road about what comes next. Thanks.

thanksgiving for that parade that we had worked to clear two things: (1) whether it mattered if we paid for that one or if they did -- helgi's answer was that it did not, and (2) the script which included the line -- macy's and nbc join me in wishing you ..., which was cleared in staffing on the 11th of november (honestly i don't know who b/c it was a holiday but i know we made sure we received the clearance from counsel because i always make sure we get your shop, karl and dan covered -- which i think i got by fax but will also check emails).

i do want to be clear that this is not something that will sink the deal -- we would just have to explain it to disney (meaning need an explanation) as the precedent is there with macy's/nbc. in this case walt disney co is the equivalent as they are the parade host (through disney world) and the broadcaster (through abc). the only thing that is different in the fact pattern is that they are going to pay the costs of the film. nbc was supposed to do that but told us they had no cash at the last minute so we picked up the tab with cncs -- not something i plan to do again.

for reference i will include below the version of the macy's parade script as it was recorded and as it aired:

Good Morning.

As we gather to celebrate Thanksgiving, let us remember to share our blessings and make this holiday season a time for giving to those in need. By helping a neighbor, we serve our nation, and we serve a cause greater than self-interest.

Everyone can do something, and through the USA Freedom Corps, you can find ways to help at a school, food pantry or any other organization near you.

Macy,s and NBC join me in wishing you a happy Thanksgiving, and we ask you to make this holiday the start of a season of service.

Yes on first question.

On the alternatives, I like the first one. I tend to think he actually would find it odd to mention those two hosts by name, however, so might avoid that additional twist for that reason.

Not sure how all of the following fell into next week, but . . .

1. I was asked to sub for Viet/Adam on a panel in New York Monday night on judges process; it is sponsored by Bar Association of City of New York. (A Schumer staffer is also on panel as well as Jeff Rosen, a law school classmate of mine who writes for New Republic.)

2. I also was asked to sub for Viet/Adam on a brown-bag lunch deal next Wednesday in DC on same topic sponsored by some committee of DC Bar (a Kennedy staffer is on that one).

3. Rachel was originally invited to speak at an Iowa bar association deal next Friday on same topic. Rachel and Colloton asked me to sub given Rachel's current job.

DRAFT----DRAFT----DRAFT----DRAFT

TO: TRC STEERING COMMITTEE

FROM: Dirk Van Dongen & Jade West
National Association of Wholesaler – Distributors
TRC EXECUTIVE SECRETARIAT

SUBJECT: ECONOMIC GROWTH AND JOBS CREATION

It appears certain that the President will propose a new set of initiatives to the Congress to stimulate economic growth and new job creation.

The TRC Management Committee had the opportunity to meet with senior White House staff last week to discuss the need for such a package, and to provide input on its composition. (We essentially reaffirmed the principles set forth in the attached letter sent to the President on behalf of TRC in September 2001, as the Administration was beginning development of what became this year's stimulus package).

During our discussion, we conveyed our strong support for such an initiative, and indicated TRC's commitment to help move it through the Congress.

Yesterday, the Management Committee met again to plan preparations for this effort.

Among the decisions made was to invoice all Steering Committee members for a 2003 membership contribution of $5000. This is identical to the required contribution for both 2001 and 2002. As you know, these funds are used to cover out-of-pocket costs and advertising. NAW provides Executive Secretariat services without cost to the coalition.

Your invoice is enclosed.

We anticipate that the TRC Steering Committee will be invited to the White House for a special briefing shortly after the package is announced. We will keep you posted on this, and other developments.

Thanks. Please call either one of us if you have questions.

(List TRC Management Committee – alpha by last name, with name of organization)

OFFICE OF POLITICAL AFFAIRS

December 6, 2002

Mr. Brad Niemann, Program Supervisor
The Washington Center
2301 M Street, NW
Washington, D.C. 20036

Dear Mr. Niemann:

Ms. Morgan Goatley worked for me as an intern in the White House Political Affairs Office this fall. While her duties varied, she worked with me to draft political and event briefings for the President, Vice President, Cabinet officials and Senior White House Staff. These briefings summarized state political climates and key policy issues. They also provided background information and itineraries for the President and Vice President's events. Morgan did outstanding work for our office.

Because of the sensitive nature of these internal documents, Morgan is unable to provide you with a sample of her work. Thank you for your understanding and for accommodating her situation.

Sincerely,

Sara Taylor

Lott's office is interested in pulling together a Members meeting on Judges issues (President's Judicial timeline proposal; committee/floor
handle timing of judicial noms who were voted down in committee).

They are looking at Tuesday of next week. They would ideally, like to have Judge Gonzales, Nick and Karl at the meeting. Let me know if there are any times that absolutely don't work for these three on Tuesday (or if they simply aren't available on Tuesday).

thanks, Heather

Anybody else in WHCO receive this CFC e-mail solicitation from Heritage?

It appears that OHS has been deluged with the same CFC solicitation e-mail, allegedly from Heritage's president. Which suggests that Heritage is using a copy of an internal e-mail address list for All OHS. I'm trying to figure out if it's wider than that and maybe reaches to the "All WHO" or "All EOP" list?

Yes, Heritage should know better. Usually for CFC, emails are sent encouraging employees to participate in the process but not towards any one organization. I recommend sending an email back to Heritage saying that this is a White House email system and as such is to be used for official purposes.

As you know, the Combined Federal Campaign is currently soliciting federal employees for contributions. As you may not know, The Heritage Foundation participates in the CFC. We welcome your support in any amount through the CFC and we will use it to promote our mission: ?to formulate and promote conservative public policies based on the principles of free enterprise, limited government, individual freedom, traditional American values and a strong national defense.?

Every year hundreds of people support Heritage through the Combined Federal Campaign and if you have done so in the past, thank you very much. Often, we do not know who our CFC supporters are?and if you are happy with anonymity, that?s fine with us. On the other hand, I?d be more than pleased to send you personal thanks and occasional reports on our activities if you want to make your gift known.

In either event, we will continue to keep you informed about our activities via e-mails as we have done in the past.

Thanks again for considering The Heritage Foundation. Our CFC number is 0881.

may need to get a bigger room.

Any help you can lend in getting Ken or Matt to give us a new time and date to build around would be great. I would like to send a new time tomorrow.

I have left a phone message for their scheduler. The post lunch, early afternoons of Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday work best.

Good news in Waxman - this was the case where Waxman and other members of Congress sued under 5 USC 2954 to obtain adjusted census data. See docket entry below reflecting the reversal of the district court's decision that any seven members of House Govt Operations Comm. could obtain information from the Executive Branch.

I am working on getting a copy of the order.

TRC EXECUTIVE SECRETARIAT

SUBJECT: ECONOMIC GROWTH AND JOBS CREATION

It appears certain that the President will propose a new set of initiatives to the Congress to stimulate economic growth and new job creation.

The TRC Management Committee had the opportunity to meet with senior White House staff last week to discuss the need for such a package, and to provide input on its composition. (We essentially reaffirmed the principles set forth in the attached letter sent to the President on behalf of TRC in September 2001, as the Administration was beginning development of what became this year's stimulus package).

During our discussion, we conveyed our strong support for such an initiative, and indicated TRC's commitment to help move it through the Congress.

Yesterday, the Management Committee met again to plan preparations for this effort.

Among the decisions made was to invoice all Steering Committee members for a 2003 membership contribution of $5000. This is identical to the required contribution for both 2001 and 2002. As you know, these funds are used to cover out-of-pocket costs and advertising. NAW provides Executive Secretariat services without cost to the coalition.

Your invoice is enclosed.

We anticipate that the TRC Steering Committee will be invited to the White House for a special briefing shortly after the package is announced. We will keep you posted on this, and other developments.

Thanks. Please call either one of us if you have questions.

Great legal minds and mouthpieces:

Doing a story in next couple of days on whether administration will weigh in on University of Michigan cases. I'm hearing Olson is inclined to do so, while Thompson and Gonzales are not. Do I have any hope of your input? Thanks.

Yes, I am afraid that we are sure it will be a very major technical, cost and schedule issue. Detailed talks with Microsoft lead us to this conclusion. Even if we were able to do it; we'd have a non-standard version of Outlook that would cost us dearly in out year support and be very difficult to maintain and keep tech people trained on it..

Is this going to be a big issue? We are hopping to start the roll-out to the WHO on Monday!

Gary Andres wanted to make sure you all saw his editorial on Judges from this morning's Washington Times:

A road twice traveled

Gary J. Andres
ÿÿÿÿÿOn Tuesday, Jan. 7, 2003, a shiny black Chrysler sedan, driven by an Army sergeant, will emerge from the Old Executive Office Building, turn left on 17th Street and head toward the U.S. Capitol. An official from the White House Executive Clerk's Office will accompany the driver, carrying the official papers of about 30 of President Bush's federal judicial nominees.
ÿÿÿÿÿ Arriving at the Capitol, the clerk will take an elevator up one level and walk on to the Senate floor. From the back of the ornate chamber, after the presiding officer recognizes him, the clerk will bellow: "I'm directed by the President of the United States to deliver a message to the Senate in writing." He will bow to the chair, hand the papers to the Senate Executive Clerk and head back to the White House.
ÿÿÿÿÿ And so will begin the "advice and consent" process, a ritual repeated every year by the White House and the Senate since 1789. But these judicial appointments are different* they traversed this venerable road in the last Congress. These are the federal judicial selections President Bush previously nominated * including Charles Pickering and Priscilla Owen * on which the full Senate never voted.
ÿÿÿÿÿ A new Republican majority means a second confirmation opportunity for these nominees and another chance for the Senate. This time the Senate should fulfill its "advice and consent" role and ensure the full body votes on each of these nominees.
ÿÿÿÿÿ The Senate's track record on these nominees over the last year and a half was deplorable. Many nominated in May 2001 are still waiting for a hearing. Using a variety of parliamentary tools, the Democrats blocked the full Senate from voting on all these men and women.

ÿÿÿÿÿ Republicans complained bitterly about the lack of progress on these nominees, but failed to dent the public's consciousness until right before the midterm elections. "The whole issue of confirming judges took on broader appeal after Democrats reneged on a commitment to Sen. Strom Thurmond," noted a GOP leadership aide. According to Mr. Thurmond and other GOP staff, Democrats committed to a vote in October, before Congress adjourned, on Dennis Shed, who was the retiring senator's candidate for a U.S. circuit judgeship. Democrats then reversed themselves and blocked a vote. The uproar, including Mr. Thurmond's blistering speech on the Senate floor, received national media attention, igniting an incendiary device among the Republican faithful.

ÿÿÿÿÿ In many key states featuring competitive races, charges that Democrats "rigged" the system and denied the full Senate a vote resonated in the election and contributed to Republican victories.

ÿÿÿÿÿ The Senate ultimately confirmed Mr. Shedd in the post-election lame duck session. But given the electoral potency of the "obstructionist" message, knowledgeable Senate insiders were stunned when reports circulated that the Democrats may continue dilatory tactics in the next Congress. "We heard disturbing reports they wanted to shift venues from stalling nominees in the Judiciary Committee to delaying action on the Senate floor," one GOP Judiciary Committee aide said.

ÿÿÿÿÿ Stalling will not work anymore in the Judiciary Committee. Sen. Orrin Hatch, the incoming chairman, will move the president's nominees with alacrity. Political scientists Roger E. Hartley and Lisa M. Holmes, writing in the summer 2002 Political Science Quarterly, underscore this point with historical evidence. Analyzing the time required to confirm lower court judges between 1969-1998, they demonstrate that the relationship between the Senate Judiciary Chair and the White House is a significant variable contributing to the length of the process. Mr. Hatch's congenial relationship with the White House should help smooth the way for these nominees.

ÿÿÿÿÿ But no longer controlling the gavel in committee, some Democrats now suggest shifting the battle to the Senate floor. Using parliamentary devices, like a filibuster * seldom used in the confirmation process * and forcing Republicans to garner a "supermajority" of 60 votes to win some of these nomination battles * represents a new level of escalation in the confirmation wars.

ÿÿÿÿÿ The Senate first passed a rule to limit debate and bring matters to a final vote in 1917. This process * known as cloture * was applied to legislation, not nominations, however, until 1968. Since that time, the Senate confirmed nearly 2,000 lower court judges, only facing filibusters on nine nominations. And even in these few cases the delay tactics did not kill the nomination, according to the Congressional Research Service.

ÿÿÿÿÿ Using filibusters to deny floor votes on judges is both highly unusual and risky for the Democrats. The Constitution calls for the Senate to provide "advice and consent" on nominations, not for an individual or small groups to use delaying tactics to block votes. Frustrating the full Senate from exercising its constitutional role created a bumpy electoral road for the Democrats last November. Shifting stall tactics from the Judiciary Committee to the Senate floor is another political dead end.

You should have received the copies of the responses from the reps on both notices by now.

It has been our practice not to send you the actual responses by the reps, unless you specifically request them, but rather a letter (usually from Nancy Smith) stating that the reps have signed off on the notice. Would you now prefer that we always send you the response from the rep?

UNITED STATES SENATE

OCTOBER 17, 1995

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee:

I am John Schmidt, Associate Attorney General of the United States. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today to present the views of the Department of Justice on the issue now before the Subcommittee: whether to reduce the size of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit from twelve to eleven judges.

Mr. Chairman, I understand the commitment you, Senator Heflin and the other members of this Subcommittee have made to the efficient, sound operation of the federal judiciary. The Administration, in turn, is committed to working with you to address the very difficult issues that lie ahead. It is the Department's strongly held view that the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit must retain its full complement of twelve judges -- the number of judges authorized by law -- to ensure the proper administration of justice. As the legal representative of most agencies of the U.S. government, the Department of Justice is the most frequent litigant in the D.C. Circuit, and thus we have a keen institutional interest in the efficient operation of this court. In addition, litigants from throughout the nation -- both businesses and private individuals -- rely on the D.C. Circuit to resolve some of our nation's most difficult legal disputes.

The D.C. Circuit's caseload remains by far the most complex and difficult of all the federal circuit courts. Equally important, the Circuit's workload has grown since the time the Judiciary Committee determined -- over ten years ago -- that a twelfth D.C. Circuit judge was necessary. We believe that when Congress decides to adjust the size of the federal judiciary, it should do so comprehensively and prospectively. only in this way can Congress carry out its legitimate authority to determine the size of the judiciary without giving the appearance of altering court size for partisan or political reasons.

1. Complex Caseload

It is undisputed that the D.C. Circuit's docket is by far the most complex and difficult of any of the nation's federal circuit courts. Over the last three years, an average of 1718 cases were filed in the D.C. Circuit per year, 778 (45.3%) of which, on average, were administrative appeals. 1 These administrative appeals are more complicated, often involve multiple parties, lengthy briefs and voluminous records, and take significantly more time to review and decide, than other cases. During this same period, only 5.9% of the appeals outside of the D.C. Circuit were administrative appeals; the figure for the Seventh Circuit was 4.7%, while the figure for the Eighth Circuit was 3.0%. 2 1 See Letter from Ralph Mecham to Senator Charles E. Grassley (October 12, 1995), Enclosure 1. Due to substantial caseload fluctuations from year to year, examining the average annual caseload over the past three years is more statistically significant than examining one year in isolation. The three years examined here are the twelve-month periods ending June 30, 1993-1995. During the most recent twelve-month period, 611 (38.5%) of the 1585 cases filed in the D.C. Circuit were administrative appeals. Ibid. 2 See Letter from Ralph Mecham to Senator Charles E. Grassley (October 12, 1995), Enclosure 1.

Two recent cases illustrate the type of administrative appeals typically and regularly handled by the D.C. Circuit:

* State of Ohio v. U.S. EPA, 997 F.2d 1520 (D.C. Cir. 1993). This case involved

24 consolidated petitions for review of EPA's National Oil and Hazardous Substance Pollution Contingency Plan under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (CERCLA). EPA filed a brief of about 170 pages, addressing an unusually large number of issues, while petitioners filed briefs totalling about 210 pages. The court allocated 3 hours for argument time, although the argument in fact went quite bit longer. The final opinion took up 31 pages in the Federal Reporter.

* MCI Telecommunications Corp. v. FCC, 59 F.3d 1407 (D.C. Cir. 1995). This case involved approximately 50 consolidated petitions for review of 21 separate FCC orders adjudicating damage actions filed by several interexchange carriers against local exchange carriers. The petitions were consolidated in the D.C. Circuit after being filed in four different circuits. The five parties filed over 250 pages of briefs, and the record on appeal filled-two drawers of a file cabinet. The court allocated one hour for argument time, although the argument in fact took two hours.

Given the unique contours of the D.C. Circuit's docket, raw caseload data -- including comparisons with the number of cases handled by other circuits -- do not accurately reflect the actual volume or difficulty of work performed by the D.C. Circuit. For example, during the twelve-month period ended September 30, 1994, only 157 (8.9%) of the 1770 cases filed in the D.C. Circuit were prisoner petitions. In Courts of Appeals outside the D.C. Circuit, 27.7% of the appeals were prisoner petitions; in particular, 1225 (38.4%) of the 3193 cases filed in the Eighth Circuit, and 1010 (32.6%) of the 3096 cases filed in the Seventh Circuit were prisoner petitions. 3 These cases, unlike administrative appeals, generally involve simple legal issues and brief records, and most are relatively easy to dispose of. Yet these relatively straightforward cases serve to swell the numbers of cases handled by the other circuit courts.

Similarly, the D.C. Circuit handles a relatively low proportion of pro se appeals, direct criminal appeals and diversity appeals, as compared with the regional circuit courts. 4 These cases, like prisoner petitions, generally consume fewer judicial resources than other cases, yet they misleadingly make it appear that other courts have a larger proportional share of the nation's judicial workload than does the D.C. Circuit.

For all of these reasons, simple numerical comparisons do not do justice to the D.C. Circuit's caseload. A recent editorial in The Washington Times, 5 for example, noted that the D.C. Circuit disposes of fewer than the 285 cases per judge once recommended by the Judicial Conference as the optimal level of circuit court dispositions. But using this benchmark to judge the D.C. Circuit's workload is inappropriate -- and not just because the Judicial Conference itself no longer uses the benchmark. More importantly, this arbitrary figure wholly ignores the unique and complex nature of D.C. Circuit cases. As James Rill, Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust in the Bush Administration, recently stated: "Reliance on simple numerical case load comparisons among circuits is essentially unreliable as a policy guide to the number of appellate judges needed for the administration of justice in each court. A qualitative analysis of this caseload is imperative . . . T he appeals heard by the D.C. Circuit far surpass in complexity and in critical importance to government regulation of business and the national economy those heard by any other circuit. These cases are characteristically extraordinarily complicated and technologically difficult, often involving multiple parties; they can have immense far-reaching economic consequences. 6 3 Judicial Business of the United States Courts.: 1994 Report of the Director, Table B-1. 4 See Letter from Chief Judge Harry T. Edwards to Senator Charles E. Grassley, at 3-4 (Sept. 18, 1995). See also Judicial Business of the United States Courts: 1994 Report of the Director, Table B-1. 5 "Another Judge for the D.C. Circuit?", The Washington Times, at A-16 (Sept. 19, 1995).

The uniquely complex nature of the D.C. Circuit's caseload weighed heavily on Congress when it followed the Judicial Conference's recommendation to create new D.C. Circuit judgeships in 1978 and 1984. The Senate Judiciary Committee Report to the 1984 judgeship legislation -- issued under the direction of then Chairman Thurmond -- was quite clear on this point in approving the creation of the D.C. Circuit's twelfth judgeship: " T he Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia inevitably receives a significant number of its caseload from federal administrative agencies headquartered in the area. Administrative appeals filed in this court numbered 504 in 1982 and represented 34.8 percent of the incoming caseload. . . . Due to the nature of the caseload which includes many unique cases involving complex legal, economic and social issues of national importance and a large backlog of pending appeals, the D.C. Circuit requires one additional judgeship." 7

The Judiciary Committee's conclusions are even more sound today, more than a decade later, when the annual number of administrative appeals filed in the D.C. Circuit has increased from 504 to 778, and from 34.8% of the Circuit's docket to 45.3%. 8 6 Letter from James F. Rill to The Washington Times, at 1 (Sept. 29, 1995) (emphasis supplied). 7 S. Rep. No. 98-55 (April 7, 1983), at 74. 8 See Letter from Ralph Mecham to Senator Charles E. Grassley (October 12, 1995), Enclosure 1 (statistics for the past three years); S. Rep. No. 98-55 (April 7, 1983), at 74 (D.C. Circuit caseload statistics available to the Judiciary Committee when it approved the twelfth judgeship). Taking into account only the most recent twelve- month period, the annual number of administrative appeals has increased from 504 to 611, and from 34.8% of the D.C. Circuit's docket to 38.5%.

In light of the unique nature of its docket, it should come as no surprise that the D.C. Circuit takes longer to dispose of cases on the merits than do all but two other regional circuits. The median amount of time required in the D.C. Circuit from the filing of the notice of appeal to final disposition is 12.0 months. This ranks the D.C. Circuit tenth out of the twelve regional circuits in this measure of productivity, ahead of only the Ninth Circuit (14.5 months) and the Eleventh Circuit (14.8 months). The nationwide average is 10.5 months; the figure for both the Second and Eighth Circuits is 8.1 months. 9

This lag time means that litigants in the D.C. Circuit are waiting longer for justice than other litigants. As Mr. Rill pointed out, the D.C. Circuit "faces a heavy commitment to appeals dealing with core issues involving the operation of the telecommunications, transportation, broadcasting, energy, and other vital industries. 10 These critical regulated companies often must wait at least a year to have their disputes with the government resolved. Reducing the size of the Circuit would only exacerbate the problem. Because the D.C. Circuit is truly a national court, with a uniquely national administrative docket, this means that all Americans are potentially at risk of having justice delayed and hence denied.

II. Increased Workload

In Public Law 98-353, enacted in 1984, Congress increased the size of the D.C.

Circuit from eleven to twelve judges. In reporting this legislation to the full Senate in April 1983, the Judiciary Committee concluded that the Circuit -- based upon its 1982 caseload -- needed a twelfth judgeship. 11 9 Judicial Business of the United States Courts: 1994 Report of the.Director, Table B-4. 10 Letter from James F. Rill to The Washington Times, at 2 (Sept. 29, 1995). 11 S. Rep. No. 98-55 (April 7, 1983), at 74. In supporting the 1984 legislation, Senator Robert Dole stated: "These new judicial positions were carefully considered and approved, after hearings before the Courts Subcommittee. Testimony was received from the chief judges of the circuit courts requesting the increases. The Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts submitted justification material based on workload and backload statistics of all Federal courts. on the basis of this record, the additional judgeships were approved." 130 Cong. Rec. S6093 (May 21, 1984).

This bit of history is extremely important, and sheds a great deal of light on the issue at hand. Presently, the D.C. Circuit faces a far heavier workload than it did when the Judiciary Committee decided to create the twelfth judgeship. Comparing the 1982 caseload to the average caseload from 1993-1995, there has been a 54.4% increase in administrative appeals and a 18.7% increase in total appeals. 12 In addition, when the Judiciary Committee approved the twelfth judgeship, the D.C. Circuit had three senior circuit judges to assist with its business. 13 Presently, there are no senior judges.

Thus, if a twelfth D.C. Circuit judgeship was deemed necessary when the Judiciary Committee reported the 1984 judgeship legislation, present circumstances make that judgeship even more essential today. In light of the Circuit's increased workload, one cannot reasonably conclude that the Circuit is "overstaffed" and has "excess capacity," or that its judges are not pulling their fair share of the judiciary's work.

As an aside, it is important to note that the 1985 caseload statistics cited by Judge Silberman in a letter to Senator Grassley 14 are anomalous. The 2182 cases filed in 1985 far surpassed the number of cases filed in every other year during the past decade. 15 The relevant point of comparison, rather, is 1982. First, 1982 was a more representative year. Second, the 1982 caseload data was the basis for the Judiciary Committee's conclusion, arrived at after reasoned deliberation, that a twelfth D.C. Circuit judgeship was necessary. Any fair comparison with 1982 will lead to the conclusion that maintaining the D.C. Circuit's twelfth judgeship is more than justified. 12 Over the last three years, an average of 1718 cases were filed in the D.C. Circuit per year, 778 (45.3%) of which, on average, were administrative appeals. Letter from Ralph Mecham to Senator Charles E. Grassley (October 12, 1995), Enclosure 1. In its April 1983 Report, the Senate Judiciary Committee cited caseload statistics from 1982, during which litigants filed 1447 cases -- 504 of which were administrative appeals -- in the Circuit. S. Rep. No. 98-55 (April 7, 1983), at 74. Comparing the 1982 caseload with the caseload from the most recent twelvemonth period, there has been a 21.2% increase in administrative appeals and a 9.5% increase in total appeals. 13 S. Rep. No. 98-55 (April 7, 1983), at 74. 14 Letter from Judge Laurence H. Silberman to Senator Charles E. Grassley, at 1-2 (Sept. 26, 1995). 15 See Letter from Chief Judge Harry T. Edwards to Senator Charles E. Grassley, "New Case Filings" Table (Sept. 18, 1995).

III. Constitutional and Prudential Considerations

Mr. Chairman, under our constitutional system, Congress certainly is well within its prerogatives to raise questions about court size and, of course, has the final authority to create or abolish judgeships through enacted legislation. However, Congress traditionally has examined such questions in a methodical and comprehensive manner. These issues should be examined apart from consideration of specific vacancies, and informed by the deliberations of the Judicial Conference. Every effort should be made to ensure an objective result and to avoid inadvertently politicizing the process of determining the size of the judiciary.

As members of the Subcommittee well know, the Framers of the Constitution were particularly concerned about preserving the independence of the judiciary. For this reason, the Framers gave the executive and legislative branches roles in determining the judiciary's membership -- the President has the power to nominate and the Senate the power to confirm. Similarly, in determining the size of the judiciary, Congress authorizes judicial positions and the President has the power to sign or veto the authorization. It is a careful balance, intended to protect the judiciary.

In the past, Congress has looked to the judges themselves -in the form of the Judicial Conference -- for assistance and guidance in determining the appropriate number of judicial positions. The process of addressing court size typically has proceeded as follows. The Judicial Conference periodically undertakes studies and surveys to assess its needs and to formulate recommendations to Congress. Congress then evaluates the Judicial Conference's recommendations. This process guarantees that serious and careful deliberation underlie decisions regarding the size of each district court and court of appeals and the federal courts as a whole.

In my view, leaving selected judicial vacancies open as they occur would introduce an element of randomness into what should be -- and what traditionally has been -- a deliberate, considered process. Vacancies can occur unexpectedly, as a result of death, resignation or retirement. Adjusting court size on such an ad hoc basis would make it difficult for chief judges at both the district and circuit level to predict what judicial resources would be available to them in the reasonably foreseeable future.

In addition, and notwithstanding the good faith of those who are raising the issue now, making judgeship decisions on such an ad hoc basis would create an appearance of partisanship that would weaken our society's respect for the non-partisan nature of the judiciary. Until now, Congress has never reduced the number of previously authorized judgeships at the circuit court level, let alone done so on an ad hoc basis when a particular vacancy arose. And, as just noted, Congress typically has increased the number only after careful consideration of Judicial Conference recommendations, on a nationwide basis.

Such an approach guarantees both the reality, and the appearance, of an objective, non-partisan allocation process. And it ensures that alterations in the judiciary's size are not viewed by the public either as attempts by Congress to deny appointments to a sitting President, or attempts by a sitting President and Congress to improperly exercise control over the Third Branch.

Indeed, the most well-known proposal to deviate from this considered approach was President Roosevelt's court-packing bill, aimed at increasing the size of the Supreme Court to ensure the Court's control by his nominees. However, as students of history will note, members of Congress from both parties strongly objected to his court-packing plan. They felt that such an unorthodox action threatened the institution of the courts, as well as the public's respect for the independence of the judiciary as an institution.

The Senate ultimately rejected Roosevelt's court-packing plan in 1937. The Senate's action signalled an understanding that the integrity of the court system can best be maintained by addressing specific nominations on their own merits, and by addressing questions of court size separately and on their own merits. I submit that the nation would be best served if the Senate would continue to act on that decades-old understanding.

IV. Conclusion

To summarize, it is the Department's strongly held view that the D.C. Circuit should retain its current size. Efficient handling of the Circuit's uniquely complex caseload, with its heavy complement of administrative appeals, is essential to the nation's most important business. Due to differences in case mix and composition, simple caseload comparisons with the other circuits are bound to be misleading. Moreover, the D.C. Circuit's workload -- particularly its administrative appeals -has grown since the Judiciary Committee concluded over ten years ago that a twelfth judgeship was necessary. And finally, while Congress has the power to alter the size of the federal judiciary, it should do so in a comprehensive manner and in consultation with the Judicial Conference, and not on a vacancy-by- vacancy basis.

(Re: "Conserving Judicial Resources: The Caseload

of the United States Court of Appeals

Appropriate Allocation of Judgeships")

SUMMARY AND INTRODUCTION

If this hearing is intended to evaluate judgeship needs in the D.C. Circuit, then I foresee two problems: First, by tradition and comity between the legislative and judicial branches, Congress usually has recognized the Judicial Conference of the United States as the appropriate forum to develop proposals for the assessment of judgeships in each Circuit. Judges know best how to assess what they are doing -- just as members of Congress best understand the demands of the legislative process. I believe that the Judicial Conference remains the proper forum to develop appropriate methodologies to weigh the different classes of appellate cases in assessing judgeship needs. The Judicial Conference has been responsible in advising Congress in the past, and I would expect them to remain so in the future. I would therefore question any approach that circumvents this traditional process. Second, if, as I have heard it suggested, the purpose of the Subcommittee's hearing is to challenge the judgeship needs of the D.C. Circuit on the basis of current case filings, then I fear that you will be engaging in a pointless exercise. The reason is simple: the work of the Courts of Appeals cannot be assessed solely by looking at the raw number of case filings, because this figure fails to factor in such critically important workload determinants as case complexity and caseload mix. In other words, any assessment of judgeship needs that is based principally on case filings invariably will be distorted and fail to reflect the actual workloads of appellate judges. At a recent meeting of the Circuit Chief Judges, there was a strong consensus that a filings-only approach is a useless means of evaluating judgeship needs. In short, I urge the subcommittee to keep in mind that any sound formula for assessing judgeship needs must rely on workload data weighted for case complexity.

There are other limitations in measuring judgeship needs by reference to case filings. For one thing, case filings fail to take account of the contributions (or lack thereof) of senior judges, a factor which can have a bearing on the workload of active appellate judges. Even more important are data on non-judge dispositions, including Clerk's Office terminations, which must be weighted against case filings. Finally, case "filings" tell you nothing about either the quantity or quality of "dispositions" in a given Circuit.

The explanation that follows -- along with the data I am attaching on the D.C. Circuit's caseload and comparable data from other Circuits -- highlights the actual caseload differences among the federal courts of appeals as well as the unusual complexity of the caseload of the D.C. Circuit. This, in turn, underscores my point that any formula developed to determine appellate judgeship requirements must be weighted to acknowledge caseload complexity, caseload mix, and the quantity, quality, and nature of case dispositions.

I. Administrative Cases

The D.C. Circuit's caseload is comprised largely of appeals and petitions for review of "agency actions." These so-called administrative appeals, from the Environmental Protection Agency, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and other such federal agencies, often involve huge records comprising thousands of pages of complex factual and regulatory material. And such appeals may involve numerous parties, with very different perspectives, challenging or defending detailed and complex agency rules and regulations. Briefs, in a single case, sometimes total hundreds of pages. Issues are often highly technical, involving difficult scientific formulae, principles, and methodologies.

In 1994, administrative appeals accounted for 46% of the D.C. Circuit's caseload. By contrast, the proportion of administrative appeals in the Ninth Circuit, which is second to the D.C. Circuit, is only 9.6%. The proportion in other Circuits ranges from 2.5% in the Eleventh Circuit to 6.8% in the Sixth Circuit. This difference in the case load mix critically affects our work operations, as compared with the work of other Circuits.

An example of what I have in mind: A panel of this court is scheduled to hear a challenge to Order 636 issued by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. Order 636 is the third in a series of orders that restructures the regulation of the natural gas industry. Each order has spawned massive numbers of federal appeals, all to the District of Columbia Circuit. Order 636 alone produced 287 separate petitions for review by 163 parties. Over one hundred additional parties intervened to support or oppose the Order.

The briefing schedule provides for the filing of 27 briefs totaling over 900 pages. Oral argument may be scheduled over days rather than hours. While not every agency case is as massive as the Order 636 proceedings, a great many of our agency cases involve multiple parties, issues, and briefs.

In short, review of large, multi-party, difficult administrative appeals is the staple of judicial work in the D.C. Circuit. This alone distinguishes the work of the D.C. Circuit from the work of other Circuits; it also explains why it is impossible to compare the work of the D.C. Circuit with other Circuits by simply referring to raw data on case filings.

II. Cases of Unusual Public Importance

Because the D.C. Circuit sits in Washington, D.C., the seat of the federal government, history shows that it is the inevitable forum for many high-profile cases presenting difficult issues of national import. Cases highlighting this reality are legion. A few recent examples: United States v. Barry, 938 F. 2d 1327 (D.C.Cir.1991), appeal after remand, 961 F.2d 260 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (appeal of conviction of D.C. mayor for cocaine possession); United States v. North, 91 0 F.2d 843 (D.C. Cir.), modified on reh'g, 920 F.2d 940 (D.C. Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 500 U.S. 941 (1991) (appeal of conviction in Iran-Contra matter); United States v. Poindexter, 951 F.2d 369 (D.C. Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 656 (1992) (appeal of conviction in Iran-Contra matter); United States v. Rostenkowski, 59 F.3d 1291 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (interlocutory appeal challenging indictment of sifting member of Congress); United States v. Microsoft Corp., 56 F.3d 1448 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (appeal from district court's rejection of antitrust settlement); Nixon v. United States, 978 F.2d 1269 (D.C. Cir. 1992)(dispute concerning control of "presidential papers"); Citizens for the Abatement of Aircraft Noise v. Metropolitan Washington Airports Auth., 917 F.2d 48 (D.C. Cir. 1990), aff'd, 501 U.S. 252 (1991) (appeal challenging constitutionality of airport authority review board made up of members of Congress); Hechinger v. Metropolitan Washington Airports Auth., 36 F.3d 97 (D.C. Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 11 5 S. Ct. 934 (1995) (subsequent challenge to reconstituted board appointed by Congress); Association of American Physicians and Surgeons v. Clinton, 997 F.2d 898 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (challenge under Federal Advisory Committee Act to secrecy of papers and proceedings of President's health care task force); Steffan v. Aspin, 8 F.3d 57 (D.C. Cir. 1993), on rehg en banc, Steffan v. Perry, 41 F.3d 677 (D.C. Cir. 1994) (en banc) (equal protection challenge to military ban on homosexuals); Lamprecht v. FCC, 958 F.2d 382 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (equal protection challenge to FCC's gender preference policy); Public Citizen v. United States Trade Representative, 5 F.3d 549 (D.C. Cir.

1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 685 (1994) (appeal in action challenging North American Free Trade Agreement under environmental and administrative procedure statutes); Michel v. Anderson, 14 F.3d 623 (1994) (Republican challenge to House of Representatives rule permitting D.C. delegate to vote in House Committee of the Whole); and Armstrong v. Executive Office of the President, Office of Admin., 1 F.3d 1274 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (action to compel EOP to preserve certain electronic records under Federal Records Act).

This list of appeals is illustrative, not exhaustive. The point that I would make, however, is that these cases and others of a similar nature, consume tremendous amounts of judicial and staff resources.

III. Criminal Appeals and Diversity Cases

The D.C. Circuit has fewer criminal appeals and "diversity jurisdiction" appeals than other circuits. This is significant because these cases tend to require fewer judicial resources than do other cases.

In 1994, for example, criminal appeals made up 8.6% of our caseload, and diversity 1 appeals were 11.8% of the caseload. The proportion in other Circuits for criminal cases ranged from 17.1 % in the Third Circuit to 28.4% in the Eleventh Circuit. For diversity cases the proportion ranged from 24.1% in the Fourth Circuit to 42.4% in the First Circuit. Because other Circuits have higher percentages of criminal and diversity appeals, judges in those Circuits decide more appeals per judge than do D.C. Circuit judges. In other words, because criminal and diversity cases typically involve only two parties, a limited number of issues, and deal with well-trod areas of the law, they do not take nearly the amount of time to decide as do administrative appeals. Indeed, in the D.C. Circuit, many of our criminal and diversity appeals are disposed of summarily by Special Panels, without oral argument, leaving the difficult cases for resolution by regular Merits Panels after oral argument. 1 Diversity cases are reported in the statistics collected by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts under the category "private civil cases." The charts attached to this letter use the Administrative Office's appellation.

IV. Pro Se Appeals

As compared with other Circuits, the D.C. Circuit handles a relatively small percentage of pro se appeals. Only 11.8% of the cases filed in the D.C. Circuit are pro se law suits. By contrast, pro se cases range from 23.6% in the First Circuit to 47% in the Fourth Circuit. Although some of our pro se cases are more difficult than the norm (because we do not get as many prisoner cases as other Circuits), it is nonetheless still true that pro se cases involve a high proportion of frivolous claims or claims that are easily identified as lacking merit.

Like criminal and diversity appeals, pro se appeals often are amenable to summary disposition without oral argument. These appeals rarely present difficult legal issues and usually can be decided without an expenditure of a significant amount of judicial resources.

V. Caseloads, Workloads, and Work Schedules in the D.C. Circuit

The complexity of the caseload in the D.C. Circuit is reflected in the number of cases the court schedules for oral argument in a typical sifting period. Our judges usually sit for eight one-week sifting periods during the year. Typically, fourteen cases are scheduled for oral argument each week, with a maximum of four cases scheduled on any given day. The Second Circuit, by contrast, schedules up to 31 cases per week. 2 The Second Circuit's schedule would be impossible in the D.C. Circuit, due to the complex and highly technical administrative cases that dominate our docket. For one thing, I doubt that it would be humanly possible to digest twice the number of our usual fare of cases -- the records are too voluminous and the issues are too difficult. For another thing, were we to ignore feasibility and double the number of cases heard in each sifting period, there is little doubt that the quality of our work would suffer beyond description (a result that the public would justly abhor). 2 In 1994, the Second Circuit's caseload was 6.8% administrative appeals, 38.5% diversity appeals, and 20% criminal appeals.

When I suggest that we could not appreciably change our current sifting schedule, I also have in mind the fact that our judges have responsibilities beyond those that are associated with the regular oral argument calendar. Each judge is assigned to sit on Special Panels that handle emergency motions, interlocutory appeals, and cases decided without oral argument. All judges are also assigned to hear special "complex cases," as well as serve on three-judge district court panels.

Two other circumstances set the D.C. Circuit apart from other circuits. First, at least during my tenure on the court, the D.C. Circuit, unlike most other Circuits, rarely has been able to rely on the valuable services of senior judges. At present, we have no active senior judges on this court. Second, by statute, one member of our court must serve as the presiding judge of the "Special Division" that handles Independent Counsel matters.

The uniquely difficult caseload of the D.C. Circuit has been acknowledged by the Judicial Conference of the United States. For example, in authorizing staffing for our Clerk's Office, the Conference applies an "additive" to the staffing formula, thus allowing our Circuit eight positions over formula. In other words, the Conference always has recognized that it would be grossly unfair to assess our staffing needs by simply applying a formula based on case filings, because it is well understood that case filings alone are not an accurate measure of our work.

Fifteen years ago, the Report of the Proceedings of the Judicial Conference of the United States for September 24-25, 1980, at page 35, noted that

The Circuit Court for the District of Columbia has a unique and complex caseload -- consisting predominantly of appeals from administrative agency decisions and cases in which the federal government is a party.

This Report also describes our caseload as including "highly technical cases" and "actions of national urgency." These characterizations never have been seriously doubted by any knowledgeable authority during the fifteen years that I have been a member of the court. What was said in 1980 is no less true today.

VI. Backlog

In earlier correspondence, you inquired about the "backlog" of cases in the D.C. Circuit. In response, I said that I thought it was fair to say that, at least during the past decade, our backlog (or number of pending cases) has hovered at around 2,000 cases. During this period, we have assumed that a backlog of about 2,000 cases will ensure a ready-docket of cases.

We have managed to hold our backlog at about 2,000 cases, often while operating with eleven judges (and one vacancy), by working very hard to increase the number of dispositions issued by the Special Panels, periodically scheduling additional sittings, adding extra criminal appeals to already full sittings, and occasionally utilizing the services of visiting judges and district judges.

We have had a full complement of twelve judges during two periods since 1984. This is explained in the following chronology:

New judgeships normally result from Congress acting on requests of the Judicial Conference of the United States for positions the Conference deems advisable based on its Biennial Judgeship Surveys. In 1980, there were eleven judges on the D.C. Circuit (McGowan, Wright, Tamm, Robinson, MacKinnon, Robb, Wilkey, Wald, Mikva, Edwards, and R.B. Ginsburg). That year, the Judicial Conference formally authorized a request for one additional judge (i.e., a twelfth judge) in the D.C. Circuit. See Report of the Proceedings of the Judicial Conference of the United States, September 2425, 1980, at 32-33, 35. That request was never acted upon by Congress.

In 1982, the Conference again authorized a twelfth judge for the D.C. Circuit based on the 1982 Biennial Judgeship Survey. That request remained pending before Congress until the passage of PL 98- 353 on July 10, 1984, which included judgeships authorized by the Conference in September 1982 and March 1983. In July of 1984, when PL 98-353 was passed, the 1984 Biennial Judgeship Survey had not yet been approved by the Conference because the survey, although started in August 1983, was not presented to the Conference until September 1984. The recommendation sent to Congress following the September 1984 action by the Conference did not include a request for the D.C. Circuit because the Circuit's twelfth judgeship had already been approved by that time.

According to information from the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, the D.C. Circuit had twelve active judges for nearly three months in 1987-88 (between November 13, 1987 and February 4, 1988), and for just over a year in 1990-91 (between May 18, 1990 and June 1, 1991). See, e.g., 828 F.2d at vii (Wald, Robinson, Mikva, Edwards, R.B. Ginsburg, Bork, Starr, Silberman, Buckley, Williams, D.H. Ginsburg, Sentelle), and see, e.g., 907 F.2d at vii (Wald, Mikva, Edwards, R.B. Ginsburg, Silberman, Buckley, Williams, D.H. Ginsburg, Sentelle, Thomas, Henderson, Randolph).

In sum, even a cursory review of the nature of the cases filed in the D.C. Circuit demonstrates that, because of the heavy fare of administrative appeals, the degree of difficulty and level of complexity of the average appeal in this Circuit exceed those of the other Circuits. The Judicial Conference of the United States and the Congress have continually recognized the D.C. Circuit's unique position among the Circuits. We have strived to maintain the high quality of decision making, but our judges have been pressed in their efforts. Any significant reduction in judicial resources would significantly increase the Court's backlog and threaten the quality of its decision making. By the same token, should we get our authorized complement of judges, this would undoubtedly ease the burdens of scheduling, allow our judges some much needed additional time to reflect on hard cases, and likely ensure against any increase in the backlog.

I'm interested in taking over California judicial duties when you depart. Heard from someone on the Hill (Makan probably) that they heard Ben would be assuming your CA docket. Is this true? Was your docket cannibalized when I wasn't paying attention?

t's almost ironic that Sen. Strom Thurmond's (R, S.C.) final "fight" in the Senate was to ensure the judicial confirmation of a former aide who was unfairly attacked as a bigot.

Sen. Trent Lott (R, Miss.) and other Republican senators went to the mat for Thurmond in his final weeks as a senator and shepherded through Dennis Shedd's confirmation over persistent Democratic insinuations of racism two weeks after Election Day. But now, Lott's uncareful praise of his centenarian colleague has precipitated an ugly short-term legacy, whose first tangible effect is the end of Charles Pickering's hopes to become an appellate judge.

Pickering's chief advocate in the Senate was Lott. Usually, having the party leader go to bat for you is worth some points. For Pickering, it has become his nomination's death warrant.

Sources close to the nomination and confirmation process say that the White House has made the decision and dropped the plans it had as recently as last week to renominate Pickering in the 108th Congress. Because the Left smeared Pickering as a racist ("racially insensitive" is word they use) Lott's misstep and the current attacks on him will unavoidably be distracting and damning.

As a strictly judicial matter, this is not too great of a loss. Pickering, while a stellar judge, is not very young, and his service on the appeals court would be brief. Renominating Pickering, though, would have had two political virtues.

First, it would please conservatives who were beside themselves with rage at the sight of Sen. Joe Biden (D, Del.) and Ted Kennedy (D, Chappaquiddick) attacking Pickering's integrity.

Second, without Lott's gaffe, Pickering would have taken a lot of the fire from Democrats, but still probably pass, making it easier for later nominees such as Priscilla Owen and Miguel Estrada after the Democratic attack dogs had shot their wad.

Now, without Pickering as a viable point man, someone else will need to take the early beating by the left's attack machine fueled by People For the American Way, the National Organization of Women, and their ilk. This could mean either serious expenditure of political capital by Republicans, or a successful filibuster of Owen or Estrada.

