TELECOPY COVER SHEET

OFFICE OF THE INDEPENDENT COUNSEL
1001 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Suite 490N
Washington, D.C. 20004
telephone (202) 514-8688 facsimile (202) 514-8802

Date: 7/11/95

TO: Hich Ewing / Brad Lerman

Company Name: OIC-CR

Fax Number: _____ Telephone Number: _____

FROM: Alex Azar

Number of Pages: 5 (including this cover sheet)

Message: Please deliver copies immediately

c:\faxform rdb

UNITED STATES
v.
BURR. [FN1]

FN1 For references to the various cases in this series, which, together, embrace a full report of the entire proceedings against Aaron Burr, see footnote to Case No. 14,692a.

Circuit Court, D. Virginia.

June 13, 1807.

At law. Motion for a subpoena duces tecum directed to the president of the United States.

Tuesday, June 9, 1807. The grand jury were adjourned to the following Thursday.

CRIMINAL LAW--SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM--TIME OF ISSUE--TO PRESIDENT--RIGHT TO--MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

1. Any person charged with a crime in the courts of the United States has a right, before as well as after indictment, to the process of the court to compel the attendance of his witnesses.

CRIMINAL LAW--SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM--TIME OF ISSUE--TO PRESIDENT--RIGHT TO--MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

2. A subpoena may issue to the president of the United States to compel his attendance as a witness, and an accused person is entitled to it of course.

CRIMINAL LAW--SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM--TIME OF ISSUE--TO PRESIDENT--RIGHT TO--MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

3. A subpoena duces tecum may issue to the president of the United States, directing him to bring any paper of which the party praying it has a right to avail himself as testimony.

CRIMINAL LAW--SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM--TIME OF ISSUE--TO PRESIDENT--RIGHT TO--MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

4. In Virginia, a motion for a subpoena duces tecum is to the discretion of the court; and as a legal means of obtaining testimony it cannot be regularly opposed by the opposite party in his character as such.

CRIMINAL LAW--SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM--TIME OF ISSUE--TO PRESIDENT--RIGHT TO--MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

5. A motion to the discretion of a court is a motion not to its inclination, but to its judgment, which is to be guided by sound legal principles.

CRIMINAL LAW--SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM--TIME OF ISSUE--TO PRESIDENT--RIGHT TO--MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

6. The court has no right to refuse its aid to motions for papers to which the accused by be entitled, and which may be material to his defense.

CRIMINAL LAW--SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM--TIME OF ISSUE--TO PRESIDENT--RIGHT TO--MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

7. An accused person has the right, before indictment found, to compel, by way of precaution, the production of letters containing statements of his conduct written by the person who is declared to be the essential witness against him.

CRIMINAL LAW--SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM--TIME OF ISSUE--TO PRESIDENT--RIGHT TO--MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

8. And in such case he is entitled to the production of the original letter, a copy not being sufficient.

CRIMINAL LAW--SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM--TIME OF ISSUE--TO PRESIDENT--RIGHT TO--MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

9. Where it does not affirmatively appear that letters and executive orders in the hands of the president of the United States which may be material to the defense of an accused contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, a subpoena duces tecum will issue. The fact that such letters and orders may contain matter not essential to the defense, and which ought not to be disclosed, will appear on the return.

30 Mr. Burr then addressed the court. There was a proposition which he wished to submit to them. In the president's communication to congress, he speaks of a letter and other papers which he had received from Mr. Wilkinson, under date of 21st of October. Circumstances had now rendered it material that the whole of this letter should be produced in court; and further, it has already appeared to the court, in the course of different examinations, that the government have attempted to infer certain intentions on my part from certain transactions. It becomes necessary, therefore, that these transactions should be accurately stated. It was, therefore material to show in what circumstances I was placed in the Mississippi territory; and of course, to obtain certain orders of the army and the navy which were issued respecting me. I have seen the order of the navy in print; and one of the officers of the navy had assured me that this transcript was correct. The instructions in this order were, to destroy my person and my property in descending the Mississippi. Now I wish, if possible, to authenticate this statement; and it was for this purpose, when I passed through Washington lately, that I addressed myself to Mr. Robert Smith. That gentleman seemed to admit the propriety of my application, but objected to my course. He informed me that if I would apply to him through one of my counsel, there could be no difficulty in granting the object of my application. I have since applied in this manner to Mr. Smith, but without success. Hence I feel it necessary to resort to the authority of this court to call upon them to issue a subpoena to the president of the United States, with a clause, requiring him to produce certain papers; or, in other words, to issue the subpoena duces tecum. The attorney for the United States will, however, save the time of this court, if he will consent to produce the letter of the 21st October, with the accompanying papers, and also authentic orders of the navy and war departments.

Mr. Hay declared that he knew not for what this information could be wanted; to what purpose such evidence could relate; and whether it was to be used on the motion for commitment or on the trial in chief.

Mr. Burr, Mr. Wickham, and Mr. Martin *31 observed that perhaps it would be used on both, according as circumstances might require.

Mr. Hay declared that all delay was unnecessary; but he pledged himself, if possible, to obtain the papers which were wanted; and not only those, but every paper which might be necessary to the elucidation of the case.

After considerable of conversation between counsel as to the objects of applying for the subpoena, and the probability of obtaining the papers without it, Mr. Wickham remarked that as to the order from the navy department, a copy might be sufficient, but as to Wilkinson's letter, 'We wish to see itself here; and surely it may be trusted in the hands of the attorney for the United States.'

Mr. Hay then said: It seems, then, that copies of papers from the government of the United States will not be received! After such an observation, sir, I retract everything that I have promised; let gentlemen, sir, take their own course.

Mr. Wickham explained, disavowing any insinuation against the fairness of the conduct of the government. But he wanted the highest possible degree of evidence, and to confront General Wilkinson with his own letter.

Mr. Hay was satisfied with the explanation, and renewed his promise to apply for the papers if the court deemed them material.

After some further conversation which did not result in any arrangement satisfactory to Mr. Burr's counsel----

The CHIEF JUSTICE said: If the attorney for the United States is satisfied that the court has a right to issue the subpoena duces tecum, I will grant the motion.

Mr. Hay. I am not, sir.

CHIEF JUSTICE. I am not prepared to give an opinion on this point, and therefore I must call for argument.

After some further conversation, the court adjourned.

Wednesday, June 10, 1807.

The court met according to adjournment. The subject of the subpoena duces tecum was resumed.

The following affidavit, drawn up and sworn to by Mr. Burr, was read in support of the motion for the subpoena.

'Aaron Burr maketh oath, that he hath great reason to believe that a letter from General Wilkinson to the president of the United States, dated 21st October, 1806, as mentioned in the president's message of the 22d January, 1807, to both houses of congress, together with the documents accompanying the said letter, and copy of the answer of said Thomas Jefferson, or of any one by his authority, to the said letter, may be material in his defence, in the prosecution against him. And further, that he hath reason to believe the military and naval orders given by the president of the United States, through the departments of war and of the navy, to the officers of the army and navy, at or near the New Orleans stations, touching or concerning the said Burr, or his property, will also be material in his defence.

'Aaron Burr.

'Sworn to in open court, 10th June, 1807.'

Upon this motion a protracted debate arose, occupying two entire days, and extending into the third, in which the motion was supported by Messrs. Wickham, Botts, Randolph, Martin, and Burr, and opposed by Messrs. Hay, MacRae, and Wirt. Much ability and eloquence were displayed on both sides. But few points of law were contested in the argument, and these are all clearly stated in the opinion of the court, which is here given in full. The arguments turned more upon the propriety of granting the motion, than upon any strictly legal question; although the right of the accused to apply to the court for process to obtain any testimony whatever, at this stage of the case, was denied by the counsel for the United States. The discussion took a wide range, and the course of the government towards Col. Burr, and the conduct of Gen. Wilkinson in respect to him, were animadverted upon with much severity by counsel for the defence, and zealously defended by the counsel for the United States.

On the part of the prosecution it was insisted that the subpoena was unnecessary, because certified copies of any documents in the executive departments could be obtained by a proper application. It was said to be improper to call upon the president to produce the letter of Gen. Wilkinson, because it was a private letter, and probably contained confidential communications, which the president ought not and could not be compelled to disclose. It might contain state secrets, which could not be divulged without endangering the national safety. It was argued that the documents demanded could not be material to the defence, and objected that the affidavit did not even state, in positive terms, that they would be material.

On the part of the defence it was denied that any affidavit whatever was necessary to support the motion. The proposition that the president could withhold a paper material to the defence, merely because it contained confidential communications, was denied, and pronounced wholly untenable in law. If the letter contained state secrets which it would be inconsistent with the public safety to disclose, the president could say so in the return to the subpoena; but it was not to be assumed until he did say so. Or, if the letter contained anything of a confidential character, not relating to the case, the president could point out such parts as he did not wish to have exposed, and they need not be read in court. A copy of the letter, it was said, would not answer the purposes of the defence. Gen. Wilkinson was admitted to be the witness upon whom the prosecution mainly depended. His relation to the prosecution 32 was such, that he had the strongest possible motive for bolstering it up; and if he failed in it, he would himself sink into irreparable disgrace. When he should come upon the stand to sustain a prosecution in which he had so much at stake, it might be of the utmost importance to confront him with his letter in his own handwriting. A copy would not do, because he might deny it; and no confidence was reposed by the defence in his integrity. The contents of the letter were only known to the defence in so far as they had been divulged by the president in a communication to congress. In that communication the president had stated that he had received a letter from Gen. Wilkinson in relation to the transactions of Mr. Burr, 'of whose guilt,' he says, 'there can be no doubt.' The president was severely censured (by Mr. Randolph) for thus assuming the functions of a judge, and pronouncing judgment against Mr. Burr in transacting his executive duties. The president had stated in said communication that Gen. Wilkinson had written at large to him respecting Mr. Burr. The defence wanted this letter, and had no doubt that in some of those things which Gen. Wilkinson had stated to the president, they would be able to trip him up.

As to the orders of the war and navy departments, it was said that certified copies would answer. But the secretary of the navy had already refused to furnish copies to one of Mr. Burr's counsel, on an application to him therefor, and they could not run the risk of another refusal. One of these orders (or what purported to be one) had been published in the Natchez Gazette, and it amounted to an order calling forth a military force to attack Mr. Burr and his associates, and destroy their property. It was contended that the president had no legal or constitutional power to issue such an order as this was represented to be; if an unconstitutional and illegal order had been issued to destroy and man and his property, that man was justified in resisting it. Authenticated copies of these orders, therefore, might be necessary to defend Mr. Burr against any attempt to prove that he had resisted, or made any preparation to resist, the military forces called forth against him. If no orders had been issued calling forth a military force to attack him, then he had a right to resist any such force as being a mere unauthorized mob. On these grounds it was of the utmost importance to the defence to know exactly what orders had been issued in relation to Col. Burr.

At the close of the discussion Mr. Hay said he had in his possession a copy of the very paper which had been so denounced by the counsel for cruelty and severity; the order issued by the secretary of the navy, which he proposed to read in order to show that there was no such thing in it. The opposite counsel desired to look at the paper, to ascertain whether it was the same they had seen in the Natchez Gazette; but Mr. Hay refused to let them take it. He finally put it up again, declaring that he believed it to be the same, but gentlemen did not want it to be read.

Before MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice.

The object of the motion now to be decided is to obtain copies of certain orders, understood to have been issued to the land and naval officers of the United States for the apprehension of the accused, and an original letter from General Wilkinson to the president in relation to the accused, with the answer of the president to that letter, which papers are supposed to be material to the defence. As the legal mode of effecting this object, a motion is made for a subpoena duces tecum, to be directed to the president of the United States. In opposition to this motion, a preliminary point has been made by the counsel for the prosecution. It has been insisted by them that, until the grand jury shall have found a true bill, the party accused is not entitled to subpoenas nor to the aid of the court to obtain his testimony. It will not be said that this opinion is now, for the first time, advanced in the United States; but certainly it is now, for the first time, advanced in Virginia. So far back as any knowledge of our jurisprudence is possessed, the uniform practice of this country has been, to permit any individual, who was charged with any crime, to prepare for his defence, and to obtain the process of the court, for the purpose of enabling him so to do. This practice is as convenient and as consonant to justice as it is to humanity. It prevents, in a great measure, those delays which are never desirable, which frequently occasion the loss of testimony, and which are often oppressive. That would be the inevitable consequence of withholding from a prisoner the process of the court, until the indictment against him was found by the grand jury. The right of an accused person to the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses seems to follow, necessarily, from the right to examine those witnesses; and, wherever the right exists, it would be reasonable that it should be accompanied with the means of rendering it effectual. It is not doubted that a person who appears before a court under a recognizance, must expect that a bill will be preferred against him, or that a question concerning the continuance of the recognizance will be brought before the court. In the first event, he has the right, and it is perhaps his duty, to prepare for his defence at the trial. In the second event, it will not be denied that he possesses the right to examine witnesses on the question of continuing his recognizance. In either case it would seem reasonable that he should be entitled to the process of the court to procure the attendance of his witnesses. The genius and character of our 33 laws and usages are friendly, not to condemnation at all events, but to a fair and impartial trial; and they consequently allow to the accused the right of preparing the means to secure such a trial. The objection that the attorney may refuse to proceed at this time, and that no day is fixed for the trial, if he should proceed, presents no real difficulty. It would be a very insufficient excuse to a prisoner, who had failed to prepare for his trial, to say that he was not certain the attorney would proceed against him. Had the indictment been found at the first term, it would have been in some measure uncertain whether there would have been a trial at this, and still more uncertain on what day that trial would take place; yet subpoenas would have issued returnable to the first day of the term; and if after its commencement other subpoenas had been required, they would have issued, returnable as the court might direct. In fact, all process to which the law has affixed no certain return day is made returnable at the discretion of the court. General principles, then, and general practice are in favor of the right of every accused person, so soon as his case is in court, to prepare for his defence, and to receive the aid of the process of the court to compel the attendance of his witnesses.

The constitution and laws of the United States will now be considered for the purpose of ascertaining how they bear upon the question. The eighth amendment to the constitution gives to the accused, 'in all criminal prosecutions, a right to a speedy and public trial, and to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor.' The right given by this article must be deemed sacred by the courts, and the article should be so construed as to be something more than a dead letter. What can more effectually elude the right to a speedy trial than the declaration that the accused shall be disabled from preparing for it until an indictment shall be found against him? It is certainly much more in the true spirit of the provision which secures to the accused a speedy trial, that he should have the benefit of the provision which entitles him to compulsory process as soon as he is brought into court. This observation derives additional force from a consideration of the manner in which this subject has been contemplated by congress. It is obviously the intention of the national legislature, that in all capital cases the accused shall be entitled to process before indictment found. The words of the law are, 'and every such person or persons accused or indicted of the crimes aforesaid, (that is, of treason or any other capital offence,) shall be allowed and admitted in his said defence to make any proof that he or they can produce by lawful witness or witnesses, and shall have the like process of the court where he or they shall be tried, to compel his or their witnesses to appear at his or their trial as is usually granted to compel witnesses to appear on the prosecution against them.' This provision is made for persons accused or indicted. From the imperfection of human language, it frequently happens that sentences which ought to be the most explicit are of doubtful construction; and in this case the words 'accused or indicted' may construed to be synonymous, to describe a person in the same situation, or to apply to different stages of the prosecution. The word 'or' may be taken in a conjunctive or a disjunctive sense. A reason for understanding them in the latter sense is furnished by the section itself. It commences with declaring that any person who shall be accused and indicted of treason shall have a copy of the indictment, and at least three days before his trial. This right is obviously to be enjoyed after an indictment, and therefore the words are, 'accused and indicted.' So with respect to the subsequent clause, which authorizes a party to make his defence, and directs the court, on his application, to assign him counsel. The words relate to any person accused and indicted. But, when the section proceeds to authorize the compulsory process for witnesses, the phraseology is changed. The words are, 'and every such person or persons accused or indicted,' &c., thereby adapting the expression to the situation of an accused person both before and after indictment. It is to be remarked, too, that the person so accused or indicted is to have 'the like process to compel his or their witnesses to appear at his or their trial, as is usually granted to compel witnesses to appear on the prosecution against him.' The fair construction of this clause would seem to be, that with respect to the means of compelling the attendance of witnesses to be furnished by the court, the prosecution and defence are placed by the law on equal ground. The right of the prosecutor to take out subpoenas, or to avail himself of the aid of the court, in any stage of the proceedings previous to the indictment, is not controverted. This act of congress, it is true, applies only to capital cases; but persons charged with offences not capital have a constitutional and a legal right to examine their testimony; and this act ought to be considered as declaratory of the common law in cases where this constitutional right exists.

Upon immemorial usage, then, and upon what is deemed a sound construction of the constitution and law of the land, the court is of opinion that any person charged with a crime in the courts of the United States has a right, before as well as after indictment, to the process of the court to compel the attendance of his witnesses. Much delay and much inconvenience may be avoided by this construction; no mischief, which is perceived, can be produced by it. The process would only issue when, according to the ordinary course of proceeding, the indictment would be tried at the term to which the subpoena is made returnable; so that it becomes incumbent 34 on the accused to be ready for his trial at that term.

This point being disposed of, it remains to inquire whether a subpoena duces tecum can be directed to the president of the United States, and whether it ought to be directed in this case? This question originally consisted of two parts. It was at first doubted whether a subpoena could issue, in any case, to the chief magistrate of the nation; and if it could, whether that subpoena could do more than direct his personal attendance; whether it could direct him to bring with him a paper which was to constitute the gist of his testimony. While the argument was opening, the attorney for the United States avowed his opinion that a general subpoena might issue to the president; but not a subpoena duces tecum. This terminated the argument on that part of the question. The court, however, has thought it necessary to state briefly the foundation of its opinion, that such a subpoena may issue. In the provisions of the constitution, and of the statute, which give to the accused a right to the compulsory process of the court, there is no exception whatever. The obligation, therefore, of those provisions is general; and it would seem that no person could claim an exemption from them, but one who would not be a witness. At any rate, if an exception to the general principle exist, it must be looked for in the law of evidence. The exceptions furnished by the law of evidence, (with one only reservation,) so far as they are personal, are of those only whose testimony could not be received. The single reservation alluded to is the case of the king. Although he may, perhaps, give testimony, it is said to be incompatible with his dignity to appear under the process of the court. Of the many points of difference which exist between the first magistrate in England and the first magistrate of the United States, in respect to the personal dignity conferred on them by the constitutions of their respective nations, the court will only select and mention two. It is a principle of the English constitution that the king can do no wrong, that no blame can be imputed to him, that he cannot be named in debate. By the constitution of the United States, the president, as well as any other officer of the government, may be impeached, and may be removed from office on high crimes and misdemeanors. By the constitution of Great Britain, the crown is hereditary, and the monarch can never be a subject. By that of the United States, the president is elected from the mass of the people, and, on the expiration of the time for which he is elected, returns to the mass of the people again. How essentially this difference of circumstances must vary the policy of the laws of the two countries, in reference to the personal dignity of the executive chief, will be perceived by every person. In this respect the first magistrate of the Union may more properly be likened to the first magistrate of a state; at any rate, under the former Confederation; and it is not known ever to have been doubted, but that the chief magistrate of a state might be served with a subpoena ad testificandum. If, in any court of the United States, it has ever been decided that a subpoena cannot issue to the president, that decision is unknown to this court.

If, upon any principle, the president could be construed to stand exempt from the general provisions of the constitution, it would be, because his duties as chief magistrate demand his whole time for national objects. But it is apparent that this demand is not unremitting; and, if it should exist at the time when his attendance on a court is required, it would be shown on the return of the subpoena, and would rather constitute of reason for not obeying the process of the court than a reason against its being issued. In point of fact it cannot be doubted that the people of England have the same interest in the service of the executive government, that is, of the cabinet counsel, that the American people have in the service of the executive of the United States, and that their duties are as arduous and as unremitting. Yet it has never been alleged, that a subpoena might not be directed to them. It cannot be denied that to issue a subpoena to a person filling the exalted position of the chief magistrate is a duty which would be dispensed with more cheerfully than it would be performed; but, if it be a duty, the court can have no choice in the case. If, then, as is admitted by the counsel for the United States, a subpoena may issue to the president, the accused is entitled to it of course; and whatever difference may exist with respect to the power to compel the same obedience to the process, as if it had been directed to a private citizen, there exists no difference with respect to the right to obtain it. The guard, furnished to this high officer, to protect him from being harassed by vexatious and unnecessary subpoenas, is to be looked for in the conduct of a court after those subpoenas have issued; not in any circumstance which is to precede their being issued. If, in being summoned to give his personal attendance to testify, the law does not discriminate between the president and a private citizen, what foundation is there for the opinion that this difference is created by the circumstance that his testimony depends on a paper in his possession, not on facts which have come to his knowledge otherwise than by writing? The court can perceive no foundation for such an opinion. The propriety of introducing any paper into a case, as testimony, must depend on the character of the paper, not on the character of the person who holds it. A subpoena duces tecum, then, may issue to any person to whom an ordinary subpoena may issue, directing him to being any paper of which the party praying it has a right to avail 35 himself as testimony; if, indeed, that be the necessary process for obtaining the view of such a paper. When this subject was suddenly introduced, the court felt some doubt concerning the propriety of directing a subpoena to the chief magistrate, and some doubt also concerning the propriety of directing any paper in his possession not public in its nature, to be exhibited in court. The impression that the questions which might arise in consequence of such process, were more proper for discussion on the return of the process than of its issuing, was then strong on the mind of the judges; but the circumspection with which they would take any step which would in any manner relate to that high personage, prevented their yielding readily to those impressions, and induced the request that those points, if not admitted, might be argued. The result of that argument is a confirmation of the impression originally entertained. The court can perceive no legal objection to issuing a subpoena duces tecum to any person whatever, provided the case be such as to justify the process. This is said to be a motion to the discretion of the court. This is true. But a motion to its discretion is a motion, not to its inclination, but to its judgment; and its judgment is to be guided by sound legal principles. A subpoena duces tecum varies from an ordinary subpoena only in this; that a witness is summoned for the purpose of bringing with him a paper in his custody. In some of our sister states whose system of jurisprudence is erected on the same foundation with our own, this process, we learn, issues of course. In this state it issues, not absolutely of course, but with leave of the court. No case, however, exists as is believed, in which the motion has been founded on an affidavit, in which it has been denied, or in which it has been opposed. It has been truly observed that the opposite party can, regularly, take no more interest in the awarding a subpoena duces tecum than in the awarding an ordinary subpoena. In either case he may object to any delay, the grant of which may be implied in granting the subpoena; but he can no more object regularly to the legal means of obtaining testimony, which exists in the papers, than in the mind of the person who may be summoned. If no inconvenience can be sustained by the opposite party, he can only oppose the motion in the character of an amicus curiae, to prevent the court from making an improper order, or from burthening some officer by compelling an unnecessary attendance. This court would certainly be very unwilling to say that upon fair construction the constitutional and legal right to obtain its process, to compel the attendance of witnesses, does not extend to their bringing with them such papers as may be material in the defence. The literal distinction which exists between the cases is too much attenuated to be countenanced in the tribunals of a just and humane nation. If, then, the subpoena be issued without inquiry into the manner of its application, it would seem to trench on the privileges which the constitution extends to the accused; it would seem to reduce his means of defence within narrower limits than is designed by the fundamental law of our country, if an overstrained rigor should be used with respect to his right to apply for papers deemed by himself to be material. In the one case the accused is made the absolute judge of the testimony to be summoned; if, in the other, he is not a judge, absolutely for himself, his judgment ought to be controlled only so far as it is apparent that he means to exercise his privileges not really in his own defence, but for purposes which the court ought to discountenance. The court would not lend its aid to motions obviously designed to manifest disrespect to the government; but the court has no right to refuse its aid to motions for papers to which the accused may be entitled, and which may be material in his defence. These observations are made to show the nature of the discretion which may be exercised. If it be apparent that the papers are irrelative to the case, or that for state reasons they cannot be introduced into the defence, the subpoena duces tecum would be useless. But, if this be not apparent, if they may be important in the defence, if they may be safely read at the trial, would it not be a blot in the page which records the judicial proceedings of this country, if, in a case of such serious import as this, the accused should be denied the use of them? The counsel for the United States takes a very different view of the subject, and insist that a motion for process to obtain testimony should be supported by the same full and explicit proof of the nature and application of that testimony, which would be required on a motion, which would delay public justice, which would arrest the ordinary course of proceeding, or would in any other manner affect the rights of the opposite party. In favor of this position has been urged the opinion of one, whose loss as a friend and as a judge I sincerely deplore; whose worth I feel, and whose authority I shall at all times greatly respect. If his opinions were really opposed to mine, I should certainly revise, deliberately revise, the judgment I had formed; but I perceive no such opposition.

In the trials of Smith and Ogden [U. S. v. Smith, Case No. 16,342], the court in which Judge Patterson presided, required a special affidavit in support of a motion made by the counsel for the accused for a continuance and for an attachment against witnesses who had been subpoenaed and who had failed to attend. Had this requisition of a special affidavit been made as well a foundation for an attachment as for a continuance, the cases would not have been parallel, because the attachment was considered by the counsel for the prosecution merely as a means of punishing 36 the contempt, and a court might certainly require stronger testimony to induce them to punish a contempt, than would be required to lend its aid to a party in order to procure evidence in a cause. But the proof furnished by the case is most conclusive that the special statements of the affidavit were required solely on account of the continuance. Although the counsel for the United States considered the motion for an attachment merely as a mode of punishing for contempt, the counsel for Smith and Ogden considered it as compulsory process to bring in a witness, and moved a continuance until they could have the benefit of this process. The continuance was to arrest the ordinary course of justice; and, therefore, the court required a special affidavit, showing the materiality of the testimony before this continuance could be granted. Prima facie the evidence could not apply to the case; and there was an additional reason for a special affidavit. The object of this special statement was expressly said to be for a continuance. Colden proceeded: 'The present application is to put off the cause on account of the absence of witnesses, whose testimony the defendant alleges is material for his defence, and who have disobeyed the ordinary process of the court. In compliance with the intimation from the bench yesterday, the defendant has disclosed by the affidavit which I have just read, the points to which he expects the witnesses who have been summoned will testify. If the court cannot or will not issue compulsory process to bring in the witnesses who are the object of this application, then the cause will not be postponed. Or, if it appears to the court, that the matter disclosed by the affidavit might not be given in evidence, if the witness were now here, then we cannot expect that our motion will be successful. For it would be absurd to suppose that the court will postpone the trial on account of the absence of witnesses whom they cannot compel to appear, and of whose voluntary attendance there is too much reason to despair; or, on account of the absence of witnesses who, if they were before the court, could not be heard on the trial.' See the trials of Smith and Ogden [supra]. This argument states, unequivocally, the purpose for which a special affidavit was required.

The counsel for the United States considered the subject in the same light. After exhibiting an affidavit for the purpose of showing that the witnesses could not probably possess any material information, Mr. Standford said: 'It was decided by the court yesterday that it was incumbent on the defendant, in order to entitle himself to a postponement of the trial on account of the absence of these witnesses, to show in what respect they are material for his defence. It was the opinion of the court that the general affidavit, in common form, would not be sufficient for this purpose, but that the particular facts expected from the witnesses must be disclosed in order that the court might, upon those facts, judge of the propriety of granting the postponement.'

The court frequently treated the subject so as to show the opinion that the special affidavit was required only on account of the continuance; but what is conclusive on this point is, that after deciding the testimony of the witnesses to be such as could not be offered to the jury. Judge Patterson was of opinion that a rule, to show cause why an attachment should not issue, ought to be granted. He could not have required the materiality of the witness to be shown on a motion, the success of which did not, in his opinion, in any degree depend on that materiality; and which he granted after deciding the testimony to be such as the jury ought not to hear. It is, then, most apparent that the opinion of Judge Patterson has been misunderstood, and that no inference can possibly be drawn from it, opposed to the principle which has been laid down by the court. That principle will therefore be applied to the present motion.

The first paper required is the letter of General Wilkinson, which was referred on in the message of the president to congress. The application of that letter to the case is shown by the terms in which the communication was made. It is a statement of the conduct of the accused made by the person who is declared to be the essential witnesses against him. The order for producing this letter is opposed:

First, because it is not material to the defense. It is a principle, universally acknowledged, that a party has a right to oppose to the testimony of any witness against him, the declarations which that witness has made at other times on the same subject. If he possesses this right, he must bring forward proof of those declarations. This proof must be obtained before he knows positively what the witness will say; for if he waits until the witness has been heard at the trial, it is too late to meet him with his former declarations. Those former declarations, therefore, constitute a mass of testimony, which a party has a right to obtain by way of precaution, and the positive necessity of which can only be decided at the trial. It is with some surprise an argument was heard from the bar, insinuating that the award of a subpoena on this ground gave the countenance of the court to suspicions affecting the veracity of a witness who is to appear on the part of the United States. This observation could not have been considered. In contests of this description, the court takes no part; the court has no right to take a part. Every person may give in evidence, testimony such as is stated in this case. What would be the feelings of the prosecutor if, in this case, the accused should produce a witness completely exclupating himself, and the attorney for the United States should be arrested in his attempt to prove what the same witness had 37 said upon a former occasion, by a declaration from the bench that such an attempt could not be permitted, because it would imply a suspicion in the court that the witness had not spoken the truth? Respecting so unjustifiable an interposition but one opinion would be formed.

The second objection is, that the letter contains matter which ought not to be disclosed. That there may be matter, the production of which the court would not require, is certain; but, in a capital case, that the accused ought, in some form, to have the benefit of it, if it were really essential to his defence, is a position which the court would very reluctantly deny. It ought not to be believed that the department which superintends prosecutions in criminal cases, would be inclined to withhold it. What ought to be done under such circumstances present a delicate question, the discussion of which, it is hoped, will never be rendered necessary in this country. At present it need only be said that the question does not occur at this time. There is certainly nothing before the court which shows that the letter in question contains any matter the disclosure of which would endanger the public safety. If it does contain such matter, the fact may appear before the disclosure is made. If it does contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, which it is not the wish of the executive to disclose, such matter, if it be not immediately and essentially applicable to the point, will, of course, be suppressed. It is not easy to conceive that so much of the letter as relates to the conduct of the accused can be a subject of delicacy with the president. Everything of this kind, however, will have its due consideration on the return of the subpoena.

Thirdly, it has been alleged that a copy may be received instead of the original, and the act of congress has been cited in support of this proposition. This argument presupposes that the letter required is a document filed in the department of state, the reverse of which may be and most probably is the fact. Letters addressed to the president are most usually retained by himself. They do not belong to any of the departments. But, were the facts otherwise, a copy might not answer the purpose. The copy would not be superior to the original, and the original itself would not be admitted, if denied, without proof that it was in the handwriting of the witness. Suppose the case put at the bar of an indictment on this letter for a libel, and on its production it should appear not to be in the handwriting of the person indicted. Would its being deposited in the department of state make it his writing, or subject him to the consequence of having written it? Certainly not. For the purpose, then, of showing the letter to have been written by a particular person, the original must be produced, and a copy could not be admitted. On the confidential nature of this letter much has been said at the bar and authorities have been produced which appear to be conclusive. Had its contents been orally communicated, the person to whom the communications were made could not have excused himself from detailing them, so far as they might be deemed essential in the defence. Their being in writing gives no additional sanctity; the only difference produced by the circumstance is, that the contents of the paper must be proved by the paper itself, not by the recollection of the witness.

Much has been said about the disrespect to the chief magistrate, which is implied by this motion, and by such a decision of it as the law is believed to require. These observations will be very truly answered by the declaration that this court feels many, perhaps, peculiar motives for manifesting as guarded a respect for the chief magistrate of the Union as is compatible with its official duties. To go beyond these would exhibit a conduct which would deserve some other appellation than the term respect. It is not for the court to anticipate the event of the present prosecution. Should it terminate as is expected on the part of the United States, all those who are concerned in it should certainly regret that a paper which the accused believed to be essential to his defence, which may, for aught that now appears, be essential, had been withheld from him. I will not say, that this circumstance would, in any degree, tarnish the reputation of the government; but I will say, that it would justly tarnish the reputation of the court which had given its sanction to its being withheld. Might I be permitted to utter one sentiment, with respect to myself, it would be to deplore, most earnestly, the occasion which should compel me to look back on any part of my official conduct with so much self-reproach as I should feel, could I declare, on the information now possessed, that the accused is not entitled to the letter in question, if it should be really important to him.

The propriety of requiring the answer to this letter is more questionable. It is alleged that it most probably communicates orders showing the situation of this country with Spain, which will be important on the misdemeanor. If it contain matter not essential to the defence, and the disclosure be unpleasant to the executive, it certainly ought not to be disclosed. This is a point which will appear on the return. The demand of the orders which have been issued, and which have been, as is alleged, published in the Natchez Gazette, is by no means unusual. Such documents have often been produced in the courts of the United States and the courts of England. If they contain matter interesting to the nation, the concealment of which is required by the public safety, that matter will appear upon the return. If they do not, and are material, they may be exhibited. It is said they cannot be material, because they cannot justify any unlawful resistance which 38 may have been employed or meditated by the accused. Were this admitted, and were it also admitted that such resistance would amount to treason, the orders might still be material; because they might tend to weaken the endeavor to connect such over act with any over act of which this court may take cognizance. The court, however, is rather inclined to the opinion that the subpoena in such case ought to be directed to the head of the department in whose custody the orders are. The court must suppose that the letter of the secretary of the navy, which has been stated by the attorney for the United States, to refer the counsel for the prisoner to his legal remedy for the copies he desired, alluded to such a motion as is now made.

The affidavit on which the motion is grounded has not been noticed. It is believed that such a subpoena, as is asked, ought to issue, if there exist any reason for supposing that the testimony may be material, and ought to be admitted. It is only because the subpoena is to those who administer the government of this country, that such an affidavit was required as would furnish probable cause to believe that the testimony was desired for the real purposes of defence, and not for such as this court will forever discountenance.

END OF DOCUMENT

Ohio. Ohio R Crim P 6(A).
New Mexico. NM Stat Ann § 31-6-1.
West Virginia. W Va Code § 52-2-43; W Va R Crim Pro 6(g).

§ 5:11. Model Oath for Grand Jurors.

The form of the oath taken by grand jurors in the feder system, which is similar to the oath prescribed by statute or ru in most states, reads as follows:

"Do you, and each of you, solemnly swear that you sh diligently inquire into and make true presentment or indictme of all such matters and things as shall be given you in charge otherwise come to your knowledge, touching your grand ju service; to keep secret the counsel of the United States, yo fellows and yourselves; not to present or indict any perso through hatred, malice or ill will; nor leave any person unpre sented or unindicted through fear, favor, or affection, nor fo any reward, or hope or promise thereof; but in all you presentments and indictments to present the truth, the whol truth, and nothing but the truth, to the best of your skill and understanding? If so, answer 'I do.'"

§ 5:12. Model Charge to Grand Jury.

The charge that is recommended for federal courts to use a the time of empanelling a grand jury is as follows:

"Ladies and gentlemen of the grand jury, you have no been empanelled and sworn as a grand jury. The duties wit which you are charged are of the highest importance to the proper administration of justice. In serving as grand jurors you will be performing an important civic duty and fulfilling an important obligation of citizenship.

"It is the court's responsibility to instruct you at this time as to the law which should govern your actions and your deliberations as grand jurors.

"The grand jury existed in England long before it was brought over to the American colonies. There was a conflict between the powers of the English kings and the rights of the citizen, and the grand jury often stood as a barrier against political and religious persecution. The grand jury developed as an entity independent of the king, so that the king could not charge a subject with a crime without first submitting the evidence to a grand jury which could decide whether to return an indictment against the accused. The resolute independence of the grand jury came about only after considerable blood was shed and punishment meted out to our forbears.

"The framers of our federal Constitution deemed the grand jury so important an instrumentality in the administration of justice that they included it in the Bill of Rights. The Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides in part that 'No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury . . . .' An infamous crime is a serious crime which may be punished by imprisonment for more than one year.

"We have two kinds of juries in the federal courts. First, there is the trial jury, sometimes known as the petit jury. The trial jury, consisting of 12 members, determines whether a person accused of a crime is guilty or not guilty of the crime charged. Federal jury trials take place in the courtroom, in the presence of the judge, the jury, the attorneys, and the public, where the accused may confront the witnesses against him and may be convicted only when each juror is convinced beyond a reasonable doubt.

"The other type of jury is the grand jury. Its function is equally important but entirely different. It consists of from 16 to 23 persons whose functions are conducted in secrecy. The grand jury has the responsibility to investigate charges of crime committed against the laws of the United States and, if the result of the investigation so warrants, to make an accusation against a person by returning an indictment against him. The decision to indict is normally made solely on the basis of the government's evidence without the accused person's having the opportunity to present his side of the case.

"An indictment is the formal written accusation charging the accused person or persons with one or more crimes. In the event that an indictment is returned against an accused person, he becomes a defendant, and in due course he will be given the opportunity to plead not guilty or guilty to the indictment. If he pleads not guilty, he will be required to stand trial in open court before a trial jury. In short, the grand jury decides whether a person should be formally charged with a crime and brought to trial; it is the trial jury which then decides whether the accused person is guilty or not guilty of the crime charged in indictment.

"Thus, the purpose of the grand jury is to determi whether there is sufficient evidence to justify a formal accus tion against a person. If law enforcement officials were not fi required to submit to an impartial grand jury proof of guilt as a proposed charge against a person suspected of having comm ted such crime, they would be free to arrest the suspect, an bring him to trial no matter how little evidence existed support the charge.

"As members of the grand jury, you, in a very real sen stand between the government and the accused. A federal gra jury shall never be made an instrument of private prejudic vengeance or malice. It is your duty to see to it that indictmen are returned against those who you find probable cause to believe are guilty and not against the innocent. It is further you duty to see to it that the innocent are not compelled to go t trial before a trial jury. Only when you are satisfied that there probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed by specified person should you return an indictment against suc person.

"In addition to the protection of life, liberty and th property of the people, another important function of govern ment is the administration of justice. The performance of thes functions requires the vigorous, fearless and impartial enforce ment of the criminal law, with due regard for the constitutiona rights of the accused. The grand jury is one of the most forceful and effective agencies through which the government perform these functions and duties.

"As set forth in the oath which you have taken, it is no the duty of each of you to inquire diligently, fully an impartially into all of the offenses which come to your knowl edge and of which this court has cognizance. You have solemnl promised that you will charge no one from fear, favor, affection reward or hope of reward. You are to keep secret the proceeding before the grand jury and also the views expressed by the United States Attorney, your fellow grand jurors, and your own. You ar to perform all the duties imposed upon you as grand jurors to the best of your ability.

"The grand jury is no place to shield or reward one's friends, nor to punish one's enemies. A member of the grand jury who finds himself or herself in a biased state of mind as to a person under investigation should not participate in that investigation or in the return of the indictment.

"Now this does not mean that, if you have an opinion, you should not participate in the investigation; but it does mean that if you form a fixed opinion before the matter comes up, that is before you hear any evidence, on a basis of friendship or hatred or some other similar motivation, you should not participate in that investigation and in the return or failure to return an indictment.

"It is a characteristic of our system of government to establish some checks against the unreasonable exercise of power. Your powers are extensive in many respects, but your powers are also limited in several important respects.

"You are empowered to investigate conduct which violates federal law. Criminal activity of a local nature is punished by state law. This latter type of criminal conduct falls outside your inquiry. The federal courts deal only with those matters over which they have authority under the Constitution and deal only with criminal activity which violates an act of Congress. Sometimes the same conduct violates both federal law and state law, and you may properly consider such conduct.

"As a grand jury, you are not concerned with the wisdom of the criminal laws enacted by Congress. Congress determines the policy in this field. It is every person's duty to conform his acts to the laws enacted by Congress. We are a government of laws and not of persons. All are equal under the law, and no one is above the law.

"Furthermore, the punishment provided by law for the offense charged in the indictment is a matter exclusively within the province of the court and is not to be considered by the grand jury in its deliberations.

"There is also a geographical limitation imposed on the scope of your inquiries and the exercise of your powers. You may inquire only into offenses committed in this district.

"Finally, there are limits imposed on the exercise of your powers by your own common sense and sense of propriety. You have the power to call private citizens from their daily business and affairs to testify before you, but you should remember th citizens are not to be harried or inconvenienced unless it public interest and justice require it.

"Just as it is hoped and expected that you will serve as th balance wheel between the power of the government and th interests of personal liberty, it is also expected that you wi achieve an appropriate balance in the exercise of your power Justice is not usually vindicated by excesses in the use of pow or undue haste. Justice is best served by a balanced an reasonable approach to the tasks that await you.

"As I have already explained to you, your function is determine whether a person shall be tried for a serious federa crime alleged to have been committed within this district. Th includes felonies and some misdemeanors. The cases whic come before you will arise in various ways. Frequently, suspect are arrested during or shortly after the commission of an alleged crime. They are taken before a magistrate of the district before you become involved in the case. The United States magistrate holds a preliminary hearing to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that a crime was committed and that the accused committed it. If the magistrate finds such probable cause, he will direct that the accused be held for the action of the grand jury, so that you can consider whether an indictment should be issued.

"Other cases will come to you before an arrest but after an investigation has been conducted by a governmental agency such as the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Treasury Department, postal authorities or other federal law enforcement officials. These cases are then brought to your attention by the United States Attorney or an Assistant United States Attorney.

"In addition to the matters presented to you by the United States Attorney's office, you have the right and duty to investigate any other offenses committed in this district against the criminal laws of the United States of which you have knowledge or which come to your attention.

"The existence of such crimes may come to your attention in two ways. First, during the course of your inquiry about one offense, the testimony may disclose a different offense. Second, some of you may have personal knowledge of the commission of a federal crime not known to the federal authorities. However, as you have no power to employ investigators or to draw on federal funds for such purpose, it is best to take up such matters with the United States Attorney. If he refuses to act or is unable to act impartially in the matter, you may then take it up with the court.

"By the terms of the Constitution, you may also make a 'presentment' directly to the court. A presentment is an accusation initiated by the grand jury itself without any formal charge or written indictment having been submitted by the government. To form the basis for a prosecution, it must be followed by an indictment. You have the power to make a presentment, even over the active opposition of the government attorneys, if you believe it is necessary in the interests of justice. I mention this power of presentment to you only to indicate the extent of your powers, and not to suggest that you are likely to find it wise or necessary to exercise this procedure.

"Sixteen of the 23 members of the grand jury constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. If fewer than this number are present, even for a moment, the proceedings of the grand jury must stop. This shows how important it is that each of you conscientiously attend the meetings. If an emergency prevents your personal attendance at a meeting, you must promptly advise the grand jury foreperson, who has the authority to excuse you from attendance. If your absence will prevent the grand jury from acting, you should, if humanly possible, attend the meeting. You have the right to regulate your sessions to accommodate the convenience of yourselves and the United States Attorney, but you have the overall obligation to be available for duty at all times during the term for which you have been selected. If you find it necessary to seek your discharge from all continued service as a member of the grand jury, such request must be presented to the judge.

"The United States Attorney represents the government in the prosecution of parties charged with the commission of public offenses against the laws of the United States. The United States Attorney or one of his assistants will present the accusations which the government desires to have considered by you. He will point out to you the laws which the government deems have been violated and will subpoena for you such witnesses as he may consider important and also such other witnesses as you may request or direct to have presented to in connection with matters under consideration or which to your knowledge.

"The evidence that you will consider will normally con of oral testimony of witnesses and written documents. E witness will appear before you separately. When the wit first appears before you, he will be sworn in by the grand foreperson. After being sworn, the witness may be question Ordinarily, the United States Attorney or one of his assista questions the witness first. Next, the foreperson questions witness, followed by the other members of the grand jury.

"In certain cases it may be necessary to have an interpre brought into the grand jury room and sworn to assist the gra jury in interpreting the testimony of someone who does speak the English language. If this be the case, the grand ju may arrange for an interpreter through the United Stat Attorney or one of his assistants.

"Witnesses should be treated courteously when they appea before you. Questions should be put to them in an orderl fashion. If there is any doubt as to the propriety of an questions asked, the advice of the United States Attorney or hi assistants may be sought. If necessary, a ruling may be obtaine from the court.

"As you listen to witnesses who are presented to you in the grand jury room and hear their testimony as to matter concerning a defendant or defendants, you are the judge of th credibility of these witnesses. You decide the value of each and every witness. You may believe the testimony of the witness, o you may not believe such testimony. The determination of the credibility of a witness involves a question of fact, and not a question of law. It is for you to decide whether you believe the testimony of a witness. It is not for the court, the prosecutors, or any officer of the court to determine that for you.

"It will assist you in passing on the credibility of witnesses to consider whether the witnesses are personally interested, whether their testimony has been corroborated by other wit nesses or circumstances in the case, what opportunity the witnesses have had for observing or determining the matter about which they testify, the reasonableness or probability of the story which they narrate to you, and the manner and demeanor of the witnesses in testifying before you. From these factors, you will determine whether you believe the witnesses who testify before you.

"Hearsay testimony, that is testimony as to facts not known by a witness of his own personal knowledge but told to him by others than the accused, may alone, if deemed by you to be persuasive, provide a basis for returning an indictment against an accused. You must be satisfied that there is evidence against the accused showing probable cause, even though such evidence is composed of hearsay testimony.

"You will receive all the evidence presented which may throw light upon the matter under consideration, but you should be cautious in accepting as true mere reports and suspicions, unless they tend to provide you with probable cause to believe in the guilt of the accused. If in the course of your inquiries you have reason to believe that there is other evidence, not presented to you but within your reach, which would qualify or explain away the charge under investigation, it will be your duty to order such evidence to be produced. You have the right to subpoena witnesses from anywhere in the country and may direct the United States Attorney to issue such subpoenas as you see fit. Your right to subpoena witnesses is a powerful one and should be exercised with careful discretion. Persons should not ordinarily be subjected to disruption of their daily lives nor should public funds be expended to bring in witnesses unless you believe they can provide meaningful evidence which will assist you in your investigations.

"You are the sole judges as to the number of witnesses you desire to hear. You are not required to summon witnesses which the accused person may wish to have examined unless you believe that an apparent violation may be explained by their testimony. Similarly, you may refuse to hear witnesses offered by the United States Attorney if you do not believe their testimony will assist you in your functions.

"Witnesses are not permitted to have counsel present with them in the grand jury room. However, the law permits witnesses to confer with their counsel outside of the grand jury room. You are to draw no adverse inference if a witness chooses to exercise this right to confer with counsel outside the grand jury room; an appearance before a grand jury may present complex legal problems requiring the assistance of cou

There are also other rights possessed by every witness befo grand jury. These include the right to refuse to answer question if the answer thereto would tend to incriminate h and the right to know that anything he says may be used aga him.

"Frequently charges are made against more than person. It will be your duty to examine the evidence as it rel to each person and to make your finding as to each person in relationship in which they may be joined in an indictm against more than one person. In other words, where charges made against more than one person, in accordance with evidence as you find it, you may indict all of the persons or o such persons whom you believe the evidence points to as be properly deserving of indictment.

"Neither the accused nor any witnesses in his behal normally will testify before the grand jury. Upon reques preferably in writing, you may afford the accused an opportuni to appear before you. If the accused is given this opportunit and appears, he cannot be forced to testify because of th provision in the federal Constitution against self-incriminatio
If you attempt to force him to testify, an indictment returne against him may be nullified.

"Because the appearance of an accused before you may raise complicated legal problems, if you decide to allow an accused to appear, you should seek the United States Attorney's advic and, if necessary, the court's ruling before his appearance is permitted.

"Even if the accused is willing to testify voluntarily, it is necessary that he first be warned of his right not to testify, and he should be required to sign a formal waiver before his testimony is received. You should be completely satisfied that he understands what he is doing.

"If a witness exercises his Fifth Amendment right against compulsory self-incrimination, the grand jurors should hold no prejudice against him for that reason, and it should play no role in the return of any indictment against such witness.

"After you have heard all the evidence you wish to hear in a particular matter, you will then proceed to deliberate whether the accused person should be indicted. No one, other than your own members is to be present while you are deliberating or voting.

"After all persons other than the grand jury members have left the room, the foreperson will ask the grand jury members to discuss and vote upon the question whether the evidence persuades the grand jury that a crime has probably been committed by the person or persons accused and that an indictment should be returned.

"To return an indictment charging an individual with an offense, it is not necessary that you find that the accused is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. You are not a trial jury, and your task is not to decide the guilt or innocence of the person charged. In your deliberative sessions, remember that the accused usually has had no opportunity to present a defense, so that ordinarily you hear only the government's side of the case. Your task is to determine whether the government's evidence as presented to you is sufficient to cause you to conclude that there is probable cause to believe that the accused is guilty of the offense charged against him—that is, whether the evidence presented to you is sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable person's believing that the accused is probably guilty of the offense with which he is charged.

"Each grand juror has the right to express his view of the matter under consideration. Only after all grand jurors have been given full opportunity to be heard will the vote be taken. It should be remembered that at least 16 jurors must be present at all times, and 12 members must vote in favor of an indictment before one may be returned.

"The foreperson shall designate another juror to serve as secretary, and the latter shall keep a record of the number of jurors concurring in the finding of every indictment. The record shall be filed with the clerk of the court. The voting record for each indictment shall not include the names of the jurors but shall indicate the number of affirmative votes.

"You may decide, after deliberation among yourselves, that further evidence should be considered before a vote is taken. In such case, you may direct the United States Attorney to subpoena the additional documents or witnesses you desire to consider.

"If 12 or more members of the grand jury, after deli tion, believe that an indictment is warranted, then you request the United States Attorney to prepare the fo written indictment if a proposed indictment has not al been prepared. The indictment will be in the name of the U States, will designate the defendant or defendants, will set the date and place of the alleged offense, will asser circumstances making the alleged conduct criminal and identify the criminal statute violated. The foreperson endorse the indictment as a true bill and place his signatu the space followed by the word 'foreperson.' It is the duty o foreperson to endorse every indictment found with the con rence of at least 12 grand jurors, whether he voted for or aga the finding of the indictment. The grand jury will then re the indictment to the court for action. If less than 12 memb of the grand jury vote in favor of an indictment which has b submitted to you for your consideration, the foreperson w endorse the indictment 'not a true bill' and return it to t court, and the court will impound it.

"Indictments will be presented to a judge or magistrate open court by your foreperson at the conclusion of eac deliberative session.

"In the absence of the foreperson, the deputy foreper may act in all of the former's functions and duties.

"You will recall from my earlier remarks that the grand ju developed in England as an entity independent from the king protect a subject from an unwarranted prosecution. The kin could not charge a subject with a serious crime without fir submitting evidence and witnesses to a grand jury, which th decided whether to return an indictment against the accus person.

"Just as the English grand jury was independent of th king, the federal grand jury under the United States Constit tion is independent of the United States Attorney, the prosec torial agent of the executive branch of the federal governmen The grand jury is not an arm of the Federal Bureau o Investigation; it is not an arm of the Internal Revenue Servic just as it is not an arm of the United States Attorney's offic There has been some criticism of the institution of the gran jury for allegedly acting as a mere rubber stamp approvin prosecutions that are brought before it by government representatives. You would desecrate your oath and the tradition of the grand jury if you were merely to rubber-stamp the contemplated prosecutions brought before you by the government representatives. Similarly, you would perform a disservice if you did not indict where the evidence warranted an indictment.

"As a practical matter, you must work closely with the government attorneys. The United States Attorney and his assistants will provide you with important service in helping you to find your way when confronted with complex legal matters. It is entirely proper that you should receive this assistance.

"However, you must remember that you are not the prosecutor's agent. Your role is related to but clearly distinct from that of the government attorneys who will assist you, and it is important that you keep the distinction between the roles clearly in mind. Although you must work closely with the government, you must not yield your powers nor forgo your independence of spirit.

"These comments are meant to be cautionary in nature. The government attorneys are sincere men and women, and you will develop ordinary human feelings as you work with them during your term of service. If past experience is any indication of what to expect in the future, then you can expect candor, honesty, and good faith efforts in every matter presented by the government. However, it is because you may tend to expect such high quality from the government's agents that there is a potentially grave risk to your independence of thought and action, which may cause you to lapse into reliance when you should be dubious or questioning.

"You should also remember that the government attorneys are advocates for the government's interest. They are prosecutors; you are not. While they will usually balance fairly the government's interest against the interests of a citizen's personal liberty, it is your responsibility to ensure that the proper balance is achieved in every case brought to your attention. You must exercise your own judgment, and if the facts suggest a different balance than advocated by the government attorneys, then you must achieve the appropriate balance even in the face of their opposition or criticism.

"Further, in gauging your role and relationship wit government, you should be aware of the pressures inhera the development of criminal cases. Frequently, a governm law enforcement agent is the first governmental represent to detect some evidence or indication of a criminal offense may occur long before the matter is brought to the attenti the government attorney or the grand jury. Occasionally, enforcement agent files an incomplete report with the go ment attorneys, secure in his personal belief that he has a pr case or that he will soon have a proper case. This may happe complete good faith on the agent's part. Thus it may de that a case will find its way to the grand jury before a fu adequate investigation has been completed. The governm attorneys may also believe that the investigation by enforcement agents has been completed or they may be actin reliance on the agent's good faith or personal reputation expect the investigation to be shortly concluded and producti of appropriate evidence to support an indictment. Such develo ments are inherent in close working associations and oft serious considerations for you.

"An inadequate or incomplete investigation is a loose drawn net that may snare the innocent and allow the tr offenders to elude the law. It is here that you must be alert your duties. You may find pressures exerted on you to decide an indictment after being presented with an inadequate incomplete investigation. Your task in such a situation may b further complicated by the realization that the governmen request is made in complete good faith.

"Your duties require that you act only after receivi evidence which shows probable cause. Thus, there is no room you to act on the basis of the government's good faith. If yo should encounter an incomplete investigation, then it is yo responsibility to see that a full investigation is developed fo your benefit before voting to return an indictment. As previou ly stated, you have considerable powers to ensure that a prop investigation is in fact accomplished. You must use your goo judgment and be alert to those situations that either abstract or concretely suggest some inadequacy. These considerations a part of your responsibilities as a separate and independent gran jury.

"Just as you must maintain your independent office throughout your dealings with the government attorneys, so should your dealings with the court be on a formal basis. If you should ever have a question for the court or desire to make a presentment or to return an indictment to the court, then you will assemble in the courtroom for these purposes. However, each juror is directed to report immediately to the court any attempt by any person who, under any pretense whatsoever, addresses such juror for the purpose of or with the intent to gain any information of any kind concerning the proceedings of the grand jury, or to influence a juror in any manner or for any purpose.

"Within your prescribed sphere, you occupy an important and independent office in the administration of justice. The government attorneys cannot dominate or command your actions. The court may guide, but cannot dominate or command your actions.

"In performing your duties, you are free to exercise your own judgment without fear or favor and shall not be deterred or influenced by the criticism of the public, the prosecutor, or the court. You are the defenders of the innocent as well as the accusers of the guilty, and in both respects you vindicate the integrity of the law. Ours is a government based on law, and there can be no more significant role in maintaining this precept than that assigned to the grand jury.

"Your proceedings are secret and must remain secret permanently unless and until the court determines that the proceedings or a portion of them should be revealed in the interests of justice.

"There are several important reasons for this secrecy requirement. A premature disclosure of grand jury action may frustrate the ends of justice by giving an opportunity to the accused to escape and become a fugitive or to destroy evidence. Also, if the testimony of a witness is disclosed, he may be subjected to intimidation, retaliation or other tampering before he testifies at trial. Further, the secrecy requirement protects an innocent person who may have come under investigation but who has been cleared by the action of the grand jury. In the eyes of some, investigation alone carries with it a suggestion of guilt. Thus, great injury and injustice can be done to the good name and standing of a person, even though he is not indicted, a it become known that there had ever been a question of hi or innocence of a crime considered by the grand jury. Be that person will not go to trial, he will have no opportuni clear his name in the event of such an unfortunate disc

For all these reasons, the secrecy requirement is of the u importance and must be regarded by you as practically s

"To ensure the secrecy of grand jury proceedings, th provides that only authorized persons may be present grand jury room while evidence is being presented. On grand jury, the United States attorney or his assistan witness under examination, the court reporter, and the preter may be present. If an indictment should ultimate voted, the presence of unauthorized persons in the grand room could invalidate it.

"The law also provides that none of those author persons whom I have just mentioned may disclose any ma which occurs before you or them. You must be careful preserve the secrecy of your proceedings by abstaining f communicating with your families, friends, representative the news media or any other persons concerning that wh transpires in the grand jury room. Grand jurors may disc these matters only among themselves and only in the grand j room. You may disclose matters which occur before the gr jury to attorneys for the government for use of such attorney the performance of their duties. The content of your delib tions and the vote of any juror may not, however, be disclo even to the government attorneys.

"The performance of jury service is the discharge of on the responsibilities of citizenship. You have taken a comprehensive oath as grand jurors. Thousands of your forb ers have taken that oath in years past. Their adherence to it preserved for us to this time a system of law and a sens justice. You are now the new link in this chain, and you mus strong and faithful in the discharge of your office."

CHAPTER 6

CONDUCT OF PROCEEDINGS AND ISSUANCE OF THE INDICTMENT

I. INTRODUCTION AND OVERVIEW

§ 6:01. Grand Jury's Investigative Authority and Right to Evidence.
§ 6:02. Role of Prosecutor.
§ 6:03. Prosecutor's Duty To Present Exculpatory Evidence.
§ 6:04. Grand Jury's Authority and Duty To Hear Exculpatory Evidence.
§ 6:05. Right To Testify or Present Evidence.
§ 6:06. Limits on Kinds of Evidence That Can Be Presented.
§ 6:07. — Applicability of Evidentiary Rules.
§ 6:08. — Applicability of Constitutional Exclusionary Rules.

II. SUBPOENAS

§ 6:09. Use of Subpoenas To Obtain Evidence.
§ 6:10. — Role of Prosecutor and Grand Jurors in Subpoenaing Evidence.
§ 6:11. — Subpoenas for Purposes Other Than Compelling Testimony.
§ 6:12. — Forthwith Subpoenas.
§ 6:13. — Subpoena Ad Testificandum.
§ 6:14. — "Targets" and "Subjects" of Grand Jury's Investigation.
§ 6:15. — Advising Witnesses of Their Rights Before Grand Jury.
§ 6:16. Witness's Right to Counsel.
§ 6:17. — Constitutional Bases for Right to Counsel.
§ 6:18. Witness's Right To Have Counsel Present During Testimony.
§ 6:19. — Witness's Right To Consult with Counsel.
§ 6:20. Multiple Representation and Conflicts of Interest.
§ 6:21. Evidentiary Privileges.
§ 6:22. — Privilege Against Compulsory Self-Incrimination.
§ 6:23. — Attorney-Client Privilege.
§ 6:24. — First Amendment, Common Law, and Statutory Reporter's Privilege.
§ 6:25. — Grand Jury Inquiries Based on Allegedly Illegal Electronic Surveillance.
§ 6:26. Subpoena Duces Tecum—In General.
§ 6:27. — Objections Based on Fourth Amendment.

UNITED STATES
v.
COOPER,

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania.

April 30, 1880.

The libellous matter complained of was as follows: 'Nor do I see any impropriety in making this request of Mr. Adams. At that time he had just entered into office. He was hardly in the infancy of political mistake. Even those who doubted his capacity thought well of his intentions. Nor were we yet saddled with the expense of a permanent navy, or threatened, under his auspices, with the existence of a standing army. Our credit was not yet reduced so low as to borrow money at eight per cent. in time of peace, while the unnecessary violence of official expressions might justly have provoked a war. Mr. Adams had not yet projected his embassies to Prussia, Russia and the Sublime Porte, nor had he yet interfered, as president of the United States, to influence the decisions of a court of justice--a stretch of authority which the monarch of Great Britain would have shrunk from--an interference without precedent, against law and against mercy. This melancholy case of Jonathan Robbins, a native citizen of America, forcibly impressed by the British, and delivered up, with the advice of Mr. Adams, to the mock trial of a British court-martial, had not yet astonished the republican citizens of this free country; a case too little known, but of which the people ought to be fully apprised, before the election, and they shall be.' [FN1]

FN1 These passages were extracted from the following publication:

April 11, 1800. The bill was found upon the ex officio action of the district attorney, there having been no previous binding over. Some difficulty arose at the outset concerning the right of the defendant to compel the attendance, as witnesses, of several members of congress (congress being then in session), and of the president. An application was made to the court to address a letter to the speaker of the house, requesting him to have process served. This PETERS, District Judge, acceded to, as the proper course. It was refused, however, by CHASE, Circuit Justice, who ordered process to issue without such letter, saying, at the same time, that if it was necessary to compel the attendance of the members, the case would be continued until the session was over. The court at the same time refused to permit a subpoena to issue directed to the president of the United States. The cause was then continued to April 19, in order to enable the defendant to procure documentary and other evidence which he considered material.

April 19, 1800. After some difficulty in obtaining the attendance of the members of congress who were subpoenaed, which appears ultimately to have been given under a waiver of the supposed privilege; and after considerable altercation between Judge CHASE and the defendant with regard to the character of the evidence to be produced, the jury was sworn, and Mr. Rawle opened the case to the jury substantially as follows:

The defendant stands charged with attempts which the practice and policy of all civilized nations have thought it right at all times to punish with severity, with having published a false, scandalous and malicious attack on the character of the president of the United States, with an intent to excite the hatred and contempt of the people of this country against the man of their choice. It was much to be lamented that every person who had a tolerable facility at writing should think he had a right to attack and overset those authorities and officers whom the people of this country had thought fit to appoint. Nor was it to be endured that foul and infamous falsehoods should be uttered and published with impunity against the president of the United States, whom the people themselves had placed in that high office, and in which he has acted with so much credit to himself and benefit to them. Thomas Cooper stands charged in the indictment as follows: (Here Mr. Rawle read the indictment.) It was a sense of public duty that called for this prosecution. It was necessary that an example should be made to deter others from misleading the people by such false and defamatory publications. There was a peculiarity in the manner also of this publication: we generally observe that persons who take these liberties endeavour to avoid punishment by sheltering themselves under fictitious signatures, or by concealing their names; but the defendant acted very differently. Being of the profession of the law, a man of education and literature, he availed himself of those advantage for the purpose of disseminating his dangerous productions in a remote part of the country where he had gained influence. Such conduct must have arisen from the basest motives. It would be proved to the jury that, at the time of this publication, the defendant went to a magistrate and acknowledged it to be his production, in the same formal manner as if it had been a deed. In conduct so grossly improper had occurred in no instance within his recollection, and the manner constituted no slight aggravation of the offence. Indeed, it was high time for the law to interfere and restrain the libellous spirit which had been so long permitted to extend itself against the highest and most deserving characters. To abuse the men with whom the public has entrusted the management of their national concerns, to withdraw from them the confidence of the people, so necessary for conducting the public business, was in direct opposition to the duties of a good citizen. Mischiefs of this kind were to be dreased in proportion as the country around is less informed, and a man of sense and education has it more in his power to extend the mischief which he is inclined to propagate. Government should not encourage the idea, that they would not prosecute such atrocious conduct; for if this conduct was allowed to pass over, the peace of the country would be endangered. Error leads to discontent, discontent to a fancied idea of oppression, and that to insurrection, of which the two instances which had already happened were alarming proofs, and well-known to the jury. That the jury, as citizens, must determine whether, from publications of this kind, the prosperity of the country was not endangered; and whether it was not their duty, when a case of this nature was laid before them and the law was applicable, to bring in such a verdict as the law and the evidence would warrant; and show, that these kinds of attacks on the government of the country were not to be suffered with impunity.

Mr. Rawle, after reading the section of the sedition act applicable to the case on trial, proceeded to call John Buyers, who testified as follows: 'I know this paper. Mr. Cooper brought it to me on the evening of the 6th of December, 1799, at my house at Sunbury. He came to me at the door of my house. Asked me to walk in. We walked in. This was between candle-light and day-light. He asked for a candle. He perused this paper which I have in my hand, pointed to his name, and said, 'This is my name, and I am the author of this piece.' There was nothing further passed, only he said, 'This may save you trouble another time.' I knew very well what he meant by it.'

Cross-examined by Mr. Cooper: 'Had not you and I been in the habit of frequently joking with each other upon political subjects? Ans. O yes--very often.'

Mr. Rawle here read that part of the publication which is included in the indictment, for which reason it is omitted here.

Mr. Cooper then addressed the jury as follows:

If it were true, as it is not true, that, in the language of the attorney general of the district, I have been guilty of publishing with the basest motives a foul and infamous libel on the character of the president; of exciting against him the hatred and contempt of the people of this country, by gross and malicious falsehoods--then, indeed, would it be his duty to bring me before this tribunal, it would be yours to convict, and the duty of the court to punish me. But I hope, in the course of this trial, I shall be enabled to prove to your satisfaction, that I have published nothing which truth will not justify. That the assertions for which I am indicted are free from malicious imputation, and that my motives have been honest and fair. You will observe, gentlemen of the jury, that the law requires it to be proved as a necessary part of the charge, that the passages for which I am indicted should be false and scandalous, and published from malicious motives: and before you will be able, consistently with your oaths, to convict upon this indictment, you must be thoroughly satisfied that both these parts of the charge are well founded. Nor does it appear to me that the expression of the act, to bring the president into contempt, can be fulfilled, if the accusation, as in the present instance, related to an examination of his public conduct, and no improper motives are imputed to him. And that I have carefully avoided imputing any impropriety of intention to the president, even in the very paper complained of; that the uniform tenor of my conduct and language has been to attribute honesty of motive even where I have strongly disapproved of the tendency of his measures, I can abundantly show. You, and all who hear me, well know that this country is divided, and almost equally divided, into two grand parties; usually termed, whether properly or improperly, Federalists and Anti-Federalists: and that the governing powers of the country are ranked in public opinion under the former denomination--of these divisions, the one wishes to increase, the other to diminish, the powers of the executive; the one thinks that the people (the democracy of the country) has too much, the other too little, influence on the measures of government: the one is friendly, the other hostile, to a standing army and a permanent navy: the one thinks them necessary to repel invasions and aggressions from without, and commotions within; the other, that a well-organized militia is a sufficient safeguard for all that an army could protect, and that a navy is more dangerous and expensive than any benefit derived from it can compensate; the one thinks the liberties of our country endangered by the licentiousness, the other, by the restrictions of the press. Such are some among the leading features of these notorious divisions of political party. It is evident, gentlemen of the jury, that each will view with a jealous eye the positions of the other, and that there cannot but be a bias among the partisans of the one side, against the principles and doctrines inculcated by the other. In the present instance, I fear it cannot but have its effects; for, without impeaching the integrity of any person directly concerned in the progress of the present trial, I may fairly state that, under the sedition law, a defendant, such as I stand before you, is placed in a situation unknown in any other case. Directly or indirectly, the public, if not the private, character of the president of the United States is involved in the present trial. Who nominates the judges who are to preside, the juries who are to judge of the evidence, the marshal who has the summoning of the jury? The president. Suppose a case of arbitration concerning the property of any one of you, where the adverse party should claim the right of nominating the persons whose legal opinions are to decide the law of the question, and of the very man who shall have the appointment of the arbitrators--what would you say to such a trial? and yet in fact such is mine, and such is the trial of every man who has the misfortune to be indicted under this law. But although I have a right to presume something of political bias against my opinions, from the court who try me, to you who sit there as jurymen, I am still satisfied you will feel that you have some character to support and some character to lose; and whatever your opinions may be on the subjects alluded to in the indictment, you will reverence as you ought the sacred obligation of the oath you have taken. Gentlemen of the jury, I acknowledge, as freely as any of you can, the necessity of a certain degree of confidence in the executive government of the country. But this confidence ought not to be unlimited, and need not be paid up in advance; let it be earned before it be reposed; let it be claimed by the evidence of benefits conferred, of measures that compel approbation, of conduct irreproachable. It cannot be exacted by the guarded provisions of sedition laws, by attacks on the freedom of the press, by prosecutions, pains and penalties on those who boldly express the truth, or who may honestly and innocently err in their political sentiments. Let this required confidence be the meed of desert, and the public will not be backward to pay it. But in the present state of affairs, the press is open to those who will praise, while the threats of the law hang over those who blame the conduct of the men in power. Indiscriminate approbation of the measures of the executive is not only unattacked, but fostered, and received with the utmost avidity; while those who venture to express a sentiment of opposition must do it in fear and trembling, and run the hazard of being dragged like myself before the frowning tribunal, erected by the sedition law. Be it so; but surely this anxiety to protect public character must arise from fear of attack. That conduct which will not bear investigation will naturally shun it; and whether my opinions are right or wrong, as they are stated in the charge, I cannot help thinking they would have been better confuted by evidence and argument then by indictment. Fines and imprisonment will produce conviction neither in the mind of the sufferer nor of the public. Nor do I see how the people can exercise on rational grounds their elective franchise, if perfect freedom of discussion of public characters be not allowed. Electors are bound in conscience to reflect and decide who best deserves their suffrage; but how can they do it, if these prosecutions in terrorem close all the avenues of information, and throw a veil over the grossest misconduct of our periodical rulers? After having offered these preliminary remarks, I shall give an account of the paper on which I am accused, and then proceed to examine the charges of the indictment in the order in which they are laid: much that I intended to have advanced I must relinquish, that I may not trespass too long on your time, or weaken the effect of my own defence by fatiguing your attention. The scored paper now handed to me by the attorney general, suggests an observation which, though trite, is material. Upon the plan usually adopted in these ex officio accusations, a good Christian might easily be proved an arrant atheist. 'The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God.' Take the four last words, and they are atheistical: take the sentence, and it is Scripture. So, take the marked passages in this paper, and they may, perhaps, be forced into something like improper imputation against the president: take the paper itself, and the very first paragraph is a plain and positive approbation of his intention. Though I must acknowledge that, however upright I might formerly have believed his motives of action, I cannot, upon reflection, pay that tribute to his conduct or his motives on the present occasion. The general circumstances that gave rise to the paper I now hold, are these: Dr. Priestley, a man whose name implies a greater combination of learning, science, and ability, of important discovery, or exertion for the benefit of mankind, and of private integrity, than any other man now living can boast--whose conduct towards me, in the instance detailed in this paper, is praise sufficient to bear up my mind against any consequences which the present trial can produce--had long been an acquaintance and an intimate acquaintance of Mr. Adams, in England and in this country. The letters of the latter to Dr. Priestley are full of strong expressions of friendship and esteem. Relying upon this long intercourse of cordiality between them, Dr. Priestley urged me to permit him to write to Mr. Adams on the subject of a vacancy mentioned in this paper, and which, as you will have it before you when you retire, I shall not read at length. This application was from one friend to another; upon the face of it a confidential communication; although containing nothing but what might do credit to all the parties concerned. Mr. Adams, however, did not think it so confidential; and from some disclosure on his part, has been founded the base and cowardly slander which dragged me in the first instance before the public in vindication of my moral and political character, and has at length dragged me before this tribunal, to protect, if I can, my personal liberty and my private fortune, against the legal attack of an ex officio information. Hence, it is evident, gentlemen of the jury, that this is not a voluntary, but an involuntary publication on my part: it has originated, not from motives of turbulence and malice, but from self-defence; not from a desire of attacking the character of the president, but of vindicating my own. And in what way have I done this? My motives, my private character, my public character, were the object of falsehood and calumny, apparently founded on information of high authority. In reply, I give credit to the intentions of the president: I say nothing of his private character; and I attack only the tendency of measures notorious to the world, which, having been known to disapprove publicly, I was charged with being ready, from motives of interest, to approve privately. I think, gentlemen, you cannot help feeling this contrast of behaviour, and if the president is satisfied with his side of the picture, I am mine.