But the effect of the Lott firestorm on nominees runs even deeper. If Lott stays on as Majority Leader, every absurd charge of racism against a GOP nominee carries more weight with the credulous media and some middle-of-the-road voters. Ultimately, the media would win over Democrats otherwise hesitant to oppose Bush and could even persuade some spineless Republicans.

In a cruel twist, however, Lott will make it even harder for Republican nominees if he steps down as Leader. Edwards, Schumer, PFAW, Kennedy, Paul Krugman, and the New York Times editorial page are aptly called "the attack dogs of personal destruction."

If they win on the Lott fight * if they taste blood * it only makes them hungrier.

It may take them some time to regroup, to digest their prey, as it did after the first Pickering trial, but the next time they will be even bolder. The Lott turmoil was entirely manufactured by Democratic operatives * namely by unrepentant Clintonite James Carville, who first made an issue of the remarks the same night on Crossfire * and then pushed the story behind the scenes wherever they could, explaining to pundits and politicians how this could be used to sock it to the GOP.

If Carville wins * if the bar for branding someone a racist is lowered to a single careless comment, an unreflective childhood in the south, and a belief in states' rights * that puts every Republican politician or nominee in a little more danger. It expands the media's definition of "extremism." Anyone whose voting record or ideology resembles that of "disgraced former Majority Leader Trent Lott" will be suspect * and vulnerable.

This means any judge who ever used the concept of federalism in his decisions will be attacked for "using the racist codeword of 'states rights'."

It's a lose-lose situation * and a checkmate for the attack dogs of personal destruction.

Along these lines, I just rec'd a call from Neil Lewis w/the NYTimes. He's doing two stories on Judges: 1) The no-win situation the WH is in on whether or not to renominate Pickering; and 2) the early musing w/in the WH on Sup Ct nominee (I couldn't tell if the story was going to be about efforts to ensure WH is prepared to deal with a vacancy or if it was about possible candidates to fill the slot(s)).

Anyway, I said nothing of course, but on the second story line, he indicated he had an admin source who had shared a few thoughts with him. Is there anything we want to do to influence this? I assume we're mum on both of these issues right now....

The normal on-call status for this Friday evening has been activated and requires coverage. Unfortunately, I'm the guy. Even more unfortunately, my family and I had been planning to leave early Saturday morning for a long car trip north for the holidays. I am therefore looking for someone to trade with me for just one night: you take this Friday evening, and I take one night of your choice in January before I leave (probably the 23rd). In addition, I will buy you lunch at the Mess. Any takers?

If Judge and David agree, can you please reserve 20 minutes for Judge and David at 2:00 on Thursday, January 9, to talk briefly on judges to some outside groups that Tim Goeglein will bring in. The point would be to thank the groups for their work and to explain what's coming on judges. I regularly speak to the routinely scheduled coalition meetings (and get deep into the weeds with them on specific issues, questions, and nominees), but Tim Goeglein and I both think it would be useful that they hear an overview from Judge as we start the new year and new Congress, and also that they meet and hear from David. Thanks.

Pickering says dad,s nomination not linked to Lott,s problems
By William F. West / community editor
Dec. 18, 2002

U.S. Rep. Chip Pickering said his father,s nomination to the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals should not be linked to debate over Trent Lott,s future as Senate majority leader.

Pickering, the 3rd District congressman, also said Tuesday he believes Lott is not racist despite comments the senator made that the nation would be better off if then-segregationist Strom Thurmond was elected president in 1948.

&I know the man as one who is good-hearted * nothing racist about who he is or his work,8 said Pickering, a Republican who served as an aide to Lott for 41/2 years before winning election to the House.

&He got up everyday and worked hard * whether it was Mississippi State and Ole Miss or Jackson State and Alcorn State * to build our communities for black and white Mississippians where we would have better jobs, better schools, better health care.8

Lott, who is set to become Republican majority leader of the Senate in January, now finds himself and his job under fire because of the comments he made Dec. 5 at Thurmond,s 100th birthday party.

Although Lott has repeatedly apologized for his remarks, some fellow Senate Republicans are now questioning his ability to lead the party and the Senate next year.

In addition, some have questioned whether the Senate should reconsider Charles Pickering,s nomination to the 5th Circuit. Pickering is a judge on the U.S. District Court for Southern Mississippi.

Both Lott and President Bush have made clear they want the judge to be promoted to the 5th Circuit bench.

In March, when the Democrats controlled the Senate, members of the Senate Judiciary Committee blocked Judge Pickering,s nomination by a 10-9 vote on grounds that he was too conservative.

Some Democrats and other critics also say the judge is insensitive to minorities * a claim his son, Chip Pickering, strongly denies.

&It is unfortunate that in what,s going on with Senator Lott today there will also be opportunists who will want to use racial attacks and smear campaigns to win their political agenda * not based on the real records or the heart of a person,8 Chip Pickering said.

&But they will use race to divide and race to maintain political power and gain political power,8 he said.

&And we need to condemn both forms of racial politics * whether it is anyone in a leadership position who makes remarks that offends or hurts or anyone that will try to use race as a wedge or a weapon to assassinate someone,s character or record.8

JUDGE KEN STARR

First Among Equals: The Supreme Court in American Life

Thursday, December 19, 2002, 1:00pm
Eisenhower Executive Office Building, Room 450

REV_00104885

TODAY'S GUEST

*K*en Starr began his illustrious career by clerking for U.S. Court of Appeals Judge David Dyer in Miami's fifth circuit, then clerked for Warren E. Burger, Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, from 1975 to 1977. After that important role, Starr joined the law firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Washington, D.C., as an associate in 1977 and worked his way up to partner. In 1981, he was named Chief of Staff to Attorney General William French Smith. In 1983, Reagan appointed Starr to the U.S. Court of Appeals in 1983 where he served for six years.

In 1989, Starr stepped down from the bench to become the Solicitor General under President George Bush. In 1993, Starr returned to private practice with the Washington, D.C. office of the Chicago-based firm, Kirkland & Ellis. But public service soon beckoned again. In November of 1993, the Senate Ethics Committee called upon Judge Starr, asking him to look into the sexual misconduct accusations against Senator Bob Packwood. Later, Starr was recruited to replace Robert Fiske as independent counsel.

Today he has returned to practicing law. He and his wife Alice live in McLean, Virginia.

TODAY'S PROGRAM

*J*udge Starr will discuss his new book, First Among Equals: The Supreme Court in American Life. He will then take questions from the audience.

The OSI Listening Series will be held periodically to help key White House staff to look over the horizon and anticipate change, keeping in touch with the latest insights, trends, and ideas. To achieve this, OSI will sponsor forums with thinkers, writers, and scholars about what we can do to better plan for the future.

Introduction of Judge Kenneth W. Starr
(December 19, 2002)

Welcome to the White House. I am privileged to introduce Judge Ken Starr, who will speak about his recent book on the Supreme Court and answer some questions about the Court -- and maybe a few about some other interesting issues Judge Starr has been involved in during his extraordinary legal career.

Ken Starr is a native Texan . . . Judge Starr, that is a good thing around here . . . born in Vernon, Texas in 1946. He graduated from George Washington University and then Duke University Law School. After law school, he served for two years as a law clerk for Chief Justice Warren Burger. At the start of the Reagan Administration, Ken Starr was named Counselor to Attorney General William French Smith and played a key role in the judicial nomination process, including the nomination of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor in 1981.

In 1983, at age 37, Judge Starr himself was nominated by President Reagan and confirmed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, often considered America's second most important court. On that court, Judge Starr quickly earned a superb reputation -- a standout on a court that included judicial luminaries such as Scalia and Bork and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. In 1989, President George Bush asked Judge Starr to serve as Solicitor General of the United States, a role he ably performed for four years. He then returned to private practice in 1993.

In 1994, Judge Starr was called to his most famous public role, that of independent counsel in the Whitewater matter. As independent counsel, Judge Starr led many important investigations and prosecutions – earning the convictions of the sitting Arkansas Governor, a former Associate Attorney General, and the co-owners of the original Whitewater project. And of course, Judge Starr also led the investigation that ultimately resulted in the second impeachment of a President in American history. Through all the controversy that surrounded his tenure as independent counsel, Judge Starr maintained his dignity and devotion to the rule of law.

Judge Starr has now returned to private practice and continues to be a leader in the legal profession. He is counsel to Senator Mitch McConnell in the landmark campaign finance litigation, and he has written an excellent book about the Supreme Court. Stuart Taylor described Judge Starr's book as a "captivating, perceptive, fair-minded portrait of the world's most powerful court, its justices, and its history . . . accessible to lay readers and brimming with insights for experienced Court-watchers." Having read the book myself, I can say that I agree completely.

Judge Starr, I am not sure you heard the following when you served as independent counsel, but . . . welcome to the White House.

Subject: Camp David List

FYI - Here is the USA Today story that ran when Judy was given the list last year. It was also given to other reporters who asked, based on this article.

USA TODAY
May 17, 2001, Thursday, FINAL EDITION
SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 9A
LENGTH: 938 words
HEADLINE: Family, friends, staff fill Bush's overnight list So far, he is keeping promise of not 'renting' to fundraisers
BYLINE: Judy Keen

BODY:
WASHINGTON -- A list of 152 people who have spent the night at the White House or Camp David since President Bush took office includes nine of 214 elite "Pioneers," who raised at least $ 100,000 for his campaign.

However, four of those Pioneers are Bush's relatives, and four are friends from before he entered politics. The ninth is Labor Secretary Elaine Chao.

Bush said he wouldn't reward donors with overnight stays at the White House or Camp David, and so far, his guest list has been loaded with friends, family and staff. There are no people he knows primarily as contributors, and the list isn't studded with celebrities.
Just before his inauguration, Bush told USA TODAY that he would "restore dignity" to the White House in part by ending President Clinton's practice of inviting donors to spend the night there.
"I can assure you we won't be renting it out for political purposes," Bush said. "Using the quarters as a fundraising vehicle, we're not going to do that."

Of the 76 people who have stayed at the White House, 41 are longtime Bush friends and members of their families. Twenty-eight are relatives. Five are political associates. Rounding out the list: Richard Levin, president of Yale, where Bush's daughter Barbara is a freshman, and Levin's wife, Jane.

The Camp David guests, also 76 people, include 37 Cabinet members, White House staffers and their families. Fifteen are Bush family members. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, his wife, Cherie, and their staff account for five. The remaining 19 are friends.

Karen Hughes, counselor to the president, says the list demonstrates that Bush "is keeping his promise" that political contributions won't buy access to what he often calls "the people's house."

The list was compiled at USA TODAY's request.

Larry Makinson of the Center for Responsive Politics, a non-partisan group that tracks campaign donations, found nothing to criticize in the guest list. But as the 2004 campaign approaches, Makinson says, "The temptation to add to that list a sprinkling of big-time donors . . . is going to be hard to resist."

In 1997, in the midst of controversy over campaign fundraising, Clinton said 938 people were his overnight guests in 1993-96. More than a third, including many Clinton friends, were donors to the Democratic National Committee or Clinton's campaign in 1996. They gave a total of $ 6 million. Last September, Clinton released another list of 404 overnight guests from July 1999 through August 2000, including donors who gave a total of $ 600,000 to Hillary Rodham Clinton's Senate campaign.

The Clinton lists didn't include dates of overnight stays, so the number of Bush guests in his first four months in office can't be compared with his predecessor's.

In March 2000, Bush, when he was governor of Texas, released a list of 131 people who had stayed at the governor's mansion in Austin. More than $ 2.2 million was raised or given to Bush's presidential campaign by 60 of those guests, including seven Pioneers.

A closer look at Bush's guests at the White House and Camp David:

* Pioneers on the list are Chao; Roland Betts, a New York developer who met Bush at Yale in 1964; Los Angeles venture capitalist Brad Freeman, who has known Bush since 1979; Texas Public Safety Commissioner Jim Francis; Joe O'Neill, an oil executive from Midland, Texas, who introduced Bush to his future wife, Laura; Bush's sister, Doro Bush Koch; his uncle William "Bucky" Bush; his cousin Debbie Stapleton and her husband, Craig, who was named ambassador to the Czech Republic.

Besides raising money for Bush, those nine people also donated a total of $ 380,646 to Bush's presidential campaign, two campaigns for governor, and Republican candidates and party organizations from 1995 through 2000.

Many of the other friends and relatives on the list also donated to Bush's presidential campaign. Among them: Gerry Parsky, who ran Bush's California campaign and contributed $ 200,000 to the Republican National Committee and $ 20,000 to the California GOP.

* Vice President Cheney and about half of Bush's Cabinet have spent at least one night at Camp David: Chao, Attorney General John Ashcroft, Housing and Urban Development Secretary Mel Martinez, Interior Secretary Gale Norton, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Agriculture Secretary Ann Veneman and Environmental Protection Agency chief Christie Whitman.

* Two members of Congress have stayed at Camp David: Chao's husband, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H. South Carolina House Speaker David Wilkins was a guest there.

* The president's parents, sister, three brothers and their children have all stayed at the White House, Camp David or both. Other relatives on the list are Nancy Ellis, the president's aunt; her son Hap Ellis and his children, Chris and Walker; and Laura Bush's mother, Jenna Welch.

* Guests also include three Yale classmates: Betts, Terry Johnson and Don Etra. Also on the list are some of Bush's fellow former owners of the Texas Rangers: Betts, Tom Bernstein and Tom Schieffer.

* Fourteen members of Laura Bush's garden club from Austin slept at the White House. So did Kirbyjon Caldwell, senior pastor at Windsor Village United Methodist Church in Houston.

Clinton's guest list was heavy with celebrities, including director Steven Spielberg, singer Barbra Streisand and actress Jane Fonda. The only star on the Bush list is champion bass fisherman Johnny Morris, a family friend.

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of Global Communications

In the President,s Words:
The Rights and Aspirations of the Peoples of the Middle East
December 20, 2002

President Bush believes in the non-negotiable demands of human dignity for all people everywhere. He makes that clear by working for peace and addressing the hopes of Israelis and Palestinians. As he said in his landmark June 24 Rose Garden speech, &This moment is both an opportunity and a test for all parties in the Middle East: an opportunity to lay the foundations for future peace.8
? &We're working with the Sharon government to allow for tax receipts to be redistributed amongst the Palestinian people. And there are a lot of non-governmental organizations doing work within the Palestinian Territory to make sure that people don't starve. But the net effect of terrorism is to not only stop the peace process, but is to cause suffering amongst all the people of the region. And that's why our war against terror must -- must remain steadfast and strong, wherever terror exists.8

President Bush Signs Child Internet Safety Legislation
The Roosevelt Room, Washington, D.C.
December 4, 2002

? &I appreciate so very much the fact that the Prime Minister is committed to working with his Cabinet to move some of the Palestinian money to the Palestinian people; that he cares about the human condition of the Palestinians; and that under a monitoring system to make sure that the money being sent back to the Palestinian people will not be used for terrorist activities, that he is willing to work with his Cabinet to do just that. I believe that's important. We talked about the framework for peace, the idea of working toward peace, the idea of two states living side-by-side in peace as a part of our vision.8

President Bush Welcomes Prime Minister Sharon to White House
The Oval Office, Washington, D.C.
October 16, 2002

? Well, first of all, I'm committed to peace. That's -- I can speak for myself. And I'm committed to a vision of two states respecting each other, two states living side by side in peace.

President Bush, King Abdullah Discuss Middle East Peace
The Oval Office, Washington, D.C.
August 1, 2002

? &This moment is both an opportunity and a test for all parties in the Middle East: an opportunity to lay the foundations for future peace; a test to show who is serious about peace and who is not. The choice here is stark and simple. The Bible says, +I have set before you life and death; therefore, choose life., The time has arrived for everyone in this conflict to choose peace, and hope, and life.8

President Bush Calls for New Palestinian Leadership
The Rose Garden
June 24, 2002

? &I don't think Mr. Arafat is the issue. I think the issue is the Palestinian people. And as I have expressed myself, I am disappointed that he has not led in such a way that the Palestinian people have hope and confidence. And so, therefore, what we've got to do is work to put institutions in place which will allow for a government to develop which will bring confidence not only to Israelis, but the Palestinians(

&And so, first things first, and that is, what institutions are necessary to give the Palestinian people hope and to give the Israelis confidence that the emerging government will be someone with whom they can deal. And that's going to require security steps; transparency, when it comes to economic matters; anti-corruption devices; rule of law, enforced by a court system.8

President Bush Meets with Prime Minister Sharon
Washington, D.C.
June 10, 2002

? &The United States and the EU share a common vision of two states, Palestine and Israel, living side by side in peace and security. This vision offers the Palestinian people a new opportunity to choose how they live. We should take this opportunity to help build institutions that will serve the Palestinian people, a Palestinian state and its neighbors, as well.8

President Bush Meets with European Leaders
The East Room, Washington, D.C.
May 2, 2002

? &There are clearly people in the Middle East who would use terror as a weapon to derail any peace process. And for there to be peace -- something I long for, and something I know that Israel and the Palestinian people long for -- in order for there to be peace, we must continue to rout out terror. And the message can't be more clear, and we're going to continue to hold people accountable for results.8

Statement by the President on the Middle East
The Bush Ranch, Crawford, Texas
April 28, 2002

? &When an 18 year old Palestinian girl is induced to blow herself up, and in the process kills a 17 year old Israeli girl, the future, itself, is dying -- the future of the Palestinian people and the future of the Israeli people. The United States is strongly committed to finding a just settlement in the Middle East. That settlement must lead to two states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace and security.8

THE WHITE HOUSE

In the President,s Words:
The Rights and Aspirations of the Peoples of the Middle East
December 20, 2002

President Bush believes in the non-negotiable demands of human dignity for all people everywhere. He makes that clear by working for peace and addressing the hopes of Israelis and Palestinians. As he said in his landmark June 24 Rose Garden speech, &This moment is both an opportunity and a test for all parties in the Middle East: an opportunity to lay the foundations for future peace.8
? &We're working with the Sharon government to allow for tax receipts to be redistributed amongst the Palestinian people. And there are a lot of non-governmental organizations doing work within the Palestinian Territory to make sure that people don't starve. But the net effect of terrorism is to not only stop the peace process, but is to cause suffering amongst all the people of the region. And that's why our war against terror must -- must remain steadfast and strong, wherever terror exists.8

The Roosevelt Room, Washington, D.C.
December 4, 2002

? &I appreciate so very much the fact that the Prime Minister is committed to working with his Cabinet to move some of the Palestinian money to the Palestinian people; that he cares about the human condition of the Palestinians; and that under a monitoring system to make sure that the money being sent back to the Palestinian people will not be used for terrorist activities, that he is willing to work with his Cabinet to do just that. I believe that's important. We talked about the framework for peace, the idea of working toward peace, the idea of two states living side-by-side in peace as a part of our vision.8

President Bush Welcomes Prime Minister Sharon to White House
The Oval Office, Washington, D.C.
October 16, 2002

? Well, first of all, I'm committed to peace. That's -- I can speak for myself. And I'm committed to a vision of two states respecting each other, two states living side by side in peace.

President Bush, King Abdullah Discuss Middle East Peace
The Oval Office, Washington, D.C.
August 1, 2002

? &This moment is both an opportunity and a test for all parties in the Middle East: an opportunity to lay the foundations for future peace; a test to show who is serious about peace and who is not. The choice here is stark and simple. The Bible says, +I have set before you life and death; therefore, choose life., The time has arrived for everyone in this conflict to choose peace, and hope, and life.8

President Bush Calls for New Palestinian Leadership
June 24, 2002

? &I don't think Mr. Arafat is the issue. I think the issue is the Palestinian people. And as I have expressed myself, I am disappointed that he has not led in such a way that the Palestinian people have hope and confidence. And so, therefore, what we've got to do is work to put institutions in place which will allow for a government to develop which will bring confidence not only to Israelis, but the Palestinians(

&And so, first things first, and that is, what institutions are necessary to give the Palestinian people hope and to give the Israelis confidence that the emerging government will be someone with whom they can deal. And that's going to require security steps; transparency, when it comes to economic matters; anti-corruption devices; rule of law, enforced by a court system.8

Washington, D.C.
June 10, 2002

? &The United States and the EU share a common vision of two states, Palestine and Israel, living side by side in peace and security. This vision offers the Palestinian people a new opportunity to choose how they live. We should take this opportunity to help build institutions that will serve the Palestinian people, a Palestinian state and its neighbors, as well.8

President Bush Meets with European Leaders
The East Room, Washington, D.C.
May 2, 2002

? &There are clearly people in the Middle East who would use terror as a weapon to derail any peace process. And for there to be peace -- something I long for, and something I know that Israel and the Palestinian people long for -- in order for there to be peace, we must continue to rout out terror. And the message can't be more clear, and we're going to continue to hold people accountable for results.8

Statement by the President on the Middle East
The Bush Ranch, Crawford, Texas
April 28, 2002

? &When an 18 year old Palestinian girl is induced to blow herself up, and in the process kills a 17 year old Israeli girl, the future, itself, is dying -- the future of the Palestinian people and the future of the Israeli people. The United States is strongly committed to finding a just settlement in the Middle East. That settlement must lead to two states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace and security.8

The Associated Press
Friday, December 20, 2002; 2:11 PM ANCHORAGE, Alaska )) Former Sen. Frank Murkowski on Friday appointed his daughter, Republican state Rep. Lisa Murkowski, to serve the remaining two years of his term in the U.S. Senate.
Murkowski, who spent 22 years as a senator, resigned Dec. 2 when he was sworn in as Alaska's governor.
As governor, he had the power to appoint his successor in the Senate.
Lisa Murkowski, 45, was re-elected last month to a third term in the Legislature and had been selected as House Majority leader.
"In some ways, this is probably one of the most important decisions I will make as your governor, recognizing this responsibility, I've reached out to Alaskans from all over the state," the governor said.
He said he wanted to choose someone with legislative experience who could get things done in Washington and establish his or her own identity in the Senate.
"Above all, I felt the person I appoint to the remaining two years of my term should be someone who shares my basic philosophy, my values, but particularly one who shares on the issues of Alaska matters that are before us," he said. "Someone whose judgment I trust in representing the state and all of its people."

Our president, Larry Mone, would like to come into D.C. and talk to you about tort reform, and the Manhattan Institute's ongoing tort reform projects.

We'd prefer a meeting in January, if you are available, preferably sometime in the mid morning or early afternoon. Larry is available on January 10th, 15th, 17th, or 22nd. Let me know if any of these dates work for you. If not, let me know what other days might work and I'll try and coordinate your

Dear friends:

It is my pleasure to send greetings to the State of Asian Pacific American Community Conference. The National Asian-America Republican Coalition is an organization for which I have the highest respect.

In providing a forum for the public to address topics pertinent to the community of Asian Pacific Americans, you are providing much needed leadership and service to our community. Your organization has contributed to the increasing role Asian Pacific Americans play within politics and the government.

We have reason to be proud of our representation in the Bush Administration. President George W. Bush has already named 97 Asian Pacific Americans to his Administration, nineteen of which required Senate confirmation--a record setting accomplishment.

I wish to congratulate Elizabeth Szu for her successful leadership of the National Asian-American Republican Coalition and thank you all for your continued commitment to our community. I wish you continued success in your future endeavors.

Sincerely,

Ed Moy
Special Assistant to the President and Associate Director for Presidential Personnel

Last part of AP story below from Sunday mentions judicial nominations.
Here is the excerpt (full article below):

The Lott controversy may have a direct influence the president's judicial picks, suggested Sen. Chuck Hagel (news, bio, voting record), R-Neb. He said he thought nominees' background "will be examined more closely regarding racial issues."

One test could come soon: Bush's possible renomination of U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering for a federal appeals court vacancy.

Hatch said he thinks Bush should again submit the nomination, which was defeated by a party-line 10-9 vote in the Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee in March.

Pickering, a Lott friend, was opposed by civil rights groups, which accused him of racial insensitivity.

"He was very badly treated before the United States Senate," Hatch said.

Leahy, who becomes the committee's ranking Democrat, said: "I'd vote again [sic] him."

Senate GOP to Name Lott's Replacement

By LEIGH STROPE, Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON - Now that they have deposed one party leader and are to elect another on Monday, Senate Republicans are working to limit the damage that Trent Lott's words had on GOP efforts to court minority voters.

"I think this will present no handicap whatsoever in our ongoing effort to convince the nonwhite citizens of our country that the Republican Party is the place to be," said Sen. Mitch McConnell (news, bio, voting record), the incoming No. 2 Republican leader.

"In the long sweep of American history, this is going to be a blip," McConnell, R-Ky., told "Fox News Sunday."

Senate Republicans planned to elevate Bill Frist of Tennessee in a conference call Monday afternoon, making him majority leader when the GOP retakes Senate control in the new Congress that convenes in early January.

Lott, R-Miss., resigned Friday, more than two weeks after his verbal blunder that implied he favored racial segregation. Lott's praise of Strom Thurmond's segregationist run for president in 1948 had put the entire Republican Party on the defensive, from the White House down.

He will return to the Senate in January, but not in a leadership position. Republican sources said it appeared that Lott, a senator since 1989, had waited too long to end the controversy and lost any leverage he might have had to cut a deal to become a committee chairman.

"There is no apparent position of influence to which we can elect him," McConnell said. "He will, in my view, have enormous influence as someone who knows a lot about how the Senate works."

The incoming Judiciary Committee (news - web sites) chairman, GOP Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record) of Utah, praised President Bush (news - web sites) * as the party's top leader * for reaching out to all people and he criticized Democrats who argue that Republicans' positions hold little appeal for minorities.

"The attitude is that only Democrats care about minorities. That's pure B.S.," Hatch said on ABC's "This Week."

"I think every Republican is working hard to try and be good to minorities and do what's right. We can't support some of the far-left, you know, extreme approaches toward race, but we certainly do believe in equality."

Lott's surprise endorsement of affirmative action will not change the GOP's opposition, senators said. Lott, in a late effort to salvage his job, declared his support on Black Entertainment Television last week.

"I don't believe that Republicans are going to start endorsing quotas and preferences," McConnell said.

As majority leader, Frist can make a difference in bringing more people into the Republican camp, Hatch said.

"It'll be a different face than what we've had, and I'm not criticizing what we've had, but I think Bill has a kind of a more moderate record and a more moderate approach toward things," Hatch said.

A leading Democrat, Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, agreed. "But I think he's going to have to reach out. It's not enough to say that we're all colorblind or anything else."

Sen. Rick Santorum (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., said the concerns raised about Lott's remarks have "re-energized many of us here in the Senate to build this country from the bottom up and provide equal opportunity for every American to succeed in the American dream."

Lott's fellow Mississippian, GOP Sen. Thad Cochran (news, bio, voting record), also said on CBS' "Face the Nation" that it was important that Republicans show "we have genuine concern and a plan" to address the interests of minorities.

And Sen. James Inhofe (news, bio, voting record), R-Okla., asked if Republicans would make a greater effort on behalf of minorities, said: "The outreach has been there. I think it's a change of concept."

The Lott controversy may have a direct influence the president's judicial picks, suggested Sen. Chuck Hagel (news, bio, voting record), R-Neb. He said he thought nominees' background "will be examined more closely regarding racial issues."

One test could come soon: Bush's possible renomination of U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering for a federal appeals court vacancy.

Hatch said he thinks Bush should again submit the nomination, which was defeated by a party-line 10-9 vote in the Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee in March.

Pickering, a Lott friend, was opposed by civil rights groups, which accused him of racial insensitivity.

"He was very badly treated before the United States Senate," Hatch said.

Leahy, who becomes the committee's ranking Democrat, said: "I'd vote again him."

President signs bill giving southern Nevada land for shooting range

President Bush on Tuesday signed a measure giving 2,880 acres of federal land to Clark County for a public shooting range that officials say will be the largest of its kind in the nation.

The president's action came a day after elected officials and gun enthusiasts gathered at the site northwest of Las Vegas to hail word that the government would turn over $230 million worth of land.

The projected $30 million Clark County Sport Shooting Park will include ranges for archery, air guns, pistols, rifles and shotguns. There will also be trap, skeet and sporting clays.

Proponents began pushing for federal land for the shooting range two years ago, citing safety concerns and the proximity of homes being built close to existing outdoor ranges and police training centers.

In 1999, a French tourist was startled when a stray bullet punctured the hood of his rental car at a campground in Red Rock Canyon, about 30 miles west of Las Vegas. Police said the shot might have come from a rifle and pistol range about a mile away.

The state's congressional delegation had supported the bill allocating the land for the project.

County officials have said the facility would be modeled after the Ben Avery Shooting Range, a publicly owned and operated facility about 23 miles north of Phoenix.

Civil Rights Groups Will Press Frist To Oppose Bush Judicial Nominees.ÿ USA Today (12/27, Kiely) reports, "A coalition of leading civil rights, religious and labor groups plans to ask the new Senate majority leader, Republican Bill Frist of Tennessee, to translate his party's pledges of inclusiveness into policy changes. That could trigger a backlash from Republicans who want the party to stay its conservative course."ÿ Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, "said his group will seek a meeting with Frist 'to give him an opportunity to make a fresh start' after the controversy over Sen. Trent Lott's praise of retiring Sen. Strom Thurmond's 1948 presidential bid. Thurmond ran as a segregationist. Lott was forced to step down as GOP Senate leader."ÿ The Leadership Conference "is a coalition of more than 180 groups. Its overture to Frist illustrates how the Lott controversy has given liberal activists new hope of influencing the Washington agenda even though Republicans will control both chambers of Congress and the White House."ÿ The group "wants Frist to:ÿ Oppose five of President Bush's 15 federal judicial nominees who were left in limbo when Congress adjourned in November: Charles Pickering of Mississippi; Priscilla Owen of Texas; Carolyn Kuhl of California; Terrence Boyle of North Carolina and Jeffrey Sutton of Ohio.ÿ They have 'records of deep hostility to core civil rights principles,' the Leadership Conference contended. Supporters of the five say they are being opposed because they are conservative.ÿ Support legislation that would encourage federal investigations and prosecutions of hate crimes -- acts believed to have been prompted by race, religion, nationality, gender, sexual orientation or disability. Most Senate Republicans have opposed the hate-crimes legislation on the grounds that all violent crimes are heinous, regardless of the motivation.ÿ Support funds for election reform."ÿ USA Today adds, "Also likely to request a meeting with Frist: Congressional Black Caucus Chairman Elijah Cummings, D-Md. He's glad the GOP replaced Lott, but he wants more."

Another great opinion from Judge Bates. He cites his decision in Walker
v. Cheney for the proposition that the judiciary should adhere to its "traditional restricted role" in disputes between the political branches
"in keeping with the Constitution's separation of powers structure."

MEMORANDUM OPINION

Thirty-two members of the House of Representatives (hereinafter "plaintiffs" or "the congressmen") bring this action against President George W. Bush, Secretary of State Colin Powell, and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld ("defendants") challenging President Bush's unilateral withdrawal from the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty ("ABM Treaty") without the approval of Congress. The congressmen contend that because the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution classifies treaties, like Acts of Congress, as the "supreme law of the land," the President cannot terminate a treaty without congressional consent, any more than he could repeal a statute. Defendants counter that the congressmen lack standing to bring this action, that their complaint raises a nonjusticiable political question, and that their claim is not ripe. Defendants further contend that given the President's plenary power over foreign relations under the Constitution and the fact that the treaty authority is in Article II of the Constitution delineating the Executive Branch's powers, and in light of historical practice over the past 200 years, the President's withdrawal from the ABM Treaty without seeking congressional approval was constitutional.

Before the Court are cross-motions for summary judgment, and several amicus briefs. The Court does not reach the merits of plaintiffs' claim in the face of two prongs of the justiciability doctrine, each founded on separation of powers concerns. Under the ruling in Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811 (1997), the Court finds that these thirty-two congressmen have not alleged the requisite injury to establish standing to pursue their claim. And pursuant to Goldwater v. Carter, 444 U.S. 996 (1979), the Court concludes that the treaty termination issue is a nonjusticiable "political question" that cannot be resolved by the courts. Accordingly, this action will be dismissed.

BACKGROUND

The United States and the Soviet Union entered into the bilateral ABM Treaty on October 3, 1972.[1] The ABM Treaty strictly limited the number and location of anti-ballistic missile systems that each side could deploy for defense against nuclear missile attacks. Both nations agreed not to develop ABM technology, and not to test or deploy such technology on land, at sea, or in space. A critical component of an interlocking framework of arms control agreements, the ABM Treaty was a cornerstone of the Cold War policy of "mutually assured destruction," an understanding that without ABM defenses neither side would risk starting a nuclear war because it knew the other side would massively retaliate, thus ensuring the widespread destruction of both nations.

President Bush, however, concluded that the world order and international security had drastically changed since the inception of the ABM Treaty three decades ago. Accordingly, on December 13, 2001, he gave Russia the requisite six-months notice of the intention of the United States to withdraw from the ABM Treaty, pursuant to the Treaty's termination clause:

> Each Party shall, in exercising its national sovereignty, have the right to withdraw from this Treaty if it decides that extraordinary events related to the subject matter of this Treaty have jeopardized its supreme interests. It shall give notice of its decision to the other Party six months prior to withdrawal from the Treaty.

ABM Treaty, art. XV, cl. 2. The White House explained that "[t]he Soviet Union no longer exists [and] Russia is not an enemy, but in fact is increasingly allied with us on a growing number of critically important issues."[2] The State Department cited the development of "a new strategic relationship with Russia that is cooperative rather than adversarial," including "strong relationships with most states of the former Soviet Union." See United States Department of State, Text of Diplomatic Notes Sent to Russia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, and Ukraine (Dec. 14, 2002).

President Bush also explained that a number of foreign regimes "have acquired or are actively seeking to acquire weapons of mass destruction . . . [that] pose a direct threat to the territory and security of the United States." Id. "The attacks against the U.S. homeland on September 11 vividly demonstrate that the threats we face today are far different from those of the Cold War." Def. Motion, Ex. 2, supra note 2. Compliance with the Treaty, President Bush noted, "hinders our government's ability to develop ways to protect our people from future terrorist or rogue state missile attacks."[3]

Before he withdrew from the Treaty, however, President Bush did not submit the question of treaty termination to the Senate or the House. Nor did the President otherwise seek congressional consent for the withdrawal. Nearly six months after President Bush announced his intention to terminate the treaty, these congressmen brought suit on June 11, 2002, just two days before the termination of the ABM Treaty became effective.[4]

ANALYSIS

Defendants raise a number of distinct bases for dismissing plaintiffs' complaint on jurisdictional grounds, including standing, political question, and ripeness. These doctrines all arise out of the "bedrock requirement" that courts hear only "cases and controversies." See Valley Forge Christian Coll. v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 471 (1982). As the Supreme Court has explained, "[t]he federal courts are under an independent obligation to examine their own jurisdiction, and standing 'is perhaps the most important of the jurisdictional doctrines.'" FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 230 (1990) (quoting Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 750 (1984)).[5] The Court will therefore begin its analysis with standing, and then [4] No emergency relief was, or since has been, requested.

[5] Standing must be determined as a threshold jurisdictional matter. See Whitman v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 155 (1990); see also Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 101-02 (1998). In Campbell v. Clinton, 203 F.3d 19 (D.C. Cir. 2000), a complaint brought by several congressmen against President Clinton was challenged on grounds of mootness, standing, and justiciabililty. The Court of Appeals, however, only reached standing: "Since we agree with the district court that the congressmen lack standing, it is not necessary to decide proceed to the related issue of whether a nonjusticiable political question is presented. In light of the resolution of these threshold jurisdictional issues, the Court does not reach the merits of plaintiffs' claims.

I. Standing

Article III of the Constitution restricts the jurisdiction of the federal courts to "Cases" and "Controversies." U.S. Const. art. III, § 2; Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 94 (1968); Allen, 468 U.S. at 750. This requirement has given rise to "several doctrines . . . 'founded in concern about the proper — and properly limited — role of the courts in a democratic society.'" Allen, 468 U.S. at 750 (quoting Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 498 (1975)); Valley Forge, 454 U.S. at 471. One aspect of this "case-or-controversy" requirement is that plaintiffs must have standing to sue, an inquiry that focuses on whether the plaintiff is the proper party to bring suit. FW/PBS, Inc., 493 U.S. at 231. Hence, "'the question of standing is whether the litigant is entitled to have the court decide the merits of the dispute or of particular issues.'" Allen, 468 U.S. at 750-51 (quoting Warth, 422 U.S. at 498).

Standing focuses on the particular injury allegedly suffered by the plaintiff:

> First, the plaintiff must have suffered an injury in fact — an invasion of a legally protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized, and (b) actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical. Second, there must be a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of — the injury has to be fairly . . . trace[able] to the challenged action of the defendant, and not . . . th[e] result [of] the independent action of some third party not before the court. Third, it must be likely, as opposed to merely speculative, that the injury will be redressed by a favorable decision.

whether there are other jurisdictional defects." 203 F.3d at 20.

Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61 (1992) (internal citations and quotation marks omitted). "These requirements together constitute the 'irreducible constitutional minimum' of standing, which is an 'essential and unchanging part' of Article III's case-or-controversy requirement, and a key factor in dividing the power of government between the courts and the two political branches." Vermont Agency of Natural Res. v. United States ex rel. Stevens, 529 U.S. 765, 771 (2000) (internal citations omitted) (quoting Lujan, 504 U.S. at 559-60).

A. Raines v. Byrd

The question whether members of Congress have standing to sue Executive Branch officials is neither novel nor unsettled. Indeed, this case is squarely within the holding of Raines v. Byrd. The Supreme Court in Raines emphasized that in cases of inter-branch disputes between the Executive and Legislative Branches of government, courts must conduct a more exacting scrutiny of standing, particularly the alleged injury: "our standing inquiry has been especially rigorous when reaching the merits of the dispute would force us to decide whether an action taken by one of the other two branches of the Federal Government was unconstitutional." 521 U.S. at 819-20.

Like the congressmen here, the plaintiffs in Raines were a small number of members of Congress suing the Executive Branch. They challenged the constitutionality of the Line Item Veto Act, 2 U.S.C. § 691 et seq., which authorized the President to strike, or "veto," specific items or provisions within appropriations legislation. Although the plaintiffs in Raines had voted against the bill, both the Senate and the House passed the legislation by wide margins, and President Clinton signed it into law.

After losing the fight in Congress, the congressmen in Raines brought their challenge to court, arguing that the Act "unconstitutionally expand[ed] the President's power" and "violate[d] the requirements of bicameral passage and presentment by granting to the President, acting alone, the authority to 'cancel' and thus repeal provisions of federal law." Raines, 521 U.S. at 816. The Line Item Veto Act, they contended, "divest[ed] the plaintiffs of their constitutional role in the repeal of legislation," and "alter[ed] the constitutional balance of powers between the Legislative and Executive Branches." Id. The District Court found that the congressmen's claim that the Act "dilute[d] their Article I voting power" was a sufficient injury to confer standing, and ultimately found that the Act violated the Presentment Clause of the Constitution, amounting to an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the President. See Byrd v. Raines, 956 F.Supp. 25, 31, 32-38 (D.D.C. 1997). On direct review, the Supreme Court vacated the District Court's ruling, and held that the plaintiffs could not meet "the bedrock requirement" of standing:

> 'No principle is more fundamental to the judiciary's proper role in our system of government than the constitutional limitation of federal-court jurisdiction to actual cases or controversies.' . . . We have always insisted on strict compliance with this jurisdictional standing requirement.

521 U.S. at 818-19 (quoting Simon v. Eastern Ky. Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S. 26, 37 (1976)).

In order to establish standing, the Supreme Court emphasized, a plaintiff must show that the "claimed injury is personal, particularized, concrete, and otherwise judicially cognizable." 521 U.S. at 820. The Court underscored that the injury must be personal to that plaintiff in order to satisfy the Article III case-or-controversy requirement:

> To meet the standing requirements of Article III, "[a] plaintiff must allege personal injury fairly traceable to the defendant's allegedly unlawful conduct and likely to be redressed by the requested relief." Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984) (emphasis added). For our purposes, the italicized words in this quotation from Allen are the key ones. We have consistently stressed that a plaintiff's complaint > must establish that he has a "personal stake" in the alleged dispute, and that the alleged injury suffered is particularized as to him.

Id. at 818-19; see also Lujan, 504 U.S. at 561 n.1 ("By particularized, we mean that the injury must affect the plaintiff in a personal and individual way.").

The Supreme Court characterized the congressmen's alleged injury in Raines as "the abstract dilution of institutional legislative power." Id. at 826. The congressmen there alleged a broad "type of institutional injury," particularly "the diminution of legislative power" — an injury, the Court found, "which necessarily damages all Members of Congress and both Houses of Congress equally." Id. at 821. The Court held "that these individual members of Congress do not have a sufficient 'personal stake' in the dispute and have not alleged a sufficiently concrete injury to have established Article III standing." Id. at 830.

B. The Application of Raines Here

The injuries in Raines are precisely the type of injuries raised here. The complaint alleges that plaintiffs have standing because President Bush failed to obtain congressional consent to withdraw from the ABM Treaty, and hence they were "deprived of their constitutional right and duty to participate in treaty termination." Compl. ¶ 13. Plaintiffs allege that the Constitution requires "that the making, modifying, and terminating of treaties be the joint prerogative of the executive and legislative branches," and that in light of the Constitution's checks and balances "the President has a duty to seek and obtain the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate or a majority of both Houses for the termination of a treaty." Compl. ¶¶ 11-12. As their complaint characterizes it, "plaintiffs have sustained a grievous institutional injury by being deprived of their constitutional right and duty to participate in treaty termination." Id. at ¶ 13. This alleged injury mirrors that claimed in Raines, where the congressmen argued they were "divest[ed] . . . of their constitutional role in the repeal of legislation." 521 U.S. at 816. It is, effectively, the same institutional injury as in Raines, where the Line Item Veto Act allegedly "alter[ed] the constitutional balance of powers between the Legislative and Executive Branches." Id.

There are striking similarities between the claims in Raines and the claims here. Both groups of congressmen brought their claims in "their official capacities as members of the United States Congress." Compare Compl. ¶ 6 with Raines, 521 U.S. at 816. Both allege injuries to the constitutional role and power of the Legislative Branch — here, in the treaty termination process, and in Raines, in the repeal of legislation. In both cases, all members of Congress (not just those bringing the lawsuit) suffered the alleged injuries equally. Indeed, the congressmen here conceded at the hearing on the parties' motions that their alleged injuries extend to all members of the House and Senate, just as the injury alleged in Raines did. See 521 U.S. at 821 (injury "necessarily damage[d] all Members of Congress and both Houses of Congress equally").

In each case, moreover, the congressmen had actually voted on measures they opposed, but lost the vote. In Raines, the congressmen had voted on the legislation establishing the Line Item Veto Act: "[T]heir votes were given full effect. They simply lost that vote." 521 U.S. at 824. Likewise, here the congressmen voted on a resolution against President Bush's termination of the Treaty, and lost. On June 6, 2002, Representative Kucinich offered a resolution in the House:

> Whereas, the President does not have the authority to repeal laws . . . . Therefore, be it resolved, That the President should respect the Constitutional role of Congress and > seek the approval of Congress for the withdrawal of the United States of America from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

Compl. ¶ 25. Following debate, the Speaker of the House ruled the resolution did not constitute a point of privilege under House rules and therefore could not be considered at the time. On appeal of that ruling to the full House, a motion to table the appeal was agreed to by a vote of 254 to 169. Compl. ¶ 25. All thirty-two congressmen who are plaintiffs here voted against the motion to table Congressman Kucinich's resolution. See H.R. Roll Call Vote No. 214, June 6, 2002.[6] There has been no claim here that their votes were not given full effect. Rather, "[t]hey simply lost that vote." Raines, 521 U.S. at 824.

Simply put, Raines teaches that generalized injuries that affect all members of Congress in the same broad and undifferentiated manner are not sufficiently "personal" or "particularized," but rather are institutional, and too widely dispersed to confer standing.

> [A]ppellees do not claim that they have been deprived of something to which they personally are entitled — such as their seats as Members of Congress after their constituents had elected them. Rather, appellees' claim of standing is based on a loss of political power, not loss of any private right, which would make the injury more concrete. . . . [T]he injury claimed by the Members of Congress here is not claimed in any private capacity but solely because they are Members of Congress. If one of the Members of Congress were to retire tomorrow, he would no longer have a claim; the claim would be possessed by his successor instead. The claimed injury thus runs (in a sense) with the Member's seat, a seat which the Member holds (it may quite arguably be said) as trustee for his constituents, not as a prerogative of personal power.

[6] Likewise, Senator Feingold sought a unanimous consent resolution stating that it was "the sense of the Senate that approval of the United States Senate is required to terminate any treaty between the United States and another nation" and that "the Senate does not approve the withdrawal of the United States from the [ABM] Treaty." Compl. ¶ 26. However, an objection was made, and the resolution was never considered by the Senate.