The first article selected for accusation is, that, at the time I allude to, 'he was but in the infancy of political mistake.' Why this expression should have been fixed on as seditious, I know not, unless it be that 'quem deus vult perdere prius dementat'; for have we advanced so far on the road to despotism in this republican country, that we dare not say our president may be mistaken? Is a plain citizen encircled at once by the mysterious attribute of political infallibility the instant he mounts the presidential chair? If so, then indeed may it be seditious to say he is mistaken; but before you can condemn me for this kind of sedition, you must become catholic believers in this new-fangled doctrine of infallibility. I know that in England the king can do no wrong, but I did not know till now that the president of the United States had the same attribute. I have said (and I am accused for saying it) 'that even those who doubted his capacity thought well of his intentions.' Is it a crime to doubt the capacity of the president? Suppose I had said that there were some who did not give him credit for capacity sufficient for the office he holds, is that a crime? Or if in them, is it a crime in me, who have not said it? Nor can the word 'capacity' here be fairly construed into any other than a comparative meaning; for surely no one who has read his defence, as it is called, of the American constitution, or who reflects that he has had abilities enough to raise himself to his present situation, can say that he is devoid either of industry or talents. But those who voted for his opponent must have believed Mr. Adams of inferior capacity to that gentleman. Of that number was I; of that number was at least one-half of the people of the United States. If it be a crime thus to have thought and thus to have spoken, I fear I shall continue in this respect incorrigible.

But if of two constructions the one is absurd, improbable and unfavourable, surely it should be rejected in favour of that meaning which was most likely to have occurred, and which in its effects will do least injury to a defendant like myself. This is common, this is legal charity. 'Nor had we yet, under his auspices, been saddled with the expense of a permanent navy.' Gentlemen, is it true or not that we are saddled with the expense of a permanent navy? Is it necessary that I should enter into a detail of authorities to prove that the sun shines at noon-day? But farther, is it true that we incur this expense under his auspices and sanction? I have before me two publications: the one the Gazette of the United States, published by Mr. Fenno in this city; and another, in a form more portable and convenient, purporting to be a selection of addresses and answers to and from the president during the summer of 1798. Not having been able to procure office copies of the documents I wished to refer to, I must offer in evidence such publications as I can find; that class of publications, upon which in fact the mind of the public is usually made up; and upon whose authority the electors of this country determine the characters whom they honour with their suffrage. Indeed, if the opinion that fell from the court this morning be accurate, that no man should hazard an assertion but upon sufficient and legal evidence, and if documents from the public offices in proof of notorious facts are required as such evidence, then are the mouths of the people completely shut up on every question of public conduct or public character; but I cannot help thinking it a fair and reasonable position, that a defendant in such a case as this should be permitted to offer to the jury any evidence that appears to him a sufficient ground for his assertion, and let them decide on its credibility.

SEDITIOUS LIBEL--INTENT OF PUBLICATION--DEFAMATION OF PRESIDENT--CHARGES IN RELATION TO EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES--STANDING ARMIES.

1. In a prosecution under the sedition act of July 14, 1798 (1 Stat. 596), for the publication of a libel against the president of the United States, there must clearly appear an intent to defame him, to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and excite against him the hatred of the good people of the United States. If there be no such intent there can be no guilt.

SEDITIOUS LIBEL--INTENT OF PUBLICATION--DEFAMATION OF PRESIDENT--CHARGES IN RELATION TO EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES--STANDING ARMIES.

2. It is false, within the meaning of the sedition act, to publish that our credit is brought so low that we are obliged to borrow money at 8 per cent. 'in time of peace,' when, although there has been no declaration of war, there have been actual hostilities, captures of vessels, and a prohibition of intercourse.

SEDITIOUS LIBEL--INTENT OF PUBLICATION--DEFAMATION OF PRESIDENT--CHARGES IN RELATION TO EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES--STANDING ARMIES.

3. A murder committed on board a British ship of war is committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, within the meaning of article 27 of the treaty with that power, relating to the extradition of persons charged with murder and forgery.

SEDITIOUS LIBEL--INTENT OF PUBLICATION--DEFAMATION OF PRESIDENT--CHARGES IN RELATION TO EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES--STANDING ARMIES.

4. The executive is the party upon whom devolves the duty of surrendering a fugitive in case of extradition under the treaty, and, although he makes use of a judge of the United States as an instrument for ascertaining whether there is sufficient evidence of criminality to require the surrender, the court has no jurisdiction of the crime, and the president cannot truthfully be accused, in connection with such a transaction, of attempting to influence or interfere with a court of justice.

SEDITIOUS LIBEL--INTENT OF PUBLICATION--DEFAMATION OF PRESIDENT--CHARGES IN RELATION TO EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES--STANDING ARMIES.

5. To publish, in respect to the president, that we are threatened, under his auspices, with the existence of a standing army, betrays either the most egregious ignorance or the most wilful intention to deceive the public; for there are but two descriptions of armies in the country, one called the 'Western Army,' enlisted for five years only, and the other called the 'Provisional Army,' enlisted during the existence of war with France; and neither of these can with any propriety be called a standing army, especially as the constitution declares that no appropriations shall be made for the support of an army longer than two years.

'To the Public. 'To the Printer--Sir: I should not condescend to answer anonymous slander, but the information on which the falsehoods contained in the following paragraph are grounded, must have been originally derived from the president himself. I cannot believe him capable of such misrepresentation, for I still think well of his intentions, however I may disapprove of his conduct: but the following narrative will show that some of his underlings are capable of anything: 'From the Reading Weekly Advertiser of October 26, 1799: "Communication. Thomas Cooper's address to the readers of the Sunbury and

Northumberland Gazette, of which he was editor, having been republished in this state, with an introduction approbatory of the piece, a correspondent wishes to know if it be the same Thomas Cooper, an Englishman, of whom the following anecdote is related? If it is, every paper devoted to truth, honour, and decency, ought to give it a thorough circulation. Not many months ago, it is said, a Mr. Cooper, an Englishman, applied to the president of the United States, to be appointed 'agent for settling the respective claims of the citizens and subjects of this country and Great Britain.' In his letter, he informs the president, that although he (Thomas Cooper) had been called a Democrat, yet his real political sentiments are such as would be agreeable to the president and government of the United States, or expressions to that effect. This letter was accompanied with another from Dr. Joseph Priestley, who did not fail to assure the president of the pliability of his friend Cooper's Democratic principles. The president, it is said, rejected Cooper's application with disdain, and Priestley's with still stronger marks of surprise, saying, it is said, as he threw the letter on the table, does he think that I would appoint any Englishman to that important office in preference to an American? What was the consequence? When Thomas Cooper found his application for a lucrative office under our president rejected, he writes in revenge the address which appeared in print, and Dr. Priestley exerted his influence in dispersing this very address, which he must know was the offspring of disappointment and revenge! The address is as cunning and insidious a production as ever appeared in the Aurora or the old Chronicle, and as for impudence, it exceeds, or at least equals, Porcupine himself. Priestley and Cooper are both called upon to deny the above narrative. A recourse to the letters themselves, would establish the accuracy of this anecdote, even to a syllable.' 'Yes; I am the Thomas Cooper alluded to--luckily possessed of more accurate information than the malignant writer of that paragraph, from whatever source his intelligence was derived. About the time of the appointment of commissioners under the British treaty, Doctor Ross, who had sedulously brought about an intercourse of civility between Mr. Liston and myself, urged me to permit him to apply on my behalf to that gentleman, for one of the appointments that must then take place. He pressed on me the folly, as he termed it, of my confining myself to Northumberland, his earnest wish to see me settled in Philadelphia, and the duty I owed my family to better my situation by every means in my power. He stated that Mr. Liston, he knew, thought highly of me, and though the post of the fifth commissioner was probably then disposed of, there must be an agent for the British claimants; an office which, from my situation as a barrister in England, and my knowledge of mercantile transactions, I was peculiarly fitted to fill. I replied, that he probably overrated Mr. Liston's opinion and his own influence, and that, at all events, my known political opinions must render it equally improper for Mr. Liston to give, and for me to accept, any office whatever connected with the British interests. That Mr. Liston and I understood each other on this question, and had hitherto avoided all politics whatever. That, being an American, I should not object to any office under this government, if I could fairly obtain it; but that I would never consent to any application to Mr. Liston. Through Mr. Coleman's interest, Mr. Hall of Sunbury was complimented with the offer of being appointed agent of American claims. On mentioning to Dr. Priestley, one night at supper, that Mr. Hall had declined it, Dr. Ross's persuasions occurred to me, and I said that such an office as that would have suited me very well. Dr. Priestley replied, if that was the case, he thought he had some interest with

Mr. Adams, with whom he had long been acquainted, and who had always expressed himself in terms of the highest friendship: that, as he never intended to ask any favour of Mr. Adams for himself, I might as well let him try for once to ask one for me. On my objecting that Mr. Adams' politics and mine were probably very different, Dr. Priestley declared that this, so far from being an objection, might be an inducement in my favour; for if Mr. Adams meant to be the ruler of a nation, insteal of the leader of a party, he would be glad of an opportunity to exhibit such an instance of liberal conduct. At length I consented, expressly requesting Dr. Priestley to take care that Mr. Adams should not mistake my politics. In consequence of this conversation, Dr. Priestley wrote the following letter,--not a few months, but above two years ago: "August 12, 1797. Dear Sir: It was far from being my intention or wish to trouble you with the request of any favours, though it is now in your power to grant them; and it is not at all probable that I shall ever take a second liberty of the kind. But circumstances have arisen which I think call upon me to do it once, though not for myself, but a friend. The office of agent for American claims was offered, I understand, to Mr. Hall of Sunbury, and he has declined it. If this be the case, and no other person be yet fixed upon, I shall be very happy if I could serve Mr. Cooper, a man I doubt not of equal ability, and possessed of every other qualification for the office, by recommending him. It is true, that both he and myself fall, in the language of our calumniators, under the description of Democrats, who are studiously represented as enemies to what is called government, both in England and here. What I have done to deserve that character, you well know, and Mr. Cooper has done very little more. In fact, we have both been persecuted for being friends to American liberty, and our preference of the government of this country has brought us both hither. However, were the accusations true, I think the appointment of a man of unquestionable ability and fidelity to his trust, for which I would make myself answerable, would be truly such a mark of superiority to popular prejudice as I should expect from you I, therefore, think it no unfavourable circumstance in the recommendation. That you will act according to your best judgment, I have no doubt, with respect to this and other affairs of infinitely more moment, through which I am persuaded you will bring the country with reputation to yourself, though in circumstances of such uncommon difficulty, perhaps with less ease and satisfaction than I could wish. With my earnest wishes for the honour and tranquillity of your presidency, I am, &c., Joseph Priestley.' 'This letter was accompanied by the following from myself: "Sir: On my expressing an inclination for the office which Mr. Hall has declined, Dr. Priestley was so good as to offer his services with you on my behalf. Probably the office will be filled ere this letter can reach you: probably there may be objections to nominating a person not a native of the country: probably the objection mentioned by Dr. Priestley, may reasonably be deemed of weight in my instance. Be all this as it may, I see no impropriety in the present application to be appointed agent of American claims, for it is still possible I may suppose more weight in the objections than they will be found to deserve. If it should so happen that I am nominated to that office, I shall endeavour to merit the character the Doctor has given me, and your esteem. I am, &c., Thomas Cooper.' 'Is this the letter of a man, or not? I do not appeal to the cowardly propagator of anonymous falsehoods, but to the public. What is there in it of vanity or servility? Do not these letters take for granted that I am a Democrat, though not a disturber of all government? and that what I am I shall remain, even though it be deemed a reasonable objection to my appointment? Is this, or is this not, adhering to my principle, whatever becomes of my interest? Nor is it true that my address originated from any motives of revenge. Two years elapsed from the date of those letters, before I wrote anything on the politics of this country. Nor did I recollect them at the time. Nor do I see the objection to taking any fair means of improving my situation. This is a duty incumbent on every prudent man who has a family to raise, and which I have already too much neglected from public motives: nor can any office to which I am eligible in this country, recompense me for the offers I rejected in its favour. But it is not in the power of promises or threats, of wealth or poverty, to extinguish the political enthusiasm which has actuated my conduct for these twenty years. The prudence of middle age and the claims of duty may make me cautious of sacrificing my interest, but they cannot induce me to sacrifice my principle. Nor do I see any impropriety in making this request of Mr. Adams. At that time he had just entered into office. He was hardly in the infancy of political mistake. Even those who doubted his capacity thought well of his intentions. He had not at that time given the public to understand that he would bestow no office but under implicit conformity to his political opinions. He had not declared that 'a republican government may mean anything.' He had not yet sanctioned the abolition of trial by jury in the alien law, or entrenched his public character behind the legal barriers of the sedition law. Nor were we yet saddled with the expense of a permanent navy, or threatened under his auspices with the existence of a standing army. Our credit was not yet reduced so low as to borrow money at eight per cent. in time of peace, while the unnecessary violence of official expressions might justly have provoked a war; nor had the political acrimony which still poisons the pleasures of private society, been fostered by those who call themselves his friends and adherents; nor had the eminent services of Mr. Humphreys at that time received their reward. Mr. Adams had not yet projected his embassies to Prussia, Russia, and the Sublime Porte; nor had he yet interfered, as president of the United States, to influence the decisions of a court of justice; a stretch of authority which the monarch of Great Britain would have shrunk from; an interference without precedent, against law and against mercy! This melancholy case of Jonathan Robbins, a native citizen of America, forcibly impressed by the British, and delivered up, with the advice of Mr. Adams, to the mock trial of a British court martial, had not yet astonished the republican citizens of this free country. A case too little known, but of which the people ought to be fully apprised before the election, and they shall be. Most assuredly, had these transactions taken place in August, 1797, the President Adams would not have been troubled by any request from 'Thomas Cooper. 'Northumberland, Nov. 2, 1797.'

CHASE, Circuit Justice.

What is it that you say, sir, fell from the court? They have not yet decided what was or what not proper evidence for you to adduce. The court said, if you thought the public documents at your service, you were mistaken. If you undertake to publish, without having proper evidence before you to justify your assertions, you do it at your own risk. Most assuredly, in common traverses, you could not offer the evidence you mention. But we acknowledge that, in such a case as this, greater latitude may be given. If you say the president did write a letter, you must prove it. We should incline to admit gazettes and acts of public authority and notoriety: you might read the speech of the president to both houses of congress in evidence. If you want to prove that the president advocated a navy, you may read the journals of congress or any authentic public document.

Mr. Cooper. If I am defeated in my endeavours to procure these documents, I must offer such evidence as I can procure; and where there is no reasonable suspicion or assignable motive why the publications I offer should misrepresent the transactions I allude to, the probability is in favour of their accuracy; especially when the printers of them are severely punishable for wilful misrepresentation or gross mistake in detailing the public acts of government.

PETERS, District Judge.

I admit a great many things from Mr. Cooper, who is without counsel, which I would not admit from others.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.

You may read anything and everything you please.

Mr. Cooper then went on to argue at great length, from a copious collection from the public documents of the day, that the policy of the president had been to saddle upon the country a permanent navy and army, and to keep down the liberties of the citizens by his arbitrary interference in the case of Jonathan Robbins. He then said:

Gentlemen, I have gone through all the charges, and I am satisfied that I have brought in support of my assertions the best evidence the nature of my case would admit of. It is true, by resorting to Danbury for depositions and to Charlestown for records, I might have made the evidence in the last charge more complete; but I did not and do not think them necessary to produce further conviction on your minds than you feel on the subject already. This is an important point under the law in question. If such strictness of testimony is required, there is an end at once of all political conversation in promiscuous society. The time, the labour, the difficulty, the expense, the harassment and fatigue of mind as well as of body, which such doctrine would occasion to every citizen whom a corrupt administration might determine to ruin, would be an engine of oppression of itself sufficiently powerful to establish a perfect despotism over the press; and would be a punishment for innocence before trial, too severe to be inflicted on sedition itself. I think you must feel the truth of these remarks: the proceedings on this trial irresistibly suggest them. Gentlemen, if the assertions I have made are true, whatever the motives of them may be, you cannot find me guilty. But I think it impossible, if you consider the paper altogether, that you can asscribe the publication of it to malice: it is on the face of it not voluntary, but compelled. I have, in the very outset of the paper, spoken well of the president: I have been in the habit of thinking his intentions right, and his public conduct wrong: and that this has been the general tenor of my language and behaviour, I believe I can even now bring proof enough from among my friends and my neighbors.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. This is not necessary: it is your conduct, not your character, that is in question. If this prosecution were for a crime against the United States, you might give evidence to your character, and show that you have always been a good citizen; but this is an indictment for a libel against the president, where your general character is not in question. 638

Mr. Cooper. I am satisfied. I shall fatigue the jury no longer; but rest my defence here.

Mr. Rawle, in reply, said:

Gentlemen of the jury, the defence you have just heard is one of the most extraordinary and unexampled I ever remember to have witnessed in a court of justice. It is no less than to call into decision whether Thomas Cooper, the defendant, or the president of the United States, to whom this country has thought proper to confide its most important interests, is best qualified to judge whether the measures adopted by our government are calculated to preserve the peace and promote the happiness of America. This, however, does not seem to me the real point which you are to try; and I shall therefore (under direction of the court) proceed to state what I conceive to be the question which you, gentlemen of the jury, are now called upon to determine. Thomas Cooper is charged in the indictment with having published a false, scandalous and malicious libel, with intent to defame the president of the United States, and to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against him the hatred of the good people of this country. In the act which defines this offence and points out the punishment, a liberality of defence is given, unknown, I believe, in any other country where the party is tried for a libel on the government. Here the defendant is allowed, under the third section of that act, to give in evidence the truth of the matters charged as a libel in the publication, and the jury have a right to determine the law and the fact under the direction of the court. The true spirit of the law is that the defendant shall not be found guilty of publishing defamatory writings, unless they be false, nor, although they may be false, shall he be considered as guilty under the law, unless the intent of the publication appear to be malicious. That such publication has proceeded upon a knowledge of the truth, he is permitted to give as matter of evidence; and if true, it must be allowed to go far to satisfy the minds of the jury that the malicious motives imputed to him are not true. In private actions for slander, where a man seeks pecuniary redress for the injury his character has sustained, the defendant is entitled to give in evidence, as a defence to the action, the truth of the words spoken or the written libel; and if the truth of the assertions be proved, it will amount to a justification. There is no difference, then, between the defence that may be set up to an action of slander, or libel on a private person, and that which is permitted under the law whereon this indictment is grounded. The defendant has undertaken to satisfy the mind of the jury that, in this publication, he had no malicious intention against the president of the United States; I join issue with him on the point, and request your particular attention to it. He alleges that he did not impute improper motives to the president, and attempts to substantiate his allegation by referring you to his declaration in the outset, where he says that 'I cannot believe him (the president) capable of such gross misrepresentations, for I still think well of his intentions, however I may disapprove of his conduct.' But to this I shall add that he goes on and concludes with a paragraph, evincing in the clearest manner a settled design to persuade the public that the president of the United States is not fit for the high office he bears, and of this you must be fully convinced from the whole tenor of the expressions which have been read to you in the indictment. It is very far from my views to press hard upon any part of his long address to you, or to make use against him of any unguarded expression, which, on more deliberate consideration, he might have omitted or corrected; yet, when I cannot but observe, from the whole tenor of his present argument, as well as from his publication, that his object is not so much to convince you, gentlemen of the jury, that his assertions are true, as to cast an unmerited reflection on the general character and conduct of the president, I cannot help suspecting him of the motives he disclaims, and I must do my duty by exposing the design as well as the fallacy of the justification he has set up. The defendant has used a little observation respecting the separating in the indictment the text from the context, as I believe he was pleased to term it; and argued that by this means the most upright intentions and laudable expressions might be perverted from their true and obvious meaning. Such an insinuation, however, is not calculated to influence your minds. In framing an indictment, it is my duty to leave out matters of little importance, and to introduce those circumstances only that are truly and legally reprehensible: and he well knows that he can read, if he pleases, the whole of the publication, and that you will have it with you when you consider of your verdict. You will judge, therefore, whether by this observation, it was his, or whether it is my design to confound and perplex the sense. Whether the reflections he has thrown upon the conduct of government, in so many instances throughout his defence as well as in his publication, evince the regard he professes to entertain for the intentions of the president, is to me, as it will be to you, extremely dubious; nor have those professions been confirmed by the singular manner in which he has cited and selected the passages on which his defence has been grounded. Throughout the quotations he has made, particularly from the addresses to the president, and the answers to them, there has been a series of misrepresentations, which it will be my duty to observe upon when I come to consider that part of the charge and his vindication of it. But it is fair to observe that if, from the perusal of partial extracts and passages selected from various publications, he has thought proper 639 to publish a libel, such as that for which he is indicted, against the character of our president, there is no excuse for his conduct; if, on the other hand, he had the whole of the publications before him, and has extracted from them partially and unfairly, his conduct is still more reprehensible, and there is the less excuse, as it is evident, and as you, gentlemen of the jury, must have observed, that he is a man of talents and letters.

Mr. Rawle then proceeded to consider at great length the several points of justification started by Mr. Cooper, and then said:

Gentlemen, you have attended to the words of this charge in the indictment, and you cannot but be impressed that they convey on the face and in the very tenor of them, a conclusive proof of a mala mens, of a malicious and deliberate intention to injure the character of the president: no man can read them without receiving this impression from the perusal. I have not touched on the article respecting the embassies to Prussia, Russia, and the Porte; because I did not think it of importance sufficient to occupy much of your time. Indeed, I believe no embassy was ever sent to Russia. There is enough for your consideration against the defendant, without dwelling on these lesser articles of the indictment. Gentlemen, I have no personal animosity against Mr. Cooper; but I have instituted this prosecution because I thought it my duty so to do, and I must make those remarks which the same duty calls forth. The defendant has endeavoured to show that his publication was without malice; but his conduct with Buyers, and his expressions in that publication, prove otherwise: the nature of his defence, though he has stated his opinion of the good intentions of the president, evidently shows that he meant to justify his own conduct and language throughout. You, gentlemen of the jury, under the direction of the court, will decide whether he has presented to you such a justification as will entitle him to your verdict in his favour.

CHASE, Circuit Justice (charging jury). Gentlemen of the jury: When men are found rash enough to commit an offence such as the traverser is charged with, it becomes the duty of the government to take care that they should not pass with impunity. It is my duty to state to you the law on which this indictment is preferred, and the substance of the accusation and defence. Thomas Cooper, the traverser, stands charged with having published a false, scandalous and malicious libel against the president of the United States, in his official character as president. There is no civilized country that I know of, that does not punish such offences; and it is necessary to the peace and welfare of this country, that these offences should meet with their proper punishment, since ours is a government founded on the opinions and confidence of the people. The representatives and the president are chosen by the people. It is a government made by themselves; and their officers are chosen by themselves; and, therefore, if any improper law is enacted, the people have it in their power to obtain the repeal of such law, or even of the constitution itself, if found defective, since provision is made for its amendment. Our government, therefore, is really republican; the people are truly represented, since all power is derived from them. It is a government of representation and responsibility. All officers of the government are liable to be displaced or removed, or their duration in office limited by elections at fixed periods. There is one department only, the judiciary, which is not subject to such removal; their offices being held 'during good behaviour,' and therefore they can only be removed for misbehaviour. All governments which I have ever read or heard of punish libels against themselves. If a man attempts to destroy the confidence of the people in their officers, their supreme magistrate, and their legislature, he effectually saps the foundation of the government. A republican government can only be destroyed in two ways; the introduction of luxury, or the licentiousness of the press. This latter is the more slow, but most sure and certain, means of bringing about the destruction of the government. The legislature of this country, knowing this maxim, has thought proper to pass a law to check this licentiousness of the press: by a clause in that law it is enacted. (Judge CHASE here read the second section of the sedition law.) It must, therefore, be observed, gentlemen of the jury, that the intent must be plainly manifest. It is an important word in the law; for it there is no such intent to defame, &c., there is no offence created by that law. Thomas Cooper, then, stands indicted for having published a false, scandalous and malicious libel upon the president of the United States, with intent to defame the president, to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against him the hatred of the good people of the United States. This is the charge. The traverser has pleaded not guilty, and that he has not published, &c., with these views. He has also pleaded in justification (which the law provides for), that the matters asserted by him are true, and that he will give the same in evidence.

It is incumbent on the part of the prosecution to prove two facts: (1) That the traverser did publish the matters contained in the indictment. (2) That he did publish with intent to defame, &c. For the intent is as much a fact as the other, and must be proved in the same manner as other facts; and must be proved as stated in the law of congress--the mere publication is no offence; and in making up your verdict, though you consider them separately, you must take the whole tenor and import of the publication, since the offence is committed by the two coupled together. 640

First, then, as to the publication. The fact of writing and publishing is clearly proved; nay, in fact, it is not denied. It is proved to have taken place at Sunbury, a considerable distance from the seat of government. It appears from the evidence that the traverser went to the house of a justice of the peace with this paper, whom, of all others, he ought to have avoided; for he must know that it was the duty of the justice of the peace to deliver it immediately to those who administer the government. He did so. It was indecent to deliver such a paper to a justice of the peace, and the manner in which it was delivered was yet more outrageous--if it was done in joke, as the traverser would wish to imply, it was still very improper--but there was the same solemnity in his expression, 'This is my name, and I am the author of this handbill,' as if the traverser was going to part with an estate. This conduct showed that he intended to dare and defy the government, and to provoke them, and his subsequent conduct satisfies my mind that such was his disposition. For he justifies the publication in all its parts, and declares it to be founded in truth. It is proved most clearly to be his publication. It is your business to consider the intent as coupled with that, and view the whole together. You must take that publication, and compare it with the indictment. If there are doubts as to the motives of the traverser, he has removed them; for, though he states in his defence that he does not arraign the motives of the president, yet he has boldly avowed that his own motives in this publication were to censure the conduct of the president, which his conduct, as he thought, deserved. Now, gentlemen, the motives of the president, in his official capacity, are not a subject of inquiry with you. Shall we say to the president, you are not fit for the government of this country? It is no apology for a man to say, that he believes the president to be honest, but that he has done acts which prove him unworthy the confidence of the people, incapable of executing the duties of his high station, and unfit for the important office to which the people have elected him: the motives and intent of the traverser, not of the president, are the subject to be inquired into by you.

Now we will consider this libel as published by the defendant, and observe what were his motives. You will find the traverser speaking of the president in the following words: 'Even those who doubted his capacity, thought well of his intentions.' This the traverser might suppose would be considered as a compliment as to the intentions of the president; but I have no doubt that it was meant to carry a sting with it which should be felt; for it was in substance saying of the president, 'You may have good intentions, but I doubt your capacity.' He then goes on to say: 'Nor were we yet saddled with the expense of a permanent navy, nor threatened, under his (the president's) auspices, with the existence of a standing army. Our credit was not yet reduced so low as to borrow money at eight per cent. in time of peace.' Now, gentlemen, if these things were true, can any one doubt what effect they would have on the public mind? If the people believed those things, what would be the consequence? What! the president of the United States saddle us with a permanent navy, encourage a standing army, and borrow money at a large premium? And are we told, too, that this is in time of peace? If you believe this to be true, what opinion can you, gentlemen, form of the president? One observation must strike you, viz.: That these charges are made not only against the president, but against yourselves who elect the house of representatives, for these acts cannot be done without first having been approved of by congress. Can a navy be built, can an army be raised, or money borrowed, without the consent of congress? The president is further charged for that 'the unnecessary violence of his official expressions might justly have provoked a war.' This is a very serious charge indeed. What, the president, by unnecessary violence, plunge this country into a war! and that a just war? It cannot be--I say, gentlemen, again, if you believe this, what opinion can you form of the president? Certainly the worst you can form: you would certainly consider him totally unfit for the high station which he has so honorably filled, and with such benefit to his country. The traverser states that, under the auspices of the president, 'our credit is so low that we are obliged to borrow money at eight per cent. in time of peace.' I cannot suppress my feelings at this gross attack upon the president. Can this be true? Can you believe it? Are we now in time of peace? Is there no war? No hostilities with France? Has she not captured our vessels and plundered us of our property to the amount of millions? Has not the intercourse been prohibited with her? Have we not armed our vessels to defend ourselves, and have we not captured several of her vessels of war? Although no formal declaration of war has been made, is it not notorious that actual hostilities have taken place? And is this, then, a time of peace? The very expense incurred, which rendered a loan necessary, was in consequence of the conduct of France. The traverser, therefore, has published an untruth, knowing it to be an untruth.

The other part of the publication is much more offensive. I do not allude to his assertions relating to the embassies to Prussia, Russia, and the Sublime Porte. They are matters of little consequence, and, therefore, I shall pass over them. The part to which I allude is that where the traverser charges the president with having influenced the judiciary department. I know of no charge which can be more injurious to the president than that of an attempt to influence a court of judicature; the judicature of the country is of the greatest consequence to the liberties and existence of a nation. If your constitution was destroyed, 641 so long as the judiciary department remained free and uncontrolled, the liberties of the people would not be endangered. Suffer your courts of judicature to be destroyed; there is an end to your liberties. The traverser says that this interference was a stretch of authority that the monarch of Great Britain would have shrunk from; an interference without precedent, against law and against mercy. Is not this an attack, and a most serious attack on the character of the president? The traverser goes on thus: 'This melancholy case of Jonathan Robbins, a native of America, forcibly impressed by the British, and delivered, with the advice of Mr. Adams, to the mock trial of a British court-martial, had not yet astonished the republican citizens of this free country,--a case too little known, but of which the people ought to be fully apprised before the election, and they shall be.' Now, gentlemen, there are circumstances in this publication which greatly aggravate the offence. The traverser does not only tell you that the president interfered to influence a court of justice without precedent, against law and against mercy; but that he so interfered in order to deliver up a native American citizen to be executed by a British court-martial under a mock trial, against law and against mercy. Another circumstance is adduced to complete the picture. He tells you that this Robbins was not only an American, but a native American, forcibly impressed by the British; and yet that the president of the United States, without precedent, against law and against mercy, interfered with a court of justice, and ordered this native American to be delivered up to a mock trial by a British court-martial. I can scarcely conceive a charge can be made against the president of so much consequence, or of a more heinous nature. But, says Mr. Cooper, he has done it. I will show you the case in which he has done it. It is the case of Jonathan Robbins. It appears then that this is a charge on the president, not only false and scandalous, but evidently made with intent to injure his character, and the manner in which it is made is well calculated to operate on the passions of Americans, and I fear such has been the effect. If this charge were true, there is not a man amongst you but would hate the president. I am sure I should hate him myself if I had thought he had done this. Upon the purity and independence of the judges depend the existence of your government and the preservation of your liberties. They should be under no influence--they are only accountable to God and their own consciences--your present judges are in that situation.

There is a little circumstance which the attorney-general, in his observations to you, omitted to state, but which I think it right to recall to your recollection, as it appears with what design the traverser made this publication. In this allusion to Jonathan Robbins he expressly tells you this is 'a case too little known, but of which the people ought to be fully apprised before the election, and they shall be.' Here, then, the evident design of the traverser was, to arouse the people against the president so as to influence their minds against him on the next election. I think it right to explain this to you, because it proves, that the traverser was actuated by improper motives to make this charge against the president. It is a very heavy charge, and made with intent to bring the president into contempt and disrepute, and excite against him the hatred of the people of the United States. The traverser has read in evidence a report made by the president to the house of representatives, and a letter written by the secretary of state, to show that the president had advised and directed this Robbins to be given up; but subsequent facts could not excuse the traverser for what he had written before. Now, gentlemen, with regard to this delivery of Jonathan Robbins, I am clearly of opinion that the president could not refuse to deliver him up. This same Jonathan Robbins, whose real name appears to have been Nash, was charged with murder committed on board the Hermione, British ship of war. This Nash being discovered in America, the British minister made a requisition to the president that he should be delivered up. Then we must inquire whether the president was obliged to give him up? By the twenty-seventh article of the treaty with Great Britain, it is stipulated, 'that either of the contracting parties will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other, provided this shall be done only on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been there committed.' If the president, therefore, by this treaty, was bound to give this Nash up to justice, he was so bound by law; for the treaty is the law of the land: if so, the charge of interference to influence the decisions of a court of justice, is without foundation. The reason why this article was inserted in the treaty, is evident. Murder is a crime against the laws of God and man, and ought never to be committed with impunity. Forgery is an offence affecting all commercial countries, and should never go unpunished; and therefore every government, especially a commercial one, acts wisely in delivering fugitives guilty of such crimes to justice. Nash was charged with having committed murder on board a British ship of war. Now a dispute has arisen whether murder committed on board such a ship of war, was committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain. I have no doubt as to the point. All vessels, whether public or private, are part of the territory and within the jurisdiction of the nation to which they belong. This is according to the law of nations. All nations have this jurisdiction, and the reason is obvious, 642 for every country carrying on commerce, is answerable to other nations for the conduct of their subjects on the ocean. Were it not so, crimes committed on board vessels of war would go unpunished; for no other country can claim jurisdiction. This person, then, was charged with murder committed on board a British ship of war. I say it was committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, By the constitution, (since the treaty is the law of the land,) America was bound to give him up: but who is the person to deliver up a fugitive according to that article in the treaty? The president was the only person to take the proper steps, and to take cognizance of the business. He represents the United States in their concerns with foreign powers. This affair could not be tried before a court of law. No court of justice here has jurisdiction over the crime of murder committed on board a British ship of war. Now, as the requisition was made to the president on the part of the British government to deliver this man up, it became necessary to know whether there was sufficient evidence of his criminality pursuant to the treaty. The judge of the court of Carolina was therefore called upon to inquire into the evidence of his criminality. He was the instrument made use of by the president to ascertain that fact. His delivery was the necessary act of the president, which he was by the treaty and the law of the land, bound to perform; and had he not done so, we should have heard louder complaints from that party who are incessantly opposing and calumniating the government, that the president had grossly neglected his duty by not carrying a solemn treaty into effect. Was this, then, an interference on the part of the president with the judiciary without precedent, against law and against mercy; for doing an act which he was bound by the law of the land to carry into effect, and over which a court of justice had no jurisdiction? Surely not; neither has it merited to be treated in the manner in which the traverser has done in his publication. A defence of greater novelty I never heard before.

Take this publication in all its parts, and it is the boldest attempt I have known to poison the minds of the people. He asserts that Mr. Adams has countenanced a navy, that he has brought forward measures for raising a standing army in the country. The traverser is certainly a scholar, and has shown himself a man of learning, and has read much on the subject of armies. But to assert, as he has done, that we have a standing army in this country, betrays the most egregious ignorance, or the most wilful intentions to deceive the public. We have two descriptions of armies in this country--we have an army which is generally called the Western army, enlisted for five years only--can this be a standing army? Who raises them? Congress. Who pays them? The people. We have also another army, called the provisional army, which is enlisted during the existence of the war with France--neither of these can, with any propriety, be called a standing army. In fact, we cannot have a standing army in this country, the constitution having expressly declared that no appropriation shall be made for the support of an army longer than two years. Therefore, as congress may appropriate money for the support of the army annually, and are obliged to do it only for two years, there can be no standing army in this country until the constitution is first destroyed. There is no subject on which the people of America feel more alarm, than the establishment of a standing army. Once persuade them that the government is attempting to promote such a measure, and you destroy their confidence in the government. Therefore, to say, that under the auspices of the president, we were saddled with a standing army, was directly calculated to bring him into contempt with the people, and excite their hatred against him.

It is too much to press this point on the traverser. But he deserves it. This publication is evidently intended to mislead the ignorant, and inflame their minds against the president, and to influence their votes on the next election. The traverser says, he has proved that the president has advocated a standing army--how has he proved it? There is no standing army; I have before stated, the army is only raised for five years, and during the existing differences--he tells you, Mr. Adams is a friend to the establishment of a navy; I wonder who is not a friend to a navy which is to protect the commerce and power of this country. The traverser has, to prove these points, read to you many extracts from the addresses and answers to the president. He has selected a number of passages, which, he asserts, prove the approbation of the president to the creation of a navy, and forming a standing army. But we are to recollect gentlemen, that when in consequence of the unjust proceedings of France, the great mass of the people thought proper to address the president, expressing in those addresses, sentiments of attachment and confidence in the president, and their determination to resist the oppression of the French government, the president replied to them, in answers which generally were the echo of their sentiments, and in fact, his expressions were as general as the nature of the addresses would permit--therefore, the traverser ought to have blamed the addressers, and not the president. The Marine Society of Boston, as old seamen, address the president in favour of a navy. The president in reply, thinks a navy is the proper defence of the country.

I believe, gentlemen, in the first part of my charge, I made remarks on the assertions of the traverser, that the president had borrowed money at eight per cent. in time of peace. Therefore, it will not be necessary to enlarge on that point. You will please to notice, gentlemen, that the traverser in his defence must prove every charge he has made to be true; 643 he must prove it to the marrow. If he asserts three things, and proves but one, he fails; if he proves but two, he fails in his defence, for he must prove the whole of his assertions to be true. If he were to prove, that the president had done everything charged against him in the first paragraph of the publication--though he should prove to your satisfaction, that the president had interfered to influence the decisions of a court of justice, that he had delivered up Jonathan Robbins without precedent, against law and against mercy, this would not be sufficient, unless he proved at the same time, that Jonathan Robbins was a native American, and had been forcibly impressed, and compelled to serve on board a British ship of war. If he fails, therefore, gentlemen, in this proof, you must then consider whether his intention in making these charges against the president were malicious or not. It is not necessary for me to go more minutely into an investigation of the defence. You must judge for yourselves--you must find the publication, and judge of the intent with which that publication was made, whether it was malice or not? If you believe that he has published it without malice, or an intent to defame the president of the United States, you must acquit him. If he has proved the truth of the facts asserted by him, you must find him not guilty.

After the jury had returned with a verdict of guilty:

CHASE, Circuit Justice. Mr. Cooper, as the jury have found you guilty, we wish to hear any circumstances you have to offer in point of the mitigation of the fine the court may think proper to impose on you, and also in extenuation of your punishment. We should therefore wish to know your situation in life, in regard to your circumstances. It will be proper for you to consider of this. As you are under recognizance, you will attend the court some time the latter end of the week. (The court appointed Wednesday.)

Proceedings on Wednesday, April 30, 1800.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. Mr. Cooper, have you anything to offer to the court previous to passing sentence?

Mr. Cooper. The court have desired me to offer anything relating to my circumstances in mitigation of the fine, or any observation that occurs to me in extenuation of the offence. I have thought it my duty (not for the purpose of deprecating any punishment which the court may deem it proper to inflict, but) to prevent any accidental or apparent harshness of punishment on part of the court, for want of that information which it is in my power to give. For this reason, therefore, and that the court may not be misled, I think it right to say, that my property in this country is moderate. That some resources I had in England, commercial failures there have lately cut off: that I depend principally on my practice: that practice, imprisonment will annihilate. Be it so. I have been accustomed to make sacrifices to opinion, and I can make this. As to circumstances in extenuation, not being conscious that I have set down aught in malice, I have nothing to extenuate.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. I have heard what you have to say. I am sorry you did not think proper to make an affidavit in regard to your circumstances; you are a perfect stranger to the court, to me at least. I do not know you personally-- I know nothing of you, more than having lately heard your name mentioned in some publication. Every person knows the political disputes which have existed amongst us. It is notorious that there are two parties in the country; you have stated this yourself. You have taken one side--we do not pretend to say, that you have not a right to express your sentiments, only taking care not to injure the characters of those to whom you are opposed. Your circumstances ought to have been disclosed, on affidavit, that the court might have judged as to the amount of the offence; nor did we want to hurt you, by this open disclosure.

Mr. Cooper. I have nothing to disclose that I am ashamed of.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. If we were to indulge our own ideas, there is room to suspect that in cases of this kind, where one party is against the government, gentlemen who write for that party would be indemnified against any pecuniary loss; and that the party would pay any fine which might be imposed on the person convicted. You must know, I suppose, before you made any publication of this kind, whether you were to be supported by a party or not, and whether you would not be indemnified against any pecuniary loss. If the fine were only to fall on yourself, I would consider your circumstances; but, if I could believe you were supported by a party inimical to the government, and that they were to pay the fine, not you, I would go to the utmost extent of the power of the court. I understand you have a family, but you have not thought proper to state that to the court. From what I can gather from you, it appears that you depend on your profession for support; we do not wish to impose so rigorous a fine as to be beyond a person's abilities to support, but the government must be secured against these malicious attacks. You say that you are not conscious of having acted from malicious motives. It may be so; saying so, we must believe you; but, the jury have found otherwise. You are a gentleman of the profession, of such capacity and knowledge, as to have it more in your power to mislead the ignorant. I do not want to oppress, but I will restrain, as far as I can, all such licentious attacks on the government of the country.

Mr. Cooper. I have been asked by the court whether, in case of a fine being imposed upon me, I shall be supported by a party. Sir, I solemnly aver, that throughout my life, here and elsewhere, among all the political questions is which I have been concerned, I have 644 never so far demeaned myself as to be a party writer. I never was in the pay or under the support of any party; there is no party in this, or any other country, that can offer me a temptation to prostitute my pen. If there are any persons here who are acquainted with what I have published, they must feel and be satisfied that I have had higher and better motives, than a party could suggest. I have written, to the best of my ability, what I seriously thought would conduce to the general good of mankind. The exertions of my talents, such as they are, have been unbought, and so they shall continue; they have indeed been paid for, but they have been paid for by myself, and by myself only, and sometimes dearly. The public is my debtor, and what I have paid or suffered for them, if my duty should again call upon me to write or to act, I shall again most readily submit to. I do not pretend to have no party opinions, to have no predilection for particular descriptions of men or of measures; but I do not act upon minor considerations; I belong here, as in my former country, to the great party of mankind. With regard to any offers which may have been made to me, to enable me to discharge the fine which may be imposed, I will state candidly to the court what has passed, for I wish not to conceal the truth; I have had no previous communication or promise whatever, I have since had no specific promises of money or anything else. I wrote from my own suggestions. But, many of my friends have, in the expectation of a verdict against me, come forward with general offers of pecuniary assistance; these offers I have, hitherto, neither accepted nor rejected. If the court should impose a fine beyond my ability to pay, I shall accept them without hesitation; but if the fine be within my circumstances to discharge, I shall pay it myself. But the insinuations of the court are ill founded, and if you, sir, from misapprehension or misinformation have been tempted to make them, your mistake should be corrected.

PETERS, District Judge.

I think we have nothing to do with parties; we are only to consider the subject before us. I wish you had thought proper to make an affidavit of your property. I have nothing to do, sitting here, to inquire whether a party in whose favour you may be, or you, are to pay the fine. I shall only consider your circumstances, and impose a fine which I think adequate; we ought to avoid any oppression. It appears that you depend chiefly upon your profession for support. Imprisonment for any time would tend to increase the fine, as your family would be deprived of your professional abilities to maintain them.

CHASE, Circuit Justice.

We will take time to consider this. Mr. Cooper, you may attend here again.

Thursday, Mr. Cooper attended, and the court sentenced him to pay a fine of four hundred dollars; to be imprisoned for six months, and, at the end of that period, to find surety for his good behaviour, himself in a thousand, and two sureties in five hundred dollars each.

NOTE. Judge Chase's conduct in this case, which was marked with a moderation in strong contrast with the harshness afterwards exhibited in the prosecution of Callender [Case No. 14,709], was ably defended by Mr. Harper, in a speech on the sedition act, in the house of representatives in January, 1801 (Harper's Works, 375), and was not thought sufficiently marked, to entitle it even to a nominal place in the memorable articles of impeachment, of November, 1804. Mr. Cooper's defence, however, so written out by himself as to make up a review of the whole administration, attracted great attention; and his imprisonment for an offence thought so trivial, was a popular subject for electioneering declamation. Mr. Adams himself thought the thing had gone too far, and would have pardoned him, had not Mr. Cooper issued a letter, in which he told him, that, so far from asking for clemency, he would not 'accept' it, unless coupled with an acknowledgment by the president of the breach of good faith which the publication of the alleged provocatory letter involved. See Aurora, for May 10, 1700. Of course nothing could be done but let the imprisonment run out. This it did, and the fine was paid. Forty years afterwards, at the same time with that imposed upon Lyon [Case No. 8,646], it was repaid with interest. In Porcupine, Mr. Cooper, as well as Dr. Priestley, were among the principal subjects of ridicule and denunciation; but, perhaps, the most bitter notice taken of them by Cobbett, was a poem called 'Prison Eclogue,' published by him in London, in 1801, and afterwards incorporated in Porcupine's works. The student will find in the Aurora of May 6, May 9, and May 19, papers of some interest emanating from Mr. Cooper on the subject of the trial in the text.

Mr. Cooper's life, however, is so connected with American history, as to require more than a general notice. He was born in London in 1759, and was educated at Oxford. Intended for the law, he did not confine himself to merely legal studies, but devoted himself with great success to the natural sciences, particularly chemistry, over which he soon obtained a mastery. His professional studies, so far as his history shows, never were very severely conducted; and soon after his advent at the bar, he allowed himself to be carried into another orbit, by accepting an ambassadorship from a democratic club in England, to a democratic club in France. For this both he, himself, and his patron, Mr. Watt, of steamengine fame, from whom his diplomatic credentials had issued, were assailed in the house of commons by Mr. Burke. This gave Mr. Cooper an opportunity which he but too gladly seized; and at once there issued a pamphlet reply, which made up for the want of vivacity of its style by the excessive inflammation of its temper. 'As long as you sell this at a high price,' said Sir John Scott, 'you can do no harm; but the moment it is turned into a penny slip, that moment I will prosecute you.' This kindly caution of course shrunk the circulation of the 'reply,' and the result was, that Mr. Cooper, abandoning for a time politics, undertook to introduce into practice in Manchester, the important secret of extracting chlorine from common salt, which though afterwards so valuable, he was not then able to bring into successful operation.

Leaving the wreck both of business and of political fortune, Mr. Cooper at last made up his mind to accompany Dr. Priestley to America, not free, it must be admitted,--at least so far as Dr. Priestley is concerned,--from the conviction that, resist it as they might, the young republic would soon press them into the ranks of its law-makers. But this seemed to be a mistake, and the result was, that Mr. Cooper soon went into a violent opposition to Mr. Adams, the then president, not, however, until he had first somewhat 645 circuitously intimated that he might accept the post of commissioner of the British treaty. Of this opposition, the prosecution in the text was the fruit. On coming out of prison, Mr. Cooper found the minority rapidly turning into a majority, and in a short time, the administration which had prosecuted him was overthrown. His untiring industry, his almost universal philosophical attainments, and his courageous temper, but more particularly the sufferings he had undergone in the maintenance of the freedom of the press, placed him high in the esteem of the dominant party. After having been appointed a commissioner to negotiate a settlement of the Luzerne difficulties in Pennsylvania--a duty he discharged with remarkable skill and success--he was nominated by Governor McKean to the president judgeship of a judicial district.

Mr. Cooper's proceedings after he became the wielder of judicial power, form an odd sequel to his experience when he was its subject. Scarcely five years had passed after he was out of prison, before he was on the bench; and scarcely five years more had passed before he was impeached before the senate of Pennsylvania, upon charges, which, were it not that they were gravely preferred and amply supported, might be considered burlesques of those upon which he was instrumental in impeaching Judge Chase, in the senate of the United States. He was charged with pouncing upon delinquent jurors on the first day of the court, with fines and bench warrants, in violation of the venerable Pennsylvania practice, of giving them the quarto die post; with imprisoning a Quaker for not pulling off his hat; with committing three parties for 'whispering,' an offence for which he declared he would hear no apology; with issuing warrants without previous oath, and then committing the constables who refused to serve them; with insisting in one case in examining under oath, a prisoner charged with crime, as to his own guilt; with sending private notes to juries in criminal cases, tending to extract a verdict of guilty; with carting a Luzerne convict to the Philadelphia prison, a thing not then provided for, which ended in the convict being kept in abeyance by the Philadelphia jailor, who refused to receive him, and the court who refused to take him back, thereby, under his new ambulatory commitment, withdrawing the sheriff from his public duties; and with brow-beating counsel, witnesses and parties, in cases so numerous as to make their recapitulation cover three pages. The Presbyterian and Quaker professions, he was charged with declaring in open court, to be 'all damned hypocrisy and nonsense;' and divers specifications were given of illegal interference on his part in the profits of cases before him, an of private speculations in interests which were to pass under his adjudication. On February 21, 1811, these charges having been formally laid before the Pennsylvania house of representatives, were referred to a committee, who two days afterwards reported, that the evidence produced before them sufficiently substantiated the specifications of passionate and oppressive judicial bearing, leaving, however, the accusation of peculation without any further basis than that afforded by an imprudent purchase of certain property, sold at sheriff's sale under process from the court, a transaction which, though clear from any moral stain, the committee thought to be of doubtful propriety and dangerous precedent. They submitted, in conclusion, a resolution, 'that a committee be appointed to draft an address to the governor for the removal of Thomas Cooper, Esq., from the office of president judge of the Eighth judicial district of Pennsylvania.' Under this resolution, which passed 73 to 20, a committee was appointed which reported an address to the governor, which was carried 59 to 34, in the face of a very powerful protest by Mr. Gibson, now chief justice of Pennsylvania, who took the ground that the offences specified by the committee were misdemeanours, cognizable by impeachment alone. To this was joined a paper, in which the greater portion of the minority joined, declaring, that whatever may have been the peculiarities of manner of Mr. Cooper, there was no evidence which showed judicial misconduct. Under the Pennsylvania constitution, the governor 'may,' on address from the legislature, remove a judge from office; and, as Governor Snyder on a former occasion, when the attempt had been made to shake off the judges of the supreme court, had declared that 'may' sometimes means 'won't,' a vigorous effort was now made to induce him to give once more the same lenient grammatical construction. The governor, it seems, had been the client of Mr. Cooper in former times, and had lived with him for many years on terms of personal intimacy, but whether from this account he felt a greater delicacy in interfering, or whether, in fact, he thought that the case was one in which he ought not to defeat the legislative will, the only reply he made, was a note through the secretary of the commonwealth, announcing that Mr. Cooper's judicial tenure was closed.

Of this procedure, in everything but its result, a duodecimo of the more solemn trial, which in the senate of the United States Judge Chase was the subject, not the least remarkable feature was, that it was carried on, with a few exceptions, by the very party of which Mr. Cooper had been lately one of the most lively leaders, and for which,--if political persecution by an outgoing administration is to be considered as a calamity,--he was one of the greatest sufferers. It may be that, like Callender, he felt a natural disgust when he found that under Mr. Jefferson, many men were put ahead of him who had not received the honours of martyrdom under Mr. Adams; or it may be that when he got on the bench,--for which, by the way, he had not received the necessary professional training,--he became subject to that nervous debility by which the most plethoric patriotism is sometimes there prostrated; but it is certain that very soon he cooled towards the Democrats, and, as was alleged in the evidence before the house committee, even went so far as to drop, when in court, expressions by no means complimentary to their persons, or their doctrines. This change--though not the overt acts said to have sprung from it--he confesses in an address issued from him at the close of the proceedings, at Lancaster, April 4, 1811. 'Nor have I been anxious to conceal,' he says, 'that during a long course of observation on the conduct of parties in this country, I have not found that the Democrats or Republicans have much reason to boast of more disinterested views, or more tolerant principles, than their opponents. I have long found it impossible for me to go all lengths with the party to which I belonged, and, of course, I have shared the fate of all moderate men; I have influence with no party, and have willingly and deliberately incurred the decided hatred of the most violent and thorough going of my own. I went over to France in 1792, an enthusiast, and I left it in disgust. I came here; and seventeen years experience of a democratic government in this country, has also served to convince me it may have its faults; that it is not quite so perfect in practice, as it is beautiful in theory, and that the speculations of my youth do not receive the full sanction of my maturer age; nor do I find that justice and disinterestedness, wisdom, and tolerance, are the necessary fruits of universal suffrage, as it is exercised in Pennsylvania, for these are not always the qualifications that procure a man to be sent as the representative of the people.'

Mr. Cooper's fine chemical acquirements, which, during all the storms of his eventful life, had never been submerged, now gave him a safe retreat. He was first placed in a philosophical professorship in Dickinson College, and afterwards in a highly honourable post in the University of Pennsylvania, which he finally abandoned for the chemical chair in Columbia College, South Carolina, of which he soon became president. In the nullification struggle he took 646 a bold part, issuing documents of the most ultra states' rights tone, and showing that if he had added nothing to the sprightliness, he had lost nothing of the fire, of the pamphleteer of 1795-1800. He died in 1840, when engaged in revising the South Carolina Statutes, a duty charged on him by the legislature, after having published, besides numberless tracts on politics, divinity, and metaphysics, a treatise on the bankrupt laws, a translation of Justinian, a treaties on political economy, a manual of chemistry, as well as a general compendium of useful information.

The defendant applied to the court for a letter to be addressed to several members of congress requesting attendance as witnesses on his behalf, which motion was refused. See Case No. 14,861.

END OF DOCUMENT

TELECOPY COVER SHEET

OFFICE OF THE INDEPENDENT COUNSEL
1001 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Suite 490N
Washington, D.C. 20004
telephone (202) 514-8688 facsimile (202) 514-8802

Date: 6/13/95

TO: ERIC JASO

Company Name: OIC

Fax Number: 501-221-8707 Telephone Number:

FROM: RAJEEV DUGGAL

Number of Pages: 6 (including this cover sheet)

Message: ATTACHED IS A REVIEW OF FILES STORES I FOUND. THEY ARE ORGANIZED BY PRESIDENT + ARE IN CHRONOLOGICAL ORDER.

I WILL GIVE YOU A CALL AFTER YOU'VE HAD SOME TIME TO REVIEW BOTH FAXES.

CONFIDENTIALITY NOTE

c:\faxform rdb

MEMORANDUM

TO: Alex Azar
Eric H. Jaso

FROM: Rajeev Duggal

DATE: June 13, 1995

RE: Review of Press Stories Regarding Presidents as Witnesses

1. Jefferson in 1807

Jefferson received a subpoena in 1807 demanding that he turn over a letter sought by defense lawyers in the treason case against Aaron Burr, Mr. Jefferson's first Vice President. Justice Marshall, presiding over the trial, declared that the President was subject to the law. After first resisting, citing the independence of the executive branch from the judicial branch, Mr. Jefferson submitted the letter, making clear that his decision was voluntary. David Johnston, Judge Won't Order Reagan Testimony, The New York Times, April 1, 1989, at A1; Deborah Zabarenko, Allowing President's Testimony Would Break U.S. Precedent, Reuters, Mar. 31, 1989.

2. Monroe in 1818

President James Monroe was served with a subpoena to testify at a criminal trial, but based on his attorney general's advice, he declined, saying his presidential duties were paramount. He said he would submit to a deposition, but the court instead used interrogatories, which he answered. Deborah Zabarenko, Allowing President's Testimony Would Break U.S. Precedent, Reuters, Mar. 31, 1989.

3. Tyler and Adams in 1846

Former Presidents John Tyler and John Quincy Adams appeared before congressional committees in response to subpoenas in the investigation of whether their Secretary of State Daniel Webster improperly disbursed funds from a confidential fund. Deborah Zabarenko, Allowing President's Testimony Would Break U.S. Precedent, Reuters, Mar. 31, 1989.

4. Lincoln in 1862

Abraham Lincoln voluntarily appeared before a congressional committee. Deborah Zabarenko, Allowing President's Testimony Would Break U.S. Precedent, Reuters, Mar. 31, 1989.

5. Grant in 1875

Ulysses S. Grant at first volunteered to testify at a criminal trial, but after consulting with his staff chose to give a deposition instead. Deborah Zabarenko, Allowing President's Testimony Would Break U.S. Precedent, Reuters, Mar. 31, 1989.

6. Nixon in 1974

a. During the 1974 trial in the coverup of the Watergate affair, John D. Ehrlichman, a domestic policy adviser at the Nixon White House, sought Mr. Nixon's appearance. U.S. District Judge John Sirica agreed that former President Nixon should be called to testify as a defense witness.

Nixon objected that he was too ill to travel from his home in San Clemente to Washington as he was suffering from phlebitis [vein inflammation]. Sirica in response sent a panel of court appointed doctors to examine Nixon and excused Nixon only after they reported that he was seriously ill. David Johnston, Judge Won't Order Reagan Testimony, The New York Times, April 1, 1989, at A1; Robert L Jackson, North Lawyers Renew Bid for Reagan to Testify, The L.A. Times, Mar. 25, 1989, at A14.

b. Nixon was ordered to produce the Watergate tapes in response to a subpoena after the tapes were shown to be necessary to a fair administration of justice. Deborah Zabarenko, Allowing President's Testimony Would Break U.S. Precedent, Reuters, Mar. 31, 1989.

7. Ford in 1975

In 1975, Gerald Ford consented to a videotaped interview for use in the trial of Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme, who was convicted of attempting to assassinate him. The videotape was played for jurors at trial. Administration lawyers lost a bid to have the court accept a written statement by the President. David Johnston, Judge Won't Order Reagan Testimony, The New York Times, April 1, 1989, at A1; North Tactic Revives an Old Debate: Can a President be Forced to Testify?, Associated Press, Jan. 4, 1989; Ruth Marcus, Subpoenaing the President: Not Without Precedent; In 1807, Jefferson Refused to Appear, But the Issue Has Never Been Clearly Decided, The Washington Post, Jan. 1, 1989, at A7.

8. Carter in 1980s

a. In 1980, Jimmy Carter while in office voluntarily answered questions on a videotape in a grand jury investigation of Robert L. Vesco, a fugitive financier. David Johnston, Judge Won't Order Reagan Testimony, The New York Times, April 1, 1989, at A1

b. President Carter while in office voluntarily provided videotaped testimony as a government witness in the perjury and gambling trial of a Georgia State Senator. North Tactic Revives an Old Debate: Can a President be Forced to Testify?, Associated Press, Jan. 4, 1989; Ruth Marcus, Subpoenaing the President: Not Without Precedent; In 1807, Jefferson Refused to Appear, But the Issue Has Never Been Clearly Decided, The Washington Post, Jan. 1, 1989, at A7.

c. A circuit court judge refused to subpoena President Carter in the bribery case against a businesswoman charged with trying to buy an Illinois lawmaker's vote for the Equal Rights Amendment. Deborah Singer, Judge in EPA Bribery Case Refuses to Subpoena Carter, Associated Press, Aug. 1, 1980.

9. Nixon in 1980

In 1980, Nixon voluntarily appeared as a witness in the trial of two former officials of the FBI who had been accused of conducting illegal break-ins. David Johnston, Judge Won't Order Reagan Testimony, The New York Times, April 1, 1989, at A1.

10. Nixon in 1982

Process servers were unable to get past Secret Service agents to serve former President Nixon with a subpoena seeking written testimony in a case by a couple against the Ford Motor Company. Bob Springer, Lawyer Says Can't Get Past Door to Serve Nixon With Subpoena, Associated Press, Aug. 25, 1982.

11. Reagan and Bush in the North Trial

a. Reagan answered interrogatories written by Independent Counsel Lawrence Walsh and submitted to the grand jury that returned an indictment against Oliver North. Judge Gesell ruled that Reagan need not testify in North's trial. Deborah Zabarenko, Allowing President's Testimony Would Break U.S. Precedent, Reuters, Mar. 31, 1989; Ruth Marcus, Subpoenaing the President: Not Without Precedent; In 1807, Jefferson Refused to Appear, But the Issue Has Never Been Clearly Decided, The Washington Post, Jan. 1, 1989, at A7.

b. U.S. District Judge Gesell threw out Oliver North's subpoena of President Bush but ruled that former President Reagan could be compelled to testify. Bush Excused From North Trial, The L.A. Times, Jan. 30, 1989, at A1.

c. "Both Reagan and Bush received defence subpoenas at North's Iran-Contra trial, but the judge in that case ruled that their testimony was not necessary or relevant." James Vincini, Bush, Reagan to be Subpoenaed at Poindexter Iran-Contra Trial, Reuters, June 16, 1989.

d. During two hours of oral argument D.C. Circuit Judge Silberman "noted that Reagan's written answers to questions in the Iran-Contra affair were submitted to a grand jury, but were never provided to North's lawyers." Silberman questioned "why, 'as a matter of basic fairness'" the written answers were not turned over to North. Pete Yost, Appeals Judge Questions Why Reagan Didn't Testify for North, Associated Press, Feb. 6, 1990.

12. Reagan and Bush in the Poindexter Trial

a. Judge Greene ruled that Poindexter may not subpoena President Bush's notes and diaries because Bush had no operational control over Bush. Ronald Ostrow, Judge Grants Access To Reagan's Papers, The L.A. Times, Oct. 25, 1989, at A1.

b. Judge Greene ordered President Reagan to release 29 excerpts and to answer 154 of the 183 questions posed by Poindexter's lawyers. Poindexter's Right to a Fair Trial Outweighs Reagan's Right to Executive Privilege, Newsday, Feb. 8, 1990, at 60.

c. "The great majority of some 183 questions Iran-Contra defendant John Poindexter proposes to ask former President Reagan are material to his defense, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held Feb. 5 as it ordered Reagan to give testimony via videotaped deposition for use at the defendant's trial."

"There is no precedent for compelled in-court testimony by a former president, the court noted; on the other hand, written answers to interrogatories cannot fulfill the essence of the defendant's Sixth Amendment right. However, taking Reagan's testimony by videotape has the virtue of permitting him to fully exercise his right to claim executive privilege, if he so chooses, while at the same time eliminating the inevitable disruptions repeated claims of privilege would cause at trial. Moreover, the court said, national security concerns argue in favor of taking Reagan's testimony in a private setting." Former President Reagan Must Give Taped Testimony in Iran-Contra Trial, 58 U.S.L.W. 1126 (Feb. 20, 1990).

d. President Reagan was set to testify in the Poindexter trial. "'This will be the first time a sitting president has been compelled to appear in a court proceeding for adversarial questioning on his own conduct in office,' notes Prof. Paul F. Rothstein of the Georgetown University Law Center, a criminal law expert who has closely followed the Iran-Contra proceedings. 'It is really quite an event.'" Fred Strasser, Reagan Testimony Takes Center Stage, The National Law Journal, Feb. 26, 1990, at 1.

13. Other

a. "Courts going back to the early 1800s have ruled that presidents may be forced to testify in a criminal case. However, no president or former president actually has been forced to testify under subpoena." "'Everybody says it [can be done] but nobody has done it,' remarked Judge Greene during yesterday's hearing." Poindexter Lawyers Must Put Questions to Reagan in Writing, The Washington Times, Jan. 24, 1990, at A4.

b. No sitting president has ever testified in court in a criminal trial, although a few Presidents and former Presidents have provided testimony or its equivalent in criminal trials and grand jury proceedings. David Johnston, Judge Won't Order Reagan Testimony, The New York Times, April 1, 1989, at A1.

Paula Corbin JONES, Plaintiff,
v.
William Jefferson CLINTON and Danny Ferguson, Defendants.

No. LR-C-94-290.

United States District Court,
E.D. Arkansas,
Western Division.

Dec. 28, 1994.

Former state employee brought civil rights action against sitting President of the United States and against state trooper who was assigned to President when President was Arkansas governor for alleged conduct occurring when President was governor. The District Court, 858 F.Supp. 902, ruled that issue of presidential immunity deserved threshold consideration and, therefore, President would be allowed to defer filing of any other pleadings or motions until immunity issue was resolved. President moved for immunity. The District Court, Susan Webber Wright, J., held that: (1) President was not entitled to absolute immunity, and (2) President was entitled to limited or temporary immunity from immediate trial, but discovery and deposition process could proceed as to all persons including the President.

Motion denied.

[1] UNITED STATES ⚿ 26
393k26
Sitting President of the United States was not entitled to absolute immunity with respect to sexual harassment action brought against him for alleged conduct occurring when President was governor of Arkansas.

[1] UNITED STATES ⚿ 50.5(5)
393k50.5(5)
Sitting President of the United States was not entitled to absolute immunity with respect to sexual harassment action brought against him for alleged conduct occurring when President was governor of Arkansas.

[1] UNITED STATES ⚿ 50.10(1)
393k50.10(1)
Sitting President of the United States was not entitled to absolute immunity with respect to sexual harassment action brought against him for alleged conduct occurring when President was governor of Arkansas.

[2] FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ⚿ 1266
170Ak1266
Sitting President of United States was entitled to limited or temporary Presidential immunity from immediate trial with respect to sexual harassment action brought against him for alleged conduct occurring when President was Arkansas governor and thus, President could not be tried until he left office, but discovery and deposition process could proceed as to all persons including the President; President should not have to devote his time and effort to defense of case at trial while in office, this was not case in which necessity existed to rush to trial nor case that would likely be tried with few demands on Presidential time, plaintiff was not in rush to get case to court, and allowing discovery process to proceed would eliminate problem that witnesses might die or become forgetful due to passage of time.

[2] FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ⚿ 1323.1
170Ak1323.1
Sitting President of United States was entitled to limited or temporary Presidential immunity from immediate trial with respect to sexual harassment action brought against him for alleged conduct occurring when President was Arkansas governor and thus, President could not be tried until he left office, but discovery and deposition process could proceed as to all persons including the President; President should not have to devote his time and effort to defense of case at trial while in office, this was not case in which necessity existed to rush to trial nor case that would likely be tried with few demands on Presidential time, plaintiff was not in rush to get case to court, and allowing discovery process to proceed would eliminate problem that witnesses might die or become forgetful due to passage of time.

[2] UNITED STATES ⚿ 26
393k26
Sitting President of United States was entitled to limited or temporary Presidential immunity from immediate trial with respect to sexual harassment action brought against him for alleged conduct occurring when President was Arkansas governor and thus, President could not be tried until he left office, but discovery and deposition process could proceed as to all persons including the President; President should not have to devote his time and effort to defense of case at trial while in office, this was not case in which necessity existed to rush to trial nor case that would likely be tried with few demands on Presidential time, plaintiff was not in rush to get case to court, and allowing discovery process to proceed would eliminate problem that witnesses might die or become forgetful due to passage of time.

[2] UNITED STATES ⇐ 50.5(5)
393k50.5(5)
Sitting President of United States was entitled to limited or temporary Presidential immunity from immediate trial with respect to sexual harassment action brought against him for alleged conduct occurring when President was Arkansas governor and thus, President could not be tried until he left office, but discovery and deposition process could proceed as to all persons including the President; President should not have to devote his time and effort to defense of case at trial while in office, this was not case in which necessity existed to rush to trial nor case that would likely be tried with few demands on Presidential time, plaintiff was not in rush to get case to court, and allowing discovery process to proceed would eliminate problem that witnesses might die or become forgetful due to passage of time.

[3] FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ⇐ 1956
170Ak1956
Allegations against state trooper who was assigned to sitting President of United States when President was Arkansas governor would be tried at the same time as those against the President who was entitled to limited or temporary presidential immunity from immediate trial with respect to sexual harassment action brought against President and trooper stemming from alleged incident when President was Arkansas governor because there was too much interdependency of events and testimony to proceed piecemeal; trooper's case was integrally related to allegations against President and both cases arose out of the same alleged incident.

691 Daniel M. Traylor, Traylor Law Firm, Little Rock, AR, and Gilbert K. Davis and Joseph Cammarata Fairfax, VA, for plaintiff.

Kathlyn Graves, Wright, Lindsey & Jennings, Stephen C. Engstrom, Wilson, Engstrom, Corum, Dudley & Coulter, Little Rock, AR, and Robert S. Bennett, Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meaghen & Flom, Washington, DC, for defendants.

Bill W. Bristow, Seay & Bristow, Jonesboro, AR and Robert Batton, Jacksonville, AR, for Mr. Ferguson.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

SUSAN WEBBER WRIGHT, District Judge.

The Plaintiff, Paula Corbin Jones, filed a damage suit against the Defendants William Jefferson Clinton and Danny Ferguson to recover for acts which were alleged to have taken place primarily while Defendant Clinton was Governor of Arkansas and Defendant Ferguson was a Trooper with the Arkansas State Police assigned to the Governor. Subsequently, in the General Election of November, 1992, Mr. Clinton was elected President of the United States and assumed that office on January 20, 1993.

The complaint was filed on May 6, 1994, and was predicated on an alleged incident which was said to have occurred on May 8, 1991. The action alleged sexual harassment and conspiracy pursuant to 42 U.S.C. §§ 1983 and 1985, which are provisions included in civil rights legislation of the reconstruction era. It also alleged state law claims of defamation and outrage.

Defendant Ferguson responded to these allegations by, in essence, denying any which might involve questionable activities on his part. Defendant Clinton responded with a motion to bifurcate the briefing schedule so as to permit the question of Presidential 692 immunity to be argued on a motion to dismiss before any other questions were presented. On July 21, 1994, the Court entered a Memorandum and Order allowing President Clinton to file a motion to dismiss on the basis of Presidential immunity and deferring and preserving the filing of any other motions or pleadings until the issue of Presidential immunity had been resolved. Jones v. Clinton, 858 F.Supp. 902 (E.D.Ark.1994).

The Court noted that this order was purely procedural in nature and addressed only the question of whether Presidential immunity would be considered as a threshold issue. Id. at 907 n. 6.

The basic issue, therefore, which this Memorandum Opinion and Order addresses is whether a civil action may be asserted against the President of the United States while he is in office when the fact situation alleged in the complaint arose before his election and assumption of office.

I.

Absolute Immunity of the President from Civil Suit

The President has asserted that he may not be sued in a civil action while sitting as President, even when the facts asserted by the Plaintiff occurred, if at all, before he was elected or assumed the office. This, of course, is a claim of absolute immunity. The President would have the Court dismiss the complaint while preserving through some equitable tolling of the statute of limitations the right of Ms. Jones to sue him civilly as soon as he left office. The Justice Department in its Statement of Interest of the United States also argued for immunity, but urged the Court in the alternative simply to stay the proceedings until the President had left office. Ms. Jones argued against immunity, but also argued alternatively for dismissal with an automatic reinstatement on the Court's docket on the last day of his Presidency and against a stay. All briefs discussed at some length the intent of the framers of the Constitution and interpretations of various scholars and judges relating to this subject, and all were thorough and well researched.

A. The English Legacy

The Court believes that the place to begin this discussion, before coming to the vital question of constitutional interpretation, is in English law and the development of the rights and liberties of the English people. The rights and liberties of England became our inheritance. The Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of the states contain provisions that come directly from that source.

Almost all of the states adopted "reception statutes" receiving into state law the English common law and acts of Parliament as they existed as of a certain date--which was usually 1607, 1620, or 1776--except to the extent that they were contrary to our federal or state constitutions or statutes or were contrary to our form of government. Arkansas adopted such a statute shortly after becoming a state. Ark.Code Ann. § 1-2-119 (Michie 1987); Ark.Stat.Ann. § 1-101 (1976 Repl.); discussed in Moore v. Sharpe, 91 Ark. 407, 121 S.W. 341 (1909). The statute adopted the English common law, subject to the stated limitations, as it existed prior to the fourth year of James I. Various English statutes or common law rules passed into Arkansas law as a result. E.g. Biscoe v. Thweatt, 74 Ark. 545, 86 S.W. 432 (1905) (Statute of Charitable Uses); Horsley v. Hilburn, 44 Ark. 458 (1884) (Rule in Shelley's Case implicitly recognized but not applied to fee tail pursuant to superseding Arkansas statute); Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. 140 (1840) (Rule Against Perpetuities). Also received were those portions of the Magna Carta relating to due process of law, equal protection, trial by jury, and rights unrelated to the feudal system.

The Magna Carta was largely a restatement of feudal law pertaining to land tenures and their incidents, and thus most of it has no application here. However, in addition to enshrining in English law some of our basic rights and liberties, it constituted a series of limitations placed upon the King and his authority. There would follow in English history a long and bloody struggle to define the rights of the monarchy as opposed to 693 Parliament and the citizenry and also to the common law itself.

The tension between the King and Parliament, on the one hand, and the King and the common law, on the other, reached its heights with the ascension to the throne of the Stuart monarchy in the person of King James the First (who was James the Sixth of Scotland). Friction soon arose between the King and the House of Commons. At the root of the disagreement, once again, was the Magna Carta. See generally William Swindler, Magna Carta: Legend and Legacy 169-176 (1965).

An important participant in all of this was Sir Edward Coke, whose writings had an enormous influence on English and American law, and who had served as Solicitor General and later Attorney General under Queen Elizabeth I and also as Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. He subsequently would become Chief Justice of the King's Bench under King James I. See 3 Roscoe Pound, Jurisprudence 428 (1959). Under Elizabeth, as her attorney, Coke had been a staunch defender of the Crown, but as a judge, he would quote Bracton to King James: "The King ought to be under no man, but under God and the law." Swindler, supra, at 172. He also stated in Dr. Bonham's Case, 8 Co. 113b, 118a, 77 Eng.Rep. 646, 652 (1610): "And it appears in our bodies, that in many cases the common law will control acts of Parliament, and sometimes adjudge them to be utterly void" if they are "against common right and reason." William B. Lockhart et al., The American Constitution 251 (5th ed. 1981). That was unlikely to be a true statement of the law in the early 17th Century, but to the extent that it was precedent, it may be said to be an early expression of judicial review.

None of this and other frictions set well with the King, and Coke was dismissed from the bench, turning his efforts to Parliament. The continuing friction between Parliament and James' successor, King Charles I, ultimately led to the adoption of the Petition of Right, which in essence ratified and extended the Magna Carta, and in effect further limited the prerogatives of the Crown. A defining moment came when the House of Commons rejected a proposal of the House of Lords that would add a clause recognizing the sovereignty of the King. Coke gave this fulmination:

> I know that prerogative is part of the law, but sovereign power is no Parliamentary word; in my opinion, it weakens Magna Carta and all our statutes; for they are absolute without any saving of sovereign power. And shall we now add to it, we shall weaken the foundation of law, and then the building must needs fall; take we heed what we yield unto--Magna Carta is such a Fellow, he will have no Sovereign.

Swindler, supra, at 185.

The Petition of Right was one of the foundation stones of the English Constitution. It enlarged upon the Magna Carta as a constitutional limitation upon the power of the monarchy. It made it apparent that the King's prerogative was limited. Sub Deo et Lege [FN1] was the law of the land.

> FN1. In Prohibitions Del Roy, 77 Eng.Rep. 1342, 1343, 12 Co.Rep. 64, 65 (K.B.1608), Lord Coke wrote: [B]ut His Majesty was not learned in the law of his realm of England, and causes which concern the life, or inheritance, or goods, or fortunes of his subjects, are not to be decided by natural reason but by the artificial reason and judgment of law, which law is an act which requires long study and experience, before that a man can attain to the cognizance of it: that the law was the golden met-wand and measure to try the causes of the subjects; and which protected His Majesty in safety and peace: with which the King was greatly offended, and said, that then he should be under the law, which was treason to affirm, as he said; to which I said, that Bracton saith, Quod Rex non debet esse sub homine, sed sub Deo et lege. [That the King ought not to be under any man, but under God and the law.] quoted in DAVID MELLINKOFF, THE LANGUAGE OF THE LAW 203 (1963). In Catherine Drinker Bowen's book, The Lion and the Throne, the situation which led to this opinion is discussed in some detail. The events of this period in English legal and political history were conclusive in determining the end of "the divine right of Kings" and subjecting the King to the law. This is historically important to us in that the founding fathers cast very little light (outside of the impeachment provision) upon suits against the President, and this matter was never addressed by Congress in passing laws enacted pursuant to the Constitution. It must be assumed that the rights of the President do not rise above the rights of an English monarch in the early 17th Century. Despite these statements by Lord Coke that the King was subject to the law, there existed contemporaneously in England the rule that "the King can do no wrong," a relic presumably rooted in the divine right of Kings. Blackstone expressed it this way: Besides the attribute of sovereignty, the law also ascribes to the King, in his political capacity, absolute perfection. The King can do no wrong: which ancient and fundamental maxim is not to be understood, as if every thing transacted by the government was of course just and lawful, but means only two things. First, that whatever is exceptionable in the conduct of public affairs, is not to be imputed to the King, nor is he answerable for it personally to his people; for this doctrine would totally destroy that constitutional independence of the crown, which is necessary for the balance of power in our free and active, and therefore compounded, constitution. And, secondly, it means that the prerogative of the crown extends not to do any injury; it is created for the benefit of the people, and therefore cannot be exerted to their prejudice. The King, moreover, is not only incapable of doing wrong, but even of thinking wrong; he can never mean to do an improper thing; in him is no folly or weakness. WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND 246 (Chitty ed. 1855) (emphasis in the original). Of course, when Blackstone published his Commentaries, this idea was already ludicrous in the light of the history of the English monarchy. A litany of the wrongs, weaknesses and sins of English kings would establish that they were not only capable of "doing wrong" but also of "thinking wrong" and were replete with folly and weakness. The English concept of kingship never entered into the law of the United States, although in England it apparently "exists today to give the Queen an absolute immunity from being sued for personal torts in the civil courts." R.J. Gray, Private Wrongs of Public Servants, 47 CAL.L.REV. 303, 307 (1959). See also Mayer G. Freed, Executive Official Immunity for Constitutional Violations: An Analysis and a Critique, 72 NW.U.L.REV. 526 (1977). States did not adopt through the reception statutes those aspects of English law relating to the monarchy since kings and queens are contrary to our form of government. Thus what remains of our English heritage on this point are the basic documents of English liberties--the Magna Carta, the Petition of Right, Habeas Corpus, and the English Bill of Rights. Moreover, as Chief Justice John Marshall pointed out in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 163, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803), the King is subject to being "sued" in the form of a petition "and he never fails to comply with the judgment of his court."

694 B. The American Experience

In the formulation of Article II of the Constitution, there were varying viewpoints as to the office of the President. [FN2] Some, such as Roger Sherman of Connecticut, believed that the President should be "nothing more than an instrument for carrying the will of the Legislature into effect," while others, such as Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania, thought the President should be "the guardian of the people, even of the lower classes, against Legislative tyranny." Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., The Constitution: Article II, in An American Primer 121-22 (Daniel J. Boorstin ed., 1968). What resulted was the compromise that we have today, amended only slightly from the original. It sets out the powers and duties of the Executive Branch (i.e., the President and the administrators he appoints), but it does not address the immunity question.

FN2. Russell Kirk cites Sir Henry Maine for the proposition that "the office of the President really is the office of a King--the chief difference being that the American President is subject to election, at fixed terms, and that the office is not hereditary." He adds: "Maine even suggests that the framers of the Constitution may have had in mind the powers of George III, when they established the powers of the American presidency." He continues in that vein discussing how powerful an office it is. He adds, however, that the restraint exercised by the first six presidents prevented the reduction of the legislative and judicial branches "to insignificance." RUSSELL KIRK, THE ROOTS OF AMERICAN ORDER 427-428 (1974). This seems to be an exaggeration, however, since during that period of time, the opinions of Chief Justice John Marshall sufficed to prevent the Executive Branch from subverting the Judicial Branch, although the first six presidents did exercise substantial restraint, particularly Washington and Adams. It seems much more likely that in providing for the Executive Branch, the founders did not have George III in mind at all, except in an unfavorable sense. The "George" that they likely had in mind was George Washington. The Executive Branch was probably modeled for the first man to occupy it--which may explain why even the insertion of an impeachment provision for criminal offenses was a matter of debate.

A large part of the problem, aside from the silence of the Constitution, is that for all practical purposes, the Executive Branch, unlike the Congress and the Supreme Court, consists of only one person. His administrative 695 appointees serve at his pleasure. Thus, a large part of the President's assertion may be summarized in the proposition that, without immunity, to cripple the Presidency in one way or another in civil litigation is to deliver a blow to and weaken the effectiveness of the entire Executive Branch of government which in effect is only one person, the President.

The importance of unimpeded, independent branches of government is discussed by Alexander Hamilton [FN3] in The Federalist No. 51:

> FN3. Some attribute this paper to James Madison. In I THE PEOPLE SHALL JUDGE 312 (University of Chicago Social Science Staff 1949), its author is listed "Hamilton or Madison."

> Were the executive, magistrate, or the judges not independent of the legislature in this particular, their independence in every other would be merely nominal ...
> [We must give] to those who administer every department the necessary constitutional means and personal motives to resist encroachments of the others.... The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place. It may be a reflection on human nature that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government. But what is government itself but the greatest of all reflections on human nature? If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself.

I The People Shall Judge 312, 313 (University of Chicago Social Science Staff 1949). He is speaking of independence from other branches, but also of the responsibility that goes along with it.

The President and his lawyers, in arguing the immunity issue, seem to place substantial reliance on the intention of the framers of the Constitution. Much of what they argue relates to the impeachment process. For example, they seize in their brief upon this commentary by Hamilton from The Federalist No. 69: "The President of the United States would be liable to be impeached, tried, and, upon conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors, removed from office; and would afterwards be liable to prosecution and punishment in the ordinary course of the law." Of course, Hamilton was talking about impeachment under Article II, Section 4, under which the President may be "removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." That has nothing to do with immunity from civil suit. Article II, and Hamilton, were addressing criminal conduct on the part of the President.

This is not to say, however, that the question of Presidential immunity from suit was not discussed at the Constitutional Convention or during the years immediately following. Justice Lewis Powell addresses this in speaking for the majority of the Court in Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731, 102 S.Ct. 2690, 73 L.Ed.2d 349 (1982):

> [T]here is historical evidence from which it may be inferred that the Framers assumed the President's immunity from damages liability. At the Constitutional Convention several delegates expressed concern that subjecting the President even to impeachment would impair his capacity to perform his duties of office. See 2 M. Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, p. 64 (1911) (remarks of Gouverneur Morris); id., at 66 (remarks of Charles Pinckney). The delegates of course did agree to an Impeachment Clause. But nothing in their debates suggests an expectation that the President would be subjected to the distraction of suits by disappointed private citizens. And Senator Maclay has recorded the views of Senator Ellsworth and Vice President John Adams--both delegates to the Convention--that 'the President, personally, was not the subject to any process whatever.... For [that] would ... put it in the power of a common justice to exercise any authority over him and stop the whole machine of Government.' Journal of William Maclay 167 (E. Maclay ed. 1890).

696 457 U.S. at 751-52 n. 31, 102 S.Ct. at 2701-02 n. 31.

Justice Powell also quoted from Justice Joseph Story's Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States to this effect:

> 'There are ... incidental powers, belonging to the executive department, which are necessarily implied from the nature of the functions, which are confided to it. Among these, must necessarily be included the power to perform them ... The president cannot, therefore, be liable to arrest, imprisonment, or detention, while he is in the discharge of the duties of his office; and for this purpose his person must be deemed, in civil cases at least, to possess an official inviolability.' 3 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States Sec. 1563, pp. 418-419 (1st ed.

1833).
457 U.S. at 749, 102 S.Ct. at 2701.

But just as the English law moved from the divine right of kings assertion to the assertion of Lord Coke and Parliament that the King was under God and the law, the situation in American law prior to Fitzgerald had proceeded essentially in the same direction with regard to the office of President. For example, it has been pointed out that when Hamilton made the statement quoted previously from The Federalist No. 69, "he was referring to his own plan" rather than reciting faithfully what had been proposed. Raoul Berger, Selected Writings on the Constitution 46-47 n. 94 (1987). Moreover, the discussion at the Constitutional Convention revolved around the impeachment process, the basis for which was the commission of "high crimes and misdemeanors." Although Justice Story, writing several decades later, discusses civil cases, as previously quoted, he is writing from the perspective of someone who was a boy at the time of the Convention--although admittedly he was rather close in time to those proceedings. He was successful in that what he wrote was embodied in Fitzgerald. There was much opposition even to the impeachment provision; some thought that the Supreme Court should conduct the trial rather than the Senate. James Madison was an advocate of that view, although Gouverneur Morris thought that "no other tribunal than the Senate could be trusted" and believed that the Supreme Court "were too few in number and might be warped or corrupted." 2 Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787 Which Framed the Constitution of the United States of America 535 (reported by James Madison) (Gaillard Hunt & James Brown Scott, eds., 1987).

The disagreement over Presidential immunity at the Constitutional Convention carried over into the years that followed. In United States v. Burr, 25 F.Cas. 30 (C.C.D.Va.1807) (No. 14,692d), Chief Justice John Marshall ruled that a subpoena duces tecum could be issued to President Thomas Jefferson. Jefferson protested strongly, arguing that the three branches of government had to be independent of each other, including independence by the executive from the judiciary. (Discussed in Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. at 751 n. 31, 102 S.Ct. at 2701-02 n. 31.) In Livingston v. Jefferson, 15 F.Cas. 660 (C.C.D.Va.1811) (No. 8,411), damages were sought for alleged trespass committed by a federal officer at the direction of Jefferson, but a federal court dismissed it for having been brought improperly in Virginia. The immunity issue was not reached. Of course, even before these cases, the argument of total independence of the Executive Branch from judicial action had been settled in large part by Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803). This case is remembered for the recognition and use of judicial review by the Supreme Court of an Act of Congress, but it also directed by mandamus that Secretary of State James Madison deliver Marbury's justice of the peace commission to him contrary to the desires of President Jefferson. While not bearing upon the immunity question directly, it was apparent that the Executive Branch was not immune from action by the Judicial Branch in enforcing mandates of the Constitution. In fact, Chief Justice Marshall said of Marbury's rights and remedies: "The very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury." 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) at 163.

697 However, in Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475, 18 L.Ed. 437 (1867), the Supreme Court refused to enjoin President Andrew Johnson from enforcing the Reconstruction Acts. Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase, writing for a unanimous Court, declined to enjoin enforcement of the legislation even though it was allegedly unconstitutional. He distinguished Marbury by stating that it only related to ministerial duties involving no discretion while these Acts related to "executive and political" duties involving broad discretion. To enjoin the President would be to restrain him from carrying out his constitutional responsibility to execute the laws. Enjoining him would threaten the separation of powers between the branches and the independence of the President. See similarly, Kendall v. United States, 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 524, 610, 9 L.Ed. 1181 (1838), and National Treasury Employees Union v. Nixon, 492 F.2d 587, 608-612 (D.C.Cir.1974).

Of course, the complaint of Paula Corbin Jones in this civil case relates neither to the ministerial nor the executive duties of the President. The allegations relate to alleged conduct of the President while he was Governor of Arkansas. (The allegations, it might be noted, also do not relate to any ministerial or executive duty of the Office of Governor.) The Justice Department, in its brief, stated that it knew of only three private suits based on pre-presidential conduct which had been adjudicated during the President's term in office. These three were (1) an action against Theodore Roosevelt and the Board of Police in New York City, which was resolved in the Board's favor in 1904, People ex rel. Hurley v. Roosevelt, 179 N.Y. 544, 71 N.E. 1137 (1904); (2) A damage suit against Harry Truman based upon his conduct as a county judge in 1931, resolved in Truman's favor in 1946, Devault v. Truman, 354 Mo. 1193, 194 S.W.2d 29 (1946); and (3) a suit against John F. Kennedy in California Superior Court asserting a tort claim from an automobile accident occurring during the 1960 campaign, which was ultimately settled, Bailey v. Kennedy, No. 757,200 (Cal.Super.Ct.1962).

However, the case most applicable to this one is Nixon v. Fitzgerald, cited previously. In a 5-4 decision, the Supreme Court decided that President Nixon had absolute immunity from a suit brought by A. Ernest Fitzgerald, a management analyst with the Department of the Air Force, whom the President ordered fired because he had given congressional testimony on cost overruns which embarrassed his superiors in the Department of Defense (and presumably embarrassed the President also). Fitzgerald sued for damages. The district court rejected President Nixon's assertion of Presidential immunity. The court of appeals affirmed, but the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the President had absolute immunity from a civil suit for damages resulting from official actions taken by the President while in office. The majority opinion of Justice Lewis Powell was hotly disputed in a dissent by Justice Byron White, in which Justices Blackmun, Brennan and Marshall joined. The majority opinion was in accord with the view of the scholar, Edward S. Corwin, in discussing the President's immunity from judicial process. Edward S. Corwin, The President: Office and Powers 138 (3d ed. 1948).

But the facts of Fitzgerald, as stated previously, are not the same as those in this case. Mr. Nixon was President when he fired Mr. Fitzgerald and was acting in his capacity as the head of the Executive Branch. Mr. Clinton was not President and was not even the President-elect when the alleged cause of action arose in this case.

The Constitution, of course, is silent on all of this. The framers debated even the subject of whether the President should be subject to impeachment for criminal acts and, if so, who should conduct the trial. There is nothing in the document relating to civil actions. Justice Story, supra, was of the mind that the President possessed immunity from civil suit, and the Supreme Court in Fitzgerald agreed in a severely divided opinion that the President was civilly immune from suits brought for official actions taken while in office.

Thus, the hard fact is that these issues of immunity, whether absolute or qualified, have been left in the hands of the Judicial Branch, particularly the Supreme Court. This District Court is not activist in nature and is not inclined to "make law" where none 698 exists. As stated by Chief Justice John Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, however: "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 177, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803).

[1] This Court recognizes the reasoning of Justice Powell and his thin majority in Nixon v. Fitzgerald that the President has absolute immunity from civil damage actions arising out of the execution of official duties of office. However, this Court does not believe that a President has absolute immunity from civil causes of action arising prior to assuming the office. Nowhere in the Constitution, congressional acts, or the writings of any judge or scholar, may any credible support for such a proposition be found. It is contrary to our form of government, which asserts as did the English in the Magna Carta and the Petition of Right, that even the sovereign is subject to God and the law.

Therefore, the President's Motion to Dismiss on Grounds of Presidential Immunity is denied.

II.

Limited or Temporary Immunity from Trial

[2] The question does not end here, however, because the intent of the Supreme Court in Nixon v. Fitzgerald would seem to carry this case beyond the question of absolute immunity from civil suit. The language of the majority opinion by Justice Powell is sweeping and quite firm in the view that to disturb the President with defending civil litigation that does not demand immediate attention under the circumstances would be to interfere with the conduct of the duties of the office.

Justice Powell states unequivocally the following: "Because of the singular importance of the President's duties, diversion of his energies by concern with private lawsuits would raise unique risks to the effective functioning of government." 457 U.S. at 751, 102 S.Ct. at 2702. He adds:

> In view of the visibility of his office and the effect of his actions on countless people, the President would be an easily identifiable target for suits for civil damages. Cognizance of this personal vulnerability frequently could distract a President from his public duties, to the detriment of not only the President and his office but also the Nation that the Presidency was designed to serve.

457 U.S. at 753, 102 S.Ct. at 2703.

Chief Justice Burger expressed the same theme in his concurring opinion: "Exposing a President to civil damages actions for official acts within the scope of the Executive authority would inevitably subject Presidential actions to undue judicial scrutiny as well as subject the President to harassment." 457 U.S. at 762, 102 S.Ct. at 2707.

Of course, in the preceding part of this opinion, this Court has pointed out that President Clinton's alleged acts took place before he was President and that he was not acting in the scope of Executive authority. Nonetheless, the concerns expressed by a majority of the Supreme Court are not lessened by the fact that these alleged actions preceded his Presidency, nor by the fact that his alleged actions would not have been within his official governmental capacity anyway. The problem, still, is essentially the same--the necessity to avoid litigation, which also might blossom through other unrelated civil actions, and which could conceivably hamper the President in conducting the duties of his office. This situation, as stated by Justice Powell in one of the preceding quotations from Nixon v. Fitzgerald, could have harmful effects in connection not only with the President but also with the nation in general.

It is therefore the view of this Court that although President Clinton is not entitled to have this action dismissed on the basis of immunity, he should not have to devote his time and effort to the defense of this case at trial while in office.

This is not a case in which any necessity exists to rush to trial. It is not a situation, for example, in which someone has been terribly injured in an accident through the alleged negligence of the President and desperately needs to recover such damages as may be awarded by a jury. It is not a divorce action, or a child custody or child support case, in which immediate personal 699 needs of other parties are at stake. Neither is this a case that would likely be tried with few demands on Presidential time, such as an in rem foreclosure by a lending institution.

The situation here is that the Plaintiff filed this action two days before the three-year statute of limitations expired. Obviously, Plaintiff Jones was in no rush to get her case to court and, in fact, has stated publicly and in her brief that her lawsuit came about in an effort to clear her name of allegations of sexual activity involving then-Governor Clinton. Her complaint, in ¶¶ 41-47, discusses in detail this situation and indicates that suit was brought because of the use of the name "Paula" in an article appearing in The American Spectator, in which the author purportedly obtained his information from state troopers, including Defendant Ferguson. Consequently, the possibility that Ms. Jones may obtain a judgment and damages in this matter does not appear to be of urgent nature for her, and a delay in trial of the case will not harm her right to recover or cause her undue inconvenience. For want of better phraseology, this amounts to the granting of temporary or limited immunity from trial as Fitzgerald seems to require due to the fact that the primary defendant is the President. The Court believes that such ruling is also permitted under Rule 40 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allowing district courts to place matters upon the trial calendar "as the courts deem expedient." Further, such limited immunity from trial would seem to be justified under the equity powers of the Court.

By putting the case on hold, as far as trial is concerned, the Court avoids any tolling of the statute of limitations problems which might otherwise be presented if the case were dismissed without prejudice. Despite the fact that the President considers himself estopped to object to a refiling, the Court believes that a delay of the trial is the better way to proceed.

This does not mean, however, that the case is put on the shelf for all purposes. There would seem to be no reason why the discovery and deposition process could not proceed as to all persons including the President himself. This approach eliminates the problem that witnesses may die, disappear, become incapacitated, or become forgetful due to the passage of time.

[3] Because there is too much interdependency of events and testimony to proceed piecemeal, the allegations against the trooper will be tried at the same time as those against the President. His case is integrally related to the allegations against the President; both cases arose out of the same alleged incident; and while the suit against the Trooper has unrelated matters based upon his alleged actions and statements subsequent to the alleged incident, it would not be possible to try the Trooper adequately without testimony from the President.

III.
Conclusion

The Court has attempted to follow its understanding of Nixon v. Fitzgerald and other cases as well as to adhere to the historical framework involved. Most importantly, the Court has sought to give effect to the full meaning of the separation of powers doctrine originally enunciated by Montesquieu and implicit in the founding fathers' structure of the Constitution. Essential Presidential prerogatives are "rooted in the separation of powers under the Constitution." United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 708, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3107, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974).

On the other hand, in situations in which the President was not the holder of his office when the action allegedly arose, there would seem to be no immunity against civil litigation. The rights of Plaintiff Jones as an American citizen must be protected. Sub Deo et lege is our law as well as the law of Great Britain. No one, be he King or President, is above the law.

To protect the Office of President, however, from the potential harm that could result from unfettered civil litigation, and to give effect to the policy of separation of powers, it is necessary to provide that the President cannot be tried in the context presented here until he leaves office. President Clinton's term in office, if he is re-elected in 1996, would end no later than January 20, 2001. 700 An earlier termination might come on January 20, 1997, which is only slightly over two years away. By permitting discovery as to all including the President, the Court is laying the groundwork for a trial shortly after the President leaves office.

In granting limited or temporary immunity from immediate trial to President Clinton, the Court wishes to emphasize that it holds no brief for alleged sexual harassment, a matter of important concern to many people. The importance of such issue is another reason why there should be no absolute immunity in this case, but only a temporary Presidential immunity from trial.

Finally, the Court must express its awareness that this case is one in which new law is being made. All of the references to historical events and to other cases do not change that fact. In making such a ruling, the Court is also not unmindful of the fact that to this extent the separation of powers has been breached. But it has happened before in many cases including United States v. Nixon, supra, and many of the landmark decisions of Chief Justice John Marshall. In the end, the decision must be made by the courts when there is doubt and only limited precedent.

As previously noted, it "is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." Marbury, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) at 177. United States v. Nixon reaffirmed that statement: "We therefore reaffirm that it is the province and duty of this Court 'to say what the law is' with respect to the claim of privilege presented in this case." 418 U.S. at 705, 94 S.Ct. at 3106. That is what this Court has tried to do, keeping in mind the words of Chief Justice John Marshall that "we must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding." McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 316, 407, 4 L.Ed. 579 (1819), [FN4] and that it is intended to endure for generations and to be applied to the various crises of human affairs.

FN4. As explained by Judge Robert H. Bork, Chief Justice Marshall was pointing out that "there are differences in the way we deal with different legal materials.... By this [Chief Justice Marshall] meant that narrow, legalistic reasoning was not to be applied to the document's broad provisions, a > document that could not, by its nature and uses, 'partake of the prolixity of a legal code.' " ROBERT H. BORK, THE TEMPTING OF AMERICA 145 (1990).

The President's motion seeking immunity from suit is denied. The court will issue a scheduling order in due course.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation 25 F.Cas. 55 FOUND DOCUMENT Database DCT-OLD Mode Page
(Cite as: 25 F.Cas. 55, *55)

55 George Hay, Dist. Atty., William Wirt, and Alexander MacRae, counsel for the prosecution.

[FN2]Before MARSHALL, Chief Justice, and GRIFFIN, District Judge.

FN2 Prior proceedings on the examination for commitment will be found reported as Case No. 14,692a.

The court was opened at half past twelve o'clock, when Col. Aaron Burr appeared, with his counsel, Edmund Randolph, John Wickham, Benjamin Botts and John Baker. [Luther Martin also appeared as counsel at a later stage of the trial.]

The clerk having called the names of the gentlemen who had been summoned on the grand jury, Mr. Burr's counsel demanded a sight of the panel, which was shown to them.

Mr. Burr addressed the court, pointing out some irregularities in summoning a part of the panel. The marshal, he said, by the law of Virginia under which he acted, was required 56 to summon twenty-four freeholders of the state to compose the grand jury. When he has summoned that number his function is completed. He proposed to inquire of the marshal and his deputies what persons they had summoned, and at what periods, to ascertain whether some had not been substituted in the place of others stricken off the panel. After some discussion as to the authority of the marshal to excuse grand jurors who had once been summoned, and to substitute others on the panel in lieu of them.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice

MARSHALL, Chief Justice, remarked that it was not in the power of the marshal to summon more than twenty-four, as the act of assembly authorized only that number. If he should summon twenty-five, the last would not have power to act; and the marshal would have no power to displace any one of the others, to put the last in his place. When the panel had been completed by the marshal, its deficiencies could only be supplied from the bystanders, under the directions of the court.

Mr. Burr said, the court having established the principle, we must ask their aid to come at the facts. We wish to know when certain persons were summoned, when discharged, and whether other persons were substituted in their stead.

Major Scott, the marshal, said he had not the least objection to state all the facts. A few days ago he had received a letter from Col. John Taylor, of Caroline, one of those whom he had summoned on the jury, stating that a hurricane had destroyed his carriagehouse, and with it his carriages, so that he could not use them; and that indisposition would prevent him from riding to Richmond on horseback. This letter he had laid before their honors, and the chief justice had deemed his excuse reasonable. He had then summoned Mr. Barbour to serve in Col. Taylor's place. He had also received a letter from Mr. John MacRae, informing him that he was going to leave the state for his health. He had, in consequence, summoned Doctor Foushee in his place. He added, that he felt it his duty to bring twenty-four jurymen into court, and acted upon that principle.

THE COURT

THE COURT decided that Mr. Barbour and Dr. Foushee were not on the grand jury.

Mr. Burr said, the panel being now reduced to sixteen, he understood it to be the proper time to make any other exceptions to the panel. With regret he should proceed to exercise the privilege of challenging for favor; and in the exercise of this right he should perhaps appeal to the authority of the court to try the jurors challenged.

Mr. Hay called for the law justifying the application.

Mr. Burr said he desired it to be distinctly understood that he claimed the same right of challenging the grand jury for favor that he had of challenging the petit jury. He admitted it was not a peremptory challenge, but that he must show good cause to support it. It would, of course, be necessary to appoint triers to decide, and before whom the party and the witnesses to prove or disprove the favor must appear.

Mr. Botts argued and cited authorities in support of the motion.

Mr. Hay disavowed the intention of opposing substantial exceptions, and admitted the law to be as stated by the opposite counsel. [FN3]

FN3 This is in accordance with both Robertson's and Carpenter's reports. But in his speech on the motion to arrest the evidence, Mr. Hay said the challenge of grand jurors was 'not warranted by any English precedent,' and intimated that he had acquiesced in it because he was indifferent 'whether A, B and C, or D, E and F composed a part' of the grand jury. Mr. Martin, in his reply to Mr. Hay, said, 'if he had examined Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, even in the index, he would have found that grand jurors may be challenged. It is there briefly stated that any person under prosecution may, before he is indicted, challenge a grand juror, as being outlawed for felony, &c., a villein, or returned at the instance of the prosecutor, or not returned by the proper officer.' He also referred to the 'American Museum,' where, he said, it would be seen 'that in a case that came before Judge Grimke, in South Carolina, it was expressly decided that the counsel of the accused have a right to challenge, for good cause, all or any of the grand jury.' These authorities do not seem to sustain Mr. Burr's position, that he had the same right to challenge the grand jury 'for favor' that he had of challenging the petit jury. Hawkins says, 'it seems' that grand jurors may be challenged as aforesaid, but refers to no decision on that subject. At most the authority goes no further than this: that a grand juror may be challenged for incompetency, or for being irregularly or improperly returned. This is a very different thing from a general right of challenge 'for favor.' It is believed that no authority, anterior to this trial, can be found extending the right to challenge grand jurors further than the citation from Hawkins goes. Later decisions and dicta may be found, admitting the right of challenge for favor; but it is believed they are all based upon the authority of Burr's Case, or on special statutory provisions. In Com. v. Clark, 2 Browne, 325, Judges Tilghman and Breckenridge allowed a challenge for favor. In U. S. v. White [Case No. 16,679], the court said that 'an exception for favor which might be a good cause of challenge, cannot be pleaded to the indictment.' The decision in the former case, and the implication in the latter, are both based upon the authority of Burr's Case

Mr. Burr.--I shall, then, proceed to name the persons and causes of challenge. The first I shall mention is William B. Giles, against whom there are two causes of challenge. The first is a matter of some notoriety, because dependent on certain documents or records; the second is a matter of fact, which must be substantiated by witnesses. As to the first, Mr. Giles, when in the senate of the United States, had occasion to pronounce his opinion on certain documents by which I was considered to be particularly implicated. Upon those documents he advocated the propriety of suspending the writ of habeas corpus. The constitution however, forbids such suspension, except in cases of invasion or insurrection, when the public safety requires it. It was therefore to be inferred that Mr. Giles did 57 suppose that there was a rebellion or insurrection, and a public danger of no common kind. It is hardly necessary to observe that with this rebellion, and this supposed danger, I myself had been supposed to be connected. Perhaps this may be a sufficient reason to set aside Mr. Giles. But if not, I shall endeavor to establish by evidence that he has confirmed these opinions by public declarations; that he has declared that these documents, involving me, contained guilt of the highest grade.

Mr. Botts.--There is no necessity of adding anything to the observations of Colonel Burr. If the right of challenge exists, the right to try the challenge exists also. But while I am up, I will declare that no reflection is intended to be made on the character or conduct of Mr. Giles. That gentleman will be candid enough to admit that there is not the least design to wound his feelings. It is with the utmost reluctance that Colonel Burr has prevailed upon himself to advance this exception. I have authorities, however, to prove that these two causes are sufficient to disqualify Mr. Giles. The first relates to his public, the second to his individual conduct.

Mr. Giles.--As to exceptions to myself personally, I can have no objection to have them tried. The court will, however, perceive the delicate situation in which I shall be placed. The triers will have to interrogate witnesses, and the result either way is ineligible. I have no objection to state to the court every impression I have ever had upon this subject. But to calling witnesses to detail loose conversations, so liable to be misunderstood, forgotten, or misrepresented, I am certainly opposed.

Mr. Hay.--I was about to make a proposition which might relieve us from all this useless embarrassment, and which might gratify the views of the accused. If the gentlemen who are challenged on the jury will consent to withdraw themselves, I can have no objection. I am content that every one who has made declarations expressive of a decisive opinion should be withdrawn from the jury. I am not disposed to spend time on such points as these.

Mr. Burr.--It will certainly save time, and I assent to the proposition.

Mr. Giles.--The circumstances which have just occurred place me in an unpleasant situation. I have no objection to disclose in the usual way, with candor, the real state of my mind in relation to the accused. But I have an objection to the introduction of witnesses to prove casual expressions, which are so liable to be misconceived. In the present state of things, expressions might be imputed to me which I never used, or expressions which I really used might be mistaken or misrepresented by the witness; or the witness might deduce inferences from my expressions which they did not justify. It was by no means agreeable to me to have been summoned on this grand jury. But for some time past I have invariably pursued this maxim: 'Neither to avoid nor to solicit any public appointment; but when called to the discharge of any public duty by the proper authority, conscientiously to attempt its execution.' In undertaking to serve on the present grand jury, I was influenced by the same consideration. With respect to my public conduct, I presume it is of public notoriety, and it will speak for itself. I not only voted for the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in certain cases, but I proposed that measure. I then thought, and I still think, that the emergency demanded it; that it was fully justified by the evidence before the senate; and I now regret that the nation had not energy enough to support the senate in that measure. This opinion was formed upon the state of the evidence before the senate, which, in all questions of a general nature, is of a very different character from the legal evidence necessary in a judicial investigation. My mind is, however, free to receive impressions from judicial evidence. In relation to the accused, I feel very desirous, and have often so expressed myself, that the various transactions imputed to him should undergo a full and fair judicial investigation; and that, through that medium, they should receive their just and true character, whatever in point of fact they might be, and that he should be presented in that character to the world. I have no personal resentments against the accused; and if he has received any information inconsistent with this statement, it is not true. However, as it is left to me to elect whether to serve on the grand jury or not, I will certainly withdraw.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE.--The court thinks that if any gentleman has made up and declared his mind it would be best to withdraw.

Mr. Burr.--A gentleman who has prejudged this cause is certainly unfit to be a juryman. It would be an effort above human nature for this gentleman to divest himself of all prepossessions. I believe his mind to be as pure and unbiased as that of any gentleman under such circumstances. But the decisive opinion he has formed upon this subject, though in his public character, disqualifies him for a juryman. But he is one of the last men on whom I would wish to cast any reflections. So far from having any animosity against him, he would have been one of those whom I should have ranked among my personal friends. The other gentleman whom I shall challenge is Wilson Cary Nicholas.

Mr. Nicholas desired that the objection against him should be stated.

Mr. Burr.--The objection is, that he has entertained a bitter personal animosity against me; and therefore I cannot expect from him that pure impartiality of mind which is necessary to a correct decision. I feel the delicacy 58 of my situation; but if the gentleman will consent to withdraw, I will waive any further inquiry.

Col. Wilson C. Nicholas rose and addressed the court as follows: My being in this situation certainly was not a thing of choice. When I was summoned by the marshal, I urged him in the strongest manner to excuse me. I mentioned to him that it would be extremely inconvenient to me to attend the court, and that it would be very unpleasant to serve on the jury, on account of the various relations in which I had stood to Colonel Burr. I had been in congress at the time when the attempt was made to elect Colonel Burr president of the United States. My feelings and opinions on that occasion are well known. I had served three years in the senate while Colonel Burr was president of that body, and was one of those who, previous to the last election, had taken a very decided part in favor of the nomination of the present vice president, for the office at that time filled by Colonel Burr. Moreover, from the time that Colonel Burr first went to the Western country, my suspicions were very much excited a to his probable objects in that part of the United States; in consequence of which I gave early, and perhaps too great, credit to the charges which were brought against him. Such was my opinion of the importance of New Orleans, not only to the prosperity, but to the union of the states, that I felt uncommon anxiety at what I believed to be the state of our affairs in the West, and had expressed my impressions very freely in conversation, and in letters to my friends during the last winter. Under these circumstances, I doubted the propriety of my being put on the jury; but I felt no distrust of myself, as I was confident that I could discharge the duty under just impression of what I owe to my country, to the accused, and to my own character. The marshal assured me that he felt the strongest disposition to oblige me, but that he thought he could not do it consistently with his duty. He supposed there was scarcely a man to be found who had not formed and expressed opinions about Colonel Burr. That he, too, was in a situation of great delicacy and responsibility, and that without the utmost circumspection on his part, he would be exposed to censure. I renewed my application to the marshal several times, and always received the same answer. Thus situated, I determined to attend the court, both from a sense of duty and because I would not put it in the power of the malicious and those disposed to slander me to assign motives for absenting myself which had no kind of influence on me. Another reason for pursuing this course presented itself some time after I had formed this determination. I conceived that an attempt had been made to deter me from attending this court. I was informed by a friend in the city, that he had heard that one of the most severe pieces which had ever been seen was preparing for publication, if I did attend, and serve on the grand jury. From what quarter this attack was to come, I do not know. The only influence which that circumstance had was to confirm me in the determination I had made, as I was much more inclined to defy my enemies than to ask their mercy or forbearance. From the first I hesitated whether I ought not to make the same representation to the court that I had made to the marshal. As I was in doubt on the subject before I came from home, I committed to paper the substance of what I have now said, and consulted three gentlemen who were lawyers, men of honor, and my personal friends. Their advice to me was not to mention it, for they did not believe that the court would or ought to discharge me for the reasons I had mentioned. As I was in doubt myself I determined to follow their advice, and the more readily as they seemed confident that I would not be discharged, and I was not ambitious of acquiring in this way a reputation for scrupulous delicacy. I was perfectly willing that my reputation should rest on the general tenor of my life, and did not believe that my character required such a prop. At present I feel myself embarrassed how to act. I certainly was, and an, anxious not to serve on the jury, but am unwilling to withdraw, lest it should be thought that I shrink from the discharge of public duty of great responsibility, and am not willing to be driven from the discharge of that duty in a way which should lead to a belief that the objection to me is either acknowledged to be well founded or has been sustained by the court. Upon this subject, the example of Mr. Giles has great weight with me. That consideration, and a hope that my motives cannot now be misunderstood or misrepresented, will induce me to do as he has done.

Colonel Burr.--The circumstance mentioned by the gentleman, that an attempt has been made to intimidate him, must have been a contrivance of some of my enemies for the purpose of irritating him, and increasing the public prejudice against me, since it was calculated to throw a suspicion on my cause. Such an act was never sanctioned by me, nor by any of my friends. I view it with indignation, and disclaim any knowledge of the fact in question.

THE COURT established the following as being the proper questions to be put to jurors: First, have you made up your mind on the case, or on the guilt of Colonel Burr, from the statements you have seen in the papers or otherwise? and finally, have you formed and expressed (or delivered) and opinion on the guilt or innocence of Colonel Burr (or the accused?)

Mr. Joseph Eggleston asked to be excused from serving on the grand jury. He had, on reading the deposition of Gen. Eaton in the newspapers, expressed considerable warmth 59 and indignation on the subject likely to come before the grand jury, and on that account it might be both indelicate and improper for him to serve on that body. But after being examined by the CHIEF JUSTICE as to the nature of the opinions he had formed, Mr. Burr remarked, that the industry which had been used to prejudice the public mind against him left him very little chance of an impartial jury, and that on the subject of Major Eggleston's application to be excused he should remain perfectly passive. The court did not excuse him.

The panel was here called over, and fourteen only appeared. The marshal then summoned from the bystanders John Randolph, Jr., and William Foushee. The court appointed Mr. John Randolph foreman of the grand jury. Being called upon to take the foreman's oath, Mr. Randolph asked to be excused from serving, on the ground that he had formed an opinion concerning the nature and tendency of certain transactions imputed to Col. Burr.

Mr. Burr remarked that he was really afraid they should not be able to find any man without such prepossessions.

The CHIEF JUSTICE remarked that a man must not only have formed, but declared an opinion, to disqualify him. Mr. Randolph said he did not recollect of having declared one; and he was not excused.

Mr. John Randolph was then sworn as foreman; and the rest of the panel being called to the book, when the name of Dr. Foushee was called he stated that from reading the president's message, Gen. Eaton's deposition, and other publications, he had formed an opinion of Col. Burr's guilt. After some discussion, Dr. Foushee was permitted to withdraw, and Col. James Barbour was summoned in his place.

The grand jury were then sworn, as follows: John Randolph, Junior, Foreman, Joseph Eggleston, Joseph C. Cabell, Littleton W. Tazewell, Robert Taylor, James Pleasants, James M. Garnett, William Daniel, John Brockenbrough, John Mercer, Edward Pegram, Mumford Beverly, John Ambler, Thomas Harrison, Alexander Shephard, and James Barbour.

The CHIEF JUSTICE delivered an appropriate charge to the grand jury, in which he particularly dwelt upon the nature of treason, and the testimony requisite to prove it; after which the jury retired.

Mr. Burr then stated his desire that the court should instruct the grand jury on certain leading points, as to the admissibility of certain evidence which he supposed would be laid before the grand jury by the attorney for the United States.

Mr. Hay objected to the proposition as unprecedented. After some discussion, in which Messrs. Burr, Hay, Randolph, and Botts participated,

The CHIEF JUSTICE observed that he was not prepared at present to say whether the same evidence was necessary before the grand jury as before the petit jury; whether two witnesses to an overt act were required to satisfy a grand jury. This was a point he would have to consider. That he had not made up his mind on the evidence of facts said to be done in different districts; how far the one could be adduced as evidence in proof or confirmation of the others; but his present impression was, that facts done without the district may be brought in to prove the material fact said to be done within the district, when that fact was charged.

The question was postponed for further discussion, on Mr. Hay's pledging himself that no evidence should be laid before the grand jury without notice being first given to Mr. Burr and his counsel.

Saturday, May 23, 1807.

The counsel for Col. Burr observed that, if it met the approbation of the court, the discussion of the propriety of giving special instructions to the grand jury would take place on Monday next. This proposition was assented to, and it was understood that Mr. Burr's counsel were to give due notice of the propositions they intended to submit.

The grand jury appearing pursuant to adjournment, the CHIEF JUSTICE informed them that the absence of Gen. Wilkinson, a witness deemed important by the counsel for the United States, and the uncertainty of his arrival at any particular period, made it necessary that they should be adjourned.

After some conversation between the court and bar as to the propriety of adjourning the grand jury to some future day of the term, they were finally adjourned till the Monday following.

Monday, May 25, 1807.

The grand jury appeared in court, and on its being stated by their foreman that they had been two days confined to their chambers, and had no presentment to make, or bill before them, Mr. Hay observed that he had two bills prepared, but wished to postpone the delivering of them till the witnesses were present, and until it was ascertained that all the evidence relied upon by the counsel for the prosecution could be had. He thought it probable that in the course of a week he should hear of Gen. Wilkinson, who was still absent, and whose testimony was deemed very important. After some conversation as to the propriety of adjourning the grand jury to a distant day of the term,

Mr. Hay gave notice of his intention to submit a motion to commit Mr. Burr on a charge of high treason. On the previous examination, he said, there was no evidence of an overt act, and he was committed for a misdemeanor only. The evidence is different now.

Some remarks having been made as to the impropriety of discussing the subject in the presence of the grand jury, they were requested to withdraw.

The argument and opinion delivered on the *60 motion to commit will be found reported as Case No. 14,692b. The opinion was delivered on Tuesday, May 26, 1807. It closed with these words: 'If it is the choice of the prosecutor on the part of the United States to proceed with this motion, it is the opinion of the court that he may open his testimony.'

Mr. Hay then rose, and observed that he was struck with the observations of the court relative to 'publications,' and he would attempt, if possible, to make some arrangement with the counsel on the other side, to obviate that inconvenience; and he understood they were disposed to do the same.

The counsel on both sides then retired by permission of the court for this purpose. They returned in a short time, and Mr. Hay informed the court that the counsel for the United States and for Colonel Burr, not having yet been able to agree upon any arrangement which would attain his object, namely, that of having Colonel Burr recognized in a sum sufficiently large to insure his appearance to answer the charge of high treason against the United States, without incurring the inconvenience resulting from a public disclosure of the evidence at this early stage of the proceeding, wished to have further time for that desirable purpose. This was granted by the court, and it then adjourned till next day.

Wednesday, May 27, 1807.

Mr. Hay informed the court that all hopes of the arrangement which he had mentioned yesterday were at an end; for he had received a letter from Colonel Burr's counsel positively refusing to give additional bail. He therefore deemed it his duty to go on with the examination of the witnesses in support of his motion to commit Mr. Burr. He observed, that he regretted extremely that it became necessary in his judgment to pursue this course. He felt the full force of the objections to a disclosure of the evidence, and to the necessity of the court's declaring its opinion, before the case was laid before a jury; but those considerations must yield to a sense of what his engagements to the United States imperiously demanded of him; that in adducing the evidence, he should observe something like chronological order. He should first read the depositions of the witnesses who were absent, and afterwards bring forward those who were present, so as to disclose all the events, as they successively happened.

Mr. Wickham stated that there were two distinct charges against Colonel Burr. The first was for a misdemeanor, for which he had already entered into recognizance; the second was a charge of high treason against the United States, which was once proposed without success, and is now again repeated. On this charge the United States must substantiate two essential points: first, that there was an overt act committed; and secondly, that Colonel Burr was concerned in it. Everything that does not bear upon these points is of course inadmissible; the course therefore laid down by the attorney for the United States is obviously improper. He proposes to examine his witnesses in a kind of chronological order.

Colonel Burr required that the evidence should be taken in strict legal order. The court and even the opposite counsel will see the propriety of observing this order. If the attorney for the United States has affidavits to produce, let him first demonstrate that they have a right to produce them. We first call upon him to prove by strict legal evidence, that an overt act of treason has been committed. If he cannot establish that one point, all the evidence which he can produce is nugatory and unavailing.

Mr. Hay protested against the right of counsel for the accused to dicate to him the order of introducing his testimony. The two charges against Aaron Burr, he said, were naturally and intimately blended. They form distinct parts of one great design. What that great design was, in all its bearings and remifications, he was not absolutely certain; but had always conceived that before Mexico was invaded New Orleans was to be taken. How, then, was it possible to separate these two allegations? How could the prosecution separate, line by line, and word by word, the evidence produced to prove these two distinct allegations? It appeared to him as though the counsel for the defence were determined to stop him at the very threshold of everything which he attempted to do. How could he advance if every inch of ground was to be measured out to him with such strictness and objections? The proposition was wholly unprecedented, that the counsel before an examining court should be instructed how to bring out his evidence. He claimed the right to bring it forward in its chronological order.

After some remarks by Mr. Wickham and Mr. Burr.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said it would certainly be better, if the evidence was produced to prove the fact first, and that to show their coloring afterwards; for no evidence certainly has any bearing on the present case unless an overt act be proved. However, if the attorney for the United States thinks the chronological order the best, he may pursue his own course; but the court trusts to him, that he will produce nothing which does not bear upon the case.

After some further remarks by Mr. Hay and Mr. Randolph, Mr. Hay produced Gen. Wilkinson's affidavit.

Mr. Botts objected to the admissibility of the paper, on the ground that it was not competent evidence. He said on this question the supreme court were divided.

The CHIEF JUSTICE here interposed, and remarked that the supreme court were divided on the question of the competency of 61 the letter annexed to the affidavit, not as to the admissibility of the affidavit itself.

Mr. Botts proceeded to state his objections to the competency of the affidavit in this court in the present proceeding. First, he objected that an ex parte affidavit ought not to be received when the witness himself could be produced in court. General Wilkinson could and ought to have been here, and this being the case, his affidavit ought not to be received. But the proposition which he mainly pressed was, that no evidence of any nature whatever, ought to be taken until there is indubitable proof that there was war levied in this district, (Virginaia,) and until it is proved that an overt act was committed by Mr. Burr.

Mr. Hay, interrupting, observed that the gentleman was renewing a proposition which had been decided by the court.

Mr. Burr said he had understood the gentleman who spoke first apprized the court that the evidence should come forward subject to discussion, which would be made as the evidence went on. The gentleman was only going into the nature of the evidence presented.

Mr. Botts resumed. He quoted the constitutional definiton of treason, and asked if it meant that, if one-half of the crime of treason was to be found in this district, you might look for the other half elsewhere? If the affidavit imported anything, it was a declaration or confession; and no declaration or confession could constitute any ingredient of an overt act, unless that confession be made 'in open court.' He enforced his views at considerable length.

Messrs. Wickham and Randolph followed, in support of the motion to exclude the testimony at this stage of the proceeding.

The CHIEF JUSTICE stated that the supreme court had already decided, that the affidavit might be admitted under certain circumstances; but they had also determined that General Wilkinson's affidavit did not contain any proof of an overt act; that he was certainly extremely willing to permit the attorney for the United States to pursue his own course in the order of drawing out his evidence, under a full confidence that he would not waste the time of the court by producing any extraneous matters; but where was the necessity of producing General Wilkinson's affidavit first? If there was no other evidence to prove the overt act, General Wilkinson's affidavit goes for nothing, for so the supreme court have already decided; and by that decision he should consider himself bound, even if he had dissented from it. Why, then, introduce this affidavit?

After some further discussion by counsel, the CHIEF JUSTICE said that unless there was a fact to be proved, he was of opinion that no testimony ought to be produced. The question before the court was not whether there had been a treasonable intent, but an overt act. That fact must be proved before there can be any treason, or any commitment for treason.

Mr. Hay then called Peter Taylor, who was Mr. Blennerhassett's gardener, and Jacob Allbright, a laborer, who had worked on his island, who gave their testimony. [This testimony is more fully detailed hereafter, and, in consequence, is omitted here.]

After these witnesses were examined, the affidavit of Jacob Dunbaugh was offered. The argument on the motion to exclude it, which took up the balance of the day, and the opinion of the court excluding the affidavit, delivered the following day, are reported as Case No. 14,692c.

Mr. Hay observed that as the examination of Colonel Burr for treason had already taken up much time without any progress in the business, and, from the disposition manifested by his counsel, it might last not only ten days, but even ten years longer, he considered it his duty, from information which he had received that morning, to suggest to the court the propriety of binding Colonel Burr in a further recognizance from day to day till the examination could be ended. He stated, on the authority of a letter just come to hand from the secretary at war, that General Wilkinson, with several other witnesses, might be expected here between the 28th and 30th of this month. This circumstance, said he, renders it essential that he should be considered in custody until he gives security that his person shall be forthcoming to answer the charge of treason against the United States. The gentlemen who appear as counsel for Colonel Burr may be, and no doubt are sincere, in the opinion they have expressed, that he will not shrink from the charges exhibited against him, and will not, in any conjuncture of circumstances which may occur, fly from a trial; but those gentlemen must pardon me for saying that I entertain a very different opinion. I must believe that his regard for the safety of his own life, would, if he perceived it in danger, prevail over his regard for the interest of his securities. I give notice, therefore, that I consider him as being already in custody to answer the motion I have made for his commitment, and that he cannot be permitted to go at large without giving security for his appearance from day to day. His situation now is the same as that when he was first apprehended and brought before a single judge for the purpose of examination. Your honor at that time considered him as in custody, and bound him over from day to day; and I only contend that the same course should be pursued at this time.

Mr. Wickham.--The gentleman thinks he has obtained the effect of his motion merely by having made it. I cannot perceive the propriety of a motion to compel Colonel Burr to give bail in any sum before the probable cause to believe him guilty of treason has 62 been shown. When he was brought before your honor for examination, you conceived the sum of $5,000 sufficient security for his daily appearance. But a recognizance has already been given in double that sum, binding him not to depart without the leave of this court. Yet now, although no probable proof of treason has been exhibited, Mr. Hay requires the court to demand of Colonel Burr additional security! I trust that such a motion will not prevail.

Mr. Martin.--It has already been decided by the supreme court of the United States, that not a single expression in Wilkinson's affidavit amounts to any proof of the charge of treason. The motion of the gentleman amounts to this: 'We have no evidence of treason, and are not ready to go to trial for the purpose of proving it; we therefore move the court to increase the bail.'

Mr. Randolph.--The first motion of the counsel for the United States was to commit Colonel Burr on the ground of probable cause only. This goes a step farther, and wishes the same thing to be done on the ground of a probable cause of a probable cause; but we trust that we shall not be deprived of our liberty or held to bail on a mere uncertain expectation of evidence.

Some further remarks were made by Mr. MacRae, Mr. Wirt, Mr. Botts, and Mr. Hay.

The CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the opinion of the court, the substance of which was as follows: It is certainly necessary that a person accused should be retained in custody, or required to give security for his appearance while his examination is depending. The amount of the security to be required must depend, however, upon the weight of the testimony against him. On a former occasion, Colonel Burr was held to bail for his daily appearance in the sum of five thousand dollars only, because there was no evidence before the judge to prove the probability of his having been guilty of treason. When the examination was completed, the sum of ten thousand dollars was considered sufficient to bind him to answer the charge of a misdemeanor only, because the constitution requires that excessive bail should not be taken; but that recognizance had no application to the charge of treason. Yet, whether additional security ought to be required in the present stage of this business, before any evidence has appeared to make the charge of treason probable, is a question of some difficulty. It would seem that evidence sufficient to furnish probable cause must first be examined before the accused can be deprived of his liberty or any security can be required of him. Yet, before this could be done, he might escape and defeat the very end of the examination. In common cases, where a person charged with a crime is arrested and brought before a magistrate, the arrest itself is preceded by an affidavit, which furnishes grounds of probable cause. The prisoner therefore is continued in custody, or bailed until the examination is finished: but here there has been no arrest for treason, and Colonel Burr is not in custody for that offence. The evidence then must be heard, to determine whether he ought to be taken into custody; but as the present public and solemn examination is very different from that before a single magistrate; as very improper effects on the public mind may be produced by it, I wish that the court could be relieved from the embarrassing situation in which it is placed, and exempted from the necessity of giving any opinion upon the case, previously to its being acted upon by the grand jury. It is the wish of the court, that the personal appearance of Colonel Burr could be secured without the necessity of proceeding in this inquiry.

Colonel Burr rose and observed, that he denied the right of the court to hold him to bail in this stage of the proceedings; that the constitution of the United States was against it--declaring that no person shall be arrested without probable cause made out by oath or affirmation. But if the court were embarrassed, he would relieve them by consenting to give bail; provided it should be understood that no opinion on the question even of probable cause was pronounced by the court by the circumstance of his giving bail.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said, that such was the meaning of the court.

Mr. Martin said, for his part, he should prefer that all the evidence should be fully gone into. Instead of fearing that public prejudice would thereby be excited against Colonel Burr, he believed it would remove all the prejudices of that sort which now prevailed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.--As a bill would probably be sent up to the grand jury, the court wishes to declare no opinion either way.

Some conversation then occurred relative to the quantum of bail; and Colonel Burr mentioned, that he would propose that the sum should be ten thousand dollars, if he should be able to find security to that amount, of which he expressed himself to be doubtful. Mr. Hay contended that fifty thousand dollars would not be too much. But the court finally accepted of the offer, made by Colonel Burr, who, after a short interval, entered into a recognizance with four sureties, to wit: Messrs. Wm. Langburn, Thomas Taylor, John G. Gamble, and Luther Martin; himself in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and each surety in the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, conditioned, that he would not depart without leave of the court.

Mr. Martin, when offered as surety for Colonel Burr, said, that he had lands in the district of Virginia, the value of which was more than double the sum; and that he was happy to have this opportunity to give a public proof of his confidence in the honor of Colonel Burr, and of his conviction that he *63 was innocent. All further proceedings in the case were thereupon postponed until the next day.

On Friday, the 29th of May, and on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, the 1st, 2d, and 3d of June, the court met and adjourned without taking up the case, on account of the non-arrival of General Wilkinson. On the last dmentioned day the district attorney stated that he did not think it probable that General Wilkinson would arrive for ten or twelve days, and suggested an adjournment of the grand jury for that length of time. Finally, they were adjourned to Tuesday, the 9th of June.

Tuesday, June 9, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment, and all the grand jorors appeared. General Wilkinson not having yet arrived, after some conversation between the court and bar as to the probable time of his arrival, the grand jury were further adjourned to Thursday following.

Immediately upon the adjournment of the grand jury a question arose as to the production of certain papers by the government, and was followed by a motion for a subpoena duces tecum directed to the president of the United States, which will be found reported as Case No. 14,692d. The argument consumed several days, and an opinion was delivered Saturday, June 13, 1807. After which

Mr. Burr called up the motion for a supplemental charge to the grand jury, in support of which he had, on yesterday, submitted a series of propositions, with citations of authorities.

The CHIEF JUSTICE stated that he had drawn up a supplemental charge, which he had submitted to the attorney for the United States, with a request that it should also be put into the hands of Colonel Burr's counsel; that Mr. Hay had, however, informed him that he had been too much occupied to inspect the charge with attention, and deliver it to the opposite counsel; but another reason was, that there was one point in the charge which he did not fully approve. He should not, therefore, deliver his charge at present, but should reserve it until Monday. In the meantime, Colonel Burr's counsel could have an opportunity of inspecting it, and an argument might be held on the points which had produced an objection from the attorney for the United States.

(After some conversation between the court and bar, as to whether the arguments on the supplemental charge should be submitted in writing or orally, the subject was passed over, and it appears never to have been again called up.)

At the instance of the district attorney, four witnesses, viz. Thomas Truxton, William Eaton, Benjamin Stoddert, and Stephen Decatur, were sworn to testify before the grand jury. The clerk then proceeded to call four other witnesses to the book, but when Erick Bollman appeared, Mr. Hay addressed the court to the following effect: Before Mr. Bollman is sworn I must inform the court of a particular, and not an immaterial circumstance. He, sir, has made a full communication to the government of the plans, the designs, and views of Aaron Burr. As these communications might criminate Dr. Bollman before the grand jury, the president of the United States has communicated to me this pardon (holding it in his hands) which I have already offered to Dr. Bollman. He received it in a very hesitating manner, and I think informed me that he knew not whether he should or should not accept it. He took it from me, however, as he informed me, to take the advice of counsel. He returned it in the same hesitating manner; he would neither positively accept nor refuse it. My own opinion is that Dr. Bollman, under these circumstances, cannot possibly criminate himself. This pardon will completely exonerate him from all the penalties of the law. I believe his evidence to be extremely material. In the presence of this court I offer this pardon to him, and if he refuses, I shall deposit it with the clerk for his use. Will you (addressing himself to Dr. Bollman) accept this pardon?

Dr. Bollman.--No, I will not, sir.
Mr. Hay then observed that Dr. Bollman must be carried up to the grand jury with an intimation that he had been pardoned.
Mr. Martin.--It has always been Dr. Bollman's intention to refuse this pardon; but he has not positively refused it before, because he wished to have this opportunity of publicly rejecting it.
Several other witnesses were sworn.
Mr. Martin did not suppose that the pardon was real or effectual; if he made any confessions before the grand jury, they might find an indictment against him, which would be valid, notwithstanding the pardon; that the pardon could not be effectual before it was pleaded to an indictment in open court.
Mr. Hay inquired whether Dr. Bollman might not go to the grand jury.
The CHIEF JUSTICE suggested that it would be better to settle the question about the validity of the pardon before he was sent to the grand jury.
Mr. Hay.--I am anxious to introduce the evidence before the grand jury in a chronological order, and the suspension of Dr. Bollman's testimony will make a chasm in my arrangement. He added that, however, it was not very important whether he was sent now or some time hence to the grand jury.
Mr. Martin.--Dr. Bollman is not pardoned, and no man is bound to criminate himself.
The CHIEF JUSTICE required his authorities.
Mr. Martin.--I am prepared to show that a party even possessed of a pardon is still indictable by the grand jury, unless he has pleaded it in court.
The other witnesses were sent to the grand jury, and Dr. Bollman was suspended. Four other witnesses were then sworn. 64
Mr. Hay.--I again propose to send Dr. Bollman to the grand jury.
At this time the marshal entered, and Mr. Hay informed the court that the grand jury had sent for the article of the constitution and the laws of congress relating to treason, and the law relating to the misdemeanor.
Jacob Dunbaugh was sworn and sent to the grand jury.
Some desultory conversation here ensued between the bar and the court respecting Dr. Bollman, when Mr. Hay addressed the opposite counsel: Are you then willing to have Dr. Bollman indicted? Take care in what an awful condition you are placing this gentleman.
Mr. Martin.--Doctor Bollman, sir, has lived too long to be alarmed by such menaces. He is a man of too much honor to trust his reputation to the course which you prescribe for him.
The CHIEF JUSTICE.--There can be no question but Dr. Bollman can go up to the jury; but the question is, whether he is pardoned or not? If the executive should refuse to pardon him, he is certainly not pardoned.
Mr. Martin.--But there can be no doubt, if he chooses to decline his pardon, that he stands in the same situation with every other witness, who cannot be forced to criminate himself.
Some desultory conversation here ensued, when Mr. Hay observed that he should extremely regret the loss of Dr. Bollman's testimony. He believed it to be material. He trusted that he should obtain it, however reluctantly given. The court would perceive, that Dr. Bollman now possessed so much zeal as even to encounter the risk of an indictment for treason. Whether he should appear before the grand jury under the circumstances of a pardon being annexed to his name, might hereafter become the object of a distinct inquiry. In the meantime he might go up without any such notification. The counsel of Mr. Burr acquiesced.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.--Whether he be really pardoned or not, I cannot at present declare. I must take time to deliberate.

Mr. Hay.--Categorically then I ask you, Mr. Bollman, do you accept your pardon?

Mr. Bollman.--I have already answered that question several times. I say no. I repeat, that I would have refused it before, but that I wished this opportunity of publicly declaring it.

Mr. Hay.--If the grand jury have any doubts about the questions that they put to Dr. Bollman, they can apply to the court for instructions. I assert, sir, that Mr. Bollman is a pardoned man. I wish the opposite counsel to prove that he is not. I therefore move, sir, that he be sent up to the grand jury, certified by you, that he is pardoned. I make this motion that gentlemen who wish to discuss the question may have an opportunity of adducing their arguments.

Mr. Williams appeared as counsel for Dr. Bollman, and addressed the court in his behalf, insisting he was not bound to criminate or calumniate himself, although pardoned. He claimed, however, that the pardon having been refused, the court could take no notice of it. He also insisted that no pardon except by statute could protect a party against a criminal prosecution, as a pardon under the great seal was not effectual until it had been pleaded and allowed in court. He cited numerous authorities in support of his positions.

Mr. Martin supported the same positions. He said, another reason why Dr. Bollman had refused the pardon was, that it would be considered an admission of guilt. He did not consider a pardon necessary for an innocent man. Dr. Bollman, sir, knows what he has to fear from the prosecution of an angry government, but he will brave it all. The man who did so much to rescue the Marquis La Fayette from his imprisonment, and who has been known at so many courts, bears too great a regard for his reputation, to wish to have it sounded throughout Europe that he was compelled to abandon his honor through a fear of unjust prosecution.

After some remarks by Messrs. MacRae and Hay, Dr. Bollman was sent up to the grand jury without any particular notification; the questions as to the effect of the pardon tendered to him, and how far he could be compelled to testify, being reserved for future discussion and decision.

Mr. Hay requested leave to inform the grand jury that fatigue alone had prevented General Wilkinson from attending them on that day, but that he should appear before them on Monday. The court then adjourned to Monday.

Monday, June 15, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment.

Gen. Wilkinson was sworn and sent to the grand jury, with a notification that it would facilitate their inquiries if they would examine him immediately.

Mr. Wickham reminded the court that the attorney for the United States had pledged himself to send up no papers to the grand jury which had not previously passed the inspection of the court; but it had since occurred to Col. Burr's counsel that the witnesses themselves might carry up improper papers. He submitted to the court whether they ought not to instruct the grand jury to receive no papers, except through the medium of the court.

Upon this motion a running debate of considerable length ensued.

Finally, the CHIEF JUSTICE remarked that he was not satisfied that a court ought to inspect the papers which form a part of a witness's testimony before he is sent to the grand jury. He had reduced to writing an opinion to be sent to the grand jury. It instructed them not to inspect any papers, but such as formed a part of the narrative of the witness, and proved to be the papers of the person against whom an indictment was exhibited.

At the instance of Mr. Hay, the instruction 65 was so amended as to submit such papers as tend to justify the witness, but not to bear upon the accused.

Mr. Hay informed the court that the grand jury had sent for Dr. Bollman; that they wanted him to decipher, if he could, a ciphered letter annexed to Mr. Willie's affidavit, and which he held in his hand; that Mr. Willie, the reputed secretary of Mr. Burr, would prove the identity of the paper, and Dr. Bollman, it was expected, would interpret it.

At the suggestion of Mr. Martin, the affidavit was severed from the letter.

Mr. Willie appearing in court, Mr. Hay produced the ciphered letter annexed to his affidavit, and said: This is the letter which I wish to transmit to the grand jury. It is addressed, I understand, to Dr. Bollman, under a fictitious name, and is all in the handwriting of Mr. Willie.

Mr. Botts objected to its being sent up to the grand jury until both its materiality and its authenticity had been proved.

Mr. Hay said that was a hard proposition, as it was written partly in ciphers and partly in German. He deemed it material, because he understood it was either dictated by the accused, or first written by him and afterwards written by his secretary, and at his request. It was addressed to Henry Wilbourn, alias Erick Bollman. He wished it to be sent up while Dr. Bollman was before the grand jury.

After considerable sparring between counsel, Mr. Willie was called to the stand.

The argument of the question of the right to compel Willie to testify took up the balance of the day, and will be found reported in Case No. 14,692e.

Tuesday, June 16, 1807.

As soon as the court met, Mr. Hay produced and read the following letter from the president of the United States, in answer to his letter on the subject of the subpoena duces tecum, observing, at the same time, that he read it to show the disposition of the government not to withhold any necessary papers, and that if gentlemen would specify what orders they wanted, they would be furnished without the necessity of expresses:

'Washington, June 12, 1807.

'Sir: Your letter of the 9th is this moment received. Reserving the necessary right of the president of the United States to decide, independently of all other authority, what papers coming to him as president the public interest permits to be communicated, and to whom, I assure you of my readiness under that restriction, voluntarily to furnish on all occasions whatever the purposes of justice may require. But the letter of General Wilkinson, of October 21st, requested for the defence of Colonel Burr, with every other paper relating to the charges against him, which were in my possession when the attorney general went on to Richmond in March. I then delivered to him; and I have always taken for granted he left the whole with you. If he did, and the bundle retains the order in which I had arranged it, you will readily find the letter desired under the date of its receipt, which was November 25th; but lest the attorney general should not have left those papers with you, I this day write to him to forward this one by post. An uncertainty whether he be at Philadelphia, Wilmington, or New Castle, may produce delay in his receiving my letter, of which it is proper you should be apprised. But as I do not recollect ehe whole contents of that letter, I must beg leave to devolve on you the exercise of that discretion which it would be my right and duty to exercise, by withholding the communication of any parts of the letter which are not directly material for the purposes of justice. With this application, which is specific, a prompt compliance is practicable; but when the request goes to copies of the orders issued in relation to Colonel Burr to the officers at Orleans and Natchez, and by the secretaries of the war and navy departments, it seems to cover a correspondence of many months, with such a variety of officers civil and military, all over the United States, as would amount to the laying open of the whole executive books. I have desired the secretary of war to examine his official communications, and on a view of these we may be able to judge what can and ought to be done towards a compliance with the request. If the defendant allege that there was any particular order which, as a cause, produced any particular act on his part, then he must know what this order was, can specify it, and a prompt answer can be given. If the object had been specified, we might then have had some guide for our conjectures, as to what part of the executive records might be useful to him. But with a perfect willingness to do what is right, we are without the indications which may enable us to do it. If the researches of the secretary at war should produce anything proper for communication, and pertinent to any point we can conceive in the defence before the court, it shall be forwarded to you. I salute you with esteem and respect

'Thomas Jefferson.