Id. at 821 (citations omitted; emphasis in original). In short, "the institutional injury they allege is wholly abstract and widely dispersed." Id. at 829. So, too, here the claim that plaintiffs were deprived of a constitutional right and duty to participate in treaty termination is, like the dilution of legislative power alleged in Raines, an institutional injury lacking a personal, particularized nature.[7]

Nor are the congressmen's injuries here the unusual type of personalized injury affecting a specific legislator for which the Supreme Court has recognized standing. In Raines, the Court distinguished that rare instance where a legislator would have standing to bring suit, specifically Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969), in which a newly elected congressman had standing to bring suit when the House excluded him from his seat because of alleged fraud.

> Unlike the injury claimed by Congressman Adam Clayton Powell, the injury claimed by the Members of Congress here is not claimed in any private capacity but solely because they are Members of Congress.

Raines, 521 U.S. at 821 (emphasis in original).

[7] The Supreme Court upheld legislative standing for institutional injuries in Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433 (1939). The plaintiffs were twenty Kansas senators who voted against the ratification of a constitutional amendment, resulting in a deadlock that otherwise would defeat the amendment. But the Kansas lieutenant governor, the presiding officer of the state senate, cast the tie-breaking vote to ratify the amendment, thereby "nullifying" the twenty state senators' votes and leaving them with no remedy — an injury the Supreme Court deemed particularized and personal to those state senators. Raines, however, distinguished the injury in Coleman:

> It is obvious, then, that our holding in Coleman stands (at most) for the proposition that legislators whose votes would have been sufficient to defeat (or enact) a specific legislative Act have standing to sue if that legislative action goes into effect (or does not go into effect), on the ground that their votes have been completely nullified. It should be equally obvious that [plaintiffs'] claim does not fall within our holding in Coleman, as thus understood. They have not alleged that they voted for a specific bill, that there were sufficient votes to pass the bill, and that the bill was nonetheless deemed defeated.

Raines, 521 U.S. at 823-24 (citations omitted).

REV_00105247

Thus, in nearly every respect, plaintiffs' alleged injuries are effectively the same as those raised in Raines, involving a similar alleged loss of legislative power to the Executive Branch. Both groups of congressmen asserted purely institutional injuries that were not personal to the individual congressmen. Under Raines, then, the plaintiffs here do not have standing.

C. Decisions Subsequent to Raines

This Circuit has applied Raines in two subsequent cases, underscoring the principle that absent some discrete, personal, particularized injury, a handful of congressmen will not have standing to bring suit against the Executive Branch. Each case — like this one — involved congressmen suing the President over an alleged diminution of their roles as members of Congress.

In Chenoweth v. Clinton, 181 F.3d 112 (D.C. Cir. 1999), four congressmen brought suit against President Clinton challenging an environmental program enacted through executive order rather than legislation. The President's use of an executive order, plaintiffs claimed, "deprived [them] of their constitutionally guaranteed responsibility of open debate and vote on issues and legislation" involving interstate commerce and the expenditure of federal money. 181 F.3d at 113. The alleged injury in Chenoweth was "predicated upon the theory that . . . the President denied them their proper role in the legislative process and, consequently, diminished their power as Members of Congress." Id. Finding Raines dispositive, the court concluded that the congressmen did not have standing and dismissed the case:

> As the plaintiffs point out, the injury they allegedly suffered when the President issued [the executive order] — a dilution of their authority as legislators — is . . . identical to the injury the Court in Raines deprecated as "widely dispersed" and "abstract." If, as the Court held in Raines, a statute that allegedly "divests > [congressmen] of their constitutional role" in the legislative process does not give standing to sue, then neither does an Executive Order that allegedly deprives congressmen of their "right[] to participate and vote on legislation in a manner defined by the Constitution."

Id. at 115 (citations omitted). The court found the plaintiffs' claimed injury — the "dilut[ion of] their authority as members of Congress" — was "indistinguishable from the claim to standing the Supreme Court rejected in Raines." Id. at 117.

The same result was reached in Campbell v. Clinton, 203 F.3d 19 (D.C. Cir. 2000). There, thirty-one congressmen challenged President Clinton's use of armed forces in Yugoslavia, claiming that the President "acted illegally — in excess of his authority — because he waged war in the constitutional sense without a congressional delegation," in violation of the War Powers Resolution, thereby "inflict[ing] an institutional injury upon Congress, in this case by circumventing its legislative authority." 203 F.3d at 21-22. The court found that the congressmen did not have standing under Raines. "The [Supreme] Court did not suggest in Raines that . . . congressmen would have standing anytime a President allegedly acts in excess of statutory authority." Id. at 22. Again, the injury alleged was to the institution, not to individual members of Congress.

The injuries alleged in Chenoweth and Campbell — which the Court of Appeals found were insufficient to establish standing — are much like the injuries claimed here. The congressmen claim that they have been divested of their constitutional role in treaty termination. That is no different from the alleged injury in Chenoweth — being divested of a role in voting on and approving or rejecting legislation — or the alleged injury in Campbell — being divested of a role in declaring war. Indeed, the injury alleged by plaintiffs here, that President Bush's termination of the ABM Treaty "dilute[d] their Article I voting power," is virtually indistinguishable from the injuries asserted in Chenoweth and Campbell, which also involved alleged dilution of authority as members of Congress. Plaintiffs do not — and cannot — explain how their alleged injuries are personal to them. Rather, their claim of a "grievous institutional injury" where they are "deprived of their constitutional right . . . to participate in treaty termination" is no different from the institutional injuries alleged in Chenoweth, Campbell, and Raines.

D. Political Remedies

The conclusion that plaintiffs do not have standing is reinforced by the fact that, in addition to seeking judicial resolution, they have a number of other, equally effective remedies available to pressure the President to obtain congressional consent to the termination of the ABM Treaty. Plaintiffs assert that "[g]iven the President's mistaken view of his authority to engage in treaty termination on his own, Plaintiffs are completely without any legislative remedy to rectify the President's proposed unlawful termination of the ABM Treaty." Compl. ¶ 14. The Court disagrees. These congressmen have remedies they can use as political leverage to prevent the President's unilateral termination of the ABM Treaty as part of the give-and-take discussion and compromise envisioned by the Framers of the Constitution. Indeed, the availability of legislative counter-measures was a factor in the Supreme Court's decision in Raines. See 521 U.S. at 829; see also id. at 821 ("In the future, a majority of Senators and Congressmen can pass or reject appropriations bills; the Act has no effect on this process.").

The fact that plaintiffs have several political arrows in their legislative quiver underscores the reluctance of courts needlessly to involve themselves in inter-branch disputes. "Because the parties' dispute is therefore fully susceptible to political resolution, we would . . . dismiss the complaint to avoid meddl[ing] in the internal affairs of the legislative branch." Chenoweth, 181 F.3d at 116 (citation omitted). "Historically, political disputes between Members of the Legislative and the Executive Branches were resolved without resort to the courts." Id. at 113-14.[8] In Goldwater v. Carter, this availability of other remedies to Congress was an important consideration: "[W]e are asked to settle a dispute between coequal branches of our Government, each of which has resources available to protect and assert its interests, resources not available to private litigants outside the judicial forum." 444 U.S. at 1004 (Rehnquist, J., concurring). The plurality opinion then noted:

> Congress has a variety of powerful tools for influencing foreign policy decisions that bear on treaty matters. Under Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution, it can regulate commerce with foreign nations, raise and support armies, and declare war. It has power over the appointment of ambassadors and the funding of embassies and consulates. Congress thus retains a strong influence over the President's conduct in treaty matters. "As our political history demonstrates, treaty creation and termination are complex phenomena rooted in the dynamic relationship between the two branches of our government."

Id. at 1005 n.1 (quoting Goldwater v. Carter, 617 F.2d 697, 716 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (Wright, J., concurring)). And in Campbell, the court also stressed that the congressmen had other remedies:

> [A]ppellants fail because they . . . enjoy ample legislative power to have stopped

[8] Of course, in Chenoweth the court pointed out that Congress could simply overturn President Clinton's American Heritage Rivers Initiative "were a sufficient number in each House so inclined." 181 F.3d at 116. Here, although Congress cannot simply reenact the ABM Treaty as if it were a statute, Congress nonetheless had a number of political options it could follow to persuade the President not to withdraw from a treaty without congressional consent.

REV_00105251

> prosecution of the "war." In this case, Congress certainly could have passed a law forbidding the use of U.S. forces in the Yugoslav campaign. . . . Of course, Congress always retains appro American role in the conflict. . . . And there always remains the possibility of impeachment should a President act in disregard of Congress' authority on these matters.

Id. at 23. These political remedies are part of the fabric of Raines:

> Raines focus[ed] on the political self-help available to congressmen. . . . [T]he Court denied them standing as congressmen because they possessed political tools with which to remedy their purported injury. . . . Indeed, Raines explicitly rejected [the argument] that legislators should not be required to turn to politics instead of the courts for their remedy.

Id. at 24.

Like the congressmen in Raines, Goldwater, and Campbell, plaintiffs here had extensive "self-help" remedies available to pressure President Bush on terminating the ABM Treaty without Congressional consent. Congressmen can certainly influence a President's actions through the appropriations power by, for example, attempting to deny funding for any ABM system President Bush seeks to build or deploy. See Campbell, 203 F.3d at 23. They could even pass legislation, perhaps over President Bush's veto, prohibiting the development or deployment of ABM systems. Congress could also refuse to fund unrelated matters that were important to the President, or even reduce budgets for the Executive Branch; the Senate could reject presidential nominees, or could refuse to provide consent to enter into other treaties submitted by the President; and as a last resort, Congress always has the option of impeachment. See id.[9]

[9] The congressmen here argue that they are left with no remedies to encourage or prevent Russia from also withdrawing from the Treaty, which they might otherwise have if the President could not terminate a treaty without congressional approval. Yet Congress does have remedies, however potent, to influence the acts of foreign nations, including the power to impose tariffs on imported goods, to appropriate foreign aid, or to pass legislation concerning (in this instance) the

REV_00105252

Thus, even without standing to sue, congressional plaintiffs are not otherwise "deprive[d] . . . of an adequate remedy" to pressure or force the President to seek congressional consent in terminating a treaty. See Raines, 521 U.S. at 829. In the end, the availability of effective political remedies goes to the very heart of the standing analysis: "[T]he law of Art. III standing is built on a single basic idea — the idea of separation of powers." Id. at 820 (quoting Allen, 468 U.S. at 752). The requirement of an actual case or controversy is "founded in concern about the proper — and properly limited — role of the courts in a democratic society." Allen, 468 U.S. at 750. Given the variety of possible political remedies plaintiffs have as congressmen, it is appropriate to defer to the political branches of government, out of respect for the traditional restricted role of the judiciary in disputes between the Legislative and Executive Branches, and in keeping with the Constitution's separation of powers structure. See generally Walker v. Cheney, No. 02-0340, 2002 WL 31741823, ____ F.Supp.2d ____ (D.D.C. Dec. 9, 2002).

E. Plaintiffs' Lack Authority to Bring Suit

Equally importantly, the thirty-two congressmen here have not been authorized, implicitly or explicitly, to bring this lawsuit on behalf of the House, a committee of the House, or Congress as a whole. Indeed, in the year since President Bush announced his intention to withdraw from the ABM Treaty, neither the House nor Congress has made any attempt whatsoever to register disapproval as a body, or to insist on a role in the termination of the Treaty. In Raines, the Supreme Court "attach[ed] some importance to the fact that appellees have not been authorized to represent deployment of ABM systems.

their respective Houses of Congress in this action." 521 U.S. at 829. The Supreme Court has observed that individual members of Congress cannot represent the interests of an entire House or all of Congress:

> The two houses of Congress are legislative bodies representing larger constituencies. Power is not vested in any one individual, but in the aggregate of the members who compose the body, and its action is not the action of any separate number of members, but the action of the body as a whole.

United States v. Ballin, 144 U.S. 1, 7 (1892); see also Reed v. County Commissioners, 277 U.S. 376, 388 (1928) (suit by a committee or subcommittee failed absent specific authority from the House); Bender v. Williamsport Area School Dist., 475 U.S. 534, 544 (1986) ("Generally speaking, members of collegial bodies do not have standing to perfect an appeal the body itself has declined to take."); cf. United States House of Representatives v. United States Dep't of Commerce, 11 F.Supp.2d 76, 89 (D.D.C. 1998) (full House of Representatives specifically authorized to bring suit through statutory provision).

It is entirely logical, from an institutional standpoint, that a group of congressmen bringing suit in court, purportedly to protect Congress's interests, must first have the authority to represent the interests of Congress, the House of Representatives, or the Senate. Permitting individual congressmen to run to federal court any time they are on the losing end of some vote or issue would circumvent and undermine the legislative process, and risk substituting judicial considerations and assessments for legislative ones. In Goldwater v. Carter, Justice Powell pointed out that a "dispute between Congress and the President is not ready for judicial review unless and until each branch has taken action asserting its constitutional authority." 444 U.S. at 996 (Powell, J., concurring).

Otherwise, Justice Powell warned, individual congressmen might too freely resort to the courts:

> The Judicial Branch should not decide issues affecting the allocation of power between the President and Congress until the political branches reach a constitutional impasse. Otherwise, we would encourage small groups or even individual Members of Congress to seek judicial resolution on issues before the normal political process has the opportunity to resolve the conflict.

Id. Raines also relies on the availability of alternate remedies, coupled with an absence of voiced Congressional support for the lawsuit, as a reason to find no standing. Here, there is no claim that Congress, as an institution, has asserted its role in the treaty termination process, and there is certainly nothing to suggest that these thirty-two congressmen speak on behalf of Congress as a whole.[10] That context counsels strongly against a conclusion that the exercise of judicial power at this time is warranted as a "last resort, and as a necessity." Allen, 468 U.S. at 752 (citation omitted).

II. Justiciability

Of course, this is not the first time that members of Congress have sued the President because he terminated a treaty without obtaining congressional consent. Prior to Raines, twenty-five congressmen sued President Carter in Goldwater v. Carter, on the precise grounds asserted by the plaintiffs here, but the Supreme Court dismissed the case as nonjusticiable. Defendants assert [10] Undoubtably, the thirty-two congressmen cannot represent the interests of the Senate. As members of the House, plaintiffs cannot challenge the President's failure to obtain approval of two-thirds of the Senate before withdrawing from a treaty. Plaintiffs thus cannot raise institutional claims that they were deprived of a right that clearly belongs to the Senate, not to the House of Representatives. See, e.g., United States v. Munoz-Flores, 495 U.S. 385, 394-395 (1990) (noting that the Constitution "giv[es] the Senate 'Advice and Consent' power over treaties"); Edye v. Robertson, 112 U.S. 580, 598 (1884).

that pursuant to Goldwater, plaintiffs' claim is likewise not justiciable because the issue involves a congressional challenge to the plenary authority of the President to conduct foreign relations, which is a "political question." This Court agrees that, even if these congressmen somehow had standing to bring this lawsuit, the treaty termination issue is nonetheless a nonjusticiable political question best left for resolution to the political branches of our government.

A. Goldwater v. Carter

Goldwater is the only Supreme Court decision to date that addresses the constitutional role of Congress in treaty termination. In 1979, as a precondition for formally recognizing the People's Republic of China, President Carter unilaterally terminated a 25-year-old mutual defense treaty with Taiwan, without obtaining congressional consent. Eight senators, one former senator, and sixteen House members "claim[ed] that the President's action in terminating the treaty with Taiwan has deprived them of their constitutional role with respect to a change in the supreme law of the land." 444 U.S. at 997-98 (Powell, J., concurring). By a 6-3 vote, the Supreme Court remanded to the District Court and ordered the case dismissed, without addressing the merits of the claim.

The Court's ruling resulted in four opinions, two concurring in the judgment and two dissenting. Four Justices in the majority — Justices Rehnquist, Stevens and Stewart, and Chief Justice Burger — concluded that the case should be dismissed because the issue presented a nonjusticiable political question that was inappropriate for resolution by the courts. Justice Powell concurred, finding that the issue was "not ripe for judicial review" because neither Congress nor the President had asserted their constitutional authority to the point of political impasse. Justice

Marshall simply concurred in the result.

Three Justices dissented from the Court's order to remand for dismissal. Without reaching the merits, Justices Blackmun and White stated only that the case should be set for oral argument and considered fully. Justice Brennan disagreed that the issue was nonjusticiable and concluded that the President had a constitutional right to withdraw from the treaty, without congressional consent, given "the President's well-established authority to recognize, and withdraw recognition from, foreign governments." Id. at 1006 (Brennan, J., dissenting).

None of the opinions in Goldwater obtained a majority of votes, and hence no single rationale controls. To be sure, six Justices voted for dismissal on jurisdictional grounds, but only four expressly agreed that the issue was a nonjusticiable political question. As a result, there is no obviously binding holding in Goldwater.

"When a fragmented Court decides a case and no single rationale explaining the result enjoys the assent of five Justices, 'the holding of the Court may be viewed as that position taken by those members who concurred in the judgments on the narrowest grounds.'" Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 193 (1977) (quoting Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 169 n.15 (opinion of Stewart, Powell, and Stevens, JJ.)). However, the rule in Marks only applies when the concurrence is implicitly in agreement with the view of a majority of justices:

> We have previously held that the rule of Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188 (1977), under which the opinion of the Justices concurring in the judgment on the "narrowest grounds" is to be regarded as the Court's holding, does not apply unless the narrowest opinion represents a "common denominator of the Court's reasoning" and "embod[ies] a position implicitly approved by at least five Justices who support the judgment."

Ass'n of Bituminous Contractors, Inc. v. Apfel, 156 F.3d 1246, 1254 (D.C. Cir.1998) (quoting King v. Palmer, 950 F.2d 771, 781 (D.C. Cir. 1991)); see also Anker Energy Corp. v. Consolidation Coal Co., 177 F.3d 161, 170 (3rd Cir.1999) ("in cases where the approaches differ, no particular standard is binding on an inferior court because none has received the support of a majority of the Supreme Court"). Thus, the Supreme Court's ruling in Marks "is workable — one opinion can be meaningfully regarded as 'narrower' than another — only when one opinion is a logical subset of other, broader opinions." King, 950 F.2d at 781.

That is not the case in Goldwater. The plurality's conclusion that the termination of treaties is a nonjusticiable political question did not garner a majority. Justice Powell's concurring opinion, moreover, did not "implicitly approve" of Justice Rehnquist's plurality rationale, and in fact explicitly disagreed with it: "Mr. Rehnquist suggests, however, that the issue presented by this case is a nonjusticiable political question which can never be considered by this Court. I cannot agree." 444 U.S. at 998 (Powell, J., concurring).

> The specter of the Federal Government brought to a halt because of the mutual intransigence of the President and Congress would require this Court to provide a resolution pursuant to our duty "to say what the law is." United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 703 (1974), quoting Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 177 (1803).

Id. at 1001. Moreover, Justice Marshall merely concurred in the result, without joining any rationale. It cannot fairly be said, moreover, that ripeness (Justice Powell's rationale) is a "logical subset" of political question (the plurality's rationale) — although perhaps narrower because it deals only with timing. Both are prongs of the case-or-controversy requirement under Article III, but they are independent justiciability doctrines.

Nonetheless, Justice Rehnquist's plurality opinion in Goldwater is instructive and compelling. See Made in the USA Foundation v. United States, 242 F.3d 1300, 1305 (11th Cir. 2001) (finding plurality opinion in Goldwater "instructive, if not controlling"). The plurality concluded that the claim that President Carter was constitutionally required to obtain congressional consent before terminating a treaty could not be resolved by the courts:

> [T]he basic question presented by the petitioners in this case is "political" and therefore nonjusticiable because it involves the authority of the President in the conduct of our country's foreign relations and the extent to which the Senate or the Congress is authorized to negate the action of the President. . . . [T]he controversy in the instant case is a nonjusticiable political dispute that should be left for resolution by the Executive and Legislative Branches of the Government.

444 U.S. at 1002-03 (Rehnquist, J., concurring).

In finding the claim nonjusticiable, Justice Rehnquist emphasized the lack of any textual provision providing either branch with authority for treaty termination. He reasoned that because the Constitution spoke only to the procedure for making a treaty, but not to a treaty's termination, "the situation presented here is closely akin to that presented in Coleman, where the Constitution spoke only to the procedure for ratification of an amendment, not its rejection." Id. at 1005; see also Coleman, 307 U.S. at 450.

> Here, while the Constitution is express as to the manner in which the Senate shall participate in the ratification of a treaty, it is silent as to that body's participation in the abrogation of a treaty. . . . In light of the absence of any constitutional provision governing the termination of a treaty, and the fact that different termination procedures may be appropriate for different treaties, the instant case in my view also "must surely be controlled by political standards."

444 U.S. at 1003 (citation omitted). While Justice Powell agreed that the issue was not justiciable, he concluded that the reason was a lack of ripeness:

> Prudential considerations persuade me that a dispute between Congress and the President is not ready for judicial review unless and until each branch has taken action asserting its constitutional authority. . . . If the Congress chooses not to confront the President, it is not our task to do so.

Id., at 996-98.

B. Political Question

Like standing, the "political question" doctrine stems from the case-or-controversy requirement in Article III, is "primarily a function of the separation of powers," and operates as a prudential limitation on the propriety of federal courts reviewing the decisions of the other branches of government. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 210 (1962). In Baker, the Supreme Court held that courts should analyze six criteria to determine whether a case presents a political question:

> Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.

369 U.S. at 217. In fact, "any one of [these] characteristics may be sufficient to preclude judicial review" under the political question doctrine. Made in the USA Foundation, 242 F.3d at 1312. Several of these factors are present here.

To be sure, "while the Constitution is express as to the manner in which the Senate shall participate in the ratification of a treaty, it is silent as to that body's participation in the abrogation of a treaty." Goldwater, 444 U.S. at 1003 (Rehnquist, J., concurring); see also Made in the USA Foundation, 242 F.3d at 1315 (the Constitution "fails to outline the Senate's role in the abrogation of treaties"). There is thus no textual commitment of the authority over treaty termination to any branch of the government. The Constitution, however, clearly relegates authority over foreign affairs to the Executive and Legislative Branches, with no role for the Judicial Branch to second-guess or reconsider foreign policy decisions. "[M]atters relating 'to the conduct of foreign relations . . . are so exclusively entrusted to the political branches of government as to be largely immune from judicial inquiry or interference.'" Haig v.Agee, 453 U.S. 280, 292 (1981) (quoting Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 589 (1952)).

> [T]he very nature of executive decisions as to foreign policy is political, not judicial. . . . They are decisions of a kind for which the Judiciary has neither aptitude, facilities, nor responsibility and have long been held to belong to the domain of political power not subject to judicial intrusion or inquiry.

Chicago & Southern Air Lines, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 111 (1948); see also Crosby v. Nat'l Foreign Trade Council, 530 U.S. 363, 386 (2000) ("the nuances of the foreign policy of the United States . . . are much more the province of the Executive Branch and Congress than of this Court") (citation omitted).

At the same time, it would be "error to suppose that every case or controversy which touches foreign relations lies beyond judicial cognizance." Baker, 369 U.S. at 211. But on the very issue before this Court — whether the Constitution provides a congressional role in treaty termination — four Justices in Goldwater concluded that the issue was a nonjusticiable political question "because it involve[d] the authority of the President in the conduct of our country's foreign relations and the extent to which the Senate or the Congress is authorized to negate the action of the President." 444 U.S. at 1002. Moreover, the plurality's conclusion that the issue was political in nature was "even more compelling . . . because it involves foreign relations — specifically a treaty commitment to use military force in the defense of a foreign government if attacked." Id. at 1003-04. So, too, here the treaty termination issue lies squarely in the arena of foreign relations and involves national defense considerations in that foreign affairs setting.

The circumstances here present "an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made." Baker, 369 U.S. at 217. President Bush publicly announced his intention to withdraw from the ABM Treaty on December 13, 2001, providing Russia with the six-months notice required by the Treaty. These thirty-two congressmen, however, waited until two days before that termination became effective to bring this lawsuit. Meanwhile, long aware of the intention of the United States to withdraw from the ABM Treaty, Russia may have acted based upon the President's notice of termination. Foreign governments must be able to rely upon the pronouncements of the United States regarding its treaties.

Hence, were this Court to find the President acted unconstitutionally, and overturn his decision to terminate the ABM Treaty more than a year after he announced the decision, "the potential[] of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question" would be undeniable. Baker, 369 U.S. at 217; see also Made in the USA Foundation, 242 F.3d at 1305. "In determining whether a question falls within [the political question] category, the appropriateness under our system of government of attributing finality to the action of the political departments . . . [is a] dominant consideration." Coleman, 307 U.S. at 454-55. With treaties, in particular, a single voice is needed:

> It is not surprising, then, that many questions arising in connection with our treaties with other governments have been held to be nonjusticiable. For "[n]ot only does resolution of such issues frequently turn on standards that defy judicial application, or involve the exercise of a discretion demonstrably committed to the executive or legislature; but many such questions uniquely demand single-voiced statement of the Government's views."

Holmes v. Laird, 459 F.2d 1211, 1215 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (quoting Baker, 369 U.S. at 211).

Courts have therefore repeatedly held that issues concerning treaties are largely political questions best left to the political branches of the government, not the courts, for resolution.[11] Since [11] See, e.g., Clark v. Allen, 331 U.S. 503, 514 (1947) ("[T]he question whether a state is in a position to perform its treaty obligations is essentially a political one."); Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U.S. 270, 288 (1902) ("[W]hether power remains in a foreign state to carry out its treaty obligations is in its nature political and not judicial, and the courts ought not to interfere with the conclusions of the political department in that regard."); Doe v. Braden, 57 U.S. (16 How.) 635, 657 (1853) (questions regarding whether the King of Spain had authority to ratify a treaty with the United States "are political questions, not judicial. They belong exclusively to the political department of the government."); Made in the USA Foundation, 242 F.3d at 1305 (whether NAFTA agreement amounted to a "treaty" requiring Senate ratification is a political question); Earth Island Institute v. Christopher, 6 F.3d 648, 653 (9th Cir. 1993) (challenge to statute that ordered "Executive to negotiate and enter into treaties with foreign nations . . . is not one that is justiciable in any federal court"); New York Chinese TV Programs, Inc. v. U.E. Enterprises, Inc., 954 F.2d 847, 852 (2d Cir. 1992) ("the judiciary should refrain from determining whether a treaty has lapsed, and instead should defer to the wishes of the elected branches of government"); Gayda v. LOT Polish Airlines, 702 F.2d 424, 425 (2nd Cir. 1983) ("abrogation or modification of a treaty by superseding legislation presents political questions with which courts may not involve themselves"); United States v. Decker, 600 F.2d 733, 737 (9th Cir. 1979) ("The principal area of nonjusticiability concerns the right of the executive to abrogate a treaty."); Dole v. Carter, 569 F.2d 1109, 1110 (10th Cir.1977) ("The controversy here is whether the understanding between the United States and Hungary is a treaty or an executive agreement not requiring Senate action. . . . [T]he dispute, having its origin in the field of foreign relations, presents a nonjusticiable political question.").

Goldwater, one other court has held that the role of Congress in the termination of a treaty presents a nonjusticiable political question. In Beacon Products Corp. v. Reagan, 633 F.Supp. 1191, 1198-99 (D. Mass. 1986), aff'd on other grounds, 814 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1987), the court relied on the plurality opinion in Goldwater to hold that a constitutional challenge to President Reagan's unilateral termination of the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation with Nicaragua, without congressional consent, raised a political question. The court concluded that in Goldwater "the challenge to the President's power vis-a-vis treaty termination raised a nonjusticiable political question. That holding is equally applicable here." 633 F.Supp. at 1199.

Lastly, this Court is further convinced that the issue presented here is nonjusticiable because "undertaking independent resolution" of the issue would result in a failure to accord the "respect due coordinate branches of government." Baker, 369 U.S. at 217. Justice Powell concluded in Goldwater that the treaty termination issue was not ripe because the political branches had not reached a "constitutional impasse." Likewise, this Court should not rule on the claim of thirty-two congressmen that President Bush ignored the constitutional role of Congress in the treaty termination process, when Congress itself has not even asserted that it has been deprived of any constitutional right. As Justice Powell stated, courts should refrain from resolving disputes raised by only a small number of congressmen:

> Prudential considerations persuade me that a dispute between Congress and the President is not ready for judicial review unless and until each branch has taken action asserting its constitutional authority.

444 U.S. at 996. In resolving an issue that neither the House nor the Senate has yet deemed worth asserting, this Court would preempt what is clearly the prerogative of Congress, and could not do so "without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government." Baker, 369 U.S. at 217. Indeed, such judicial action might simply encourage congressmen to run to court any time they disagreed with Presidential action (on a treaty or other foreign relations issue) or were on the losing end of a piece of legislation. See 444 U.S. at 997 (Powell, J., concurring).[12] That would undermine both the delicate balance of powers under the Constitution and the limitation of judicial authority to the resolution of justiciable cases or controversies.

CONCLUSION

The Court concludes that because plaintiffs have alleged only an institutional injury to Congress, not injuries that are personal and particularized to themselves, under Raines v. Byrd they do not have standing to bring this lawsuit. The Court also concludes that under Goldwater v. Carter the issue raised by these congressmen is a nonjusticiable political question. Therefore, defendants' motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment is granted, and plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment is denied. Plaintiffs' complaint is therefore dismissed.

[12] Justice Powell concluded that application of the Baker v. Carr factors in Goldwater did not establish that the treaty termination issue — if ripe — was always a political question. See 444 U.S. at 998-1001. However, in this specific case, this Court concludes that those factors support the conclusion, as discussed above, that a nonjusticiable political question is presented, although it is also true that under Justice Powell's analysis the case is not ripe for judicial resolution.

HEADLINE: Blacks at Home Support a Judge Liberals Assail

BYLINE: ÿBy DAVID FIRESTONEÿ

DATELINE: LAUREL, Miss., Feb. 15

BODY:
Back in Washington, his opponents have depicted Judge Charles W. Pickering as the personification of white Mississippi's oppressive past, a man so hostile to civil rights and black progress that he is unfit for promotion to a federal appeals court.

But here on the streets of his small and largely black hometown, far from the bitterness of partisan agendas and position papers, Charles Pickering is a widely admired figure of a very different present. In funeral parlors and pharmacies, used-car lots and the City Council chambers, the city's black establishment overwhelmingly supports his nomination to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which is heading toward a contentious vote in the Senate in the first major judicial battle of the Bush administration.

Though few black residents here subscribe to Judge Pickering's staunchly Republican politics, many say they admire his efforts at racial reconciliation, which they describe as highly unusual for a white Republican in the state.

"I have never seen Trent Lott open his arms to the black community the way Charles Pickering has," said Larry E. Thomas, owner of Thomas Pharmacy, referring to the Senate minority leader, who is Judge Pickering's friend and patron. "Over the years I've seen him work with black leaders and really try to make an effort to understand and help the community. That's a progressiveness that we need to see more of in this state."

Progressive is not exactly the description used by the national black officials who are making an intense effort to prevent the judge's appointment. "A vote for Pickering is a vote against civil rights," said Julian Bond, the national chairman of the N.A.A.C.P. Representative Robert C. Scott, Democrat of Virginia, speaking against the nomination with other members of the Congressional Black Caucus, said, "It's hard to imagine a person who is more hostile to civil rights." Judge Pickering has also been condemned by a variety of big-city newspaper editorial boards and columnists.

But such comments carry little weight among those who actually know the man personally here in Laurel, in southeast Mississippi. Judge Pickering, now a federal district judge in the nearby city of Hattiesburg, was praised by black city officials for helping to set up after-school youth programs here, and for directing federal money to medical clinics in low-income areas when he was a state senator. Black business leaders say he was influential in persuading white-owned banks to lend money to black entrepreneurs, helping to strengthen the city's black middle class.

"I can't believe the man they're describing in Washington is the same one I've known for years," said Thaddeus Edmonson, a former local president of the N.A.A.C.P. who is now president of the seven-member Laurel City Council and one of its five black members. "If those people who are voting against him because of some press release would just come down here and talk to the people who know him, I think they would have a very different opinion."

The judge's widespread popularity in his hometown has been frustrating to the many civil rights and abortion rights groups that have worked to portray him as an ideological relic of the Old South.

Several opponents of his nomination have tried unsuccessfully to get his supporters to change their minds, and their inability to do so reflects the distance between national liberal groups and many Southern blacks in small towns. In a city like Laurel, with a population of 18,393, one's personality and faith are often more important than a judicial paper trail or an adherence to an agenda.

People for the American Way, a liberal organization based in Washington, has criticized Judge Pickering for disregarding the separation of church and state by promoting religious programs from the bench. But many prominent blacks here say it is precisely his religious background -- he was president of the Mississippi Baptist Convention in the 1980's -- that they admire.

"I know Judge Pickering is a fair and impartial person grounded with Christian ethics and beliefs, who ought to be given this chance," said the Rev. Arthur Logan, the black pastor of the Union Baptist Church and a member of the City Council. "There are many people in Mississippi who made these same mistakes early in life, but their strong Christian character brought them closer to God and helped them change."

Four of the five black council members, in fact, said they enthusiastically supported Judge Pickering's appointment. The fifth, Manuel Jones, said he opposed the nomination, largely because he differed with Judge Pickering's efforts in the late 1980's to integrate the largely black city schools with the largely white county schools.

Judge Pickering, then in private practice in Laurel, was one of several white city leaders who argued that the city could not attract economic development with an effectively segregated school system. At the time, Mr. Jones was president of the Laurel-Jones County branch of the N.A.A.C.P., which maintained that consolidation would dilute black administrative power over the city schools. The consolidation plan was eventually overturned by a federal judge, who said it was not justified.

Mr. Jones said he rebuffed a recent telephone request by Judge Pickering that he write the Senate a letter of support. (He had publicly opposed the judge's original appointment to the federal bench in 1990.) Several other council members did agree to the judge's request, however, and their letters are on file with the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"It's hard to go against a sitting federal judge," said Mr. Jones, searching for an explanation of why his colleagues have taken a position that differs so sharply from his.

Many of the judge's critics have cited actions or statements he made in the 1960's and 70's. They have pointed to an article he wrote in 1959 that appeared to support strengthening the state's law against interracial marriages, and to his votes in the state senate that appeared to dilute black voting strength.

But his many black supporters here -- all lifelong Democrats -- say they are more interested in his journey than his starting point. They say Judge Pickering, like many white Mississippians, has moved beyond his all-too-common origins.

"He grew up like a lot of white people here," said the Rev. George L. Barnes, a black minister who is pastor at two Missionary Baptist churches and owns a used-car lot. "But his daddy and my daddy used to swim together down in the creek, and I've never heard him say a racist thing. I would say, of people in his age bracket, he's probably come further than any white man I know of."

Local leaders' support for Judge Pickering has put them at odds with several black state officials and the Mississippi conference of the N.A.A.C.P., which oppose his appointment. Bennie Thompson, a Democrat who represents the Delta region on the opposite side of the state in Congress, has called the judge's black supporters "Judases." State N.A.A.C.P. officials say the judge's supporters in Laurel have succumbed to an effort to cover up his feelings with small acts of kindness. This alternately angers and amuses local residents, who say no such masquerade can last for decades.

"If he's been putting on a show for us, it's the greatest show on earth," said Mr. Thomas, who runs the city's only black-owned pharmacy and who served with Mr. Pickering on the local economic development board in the 1980's.

Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, which is leading the opposition to the appointment, said many of the judge's supporters in Laurel simply did not know the full details of his record.

"We don't dispute that he has support from a number of African-Americans at the local level, and we have never said he is a racist," Mr. Neas said. "He may be a decent person on a one-to-one basis, but that's not the issue. It's his actions as a public official that demonstrate insensitivity and hostility toward basic civil rights principles."

People for the American Way said that as a state senator in the 1970's, Mr. Pickering voted for measures to reduce black voting strength and approved giving state money to the Mississippi Sovereignty Commission, which became notorious for opposing the civil rights movement. On the federal bench, the group said, he has strongly criticized the creation of largely black political districts as a remedy for past discrimination.

Many local residents said they were not familiar with such statements. But they do remember that in 1967, Judge Pickering testified against Sam Bowers, a Ku Klux Klan leader based in Laurel who was on trial for the firebombing death of a black civil rights worker. Several said that just as the judge broke with prevailing white opinion in the state to do so, they have no trouble differing with black opinion.

"What blacks have fought for is freedom, and that means the freedom of expression to differ among ourselves," said Johnny Magee, a black councilman who supports the judge. "So many people are still angry about the past. But if the judge has moved beyond his past, I think we should all try to do the same."

National Review (Byron York)

The attacks on Pickering on the issue of race have genuinely baffled his defenders. They cite many actions on the issue of civil rights that contradict the description of Pickering as "insensitive or even hostile to key principles and remedies that now safeguard civil rights." For example, it is widely known that in 1967, as a county prosecutor, Pickering testified against Sam Bowers, an Imperial Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan, in a case in which Bowers was accused of firebombing the home of a civil-rights worker. According to a letter written on Pickering's behalf by Charles Evers, brother of murdered civil-rights activist Medgar Evers, "In 1967, many locally elected prosecutors in Mississippi looked the other way when faced with allegations of violence against African-Americans and those who supported our struggle for equal treatment under the law. Judge Pickering was a locally elected prosecutor who took the stand that year and testified in the criminal trial against the Imperial Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan, who was accused of firebombing a civil rights activist. Judge Pickering later lost his bid for reelection because he dared to defy the Klan, but he gained my respect and the respect of many others as a man who stands up for what is right."

The Klan case, although 35 years ago, stands out in many memories. "Pickering is not perfect * no one is * but he has courage," Johnny Magee, a black city councilman in Laurel, Mississippi, recently told Legal Times. "He was involved as a county prosecutor in fighting against the Ku Klux Klan and helped put Klansmen behind bars. That was something you just didn't do in Jones County in the 1960s."

And Pickering's defenders cite more than just one case. Pickering hired black staffers when few other Republicans or Democrats in Mississippi did. As a private lawyer he defended a young black man accused of robbing a young white woman in a rural grocery store, then stuck with the case through two trials, and finally won the young man's acquittal. He pushed the chancellor of the University of Mississippi to establish the Institute of Racial Reconciliation and then served on its board of directors. And he built a reputation for fairness. Johnny Magee told Legal Times that his stepson, convicted of drug charges, came before Pickering for sentencing. Magee told the paper that his stepson "is currently serving time, and he deserves it. But Pickering dealt with him completely fairly."

Judge Gonzales received a letter today from Ralph Mecham, the Director of the Administrative Office of the US Courts. The letter indicates that the Committee on Judicial Resources of the Judicial Conference of the United States has taken favorable action consistent with President's proposal on judges. In December, the Committee (chaired by Judge Dennis Jacobs of the Second Circuit) approved the following language, which in turn will be considered and voted on in March by the full Judicial Conference: "The Judicial Conference strongly urges all judges to notify the President and the Administrative Office of the United States Courts as far in advance as possible of a change in status, and if possible, twelve months before the contemplated date of changes in status." They also adopted language that "regular reminders of the policy be transmitted to judges."

Mr. Mecham's letter states: "I am sure that the Judicial Conference will approve this strengthened policy."

This is good news, of course.

Brett, as I understand it, OMB has been printing out a hard copy of the edits from WH staff to maintain a record of all of the comments. Does that help? Also, do we have any idea what the timing of this will be? They staffed several documents last night and are asking for staffing of several today. Do we need to tell the WH staff not to use the Server approach. OMB instructed them that they could use it.

Here is a question that could help resolve this quickly: In the past, did WHO comments go to OMB in the same form that they were given to Staff Secretary (i.e., the various written comments from individual WHO components), or did Staff Secretary's office combine the WHO comments from individual WHO components into one single WHO document and then give that one document to OMB.

Pryor Up For Judgeship (Birmingham News)
By MARY ORNDORFF
The Birmingham News, January 6, 2003
WASHINGTON The White House is considering Alabama Attorney General Bill Pryor for a lifetime appointment to a high-level federal judgeship, according to Sen. Jeff Sessions' office.
"It is no secret that President Bush believes Bill Pryor is a superb lawyer and attorney general," said Michael Brumas, spokesman for Sessions. "Sen. Sessions shares that view and believes Bill Pryor would be a magnificent circuit judge."
The White House has inquired about Pryor's credentials for appointment to the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, a federal court that handles appeals from Alabama, Georgia and Florida and is one step below the U.S. Supreme Court.
Pryor, a politically active and ideologically conservative state prosecutor, has developed ties in the White House and around Washington since Bush's election. He said last month he would accept a nomination if it were offered.
Pryor declined comment Saturday night.
The timing of Pryor's nomination would be ideal, several Republicans said Friday. The GOP retook control of the Senate in the last election, giving Bush nominees the chance for a smoother confirmation ride through the Judiciary Committee.
Also, Pryor would leave his post as attorney general during Gov.-elect Bob Riley's term, meaning a Republican would appoint Pryor's replacement. The appointment would be early enough in the term to give the new prosecutor a lengthy time in office before facing election in 2006.
Pryor's nomination also would signal a desire by Republicans stung by the recent resignation of Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., as party leader to dodge another confrontation over race. Bush's original nominee to the 11th Circuit, William Steele of Mobile, is opposed by black groups and has languished for 15 months without a confirmation hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee.
Steele, already a federal magistrate, could instead be nominated for a district court position, a lower level than the appellate court.
"Sen. Sessions believes the president has complete confidence in Bill Steele and the senator expects that Judge Steele will be nominated for a federal judgeship shortly," Brumas said.
Objections to Steele:
The Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the NAACP last year objected to Steele's nomination because of a 2001 opinion he issued in a racial harassment case filed by black employees at a Pennington paper mill. Although Steele found evidence of racially insensitive remarks in the workplace, he dismissed the case in favor of the mill's owner because the employees failed to meet several legal requirements.

The 11th Circuit recently reversed Steele's decision and Sessions said then that the reversal was due to changes in the law, not a mistake by Steele.

But since Lott's glowing praise of a one-time segregationist presidential candidate, Republicans are especially vulnerable to allegations of racial insensitivity, and the criticism of Steele's original ruling would undoubtedly resurface.

Swapping Steele for Pryor, however, does not guarantee a noncontroversial confirmation hearing.

Extensive record:

Pryor has been the most active state prosecutor in the country in pressing cases of interest to the U.S. Supreme Court, and he has an extensive record of speeches, articles and congressional testimony on important federal issues. Pryor has taken strident positions supporting the right to student-led prayer in public schools, promoting states' rights over the federal government's and protecting Second Amendment rights on gun ownership, to name just a few.

His conservative record also provides Democrats, especially wary of strident anti-abortion Bush nominees to the bench, with plenty of ammunition.

"Our greatest right is the right to life," Pryor said in a 2000 rally promoting restrictions on a woman's access to abortions in Alabama.

Pryor opposed the multistate lawsuit against the tobacco companies, and he advocated giving utility companies more freedom to upgrade their coal-fired power plants without being forced to add pollution control devices. He defends Alabama Supreme Court Chief Justice Roy Moore's decision to prominently display the Ten Commandments in the state judicial building and helped write rules that provide fewer automatic appeals of death penalty cases.

For Sessions, escorting Pryor's nomination through Senate confirmation would be pleasantly ironic as Sessions' own chance at the federal bench was scuttled years ago by allegations of racial insensitivity. Pryor was a Sessions protege at the attorney general's office, and Pryor replaced Sessions in the top job when Sessions was elected to the Senate in 1996.

Pryor, now 40, was appointed attorney general by Gov. Fob James and has twice won re-election, most recently last year.

Solidly conservative:

Ideologically, Pryor's record is solidly conservative. Politically, it's murkier. He's angered some state Republicans at times, as in 2001 when he sided with Gov. Don Siegelman in the governor's ability to cut higher education more deeply than K-12 during a budget crisis.

Most recently, his opinion in the debate over a recounting of the votes in the closely contested governor's race favored Riley. In that election cycle, Sessions and Pryor were the top two vote-getters in the state.

Pryor would be another in a long line of high-level Bush appointees who are active in the Federalist Society, an association of legal scholars and lawyers promoting the conservative principles of limited government.

Pryor's 1998 campaign was aided by consultant Karl Rove, now the president's top political adviser. The two have stayed in touch, evidenced by Pryor's recent ride aboard Air Force One arranged by Rove.

The opening on the appellate court was created when Emmett Ripley Cox, an Alabama native and appointee of President Reagan, announced in December 2000 that he was stepping down from handling cases.

The White House selects nominees for the federal appellate courts but frequently consults with the senators from their home states.

Brett:

One of the things we thought would be useful to undertake is to create a birthday database so that key contacts receive a personal birthday greeting from the President. As you know, this information is collected now each time we clear someone in through WAVES for events and meetings; what we were wondering is if it was allowable to use that information in the way that's been suggested.

I'd be grateful for your guidance.

Many thanks.

Pete

Here are #'s which show how many taxpayers in each state benefit from the package, and from each provision.

For example:

- "1.2 million taxpayers in Alabama will have lower income tax bills in 2003"

- "Over 400,000 married couples and single parents in Alabama will benefit from the acceleration to 2003 of the increase in the child tax credit"

- "Nearly 400,000 taxpayers in Alabama will benefit from the exclusion of dividends paid from previously-taxed corporate income."