'George Hay, Esq.'

Some conversation ensued about the specification of the papers wanted from the executive.

Mr. Hay stated that in his communication to the president, to which this letter was a reply, he had mentioned these papers in the terms by which he thought the opposite counsel would probably have described them. The president, however did not deem this description sufficient.

Colonel Burr's counsel then stated that they had sent an express to Washington for these papers, with a subpoena to the president, and that it would appear on the return whether they could obtain them or not.

Here a desultory conversation ensued, in 66 which Mr. Hay insisted that Dr. Bollman was a pardoned man, and ought to communicate all he knew to the grand jury, which was denied by the other side; when Dr. Bollman, addressing himself to the court, said: I have answered every question that was put to me by the grand jury.

The CHIEF JUSTICE inquired if there was any objection to asking Dr. Bollman if he could decipher the letter.

Mr, Martin said it would be time enough to discuss that question after the letter shall have been before the grand jury.

Mr. MacRae.--I wish the question now put. I asked Willie whether he understood that part of the letter which is in cipher; he could not be criminal if he did not understand it. I wish the part which is written in German now to be explained, to show that there is nothing criminal in it. I wish Bollman to translate that part.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said he would prefer to proceed with the other point; how far a witness may refuse to answer a question which he thinks would criminate himself.

Mr. Botts then addressed the codurt at some length on that point. In the course of his remarks he intimated that the letter in question had been obtained by the robbery of the post office, and referred to the mark '25' on its back, (which he said was the only post mark of many of the country post offices,) as evidence that it has been taken from the post office.

Mr. Williams, counsel for Mr. Willie, followed Mr. Botts in support of the position that the witness was not bound to answer any question, the answer to which he believed would tend to criminate himself.

Messrs. MacRae and Hay replied at some length, after which the court adjourned.

Wednesday, June 17, 1807.

At the meeting of the court Mr. Hay referred to the insinuations that had been thrown out yesterday, that the ciphered letter in question had been taken improperly if not feloniously from the post office; and said this was evidently done to affect the character of Gen. Wilkinson. He read a note which he had just received from Gen. Wilkinson, stating that the letter was delivered to him by Charles Patton, of the house of 'Meeker, Williamson & Patton,' New Orleans.

Mr. Martin then addressed the court on the question of the right of Mr. Willie to decline answering the questions prolpounded to him by the counsel for the prosecution. He contended that 'a witness is not compelled to answer when it tends to criminate him, nor where it does not relate to the issue,' and cited authorities in aupport of the proposition.

Mr. Wickham followed in an argument on the same side.

After some further desultory conversation, the CHIEF JUSTICE asked whether there were any other questions before the court.

Mr. MacRae requested a decision on Dr. Bollman's case, as he wished to interrogate him about the ciphered letter.

Mr. Williams said he was ready to discuss the question.

Mr. Burr.--There will arise some very important questions, affecting the very source of the jurisdiction of this country. I have several affidavits to produce to show that improper means have been used to procure witnesses, and thereby contaminate the public justice. When these proofs have been duly exhibited, it will be the province of the court to decide whether they will not arrest the progress of such improper conduct, and prevent the introduction of such evidence.

Mr. Botts rose to apprise the oppositite counsel that there were three or four questions of importance which the counsel for Mr. Burr should bring forward as soon as possible. Two or three days ago he had commented on the plunder of the post office, and he assured the counsel for the prosecution that he should probe that subject to the bottom, as no man could be more anxious than himself that the stigma which this transaction attaches to the inferior or superior officers of the government should be wiped off.

CHIEF JUSTICE.--Unless these allegations affected some testimony that was about to be delivered, how can you introduce this subject?

Mr. Burr.--The court has very properly demanded some proof of the relevancy of our proposition. Sir, we are ready to prove the violation of the post office. We are ready to fasten it on individuals now here, and we are ready to name the post offices if the court require it, which have been thus plundered. When it comes out that evidence has been thus improperly obtaidned, we shall say, sir, that it is contaminated by fraud. I will name three persons who have been guilty of improper conduct, in improperly obtaining letters from the post office to be evidence against me. These are Judge Toulmin, of the Mississippi territory, John G. Jackson, a member of congress, and General Wilkinson. Two of these persons are within the reach of this court. As well as the improper manner in which they have procured affidavits and witnesses against me, I mention these circumstances for two reasons: first, that the facts may be proved to the satisfaction of the court; and second, that the court may lay their hands on testimony thus procured.

Mr. Botts.--The circumstance of the post mark proves that the post office was robbed of that letter; therefore it is not evidence.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said, let the consequences be as they may, this court cannot take cognizance of any act which has not been committed within this district. That mark is not necessarily a post mark. The court can only know the fact, in a case to which it applies, except to commit and send for trial.

Mr. Hay.--Let some specific motion be 67 made, and the evidence procured; and if there have been any crime committed, let the offenders be prosecuted according to law. These gentlemen know the course, and I most solemnly promise to discharge the duties of my office, whether they bear against General Wilkinson, or the man at the bar. If the crime have been committed, it is not the province of the court to notice it till after an indictment has been found.

Mr. Botts.--We only wish to prove and prevent a repetition any continuance of this improper mode of proceeding. The proof will affect General Wilkinson.

CHIEF JUSTICE.--If it did affect General Wilkinson it could not prevent him from being a witness.

Some desultory conversation here ensued, when Mr. Burr observed that he was afraid he was not sufficiently understood, from mingling two distinct propositions together. As to the subject of the post offices, it might rest for the present; but as to the improper means employed in obtaining testimony, they were at this moment in actual operation.

Some witnesses had been brought here by this practice, and it was one which ought immediately to be checked; he did not particularly level his observations against General Wilkinson. He did not say that the attorney for the United States ought to indict, or that such a crime, if committed out of this district, was cognizable by the court, unless it be going on while the court is in session, or the cause depending; in those cases improper practices relative to crimes committed out of the limits of this court may be examined, and the persons committing them attached. Such practices have been since I have been recognized here, and they ought to be punished by attachment.

Mr. Wirt.--I do not yet understand the gentlemen. What is the object of their motion? Mr. Botts.--We shall hereafter make it; we have no other object by the present annunciation than to give gentlemen a timely notice of our intentions.

Mr. Burr.--We have sufficient evidence on which to found our motion.

What motion? demanded Mr. Hay.

Mr. Burr.--I thought, sir, I had sufficiently explained my intentions. I may either move for a rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue against Judge Toulmin, John G. Jackson, and General Wilkinson, or what is sometimes, though not so frequently practiced, I may directly move for an attachment itself.

Mr. MacRae.--At whose instance?

Mr. Burr.--At the public's.

Mr. MacRae.--A pretty proceeding, indeed! that the public prosecution should thus be taken out of the hands of the public prosecutor, and that the accused should supersede the attorney for the United States!

Mr. Burr.--A strange remark indeed! As if it were not the business of the injured person himself to institute the complaint.

Mr. Hay.--I wish for further explanation. Let the specific charge on which their motion is founded be clearly pointed out and reduced to writing.

Mr. Burr.--The motion will be for an attachment for the irregular examination of witnesses, practicing on their fears, forcing them to come to this place, and transporting them from New Orleans to Norfolk.

At this moment Mr. Randolph entered the court, and observed that if he had been present he would have himself opened this motion, which was intended to operate immediately upon General Wilkinson, and ultimately upon some other persons. Mr. Randolph here read the motion which he would have submitted to the court.

Mr. Hay protested against this proceeding, which, he said, was calculated to interrupt the course of the prosecution, and was levelled at General Wilkinson alone.

After some further remarks from Mr. Hay and from Messrs. Randolph and Martin--Mr. Hay said he should move to postpone the motion of the gentlemen till the prosecution was over, because it would necessarily interrupt the business before the court, because it was intended to impeach the credit of a witness, and because this inquiry could as well be conducted after as before the prosecution.

Mr. Wickham replied to Mr. Hay. He said, among other things, that General Wilkinson had brought witnesses with him from New Orleans by military force. He had taken their depositions entirely ex parte at the point of the bayonet, for the purpose of keeping their testimony straight. He would lay down the broad proposition that the man who goes about collecting affidavits upon affidavits in relation to a matter to be investigated in this court corrupts the fountains of justice. We have already seen a volume of such at this bar. He particularly referred to Mr. Jackson, who comes here with the depositions of witnesses who are thus bound hand and foot, thus tongue-tied, because their depositions had been taken. He had seen them in this very court examining witnesses with affidavits in their hands, and comparing the one with the other; depositions taken not by commissions, but ex parte. When an interested agent thus goes about collecting depostitions, and with ignorant men shaping them just as he pleases, he acts contrary to law and to the spirit and genius of our government; and such acts are a contempt of this court, if done during the prosecution, by interfering with the purposes of justice. Such men are liable to attachment from the very moment that the government took possession of Colonel Burr's person; not from the moment of first arrest, but from the time when they ordered Perkins to conduct his prisoner from Fredericksburg to Richmond. It was necessary to institute this proceeding now to prevent the repetition of such practices during the progress of the trial. At the conclusion of Mr. Wickham's remarks.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said that the pendency *68 of the prosecution was no objection to hearing the motion, but it was another question whether there were any grounds for it or not, and that the court would not say that a motion relating to the justice of the case ought not to be heard.

The court then adjourned.

Thursday, June 18, 1807. As soon as the court met, the CHIEF JUSTICE delivered an opinion in the case of Willie. This will be found reported as Case No. 14,692e. After the delivery af such opinion

Mr. Williams (counsel for Mr. Willie) stated that he had misunderstood him the other day in court, and in a subsequent conversation had obtained more accurate information. He does understand a part of that letter.

Mr. Hay requested that Mr. Willie should be called into court. When he appeared Mr. Hay interrogated him. Do you understand the contents of that letter? Answer. No. Mr. Willie afterwards said that he understood the part of the letter which is written in Dutch.

Mr. Hay.--Was this letter written by the hand or the direction of Aaron Burr?

Mr. Wickham objected to the question.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.--The witness and his counsel will consult.

Mr. Hay repeated the question. Mr. Willie. Yes. Mr. Hay. Which? by his hand or his direction? Mr. Willie. By his direction. It was copied from a paper written by himself.

Mr. Hay.--I wish this paper to be carried to the grand jury. I presume there can be no objection.

Mr. Botts.--No objection! We call upon you to show the materiality of that letter.

Mr. Hay.--I deny the necessity of any such thing. Until this letter be deciphered it will be perfectly unintelligible to me and to the grand jury. It is no more than a blank piece of paper.

Mr. Wickham.--I had always understood before that the testimony which is laid before a grand jury must not only be legal in itself, but proved to be material.

Mr. Williams begged leave to interrupt the gentleman. Mr. Willie is anxious to be particularly understood. He says that this ciphered letter was first written by Colonel Burr, and afterwards copied. But it is the cipher only which has been copied from Colonel Burr's original.

Mr. Hay.--It is quite sufficient, sir. If Colonel Burr wrote the ciphered part, he will be considered the author of the whole.

Mr. Wickham.--The gentleman has stated a curious proposition indeed! I had always understood before that the whole included the part; but it seems now that the part is to comprehend the whole.

After some further discussion, in which several of the counsel participated,

The CHIEF JUSTICE said he had in some measure anticipated this question, and had reflected upon it; his opinion was, that a paper to go before the grand or petit jury must be relevant to the case, even if its materiality were not proved. Why send this paper before the grand jury, if it cannot be deciphered? If it can be deciphered before the grand jury, why not before the court? Let it, then, be deciphered, and its relevancy may at once be established.

Mr. Hay then requested Dr. Bollman to be called, that he might be interrogated as to its contents; but before he appeared, Mr. John Randolph entered at the head of the grand jury, and addressed the court as follows: May it please the court: One of the witnesses under examination before the grand jury has answered certain questions touching a letter in ciphers. The grand jury understand that this letter is in the possession of the court, or of the counsel for the prosecution. They have thought proper to appear before you, to know whether the letter referred to by the witness be in the possession of the court?

The CHIEF JUSTICE then remarked that as the letter was wanted by the grand jury, a witness having referred to it, that was sufficient to establish its relevancy, and directed it to be delivered to them.

Mr. MacRae hoped that before the grand jury retired they would be informed that a witness had proved that this letter was originally written by Aaron Burr.

Mr. Wickham hoped that they would also be informed that the superscription on that letter has not been proved to have been written by Colonel Burr. The witness did not and would not say that he knew the superscription to have been written by him. The grand jury retired and the court adjourned.

Friday, June 19, 1807.

As soon as the court met, Mr. Burr addressed them. He stated that the express that he had sent on to Washington with the subpoena duces tecum had returned to this city on Wednesday last, but had received no other than a verbal reply from the president of the United States that the papers wanted would not be sent by him, from which I have inferred, said Mr. Burr, that he intends to send them in some other way. I did not mention this circumstance yesterday to the court, under an expectation that the last night's mail might give us further intelligence on the busject. I now rise to give notice that unless I receive a satisfactory intimation on this subject before the meeting of the court, I shall to-morrow move the court to enforce its process.

Motion was then made for an attachment against General Wilkinson 'for a contempt in obstructing the administration of the justice of this court,' the argument on which occupied the balance of the day. Case No. 14,692f.

Saturday, June 20, 1807.

The court met according to adjournment. Present, the same judges as yesterday. 69

Mr. Randolph rose to proceed with his motion, when he was interrupted by Mr. Hay, who spoke to this effect:

I have a communication to make to the court, and to the counsel of the accused. The court will recollect the answer which I received from the president, to my letter respecting certain papers. He stated in that letter that General Wilkinson's letter of the 21st October had been delivered to Mr. Rodney, the attorney general, from whom he would endeavor to obtain it. By the last mail I have received this letter from the president on the same subject.

'Washington, June 17, 1807.

'Sir: In answering your letter of 9th, which desired a communication of one to me from General Wilkinson, specified by its date, I informed you in mine of the 12th that I had delivered it, with all other papers respecting the charges against Aaron Burr, to the attorney general when he went to Richmond; that I had supposed he had left them in your possession, but would immediately write to him, if he had not, to forward that particular letter without delay. I wrote to him accordingly on the same day, but having no answer I know not whether he has forwarded the letter. I stated in the same letter that I had desired the secretary of war to examine his office in order to comply with your further request to furnish copies of the orders which had been given respecting Aaron Burr and his property; and, in a subsequent letter of the same day, I forwarded you copies of two letters from the secretary at war, which appeared to be within the description expressed in your letter. The order from the secretary of the navy you said you were in possession of. The recdipt of these papers has, I presume, so far anticipated, and others this day forwarded, will have substantially fulfilled the object of a subpoena from the district court of Richmond, requiring that those officers and myself should attend the court in Richmond, with the letter of General Wilkinson, the answer to that letter, and the orders of the department of war and the navy therein generally described. No answer to General Wilkinson's letter, other than a mere acknowledgment of its receipt in a letter written for a different purpose, was ever written by myself or any other. To these communications of papers I will add, that if the defendant suppose there are any facts within the knowledge of the heads of departments or of myself, which can be useful for his defence, from a desire of doing anything our situation will permit in furtherance of justice, we shall be ready to give him the benefit of it, by way of deposition through any persons whom the court shall authorize to take our testimony at this place. I know indeed that this cannot be done but by consent of parties, and I therefore authorize you to give consent on the part of the United States. Mr. Burr's consent will be given of course, if he suppose the testimony useful.

'As to our personal attendance at Richmond, I am persuaded the court is sensible that paramount duties to the nation at large control the obligation of compliance with its summons in this case, as it would should we receive a similar one to attend the trials of Blennerhassett and others in the Mississippi territory, those instituted at St. Louis and other places on the western waters, or at any place other than the seat of government. To comply with such calls would leave the nation without an executive branch, whose agency nevertheless is understood to be so constantly necessary that it is the sole branch which the constitution requires to be always in function. It could not, then, intend that it should be withdrawn from its station by any co-ordinate authority.

'With respect to papers, there is certainly a public and private side to our offices. To the former belong grants of land, patents for inventions, certain commissions, proclamations, and other papers patent in their nature. To the other belong mere executive proceedings. All nations have found it necessary that, for the advantageous conduct of their affairs, some of these proceedings, at least, should remain known to their executive functionary only. He, of course, from the nature of the case, must be the sole judge of which of them the public interest will permit publication. Hence, under our constitution, in requests of papers from the legislative to the executive branch, an exception is carefully expressed, 'as to those which he may deem the public welfare may require not to be disclosed,' as you will see in the inclosed resolution of the house of representatives, which produced the message of January 22d, respecting this case. The respect mutually due between the constituted authorities in their official intercourse, as well as sincere dispositions to do for every one what is just, will always insure from the executive, in exercising the duty of discrimination confided to him, the same candor and integrity to which the nation has, in like manner, trustee in the disposal of its judiciary authorities. Considering you as the organ for communicating these sentiments to the court, I address them to you for that purpose, and salute you with esteem and respect.

Thos. Jefferson.'

Accompanying this letter is a copy of the resolution of the house of representatives containing the exception to which the president refers. I have also received a letter from Mr. Smith, the secretary of the navy, containing an authentic copy of the order which was wanted, precisely corresponding with the unauthenticated copy in my possession.

Mr. Wickham.--I presume that these must be considered and noted as the return to the 'subpoena duces tecum.'

Mr. Hay.--So far as they go. When we receive General Wilkinson's, the return will be complete. I have also received a letter 70 from the secretary of war, which contains all the orders of his department relative to Aaron Burr. All which papers I shall deposit with the clerk of this court.

The following is the order of the navy department:

'I certify that the annexed is a true copy from the records in the office of the department of the navy of the United States of of the navy of the United States of the letter from the secretary of the navy to Captain John Shaw, dated 20th December, 1806. In faith whereof, I, Robert Smith, secretary of the navy of the United States of America, have signed these presents, and caused the seal of my office to be affixed hereto, at the city of Washington, this 17th day of June, Anno Domini 1807, and in the 31st year of the independence of the said states.

'(Registered,) Rt. Smith,'

'Secretary of the Navy.

'Ch. W. Goldsborough,

'Ch. Clk., N. D.'

'(Copy.)

'Navy Department, 20th December, 1806.

'Sir: A military expedition formed on the western waters by Colonel Burr will soon proceed down the Mississippi, and by the time you receive this letter will probably be near New Orleans. You will, by all the means in your power, aid the army and malitia in suppressing this enterprise. You will, with your boats, take the best position to intercept and to take, and, if necessary, to destroy, the boats descending under the command of Colonel Burr, or of any person holding an appointment under him. There is great reliance on your vigilance and exertions. I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient,

'(Signed) Rt. Smith.

'Captain John Shaw, or the Commanding Naval Officer at New Orleans.'

Thereupon the motion for attachment was brought on and argued. The argument and opinion will be found reported as Case No. 14,692f.

On Wednesday, the 24th of June, while Mr. Botts was speaking on the motion for an attachment, the grand jury entered, when Mr. John Randolph, their foreman, addressed the court, and stated that they had agreed upon several indictments, which he handed in at the clerk's table. The clerk then read the endorsements upon them as follows: 'An indictment against Aaron Burr for treason. A true bill.' 'An indictment against Aaron Burr for a misdemeanor. A true bill.' 'An indictment against Herman Blannerhasset [FN4] for treason. A true bill.' 'An indictment against Herman Blannerhassett for a misdemeanor. A true bill.' The foreman then stated that the grand jury had still other subjects for their consideration, and had adjourned themselves to meet to-morrow at ten o'clock.

FN4 So in the indictment. The correct spelling is 'Harman Blennerhassett.'

After Mr. Botts had concluded his argument, Mr. Burr addressed the court, and observed that as bills had been found against him, it was probable the public prosecutors would move his commitment. He would, however, suggest two ideas for the consideration of the court: the one was, that it is within their discretion to bail in certain cases, even when the punishment was death; and the other was, that it was expedient for the court to exercise their discretion in this instance, as he should prove that the indictment against him had been obtained by perjury.

Mr. Hay moved for the commitment of Aaron Burr. He stated that if the court had power to bail by the 33d section of the judicial act, it was only to be exercised according to their sound discretion, and that the prisoner was not to demand bail as a matter of right.

Mr. Martin said the counsel for the prosecution had admitted the right of the court to give bail according to its discretion.

Mr. MacRae did not understand from the judicial act that the discretion was to be exercised at this stage of the business, but only at the time of making the arrest.

After some further remarks by Messrs. Martin, Wirt, and Wickham, the CHIEF JUSTICE said: Mr. Martin, have you any precedents where a court has bailed for treason, after the finding of a grand jury, on either of these grounds; that the testimony laid before the grand jury had been impeached for perjury, or that other testimony had been laid before the court, which had not been in possession of the grand jury?

Mr. Martin said that he had not anticipated this case, and had not, therefore, prepared his authorities; but he had no doubt that such existed.

Mr. Burr said, if the court have no discretion, it is unnecessary to produce evidence. That question ought, therefore, to be previously settled.

Some further discussion ensued, as to the question whether the court had any discretion, when Mr. Burr said, that if the court thought it had the power to bail in any case after bill found, it would then be necessary to show that it ought to exercise its discretion in this instance. That the finding of the jury was founded on the testimony of a perjured witness. That General Tupper would prove that there had been no such resistance of his authority as had been stated by that witness.

After same further conversation between counsel, Mr. Burr wished to know whether the court would go into testimony extrinsic to the indictment.
The CHIEF JUSTICE said he had never known a case similar to the present when such an examination had taken place. [FN5]

FN5 The court will in no instance inquire into the character of the testimony which has influenced the grand jury in finding an indictment. State v. Boyd, 2 Hill (S. C.) 288. 71

Mr. Martin would produce authorities if he had time allowed him.
The CHIEF JUSTICE insisted upon the necessity of producing adjudged cases to prove that the court could bail a party against whom an indictment had been found.
Mr. Burr did not wish to protract the session of the court to suit his own personal convenience. There was no time at present to look for authorities.
The CHIEF JUSTICE observed that he was then under the necessity of committing Colonel Burr.
Mr. Burr stated that he was willing to be committed, but hoped that the court had not forestalled its opinion.
The CHIEF JUSTICE.--I have only stated my present impression. This subject is open for argument hereafter. Mr. Burr stands committed to the custody of the marshal.
He was accordingly committed to the gaol, and the court adjourned.
On Thursday, the 25th of June, while Mr. Hay was addressing the court on the motion for an attachment against General Wilkinson, the grand jury entered, and their foreman, Mr. John Randolph, addressed the court as follows: 'May it please the court: The grand jury have been informed that there is in the possession of Aaron Burr a certain letter, with the post mark of May 13th, from James Wilkinson, in ciphers, which they deem to be material to certain inquiries now pending before them. The grand jury are perfectly aware that they have no right to demand any evidence from the prisoner under prosecution which may tend to criminate himself. But the grand jury have thought proper to appear in court to ask its assistance, if it think proper to grant it, to obtain the letter with his consent.'
Mr. Burr rose and asked whether the court were about to give an opinion?
The CHIEF JUSTICE stated that the court was about to say that the grand jury were perfectly right in the opinion, that no man can be forced to furnish evidence against himself; he presumed that the grand jury wished also to know whether the person under prosecution could be examined on other questions not criminating himself?
Mr. Burr declared that it would be impossible for him, under certain circumstances, to expose any letter which had been communicated to him confidentially; how far the extremity of circumstances might compel him to such a conduct, he was not prepared to decide; but it was impossible for him even to deliberate on the proposition to deliver up anything which had been confided to his honor, unless it were extorted from him by law.
Mr. Randolph.--We will withdraw to our chamber, and when the court has decided upon the question it will announce it to the grand jury.
The CHIEF JUSTICE knew not that there was any objection to the grand jury calling before them and examining any man as a witness who laid under an indictment.

Mr. Martin said there could be no objection.

Mr. Randolph said he was afraid that the object of the grand jury had been misunderstood by the court. The grand jury had not appeared before the court to apply for the person of Aaron Burr, to obtain evidence from him, but for a certain paper which might or might not be in his possession; and upon that paper being or not being in his possession, and upon its being possible or not possible to identify that paper, it might depend whether Aaron Burr himself were or were not a material evidence before them; and then the grand jury withdrew.

When Mr. Hay had concluded his argument, Mr. MacRae addressed the court. He was solicitous he said, to lay a communication before it, on a circumstance which had lately transpired. The grand jury had asked for a certain letter in ciphers, which was supposed to have been addressed by General Wilkinson to the accused. The court had understood the ground on which the accused had refused to put it in their possession, to be an apprehension lest his honor should be wounded by his thus betraying matters of confidence. I have seen General Wilkinson, sir, since this declaration was made. I have informed him of the communication which has thus been made, and the general has expressed his wishes to me, and requested me to express those wishes, that the whole of the correspondence between Aaron Burr and himself may be exhibited before the court. The accused has now, therefore, a fair opportunity of producing this letter; he is absolved from all possible imputation; his honor is perfectly safe.

Mr. Burr.--The court will probably expect from me some reply. The communication which I made to the court, has led, it seems, to the present invitation. I have only to say, sir, that this letter will not be produced. The letter is not at this time in my possession, and General Wilkinson knows it.

Mr. MacRae hoped that notice of his communication would be sent to the grand jury.

Mr. Martin hoped that Colonel Burr's communication also would go along with it.

The CHIEF JUSTICE was unwilling to make the court the medium of such communications.

Mr. MacRae hoped the court would notify his communication to the grand jury, and for an obvious reason. When the grand jury came into court to ask for the paper, what did the accused say? Did he declare that it was not in his possession? No: he merely said that honor forbade him to disclose it. The inference undoubtedly was, that he had the paper, but could not persuade himself to disclose it. And what then must have been the impression of the grand 72 jury? A cloud of suspicions must have fastened itself upon their minds; suspicions unjustly injurious to the character of General Wilkinson and which the present communication may at once disperse. It is but justice, therefore, to General Wilkinson, to whom the inquiries of the grand jury may at present relate, to give them the benefit of this information.

Mr. Burr.--General Wilkinson, sir, is extremely welcome to all the eclat which he may expect to derive from this challenge; but as it is a challenge from him, it is a sufficient reason why I should not accept it. But as the remarks of the last gentleman seem to convey some reproach against me, (which no man who knows me can believe me to deserve) it may be proper to say, that I did voluntarily, and the presence of a witness, put the letter out of my hands, with the express view that it should not be used improperly against any one. I wished, sir. to disable any person, even myself, from laying it before the grand jury. General Wilkinson knows this fact.

The CHIEF JUSTICE then reduced these communications to writing, and transmitted them to the grand jury.

Mr. Burr.--Let it be understood, that I did not put this letter out of my possession because I expected the grand jury would take up this subject but from a supposition that they might do so.

Mr. Wickham, about to speak, was interrupted by the entrance of the grand jury when Mr. Randolph, their foreman, informed the court that they had agreed upon some presentments, which he then delivered into the hands of the clerk. The clerk then read as follows:

'The grand inquest of the United States, for the district of Virginia, upon their oaths, present, that Jonathan Dayton, late a senator in the congress of the United States, from the state of New Jersey; John Smith, a senator in the congress of the United States, from the state of Ohio; Comfort Tyler, late of the state of New York; Israel Smith, late of the state of New York; and Davis Floyd, late of the territory of Indiana, are guilty of treason against the United States, in levying war against the same, to wit: at Blennerhassett's Island, in the county of Wood, and state of Virginia, on the 13th day of December, 1806.'

Friday, June 26, 1807.

The court met about nine o'clock, and, about ten o'clock, the grand jury entered, and Mr. Randolph, their foreman, presented ten indictments, found true bills; that is, one indictment for treason, and another for a misdemeanor, against each of the following individuals, viz.: Jonathan Dayton, John Smith, Comfort Tyler, Israel Smith, and Davis Floyd.

The CHIEF JUSTICE then made a short address to the grand jury, in which he complimented them upon the great patience and cheerful attention with which they had performed the arduous and laborious duties in which they had been so long engaged, and concluded, by discharging them from all further attendance.

The court then adjourned till twelve o'clock. As soon as it met again, Mr. Botts requested the court to remove Mr. Burr from the public gaol, to some comfortable and convenient place of confinement. He depicted, in very strong terms, the miserable state of the prison where he was then confined. The grounds of this motion are to be found in the following affidavit made by some of Mr. Burr's counsel, and laid before the court:

'We, who are counsel in the defence of Colonel Burr, at the suit of the United States, beg leave to represent to the court, that in pursuance of our duty to him, we have visited him in his confinement in the city gaol: that we could not avoid remarking the danger, which will most probably result to his health, from the situation, inconveniences and circumstances attending the place of his confinement; but we cannot forbear to declare our conviction, that we ourselves cannot freely and fully perform what we have undertaken for his defence, if he remain in the gaol aforesaid, deprived, as he is, of a room to himself, it being scarcely possible for us to consult with him upon the various necessary occasions which must occur, from all which we believe that he will be deprived of that assistance from counsel, which is given to him by the constitution of the United States, unless he be removed.

Edmund Randolph.
'John Wickham.
'Benjamin Botts.
'Sworn to in open court, by Edmund Randolph, John Wickham, and Benjamin Botts, Esquires. June 25th, 1807.
'William Marshall, Clerk.'
The counsel for the prosecution were perfectly silent on the motion. After a long and desultory argument by Mr. Burr's counsel, the court determined that the prisoner should be removed to his former lodgings near the capitol, provided they could be made sufficiently strong for his safe keeping, being of opinion that the act of congress authorized it, on the foregoing affidavit, to make the order of removal.
Mr. Latrobe, surveyor of the public buildings of the United States, was requested to inspect them; and upon his report the court passed the following order: 'Whereupon, it is ordered, that the marshal of this district do cause the front room of the house now occupied by Luther Martin, Esq., which room has been and is used as a dining room, to be prepared for the reception and safe keeping of Colonel Aaron Burr, by securing the shutters to the windows of the said room by bars, and the door by a strong bar or padlock. And that he employ a guard of seven men to be placed on the floor of the adjoining unfinished house, and on the same story with the before described front room, and also at the door 73 opening into the said front room; and upon the marshal's reporting to the court that the said room has been so fitted up and the guard employed, that then the said marshal be directed, and he is hereby directed, to remove to the said room, the body of the said Aaron Burr from the public gaol, there to be by him safely kept.'
Mr. Hay.--My only wish is, that this prosecution should be regularly conducted. Is it not the usual practice to read the indictment first and then move for the venire?
Mr. Burr.--I have been furnished with a copy of the indictment; I have perused it and I am ready to plead not guilty to it.
Mr. Wirt.--The usual form requires the actual arraignment of the prisoner; however, the court may dispense with it, if it think proper.
Mr. Hay was indifferent about the form, if the law could be substantially executed. He supposed that a simple acknowledgment of the prisoner was sufficient, without the customary form of holding up his hand.
CHIEF JUSTICE.--It is enough, if he appear to the indictment, and plead not guilty.
The clerk then read the indictment against Aaron Burr, for treason against the United States; which specifies the place of the overt act, to be at Blennerhassett's Island; and the time, the 10th day of December, 1806.
When he had concluded, Mr. Burr addressed the court: I acknowledge myself to be the person named in the indictment. I plead not guilty; and put myself upon my country for trial.
Mr. Hay then addressed the court on the venire that was to try the issue between the prisoner and the United States. He expressed some doubt whether the 29th section of the act of congress called the judicial act [1 Stat. 88], was still in force, which required twelve jurors, at least, to be summoned from the county where the offence was committed. If this law was still in force, it would be necessary to summon twelve petit jurors from the county of Wood, which would render it impossible to have the trial at an early day.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said he had no doubt the law was still in force.

Mr. Burr said as this law was most probably intended for the benefit of the accused, he consented to waive the right.

Mr. Wirt suggested a doubt whether consent in such a case could take away error.

The CHIEF JUSTICE believed that the provision was not absolutely obligatory, if both parties would waive the right.

Mr. Hay said he felt no disposition to delay the trial; but he could not think of pledging himself to such a measure without due deliberation. He would consult the gentlemen associated with him, and inform the court of the result.

The counsel for the prosecution then retired to consult. On their return, Mr. Hay informed the court that they could not assume the responsibility of consenting to such a proposition, as the law seemed imperative. He must therefore request the court to direct a venire of twelve men, at least, to be summoned from Wood county.

A long conversation ensued as to the time that would be necessary to summon the venire from Wood county, as it would be necessary to postpone the trial accordingly; opinions varying from twenty to thirty-five days. The court made an order for a venire of forty-eight jurors, twelve of whom, at least, were to be summoned from Wood county. Without fixing the time for the trial, the court adjourned.

On Saturday, the 27th of June, an order was made postponing the trial to the third day of August, and for the return of the venire on that day.

Monday, June 29, 1807.

Mr. Hay laid the following order of the executive council before the court:

'In Council, June 29, 1807. The board being informed that an affidavit has been filed in the circuit court of the United States, for the Virginia district, which states that the gaol for the county of Henrico and city of Richmond is inconvenient and unhealthy, and so crowded with state offenders and debtors that there are no private apartments therein for the reception of persons charged with offences against the laws of the United States, it is therefore advised that the governor be requested to tender the said court, (through the federal attorney of the district of Virginia,) apartments in the third story of the public gaol and penitentiary house for the reception of such persons as shall be directed under the authority of the United States to be confined therein.

'Extract from the minutes.

'Daniel L. Hylton, Clerk of the Council.'

The following was the order of the court on this subject: 'Which tender the court doth accept for the purpose above mentioned.'

The final decision of the motion to commit Aaron Burr to the penitentiary was postponed until to-morrow.

Tuesday, June 30, 1807.

After the court met the motion to commit Aaron Burr to the penitentiary was renewed. It was objected to by his counsel, on the ground (and an affidavit was made by them to the same effect) that in so important a case it was essentially necessary for the most uninterrupted intercourse to subsist between the prisoner and his counsel; but that the distance of the penitentiary, combined with their own professional avocations, would necessarily narrow and interrupt this intercourse. It was also said that, by particular regulations of the penitentiary, the custody of the prisoner would be transferred from the marshal to the superintendent, and that the communications of the prisoner with his counsel would be limited to the very same short period which was allowed to the other visitants: that is, from eleven to one o'clock. 74

The attorney for the United States replied to these objections.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said when there was a public gaol not unreasonable distant or unfit for the reception of the prisoner, and when the court was called upon on the part of the United States to commit a prisoner to its keeping, that he conceived himself bound to comply with the requisition; that when he had given the order for his removal from the gaol to his own lodgings, it was under an expectation that the trial would be prosecuted immediately, and that the intercourse between the prisoner and his counsel would be necessarily incessant; but as a postponement had taken place, such an intercourse would not be absolutely necessary; under such circumstances, therefore, he should direct the removal of the prisoner to the penitentiary, if he were still to continue in the possession of the marshal, and if his counsel were to have free and uninterrupted access to him.

Some difficulty having thus occurred on these points, the executive council was immediately convened. In a short time the following letter was submitted to the court:

'Council Chamber, June 30, 1807.

'Sir: In pursuance of an advice of the council of state, I beg leave, through you, to inform the circuit court of the United States, now sitting, that any persons who may be confined in the gaol and penitentiary house, on the part of the United States, will be considered as in the custody, and under the sole control of the marshal of the district; that he will have authority to admit any person or persons to visit the confined that he may think proper, and that he will be authorized to select for the purposes aforesaid, any apartment in the penitentiary now unoccupied, that he may deem most conducive to safety, health, and convenience. I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

'Wm. H. Cabell.

'George Hay, Esq.'

The court then made the following order: 'In consequence of the offer made by the executive of apartments in the third story of penitentiary and state prisoa, for persons who may be confined therein, under the authority of the United States, and of the foregoing letter from the governor of this commonwealth, it is ordered, on the motion of the attorney for the United States, that so soon as the apartments in the third story of the public gaol and penitentiary shall be fit for the reception and safe keeping of Aaron Burr, that he be removed thereto, and safely kept therein by the marshal, until the second day of August next, when he shall be brought back to the prison where he is now placed, there to be guarded in like manner as at present, until the further order of the court.'

Monday, August 3, 1807.

On this day the circuit court of the United States for the Fifth circuit and district of Virginia, was held according to adjournment. Present: the CHIEF JUSTICE of the United States; George Hay, William Wirt, and Alexander MacRae, Esquires, counsel for the prosecution.

The prisoner was brought into court from his apartment, near the Swan Tavern, to which he had been removed on Saturday.

Edmund Randolph, John Wickham, Benjamin Botts, John Baker, and Luther Martin, Esquires, appeared as his counsel.

The court assembled at twelve o'clock. An immense concourse of citizens attended to witness the proceedings of this important trial.

Mr. Hay observed that he could take no steps in this business until he had ascertained whether the witnesses summoned on the part of the United States were present; he therefore requested that their names might be called over; they were more than one hundred in number. Their names were accordingly called.

Mr. Hay begged leave to mention that he had nothing more to submit to the court this day. There were many of the witnesses of whose places of residence he was ignorant; several had not appeared; many had been merely pointed out to him by the attorney general of the United States. He observed that, therefore, he had not yet been able to furnish Colonel Burr with a list of the witnesses, and a statement of the places of their residence, as the law requires; that, as many of those who had been summoned and recognized had failed to appear, he was not ready to proceed with the trial immediately. He also informed the court that a list of the venire had been delivered on Saturday to Colonel Burr, but had since been discovered to be inaccurate. It became, therefore, necessary (an act of congress having directed this to be done at least three days before the trial) to deliver a correct list on this day; and, of course, the trial would be postponed until the requisite time should have elapsed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE inquired, then, to what day it would be proper to adjourn the court.

Mr. Hay could not possibly state by what day he should be able to prepare his lists.

Mr. Burr observed that it was not probable that he should avail himself of any privileges to which he might be entitled from any delay in furnishing him with the list of jurors, or of any incorrectness in the list; and therefore the court might adjourn to any day which was convenient to the attorney for the United States. If the day of adjournment depended on his own consent, he should not object to any adjournment, provided it did not extend further than Wednesday.

Mr. Hay had no objection to that day.

At the instance of Mr. Hay the names of the jurors were called, when forty-six answered to their names, two only being absent.

Mr. Burr reminded the court of the motion which he had made, on a former occasion, for a subpoena duces tecum, addressed to the president of the United States. That motion 75 had been partly complied with. He wished to know of the court whether it were not a matter of right for him to obtain a subpoena duces tecum. If it were not, he should then lay a specific motion before the court.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not believe it to be the practice in Virginia to obtain such a subpoena upon a mere application to the clerk. The motion must be brought before the court itself.

Mr. Hay said that he would say nothing on this subject until he understood the object of the application: that if it were to obtain the letter which was not formerly furnished, he would inform the opposite counsel that he had it now among his papers, and was ready to produce it.

Mr. Burr.--That is one object of the application. Another is, to obtain a certain communication from General Eaton to the president of the United States, which is mentioned in his deposition.

Mr. Hay said that he was not certain whether he had that communication, but believed that it was among his papers. If it were there, he would certainly produce it.

Mr. Burr.--But if, after a search, the gentleman finds that he has not that paper, will he consent, out of court, to issue a subpoena to the president of the United States, under the qualification I have mentioned? I wish not, at the present exigency, to derange the affairs of the government, or to demand the presence of the executive officers at this place. All that I want are certain papers.

Mr. Hay said that he could not consent to it; he would rather that a regular application should be made for it to the court.

Mr. Burr.--Then, sir, I shall move for a subpoena duces tecum, to the president of the United States, directing him to attend with certain papers. This subpoena will issue as in the former instance. I shall furnish the clerk with the necessary specification of the paper which I require.

The court was then adjourned till Wednesday, twelve o'clock.

Wednesday, August 5, 1807.

The court met, according to adjournment. Present: JOHN MARSHALL, Chief Justice of the United States.

The names of the witnesses being called over, and many being still absent, Mr. Hay was not ready to proceed. He presumed all of the witnesses would be present in a few days.

After some conversation as to the time to which the court should adjourn, Mr. Hay proposed an arrangement as to the mode of conducting the trial, in respect to the order in which counsel should speak.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said the best mode appeared to him to be this: that the case should be opened fully by one of the gentlemen on the part of the United States; then opened fully by one of the counsel on the other side; that the evidence should be next gone through, and the whole commented upon by another of the gentlemen employed by the United States, who should be answered by the rest of the counsel for Colonel Burr; and one only of the counsel for the United States should conclude the argument.

Without coming to any arrangement, the court adjourned till Friday, twelve o'clock.

Friday, August 7, 1807.

The court met according to adjournment. Present: JOHN MARSHALL, Chief Justice of the United States, and CYRUS GRIFFIN, Judge of the District of Virginia.

The witnesses were again called over, and several who had not been present before, appeared, and were recognized to attend until discharged by the court. The counsel for the United States, however, not being as well prepared to go into the trial as they expected to be, (many of their witnesses being still absent,) the trial was farther postponed, and the court adjourned until Monday next, at twelve o'clock.

In the course of this day, a difficulty was suggested by Major Scott, the marshal of the Virginia district, as arising out of the order of the court, by virtue of which Colonel Burr had been removed from the penitentiary house to his present lodgings. He stated that he had been informed from good authority, that the secretary of the treasury had declared that he would not allow his charge of seven dollars per day, for the guards employed for the safe-keeping of the prisoner; and, therefore, he might lose that sum, which he had hitherto been advancing out of his own pocket.

The CHIEF JUSTICE declared the firm conviction of the court, that the order, heretofore made, was legal and proper; that the payments made in pursuance thereof would be sanctioned by the court, and ought to be allowed by the secretary of the treasury. He could not believe that the secretary would finally disallow those items in the marshal's account. But, as the officer of the court ought not to be subjected to any risk in obeying its directions, and if the secretary should refuse to allow him a credit for the money paid, the court had no power to compel him to do so, and the situation of the marshal was such that he dared not enter into a controversy with the secretary; the court was disposed to rescind the order, unless some arrangement could be made by Colonel Burr and his counsel, for the indemnification of the marshal.

Colonel Burr declared that an offer had already been made on his part to indemnify the marshal, and that he was still ready and willing to give him satisfactory security that the money should be paid him, in case the secretary of the treasury should refuse to allow the credit.

Some desultory conversation ensued, but nothing positive was agreed upon; but it appeared 76 to be understood that security was to be given to Major Scott, and that Colonel Burr was to remain in his apartment near the Swan Tavern.

Monday, August 10, 1807.

The court met pursuant to adjournment.

Harman Blennerhassett was brought into court, and Mr. Hay moved that he be arraigned for treason. Mr. Botts objected, on the ground that he had not been furnished with a copy of the indictment three days previously; and he was reconducted to his prison. Four of the venire were excused on account of indisposition. The clerk informed Mr. Burr that he was at liberty to challenge such of the venire as he might object to.

Mr. Burr begged leave to inform the jurors, who were within hearing, that a great number of them may have formed and expressed opinions about him which might disqualify them from serving on this occasion. He expected that, as they came up, they would discharge the duties of conscientious men, and candidly answer the questions put to them, and state all their objections against him. The deputy marshal then summoned first, Hezekiah Bucky.

Mr. Botts.--We challenge you for cause. Have you ever formed and expressed an opinion about the guilt of Colonel Burr? Mr. Bucky. I have not, sir, since I have been subpoenaed. Question. Had you before? Answer. I had formed one before in my own mind.

Mr. Hay wished that the question of the opposite counsel could assume a more precise and definite form. If this question were proposed to this man, and to every other man of the panel, he would venture to predict that there could not be a jury selected in the state of Virginia, because he did not believe that there was a single man in the state, qualified to become a juryman, who had not, in some form or other, made up, and declared an opinion on the conduct of the prisoner. The transactions in the West had excited universal curiosity; and there was no man who had not seen and decided on the documents relative to them. Do gentlemen contend that in a case so peculiarly interesting to all, the mere declaration of an opinion is sufficient to disqualify a juryman? A doctrine of this sort would at once acquit the prisoner; for where is the jury that could try him? Such a doctrine amounts to this: that a man need only to do enough to draw down the public attention upon him, and he would immediately effect his discharge. Mr. Hay concluded with a hope that the question would assume a more definite form; he should not pretend to decide the form in which it should be proposed, for that was province of the court; it was a privilege to which every court is entitled, and one which the court had exercised in the case of James T. Callender.

Mr. Botts considered it as a misfortune ever to be deplored, that in this country, and in this case, there had been too general an expression of the public sentiment, and that this generality of opinion would disqualify many, but he had never entertained a doubt, until the gentleman for the prosecution had avowed it, that twelve men might be found in Virginia, capable of deciding this question with the strictest impartiality. He still trusted that the attorney for the United States was mistaken, that the catastrophe was not completely fixed, and that every man in the state had not pledged himself to convict Colonel Burr whether right or wrong. He was not present at the trial of James T. Callender; but all America had heard the question which was then propounded to the juryman, and that was, whether he had made up and expressed an opinion respecting the guilt of the prisoner.

Mr. Hay said that he would put Mr. Botts right as to matter of fact. The court would recollect that on the trial of Callender, the question was, not whether the juryman had formed and expressed an opinion on that case generally, but on the subject-matter that was to be tried, and contained in the indictment. The question then in the present case should be, have you formed and expressed an opinion on the point at issue: that is, whether Aaron Burr be guilty of treason? On the trial of Callender, the court would particularly recollect that Mr. John Bassett having objected to himself, because he had read the libellous publication, was actually overruled, because it was not on the book itself, but on the subject-matter of the indictment, that he was called upon to say whether he had ever expressed an opinion?

Mr. Burr declared that there was a material distinction between that and the present case. Mr. Bassett's acknowledging that he had seen the book did not disqualify him from serving on the jury; in the same manner the person who had seen a murder committed would not be an incompetent juror in the prosecution for that crime. But if a man pretended to decide upon the guilt of a prisoner, upon mere rumor, he would manifest such a levity and bias of mind as would effectually disqualify him. Mr. Bucky, however, has not yet come out completely with his declarations. Let him be further interrogated.

Mr. Hay observed that the question would still be too general and vague, if it were even to be 'Have you expressed any opinion on the treason of Aaron Burr?' for the case stated in the indictment was infinitely more specific. It was treason in levying war against the United States at Blennerhassett's Island. Unless this particular allegation be proved, it sefeats all the other parts of the accusation; and it was probably on this point that the juror had never made up any opinion.

Mr. Martin contended that it was the duty of every juryman to come to the trial of any case with the most perfect impartiality, and 77 more particularly one where life and reputation were at stake; that it was a libel upon Virginia, a blot upon the whole state, to assert, that twelve men could not be found to decide such a case, with no other knowledge that what they had picked up from newspapers; that there was a material distinction between this and Callender's Case [Fed. Cas. No. 14,709]; the libel was a book in every man's hand, but does any juryman in the present case pretend to know the testimony on which this charge depends? The gentleman proposes to ask the juryman whether he has made up an opinion on Colonel Burr's treason? But it is expressly probable that most of them knew not what treason is; and though they may decide upon the guilt of Colonel Burr, they may be ignorant whether it come under the name and description of treason.

The CHIEF JUSTICE observed that it might save some altercation if the court were to deliver its opinion at the present time; that it was certainly one of the clearest principles of natural justice, that a juryman should come to a trial of a man for life with a perfect freedom from previous impressions, that it was clearly the duty of the court to obtain, if possible, men free from such bias; but that if it were not possible from the very circumstances of the case--if rumors had reached and prepossessed their judgments, still the court was bound to obtain as large a portion of impartiality as possible, that this was not more a principle of natural justice, than a maxim of the common law, which we have inherited from our forefathers, that the same right was secured by the constitution of the United States, which entitles every man under a criminal prosecution, to a fair trial by 'an impartial jury.' Can it be said however, that any man is an impartial juryman who has declared the prisoner to be guilty and to have deserved punishment? If it be said that he has made up this opinion, but has not heard the testimony, such an excuse only makes the case worse; for if the man has decided upon insufficient testimony, it manifests a bias that completely disqualifies himself from the functions of a juryman. It is too general a question to ask, whether he has any impressions about Colonel Burr. The impressions may be so light that they do not amount to an opinion of guilt, nor do they go to the extent of believing that the prisoner deserves capital punishment. With respect to Mr. Bassett's opinion, it was true he had read 'The Prospect Before Us;' and he had declared that it was a libel, but Mr. Bassett had formed no opinion about James T. Callender's being the author. It was the same principle in the present case. If a juryman were to declare that the attempt to achieve the dismemberment of the Union, was treason, it would not be a complete objection or disqualification; but it would be the application of that crime to a particular individual; it would be the fixing it on Aaron Burr that would disable him from serving in this case. Let the counsel then proceed with the inquiry.

Mr. Botts.--Have you said that Colonel Burr was guilty of treason? Mr. Bucky.--No. I only declared that the man who acted as Colonel Burr was said to have done, deserves to be hung. Question. Did you believe that Colonel Burr was that man? Answer. I did, from what I had heard.

Mr. Hay.--I understand then, that the question proposed in Callender's Case is to be overruled?

The CHIEF JUSTICE.--My Brother, Judge GRIFFIN, does not recollect whether it particularly went to the indictment or not.

GRIFFIN, District Judge.--I think the question was 'relative to the matter in issue.'

Mr. Hay.--The very position that I have laid down.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.--The simple question is, whether the having formed an opinion, not upon the evidence in court, but upon common rumor, renders a man incompetent to decide upon the real testimony of the case?

Mr. Wirt (addressing Mr. Bucky).--Did I understand you to say that you concluded upon certain rumors you had heard, that Colonel Burr deserved to be hung? Mr. Backy.--I did. Question. Did you believe these rumors? Answer. I did. Question. Would you, if you were a juryman, form your opinion upon such rumors? Answer. Certainly not.

Mr. MacRae.--Did you form and express your opinion upon the question, whether an overt act of treason had been committed at Blennerhassett's Island? Answer. It was upon other rumors, and not upon that, that I had formed an opinion.

Mr. Martin submitted it to the court, whether he could be considered on impartial juryman.

THE COURT decided that he ought not to be so considered, and he was accordingly rejected.

James G. Laidly stated that he had formed and expressed some opinions unfavorable to Colonel Burr; that he could not pretend to decide upon the charges in the indictment, which he had not heard; that he had principally taken his opinions from newspaper statements; and that he had not, as far as he recollected, expressed an opinion that Colonel Burr deserved hanging; but that his impression was, that he was guilty. He was therefore set aside.

James Compton being challenged for cause and sworn, stated that he had formed and expressed an opinion from hearsay that Colonel Burr was guilty of treason, and of that particular treason of which he stood charged, as far as he understood. He was rejected.

Mr. Burr observed, that as gentlemen on the part of the prosecution had expressed a willingness to have an impartial jury, they could not refuse that any juryman should state all his objections to himself; and that he had no doubt, in spite of the contrary assertions 78 which had been made, that they could get a jury from his panel.

Hamilton Morrison, upon being called, said that he had frequently thought and declared that Colonel Burr was guilty, if the statements which he had heard were true; that he did not know whether they were so, but only thought, from the great clamor which had been made, that it might be possible that they were true; that he had not passed any positive opinion, nor was he certain that he had always qualified it by saying, 'if these things were true;' that he does not recollect to have said that Colonel Burr ought to be punished, without stating at the same time, 'if he were guilty.' Mr. Morrison was suspended for further examination.

Yates S. Conwell had formed and expressed an opinion, from the reports he had heard, that Colonel Burr must be guilty of high treason. He was accordingly set aside.

Jacob Beeson declared that he had for some time past formed an opinion, as well from newspaper publications as from the boats which had been built on the Ohio, that Colonel Burr was guilty; and that he himself had borne arms to suppress this insurrection. He was therefore set aside as incompetent.

William Prince declared he had nearly the same impressions as Mr. Beeson; that he too had borne arms, as well on Blennerhassett's Island as on descending the river in search of Blennerhassett. He was set aside in like manner.

Nimrod Saunders declared that he had expressed an opinion previously to his being summoned on the jury, that the prisoner had been guilty of treason. He was therefore set aside as incompetent.

Thomas Creel had no declaration to make, and he was challenged for cause. Upon being interrogated, he stated that he had never asserted that the prisoner ought to be punished; that he had said that he was a sensible man, and if there were any hole left he would creep out of it; that he had conceived that Colonel Burr had seduced Blennerhassett into some acts that were not right; that he had never positively said that Colonel Burr was guilty; that he had said that Blennerhassett was the most blamable, because he was in good circumstances and well off in life, whereas Colonel Burr's situation was desperate, and that he had little to lose; that he had not said that Colonel Burr had directly misled Mr. Blennerhassett, but through the medium of Mrs. Blennerhassett; in short, that there was no determinate impression on his mind respecting the guilt of the prisoner.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not think that this was sufficient to set him aside, and suspended his case for further examination.

Anthony Buckner had freqnently said that the prisoner deserved to be hung. He was therefore set aside.

David Creel had formed an opinion from the statements in the newspapers, and if these were true the prisoner was certainly guilty. He had expressed a belief that he was guilty of the charges now brought against him, and that he ought to be hanged. He was therefore rejected.

The above named jurors were all from Wood county.

Jurors from the body of the district:

John Horace Upshaw declared that he conceived himself to stand there as an unprejudiced juryman, for he was ready to attend to the evidence; but that as he had formed opinions hostile to the prisoner, (if opinions they can be called which are formed from newspaper testimony,) and had, he believed, frequently expressed them, that he was unwilling to subject himself to the imputation of having prejudged the cause.

Mr. Burr.--We challenge Mr. Upshaw for cause.

Mr. Hay.--Then, sir, I most seriously apprehend that we shall have no jury at all. I solemnly believe Mr. Upshaw is an intelligent and upright man, and can give a correct verdict on the evidence; and I will venture to assert, (whatever credit my friends on the other side will allow to my assertion,) that I myself could do justice to the accused. I believe that any man can who is blessed with a sound judgment and integrity. We might as well enter at once a nolle prosequi, if he is to be rejected.

Mr. Wickham.--Then according to the gentleman's doctrine, any honest man, no matter what his impressions may be, is a competent juryman. Is this agreeable to the principles of law? Does the gentleman mean to insinuate that when we object to a juryman it is for his want of honesty? No, sir, every man is subject to partialities and aversions, which may unconsciously sway his judgment. Mr. Upshaw does no doubt deem himself an impartial juryman; but Mr. Upshaw may be deceived.

After some desultory argument between Messrs. Hay and Wickham, Mr. Wirt proceeded to ask Mr. Upshaw whether he had understood him to say that notwithstanding the hostile impressions he had taken up from newspaper reports, these impressions had not received that determinate character which might entitle them to the name of opinions? Answer. I have received impressions hostile to Colonel Burr, and have expressed them with some warmth, but my impressions have not been induced by anything like evidence They were predicated on the deposition of General Eaton and the communications of General Wilkinson, to the president of the United States. I had conceived that the prisoner had been guilty of some criminal act against the public, and ought to be punished; and I believe, also, that I went on further to vindicate the conduct of those gentlemen who would appear as the principal witnesses against him, and also of the government in the measures which it had taken to suppress his plans. After some further and animated discussion on this point, Mr. Upshaw's case was suspended for subsequent examination.

William Pope declared that his impressions 79 were nearly the same with those of the gentleman who had preceded him; that he had thought at first, from newspaper representations, that it was Colonel Burr's intention to make his fortune in the west by the settlement of lands; that when he had afterwards understood that he had formed a union with Wilkinson to proceed to Mexico, he had regarded the prisoner's conduct in such a light that, if he had proceeded to Mexico, he would have considered it as an excusable offence; but when he had afterwards understood that there was treason mixed with his projects, it was impossible for him to view his conduct without the deepest indignation. If these impressions could be called prejudices, he trusted that he should always retain them. What other sentiments could he feel against such a crime, perpetrated against the very best government on the surface of the earth? But Mr. Pope declared that from his heart he believed that he could divest himself of these unfavorable impressions, and give Colonel Burr a fair and honorable trial. He would add that, in pursuance of the spirit manifested by the constitution which required two witnesses to an overt act of treason, he should think it necessary that the evidence for the United States should be so strong as to make the scale preponderate.

Mr. Wickham.--You will not misunderstand me, Mr. Pope, when I ask you whether you have not been a candidate for your county, and whether you be not now a delegate? Answer. Yes. Question. In canvassing among the people, have you not declared that the government had acted properly in commencing this prosecution? Answer. Yes; I believe I have said generally that I thought Colonel Burr was guilty of high treason. Mr. Pope was therefore set aside.

Peyton Randolph declared that it had never been his wish or intention to shrink from the discharge of a public duty, but that he had peculiar objections to serve on this occasion, one of which only he should state. He had been enrolled and was qualified as a lawyer in this court; and he would submit it to the court whether this did not exempt, if not disqualify, him from serving?

The CHIEF JUSTICE admitted Mr. Randolph's privilege, unless there were an express interposition on the part of the prisoner to retain him and others of the venire who had privileges; for this would call a conflicting privilege into operation.

Mr. Burr said that he should be passive.
John Bowe did not recolleck to have said that the prisoner was guilty of treason, but of something hostile to the peace and happiness of the United States. Upon being interrogated, he observed that he was a delegate from the county of Hanover, that there had been a competition at the last election, that he had had occasion to speak at that time of the views of the prisoner, but had always done it cautiously; had never asserted that he ought to be hung, but that he was guilty of something unfriendly to the peace of the United States.
Mr. Wickham.--You have said that the prisoner was guilty? Answer. Yes.
The CHIEF JUSTICE.--Did you ever make up an opinion about his levying troops and making war against the United States? Answer. Yes; but I have never expressed it.
Mr. Burr.--Take the whole together, and it amounts to an opinion of treason. Mr. Bowe has said that Colonel Burr was guilty; and of what? Of that which in Mr. Bowe's mind amounts to the definition of treason. He was therefore set aside.
John Roberts had thought and declared, from the reports in the public newspapers, that the prisoner was guilty of treason, though he had no doubt that his opinion might be changed by the production of other testimony. He was set aside as incompetent.
Joshua Chaffin excused from indisposition.
7. Jervis Storrs observed that the state of his mind was like that of the gentleman who had gone before him, (Mr. Bowe;) he was in the habit of reading newspapers, and could not but examine their statements relative to those transactions. If he could believe General Eaton's assertion, that the prisoner had threatened to turn congress out of doors, and assassinate the president, he had said, and would still say, that Colonel Burr was guilty of treason. If General Wilkinson's letter were true, he had surely been guilty of something in the West that was hostile to the interest of the United States. He did not know whether in the multifarious conversations he had had on this subject he had always expressed this opinion of his guilt with that reservation. He had very often communicated his impressions, that he was plotting some hostile designs against the United States. Mr. Storrs confessed that he might be prejudiced against the prisoner, and that he might be judging too highly of his own mind to entertain the belief that he could divest himself of all his impressions; and upon the whole, he expressed a wish not to serve. He was then rejected.
8. Miles Selden declared that it was impossible not to have entered into the frequent conversations which had occurred on this topic, and to have declared some opinion; that he had always said that Colonel Burr was guilty of something, and that if he was guilty of treason against such a government as that of the United States, he would deserve to be hung; that he could not assert that he had always accompanied his opinions with this reservation, but that he was not afraid to trust himself in the rendering of a verdict. Upon being interrogated, he said that he had frequently jested on this subject, and particularly recollected to have said in a sportive conversation with Colonel Mayo, that this was a Federal plot, and that Burr had been set on by the Federalists. Colonel Selden was therefore suspended for further consideration.

9. Lewis Truehart had said that if the reports were correct, Colonel Burr had been *80 guilty of something inimical to the country, and that he always qualified his opinions in that manner.

Colonel Tinsley was then called in as a witness, who stated that from a conversation with Mr. Truehart, he thought that he had discovered that he had a general prepossession against Colonel Burr. He did not expect to be called on, and had no very distinct recollection of the particulars; that this was before any of the proceedings of the trial; and when he heard that he was summoned as one of the venire, he then recollected their conversation and happened casually to mention it. Mr. Truehart suspended.

William Yancey had expressed an opinion on newspaper testimony that Colonel Burr was guilty; that he had frequently said that he would believe the statements of newspapers till the contrary was proved, but that he had no doubt he should entertain a different sentiment, if other testimony were produced. He was set aside.

Thomas Prosser was next called. He said that he had made numberless declarations about Colonel Burr; that he had believed him to be guilty of a treasonable intention, but not of the overt act; on this point he had suspended his opinion, but he was rather inclined to believe that he had not committed it.

Mr. Martin.--Can this gentleman be considered as an impartial juryman, when he thus comes with his mind made up on one half of the guilt? He was suspended for further consideration.

John Staples had been under the same impressions which had been described by others; that he dared to say that he had said Colonel Burr was guilty of levying troops and making war upon the United States. He was set aside.

Edward C. Standard acknowledged that his prejudices against Colonel Burr had been deep-rooted; that he had no doubt of the criminality of his motives, but that he had doubts of the commission of an overt act; he regretted that a man of his talents and energetic mind should be lost to his country. Upon being interrogated, he observed that he had doubts as to the overt act, because he believed him to be a man of such deep intrigue as never to jeopardize his own life till thousands fell before him. He was rejected.

Richard B. Goode was then called. I have never seen, neither do I believe that I have heard correctly, the evidence in this prosecution. From common report and newspaper information I have formed an opinion has vorable to Colonel Burr. That opinion has been strengthened by what I have heard from the lips of Colonel Burr in this court; but without arrogating to myself more virtue than belongs to other men, if I know myself, I have formed no opinion which cannot be altered by the evidence.

Mr. Baker.--Did you not endeavor to displace Mr. Heth as captain of the Manchester cavalry, for becoming the bail of Colonel Burr? Answer. I never did. (Here sundry witnesses were directed to be called.)

Mr. Goode.--I will state the circumstance to which you allude, unless you prefer to prove it.

THE COURT.--Do so, if you please.

Mr. Goode.--On the 4th of July, 1806, I was a member of a committee with Captain Heth, appointed to prepare toasts to be drunk on that day by the Manchester cavalry. I profess to be attached to the present administration of the general government, and wished to express such a sentiment. Captain Heth declared that he had not confidence in the executive, and rather than express such a sentiment he would resign his commission. At that time, I thought Captain Heth and myself differed only as to measures, and not as to principles; and that it was an honest opinion. But in a few months after, when I understood that Captain Heth had become bail for Colonel Burr, and was his zealous friend, with whom he was neither connected nor acquainted, but a stranger, who, three years ago, would have been consigned to the grave by Captain Heth, and those thinking with him upon political subjects, and when I recollected the charge preferred against Colonel Burr, I confess that the declaration and conduct of Captain Heth made such impressions upon my mind, that I refused to trust my person with him as a military commander, and I would do it again.

Colonel Burr.--Pray, sir, did you not write a letter to Captain Heth? Answer. I did; and I have reasons to believe that that letter is in your possession, or in the possession of your counsel. You are at liberty to show it to the court, or I will repeat that part of it which relates to Captain Heth and yourself.

THE COURT.--Do, sir.

Mr. Goode.--A few weeks past, I received a letter from Captain Heth, commanding me to appear at a certain time and place, in order to take my proper command in the troop. I wrote him, in answer, that my post as a soldier would never be abandoned, and that my duty as a citizen forbade that I should silently approve of the conduct of those who had extended a favor to a traitor, which the justice of my country denied to an unfortunate debtor, or words to that effect.

Mr. Goode was then rejected.

Nathaniel Selden stated he had formed an opinion, particularly from General Eaton's deposition, that the intentions of the prisoner were hostile to the United States, but that he had also said he had seen no evidence to satisfy him that he had been guilty of an overt act. He was suspended for further consideration.

16. Esme Smock declared that he had formed and expressed an opinion that Colonel Burr had treasonable designs.

CHIEF JUSTICE.--To what time did your opinion relate?

Mr. Smock.--I formed my opinion from newspaper publications and common report;

UNITED STATES of America
v.
John M. POINDEXTER.

No. Cr. No. 88-0080-01 (HHG).

United States District Court,
District of Columbia.

Oct. 24, 1989.

Defendant, charged with obstruction of Congress and violation of general federal false statement law, filed number of pretrial motions, including motions to dismiss indictment. The District Court, Harold H. Greene, J., held that: (1) indictment was not duplicitous so as to require dismissal; (2) National Security Council was "public office" for purposes of statute prohibiting destruction of records deposited in "public office"; (3) indictment sufficiently charged offense of obstruction of Congress; and (4) certain terms in indictment would be stricken on grounds of prejudice.

So ordered.

See also 719 F.Supp. 6.

[1] COURTS ⚿ 99(1)
106k99(1)
Law of case doctrine requires that, absent extraordinary and compelling circumstances, rulings made in earlier phase of particular litigation are binding in later phases of same lawsuit.

[2] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 125(2)
210k125(2)
Ordinarily two or more distinct offenses may not be charged in single count.

[3] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 125(19.1)
210k125(19.1)
Formerly 210k125(19)
Despite contention of defendant that first count of indictment charged one conspiracy to make false statements and destroy documents, another to obstruct congressional inquiries, and a third to obstruct other congressional inquiries, count charged but one single conspiracy to defeat congressional inquiries by various means, and thus, was permissible method of charging conspiracy.

[4] CONSPIRACY ⚿ 48.1(1)
91k48.1(1)
Existence of single conspiracy or multiple conspiracies is primarily question of fact for jury.

[5] CONSPIRACY ⚿ 24(2)
91k24(2)
For purposes of determining whether single count of indictment charges several conspiracies, neither number of objects nor number of means to effectuate those objects transforms single conspiracy into several such agreements.

[6] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 125(1)
210k125(1)
Fact that different proof may be required for each of offenses alleged as objectives of conspiracy does not render indictment charging conspiracy duplicitous.

[6] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 127
210k127
Fact that different proof may be required for each of offenses alleged as objectives of conspiracy does not render indictment charging conspiracy duplicitous.

[7] RECORDS ⚿ 22
326k22
"Public office" within meaning of statute prohibiting person from willfully and unlawfully concealing, removing, mutilating, or destroying records, paper or documents filed in any "public office" is not limited to those offices to which public customarily comes; rather, term includes those offices not accessible to public where normally more important and vital governmental records are kept. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2071(b).

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

[8] RECORDS ⚿ 22
326k22
National Security Council was "public office" within meaning of statute prohibiting destruction of documents filed or deposited in any "public office." 18 U.S.C.A. § 2071(b).

[9] RECORDS ⚿ 22

326k22
Statute prohibiting destruction, mutilation or concealment of documents filed in "public office" applies only to unlawful destruction or removal of official records, and as such does not impact upon functioning of presidency when applied to National Security Council. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2071(b).

[10] RECORDS ⚿ 22
326k22
"Custodians" under statute prohibiting custodian of records filed in public office from concealing, removing or destroying those records does not apply only to those who are custodians of records in technical sense, such a clerks or librarians, but rather, includes others working in government agency who have access to sensitive documents. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2071(b).

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

[11] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 71.2(2)
210k71.2(2)
Defendant must be advised by indictment of specific charge against him in order to enable him to prepare defense and to protect him against double jeopardy. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5.

[11] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 71.2(4)
210k71.2(4)
Defendant must be advised by indictment of specific charge against him in order to enable him to prepare defense and to protect him against double jeopardy. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5.

[12] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 60
210k60
Indictment is sufficient if it contains elements of offense in enough detail to apprise defendant of particular offense with which he is charged. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5; Fed.Rules Cr.Proc.Rule 7(c)(1), 18 U.S.C.A.

[13] OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE ⚿ 11
282k11
Charge that defendant knowingly and corruptly obstructed due and proper exercise of power of inquiry under which investigations were being held by congressional committees, to wit, consideration of proposed resolution by committees in question, by making and causing to be made false statements and representations to committees, for purposes of concealing material matters, together with other factual allegations contained in indictment, adequately apprised defendant of factual basis for charge of obstruction of Congress. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1505.

[14] OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE ⚿ 11
282k11
Indictment furnished sufficient information to defendant about letters upon which obstruction of Congress charge was based to enable defendant to prepare defense and to protect against double jeopardy, where indictment referred to years letters were sent and made reference to author of letters and to previous information provided in another paragraph of indictment. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5; 18 U.S.C.A. § 1505.

[15] OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE ⚿ 1
282k1
Alleged informality of congressional inquiries did not protect defendant from charge of obstruction of Congress; obstruction of Congress statute protects preliminary and informal inquiries against obstruction as well as formal proceedings. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1505.

[16] UNITED STATES ⚿ 23(3)
393k23(3)
Congressional inquiries were "due and proper" exercises of power of inquiry of Congress, despite contentions that Congressional committees violated their own rules and those of House of Representatives. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1505.

[17] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⚿ 68(1)
92k68(1)
Political question doctrine does not leave it to President to determine whether member of his staff has violated criminal law, nor does it protect members of any branch of government from revelations of wrongdoing or ignorance.

[18] OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE ⚿ 8
282k8
Despite contention of defendant that crux of obstruction of Congress allegation was statement made on behalf of and after consultation with

President, and that foreign policy and national security were implicated, defendant charged with obstruction of Congress could not assert political question defense; adjudication of foreign policy issues was not involved, but rather, all that was involved was question of whether defendant had violated laws proscribing obstruction of Congress. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1505.

[19] OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE ⇦ 1
282k1
Obstruction of Congress statute prohibits an endeavor to obstruct as well as a completed obstruction. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1505.

[20] OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE ⇦ 11
282k11
Failure of indictment to allege that statements made by defendant had actual effect of impeding congressional inquiry did not render indictment charging obstruction of Congress insufficient. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1505.

[21] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⇦ 125(4.1)
210k125(4.1)
Formerly 210k125(4)
Two or more acts which could be charged as separate offenses may be charged as single count if these acts can legitimately be characterized as part of single, continuing scheme or course of conduct.