Please make sure to thank the Treasury tax team! (Pam Olson, Drew Lyon, Greg Jenner, Chris Smith) They're cranking out some great stuff.

Attached is a state-by-state table of the number of returns benefiting from the Growth Package, and by each major provision. Counts are based on returns processed in 2001 (mostly tax year 2000 returns), so they do not coincide with the total nationwide counts we have separately projected for tax year 2003.

In addition to the table, we have provided a write-up for one state (Alabama) that may be used as a template by your shop for generating 50 separate one-page descriptions.

Notes

The figures in the table are based on tabulations of all individual income tax returns filed and processed through the IRS Individual Master File (IMF) during calendar year 2001. Most returns filed in 2001 were for tax year 2000.

Classification by state was based on the address used on the return. Usually this address is the taxpayer's home address. However, some taxpayers may have used the address of a tax attorney or accountant, or a place of business, and that address could be in a different state than the taxpayer's home.

Footnotes

[1] The number of returns benefitting from each of the specific provisions shown may not add to the number benfitting from the entire package because some returns will benefit from more than one provision. In addition to the provisions shown separately, the package includes an increase in exemption levels for the alternative minimum tax (AMT).

[2] Returns with business income are those that report at least one dollar of income or loss from a sole proprietorship, farm proprietorship, partnership, S corporation, and/or rental income.

Subject: GROWTH: State-by-State Analysis

Here are #'s which show how many taxpayers in each state benefit from the package, and from each provision.

For example:

- "1.2 million taxpayers in Alabama will have lower income tax bills in 2003"

- "Over 400,000 married couples and single parents in Alabama will benefit from the acceleration to 2003 of the increase in the child tax credit"

- "Nearly 400,000 taxpayers in Alabama will benefit from the exclusion of dividends paid from previously-taxed corporate income."

Subject: State-by-State Analysis

Attached is a state-by-state table of the number of returns benefiting from the Growth Package, and by each major provision. Counts are based on returns processed in 2001 (mostly tax year 2000 returns), so they do not coincide with the total nationwide counts we have separately projected for tax year 2003.

In addition to the table, we have provided a write-up for one state

(Alabama) that may be used as a template by your shop for generating 50 separate one-page descriptions. <<...>> <<...>>

- Just under 500,000 married couples in Alabama will benefit from the acceleration to 2003 of provisions that increase the standard deduction for joint filers to double the amount for single filers and increase the width of the 15-percent bracket to twice the width for single filers. These two provisions were scheduled to phase in between 2005 and 2009.

ACCELERATE INCREASE IN CHILD TAX CREDIT

- Over 400,000 married couples and single parents in Alabama will benefit from the acceleration to 2003 of the increase in the child tax credit from $600 to $1,000 that was scheduled to phase in between 2005 and 2010.

EXCLUSION FOR CORPORATE DIVIDENDS

- Nearly 400,000 taxpayers in Alabama will benefit from the exclusion of dividends paid from previously-taxed corporate income.

SOURCE: Counts are for the number of returns filed in 2001 that would have benefited from the package. These estimates are based on tabulations from all individual income tax returns processed by the Internal Revenue Service in 2001. Most of these returns covered tax year 2000.

Subject: GROWTH: State-by-State Analysis

Here are #'s which show how many taxpayers in each state benefit from the package, and from each provision.

For example:

- "1.2 million taxpayers in Alabama will have lower income tax bills in 2003"

- "Over 400,000 married couples and single parents in Alabama will benefit from the acceleration to 2003 of the increase in the child tax credit"

- "Nearly 400,000 taxpayers in Alabama will benefit from the exclusion of dividends paid from previously-taxed corporate income."

Please make sure to thank the Treasury tax team! (Pam Olson, Drew Lyon, Greg Jenner, Chris Smith) They're cranking out some great stuff.

Attached is a state-by-state table of the number of returns benefiting from the Growth Package, and by each major provision. Counts are based on returns processed in 2001 (mostly tax year 2000 returns), so they do not coincide with the total nationwide counts we have separately projected for tax year 2003.

In addition to the table, we have provided a write-up for one state

Notes

The figures in the table are based on tabulations of all individual income tax returns filed and processed through the IRS Individual Master File (IMF) during calendar year 2001. Most returns filed in 2001 were for tax year 2000.

Classification by state was based on the address used on the return. Usually this address is the taxpayer's home address. However, some taxpayers may have used the address of a tax attorney or accountant, or a place of business, and that address could be in a different state than the taxpayer's home.

Footnotes

[1] The number of returns benefitting from each of the specific provisions shown may not add to the number benfitting from the entire package because some returns will benefit from more than one provision. In addition to the provisions shown separately, the package includes an increase in exemption levels for the alternative minimum tax (AMT).

[2] Returns with business income are those that report at least one dollar of income or loss from a sole proprietorship, farm proprietorship, partnership, S corporation, and/or rental income.

Q Do you intend to resuscitate the nomination of Priscilla Owen and Charles Pickering? And, also, how bloody do you think the next Supreme Court nomination will be?

THE PRESIDENT: Well, first, I want the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee to understand that I am very serious about the reforms that I suggested in the East Room, about how to get this process of nominating judges and approving judges on the right course, not only for this administration, but future administrations; not only for this Senate, but future Senates. And so step one on the judiciary process, I believe there needs to be reform. I would be glad to reprise the reforms if you can't remember them.

Q Owen and Pickering, are they going to --

THE PRESIDENT: I'll be there in a minute. (Laughter.) I'm using this as an opportunity to make a point on judicial reform. And that is that if a judge thinks he's going to retire, give us a year's notice, if possible. And then we will act -- "we," the administrative branch, will nominate somebody and clear them within 180 days. And then the Senate judiciary has got 90 days to go through the process and then get the person's name to the floor, and 180 days for an up or down vote. To me that would be a needed and necessary reform.

So step one on the nomination process is to work with Senator Hatch -- and Senator Leahy -- to put these reforms in place; is to convince members of the Senate we're serious about a process that will get rid of the old bitterness of the judicial process.

This is probably not to your liking, by the way. You love those court fights. I'm confident it makes great covering and great stories.

I also said at the time of Priscilla Owen's being -- not being put to the floor of the Senate that I would hope that the judiciary committee would let her name out to the Senate floor at some point in time. We don't have to recommit them, they never -- they're there. Pickering and Owen are still there at the committee level. They just weren't ever -- their names were never let to the floor for a vote.

By the way, if they had been let to the floor for a vote, we believe they would have won the vote -- perhaps the reason why they were never let to the floor for a vote. But -- so, I hope that judiciary committee will let their names out and they get a fair hearing.

I thought you were going to talk about the Texas elections. But that's okay. (Laughter.)

Q Do you intend to resuscitate the nomination of Priscilla Owen and Charles Pickering? And, also, how bloody do you think the next Supreme Court nomination will be?

THE PRESIDENT: Well, first, I want the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee to understand that I am very serious about the reforms that I suggested in the East Room, about how to get this process of nominating judges and approving judges on the right course, not only for this administration, but future administrations; not only for this Senate, but future Senates. And so step one on the judiciary process, I believe there needs to be reform. I would be glad to reprise the reforms if you can't remember them.

Q Owen and Pickering, are they going to --

THE PRESIDENT: I'll be there in a minute. (Laughter.) I'm using this as an opportunity to make a point on judicial reform. And that is that if a judge thinks he's going to retire, give us a year's notice, if possible. And then we will act -- "we," the administrative branch, will nominate somebody and clear them within 180 days. And then the Senate judiciary has got 90 days to go through the process and then get the person's name to the floor, and 180 days for an up or down vote. To me that would be a needed and necessary reform.

So step one on the nomination process is to work with Senator Hatch -- and Senator Leahy -- to put these reforms in place; is to convince members of the Senate we're serious about a process that will get rid of the old bitterness of the judicial process.

This is probably not to your liking, by the way. You love those court fights. I'm confident it makes great covering and great stories.

I also said at the time of Priscilla Owen's being -- not being put to the floor of the Senate that I would hope that the judiciary committee would let her name out to the Senate floor at some point in time. We don't have to recommit them, they never -- they're there. Pickering and Owen are still there at the committee level. They just weren't ever -- their names were never let to the floor for a vote.

By the way, if they had been let to the floor for a vote, we believe they would have won the vote -- perhaps the reason why they were never let to the floor for a vote. But -- so, I hope that judiciary committee will let their names out and they get a fair hearing.

Bush renominates Pickering, Owen other judges
By JESSE J. HOLLAND
Associated Press Writer
WASHINGTON (AP) - President Bush on Tuesday renominated controversial Mississippi judge Charles Pickering and 30 other judicial nominees who were not confirmed by the Democrat-controlled Senate last year.
The federal appellate nomination of Pickering, who was accused of being racially insensitive by Democrats, was thrown into doubt once again after one of his patrons, Sen. Trent Lott, stepped down as Senate GOP leader after making racially insensitive remarks. And Senate Democrats immediately pledged to do whatever they could to keep Pickering from getting a seat on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, including a possible filibuster of the nomination.

"Unfortunately, they have not learned from the Trent Lott episodes and I am going to do everything I can to stop the Pickering nomination from going forward," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Pickering, a U.S. District judge in Hattiesburg, Miss., and a Lott friend, was blocked by Senate Democrats last year after civil rights groups accused him of racial insensitivity.

But Republicans - behind new Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee - now control the Senate by a 51-48-1 margin, with independent Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont voting with the Democrats.

Also renominated was Texas Supreme Court Justice Priscilla Owen, who also was voted down by the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee last year while seeking a seat on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, "is pleased that the president is acting as soon as possible on nominations. We have a lot of leftover work to do," spokeswoman Margarita Tapia said.

Pickering's opponents have said the White House should not renominate the Mississippi judge as punishment for Lott's comments.

Lott triggered an uproar last month when he said that Mississippians were proud to have voted for retired South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurman in 1948 on the pro-segregationist Dixiecrat ticket. "And if the rest of the country had followed our lead, we wouldn't have had all these problems over all these years either," Lott said.

Lott said last month that he expected Pickering's opponents to invoke his name in opposition to the Mississippi judge. "Obviously people will try to use it against him," Lott said. "They used a lot of things against him last time that were very unfair."

Senate Democrats say Pickering's renomination shows the GOP did not learn anything from Lott's controversy.

"Given the encouraging rhetoric of this administration on civil rights over the last few weeks, it's astonishing that when it's time to match that rhetoric with real action they nominate Charles Pickering to serve on the second highest court in the nation," said Sen. Ted Kennedy of Massachussetts.

Kennedy said Democrats "will use every tool in our arsenal to ensure that his nomination is rejected again this year."

Pickering was defeated 10-9 in committee last March after civil rights groups said he supported segregation as a young man in Mississippi. Pickering's opponents also pointed to his conservative voting record as a Mississippi state lawmaker and decisions as a judge.

Pickering's supporters, including some Mississippi Democrats and black leaders, said Pickering supported civil rights efforts as far back as the middle 1960s.

The Senate last year confirmed 100 of Bush's 131 appellate and district court nominees under Democratic control.

BODY:
President Bush, defending an embattled federal court nominee, accused Senate Democrats on Wednesday of "playing politics" with the choice as his spokesman said the civil rights record of some senators could come into play during Charles Pickering's nomination fight.

Turning aside Democratic criticism about Pickering's civil rights record, Bush waved his arms in disgust and said, "All of these allegations have been looked at. He has been confirmed unanimously by the United States Senate in the past."

Pickering and Bush were joined in the Oval Office by the judge's supporters, including Mississippi Attorney General Mike Moore and several Democratic elected officials. Charles Evers, the brother of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers, denounced "Yankees up here" and liberals fighting Pickering's nomination. The federal appeal court nomination is all but dead in the Senate. Bush launched the last-minute political offensive to avoid criticism that he did not do enough on Pickering's behalf, and to signal to the Senate that he won't roll over on his judicial nominees.

The fight over Pickering's nomination to the federal appeals court is viewed by the White House and Democratic foes as a dress rehearsal for the clash that would likely ensue if a Supreme Court justice retires and Bush is allowed to fill a vacancy on the high court.

Pickering, currently a federal district judge, has faced criticism from women's, civil rights and liberal groups - some of the same factions likely to line up against a Bush pick to the Supreme Court.

The Democratic Party, in opposing the nomination, said in a recent news release that Pickering wrote an article in May 1959 suggesting how a loophole in Mississippi's statute banning interracial marriage could be corrected to allow the state to criminally prosecute anyone whose spouse is of a different race.

Bush and Pickering refused to address that and other specific allegations about Pickering's record.

"I think the country is tired of people playing politics all the time in Washington," Bush said in a brief question-and-answer session designed to bolster the nomination in advance on a Senate committee vote Thursday. "I believe they are holding this man's nomination up for political purposes."

Afterward, Evers shrugged off criticism of Pickering's actions in the 1950s and 1960s. "Whatever he was then, he's not that now," Evers said.

Said Moore, the state's attorney general: "You won't see elected officials stand up for a man if he's a racist."

Earlier, White House press secretary Ari Fleischer dismissed questions about Pickering's civil rights record.

"You're referring to something that took place over 40 years ago when he was a law student. If actions taken by people 40 years ago were the criteria, there'd be some senators who are voting on this nomination whose very history would come into play," Fleischer said. "So I think what you've seen is a nation that has changed."

He refused to single out any senator. Ironically, one of the Republicans who support Pickering's nomination is Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who ran for president as a segregationist in 1948. In addition, Sen. Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., was a member of the Ku Klux Klan briefly before he came to Congress in the 1950s, and Byrd has been a strong supporter of civil rights.

Thurmond is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Byrd is not. Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., a member of the panel, was rejected for the federal court bench in 1986 because of racially tinged remarks attributed to him.

All 10 Democrats on the committee say they will vote against the nomination Thursday, enough to keep Bush's choice off the Senate floor. Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said Wednesday the nomination won't go to the floor unless the panel approves it.

Bush wants to elevate Pickering to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, which serves Mississippi, Texas and Louisiana. Democrats outnumber Republicans 10-9 on the Judiciary Committee, which is expected to vote on the nomination Thursday.

Pickering, a former Mississippi prosecutor and lawmaker, easily won Senate confirmation in 1990 as a U.S. District Court judge.

At least two Senate Democrats, Sens. Ernest Hollings of South Carolina and Zell Miller of Georgia, have indicated they might vote for Pickering, enough to confirm his nomination in the 50-49 Senate, if his nomination makes it to the floor.

Helfrich will be sworn in Monday by Pickering
Lea Crager
American Staff Writer A new judge will take his seat on the 12th Circuit Court District bench for the first time in 20 years Monday.
U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering will swear in Bob Helfrich at 11 a.m. in the Forrest County Courthouse's Circuit Courtroom.
Helfrich, 49, said he chose Pickering for the ceremony out of respect.
"It's very likely that he'll be going to the (U.S.) Court of Appeals," he said. "He ought to be going to the Court of Appeals. I've just got a lot of respect for Judge Pickering. You have to realize that in the '60s, Judge Pickering testified against Sam Bowers. He's a man from Jones County who testified against Sam Bowers and the Klan of Jones County. That took a lot of courage."
President Bush last year nominated Pickering for the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, but Democratic senators blocked the appointment.
Bush has said he will renominate Pickering this year for the vacancy.
Helfrich, a former assistant district attorney, defeated five-term incumbent Dicky McKenzie in November.
As a prosecutor, Helfrich prosecuted Jones County Klan leader Sam Bowers in 1998 for the 1966 fire-bombing death of Vernon Dahmer.
Helfrich said he wants to establish a court docket to help clear the backlog of cases, which he estimates to be in the thousands. And he expects to begin work immediately.
"We're going to select a grand jury for this term at 9 a.m. before the ceremony," Helfrich said. "I've got to sit down and go over what's been pre-set and see what we can work around to get into. We're trying to get moved in and get this place organized now."

Terrorism Risk Insurance

On November 26, 2002, President Bush signed into law the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act of 2002. Since the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, the economy has been harmed by the withdrawal of many insurance companies from the marketplace for terrorism risk insurance. Their withdrawal in the face of great uncertainty as to their risk exposure to future terrorist attacks led to the cancellation of construction projects, increased business costs for the insurance that was available, and substantial shifting of risk--from reinsurers to primary insurers, and from insurers to policyholders (e.g., investors, businesses, and property owners).

The new law establishes a temporary Federal program that provides for a system of shared public and private compensation for insured commercial property and casualty losses arising from acts of terrorism under the Act. The program will be administered by the Treasury Department and will sunset on December 31, 2005.

Under the new law, insurance companies included under the program must make available to their policyholders coverage for insured losses from acts of terrorism under the program. The law also requires insurance companies to disclose to policyholders the premium charged for terrorism risk insurance and the Federal share of compensation provided under the law.

In the event of a future terrorist attack on private businesses and others covered by this program, insurance companies will cover insured losses up to each company's deductible as specified in the law. Insured losses above that amount in a given year would be shared between the insurance company and the Treasury, with Treasury covering 90 percent of the losses above the company's deductible. However, neither the Treasury nor any insurer would be liable for any amount exceeding the statutory annual cap of $100 billion in aggregate insured losses. The law also provides for the Treasury to recoup any federal payments via surcharges on policyholders for at least the first $10 billion of any insured losses through 2003, $12.5 billion in 2004, and $15 billion in 2005, though no time period for recoupment is specified.

How a Republican Desegregated the South's Schools
By GEORGE P. SHULTZ

PALO ALTO, Calif. * The Republican Party's commitment to equality of opportunity has come under question in recent weeks, particularly its determination to deal effectively with racial segregation. That's lamentable, for there is a laudable story to tell about the modern Republican Party and the efforts of a Republican president to ensure equal opportunity for all Americans.

In 1970, seven states * Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina and South Carolina * continued to enforce the dual school system. This was in clear defiance of the Supreme Court's 1954 decision in Brown v. Topeka Board of Education, which declared dual school systems to be unconstitutional. It was also in defiance of a 1969 court decision ordering an end to further delay.

If it's possible to imagine, the subject of desegregation was becoming more inflamed by the day. In March 1970, President Richard M. Nixon decided to take action. He declared Brown to be "right in both constitutional and human terms" and expressed his intention to enforce the law. He also put in place a process to carry out the court's mandate. Vice President Spiro T. Agnew and I (then secretary of labor) were asked to lead a cabinet committee to manage the transition to desegregated schools.

The vice president said he wanted no part of this effort. So I became its de facto chairman, with help from Daniel Patrick Moynihan, then a counselor to the president, and Leonard Garment, one of the president's lawyers. With the president's support, we formed biracial committees in each of the seven states. The idea was to reach out to key leaders. Many were reluctant to serve, the whites fearing too close an association with desegregation, the blacks concerned that the committee might be a sham.
The first group to come to Washington was from Mississippi. We met in the Roosevelt Room of the White House, across the hall from the Oval Office. The discussion was civil, but deep divisions were evident. I let them argue for a while. Then, by prearrangement, I had John Mitchell, the attorney general, drop by. He was known in the South as a tough guy, and on the whole was regarded by whites as sympathetic to their cause. I asked Mitchell what he planned to do about the schools. "I am attorney general, and I will enforce the law," he growled in his gruff, pipe-smoking way. He offered no judgments about whether this was good, bad or indifferent. "I will enforce the law," he repeated. With that, he left.
I then addressed the group. "This discussion has been intense and revealing, but you can see that it's not really relevant," I told them. "The fact is, desegregation is going to happen, whether you like it or not. You have a great stake in seeing that this effort is managed in a reasonable way." Gradually, the discussion shifted to more operational issues.
When lunchtime arrived, I took the group to the diplomatic reception rooms in the State Department, taking pains to point out to them the desk on which Thomas Jefferson wrote parts of the Declaration of Independence. I sat with the two people I wanted to lead the Mississippi advisory committee: Warren Hood, president of the Mississippi Manufacturers Association, and Dr. Gilbert Mason, a black physician and head of the Biloxi chapter of the N.A.A.C.P. I argued that if they would accept, the committee would have great credibility with whites and blacks.
I could see they were beginning to talk constructively to each other, so I left them alone. As lunch ended, I was pleased to see them shaking hands. We were in business.
After we returned to the White House, members of the delegation started to make suggestions about how to handle various problems. I mentioned that we had created a small kitty out of Department of Health, Education and Welfare funds * if they had minor expenditures, I could provide some money quickly. That seemed to help.
When the time was right, I let President Nixon know that we were ready for him. We walked across the hall into the Oval Office, where the president gathered his guests around his desk. "We live in a great democracy where authority and responsibility are shared," I remember him saying. "Just as decisions are made here in this office, decisions are made throughout the states and communities of our country. You are leaders in those communities and you have to step up to your responsibilities. " They left the Oval Office inspired.
Over the next two months, we went through much the same process with representatives of five other states. The committees were coming together. They were talking about practical issues, like how to open the schools without violence.
The last state was Louisiana. It was August and the schools would soon be opening. Our meetings had been going so well that I suggested to the president that we hold the final one in New Orleans. I would do my part in the morning. He would fly down from Washington and do his part around noon. Then we would invite the co-chairmen from the seven states to join the president for an overall discussion of the school openings.
I remember the meeting in the Oval Office to discuss these proposed events. Vice President Agnew warned the president not to go. There you will be in that room, Mr. President, I recall him saying. Half the people there will be black; half will be white. Pictures will be taken. When the schools open, there will be blood running through the streets of the South, and if you go, this will be blood on your hands. This is not your issue. This is the issue of the liberals who have pushed for desegregation. Stay away.
The president looked at me. I told him what was obvious: I can't predict what will happen. The vice president may very well be right about violence, but you're the president of the whole country. We should do everything we can to see that the schools open and operate peacefully and well.

The president decided to go ahead.

The meeting with the Louisiana group began early on Aug. 14, 1970. The going was tougher than with any other delegation. It's one thing to gather across from the Oval Office and it's another thing to sit around a table in a hotel meeting room. The president was due to arrive about noon, but as the time drew near, I had not reached the level of agreement that I wanted. "The president has just landed," came word from the Secret Service. "The president is 10 minutes out." We took a break. I went to meet the president, the vice president's views in the back of my mind. "Mr. President," I told him, "I haven't got this group there yet. I'm afraid you're going to have to finish the job."

The president came in. He listened. He talked. He emphasized the importance of having the schools open peacefully. If there were problems, children would suffer.

That afternoon we met with the co-chairmen from the seven states. Everyone was on board. At the end of the meeting, the president went before the television cameras. From the heart of the South, he spoke forcefully about his determination to enforce the law, and the importance of community involvement.

"One of the most encouraging experiences that I have had since taking office was to hear each one of these leaders from the Southern states speak honestly about the problems, not glossing over the fact that there were very grave problems," he said. "As a result of these advisory committees being set up, we are going to find that in many districts the transition will be orderly and peaceful, whereas otherwise it could have been the other way."

In the end, the school openings were peaceful, to the amazement of almost everyone. I was not the only one impressed.

In "One of Us: Richard Nixon and the American Dream," Tom Wicker, a former columnist for The Times, assessed the president's efforts. "There's no doubt about it * the Nixon administration accomplished more in 1970 to desegregate Southern school systems than had been done in the 16 previous years, or probably since," he wrote. "There's no doubt either that it was Richard Nixon personally who conceived, orchestrated and led the administration's desegregation effort. Halting and uncertain before he finally asserted strong control, that effort resulted in probably the outstanding domestic achievement of his administration."

I believe he was absolutely right.

The President. I nominated a very good man from Mississippi named Charles Pickering to the appellate bench, and I expect him to be confirmed by the United States Senate. I think the country is tired of people playing politics all the time in Washington. And I believe that they're holding this man's nomination up for political purposes. It's not fair, and it's not right. And a lot of people in Mississippi agree with me. Republicans agree with me, but so do a lot of good Democrats, starting with the attorney general of the State of Mississippi. He is here to lend his support for Charles Pickering. As well, the former Governor, Governor Winter, has expressed concern about a process that would malign a man such as him and expects him to be confirmed. Frank Hunger feels the same way. These are people in Mississippi who know the man for what he is, a man who respects the rights of all citizens and a man who not only respects the rights of all citizens, who has acted on that strong belief, a man who's a fine jurist, a man of quality and integrity.

And I hope the Senate stops playing politics. This is not good for the Senate, and it's not good for the country. They've got to get him on the floor and get him a vote and get him in. He'll do a fine job.

Judge Pickering's Nomination

Q. Can we ask you a couple questions about his nomination, sir?

The President. Go ahead.

Q. Do you agree with your Press Secretary that if the judge's writings and actions of 30-20, 30, 40 years ago should come into play, then so should the civil rights record of some of the very Senators of 30, 40 years ago? And is that a threat?

The President. Here's what I believe: I believe this man should be confirmed. I know him--I've known him for a long time. But more importantly, people from Mississippi have known him. Democrats and Republicans know him. And he needs to be confirmed, Ron [Ron Fournier, Associated Press]. This is a good, good, honorable citizen, and they're playing politics with him up there.

Q. Did you support in 1950-----

The President. Hold on-----

Q. Mr. President, you describe this as playing politics. But many Democrats believe there are serious civil rights issues involved; among them that when he was a member of the State Senate, Mr. Pickering voted twice to support the Mississippi Sovereignty Commission, which was a segregationist spy agency recognized by the State.

The President. All the allegations have been laid out. He has been confirmed unanimously by the United States Senate in the past. This is a good, honorable man who should be approved by the United States Senate.

Otherwise we wouldn't have a Democrat attorney general, a very popular former Governor, Al Gore's brother-in-law, all of whom have stood up and said, the man needs to be confirmed.

Thank you all.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:52 a.m. in the Oval Office at the White House. In his remarks, he referred to Mike Moore, State attorney general, and former Gov. William Winter of Mississippi; and Frank W. Hunger, former Assistant Attorney General, Civil Division, and brother-in-law of former Vice President Albert Gore, Jr. Judge Pickering's nomination to be U.S. Circuit Judge for the Fifth Circuit was submitted May 25, 2001.

BODY:
President Bush, defending an embattled federal court nominee, accused Senate Democrats on Wednesday of "playing politics" with the choice as his spokesman said the civil rights record of some senators could come into play during Charles Pickering's nomination fight.

Turning aside Democratic criticism about Pickering's civil rights record, Bush waved his arms in disgust and said, "All of these allegations have been looked at. He has been confirmed unanimously by the United States Senate in the past."

Pickering and Bush were joined in the Oval Office by the judge's supporters, including Mississippi Attorney General Mike Moore and several Democratic elected officials. Charles Evers, the brother of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers, denounced "Yankees up here" and liberals fighting Pickering's nomination. The federal appeal court nomination is all but dead in the Senate. Bush launched the last-minute political offensive to avoid criticism that he did not do enough on Pickering's behalf, and to signal to the Senate that he won't roll over on his judicial nominees.

The fight over Pickering's nomination to the federal appeals court is viewed by the White House and Democratic foes as a dress rehearsal for the clash that would likely ensue if a Supreme Court justice retires and Bush is allowed to fill a vacancy on the high court.

Pickering, currently a federal district judge, has faced criticism from women's, civil rights and liberal groups - some of the same factions likely to line up against a Bush pick to the Supreme Court.

The Democratic Party, in opposing the nomination, said in a recent news release that Pickering wrote an article in May 1959 suggesting how a loophole in Mississippi's statute banning interracial marriage could be corrected to allow the state to criminally prosecute anyone whose spouse is of a different race.

Bush and Pickering refused to address that and other specific allegations about Pickering's record.

"I think the country is tired of people playing politics all the time in Washington," Bush said in a brief question-and-answer session designed to bolster the nomination in advance on a Senate committee vote Thursday. "I believe they are holding this man's nomination up for political purposes."

Afterward, Evers shrugged off criticism of Pickering's actions in the 1950s and 1960s. "Whatever he was then, he's not that now," Evers said.

Said Moore, the state's attorney general: "You won't see elected officials stand up for a man if he's a racist."

Earlier, White House press secretary Ari Fleischer dismissed questions

about Pickering's civil rights record.

"You're referring to something that took place over 40 years ago when he was a law student. If actions taken by people 40 years ago were the criteria, there'd be some senators who are voting on this nomination whose very history would come into play," Fleischer said. "So I think what you've seen is a nation that has changed."

He refused to single out any senator. Ironically, one of the Republicans who support Pickering's nomination is Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who ran for president as a segregationist in 1948. In addition, Sen. Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., was a member of the Ku Klux Klan briefly before he came to Congress in the 1950s, and Byrd has been a strong supporter of civil rights.

Thurmond is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Byrd is not. Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., a member of the panel, was rejected for the federal court bench in 1986 because of racially tinged remarks attributed to him.

All 10 Democrats on the committee say they will vote against the nomination Thursday, enough to keep Bush's choice off the Senate floor. Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said Wednesday the nomination won't go to the floor unless the panel approves it.

Bush wants to elevate Pickering to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, which serves Mississippi, Texas and Louisiana. Democrats outnumber Republicans 10-9 on the Judiciary Committee, which is expected to vote on the nomination Thursday.

Pickering, a former Mississippi prosecutor and lawmaker, easily won Senate confirmation in 1990 as a U.S. District Court judge.

At least two Senate Democrats, Sens. Ernest Hollings of South Carolina and Zell Miller of Georgia, have indicated they might vote for Pickering, enough to confirm his nomination in the 50-49 Senate, if his nomination makes it to the floor.

The story came from the late 1960s in Laurel, where Klansmen were "throwing sticks of dynamite like they were firecrackers" to preserve segregation in South Mississippi. Now a semi-retired Jackson lawyer, W.O. "Chet" Dillard was Jones County's district attorney then, and he faced a time-consuming and hair-raising challenge: finding the culprits behind several civil rights murders that had made his area infamous throughout the South.

"I was deathly afraid," Dillard said of the night in 1967 when he was supposed to meet a Ku Klux Klan informant in a Laurel shopping center's parking lot. "So Charles borrowed a pistol from the FBI and waited across the street in the upstairs part of a funeral home. . . . He was going to start shooting if I flashed my headlights three times." The "Charles" of the story is Charles Willis Pickering Sr., then county attorney for Jones County. Today, Pickering is a 64-year-old federal judge trying to refute liberal groups' allegations that his legal career "does not demonstrate an affirmative commitment to civil rights protections."

Whether the judge was a friend or enemy of civil rights in the 1960s will be one of the questions reviewed at 2 p.m. today by the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is considering President Bush's nomination of Pickering to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The judge, whose jurisdiction now covers the Coast, will be making his second appearance before the committee. Watching will be a host of Washington politicos who view Pickering's nomination as the first clash between Bush and Congress over judicial appointments.

And senators and representatives from Mississippi, some with personal as well as political interests in the nomination, will be paying attention, too.

Fight against the Klan

Dillard, for one, said he hopes the committee gets to hear about the night he met the Klan informant with Pickering.

"He was there with me ready to shoot a bunch of Kluckers," said Dillard, employing the slang term that some Southern lawmen used to refer to Klansmen in the 1960s. "They're going to have to find something other than civil rights to hang on Charles. He was more liberal than me, and I was working to bring down the Klan!"

Still, Democrats have seized on the Pickering nomination as an opportunity to portray Bush nominees as right-wing extremists far from mainstream public opinion on issues such as race, abortion and the role of religion in public life.

A strong opponent of abortion, Pickering has drawn brickbats from the left for his role in shaping the Republican Party's anti-abortion platform in 1976, as well as statements he made as president of the Mississippi Baptist Convention in the 1980s that divorce was to blame for some social problems.

But racial issues were the most prominent concerns of the Congressional Black Caucus members who held a press conference Wednesday to announce their opposition to Pickering.

The Black Caucus members cited Pickering's examination of laws banning interracial marriage in a 1959 law review article, in which he wrote that the Mississippi Legislature should amend the wording of the ban "if it is to serve the purpose that the Legislature undoubtedly intended it to serve." They also decried Pickering's contact in the early 1970s with the Mississippi Sovereignty Commission, a state-funded agency set up to undermine the civil rights movement. In a 1972 letter to the commission, the judge, then a state senator, asked to be informed of the activities of a labor group working to organize pulpwood workers in Jones County.

Rep. Thompson lashes out

The strongest denunciation of Pickering came from U.S. Rep. Bennie Thompson, a Democrat from Bolton who compared black Mississippians who are in Washington lobbying for the judge to Judas, the disciple who betrayed Jesus Christ.

"Judge Pickering has been an enemy of civil rights since his days in law school," said Thompson, referring to his article on miscegenation. Thompson's comments aroused the ire of Republicans and conservatives who are pushing for Pickering's confirmation by Presidents Day.

"That's just horrid," said Kay Daly, spokesman for the Coalition for a Fair Judiciary, a conservative Washington organization that favors Pickering's nomination. "I guess if you're not in lockstep with the Congressional Black Caucus, then you're an enemy of civil rights for black people."

Daly's group defends Pickering by highlighting his anti-Klan activity in the 1960s. Pickering testified against Sam Bowers, a notorious Mississippi Klansman, in 1967 during Bowers' first trial for killing civil rights leader Vernon Dahmer. Bowers was convicted of the murder in a later trial in 1998.

Republicans also say that Pickering asked the Sovereignty Commission for information on labor activities in South Mississippi because of the pro-Klan bent of one union in Jones County, which he represented from 1972 until 1980 in the state Legislature.

"Union members who were also members of the KKK shot into and burned homes in the middle of the night and brutally beat up workers," Dillard wrote in a letter to the Judiciary Committee. "As a state senator representing Jones County, Charles Pickering had every right to be concerned about further union violence . . . in Jones County."

'Politics at its worst'

U.S. Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., said Pickering's personal and legal records demonstrate his competence.

"I think he would be totally fair to everyone," Cochran said. "He has demonstrated his exceptional capabilities as a U.S. District Court judge, and he deserves this promotion."

Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, a Pascagoula Republican and longtime friend of Pickering, has called on his colleagues to confirm Pickering by Presidents Day. Last month, Lott said liberals were trying to take "a snooker shot" at him by holding up Pickering.

And the Mississippi Republican perhaps closest to Pickering -- his son, U.S. Rep. Chip Pickering -- called the Congressional Black Caucus' attack on his father "politics at its worst."

"Bennie Thompson is trying to extort a commitment for who the next federal judge from Mississippi is going to be, and he's holding my father hostage," the younger Pickering said. "He's impugning the record of a good man with a 40-year record of fighting the Klan, standing up to racists, pushing for racial reconciliation."

Neither Thompson nor Pickering would predict the outcome of the judge's confirmation battle.

"It's going to be close," Thompson said. "It could be 10-9 or 9-10 in favor or against on the committee. It's going to be real tight."

Bush the Bold II

Yesterday I complimented President Bush on the boldness of his family-friendly tax cut plan. Late yesterday afternoon, just hours after the Republicans resumed control of the Senate, President Bush again showed true leadership. In another bold stroke, the president re-nominated 30 judicial nominees to the federal bench who had failed to win confirmation last year, including two who were rejected on partisan votes of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Along with nominees who never were given a vote in Tom Daschle's Senate, Mr. Bush re-nominated to the U.S Fifth Circuit Court Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi and Texas Supreme Court Justice Priscilla Owen. Both highly qualified, distinguished jurists became targets of orchestrated smear campaigns by leftist interest groups and were rejected on party-line votes in committee. In the aftermath of the Trent Lott debacle, many doubted President Bush would dare re-nominate Judge Pickering and risk re-igniting the race issue. Judge Pickering, it will be recalled, was wrongfully accused of "racial insensitivity" by his Democrat detractors. But Mr. Bush refused to be cowed by such unseemly tactics or put political expediency ahead of principle. Judge Pickering is a man of honor and integrity, as those who know him eagerly attest. He will make a superb federal judge. Mr. Bush's action sends a clear signal that he will not be held hostage to the politics of personal destruction.

We need to get the numbers and percentages (i) of women, (ii) African-American, and (iii) Hispanic nominees (not just confirmed nominees) in the Clinton, Bush 41, Reagan, and Carter Administrations. We need the numbers and percentages for district, circuit, and combined. Any idea whether we can easily get these? Thanks.

Fournier just called to say their legal affairs reporter is going on the wire with a story saying the Department of Justice has recommended to the White House that the administration file a friend of the court brief stating that it is unconstitutional, and that it is just waiting White House decision whether to accept the recommendation or not.

One of the things we thought would be useful to undertake is to create a birthday database so that key contacts receive a personal birthday greeting from the President. As you know, this information is collected now each time we clear someone in through WAVES for events and meetings; what we were wondering is if it was allowable to use that information in the way that's been suggested.

I'd be grateful for your guidance.

Many thanks.

Brett,
We came up with the idea of having some Spanish classes held somewhere on the WH complex that would be open to WH staff and wanted to run the following questions by you? Please also let me know if there is another WH counsel this should be run by as well.

1. Generally, is the concept of having Spanish classes held on the WH complex (perhaps in the EEOB) ok?

2. Would it be ok for an outside group to sponsor the classes, to defer the costs for the WH staff?

Thanks for your thoughts and guidance.

Bush the Bold II

Yesterday I complimented President Bush on the boldness of his family-friendly tax cut plan. Late yesterday afternoon, just hours after the Republicans resumed control of the Senate, President Bush again showed true leadership. In another bold stroke, the president re-nominated 30 judicial nominees to the federal bench who had failed to win confirmation last year, including two who were rejected on partisan votes of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Along with nominees who never were given a vote in Tom Daschle's Senate, Mr. Bush re-nominated to the U.S Fifth Circuit Court Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi and Texas Supreme Court Justice Priscilla Owen. Both highly qualified, distinguished jurists became targets of orchestrated smear campaigns by leftist interest groups and were rejected on party-line votes in committee. In the aftermath of the Trent Lott debacle, many doubted President Bush would dare re-nominate Judge Pickering and risk re-igniting the race issue. Judge Pickering, it will be recalled, was wrongfully accused of "racial insensitivity" by his Democrat detractors. But Mr. Bush refused to be cowed by such unseemly tactics or put political expediency ahead of principle. Judge Pickering is a man of honor and integrity, as those who know him eagerly attest. He will make a superb federal judge. Mr. Bush's action sends a clear signal that he will not be held hostage to the politics of personal destruction.

January 9, 2003 10:10 a.m.
The Cross Burning Case: What Really Happened
The facts are far different from the Democratic spin.

n their renewed attacks on Bush appeals-court nominee Charles Pickering, Democrats have focused on Pickering's rulings in a 1994 cross-burning case. Accusing Pickering of "glaring racial insensitivity," they charge that he abused his powers as a U.S. District Court judge in Mississippi to give a light sentence to a man convicted of the crime. "Why anyone would go the whole nine yards and then some to get a lighter sentence for a convicted cross burner is beyond me," New York Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer said Wednesday. "Why anyone would do that * in 1994 and in a state with Mississippi's history * is simply mind-boggling."

But a close look at the facts of the case suggests that Pickering's actions were not only not mind-boggling but were in fact a reasonable way of handling a difficult case. Here is what happened:
The crime took place on January 9, 1994. Three men * 20-year-old Daniel Swan, 25-year-old Mickey Herbert Thomas, and a 17-year-old whose name was not released because he was a juvenile * were drinking together when one of them came up with the idea that they should construct a cross and burn it in front of a house in which a white man and his black wife lived in rural Walthall County in southern Mississippi. While it is not clear who originally suggested the plan, it is known that the 17-year-old appeared to harbor some sort of hostility toward the couple; on an earlier occasion, he had fired a gun into the house (no one was hit). Neither Swan nor Thomas was involved in the shooting incident.

The men got into Swan's pickup truck, went to his barn, and gathered wood to build an eight-foot cross. They then drove to the couple's house, put up the cross, doused it with gasoline, and set it on fire.

Because the case involved a cross burning covered under the federal hate-crimes statute, local authorities immediately brought in investigators from the Clinton Justice Department's Office of Civil Rights. After the three suspects were arrested in late February, 1994, lawyers for the civil-rights office made the major decisions in prosecuting the case.

In a move that baffled and later angered Judge Pickering, Civil Rights Division prosecutors early on decided to make a plea bargain with two of the three suspects. The first, Mickey Thomas, had an unusually low IQ, and prosecutors decided to reduce charges against him based on that fact. The second bargain was with the 17-year-old. Civil Rights Division lawyers allowed both men to plead guilty to misdemeanors in the cross-burning case (the juvenile also pleaded guilty to felony charges in the shooting incident). The Civil Rights Division recommended no jail time for both men.

The situation was different for the third defendant, Daniel Swan, who, like the others, faced charges under the hate-crime statute. Unlike the others, however, Swan pleaded not guilty. The law requires that the government prove the accused acted out of racial animus, and Swan, whose defense consisted mainly of the contention that he was drunk on the night of the cross burning, maintained that he simply did not have the racial animus necessary to be guilty of a hate crime under federal law.

The case went to trial in Pickering's courtroom. During the course of testimony, Pickering came to suspect the Civil Rights Division had made a plea bargain with the wrong defendant. No one questioned the Justice Department's decision to go easy on the low-IQ Thomas, but the 17-year-old was a different case. "It was established to the satisfaction of this court that although the juvenile was younger than the defendant Daniel Swan, that nevertheless the juvenile was the ring leader in the burning of the cross involved in this crime," Pickering wrote in a memorandum after the verdict. "It was clearly established that the juvenile had racial animus....The court expressed both to the government and to counsel for the juvenile serious reservations about not imposing time in the Bureau of Prisons for the juvenile defendant."

In addition to the 17-year-old's role as leader, there was significant evidence, including the fact that he had once fired a shot into the mixed-race couple's home, suggesting that he had a history of violent hostility to blacks that far outweighed any racial animosity felt by Daniel Swan. Swan had no criminal record, and seven witnesses testified that they were not aware of any racial animus he might have held against black people. On the other hand, one witness testified that he believed Swan did not like blacks, and Swan admitted under questioning that he had used the "N" word in the past. In the end, Swan was found guilty * there was no doubt that he had taken an active role in the cross burning * and the Justice Department recommended that he be sentenced to seven and a half years in jail.

At that point, the Justice Department had already made a no-jail deal with the 17-year-old. When it came time to sentence Swan, Pickering questioned whether it made sense that the most-guilty defendant got off with a misdemeanor and no jail time, while a less-guilty defendant would be sentenced to seven and a half years in prison. "The recommendation of the government in this instance is clearly the most egregious instance of disproportionate sentencing recommended by the government in any case pending before this court," Pickering wrote. "The defendant [Swan] clearly had less racial animosity than the juvenile."

Compounding Pickering's concern was a conflict between two federal appeals-court rulings over the applicability of a statutory mandatory minimum sentence to the case. The Justice Department insisted that Swan be sentenced to a minimum of five years under one statute and two and a half years under a separate law. Pickering doubted whether both were applicable to the case and asked Civil Rights Division lawyers whether the same sentencing standards were used in cases in other federal circuits. The prosecutors said they would check with Washington for an answer.

Pickering set a sentencing date of January 3, 1995. As the date approached, he waited for an answer from the Justice Department. He asked in November, 1994 and received no response. He asked again in December and received no response. He asked again on January 2, the day before the sentencing, and still received no response. He delayed sentencing, and on January 4 wrote a strongly-worded order to prosecutors demanding not only that they respond to his questions but that they take the issue up personally with Attorney General Janet Reno and report back within ten days.

Shortly after issuing the order, Pickering called assistant attorney general Frank Hunger, a Mississippian and friend of Pickering's who headed the Justice Department's Civil Division at the time (Hunger was also well known as the brother-in-law of vice president Al Gore). Pickering says he called Hunger to express "my frustration with the gross disparity in sentence recommended by the government, and my inability to get a response from the Justice Department in Washington." Hunger told Pickering that the case wasn't within his area of responsibility. It appears that Hunger took no action as a result of the call. (Hunger later supported Pickering's nomination to the federal appeals courts.)

Finally, Pickering got word from Civil Rights Division prosecutors, who said they had decided to drop the demand that Swan be given the five-year minimum portion of the recommended sentence. Pickering then sentenced Swan to 27 months in jail. At the sentencing hearing, Pickering told Swan, "You're going to the penitentiary because of what you did. And it's an area that we've got to stamp out; that we've got to learn to live, races among each other. And the type of conduct that you exhibited cannot and will not be tolerated....You did that which does hinder good race relations and was a despicable act....I would suggest to you that during the time you're in the prison that you do some reading on race relations and maintaining good race relations and how that can be done."

So Swan went to jail, for a bit more than two years rather than seven. Every lawyer in the case * the defense attorneys, the prosecutors, and the judge * faced the difficulty of dealing with an ugly situation and determining the appropriate punishment for a bad guy and a somewhat less-bad guy. Pickering, who believed the Civil Rights Division went too easy on the 17-year-old bad guy, worked out what he believed was the best sentence for Daniel Swan. It was a real-world solution to the kind of real-world problem that the justice system deals with every day. And it was the end of the cross-burning case until Pickering was nominated by President Bush to a place on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Schumer on the Attack
The New York senator accuses the White House of plotting to destroy civil rights.

n a statement Wednesday, New York Democratic Senator Charles Schumer charged the renomination of Judge Charles Pickering to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals is part of a Bush administration plan to destroy "basic civil rights" in America. "For years, the federal courts served as the shield protecting basic civil rights in this country," Schumer said. "This administration wants the courts to become the sword that destroys those rights."

ÿ

"And don't think this stops with Judge Pickering," Schumer added. "He's just the tip of the iceberg." Setting the stage for a Senate-wide fight, Schumer said he is "prepared to do everything I can to stop the nomination from going forward" * including a filibuster.

Pickering, a U.S. District Court judge in Mississippi, was defeated in a straight party-line vote last March by the then-Democratic-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee. Democrats alleged that Pickering had displayed "glaring racial insensitivity" in his decisions, particularly one in which he reduced the sentence of a man convicted in a 1994 cross burning. Now, with Republicans in control of the Senate, the White House has renominated Pickering.

That led to renewed Democratic attacks. "Why anyone would go the whole nine yards and then some to get a lighter sentence for a convicted cross burner is beyond me," Schumer said Wednesday. "Why anyone would do that * in 1994 and in a state with Mississippi's history * is simply mind-boggling." (Contrary to Schumer's assertions, the facts of the cross-burning case appear to support Pickering's actions.)

At a news conference Wednesday, Schumer admitted there is little Democrats can do to stop Pickering in the Senate Judiciary Committee, where Republicans will enjoy a 10 to 9 majority. But he predicted a strong filibuster effort in the full Senate. "I think there is wide support in our caucus to do this," he said.

But there are serious doubts about whether a Democratic filibuster would be successful. Schumer's news conference was attended by just one other senator, Dick Durbin of Illinois. Beyond that, only Massachusetts's Edward Kennedy has publicly supported a filibuster. To succeed, Schumer would have to persuade 40 other senators to side with him against allowing a full-Senate vote on the Pickering nomination.

There is little evidence he will be able to do that. First, such a maneuver has not been successful in more than three decades (and then in a Supreme Court case). Second, a successful filibuster would guarantee serious and possibly long-term reprisals from the GOP. And third, many observers believe the judicial issue helped Republicans win some key Senate elections last November and that the Democratic leadership would be hesitant to make a historic stand on an issue that could conceivably cost them in 2004. "To some degree our success in the election nationalized this issue," says one Republican. "Do Democrats still see that as a winning issue for them?"

So it seems likely that in the end, Pickering will be confirmed. Still, some Republicans were surprised by the president's decision to renominate the Mississippi judge, especially in light of the fallout from the controversy over former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, who was removed by Republicans after his statement praising former Sen. Strom Thurmond's 1948 Dixiecrat campaign for president. Leading Democrats saw the incident as an opportunity to charge that Lott's comments reflected a pervasive racism at the core of the Republican party. Now the Pickering renomination gives them a chance to renew the attack. Sure enough, at their news conference Wednesday, Schumer and Durbin did just that.

Some Republicans believed that the White House should not have renominated Pickering so quickly, that the president should have waited until the Lott issue cooled. "I don't think it was smart to do it this soon," says one. "At some point you have to lay low." But others cheered the president's decision. "It's a good thing," says one. "We shouldn't shy away from [Pickering's] background."

In a sense, the White House had little choice. In campaign appearances last year, the president vouched for Pickering's character and ability. "I named two good judges, one from Mississippi and one from my home state of Texas * Charles Pickering, Priscilla Owen," he told the National Republican Senatorial Committee last September. "It is not right that these two fine, fine people were denied the bench." Last August, at a fundraiser for Pickering's son, Rep. Chip Pickering, Bush said, "I put up a good man named Judge Pickering for a higher court....The Senate did wrong by Judge Pickering. I did right by naming him to the bench." And last March, shortly after Pickering's defeat, speaking at a Saxby Chambliss for Senate dinner in Atlanta, the president called Pickering "a good man from Mississippi." He praised Georgia Democratic Sen. Zell Miller for having "stood up and defended the honor and integrity of Judge Pickering."

Having said all that, how could Bush not renominate Pickering? Bush had bestowed his "good man" stamp of approval on Pickering, and to withdraw it in light of the Lott affair would have seemed a baldly political calculation. It would also have sent a message to Democrats that their attacks worked * thus encouraging more.

So now, the Pickering battle has resumed. Unlike last year, Republicans appear to have the winning advantage. But there will still be a terrible fight, if Charles Schumer has anything to say about it.

Steele up for federal judge
Some are disapponted that a black candidate was not recommended
01/08/03
By SEAN REILLY
Washington Bureau
WASHINGTON -- After unsuccessfully seeking to install U.S. Magistrate William Steele on a federal appellate court in Atlanta, President Bush has renominated him for a vacant federal district judgeship in Mobile.
Steele's name was in a batch of 31 nominations released by the White House on Tuesday evening. It's now up to the Senate Judiciary Committee to schedule hearings on them.
Steele, a 51-year-old Tuscumbia native, has been a magistrate in Mo bile since 1990. A former federal prosecutor, he worked for several years under U.S. Sen. Jeff Sessions during the latter's stint as U.S. attorney in the 1980s.
In a statement released through spokeswoman Nancy Wall, Sessions, R-Mobile, said Tuesday evening that Steele "has the highest personal integrity, a phenomenal work ethic and excellent administrative skills. He will do a great job."
But on Monday, several lawyers and a state lawmaker had urged Sessions and U.S. Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Tuscaloosa, to recommend a black candidate for the lifetime appointment. No black has ever sat on the three-judge federal district bench in Mobile. Steele is white.
"I'm outraged and very disappointed," said Lettie Malone, Mobile branch president of the NAACP, upon learning of Steele's nomination.
Sessions was not available to comment, Wall said. Steele did not return phone messages left at his home Tuesday evening.
Bush had nominated Steele in fall of 2001 for a vacancy on the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta, but the nomination died without Senate action at the end of the 107th Congress late last year.
The NAACP and another civil rights organization, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, had earlier voiced objection to Steele's 2001 decision to throw out a racial discrimination suit filed by three black paper mill workers. At the time, however, black attorneys in Mobile said they found Steele fair.
Last year, a three-judge panel on the 11th Circuit reversed that decision on the grounds that the statute of limitations issue needed to be revisited and sent the case back to Mobile. Steele has bowed out of any further involvement.
Because Republicans now control the Senate, Steele's chances of confirmation are almost certainly better this year. In addition, nominees for district judgeships usually receive less scrutiny than those for more influential appeals courts.
The Mobile judgeship in question has been vacant for two years. The support of both home-state senators is usually essential for a judicial nominee to win Senate confirmation.
On Monday, Shelby spokes woman Andrea Andrews had said that several candidates were under consideration and it was still early in the selection process. Andrews did not immediately return phone calls Tuesday evening seeking clarification of her remarks.

Last year, district judges made $150,000 annually, but they may soon receive a modest pay increase.
In a move that was immediately denounced by Democrats, Bush also re-nominated U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering of Hattiesburg, Miss., for a seat on the federal appeals court in New Orleans. Democrats blocked Pickering's original nomination last year, contending that he is racially insensitive.
The name of Alabama Attorney General Bill Pryor was not on the list of nominations released Tuesday by the White House. Sessions' office said last week that Pryor is under consideration for the 11th Circuit seat that Steele had been nominated for. Neither Wall nor a White House spokeswoman had any comment Tuesday.

'State of State'
Reinforcing education a priority
Gov. Ronnie Musgrove gives his fourth "State of the State" address today * and it could be full of surprises.

Priorities

Gov. Ronnie Musgrove could and should hearken back to his inauguration theme of wanting to be the "education governor," with innovative ways to fully fund K-12 and higher education.

Since this is an election year, it could be a preview of his re-election bid.
It's hard to predict what Musgrove will say. However, it is safe to say that it will be dominated * or overshadowed * by budget concerns.
The state's dire financial situation, which by the way is not unlike other states, will be the defining theme of the 2003 session. But it should not be an excuse for a do-nothing session, which the Legislature will be inclined to do.
This is where clear leadership from the governor's office is needed. There should be bold approaches to budget reductions and creative ideas for revenue enhancements.
Musgrove most likely will stress his approach at setting budget priorities, which he should. But his guide in this should hearken back to his inauguration theme.
Three years ago, Musgrove said he wanted to be the "education governor," and outlined ideas, including raising teacher pay and adequately funding schools. Those basic themes need reinforcing today.
As in the past, he could offer creative ways to fund his public education proposals, but they should be:
Fully funding the teacher pay raises approved in 2000;
Fully funding the Minimum Foundation Program for districts' operations, and the Adequate Education Program, designed to help equalize funding in poorer districts;

Giving greater support for higher education.
We can expect Musgrove to point to his successes over the past three years, including landing the Nissan auto plant providing thousands of jobs.
It would be surprising if Musgrove didn't use this opportunity as his first major speech this election year touting his achievements and pointing to what he would hope to accomplish in 2003 and beyond.
Getting through these difficult budget times without further harm to education is not politically sexy, but it is the priority.
Pickering
Judge's own merits are the issue
As fully qualified as U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering is to serve on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, President Bush renominating him for the post could become a divisive racial debate in the U.S. Senate.
That would be unfair to Pickering and to Mississippi.
Perhaps, with a GOP Senate majority, Bush believes the nomination can be eased through quickly. But Democrats must be salivating at the chance to pillory the nomination based on the fact that he is the choice of U.S. Sen. Trent Lott, who is vulnerable on the race issue.
Pickering is a competent and qualified jurist with a record of racial fairness. He didn't deserve the hatchet job he endured last spring.
Pickering should be judged on his merits, not Lott or the perceived weaknesses of the GOP on matters of race.
The selection of federal court judges has turned into a nasty, partisan affair * Democratic and Republican * that has nothing to do with the nominees. The Senate should get back to judging judges objectively.
Pickering didn't get a fair shot last time.

Fitzgerald recommends Samuel Der-Yeghiayan and Mark Filip for vacancies on U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois

CHICAGO, IL...U.S. Senator Peter G. Fitzgerald (R-Illinois) announced today that he will recommend that President Bush nominate Samuel Der-Yeghiayan of Vernon Hills, Illinois, and Mark Filip of Winnetka, Illinois, to fill vacancies on the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. The vacancies occurred upon Judge Harry D. Leinenweber and Chief Judge Marvin E. Aspen assuming senior status in June and July, 2002, respectively. Judge Leinenweber has presided on the court since 1986, and Judge Aspen since 1979.

"I reviewed a substantial number of applications for the vacancies on the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois," said Fitzgerald. "Judge Samuel Der-Yeghiayan has more than 20 years of significant experience in the federal judicial system and Mark Filip stood out for his unique combination of stellar academic and professional credentials. I am confident that, if they are nominated by President Bush and confirmed by the U.S. Senate, both men will serve as fair and competent additions to the court."

Judge Samuel Der-Yeghiayan

Samuel Der-Yeghiayan was appointed in 1978 as a Trial Attorney for the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) in Chicago, Illinois. Four years later, Der-Yeghiayan was promoted to the position of District Counsel for the INS Chicago District with jurisdiction over the states of Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin. From 1982 to 2000, he managed one of the largest INS Legal Proceedings programs in the nation and supervised a staff of over 20 government attorneys, including Special Assistant United States Attorneys.

During his tenure with the INS, he served as part of the government team litigating cases in both the U.S. District Courts and the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. Since his 2000 appointment to the U.S. Immigration Court in Chicago, Der-Yeghiayan has carried one of the heaviest caseloads in the Immigration Court system. For 20 consecutive years, from 1981 to 2000, he received Outstanding Performance Ratings from the Attorney General of the United States as a U.S. Justice Department Attorney.

From 1992 to 1993, Filip served as a law clerk for Stephen F. Williams of the United States Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit in Washington, D.C. From 1993 to 1994, Filip served as a law clerk for Antonin Scalia, United States Supreme Court.

After working as a litigation associate at Kirkland & Ellis in Chicago from 1994 to 1995, Filip joined the United States Attorney's Office in Chicago, where he served as an Assistant United States Attorney in the Criminal Division. As an Assistant U.S. Attorney, he prosecuted a wide variety of cases in the trial courts and on appeal – including matters such as racketeering; tax offenses; international heroin trafficking; violent and gang-related crime; health care and other white collar frauds; and public corruption. Filip tried the case of United States v. James Washington (95 CR 302), which was the first case in which the U.S. Attorney's Office in Chicago invoked the federal "Three Strikes" mandatory life sentencing statue. He was one of the investigating and trial attorneys in United States v. Edward Jackson, et al. (96 CR 815), in which seven corrupt police officers from Chicago's Austin District were convicted of various offenses, including racketeering and narcotics dealing.

Filip also represented the United States in a number of cases before the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in Chicago. These cases included United States v. Thomas Maloney, 71 F.3d 645 (7th Cir. 1995) (affirming the racketeering conviction of a state court judge convicted of taking bribes in murder cases); United States v. Palumbo Brothers Inc., et al., 145 F.3d 850 (7th Cir. 1998) (reversing district court order dismissing much of the racketeering indictment on grounds of labor law preemption); and United States v. Jesse Evans, 192 F.3d 698 (7th Cir. 1999) (affirming the conviction of former Chicago alderman convicted of bribe-taking).

While a federal prosecutor, Filip received the U.S. Department of Justice Director's Award for Superior Performance as an Assistant United States Attorney.

Filip joined the Chicago office of Skadden, Arps, Meagher & Flom, in 1999 as an associate in the litigation department. He was named partner in 2001. Filip's work has focused on federal litigation, and he has represented clients in complex civil litigation matters, both in the trial and appellate courts.

Filip has served as an adjunct professor at the Northwestern University School of Law and currently serves as a lecturer in law at the University of Chicago Law School.

Filip lives in Winnetka, Illinois, with his wife Beth. Mark and Beth have four sons – Matthew (6), Charlie (4), Tommy (2), and Joseph (8 months).

Dear Mr. Cooney,

This is Michael Judge at the WSJ editorial page. We'd like to run you're piece in Bob Bartley's Thinking Things Over slot next Monday, since Bob is on vacation. We feel, however, that it needs to be updated to address

the current flap over Charles Pickering and probably lede with that, since a fillibuster is highly likely. Also, if you could, please trim the piece down to 950 words, as that's, unfortunately, all the space we have. If you could file by close of business today that would be grand, otherwise Friday is fine. Thank you again for an excellent piece, and I look forward to seeing the new version.

Cheers, MJ

If given the chance, a majority of Senators will probably vote to confirm federal appeals court nominee Judge Charles Pickering. Knowing this, opponents of his nomination are now threatening a filibuster on the floor of the Senate. Were such a filibuster to occur, it would be a virtually unprecedented escalation in the battle over judges.

Regardless of whether one supports or opposes the Pickering nomination, the filibuster threat is further proof that our current judicial confirmation system has become what President Bush calls an "endless cycle of blame and bitterness." It is a process where merit and fairness too often take a back seat to the political and financial interests of political interest groups and where a nominee's confirmability is measured less by his or her character, ability, and temperament than by political factors beyond his or her control.

The "endless cycle" has been well-documented: nominees are mistreated, votes are delayed, interest groups raise money, hearings are denied, federal judgeships sit empty, the quality of justice in America is endangered. Recriminations between Presidents (both Democrat and Republican) and the Senate (both Democrat- and Republican-controlled) fly furiously up and down Pennsylvania Avenue.

In his annual report on the state of the federal judiciary, Chief Justice Rehnquist again called on the political branches of government to fix the confirmation problem. Americans share the Chief Justice's concerns. When merit and a fair application of the rules do not control, our shared ideals are offended. We hate the polarized and poisonous atmosphere. We think that it is unfair that nominees and their families are left in limbo. We think that it is wrong that good people are discouraged from serving as judges. We want a more dignified process.

Several weeks ago, President Bush proposed a "clean start" that would restore fairness and dignity to the judicial confirmation process. He proposed specific timetables designed to streamline the confirmation process:

- First, he asked judges to notify the President of their intended retirement dates at least a year in advance, whenever possible.
- Second, he committed to submit a nomination to the Senate within six months of receiving notice of a federal court vacancy or intended retirement.
- Third, he called on the Senate Judiciary Committee to hold a hearing within three months of receiving a nomination.
- Fourth, he called on the full Senate to hold an up-or-down vote within six months of receiving a nomination.

These are sound, overdue procedural reforms that build upon the recommendations of several bipartisan study commissions. President Bush and Senator Orrin Hatch, who returns this year as Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, can largely implement them simply by working closely together in the coming months. But for these reforms to be enduring, for them to apply now and in the future, no matter who lives in the White House and who controls the Senate, some modifications are in order.

First, each branch of government should incorporate these reforms in its own rules. For the Senate, this would mean establishing a new Senate rule requiring that every nominee be given a hearing within three months and a vote on the floor within six months. Once established by Senate rule, it will matter less who lives in the White House and who controls the Senate and matter more who the nominee is and what his or her qualifications are. Similarly, the President should issue an Executive Order requiring that he and future Presidents make a nomination within six months of learning of a vacancy. The federal judiciary already has a policy that judges should give advance notice if they are going to retire but should make clear that one year advance notice is necessary to ensure a seamless transition.

Second, the reforms should acknowledge and incorporate the long-standing tradition of Senatorial courtesy. This tradition dictates that the President, before making a nomination, consult with home-State Senators, the theory being that Senators should have some influence over who is named to a court located within their State. So, where the President has failed to consult with home-State Senators over appointments to the federal district court (or courts) located within their State, the Senate rules would not bind the Senate to hold a hearing within three months and a vote within six months.

Third, the filibustering of judicial nominees should be prohibited. As noted above, the political left increasingly is arguing that a super-majority should be required to confirm a judge. This argument is the fruit of a broken system. The Senate can rise to the President's challenge to help fix the broken system by amending the Rules of the Senate to prohibit the filibustering of judicial nominations. Precedents for restricting filibusters on issues of national importance exist, such as the Senate's rule limiting debate over budget reconciliation measures.

For those Americans who want to see a more dignified process, they should encourage Senate Republicans to initiate the consideration of changes to the Senate Rules. President Bush's proposal, if made enforceable in the manner described above, will go a long way towards fixing the broken judicial confirmation system without depriving the public of its right to weigh in. It would enable Presidents to recruit high-caliber jurists, it would allow all Senators to be consulted, and it would help ensure that the federal courts are fully staffed to protect our rights and liberties.

Letter from Charles Harrison, first African American hired in Laurel Miss police department:

"County Attorney Charles Pickering worked with the FBI to investigate and prosecute violent KKK members, and even testified against the Imperial Wizard of the KKK, Sam Bowers. He put his, his wife's, and his children's lives at risk by doing this. If any person would have mentioned union activity to me that affected Jones County, I would have asked about it, too, as would anyone who knew the violent history of unions at the Masonite plant. That would have nothing to do with segregation. It would have had to do with protecting people, black and white, from violence. In the end, the Sovereignty Commission allegations only prove that Charles Pickering fought against the Klan and for the people of Jones County."

Here's the updated story -

Missouri Democrats seek renomination of Ronnie White
LIBBY QUAID
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) _ In an apparent attempt to press the issue of race, two Missouri Democrats are asking President Bush to renominate the black judge who was the key witness for the opposition during Attorney General John Ashcroft's confirmation hearings.
Reps. Dick Gephardt and William Lacy Clay asked the president to appoint Missouri Supreme Court Judge Ronnie White to the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which will have a vacancy in April.
White, first nominated in 1997, was the first nominee since conservative jurist Robert Bork in 1987 to suffer defeat on the floor of the Senate, and the first district court nominee so defeated in four decades.
Ashcroft, then a Missouri senator seeking re-election, called White ``pro-criminal'' because of his votes to overturn death penalty sentences.
Today, Democrats are threatening to filibuster a controversial Bush nominee, Charles Pickering of Mississippi, whose nomination they blocked last year after civil rights groups questioned his race-relations record.
Democrats have appeared eager to return to the subject since Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., a friend of Pickering's, sparked a firestorm last month after speaking warmly of the segregationist presidential campaign that former Sen. Strom Thurmond ran in 1948.
``In light of this and your party's efforts to repair its image on race relations, we urge you to reconsider Judge White's nomination to the federal bench,'' Gephardt and Clay wrote in a letter they released Friday.
``Such action would be entirely consistent with your stated goal of realizing the promise of America for all our citizens, regardless of race.''

Gephardt is among several Democrats exploring a presidential campaign in 2004.
During Ashcroft's confirmation hearings, White testified that Ashcroft ``seriously distorted my record.'' He added, ``The question for the Senate is whether these misrepresentations are consistent with the fair play and justice you all would require of the U.S. attorney general.''
Bush refused to consider a previous request from Gephardt to renominate White. For the 8th Circuit vacancy, created by an Iowa judge's retirement, the president is expected to nominate U.S. Attorney Steve Colloton of Iowa, according to the Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa.
Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, considers White's nomination dealt with already. Hatch's panel controls judicial nominations.
``Judge White, under Sen. Hatch's leadership, was afforded the respect of a vote by the full Senate,'' said the spokeswoman, Margarita Tapia. ``Judge Pickering, in contrast, was denied the opportunity of a full Senate vote by the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee.''
On Friday, White issued a statement saying he is ``humbled'' by the recommendation from Gephardt and Clay.
``I am interested in participating in this process, and I am honored to be considered for this judicial position,'' said White, who will be elevated to chief justice of the Missouri Supreme Court on July 1.
White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said: ``We are aware of the upcoming vacancy in the 8th circuit, and we are working to fill it.''

HEADLINE: Senate confirms Clifton to 9th Circuit

BYLINE: SUSAN ROTH; Gannett News Service

BODY:
WASHINGTON -- Honolulu attorney Richard Clifton's long road to the bench of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ended Thursday evening with unanimous Senate approval of his nomination.

Nearly 13 months after President Bush nominated him, Clifton celebrated the 98-0 Senate vote with a sense of perspective on the long process and no animosity toward Hawaii's senators, who at first blocked his appointment.

"It's been a while, but it's worth it," said Clifton, 51, who watched the Senate vote on C-SPAN with colleagues at Cades Schutte Fleming & Wright. "I could always have climbed off the path, but I never did, because it's such a great honor and opportunity that it's worth waiting for. Now, I'm ready to go."

Clifton, who was the Hawaii Republican Party's attorney until he was named by Bush, said he had faith that once the senators learned more about him, they would be satisfied that he was qualified for the lifetime appointment, though he conceded that "communications may not have been the greatest at the beginning."

Sens. Dan Inouye and Daniel Akaka, both Democrats, blocked the appointment until February because they were angry that the White House did not consult them during the selection process. Both had backed the 1999 appointment by President Clinton of Honolulu attorney James Duffy, whose nomination was never approved by the then-Republican-controlled Senate.

Clifton said the senators "are both statesmen who are not motivated primarily by partisan bickering. ... It's a peculiar process, a political process. So while the process took a little longer and had a few more bumps than I might have wished, we live with the bumps and take the long view. Their names are certainly high on the list of those I will be thanking for this opportunity."

Inouye did not issue a statement upon approval of the nomination, but Akaka noted that Hawaii had waited many years for Senate confirmation of a Hawaii resident to the court of appeals. A 1995 bill by Akaka required representation on the court from each state in the circuit.

"Rick Clifton has had a distinguished legal career," Akaka said in a statement submitted to the Senate. "I believe he will be an asset to the Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, and urge my colleagues to support his nomination.

"Mr. Clifton's confirmation concludes a long and regrettable saga in confirming a qualified nominee from Hawaii," Akaka said, referring to Duffy, whose nomination "languished for 791 days in the Judiciary Committee without ever receiving a hearing." The confirmation vote attests to the fairness of the Senate Democratic leadership, Akaka said.

Clifton said he planned to ask Senior Circuit Court Judge Herbert Y.C. Choy of Hawaii to swear him in to the position in the coming weeks. After Clifton graduated from Yale Law School, he served as a law clerk for Choy, who is the last judge from Hawaii appointed to the circuit.

Senate staff said lawmakers had not yet completed the review process on the nomination of Honolulu attorney Frederick W. "Fritz" Rohlfing III for federal district judge, though both Hawaii senators are expected to OK the nomination.

The San Francisco-based 9th circuit hears cases from Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Washington state and Guam.

Kathy,

Brett handles the rules on allocating and accounting for trips between political and official when it is a mixed trip so I will leave it to his judgment. I get involved when an outside group is actually furnishing the tickets/meals/hotel and a "Travel Expense from Outside Source" form is needed. For the Lincoln Club of Northern California, the bylaws they sent are helpful, but I would also note their website states:

The Lincoln Club of Northern California is the preeminent organization of Republican business and community leaders in the greater Bay Area, with membership from Monterey to Sacramento.;

; ; Its primary purpose is to identify, recruit, and elect quality Republican candidates to federal, state and local office.; Through the caliber of its members and the success of their efforts, The Lincoln Club has gained high respect and a reputation for strong leadership among Republican office holders and the public.

Ruben will be traveling to California for three speeches. Two of the organization's have political affilations that may me wonder if I should have them cover a portion of the expenses. The Lincoln Club of Northern California sent me a brief overview of their organization including tax status. Could you clarify if this would be approved official travel? Under a separate email I will forward background on the New Majority (another group with political leanings) they would like Ruben to address a luncheon in Orange County. If not sanctioned as official travel, I would like to split the ticket between official and political.

Tentative Schedule
DEP Washington en route to San Francisco
Address Lincoln Club
DEP San Francisco to John Wayne Airport
Address New Majority in Orange County
DEP Orange County en route to Los Angeles
Address CA State Legislators at event sponsored by UCLA School of Government
DEP Los Angeles en route to Washington

Thanks,
Kathy

RULE OF LAW

Bringing Reason
To the Battle Over Judges

By MANUS COONEY

If given the chance, a majority of senators will probably vote to confirm federal appeals court nominee Judge Charles Pickering. Knowing this, opponents of his nomination are now threatening a filibuster on the floor of the Senate. Were such a filibuster to occur, it would be a virtually unprecedented escalation in the battle over judges.

Regardless of whether one supports or opposes the Pickering nomination, the filibuster threat is further proof that our current judicial confirmation system has become what President Bush calls an "endless cycle of blame and bitterness." It is a process where merit and fairness too often take a back seat to the political and financial interests of political interest groups and where a nominee's confirmability is measured less by his or her character, ability, and temperament than by political factors beyond his or her control.

The "endless cycle" has been well documented: nominees are mistreated, votes are delayed, interest groups raise money, hearings are denied, federal judgeships sit empty, the quality of justice in America is endangered. Recriminations between presidents (both Democrat and Republican) and the Senate (both Democrat- and Republican-controlled) fly furiously up and down Pennsylvania Avenue.

In his annual report on the state of the federal judiciary, Chief Justice Rehnquist again called on the political branches of government to fix the confirmation problem. Americans share the chief justice's concerns. When merit and a fair application of the rules do not win out, our shared ideals are offended. We hate the polarized and poisonous atmosphere. We think that it is unfair that nominees and their families are left in limbo. We think that it is wrong that good people are discouraged from serving as judges. We want a more dignified process.

Several weeks ago, President Bush proposed a "clean start" that would restore fairness and dignity to the judicial confirmation process. He proposed specific timetables designed to streamline the confirmation process:

* First, he asked judges to notify the president of their intended retirement dates at least a year in advance, whenever possible.

* Second, he committed to submit a nomination to the Senate within six months of receiving notice of a federal court vacancy or intended retirement.

* Third, he called on the Senate Judiciary Committee to hold a hearing within three months of receiving a nomination.

* Fourth, he called on the full Senate to hold an up-or-down vote within six months of receiving a nomination.

These are sound, overdue procedural reforms that build upon the recommendations of several bipartisan study commissions. President Bush and Sen. Orrin Hatch, who returns this year as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, can largely implement them simply by working closely together in the coming months. But for these reforms to be enduring, for them to apply now and in the future, no matter who lives in the White House and who controls the Senate, some modifications are in order.

First, each branch of government should incorporate these reforms in its own rules. For the Senate, this would mean establishing a new Senate rule requiring that every nominee be given a hearing within three months and a vote on the floor within six months. Once established by Senate rule, it will matter less who lives in the White House and who controls the Senate and matter more who the nominee is and what his or her qualifications are. Similarly, the president should issue an executive order requiring that he and future presidents make a nomination within six months of learning of a vacancy. The federal judiciary already has a policy that judges should give advance notice if they are going to retire but should make clear that one year advance notice is necessary to ensure a seamless transition.

Second, the reforms should acknowledge and incorporate the long-standing tradition of senatorial courtesy. This tradition dictates that the president, before making a nomination, consult with home-state senators, the theory being that senators should have some influence over who is named to a court located within their state. So, where the president has failed to consult with home-state senators over appointments to the federal district court (or courts) located within their state, the Senate rules would not bind the Senate to hold a hearing within three months and a vote within six months.

Third, the filibustering of judicial nominees should be prohibited. As noted above, the political left increasingly is arguing that a super-majority should be required to confirm a judge. This argument is the fruit of a broken system. The Senate can rise to the president's challenge to help fix the broken system by amending the rules of the Senate to prohibit the filibustering of judicial nominations. Precedents for restricting filibusters on issues of national importance exist, such as the Senate's rule limiting debate over budget reconciliation measures.

For those Americans who want to see a more dignified process, they should encourage Senate Republicans to initiate the consideration of changes to the Senate rules. President Bush's proposal, if made enforceable in the manner described above, will go a long way towards fixing the broken judicial confirmation system without depriving the public of its right to weigh in. It would enable presidents to recruit high-caliber jurists, it would allow all senators to be consulted, and it would help ensure that the federal courts are fully staffed to protect our rights and liberties.

Brett,
We came up with the idea of having some Spanish classes held somewhere on the WH complex that would be open to WH staff and wanted to run the following questions by you? Please also let me know if there is another WH counsel this should be run by as well.

1. Generally, is the concept of having Spanish classes held on the WH complex (perhaps in the EEOB) ok?

2. Would it be ok for an outside group to sponsor the classes, to defer the costs for the WH staff?

Thanks for your thoughts and guidance.

RULE OF LAW

Bringing Reason
To the Battle Over Judges

By MANUS COONEY

If given the chance, a majority of senators will probably vote to confirm federal appeals court nominee Judge Charles Pickering. Knowing this, opponents of his nomination are now threatening a filibuster on the floor of the Senate. Were such a filibuster to occur, it would be a virtually unprecedented escalation in the battle over judges.

Regardless of whether one supports or opposes the Pickering nomination, the filibuster threat is further proof that our current judicial confirmation system has become what President Bush calls an "endless cycle of blame and bitterness." It is a process where merit and fairness too often take a back seat to the political and financial interests of political interest groups and where a nominee's confirmability is measured less by his or her character, ability, and temperament than by political factors beyond his or her control.

The "endless cycle" has been well documented: nominees are mistreated, votes are delayed, interest groups raise money, hearings are denied, federal judgeships sit empty, the quality of justice in America is endangered. Recriminations between presidents (both Democrat and Republican) and the Senate (both Democrat- and Republican-controlled) fly furiously up and down Pennsylvania Avenue.

In his annual report on the state of the federal judiciary, Chief Justice Rehnquist again called on the political branches of government to fix the confirmation problem. Americans share the chief justice's concerns. When merit and a fair application of the rules do not win out, our shared ideals are offended. We hate the polarized and poisonous atmosphere. We think that it is unfair that nominees and their families are left in limbo. We think that it is wrong that good people are discouraged from serving as judges. We want a more dignified process.

Several weeks ago, President Bush proposed a "clean start" that would restore fairness and dignity to the judicial confirmation process. He proposed specific timetables designed to streamline the confirmation process:

* First, he asked judges to notify the president of their intended retirement dates at least a year in advance, whenever possible.

* Second, he committed to submit a nomination to the Senate within six months of receiving notice of a federal court vacancy or intended retirement.

* Third, he called on the Senate Judiciary Committee to hold a hearing within three months of receiving a nomination.

* Fourth, he called on the full Senate to hold an up-or-down vote within six months of receiving a nomination.

These are sound, overdue procedural reforms that build upon the recommendations of several bipartisan study commissions. President Bush and Sen. Orrin Hatch, who returns this year as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, can largely implement them simply by working closely together in the coming months. But for these reforms to be enduring, for them to apply now and in the future, no matter who lives in the White House and who controls the Senate, some modifications are in order.

First, each branch of government should incorporate these reforms in its own rules. For the Senate, this would mean establishing a new Senate rule requiring that every nominee be given a hearing within three months and a vote on the floor within six months. This argument is the fruit of a broken system. The Senate can rise to the president's challenge to help fix the broken system by amending the rules of the Senate to prohibit the filibustering of judicial nominations. Precedents for restricting filibusters on issues of national importance exist, such as the Senate's rule limiting debate over budget reconciliation measures.

For those Americans who want to see a more dignified process, they should encourage Senate Republicans to initiate the consideration of changes to the Senate rules. President Bush's proposal, if made enforceable in the manner described above, will go a long way towards fixing the broken judicial confirmation system without depriving the public of its right to weigh in. It would enable presidents to recruit high-caliber jurists, it would allow all senators to be consulted, and it would help ensure that the federal courts are fully staffed to protect our rights and liberties.

RULE OF LAW

Bringing Reason

By MANUS COONEY

If given the chance, a majority of senators will probably vote to confirm federal appeals court nominee Judge Charles Pickering. Knowing this, opponents of his nomination are now threatening a filibuster on the floor of the Senate. Were such a filibuster to occur, it would be a virtually unprecedented escalation in the battle over judges.

Regardless of whether one supports or opposes the Pickering nomination, the filibuster threat is further proof that our current judicial confirmation system has become what President Bush calls an "endless cycle of blame and bitterness." It is a process where merit and fairness too often take a back seat to the political and financial interests of political interest groups and where a nominee's confirmability is measured less by his or her character, ability, and temperament than by political factors beyond his or her control.

The "endless cycle" has been well documented: nominees are mistreated, votes are delayed, interest groups raise money, hearings are denied, federal judgeships sit empty, the quality of justice in America is endangered. Recriminations between presidents (both Democrat and Republican) and the Senate (both Democrat- and Republican-controlled) fly furiously up and down Pennsylvania Avenue.

In his annual report on the state of the federal judiciary, Chief Justice Rehnquist again called on the political branches of government to fix the confirmation problem. Americans share the chief justice's concerns. When merit and a fair application of the rules do not win out, our shared ideals are offended. We hate the polarized and poisonous atmosphere. We think that it is unfair that nominees and their families are left in limbo. We think that it is wrong that good people are discouraged from serving as judges. We want a more dignified process.

Several weeks ago, President Bush proposed a "clean start" that would restore fairness and dignity to the judicial confirmation process. He proposed specific timetables designed to streamline the confirmation process:

* First, he asked judges to notify the president of their intended retirement dates at least a year in advance, whenever possible.

* Second, he committed to submit a nomination to the Senate within six months of receiving notice of a federal court vacancy or intended retirement.

* Third, he called on the Senate Judiciary Committee to hold a hearing within three months of receiving a nomination.

* Fourth, he called on the full Senate to hold an up-or-down vote within six months of receiving a nomination.

These are sound, overdue procedural reforms that build upon the recommendations of several bipartisan study commissions. President Bush and Sen. Orrin Hatch, who returns this year as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, can largely implement them simply by working closely together in the coming months. But for these reforms to be enduring, for them to apply now and in the future, no matter who lives in the White House and who controls the Senate, some modifications are in order.

First, each branch of government should incorporate these reforms in its own rules. For the Senate, this would mean establishing a new Senate rule requiring that every nominee be given a hearing within three months and a vote on the floor within six months. Once established by Senate rule, it will matter less who lives in the White House and who controls the Senate and matter more who the nominee is and what his or her qualifications are. Similarly, the president should issue an executive order requiring that he and future presidents make a nomination within six months of learning of a vacancy. The federal judiciary already has a policy that judges should give advance notice if they are going to retire but should make clear that one year advance notice is necessary to ensure a seamless transition.

Second, the reforms should acknowledge and incorporate the long-standing tradition of senatorial courtesy. This tradition dictates that the president, before making a nomination, consult with home-state senators, the theory being that senators should have some influence over who is named to a court located within their state. So, where the president has failed to consult with home-state senators over appointments to the federal district court (or courts) located within their state, the Senate rules would not bind the Senate to hold a hearing within three months and a vote within six months.

Third, the filibustering of judicial nominees should be prohibited. As noted above, the political left increasingly is arguing that a super-majority should be required to confirm a judge. This argument is the fruit of a broken system. The Senate can rise to the president's challenge to help fix the broken system by amending the rules of the Senate to prohibit the filibustering of judicial nominations. Precedents for restricting filibusters on issues of national importance exist, such as the Senate's rule limiting debate over budget reconciliation measures.

For those Americans who want to see a more dignified process, they should encourage Senate Republicans to initiate the consideration of changes to the Senate rules. President Bush's proposal, if made enforceable in the manner described above, will go a long way towards fixing the broken judicial confirmation system without depriving the public of its right to weigh in. Brett:

As you may know, I chair an annual event called Mark's Run.

It's a 5-kilometer race held in honor of my friend Mark Ferris, who died two years ago from Juvenile Diabetes. The proceeds from the Run are divided between the juvenile diabetes foundation and a landon school scholarship fund in Mark;'s name. Last year the event raised drew 400 runners and raised $70,000 ($35K went to each organization).

I'm helping put together the run again this year, and Ken offered to host a dinner at his house to help raise some funds.
What are the rules that might be associated with such an event?
- Can ken do this?
- if so, can we use our personal emails (definitely NOT gov't, of course) to invite friends?
- if not, can he attend a dinner at someone else's house?

thanks for helping with this - we're grateful!

Brett,

Do you have the Bob Conrad publications, in particular the abortion article from the Charlotte Observer in 1988 -- I couldn't track them down

For those interested in Law, The Supreme Court, Viet Dinh...or just history... here's an interesting read.

The Honorable Viet D. Dinh, U.S. Assistant Attorney General, will make his first oral argument before the Supreme Court tomorrow, January 15, 2003...

I believe this is the first time ever that a Vietnamese American makes an oral argument before the Supreme Court.

Subject of Clinton pardon arrested on tax evasion charge
By The Associated Press

MIAMI - A California businessman pardoned by former President Clinton for a 1983 fraud conviction involving a hair-growth product has been arrested on tax evasion charges, authorities said Tuesday.

Internal Revenue Service agents took Almon Glenn Braswell into custody Monday, and he was scheduled for an initial court appearance before a federal magistrate Tuesday afternoon.

Braswell, 59, was indicted by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles last year. The charges were sealed until the court hearing.

It was not immediately known whether Braswell had an attorney in Miami to represent him. Since the charges originated in California, he would be subject to federal removal, which is similar to state extradition.

Clinton granted 177 pardons and clemencies just before leaving office in 2001. Braswell's pardon became one of the most criticized after it was learned the president's brother-in-law had been paid $200,000 for working on the case. Hugh Rodham later returned the money.

Braswell was a target of federal investigators when he asserted his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination at a hearing of the Senate Special Committee on Aging examining his dietary supplement business in September 2001.

Braswell's companies, including Gero Vita International, market Prostata for prostate health, Testerex for sexual vitality and Serezac for depression. Former CFO Michael O'Neil has said Braswell's advertising was deceptive for products that fail to deliver the promised results.

The mail-order business lists a return address in Toronto, Canada, but company employees are based in Marina Del Rey, Calif.

Braswell, then a Miami businessman, was pardoned by Clinton for his fraud conviction stemming from false claims in 1983 about a baldness treatment.

In the programs under review by the Supreme Court, the University of Michigan has established an admissions process based on race.; At the undergraduate level, African American students, some Hispanic students, and American Indian students receive 20 points out of a maximum of 150 not because of any academic achievement or life experience, but solely because they are African American, Hispanic or Native American.; To put this in perspective, a perfect SAT score is worth only 12 points under the Michigan system.; Students who accumulate 100 points are generally admitted, and so those twenty points awarded solely based on race are often the decisive factor.; At the law school, some minority students are admitted to meet percentage targets, while other applicants with higher grades and better scores are passed over.; This means that students are being selected or rejected based primarily on the color of their skin.; The motivation for such an admissions policy may be very good, but its result is discrimination, and that discrimination is wrong.;;

9. CREDIT AND INSURANCE

Federal credit programs offer direct loans and loan guarantees for a wide range of activities, primarily housing, education, business and rural development, and exports. At the end of 2002, there were $xxx billion in Federal direct loans outstanding and $x,xxx billion in loan guarantees. Through its insurance programs, the Federal Government insures bank, thrift, and credit union deposits, guarantees private defined-benefit pensions, and insures against other risks such as natural disasters, all up to certain limits.

The Federal Government also enhances credit availability for targeted sectors indirectly through Government-sponsored enterprises (GSEs)—privately owned companies and cooperatives that operate under Federal charters. GSEs provide direct loans and increase liquidity by guaranteeing and securitizing loans. Some GSEs have become major players in the financial market. In 2002, the face value of GSE lending totaled $x.x trillion. In return for serving social purposes, GSEs enjoy many privileges, which differ across GSEs. In general, GSEs can borrow from Treasury in amounts ranging up to $4 billion at Treasury's discretion, GSEs' corporate earnings are exempt from state and local income taxation, GSE securities are exempt from SEC registration, and banks and thrifts are allowed to hold GSE securities in unlimited amounts and use them to collateralize public deposits. These privileges leave many people with the impression that their securities are risk-free. GSEs, however, are not part of the Federal Government, and their securities are not federally guaranteed. By law, the GSEs' securities carry a disclaimer of any U.S. obligation.

The role and risk of these diverse programs critically depend on the state of financial markets. In recent years, financial markets have been changing fast because of rapid technological advances and active deregulation. The Federal Government, therefore, needs to closely monitor financial market developments and keep adapting the extent and nature of credit and insurance programs to changing environments.

The rest of this chapter is organized as follows.

- The first section analyzes the role of Federal credit and insurance programs. Federal programs play useful roles when market imperfections prevent the private market from efficiently providing credit and insurance. Financial evolution has partly corrected many imperfections and generally weakened the justification for Federal intervention. The role of Federal programs, however, may still be critical in some areas.
- The second section identifies four key criteria for evaluating Federal programs: objectives, economic justification, availability of alternative means, and efficiency. Recognizing that improving efficiency is a continual concern, this section pays particular attention to it, including discussion of asset management.
- The third section reviews Federal credit programs and GSEs in four sectors: housing, education, business and community development, and exports. This section discusses program objectives, recent developments, and future plans for each program.
- The final section describes Federal deposit insurance, pension guarantees, disaster insurance, and insurance against terrorism and other security-related risks in a context similar to that for credit programs.

I. FEDERAL PROGRAMS IN CHANGING FINANCIAL MARKETS

The Federal Role

The roles of Federal credit and insurance programs can be broadly classified into two categories: helping disadvantaged groups and correcting market failures. Subsidized Federal credit programs redistribute resources from the general taxpayer to disadvantaged regions or segments of the population. Since disadvantaged groups can be assisted through other means, such as direct subsidies, the value of a credit or insurance program critically depends on the extent to which it corrects market failures.

In most cases, private lending and insurance businesses efficiently meet societal demands by allocating resources to the most productive uses, and Federal intervention is unnecessary or can even be distortionary. However, Federal intervention may improve the market outcome in some situations. The market imperfections that justify some Federal involvement are the following.

- Information opaqueness interferes with the optimal allocation of capital. In most cases, financial intermediaries efficiently gather and process information needed to evaluate the creditworthiness of borrowers. However, there may be little objective information about some groups of borrowers such as start-up businesses, start-up farmers, and students, who have limited incomes and credit histories. Because it is difficult for those borrowers to prove their creditworthiness to a large number of lenders, they must rely on the subjective judgements of a few lenders. In this situation, many creditworthy borrowers may fail to obtain credit.

Even for borrowers who are approved for credit, insufficient competition can result in higher interest rates. Government intervention, such as loan guarantees, enable these groups of borrowers to obtain credit more easily and cheaply and provides an opportunity for the lender to become more comfortable with that group of borrowers. Similarly, the private sector efficiently insures against various risks. Insurance companies estimate the expected loss based on probabilities of loss-generating events and charge adequate premiums. Private insurers, however, are reluctant to insure against an event for which they cannot reasonably estimate the probability and the magnitude of loss. Without these estimates, they cannot adequately set the premium. Terrorism emerged as one of these cases after the September 11 attacks. The loss from terrorism is highly unpredictable and can turn out to be enormous. In this case, Government intervention limiting uncertainties for the private sector is necessary to ensure the provision of insurance, until the private sector understands the particular risk better.