[22] FRAUD ⇦ 68.10(3)
184k68.10(3)
General federal false statements law applies to statements made in response to congressional committee inquiries. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1001.

[23] FRAUD ⇦ 68.10(3)
184k68.10(3)
General federal false statements law is applicable to unsworn statements communicated by executive branch official to member of committee of Congress in informal circumstances. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1001.

[24] FRAUD ⇦ 68.10(1)
184k68.10(1)
General federal false statements law does not punish expressions of differences of opinions between representatives of two branches on policy issues, but only statements that are proven to be false. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1001.

[25] FRAUD ⇦ 68.10(1)
184k68.10(1)
President's unquestioned rule in constitutionally assigned functions of foreign affairs and national security may allow his advisor to be "less than forthcoming" about prospective foreign policy initiative; however, it does not allow such advisor to make false statements to Congress in violation of general federal false statements law. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1001.

[26] FRAUD ⇦ 68.10(4)
184k68.10(4)
Materiality of false statement is essential element of offense in prosecution under general federal false statement statute. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1001.

[27] FRAUD ⇦ 68.10(4)
184k68.10(4)
Test of materiality of false statement for purposes of general federal false statement statute is whether false statement has natural tendency to influence, or was capable of influencing, decision of tribunal in making determination required to be made. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1001.

[28] FRAUD ⇦ 68.10(1)
184k68.10(1)
Actual reliance by agency, department or committee to whom false statement was made is not element of offense under general federal false statement statute. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1001.

[29] FRAUD ⇦ 68.10(1)
184k68.10(1)
Despite defendant's contention that members of executive branch so commonly made false statements when required to provide information to Congress, particularly with respect to sensitive activities, without being prosecuted for their acts, that he was justified in believing that such action was not criminal, defendant charged with obstruction of Congress and violation of general false statement law was provided with sufficient fair notice that his conduct was criminal. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1001, 1505.

[29] OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE ⇦ 1
282k1
Despite defendant's contention that members of executive branch so commonly made false statements when required to provide information to

Congress, particularly with respect to sensitive activities, without being prosecuted for their acts, that he was justified in believing that such action was not criminal, defendant charged with obstruction of Congress and violation of general false statement law was provided with sufficient fair notice that his conduct was criminal. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1001, 1505.

[30] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⚿ 265
92k265
Due process does not require that Government cite litigated fact pattern directly on point as prerequisite to institution of criminal proceedings. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5.

[31] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 13.1(1)
110k13.1(1)
Prior litigation is prerequisite to prosecution for violation of statute only if particular law is ambiguous or fails to give to world in language that common world will understand notice of what law intends to do if certain line is passed.

[32] WITNESSES ⚿ 16
410k16
Defendant charged with obstruction of Congress and violation of general federal false statements law would be allowed subpoena duces tecum for specific, relevant documents in custody of former President or Archivist of United States on former President's behalf, where there was sufficient likelihood that, if claims made in defendant's proffer were correct, documents sought from former President would be material to defendant's defense. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1001, 1505.

[33] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⚿ 72
92k72
No individual, whatever his position, is exempt from obligation inherent in law to provide evidence, especially where such evidence is sought by defendant in criminal case in exercise of his constitutional right to mount defense to serious charges against him; however, respect for chief executive and head of branch of government coequal to judiciary dictates that production of evidence from sitting President not be coerced unless such evidence is necessary to defense and just resolution of cause.

[33] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 627.5(1)
110k627.5(1)
No individual, whatever his position, is exempt from obligation inherent in law to provide evidence, especially where such evidence is sought by defendant in criminal case in exercise of his constitutional right to mount defense to serious charges against him; however, respect for chief executive and head of branch of government coequal to judiciary dictates that production of evidence from sitting President not be coerced unless such evidence is necessary to defense and just resolution of cause.

[33] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1222.1
110k1222.1
Formerly 110k1222
No individual, whatever his position, is exempt from obligation inherent in law to provide evidence, especially where such evidence is sought by defendant in criminal case in exercise of his constitutional right to mount defense to serious charges against him; however, respect for chief executive and head of branch of government coequal to judiciary dictates that production of evidence from sitting President not be coerced unless such evidence is necessary to defense and just resolution of cause.

[34] WITNESSES ⚿ 16
410k16
Defendant charged with obstruction of Congress and violation of general federal false statements law would be denied subpoena duces tecum for vice presidential papers, even though defendant asserted that vice president knew about various activities relevant to case, where defendant did not and could not point to any vice presidential authorization for his activities, and even assuming authorization would be valid defense, papers appeared to be largely cumulative.

[35] RECORDS ⚿ 31
326k31
Provision of Classified Information Procedures Act which requires defendant to notify prosecution prior to trial of all classified information defense expects to use at trial is not unconstitutional. Classified Information Procedures Act, § 5(a), 18 U.S.C.A.App.; U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 5, 6.

[36] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 393(1)
110k393(1)

Classified Information Procedures Act, which requires that defendant notify prosecution prior to trial of all classified information defense expects to use at trial, does not impermissibly infringe defendant's Fifth Amendment right to be silent and right to testify in his own defense; statute does not require defendant to specify whether he will testify or what he will testify about, but rather, requires merely general disclosure as to what classified information will be used. Classified Information Procedures Act, § 5(a), 18 U.S.C.A.App.; U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5.

[36] RECORDS ⚿ 31
326k31
Classified Information Procedures Act, which requires that defendant notify prosecution prior to trial of all classified information defense expects to use at trial, does not impermissibly infringe defendant's Fifth Amendment right to be silent and right to testify in his own defense; statute does not require defendant to specify whether he will testify or what he will testify about, but rather, requires merely general disclosure as to what classified information will be used. Classified Information Procedures Act, § 5(a), 18 U.S.C.A.App.; U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5.

[37] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 662.1
110k662.1
Classified Information Procedures Act, which requires defendant to notify prosecution prior to trial of all classified information defense expects to use at trial, does not violate defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confront witnesses against him; statute requires defendant merely to identify universe of classified information he intends to use, it does not require that defendant attribute any particular piece of information to cross-examination of any particular witness. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 6; Classified Information Procedures Act, § 5(a), 18 U.S.C.A.App.

[38] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 121.1(7)
210k121.1(7)
Defendant was not entitled to bill of particulars, where particulars defendant requested went essentially only to evidentiary details and Government's legal theory.

[39] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 137(1)
210k137(1)
Terms "among other things," "among others," "among," "at least," "including," "included, but not limited to," "in part," and "various" could indicate to jury that defendant was charged with offenses and conduct in addition to those actually listed in indictment, and thus, terms would be stricken from indictment.

[40] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 137(1)
210k137(1)
Term "lethal" in relation to supplies being shipped to contras and description of military supplies as consisting of "millions of rounds" and "hundreds of thousands of pounds" in indictment arising out of Iran-contra affair would not be stricken; quantities described were apparently those involved, at least according to Government, and throughout relations between United States and contras, distinction between lethal and humanitarian assistance had been made.

[41] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 137(1)
210k137(1)
Despite defendant's contention that term "enterprise" was term of art well known under Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act, and that therefore use of term in indictment arising out of Iran-contra affair might suggest racketeering, term "enterprise" would not be stricken as prejudicial; term "enterprise" is fairly neutral description of activities of alleged conspirators, and if term means anything other than business to most individuals, it most likely evokes starship or space shuttle.

[42] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 137(1)
210k137(1)
Term "coverup" was inflammatory, especially in context of alleged criminal activity arising out of Iran-contra affair, and thus, term would be stricken from indictment.

[43] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 137(1)
210k137(1)
References, in indictment arising out of Iran-contra affair, to defendant's original codefendants and to press reports about shipments to Iran would not be stricken as irrelevant descriptive recitals; references to codefendants were relevant to obstruction of Congress and false statements charges, and press report references were necessary to understanding of background of congressional inquiries into activities of defendant with respect thereto. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1001, 1505.

[44] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 137(1)
210k137(1)
Reference, in indictment arising out of Iran-contra affair, to codefendant's discharge from his position and fact that defendant himself resigned from his position would be stricken as irrelevant; inclusion of facts could be taken by jury as objective indications of fault or of administration's determinations of fault, and thus, were prejudicial without any special relevance.

[45] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 137(1)
210k137(1)
Reference in obstruction of Congress indictment to Boland Amendment would not be stricken, despite defendant's contention that amendment had relevance, if at all, only to defendant's state of mind; amendment's restrictions were focus of congressional inquiries at issue, as well as of defendant's allegedly false and misleading statements, and thus, were relevant to indictment. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1505.

[46] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⚿ 144.1(1)
210k144.1(1)
Alleged prejudicial pretrial publicity arising out of Iran-contra affair did not establish grounds for dismissal of indictment charging obstruction of Congress and violation of general federal false statement statute. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1001, 1505.

[47] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 126(2)
110k126(2)
Alleged pretrial publicity did not warrant change of venue of prosecution for obstruction of Congress and violation of general false statement statute in connection with Iran-contra affair; not only was publicity not especially prejudicial to defendant, but publicity regarding Iran-contra affair, like that accompanying many other governmental white-collar criminal cases, was national rather than local. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1001, 1505.

[48] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 700(1)
110k700(1)
Dismissal for failure to follow policies of Department of Justice of indictment charging violation of general federal false statement statute and obstruction of Congress was not warranted; very nature of independent counsel's responsibilities suggest that it may not always be possible for him to follow the policies of Department of Justice. 28 U.S.C.A. § 594(f); 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1001, 1505.

[49] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 700(1)
110k700(1)
United States attorney's manual, by its own language, creates no rights in any party, and thus, failure of independent counsel to follow policy set forth in manual did not require dismissal of indictment charging obstruction of justice and violation of general federal false statement law in connection with Iran-contra affair. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 1001, 1505.

[50] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 700(1)
110k700(1)
Independent counsel's failure to present exculpatory evidence to grand jury did not require dismissal of indictment arising out of Iran-contra affair.

17 Lawrence Walsh, Washington, D.C., for plaintiff.

Richard Beckler, Washington, D.C., for defendant.

OPINION

18 HAROLD H. GREENE, District Judge.

[1]Defendant has filed a number of pretrial motions, the government has filed oppositions, and the Court has received replies and voluminous appendices. In general, the motions will be denied. Several of them are subject to denial on a fairly summary basis, either because Judge Gesell of this Court ruled on the issues adversely to defendant while the Poindexter matter was still pending before him, and the rulings are therefore the "law of the case," [FN1] or because there is direct appellate precedent in point contrary to the position taken by defendant.

FN1. The law of the case doctrine requires that, absent extraordinary and compelling circumstances, rulings made in earlier phases of particular litigation are binding in later phases of the same lawsuit. See International Union, UAW v. Donovan, 756 F.2d 162, 165 (D.C.Cir 1985); Laffey v. Northwest Airlines, Inc. 642 F.2d 578, 585 (D.C.Cir.1980); Laffey v. Northwest Airlines, Inc. 740 F.2d 1071, 1082-83 (D.C.Cir.1984) United States v. Eilberg, 553 F.Supp. 1, 3 (D.D.C.1981).

Notwithstanding these preliminary obstacles, the Court has subjected all of defendant's motions to careful analysis. Where it has concluded that a particular position taken by defendant is contrary to the law of the case or appellate precedent, it has nevertheless considered the merits, at least to the extent of satisfying itself that an injustice would not be done, in the context of this case, by following the previous rulings, or that some distinction did not exist between the situation here and that presented by the precedents. Other motions were of course considered under broader criteria. Not yet decided is defendant's motion pursuant to Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 92 S.Ct. 1653, 32 L.Ed.2d 212 (1972) with respect to which a number of issues are being set down for oral argument.

I Count One

Defendant has moved to dismiss Count One of the indictment, which charges him with a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371 by participation in a conspiracy, on two grounds: (1) that it alleges not one but several conspiracies and is therefore multiplicious; and (2) that to the extent that Count One incorporates Count Sixteen of the original indictment it fails to state an offense. The motion lacks merit and will be denied.

A. Multiplicity

[2] Defendant contends that Count One charges one conspiracy to make false statements and destroy documents which theoretically could have started in August 1985; another, to obstruct congressional inquiries, which began on July 25, 1986 and ended August 6, 1986; and a third, to obstruct other congressional inquiries, which began in November 1986; and that on this basis the count is fatally multiplicious. [FN2]

FN2. Ordinarily two or more distinct offenses may not be charged in a single count. 1 C. Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure: Criminal, § 142 (2d ed. 1982); but see, Part III--E infra.

[3][4][5][6] However, the Court concludes that Count One charges but a single conspiracy to defeat congressional inquiries into the defendants' Iran-contra activities by a variety of means, as necessary to conceal the conspirators' activities, and that this is a permissible and not multiplicious method of charging a conspiracy. [FN3] Neither a number of objects nor a numbers of means to effectuate those objects transforms a single conspiracy into several such agreements. See Braverman v. United 19 States, 317 U.S. 49, 53-54, 63 S.Ct. 99, 101-02, 87 L.Ed. 23 (1942), where the Supreme Court stated that "[w]hether the object of a single agreement is to commit one or many crimes, it is in either case that agreement which constitutes the conspiracy which the statute punishes. The one agreement cannot be taken to be several agreements and hence several conspiracies because it envisages the violation of several statutes rather than one ... [On this basis, the] allegation in a single count of a conspiracy to commit several crimes is not duplicitous....". See also, United States v. Treadwell, 760 F.2d 327, 336 (D.C.Cir.1985); United States v. Addonizio, 451 F.2d 49, 59-60 (3rd Cir.1972). [FN4] In fact, a single conspiracy count which includes allegations of several objects, several means, and several overt acts is more typical of criminal litigation in the federal courts--as, for example, in indictments charging violations of the drug laws--than the segmented charges defendant claims to be the only ones warranted by law. [FN5]

B. Incorporation of Count Sixteen

FN3. Contrary to defendant's contention (Reply Brief at 2-3, 7), there is no reason why a single conspiracy could not have as its object the obstruction of several legislative inquiries not overlapping as to time, into the same or of related subjects. As the Court of Appeals said in United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384, 1391 (D.C.Cir.1988), the existence of a single conspiracy or multiple conspiracies is primarily a question of fact for the jury. Defendant's attempt to distinguish Tarantino on the basis that the indictment here charges multiple conspiracies simply assumes the result.

FN4. Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1946), the famous spokes-of-the-wheel case and the only decision cited by defendant with even marginal relevance to the issue, involved a series of totally unrelated offenses tied together only through a "common key figure." That description does not fit the charges here.

FN5. For similar reasons, Count One is not duplicitous or multiplicitous in the sense that different proof may be required for each of the offenses alleged as objectives, inasmuch as the evidence would go toward establishing a single offense. See United States v. Hubbard, 474 F.Supp. 64, 71-72 (D.D.C.1979) (single conspiracy although the 59 overt acts constituting the means and objectives "can logically be grouped into separate categories"); United States v. Recognition Equipment, 711 F.Supp. 1, 7-9 (D.D.C.1989) (conspiracy charge included allegations of a kickback scheme, a scheme to replace the Postmaster General, theft of USPS property, mail and wire fraud, and corruption of USPS operations, but the court held that the indictment properly charged a single conspiracy to violate statutes and to impede the lawful functions of the USPS "by multiple and interrelated means" for the ultimate purpose of securing the contract for the defendant).

Count One, as narrowed by the government in August 1989, retains as one of its objects the violation by Poindexter's then codefendant Oliver North of 18 U.S.C. § 2071(b), as alleged in Count Sixteen of the original indictment. Count Sixteen, in turn, charged that North altered or caused to be altered certain memoranda of the National Security Council (NSC) that were in his custody. Defendant argues, first, that there could be no violation because the NSC is not a "public office" within the meaning of the statute, and second, that North did not have "custody" of the papers he allegedly falsified and destroyed. These arguments are likewise without merit.

[7] It is defendant's theory that a "public" office is only one to which the public customarily comes, as, for example, a Post Office window or a welfare office. To be sure, the term "public" office could conceivably be construed to mean just that; however, it could also be taken to mean a governmental office, as distinguished from a private one. There is not the slightest reason to suppose that, when Congress sought to protect governmental documents from destruction, concealment, or mutilation, it meant to single out those offices that are customarily visited by members of the public, while leaving unprotected those offices not accessible to the public where normally the more important and vital government records are kept.

It is accordingly not surprising that the reported decisions do not bear out defendant's theory. In Coplon v. United States, 191 F.2d 749 (D.C.Cir.1951), the Court of Appeals for this Circuit upheld the espionage conviction of a Department of Justice employee who had concealed and removed highly secret FBI reports located in Department of Justice offices not accessible to the public. In a similar vein, in McInerny v. United States, 143 F. 729 (1st Cir.1906), the First Circuit, discussing the categories of records protected by the predecessor statute of section 2071, mentioned such documents as the "report of a commanding general as to the operations of an army, or of a naval commander" [that when] "deposited or filed in the proper office, would clearly enough in the sense of 20 the statute be so far a record of the events to which it relates as to render a person responsible who takes it from its public place and destroys it." 143 F. at 133. [FN6]

FN6. The same conclusion was reached in United States v. North, 708 F.Supp. 364, 369 n. 3 (D.D.C.1988). Defendant's reliance to the contrary on Davidson v. United States, 292 F. 750 (3rd Cir.1923) is misplaced, for in that case not only was the conviction affirmed, but the records were truly not public records; they were the records of a bankrupt, title to which remained with the trustee, which had merely been left with the bankruptcy referee, but had not even filed in the bankruptcy proceeding.

[8][9] These cases only acknowledge the obvious. Even if there were no such decisions, the Court would not lightly hold, absent compelling legislative history, that Congress intended to restrict the statute to the protection of the often relatively unimportant documents found in areas where the public has access while withholding that protection from the documents of the National Security Council [FN7] in whose integrity the public and the government have the highest interest. [FN8]

FN7. The Court also rejects defendant's argument that application of section 2071 to NSC documents would intrude upon the constitutionally-based doctrine of executive privilege. Defendant's Memorandum at 16-17. That statute, of course, applies only to the unlawful destruction or removal of official records, and as such it does not impact the functioning of the Presidency. See Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 439-55, 97 S.Ct. 2777, 2788-96, 53 L.Ed.2d 867 (1977), where the Supreme Court held that even the required processing of Presidential papers, with no claim of criminality, did not improperly invade Executive power.

FN8. See also, 44 U.S.C. §§ 2201-2207, Presidential Records Act of 1978, whose purpose it was "to establish public ownership of records created by future Presidents and their staff in the course of discharging their official duties." (emphasis added) H.R.Rep. No. 95-1487, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 2 (1978), reprinted in 1978 U.S.Code Cong. & Adm.News 5732, 5733. The government has asserted that it will prove at trial that NSC staff members were informed that documents in the central files of the NSC were official governmental records that could not be destroyed or otherwise tampered with.

[10] Defendant's argument regarding "custody" suffers from similar artificiality. There is no warrant for supposing, and no legislative history suggesting, that Congress meant to subject to punishment under section 2071 only those who are the custodians of records in the technical sense, such as clerks or librarians, but to permit others working in a government agency who have access to sensitive documents to destroy or alter them with impunity. The obvious purpose of the statute is to prohibit the impairment of sensitive government documents by those officials who have access to and control over them, and no court has ever held to the contrary. See generally, Coplon, supra, where the defendant was found to have custody of classified documents to which she gained access in the course of her employment as an attorney in the Internal Security Section of the Department of Justice. Not only was she not the official "custodian" of the records, but she had specifically been told that she no longer had routine access to them.

The motion to dismiss Count One is denied.

II
Counts Two and Three

Count Two of the indictment alleges that from July 21 to August 6, 1986, defendant obstructed and endeavored to obstruct inquiries being had by several committees of the House of Representatives in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1505. This obstruction is alleged to have occurred basically in two ways: (1) by the dispatch of letters to the committees on July 21, 1986 which were false, and (2) by making arrangements for a meeting between House members and Oliver North in the course of which North made a number of false statements. Both of these activities are alleged to have been intended to obstruct the inquiry of the House committees. According to defendant, Count Two fails to state an offense on various grounds.

A. Failure to Inform Defendant of the Offense

[11][12] A defendant must, of course, be advised by the indictment of the specific 21 charge against him in order to enable him to prepare a defense and to protect him against double jeopardy. Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 117-18, 94 S.Ct. 2887, 2907-2908, 41 L.Ed.2d 590 (1974); United States v. Conlon, 628 F.2d 150, 155-56 (D.C.Cir.1980); United States v. Shorter, 608 F.Supp. 871, 874 n. 2 (D.D.C.1985), aff'd. 809 F.2d 54 (D.C.Cir.1987); United States v. Madeoy, 652 F.Supp. 371, 374 (D.D.C.1987). An indictment is sufficient in this regard if it contains the elements of the offense and enough detail to apprise the defendant of the particular offense with which he is charged. Conlon, id. at 155. See also, Fed.R.Crim.P. 7(c)(1). The indictment in this case meets these requirements.

[13] Paragraph 11 of Count Two clearly details the elements of the offense of obstruction of Congress: that Poindexter knowingly and corruptly obstructed the due and proper exercise of the power of inquiry under which investigations were being had by congressional committees, to wit, the consideration of a proposed resolution by the committees in question, and that he did so by making and causing to be made false statements and representations to these committees, for the purpose of concealing material facts.

It may be that this paragraph is by itself adequate to protect Count Two against a claim of insufficient notice of the charges. In any event, the count contains additional specificity, for while the factual allegations contained therein are somewhat disjointed, they adequately apprise the defendant of the factual basis for the charge against which he must defend.

[14] Defendant's claim focuses on paragraphs 7 through 10 of Count Two. Paragraph 7 states that defendant's July 21 letters, which referred to 1985 letters, were false and misleading because, as defendant "well knew and believed, the 1985 letters ... would not have been a truthful response to the 1986 inquiries." It is defendant's position that, because Count Two does not identify the 1985 letters further or specify in what manner they were false, the allegation is vague and does not permit him properly to prepare for trial on this charge. However, the reference to "the 1985 letters" in paragraph 7, together with the reference to Robert C. McFarlane in paragraph 5 (the author of the letters), and that to previous information "provided by this office" in paragraph 6, furnish sufficient information to defendant about "the 1985 letters" to enable him to prepare his defense and to protect him against double jeopardy. [FN9]

> FN9. The Court also takes note that the 1985 letters were identified in considerable detail in Counts Five through Seven of the original indictment in this case.

Defendant further claims that paragraphs 8 through 10 fail to allege any additional acts of obstruction with the requisite specificity. [FN10] Paragraph 8 states that, in response to a request from the Chairman of the House intelligence committee, and "in accordance with arrangements made and approved by the defendant POINDEXTER," Oliver North met with members and staff of the committee to answer questions relating to the Iran-contra affair. Paragraph 9 goes on to allege that in the course of the meeting, North made numerous specified false and misleading statements intended to obstruct the Committee's inquiry. Finally, paragraph 10 avers that following that meeting, Poindexter, knowing that North's representations had been false, nevertheless sent a message to him stating, "Well done."

> FN10. It is not clear that defendant's motion would prevail even if he were correct in that claim, for Count Two would charge an offense even if it did not contain paragraphs 8 through 10.

The precise discussions between Poindexter and North prior to the meeting on August 6 are not averred. However, the relevant paragraphs, in conjunction with the "Well Done" congratulation following the false statements at the meeting--about which Poindexter knew--make clear that Poindexter is alleged to have arranged for North to lie to the committee members and staff so as to obstruct their inquiry. To the extent that it might be argued that the language did not adequately inform defendant of the alleged criminality, this was 22 certainly done by the juxtaposition of these factual charges with paragraph 11 which relates the facts to an obstruction. The Court concludes that paragraphs 8 through 11 as well as paragraph 7 provide the defendant with enough factual detail to enable him to prepare his defense.

B. Due and Proper Inquiry

[15] Defendant contends next that the congressional inquiries at issue in Counts Two and Three were insufficiently formal to be protected against obstruction, and that they lacked the necessary compulsion. It is established, however, that the statute protects preliminary and informal inquiries against obstruction as well as formal proceedings. United States v. Mitchell, 877 F.2d 294 (4th Cir.1989); United States v. North, 708 F.Supp. 385, 386 (D.D.C.1988); see also, Rice v. United States, 356 F.2d 709, 712 (8th Cir.1966); United States v. Fruchtman, 421 F.2d 1019 (6th Cir.1970). Defendant's reliance to the contrary on McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 47 S.Ct. 319, 71 L.Ed. 580 (1927) is misplaced. That case holds only that Congress may use compulsory process to exercise its power of inquiry, not that all other means for exercising that power are invalid.

[16] In a related argument, defendant claims that the committees violated their own rules and those of the House of Representatives, and that for that reason the inquiries in question were not "due and proper" exercises of the power of inquiry. [FN11]

However, to the extent that defendant cites authority for that claim, it stands only for the proposition that a witness from whom a committee seeks to compel answers has a right to insist that the proper procedures be followed. See, e.g., Yellin v. United States, 374 U.S. 109, 83 S.Ct. 1828, 10 L.Ed.2d 778 (1963); Liveright v. United States, 347 F.2d 473 (D.C.Cir.1965). What the cases do not hold is that, when a congressional committee is engaged in a less formal inquiry--as committees frequently do, in advance or in lieu of formal, sworn hearings--the witnesses are free to lie and otherwise to obstruct the body without fear of the law of obstruction. The Court of Appeals for this Circuit said in Shimon v. United States, 352 F.2d 449, 450 (D.C.Cir.1965), that "Congress' concern with the obstruction of justice may not be avoided by such empty technicalities;" and the Fourth Circuit recently reiterated

> FN11. Among the rules allegedly violated was House Rule XI which requires committee meetings to be open to the public, compels the committees to keep a complete record of their proceedings, requires the chairman to announce the subject of the investigation at the start of any hearing, and allows each witness to obtain a transcript of the proceedings.

> The question of whether a given congressional investigation is a 'due and proper exercise of the power of inquiry' for purposes of § 1505 can not be answered by a myopic focus on formality. Rather, it is properly answered by a careful examination of all the surrounding circumstances. If it is apparent that the investigation is a legislative exercise of investigative authority by a congressional committee in an area within the committee's purview, it should be protected by § 1505.

Mitchell, 877 F.2d at 300-01; see also, United States v. Sutton, 732 F.2d 1483, 1490 (10th Cir.1984). [FN12]

> FN12. The questions raised by the committees must of course be within their jurisdiction--as they were here.

C. Political Question

Defendant next contends that a scrutiny of his letters would be equivalent to a scrutiny of the President's conduct and pronouncements, and that on this basis Count Two presents a political question beyond the competence of the Judiciary under the separation of powers, Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217, 82 S.Ct. 691, 710, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962), particularly since foreign policy and national security were implicated. Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280, 292, 101 S.Ct. 2766, 2774, 69 L.Ed.2d 640 (1981); C. & S. AirLines v. Waterman Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 111, 68 S.Ct. 431, 436, 92 L.Ed. 568 (1948). More specifically, he asserts that "the crux of the obstruction of Congress allegation is a statement made on behalf of 23 and after consultation with the President ... [that] expressed the President's belief that the Administration was in compliance" [with the Boland Amendment]. Defendant's Memorandum at 24. Defendant goes on to say that, since the President had declared through his spokesmen that the NSC staff had not been in violation of either the spirit or the letter of the law, to pursue Count Two would be "to call into question" the "presidential pronouncements.... The clear implication of a guilty verdict on.... Count two would be either that President Reagan lied on these other occasions or that he had no grasp of what he was talking about in the area of foreign affairs. Either way, a showing of an absolute lack of respect for the President would result." Defendant's Memorandum at 26-27.

[17] The Court does not know at this juncture whether the defendant made his statements "after consultation with the President" nor does the Court know whether these statements represented the President's views. That may or may not have been so; at this time we have only defendant's version of his discussion with President Reagan. But see, Part V-B infra. In any event, the political question doctrine does not leave it to the President to determine whether a member of his staff has violated the criminal law, nor does it protect members of any branch of government from revelations of wrongdoing or ignorance.

[18] Nothing in this case would require the Court to adjudicate foreign policy issues, a subject plainly beyond its competence; all that is involved is the question whether one particular individual--this defendant--has violated the laws proscribing obstruction of Congress, a subject not beyond the Court's jurisdiction. The Supreme Court has instructed the lower courts that it would be "error to suppose that every case or controversy that touches foreign relations lies beyond judicial cognizance." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. at 211, 82 S.Ct. at 707; see also, Japan Whaling Association v. American Cetacean Society, 478 U.S. 221, 227, 106 S.Ct. 2860, 2864, 92 L.Ed.2d 166 (1986); United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 694, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3100, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974). The political question defense is therefore rejected.

D. Count Three

[19][20] Defendant claims that Count Three is based on false statements alone, and that on this basis, under United States v. Griffin, 589 F.2d 200, 205 (5th Cir.1979), the indictment should have alleged that the statements had the actual effect of impeding a congressional inquiry. See also, United States v. Perkins, 748 F.2d 1519 (11th Cir.1984). The short answer to that contention is that the obstruction statute prohibits an "endeavor to" obstruct as well as a completed obstruction. See, United States v. Russell, 255 U.S. 138, 41 S.Ct. 260, 65 L.Ed. 553 (1921); United States v. Jackson, 513 F.2d 456, 460 (D.C.Cir.1975). [FN13] It follows that an obstructive effect is not a prerequisite to a violation.

> FN13. Moreover, Griffin, the precedent principally relied on by defendant, was recently rejected by the Fifth Circuit which had authored that decision. See United States v. Williams, 874 F.2d 968, 980-81 (5th Cir.1989).

Beyond that, Count Three is not premised solely on false statements; several additional acts of obstruction are charged. According to the indictment, the House and Senate intelligence committees began to inquire in early November 1986 into reports that the government was selling arms to Iran, and they decided to seek the testimony of defendant Poindexter, in addition to CIA Director William J. Casey, on that issue. Arrangements were made for a meeting with Poindexter on November 21, 1986 and, in anticipation of that meeting, defendant directed his subordinates, including Oliver North, to prepare a chronology of events leading to the arms shipments, to be used at the meeting. The final version of the chronology, it is claimed, deliberately misrepresented the time the government first learned of the shipment of Hawk missiles to Iran, and in his appearances Poindexter made false statements to the congressional 24 delegation corresponding to the chronology.

Additionally, defendant allegedly sought to obstruct the committees by deleting stored messages from his files in the NSC computer system that would have revealed his activities in relation to the Iran initiative and in the provision of assistance to the Contras. All these actions are said to have been taken with the specific purpose of obstructing the inquiries of the congressional committees and of concealing facts that were material to these inquiries and that would have prolonged them had they been truthfully disclosed. In short, the allegations in Count Three go beyond false statements; the indictment alleges that defendant committed other acts of obstruction as well, and on that basis, too, the argument based on Griffin must be rejected.

E. Duplicity

[21] Defendant finally contends with respect to Counts Two and Three that they are each impermissibly duplicitous because he is charged in each count with obstructing more than one congressional committee by more than one method. Accordingly, says the defendant, these counts must be either dismissed or modified. However, it does not follow that, because a count alleges several acts, each of which could constitute a separate offense, each such act must be charged as a separate count or be dismissed for duplicity. On the contrary, as discussed in Part I supra, two or more acts which could be charged as separate offenses may be charged as a single count if these acts can legitimately be characterized as part of a single, continuing scheme or course of conduct. See United States v. Mangieri, 694 F.2d 1270, 1282 (D.C.Cir.1982); United States v. Shorter, 809 F.2d 54, 56 (D.C.Cir.1987). Indeed, a contrary rule would risk unfairness to the defendant who might otherwise be subjected to multiple punishments for a single criminal episode. Any dangers presented by the prosecution of a defendant by way of a single count with more than one allegation of criminal conduct--such as the possibility that the jury would render a guilty verdict without unanimity regarding the events in question--can be more than adequately controlled through instructions to the jury.

III
Counts Four and Five

Count Four of the indictment charges defendant with violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001, in that he allegedly falsely told members of the Senate and House intelligence committees (1) that he did not learn until January 1986 that Hawk missiles had been shipped to Iran two months earlier, and (2) that he had not learned until November 20, 1986 that anyone in the United States government had prior knowledge of the shipment of such missiles to Iran in November 1985. The allegation is that defendant had, in fact, been advised by Oliver North by November 20, 1985 that such a shipment was about to take place, and in November and December 1985 that a shipment of Hawk missiles had occurred.

Count Five of the indictment charges a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001, in that defendant allegedly falsely told members of the Senate intelligence committee that he had not learned until January 1986 that Hawk missiles had been shipped to Iran in November 1985, when in fact Oliver North had advised him in November and December 1985 that such a shipment was about to take place, and he was further advised by North that such a shipment had taken place.

Defendant requests that these counts be dismissed for failure to state offenses under section 1001; that the statute may not be applied to unsworn statements by an Executive Branch official; that the statute does not provide fair notice to him that his conduct was prohibited by law; and that the false statements he allegedly made were not material.

A. Statements made to Congress

[22] Defendant contends most broadly that section 1001--the general federal false statements law--does not apply to statements made with respect to the non-administrative 25 functions of the Legislative Branch. While conceding that no case has ever carved out such an exception, he urges that, inasmuch as the courts have held that the statute does not apply to the adjudicative functions of the Judicial Branch, this Court should, on the same basis, hold that the law does not apply to the Congress (except for its administrative functions).

It is quite correct that several courts have decided that a person may not be convicted under section 1001 for statements made in the course of judicial proceedings. See United States v. Rodgers, 466 U.S. 475, 483 n. 4, 104 S.Ct. 1942, 1948 n. 4, 80 L.Ed.2d 492 (1984), for a collection of the relevant cases; and in this jurisdiction see, Morgan v. United States, 309 F.2d 234, 237 (D.C.Cir.1962). Even if this Court were inclined to draw the parallel defendant invites it to draw between the Judicial and the Legislative Branches in this respect--and it is not [FN14]--the Court of Appeals for this Circuit has determined that section 1001 applies to congressional committee inquiries.

> FN14. To do so would, inter alia, result in an interpretation of the law that punished the deception of Congress in trivial "administrative" contexts, while permitting deceptions that affect the core functions of the Legislative Branch. Moreover, the court in Morgan rested its decision on the problems that would arise in the judicial context were the statute applied to "traditional trial tactics," 309 F.2d at 237--a consideration that does not apply to statements made to the Congress.

In United States v. Hansen, 772 F.2d 940, 943-44 (D.C.Cir.1985), that court, speaking through Judge (now Justice) Scalia explicitly and unambiguously held that a House committee is a "department" for purposes of section 1001, since that term "was meant to describe the executive, legislative and judicial branches of the Government" (citing Bramblett infra). [FN15] It further expressly held that the term "jurisdiction" encompasses an investigation by a congressional committee. Id. In other words, Hansen has authoritatively decided that a congressional investigation is "a ... matter within the jurisdiction of any department of the United States." That, of course, ends the matter as far as this Court is concerned.

> FN15. Defendant's effort to characterize the Hansen case as one which, unlike the instant case, involves only housekeeping functions, is unavailing, for three reasons. First, the Hansen court did not suggest any distinction between congressional housekeeping and legislative functions, so as to include the former and exempt the latter. Second, it hardly makes sense to classify a congressional investigation of Hansen, a Member of Congress, as "housekeeping," while regarding an inquiry into the behavior of Executive officials, such as defendant, as legislative. Third, inquiries that begin as housekeeping matters frequently have the potential to result in legislative investigations--which is precisely what happened in Hansen--thus rendering impractical the distinction defendant seeks to draw. In addition to Hansen, see also, United States v. Bramblett, 348 U.S. 503, 75 S.Ct. 504, 99 L.Ed. 594 (1955); United States v. D'Amato, 507 F.2d 26 (2d Cir.1974); United States v. Diggs, 613 F.2d 988 (D.C.Cir.1979); North, 708 F.Supp. at 383-84.

B. Unsworn and Informal Communications to Congress

[23] Defendant contends next that section 1001 may not properly be applied to an unsworn statement communicated by an Executive Branch official to a member or a committee of Congress in informal circumstances.

As discussed in Part II above, Poindexter, who was not under subpoena to meet with the members of the intelligence committees, nevertheless agreed to meet with some of these members and their staffs at the White House. According to his motion, the purpose of the meeting was to provide policy background prior to the taking of the sworn testimony of CIA Director Casey; Poindexter himself was not to appear for the actual hearings; the White House conference did not include the trappings of a formal committee meeting; he was not placed under oath; and no verbatim transcript was maintained. In short, the meeting partook of none of the formalities of a full-fledged congressional hearing.

Defendant predicts that the application of the false statements statute in that kind of setting would have a chilling effect on communications between the two branches of government. As he notes, "[o]fficials in 26 the Executive Branch routinely communicate with Congress concerning an enormous range of subjects relating to the business of government, including proposed legislation, matters under investigation by Congress, actions taken or contemplated by the Executive Branch, Congress's oversight of the Executive Branch, budget requests, treaties, and presidential appointments. Such communications may be written or oral, formal or informal, and may involve individuals at any level of the Executive Branch and either members of Congress or other staffs." Defendant's Memorandum at 19. In this view, the situation is aggravated by the fact that section 1001 prohibits false statements in the broadest sense. [FN16]

FN16. Section 1001 has been held to prohibit not only false statements concerning objective facts but also false statements concerning intent. See Corcoran v. United States, 229 F.2d 295 (5th Cir.1956). It has been held to prohibit not only statements that are false but also those that fail to disclose a material fact. See United States v. Mattox, 689 F.2d 531, 533 (5th Cir.1982). It has also been held to reach statements not only made directly to the federal government but also statements submitted to nonfederal agencies receiving federal funds. See United States v. Petullo, 709 F.2d 1178, 1180 (7th Cir.1983). And it has been held applicable even to false statements in records subject to government inspection. See Gonzales v. United States, 286 F.2d 118 (10th Cir.1960).

The Court is not unsympathetic to these considerations. It may indeed be that the application of section 1001 to statements made by Executive officials in the course of informal contacts with congressional officers would complicate future relationships between the two branches and thus could disrupt the orderly functioning of government. At a minimum, it could eventuate that the Executive officials would be more stilted and careful and less forthcoming than they might otherwise be.

[24] On the other hand, it cannot be gainsaid that the chill defendant forecasts between the Executive and the Legislative Branches on account of false statement prosecutions may be nothing more than the natural consequence of the deterrent effect of the criminal law. After all, section 1001 does not punish expressions of differences of opinion between representatives of the two branches on policy issues, but only statements that are proven to be false. Moreover, as the government notes, at this juncture it is only speculation that enforcement of section 1001, as in the instant case, would damage communications between Congress and the Executive. Should such damage occur, the appropriate forum for a policy-driven exception to the statute would be the political branches, not the Judiciary.

[25] In any event, here again, the Court is not writing on a clean slate. In Marzani v. United States, 168 F.2d 133 (D.C.Cir.), aff'd by an equally divided Court, 335 U.S. 895, 69 S.Ct. 299, 93 L.Ed. 431 (1948), the Court of Appeals upheld a conviction of a government employee who had lied about his past Communist connections. The court took note of the defendant's objection

> ... that the statements were not under oath and were not stenographically transcribed; that the interview was at appellant's request; that there were only two participants in the conference; that they addressed each other by their first names, and that they discussed a variety of topics.

Id. at 141-42. But, said the court, the statute

> ... does not limit the offense to formal statements, to written statements, or to statements under oath. It applies to 'any false or fraudulent statements or representations, ... in any matter with the jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States.'

Id. at 142. This Court is of course bound by that determination and will follow it. [FN17]

> FN17. Nor would the Court be justified in drawing the distinction defendant asks it to draw between ordinary citizens and officials of the Executive Branch. In our free, constitutional system, such a distinction would be proper only if it were clearly required by a mandate of the policymaking branches of government. No such mandate is present here. On a similar basis, the Court rejects defendant's argument that the application of section 1001 to communications from the President's advisor on foreign affairs and national security would be improperly to invade the Presidential prerogatives in these two areas. The President's unquestioned role in these constitutionally assigned functions may allow his advisor to be "less than forthcoming about prospective foreign policy initiatives," Defendant's Memorandum at 23; it does not allow such an advisor to make false statements to the Congress.

27 C. Materiality

[26][27] Defendant also argues that the allegedly false statements he made were not material to the committees' inquiries. Materiality is an essential element of the offense in a prosecution such as this. Freidus v. United States, 223 F.2d 598, 601 (D.C.Cir.1955); Weinstock v. United States, 231 F.2d 699, 701 (D.C.Cir.1956). The test of materiality is "whether the false statement has a natural tendency to influence, or was capable of influencing, the decision of the tribunal in making a determination required to be made." Weinstock at 701-02; see also, Hansen, supra.

Defendant contends that the element of materiality is lacking here because the indictment does not allege that element and the government cannot prove actual reliance by the committees on his allegedly false statements. Neither claim is justified.

[28] The indictment alleges both in Count Four and in Count Five that defendant "unlawfully, willfully, and knowingly made and caused to be made material false, fictitious, and fraudulent statements and representations ..." (emphasis added). Insofar as proof is concerned, defendant's formulation represents a mistaken view of the law. The Court of Appeals has plainly said that "proof of actual reliance is not required; the Government need only make a reasonable showing of its potential effects." Hansen, 772 F.2d at 949; see also, United States v. Diggs, 613 F.2d 988, 999 (D.C.Cir.1979). This formulation of the appropriate standard by the Court of Appeals does not include the element defendant claims to be critical: that of actual reliance. See also, United States v. Quirk, 167 F.Supp. 462, 464 (E.D.Pa.), aff'd, 266 F.2d 26 (3d Cir.1959). In any event, it will be for those who evaluate the trial evidence to decide whether the government has proved materiality.

Defendant claims, more directly, that representations regarding his personal knowledge of the Hawk shipment to Iran were not material; that the committees were inquiring far more broadly into the participation of the United States government as such in sales of weapons to that country. That, again, is too cramped a view of the scope of congressional inquiries and of the concept of materiality. To be sure, the committees were investigating the issue of United States government involvement in sales of arms to Iran. But it was plainly material to that inquiry when the defendant--the President's principal advisor on national security and the senior official of the NSC, the body identified with the Iran initiative--first learned of government involvement in the shipment of arms to that country.

The motion to dismiss Counts Four and Five of the indictment is denied.

IV
Fair Notice Under Statute

Defendant contends, in a separate motion, that sections 1001 and 1505 of Title 18 failed to provide him with fair notice that his conduct was criminal, and that this vice infects Counts Two through Five. He does not, he cannot, argue that these statutes are impermissibly vague as not providing notice to one and all that it is a crime knowingly to make false statements to congressional bodies, as to other government agencies, or that it is a crime to deliberately obstruct investigations or inquiries by such entities. Both sections have been applied and sustained too many times for that argument to be seriously made.

[29] Defendant's point is both narrower and broader: it is that members of the Executive Branch so commonly make false statements when required to provide information to Congress, particularly with respect to sensitive activities, without ever having been prosecuted for their acts, that 28 he was justified in believing that such action was not criminal. Defendant's Memorandum at 2-3, 8, 12-14. The Court rejects this notion for several reasons.

[30][31] First, it is simply not true that no Executive official had ever been prosecuted prior to the Iran-contra affair on the charge of lying to a congressional committee. See United States v. Lavelle, 751 F.2d 1266 (D.C.Cir.1985). Second, due process does not require that the government cite a "litigated fact pattern directly on point" as a prerequisite to the institution of criminal proceedings. United States v. Mallas, 762 F.2d 361, 364 (4th Cir.1985). It would therefore be irrelevant if Executive officials had not previously been prosecuted for false statements to Congress. [FN18] Third, Congress made it clear by enactment of the Hughes-Ryan Amendment, 50 U.S.C. § 413, which imposes substantial reporting requirements on the Executive Branch relating to intelligence activities, that it expects Executive officials to tell the truth when reporting to Congress with respect to such activities. Thus, if, as defendant claims, there is a pattern of lying by Executive officials when reporting to the Congress, [FN19] the proper response under Hughes-Ryan would be to end that practice rather than to sanction it by accepting it as a defense to a criminal charge. Finally, as Judge Gesell stated in North, it would come as no surprise to an ordinary citizen that section 1001 prohibits the making of false statements to a government agency; nor should it come as a surprise to a high government official. 708 F.Supp. at 368.

FN18. Prior litigation is a prerequisite only if the particular law is ambiguous or fails to give "to the world in language that the common world will understand [notice] of what the law intends to do if a certain line is passed." McBoyle v. United States, 283 U.S. 25, 27, 51 S.Ct. 340, 341, 75 L.Ed. 816 (1931).

FN19. The Court of course has neither the ability nor the jurisdiction to make a judgment on that issue.

Defendant's motion to dismiss Counts II through V for lack of fair notice is denied.

V
Subpoenas Duces Tecum

Defendant has moved under F.R.Crim.P. Rule 17(c) for an order setting a pretrial return date at least sixty days before trial for subpoenas duces tecum. The government opposes the motion as premature and nonspecific. Defendant has also requested the production of documents from former President Reagan and former Vice President Bush. [FN20]

FN20. In order to minimize confusion, the Court will generally refer herein to President George Bush as Vice President Bush--the position he occupied at the time of the events which are the subject of this criminal action--and to former President Ronald Reagan as President Reagan.

A. General

Defendant argues that the pretrial production of documents by way of subpoena is necessitated by the large volume of papers known to exist relating to a variety of critical issues--evidentiary materials in the possession of government officials, including members of Congress and Presidents Reagan and Bush; highly sensitive intelligence reports relevant, inter alia, to a demonstration of knowledge and approval of defendant's activities and those of his alleged co-conspirators; documents relevant and necessary to prepare for the cross-examination of government witnesses; and documents relating to the issue of defendant's intent. Defendant's Motion at 2-3. This list is disquieting, for it parallels in substantial part the discovery motion defendant has filed and which the Court ruled on in detail under date of September 11, 1989. [FN21]

> FN21. This disquiet is not significantly alleviated by defendant's observation that, to the extent that the government complies with its obligation to produce documents in the possession of Executive Branch agencies, some, but not all of this evidence will not be sought by subpoena. Defendant's Motion at 3 note 2.

On that basis, the Court cannot but concur with the government's observation that pretrial return dates ought not be used improperly as blank checks for the use of 29 trial subpoenas duces tecum as a supplemental discovery device. See United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974); United States v. Ferguson, 37 F.R.D. 6 (D.D.C.1965). The government also suggests that, under established law, the Court should delay dates and make rulings only on specific subpoenas to specific witnesses calling for the production of specific, identified materials.

The Court appreciates that, with respect at least to some documents, the litigation of such issues as privilege may take some time, and that an early return date is for that reason warranted. On the other hand, the Court is not prepared to hand to defendant a blank check for the issuance of wide-ranging subpoenas to government officials and others, either to duplicate discovery already allowed or to secure discovery that the Court rejected. In order to accommodate the various legitimate interests, the Court will order a return date forty days in advance of the trial, that is, December 13, 1989, with respect to specific subpoenas for clearly identified, relevant evidence, after application therefor is made.

B. Presidential and Vice Presidential Documents

On September 11, 1989, in ruling upon defendant's discovery requests, the Court stated with respect to a demand for notes and diaries maintained by and for President Reagan and Vice President Bush, that it would defer a decision thereon, pending the filing of (1) legal memoranda from both parties on the question whether the Independent Counsel could be required to produce documents maintained by President Reagan, in view of the Presidential Records and Materials Preservation Act, 44 U.S.C.A. § 2101 et seq.; and (2) a more specific proffer from defendant as to the involvement of these two high officials in the events which led to his indictment. These papers have now been submitted.

First. The issue of the method of securing access to the Reagan documents has been resolved. The Independent Counsel submitted a memorandum which concluded that the Presidential Records Act grants to former President Reagan and to the Archivist of the United States, but not to counsel for the government, access to and control over these papers. Defendant responded by stating that, while he did not necessarily agree with the Independent Counsel's legal conclusions, he was willing to forgo production through that official by means of Rule 16, F.R.Crim.P., but would instead seek to access the Presidential and Vice Presidential documents by means of a subpoena duces tecum pursuant to Criminal Rule 17. Not only does this agreement settle the issue of the method of production; it is also preferable from the point of view of clarity. If any claims of privilege are advanced, they may be made directly, in response to the subpoena, rather than through the circuitous route of an objection made to the Independent Counsel who would then, in turn, pass such claims on to defendant and the Court.

Second. Defendant's more specific proffer concerning the materiality of the Presidential and Vice Presidential documents was submitted in camera (to avoid the disclosure of possibly privileged documents) and ex parte (to avoid revelation of defense strategy to the prosecution in advance of trial). The memorandum embodying that proffer, with various exhibits, was carefully examined by the Court.

According to that proffer, President Reagan met with Poindexter daily, frequently alone; [FN22] they routinely had conversations with regard to national security matters, including, among other things, the Iran initiative and the Contra support program; assistance to the Contras by third countries; the role of Richard Secord as a middleman in the transfer of arms to Iran; private and third country fundraising for the Contras; the depth of the Administration's commitment to the Contras and its desire to continue to provide military support 30 to them; the Administration's view of the relationship between the Boland Amendment and the National Security Council, and the application of that statute to the NSC; the Administration's view of the resolution of inquiry under consideration by the House Foreign Affairs Committee and on the accuracy of the chronology prepared by Oliver North and reviewed by Poindexter.

FN22. This is in sharp contrast to the relationship between President Reagan and Oliver North, who may have never seen the President on a one-to-one basis.

[32] On a number of these issues, it is claimed, President Reagan formulated the Administration's position for the guidance of Poindexter (and sometimes others). On other issues, Mr. Reagan allegedly entertained Poindexter's plans without voicing any objection. It appears that notes were taken by the President and others on these conversations and, according to defendant, these notes or Presidential diary entries made pursuant thereto would support his defense to the charges in the various counts of the indictment.

If the claims made in defendant's proffer are correct--a matter which the Court of course cannot and does not evaluate at this stage of the proceedings [FN23] but, in view of the specificity of defendant's proffer, [FN24] accepts as true for present purposes--there is "a sufficient likelihood" that the documents sought from President Reagan would be material to the Poindexter defense. [FN25] Accordingly, if the defendant submits to the Court subpoenas duces tecum for specific, relevant documents in the custody of former President Reagan or of the Archivist of the United States on his behalf, with a return date sixty days in advance of trial, that is, November 23, 1989, the Court will authorize their issuance.

FN23. Only the papers themselves can provide the answer.

FN24. To preserve the in camera character of the proffer, its details are discussed herein only to the extent necessary for an explanation of the rationale underlying the Court's ruling.

FN25. United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 700, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3103, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1973). The Court concludes that the defendant has made the showing required by Rule 17(c): (1) that the documents appear to be evidentiary and relevant; (2) that they are not otherwise procurable reasonably in advance of trial by exercise of due diligence; (3) that he cannot properly prepare for trial without such production and inspection in advance of trial and that failure to obtain such inspection may tend unreasonably to delay the trial; and (4) that the application is made in good faith and is not intended as a general "fishing expedition." Id.

[33][34] Third. The situation is different as concerns Vice President Bush. Although defendant asserts that the then Vice President knew about various activities relevant to this case, he does not and could not point to a Vice Presidential authorization of his activities as a defense--assuming for present purposes that authorization by a superior would be a valid defense--for the Vice President had no operational authority with respect to Poindexter. Regarding other subjects, e.g., the claimed knowledge by high officials of defendant's activities, it appears to the Court, at least on the present showing, that the Vice Presidential papers may be largely cumulative. Therefore, based on that showing, and because of the deference due the incumbent President, [FN26] the Court denies defendant's request for the Bush papers at this time. [FN27]

FN26. No individual, whatever his position, is exempt from the obligation inherent in our laws to provide evidence, especially where such evidence is sought by a defendant in a criminal case in the exercise of his constitutional right to mount a defense to serious charges against him. However, respect for the Chief Executive and head of a branch of government co-equal to the Judiciary dictates that the production of evidence from a sitting President not be coerced, by subpoena or otherwise, unless such evidence is necessary to the defense and a just resolution of the cause.

FN27. The Court's decision on this issue is obviously without prejudice to its reevaluation in the event that the defendant is able at a later point to make the case for a more pressing need for the documents in his defense against the charges.

Fourth. The Independent Counsel apparently has in his possession copies of an notes based upon some Presidential documents, Memorandum, at 16 and n. 7, and defendant requests the production of these papers. There is, however, a question of privilege at least as to some of the notes prepared by Independent Counsel attorneys. In any event, inasmuch as the Court 31 has stated that it may authorize a subpoena for the originals, it will defer a ruling on defendant's separate request for copies and notes at this time, without prejudice to a renewal of the request if the demand for the original documents is frustrated or unduly delayed.

VI
Constitutionality of CIPA

[35] Defendant contends that, as applied to him, section 5 of the Classified Information Procedures Act (CIPA), 18 U.S.C.App. IV § 5(a) is unconstitutional. Section 5 of CIPA requires a defendant to notify the prosecution prior to trial of all classified information the defense expects to use at trial. According to defendant, this requirement violates his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent; his Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights to testify in his own defense; his Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel; his right to cross examine witnesses against him; and his right to due process of law. In the opinion of this Court, these contentions exaggerate the effects of the CIPA requirements, and they will be rejected. [FN28]

FN28. The government also argues that a decision on this issue would be premature because defendant is not yet being required to do anything pursuant to the statute. While that observation is technically accurate, nothing would be gained by the brief delay in adjudication that would follow from the Court's deferral in accordance with the government's argument.

A. General

Congress enacted CIPA as a means for coping with the so-called "graymail" problem--the problem of defendants in criminal cases threatening to introduce classified information at trial, thus confronting the government with the choice between permitting highly sensitive national security information to become publicly known, on the one hand, and capitulating to the graymail by dismissing the charges, on the other. H.R.Rep. No. 96-831, Pt. 1, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. (1980); S.Rep. No. 96-823, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. (1980) U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News p. 4294. As may be imagined, both alternatives are unpalatable to the prosecuting authorities and presumably to the public. CIPA seeks to resolve this difficulty by giving the trial judge the opportunity to rule on questions of admissibility of classified information in advance of its use as evidence in open court.

Under the CIPA procedures, as defendant correctly states, the defense is required (by section 5) to notify the Court and the prosecutor of its intention to disclose particular classified information at trial. Section 6(a) permits the prosecution thereafter to request an in camera hearing for a determination of the use, relevance, and admissibility of this proposed defense evidence. If the Court makes an affirmative finding with respect thereto, the government may move for, and the Court may authorize, the substitution of unclassified facts or a summary of the classified information in the form of an admission by the government. Under section 6(e)(2) if the government prevents a defendant from disclosing classified information at trial, the Court may find against the prosecution on any issue to which the excluded information relates; it may strike or preclude the testimony of particular government witnesses; and it may dismiss the indictment or specific counts thereof.

As this summary of the provisions of CIPA suggests, the law establishes a carefully balanced framework for consideration of the difficult issue of the use of classified information by the defense. In addition, although the statute in terms speaks only of a defense obligation to disclose the classified information it intends to use at trial, this Court has also required the government to present all the classified documents it intends to introduce as part of its case-in-chief, [FN29] and the government must, in fact, do so before the defense makes its disclosure. [FN30]

FN29. That is also the procedure adopted in the North case.

FN30. The government claims that it has already complied with this obligation.

*32 Moreover, the protection of the rights of defendant is paramount under the statutory scheme: if the Attorney General files an affidavit objecting to the disclosure of the classified material, [FN31] and the Court determines that other remedies, including satisfactory unclassified substitutes providing defendant "with substantially the same ability to make his defense as would disclosure of the specific classified information," cannot be fashioned, [FN32] it must provide relief, including, where appropriate, by a dismissal of the indictment.

FN31. Section 6(e) of CIPA.

FN32. Section 6(c)(1) of CIPA.

This Court is fully mindful of its obligation, stemming from the Constitution itself, as well as from the statute, not to deprive the defendant of the ability to defend himself against the criminal charges brought against him. As between that obligation, on the one hand, and the various governmental interests involved, on the other, [FN33] the Court does not intend to relegate defendant's constitutional rights to second place.

FN33. These interests include the continued prosecution of the defendant as well as the need to safeguard classified materials.

In conformity with the statute, the Court expects to make a substantial effort, with the assistance of the parties, to fashion equivalent substitutes for highly sensitive documents where these documents cannot be revealed in their original form due to the potential damage to national security. [FN34] If for some reason a substitute cannot be fashioned for reasons other than a defense failure to cooperate in good faith, and the document or documents in question are clearly material, the Court will not hesitate to grant the appropriate relief to the defendant, if necessary by a dismissal of the charges. [FN35]

FN34. The Court assumes that, as in North, the government will not prevent the defendant from use as evidence in his defense documents which, whatever their technical classification, would not harm national security if disclosed, and further, that documents actually used in the North trial will be disclosed here as well, without objection.

FN35. However, both parties are on notice that the Court will neither honor the designation by the defendant of documents that are plainly not material and where the principal aim is to generate a dismissal, nor will it countenance government refusals to cooperate with the publication of documents which would not be harmful to national security.

In connection with defendant's assertion that the burdens imposed on him by CIPA are onerous while "no burden whatsoever" is imposed on the government, Reply Memorandum at 5, not only is that claim disproved by the discussion supra, but it must also be remembered that, in addition to its CIPA burdens, the government has discovery obligations not incurred by a criminal defendant. These include the duty to furnish to a criminal defendant in advance of trial: (1) documents that are material to the preparation of the defense, (2) documents the government intends to introduce in its case-in-chief; (3) documents that were obtained from or belong to the defendant; (4) all written or recorded statements of the defendant; (5) a copy of defendant's prior criminal record; (6) reports of physical or mental examinations and scientific tests or experiments; (7) all exculpatory evidence; and (8) all prior statements of government witnesses. In short, defendant's complaint that he is laboring under burdens not shouldered by the government is simply untrue.

It is not surprising, therefore, that every court that has passed on the constitutionality of CIPA has upheld it. See United States v. Wilson, 750 F.2d 7, 9-10 (2d Cir.1984); United States v. Wilson, 721 F.2d 967, 976 (4th Cir.1983); United States v. Collins, 720 F.2d 1195, 1200 (11th Cir.1983); United States v. Jolliff, 548 F.Supp. 229, 231 (D.Md.1981); U.S. v. North, 708 F.Supp. 399 (D.D.C.1988).

To be sure, defendant correctly states that, because of his previous position as National Security Advisor and because of the nature of the charges, these proceedings may be extraordinary in the breadth of the classified information involved. [FN36] *33 However, the Court is not prepared to hold that, for this reason alone, the congressionally-mandated CIPA process will not be applied. If defendant's suggestion constituted the proper rule, public officials in high national security positions would in practical effect be immune from the operation of the criminal laws with respect to criminal excesses in the exercise of their authority: in the absence of the CIPA tool provided by Congress for dealing with the classified information dilemma, prosecutions instituted on account of such derelictions by such officials would inevitably have to be aborted. That is not, that cannot be, the law. No court has so held, and this Court will not set such a precedent.

FN36. However, as the Court noted in its September 11, 1989 Opinion, much of that information is relevant and material only indirectly, as part of the defendant's purpose to demonstrate lack of motive and hence lack of criminal intent.

The Court will now turn to defendant's specific constitutional arguments.

B. Fifth Amendment

[36] Defendant's principal contention is that, inasmuch as CIPA requires him to divulge to the government what classified information he may personally testify to at trial, the statute impermissibly burdens his Fifth Amendment right to be silent and his right to testify in his own defense. This contention is erroneous on several grounds.

In the first place, section 5 of CIPA does not require a defendant to specify whether he will testify or what he will testify about. The statute requires merely a general disclosure as to what classified information the defense expects to use at the trial, regardless of the witness or the document through which that information is to be revealed. In other words, defendant need not reveal what he will testify about or whether he will testify at all.

Moreover, it is of course hardly a novel proposition that defendants in criminal cases may be required to disclose elements of their defenses in advance of trial. Examples of such requirements are Fed.R.Crim.P. 12.1 (alibi defense); Fed.R.Crim.P. 12.2 (insanity defense); Fed.R.Crim.P. 12.3 (public authority defense); Fed.R.Crim.P. 16 (medical and scientific tests, and tangible objects, and certain documents). Provisions requiring the revelation of such defenses in advance of trial have consistently been held to be constitutional. Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 90 S.Ct. 1893, 26 L.Ed.2d 446 (1970); [FN37] Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 108 S.Ct. 646, 98 L.Ed.2d 798 (1988); and see, e.g., United States v. Fitts, 576 F.2d 837 (10th Cir.1978); United States v. Buchbinder, 796 F.2d 910 (7th Cir.1986); United States v. Duggan, 743 F.2d 59 (2d Cir.1984). [FN38]

FN37. Defendant attempts to distinguish Williams principally on the ground that the Florida statute there before the Court excluded the defendant's own testimony from the notice requirement. However, there is no indication that the Supreme Court's decision depended on that fact. Other than simply to quote the language of the statute, the Court did not even refer to the provision defendant here regards as critical. And none of the decisions interpreting and passing on the federal notice provisions make the distinction defendant proposes.

FN38. Defendants have also been required to reveal their defenses in additional circumstances, such as the relation of particular testimony to evidence the defendant intends to present. See, e.g., United States v. Mitchell, 385 F.Supp. 1190, 1192-93 (D.D.C.1974); United States v. Ismaili, 828 F.2d 153, 161-62 (3rd Cir.1987); United States v. Trenary, 473 F.2d 680, 682 (9th Cir.1973).

Defendant relies for the contrary proposition primarily upon Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605, 92 S.Ct. 1891, 32 L.Ed.2d 358 (1972). However, the state statute there at issue, unlike the federal immunity law, required the defendant to testify at the outset of the presentation of his case or to forego testifying altogether. It was that feature of the statute, and none other, that caused the Supreme Court to find a constitutional violation. But here, as noted above, there is no compulsion on the defendant to reveal as to when he will testify, or even whether he will testify. All he is required to do under CIPA is to identify the classified information on which his side intends to rely in the course of its overall presentation, not who will disclose it as a part of any particular testimony. In short, it is simply not true that, as defendant asserts, he, "like the defendant in Brooks, 34 is compelled to choose ... whether he will testify at trial." Defendant's Memorandum at 6. [FN39] The leap from the requirement of disclosure--similar to the disclosure of an alibi or an insanity defense--to a violation of defendant's right to testify or not to testify, is too wide to be justified.

> FN39. To buttress the point that he could not be required to provide notice of the classified information he intends to use at trial, defendant notes that in the North case, Judge Gesell did not require the defendant to notice his anticipated classified testimony. Memorandum at 11 n. 8. That is correct only in a technical sense. Judge Gesell ruled that There will be no review of defendant North's testimony in advance. When and if he is about to testify, his counsel will advise the Court if it then appears the testimony will involve classified national security disclosures beyond those then authorized under prior rulings of the Court and, again, a specific further ruling will be obtained. 698 F.Supp. at 322. Moreover, by that time, Judge Gesell had already required North to disclose pursuant to section 5 of CIPA (1) each classified document he intended to use at trial (orders of July 8, 1988, August 5, 1988, and October 19, 1988) and (2) all classified documents or other classified testimonial information not covered by previous CIPA orders that North reasonably expected to use at trial (orders of November 23, 1988 and December 22, 1988).

Defendant further seeks to distinguish the precedents by pointing to the important interests present in the decided cases on the government's side of the equation. E.g., Defendant's Memorandum at 9 (importance of rules designed to assure fairness and reliability). However, as the Supreme Court has noted, "[i]t is 'obvious and unarguable' that no governmental interest is more compelling than the security of the Nation." Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280, 307, 101 S.Ct. 2766, 2782, 69 L.Ed.2d 640 (1981). CIPA serves that interest by providing a mechanism for protecting both the unnecessary disclosure of sensitive national security information and by helping to ensure that those with significant access to such information will not escape the sanctions of the law applicable to others by use of the graymail route. S.Rep. No. 96-823, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. at 3 (1980) U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News pp. 4294, 4296.

C. Counsel, Confrontation, and Due Process

Similar, if not identical, considerations dispose of defendant's arguments which assert a denial of effective assistance of counsel, the failure to afford confrontation, and a denial of due process.

Defendant's claim that his Sixth Amendment right to counsel is violated when he is required to testify before his counsel has the opportunity to make an educated decision on whether to have defendant take the stand is merely the Fifth Amendment argument discussed above in another garb. See also, Lakeside v. Oregon, 435 U.S. 333, 341, 98 S.Ct. 1091, 1096, 55 L.Ed.2d 319 (1978).

[37] Likewise without substance is the complicated argument that CIPA violates defendant's "Sixth Amendment right to confront the witnesses against him by forcing him to notify the prosecution pretrial of all the classified information that he expects to elicit from prosecution witnesses on cross-examination and all such information that will be disclosed in defense counsel's questions to those witnesses." Defendant's Memorandum at 13, 15. This argument assumes that defendant has an unqualified right to undiminished surprise with respect to his cross-examination, and that if there is any impairment of the element of surprise, however slight, cross-examination must be regarded as per se ineffective. [FN40]

> FN40. Of course, CIPA does not "eviscerate[ ] the right [to cross examination] altogether." Defendant's Memorandum at 14-15. The statute requires a defendant merely to identify the universe of the classified information he intends to use; he need not attribute any particular piece of information to the cross examination of any particular witness.

However, as the Supreme Court said in Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 679, 106 S.Ct. 1431, 1435, 89 L.Ed.2d 674 (1986), "the Confrontation Clause guarantees an opportunity for effective cross-examination, not cross-examination that is effective in whatever way, and to whatever extent, the defense might wish" (emphasis in original). See also, United States v. 35 Owens, 484 U.S. 554, 108 S.Ct. 838, 842, 98 L.Ed.2d 951 (1988); Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. 730, 107 S.Ct. 2658, 2664, 96 L.Ed.2d 631 (1987); United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384, 1405 (D.C.Cir.1988); United States v. Anderson, 881 F.2d 1128, 1137 (D.C.Cir.1989). Finally, as concerns the claim that the disclosure requirements of CIPA violate the Due Process Clause by imposing a "one-sided burden" on him, it also lacks merit. As discussed at some length above, the CIPA burdens are not one-sided, but they are carefully balanced, [FN41] and there is therefore no basis for a due process complaint. United States v. Collins, 720 F.2d 1195 (11th Cir.1983).

FN41. If, as in Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470, 93 S.Ct. 2208, 37 L.Ed.2d 82 (1973), there were no balance, the relevant statute could not stand.

VII
Surplusage

[38] Defendant has moved pursuant to Fed.R.Crim.P. 7(d) to strike surplusage from the indictment. [FN42] It is clear (1) that with respect to surplusage the Court has wide discretion, [FN43] and (2) that the standard under Rule 7(d) is exacting. [FN44] It is also settled that a defendant is entitled to have language stricken only if it is both irrelevant and prejudicial, see, e.g., United States v. Jordan, 626 F.2d 928, 930 n. 1 (D.C.Cir.1980), and the Rule has been construed as not favoring the striking of surplusage. Id.

FN42. Defendant's related motion, that for a bill of particulars, is not well taken. As discussed in Parts I through IV, supra, the indictment adequately apprises defendant of the charges against him. The particulars defendant requests go essentially only to the evidentiary details and the government's legal theory, and they therefore need not be spread upon the record by a bill of particulars. See United States v. Pollack, 534 F.2d 964, 970 (D.C.Cir.1976). The request is especially ill founded in view of the government's uncontradicted claim that it has furnished to defendant hundreds of thousands of pages of materials, including copies of all the documents it intends to offer in its case-in-chief. (The government has also provided further particulars as part of its Memorandum filed September 8, 1989). In short, defendant has ample notice of the facts needed to prepare his defense. See also, the November 8, 1988 Order in North.

FN43. The Rule provides that the court "may" strike surplusage.

FN44. See C. Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure: Criminal 2d § 127 at 426 (1982).

[39] First. Defendant requests that the Court strike from the indictment the terms "among other things," "among others," "among," "at least," "including," "included, but not limited to," "in part," and "various," the contention being that this language will lead the jury to speculate that defendant was guilty of or responsible for actions in addition to those charged in the indictment. The government points to the fact that Judge Gesell declined to strike this type of language in North, and that in several contexts its use is innocuous.

The Court does not agree. It indicated in United States v. Whitehorn, 710 F.Supp. 803, 819 (D.D.C.1989) that similar terms could improperly indicate to a jury that the defendants were charged with offenses and conduct in addition to those actually listed in the indictment, and on this basis it ordered them stricken. Similar reasoning and a similar result apply here. Accordingly, the Court hereby orders all such language stricken. [FN45]

FN45. Of course, as in Whitehorn, the government will not be precluded by this ruling from introducing relevant and material evidence tending to prove the conspiracy charged in Count One, and the manner and means by which it was to be achieved. See 710 F.Supp. at 819.

Second. Defendant claims that certain language in the indictment is needlessly inflammatory. However, with respect to most of the terms to which defendant objects, the language is necessary, neutrally descriptive, or both.

[40] For example, defendant objects to use of the term "lethal" in relation to supplies being shipped to the Contras. However, through much of the history of the relations between the United States and the Contras, a distinction has been made between lethal and humanitarian assistance, and there is no reason why those 36 properly descriptive terms should be excluded from the indictment. [FN46]

FN46. Defendant's objection to the description of military supplies as consisting of "millions of rounds" and "hundreds of thousands of pounds," is likewise not well taken, since those were apparently the quantities involved, at least according to the government.

[41] Similar reasoning causes the Court to deny defendant's objection to the terms "Enterprise," "divert," "diversion," and "clandestine." Indeed, the term "Enterprise," which defendant has particularly emphasized, is a fairly neutral description of the activities of the alleged conspirators. [FN47] Defendant contends to the contrary that the jury might relate the term to racketeering, on the basis that "the word 'enterprise' is a well-known term of art under the RICO statute." Defendant's Memorandum at 10. There may be a few dozen lawyers in this country to whom this "term of art" is well known and who will immediately think of RICO when the word "enterprise" is mentioned; to most individuals, if that term means anything other than a business, it more likely evokes a starship or a space shuttle.

FN47. In fact, one of the defendants, Secord, apparently used the term in that context before the Iran-contra congressional committee.