- Externalities cause either underinvestment or overinvestment in some sectors. Decisions at the individual level are not socially optimal when individuals do not capture the full benefit (positive externalities) or bear the full cost (negative externalities) of their activities. Examples of positive and negative externalities are education and pollution. The general public benefits from high productivity and good citizenship of a well-educated person and suffers from pollution. Without Government intervention, people will invest less than the socially optimal amount in activities that generate positive externalities and more in activities that generate negative externalities. The Federal Government can encourage those activities that produce positive externalities or reduce negative externalities by offering subsidized credit or other rewards such as tax benefits, while discouraging activities producing negative externalities by imposing taxes or other penalties.
- Resource constraints sometimes limit the private sector's ability to offer certain products. Deposit insurance is one example. Since the performance of banks is often affected by common factors such as macroeconomic conditions, bank failures tend to be clustered in bad economic times. Furthermore, if depositors become doubtful about the soundness of the banking system as a whole upon observing a large number of failures, they may rush to withdraw deposits, forcing even sound banks into liquidation. To prevent these undesirable withdrawals, which would harm the whole economy, deposit insurance needs to be backed by a sufficient fund to resolve a very large number of failures. It may be difficult for private insurers to secure such a large fund. Some catastrophic events can also threaten the solvency of private insurers. For some events involving a very large loss concentrated in a short time period, therefore, Government insurance commanding more resources can be more credible and effective.
- Imperfect competition justifies some Government intervention. Competition is imperfect in some markets because of barriers to entry, economies of scale, and foreign government intervention. For example, legal barriers to entry or geographic isolation can cause imperfect competition in some rural areas. If the lack of competition forces some rural residents to pay excessively high interest on loans, Government lending programs aiming to increase the availability of credit and lower the borrowing cost for those rural residents may improve economic efficiency.

Changing Financial Markets

Financial markets have undergone fundamental changes that continue to alter their long-term trend. The main forces behind these changes are financial services deregulation and technological advances, which have promoted competition and economic efficiency. Deregulation has promoted consolidation by removing legal barriers to business combinations. By increasing the availability of information and lowering transaction costs, technological advances have significantly contributed to enhancing liquidity, refining risk management tools, and spurring globalization. Interacting with these developments, however, have been some unsettling events, such as the ballooning and then plunging stock market, recession, and accounting scandals.

Financial services deregulation has promoted competition by removing geographic and industry barriers. The Riegle-Neal Interstate Banking and Branching Act of 1997 completed the demolition of geographic barriers in banking that had been going on at the state level for two decades. The Financial Services Modernization Act of 1999 has repealed the provisions of the Glass-Steagall Act and the Bank Holding Company Act that restricted the affiliation between banks, securities firms, and insurance companies. The Act allows financial holding companies to engage in various financial activities, including traditional banking, securities underwriting, insurance underwriting, asset securitization, and financial advising. As a result, competition has become nationwide and across all financial products.

Advances in communication and information processing technology have made the evaluation of borrowers' creditworthiness more accurate and lowered the cost of financial transactions. Lenders now have easy access to large databases, powerful computers, and sophisticated analytical models. Thus, many lenders use credit scoring models that evaluate creditworthiness based on various borrower characteristics derived from extensive credit bureau data. As a result, lending decisions have become more accurate and objective. Powerful computing and communication devices have also lowered the cost of financial transactions by producing new transaction methods such as electronic fund transfers, Internet banking, and Internet brokerage. The development of reliable screening methods and efficient transaction methods have resulted in intense competition for creditworthy borrowers and narrowed lending margins. Financial institutions are more willing to compete for customers with unique characteristics, customers in distant areas, and customers offering small business volume. A notable example of increased competition is the credit card business, where offering lower rates to lower-risk customers has become much more common in recent years.

Consolidation among financial institutions, especially banks, has been very active due to deregulation and increased competition. Because of active consolidation, the number of banks has sharply decreased, and the market share of large banks has increased. At the end of calendar 2001, there were about 8,100 commercial banks, which represented a decrease by about 4,300 or 35 percent from the end of calendar 1990. The top 10 and 100 banks respectively controlled 40 and 73 percent of banking assets at the end of calendar 2001, compared with 21 and 51 percent at the end of calendar 1990. Consolidation across traditional industry boundaries has produced financial holding companies that control multiple types of financial institutions. The pace of consolidation, however, slowed in recent years due to slumping stock markets.

Direct capital market access by borrowers has become easier. Advances in communication and information processing technology enabled many companies (less-established medium-sized companies, as well as large well-known ones) to validate their financial information at low costs and to borrow directly in capital markets, instead of relying on banks. In particular, growth of commercial paper (short-term financing instruments issued by corporations) substantially outpaced growth of bank business loans in the 1990s. This long-term trend, however, has been seriously interrupted by the last recession and recent accounting scandals that caused some instability in financial markets. In recent periods, the volume of commercial paper issued by nonfinancial companies dropped below $160 billion, which was less than one half of the peak level reached in 2000. Some borrowers with relatively low credit ratings were denied access, and even borrowers with higher credit ratings had to reduce the reliance commercial paper because of increased investors' concern about the riskiness of short-term financing. Heavy reliance on short-term financing can quickly worsen financial distress by causing refinancing difficulty.

Nonbank financial institutions have increased their market share, partly thanks to advanced communications and information processing technology that helped to level the playing field. Finance companies are a major nonbank lender. Over the last decade, both consumer loans and business loans have been growing at finance companies faster than at commercial banks. In the 1990s, venture capital firms emerged as a major financing source for small, start-up firms that had heavily relied on banks. During the last stock-market boom, the growth of venture capital firms was rather phenomenal. Between calendar 1995 and calendar 2000, their new investments, which were mostly in small firms' equity, jumped 18-fold, to over $100 billion. Venture capital investments, however, plunged, as the stock market slumped. During the first three quarters of calendar 2002, venture capital firms invested only about $17 billion.

Internet-based financial intermediaries provide financial services more cheaply and widely. The Internet lowers the cost of financial transactions and reduces the importance of physical location. Internet brokers slashed the commission on stock trading, facilitating small investors' participation in the stock market. Internet-only banks, which emerged recently, bid up deposit interest rates. Furthermore, their services are nationwide. The Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act of 2000, which eliminates legal barriers to the use of electronic technology to sign contracts, should accelerate the growth of transactions over the Internet.

Securitization (pooling a certain type of asset and selling shares of the asset pool to investors) is a financial instrument produced by technological advances. Increased transparency of asset quality created demand for securitized assets. Securitization has enhanced liquidity in financial markets by enabling lenders to raise funds without borrowing or issuing equity. It also helps financial institutions to reduce risk exposure to a particular line of business. Commonly securitized assets include credit card loans, automobile loans, and residential mortgages, whose quality can be more objectively analyzed. In recent years, financial institutions began securitizing to a limited extent many other assets such as commercial mortgages and small business loans, the riskiness of which is more difficult to evaluate.

Financial derivatives, such as options, swaps, and futures, have improved investors' ability to manage risk. Financial institutions and many nonfinancial companies are increasingly using these relatively new instruments to manage various types of risk such as price risk, interest rate risk, credit risk, and even catastrophe-related risk. Price risk can be easily managed through standard derivative contracts such as options and futures. The interest rate swap is an effective tool to reduce a firm's exposure to interest rate movements. Interest rate swaps are widely used by financial institutions that have many fixed-interest rate assets, such as mortgage lenders. Credit derivatives, which can be used as insurance against loan default, gained more popularity in recent periods, as default by some large corporations such as Enron and WorldCom heightened investors' concern about default risk. After the September 11 attacks, catastrophe bonds drew considerable attention as a potential means to manage a large risk. Through the bonds, the potential large loss from a catastrophe can be spread among a large number of investors, instead of a few insurance companies. The size of the catastrophe bond market, however, is still very small.

Globalization is another important consequence of the reduced importance of geographic proximity and knowledge of local markets. Both commercial and investment banking institutions headquartered in Europe and Japan are actively competing in the U.S. market, and many U.S. financial institutions have branches worldwide. With international competition, even very large financial institutions can hardly have market power.

Slumping stock markets, last recession, and recent accounting scandals caused financing difficulties for some businesses. Stock market declines raised the cost of equity financing for most corporations and substantially reduced the supply of venture capital for small, start-up businesses. Last recession increased the delinquency rate of business loans. The delinquency rate kept increasing because loan delinquencies usually follow an economic downturn with a lag. The increased delinquency rate made it more difficult for some businesses to obtain loans by making banks more cautious. Recent accounting scandals involving large companies such as Enron and WorldCom caused investors to become unusually jittery about the reliability of financial reports and default risk. The stock market reacted negatively, further increasing the cost of equity financing. Bond financing also became more difficult and expensive for companies with low credit ratings, despite low interest rates in other sectors of the economy. The financing difficulties, however, were largely confined to risky or less established businesses. Well-established companies with high credit ratings benefitted from the lowest interest rates in decades, which could offset the effect of a high equity-financing cost. Consumers and home buyers kept having easy access to credit, partly thanks to the continued strength of the housing market. The delinquency rates of consumer and real estate loans remained at low levels, suggesting that credit condition in those sectors may continue to be favorable in the foreseeable future.

Implications for Federal Programs

Financial evolution has been increasing the private market's capacity to serve the populations traditionally targeted by Federal programs. This long-term trend will continue in the future, but can be interrupted temporarily. In general, financial evolution has weakened the role of Federal credit and insurance programs. To improve the effectiveness of credit and insurance programs, therefore, the Federal Government may focus on narrower target populations that still have difficulty in obtaining credit from private lenders and on more specific objectives that have been less affected by financial evolution. The Federal Government, however, may take more active roles during the periods in which financial instability temporarily interrupts the smooth functioning of the private market.

Information about borrowers is more widely available and easier to process, thanks to technological advances. As a result, creditworthy borrowers are less likely to be turned down, while borrowers that are not creditworthy are less likely to be approved for credit. The Federal role of improving credit allocation, therefore, is generally not as strong as before. The benefit from financial evolution, however, can be uneven across groups and over time. Credit scoring, for example, is still difficult to apply to some groups with unique characteristics that can hardly be standardized. In times of economic downturn or financial instability, lenders can be overly cautious, leaving out some creditworthy borrowers. The Federal Government may need to better target those underserved groups, while reducing general involvement.

Externalities have not been significantly affected by financial evolution. The private market fundamentally relies on decisions at the individual level. Thus, it is inherently difficult for the private market to correct problems related to externalities.

Resource constraints have been alleviated. Securitization and financial derivatives facilitate fund raising and risk sharing. By securitizing loans and writing derivatives contracts, a lender can make a large amount of risky loans, while limiting its risk exposure. An insurer can distribute the risk of a natural or man-made catastrophe among a large number of investors through catastrophe-related derivatives, although the extent of risk sharing in this way is still limited because of the small size of the market for those products.

Imperfect competition is much less likely in general. Developments that contributed to increasing competition are financial deregulation, direct capital market access by borrowers, stronger presence of nonbank financial institutions, emergence of Internet-based financial institutions, and globalization. Consolidation has a potential negative effect on competition, especially in markets that were traditionally served by small institutions. Large financial institutions with global operations may want to focus more on large customers and business lines that utilize economies of scale and scope more fully. Given that the Nation still has many banks and other financial institutions, the negative effect, if any, should be insignificant overall. It is possible, however, that some communities in remote rural areas and inner city areas have been adversely affected by consolidation.

Uncertainties about the Federal Government's liability have increased in some areas. Consolidation has increased bank size. Thus, the failure of even a single large bank can seriously drain the federal deposit insurance fund. As a result of deregulation, banks engage in more activities. While diversification across business lines may generally improve the safety of banks, new businesses introduce new risks. For example, one concern raised recently is that the motive to obtain underwriting business from borrowing firms may have been affecting lending decisions, undermining loan quality at some large banking organizations. Globalization also has both an upside and a downside. A financial institution with a worldwide operation may overcome difficulties in the U.S. market more easily, but it is more heavily exposed to economic turmoil in other countries, especially those that are less-developed and unstable. The large size of some GSEs is also a potential problem. Financial trouble of a large GSE could cause strong repercussions in financial markets, affecting federally insured entities and economic activity. Overall, the financial market evolves to be more efficient and safer. Financial evolution, however, is often accompanied by new risks. Thus, Federal agencies need to be vigilant to identify and manage new risks.

The stock market plunge and the slow economic recovery have increased the risk and uncertainty for the pension guaranty program by impairing the financial health of many pension funds and firms offering pension benefits. New and amended insurance programs for security-related risks also make the Federal Government's liability more uncertain. Security-related events such as terrorism and war are highly uncertain in terms of both the frequency of occurrence and the magnitude of potential loss.

II. A CROSS-CUTTING ASSESSMENT

To systematically assess Federal programs, policymakers and program managers need to consider the following questions. (1) Are the programs' objectives still worthwhile? (2) Is the program economically justified? (3) Is the credit or insurance program the best way to achieve the goals? (4) Is the program operating efficiently and effectively? If the answer to any of the first three questions is "No," the program should be eliminated or phased out. For programs that pass the three tests, the focus should be on improving efficiency and effectiveness.

Objectives

The first step in reassessing Federal credit and insurance programs is to identify clearly the objective of each program, such as an increase in homeownership, an increase in college graduates, an increase in jobs, or an increase in exports. The objective must be clear and worthwhile to justify a program. For some programs, the objective might be unclear or of low importance. In some other cases, an initially worthwhile objective might have become obsolete. Programs lacking a clear, worthwhile objective should be either refocused or discontinued.

Economic Justifications

For a credit or insurance program to be economically justified, the program's benefits must exceed its costs. The main benefit measure should be the improvement in intended outcomes (for example, an increased in homeownership) net of what would have occurred in the absence of the program (for example, the portion of the increase owing to economic growth and financial evolution). Financial evolution may have significantly affected the net benefit from some programs. Suppose, for example, that financial evolution made information about borrowers transparent in some sectors where information opaqueness had been a major problem. Then the benefit would be substantially smaller for the Federal programs that were mainly intended to increase credit availability in those sectors by alleviating the information problem. Only a small portion of the increased credit availability may be attributable to those Federal programs.

Many Federal credit and insurance programs involve subsidy costs, and all of them incur administrative costs. A subsidy cost occurs when the beneficiaries of a program do not pay enough to cover the cost to the Federal Government (e.g., they pay below-cost interest rates and below-cost fees). The administrative costs include the costs of loan origination, servicing, and monitoring. The benefit of a program can be smaller than the combined cost of subsidy and administration either because it is inherently costly to pursue the program's goal or because the program is inefficiently managed (failure to maximize the benefit and minimize the cost). The program should be discontinued in the first case and restructured in the second case.

Alternatives

Even a program that is economically justified should be discontinued if there is a better way to achieve the same goals. The Federal Government has other means to achieve social and economic goals, such as providing direct subsidies, offering tax benefits, and encouraging private institutions to provide the intended services.

In general, direct subsidies are more efficient than credit programs for the purpose of fulfilling social objectives such as helping low-income people, as opposed to economic objectives such as improving credit allocation. Direct subsidies are less likely to interfere with the efficient allocation of resources. Suppose that the Government makes a subsidized loan to be used for a specific project. Then the borrower will undertake the project if its return is greater than the subsidized rate. Thus, the subsidized loan can induce the borrower to undertake a normally unprofitable project and hence result in a social loss. On the other hand, a direct subsidy is a simple income transfer, which is less likely to cause a social loss.

To a certain extent, the Federal Government can also correct market failures by helping the private market to improve efficiency, instead of directly offering credit or insurance. For example, policies encouraging the standardization of information (e.g., standardization of loan origination documents) may improve the private lenders' ability to serve those sectors where information is opaque. Standardization helps to reduce opaqueness by facilitating information processing. With reduced opaqueness, loan sales should be easier, and the secondary market should develop more quickly. Then the lending market would be more liquid and competitive.

A more specific example is the development of floodplain maps by the National Flood Insurance Program. Before the development of the maps, private insurance companies had little information on flood risks by geographic area. The lack of information was a main reason why private companies were unwilling to insure against flood risk.

Improving Efficiency

Some programs may be well-justified based on the three criteria above. However, few programs may be perfectly designed or managed. It is almost impossible to take all relevant factors into consideration at the beginning. In addition, financial evolution can lower the efficiency of initially well-designed and well managed programs. Thus, improving efficiency is a continual concern. Although the ways to improve efficiency vary across programs, there are some general categories and principles that apply to most programs.

Pricing (setting appropriate lending terms or insurance premiums) is a critical part of credit and insurance programs. To maximize efficiency, program managers need to set the subsidy rate at an optimal level and calculate the subsidy rate accurately. If a program's subsidy is too small, the intended population may benefit little and may even be discouraged from using the program. On the other hand, an excessive subsidy will transfer too much resources to a small group of the population. In either case, program efficiency can be seriously undermined. Miscalculation of subsidy rate would also result in resource misallocation. If program managers fail to accurately estimate the default and prepayment probabilities for a credit program and the loss probability for an insurance program, the actual subsidy may substantially deviate from the intended subsidy. For a given amount of the budget, the program size (total amount of loans or number of beneficiaries) is determined by the estimated subsidy rate. Thus, an estimated subsidy smaller than the actual would increase the program size beyond the level intended by policymakers, while an estimated subsidy larger than the actual would unduly prevent the program from helping more people.

To set the subsidy rate at the optimal level, policymakers and program managers should carefully weigh the benefit of improving economic efficiency in the targeted sector against the risk of misallocating resources. To improve the accuracy of subsidy estimation, program managers need to fully utilize both historical experience and advanced analytical tools. Private sector participation may also help the pricing of complicated programs. Federal agencies can make risk-sharing arrangements with private firms that may have better pricing expertise and derive information from the private firms' pricing.

Targeting the right population is also an important element of program efficiency. The net benefit will increase if program managers more successfully identify the populations that would benefit more from credit and insurance programs and reach out to them. Right populations include borrowers who have worthwhile projects but have difficulty in obtaining private credit (e.g., beginning farmers, new businesses, new exporters), populations underserved by the private market (e.g., low-income, minority), underserved neighborhoods (e.g., rural, inner city), and legislatively targeted populations (e.g., students, veterans). In addition to making credit available, program managers need to actively inform potential borrowers of the credit availability and provide high-quality customer services, so that ignorance or inconvenience does not deter the targeted populations from accessing the program.

In outreaching, program managers may also consider the state of the financial market. The right population can expand when the private market fails to function smoothly due to temporary interruptions, such as economic downturns and asset-price declines. Those interruption can reduce credit availability in the private market, as evidenced by declines in commercial paper and venture capital investment in recent periods. Reduced credit availability can mean that more creditworthy borrowers have difficulty in obtaining credit in the private market. On those occasions, Federal credit programs can also play a more useful role.

While outreaching, program managers should avoid overreaching (assisting those who have easy access to private credit or insurance). Excessive government intervention would waste taxpayers' money and distort economic outcomes. To avoid overreaching, program managers need to clearly define eligibility and carefully screen applicants based on the eligibility. The eligibility screening is especially important for programs offering a large subsidy because the large subsidy can attract many customers who can easily obtain credit or insurance in the private sector. In addition, plans to expand the scale or the scope of a program should be carried out cautiously; they should be convincingly supported by careful cost-benefit analyses.

Risk management needs to be effective to limit the cost of credit and insurance programs. Careful screening of borrowers' creditworthiness would reduce the default risk. Although the goal of most credit programs is not to lend to the most creditworthy borrowers, it is important to identify relatively more creditworthy borrowers even among those who might be denied credit by private lenders. Other key elements of risk management include monitoring existing borrowers and collecting defaulted loans.

One way to improve screening, monitoring, and collecting is to use advanced analytical tools such as credit scoring and to maintain useful data bases. Using the state-of-the-art tools is especially important for programs that compete with the private sector for the same group of customers. Private financial institutions are quick to adopt new technology. Falling behind, Federal programs could be left with riskier customers. In cases where the private sector has a clear advantage in performing some risk management functions, delegating those functions is an effective strategy. For example, if banks are better at screening some opaque borrowers because of their extensive experience with those borrowers, Federal agencies may delegate the screening of those borrowers to banks. To realize the potential benefit from delegation, Federal agencies need to closely monitor the performance of private partners. More importantly, the partnership should be structured such that the profit motives of private-sector partners are preserved. Risk-sharing arrangements and performance-based contracts would help to preserve the profit motive.

VerDate May 01 2002 18:43 Jan 14, 2003 Jkt 000000 PO 00000 Frm 00006 Fmt 3625 Sfmt 3625 N:\PRINT\FY04-BUD\SPEC\SPEC09.04 OMB2 PsN: ROWE

Cost control is a concern for all types of organizations. For Federal credit and insurance programs, key elements include delivery and servicing costs, in addition to the general administration cost. There are many ways for Federal agencies to minimize costs. They may streamline the delivery system, computerize loan servicing, and eliminate redundant servicing facilities. Inter-agency cooperation can also result in a substantial cost saving. When several Federal agencies serve similar purposes, those agencies may share databases, facilities, and expertise. Outsourcing some functions to the private sector is always a possibility because the private sector is generally more efficient.

For Federal programs involving private-sector partners, cost efficiency critically depends on whether contract terms with private-sector partners are adequate. To utilize the private sector's expertise, it is necessary to offer reasonable profit opportunities to private-sector partners. However, contract terms allowing excessive profits would result in serious inefficiency. Profit margins for private-sector partners should be carefully examined and set at an appropriate level. Preferably, Federal agencies may use competitive bidding when it is practical.

Initiative plays an important role in a rapidly changing environment. Information technology and financial markets have been changing rapidly. To achieve the maximum efficiency, program managers need to closely watch and quickly adapt their programs to new developments. Tardy responses to changes in information technology may mean missed opportunities for improving risk management and reducing costs. Financial market developments also have important implications. For example, many loans guaranteed by the Government are securitized. Securitization may reduce the lenders' incentives to screen and monitor borrowers if they believe that guaranteeing agencies do not properly track the performance of securitized loans. To prevent this adverse effect, the Government needs well-organized databases and modern monitoring systems. Private lenders are more willing to serve many customers to whom they did not want to lend in the past. Thus, some Federal credit programs may need to focus more narrowly on customers who are still underserved by private lenders. Without agencies' initiative, needed adjustments might be substantially delayed. because individual agencies conducting daily businesses are best positioned to detect changes in market conditions.

Federal Loan Portfolio Management: Improving Performance and Efficiency

At the end of 2002, the Federal Government held loan assets valued at $———billion. Of this figure, $———billion were direct loans, and $——billion were guaranteed loans acquired by the Federal Government after default. In addition, the Federal government holds liabilities on a $———billion loan guarantee portfolio. While the Government sets aside resources for the future costs of these activities, better management of the portfolio can allow more accurate estimates of credit program subsidy costs, lower the risk exposure of the Federal government, and produce more reliable financial reporting. More efficient management can also free up existing agency resources to better serve program target populations and work more effectively with borrowers and lenders. The size of the Government's portfolio means that even small changes in management practices can have substantial qualitative and quantitative effects in a time of scarce resources.

Over the next year, OMB will work with agencies to identify ways of improving loan portfolio management across the four basic credit functions: program development, loan origination, servicing or lender monitoring during repayment, and liquidation. These improvements will build on principles from:

- the President's Management Agenda, which includes improved asset management (including physical assets) as a component of successful financial management,
- OMB Circular A-129, which outlines policies governing the four basic credit functions, and
- the Debt Collection Improvement Act of 1996, which authorized a variety of techniques, including loan asset sales and Treasury tax refund offset and cross-servicing, to improve management of loans in default by increasing the chance of recovery.

While some agencies have adopted techniques to improve efficiency and performance, such as competitive servicing contracts and lender monitoring, the evolution of private-sector best practices has far outpaced the Government's. In many cases, agencies perform one of the basic credit functions well—usually loan origination—but have poor systems in place for tracking loan performance. Other agencies may track borrowers reasonably well during repayment, but have no risk management system in place to identify and closely monitor borrowers in danger of defaulting.

Implementing changes cannot happen in isolation, however; changes made in one function can significantly affect performance in another. Analyzing these effects may inform agencies' resource decisions through the basic functions, such as whether or not to improve internal accounting systems or to outsource loan servicing and liquidation. Equally important is the fact that this analysis may improve program performance by reducing the default rate, allowing the agency to stretch its subsidy dollars over more borrowers.

Any changes to program management will be made in light of the programs' justifications to ensure that the Government neither crowds out the private sector nor expands the target population beyond that intended. However, the main focus of OMB efforts will be on efficient stewardship of taxpayer dollars and more effective credit assistance to those borrowers who need it.

III. CREDIT IN FOUR SECTORS

Housing Credit Programs and GSEs

The Federal Government makes direct loans, provides loan guarantees, and enhances liquidity in the housing market to promote homeownership among low- and moderate-income people and to help finance rental housing for low-income people. While direct loans are largely limited to low-income borrowers, loan guarantees are offered to a much larger segment of the population, including moderate-income borrowers. Increased liquidity achieved through GSEs benefits virtually all borrowers in the housing market, although it helps low and moderate-income borrowers more.

Federal Housing Administration

In June 2002, the President issued America's Homeownership Challenge to increase first-time minority homeowners by 5.5 million through 2010. HUD's Federal Housing Administration (FHA) will help to achieve this goal through its insurance funds, mainly the Mutual Mortgage Insurance Fund. FHA mortgage insurance provides access to homeownership for people who lack the financial resources or credit history to qualify for a conventional home mortgage. In 2002, FHA insured $136 billion in mortgages for over 1.2 million households, 21 percent more households than in 2001. Most of these were people buying their first homes many of whom were minorities. The dollar volume of mortgages exceeded the 2001 volume by 27 percent, partially driven by the rapid increase in house prices and low interest rates.

For fiscal year 2004, FHA is proposing a new mortgage product. This product will be geared toward families with poor credit records who are currently being served at a higher cost in the subprime market or not served at all. Borrowers could reduce their annual mortgage insurance premiums once they have established a history of regular payments thereby demonstrating their creditworthiness. This innovative product is consistent with FHA's traditional pioneering role in reducing the cost of homeownership and protecting buyers from predatory practices.

To better manage its risks, FHA requires its lenders to evaluate each potential foreclosure and use loss mitigation tools where appropriate. Last year, incentive payments for over 68 thousand loss mitigation actions were made, up from 53 thousand in fiscal year 2001. Loss mitigation helps to avoid costly foreclosures, enables many distressed borrowers to retain their homes, and reduces FHA's claim expenses. FHA also is reducing its losses through more aggressive management of its property oversight and disposition program and is testing a new joint venture approach to this task.

The Budget expands HUD's support for new homeowners by increasing funds for pre- and post-purchase counseling services through a network of counseling agencies. With this increase, over 950 thousand homeowners will receive counseling in 2004.

The President's Management Agenda sets out several critical tasks for FHA to combat fraud and improve risk management. In 2003, FHA will issue a final rule that will prevent the predatory practice of property flipping, in which a lender and an appraiser conspire to sell a home at a falsely inflated price, thereby victimizing the borrower and exposing FHA to excessive losses. HUD also will strengthen its Credit Watch initiative—a lender monitoring program that rates lenders and underwriters by the performance of their loans and allows FHA to sever relationships with those showing poor performance. Credit Watch is critical to protect the FHA Mutual Mortgage Insurance Fund from unexpected losses due to mismanagement and fraud.

VA Housing Program

The VA assists veterans, members of the Selected Reserve, and active duty personnel to purchase homes as a recognition of their service to the Nation. The program substitutes the Federal guarantee for the borrower's down payment. In 2002, VA provided $37 billion in guarantees to assist 294,800 borrowers. Both the volume of guarantees and the number of borrowers increased substantially from 2001 as lower interest rates increased loan originations and refinancings in the housing market.

Since the main purpose of this program is to help veterans, lending terms are more favorable than loans without a VA guarantee. In particular, VA guarantees zero down payment loans. As a result, the default rate is somewhat higher than the national average. The subsidy rate has remained relatively stable during the past couple of years and continues to be less than one percent.

In order to help veterans retain their homes and avoid the expense and damage to their credit resulting from foreclosure, VA plans aggressive intervention to reduce the likelihood of foreclosures when loans are referred to VA after missing three payments. VA was successful in 43 percent of its 2002 interventions, and its goal is to maintain at least a 41 percent success rate in 2004. Future military base closures, however, may negatively affect the default rate in the VA guaranteed housing program. Guaranteed loans issued to active duty military and military reservists are vulnerable to the impact of base closures on the neighboring community. VA is continuing its efforts to reduce administrative costs through restructuring and consolidations.

Rural Housing Service

The U.S. Department of Agriculture's (USDA's) Rural Housing Service (RHS) offers direct and guaranteed loans and grants to help very low- to moderate-income rural residents buy and maintain adequate, affordable housing. The single family guaranteed loan program guarantees up to 90 percent of a private loan for low to moderate-income rural residents. The program's emphasis is on reducing the number of rural residents living in substandard housing. In 2002, $2.4 billion of guarantees went to 29,218 households, of which 33 percent went to low-income borrowers (with income 80 percent or less than median area income).

In 2002, RHS approved separate risk categories for the guarantee refinancing (refis) and guarantees of new loans. As part of that change, RHS also reduced the guarantee fee to 0.5 percent for the refis. This change reflected the lower risk on refis as compared to an unseasoned borrower receiving a new loan. It is also consistent with the rate HUD and VA charge on their refis of similar loans. For 2003, RHS will also lower the guarantee fee on new loans to 1.5 percent from 2 percent, partly undoing the 1-percentage-point increase that was implemented in 2001. Recent data revealed that the full 1-percentage-point increase was inconsistent with the housing market condition and too costly for the target borrower, low and moderate income families. The high fee resulted in less assistance going to rural areas for guaranteed single family housing loans than what had been authorized. The new rate is more in line with the housing industry, including HUD and VA, and will result in more rural Americans realizing the dream of homeownership.

In the single family housing guaranteed loan program, lender monitoring and external audits have helped to identify program weaknesses, train servicers, and identify troubled lenders. RHS's guaranteed loan program is also moving toward automated underwriting. In 2003, RHS continued to enhance an Internet-based system that will, with future planned improvements, provide the capacity to accept electronic loan originations from their participating lenders. Utilizing electronic loan origination technology will add significant benefits to loan processing efficiency, consistency and timeliness for RHS, the lenders, and customers. RHS is currently working with HUD to determine if RHS can utilize or modify the TOTAL socrecard being developed by HUD. RHS continues to operate under the "best practice" for asset disposition for its guaranteed loan program. For single family guarantees, the lender is paid the loss claim, including costs incurred for up to three months after the default. After the loss claim is paid, RHS has no involvement in the loan, and it becomes the sole responsibility of the lender to dispose of the property. RHS is currently in the process of centralizing and automating the loss claim process to improve consistency and efficiency.

RHS programs differ from other Federal housing loan guarantee programs. RHS programs are means-tested and more accessible to low-income, rural residents. In addition, the RHS direct loan program offers deeper assistance to very-low-income homeowners by reducing the interest rate down to 1 percent for such borrowers. The program helps the "on the cusp" borrower obtain a mortgage, and requires graduation to private credit as the borrower's income increases over time. The interest rate depends on the borrower's income. Each loan is reviewed annually to determine the interest rate that should be charged on the loan in that year based on the borrower's actual annual income. The program cost is balanced between interest subsidy and defaults. For 2004, RHS expects to provide $1.4 billion in loans with a subsidy cost of 9.27 percent.

RHS also offers multifamily housing loans. Direct loans are offered to private developers to construct and rehabilitate multi-family rental housing for very-low to low-income residents, elderly households, or handicapped individuals. These loans to developers are very heavily subsidized; the interest rate is between 1 and 2 percent. A subset of these loans is the farm labor housing direct loans, which are similarly subsidized and provide rental units for farm workers, the majority of whom are minorities. RHS rental assistance grants supplement both of these loan programs in the form of project based rent subsidies for very low-income rural households (for continuation of this assistance plus new commitments, the cost will be $740 million in 2004). RHS will address management issues in its multifamily housing portfolio in 2004 by restricting the $71 million loan level to repair and rehabilitation of its existing portfolio (17,400 projects, 446,000 units). They will also conduct a study on how to fund new construction in a more cost efficient manner with a continued emphasis on the preservation of existing units. Farm labor housing will have a program level of $59 million and will provide for new construction as well as repair/rehabilitation. RHS also offers guaranteed multifamily housing loans with a loan level of $100 million a year.

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac (the "Enterprises") are Federally-chartered, shareholder owned corporations that were created by Congress to achieve public purposes. Specifically, the Enterprises are required to establish a secondary market for residential mortgages below a certain size and to assist the secondary mortgage market by increasing the liquidity of mortgage investments. The Enterprises also are required to purchase mortgages that serve low-and moderate-income families and families living in communities underserved by the mortgage markets. To assist the Enterprises in achieving their public purpose, Congress granted Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac certain benefits that are not available to fully private corporations, including an exemption from State and local taxes and authority granted to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase their debt obligations.

REV_00106402

The Enterprises carry out their public mission by purchasing mortgages from loan originators and packaging them into mortgage-backed securities (MBS) for investors. The Enterprises earn profits for their stockholders by charging fees for their guarantees against potential credit losses on these securities.

The Enterprises also earn profits from their portfolio holdings of mortgages and other mortgage-backed assets (including MBS that they have repurchased). The mortgage asset portfolios of the two Enterprises have grown in the past year by 11 percent. Each Enterprise also markets technology and services to support the mortgage lending process, another source of earnings.

The bulk of the Enterprises' profits reflect the rewards they earn for taking and managing risks. These risks mainly fall into two categories: Credit risk and Interest rate risk.

Credit risk arises from the Enterprises' guarantee against losses when mortgages they have purchased default, whether the mortgages support investor-owned MBS or whether they are held in the Enterprises' portfolios as individual loans or as MBS. The Enterprises share credit risk with private mortgage insurers on pools of mortgages and on individual mortgages with low down payments. They also share risk with other third-party guarantors and, in some cases, with lenders.

Interest rate risk arises from the mortgages and other assets that the Enterprises hold in their portfolios. This risk results from changes in market interest rates that might reduce the spread between the return that the Enterprises earn on their holdings and the interest they pay on borrowings used to finance them. Mismatches between the duration of assets and liabilities and the potential for changes in prepayment speeds give rise to interest rate risk. The Enterprises limit interest rate risk by various means, including matching the projected duration of their assets and liabilities and purchasing options that effectively allow them to alter the speed with which they retire their fixed-rate liabilities.

- When the Enterprises buy MBS and hold these in portfolio, they must manage the interest rate risk just as they manage the risks on individual loans. As of September 2002, the two Enterprises held a combined $797 billion of their own previously issued MBS, accounting for 62 percent of their combined mortgage asset portfolios.
- Although holding substantially more securities rather than individual loans could facilitate the sale of portfolio assets should the Enterprises choose to liquidate these assets, some have proposed limiting the size of the Enterprises' retained portfolios for both MBS and individual loans. These proposals are based partly on a desire to minimize the Enterprises' exposure to possible losses that could result from substantial interest rate risk. While the Enterprises argue that large retained portfolios contribute to lower mortgage rates, a substantial portion of the benefits accrue to shareholders, not homeowners.

The inherent risks of the Enterprises' business are constantly monitored by the market and by their Federal safety and soundness regulator, established in October 1992, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight (OFHEO).

Increased voluntary disclosures, which the Enterprises initiated in early 2002, have helped investors better assess the level of each Enterprise's risk exposure. Both Enterprises now disclose measures of their interest rate risk on a monthly basis and issue credit risk disclosures on a quarterly basis. They also obtain and disclose an annual rating of their financial condition from a nationally recognized agency. In July 2002, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac announced that they would voluntarily register their common stock with the SEC under provisions of Section 12(g) of the Exchange Act, 15 U.S.C. 781 (g). The Enterprises' voluntary registration, which OFHEO will facilitate by promulgating a regulation on public disclosures of financial and other information, will subject them to the same periodic disclosures that the SEC requires of other publicly traded companies.

OFHEO's new capital requirements will enhance its regulatory oversight and reinforce market discipline. OFHEO began quarterly publication of a risk-based capital requirement for the Enterprises in the second quarter of FY 2002, and this requirement became fully enforceable in the fourth quarter. Both Enterprises held more than the required capital in that quarter. Fannie Mae's capital was $27.278 billion while its risk based requirement was $21.440 billion. Freddie Mac's capital was $23.101 billion while its risk based requirement was $4.919 billion. In addition to ensuring that the Enterprises maintain a level of capital commensurate with their risk, the risk-based capital requirement can enhance market discipline. The Enterprises and the marketplace may use the quarterly changes in this measure as another indication of their overall risk exposure and their ability to manage it.

Who benefits from Enterprise risk-taking? Because they receive substantial advantages from the Federal Government, such as conditional access to up to $2.25 billion of US Treasury borrowing and exemption from State and local income taxes, some perceive the Enterprises as having Government support—despite the fact that the Government makes it explicit that it does not guarantee their securities. As a result, they are able to fund their operations at lower cost than would other private firms with similar financial characteristics. In a report published in May 2001, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) estimated this funding advantage for the year 2000 resulted in a $10.6 billion annual subsidy. Of this amount, CBO estimated that borrowers received $6.7 billion of the subsidy, while the Enterprises retained about $3.9 billion, or 37 percent of the subsidy, for their shareholders. Subsequently, through September 2002, the Enterprises have increased their combined debt-funded retained portfolios by 29 percent and their off-balance sheet MBS by 34 percent, suggesting further increases in the annual subsidy.

To help ensure that the Enterprises' subsidy contributes to the maximum extent possible to underserved housing needs, the Congress in 1992 mandated that the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) establish annual "housing goals." The housing goals define percentages of the Enterprises' annual purchases that must serve very-low, low-, and moderate-income borrowers and borrowers living in communities that are underserved by the private market. Underserved communities include high-minority and low-income census tracts, which traditionally have had more difficulty than other areas in obtaining mortgage credit. Congress has directed that, in setting the level of the housing goals, HUD must consider, among other factors, the extent to which the Enterprises "lead the mortgage finance industry" in service to these categories of potential borrowers.

The President has set a goal for the Nation of adding 5.5 million new minority homebuyers by 2010. To meet this goal, the Enterprises, along with others, will increase their support for lending to these groups. Numerous studies by HUD and other researchers have shown that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac generally have trailed the rest of the private mortgage market in funding mortgage loans for low-income and minority families. For example, during the 1997–1999 period, HUD estimates that while the home loans acquired by these Enterprises represented 36 percent of all new home buyer purchases, they represented only 15 percent of homes purchased by first-time minority families. On the other hand, FHA loans, which were only 16 percent of the overall market, totaled 37 percent of the first-time minority market.

HUD is also looking at new ways to encourage improved performance from the Enterprises. HUD's current rule established the Enterprises' housing goals for 2001–2003. In accordance with its rulemaking responsibilities, HUD is re-examining these housing goals to determine appropriate performance levels for the years 2004 2006. At the same time, HUD is looking at ways to create new housing incentives that will have the effect of increasing minority homeownership, thereby further ensuring that the benefits each Enterprise derives from its Congressional charter are used to increase minority homeownership opportunities.

Federal Home Loan Bank System

The Federal Home Loan Bank System, consisting of 12 banks (FHLBs) serving their districts, was established in 1932 to provide liquidity to home mortgage lenders. The FHLBs carry out this mission by issuing debt and using the proceeds to make advances (secured loans) to their members. Member institutions, which include thrifts, commercial banks, and credit unions, secure advances primarily with residential mortgages and other housing-related assets. To assist the FHLBs in achieving their public purpose, Congress granted certain benefits that are not available to fully private corporations, including a $4 billion conditional line of credit with the U.S. Treasury and exemption from State and local taxes.

The FHLBs experienced moderate growth in the past year, while their profitability declined slightly. Outstanding advances reached $490.7 billion in September 2002, a 5.1 percent increase over the $466.8 billion outstanding a year earlier. As of September 30, 2002, about 69 percent of advances had a remaining maturity of greater than one year—up from 64 percent one year earlier. Mortgage loans outstanding were $47.1 billion, up from $22.6 billion one year earlier. Mortgage loans accounted for approximately 6.2 percent of total FHLBs' assets. In 2002, the FHLBs issued $4.6 trillion in debt securities, most of which represented the rollover of overnight or short-term debt. While the majority of the debt issued by the System is overnight or short-term, 79 percent of debt outstanding had an original maturity of one year or longer. Total debt outstanding was about $688 billion at the end of 2002. The FHLBs reported net income of $1.9 billion for the year ending September 30, 2002, down from $2.1 billion in the previous 12 months.

Traditionally, the FHLBs have been exposed to little credit risk. All advances to member institutions are collateralized, and the FHLBs can call for additional or substitute collateral during the life of an advance. As long as FHLBs adhere to conservative collateral policies (high-quality collaterals and a high ratio of collateral value to the loan amount), their exposure to credit risk will continue to be minimal in the future. The benefit of using collateral, however, comes at the cost of increasing the potential liability of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC). Since the FHLBs' collateralized claim is senior to the FDIC's claim, the FDIC has less to recover in cases where a member institution with large FHLB advances fails. Thus, FHLB advances, like secured loans from other creditors, could indirectly increase the Federal Government's exposure to credit risk. As is the case with other financial intermediaries, FHLBs are potentially exposed to interest rate risk, which should be carefully managed.

The System's new investment activities, including mortgage purchase programs, involve more risk while offering new alternative ways of doing mortgage business. In one of these programs, the Mortgage Partnership Finance Program, the FHLBs finance mortgage loans and assume the interest-rate and prepayment risk, while the member banks and thrifts originate and service the loans and assume a portion of the credit risk. All assets held by an FHLB under these mortgage purchase programs are required, pursuant to the terms of the program, to be credit enhanced to at least the level of an investment-grade security. In addition, an FHLBank must hold risk-based capital against mortgage assets that have credit risk equivalent to an instrument rated lower than double A.

To control the System's risk exposure, the Federal Housing Finance Board (the FHLBs' regulator) has established regulations and policies that the FHLBs must follow to evaluate and manage their credit and interest-rate risk. FHLBs must file periodic compliance reports, and the Finance Board conducts an annual on-site examination of each FHLB. Each FHLB's board of directors must establish risk-management policies that comport with Finance Board guidelines. Each FHLB is also required to adopt and implement a capital plan consistent with provisions of the Gramm Leach Bliley Act and Finance Board regulations. In 2002, the Finance Board approved the capital plan of each FHLB. These plans call for implementation over the next several years.

In 2002, the Administration encouraged all Government Sponsored Enterprises, including the FHLBs, to voluntarily register their equity securities with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). This voluntary registration is part of the Administration's efforts to have GSEs undergo the same scrutiny process as other corporate enterprises. Unlike Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, which have committed to participating in the disclosure process, the FHLBs have not yet decided to register their stock with the SEC.

The FHLBs' evolving member composition and investment activities raise questions about the degree to which the System continues to promote the public policy objective of providing liquidity to home mortgage lenders. As a result of opening membership to commercial banks and credit unions, for example, many member institutions now have very limited involvement in mortgage lending. In addition, like other GSEs, the FHLBs issue debt securities at close to U.S. Treasury rates and invest the proceeds in higher-yielding securities. Through September 2002, the FHLBs' investments other than advances rose to $215 billion, compared with $194 billion a year earlier. As a percentage of total assets, those investments remained at 28 percent. While these investments may enable the FHLBs to provide benefits to member institutions, they do not necessarily result in lower costs to home buyers. According to a report by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO), member advances can be used to fund other loans besides mortgages. While the CBO report found, through competitive pressures, that "members may be forced to pass most of the benefit through to their own customers," the report concluded that of the $3 billion annual subsidy that the FHLBs received from their funding advantage and other benefits in 2000, only $0.3 billion was passed on to mortgage borrowers in the form of lower interest rates.

Education Credit Programs and GSEs

The Federal Government guarantees loans through intermediary agencies and makes direct loans to students to encourage post-secondary education. The Student Loan Marketing Association (Sallie Mae), a GSE, securitizes guaranteed student loans.

Student Loans

The Department of Education helps to finance student loans through two major programs: the Federal Family Education Loan (FFEL) program and the William D. Ford Federal Direct Student Loan (Direct Loan) program. Eligible institutions of higher education may participate in one or both programs. Loans are available to students regardless of income. However, borrowers with low family incomes are eligible for additional interest subsidies. For these loans, the Federal Government subsidizes interest costs while borrowers are in school, during a six-month grace period after graduation, and during certain deferment periods.

In 2004, more than 6 million borrowers will receive over 12 million loans totaling $67 billion. Of this amount, nearly $48 billion is for new loans, and the remainder reflects the consolidation of existing loans. Loan levels have risen dramatically over the past 10 years as a result of rising educational costs, higher loan limits, and an increase in eligible borrowers.

The FFEL program provides loans through an administrative structure involving over 3,500 lenders, 36 State and private guaranty agencies, roughly 50 participants in the secondary market, and approximately 6,000 participating schools. Under FFEL, banks and other eligible lenders loan private capital to students and parents, guaranty agencies insure the loans, and the Federal Government reinsures the loans against borrower default. In 2004, FFEL lenders will disburse nearly 9 million loans totaling almost $47 billion in principal. Lenders bear two percent of the default risk, and the Federal Government is responsible for the remainder. The Department also makes administrative payments to guaranty agencies and pays interest subsidies to lenders.