[42] However, the Court agrees with defendant that use of the term "cover up" is inflammatory, especially in the context of the kind of criminal activity that is at issue here. Further, inasmuch as the term is used in the indictment in tandem with the word "conceal," it is not necessary, and it is therefore hereby ordered to be stricken.

[43] Third. Insofar as defendant's category of "irrelevant descriptive recitals" are concerned, the Court will, once again, retain some terms and strike others. The references in Counts Two, Three, and Four to Poindexter's original co-defendants Secord and Hakim are relevant to the obstruction and false statement claims, and they will not be stricken. On the same basis, the Court will not require the elimination of references to press reports about shipments to Iran, as they are necessary to an understanding of the background of the congressional inquiries and the activities of the defendants with respect thereto. See United States v. Langella, 776 F.2d 1078, 1081 (2d Cir.1985).

[44] On the other hand, there is no valid reason for allegations in the indictment that Oliver North was discharged and that Poindexter resigned from their respective positions. Inclusion of these facts could be taken by the jury as objective indications of fault or of Reagan Administration determinations of fault; they are thus prejudicial without having any special relevance. These particular allegations are therefore ordered to be stricken.

[45] Fourth. Defendant contends that the references in the indictment to the Boland Amendment improperly suggest to the jury that he violated that statute, and that on this basis all such references should be stricken. The request is denied. It is defendant's theory that references to the Boland Amendment have relevance, if at all, only to his state of mind. Defendant's Memorandum at 15. That, however, is not a justified assumption. To be sure, "the defense contends" that this statute was inapplicable to the NSC staff and, according to defendant, the "evidence in this case will establish" that it was not intended to apply to that staff and could not constitutionally have been applied to that staff's activities. Defendant's Memorandum at 15 and n. 14. However, obviously the relevance of the Boland Amendment to this case is not to be measured by defendant's contentions alone.

The Boland Amendment restrictions were the focus of the congressional inquiries at issue here, as well as of defendant's allegedly false and misleading statements. [FN48] To eliminate from the indictment 37 references to the Boland Amendment would be the equivalent of performing "Hamlet" without the Prince of Denmark. [FN49]

FN48. Defendant's claim is that this case is "virtually identical" to United States v. Mandel, 415 F.Supp. 997, 1008-09 (D.Md.1975), in that there, as here, the defense contended that certain subjects were inapplicable to the defendant. However, the Code of Ethics in Mandel was merely one of many possible indicia of an intent to deceive, and the Mandel decision questioned whether the prosecution would even be able to demonstrate the Code's relevance at trial. Because of the Boland Amendment's crucial position in the instant case, no such question exists here.

FN49. W. Scott, The Talisman, introduction.

Similar reasoning applies to defendant's request that the Court strike the background paragraphs in Count One--those that describe the relationship between the United States and Iran, the fact that hostages were held in Lebanon, the seizure of the American embassy in Iran, and the like. These paragraphs are not only not prejudicial but they are relevant in the sense that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the jury to understand defendant's allegedly false statements and obstruction without that background. See United States v. Langella, supra.

As concerns, finally, the incorporation by reference in Counts Two through Five of the allegations in Count One regarding Secord and Hakim, Poindexter's co-defendants at the time the indictment was returned, here again, the activities of the Enterprise, of which these two defendants were allegedly members, were among the very subjects of the false statements and the obstruction with which Poindexter is charged. The request to strike them is therefore likewise denied.

VIII

Publicity, Department of Justice Policies, and Abuse of Grand Jury

The remaining motions require only relatively brief discussion.

A. Pretrial Publicity

[46] Defendant has moved to dismiss the indictment, or in the alternative, for a change of venue, because of prejudicial pretrial publicity.

As concerns the defense request for a dismissal, there does not appear to be a single precedent anywhere in the federal court system granting so drastic a remedy, no matter how widespread or prejudicial the publicity. [FN50] No reason has been advanced for establishing such a precedent here.

> FN50. United States v. Sweig, 316 F.Supp. 1148 (S.D.N.Y.1970), cited by defendant, merely suggested that dismissal might be warranted where prosecutorial misconduct contributed to prejudicial publicity that influenced a grand jury. Even that dicta however, was rejected by the Second Circuit. See United States v. Curcio, 712 F.2d 1532, 1544-45 (2d Cir.1983). Similarly, in Delaney v. United States, 199 F.2d 107 (1st Cir.1952), the other case relied on by defendant, the court upheld a trial judge's decision to deny a motion to dismiss, questioning whether a dismissal on account of prejudicial pretrial publicity would ever be appropriate. 199 F.2d at 111-12.

[47] Moreover, even a change of venue is not warranted, for several interrelated reasons.

In United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31, 60, 63-64 (D.C.Cir.1976), the Court of Appeals for this Circuit held that an appropriate voir dire of potential jurors was preferable to a transfer to another venue as a means for dealing with pretrial publicity. [FN51] At a time when this case was still joined with that of Oliver North, Judge Gesell denied a similar motion without prejudice, observing that "[e]xperience here again in this city with high profile cases engendering publicity such as Watergate ... strongly suggest that a completely impartial jury can be seated." United States v. North, 713 F.Supp. 1444 (D.D.C.1989). Following the voir dire, the Court reiterated that view, stating that it was "entirely satisfied that the jurors eventually selected are unbiased ...". North, 713 F.Supp. at 1445. The verdict in North--a conviction on some counts and an acquittal on most others--has validated that judgment.

> FN51. In that case, relied on by defendant, Memorandum at 16, it was the court's decision that the "District Court was correct to follow this circuit's well established procedure by refusing appellants' pre-voir dire requests for a continuance or a change of venue." 559 F.2d at 63-64 (citations omitted).

In the event, both in Watergate and in the North case, it was found possible to assemble an impartial jury notwithstanding publicity that was far more widespread than in the instant case.

38 Moreover, what publicity there has been has not been especially prejudicial to Poindexter. This is not a case, such as one involving a rape, the large-scale distribution of drugs, murder under revolting circumstances, or the like, that causes widespread and near-unanimous revulsion against the accused. See Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333, 86 S.Ct. 1507, 16 L.Ed.2d 600 (1966); Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723, 83 S.Ct. 1417, 10 L.Ed.2d 663 (1963). To the contrary. Media coverage and public opinion have been divided, with some regarding the Iran-contra defendants as deserving of public opprobrium while others consider them to be national heroes. [FN52] See,

United States v. Moreno Morales, 815 F.2d 725, 736 (1st Cir.1987).

FN52. President Reagan himself expressed that view, widely reported in the press, with respect to Oliver North. Washington Post, March 26, 1989 at p. A1.

Defendant argues that the publicity that followed the verdict in the North case was damaging to him, in that Judge Gesell and others made comments that could be construed as referring to Oliver North's superiors as being as guilty as or more guilty than North. However, to the extent that there was such comment, it appears to have been directed not at this defendant but at President Reagan and others better known to the public than Poindexter. [FN53] In any event, just as the Court of Appeals found in Haldeman that the Watergate defendants received a fair trial notwithstanding widespread publicity, so can this defendant. [FN54]

FN53. To be sure, as defendant points out, one of the North jurors did refer to Poindexter by name. Washington Post, May 6, 1989 at p. A7. But that comment, and what publicity it received, was isolated. Indeed it is found in the thirty-third paragraph of a thirty-four paragraph article.

FN54. It is not apparent, in any event, what a change of venue would accomplish. The publicity regarding the Iran-contra affair, like that accompanying many "governmental," white collar criminal cases, and unlike those involving common law offenses, has been national rather than local.

B. Failure to Follow Department of Justice Policies

[48] There is likewise no merit to the motion to dismiss the indictment for failure to follow the policies of the Department of Justice. The very nature of the Independent Counsel's responsibilities suggests that it may not always be possible for him to follow those policies, [FN55] and it is for that very reason that the Independent Counsel statute explicitly provides that he is required to follow Department of Justice policies only "to the extent possible." See 28 U.S.C. § 594(f). [FN56] On this basis, defendant's contentions--that the Independent Counsel should have secured the permission of the Attorney General before prosecuting him as one who received a grant of immunity, or that he should have secured an Attorney General determination as to whether prosecution would lead to excessive disclosure of classified information [FN57]--border on the frivolous. The Independent Counsel, as the very name suggests, is to be independent of the Attorney General.

FN55. See also, North, Order of November 10, 1988 at 18 n. 1.

FN56. See also, S.Rep. No. 123, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. 24, reprinted in 1987 U.S.Code Cong. & Adm.News 2150, 2173.

FN57. As for defendant's related claim that his prosecution by the Independent Counsel risks the revelation of national secrets, the short answer is that it would be the intelligence agencies, not defendant, that would have cause for complaint. See Attorney General's Guidelines for Prosecutions Involving Classified Information at 7.

[49] Moreover, much of defendant's argument rests on alleged departures from guidelines set forth in the U.S. Attorney's Manual--a document that, by its own language, creates no rights in any party. U.S. Attorney's Manual § 1-1.00 (1984); United States v. Busher, 817 F.2d 1409, 1411-12 (9th Cir.1987); see also United States v. Caceres, 440 U.S. 741, 749-55, 99 S.Ct. 1465, 1470-73, 59 L.Ed.2d 733 (1979).

C. Prosecutorial Abuse of Grand Jury

There is no merit whatever to the claim that the Independent Counsel in several ways abused the grand jury process.

39 [50] First. Defendant asserts that the Independent Counsel failed to present exculpatory evidence to the grand jury, and that this so tainted the process that the indictment should be dismissed. In the first place, it is the majority view in the federal courts that the prosecution has no duty to present exculpatory evidence to the grand jury. See generally, United States v. Ismaili, 828 F.2d 153, 165 n. 13 (3d Cir.1987). Furthermore, the only specific evidence cited in support of defendant's claim is the alleged failure of the Independent Counsel to present to the body President Reagan's response to written interrogatories. However, not only is it not established that the President's views would have been exculpatory, but his answers to the written interrogatories were, in fact, presented to the grand jury. North, 713 F.Supp. at 1450. Finally on this issue, the Court notes the Supreme Court's admonition in Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 363, 76 S.Ct. 406, 408, 100 L.Ed. 397 (1956) that a defendant has no right to "a kind of preliminary trial to determine the competency and adequacy of the evidence before the grand jury."

Second. Defendant asserts that the presence of Associate Independent Counsel before the grand jury was improper, in that section 594(c) of the Ethics in Government Act unconstitutionally empowers the Independent Counsel to appoint associates or other assistants. The Supreme Court held the Independent Counsel provisions of the Ethics in Government Act to be constitutional just last year in Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 108 S.Ct. 2597, 101 L.Ed.2d 569 (1988)--a decision nowhere mentioned in defendant's papers. In another decision directly on point but not referred to by defendant--In re Sealed Case, 829 F.2d 50, 57-59 (D.C.Cir.1987)--the Court of Appeals for this Circuit specifically determined that Associate Independent Counsel may conduct grand jury investigations.

Third. The final claim of alleged prosecutorial misconduct are that the Independent Counsel, a former federal judge, was at times referred to before the grand jury as "Judge Walsh," and that he improperly expressed his appreciation to the grand jury and otherwise sought to create the impression that the grand jury and those presenting evidence to it were engaged in a joint enterprise. With respect to the first claim, Judge Gesell advised counsel in open court as long ago as June of last year that complete disclosure had been made to the grand jury of Mr. Walsh's nonjudicial status. North, 708 F.Supp. at 372. As concerns the second, the Court concludes that the statements quoted by defendant are so innocuous as to render inappropriately extravagant his call for the use of this Court's supervisory power to curb a "pattern of extensive prosecutorial misconduct." Defendant's Memorandum at 19. [FN58] FN58. It should also be noted that, when this defendant's case was still before him, Judge Gesell reviewed the grand jury transcripts and found no evidence of abuse.

IX
Kastigar Issues

The parties' submissions are not sufficiently developed on various key points to permit the Court to render a decision at this time on the issues arising under Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 92 S.Ct. 1653, 32 L.Ed.2d 212 (1972), regarding the relationship between this prosecution and the immunity granted to Poindexter with respect to his testimony in Congress. [FN59] Accordingly, the Court will hold a non-evidentiary hearing on Kastigar issues on October 27, 1989, at 10:00 a.m. Among the issues to be discussed at that hearing will be the question of the right of the defendant to a dismissal on account of taint from immunized testimony, or to an evidentiary 40 hearing with respect thereto, for the following four separate categories of persons: (1) grand jurors, (2) grand jury witnesses, (3) Independent Counsel attorneys, and (4) prospective trial witnesses.

FN59. For example, while the government's memorandum relies on various legal principles, it does not always make it clear how these principles apply to the facts of this case. Thus, the memorandum states (at p. 19) that the prosecution "may rely on the testimony of witnesses who have been exposed to immunized testimony," but it does not attempt to explicate the breadth of the exposure of the trial witnesses, the period when it occurred, or its impact on the witnesses' independent knowledge, if any.

With respect to witnesses, the parties are invited to address the subject both with respect to those whose names and the substance of their testimony were memorialized in sealed submissions to the Chief Judge of this Court or otherwise, prior to the taking of immunized testimony in Congress; and with respect to those whose names and testimony were not known or fixed before that testimony was taken. With respect to Independent Counsel attorneys, the parties are invited to distinguish between attorneys who were subjected to the procedures Mr. Walsh testified to before Judge Gesell in April 1988, and those who became involved in the Independent Counsel's Iran-contra effort after that time. The parties may also wish to discuss what type of pretrial evidentiary hearing, if any, would be appropriate or required. One hour will be allocated to each side.

X
Trial Date

Upon consideration of the pretrial work that must still be done by the parties and the Court, as well as the tasks to be performed by the so-called Interagency Group with respect to the identification of classified materials in connection with the CIPA process, the Court is setting January 22, 1990 as the date for the start of the trial.

END OF DOCUMENT

Paul M. BRANZBURG, Petitioner,
v.
John P. HAYES, Judge, etc., et al.
In the Matter of Paul PAPPAS, Petitioner.
UNITED STATES, Petitioner,
v.
Earl CALDWELL.

Nos. 70--85, 70--94, 70--57.

Argued Feb. 22, 23, 1972.
Decided June 29, 1972.

Certiorari was granted to review judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, 434 F.2d 1081, upholding refusal of newsman to appear and testify before grand jury with respect to confidential sources, and judgments of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, at 461 S.W.2d 345 and in an unreported case, and the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 358 Mass. 604, 266 N.E.2d 297, rejecting claimed rights of newsmen to refuse to testify before grand juries with respect to confidential sources. The Supreme Court, Mr. Justice White, held that requiring newsmen to appear and testify before state or federal grand juries does not abridge the freedom of speech and press guaranteed by the First Amendment; and that a newsman's agreement to conceal criminal conduct of his news sources, or evidence thereof, does not give rise to any constitutional testimonial privilege with respect thereto.

Judgment at 434 F.2d 1081 reversed; judgments at 461 S.W.2d 345 and 266 N.E.2d 297, and in unreported Kentucky case, affirmed.

Mr. Justice Powell filed concurring opinion; Mr. Justice Douglas dissented and filed opinion, see 92 S.Ct. 2686; Mr. Justice Stewart dissented and filed opinion in which Mr. Justice Brennan and Mr. Justice Marshall joined.

[1] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇐ 90.1(3)
92k90.1(3)
Requiring newsmen to appear and testify before state or federal grand juries does not abridge the freedom of speech and press guaranteed by the First Amendment. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[2] FEDERAL COURTS ⇐ 508
170Bk508
Constitutional claim to newsman's privilege was properly preserved for review by certiorari where it was presented to state court, though newsman in state court relied primarily upon state statute creating a newsman's privilege and though the state court considered that such reliance constituted abandonment of the constitutional claim and did not consider the latter claim. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1; K.R.S. 421.100.

[3] GRAND JURY ⇐ 36.2
193k36.2
Formerly 193k36
News reporters have the same obligation as other citizens to respond to grand jury subpoenas and to answer questions relevant to an investigation into the commission of crime. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[4] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇐ 90.1(3)
92k90.1(3)
Neither the First Amendment nor any other constitutional provision protects citizens from disclosing to a grand jury information that they have received in confidence. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[4] GRAND JURY ⇐ 36.3(2)
193k36.3(2)
Formerly 410k196
Neither the First Amendment nor any other constitutional provision protects citizens from disclosing to a grand jury information that they have received in confidence. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[5] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇐ 90(3)
92k90(3)
The First Amendment does not invalidate every incidental burdening of the press that may result from the enforcement of civil or criminal statutes of general applicability. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[6] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇐ 90(3)
92k90(3)
The First Amendment does not guarantee the press a constitutional right of special access to information not available to the public generally. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[7] GRAND JURY ⇐ 26
193k26

Grand jury has the dual function of determining if there is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and of protecting citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions.

[8] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇦ 265
92k265
Indictment by grand jury is not part of the due process of law guaranteed to state criminal defendants by the Fourteenth Amendment. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

[9] GRAND JURY ⇦ 36.1
193k36.1
Formerly 193k36
The public has a right to every man's evidence before a grand jury except for those persons protected by a constitutional, common law, or statutory privilege.

[10] GRAND JURY ⇦ 36.3(2)
193k36.3(2)
Formerly 193k36
Only where a reporter's news sources themselves are implicated in crime or possess information relevant to the grand jury's task need they or the reporter be concerned about grand jury subpoenas.

[11] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇦ 90.1(3)
92k90.1(3)
When a newsman is subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury, the First Amendment does not protect his agreement to conceal the criminal conduct of a news source, or evidence thereof. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[12] GRAND JURY ⇦ 36.3(2)
193k36.3(2)
Formerly 193k36
Public interest in possible future news about crime from undisclosed, unverified sources does not take precedence over public interest in pursuing, by grand jury investigation, and prosecuting those crimes reported to the press by informants, and in thus deterring the commission of such crimes in the future. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[13] GRAND JURY ⇦ 25
193k25
The investigative power of the grand jury is necessarily broad if its public responsibility is to be adequately discharged. Fed.Rules Crim.Proc. rule 6(e), 18 U.S.C.A.

[14] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇦ 90.1(3)
92k90.1(3)
Any indirect burden on First Amendment rights imposed by calling newsmen to testify before a grand jury where it is likely that they can supply information to aid in determination of whether illegal conduct has occurred and whether there is sufficient evidence to return an indictment is justified by the fundamental governmental role of the grand jury in securing the safety of the person and property of the citizen by the investigation of crime; the governmental interest in such role is compelling and paramount and calling newsmen in such circumstances bears a reasonable relationship to the achievement of the governmental purpose. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[15] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇦ 90.1(3)
92k90.1(3)
It is not necessary under the First Amendment that, before a newsman may be called to testify before a grand jury with respect to information obtained from confidential sources, it be shown that a crime has been committed and that the newsman possesses relevant information not available from other sources. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[16] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇦ 90(2)
92k90(2)
Freedom of the press is a fundamental personal right which is not confined to newspapers and periodicals. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[17] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇦ 90.1(3)
92k90.1(3)
Grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment as well as the Fifth and may not harass the press for purposes not of law enforcement but of disrupting a reporter's relationship with his news sources. U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 1, 5.

[17] GRAND JURY ⇦ 33
193k33
Grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment as well as the Fifth and may not harass the press for purposes not of law enforcement but of disrupting a reporter's relationship with his news sources. U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 1, 5.

[18] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇦ 90.1(3)

92k90.1(3)
There is no First Amendment newsman's testimonial privilege, either qualified or absolute, arising from receipt of confidential information, to refuse to answer relevant and material questions asked during a good-faith grand jury investigation. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[19] GRAND JURY ⇦ 36.3(2)
193k36.3(2)
Formerly 193k36
Newsman had no constitutional privilege to refuse to appear before a grand jury until the government demonstrated some compelling need for his testimony. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1.

[20] WITNESSES ⇦ 196.1
410k196.1
Formerly 410k196
Where newsman had observed violations of state narcotics laws, he had no privilege to refuse to answer questions that directly related to the criminal conduct. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 1; K.R.S. 218.010(14), 218.210.

[21] GRAND JURY ⇦ 36.3(2)
193k36.3(2)
Formerly 193k36
Newsman had duty to appear before grand jury and answer questions put to him, subject to supervision of presiding judge as to the propriety, purposes and scope of the grand jury inquiry and of the pertinence of the probable testimony.

*2648 665 Syllabus [FN]

FN* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

The First Amendment does not relieve a newspaper reporter of the obligation that all citizens have to respond to a grand jury subpoena and answer questions relevant to a criminal investigation, and therefore the Amendment does not afford him a constitutional testimonial privilege for an agreement he makes to conceal facts relevant to a grand jury's investigation of a crime or to conceal the criminal conduct of his source or evidence thereof. Pp. 2655--2670.

No. 70--85, 461 S.W.2d 345, and Kentucky Court of Appeals judgment in unreported *2649 case of Branzburg v. Meigs; and No. 70--94, 358 Mass. 604, 266 N.E.2d 297, affirmed; No. 70--57, 434 F.2d 1081, reversed.

On Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Appeals of Kentucky.

On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

Edgar A. Zingman, Louisville, Ky., for petitioner Paul M. Branzburg in No. 70--85; Robert C. Ewald, Louisville, Ky., on the briefs.

E. Barrett Prettyman, Jr., Washington, D.C., for petitioner, the Commonwealth of Mass. in No. 70--94; William H. Carey, New Bedford, Mass., on the briefs.

Solicitor Gen., Erwin Griswold for the United States in No. 70--57; David A. Wilson, Jr., Peterson, Asst. Attys. Gen., William Bradford Reynolds, Beatrice Rosenberg, and Sidney M. Glazer, Washington, D.C., on the briefs.

666 Edwin A. Schroeting, Jr., Louisville, Ky., for respondents John P. Hayes and others in No. 70--85; W. C. Fisher, Jr., Louisville, Ky., on the brief.

Joseph J. Hurley, First Asst. Atty. Gen., for respondent, Commonwealth of Mass., in No. 70--94; Robert H. Quinn, Atty. Gen., Walter H. Mayo III, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Lawrence T. Bench, Deputy Asst. Atty. Gen., on the brief.

Anthony G. Amsterdam, Washington, D.C., for respondent Earl Caldwell in No. 70--57; Jack Greenberg, James M. Nabrit III, Charles Stephen Ralston, New York City, and William Bennett Turner, San Francisco, Cal., on the brief.

William Bradford Reynolds, Washington, D.C., for the United States as amicus curiae urging affirmance in Nos. 70--85 and 70--94; Sol. Gen.

Erwin Griswold, Asst. Atty. Gen., David B. Wilson, Jr., and Beatrice Rosenberg, Washington, D.C., on the brief.

Briefs of amici curiae urging affirmance in No. 70--57 and reversal in Nos. 70--85 and 70--94 were filed by Alexander M. Bickel, New Haven, Conn., Lawrence J. McKay, Floyd Abrams, Daniel Sheehan, Corydon B. Dunham, Clarence Fried, Alan J. Hruska, New York City, Robert S. Rifkind, Washington, D.C., Anthony A. Dean, and Edward C. Wallace, New York City, for New York Times Co., Inc., and others; by Don H. Reuben, Lawrence Gunnels, Steven L. Bashwiner, and Thomas F. Ging., Chicago, Ill., for Chicago Tribune Co.; by Arthur B. Hanson, Washington, D.C., for American Newspaper Publishers Assn.; and by Irving Leuchter, Newark, N.J., for American Newspaper Guild, AFL-CIO, CLC.

John T. Corrigan, Cleveland, Ohio, filed a brief for the National District Attorneys Association urging reversal in No. 70--57 and affirmance in No. 70--94.

Briefs of amici cruiae urging affirmance in No. 70--57 were filed by Irwin Karp, New York City, for Authors League of America, Inc.; by W. Theodore Pierson and J. Laurent *667 Scharff, Washington, D.C., for Radio Television News Directors Assn.; and by Earle K. Moore and Samuel Rabinove, New York City, for Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ and others.

Briefs of amici curiae in No. 70--57 were filed by Leo P. Larkin, Jr., Stanley Godofsky, and John J. Sheehy, New York City, for Washington Post Co. and others; by Richard M. Schmidt, Jr., for American Society of Newspaper Editors and others; by Roger A. Clark, New York City, for National Press Photographers Assn.; and by Melvin L. Wulf, New York City, Paul N. Halvonik, San Francisco, Cal., A. L. Wirin, Fred Okrand and Lawrence R. Sperber, Los Angeles, Cal., for American Civil Liberties Union and others.

Opinion of the Court by Mr. Justice WHITE, announced by THE CHIEF JUSTICE.

[1] The issue in these cases is whether requiring newsmen to appear and testify before state or federal grand juries abridges the freedom of speech 2650 and press guaranteed by the First Amendment. We hold that it does not.

I

The writ of certiorari in No. 70--85, Branzburg v. Hayes and Meigs, brings before us two judgments of the Kentucky Court of Appeals, both involving petitioner Branzburg, a staff reporter for the Courier-Journal, a daily newspaper published in Louisville, Kentucky.

On November 15, 1969, the Courier-Journal carried a story under petitioner's by-line describing in detail his observations of two young residents of Jefferson County synthesizing hashish from marihuana, an activity which, they asserted, earned them about $5,000 in three weeks. The article included a photograph of a pair of hands working above a laboratory table on which was a substance identified by the caption as hashish. The article stated that petitioner had promised not to *668 reveal the identity of the two hashish makers. [FN1] Petitioner was shortly subpoenaed by the Jefferson County grand jury; he appeared, but refused to identify the individuals he had seen possessing marihuana or the persons he had seen making hashish from marihuana. [FN2] A state trial court judge [FN3] ordered petitioner to answer these questions and rejected his contention that the Kentucky reporters' privilege statute, Ky.Rev.Stat. s 421.100 (1962), [FN4] the First Amendment of the United States Constitution, or ss 1, 2 and 8 of the Kentucky Constitution authorized his refusal to answer. Petitioner then sought prohibition and mandamus in the Kentucky Court of Appeals on the same grounds, but the Court of Appeals denied the petition. Branzburg v. *669 Pound, 461 S.W.2d 345 (1970), as modified on denial of rehearing, Jan. 22, 1971. It held that petitioner had abandoned his First Amendment argument in a supplemental memorandum he had filed and tacitly rejected his argument based on the Kentucky Constitution. It also construed Ky.Rev.Stat. s 421.100 as affording a newsman the privilege of refusing to divulge the identity of an informant who supplied him with information, but held that the statute did not permit a reporter to refuse to testify about events he had observed personally, including the identities of those persons he had observed.

FN1. The article contained the following paragraph: "I don't know why I'm letting you do this story,' (one informant) said quietly. 'To make the narcs (narcotics detectives) mad, I guess. That's the main reason.' However, Larry and his partner asked for and received a promise that their names would be changed.' App. 3--4.

FN2. The Foreman of the grand jury reported that petitioner Branzburg had refused to answer the following two questions: '#1. On November 12, or 13, 1969, who was the person or persons you observed in possession of Marijuana, about which you wrote an article in the Courier-Journal on November 15, 1969? #2. On Novebmer 12, or 13, 1969, who was the person or persons you observed compounding Marijuana, producing same to a compound known as Hashish?' App. 6.

FN3. Judge J. Miles Pound. The respondent in this case, Hon. John P. Hayes, is the successor of Judge Pound.

FN4. Ky.Rev.Stat. s 421.100 provides: 'No person shall be compelled to disclose in any legal proceeding or trial before any court, or before any grand or petit jury, or before the presiding officer of any tribunal, or his agent or agents, or before the General Assembly, or any committee thereof, or before any city or county legislative body, or any committee thereof, or elsewhere, the source of any information procured or obtained by him, and published in a newspaper or by a radio or television broadcasting station by which he is engaged or employed, or with which he is connected.'

The second case involving petitioner Branzburg arose out of his later story published on January 10, 1971, which described in detail the use of drugs in Frankfort, Kentucky. The article reported that in order to provide a comprehensive survey of the 'drug scene' in Frankfort, petitioner had 'spent two weeks interviewing several dozen drug users in the capital city' and had seen some of them smoking marihuana. A number of conversations with and observations of several unnamed drug users were recounted. Subpoenaed to appear before a Franklin County grand jury 'to testify in the matter of violation of statutes concerning 2651 use and sale of drugs,' petitioner Branzburg moved to quash the summons; [FN5] the motion was denied, although *670 an order was issued protecting Branzburg from revealing 'confidential associations, sources or information' but requiring that he 'answer any questions which concern or pertain to any criminal act, the commission of which was actually observed by (him).' Prior to the time he was slated to appear before the grand jury, petitioner sought mandamus and prohibition from the Kentucky Court of Appeals, arguing that if he were forced to go before the grand jury or to answer questions regarding the identity of informants or disclose information given to him in confidence, his effectiveness as a reporter would be greatly damaged. The Court of Appeals once again denied the requested writs, reaffirming its construction of Ky.Rev.Stat. s 421.100, and rejecting petitioner's claim of a First Amendment privilege. It distinguished Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (CA9 1970), and it also announced its 'misgivings' about that decision, asserting that it represented 'a drastic departure from the generally recognized rule that the sources of information of a newspaper reporter are not privileged under the First Amendment.' It characterized petitioner's fear that his ability to obtain *671 news would be destroyed as 'so tenuous that it does not, in the opinion of this court, present an issue of abridgement of the freedom of the press within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution of the United States.'

FN5. Petitioner's Motion to Quash argued: 'If Mr. Branzburg were required to disclose these confidences to the Grand Jury, or any other person, he would thereby destroy the relationship of trust which he presently enjoys with those in the drug culture. They would refuse to speak to him; they would become even more reluctant than they are now to speak to any newsman; and the news media would thereby vitally hampered in their ability to cover the views and activities of those involved in the drug culture. 'The inevitable effect of the subpoena issued to Mr. Branzburg, if it not be quashed by this Court, will be to suppress vital First Amendment freedoms of Mr. Branzburg, of the Courier-Journal, of the news media, and of those involved in the drug culture by driving a wedge of distrust and silence between the news media and the drug culture. This Court should not sanction a use of its process entailing so drastic an incursion upon First Amendment freedoms in the absence of compelling Commonwealth interest in requiring Mr. Branzburg's apearance before the Grand Jury. It is insufficient merely to protect Mr.

Branzburg's right to silence after he appears before the Grand Jury. This Court should totally excuse Mr. Branzburg from responding to the subpoena and even entering the Grand Jury room. Once Mr. Branzburg is required to go behind the closed doors of the Grand Jury room, his effectiveness as a reporter in these areas is totally destroyed. The secrecy that surrounds Grand Jury testimony necessarily introduces uncertainties in the minds of those who fear a betrayal of their confidences.' App. 43--44.

[2] Petitioner sought a writ of certiorari to review both judgments of the Kentucky Court of Appeals, and we granted the writ. [FN6] 402 U.S. 942, 91 S.Ct. 1616, 29 L.Ed.2d 109 (1971).

FN6. After the Kentucky Court of Appeals' decision in Branzburg v. Meigs was announced, petitioner filed a rehearing motion in Branzburg v. Pound suggesting that the court had not passed upon his First Amendment argument and calling to the court's attention the recent Ninth Circuit decision in Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (1970). On Jan. 22, 1971, the court denied petitioner's motion and filed an amended opinion in the case, adding a footnote, 461 S.W.2d 345, at 346 n. 1, to indicate that petitioner had abandoned his First Amendment argument and elected to rely wholly on Ky.Rev.Stat. s 421.100 when he filed a Supplemental Memorandum before oral argument. In his Petition for Prohibition and Mandamus, petitioner had clearly relied on the First Amendment, and he had filed his Supplemental Memorandum in response to the State's Memorandum in Opposition to the granting of the writs. As its title indicates, this Memorandum was complementary to petitioner's earlier Petition, and it dealt primarily with the State's construction of the phrase 'source of any information' in Ky.Rev.Stat. s 421.100. The passage that the Kentucky Court of Appeals cited to indicate abandonment of petitioner's First Amendment claim is as follows: 'Thus, the controversy continues as to whether a newsman's source of information should be privileged. However, that question is not before the Court in this case. The Legislature of Kentucky has settled the issue, having decided that a newsman's source of information is to be privileged. Because of this there is no point in citing Professor Wigmore and other authorities who speak against the grant of such a privilege. The question has been many times debated, and the Legislature has spoken. The only question before the Court is the construction of the term 'source of information' as it was intended by the Legislature.' Though the passage itself is somewhat unclear, the surrounding discussion indicates that petitioner was asserting here that the question of whether a common-law privilege should be recognized was irrelevant since the legislature had already enacted a statute. In his earlier discussion, petitioner had analyzed certain cases in which the First Amendment argument was made but indicated that it was not necessary to reach this question if the statutory phrase 'source of any information' were interpreted expansively. We do not interpret this discussion as indicating that petitioner was abandoning his First Amendment claim if the Kentucky Court of Appeals did not agree with his statutory interpretation argument, and we hold that the constitutional question in Branzburg v. Pound was properly preserved for review.

*672 In re Pappas, No. 70--94, originated when petitioner Pappas, a television newsman-photographer working out of the Providence, Rhode Island, office of a New Bedford, Massachusetts, television station, was called to New Bedford on July 30, 1970, to report on civil disorders there which involved fires and other turmoil. He intended to cover a Black Panther news conference at that group's headquarters in a boarded-up store. Petitioner found the streets around the store barricaded, but he ultimately gained entrance to the area and recorded and photographed a prepared statement read by one of the Black Panther leaders at about 3 p.m. 2652 [FN7] He then asked for and received permission to re-enter the area. Returning at about 9 o'clock, he was allowed to enter and remain inside Panther headquarters. As a condition of entry, Pappas agreed not to disclose anything he saw or heard inside the store except an anticipated police raid, which Pappas, 'on his own,' was free to photograph and report as he wished. Pappas stayed inside the headquarters for about three hours, but there was no police raid, and petitioner wrote no story and did not otherwise reveal what had occurred in the store while he was there. Two months later, petitioner was summoned before the Bristol *673 County Grand Jury and appeared, answered questions as to his name, address, employment, and what he had seen and heard outside Panther headquarters, but refused to answer any questions about what had taken place inside headquarters while he was there, claiming that the First Amendment afforded him a privilege to protect confidential informants and their information. A second summons was then served upon him, again directing him to appear before the grand jury and 'to give such evidence as he knows relating to any matters which may be inquired of on behalf of the Commonwealth before . . . the Grand Jury.' His motion to quash on First Amendment and other grounds was denied by the trial judge who, noting the absence of a statutory newsman's privilege in Massachusetts, ruled that petitioner had no constitutional privilege to refuse to divulge to the grand jury what he had seen and heard, including the identity of persons he had observed. The case was reported for decision to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. [FN8] The record there did not include a transcript of the hearing 2653 on the motion to quash, nor did it reveal the specific questions petitioner had refused to answer, the expected nature of his testimony, the nature of the grand jury investigation, or the likelihood of the grand jury's securing the information it sought from petitioner by other means. [FN9] The *674 Supreme Judicial Court, however, took 'judicial notice that in July, 1970, there were serious civil disorders in New Bedford, which involved street barricades, exclusion of the public from certain streets, fires, and similar turmoil. We were told at the arguments that there was gunfire in certain streets. We assume that the grand jury investigation was an appropriate effort to discover and indict those responsible for criminal acts.' 358 Mass. 604, 607, 266 N.E.2d 297, 299 (1971). The court then reaffirmed prior Massachusetts holdings that testimonial privileges were 'exceptional' and 'limited,' stating that '(t)he principle that the public 'has a right to every man's evidence" had usually been preferred, in the Commonwealth, to countervailing interests. Ibid. The court rejected the holding of the Ninth Circuit in Caldwell v. United States, supra, and 'adhere(d) to the view that there exists no constitutional newsman's privilege, either qualified or absolute, to refuse to appear and testify before a court or grand jury.' [FN10] 358 Mass., at 612, 266 N.E.2d, at 302--303. Any adverse effect upon the free dissemination of news by virtue of petitioner's being called to testify was deemed to be only 'indirect, theoretical, and uncertain.' Id., at 612, 266 N.E.2d, at 302. The court concluded that '(t)he obligation of newsmen . . . is that of every citizen . . . to appear when summoned, with relevant written or other material when required, and to answer relevant and reasonable inquiries.' Id., at 612, 266 N.E.2d, at 303. The court nevertheless noted that grand juries were subject to supervision by the presiding *675 judge, who had the duty 'to prevent oppressive, unnecessary, irrelevant, and other improper inquiry and investigation,' ibid., to insure that a witness' Fifth Amendment rights were not infringed, and to assess the propriety, necessity, and pertinence of the probable testimony to the investigation in progress. [FN11] The burden was deemed to be on the witness to establish the impropriety of the summons or the questions asked. The denial of the motion to quash was affirmed and we granted a writ of certiorari to petitioner Pappas. 402 U.S. 942, 91 S.Ct. 1619, 29 L.Ed.2d 110 (1971).

FN7. Petitioner's news films of this event were made available to the Bristol County District Attorney. App. 4.

FN8. The case was reported by the superior court directly to the Supreme Judicial Court for an interlocutory ruling under Mass.Gen.Laws, c. 278, s 30A and Mass.Gen.Laws, c. 231, s 111 (1959). The Supreme Judicial Court's decision appears at 358 Mass. 604, 266 N.E.2d 297 (1971).

FN9. 'We do not have before us the text of any specific questions which Pappas has refused to answer before the grand jury, or any petition to hold him for contempt for his refusal. We have only general statements concerning (a) the inquiries of the grand jury, and (b) the materiality of the testimony sought from Pappas. The record does not show the expected nature of his testimony or what likelihood there is of being able to obtain that testimony from persons other than news gatherers.' 358 Mass., at 606--607, 266 N.E.2d, at 299 (footnote omitted).

FN10. The court expressly declined to consider, however, appearances of newsmen before legislative or administrative bodies. Id., at 612 n. 10, 266 N.E.2d, at 303 n. 10.

FN11. The court noted that 'a presiding judge may consider in his discretion' the argument that the use of newsmen as witnesses is likely to result in unnecessary or burdensome use of their work > product, id., at 614 n. 13, 266 N.E.2d, at 304 n. 13, and cautioned that: 'We do not suggest that a general investigation of mere political or group association of persons, without substantial relation to criminal events, may not be viewed by a judge in a somewhat different manner from an investigation of particular criminal events concerning which a newsman may have knowledge.' Id., at 614 n. 14, 266 N.E.2d, at 304 n. 14.

United States v. Caldwell, No. 70--57, arose from subpoenas issued by a federal grand jury in the Northern District of California to respondent Earl Caldwell, a reporter for the New York Times assigned to cover the Black Panther Party and other black militant groups. A subpoena duces tecum was served on respondent on February 2, 1970, ordering him to appear before the grand jury to testify and to bring with him notes and tape recordings of interviews given him for publication by officers and spokesmen of the Black Panther Party concerning the aims, purposes, and activities 2654 of that organization. [FN12] Respondent objected to the scope *676 of this subpoena, and an agreement between his counsel and the Government attorneys resulted in a continuance. A second subpoena, served on March 16, omitted the documentary requirement and simply ordered Caldwell 'to appear . . . to testify before the Grand Jury.' Respondent and his employer, the New York Times, [FN13] moved to quash on the ground that the unlimited breadth of the subpoenas and the fact that Caldwell would have to appear in secret before the grand jury would destroy his working relationship with the Black Panther Party and 'suppress vital First Amendment freedoms . . . by driving a wedge of distrust and silence between the news media and the militants.' App. 7. Respondent argued that 'so drastic an incursion upon First Amendment freedoms' should not be permitted 'in the absence of a compelling governmental interest--not shown here--in requiring Mr. Caldwell's appearance before the grand jury.' Ibid. The motion was supported by amicus curiae memoranda from other publishing concerns and by affidavits from newsmen asserting the unfavorable impact on news sources of requiring reporters to appear before grand juries. The Government filed three memoranda in opposition to the motion to quash, each supported by affidavits. These documents stated that the grand jury was investigating, among other things, possible violations of a number of criminal statutes, including 18 U.S.C. s 871 (threats against the President), 18 U.S.C. *677 s 1751 (assassination, attempts to assassinate, conspiracy to assassinate the President), 18 U.S.C. s 231 (civil disorders), 18 U.S.C. s 2101 (interstate travel to incite a riot), and 18 U.S.C. s 1341 (mail frauds and swindles). It was recited that on November 15, 1969, an officer of the Black Panther Party made a publicly televised speech in which he had declared that '(w)e will kill Richard Nixon' and that this threat had been repeated in three subsequent issues of the Party newspaper. App. 66, 77. Also referred to were various writings by Caldwell about the Black Panther Party, including an article published in the New York Times on December 14, 1969, stating that '(i)n their role as the vanguard in a revolutionary struggle the Panthers have picked up guns,' and quoting the Chief of Staff of the Party as declaring that: 'We advocate the very direct overthrow of the Government by way of force and violence. By picking up guns and moving against it because we recognize it as being oppressive and in recognizing that we know that the only solution to it is armed struggle (sic).' App. 62. The Government also stated that the Chief of Staff of the Party had been indicted by the grand jury on December 3, 1969, for uttering threats against the life of the President in violation of 18 U.S.C. s 871 and that various efforts had been made to secure evidence of crimes under investigation through the immunization of persons allegedly associated with the Black Panther Party.

> FN12. The subpoena ordered production of '(n)otes and tape recordings of interviews covering the period from January 1, 1969, to date, reflecting statements made for publication by officers and spokesmen for the Black Panther Party concerning the aims and purposes of said organization and the activities of said organization, its officers, staff, personnel, and members, including specifically but not limited to interviews given by David Hilliard and Raymond 'Masai' Hewitt.' App. 20.

> FN13. The New York Times was granted standing to intervene as a party on the motion to quash the subpoenas. Application of Caldwell, 311 F.Supp. 358, 359 (ND Cal. 1970). It did not file an appeal from the District Court's contempt citation, and it did not seek certiorari here. It has filed an amicus curiae brief, however.

2655 On April 6, the District Court denied the motion to quash, Application of Caldwell, 311 F.Supp. 358 (NDCal.1970), on the ground that 'every person within the jurisdiction of the government' is bound to testify upon being properly summoned. Id., at 360 (emphasis in original). Nevertheless, the court accepted respondent's First Amendment arguments to the extent of issuing a protective order providing that although respondent had to divulge *678 whatever information had been given to him for publication, he 'shall not be required to reveal confidential associations, sources or information received, developed or maintained by him as a professional journalist in the course of his efforts to gather news for dissemination to the public through the press or other news media.' The court held that the First Amendment afforded respondent a privilege to refuse disclosure of such confidential information until there had been 'a showing by the Government of a compelling and overriding national interest in requiring Mr. Caldwell's testimony which cannot be served by any alternative means.' Id., at 362.

Subsequently, [FN14] the term of the grand jury expired, a new grand jury was convened, and a new subpoena ad testificandum was issued and served on May 22, 1970. A new motion to quash by respondent and memorandum in opposition by the Government were filed, and, by stipulation of the parties, the motion was submitted on the prior record. The court denied the motion to quash, repeating the protective provisions in its prior order but this time directing Caldwell to appear before the grand jury pursuant to the May 22 subpoena. Respondent refused to appear before the grand jury, and the court issued an order to show cause why he should not be held in contempt. Upon his further refusal to go before the grand jury, respondent was ordered committed for contempt until such time as he complied with the court's order or until the expiration of the term of the grand jury.

FN14. Respondent appealed from the District Court's April 6 denial of his motion to quash on April 17, 1970, and the Government moved to dismiss that appeal on the ground that the order was interlocutory. On May 12, 1970, the Ninth Circuit dismissed the appeal without opinion.

*679 Respondent Caldwell appealed the contempt order, [FN15] and the Court of Appeals reversed. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (CA9 1970). Viewing the issue before it as whether Caldwell was required to appear before the grand jury at all, rather than the scope of permissible interrogation, the court first determined that the First Amendment provided a qualified testimonial privilege to newsmen; in its view, requiring a reporter like Caldwell to testify would deter his informants from communicating with him in the future and would cause him to censor his writings in an effort to avoid being subpoenaed. Absent compelling reasons for requiring his testimony, he was held privileged to withhold it. The court also held, for similar First Amendment reasons, that, absent some special showing of necessity by the Government, attendance by Caldwell at a secret meeting of the grand jury was something he was privileged to refuse because of the potential impact of such an appearance on the flow of news to the public. We granted the United States' petition for certiorari. [FN16] 402 U.S. 942, 91 S.Ct. 1616, 29 L.Ed.2d 109 (1971).

FN15. The Government did not file a cross-appeal and did not challenge the validity of the District Court protective order in the Court of Appeals.

FN16. The petition presented a single question: 'Whether a newspaper reporter who has published articles about an organization can, under the First Amendment, properly refuse to appear before a grand jury investigating possible crimes by members of that organization who have been quoted in the published articles.'

II

Petitioners Branzburg and Pappas and respondent Caldwell press First Amendment claims that may be simply put: that to gather news it is often necessary 2656 to agree either not to identify the source of information published or to publish only part of the facts revealed, or both; that if the reporter is nevertheless *680 forced to reveal these confidences to a grand jury, the source so identified and other confidential sources of other reporters will be measurably deterred from furnishing publishable information, all to the detriment of the free flow of information protected by the First Amendment. Although the newsmen in these cases do not claim an absolute privilege against official interrogation in all circumstances, they assert that the reporter should not be forced either to appear or to testify before a grand jury or at trial until and unless sufficient grounds are shown for believing that the reporter possesses information relevant to a crime the grand jury is investigating, that the information the reporter has is unavailable from other sources, and that the need for the information is sufficiently compelling to overide the claimed invasion of First Amendment interests occasioned by the disclosure. Principally relied upon are prior cases emphasizing the importance of the First Amendment guarantees to individual development and to our system of representative government, [FN17] decisions requiring that official action with adverse impact on First Amendment rights be justified by a public interest that is 'compelling' or 'paramount,' [FN18] and those precedents establishing the principle that justifiable governmental goals may not be achieved by unduly broad means having an unnecessary impact 681 on protected rights of speech, press, or association. [FN19] The heart of the claim is that the burden on news gathering resulting from compelling reporters to disclose confidential information outweighs any public interest in obtaining the information. [FN20]

FN17. Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 145, 87 S.Ct. 1975, 1986, 18 L.Ed.2d 1094 (1967) (opinion of Harlan, J.); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270, 84 S.Ct. 710, 720, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964); Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, 64--65, 80 S.Ct. 536, 538--539, 4 L.Ed.2d 559 (1960); Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 263, 62 S.Ct. 190, 194, 86 L.Ed. 192 (1941); Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250, 56 S.Ct. 444, 449, 80 L.Ed. 660 (1936); Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 722, 51 S.Ct. 625, 633, 75 L.Ed. 1357 (1931).

FN18. NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 439, 83 S.Ct. 328, 341, 9 L.Ed.2d 405 (1963); Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 530, 65 S.Ct. 315, 322, 89 L.Ed. 430 (1945); DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825, 829, 86 S.Ct. 1148, 1151, 16 L.Ed.2d 292 (1966); Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524, 80 S.Ct. 412, 417, 4 L.Ed.2d 480 (1960); Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 161, 60 S.Ct. 146, 150, 84 L.Ed. 155 (1939); NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 464, 78 S.Ct. 1163, 1173, 2 L.Ed.2d 1488 (1958).

FN19. Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 56, 85 S.Ct. 734, 737, 13 L.Ed.2d 649 (1965); NAACP v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288, 307, 84 S.Ct. 1302, 1313, 12 L.Ed.2d 325 (1964); Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 147, 63 S.Ct. 862, 865, 87 L.Ed. 1313 (1943); Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11, 18, 86 S.Ct. 1238, 1241, 16 L.Ed.2d 321 (1966).

FN20. There has been a great deal of writing in recent years on the existence of a newsman's constitutional right of nondisclosure of confidential information. See, e.g., Beaver, The Newsman's Code, The Claim of Privilege and Everyman's Right to Evidence, 47 Ore.L.Rev. 243 (1968); Guest & Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing Their Sources, 64 Nw.U.L.Rev. 18 (1969); Note, Reporters and Their Sources: The Constitutional Right to a Confidential Relationship, 80 Yale L.J. 317 (1970); Comment, The Newsman's Privilege: Government Investigations, Criminal Prosecutions and Private Litigation, 58 Calif.L.Rev. 1198 (1970); Note, The Right of the Press to Gather Information, 71 Col.L.Rev. 838 (1971); Nelson, The Newsmen's Privilege Against Disclosure of Confidential Sources and Information, 24 Vand.L.Rev. 667 (1971).

We do not question the significance of free speech, press, or assembly to the country's welfare. Nor is it suggested that news gathering does not quality for First Amendment protection; without some protection for seeking out the news, freedom of the press could be eviscerated. But these cases involve no intrusions *2657 upon speech or assemby, no prior restraint or restriction on what the press may publish, and no express or implied command that the press publish what it prefers to withhold. No exaction or tax for the privilege of publishing, and no penalty, civil or criminal, related to the content of published material is at issue here. The use of confidential sources by the press is not forbidden or restricted; reporters remain free to seek news from 682 any source by means within the law. No attempt is made to require the press to publish its sources of information or indiscriminately to disclose them on request.

[3][4] The sole issue before us is the obligation of reporters to respond to grand jury subpoenas as other citizens do and to answer questions relevant to an investigation into the commission of crime. Citizens generally are not constitutionally immune from grand jury subpoenas; and neither the First Amendment nor any other constitutional provision protects the average citizen from disclosing to a grand jury information that he has received in confidence. [FN21] The claim is, however, that reporters are exempt from these obligations because if forced to respond to subpoenas and identify their sources or disclose other confidences, their informants will refuse or be reluctant to furnish newsworthy information in the future. This asserted burden on news gathering is said to make compelled testimony from newsmen constitutionally suspect and to require a privileged position for them.

> FN21. 'In general, then, the mere fact that a communication was made in express confidence, or in the implied confidence of a confidential relation, does not create a privilege. '. . . No pledge of privacy nor oath of secrecy can avail against demand for the truth in a court of justice.' 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence s 2286 (McNaughton rev. 1961). This was not always the rule at common law, however. In 17th century England, the obligations of honor among gentlemen were occasionally recognized as privileging from compulsory disclosure information obtained in exchange for a promise of confidence. See Bulstrod v. Letchmere, 2 Freem. 6, 22 Eng.Rep. 1019 (1676); Lord Grey's Trial, 9 How.St.Tr. 127 (1682).

[5] It is clear that the First Amendment does not invalidate every incidental burdening of the press that may result from the enforcement of civil or criminal statutes of general applicability. Under prior cases, otherwise valid laws serving substantial public interests may be enforced against the press as against others, despite 683 the possible burden that may be imposed. The Court has emphasized that '(t)he publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of general laws. He has no special privilege to invade the rights and liberties of others.' Associated Press v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103, 132--133, 57 S.Ct. 650, 656, 81 L.Ed. 953 (1937). It was there held that the Associated Press, a news-gathering and disseminating organization, was not exempt from the requirements of the National Labor Relations Act. The holding was reaffirmed in Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 192--193, 66 S.Ct. 494, 497--498, 90 L.Ed. 614 (1946), where the Court rejected the claim that applying the Fair Labor Standards Act to a newspaper publishing business would abridge the freedom of press guaranteed by the First Amendment. See also Mabee v. White Plains Publishing Co., 327 U.S. 178, 66 S.Ct. 511, 90 L.Ed. 607 (1946). Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 65 S.Ct. 1416, 89 L.Ed. 2013 (1945), similarly overruled assertions that the First Amendment precluded application of the Sherman Act to a news-gathering and disseminating organization. Cf. Indiana Farmer's Guide Publishing Co. v. Prairie Farmer Publishing Co., 293 U.S. 268, 276, 55 S.Ct. 182, 184, 79 L.Ed. 356 (1934); Citizen Publishing Co. v. United States, 394 U.S. 131, 139, 89 S.Ct. 927, 931, 22 L.Ed.2d 148 (1969); Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143, 155--156, 72 S.Ct. 181, 187--188, 96 L.Ed. 162 (1951). Likewise, a newspaper may be subjected to nondiscriminatory forms of general taxation. Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. *2658 233, 250, 56 S.Ct. 444, 449, 80 L.Ed. 660 (1936); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 112, 63 S.Ct. 870, 874, 87 L.Ed. 1292 (1943).

The prevailing view is that the press is not free to publish with impunity everything and anything it desires to publish. Although it may deter or regulate what is said or published, the press may not circulate knowing or reckless falsehoods damaging to private reputation without subjecting itself to liability for damages, including punitive damages, or even criminal prosecution. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 684 279--280, 84 S.Ct. 710, 725--726, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964); Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74, 85 S.Ct. 209, 215, 13 L.Ed.2d 125 (1964); Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 147, 87 S.Ct. 1975, 1987, 18 L.Ed.2d 1094 (1967) (opinion of Harlan, J.,); Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265, 277, 91 S.Ct. 621, 628, 28 L.Ed.2d 35 (1971). A newspaper or a journalist may also be punished for contempt of court, in appropriate circumstances. Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 377--378, 67 S.Ct. 1249, 1255--1256, 91 L.Ed. 1546 (1947).

[6] It has generally been held that the First Amendment does not guarantee the press a constitutional right of special access to information not available to the public generally. Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 16--17, 85 S.Ct. 1271, 1280--1281, 14 L.Ed.2d 179 (1965); New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 728--730, 91

S.Ct. 2140, 2148--2149, 29 L.Ed.2d 822 (1971), (Stewart, J., concurring); Tribune Review Publishing Co. v. Thomas, 254 F.2d 883, 885 (CA3 1958); In the Matter of United Press Assns. v. Valente, 308 N.Y. 71, 77, 123 N.E.2d 777, 778 (1954). In Zemel v. Rusk, supra, for example, the Court sustained the Government's refusal to validate passports to Cuba even though that restriction 'render(ed) less than wholly free the flow of information concerning that country.' 381 U.S., at 16, 85 S.Ct., at 1281. The ban on travel was held constitutional, for '(t)he right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information.' Id., at 17, 85 S.Ct., at 1281. [FN22]

FN22. 'There are few restrictions on action which could not be clothed by ingenious argument in the garb of decreased data flow. For example, the prohibition of unauthorized entry into the White House diminishes the citizen's opportunities to gather information he might find relevant to his opinion of the way the country is being run, but that does not make entry into the White House a First Amendment right.' 381 U.S., at 16--17, 85 S.Ct., at 1281.

Despite the fact that news gathering may be hampered, the press is regularly excluded from grand jury proceedings, our own conferences, the meetings of other official bodies gathered in executive session, and the meetings of private organizations. Newsmen have no constitutional right of access to the scenes of crime or 685 disaster when the general public is excluded, and they may be prohibited from attending or publishing information about trials if such restrictions are necessary to assure a defendant a fair trial before an impartial tribunal. In Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333, 86 S.Ct. 1507, 16 L.Ed.2d 600 (1966), for example, the Court reversed a state court conviction where the trial court failed to adopt 'stricter rules governing the use of the courtroom by newsmen, as Sheppard's counsel requested,' neglected to insulate witnesses from the press, and made no 'effort to control the release of leads, information, and gossip to the press by police officers, witnesses, and the counsel for both sides.' Id., at 358, 359, 86 S.Ct., at 1520. '(T)he trial court might well have proscribed extrajudicial statements by any lawyer, party, witness, or court official which divulged prejudicial matters.' Id., at 361, 86 S.Ct., at 1521. See also Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532, 539--540, 85 S.Ct. 1628, 1631--1632, 14 L.Ed.2d 543 (1965); Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723, 726, 83 S.Ct. 1417, 1419, 10 L.Ed.2d 663 (1963).

It is thus not surprising that the great weight of authority is that newsmen are not exempt from the normal duty of appearing before a grand jury and answering questions relevant to a *2659 criminal investigation. At common law, courts consistently refused to recognize the existence of any privilege authorizing a newsman to refuse to reveal confidential information to a grand jury. See, e.g., Ex parte Lawrence, 116 Cal. 298, 48 P. 124 (1897); Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, 70 S.E. 781 (1911); Clein v. State, 52 So.2d 117 (Fla.1950); In re Grunow, 84 N.J.L. 235, 85 A. 1011 (1913); People ex rel. Mooney v. Sheriff, 269 N.Y. 291, 199 N.E. 415 (1936); Joslyn v. People, 67 Colo. 297, 184 P. 375 (1919); Adams v. Associated Press, 46 F.R.D. 439 (SD Tex. 1969); Brewster v. Boston Herald-Traveler Corp., 20 F.R.D. 416 (D.C.Mass.1957). See generally Annot., 7 A.L.R.3d 591 (1966). In 1958, a news gatherer asserted for the first time that the First Amendment 686 exempted confidential information from public disclosure pursuant to a subpoena issued in a civil suit, Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (CA2), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910, 79 S.Ct. 237, 3 L.Ed.2d 231 (1958), but the claim was denied, and this argument has been almost uniformly rejected since then although there are occasional dicta that, in circumstances not presented here, a newsman might be excused. In re Goodfader, 45 Haw. 317, 367 P.2d 472 (1961); In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A.2d 181 (1963); State v. Buchanan, 250 Or. 244, 436 P.2d 729, cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905, 88 S.Ct. 2055, 20 L.Ed.2d 1363 (1968); Murphy v. Colorado (No. 19604 Sup.Ct.Colo.), cert. denied, 365 U.S. 843, 81 S.Ct. 802, 5 L.Ed.2d 810 (1961) (unreported, discussed in In re Goodfader, supra, 45 Haw., at 366, 367 P.2d, at 498 (Mizuha, J., dissenting)). These courts have applied the presumption against the existence of an asserted testimonial privilege, United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323, 331, 70 S.Ct. 724, 730, 94 L.Ed. 884 (1950), and have concluded that the First Amendment interest asserted by the newsman was outweighed by the general obligation of a citizen to appear before a grand jury or at trial, pursuant to a subpoena, and give what information he possesses.

The opinions of the state courts in Branzburg and Pappas are typical of the prevailing view, although a few recent cases, such as Caldwell, have recognized and given effect to some form of constitutional newsman's privilege. See State v. Knops, 49 Wis.2d 647, 183 N.W.2d 93 (1971) (dictum); Alioto v. Cowles Communications, Inc., C.A. No. 52150 (ND Cal.1969); In re Grand Jury Witnesses, 322 F.Supp. 573 (ND Cal.1970); People v. Dohrn, Crim.No. 69--3808 (Cook County, Ill., Cir.Ct.1970).

[7][8][9] The prevailing constitutional view of the newsman's privilege is very much rooted in the ancient role of the grand jury that has the dual function of determining if there is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and of protecting citizens against unfounded 687 criminal prosecutions. [FN23] Grand jury proceedings are constitutionally mandated for the institution of federal criminal prosecutions for capital or other serious crimes, and 'its constitutional prerogatives are rooted in long centuries of Anglo-American history.' Hannah v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420, 489--490, 80 S.Ct. 1502, 1544, 4 L.Ed.2d 1307 (1960). (Frankfurter, J., concurring in result). The Fifth Amendment provides that '(n)o person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury.' [FN24] The adoption *2660 of the grand jury 'in our Constitution as the sole method for preferring charges in serious criminal cases shows the high place it held as an instrument of justice.' Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 362, 76 S.Ct. 406, 408, 100 L.Ed. 397 (1956). Although state systems of criminal procedure differ greatly among themselves, the grand jury is similarly guaranteed by many state constitutions and plays an important role in fair and effective law enforcement in the overwhelming 688 majority of the States. [FN25] Because its task is to inquire into the Existence of possible criminal conduct and to return only well-founded indictments, its investigative powers are necessarily broad. 'It is a grand inquest, a body with powers of investigation and inquisition, the scope of whose inquiries is not to be limited narrowly by questions of propriety or forecasts of the probable result of the investigation, or by doubts whether any particular individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime.' Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 282, 39 S.Ct. 468, 471, 63 L.Ed. 979 (1919). Hence, the grand jury's authority to subpoena witnesses is not only historic, id., at 279--281, 39 S.Ct., at 470--471, but essential to its task. Although the powers of the grand jury are not unlimited and are subject to the supervision of a judge, the longstanding principle that 'the public . . . has a right to every man's evidence,' except for those persons protected by a constitutional, common-law, or statutory privilege, United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323, 331, 70 S.Ct. 724, 730, 94 L.Ed. 884 (1950); Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421, 438, 52 S.Ct. 252, 255, 76 L.Ed. 375 (1932); 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence s 2192 (McNaughton rev. 1961), is particularly applicable to grand jury proceedings. [FN26]

FN23. 'Historically, (the grand jury) has been regarded as a primary security to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive persecution; it serves the invaluable function in our society of standing between the accuser and the accused . . . to determine whether a charge is founded upon reason or was dictated by an intimidating power or by malice and personal ill will.' Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 390, 82 S.Ct. 1364, 1373, 8 L.Ed.2d 569 (1962) (footnote omitted).

FN24. It has been held that 'infamous' punishments include confinement at hard labor, United States v. Moreland, 258 U.S. 433, 42 S.Ct. 368, 66 L.Ed. 700 (1922): incarceration in a penitentiary, Mackin v. United States, 117 U.S. 348, 6 S.Ct. 777, 29 L.Ed. 909 (1886); and imprisonment for more than a year, Barkman v. Sanford, 162 F.2d 592 (CA5), cert. denied, 332 U.S. 816, 68 S.Ct. 155, 92 L.Ed. 393 (1947). Fed.Rule Crim.Proc. 7(a) has codified these holdings: 'An offense which may be punished by death shall be prosecuted by indictment. An offense which may be punished by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year or at hard labor shall be prosecuted by indictment, or, if indictment is waived, it may be prosecuted by information. Any other offense may be prosecuted by indictment or by information.'

FN25. Although indictment by grand jury is not part of the due process of law guaranteed to state criminal defendants by the Fourteenth Amendment, Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516, 4 S.Ct. 111, 28 L.Ed. 232 (1884), a recent study reveals that 32 States require that certain kinds of criminal prosecutions he initiated by indictment. Spain, the Grand Jury, Past and Present: A Survey, 2

Am.Crim.L.Q. 119, 126--142 (1964). In the 18 States in which the prosecutor may proceed by information, the grand jury is retained as an alternative means of invoking the criminal process and as an investigative tool. Ibid.

FN26. Jeremy Bentham vividly illustrated this maxim: 'Are men of the first rank and consideration--are men high in office--men whose time is not less valuable to the public than to themselves--are such men to be forced to quit their business, their functions, and what is more than all, their pleasure, at the beck of every idle or malicious adversary, to dance attendance upon every petty cause? Yes, as far as it is necessary, they and everybody. . . . Were the Prince of Wales, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Lord High Chancellor, to be passing by in the same coach, while a chimney-sweeper and a barrow-woman were in dispute about a halfpennyworth of apples, and the chimney-sweeper or the barrow-woman were to think proper to call upon them for their evidence, could they refuse it? No, most certainly.' 4 The Works of Jeremy Bentham 320--321 (J. Bowring ed. 1843). In United States v. Burr, 25 Fed.Cas. pp. 30, 34 (No. 14,692d) (C.C.Va.1807), Chief Justice Marshall, sitting on Circuit, opined that in proper circumstances a subpoena could be issued to the President of the United States.

689 A number of States have provided newsmen a statutory pvivilege of varying breadth, [FN27] but the majority have not *2661 done so, and none has been provided by federal statute. [FN28] Until now the only testimonial privilege for unofficial witnesses that is rooted in the Federal Constitution 690 is the Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination. We are asked to create another by interpreting the First Amendment to grant newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy. This we decline to do. [FN29] Fair and effective law enforcement aimed at providing security for the person and property of the individual is a fundamental function of government, and the grand jury plays an important, constitutionally mandated role in this process. On the records now before us, we perceive no basis for holding that the public interest in law enforcement and in ensuring effective grand jury proceedings is insufficient to override the consequential, but uncertain, burden on news gathering that is said to result from insisting that reporters, like other citizens, respond to relevant 691 questions put to them in the course of a valid grand jury investigation or criminal trial.

FN27. Thus far, 17 States have provided some type of statutory protection to a newsman's confidential sources: Ala.Code, Tit. 7, s 370 (1960); Alaska Stat. s 09.25.150 (Supp.1971); Ariz.Rev.Stat.Ann. s 12--2337 (Supp.1971--1972); Ark.Stat.Ann. s 43--917 (1964); Cal.Evid.Code s 1070 (Supp.1972); Ind.Ann.Stat. s 2--1733 (1968), IC 1971, 34--3--5--1; Ky.Rev.Stat. s 421.100 (1962); La.Rev.Stat.Ann. ss 45:1451--45:1454 (Supp.1972); Md.Ann.Code, art. 35, s 2 (1971); Mich.Comp.Laws s 767.5a (Supp.1956), Mich.Stat.Ann. s 28.945(1) (1954); Mont.Rev.Codes Ann. s 93--601--2 (1964); Nev.Rev.Stat. s 49.275 (1971); N.J.Rev.Stat. ss 2A:84A--21, 2A:84A--29 (Supp.1972--1973); N.M.Stat.Ann. s 20--1--12.1 (1970); N.Y.Civil Rights Laws, McKinney's Consol.Laws, c. 6, s 79--h (Supp.1971--1972); Ohio Rev.Code Ann. s 2739.12 (1954); Pa.Stat.Ann., Tit. 28, s 330 (Supp.1972--1973).

FN28. Such legislation has been introduced, however. See, e.g., S. 1311, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971); S. 3552, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970); H.R. 16328, H.R. 16704, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970); S. 1851, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. (1963); H.R. 8519, H.R. 7787, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. (1963); S. 965, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. (1959); H.R. 355, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. (1959). For a general analysis of proposed congressional legislation, see Staff of Sentate Committee on the Judiciary, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., The Newsman's Privilege (Comm. Print 1966).

FN29. The creation of new testimonial privileges has been met with disfavor by commentators since such privileges obstruct the search for truth. Wigmore condemns such privileges as 'so many derogations from a positive general rule (that everyone is obligated to testify when properly summoned)' and as 'obstacle(s) to the administration of justice.' 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence s 2192 (McNaughton rev. 1961). His criticism that 'all privileges of exemption from this duty are exceptional, and are therefore to be discountenanced,' id., at s 2192, p. 73 (emphasis in original) has been frequently echoed. Morgan, Foreward, Model Code of Evidence 22--30 (1942); 2 Z. Chafee, Government and Mass

Communications 496--497 (1947); Report of ABA Committee on Improvements in the Law of Evidence, 63 A.B.A. Reports 595 (1938); C. McCormick, Evidence 159 (2d ed. 1972); Chafee, Privileged Communications: Is justice Served or Obstructed by Closing the Doctor's Mouth on the Witness Stand?, 52 Yale L.J. 607 (1943); Ladd, Privileges, 1969 Law & the Social Order 555, 556; 58 Am.Jur., Witnesses s 546 (1948); 97 C.J.S. Wtinesses s 259 (1957); McMann v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 87 F.2d 377, 378 (CA2 1937) (L. Hand, J.). Neither the ALI's Model Code of Evidence (1942), the Uniform Rules of Evidence of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (1953), nor the Proposed Rules of Evidence for the United States Courts and Magistrates (rev. ed. 1971) has included a newsman's privilege.

[10] This conclusion itself involves no restraint on what newspapers may publish or on the type or quality of information reporters may seek to acquire, nor does it threaten the vast bulk of confidential relationships between reporters and their sources. Grand juries address themselves to the issues of whether crimes have been committed and who committed them. Only where news sources themselves are implicated in crime or possess information relevant to the grand jury's task need they or the reporter be concerned about grand jury subpoenas. Nothing before us indicates that a large number or percentage of all confidential news sources falls into either category and would in any way be deterred by our holding that the Constitution does not, as it never has, exempt the newsman from performing the citizen's normal duty of appearing and furnishing 2662 information relevant to the grand jury's task.

The preference for anonymity of those confidential informants involved in actual criminal conduct is presumably a product of their desire to escape criminal prosecution, and this preference, while understandable, is hardly deserving of constitutional protection. It would be frivolous to assert--and no one does in these cases--that the First Amendment, in the interest of securing news or otherwise, confers a license on either the reporter or his news sources to violate valid criminal laws. Although stealing documents or private wiretapping could provide newsworthy information, neither reporter nor source is immune from conviction for such conduct, whatever the impact on the flow of news. Neither is immume, on First Amendment grounds, from testifying against the other, before the grand jury or at a criminal trial. The Amendment does not reach so far as to override the interest of the public in ensuring *692 that neither reporter nor source is invading the rights of other citizens through reprehensible conduct forbidden to all other persons. To assert the contrary proposition > 'Is to answer it, since it involves in its very statement the contention that the freedom of the press is the freedom to do wrong with impunity and implies the right to frustrate and defeat the discharge of those governmental duties upon the performance of which the freedom of all, including that of the press, depends. . . . It suffices to say that however complete is the right of the press to state public things and discuss them, that right, as every other right enjoyed in human society, is subject to the restraints which separate right from wrong-doing.' Toledo Newspaper Co. v. United States, 247 U.S. 402, 419--420, 38 S.Ct. 560, 564, 62 L.Ed. 1186 (1918). [FN30]

FN30. The holding in this case involved a construction of the Contempt of Court Act of 1831, 4 Stat. 487, which permitted summary trial of contempts 'so near (to the court) as to obstruct the administration of justice.' The Court held that the Act required only that the conduct have a 'direct tendency to prevent and obstruct the discharge of judicial duty.' 247 U.S., at 419, 38 S.Ct., at 564. This view was overruled and the Act given a much narrower reading in Nye v. United States, 313 U.S. 33, 47--52, 61 S.Ct. 810, 815--817, 85 L.Ed. 1172 (1941). See Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 205--206, 88 S.Ct. 1477, 1484--1485, 20 L.Ed.2d 522 (1968).

[11] Thus, we cannot seriously entertain the notion that the First Amendment protects a newsman's agreement to conceal the criminal conduct of his source, or evidence thereof, on the theory that it is better to write about crime than to do something about it. Insofar as any reporter in these cases undertook not to reveal or testify about the crime he witnessed, his claim of privilege under the First Amendment presents no substantial question. The crimes of news sources are no less reprehensible and threatening to the public interest when witnessed by a reporter than when they are not.

*693 There remain those situations where a source is not engaged in criminal conduct but has information suggesting illegal conduct by others. Newsmen frequently receive information from such sources pursuant to a tacit or express agreement to withhold the source's name and suppress any information that the source wishes not published. Such informants presumably desire anonymity in order to avoid being entangled as a witness in a criminal trial or grand jury investigation. They may fear that disclosure will threaten their job security or personal safety or that it will simply result in dishonor or embarassment.

The argument that the flow of news will be diminished by compelling reporters to aid the grand jury in a criminal investigation is not irrational, nor are the records before us silent on the matter. But we remain unclear how often and to what extent informers are actually deterred from furnishing information when newsmen are forced to testify before a grand jury. The available data 2663 indicate that some newsmen rely a great deal on confidential sources and that some informants are particularly sensitive to the threat of exposure and may be silenced if it is held by this Court that, ordinarily, newsmen must testify pursuant to subpoenas, [FN31] but the evidence fails to demonstrate that there would be a significant construction of the flow of news to the public if this Court reaffirms the prior common-law and constitutional rule regarding the testimonial obligations of newsmen. Estimates of the inhibiting effect of such subpoenas on the willingness of informants to make disclosures to newsmen are widely divergent and *694 to a great extent speculative. [FN32] It would be difficult to canvass the views of the informants themselves; surveys of reporters on this topic are chiefly opinions of predicted informant behavior and must be viewed in the light of the professional self-interest of the interviewees. [FN33] Reliance by the press on confidential informants does not mean that all such sources will in fact dry up because of the later possible appearance of the newsman before a grand jury. The reporter may never be called and if he objects to testifying, the prosecution may not insist. Also, the relationship of many informants to the press is a symbiotic one which is unlikely to be greatly inhibited by the threat of subpoena: quite often, such informants are members of a minority political or cultural group that *695 relies heavily on the media to propagate its views, publicize its aims, and magnify its exposure to the public. Moreover, grand juries characteristically conduct secret proceedings, and law enforcement officers are themselves experienced in dealing with informers, and have their own methods for protecting them without interference with the effective administration of justice. There is little before us indicating that informants whose interest in avoiding exposure is that it may threaten job security, personal safety, or peace of mind, would in fact be in a worse position, or would think they would be, if they risked placing their trust in public officials as well as reporters. We doubt if the informer who prefers anonymity but is sincerely interested in furnishing evidence of crime will always or very often be deterred by the prospect of dealing with those public authorities characteristically charged with the duty to protect the public interest as well as his.

FN31. Respondent Caldwell attached a number of affidavits from prominent newsmen to his initial motion to quash, which detail the experiences of such journalists after they have been subpoenaed. Appendix to No. 70--57, pp. 22--61.

FN32. Cf. e.g., the results of a study conducted by Guest & Stanzler, which appears as an appendix to their article, supra, n. 20. A number of editors of daily newspapers of varying circulation were asked the question, 'Excluding one-or two-sentence gossip items, on the average how many stories based on information received in confidence are published in your paper each year? Very rough estimate.' Answers varied significantly, e.g., 'Virtually innumerable,' Tucson Daily Citizen (41,969 daily circ.), 'Too many to remember,' Los Angeles Herald-Examiner (718,221 daily circ.), 'Occasionally,' Denver Post (252,084 daily circ.), 'Rarely,' Cleveland Plain Dealer (370,499 daily circ.), 'Very rare, some politics,' Oregon Journal (146 403 daily circ.). This study did not purport to measure the extent of deterrence of informants caused by subpoenas to the press.

FN33. In his Press Subpoenas: An Empirical and legal Analysis, Study Report of the Reporters' Committee on Freedom of the Press 6--12, Prof. Vince Blasi discusses these methodological problems. Prof. Blasi's survey found that slightly more than half ot the 975 reporters questioned said that they relied on regular confidential sources for at least 10% of their stories. Id., at 21. Of this group of reporters, only 8% were able to say with some certainty that their professional functioning had been adversely affected by the threat of subpoena; another 11% were not certain whether or not they had been adversely affected. Id., at 53.

[12] Accepting the fact, however, that an undetermined number of informants not themselves implicated in crime will nevertheless, for whatever reason, refuse to talk to newsmen if 2664 they fear identification by a reporter in an official investigation, we cannot accept the argument that the public interest in possible future news about crime from undisclosed, unverified sources must take precedence over the public interest in pursuing and prosecuting those crimes reported to the press by informants and in thus deterring the commission of such crimes in the future.

We note first that the privilege claimed is that of the reporter, not the informant, and that if the authorities independently identify the informant, neither his own reluctance to testify nor the objection of the newsman would shield him from grand jury inquiry, whatever the impact on the flow of news or on his future usefulness as a secret source of information. More important, *696 it is obvious that agreements to conceal information relevant to commission of crime have very little to recommend them from the standpoint of public policy. Historically, the common law recognized a duty to raise the 'hue and cry' and report felonies to the authorities. [FN34] Misprision of a felony--that is, the concealment of a felony 'which a man knows, but never assented to . . . (so as to become) either principal or accessory,' 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries, *121, was often said to be a common-law crime. [FN35] The first Congress passed a statute, 1 Stat. 113, s 6, as amended, 35 Stat. 1114, s 146, 62 Stat. 684, which is still in effect, defining a federal crime of misprision:

FN34. See Statute of Westminster First, 3 Edw. 1, c. 9, p. 43 (1275); Statute of Westminster Second, 13 Edw. 1, c. 6, pp. 114--115 (1285); Sheriffs Act of 1887, 50 & 51 Vict., c. 55, s 8(1); 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries *293--295; 2 W. Holdsworth, History of English Law 80--81, 101--102 (3d ed. 1927); 4 id., at 521--522.

FN35. See, e.g., Scrope's Case, referred to in 3 Coke's Institute 36; Rex v. Cowper, 5 Mod. 206, 87 Eng.Rep. 611 (1969); Proceedings under a Special Commission for the County of York, 31 How.St.Tr. 965, 969 (1813); Sykes v. Director of Public Prosecutions, (1961) 3 W.L.R. 371. But see Glazebrook, Misprision of Felony--Shadow or Phantom?, 8 Am.J.Legal Hist. 189 (1964). See also Act 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 11 (1552).

'Whoever, having knowledge of the actual commission of a felony cognizable by a court of the United States, conceals and does not as soon as possible make known the same to some judge or other person in civil or military authority under the United States, shall be (guilty of misprision).' 18 U.S.C. s 4. [FN36]

FN36. This statute has been contrued, however, to require both knowledge of a crime and some affirmative act of concealment or participation. Bratton v. United States, 73 F.2d 795 (CA10 1934); United States v. Farrar, 38 F.2d 515, 516 (Mass.), aff'd on other grounds, 281 U.S. 624, 50 S.Ct. 425, 74 L.Ed. 1078 (1930); United States v. Norman, 391 F.2d 212 (CA6), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 1014, 88 S.Ct. 1265, 20 L.Ed.2d 163 (1968); Lancey v. United States, 356 F.2d 407 (CA9), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 922, 87 S.Ct. 234, 17 L.Ed.2d 145 (1966). Cf. Marbury v. Brooks, 7 Wheat. 556, 575, 5 L.Ed. 522 (1822) (Marshall, C.J).

*697 It is apparent from this statute, as well as from our history and that of England, that concealment of crime and agreements to do so are not looked upon with favor. Such conduct deserves no encomium, and we decline now to afford it First Amendment protection by denigrating the duty of a citizen, whether reporter or informer, to respond to grand jury subpoena and answer relevant questions put to him.

Of course, the press has the right to abide by its agreement not to publish all the information it has, but the right to withhold news is not equivalent to a First Amendment exemption from the ordinary duty of all other citizens to furnish relevant information to a grand jury performing an important public function. Private restraints on the flow of information are not so favored by the First Amendment that they override all other public interests. As Mr. Justice Black declared in another context, '(f)reedom of the press from governmental 2665 interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests.' Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S., at 20, 65 S.Ct., at 1425.

Neither are we now convinced that a virtually impenetrable constitutional shield, beyond legislative or judicial control, should be forged to protect a private system of informers operated by the press to report on criminal conduct, a system that would be unaccountable to the public, would pose a threat to the citizen's justifiable expectations of privacy, and would equally protect well-intentioned informants and those who for pay or otherwise betray their trust to their employer or associates. The public through its elected and appointed *698 law enforcement officers regularly utilizes informers, and in proper circumstances may assert a privilege against disclosing the identity of these informers. But

> '(t)he purpose of the privilege is the furtherance and protection of the public interest in effective law enforcement. The privilege recognizes the obligation of citizens to communicate their knowledge of the commission of crimes to law-enforcement officials and, by preserving their anonymity, encourages them to perform that obligation.' Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 59, 77 S.Ct. 623, 627, 1 L.Ed.2d 639 (1957).

Such informers enjoy no constitutional protection. Their testimony is available to the public when desired by grand juries or at criminal trials; their identity cannot be concealed from the defendant when it is critical to his case. Roviaro v. United States, supra, at 60--61, 62, 77 S.Ct. at 627--628, 629; McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300, 310, 87 S.Ct. 1056, 1062, 18 L.Ed.2d 62 (1967); Smith v. Illinois, 390 U.S. 129, 131, 88 S.Ct. 748, 749, 19 L.Ed.2d 956 (1968); Alford v. United States, 282 U.S. 687, 693, 51 S.Ct. 218, 220, 75 L.Ed. 624 (1931). Clearly, this system is not impervious to control by the judiciary and the decision whether to unmask an informer or to continue to profit by his anonymity is in public, not private, hands. We think that it should remain there and that public authorities should retain the options of either insisting on the informer's testimony relevant to the prosecution of crime or of seeking the benefit of further information that his exposure might prevent.

We are admonished that refusal to provide a First Amendment reporter's privilege will undermine the freedom of the press to collect and disseminate news. But this is not the lesson history teaches us. As noted previously, the common law recognized no such privilege, and the constitutional argument was not even asserted until 1958. From the beginning of our country the press has operated without constitutional protection *699 for press informants, and the press has flourished. The existing constitutional rules have not been a serious obstacle to either the development or retention of confidential news sources by the press. [FN37]

> FN37. Though the constitutional argument for a newsman's privilege has been put forward very recently, newsmen have contended for a number of years that such a privilege was desirable. See, e.g., Siebert & Ryniker, Press Winning Fight to Guard Sources, Editor & Publisher, Sept. 1, 1934, pp. 9, 36--37; G. Bird & F. Merwin, The Press and Society 592 (1971). The first newsman's privilege statute was enacted by Maryland in 1896, and currently is codified as Md.Ann.Code Art. 35, s 2 (1971).

It is said that currently press subpoenas have multiplied, [FN38] that mutual distrust and tension between press and officialdom have increased, that reporting styles have changed, and that there is now more need for confidential sources, particularly where the press seeks news about minority cultural and political groups or dissident organizations suspicious of the law and public officials. These developments, even if true, are treacherous grounds for a far-reaching 2666 interpretation of the First Amendment fastening a nationwide rule on courts, grand juries, and prosecuting officials everywhere. The obligation to testify in response to grand jury subpoenas will not threaten these sources not involved with criminal conduct and without information relevant to grand jury investigations, and we cannot hold that the Constitution places the sources in these two categories either above the law or beyond its reach.

> FN38. A list of recent subpoenas to the news media is contained in the appendix to the brief of amicus New York Times in No. 70--57.

[13] The argument for such a constitutional privilege rests heavily on those cases holding that the infringement of protected First Amendment rights must be no broader than necessary to achieve a permissible governmental purpose, see cases cited at n. 19, supra. We do not deal, however, with a governmental institution that has abused 700 its proper function, as a legislative committee does when it 'expose(s) for the sake of exposure.' Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 200, 77 S.Ct. 1173, 1185, 1 L.Ed.2d 1273 (1957). Nothing in the record indicates that these grand juries were 'prob(ing) at will and without relation to existing need.' DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825, 829, 86 S.Ct. 1148, 1151, 16 L.Ed.2d 292 (1966). Nor did the grand juries attempt to invade protected First Amendment rights by forcing wholesale disclosure of names and organizational affiliations for a purpose that was not germane to the determination of whether crime has been committed, cf. NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 78 S.Ct. 1163, 2 L.Ed.2d 1488 (1958); NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 83 S.Ct. 328, 9 L.Ed.2d 405 (1963); Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 80 S.Ct. 412, 4 L.Ed.2d 480 (1960), and the characteristic secrecy of grand jury proceedings is a further protection against the undue invasion of such rights. See Fed.Rule CrimProc. 6(e). The investigative power of the grand jury is necessarily broad if its public responsibility is to be adequately discharged. Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, at 364, 76 S.Ct. 406, at 409, 100 L.Ed. 397 (1956).

[14] The requirements of those cases, see n. 18, supra, which hold that a State's interest must be 'compelling' or 'paramount' to justify even an indirect burden on First Amendment rights, are also met here. As we have indicated, the investigation of crime by the grand jury implements a fundamental governmental role of securing the safety of the person and property of the citizen, and it appears to us that calling reporters to give testimony in the manner and for the reasons that other citizens are called 'bears a reasonable relationship to the achievement of the governmental purpose asserted as its justification.' Bates v. Little Rock, supra, 361 U.S. at 525, 80 S.Ct. at 417. If the test is that the government 'convincingly show a substantial relation between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling state interest,' Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, 701 372 U.S. 539, 546, 83 S.Ct. 889, 894, 9 L.Ed.2d 929 (1963), it is quite apparent (1) that the State has the necessary interest in extirpating the traffic in illegal drugs, in forestalling assassination attempts on the President, and in preventing the community from being disrupted by violent disorders endangering both persons and property; and (2) that, based on the stories Branzburg and Caldwell wrote and Pappas' admitted conduct, the grand jury called these reporters as they would others--because it was likely that they could supply information to help the government determine whether illegal conduct had occurred and, if it had, whether there was sufficient evidence to return an indictment.

[15] Similar considerations dispose of the reporters' claims that preliminary to requiring their grand jury appearance, the State must show that a crime has been committed and that they possess relevant information not available from other sources, for only the grand jury itself can make this determination. The role of the grand jury as an important instrument of offective law enforcement necessarily includes an investigatory function with respect to determining *2667 whether a crime has been committed and who committed it. To this end it must call witnesses, in the manner best suited to perform its task. 'When the grand jury is performing its investigatory function into a general problem area . . . society's interest is best served by a thorough and extensive investigation.' Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 392, 82 S.Ct. 1364, 1374, 8 L.Ed.2d 569 (1962). A grand jury investigation 'is not fully carried out until every available clue has been run down and all witnesses examined in every proper way to find if a crime has been committed.' United States v. Stone, 249 F.2d 138, 140 (C.A.2 1970). Such an investigation may be triggered by tips, rumors, evidence proffered by the prosecutor, or the personal knowledge of the grand jurors. Costello v. United States, 350 U.S., at 362, 76 S.Ct., at 408. It is 702 only after the grand jury has examined the evidence that a determination of whether the proceeding will result in an indictment can be made.

> 'It is impossible to conceive that in such cases the examination of witnesses must be stopped until a basis is laid by an indictment formally preferred, when the very object of the examination is to ascertain who shall be indicted.' Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 65, 26 S.Ct. 370, 375, 50 L.Ed. 652 (1906).

See also Hendricks v. United States, 223 U.S. 178, 32 S.Ct. 313, 56 L.Ed. 394 (1912); Blair v. United States, 250 U.S., at 282--283, 39 S.Ct., at 471, 63 L.Ed. 979. We see no reason to hold that these reporters, any more than other citizens, should be excused from furnishing information that may help the grand jury in arriving at its initial determinations.

The privilege claimed here is conditional, not absolute; given the suggested preliminary showings and compelling need, the reporter would be required to testify. Presumably, such a rule would reduce the instances in which reporters could be required to appear, but predicting in advance when and in what circumstances they could be compelled to do so would be difficult. Such a rule would also have implications for the issuance of compulsory process to reporters at civil and criminal trials and at legislative hearings. If newsmen's confidential sources are as sensitive as they are claimed to be, the prospect of being unmasked whenever a judge determines the situation justifies it is hardly a satisfactory solution to the problem. [FN39] For *2668 them, it would appear that only an absolute privilege would suffice.

> FN39. 'Under the case-by-case method of developing rules, it will be difficult for potential informants and reporters to predict whether testimony will be compelled since the decision will turn on the judge's ad hoc assessment in different fact settings of 'importance' or 'relevance' in relation to the free press interest. A 'general' deterrent effect is likely to result. This type of effect stems from the vagueness of the tests and from the uncertainty attending their application. For example, if a reporter's information goes to the 'heart of the matter' in Situation X, another reporter and informant who subsequently are in Situation Y will not know if 'heart of the matter rule X' will be extended to them, and deterrence will thereby result. Leaving substantial discretion with judges to delineate those 'situations' in which rules of 'relevance' or 'importance' apply would therefore seem to undermine significantly the effectiveness of a reporter-informer privilege.' Note, Reporters and Their Sources: The Constitutional Right to a Confidential Relationship, 80 Yale L.J. 317, 341 (1970). In re Grand Jury Witnesses, 322 F.Supp. 573 (ND Cal.1970), illustrates the impact of this ad hoc approach. Here, the grand jury was, as in Caldwell, investigating the Black Panther Party, and was 'inquiring into matters which involve possible violations of Congressional acts passed to protect the person of the President (18 U.S.C. s 1751), to free him from threats (18 U.S.C. s 871), to protect our armed forces from unlawful interference (18 U.S.C. s 2387), conspiracy to commit the foregoing offenses (18 U.S.C. s 371), and related statutes prohibiting acts directed against the security of the government.' Id., at 577. The two witnesses, reporters for a Black Panther Party newspaper, were subpoenaed and given Fifth Amendment immunity against criminal prosecution, and they claimed a First Amendment journalist's privilege. The District Court entered a protective order, allowing them to refuse to divulge confidential information until the the Government demonstrated 'a compelling and overriding national interest in requiring the testimony of (the witnesses) which cannot be served by any alternative means.' Id., at 574. The Government claimed that it had information that the witnesses had associated with persons who had conspired to perform some of the criminal acts that the grand jury was investigating. The court held the Government had met its burden and ordered the witnesses to testify: 'The whole point of the investigation is to identify persons known to the (witnesses) who may have engaged in activities violative of the above indicated statutes, and also to ascertain the details of their alleged unlawful activities. All questions directed to such objectives of the investigation are unquestionably relevant, and any other evaluation thereof by the Court without knowledge of the facts before the Grand Jury would clearly constitute 'undue interference of the Court." Id., at 577. Another illustration is provided by State v. Knops, 49 Wis.2d 647, 183 N.W.2d 93 (1971), in which a grand jury was investigating the August 24, 1970, bombing of Sterling Hall on the University of Wisconsin Madison campus. On August 26, 1970, an 'underground' newspaper, the Madison Kaleidoscope, printed a front-page story entitled 'The Bombers Tell Why and What Next--Exclusive to Kaleidoscope.' An editor of the Kaleidoscope was subpoenaed, appeared, asserted his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, was given immunity, and then pleaded that he had a First Amendment privilege against disclosing his confidential informants. The Wisconsin Supreme Court rejected his claim and upheld his contempt sentence: '(Appellant) faces five very narrow and specific questions, all of which are founded on information which he himself has already volunteered. The purpose of these questions is very clear. The need for answers to them is 'overriding,' to say the least. The need for these answers is nothing short of the public's need (and right) to protect itself from physical attack by apprehending the perpetrators of such attacks.' 49 Wis.2d, at 658, 183 N.W.2d, at 98--99.

703 [16] We are unwilling to embark the judiciary on a long and difficult journey to such an uncertain destination. The administration of a constitutional newsman's privilege 704 would present practical and conceptual difficulties of a high order. Sooner or later, it would be necessary to define those categories of newsmen who qualified for the privilege, a questionable procedure in light of the traditional doctrine that liberty of the press is the right of the lonely pamphleteer who uses carbon paper or a mimeograph just as much as of the large metropolitan publisher who utilizes the latest photocomposition methods. Cf. In re Grand Jury Witnesses, 322 F.Supp. 573, 574 (ND Cal.1970). Freedom of the press is a 'fundamental personal right' which 'is not confined to newspapers and periodicals. It necessarily embraces pamphlets and leaflets. . . . The press in its historic connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion.' Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 450, 452, 58 S.Ct. 666, 669, 82 L.Ed. 949 (1938). See also Mills 705 v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 219, 86 S.Ct. 1434, 1437, 16 L.Ed.2d 484 (1966); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 111, 63 S.Ct. 870, 874, 87 L.Ed. 1292 (1943). The informative function asserted by representatives of the organized press in the present cases is also performed by lecturers, political pollsters, novelists, academic researchers, and dramatists. Almost any author may quite accurately assert that he is contributing to the flow of information to the public, that he relies on confidential sources of information, and that these sources will be silenced if he is forced to make disclosures before a grand jury. [FN40]

FN40. Such a privilege might be claimed by groups that set up newspapers in order to engage in criminal activity and to therefore be insulated from grand jury inquiry, regardless of Fifth Amendment grants of immunity. It might appear that such 'sham' newspapers would be easily distinguishable, yet the First Amendment ordinarily prohibits courts from inquiring into the content of expression, except in cases of obscenity or libel, and protects speech and publications regardless of their motivation, orthodoxy, truthfulness, timeliness, or taste. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, at 269--270, 84 S.Ct. 710, at 720--721, 11 L.Ed.2d 686; Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U.S. 684, 689, 79 S.Ct. 1362, 1365, 3 L.Ed.2d 1512 (1959); Winters v. New York 333 U.S. 507, 510, 68 S.Ct. 665, 667, 92 L.Ed. 840 (1948); Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, at 537, 65 S.Ct. 315, at 326, 89 L.Ed. 430. By affording a privilege to some organs of communication but not to others, courts would inevitably be discriminating on the basis of content.

*2669 In each instance where a reporter is subpoenaed to testify, the courts would also be embroiled in preliminary factual and legal determinations with respect to whether the proper predicate had been laid for the reporter's appearance: Is there probable cause to believe a crime has been committed? Is it likely that the reporter has useful information gained in confidence? Could the grand jury obtain the information elsewhere? Is the official interest sufficient to outweigh the claimed privilege?

Thus, in the end, by considering whether enforcement of a particular law served a 'compelling' governmental interest, the courts would be inextricably involved in 706 distinguishing between the value of enforcing different criminal laws. By requiring testimony from a reporter in investigations involving some crimes but not in others, they would be making a value judgment that a legislature had declined to make, since in each case the criminal law involved would represent a considered legislative judgment, not constitutionally suspect, of what conduct is liable to criminal prosecution. The task of judges, like other officials outside the legislative branch, is not to make the law but to uphold it in accordance with their oaths.

At the federal level, Congress has freedom to determine whether a statutory newsman's privilege is necessary and desirable and to fashion standards and rules as narrow or broad as deemed necessary to deal with the evil discerned and, equally important, to refashion those rules as experience from time to time may dictate. There is also merit in leaving state legislatures free, within First Amendment limits, to fashion their own standards in light of the conditions and problems with respect to the relations between law enforcement officials and press in their own areas. It goes without saying, of course, that we are powerless to bar state courts from responding in their own way and construing their own constitutions so as to recognize a newsman's privilege, either qualified or absolute.

In addition, there is much force in the pragmatic view that the press has at its disposal powerful mechanisms of communication and is far from helpless to protect itself from harassment or substantial harm. Furthermore, if what the newsmen urged in these cases is true--that law enforcement cannot hope to gain and may suffer from subpoenaing newsmen before grand juries--prosecutors will be loath to risk so much for so little. Thus, at the federal level the Attorney General has already fashioned a set of rules for federal officials in connection *707 with subpoenaing members of the press to testify before grand juries or at criminal trials. [FN41] These rules are a major step in the direction the reporters 2670 herein desire to move. They may prove wholly sufficient to resolve the bulk of disagreements and controversies between press and federal officials.

FN41. The Guidelines for Subpoenas to the News Media were first announced in a speech by the Attorney General on August 10, 1970, and then were expressed in Department of Justice Memo. No. 692 (Sept. 2, 1970), which was sent to all United States Attorneys by the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division. The Guidelines state that: 'The Department of Justice recognizes that compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights. In determining whether to request issuance of a subpoena to the press, the approach in every case must be to weigh that limiting effect against the public interest to be served in the fair administration of justice' and that: 'The Department of Justice does not consider the press 'an investigative arm of the government.' Therefore, all reasonable attempts should be made to obtain information from non-press sources before there is any consideration of subpoenaing the press.' The Guidelines provide for negotiations with the press and require the express authorization of the Attorney General for such subpoenas. The principles to be applied in authorizing such subpoenas are stated to be whether there is 'sufficient reason to believe that the information sought (from the journalist) is essential to a successful investigation,' and whether the Government has unsuccessfully attempted to obtain the information from alternative non-press sources. The Guidelines provide, however, that in 'emergencies and other unusual situations,' subpoenas may be issued which do not exactly conform to the Guidelines.

[17] Finally, as we have earlier indicated, news gathering is not without its First Amendment protections, and grand jury investigations if instituted or conducted other than in good faith, would pose wholly different issues for resolution under the First Amendment. [FN42] Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship *708 with his news sources would have no justification. Grand juries are subject to judicial control and subpoenas to motions to quash. We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment as well as the Fifth.

FN42. Cf. Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 49, 53--54, 91 S.Ct. 746, 753, 754--755, 27 L.Ed.2d 669 (1971).

III

[18][19] We turn, therefore, to the disposition of the cases before us. From what we have said, it necessarily follows that the decision in United States v. Caldwell, No. 70--57, must be reversed. If there is no First Amendment privilege to refuse to answer the relevant and material questions asked during a good-faith grand jury investigation, then it is a fortiori true that there is no privilege to refuse to appear before such a grand jury until the Government demonstrates some 'compelling need' for a newsman's testimony. Other issues were urged upon us, but since they were not passed upon by the Court of Appeals, we decline to address them in the first instance.

[20] The decisions in No. 70--85, Branzburg v. Hayes and Branzburg v. Meigs, must be affirmed. Here, petitioner refused to answer questions that directly related to criminal conduct that he had observed and written about. The Kentucky Court of Appeals noted that marihuana is defined as a narcotic drug by statute, Ky.Rev.Stat. s 218.010(14) (1962), and that unlicensed possession or compounding of it is a felony punishable by both fine and imprisonment. Ky.Rev.Stat. s 218.210 (1962). It held that petitioner 'saw the commission of the statutory felonies of unlawful possession of marijuana and the unlawful conversion of it into hashish,' in Branzburg v. Pound, 461 S.W.2d, at 346. Petitioner may be presumed to have observed similar violations of the state narcotics laws during the research he did for the story that forms the basis of the subpoena in Branzburg v. Meigs. In both cases, if what petitioner wrote was true, *709 he had direct information to provide the grand jury concerning the ommission of serious crimes.

[21] The only question presented at the present time in In re Pappas, No. 70--94, is whether petitioner Pappas must appear before the grand jury to testify pursuant to subpoena. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court characterized the record in this case as 'meager,' and it is not clear what petitioner will be asked by the grand jury. It is not even clear that he will be asked to divulge information received in confidence. We affirm the decision of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court and hold that petitioner must appear before the grand jury to answer the questions put to him, subject, of course, to the supervision of the presiding judge as to 'the propriety, purposes, and scope of the grand jury inquiry and the pertinence of the probable testimony.' 358 Mass., at 614, 266 N.E.2d, at 303--304.

So ordered.

Judgment at 434 F.2d 1081 reversed; judgments at 461 S.W.2d 345 and 266 N.E.2d 297 affirmed.

2671 Mr. Justice POWELL, concurring.

I add this brief statement to emphasize what seems to me to be the limited nature of the Court's holding. The Court does not hold that newsmen, subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury, are without constitutional rights with respect to the gathering of news or in safeguarding their sources. Certainly, we do not hold, as suggested in Mr. Justice STEWART's dissenting opinion, that state and federal authorities are free to 'annex' the news media as 'an investigative arm of government.' The solicitude repeatedly shown by this Court for First Amendment freedoms should be sufficient assurance against any such effort, even if one seriously believed that the media--properly free and untrammeled in the fullest sense of these terms--were not able to protect themselves.

As indicated in the concluding portion of the opinion, the Court states that no harassment of newsmen will 710 be tolerated. If a newsman believes that the grand jury investigation is not being conducted in good faith he is not without remedy. Indeed, if the newsman is called upon to give information bearing only a remote and tenuous relationship to the subject of the investigation, or if he has some other reason to believe that his testimony implicates confidential source relationship without a legitimate need of law enforcement, he will have access to the court on a motion to quash and an appropriate protective order may be entered. The asserted claim to privilege should be judged on its facts by the striking of a proper balance between freedom of the press and the obligation of all citizens to give relevant testimony with respect to criminal conduct. The balance of these vital constitutional and societal interests on a case-by-case basis accords with the tried and traditional way of adjudicating such questions. [FN]

FN* It is to be remembered tha tCaldwell asserts a constitutional privilege not even to appear before the grand jury unless a court decides that the Government has made a showing that meets the three preconditions specified in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Stewart. To be sure, this would require a 'balancing' of interests by the court, but under circumstances and constraints significantly different from the balancing that will be appropriate under the court's decision. The newsman witness, like all other witnesses, will have to appear; he will not be in a position to litigate at the threshold the State's very authority to subpoena him. Moreover, absent the constitutional preconditions that Caldwell and that dissenting opinion would impose as heavy burdens of proof to be carried by the State, the court--when called upon to protect a newsman from improper or prejudicial questioning--would be free to balance the competing interests on their merits in the particular case. The new constitutional rule endorsed by that dissenting > opinion would, as a practical matter, defeat such a fair balancing and the essential societal interest in the detection and prosecution of crime would be heavily subordinated.

In short, the courts will be available to newsmen under circumstances where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection.

725 Mr. Justice STEWART, with whom Mr. Justice BRENNAN and Mr. Justice MARSHALL join, dissenting.

The Court's crabbed view of the First Amendment reflects a disturbing insensitivity to the critical role of an independent press in our society. The question whether a reporter has a constitutional right to a confidential relationship with his source is of first impression here, but the principles that should guide our decision are as basic as any to be found in the Constitution. While Mr. Justice POWELL'S enigmatic concurring opinion gives some hope of a more flexible view in the future, the Court in these cases holds that a newsman has no First Amendment right to protect his sources when called before a grand jury. The Court thus invites state and federal authorities to undermine the historic independence of the press by attempting to annex the journalistic profession as an investigative arm of government. Not only will this decision impair performance of the press' constitutionally protected functions, but it will, I am convinced, in the *2672 long run, harm rather than help the administration of justice.

I respectfully dissent.

I

The reporter's constitutional right to a confidential relationship with his source stems from the broad societal interest in a full and free flow of information to the public. It is this basic concern that underlies the Constitution's 726 protection of a free press, Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250, 56 S.Ct. 444, 449, 80 L.Ed. 660; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269, 84 S.Ct. 710, 720, 11 L.Ed.2d 686, [FN1] because the guarantee is 'not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of all of us.' Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 389, 87 S.Ct. 534, 543, 17 L.Ed.2d 456. [FN2]

FN1. We have often described the process of informing the public as the core purpose of the constitutional guarantee of free speech and a free press. See, e.g., Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 369, 51 S.Ct. 532, 535, 75 L.Ed. 1117; De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 365, 57 S.Ct. 255, 260, 81 L.Ed. 278; Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 153, 80 S.Ct. 215, 218, 4 L.Ed.2d 205.

FN2. As I see it, a reporter's right to protect his source is bottomed on the constitutional guarantee of a full flow of information to the public. A newsman's personal First Amendment rights or the associational rights of the newsman and the source are subsumed under that broad societal interest protected by the First Amendment. Obviously, we are not here concerned with the parochial personal concerns of particular newsmen or informants. 'The newsman-informer relationship is different from . . . other relationships whose confidentiality is protected by statute, such as the attorney-client and physician-patient relationship. In the case of other statutory privileges, the right of nondisclosure is granted to the person making the communication in order that he will be encouraged by trong assurances of confidentiality to seek such relationships which contribute to his personal well-being. The judgment is made that the interests of society will be served when individuals consult physicians and lawyers; the public interest is thus advanced by creating a zone of privacy that the individual can control. However, in the case of the reporter-informer relationship, society's interest is not in the welfare of the informant per se, but rather in creating conditions in which information possessed by news sources can reach public attention.' Note, 80 Yale L.J. 317, 343 (1970) (footnotes omitted) (hereinafter Yale Note).

Enlightened choice by an informed citizenry is the basic ideal upon which an open society is premised, [FN3] and a free press is thus indispensable to a free society. Not only does the press enhance personal self-fulfillment 727 by providing the people with the widest possible range of fact and opinion, but it also is an incontestable precondition of self-government. The press 'has been a mighty catalyst in awakening public interest in governmental affairs, exposing corruption among public officers and employees and generally informing the citizenry of public events and occurrences . . ..' Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532, 539, 85 S.Ct. 1628, 1631, 14

L.Ed.2d 543; Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 219, 86 S.Ct. 1434, 1437, 16 L.Ed.2d 484; Grosjean, supra, 297 U.S. at 250, 56 S.Ct. at 449. As private and public aggregations of power burgeon in size and the pressures for conformity necessarily mount, there is obviously a continuing need for an independent press to disseminate a robust variety of information and opinion through reportage, investigation, and criticism, if we are to preserve our constitutional tradition of maximizing freedom of choice by encouraging diversity of expression.

FN3. See generally Z. Chafee, Free Speech in the United States (1941); A. Meikeljohn, Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government (1948); T. Emerson, Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment (1963).

A

In keeping with this tradition, we have held that the right to publish is central to the First Amendment and basic to the existence of constitutional democracy. Grosjean, supra, at 250, 56 S.Ct. at 449; New York Times, supra, 376 U.S. at 270, 84 S.Ct. at 720.

A corollary of the right to publish must be the right to gather news. The 2673 full flow of information to the public protected by the free-press guarantee would be severely curtailed if no protection whatever were afforded to the process by which news is assembled and disseminated. We have, therefore, recognized that there is a right to publish without prior governmental approval, Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 51 S.Ct. 625, 75 L.Ed. 1357; New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 91 S.Ct. 2140, 29 L.Ed.2d 822, a right to distribute information, see, e.g., Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S., 444, 452, 58 S.Ct. 666, 669, 82 L.Ed. 949; Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 66 S.Ct. 276, 90 L.Ed. 265; Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 63 S.Ct. 862, 87 L.Ed. 1313; Grosjean, supra, and a right to receive printed matter, Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301, 85 S.Ct. 1493, 14 L.Ed.2d 398.

*728 No less important to the news dissemination process is the gathering of information. News must not be unnecessarily cut off at its source, for without freedom to acquire information the right to publish would be impermissibly compromised. Accordingly, a right to gather news, of some dimensions, must exist. Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 85 S.Ct. 1271, 14 L.Ed.2d 179. [FN4] Note, The Right of the Press to Gather Information, 71 Col.L.Rev. 838 (1971). As Madison wrote: 'A popular Government, without popular information, or the means of acquiring it, is but a Prologue to a Farce or a Tragedy; or perhaps both.' 9 Writings of James Madison 103 (G. Hunt ed. 1910).

FN4. In Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 85 S.Ct. 1271, 14 L.Ed.2d 179, we held that the Secretary of State's denial of a passport for travel to Cuba did not violate a citizen's First Amendment rights. The rule was justified by the 'weightiest considerations of national security' and we concluded that the 'right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information.' Id., at 16--17, 85 S.Ct. at 1281 (emphasis supplied). The necessary implication is that some right to gather information does exist.

B

The right to gather news implies, in turn, a right to a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. This proposition follows as a matter of simple logic once three factual predicates are recognized: (1) newsmen require informants to gather news; (2) confidentiality--the promise or understanding that names or certain aspects of communications will be kept off the record--is essential to the creation and maintenance of a news-gathering relationship with informants; and (3) an unbridled subpoena power--the absence of a constitutional right protecting, in any way, a confidential relationship from compulsary process--will either deter sources from divulging information or deter reporters from gathering and publishing information.

*729 It is obvious that informants are necessary to the news-gathering process as we know it today. If it is to perform its constitutional mission, the press must do far more than merely print public statements or publish prepared handouts. Familiarity with the people and circumstances involved in the myriad background activities that result in the final product called 'news' is vital to complete and responsible journalism, unless the press is to be a captive mouthpiece of 'newsmakers.' [FN5]

FN5. In Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081, the Government claimed that Caldwell did not have to maintain a confidential relationship with members of the Black Panther Party and provide independent reporting of their activities, since the Party and its leaders could issue statements on their own. But, as the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit correctly observed: '(I)t is not enough that Black Panther press releases and public addresses by Panther leaders may continue unabated in the wake of subpoenas such as the one here in question. It is not enough that the public's knowledge of groups such as the Black Panthers should be confined to their deliberate public pronouncements or distant news accounts of their occasional dramatic forays into the public view. 'The need for an untrammeled press takes on special urgency in times of widespread protest and dissent. In such times the First Amendment protections exist to maintain communication with dissenting groups and to provide the public with a wide range of information about the nature of protest and heterodoxy.' Citing Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20, 65 S.Ct. 1416, 89 L.Ed. 2013; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 102, 60 S.Ct. 736, 84 L.Ed. 1093. Id., at 1084--1085.

*2674 It is equally obvious that the promise of confidentiality may be a necessary prerequisite to a productive relationship between a newsman and his informants. An officeholder may fear his superior; a member of the bureaucracy, his associates; a dissident, the scorn of majority opinion. All may have information valuable to the public discourse, yet each may be willing to relate that information only in confidence to a reporter whom he trusts, either because of excessive caution or because of a reasonable fear of reprisals or censure for unorthodox 730 views. The First Amendment concern must not be with the motives of any particular news source, but rather with the conditions in which informants of all shades of the spectrum may make information available through the press to the public. Cf. Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, 65, 80 S.Ct. 536, 539, 4 L.Ed.2d 559; Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 80 S.Ct. 412, 4 L.Ed.2d 480; NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 78 S.Ct. 1163, 2 L.Ed.2d 1488. [FN6]

FN6. As we observed in Talley v. California, 362 U.S 60, 80 S.Ct. 536, 4 L.Ed.2d 559, 'Anonymous pamphlets, leaflets, brochures and even books have played an important rule in the progress of mankind. . . . Before the Revolutionary War colonial patriots frequently had to conceal their authorship or distribution of literature that easily could have brought down on them prosecutions by English-controlled courts. . . . Even the Federalist Papers, written in favor of the adoption of our Constitution, were published under fictitious names. It is plain that anonymity has sometimes been assumed for the most constructive purposes.' Id., at 64--65, 80 S.Ct., at 538. And in Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301, 85 S.Ct. 1493, 14 L.Ed.2d 398, we recognized the importance to First Amendment values of the right to receive information anonymously.

In Caldwell, the District Court found that 'confidential relationships . . . are commonly developed and maintained by professional journalists, and are indispensable to their work of gathering, analyzing and publishing the news.' [FN7] Commentators and individual reporters have repeatedly noted the importance of confidentiality. [FN8] 731 And surveys among reporters and editors indicate that the promise of nondisclosure is necessary for many types of news gathering. [FN9]

FN7. Application of Caldwell, 311 F.Supp. 358, 361.

FN8. See, e.g., F. Chalmers, A Gentleman of the Press: The Biography of Colonel John Bayne MacLean 74--75 (1969); H. Klurfeld, Behind the Lines: The World of Drew Pearson 50, 52--55 (1968); A. Krock, Memoris: Sixty Years on the Firing Line 181, 184--185 (1968); E. Larsen, First with the Truth 22--23 (1968); R. Ottley, The Lonely Warrior--The Life and Times of Robert S. Abbott 143--145 (1955); C. Sulzberger, A Long Row of Candles; Memoirs and Diaries 241 (1969). As Walter Cronkite, a network television reporter, said in an affidavit in Caldwel: 'In doing my work, I (and those who assist me) depend constantly on information, ideas, leads and opinions received in confidence. Such material is essential in digging out newsworthy facts and, equally important, in assessing the importance and analyzing the significance of public events.' App. 52.

FN9. See Guest & Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing Their Sources, 64 Nw.U.L.Rev. 18 (1969); V. Blasi, Press Subpoenas: An Empirical and Legal Analysis, Study Report of the Reporters' Committee on Freedom of the Press 20--29 (hereinafter Blasi).

Finally, and most important, when governmental officials possess an unchecked power to compel newsmen to disclose information received in confidence, sources will clearly be deterred from giving information, and reporters will clearly be deterred from publishing it, because uncertainty about exercise of the power will lead to 'self-censorship.' Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 149--154, 80 S.Ct. 215, 216--219, 4 L.Ed.2d 205; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 279, 84 S.Ct., at 725. The uncertainty arises, of course, because the 2675 judiciary has traditionally imposed virtually no limitations on the grand jury's broad investigatory powers. See Antell, The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Supergovernment, 51 A.B.A.J. 153 (1965). See also Part II, infra.

After today's decision, the potential informant can never be sure that his identity or off-the-record communications will not subsequently be revealed through the compelled testimony of a newsman. A public-spirited person inside government, who is not implicated in any crime, will now be fearful of revealing corruption or other governmental wrongdoing, because he will now know he can subsequently be identified by use of compulsory process. The potential source must, therefore, choose between risking exposure by giving information or avoiding the risk by remaining silent.

The reporter must speculate about whether contact with a controversial source or publication of controversial material will lead to a subpoena. In the event of a *732 subpoena, under today's decision, the newsman will know that he must choose between being punished for contempt if he refuses to testify, or violating his profession's ethics [FN10] and impairing his resourcefulness as a reporter if he discloses confidential information. [FN11]

FN10. The American Newspaper Guild has adopted the following rule as part of the newsman's code of ethics: '(N)ewspapermen shall refuse to reveal confidences or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before other judicial or investigating bodies.' G. Bird & F. Merwin, The Press and Society 592 (1971).

FN11. Obviously, if a newsman does not honor a confidence he will have difficulty establishing other confidential relationships necessary for obtaining information in the future. See Siebert & Ryniker, Press Winning Fight to Guard Sources, Editor & Publisher, Sept. 1, 1934, pp. 9, 36--37.

Again, the commonsense understanding that such deterrence will occur is buttressed by concrete evidence. The existence of deterrent effects through fear and self-censorship was impressively developed in the District Court in Caldwell. [FN12] Individual reporters [FN13] and commentators [FN14] have noted such effects. Surveys have verified that an unbridled subpoena power will substantially *733 impair the flow of news to the public, especially in sensitive areas involving governmental officials, financial affairs, political figures, dissidents, or minority groups that require in-depth, investigative reporting. [FN15] And the Justice Department has recognized that 'compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment right.' [FN16] No evidence 2676 contradicting the existence of such deterrent effects was offered at the trials or in the briefs here by the petitioner in Caldwell or by the respondents in Branzburg and Pappas.

FN12. The court found that 'compelled disclosure of information received by a journalist within the scope of . . . confidential relationships jeopardizes those relationships and thereby impairs the journalist's ability to gather, analyze and publish the news.' Application of Caldwell, 311 F.Supp., at 361.

FN13. See n. 8, supra.

FN14. Recent commentary is nearly unanimous in urging either an absolute or qualified newsman's privilege. See, e.g., Goldstein, Newsmen and Their Confidential Sources, New Republic, Mar. 21, 1970, pp. 13--14; Yale Note, supra, n. 2; Comment, 46 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 617 (1971); Nelson, The Newsmen's Privilege Against Disclosure of Confidential Sources and Information, 24 Vand.L.Rev. 667 (1971); Note, The Right of the Press to Gather Information, 71 Col.L.Rev. 838 (1971); Comment, 4 U.Mich.J.L.Ref. 85 (1970); Comment, 6 Harv.Civ.Rights-Civ.Lib.L.Rev. 119

(1970); Comment, The Newsman's Privilege; Government Investigations, Criminal Prosecutions and Private Litigation, 58 Calif.L.Rev. 1198 (1970). But see the Court's opinion, ante, at 2660 n. 29. And see generally articles collected in Yale Note, supra, n. 2. Recent decisions are in conflict both as to the importance of the deterrent effects and, a fortiori, as to the existence of a constitutional right to a confidential reporter-source. relationship. See the Court's opinion, ante, at 2658--2659, and cases collected in Yale Note, at 318 nn. 6--7.

FN15. See Blasi 6--71; Guest & Stanzler, supra, n. 9, at 43--50.

FN16. Department of Justice Memo. No. 692 (Sept. 2, 1970).

The impairment of the flow of news cannot, of course, be proved with scientific precision, as the Court seems to demand. Obviously, not every news-gathering relationship requires confidentiality. And it is difficult to pinpoint precisely how many relationship do require a promise or understanding of nondisclosure. But we have never before demanded that First Amendment rights rest on elaborate empirical studies demonstrating beyond any conceivable doubt that deterrent effects exist; we have never before required proof of the exact number of people potentially affected by governmental action, who would actually be dissuaded from engaging in First Amendment activity.

Rather, on the basis of common sense and available information, we have asked, often implicitly, (1) whether there was a rational connection between the cause (the governmental action) and the effect (the deterrence or 734 impairment of First Amendment activity), and (2) whether the effect would occur with some regularity, i.e., would not be de minimis. See, e.g., Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S., at 244--245, 56 S.Ct., at 446--447; Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 503, 72 S.Ct. 777, 781, 96 L.Ed. 1098; Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 248, 77 S.Ct. 1203, 1210, 1 L.Ed.2d 1311 (plurality opinion); NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S., at 461--466, 78 S.Ct., at 1171--1174; Smith v. California, 361 U.S., at 150--154, 80 S.Ct., at 217--219; Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S., at 523--524, 80 S.Ct., at 416--417; Talley v. California, 362 U.S., at 64--65, 80 S.Ct., at 538--539; Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 485--486, 81 S.Ct. 247, 250--251, 5 L.Ed.2d 231; Cramp v. Board of Public Instructions, 368 U.S. 278, 286, 82 S.Ct. 275, 280, 7 L.Ed.2d 285; NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 431--438, 83 S.Ct. 328, 337--341, 9 L.Ed.2d 405; Gibson v. Florida Legislation Investigation Committee, 372 U.S. 539, 555--557, 83 S.Ct. 889, 898--899, 9 L.Ed.2d 929; New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 277--278, 84 S.Ct., at 724--725; Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 59, 85 S.Ct. 734, 739, 13 L.Ed.2d 649; DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825, 86 S.Ct. 1148, 16 L.Ed.2d 292; Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11, 16--19, 86 S.Ct. 1238, 1240--1242, 16 L.Ed.2d 321. And, in making this determination, we have shown a special solicitude towards the 'indispensable liberties' protected by the First Amendment, NAACP v. Alabama, supra, 357 U.S., at 461, 78 S.Ct. at 1171; Bantam Books, inc. v. Sullivan, ,372 U.S. 58, 66, 83 S.Ct. 631, 637, 9 L.Ed.2d 584, for '(f)reedoms such as these are protected not only against heavy-handed frontal attack, but also from being stifled by more subtle governmental interference.' Bates, supra, 361 U.S., at 523, 80 S.Ct., at 416. [FN17] Once this threshold inquiry has been satisfied, we have then examined the competing interests in determining whether 735 there is an unconstitutional infringement of First Amendment freedoms.

FN17. although, as the Court points out, we have held that the press is not free from the requirements of the National Labor Relations Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the antitrust laws, or nondiscriminatory taxation, ante, at 2657, these decisions were concerned 'only with restraints on certain business or commercial practices' of the press. Citizen Publishing Co. v. United States, 394 U.S. 131, 139, 89 S.Ct. 927, 931, 22 L.Ed.2d 148. And due weight was given to First Amendment interests. For example, 'The First Amendment, far from providing an argument against application of the Sherman Act . . . provides powerful reasons to the contrary.' Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S., at 20, 65 S.Ct., at 1424.

For example, in NAACP v. Alabama, supra, we found that compelled disclosure of the names of those in Alabama who belonged to the NAACP 'is likely to affect 2677 adversely the ability (of the NAACP) and its members to pursue their . . . beliefs which they admittedly have the right to advocate, in that it may induce members to withdraw from the Association and dissuade others from joining it because of fear of exposure of their beliefs shown through their associations and of the consequences of this exposure.' Id., at 462--463, 78 S.Ct., at 1172. In Talley, supra, we held invalid a city ordinance that forbade circulation of any handbill that did not have the distributor's name on it, for there was 'no doubt that such an identification requirement would tend to restrict freedom to distribute information and thereby freedom of expression.' Id., 362 U.S., at 64, 80 S.Ct., at 538. And in Burstyn, Inc., supra, we found deterrence of First Amendment activity inherent in a censor's power to exercise unbridled discretion under an overbroad statute. Id., 343 U.S., at 503, 72 S.Ct., at 781.

Surely the analogous claim of deterrence here is as securely grounded in evidence and common sense as the claims in the cases cited above, although the Court calls the claim 'speculative.' See ante, at 2662. The deterrence may not occur in every confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. [FN18] But it will certainly *736 occur in certain types of relationships involving sensitive and controversial matters. And such relationships are vital to the free flow of information.

FN18. The fact that some informants will not be deterred from giving information by the prospect of the unbridled exercise of the subpoena power only means that there will not always be a conflict between the grand jury's inquiry and the protection of First Amendment activities. But even if the percentage of such informants is relatively large compared to the total 'universe' of potential informants, there will remain a large number of people in 'absolute' terms who will be deterred, and the flow of news through mass circulation newspapers and electronic media will inevitably be impaired.

To require any greater burden of proof is to shirk our duty to protect values securely embedded in the Constitution. We cannot await an unequivocal--and therefore unattainable--imprimatur from empirical studies. [FN19] We can and must accept the evidence developed in the record, and elsewhere, that overwhelmingly supports the premise that deterrence will occur with regularity in important types of news-gathering relationships. [FN20]

FN19. Empirical studies, after all, can only provide facts. It is the duty of courts to give legal significance to facts; and it is the special duty of this Court to understand the constitutional significance of facts. We must often proceed in a state of less than perfect knowledge, either because the facts are murky or the methodology used in obtaining the facts is open to question. It is then that we must look to the Constitution for the values that inform our presumptions. And the importance to our society of the full flow of information to the public has buttressed this Court's historic presumption in favor of First Amendment values.

FN20. See, e.g., the uncontradicted evidence presented in affidavits from newsmen in Caldwell, Appendix to No. 70--57, pp. 22--61 (statements from Gerald Fraser, Thomas Johnson, John Kifner, Timothy Knight, Nicholas Proffitt, Anthony Ripley, Wallace Turner, Gilbert Noble, Anthony Lukas, Martin Arnold, David Burnham, Jon Lowell, Frank Morgan, Min Yee, Walter Cronkite, Eric Sevareid, Mike Wallace, Dan Rather, Marvin Kalb).

Thus, we cannot escape the conclusion that when neither the reporter nor his source can rely on the shield of confidentiality against unrestrained use of the grand jury's subpoena power, valuable information will not be published and the public dialogue will inevitably be impoverished.

II

Posed against the First Amendment's protection of the newsman's confidential relationships in these cases is society's interest in the use of the grand jury to administer *737 justice fairly and effectively. The grand jury serves two important functions: 'to examine into the commission of crimes' and 'to stand between the prosecutor and the accused, and to 2678 determine whether the charge was founded upon credible testimony or was dictated by malice or personal ill will.' Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 59, 26 S.Ct. 370, 373, 50 L.Ed. 652. And to perform these functions the grand jury must have available to it every man's relevant evidence. See Blair v. United States, 250 U.S 273, 281, 39 S.Ct. 468, 471, 63 L.Ed. 979; Blackmer v. United States, 284

U.S. 421, 438, 52 S.Ct. 252, 255, 76 L.Ed. 375.

Yet the longstanding rule making every person's evidence available to the grand jury is not absolute. The rule has been limited by the Fifth Amendment, [FN21] the Fourth Amendment, [FN22] and the evidentiary privileges of the common law. [FN23] So it was that in Blair, supra, after recognizing that the right against compulsory self-incrimination prohibited certain inquiries, the Court noted that 'some confidential matters are shielded from considerations of policy, and perhaps in other cases for special reasons a witness may be excused from telling all that he knows.' Id., 250 U.S. at 281, 39 S.Ct. at 471 (emphasis supplied). And in United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323, 70 S.Ct. 724, 94 L.Ed. 844, the Court observed that any exemption from the duty to testify before the grand jury 'presupposes a very real interest to be protected.' Id., at 332, 70 S.Ct. at 731.

FN21. See Blau v. United States, 340 U.S. 159, 71 S.Ct. 223, 95 L.Ed. 170; Quinn v. United States, 349 U.S. 155, 75 S.Ct. 668, 99 L.Ed. 964; Curcio v. United States, 354 U.S. 118, 77 S.Ct. 1145, 1 L.Ed.2d 1225; Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 84 S.Ct. 1489, 12 L.Ed.2d 653.

FN22. See Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385, 40 S.Ct. 182, 64 L.Ed. 319.

FN23. See Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of Judicial Conference of the United States, Revised Draft of Proposed Rules of Evidence for the United States Courts and Magistrates (1971); 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence ss 2290--2391 (McNaughton rev. 1961).

Such an interest must surely be the First Amendment protection of a confidential relationship that I have discussed above in Part I. As noted there, this protection does not exist for the purely private interests of the *738 newsman or his informant, nor even, at bottom, for the First Amendment interests of either partner in the news-gathering relationship. [FN24] Rather, it functions to insure nothing less than democratic decisionmaking through the free flow of information to the public, and it serves, thereby, to honor the 'profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open.' New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 270, 84 S.Ct., at 721.

FN24. Although there is a longstanding presumption against creation of common-law testimonial privileges, United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323, 70 S.Ct. 724, 94 L.Ed. 884, these privileges are grounded in an 'individual interest which has been found . . . to outweigh the public interest in the search for truth' rather than in the broad public concerns that inform the First Amendment. Id., at 331, 70 S.Ct., at 730.

In striking the proper balance between the public interest in the efficient administration of justice and the First Amendment guarantee of the fullest flow of information, we must begin with the basic proposition that because of their 'delicate and vulnerable' nature, NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S., at 433, 83 S.Ct., at 338, and their transcendent importance for the just functioning of our society, First Amendment rights require special safeguards.

A

This Court has erected such safeguards when government, by legislative investigation or other investigative means, has attempted to pierce the shield of privacy inherent in freedom of association. [FN25] In no previous case have 2679 we considered the extent to which the First Amendment limits the grand jury subpoena power. But the *739 Court has said that '(t)he Bill of Rights is applicable to investigations as to all forms of governmental action. Witnesses cannot be compelled to give evidence against themselves. They cannot be subjected to unreasonable search and seizure. Nor can the First Amendment freedoms of speech, press . . . or political belief and association be abridged.' Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 188, 77 S.Ct. 1173, 1179, 1 L.Ed.2d 1273. And in Sweezy v. New Hampshire, it was stated: 'It is particularly important that the exercise of the power of compulsory process be carefully circumscribed when the investigative process tends to impinge upon such highly sensitive areas as freedom of speech or press, freedom of political association, and freedom of communication of ideas.' 354 U.S., at 245, 77 S.Ct., at 1209 (plurality opinion).

FN25. The protection of information from compelled disclosure for broad purposes of public policy has been recognized in decisions involving police informers, see Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 77 S.Ct. 623, 1 L.Ed.2d 639; United States v. Ventresca, 380 U.S. 102, 108, 85 S.Ct. 741, 745, 13 L.Ed.2d 684; Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 114, 84 S.Ct. 1509, 1514, 12 L.Ed.2d 723; McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300, 87 S.Ct. 1056, 18 L.Ed.2d 62, and military and state secrets, United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 73 S.Ct. 528, 97 L.Ed. 727.

The established method of 'carefully' circumscribing investigative powers is to place a heavy burden of justification on government officials when First Amendment rights are impaired. The decisions of this Court have 'consistently held that only a compelling state interest in the regulation of a subject within the State's constitutional power to regulate can justify limiting First Amendment freedoms.' NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S., at 438, 83 S.Ct., at 341. And 'it is an essential prerequisite to the validity of an investigation which intrudes into the area of constitutionally protected rights of speech, press, association and petition that the State convincingly show a substantial relation between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling state interest.' Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, 372 U.S., at 546, 83 S.Ct., at 894 (emphasis supplied). See also DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825, 86 S.Ct. 1148, 16 L.Ed.2d 292; NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 78 S.Ct. 1163, 2 L.Ed.2d 1488; Sweezy, supra; Watkins, supra.

Thus, when an investigation impinges on First Amendment rights, the government must not only show that *740 the inquiry is of 'compelling and overriding importance' but it must also 'convincingly' demonstrate that the investigation is 'substantially related' to the information sought.

Governmental officials must, therefore, demonstrate that the information sought is clearly relevant to a precisely defined subject of governmental inquiry. Watkins, supra; Sweezy, supra. [FN26] They must demonstrate that it is reasonable to think the witness in question has that information. Sweezy, supra; Gibson, supra. [FN27] And they must 2680 show that there is not any means of obtaining the information less destructive of First Amendment liberties. Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S., at 488, 81 S.Ct., at 252; Louisiana ex rel. Gremillion v. NAACP, 366 U.S. 293, 296--297, 81 S.Ct. 1333, 1335--1336, 6 L.Ed.2d 301. [FN28]

FN26. As we said in Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 77 S.Ct. 1173, 1 L.Ed.2d 1273, '(W)hen First Amendment rights are threatened, the delegation of power to the (legislative) committee must be clearly revealed in its charter.' 'It is the responsibility of the Congress . . . to insure that compulsory process is used only in furtherance of a legislative purpose. That requires that the instructions to an investigating committee spell out the group's jurisdiction and purpose with sufficient particularity. . . . The more vague the committee's charter is, the greater becomes the possibility that the committee's specific actions are not in conformity with the will of the parent House of Congress.' Id., at 198, 201, 77 S.Ct., at 1186.

FN27. We noted in Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 77 S.Ct. 1203, 1 L.Ed.2d 1311: 'The State Supreme Court itself recognized that there was a weakness in its conclusion that the menace of forcible overthrow of the government justified sacrificing constitutional rights. There was a missing link in the chain of reasoning. The syllogism was not complete. There was nothing to connect the questioning of petitioner with this fundamental interest of the State.' Id., at 251, 77 S.Ct. at 1212 (emphasis supplied).

FN28. See generally Note, Less Drastic Means and the First Amendment, 78 Yale L.J. 464 (1969).

These requirements, which we have recognized in decisions involving legislative and executive investigations, serve established policies reflected in numerous First *741 Amendment decisions arising in other contexts. The requirements militate against vague investigations that, like vague laws, create uncertainty and needlessly discourage First Amendment activity. [FN29] They also insure that a legitimate governmental purpose will not be pursued by means that 'broadly stifle fundamental personal liberties when the end can be more narrowly achieved.' Shelton, supra, 364 U.S. at 488, 81 S.Ct. at 252. [FN30] As we said in Gibson, supra, 'Of course, a legislative investigation--as any investigation--must proceed 'step by step,' . . . but step by step or in totality, an adequate foundation for inquiry must be laid before proceeding in such a manner as will substantially intrude upon and severely curtail or inhibit constitutionally protected activities or seriously interfere with similarly protected associational rights.' 372 U.S., at 557, 83 S.Ct., at 899.

FN29. See Watkins, supra, 354 U.S. at 208--209, 77 S.Ct. at 1189--1190. See generally Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 372, 84 S.Ct. 1316, 1322, 12 L.Ed.2d 377; Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 526, 78 S.Ct. 1332, 1342, 2 L.Ed.2d 1460; Ashton v. Kentucky, 384 U.S. 195, 200--201, 86 S.Ct. 1407, 1410--1411, 16 L.Ed.2d 469; Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 486, 85 S.Ct. 1116, 1120, 14 L.Ed.2d 22; Smith v. California, 361 U.S., at 150--152, 80 S.Ct., at 217--218; Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 68 S.Ct. 665, 92 L.Ed. 840; Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S., at 369, 51 S.Ct., at 535. See also Note, The Chilling Effect in Constitutional Law, 69 Col.L.Rev. 808 (1969).

FN30. See generally Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 249--250, 88 S.Ct. 391, 396--397, 19 L.Ed.2d 444; and cases cited therein; Coates v. Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611, 616, 91 S.Ct. 1686, 1689, 29 L.Ed.2d 214; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 307, 60 S.Ct. 900, 904, 84 L.Ed. 1213; De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S., at 364--365, 57 S.Ct., at 259--260; Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 164, 60 S.Ct. 146, 152, 84 L.Ed. 155; Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 562--564, 85 S.Ct. 476, 479--481, 13 L.Ed.2d 487. Cf. NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 438, 83 S.Ct. 328, 340, 9 L.Ed.2d 405. See also Note, The First Amendment Overbreadth Doctrine, 83 Harv.L.Rev. 844 (1970).

I believe the safeguards developed in our decisions involving governmental investigations must apply to the grand jury inquiries in these cases. Surely the function of the grand jury to aid in the enforcement of the law is no more important than the function of the legislature, and its committees, to make the law. We have long recognized the value of the role played by legislative investigations, see e.g., United States v. Rumely, 742 345 U.S. 41, 43, 73 S.Ct. 543, 544, 97 L.Ed. 770; Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 111--112, 79 S.Ct. 1081, 1085, 3 L.Ed.2d 1115, for the 'power of the Congress to conduct investigations is inherent . . . (encompassing) surveys of defects in our social, economic or political system for the purpose of enabling the Congress to remedy them.' Watkins, supra, 354 U.S., at 187, 77 S.Ct., at 1179. Similarly, the associational rights of private individuals, which have been the prime focus of our First Amendment decisions in the investigative sphere, are hardly more important than the First Amendment rights of mass circulation newspapers and electronic media to disseminate ideas and information, and of the general public to receive them. Moreover, the vices of vagueness and overbreadth that legislative *2681 investigations may manifest are also exhibited by grand jury inquiries, since grand jury investigations are not limited in scope to specific criminal acts, see e.g., Wilson v. United States, 221 U.S. 361, 31 S.Ct. 538, 55 L.Ed. 771; Hendricks v. United States, 223 U.S. 178, 184, 32 S.Ct. 313, 316, 56 L.Ed. 394; United States v. Johnson, 319 U.S. 503, 63 S.Ct. 1233, 87 L.Ed. 1546, and since standards of materiality and relevance are greatly relaxed. Holt v. United States, 218 U.S. 245, 31 S.Ct. 2, 54 L.Ed. 1021; Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 76 S.Ct. 406, 100 L.Ed. 397. See generally Note, The Grand Jury as an Investigatory Body, 74 Harv.L.Rev. 590, 591--592 (1961). [FN31] For, as the United States notes in its brief in Caldwell, the 743 grand jury 'need establish no factual basis for commencing an investigation, and can pursue rumors which further investigation may prove groundless.'

FN31. In addition, witnesses customarily are not allowed to object to questions on the grounds of materiality or relevance, since the scope of the grand jury inquiry is deemed to be of no concern to the witness. Carter v. United States, 9 Cir., 417 F.2d 384, cert. denied, 399 U.S. 935, 90 S.Ct. 2253, 26 L.Ed.2d 807. Nor is counsel permitted to be present to aid a witness. See In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330, 77 S.Ct. 510, 1 L.Ed.2d 376. See generally Younger, The Grand Jury Under Attack, pt. 3, 46 J.Crim.L.C. & P.S. 214 (1955); Recent Cases, 104 U.Pa.L.Rev. 429 (1955); Watts, Grand Jury: Sleeping Watchdog or Expensive Antique, 37 N.C.L.Rev. 290 (1959); Whyte, Is the Grand Jury Necessary, 45 Va.L.Rev. 461 (1959); Note, 2 Col.J.Law & Soc.Prob. 47, 58 (1966); Antell, The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Supergovernment, 51 A.B.A.J. 153 (1965); Orfield, The Federal Grand Jury, 22 F.R.D. 343.

Accordingly, when a reporter is asked to appear before a grand jury and reveal confidences, I would hold that the government must (1) show that there is probable cause to believe that the newsman has information that is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of law; [FN32] (2) demonstrate that the information sought cannot be obtained by alternative means less destructive of First Amendment rights; and (3) demonstrate a compelling and overriding interest in the information. [FN33]

FN32. The standard of proof employed by most grand juries, federal and State, is simply 'probable cause' to believe that the accused has committed a crime. See Note, 1963 Wash.U.L.Q. 102; L. Hall et al., Modern Criminal Procedure 793--794 (1969). Generally speaking, it is extremely difficult to challenge indictments on the ground that they are not supported by adequate or competent evidence. Cf. Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 76 S.Ct. 406, 100 L.Ed. 397; Beck v. Washington, 369 U.S. 541, 82 S.Ct. 955, 8 L.Ed.2d 98.

FN33. Cf. Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit declined to provide a testimonial privilege to a newsman called to testify at a civil trial. But the court recognized a newsman's First Amendment right to a confidential relationship with his source and concluded: 'It is to be noted that we are not dealing here with the use of the judicial process to force a wholesale disclosure of a newspaper's confidential sources of news, nor with a case where the identity of the news source is of doubtful relevance or materiality. . . . The question asked . . . went to the heart of the plaintiff's claim.' Id., at 549--550 (citations omitted).

This is not to say that a grand jury could not issue a subpoena until such a showing were made, and it is not to say that a newsman would be in any way privileged to ignore any subpoena that was issued. Obviously, before the government's burden to make such a showing were triggered, the reporter would have to move to quash the subpoena, asserting the basis on which he considered the particular relationship a confidential one.

*744 B

The crux of the Court's rejection of any newsman's privilege is its observation that only 'where news sources themselves are implicated in crime or possess information relevant to the grand jury's task need they or the reporter be concerned about grand jury subpoenas.' See ante, at 2661 (emphasis 2682 supplied). But this is a most misleading construct. For it is obviously not true that the only persons about whom reporters will be forced to testify will be those 'confidential informants involved in actual criminal conduct' and those having 'information suggesting illegal conduct by others.' See ante, at 2661, 2662. As noted above, given the grand jury's extraordinarily broad investigative powers and the weak standards of relevance and materiality that apply during such inquiries, reporters, if they have no testimonial privilege, will be called to give information about informants who have neither committed crimes nor have information about crime. It is to avoid deterrence of such sources and thus to prevent needless injury to First Amendment values that I think the government must be required to show probable cause that the newsman has information that is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of criminal law. [FN34]

FN34. If this requirement is not met, then the government will basically be allowed to undertake a 'fishing expedition' at the expense of the press. Such general, exploratory investigations will be most damaging to confidential news-gathering relationships, since they will create great uncertainty in both reporters and their sources. The Court sanctions such explorations, by refusing to apply a meaningful 'probable cause' requirement. See ante, at 2666--2667. As the Court states, a grand jury investigation 'may be triggered by tips, rumors, evidence proffered by the prosecutor, or the personal knowledge of the grand jurors.' Ante, at 2666. It thereby invites government to try to annex the press as an investigative arm, since any time government wants to probe the relationships between the newsman and his source, it can, on virtually any pretext, convene a grand jury and compel the journalist to testify. The Court fails to recognize that under the guise of 'investigating crime' vindictive prosecutors can, using the broad powers of the grand jury which are, in effect, immune from judicial supervision, explore the newsman's sources at will, with no serious law enforcement purpose. The secrecy of grand jury proceedings, affords little consolation to a news source; the prosecutor obviously will, in most cases, have knowledge of testimony given by grand jury witnesses.

*745 Similarly, a reporter may have information from a confidential source that is 'related' to the commission of crime, but the government may be able to obtain an indictment or otherwise achieve its purposes by subpoenaing persons other than the reporter. It is an obvious but important truism that when government aims have been fully served, there can be no legitimate reason to disrupt a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. To do so would not aid the administration of justice and would only impair the flow of information to the public. Thus, it is to avoid deterrence of such sources that I think the government must show that there are no alternative means for the grand jury to obtain the information sought.

Both the 'probable cause' and 'alternative means' requirements would thus serve the vital function of mediating between the public interest in the administration of justice and the constitutional protection of the full flow of information. These requirements would avoid a direct conflict between these competing concerns, and they would generally provide adequate protection for newsmen. See Part III, infra. [FN35] No doubt the courts would be required to make some delicate judgments in working out this accommodation. But that, after all, *746 is the function of courts of law. Better such judgments, however difficult, than the simplistic and stultifying absolutism adopted by the Court in denying any force to the First Amendment in these cases. [FN36]

FN35. We need not, therefore, reach the question of whether government's interest in these cases is 'overriding and compelling.' I do not, however, believe, as the Court does, that all grand jury investigations automatically would override the newsman's testimonial privilege.

FN36. The disclaimers in Mr. Justice POWELL'S concurring opinion leave room for the hope that in some future case the Court may take a less absolute position in this area.

2683 The error in the Court's absolute rejection of First Amendment interests in these cases seems to me to be most profound. For in the name of advancing the administration of justice, the Court's decision, I think, will only impair the achievement of that goal. People entrusted with law enforcement responsibility, no less than private citizens, need general information relating to controversial social problems. Obviously, press reports have great value to government, even when the newsman cannot be compelled to testify before a grand jury. The sad paradox of the Court's position is that when a grand jury may exercise an unbridled subpoena power, and sources involved in sensitive matters become fearful of disclosing information, the newsman will not only cease to be a useful grand jury witness; he will cease to investigate and publish information about issues of public import. I cannot subscribe to such an anomalous result, for, in my view, the interests protected by the First Amendment are not antagonistic to the administration of justice. Rather, they can, in the long run, only be complementary, and for that reason must be given great 'breathing space.' NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S., at 433, 83 S.Ct., at 338.

III

In deciding what protection should be given to information a reporter receives in confidence from a news source, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the holding of a District Court that the grand *747 jury power of testimonial compulsion must not be exercised in a manner likely to impair First Amendment interests 'until there has been a clear showing of a compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by any alternative means.' Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081, 1086. It approved the request of respondent Caldwell for specification by the government of the 'subject, direction or scope of the Grand Jury inquiry.' Id., at 1085. And it held that in the circumstances of this case Caldwell need not divulge confidential information.

I think this decision was correct. On the record before us the United States has not met the burden that I think the appropriate newsman's privilege should require.