The William D. Ford Direct Student Loan program was authorized by the Student Loan Reform Act of 1993. Under the Direct Loans program, the Federal Government provides loan capital directly to roughly 1200 schools, which then disburse loan funds to students. In 2004, the Direct Loan program will generate more than 3.5 million loans with a total value of nearly $20 billion. The program offers a variety of flexible repayment plans including income-contingent repayment, under which annual repayment amounts vary based on the income of the borrower and payments can be made over 25 years with any residual balances forgiven.

Recently, historically low interest rates have significantly affected the Federal costs and receipts associated with these programs, as well as borrowers' decisions to consolidate their student loans. In FFEL, for example, low interest rates have decreased the Federal interest subsidies paid to lenders on behalf of low-income borrowers while they are in school or during grace or deferment periods. In Direct Loans, the steep decline in short-term interest rates has decreased borrowers loan repayments, resulting in lower Federal receipts.

In recent years, low interest rates have also contributed to a dramatic increase in fixed-rate Consolidation Loans, which allow borrowers to combine one or more FFEL, Direct Loan, or other Federal student loans. When interest rates are low, borrowers have a strong incentive to consolidate their existing loans to lock in at a low fixed rate. In 1995, Consolidation Loans totaled $3.6 billion, accounting for roughly 13 percent of overall student loan volume. By 2002, these loans grew more than six fold to nearly $22.7 billion, making up approximately 56 percent of total student loan volume. This high rate of growth should slow if, as projected, interest rates increase from current levels. Consolidation Loans are projected to be $24.4 billion in 2003 and to decrease to $19.1 billion in 2004.

For Fiscal Year 2004, the Administration is once again proposing to address the shortage of qualified, skilled math, science, and special education teachers in elementary and secondary schools by expanding loan forgiveness. This proposal builds upon the teacher loan forgiveness program authorized in the 1998 Higher Education Amendments, which provided up to $5,000 of loan forgiveness to teachers of any subject who teach for five consecutive years in schools serving low-income populations. The Administration is proposing to increase loan forgiveness to $17,500 for highly qualified teachers who teach math, science, or special education for five years in high-need schools. Such schools would include those with a high concentration of low-income students and those in which there is a large proportion of out-of-field math, science, and special education teachers.

Sallie Mae

The Student Loan Marketing Association (Sallie Mae) was chartered by Congress in 1972 as a for-profit, shareholder-owned, Government-sponsored enterprise (GSE). Sallie Mae was privatized in 1997 pursuant to the authority granted by the Student Loan Marketing Association Reorganization Act of 1996. The GSE is a wholly owned subsidiary of SLM Corporation and must wind down and be liquidated by September 30, 2008. In January 2002, the GSE's board of directors announced that it expects to complete dissolution of the GSE by September 30, 2006. The Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1999 allows the SLM Corporation to affiliate with a financial institution upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Any affiliation will require the holding company to dissolve the GSE within two years of the affiliation date (unless such period is extended by the Department of the Treasury).

Sallie Mae makes funds available for student loans by providing liquidity to lenders participating in the FFEL program. Sallie Mae purchases guaranteed student loans from eligible lenders and makes warehousing advances (secured loans to lenders). Generally, under the privatization legislation, the GSE cannot engage in any new business activities or acquire any additional program assets other than purchasing student loans. The GSE can continue to make warehousing advances under contractual commitments existing on August 7, 1997. Sallie Mae currently holds approximately 42 percent of all outstanding guaranteed student loans.

Business and Rural Development Credit Programs and GSEs

The Federal Government guarantees small business loans to promote entrepreneurship. The Government also offers direct loans and loan guarantees to farmers who may have difficulty obtaining credit elsewhere and to rural communities that need to develop and maintain infrastructure. Two GSEs, the Farm Credit System and the Federal Agricultural Mortgage Corporation, increase liquidity in the agricultural lending market.

Small Business Administration

The Small Business Administration (SBA), created in 1953, helps entrepreneurs start, sustain, and grow small businesses. As a "gap lender" SBA works to supplement market lending and provide access to credit where private lenders are reluctant to do so without a Government guarantee.

The 2004 Budget requests $226 million for SBA to leverage more than $20 billion in financing for small businesses. The 7(a) General Business Loan program will support $9.3 billion in guaranteed loans, while the 504 Certified Development Company program will support $4.5 billion in guaranteed loans. SBA will supplement the capital of Small Business Investment Companies (SBICs), which provide equity capital and long-term loans to small businesses, with $7 billion in participating securities and guaranteed debentures. In addition, SBA expects to provide $20 million in microloans, along with $15 million in technical assistance to increase the likelihood of success of these very small business borrowers.

To continue to serve the needs of small businesses, SBA will focus program management in three areas: (1) targeting economic assistance to the neediest small businesses, (2) improving risk management, and (3) operating more efficiently.

While SBA can guarantee loans up to $1 million, the greatest need for Government assistance is for loans below $150,000. Loans below $150,000 are usually for very small or start-up businesses. Lenders, however, are generally reluctant to make these loans due to high administrative costs and low financial returns. The SBA guarantee will encourage banks to increase the number of loans they make that are below $150,000.

To more effectively target economic assistance to small businesses, SBA will address the findings of a Program Assessment Rating Tool (PART), which was used to evaluate the 504 loan program. The PART found that the 504 program duplicates the 7(a) program in that both provide long-term financing for fixed assets (land, buildings, and large equipment). Additionally, the PART revealed that the 504 program does not have long-term, measurable public policy objectives that flow from an agency strategic plan. Finally, the PART found that the 504 program needs to increase the availability of intermediaries so that borrowers can more readily determine which of SBA's programs (7(a) or 504) better meets their needs.

To address these findings, the 2004 Budget proposes to increase program evaluations to determine the factors that affect both demand and performance in the 504 and 7(a) programs. The proposed evaluations would also compare the cost of 504, 7(a), and private sector loans. Further, SBA will solicit the public's views as it prepares to develop a regulation regarding long-term programmatic goals and increasing borrower choice for 504 and 7(a) loans.

Improving management by measuring and mitigating risks in SBA's $50 billion business loan portfolio is one of the agency's greatest challenges. As the agency delegates more responsibility to the private sector to administer SBA guaranteed loans, oversight functions become increasingly important. SBA established the Office of Lender Oversight, which is responsible for evaluating individual SBA lenders. This office will employ a variety of analytical techniques to ensure sound financial management by SBA and its lending partners, including overall financial performance analysis, industry concentration analysis, peer lending performance comparisons, portfolio performance analysis, and selected credit reviews. The oversight program will also encompass on-site safety and soundness examinations and off-site monitoring of Small Business Lending Companies (SBLCs) and compliance reviews of SBA lenders. In addition, the office will develop incentives for lenders to minimize defaults and to adopt measurable performance measures.

SBA has also been developing a Loan Monitoring System (LMS), which will further support lender oversight by improving SBA's data collection and processing capabilities, providing a direct and better interface with lenders, and helping to increase lender accountability.

Improving risk management also means improving SBA's ability to more accurately estimate the cost of subsidizing small business loans. This has been a source of some controversy for the Section 7(a) program in recent years. During the period of strong economic growth over the last few years, initial subsidy estimates appeared to significantly overstate actual experience for various loan cohorts. However, during the recent economic downturn, actual defaults have increased and are now more closely aligned with original projections. For the Section 7(a) program, SBA projected an estimate of $757 million in defaults for loans made in fiscal year 2002, which was only 2.3 percent higher than the actual amount of defaults, which was $740 million. For the Section 504 program, SBA underestimated fiscal year 2002 defaults by 8 percent. Although the agency projected $100 million in defaults for loans made in fiscal year 2002, actual defaults reached $108 million. Such swings in subsidy estimates are not surprising as statistical forecasts are not precise but rather represent the best estimates that can be made with available data.

The Administration has also made two technical improvements that enhance the Section 7(a) credit subsidy estimate. First, SBA has improved the quality of the data. Second, SBA has made significant progress in improving the accuracy of the subsidy estimate in the 7(a) program through the development of an econometric model. This new model incorporates predictive economic variables. As a result, the new model is more accurate in capturing yearly fluctuations in program performance than the straight averaging method applied in prior years. The difference can be substantial. Applying the econometric model to fiscal year 2003 produces a subsidy rate of 1.04 percent, rather than the 1.76 percent included in the fiscal year 2003 Budget that was delivered using the previous model.

Further, SBA is improving oversight and accounting practices in the ongoing sale of more than $5 billion in direct loans from SBA's portfolio. The agency is reassessing the accounting of prior sales to more accurately reflect the impact of asset sales on the overall cost of SBA's direct loans. SBA is committed to resolving accounting discrepancies prior to conducting any further asset sales. SBA also sells 7(a) guaranteed loans through a master reserve fund (MRF), which serves as the agency's vehicle for managing loans sold in the secondary market. To properly manage any risk associated with this fund, SBA will budget and account for the Government's liability in accordance with the Federal Credit Reform Act. Specifically, SBA will reflect in the 2004 Budget the estimated liability of MRF financial activity. In the future SBA will refine these estimates and develop financial reports to measure portfolio risk.

To operate more efficiently, SBA will automate loan origination activities in the disaster loan program with a paperless loan application. As a result, loan-processing costs, times, and errors will decrease, while Government responsiveness to the needs of disaster victims will increase. While still in the design stage, SBA expects to begin full implementation of the paperless disaster loan application in 2004. Additionally, because loan-servicing functions can often be better performed by the private sector, SBA is subjecting performance of these activities to competition. The agency will, therefore, focus its resources on core programs such as providing access to capital, technical assistance, and Federal contracting opportunities.

USDA Rural Infrastructure and Business Development Programs

USDA provides grants, loans, and loan guarantees to communities for constructing facilities such as health-care clinics, day-care centers, and water and wastewater systems. Direct loans are available at lower interest rates for the poorest communities. These programs have very low default rates. The cost associated with them is due primarily to subsidized interest rates that are below the prevailing Treasury rates.

The program level for the Water and Waste (W&W) loan and grant program in the 2004 President's Budget is $1.5 billion. These funds are available to communities of 10,000 or less residents. The program finances drinking water, sewer, solid waste disposal, and storm drainage facilities through direct or guaranteed loans and grants. In order to qualify, applicant communities must be unable to finance their needs through their own resources or with credit from commercial lenders. Priority is given to loans serving smaller communities that have greater financial need, based on their median household income, poverty levels, and size of service population as determined by the USDA's field office staff. The community typically receives a combination of loans and grants depending on how much they can afford. The grant is usually for 35–45% of the project cost (it can be up to 75%). Loans are for 40 years with interest rates based on a three-tiered structure (poverty, intermediate, and market) depending on community income. The community facility programs are targeted to rural communities with fewer than 20,000 residents and have a program level of $477 million in 2004. USDA also provides grants, direct loans, and loan guarantees to assist rural businesses, including cooperatives, to increase employment and diversify the rural economy. In 2004, USDA proposes to provide $602 million in loan guarantees to rural businesses (these loans serve communities of 50,000 or less).

These community programs are all part of the Rural Community Advancement Program (RCAP). Under RCAP, States have increased flexibility within the three funding streams for Water and Wastewater, Community Facilities, and Business and Industry (B&I). USDA also provides loans through the Intermediary Relending Program (IRP), which provides loan funds at a 1 percent interest rate to an intermediary such as a State or local government agency that, in turn, provides funds for economic and community development projects in rural areas. In 2003, USDA expects to retain or create 53,494 new jobs through the B&I guarantee and the IRP loan programs.

Electric and Telecommunications Loans

USDA's rural electric and telecommunications program makes new loans to maintain existing infrastructure and to modernize electric and telephone service in rural America. Historically, the Federal risk associated with the $40 billion loan portfolio in electric and telephone loans has been small, although several large defaults have occurred in the electric program. In 1997, $667 million worth of largely nuclear power construction loans was written off, but this case was unusual. The large nuclear generation loans have proven to be the most risky electric loans. USDA has not approved a nuclear power generation loan for over 20 years.

The subsidy rates for most of the electric and telecommunication programs are negative. The subsidy rates have decreased largely due to the low interest rates that are projected in the Budget and used to discount future loan repayments. The default rates for both programs are very low, less than one percent. With increased deregulation, however, there is the possibility of increased defaults in the electric program because competition resulting from deregulation may erode the ability of some borrowers to repay. So far there has not been any significant effect on rural cooperatives due to deregulation. As information on the impact of deregulation increases, this risk will be factored into the default rates. In addition, recent problems in the telecommunications industry have not had a significant impact on rural telecommunications cooperatives. The number of electric loans has been increasing due to large increases in loan level appropriated over the last several years. The average size for electric loans has also been increasing. The number and the size of telecommunications loans have remained steady.

Providing funding and services to needy areas is of concern to USDA. Many rural cooperatives provide service to areas where there are high poverty rates. Based on findings of the PART analysis, the 2004 Budget proposes to increase funding (increases of $120 million for electric loans and $70 million for telecommunications loans) to those electric and telecommunications loans which are targeted to severely depressed areas. USDA will target electric loan funds to areas of high poverty. These changes will increase the availability of utility service in needy areas, improving the quality of life and helping to retain and attract businesses. In addition, to ensure the program's focus on rural areas, the Budget proposes to require recertification of rural status for each electric and telecommunications borrower on the first loan request received in or after FY 2004 and on the first loan request received after each subsequent Census.

USDA's Rural Utilities Service (RUS) proposes to make $2.6 billion in direct and guaranteed loans in 2004 to rural electric cooperatives, public bodies, nonprofit associations, and other utilities in rural areas for generating, transmitting, and distributing electricity. This funding request includes provision for guaranteeing $100 million in electric loans made by private banks. The demand for loans to rural electric cooperatives has been increasing and is expected to increase further as borrowers replace many of the 40-year-old electric plants. With the $2.6 billion in loans, RUS borrowers are expected to upgrade 225 rural electric systems, which will benefit over 3.4 million customers and create or preserve approximately 50,000 jobs.

USDA's RUS proposes to make $495 million in direct loans in 2004 to companies providing telecommunications in rural areas. The uses of the telecommunication loans are changing from bringing service to new customers to upgrading existing service with new technology. With the $495 million in loans, RUS borrowers are expected to fund over 50 telecommunication systems for advanced telecommunications services. This funding will provide broadband and high-speed Internet access and benefit over 300 thousand rural customers.

The Rural Telephone Bank (RTB), which provides financing for rural telecommunications systems, is in the process of privatization. The 2004 Budget does not propose funding to support new loans. There is significant member and borrower support for statutorily authorized privatization. The RTB is financially able to privatize by the end of 2004, and this provides enough time to finish a privatization study and prepare for privatization. The RTB is provided full salaries and expenses to service existing loans, to finish a privatization study, and prepare for privatization by the end of 2004.

The Distance Learning and Telemedicine program provides grants and loans to improve distance learning and telemedicine services in rural areas and encourage students, teachers, medical professionals, and rural residents to use telecommunications, computer networks, and related advanced technologies. With the $25 million in grants and $50 million in loans, RUS borrowers are expected to provide distance learning facilities to 300 schools, libraries, and rural education centers and also provide telemedicine equipment to 150 rural health care providers, benefiting millions of residents in rural America.

There were various legislative actions that impacted RUS. This includes the Local TV Act that provides authorization for RUS to provide loans to bring local television to rural customers. Funding was provided in the 2002 appropriations and in the 2002 Farm Bill. The 2002 Farm Bill also authorized a broadband loan program and provided funding through 2007. This program will help bring high speed Internet access to rural areas. The 2004 Budget proposes converting the mandatory broadband funding into discretionary funding.

Loans to Farm Operators

Farm Service Agency (FSA) assists low-income family farmers in starting and maintaining viable farming operations. Emphasis is placed upon aiding beginning and socially disadvantaged farmers. FSA offers operating loans and ownership loans, both of which may be either direct or guaranteed loans. Operating loans provide credit to farmers and ranchers for annual production expenses and purchases of livestock, machinery, and equipment. Farm ownership loans assist producers in acquiring and developing their farming or ranching operations. As a condition of eligibility for direct loans, borrowers must be unable to obtain private credit at reasonable rates and terms. As FSA is the "lender of last resort,"default rates on FSA direct loans are generally higher than those on private-sector loans. However, in recent years the loss rate has decreased to 4.8 percent in 2002, compared with 5.4 percent in 1999.

FSA guaranteed farm loans are made to more creditworthy borrowers who have access to private credit markets. Because the private loan originators must retain 10 percent of the risk, they exercise care in examining the repayment ability of borrowers. As a result, losses on guaranteed farm loans have been low. As for direct loans, the default rate on guaranteed loans declined in recent years; it was percent 0.6 percent in 2002, as compared with 0.9 percent in 1999.

The 2002 Farm Bill changed some of the requirements for managing inventory property. Property acquired through foreclosure on direct loans must now be sold at auction within 165, rather than 105 days of acquisition. The new rule allows more time to advertise and encourage participation from beginning farmers.

The subsidy rates for these programs have been fluctuating over the past several years. These fluctuations are mainly due to the interest component of the subsidy rate. The default rates for these programs tend to be below ten percent. As shown above, both the direct and guaranteed loans have experienced a decreasing default rate.

In fiscal year 2002, FSA provided loans and loan guarantees to approximately 30,000 family farmers totaling $3.5 billion. The number of loans provided by these programs have fluctuated over the past several years. The average size for farm loans has been increasing. The majority of assistance provided in the operating loan program is to existing FSA farm borrowers. In the farm ownership program, new customers receive the bulk of the benefits furnished.

In the last few years, the demand for FSA direct and guaranteed loans have been high due to crop/livestock price decreases and some regional production problems. In 2004, USDA's FSA proposes to make $3.5 billion in direct and guaranteed loans through discretionary programs.

USDA's Loan Sale Initiative

In 2004, USDA's Rural Development along with the Farm Service Agency will conduct a review and develop a pilot loan asset sale. The sale should include both performing and non-performing loans with a loan mix that results in the greater budgetary savings for the Federal government. Although the exact mix of loans has not been determined a placeholder has been included in the 2004 Budget to reflect the sale.

The Farm Credit System and Farmer Mac

The Farm Credit System (FCS or System) and the Federal Agricultural Mortgage Corporation (Farmer Mac) are Government-Sponsored Enterprises (GSEs) that enhance credit availability for the agricultural sector. The FCS provides production, equipment, and mortgage lending to farmers and ranchers, aquatic producers, their cooperatives, and related businesses, while Farmer Mac provides a secondary market for agricultural real estate and rural housing mortgages. Both GSEs face a business risk because their borrowers are generally dependent on a single economic sector, agriculture. The downturn in the agricultural sector in the 1980s caused severe financial difficulties within the FCS.

Legislation in 1987 provided temporary Federal assistance to the FCS and created Farmer Mac. The Nation's agricultural sector and, in turn, its lenders continue to exhibit stability in their income and balance sheets. Unfortunately, this is due,in part, to ad-hoc Government emergency assistance payments that have been provided from 1998 through 2001. The current economic malaise that began in 2001 may not have a significant effect on the agricultural economy because the farm economic cycle doesn't quite coincide with the general economic cycle. Commodity prices remained relatively low in 2002, and drought conditions were widespread. Long-term forecasts are for gradual recovery in commodity prices. Farm income levels, including Government payments, have enabled most borrowers to maintain low debt-to-asset ratios and lenders to keep loan delinquencies well below problem thresholds. However, such aggregate facts may mask the problems of certain sectors within the farm economy as is evident in the rice and cotton sectors where prices are down 50 and 44 percent, respectively, this year when compared to their respective ten year price averages. Farmland values increased moderately in 2001 (up 4.5 percent) due to a combination of Government payments and urban influences. Projections for 2002 see a minimal rise of 1.0 percent in farmland values.

Commercial banks continued their long standing hold on the predominant market share of all farm debt registering a 40.5 percent share in 2001. The FCS trailed with a significant share of 28.3 percent. The United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) direct farm loan programs market share was 3.8 percent, though that percentage would more than double if adjusted for its guaranteed loans issued through private institutional lenders. USDA expects that both commercial banks and the FCS have maintained their market share in 2002.

The Farm Credit System

The financial condition of the System's banks and associations during 2002 continued a 14-year trend of improving financial health and performance. Improved asset quality and strong income generation enabled FCS to post record capital levels: on September 30, 2002, capital stood at $15.2 billion—an increase of 8.9 percent for the year. Not included in the $15.2 billion is restricted capital totaling $1.8 billion held by the Farm Credit System Insurance Corporation (FCSIC). Loan volume has increased since 1995 to $87.9 billion in September 2002, which easily surpasses the high of $81.9 billion in the early 1980s. The rate of asset growth seen in the years 2001 and 2000 has been significant, 7.2 percent and 6.0 percent respectively. The rate of capital accumulation, however, has been greater, resulting in total capital equaling 15.3 percent of total assets at yearend 2000 and 15.8 percent at yearend 2001. Non-performing assets increased slightly to 1.4 percent of the portfolio in September 2002 after remaining steadfast at 1.2 percent in both December 2001 and December 2000. Competitive pressures have narrowed the FCS's net interest margin from 3.03 percent in 1995 to 2.82 percent in 2001. The net interest margin has remained relatively stable at about the 2001 level during 2002. However, the net interest margin is expected to increase in the near-term, given the lower interest rate environment seen through 2002. Substantial consolidation continues in the structure of the FCS. In January 1995, there were nine banks and 232 associations; by October 2002, the numbers reduced to seven banks and 103 associations. From October 2001 to October 2002, the number of associations fell by 12 because of mergers and acquisitions.

The 1987 legislation established FCSIC to ensure timely payment of interest and principal on FCS obligations. FCSIC's net assets, largely comprised of premiums paid by FCS institutions, supplements the System's capital and supports the joint and several liability of all System banks for FCS obligations. On September 30, 2002, FCSIC's net assets totaling $1.6 billion were slightly below (1.94 percent) the statutory minimum of 2.0 percent of outstanding debt. The Insurance Corporation resumed premium collection from System institutions in 2002 and will quadruple its premium rate in 2003 to ensure the Insurance Fund grows in concert with the expansion in the System's outstanding debt necessitated by strong growth in its loan portfolio.

Improvement in the FCS's financial condition is also reflected in the examinations of FCS member institutions by the Farm Credit Administration (FCA), its Federal regulator. Each of the System institutions is rated under the FCA Financial Institution Rating System (FIRS) for capital, asset quality, management, earnings, liquidity, and sensitivity. At the beginning of 1995, 197 institutions carried the best FIRS ratings of 1 or 2, 36 were rated 3, one institution was rated 4, and no institutions received the lowest rating of 5. In September 2002, in contrast, all but one of the 111 institutions were given ratings of 1 or 2, the remaining one, a relatively small association, was rated 3. As of September 30, 2002, there were no FCS institutions under an enforcement action.

The System had $87.9 billion in gross loans outstanding as of September 30, 2002. Total loans outstanding have grown by $7.8 billion, or 9.8 percent, over the year ended September 30, 2002, and by $24.9 billion, or 39.5 percent, over the past five years. The volume of lending secured by farmland increased 47.6 percent, while farm-operating loans have increased 41.6 percent since 1997. Total members served increased about 3 percent during the past year. Agricultural producers represented by far the largest borrower group, with $68.1 billion including loans to rural homeowners and leases, or more than three-quarters of the total dollar amount of loans outstanding. As required by law, all borrowers are also stockholder of System institutions. The System has more than 444,000 stockholders; about 84 percent of these are farmers with voting stock. Over half of the System's total loan volume outstanding (51.0 percent) is in long-term real estate loans, over one-quarter (26.5 percent) is in short- and intermediate-term loans to agricultural producers, and 19.1 percent is to cooperatives. International loans (export financing) represent 3.4 percent of the System's loan portfolio.

The System, while continuing to record strong earnings and capital growth, remains exposed to numerous risks, including concentration risk, changes in Government assistance payments, the volatility of exports and crop prices, and lower non-farm earnings of farm households associated with weakness in the general economy.

Farmer Mac

Farmer Mac was established in 1987 to facilitate a secondary market for farm real estate and rural housing loans. Since the Agricultural Credit Act of 1987, there have been several amendments to Farmer Mac's chartering statute. Perhaps the most significant amending legislation for Farmer Mac was the Farm Credit System Reform Act of 1996 that transformed Farmer Mac from a guarantor of securities backed by loan pools into a direct purchaser of mortgages, enabling it to form pools to securitize. The 1996 Act increased Farmer Mac's ability to achieve its statutory mission. Since the passage of the 1996 Act, Farmer Mac's program activities and business have steadily increased.

Farmer Mac continues to meet statutory minimum core capital requirements. Additionally, Farmer Mac was first required to be in compliance with FCA's risk-based capital rule and stress test on May 23, 2002. This rule and stress test determine the minimum level of regulatory capital necessary to enable Farmer Mac to maintain positive capital during stressful credit and interest rate risk conditions. Farmer Mac is in compliance with the regulatory capital requirements of the risk-based capital rule and stress test.

International Credit Programs

Seven Federal agencies, the Department of Agriculture (USDA), the Department of Defense, the Department of State, the Department of the Treasury, the Agency for International Development (USAID), the Export-Import Bank, and the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC), provide direct loans, loan guarantees, and insurance to a variety of foreign private and sovereign borrowers. These programs are intended to level the playing field for U.S. exporters, deliver robust support for U.S. manufactured goods, stabilize international financial markets, and promote sustainable development.

Leveling the Playing Field

Federal export credit programs counter subsidies that foreign governments, largely in Europe and Japan, provide their exporters, usually through export credit agencies (ECAs). The U.S. Government has worked since the 1970's to constrain official credit support through a multilateral agreement in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). This agreement has significantly constrained direct interest rate subsidies and tied-aid grants. Further negotiations resulted in a multilateral agreement that standardized the fees for sovereign lending across all ECAs beginning in April 1999. Fees for non-sovereign lending, however, continue to vary widely across ECAs and markets, thereby providing implicit subsidies.

The Export-Import Bank attempts to strategically "level the playing field" and to fill gaps in the availability of private export credit. The Export-Import Bank provides export credits, in the form of direct loans or loan guarantees, to U.S. exporters who meet basic eligibility criteria and who request the Bank's assistance. USDA's "GSM" programs similarly help to level the playing field. Like programs of other agricultural exporting nations, GSM programs guarantee payment from countries and entities that want to import U.S. agricultural products but cannot easily obtain credit. The U.S. has been negotiating in the OECD the terms of agricultural export financing, the outcome of which could affect the GSM programs.

Stabilizing International Financial Markets

In today's global economy, the health and prosperity of the American economy depend importantly on the stability of the global financial system and the economic health of our major trading partners. The United States can contribute to orderly exchange arrangements and a stable system of exchange rates by providing resources on a multilateral basis through the IMF (discussed in other sections of the Budget), and through financial support provided by the Exchange Stabilization Fund (ESF).

The ESF may provide "bridge loans" to other countries in times of short-term liquidity problems and financial crises. In the past, "bridge loans" from ESF provided dollars to a country over a short period before the disbursement of an IMF loan to the country. Also, a package of up to $20 billion of medium-term ESF financial support was made available to Mexico during its crisis in 1995. Such support was essential in helping to stabilize Mexican and global financial markets. Mexico paid back its borrowings under this package ahead of schedule in 1997, and the United States earned almost $600 million in interest. There was zero subsidy cost for the United States as defined under credit reform, as the medium-term credit carried interest rates reflecting an appropriate country risk premium.

The United States also expressed a willingness to provide ESF support in response to the financial crises affecting some countries such as South Korea in 1997 and Brazil in 1998. It did not prove necessary to provide an ESF credit facility for Korea, but the United States agreed to guarantee through the ESF up to $5 billion of a $13.2 billion Bank for International Settlements credit facility for Brazil. Such support helped to provide the international confidence needed by these countries to begin the stabilization process.

Using Credit to Promote Sustainable Development

REV_00106411

Credit is an important tool in U.S. bilateral assistance to promote sustainable development. In 2002, all of USAID's credit programs were consolidated to create the unified Development Credit Authority (DCA), which allows USAID to use a variety of credit tools to support its development activities abroad. This unit encompasses newer DCA activities, such as municipal bond guarantees for local governments in developing countries, as well as USAID's traditional microenterprise and urban environmental credit programs. DCA provides non-sovereign loans and loan guarantees in targeted cases where credit serves more effectively than traditional grant mechanisms to achieve sustainable development. DCA is intended to mobilize host country private capital to finance sustainable development in line with USAID's strategic objectives. Through the use of partial loan guarantees and risk sharing with the private sector, DCA stimulates private-sector lending for financially viable development projects, thereby leveraging host-country capital and strengthening subnational capital markets in the developing world. While there is clear demand for DCA's facilities in some emerging economies, the utilization rate for these facilities is still very low.

OPIC also supports a mix of development, employment, and export goals by promoting U.S. direct investment in developing countries. OPIC pursues these goals through political risk insurance, direct loans, and guarantee products, which provide finance, as well as associated skills and technology transfers. These programs are intended to create more efficient financial markets, eventually encouraging the private sector to supplant OPIC finance in developing countries. OPIC has also created a number of investment funds that provide equity to local companies with strong development potential.

Ongoing Coordination

International credit programs are coordinated through two groups to ensure consistency in policy design and credit implementation. The Trade Promotion Coordinating Committee (TPCC) works within the Administration to develop a National Export Strategy to make the delivery of trade promotion support more effective and convenient for U.S. exporters.

The Interagency Country Risk Assessment System (ICRAS) standardizes the way in which agencies budget for the risk of international lending. The cost of lending by the agencies is governed by ratings and ICRAS default estimates. The methodology establishes assumptions about default risks in international lending using averages of international bond market data. The strength of this method is its link to the market.

For 2004, OMB used the 2003 methodology, updated for current market data. The 2003 methodology was a significant revision which uses more sophisticated financial analyses and comprehensive market data, and better isolates the expected cost of default implicit in interest rates charged by private investors to sovereign borrowers. All else equal, this change expands the level of international lending an agency can support with a given appropriation. For example, the Export-Import Bank will be able to generally provide higher lending levels using lower appropriations in 2004.

Adapting to Changing Market Conditions

Overall, officially supported finance and transfers account for a tiny fraction of international capital flows. Furthermore, the private sector is continuously adapting its size and role in emerging markets finance to changing market conditions. In response, the Administration is working to adapt international lending at Export-Import Bank and OPIC to dynamic private sector finance. The Export-Import Bank, for example, is developing a sharper focus on lending that would otherwise not occur without Federal assistance. Measures under development include reducing risks, collecting fees from program users, and improving the focus on exporters who truly cannot access private export finance.

OPIC in the past has focused relatively narrowly on providing financing and insurance services to large U.S. companies investing abroad. As a result, OPIC did not devote significant resources to its mission of promoting development through mobilizing private capital. OPIC is developing and implementing policy changes that reflect the mandate to revitalize its core development mission.

These changes at the Export-Import Bank and at OPIC will place more emphasis on correcting market imperfections as the private sector's ability to bear emerging market risks becomes larger, more sophisticated, and more efficient.

Due to sufficient carry-over resources, the Budget does not request subsidy appropriations for the Export-Import Bank. The carry-over balance will support a projected increase over the Bank's level of lending in 2003. The Budget provides $24 million for OPIC credit subsidy in 2004.

Performance Assessment

For FY 2004, The Administration used the Performance Assessment Rating Tool (PART) to rate Export-Import Bank's long term guarantee program and OPIC's finance program. The PART revealed that both of these programs were well-managed, but need to strengthen their performance measures. The Administration will work with these Agencies to develop and implement more effective performance measures.

IV. INSURANCE PROGRAMS

Deposit Insurance

Federal deposit insurance was established in the depression of the 1930s, which prompted the need to protect small depositors and prevent bank failures from causing widespread disruption in financial markets. Before the establishment of Federal deposit insurance, failures of some depository institutions often caused depositors to lose confidence in the banking system as a whole and rush to withdraw deposits from other institutions. Such sudden withdrawals would seriously disrupt the economy.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) insures the deposits in banks and savings associations (thrifts) through separate insurance funds, the Bank Insurance Fund (BIF) and the Savings Association Insurance Fund (SAIF). Deposits of credit unions are insured through the National Credit Union Administration (NCUA). Deposits are currently insured up to $100,000 per account. The FDIC insures a combined $3.3 trillion of deposits at almost 8,000 commercial banks and 1,500 savings institutions. The NCUA insures almost 10,000 credit unions with $432 billion in insured shares.

Current Industry and Insurance Fund Conditions

The 1980s and early 1990s were a turbulent period for the banking industry, with over 1,400 bank failures and 1,100 thrift failures. The Federal Government responded with the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act of 1989 and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Improvement Act of 1991, which were largely designed to improve the safety and soundness of the banking system. These reforms, combined with more favorable economic conditions, helped to restore the health of depository institutions and the deposit insurance system.

One SAIF member and 8 BIF members with a combined $2.5 billion dollars in assets failed during 2002. Since 1997, assets associated with BIF failures have averaged $778 million per year. During 2002, 14 Federally insured credit unions with $57 million in assets failed (including assisted mergers). The FDIC currently classifies 148 institutions with $42 billion in assets as "problem institutions," compared to 94 institutions with $18 billion in assets a year ago. By comparison, at the height of the banking crisis in 1989, failed assets rose to over $150 billion.

Bank earnings increased in fiscal year 2002. The industry net income totaled $87 billion in fiscal year 2002, an increase of 19 percent from fiscal year 2001. The largest factor in the earnings increase in 2002 is higher net interest income, which has more than offset a rise in loan loss provisions. Thrift earnings also increased in fiscal year 2002. Net income during fiscal year 2002 was $3 billion higher than a year ago. Despite these favorable conditions, the banking industry faces numerous challenges ahead. Specific areas of concern for FDIC-insured institutions include (1) continuing credit losses at large banks on loans to large, corporate borrowers, (2) concentrations of credit risk among smaller institutions headquartered in formerly fast-growing metro areas, and (3) subprime lenders, which continue to figure prominently among failed and troubled institutions.

In the first calendar year quarter of 2002, the reserve ratio (ratio of insurance reserves to insured deposits) of BIF fell to 1.23-percent, below the 1.25-percent statutory target. The ratio, however, recovered in subsequent quarters. As of September 30, 2002, BIF had estimated reserves of $31 billion, or 1.25 percent of insured deposits. The SAIF reserve ratio remained comfortably above 1.25-percent. As of September 30, 2002, SAIF had reserves of $12 billion, or 1.39 percent of insured deposits. Through June 30, 3003, the FDIC will continue to maintain deposit insurance premiums in a range from zero for the healthiest institutions to 27 cents per $100 of assessable deposits for the riskiest institutions. In May, the FDIC will set assessment rates for July through December of this year. Due to the strong financial condition of the industry and the insurance funds, 91 percent of commercial banks and 90 percent of thrifts did not pay insurance premiums in 2002.

The National Credit Union Share Insurance Fund (NCUSIF) also remains strong with assets of $6 billion. Each insured credit union is required to deposit and maintain an amount equal to 1 percent of its member share accounts in the fund. Premiums were waived during 2002 because sufficient investment income was generated. For the first time in six years, the NCUA Board did not approve a dividend for calendar year 2001, as the Fund's equity ratio did not exceed 1.30 percent. As the equity ratio did not exceed 1.30 percent in 2002, the Fund will not restore dividends this year.

As a result of consolidation, fewer large banks control an increasingly substantial share of banking assets. Thus, the failure of even one of these large institutions could strain the insurance fund. Banks are increasingly using sophisticated financial instruments such as asset-backed securities and financial derivatives, which could have unforeseen effects on risk levels. Whether or not these new instruments add to risk, they do complicate the work of regulators who must gauge each institution's financial health and the potential for deposit insurance losses that a troubled institution may represent.

Federal Deposit Insurance Reform

While the deposit insurance system is in good condition, the Administration proposes to make improvements in the operation and fairness of the deposit insurance system for banks and thrifts. The 2004 Budget proposes to merge the BIF and the SAIF, which offer an identical product. A single merged fund would be stronger and better diversified than either fund alone. A merged fund would prevent the possibility that institutions posing similar risks would again pay significantly different premiums for the same product. Under the current system, the FDIC is required to maintain a designated reserve ratio (DRR, the ratio of insurance fund reserves to total insured deposits) of 1.25 percent. If insurance fund reserves falls below the DRR, the FDIC must charge either sufficient premiums to restore the reserve ratio to 1.25 percent within one year, or no less than 23 basis points if the reserve ratio remains below 1.25 percent for more than one year. The Administration's proposal would give the FDIC authority to adjust the DRR periodically within prescribed upper and lower bounds and greater discretion in determining how quickly it restores the DRR to target levels. This flexibility would help reduce potential pro-cyclical effects by stabilizing industry costs over time and avoiding sharp premium increases when the economy may be under stress. Finally, the FDIC has been prohibited since 1996 from charging premiums to "well-capitalized" and well-run institutions as long as insurance fund reserves equal or exceed 1.25 percent of insured deposits. Therefore, only nine percent of banks and ten percent of thrifts pay insurance premiums, allowing a large number of financial institutions to rapidly increase their insured deposits without any contribution to the insurance fund. The Administration proposal would repeal this prohibition to ensure that institutions with rapidly increasing insured deposits or greater risks appropriately compensate the insurance fund.

Pension Guarantees

The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation (PBGC) insures most defined-benefit pension plans sponsored by private employers. PBGC pays the benefits guaranteed by law when a company with an underfunded pension plan becomes insolvent. PBGC's exposure to claims relates to the underfunding of pension plans, that is, to any amount by which vested future benefits exceed plan assets. In the near term, its loss exposure results from financially distressed firms with underfunded plans. In the longer term, additional loss exposure results from the possibilities that currently healthy firms become distressed in the future and that currently well-funded plans become underfunded due to inadequate contributions or poor investment results.

The number of plans insured by PBGC has been declining as small companies with defined-benefit plans terminate them and shift to defined-contribution pension arrangements such as 401(k) accounts. The number of plans with 1,000 or more participants increased slightly during the1980's but started to decline in the 1990's. The increase in the number of participants in PBGC-insured plans—from 38 million in 1985 to almost 44 million in calendar 2002—is attributable to aging of the participant population, which includes retirees, separated vested workers, and beneficiaries of deceased workers and retirees, in addition to active workers. The number of active workers in PBGC-covered plans fell from almost 27 million in calendar1985 to fewer than 23 million in calendar 2000, a decrease of 15 percent. If the trend continues, active workers may constitute less than half of PBGC-insured participants in calendar 2003.

PBGC's single-employer program returned to a deficit position in 2002 for the first time in seven years, as a result of record losses on plan terminations in 2001 and 2002. LTV, a steel company, terminated its plan with underfunding of nearly $2 billion, which then was PBGC's largest claim ever. Other large underfunded terminations during the fiscal year included Reliance Insurance Company, RTI, Anchor Glass Container Corporation, and Polaroid Corporation. Additionally, in December 2002, an even larger pension plan than LTV terminated. Bethlehem Steel's plan covers 95,000 workers and retirees and is underfunded by about $4.3 billion, of which PBGC is liable for about $3.7 billion.

PBGC's "snapshot" current measure of financial position (deficit or surplus) includes the financial effects only of pension plans that have already terminated and of seriously underfunded large plans for which termination is considered "probable." Additional risk and exposure may remain for the future because of economic uncertainties and significant underfunding in pension plans. Some of the companies with the most underfunded plans are in troubled industries (like airlines or the old-line steel companies), or already are in Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings. Because pension underfunding and risk are concentrated in a relatively small number of plans and industries, the number and size of claims is often volatile from year to year. As a result of this volatility, budget estimates are based on an average of recent claims experience.

PBGC monitors troubled companies with underfunded plans and acts, in bankruptcies, to protect its beneficiaries and the future of the program. Such protections include, where necessary, initiating plan termination. Under its Early Warning Program, PBGC negotiates settlements with companies that improve pension security and reduce PBGC's future exposure to risk. Working with the rest of the Administration, PBGC is identifying options to address structural weaknesses that exacerbate pension underfunding and potential losses to PBGC, workers and retirees, in the event of plan termination.

In 2002, overall investment returns in PBGC's single-employer program were 2.1 percent, with negative returns in its trust funds, which hold mostly equities, and positive returns in the revolving funds, which are invested in U.S. Government securities. Single-employer premium revenues decreased slightly from $821 million to $787 million.

PBGC's multiemployer program, which guarantees pension benefits of certain unionized plans offered by several employers in an industry, remained financially strong, however. The program had a gain in 2002 as

PBGC continues to speed up issuance of benefit determinations so that when a participant retires, PBGC can put him or her into pay status with a final (rather than estimated) benefit amount, thereby providing the participant certainty and avoiding the complexities and costs associated with benefit adjustments. The average calculation time for benefit determinations issued in 2002 was 3.3 years, down from 4.9 years in 2000. Improved automated benefit calculation programs are reducing the cost of determining the final benefits and helping to speed the process. This automation will help PBGC administer benefits for the 89,000 participants taken into trusteeship in 2001 and the 187,000 new participants in 2002, the largest increase in new participants in PBGC's history. PBGC is working to send first benefit checks more speedily. In 2002, 95 percent of pensioners got their first benefit checks within three months of completing their applications. PBGC also has established a pilot project that enables participants in certain plans to estimate their benefits online at PBGC's website.

Disaster Insurance

Flood Insurance

The Federal Government provides flood insurance through the National Flood Insurance Program (NFIP), which is administered by the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) (the program was formerly administered by the Federal Emergency Management Agency). Flood insurance is available to homeowners and businesses in communities that have adopted and enforced appropriate flood plain management measures. Coverage is limited to buildings and their contents. By 2004, the program is projected to have approximately 4.7 million policies from more than 19,000 communities with $699 billion of insurance in force.

Prior to the creation of the program in 1968, many factors made it cost prohibitive for private insurance companies alone to make affordable flood insurance available. In response, the NFIP was established to make insurance coverage widely available. The NFIP requires building standards and other mitigation efforts to reduce losses, and operates a flood hazard mapping program to quantify the geographic risk of flooding. These efforts have made substantial progress.

The number of policies in the program has grown significantly over time. The number of enrolled policies grew from 2.4 to 4.3 million between 1990 and 2001, and by about 42,000 policies in 2002. DHS is using three strategies to increase the number of flood insurance policies in force: lender compliance, program simplification, and expanded marketing. DHS is educating financial regulators about the mandatory flood insurance requirement for properties with mortgages from federally regulated lenders. The NFIP also has a multipronged strategy for reducing future flood damage. The NFIP offers mitigation insurance to allow flood victims to rebuild to code, thereby reducing future flood damage costs. Further, DHS adjusts premium rates to encourage community and State mitigation activities beyond those required by the NFIP.

Despite these efforts, the program faces financial challenges. The program's financing account, which is a cash fund, has sometimes had expenses greater than its revenue, preventing it from building sufficient long-term reserves. This is mostly because a large portion of the policyholders pay subsidized premiums. DHS charges subsidized premiums for properties built before a community adopted the NFIP building standards. Properties built subsequently are charged actuarially fair rates. The creators of the NFIP assumed that eventually the NFIP would become self-sustaining as older properties left the program. The share of subsidized properties in the program has fallen, but remains substantial; it was 70 percent in 1978 and is 29 percent today.

Until the mid-1980s, Congress appropriated funds periodically to support subsidized premiums. However, the program has not received appropriations since 1986. During the 1990s, FEMA relied on Treasury borrowing to help finance its loss expenses (the NFIP may borrow up to $1.5 billion). As of October 31, 2002, the NFIP had repaid all of its outstanding debt.

The NFIP was evaluated on its effectiveness and efficiency this year using the Program Assessment Rating Tool (PART). The PART revealed that the program has clear purpose and is well designed, with the exception of the fact that it is not actuarially sound. The program also received high marks for strategic planning, demonstrating that it has both well-defined long-term and annual goals.

Although the program is generally well run, it receives some criticism about the low participation rate and the inclusion of subsidized properties, especially those that are repetitively flooded. Currently, less than half of the eligible properties in identified flood plains participate in this program. In comparison, the participation rate for private wind and hurricane insurance is nearly 90 percent in at-risk areas. Given that flood damage causes roughly $6 billion in property damage annually, DHS will have to evaluate its incentive structure to attract more participation in the program, while not encouraging misuse of the program. The Budget also proposes a $300 million predisaster mitigation grant program to be funded within DHS, some of which will be targeted to buyouts of repetitively flooded properties.

Crop Insurance

Subsidized Federal crop insurance administered by USDA's Risk Management Agency (RMA) assists farmers in managing yield shortfalls due to bad weather or other natural disasters. Private companies are reluctant to offer multi-peril crop insurance without Government reinsurance because of the difficulty of limiting risk exposure; insurance companies are exposed to large losses because losses tend to occur across a wide geographic area. For example, a drought usually affects many farms at the same time. In 2002, much of the agriculture region across the US suffered from severe drought conditions. As a result, the amount of claim payments made under the crop insurance program increased significantly. This suggests that the Federal Government plays an important role in mitigating the risks faced by the agricultural community. RMA continues to create new products for commodities that are not offered coverage under the current crop insurance program so that the Government can reduce the need for ad-hoc disaster assistance payments to the agriculture community in bad years.

The USDA crop insurance program is a cooperative effort between the Federal Government and the private insurance industry. Private insurance companies sell and service crop insurance policies. The Federal Government reimburses private companies for the administrative expenses associated with providing crop insurance and reinsures the private companies for excess insurance losses on all policies. The Federal Government also subsidizes premiums for farmers. In crop year 2002, 216 million acres were insured, with an estimated $2.9 billion in total premium income, including $1.7 billion in premium subsidy.

Included in the 2004 Budget is a proposal to amend the Federal Crop Insurance Act by limiting the reimbursement rate the private insurance companies receive for administrative costs to 20 percent of the premiums sold. This rate has not changed since set at 24.5 percent in 1998, even though the 2000 Agriculture Risk Protection Act significantly increased the level and volume of insurance coverage by farmers. While, the total premiums received by each company grew correspondingly, the costs of selling and servicing these policies have grown much less (due to economies of scale). This would argue that the current rate exceeds a reasonable amount for the companies' costs related to selling and servicing these policies. A reimbursement rate of 20 percent would be more reasonable and is expected to save $68 million in 2004.

There are various types of insurance programs. The most basic type of coverage is Catastrophic Crop Insurance (CAT), which compensates the farmer for losses up to 50 percent of the individual's average yield at 55 percent of the expected market price. The CAT premium is entirely subsidized, and farmers pay only a small administrative fee. Commercial insurance companies deliver the product to the producer in all states. Additional coverage is available to producers who wish to insure crops above the basic coverage. Premium rates for additional coverage depend on the level of coverage selected and vary from crop to crop and county to county. The additional levels of insurance coverage are more attractive to farmers due to availability of optional units, other policy provisions not available with CAT coverage, and the ability to obtain a level of protection that permits them to use crop insurance as loan collateral and to achieve greater financial security. Private companies sell and adjust the catastrophic portion of the crop insurance program, and also provide higher levels of coverage, which are also federally subsidized. Approximately XX percent of eligible acres participated in one or more crop insurance programs in 2002.

Revenue insurance programs protect against loss of revenue stemming from low prices, poor yields, or a combination of both. The plans available are Revenue Coverage (CRC), Revenue Assurance (RA), and the Income Protection (IP) plan. These three plans have many similar features and some very distinctive features. All provide a guaranteed revenue by combining coverage on both yield and price variability. CRC and RA also provide protection against crop price changes. These programs extend traditional multi-peril crop insurance protection by adding price variability to production history. Indemnities are due when any combination of yield and price result in revenue that is less than the revenue guarantee. Revenue protection for all products is provided. The price component common to CRC, RA, and IP uses the commodity futures market for price discovery. These programs all seek to help ensure a certain level of annual income and are offered through private insurance companies. For 1999, a Group Risk Income Protection plan was developed by the private sector to provide protection against decline in county revenue, based on futures market prices and National Agricultural Statistics Service county average yields, as adjusted by Federal Crop Insurance Corporation (FCIC). FCIC is also piloting an Adjusted Gross Revenue (AGR) program, which is designed to insure a portion of producers' gross revenue based on their Schedule F Farm and Income Tax reports.

USDA continues to expand revenue coverage. RMA plans to roll out Round IV of the Dairy Options Pilot Program (DOPP) during 2002, which includes reaching producers in a total of 300 counties in 40 states. RMA's partners in the program are registered commodities brokers who are authorized by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission to buy put options on behalf of DOPP participants on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. In September 2001, RMA published an interim rule that allows RMA to reimburse developers of private crop insurance products for their research and development costs and maintenance costs. In November 2001, two livestock pilot programs were approved—the Livestock Gross Margin and Livestock Risk Protection. The pilot livestock programs will cover swine in the State of Iowa and will be made available beginning in 2002.

Insurance Against Security-Related Risks

The Federal Government newly offers terrorism risk insurance and Airline War Risk Insurance on a temporary basis, and has expanded the vaccine compensation program. After the September 11 attacks, private insurers became reluctant to insure against security-related risks such as terrorism and war. Those events are so uncertain in terms of both the frequency of occurrence and the magnitude of potential loss that private insurers can hardly estimate the expected loss. Furthermore, terrorism can produce a really large loss that can wipe out private insurers' capital. These uncertainties make the private sector reluctant to provide security-related insurance. Thus, it is necessary for the Federal Government to insure against security-related risks, at least until the private sector learns enough to be comfortable about estimating those risks, to ensure the smooth functioning of the economy.

Terrorism Risk Insurance

On November 26, 2002, President Bush signed into law the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act of 2002. Since the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, the economy has been harmed by the withdrawal of many insurance companies from the marketplace for terrorism risk insurance. Their withdrawal in the face of great uncertainty as to their risk exposure to future terrorist attacks led to the cancellation of construction projects, increased business costs for the insurance that was available, and substantial shifting of risk from reinsurers to primary insurers, and from insurers to policyholders (e.g., investors, businesses, and property owners). Ultimately, these costs are borne by American workers and communities with fewer construction projects and lower economic activity.

The new law establishes a temporary Federal program that provides for a system of shared public and private compensation for insured commercial property and casualty losses arising from acts of terrorism. The program is administered by the Treasury Department and will sunset on December 31, 2005.

Under the new law, insurance companies included under the program must make available to their policyholders coverage for losses from acts of terrorism under the program. The law also requires insurance companies to disclose to policyholders the premium charged for terrorism risk insurance and the Federal share of compensation provided under the law.

In the event of a future terrorist attack on private businesses and others covered by this program, insurance companies will cover insured losses up to each company's deductible as specified in the law. Insured losses above that amount in a given year would be shared between the insurance company and the Treasury, with Treasury covering 90 percent of the losses above the company's deductible. However, neither the Treasury nor any insurer would be liable for any amount exceeding the statutory annual cap of $100 billion in aggregate insured losses. The law also provides authority for the Treasury to recoup Federal payments via surcharges on policyholders.

Airline War Risk Insurance

After the September 11 attacks, private insurers cancelled third party liability war risk coverage for airlines and dramatically increased the cost of other war risk insurance. In response, the Department of Transportation (DOT) provided a short-term reimbursement to airlines for the increased cost of aviation hull and passenger liability war risk insurance under the authority provided in P.L. 107–42. Under Presidential Determination No. 01–29, the President delegated the authority to extend aviation insurance to the Secretary of Transportation. Due to the extended disruption in the marketplace, DOT also offered airlines third-party liability war risk insurance coverage at subsidized rates to replace coverage initially withdrawn by private insurers. For the last year, DOT has continued to provide this insurance coverage in 60-day increments.

On November 26, the President signed the Homeland Security Act of 2002 which included the Airline War Risk Insurance Legislation. This law extends the term of third party war risk coverage and expands the scope of coverage to include war risk hull, passenger, crew, and property liability insurance. Under the law, the Secretary of Transportation shall extend insurance policies until August 31, 2003, but may extend until December 31, 2003. At this time DOT is preparing policies that extend insurance coverage until August 31st 2003. In addition, the law states that the total premium for the three types of insurance shall not exceed twice the premium rate charged for the third party liability insurance as of June 19, 2002.

Currently 73 air carriers are insured by DOT. Coverage for individual carriers ranges from $80 million to $4 billion per carrier with the median insurance coverage at approximately $1.8 billion per occurrence. Premiums collected by the Government are deposited into the Aviation Insurance Revolving Fund. In 2002, the fund collected approximately $75 million in premiums for insurance provided by DOT and paid out $56 million in one time premium assistance reimbursements for coverage purchased from private insurers. In 2003, it is anticipated that up to $123 million in premiums may be collected by DOT for the provision of insurance. In 2004, the authorization for the war risk insurance program expires. Any claims by the airlines that exceed the balance in the aviation insurance revolving fund would be paid by the Federal Government.

Vaccine Injury Compensation

The National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program began in 1988 to encourage childhood vaccination by providing streamlined compensation for injuries resulting from vaccination. This program is jointly administered by the Department of Health and Human Services

REV_00106417

(HHS), the U.S. Court of Federal Claims, and the Department of Justice (DOJ). Vaccine-related victims file claims against HHS in the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. Then DOJ represents HHS in the court to ensure fair compensation. Compensation is paid out of the Vaccine Trust Fund, financed through per-dose assessments on vaccines.

To better prepare the Nation for potential biological attacks, the Homeland Security Act of 2002 expands the coverage of the National Vaccine Injury Compensation Program by broadening the interpretation of key terms, such as "vaccine" and "vaccine-related injury or death." The Act also provides medical liability protection to some private parties, such as doctors, drug manufacturers, and hospitals, when those entities, acting on behalf of the U.S. Public Health Service, are liable for the administration of the smallpox vaccine and other countermeasures. This protection is effective only during such period as declared by the Secretary of HHS.

BOB GRAHAM
Florida's judicial-nomination process under threat

For more than a decade, through both Democratic and Republican presidencies, Florida had an outstanding record of filling federal judicial vacancies through a nonpartisan, merit-based process.
The process was driven by the judicial nominating commissions, which took applications, interviewed candidates and submitted three names for consideration for each judicial vacancy. These commissions, appointed by the two senators, were made up of volunteers who represented a cross-section of our state: lawyers and lay persons, Democrats and Republicans. Both Florida senators interviewed the three finalists and passed their recommendations onto the White House.
The process worked. Over 10 years, we filled 26 District Court vacancies without a single significant controversy. Because of the confidence that the Senate Judiciary Committee vested in the Florida judicial-nominating process, between the 101st and 106th Congress, those vacancies were filled in an average of 108 days. This compares to the average time for all U.S. District Court vacancies of 151 days.
The process attracted highly qualified candidates for federal judicial vacancies. This is sometimes difficult because the open process makes all the information submitted by the candidates publicly available. However, because decisions were made on merit, candidates of the highest quality from private practice as well as the state courts and federal magistrates were attracted to apply.
RAISING CONCERNS
After George W. Bush became president, the process changed. Now the governor, along with the most senior Republicans in our state's congressional delegation, are responsible for naming the nominating commission's members.

While Sen. Bill Nelson and I can interview the candidates, we cannot make recommendations to the White House anymore. We can only indicate whether any of the candidates might encounter difficulty in winning Senate confirmation.

Since this new system has taken effect, there have been two instances that raise concerns about the politicization of the judicial-nominating process, threatening to undermine the credibility of our judiciary.

A year ago, the nominating commission announced groups of three finalists to fill three U.S. marshals positions in Florida, including one in the Southern District of Florida. In March 2002, my office was informed that the three finalists for the position in the Southern District were being put aside in favor of a candidate who had not even applied. This candidate has been renominated in the 108th Congress and is now awaiting action by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

In February 2002, the Judicial Nominating Commission announced that it had selected three finalists for a Southern District court vacancy. The candidates included two state circuit-court judges and the sitting U.S. attorney for the Southern District, who were interviewed by the Judicial Nominating Commission and found to be qualified. Nelson and I informed the White House that, if nominated, any of the three would be expeditiously confirmed.

By April, however, the process took a mystifying turn. The nominating commission's chairman informed the fellow commissioners that the White House had requested three additional names, effectively disregarding the three initial candidates. A month later, at the direction of the governor and two U.S. House members, the commission met again and selected three new finalists. A nominee is expected from the White House any day now.

The qualifications of these three new candidates are not to be questioned. Rather, the concern is the deviation from a process that has been successful for more than a decade. The independence and integrity of our judicial system are at stake.

The legal counsel to the president, Alberto Gonz lez, said that the initial panel had been rejected because of inadequate diversity. I found this surprising because half of the federal court officers nominated in Florida by the Republican-appointed Judicial Nominating Commission and selected by the president were minorities.

With this record, if this recent set of recommendations by the Judicial Nominating Commission was found by the president to be insufficient, what recommendation would Gonz lez make to satisfy the diversity sought by the president?

PROUD TRADITION

We must live up to the words said by former Florida Bar President Herman J. Russamanno about our federal courts: ``Florida has been blessed with competent, experienced, compassionate and highly professional judges. These distinguished individuals bring to the court the highest standards and strong commitments to the administration of justice.''

I am committed to this proud tradition, which is why we must honor a system of nonpartisanship and cooperation in the selection of Florida's federal judges.

Bob Graham, a Democrat, is the senior U.S. senator from Florida.

Judgeship impasse could end
Sens. Dole, Edwards discuss cooperating to place North Carolinian on appeals court
JIM MORRILL
Staff Writer

North Carolina's two U.S. senators say they're working together to do what hasn't been done in 22 years -- put a North Carolinian on the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Years of partisan wrangling have left the state without a representative on the Richmond-based court, one step below the U.S. Supreme Court.

In recent years Republican Sen. Jesse Helms and Democratic Sen. John Edwards blocked each other's candidates to the bench.

The 4th Circuit covers Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and the Carolinas. Every state but North Carolina has at least two judges on the bench.

Now Edwards and Helms' successor, Republican Elizabeth Dole, are trying to avoid a similar impasse. Both they and their staffs have talked about the need to fill judicial vacancies.

"They both seem to share a desire to move forward on the judicial nomination process," Dole spokeswoman Mary Brown Brewer said Friday.

Edwards' spokesman sounded a similar note. "There's great promise that they can both cooperate on a way that would help get North Carolinians on the bench," said Mike Briggs. "The senator is very optimistic."

Their first test will come soon.
On Tuesday President Bush renominated Terrence Boyle of Edenton, chief judge of the District Court for Eastern North Carolina and a one-time aide to Helms. It was the fourth time the 57-year-old jurist has been tapped for the post.
In 1991 he was nominated by Bush's father. Democrats who then controlled the Senate refused to hold a hearing on the nomination. Helms went on to block all of President Clinton's N.C. nominees to the 4th Circuit. Edwards killed Boyle's 2001 nomination by the current President Bush.
As a result, no North Carolinian has taken a seat on the court since the late Sam Ervin III in 1980.
The 4th Circuit has three vacancies. Nationwide there are 25 openings among the 179 appeals court seats. With the Supreme Court deciding fewer cases each year, appeals courts increasingly have the final word on many cases.
Most of the 4th Circuit's 12 current judges are generally regarded as conservative. Briggs said if Bush nominates another North Carolinian who offers ideological balance, "that would be the appropriate time (for Edwards) to take another look at the Boyle nomination."
During her campaign, Dole urged a quick hearing for Boyle, saying the 4th Circuit faced a "judicial emergency." The week after she was elected in November, Dole discussed judicial nominations with Edwards during a visit to his office. Their staffs have since held discussions on the subject.
And Brewer says Dole is still weighing a proposal Edwards made in a letter, in which he asked her to consider a recommendation from the N.C. Bar Association.
Last year the bar proposed a bipartisan nominating commission, with three members chosen by each senator. For each court vacancy, the commission would nominate three candidates from among whom the president would be urged to choose.
"It seemed to me to be a proposal that had tremendous common sense to it," said Hank Van Hoy of Mocksville, the bar association's immediate past president. "It essentially removed politics from the issue. ... Then you end this logjam and you get rid of this tit-for-tat game that's being played now."

Ashley Davis & Tom Ridge will both be leaving the EOP next week. Governor Ridge will be going to Homeland and Ashley to a law firm. They would both like to have us convert their contact information (personal and professional) from their palm pilots onto diskette/CD. Do you see any reason we should not do this?

Thank you,

Clegg's ultimate aim is emerging:

Roger Clegg, general counsel for the Center for Equal Opportunity, a Virginia-based think tank that opposes race-conscious affirmative action, said that while the percentage plans are better than "racial preferences," they still amount to a thinly veiled system of selecting students by race.
"I think these plans are very vulnerable to a legal challenge," he said.

Brett: Ed asked me to forward to you -- at this point, for your review alone -- a draft of the guidance we discussed this morning. Ed is still on the Hill and has not been able to review it in detail, but he has seen an earlier and slightly different version. He is calling you to flag a couple of questions. One further question for you is whether we should say anything in the "request-and-approve" process about classified materials people may want to take over to DHS.
Also, this draft is skimpy on practical guidance on boxing, filing, inventorying, etc. My sense is that there should be a separate Exec Sec-type memo to accompany this, giving all those thoughts. The shorter we keep each memo, the likelier each is to be read -- and followed.

Another related question - we think it might be helpful to start purchasing books that are published about the President, i.e. the David Frum book, to keep for potential use in the future Library. (The logic is that by the time the Library is built, these books may no longer be available in hardback which would obviously make for a nicer display). Would it be permissible for us to ask the Archives to pay for these too?

FYI - WHMO has provided a list of items from Offutt AFB that the President used on 9/11 (still waiting to hear back from Barksdale AFB). The items identified so far are:

- Command Center Swivel Chair w/old US Strategic Command Seal
-Secure Telephone
- Plastic Water Pitcher
- Plate under Pitcher
- Goblet
- Paper coasters w/old US Strategic Command Seal
- Video Tele-Conference Center Chair

I recommend we advise we would like all these items to recreate the image down the road (even though we may not use all). Do you agree?

Issues to address:
1. Who should pay to ship these items to DC ?
2. Is it okay to store them in 501 EEOB?

Brett,

Good talking to you today. I can't tell you how impressed we've all been lately with the President's agenda on tort reform and the courts. Best of luck with all your efforts.

Our president, Lawrence (Larry) Mone, would like to come into the White House to talk to you (and anyone else you think should be in the meeting) regarding tort reform. The dates he has available are January 22nd, 28th, 31st, or February 4th. Let me know which of these dates works for you and I'll lock it in.

If none of these dates are available, give me a few alternates from your calendar and I'll work from those instead.

Best,

Paul Howard

Tim -- thanks for doing the heavy lifting on this. But oHS isn't the only WH component sending people to DHS. And we can't have a separate memo for each office. My strong recommendation is that there shld be just one, uniform set of instructions sent out by someone with WH-wide responsibilities. It cld be Harriet, or maybe McCord or Alix, or OA. But it should only be one memo, and it should go to all WHO.

Second, remember that you Tim and for that matter most of those named above can't tell OMB staff what to do or how to do it. And most of these docs are in OMB's possession -- NOT OHS or even WHO. So pls get w/ your counterparts who have office-wide authority at (a) WHO and (b) OMB re: this. They can use your draft or whatever has been been STANDARD WH text in the past.

Ed: Here's a possible add on -- or maybe a separate but accompanying memo -- from OHS Exec Sec, which I asked them to do. Note that it mentions classified materials, which my draft didn't. Maybe we need to add something on that too, in the approval-for-copying process. Robert

Preparing Records for Storage

1) ONLY use storage boxes provided by the Office of Records Management. To order those please call ORM at 456-2240 or x 2242.
2) Place files upright in the box.
3) Prepare a detailed inventory list that includes contents in the order they appear in the box and be sure to include the staff member,s name and office at the top of the inventory list. Process security

classified documents separately. (ALL BOXES MUST HAVE AN INVENTORY LIST ON DISK AND PAPER WHEN GIVEN TO ORM)
4) Place the paper copy of list inside the box and provide the individual picking the boxes up with an envelope containing an electronic copy of the inventory on a 31/28 diskette. (Please note that only 1 disk is needed for each series of boxes picked up by ORM- disks can be provided by ORM if necessary)
5) Mark the top flap of the box appropriately with the staff member, s name, office and box number. If a series of boxes is being given to ORM, please archive as 1 of 5, 2 of 5, etc.
6) Call 456-2242 to arrange for pick-up. Be sure to provide the contact,s name, room, location, and the quantity of boxes that are being picked up.

If you have any questions, call 456-2242 or visit ORM at www.eop.gov/ORM.

Following these steps will help ensure that your material is accessible and organized when they are transferred to the Bush Presidential Library at the end of the Subject: Draft docs memo to WHO staff transferring to DHS -- comments due Tues. a.m.

The att'd memo was initially drafted by Robert Delahunty after this a.m.'s meeting, and also reflects add'l drafting by Brett Kavanaugh and myself.
The ORM "check out" attachments and instructions are standard and can be viewed on the ORM website cited in the memo here.
Presumably OMB (Steve Aitken?) will be preparing a similar memo (as OMB GC did for TPO in July 2002), but that is OMB's call.
John Bellinger -- pls note the blank in the last sentence -- which NSC lawyer wld you like to approve any doc requests from NSC personnel who are at the TPO or moving to the new DHS?
Please send all edits and comments to OHS Assoc. Counsel Faisal Gill by 10:00 a.m. Tuesday.

Here is the revised chart, as I told Brett, I hadn't had a chance to review the other, it was a draft I sent you - but for a 1st draft my legal fellow did a bang up job. I finally have some help on this stuff! Once I reviewed it I noticed the Punitives standard issue and the House Flexicap was missing. Also, I would have written "proportionate liability" in the joint and several section, but he put in the more exact language which I am leaving in for my boss. Easier to understand for talking points. You can obviously change it.

I hope you don't have trouble printing it or reading it - I have spent a good part of this afternoon dealing with computer problems with our conversion over to Word and it screwing up these charts for printing (even though they were created in Word). More info than you need I am sure :-)

Bush Set For High Court Battle

Strategy Is to Nominate Ideological Conservative

By Mike Allen and Charles Lane
Washington Post Staff Writers

Sunday, January 19, 2003; Page A01

White House aides have developed a strategy for filling a future vacancy on the Supreme Court that calls for nominating an ideological conservative even if it increases the chance that the person would not be confirmed, administration officials said.

With at least one retirement on the court this year increasingly viewed as likely, advisers to President Bush see no necessity to try to head off Democratic opposition by offering a moderate nominee without a long paper trail of opinions and academic writings.

The officials said they are more likely to choose someone inclined to more conservative interpretations of the Constitution and take their chances with the Senate, where Republicans hold a majority of 51 to 49.

"There is no fear of a confirmation fight," a senior administration official said. "That doesn't mean that we want to fight for the sake of having a fight, or that we aren't going to choose the fight carefully."

Officials said the more aggressive strategy was driven in part by Bush's political momentum after November's elections and a growing belief in the West Wing that Democrats plan to fight no matter who is nominated. But a third factor, they said, was the frank opposition among conservative activists to the prospective nomination of White House counsel Alberto R. Gonzales, who served as a Texas Supreme Court justice and as Bush's counsel in the Texas governor's office -- and has long been expected to be Bush's first choice for the court.

Gonzales is still very much in the running and might well be nominated -- if not at first, then eventually, the officials said. But they said for the first time that they are taking the conservatives' complaints to heart and would not automatically recommend putting him up first.

Gonzales's office has been in charge of vetting potential nominees for the high court. Sources said that his potential nomination posed no conflict because Bush would make that decision himself, and that Gonzales had been leading discussions of the issue as if he were not a candidate. White House officials said they have been researching potential nominees since shortly after Bush's inauguration.

Although Bush has pursued a middle course on some issues, this emerging approach to Supreme Court nominations signals the administration's intention to govern largely from the right now that the Senate is back in Republican hands. The strategy is in keeping with the White House's announcement of an economic plan heavy on tax cuts and the renomination of conservative lower court judges previously rejected by Senate Democrats.

The Supreme Court strategy also implies that Republican conservatives have gained the upper hand in the internal administration debate over whether the president's political interest lies in rewarding his core supporters or in courting Hispanic voters by naming the first member of that fast-growing voting population to the court.

Conservatives are concerned about Gonzales's views on affirmative action and abortion. The right blames him for the administration's initial hesitation to support a challenge at the Supreme Court to the University of Michigan's race-conscious admissions program. And antiabortion groups dislike an opinion he wrote as a Texas Supreme Court justice supporting a teenager's right to have an abortion without telling her parents.

One prominent conservative who is familiar with the White House's deliberations said activists are concerned that Gonzales's instincts "may not be that sound."

The conservative leader added: "But there's also a certain amount of resignation that if the president wants him, the president wants him."

Another top conservative activist spoke of "strong, vocal opposition," and said it has been communicated to Bush's senior adviser, Karl Rove.

Several senior officials explained that the ultimate choice would depend very much on precisely who vacates the court. Officials said Gonzales would be less likely to be nominated if the first member to step down were Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, 78. Gonzales is not perceived as being "as rock-solid as the chief is," as one put it, so his elevation to the court could, in this view, actually move it to the left.

Among the right's favorites for the court are J. Harvie Wilkinson, chief judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, based in Richmond, and J. Michael Luttig, another judge on the same court. Also mentioned are Edith Jones, a judge on the New Orleans-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit, and Solicitor General Theodore B. Olson. Administration officials said another possibility is Samuel A. Alito Jr., a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, in Philadelphia.

But Gonzales might be more acceptable to conservative activists if he were replacing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, 72, a more moderate, Republican-appointed justice who, unlike Rehnquist, has voted to support abortion rights.

One official said an ideal scenario for the administration and its allies would be for Justice John Paul Stevens, 82, to retire. Though appointed by Republican President Gerald R. Ford, in 1975, Stevens is a consistently liberal voice on the court, so the administration could argue that installing Gonzales in the Stevens seat would be a net gain for the right.

If Rehnquist retired, Bush would have the option of elevating a current member to chief justice while installing a new nominee as associate justice. In that case, officials said, he would most likely choose from the court's other four Republican appointees, O'Connor, Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas or Anthony M. Kennedy.

William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard, said the strategy had evolved in part because of the White House's expectations that Democrats will oppose anyone it nominates. "Since you can't duck and dodge, they're going to go for a fighter," he said. "They want someone who will defend himself effectively."

Recalling Bush's campaign-trail praise for conservatives Scalia and Thomas, some conservative activists have taken to comparing any move by Bush to nominate a moderate to the court with his father President George H.W. Bush's violation of a campaign pledge not to raise taxes.

Conservatives have also pounded home the message that they expect no repeat of the elder's nomination of David H. Souter to the court. A little-known "stealth nominee" -- one without a long record or well-known ideology -- when he was named in 1990, Souter has infuriated the right by consistently voting with the court's four-member liberal bloc.

"The rallying cry on the right for 'No more Souters' is really intense," said Clint Bolick, a former Reagan administration Justice Department official. "Conservatives think that they've got an explicit promise to nominate conservative justices."

"This is one of those rare cases where the politics actually yielded a superior outcome," says Catholic University School of Law Dean Douglas Kmiec, a former official in the Reagan Justice Department. The political discussions, Kmiec says, may have allowed Solicitor General Theodore Olson to "cut through some of the legalisms," such as the precise meaning and weight of Justice Lewis Powell's controlling concurrence in the 1978 Bakke case.

Kmiec thinks the government's brief may win over more than the five justices needed to strike down the Michigan program, "if the oral argument is as successful, and the justices as open-minded as the decision-makers in this political debate."

I worked again on these over weekend after receiving some more material from DOJ on some of the nominees. I have sent drafts back to DOJ for their review and input. The binder will include tabs for each of the 14 circuit nominees as well as 2 preliminary tabs -- one tab on the President's proposal on judges and a second tab that includes a single page that gives a general overview on the 14 pending circuit nominees.

Ashley, I would like to have someone in communications help put them into a nice format after the substance is complete. Is that doable? What I may do is bring a hard-copy draft to you as soon as I can later today.

We will send final versions to Heather and Tim for circulation to Hill and groups this week.

Q;Ari, the date for oral arguments in the Michigan case has been set.;
Does the President intend to have some kind of a hands-on role, or will White House attorneys have a hands-on role as the Justice Department prepares its case?; What does the President do from this point --
;MR. FLEISCHER:; Ken, I haven't asked that specifically, but I would anticipate at this point this becomes a matter for the Office of the Solicitor General, the Department of Justice.; The President shaped the vision of what he believes is the appropriate course to promote diversity while not supporting quotas.; And at this point, the Department of Justice, of course, represents the administration.
;Although, in this case, of course, as you know, the administration is not a party to this case.; An amicus brief has been filed, a friend of the court brief has been filed.; But the administration is not party to the case; as is typical in a case like this, the administration would not be a party.

This looks good. By I have one over-riding concern: Is it wise for the Judge to explicitly take on an issue that our brief at most addresses only implicitly? That is, this op-ed would essentially state that a governmental "goal" to "ensure minority...representation" is "constitutional." Regardless of whether this is true, it is an assertion to which at least some would object, and which our brief does not directly confront. Given that our briefs, without explicitly taking on this precise question, clearly endorse the Texas 10 percent plan, I am unsure what more is to be gained by specifically tackling this additional legal question.

Subject: first ROUGH draft of possible op-ed

DRAFT (1/21/03)

Last week, President Bush re-stated his strong and long-standing commitment to educational admissions programs that remedy the effects of past discrimination and ensure that African-Americans, Hispanics, Asian-Americans, and Native Americans have access to and are represented in American universities (a result often described as diversity). He also stated that the appropriate way to achieve such minority access and representation is a race-neutral admissions program that does not treat individual applicants differently solely because of their race or ethnicity. The President cited the Texas plan (which guarantees state university admission to the top 10% of all state high-school classes) as an example of a program that ensures minority access to and representation in institutions of higher education while also maintaining the basic constitutional principle that, absent a compelling justification, all Americans should be treated equally and without regard to race.

In response to the President?s statement last week, some have questioned whether race-neutral programs will work. Others have questioned whether there is a meaningful constitutional distinction between race-based programs (such as the critical-mass and bonus-point quota systems employed by the University of Michigan) and race-neutral programs that ensure minority access and representation.

These two questions are critically important, yet the answers are straightforward. Race-neutral programs that ensure minority access and representation will work and, indeed, have worked in states such as Texas, Florida, and California. And such race-neutral programs are plainly constitutional.

First, the Texas plan, like similar plans instituted in Florida and California, demonstrates convincingly that race-neutral programs ensure minority access to and representation in institutions of higher education. In Texas, 1996 was the last year that race was used as an admissions criterion. At the time, 4% of enrolled freshmen were African-American, 14% were Hispanic, and less than 1% were Native Americans. In 2002, under the new race-neutral program, 3% were African-American (the number has been between 3% and 4% since 1997), 14% were Hispanic, and less than 1% were Native American. Since Florida adopted its Talented Twenty program (which guarantees admission to the top 20% of all state high-school classes), the Florida state university system similarly has maintained or increased the number of enrolled minorities. And in California, the same kind of result has occurred. In 1997, the last year that race was a factor in admissions, African-American, Hispanic, and Native American students were 3.7%, 14.3%, and 0.8% of the freshmen classes. In 2002, these figures were 3.3%, 16.6%, and 0.7%. As demonstrated by these results in three of America?s largest States, race-neutral programs can and will work to ensure minority access to and representation in American universities.

Second, as the Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized, the Constitution permits and prefers efficacious race-neutral programs as the means to remedy the effects of past societal discrimination and ensure minority access to and representation in fields such as higher education, employment, and contracting. All of the Justices have agreed that race-neutral programs must be at least the primary means employed to achieve this objective (the Justices have disagreed, of course, about whether and under what circumstances race can be considered if race-neutral programs are not efficacious).

The Justices have expressly recognized, moreover, that race-neutral programs designed to remedy the effects of past societal discrimination are constitutional. In a 1989 case involving minority businesses, Justice O?Connor, joined by the Chief Justice, Justice White, and Justice Kennedy, wrote that the government had ?at its disposal a whole array of race-neutral devices to increase the accessibility of city contracting entrepreneurs of all races? and ?to increase the opportunities available to minority business without classifying individuals on the basis of race.? In that same case, Justice Scalia added: ?A State can, of course, act to undo the effects of past discrimination in many permissible ways that do not involve classification by race. In the particular field of state contracting, for example, it may adopt a preference for small businesses, or even for new businesses . . . . Such programs may well have racially disproportionate impact, but they are not based on race.? And Justices Brennan, White, Marshall, and Blackmun concluded in the 1978 Bakke case that admissions programs expressly designed to remedy past discrimination and ensure minority access to and representation in universities were constitutional. In short, Justices with varying constitutional approaches have expressly agreed on one core point: Race-neutral programs to remedy past societal discrimination and ensure minority access and representation are plainly constitutional.

In recent weeks, some commentators have focused solely on the need to remedy past discrimination and ensure minority access and representation, and not on the need to treat individuals without regard to race. Others have focused solely on the need to treat individuals without regard to race, and not on the need to remedy past discrimination and ensure minority access and representation. President Bush has charted a course that shows us that both goals are attainable and constitutional. As the President has stated, government can and should remedy the effects of past racial discrimination in a way that will ensure minority access to and representation but not compromise the basic constitutional principle that all Americans should be treated equally.

Thanks for copying us on the OMB draft, Kimberly. And you ask a fair question. I'll look at how the language interacts between the two drafts, as Lucy has rightly suggested. But given the very distinct and separate statuses of the WHO and the OMB, my inclination follows that of Phil's memo yesterday and David's today, which is that each entity receive separate and office-specific advice. That reflects the decision by WHCO and OMB GC in July when TPO was launched, and I don't see why that would be reversed.

MEMORANDUM TO OMB TPO STAFF TRANSFERRING TO DHS

FROM: PHILIP J. PERRY, GENERAL COUNSEL

SUBJECT: TRANSFER AND HANDLING OF TPO RECORDS

This memorandum provides guidance to personnel of the Transition Planning Office (TPO) who are transferring to the new Department of Homeland Security (DHS). It addresses all documents or email in TPO files except those received from OHS or other White House entities. Please consult the attached memorandum from White House Counsel for special procedures regarding documents received from OHS and other White House entities.

ú Documents or Email Created at TPO: You may take to DHS copies of any paper documents or email you created at TPO. However, you should make copies only of materials that you will need to perform your mission at DHS. You do not need to check with a lawyer before taking these copies. Keep in mind that the Office of Administration (OA) will be able to provide you access to your TPO materials even after your transfer to DHS.

ú Documents Received from OMB: You may also take to DHS documents received from OMB, except for Director's Review Books, passback materials or other internal OMB deliberative material not typically shared with agencies. If you have any questions about the nature of OMB documents in your possession, please consult Kimberley Luczynski at 5-7870.

ú Other Documents Received at TPO: Unless received from OHS or other White House entities, you are free to take copies to DHS.

When you depart for the new Department, OA will ensure that all of your original TPO files are properly archived. The appropriate contact at OA is Markus Most at 5-6471.

I'll take a couple of questions. Ron.

Q Sir, last week in this room, you came out against quotas, which have been unconstitutional for 25 years. You didn't answer the central question, and that is whether race can be used as a factor in admissions. Dr. Rice says it could be, Colin Powell says it should be. What is your position? Can it be used as --

THE PRESIDENT: Well, my position is, is that as the -- as the brief says, that there are clearly unconstitutional means to achieve diversity, there are race-neutral ways to achieve diversity which I have put in place as the governor of Texas, and that we'll leave the Court to define the outer limits of the constitution.

Adam.

Q Yes, Mr. President --

Q You won't answer that question then?

THE PRESIDENT: I just answered it.

Q Whether or not you believe --

THE PRESIDENT: No, I answered it. The courts will make the definition of the outer limits of the -- and as Condi Rice said, she felt very comfortable in saying on national TV the decision I made was the right decision.

Subject: Re: TPO memo

Thanks for copying us on the OMB draft, Kimberly. And you ask a fair question. I'll look at how the language interacts between the two drafts, as Lucy has rightly suggested. But given the very distinct and separate statuses of the WHO and the OMB, my inclination follows that of Phil's memo yesterday and David's today, which is that each entity receive separate and office-specific advice. That reflects the decision by WHCO and OMB GC in July when TPO was launched, and I don't see why that would be reversed.

Lucy/Ed,
Here's our memo. I know this is probably late in the game, but do you think that perhaps one memo (addressing both OHS/TPO folks) might be a little less confusing?
Thanks.

MEMORANDUM TO OMB TPO STAFF TRANSFERRING TO DHS

SUBJECT: TRANSFER AND HANDLING OF TPO RECORDS

This memorandum provides guidance to personnel of the Transition Planning Office (TPO) who are transferring to the new Department of Homeland Security (DHS). It addresses all documents or email in TPO files except those received from OHS or other White House entities. Please consult the attached memorandum from White House Counsel for special procedures regarding documents received from OHS and other White House entities.

ú Documents or Email Created at TPO: You may take to DHS copies of any paper documents or email you created at TPO. However, you should make copies only of materials that you will need to perform your mission at DHS. You do not need to check with a lawyer before taking these copies. Keep in mind that the Office of Administration (OA) will be able to provide you access to your TPO materials even after your transfer to DHS.

ú Documents Received from OMB: You may also take to DHS documents received from OMB, except for Director's Review Books, passback materials or other internal OMB deliberative material not typically shared with agencies. If you have any questions about the nature of OMB documents in your possession, please consult Kimberley Luczynski at 5-7870.

ú Other Documents Received at TPO: Unless received from OHS or other White House entities, you are free to take copies to DHS.

When you depart for the new Department, OA will ensure that all of your original TPO files are properly archived. The appropriate contact at OA is Markus Most at 5-6471.

Yes, that should be part of the plan. Also, we need to make sure OVP documents are included in that, and that Addington is looped in.

I don't have a stake in what goes into the memo to OHS. But I thought you all were doing a separate memo to TPO regarding the WH docs that were sent there "temporarily" from OHS etc. Is that not the plan?

Each year, White House staffers are invited to usher at the National Prayer Breakfast. This year it is at the Washington Hilton on February 6th. This allows White House staffers the opportunity to attend without prior sponsors or official invitations. If you are interested, please email the following information to Valerie Largent (valerie_largent@ensign.senate.gov) with a cc to Lee Rooker (leroy.rooker@ed.gov) by Friday January 24th.

Name
White House Office
Daytime phone
email address
of times volunteered at the National Prayer Breakfast
Date of birth
Social Security number

There will be a few organizational meetings prior to the NPB for the ushers. This is a great opportunity to serve. Consider this prayerfully.

Each year, White House staffers are invited to usher at the National Prayer Breakfast. This year it is at the Washington Hilton on February 6th. This allows White House staffers the opportunity to attend without prior sponsors or official invitations. If you are interested, please email the following information to Valerie Largent (valerie_largent@ensign.senate.gov) with a cc to Lee Rooker (leroy.rooker@ed.gov) by Friday January 24th.

Name
White House Office
Daytime phone
email address
of times volunteered at the National Prayer Breakfast
Date of birth
Social Security number

There will be a few organizational meetings prior to the NPB for the ushers. This is a great opportunity to serve. Consider this prayerfully.

Each year, White House staffers are invited to usher at the National Prayer Breakfast. This year it is at the Washington Hilton on February 6th. This allows White House staffers the opportunity to attend without prior sponsors or official invitations. If you are interested, please email the following information to Valerie Largent (valerie_largent@ensign.senate.gov) with a cc to Lee Rooker (leroy.rooker@ed.gov) by Friday January 24th.

Name
White House Office
Daytime phone
email address
of times volunteered at the National Prayer Breakfast
Date of birth
Social Security number

There will be a few organizational meetings prior to the NPB for the ushers. This is a great opportunity to serve. Consider this prayerfully.

Each year, White House staffers are invited to usher at the National Prayer Breakfast. This year it is at the Washington Hilton on February 6th. This allows White House staffers the opportunity to attend without prior sponsors or official invitations. If you are interested, please email the following information to Valerie Largent (valerie_largent@ensign.senate.gov) with a cc to Lee Rooker (leroy.rooker@ed.gov) by Friday January 24th.

Name
White House Office
Daytime phone
email address
of times volunteered at the National Prayer Breakfast
Date of birth
Social Security number

There will be a few organizational meetings prior to the NPB for the ushers. This is a great opportunity to serve. Consider this prayerfully.

Each year, White House staffers are invited to usher at the National Prayer Breakfast. This year it is at the Washington Hilton on February 6th. This allows White House staffers the opportunity to attend without prior sponsors or official invitations. If you are interested, please email the following information to Valerie Largent (valerie_largent@ensign.senate.gov) with a cc to Lee Rooker (leroy.rooker@ed.gov) by Friday January 24th.

Name
White House Office
Daytime phone

of times volunteered at the National Prayer Breakfast
Date of birth
Social Security number

There will be a few organizational meetings prior to the NPB for the ushers.
This is a great opportunity to serve. Consider this prayerfully.

First, I thought the RNC was paying for it. Second, I would use outside caterers for this.

Subject: Reception for RNC EDs

Matt contacted you a couple of weeks ago to make sure it was ok to have Tony Feather's company sponsor a reception for the RNC Executive Directors here in the EEOB. You were comfortable, so we are doing it on Wed. 1/29 in the Indian Treaty Room. It is going to be catered, so here's my question.

Can we use the WH Mess catering services (charged to Ken's account) and have FLS reimburse Ken? Or do we need to use an outside caterer and have FLS pay directly?

Mess is just easier because you don't need to wave in trucks, etc.

Thanks.

Each year, White House staffers are invited to usher at the National Prayer Breakfast. This year it is at the Washington Hilton on February 6th. This allows White House staffers the opportunity to attend without prior sponsors or official invitations. If you are interested, please email the following information to Valerie Largent (valerie_largent@ensign.senate.gov) with a cc to Lee Rooker (leroy.rooker@ed.gov) by Friday January 24th.

Name
White House Office
Daytime phone
email address
of times volunteered at the National Prayer Breakfast
Date of birth
Social Security number

There will be a few organizational meetings prior to the NPB for the ushers. This is a great opportunity to serve. Consider this prayerfully.

MEMORANDUM TO OMB TPO STAFF

SUBJECT: TRANSFER AND HANDLING OF TPO RECORDS

This memorandum provides guidance to all personnel of the Transition Planning Office (TPO). It addresses all documents or email in TPO files, including those received from the White House. Please note that some sections apply to TPO employees who are transferring to the new Department of Homeland Security (DHS), while other sections apply to TPO employees transferring to other agencies.

White House Documents (applies to all TPO employees):
When TPO was created, the White House Counsel,s Office made special arrangements for handling documents from "White House" entities that were temporarily provided to TPO personnel. Those arrangements (addressed in depth in the attached memoranda) applied generally to emails and other documents from OHS and other White House entities. Pursuant to the attached memos, those materials should already bear the legend &White House-controlled Material/Protected from Disclosure.8
Please return all such materials to the White House entity from which they originated by routing them through Distie Carstensen or Brook Holladay at 1800 G Street, 9th floor [check].
Emails from White House entities will be automatically segregated by the Office of Administration [check].
You should not take copies of any materials from White House entities with you, unless you receive clearance to do so by Ed McNally, OHS GC.
If you have any questions regarding the treatment of materials from White House entities, please contact Ed McNally at 6-1700.

All other Documents (applies to TPO employees transferring to DHS):
ú Documents or Email Created at TPO: You may take to DHS copies of any paper documents or email you created at TPO. However, you should make copies only of materials that you will need to perform your mission at DHS. You do not need to check with a lawyer before taking these copies. Keep in mind that the Office of Administration (OA) will be able to provide you access to your TPO materials even after your transfer to DHS.

ú Documents Received from OMB: You may also take to DHS documents received from OMB, except for Director's Review Books, passback materials or other internal OMB deliberative material not typically shared with agencies. If you have any questions about the nature of OMB documents in your possession, please consult Kimberley Luczynski at 5-7870.

ú Other Documents Received at TPO: Unless received from OHS or other White House entities, you are free to take copies to DHS.

When you depart for the new Department, OA will ensure that all of your original TPO files are properly archived. The appropriate contact at OA is Markus Most at 5-6471. Mr. Most will send, under separate cover, instructions regarding archiving your originals.

For TPO employees transferring to agencies other than DHS: You may not take copies of any TPO documents with you. As above, OA will ensure that all of your original TPO files are properly archived.

Subject: revised chart

Here is the revised chart, as I told Brett, I hadn't had a chance to review the other, it was a draft I sent you - but for a 1st draft my legal fellow did a bang up job. I finally have some help on this stuff! Once I reviewed it I noticed the Punitives standard issue and the House Flexicap was missing. Also, I would have written "proportionate liability" in the joint and several section, but he put in the more exact language which I am leaving in for my boss. Easier to understand for talking points. You can obviously change it.

I hope you don't have trouble printing it or reading it - I have spent a good part of this afternoon dealing with computer problems with our conversion over to Word and it screwing up these charts for printing (even though they were created in Word). More info than you need I am sure :-)

Each year, White House staffers are invited to usher at the National Prayer Breakfast. This year it is at the Washington Hilton on February 6th. This allows White House staffers the opportunity to attend without prior sponsors or official invitations. If you are interested, please email the following information to Valerie Largent (valerie_largent@ensign.senate.gov) with a cc to Lee Rooker (leroy.rooker@ed.gov) by Friday January 24th.

Name
White House Office
Daytime phone
email address
of times volunteered at the National Prayer Breakfast
Date of birth
Social Security number

There will be a few organizational meetings prior to the NPB for the ushers. This is a great opportunity to serve. Consider this prayerfully.

Each year, White House staffers are invited to usher at the National Prayer Breakfast. This year it is at the Washington Hilton on February 6th. This allows White House staffers the opportunity to attend without prior sponsors or official invitations. If you are interested, please email the following information to Valerie Largent (valerie_largent@ensign.senate.gov) with a cc to Lee Rooker (leroy.rooker@ed.gov) by Friday January 24th.

Name
White House Office
Daytime phone
email address
of times volunteered at the National Prayer Breakfast
Date of birth
Social Security number

There will be a few organizational meetings prior to the NPB for the ushers. This is a great opportunity to serve. Consider this prayerfully.