In affidavits before the District Court, the United States said it was investigating possible violations of 18 U.S.C. s 871 (threats against the President), 18 U.S.C. s 1751 (assassination, attempts to assassinate, conspiracy to assassinate the President), 18 U.S.C. s 231 (civil disorders), 18 U.S.C. s 2101 (interstate travel to incite a riot), 18 U.S.C. s 1341 (mail fraud and swindles) and other crimes that were not specified. But, with one exception, there has been no factual showing in this case of the probable commission of, or of attempts to commit, any crimes. [FN37] The single exception relates to the allegation that a Black Panther Party leader, David Hilliard, violated 18 U.S.C. s 871 during the course of a speech in November 1969. But Caldwell was subpoenaed two months after an indictment was returned against Hilliard, and that charge could not, subsequent to the indictment, be investigated by a grand jury. See In re National Window Glass Workers, D.C. 287 F. 219; United *748 States v. Dardi, 2 Cir., 330 F.2d 316, 336. [FN38] Furthermore, 2684 the record before us does not show that Caldwell probably had any information about the violation of any other federal criminal laws, [FN39] or that alternative *749 means of obtaining the desired information were pursued. [FN40]

FN37. See Blasi 61 et seq.

FN38. After Caldwell was first subpoenaed to appear before the grand jury, the Government did undertake, by affidavits, to 'set forth facts indicating the general nature of the grand jury's investigation (and) witness Earl Caldwell's possession of information relevant to this general inquiry.' In detailing the basis for the belief that a crime had probably been committed, the Government simply asserted that certain actions had previously been taken by other grand juries, and by Government counsel, with respect to certain members of the Black Panther Party (i.e., immunity grants for certain Black Panthers were sought; the Government moved to compel party members to testify before grand juries; and contempt citations were sought when party members refused to testify). No facts were asserted suggesting the actual commission of crime. The exception, as noted, involved David Hilliard's speech and its republication in the party newspaper, the Black Panther, for which Hilliard had been indicted before Caldwell was subpoenaed.

FN39. In its affidavits, the Government placed primary reliance on certain articles published by Caldwell in the New York Times during 1969 (on June 15, July 20, July 22, July 27, and Dec. 14). On Dec. 14, 1969, Caldwell wrote: "We are special,' Mr. Hilliard said recently 'We advocate the very direct overthrow of the Government by way of force and violence. By picking up guns and moving against it because we recognize it as being oppressive and in recognizing that we know that the only solution to it is armed struggle.' 'In their role as the vanguard in a revolutionary struggle, the Panthers have picked up guns. 'Last week two of their leaders were killed during the police raid on one of their offices in Chicago. And in Los Angeles a few days earlier, three officers and three Panthers were wounded in a similar shooting incident. In these and in some other raids, the police have found caches of weapons, including high-powered rifles.' App. in No. 70--57, p. 13. In my view, this should be read as indicating that Caldwell had interviewed Panther leaders. It does not indicate that he probably had knowledge of the crimes being investigated by the Government. And, to repeat, to the extent it does relate to Hilliard's threat, an indictment had already been brought in that matter. The other articles merely demonstrate that Black Panther Party leaders had told Caldwell their ideological beliefs--beliefs that were readily available to the Government through other sources, like the party newspaper.

FN40. The Government did not attempt to show that means less impinging upon First Amendment interests had been pursued.

In the Caldwell case, the Court of Appeals further found that Caldwell's confidential relationship with the leaders of the Black Panther Party would be impaired if he appeared before the grand jury at all to answer questions, even though not privileged. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d, at 1088. On the particular facts before it, [FN41] the court 2685 concluded that the very *750 appearance by Caldwell before the grand jury would jeopardize his relationship with his sources, leading to a severance of the news-gathering relationship and impairment of the flow of news to the public: [FN42]

FN41. In an affidavit filed with the District Court, Caldwell stated: 'I began covering and writing articles about the Black Panthers almost from the time of their inception, and I myself found that in those first months . . . they were very brief and reluctant to discuss any substantive matter with me. However, as they realized I could be trusted and that my sole purpose was to collect my information and present it objectively in the newspaper and that I had no other motive. I found that not only were the party leaders available for in-depth interviews but also the rank and file members were cooperative in aiding me in the newspaper stories that I wanted to do. During the time that I have been covering the party, I have noticed other newspapermen representing legitimate organizations in the news media being turned away because they were not known and trusted by the party leadership. 'As a result of the relationship that I have developed, I have been able to write lengthy stories about the Panthers that have appeared in The New York Times and have been of such a nature that other reporters who have not known the Panthers have not been able to write. Many of these stories have appeared in up to 50 or 60 other newspapers around the country. 'The Black Panther Party's method of operation with regard to members of the press is significantly different from that of other organizations. For instance, press credentials are not recognized as being of any significance. In addition, interviews are not normally designated as being 'backgrounders' or 'off the record' or 'for publication' or 'on the record.' Because no substantive interviews are given until a relationship of trust and confidence is developed between the Black Panther Party members and a reporter, statements are rarely made to such reporters on an expressed 'on' or 'off' the record basis. Instead, an understanding is developed over a period of time between the Black Panther Party members and the reporter as to matters which the Black Panther Party wishes to disclose for publications and those matters which are given in confidence. . . . Indeed, if I am forced to appear in secret grand jury proceedings, my appearance alone would be interpreted by the Black Panthers and other dissident groups as a possible disclosure of confidences and trusts and would similarly destroy my effectiveness as a newspaperman.' The Government did not contradict this affidavit.

FN42. 'Militant groups might very understandably fear that, under the pressure of examination before a Grand Jury, the witness may fail to protect their confidences . . .. The Government characterizes this anticipated loss of communication as Black Panther reprisal . . . But it is not an extortionate threat we face. It is human reaction as reasonable to expect as that a client will leave his lawyer when his confidence is shaken. . . . As the Government points out, loss of such a sensitive news source can also result from its reaction to indiscreet or unfavorable reporting or from a reporter's association with Government agents or persons disapproved of by the news source. Loss in such a case, however, results from an exercise of the choice and prerogative of a free press. It is not the result of Government compulsion.' Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d, at 1088.

'Appellant asserted in affidavit that there is nothing to which he could testify (beyond that which he has already made public and for which, therefore, his appearance is unnecessary) that is not protected by the District Court's order. If this is true--and the Government apparently has not believed it necessary to dispute it--appellant's response to the subpoena would be a barren performance-- *751 one of no benefit to the Grand Jury. To destroy appellant's capacity as news gatherer for such a return hardly makes sense. Since the cost to the public of excusing his attendance is so slight, it may be said that there is here no public interest of real substance in competition with the First Amendment freedoms that are jeopardized.
'If any competing public interest is ever to arise in a case such as this (where First Amendment liberties are threatened by mere appearance at a Grand Jury investigation) it will be on an occasion in which the witness, armed with his privilege, can still serve a useful purpose before the Grand Jury. Considering the scope of the privilege embodied in the protective order, these occasions would seem to be unusual. It is not asking too much of the Government to show that such an occasion is presented here.' Id., at 1089.

I think this ruling was also correct in light of the particularized circumstances of the Caldwell case. Obviously, only in very rare circumstances would a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source be so sensitive that mere appearance before the grand jury by the newsman would substantially impair his news-gathering function. But in this case, the reporter made out a prima facie case that the flow of news to the public would be curtailed. And he stated, without contradiction, that the only nonconfidential material about which he could testify was already printed in his newspaper articles. [FN43] Since the United States has not attempted to *752 refute this assertion, the appearance of Caldwell would, on these facts, indeed be a 'barren performance.' But this aspect of 2686 the Caldwell judgment I would confine to its own facts.

As the Court of Appeals appropriately observed: '(T) he rule of this case is a narrow one. . . .' Caldwell, supra, at 1090.

FN43. Caldwell stated in his affidavit filed with the District Court, see n. 40, supra: 'It would be virtually impossible for me to recall whether any particular matter disclosed to me by members of the Black Panther Party since January 1, 1969, was based on an understanding that it would or would not be confidential. Generally, those matters which were made on a nonconfidential or 'for publication' basis have been published in articles I have written in The New York Times; conversely, any matters which I have not thus far disclosed in published articles would have been given to me based on the understanding that they were confidential and would not be published.'

Accordingly, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals in No. 70--57, United States v. Caldwell. [FN44] In the other two cases before us, No. 70--85, Branzburg v. Hayes and Meigs, and No. 70--94, In re Pappas, I would vacate the judgments and remand the cases for further proceedings not inconsitent with the views I have expressed in this opinion.

FN44. The District Court reserved jurisdiction to modify its order on a showing of a governmental interest which cannot be served by means other than Caldwell's grand jury testimony. The Government would thus have further opportunity in that court to meet the burden that, I think, protection of First Amendment rights requires.

END OF DOCUMENT

John S. ATLEE et al.
v.
Richard M. NIXON, Individually and as President of the United States, Melvin Laird, Individually and as Secretary of the Department of Defense.

Civ. A. No. 71-2324.

United States District Court,
E. D. Pennsylvania.

Jan. 20, 1972.

Suit wherein it was alleged that prosecution of war in Southeast Asia violated various provisions of Federal Constitution, treaties of United States and doctrines of international law. On "suggestion," of United States attorney, who had been granted leave to intervene as amicus curiae, that suit be dismissed as to President, the District Court, Joseph S. Lord, III, Chief Judge, held that absent indication, in such suit which was brought against both President and Secretary of Defense individually and in their official capacities, that plaintiffs would be denied remedy if President were dismissed as party, President would be dismissed as party without prejudice to rights of plaintiffs if it should appear that President was indispensable party.

Ordered accordingly.

[1] UNITED STATES ⇦ 26
393k26
United States President is not completely immune from judicial process merely because he is President.

[2] INJUNCTION ⇦ 75
212k75
Executive action may be restrained indirectly by enjoining a cabinet member from enforcing an executive order found to violate the law.

[3] UNITED STATES ⇦ 26
393k26
Purpose of doctrine of executive immunity is not to serve as a shield to completely bar constitutional review of presidential action but to insure that the President is not distracted from or hindered in performance of his tasks by being called into court to defend his actions.

[4] UNITED STATES ⇦ 135
393k135
Absent indication, in suit which was brought against United States President and Secretary of Defense individually and in their official capacities, and in which it was alleged that prosecution of war in Southeast Asia violated various provisions of Federal Constitution, treaties of United States and doctrines of international law, that plaintiffs would be denied remedy if President were dismissed as party, President would be dismissed as party without prejudice to rights of plaintiffs if it should appear that President was indispensable party.

791 David Kairys, David Rudovsky, Kairys & Rudovsky, Philadelphia, Pa., for plaintiffs.

Louis C. Bechtle, U. S. Atty., Warren D. Mulloy, John T. Thorn, Asst. U. S. Attys., Philadelphia, Pa., for defendants.

OPINION

JOSEPH S. LORD, III, Chief Judge.

The plaintiffs in this suit are citizen taxpayers who bring this action on their own behalf, and as representatives of a class consisting of all those similarly situated, pursuant to F.R.Civ.P. 23. They allege that the prosecution of the war in Southeast Asia violates various provisions of the United States Constitution, Treaties of the United States, and doctrines of international law. They seek a permanent injunction against the allocation and expenditure of funds of the United States to prosecute the war. We have jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331.

The defendants are Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, and Melvin Laird, Secretary of the United States Department of Defense. The United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania has been granted leave to intervene as amicus curiae for the purpose of making suggestions. Now pending is its "suggestion" that the instant suit be dismissed as to defendant Nixon.

[1] At the outset, we reject the notion that defendant Nixon is completely immune from judicial process because he is the President of the United States. United States v. Burr, 25 F.Cas.P. 30, No. 14,692d (C.C.A.Va.1807) (Marshall, C. J.).

Nevertheless, at this time we have decided to dismiss the action as to defendant Nixon.

The doctrine of executive immunity from suit cannot be found in any particular provision of the United States Constitution, or in any federal law. It is a judicial creation founded in a proper respect for executive prerogative in a system of government which emphasizes a separation of powers between the various branches. This led the Court in Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 475, 18 L.Ed. 437 (1867) to conclude that a court has no jurisdiction of a bill to enjoin the President in the performance of his official duties. "The Congress is the Legislative Department of the government; the President is the Executive Department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the Judicial Department ." Id. at 500.

Later decisions of the Court have strongly suggested that judicial restraint of the executive may no longer be absolutely prohibited. The doctrine of separation of powers itself may necessitate 792 judicial action to restrain executive action which has invaded the province of Congress's lawmaking power.

[2] It is not open to doubt that executive action may be restrained indirectly by enjoining a cabinet member from enforcing an executive order found to violate the law. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 72 S.Ct. 863, 96 L.Ed. 1153 (1952). The decision in Youngstown was based on the finding that the President's executive order seizing the steel mills was not within the constitutional powers of the President. President Truman, however, was not a named party. The defendant was Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer who had been directed by the President to take temporary possession of the nation's steel mills. He was restrained from continuing the seizure and possession of the plants and acting under the authority of the executive order.

The question arises whether the Presidential immunity doctrine should apply in a situation where the President is alleged to be acting in violation of the Constitution, and there is no agent who participated in this action who may be restrained, as Mr. Sawyer in the Youngstown case. We need not decide this difficult issue now.

In the recent case of Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 89 S.Ct. 1944, 23 L.Ed.2d 491 (1969), the Court held that the Speech or Debate Clause of the Constitution, Art. I, § 6, [FN1] did not serve as a bar to judicial review of the constitutionality of the House decision to exclude Mr. Powell. The action was dismissed as to Congressmen defendants, but was allowed to be maintained against House employees such as the Sergeant at Arms and the Doorkeeper of the House. In dismissing the Congressmen as defendants, the Court made clear it was not laying down any flat rule prohibiting injunctive relief against Congressmen.

> FN1. Article I, § 6, provides: "for any Speech or Debate in either House, they [Senators and Representatives] shall not be questioned in any other Place."

> "Given our disposition of this issue, we need not decide whether under the Speech or Debate Clause petitioners would be entitled to maintain this action solely against members of Congress where no agents participated in the challenged action and no other remedy was available." Id. at 506, footnote 26, 89 S.Ct. at 1956.

[3] The doctrine of executive immunity's purpose is not to serve as a shield to bar completely constitutional review of Presidential action. It does, though, serve a very important function, much like the Speech or Debate Clause.

> "The purpose of the protection afforded legislators is not to forestall judicial review of legislative action but to insure that legislators are not distracted from or hindered in the performance of their legislative tasks by being called into court to defend their actions." Id. at 505, 89 S.Ct. at 1955.

Of course, we should be even more reluctant to disturb the President in the performance of his duties than we are to distract any individual legislator.

[4] In the instant case, we note that the Secretary of Defense, Melvin Laird, is also a defendant. Therefore, we have no indication at this time that plaintiffs would be denied a remedy if defendant Nixon were to be dismissed as a party. Indeed, it would be a rare situation where executive action was not participated in by any other government officials.

We have concluded that Richard M. Nixon should be dismissed as a party, without prejudice to the rights of plaintiffs to move at some future stage of this action that he is indeed a necessary party, if alleged prohibited conduct appears to the plaintiffs to be entirely unilateral. We of course at this time intimate no opinion as to the merits of this action.

END OF DOCUMENT

The MINNESOTA CHIPPEWA TRIBE et al., Plaintiffs,
v.
Frank C. CARLUCCI, etc., et al., Defendants.

Civ. A. No. 175-73.

United States District Court, District of Columbia.

April 25, 1973.

Action, inter alia, to require President of the United States to appoint members of National Advisory Council on Indian Education pursuant to Indian Education Act, wherein case came before court on Government's suggestion for dismissal of action as to the President. The District Court, June L. Green, J., held that the action was maintainable over objection of lack of standing, inasmuch as plaintiffs were intended beneficiaries of the Indian Education Act. The Court further held that, although, under the Act, the President had discretion to choose whom to appoint, inasmuch as he apparently had no discretion to decide whether the Council should or should not be constituted, the action was not subject to dismissal on basis that it related to executive, discretionary or political acts.

Suggestion for dismissal of action as to President denied.

Appointments to the National Advisory Council on Indian Education were made by the President of the United States May 5, 1973.

In a separate order of May 8, 1973, the Court dismissed the case as moot as to the President.

[1] FEDERAL CIVIL PROCEDURE ⇦ 656
170Ak656
Complaint must be construed liberally where plaintiff's assertion of subject matter jurisdiction is questioned by defendant.

[2] FEDERAL COURTS ⇦ 195
170Bk195
Formerly 106k284(3)
Federal district court had subject matter jurisdiction of complaint seeking to require President of the United States to appoint members of National Advisory Council on Indian Education pursuant to Indian Education Act. 5 U.S.C.A. §§ 701-706; 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1331, 1337, 1361, 1362.

[3] UNITED STATES ⇦ 26
393k26
President of United States is not completely immune from judicial process for sole reason that he is President.

[4] UNITED STATES ⇦ 26
393k26
Judiciary has jurisdiction over President of United States to compel him to perform a nondiscretionary act required by law.

[5] MANDAMUS ⇦ 23(1)
250k23(1)
Intended beneficiaries of Indian Education Act had standing to maintain action to require President of United States to appoint members of National Advisory Council on Indian Education pursuant to Indian Education Act. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc. rule 12(h)(3), 28 U.S.C.A.; Indian Education Act, § 442(a), 86 Stat. 334.

[6] MANDAMUS ⇦ 76
250k76
Although, under Indian Education Act, President of United States had discretion to choose whom to appoint to National Advisory Council on Indian Education, inasmuch as he apparently had no discretion to decide if the Council should or should not be constituted, action brought to require him to appoint members of Council was not subject to dismissal on basis that the action related to executive, discretionary or political acts. Indian Education Act, § 442(a-c), 86 Stat. 334.

[7] MANDAMUS ⇦ 151(2)
250k151(2)
Where it appeared that only President of United States had been given power to appoint members of National Advisory Council on Indian Education, but he had neither made such appointments nor delegated his power to another and no implied delegation appeared, action to require President to appoint members of Council could be maintained over objection that joinder of President as party was unnecessary in that plaintiffs could be afforded complete relief by suing member of President's Cabinet. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc. rule 12(h)(3), 28 U.S.C.A.; Indian Education Act, § 442(a), 86 Stat.

334.

974 L. Graeme Bell, III, Native American Rights Fund, Washington, D. C., Thomas W. Fredericks and David H. Getches, Native American Rights Fund, Boulder, Colo., Daniel M. Rosenfelt, Eric E. Van Loon, Center for Law and Education, Cambridge, Mass., for plaintiffs.

Harold H. Titus, Jr., U. S. Atty., Arnold T. Aikens and Michael A. Katz, Asst. U. S. Attys., Washington, D. C., for defendants.

ORDER

JUNE L. GREEN, District Judge.

In this action plaintiffs seek inter alia to require the President of the United States to appoint members of the National Advisory Council on Indian Education pursuant to The Indian Education Act, Title IV of Pub.L.No.92-318, 86 Stat. 334, approved by the President June 23, 1972. [FN1] In answering the complaint, the government admitted that the President is charged with duties and responsibilities under the statute in question. The answer further admitted that the President has heretofore neither made any appointments to the Council, nor delegated his power to another.

> FN1. Part D, § 442(a) of the Act provides, "There is hereby established the National Advisory Council on Indian Education ... which shall consist of fifteen members who are Indians and Alaska Natives appointed by the President of the United States. Such appointments shall be made by the President from lists of nominees furnished, from time to time, by Indian tribes and organizations, and shall represent diverse geographic areas of the country." The complaint does not refer to any lists.

The case is before the Court on the government's "Suggestion for Dismissal of Action as to Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States". Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(h)(3) provides,

> "Whenever it appears by suggestion of the parties or otherwise that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court shall dismiss the action."

[1] In determining whether the Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter, the Court is reminded that

> "... where the complaint ... is so drawn as to seek recovery directly under the Constitution or laws of the United States, the federal court, but for two possible exceptions later noted [and not here relevant] must entertain the suit. ... Whether the complaint states a cause of action on which relief could be granted is a question of law and just as issues of fact it must be decided after and not before the court has assumed jurisdiction over the controversy4)4B"B" Bell v. Hood, 327 U.S. 678, 681-682, 66 S.Ct. 773, 776, 90 L.Ed. 939 (1946).

975 Moreover, the complaint must be construed liberally where plaintiff's assertion of subject matter jurisdiction is questioned by defendant. Caserta v. Home Lines Agency, Inc., 154 F.Supp. 356 (S.D.N.Y.1957), aff'd., 273 F.2d 943 (2d Cir. 1959).

[2] A review of the complaint and plaintiffs' jurisdictional statement indicates that the Court has subject matter jurisdiction and that this case may eventually be decided on the merits. Plaintiffs have cited several statutes, e. g., 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331, 1337, 1361, 1362 and 5 U.S.C. §§ 701-706, and the Court is satisfied on the question.

Since the government contends that any claim against the person of the President is barred by the separation of powers doctrine, the Court now addresses itself to this issue.

[3][4] The President of the United States is not completely immune from judicial process for the sole reason that he is President. Atlee v. Nixon, 336 F.Supp. 790 (E.D.Pa.1972), (dictum); cited with approval in Meyers v. Nixon, 339 F.Supp. 1388 (S.D.N.Y.1972) (dictum). Chief Justice Marshall held long ago that the judiciary has jurisdiction over the President to compel him to perform a nondiscretionary act required by law. United States v. Burr, 25 Fed.Cas. p. 30, No. 14,692d (C.C.A.Va.1807) (subpoena duces tecum against the President held proper).

Suits against the President have generally been unsuccessful for several reasons, none of which appears present in the case sub judice.

[5] The first reason is lack of standing. E. g., Mottola v. Nixon, 464 F.2d 178 (9th Cir. 1972). In the case at bar, it appears plaintiffs have a personal stake and interest in the outcome of the controversy and might suffer actual injury in fact. Plaintiffs are intended beneficiaries of the Indian Education Act. The National Advisory Council clearly was intended to play a key role in administration of the Act. It appears that the implementation of the Act may be impossible or impracticable unless the Council is constituted by the President. [FN2] > FN2. The responsibilities of the Council are described in § 442(a)-(c) of the Act.

The second reason suits against the President have foundered is that they relate to "executive" or "discretionary" acts. Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall (71 U.S.) 475, 18 L.Ed. 437 (1866). More recently, the Supreme Court has defined a question as "political" if it involves one of the following:

> "... a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question." Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217, 82 S.Ct. 691, 710, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962).

[6] Based on the present record it appears that this case does not fall within the Baker definition, and that Mississippi is distinguishable. Plaintiffs do not pray that the Court determine whether Indians are recognized as tribes. They do not ask that the Court alter the special relationship between Indians and the United States. Their claim does not involve the President's role as Commander in Chief of our armed forces or as an architect of our foreign policy. They do not seek to enjoin the President from executing the law.

Plaintiffs' suit does not relate to ongoing supervisory acts which require the exercise of judgment, but to single specific "one-shot" acts, appointments to the Council. Although the President clearly has discretion to choose whom to appoint to the Council, he apparently has no discretion *976 to decide if the Council should or should not be constituted. The Indian Education Act, § 442(a) provides that "... appointments [to the Council] shall be made by the President. ..." (emphasis added). See McQueary v. Laird, 449 F.2d 608, 611 (10th Cir. 1971) (mandamus will issue to require the exercise of permissible discretion.)

[7] In the third place, joinder of the President as a party defendant is generally unnecessary: a plaintiff may be afforded complete relief by suing a member of the President's Cabinet. E. g., Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 72 S.Ct. 863, 96 L.Ed. 1153 (1952). In the instant case, however, it appears that plaintiffs' only remedy is to sue the President directly. Only the President is given the power to make appointments to the Council. As earlier noted, the President has neither made such appointments nor delegated his power to another. The record does not suggest any implied delegation.

For the foregoing reasons, it is by the Court, this 25th day of April 1973, Ordered that the Suggestion for Dismissal of Action as to Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, should be and the same hereby is denied.

END OF DOCUMENT

SENATE SELECT COMMITTEE ON PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN ACTIVITIES et al., Plaintiffs,
v.
Richard M. NIXON, Individually and as President of the United States, Defendant.

Civ. A. No. 1593-73.

United States District Court, District of Columbia.

Feb. 8, 1974.

Senate committee applied for enforcement of subpoena duces tecum served on the President with respect to certain tapes. On motion of the committee for summary judgment and of the President for dismissal, the District Court, Gesell, J., held that the matter was justiciable but that the committee had not established that it was entitled at that particular time to injunction directing compliance with subpoena, in light of possible prejudicial effect of pretrial publicity with respect to pending criminal prosecutions.

Complaint dismissed without prejudice.

See also, D.C.Cir., 487 F.2d 700; D.C., 366 F.Supp. 51, D.C., 360 F.Supp. 1.

[1] CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⊜ 68(1)
92k68(1)
Proceeding on application by Senate Committee to enforce subpoena duces tecum served on the President presented a justiciable controversy despite contention that it involved a political question.

[1] FEDERAL COURTS ⊜ 13.20
170Bk13.20
Formerly 106k281
Proceeding on application by Senate Committee to enforce subpoena duces tecum served on the President presented a justiciable controversy despite contention that it involved a political question.

[2] UNITED STATES ⊜ 23(4)
393k23(4)
On application by Senate committee to enforce subpoena duces tecum served on the President, it was the duty of the court to weigh the public interest protected by the President's claim of privilege against public interest that would be served by disclosure to the committee.

[2] UNITED STATES ⊜ 26
393k26
On application by Senate committee to enforce subpoena duces tecum served on the President, it was the duty of the court to weigh the public interest protected by the President's claim of privilege against public interest that would be served by disclosure to the committee.

[3] UNITED STATES ⊜ 23(4)
393k23(4)
President's unwillingness to submit to court, for in camera ex parte inspection, tapes sought by Senate committee pursuant to subpoena duces tecum, or to particularize in any other fashion his claim of executive privilege, precluded judicial recognition of that privilege on confidentiality grounds.

[4] UNITED STATES ⊜ 23(4)
393k23(4)
Court would not enforce subpoena duces tecum served by Senate committee on the President, seeking production of certain tapes, where committee did not demonstrate present need for the tapes in connection with further public hearings, and where nondisclosure was needed to safeguard pending criminal prosecutions from the possible prejudicial effect of pretrial publicity.

[5] UNITED STATES ⊜ 23(5.1)
393k23(5.1)
Formerly 393k23(5)
Senate committee in conducting inquest into governmental conduct may proceed only in aid of Congress' legislative function.

521 Samuel Dash, Fred D. Thompson, James Hamilton, Ronald D. Rotunda, Washington, D. C., for plaintiffs.

J. Fred Buzhardt, James D. St. Clair, Charles Alan Wright, Robert T. Andrews, Thomas P. Marinis, Jr., Washington, D. C., for defendant.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

GESELL, District Judge.

The Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities desires access to five tape recordings made by the President of conversations between himself and John Wesley Dean, III, then Counsel to the President. These tapes are relevant to the Committee's functions and are identified by date and time. The Committee duly served a subpoena duces tecum on the President demanding production of those portions of the taped conversations which deal with "alleged criminal acts occurring in connection with the Presidential election of 522 1972." [FN1] The President refused to comply. Deeming the Senate's own enforcement procedures inappropriate, the Committee sought judicial enforcement of the subpoena, but the Court (Sirica, J.) ruled that it lacked jurisdiction. At the instance of the Committee, Congress then passed a statute placing special jurisdiction in this Court to enforce the Committee's subpoenas, and accordingly the issues are again presented for judicial consideration. The Committee seeks a declaratory judgment clarifying its rights and an affirmative injunction directing compliance with the subpoena.

> FN1. The Committee originally issued two subpoenas duces tecum, but enforcement of the second subpoena was denied by this Court on January 25, 1974.

The Committee has moved for summary judgment and the President, through his counsel, resists and asks for dismissal. On the basis of the voluminous papers before the Court and a transcript of the oral argument before Judge Sirica during earlier proceedings in this case, the Court has determined that no further hearings are required and the case is ripe for resolution.

[1] The President at the outset contends that the issue before the Court "constitutes a non-justiciable political question," but the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit sitting en banc in Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F.2d 700 (D.C.Cir., 1973), is squarely to the contrary and no extended discussion is required. The reasoning of that Court involving a grand jury subpoena is equally applicable to the subpoena of a congressional committee. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 82 S.Ct. 691, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962), establishes the tests for determining the existence of a "political question," and application of these tests leaves no doubt that the issues presented in the instant controversy are justiciable. See id. at 217, 82 S.Ct. 691. See also Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 518-550, 89 S.Ct. 1944, 23 L.Ed.2d 491 (1969).

[2] Given this determination, it becomes the duty of the Court to weigh the public interests protected by the President's claim of privilege against the public interests that would be served by disclosure to the Committee in this particular instance. Nixon v. Sirica, supra, 487 F.2d at 716-718. This is a difficult but necessary task. The circumstances are unique in our constitutional history. To aid the final determination, the Court requested the Watergate Special Prosecutor to indicate what effect, if any, public disclosure of the subpoenaed tapes by the Committee at this juncture would have on his responsibilities in carrying forward criminal prosecutions. The Court also requested the President to particularize and to update his claim of privilege as it relates to the five tapes, since substantial time and many events have intervened since the original issuance of the subpoena. The President's response is attached. The Committee has also elaborated upon its need for the tapes in recently filed papers. The Court has carefully weighed these conflicting assertions of public interest in the light of the respective requirements of the parties.

[3][4] It has not been demonstrated to the Court's satisfaction that the Committee has a pressing need for the subpoenaed tapes or that further public hearings before the Committee concerning the content of those tapes will at this time serve the public interest. Conversely, the Court rejects the President's assertion that the public interest is best served by a blanket, unreviewable claim of confidentiality over all Presidential communications, see Nixon v. Sirica, supra, at 719-720, and the President's unwillingness to submit the tapes for the Court's in camera ex parte inspection or in any other fashion to particularize his claim of executive privilege precludes judicial recognition of that privilege on confidentiality grounds. Cf. United States v. Burr, 25 Fed.Cas. 187 (Case No. 14,694), 192 (1807).

On the other hand, both the President and the Special Prosecutor have advanced 523 another factor bearing upon the public interest which the Court finds to be of critical importance-the need to safeguard pending criminal prosecutions from the possibly prejudicial effect of pretrial publicity.

At this juncture in the so-called Watergate controversy, it is the responsibility of all three branches of the Federal Government to insure that pertinent facts are brought to light, that indictments are fairly and promptly tried, and that any accusations involving the conduct of the President or others are considered in a dignified manner and dealt with in accordance with established constitutional processes. The President, the Congress and the Courts each have a mutual and concurrent obligation to preserve the integrity of the criminal trials arising out of Watergate. The public has been subjected to a mass of information that is both conflicting and uncertain in its implications. Clearly the public interest demands that the charges and countercharges engendered be promptly resolved by our established judicial processes. Thus the Court is compelled to weigh the effect that disclosure of the subpoenaed portions of these tapes might have upon criminal trials scheduled or soon to be scheduled on the calendar of this Court.

Three grand juries are now engaged on matters under the Special Prosecutor's jurisdiction. A number of indictments and informations have already been filed and more are expected by the end of this month. The cases will be promptly scheduled for trial. The first trial is set for April 1, with pretrial hearings later this month, at which Mr. Dean will testify. The Special Prosecutor has indicated to the Court his intention of introducing at least four of the five subpoenaed tapes into evidence at some of the trials. All five tapes are now in his possession, and at least four have been played before a grand jury.

No one can doubt that, should the President be forced to comply with the subpoena, public disclosure of these tapes would immediately generate considerable publicity. While it is impossible, as the Special Prosecutor points out, to assess the precise impact of such publicity on the forthcoming judicial proceedings, the risk exists that it would bolster contentions that unbiased juries cannot be impaneled for trial. This is, moreover, in the nature of a test case and should the Committee prevail, numerous additional demands might well be made. [FN2]

FN2. A sweeping subpoena seeking some 500 items has apparently been served on the President more recently, but it has not been brought into this litigation.

The President has a constitutional mandate to see that the laws are faithfully executed and should therefore quite properly be concerned with the dangers inherent in excessive pretrial publicity. That the President himself may be under suspicion does not alter this fact, for he no less than any other citizen is entitled to fair treatment and the presumption of innocence. The public interest does not require that the President should be forced to provide evidence, already in the hands of an active and independent prosecution force, to a Senate committee in order to furnish fuel for further hearings which cannot, by their very nature, provide the procedural safeguards and adversary format essential to fact finding in the criminal justice system. Congressional demands, if they be forthcoming, for tapes in furtherance of the more juridical constitutional process of impeachment would present wholly different considerations. But short of this, the public interest requires at this stage of affairs that priority be given to the requirements of orderly and fair judicial administration.

The Court wishes to emphasize the special circumstances of this particular case which support this conclusion. The five tapes at issue are sought principally for the light that they might shed on the President's own alleged involvement 524 in the Watergate coverup. "[A]llegations involving the President" are among those specifically assigned to the Special Prosecutor for investigation and, if appropriate, for prosecution. The President has, however reluctantly, now provided the Special Prosecutor with all of the information he requires with regard to the five conversations at issue. The tapes themselves have been delivered to the grand juries; all the President's aides participating in the conversations have been permitted to testify under oath concerning the conversations, and the President has invoked neither his Fifth Amendment nor his attorney-client privilege with regard to any of the conversations or related materials he has furnished. To suggest that at this juncture the public interest requires pretrial disclosure of these tapes either to the Committee or to the public is to imply that the judicial process has not been or will not be effective in this matter. All of the evidence at hand is to the contrary.

[5] The Committee's role as a "Grand Inquest" into governmental misconduct is limited, for it may only proceed in aid of Congress' legislative function. The Committee has, of course, ably served that function over the last several months, but surely the time has come to question whether it is in the public interest for the criminal investigative aspects of its work to go forward in the blazing atmosphere of ex parte publicity directed to issues that are immediately and intimately related to pending criminal proceedings. The Committee itself must judge whether or not it should continue along these lines of inquiry, but the Court, when its equity jurisdiction is invoked, can and should exercise its discretion not to enforce a subpoena which would exacerbate the pretrial publicity in areas that are specifically identified with pending criminal charges.

The Court recognizes that any effort to balance conflicting claims as to what is in the public interest can provide only an uncertain result, for ours is a country that thrives and benefits from factional disagreements as to what is best for everyone. In assigning priority to the integrity of criminal justice, the Court believes that it has given proper weight to what is a dominant and pervasive theme in our culture. To be sure, the truth can only emerge from full disclosure. A country's quality is best measured by the integrity of its judicial processes. Experience and tradition teach that facts surrounding allegations of criminal conduct should be developed in an orderly fashion during adversary proceedings before neutral fact finders, so that not only the truth but the whole truth emerges and the rights of those involved are fully protected.

Accordingly, the Court declares that, while the controversy presented is justiciable, the Select Committee has not established by a preponderance of the evidence that it is entitled at this particular time to an injunction directing the President to comply with its subpoena for the five tape recordings. The application of the President's counsel for dismissal of the complaint is granted, and the complaint is dismissed without prejudice.

So ordered.

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON
February 6, 1974

Dear Judge Gesell:

I have been advised by Special Counsel to the President of the order issued by you on January 25, 1974, in which you solicited my personal response with reference to five specified taped conversations.

*525 As indicated in the various briefs, pleadings and other papers filed in this proceeding, it is my belief that the issue before this Court constitutes a non-justiciable political question.

Nevertheless, out of respect for this Court, but without in any way departing from my view that the issues presented here are inappropriate for resolution by the Judicial Branch, I have made a determination that the entirety of the five recordings of Presidential conversations described on the subpoena issued by the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities contains privileged communications, the disclosure of which would not be in the national interest.

I am taking this position for two primary reasons. First, the Senate Select Committee has made known its intention to make these materials public. Unlike the secret use of four out of five of these conversations before the grand jury, the publication of all of these tapes to the world at large would seriously infringe upon the principle of confidentiality, which is vital to the performance of my Constitutional responsibilities as President.

Second, it is incumbent upon me to be sensitive to the possible adverse effects upon ongoing and forthcoming criminal proceedings should the contents of these subpoenaed conversations be made public at an inappropriate time. The dangers connected with excessive pre-trial publicity are as well-known to this Court as they are to me. Consequently, my Constitutional mandate to see that the laws are faithfully executed requires my prohibiting the disclosure of any of these materials at this time and in this forum.

Sincerely,

s/ Richard M. Nixon

The Honorable Gerhard A. Gesell

Judge

U. S. District Court for the District of Columbia

Washington, D. C.

END OF DOCUMENT

Exhibits – Pres Subpoena Memo.

Facsimile Cover Sheet

To: Erik Jaso (cc: Alex Azar) Company: OIC
Phone:
Fax: 501-221-8707

From: Rajeev Duggal
Company:
Phone: 301-907-9415
Fax:

Date: 07/04/95
Pages including this cover page: 12

Comments:

Attached is the first response from the Carter library. They seem to have misunterstood what we were looking for, so I will follow up with them on Wednesday. Let me know if you have any comments. Thanks.

Jimmy Carter Library
One Copenhill Avenue Atlanta, Georgia 30307-1498

June 29, 1995

Rajeev Duggal
5914 Wisconson Ave.
Chevy Chase, MD 20815

Dear Mr. Duggal:

In response to your telephone call, I have looked in file locations readily accessible for information on the preparation of President Carter's testimony regarding the Robert Vesco investigation. I have enclosed a computer search of the Library's open material on "Vesco." The number of pages mentioned in the search is approximately 650, the majority of which appears to be newspaper articles.

In a cursory review of the material mentioned in the search, I found little information as to President Carter's testimony. I have enclosed a newspaper article on his testimony. Also, I have included eight pages of what appear to be questions and answers on the subject; however, whether or not they were intended for President Carter's use I cannot tell as they do not include the name of the individual.

If you wish to order copies of any of the pages mentioned above, the charge is twenty-five cents per page. Please make your check payable to the National Archives Trust Fund.

Please contact us again if we may be of further assistance.

Sincerely,

Jim Herring
Archivist

enclosures

DESCRIPTION FILE 15:16:42 06-29-95
SEEK Strategy: TTL = VESCO

HIT.	LOCATION.....	BOX....	TITLE..... PAGE COUNT
1	4	*	WHITE HOUSE OFFICE OF COUNSEL TO THE PRESIDENT
2		48	Vesco, Robert
3		114	Vesco, Robert
4	4	*	PRESS -- GRANUM
5		94	Vesco Case
6		94	Vesco Files -- Extra Notes
7		94	Vesco Files -- Reporters 1
8		94	Vesco Files -- Reporters 2
9		94	Vesco Files -- Statements & Transcripts
10		94	Vesco Files -- Top Staff 1
11		94	Vesco Files -- Top Staff 2
12	AV	*	AUDIO-VISUAL COLLECTION -- MIMS
13		52	10/23/80, Senate Judiciary Committee on Vesco (T-46527)n

President Testifies on Videotape For Grand Jurors in Vesco Case

3-11 3/3/80 Vesco F.R.E.

By EDWARD POUND
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 1 — President Carter spent more than an hour answering questions on videotape last month for a Federal grand jury investigating allegations that Robert L. Vesco, the fugitive financier, attempted to have his legal problems "fixed" in the Carter Administration.

Sources familiar with the interview said that Mr. Carter offered no major new information about the case when he was questioned at the White House by three Federal prosecutors. His videotaped interview was shown to the grand jury on Feb. 21, the sources said.

They declined to comment on Mr. Carter's testimony other than to say that it was not damaging to anyone in his Administration, including an aide who is under investigation for possible perjury. The President, the sources said, often responded by saying that he could not recall matters about which the Government lawyers were inquiring.

It was the first time that a President had answered grand jury questions on videotape, though Mr. Carter has provided testimony in different forms at least twice before in criminal investigations.

Carter Aide Is Reticent

Lloyd N. Cutler, the White House counsel, declined to confirm that the President had been questioned. But he said: "The President always cooperates with the proper law enforcement investigation. He has and he will cooperate with this investigation."

Government lawyers who questioned Mr. Carter refused to discuss the session. However, they were known to have focused their questioning on a meeting Mr. Carter held in the White House on Feb. 15, 1977, with Richard M. Harden, a special assistant.

The lawyers wanted the President's account of the meeting to determine whether it corroborated or contradicted Mr. Harden's testimony before the grand jury in December 1978. Sources in the Justice Department said last summer that Mr. Harden was under investigation for possible perjury in his account of his conversation with Mr. Carter and an earlier one with W. Spencer Lee 4th, a lawyer from Albany, Ga., who was representing Mr. Vesco's interests and who is a close friend of Mr. Harden.

Mr. Harden reportedly told the grand jury that he talked Mr. Lee out of continuing to represent Mr. Vesco's interests when they met on Feb. 8, 1977. He was also reported to have testified that he briefed Mr. Carter on the Vesco situation a week later and informed him that Mr. Lee was withdrawing from the arrangement.

Some Jurors Dissatisfied

Sources close to the grand jury investigation said that jurors submitted some of the questions that were put to the President by Government lawyers. No jurors were present for the interview and, the sources said, several jurors were dissatisfied with the procedure because it prevented them from asking followup questions. They were also reportedly displeased because they believed the President should have testified in person.

Evidence in the case is being presented to the grand jury by the office of the United States Attorney here. Government lawyers have not indicated whether the investigation will continue after the grand jury's 18-month term expires in early April.

At one point, Ralph E. Ulmer, the grand jury's foreman, tried to resign, charging the Justice Department with directing a "cover-up" to protect the Carter Administration. His charges were denied by Mr. Carter's spokesmen and the Justice Department.

John T. Kotelly, deputy chief of the fraud division in the United States Attorney's office, declined to comment on the investigation.

The investigation began after R. L. Herring, a businessman in Albany, Ga., charged that Mr. Vesco wanted to bribe Carter Administration officials to resolve his legal problems. Mr. Vesco fled the United states nearly a decade ago after he was charged with defrauding stockholders of millions of dollars in an international swindle.

Mr. Herring, who was convicted on unrelated fraud and racketeering charges and is in a Federal prison in Miami, has said that he retained Mr. Lee, the Albany lawyer, to act in Mr. Vesco's behalf.

In a telephone interview yesterday, Mr. Herring said that he was scheduled to take a polygraph, or lie-detector, test on March 6 and that he planned to release the test results to the press.

Ex-Soviet Spy Agrees To Discuss Techniques For Press, F.B.I. Says

By ROBERT PEAR
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 2 — A former Soviet spy who is now working for the United States will be presented to reporters tomorrow by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Government officials said tonight. The officials said that the agent would discuss Soviet intelligence techniques in a news conference at the bureau's headquarters here.

The scheduled appearance follows by just three days an F.B.I. official's disclosure that the United States quietly expelled five diplomats from Soviet bloc countries in the last year for alleged espionage activities. William O. Kriegar, assistant director of the F.B.I. in charge of the intelligence division, made the disclosure in an interview Friday, the day before his retirement.

President Carter praised Mr. Kriegar's integrity Thursday at a gathering of law-enforcement officials in the White House.

The recent publicity about foreign espionage activities in the United States is a departure from the normal Federal practice. The Government rarely publicizes intelligence or counter-intelligence operations. Intelligence experts suggested that the latest disclosures were personally approved and perhaps orchestrated by President Carter.

Carter Anger Reported

A former top-ranking counter-intelligence official said he believed that President Carter had reached a point of disgust and anger with Soviet intelligence operations similar to that of the British when they expelled more than 100 Soviet diplomats in the late 1960's.

"It is the mood of the President to narrow the size of the target," said the official, suggesting that Mr. Carter wanted to focus a spotlight on the suspected Soviet agents.

Other officials said that the news conference tomorrow was a signal of an increase in the espionage war to match the recent chill in diplomatic relations between the United States and the Soviet Union.

It was not immediately possible to gauge the importance of the agent who is to appear tomorrow. An Administration official said that the disclosure "will not blow a major Soviet intelligence network in this country," although the former spy has been a "productive" asset for the United States.

Canadian Shipping Aide Drowns

SORRENTO, Me., March 2 (AP) — Robert A. Cushman, the president of a Canadian shipping concern, drowned when his small boat capsized in the ocean near an island he owned off Maine, the authorities said today. Mr. Cushman, 58 years old, Pointe Claire, Quebec, was the president of Saguenay Shipping Ltd. of Montreal. He died yesterday at Ingall's Island.

A

From -

Press - Granum, Box 94

Folder "Vesco Files -- Reporter [1]"

September 27, 1978

Well, I'm at a bit of a disadvantage in discussing what I may have said to Richard Harden and the thinking behind my note to the Attorney General since, no matter how hard I've tried, I simply don't remember the conversation.

As best my staff has been able to determine, I talked with Richard very briefly for four or five minutes in the early evening of February 15, 1977 -- a few weeks after taking office. The logs indicate that was the last appointment of a long day that began at 6:30 in the morning and included at least 18 meetings with at least 55 persons.

insert A

The Department of Justice has recently said publicly that this overall matter has been the subject of an investigation for the past several months, and I understand that it is ongoing at this time. I will cooperate in any possible way I can with the investigation, as I have with investigations in the past. I think it is inappropriate to speculate or comment on hypotheticals, especially so when an investigation by the Department of Justice is ongoing.

Q: What is the Administration now doing to secure Vesco?

A: As a matter of policy, we are pursuing every possible means to secure the return of Mr. Vesco to the United States to stand trial on the charges he faces. My own policy is clear -- even before Mr. Vesco left Costa Rica in May of this year for the Bahamas, I know of at least 5 different times I personally encouraged efforts to secure the return of Mr. Vesco to the United States to stand trial, & my staff will be happy 2 supply more detail on those times.

From - Press - Graham, Box 94

I have discussed our ~~efforts~~ efforts to secure Vesco's return with the Attorney General and the Secretary of State both before and after the current news stories, but to discuss now specifics of our current efforts would be inappropriate and unwise.

Q: Why did you write such a vague note to the Attorney General, one that does not spell out any connection whatsoever with Vesco, and to be quite honest could be interpreted maliciously as far as your intentions?

A: As I've said, I have no recollection of the brief conversation, so I'm really at a disadvantage in trying to answer that question.

IF PRESSED:

I certainly understand the legitimacy of the questions. But I simply do not remember that brief conversation or writing the note. I think it would be a disservice both to you and to myself to ascribe motives for doing something I don't remember doing.

In any case, I have made my pos. on the note very clear — Have no 5 sec. motive else. — —

insert (B)

Q: Have you talked with Richard Harden since these stories came out?

A: No.

Q: Why did Harden come to the President of the United States instead of Lipshutz, Jordan, or the Attorney General himself?

A: I really couldn't tell -- you'll have to ask him.

Q: Have you been interviewed by the FBI?

A: No.

Q: Will you be?

A: It has always been my very firm belief, and I know it is one shared by Griffin Bell and William Webster, that every citizen has an obligation to provide any information that may be relevant in any investigation. I've given such interviews before, the requests from them have routinely gone through my Legal Counsel's office, and if there is a request in this instance, I assume it will go to my Counsel, and I will certainly cooperate.

Q: Do you know Spencer Lee?

A: I know him as a friend of Hamilton Jordan and as a campaign worker.

B

Q. Do you believe there was a cmapaign by ~~Phor~~ Robert Vesco to influence some of yo[u]r clo[s]sest associates?

~~A. There's certainly the appearance of a cmapaign.~~

~~A. Tant's the~~

~~A. That's among the prurposes of the Justice Department investigation---to dete--~~

A. Determing whether there was such a campaign is among the ~~ap~~ purposes of the Justice Department investigation, which as I've said ~~on~~ has been ongoing for se~~veral~~ ~~m~~ ~~months.~~

Smile

I cert. don't know 1st hand. —what I've ... many ... —affect ... staff ... improper camp. + improper campaign

Lapdogs

A. I certainly don't know firsthand----I only know that I've read.

~~I'm sure that every fuguitive~~ I'm sure that many fugitives would like to affect their fugutive status. But one of the ~~p~~ purposes of the Justice Department investigation, which as I said has been going on for several months, is whethere there was a campaign and if so whether it was improper or illegal.

~~Q Do you mean then that there could could be a "proper" campaign directed towards the Adminisratoin.~~

~~A I suppolse~~

(A)

Q. What does Richard Hardin say he remembers about his conversation with you.

According to my staff, he simply states that he came to let me know that a potential problem - that is Mr. Lee asking Mr. Jordan to meet with someone representing Mr. Visco - ~~to have~~ had not not taken taken place ~~at all~~ because Mr. Lee had realized that this would be inappropriate. Mr. Hardin ~~told my staff~~ ~~stated~~ was his feeling and mine that any further discussions on this subject ~~with~~ should take place with the Justice Dept, not at the White House, and that My note was ~~that~~ to make sure that if Mr. Lee called he would be able to get through.

(B)

Q. Why did your note say "when he calls" rather than "if he calls"?

A. ~~obviously can't to try to why I chose a particular word~~ Normally when you write an informal note to make sure a phone call gets returned you don't word it as carefully as if you were writing a legal document.

UNITED STATES
v.
BURR. [FN1]

FN1 For references to the various cases in this series, which, together, embrace a full report of the entire proceedings against Aaron Burr, see note to Case No. 14,692a.

Circuit Court, D. Virginia.

Sept. 3, 1807.

At law. Trial of Aaron Burr for a misdemeanor, in beginning, setting on foot, and providing the means of, a military expedition against the dominions or territory of the king of Spain.

At the meeting of the court on Wednesday, the 2d of September, 1807, Mr. Hay stated that according to his understanding of the opinion of the court delivered in the trial for treason [Case No. 14,693], the evidence of the transactions on Blennerhassett's Island did not come up to the constitutional crime of levying war; and so it would be improper to press the prosecution against Blennerhassett and Israel Smith. Under these circumstances he should enter a nolle prosequi as to the indictments for treason, and move to commit them, and also Mr. Burr, in order that they should be tried in the place where it should appear that the crime had been committed. He moved that Blennerhassett and Smith might be brought into court; and an order was made accordingly.

Mr. Burr then said that the motions were distinct against the several individuals, and they could not be combined. He insisted on a separate examination as to himself, and required a specification of the time and place when and where the offence was said to have been committed, that he might have an opportunity of meeting the testimony.

A debate of considerable length ensued on this motion.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

1. Where a person, after acquittal on an indictment for treason, is in the custody of the marshal, bound to answer an indictment for a misdemeanor, the court has no authority to send him to another district for trial for treason in the place where the crime was committed.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

2. The laws of the several states cannot be regarded as rules of decision (Judiciary Act, s 34, 1 Stat. 92) in trials for offenses against the United States. Cited in Clark v. Sohier, Case No. 2,835; U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge, Id. 15,867.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

3. The circuit court of the United States, under section 4 of the judiciary act, has power to devise the process for bringing any person before it who has committed an offense of which it has cognizance, without reference to the process given by the state law. Cited in Re Sheazle, Case No. 12,734.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

4. A capias is the proper process to bring an accused in to answer to an indictment for an offense against the laws of the United States.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

5. Where the accused is already in court, an order of the court will supply the place of a capias.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

6. It is sufficient, in an affidavit, for the production of a paper in the possession of the prosecution, to aver that it 'may be material' in the defense.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

7. On a motion to compel the production of a letter written to the president of the United States, and in the hands of the prosecuting attorney, averred to be material to the defense, parts of it cannot be withheld, in the discretion of the prosecuting attorney, on the ground of public interest. The president alone may decide as to the propriety of withholding them, and he cannot delegate his discretion.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

8. On the trial of an indictment for a misdemeanor, in beginning or setting on foot a military expedition against a nation at peace with the United States, containing no allusion to a conspiracy, the declarations of third persons, not forming a part of the transaction, and not made in the presence of the accused, are not admissible in evidence.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

9. In such case the acts of accomplices, except so far as they prove the character or object of the expedition in question, are not admissible in evidence.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

10. The acts of the accused in a different district, which constitute, in themselves, substantive causes for a prosecution, cannot be given in evidence, unless they go directly to prove the charges laid in the indictment.

CRIMINAL LAW--ARREST AND REMOVAL OF ACCUSED--PROCESS--STATE LAWS--PRODUCTION OF PAPERS--LETTERS TO PRESIDENT--AFFIDAVIT--MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST NATION AT PEACE--EVIDENCE--ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS--ACTS IN OTHER DISTRICTS.

11. Any legal testimony which shows the expedition in question to be military, or to have been designed against the dominions of the nation, as charged, is admissible.

187 MARSHALL, Chief Justice.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice, finally remarked that as Col. Burr was now in custody of the marshal, and bound to answer an indictment for a misdemeanor, the court had no authority to send him to another district.

Mr. Hay said that all three were in the same situation, and the same difficulty applied to all. He regretted that the difficulty had not been adverted to at an earlier period, which would have saved much trouble; that he did not wish to disturb the opinion of the court, but would proceed with the trial of Col. Burr for a misdemeanor. He requested the clerk to read the indictment in the usual way, that they might proceed without issuing process to take the accused into custody, as he was in court.

The clerk was about to proceed, when Mr. Burr interrupted him, and said that he ought not to be arraigned, but to be permitted to plead by attorney. He said he was in court, not on that indictment, but because he had not moved to be discharged since his acquittal on the first indictment for treason. In this case he wished certain land-marks to be set up, in order to direct in future cases.

A protracted debate ensued, occupying the remainder of the day, in which Mr. Botts made a very long speech, and several of the counsel, on both sides, made shorter ones; all about the question whether a capias or a summons was the proper process to bring Col. Burr before the court, he being all the time in court, and participating in the debate.

[FN2]MARSHALL, Chief Justice, said, that if 188 a capias should be determined to be the proper process, he should consider the situation of the party, and direct that he should not be discharged till the cause was finally decided. If a capias should be considered not to be the proper process, a venire facias must be awarded. There was another consideration: If a venire facias issued, it would involve the right to a continuance of the cause till another term. He would consider that with the principal question.

FN2 From 2 Robertson's Report of the Trial of Aaron Burr, 481.

THE COURT.

THE COURT took time to consider; and adjourned till to-morrow.

Thursday, September 3, 1807.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice.

The question now before the court is whether bail be demandable from a person actually in custody, against whom an indictment for a misdemeanor has been found by a grand jury. As conducting directly to a decision of this point, the question has been discussel whether a summons or a capias would be the proper process to bring the accused in to answer the indictment, if, in point of fact, he were not before the court. It seems to be the established practice of Virginia in such cases to issue a summons in the first instance; and if by any act of congress the laws of the several states be adopted as the rules by which the courts of the United States are to be governed in criminal prosecutions, the question is at an end; for I should admit the settled practice of the state courts as the sound construction of the state law under which that practice has prevailed. The 34th section of the judicial act, it is contended, has made this adoption. The words of that section are 'that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply.'

It might certainly be well doubted whether this section (if it should be construed to extend to all the proceedings in a case where a reference can be made to the state laws for a rule of decision at the trial) can comprehend a case where, at the trial in chief, no such reference can be made. Now in criminal cases the laws of the United States constitute the sole rule of decision; and no man can be condemned or prosecuted in the federal courts on a state law. The laws of the several states therefore cannot be regarded as rules of decision in trials for offences against the United States. It would seem to me too that the technical term, 'trials at common law,' used in the section, is not correctly applicable to prosecutions for crimes. I have always conceived them to be, in this section, applied to civil suits, as contradistinguished from criminal prosecutions, as well as to suits at common law as contradistinguished from those which come before the court sitting as a court of equity or admiralty. The provision of this section would seem to be inapplicable to original process, for another reason. The case is otherwise provided for by an act of congress. The 14th section of the judicial act empowers the courts of the United States 'to issue all writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law.' This section seems to me to give this court power to devise the process for bringing any person before it who has committed an offence of which it has cognisance, and not to refer it to the state law for that process. The limitation on this power is, that the process shall be agreeable to the principles and usages of law. By which I understand those general principles and those general usages which are to be found not in the legislative acts of any particular state, but in that generally recognised and long established law, which forms the substratum of the laws of every state.

Upon general principles of law it would seem to me that in all cases where the judgment is to affect the person, the person ought to be held subject to that judgment. Thus in civil actions, where the body may be taken in execution to satisfy the judgment, bail may be demanded. If the right of the plaintiff be supported by very strong probability, as in debt upon a specialty, bail is demandable without the intervention of a judge. If there be no such clear evidence of the debt, bail is often required upon the affidavit of the party. Now, reasoning by analogy from civil suits to criminal prosecutions, it would seem not unreasonable, where there is such evidence as an indictment found by a grand jury, to use such process as will hold the person of the accused within the power of the court, or furnish security that the person will be brought forward to satisfy the judgment of the court. Yet the course of the common law appears originally to have been otherwise. It appears from Hawkins that the practice of the English courts was is issue a venire facias in the first instance, on an indictment for a misdemeanor. This practice however is stated by Blackstone to have been changed. He says (volume 4, p. 319), 'And so in the case of misdemeanors, it is now the usual practice for any judge of the court of king's bench, upon certificate of an indictment found, to award a writ of capias immediately, in order to bring in the defendant.'

It is then the English construction of the common law, that although in the inferior courts the venire facias might be the usual course, and although it had prevailed, yet that a judge of the king's bench might issue a capias in the first instance. This subject has always appeared to me to be in a great measure governed by the 33d section of the judicial act. That section provides, that for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in that 189 state where he is found, be arrested and imprisoned or bailed as the case may be. This act contemplates an arrest, not a summons; and this arrest is to be, not solely for offences for which the state laws authorize an arrest, but 'for any crime or offence against the United States.' I do not understand the reference to the state law respecting the mode of process as overruling the preceding general words, and limiting the power of arrest to cases in which according to the state laws a person might be arrested, but simply as prescribing the mode to be pursued. Wherever, by the laws of the United States, an offender is to be arrested, the process of arrest employed in the state shall be pursued; but an arrest is positively enjoined for any offence against the United States. This construction is confirmed by the succeeding words: the offender shall be imprisoned or bailed as the case may be. There exists no power to direct the offender, or to bind him without bail, to appear before the court; which would certainly have been allowed had the act contemplated a proceeding in such a case which should leave the person at large without security. But he is absolutely to be imprisoned or bailed as the case may be.

In a subsequent part of the same section it is enacted 'that upon all arrests in criminal cases bail shall be admitted, except where the punishment may be death.' There is no provision for leaving the person at large without bail; and I have over construed this section to impose it as a duty on the magistrate who proceeds against any offender against the United States to commit or bail him. I perceive in the law no other course to be pursued. This section, it is true, does not respect the process upon an indictment. But the law would be inconsistent with itself if it required a magistrate to arrest for any offence against the United States, if it commanded him on every arrest to commit or to bail, and yet refused a capias and permitted the same offender to go at large, as soon as an indictment was found against him. This section therefore appears to me to be entitled to great influence in determining the court on the mode of exercising the power given by the 14th section in relation to process. On the impeachment which has been mentioned, this point was particularly committed to Mr. Lee, and the law upon it was fully demonstrated by him. The only difficulty I ever felt on this question was produced by the former decision of Judge Iredell. If the state practice on this subject had been adopted I should have held myself bound by that adoption. But I do not consider the state practice as adopted. Mundell's Case [Case No. 15,834] was a civil suit; and the decision was that the state rule respecting bail in civil actions must prevail. Sinclair's Case [unreported] was indeed a case similar to this; and in Sinclair's Case a venire facias was issued. But I am informed by the clerk that this was his act, at the instance of the attorney, not the act of the court. The point was not brought before the court.

In U. S. v. Callender [Case No. 14,709] a capias, or what is the same thing, a bench warrant was issued. This was the act of the court; but, not having been an act on argument, or with a view of the whole law of the case and of former decisions, I should not have considered it as overruling those decisions if such existed. But there has been no decision expressly adopting the state practice; and the decision in Callender's Case [supra] appears to me to be correct. I think the capias the more proper process. It is conformable to the practice of England at the time of our Revolution, and is, I think, in conformity with the spirit of the 33d section of the judicial act. I shall therefore adopt it. To issue the capias to take into custody a person actually in custody would be an idle ceremony. In such a case the order of the court very properly supplies the place of a capias. The only difference between proceeding by capias and by order, which I can perceive, would be produced by making the writ returnable to the next term. [FN3]

FN3 From 2 Robertson's Report of the Trial of Aaron Burr, 481.

Mr. Hay then said he would proceed to the trial of the indictment for a misdemeanor.

Mr. Burr then referred to the letter which had been demanded of the president, which had often been promised but not yet produced. He wished to know whether that letter was in court.

Mr. Hay said he did not know whether the original letter was among his papers or not. He had searched for it, but had not been able to find it. He had a copy, which was ready to be produced.

Mr. Burr said the president had promised that the letter should be produced, and it was strange that it was not here. He was not disposed to admit a copy.

After some further remarks by counsel, the CHIEF JUSTICE said, unless the loss of the original be proved, a copy cannot be admitted.

Mr. Burr then called the attention of the court to the subject of bail, (made necessary by the decision that a capias was the proper process to bring him before the court.)

After some discussion, the CHIEF JUSTICE fixed the amount of the bail at five thousand dollars.

The counsel for the prosecution here took the alarm, that taking bail might entangle the motion intended subsequently to be made to commit for treason in another state. A debate on this subject of considerable length ensued, in the course of which the CHIEF JUSTICE remarked that those who prosecuted had the choice of making the motion to commit for a greater crime by discontinuing the prosecution for a misdemeanor, or of persevering in the latter.

At the close of this discussion, resulting in 190 nothing, Mr. Burr observed that he had discovered that a letter written by General Wilkinson on the 12th of November, 1806, to the president of the United States, was material to his defence.

Mr. Hay said he had that letter, and would produce it. But there were some matters in the letters of General Wilkinson which ought not to be made public. It would be extremely improper to submit the whole of his letters to public inspection. He was willing to put them in the hands of the clerk confidentially, and he could copy all those parts which had relation to the cause.

The counsel for Colonel Burr were not satisfied with this proposal. They demanded the whole letters.

Mr. Hay said he was willing that Mr. Botts, Mr. Wickham, and Mr. Randolph should examine them. He would depend on their candor and integrity to make no improper disclosures; and if there should was particularly committed to Mr. Lee, and the law upon it was fully demonstrated by him. The only difficulty I ever felt on this question was produced by the former decision of Judge Iredell. If the state practice on this subject had been adopted I should have held myself bound by that adoption. But I do not consider the state practice as adopted. Mundell's Case [Case No. 15,834] was a civil suit; and the decision was that the state rule respecting bail in civil actions must prevail. Sinclair's Case [unreported] was indeed a case similar to this; and in Sinclair's Case a venire facias was issued. But I am informed by the clerk that this was his act, at the instance of the attorney, not the act of the court. The point was not brought before the court.

In U. S. v. Callender [Case No. 14,709] a capias, or what is the same thing, a bench warrant was issued. This was the act of the court; but, not having been an act on argument, or with a view of the whole law of the case and of former decisions, I should not have considered it as overruling those decisions if such existed. But there has been no decision expressly adopting the state practice; and the decision in Callender's Case [supra] appears to me to be correct. I think the capias the more proper process. It is conformable to the practice of England at the time of our Revolution, and is, I think, in conformity with the spirit of the 33d section of the judicial act. I shall therefore adopt it. To issue the capias to take into custody a person actually in custody would be an idle ceremony. In such a case the order of the court very properly supplies the place of a capias. The only difference between proceeding by capias and by order, which I can perceive, would be produced by making the writ returnable to the next term. [FN3]

FN3 From 2 Robertson's Report of the Trial of Aaron Burr, 481.

Mr. Hay then said he would proceed to the trial of the indictment for a misdemeanor.

Mr. Burr then referred to the letter which had been demanded of the president, which had often been promised but not yet produced. He wished to know whether that letter was in court.

Mr. Hay said he did not know whether the original letter was among his papers or not. He had searched for it, but had not been able to find it. He had a copy, which was ready to be produced.

Mr. Burr said the president had promised that the letter should be produced, and it was strange that it was not here. He was not disposed to admit a copy.

After some further remarks by counsel, the CHIEF JUSTICE said, unless the loss of the original be proved, a copy cannot be admitted.

Mr. Burr then called the attention of the court to the subject of bail, (made necessary by the decision that a capias was the proper process to bring him before the court.)

After some discussion, the CHIEF JUSTICE fixed the amount of the bail at five thousand dollars.

The counsel for the prosecution here took the alarm, that taking bail might entangle the motion intended subsequently to be made to commit for treason in another state. A debate on this subject of considerable length ensued, in the course of which the CHIEF JUSTICE remarked that those who prosecuted had the choice of making the motion to commit for a greater crime by discontinuing the prosecution for a misdemeanor, or of persevering in the latter.

At the close of this discussion, resulting in 190 nothing, Mr. Burr observed that he had discovered that a letter written by General Wilkinson on the 12th of November, 1806, to the president of the United States, was material to his defence.

Mr. Hay said he had that letter, and would produce it. But there were some matters in the letters of General Wilkinson which ought not to be made public. It would be extremely improper to submit the whole of his letters to public inspection. He was willing to put them in the hands of the clerk confidentially, and he could copy all those parts which had relation to the cause.

The counsel for Colonel Burr were not satisfied with this proposal. They demanded the whole letters.

Mr. Hay said he was willing that Mr. Botts, Mr. Wickham, and Mr. Randolph should examine them. He would depend on their candor and integrity to make no improper disclosures; and if there should be any difference of opinion as to what were confidential passages, the court should decide.

Mr. Martin objected to this as a secret tribunal. The counsel had a right to hear the letters publicly, without their consent.

Mr. Burr's counsel united in refusing to inspect anything that was not also submitted to the inspection of their client.

The CHIEF JUSTICE saw no real difficulty in the case. If there were any parts of the letters confidential, then a public examination would be very wrong; otherwise they ought to be read.

Mr. Hay said the president wrote to him when he understood the process had been awarded, that he had reserved to himself the province of deciding what parts of the letters ought to be published and what parts required to be kept secret; that they wished everything to be as public as possible except those parts which were really confidential. The discussion continued till the court adjourned.

Friday, September 4, 1807.

Colonel Burr renewed his application for the production of the two letters from General Wilkinson to the president of the United States, for one of which a subpoena duces tecum had been awarded. He said that the president was in contempt, and he had a right to demand process of contempt against him; but as it would be unpleasant to resort to such process, and it would produce delay, he hoped the letters would be produced. It might, perhaps, suffice to produce a copy, if duly authenticated, of that of October 21st, which was said to be lost or mislaid. As to the letter of the 12th of November, he had reason to believe that the whole letter had been shown to others to injure him, and as the whole letter had been used against him, the whole ought to be produced.

Mr. Hay said he did not know what was meant by the expression of such a belief or suspicion.

Mr. Burr said he would be more explicit; and asked whether this letter had not been used against him before the grand jury.

Mr. Hay said he could not be certain whether it was produced before the grand jury or not. He was not as well acquainted with what passed before the grand jury as some other gentlemen were.

A long and excited debate ensued, in which Mr. Burr's counsel insisted on the production of the whole letter, and Mr. Hay insisted on withholding certain passages. He said there were two passages in the letter which he could not submit to public inspection; and he did not know that they could be extorted from him under any circumstances. Finally, the counsel of Colonel Burr applied for a subpoena duces tecum to Mr. Hay, which was awarded. To this Mr. Hay made a return, tendering a copy of the letter of 12th November, 1806, 'excepting such parts thereof as are, in my opinion, not material for the purposes of justice, for the defence of the accused, or pertinent to the issue now about to be joined; the parts excepted being communicated to the president, and he having devolved on me the exercise of that discretion which constitutionally belongs to himself. The accuracy of this opinion I am willing to refer to the judgment of the court, by submitting the original letter to its inspection. I further certify, in order to show more clearly the irrelevancy of the parts excepted to any defence which can be set up in the present case, that these parts contain a communication of the opinion of the writer concerning certain persons, about which opinion, or the fact of his having communicated it, the writer, if a witness before the court, could not legally, as I conceive, be interrogated; and about which no evidence could legally be received from other persons.'

The CHIEF JUSTICE asked if there were any objections to this return.

Mr. Burr said he could not be satisfied with a copy of part of the letter.

Mr. Botts said it would be a matter of the deepest regret if an attachment should go against Mr. Hay, and nothing would give him greater pain than to be under the necessity of making such a motion. To avoid this, there was another alternative, but which was, also, extremely disagreeable, as it would produce delay, viz: To move that the cause should be continued until the letter should be produced. He made that motion, and supported it by a speech of considerable length.

Other counsel followed, in a protracted debate on the motion. When the discussion ended the CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the following opinion:

MARSHALL, Chief Justice. [FN4]It is not without regret that I find myself constrained to deliver an opinion on the present application. To overrule the motion may, at least, have the appearance of imposing a hardship 191 on the prinsoner, and to grant it may occasion delay in a case which all must desire to terminate. It is with regret that I decide a question under such circumstances, because it is probable that those parts of the letter which are withheld, are of much less importance than gentlemen suppose; and that the effect of their production would be to dissipate suspicions which are now entertained, and to show that the subject of the controversy is by no means proportioned to the zeal with which it has been maintained. Upon an affidavit made by the accused, a subpoena duces tecum has been awarded to the president of the United States, requiring the production of this letter. In consequence of this process the letter was transmitted to the attorney for the United States, accompanied with a communication from the president, authorizing the attorney to exercise his discretion in the case. In the exercise of this discretion, he has selected certain parts of the letter which he has determined to withhold, because he believes them to be confidential, and therefore such as ought not to be exhibited in public. If this might be likened to a civil case, the law is express on the subject. It is that either party may require the other to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue. In this respect the courts of law are invested with the power of a court of chancery, and if the order be disobeyed by the plaintiff, judgment as in the case of a nonsuit may be entered against him.

FN4 From 2 Robertson's Report of the Trial of Aaron Burr, 533.

Now, if a paper be in possession of the opposite party, what statement of its contents or applicability can be expected from the person who claims its production, he not precisely knowing its contents? If the opposite party be required to produce his books on a particular subject, it is not necessary that the entries on those books should be stated in order to entitle the applicant to his motion. He cannot be expected to make such a statement. It has always been deemed sufficient to describe the paper required, to express its general purport, and to state its materiality to the case in some degree, even when its contents are known. When a paper is in possession of one party, it is completely in his power, and is required by the other, very strong reasons must be given to justify its being withheld, if it have any relation to the case. Before a court would make a decisive order in such a case it certainly ought to receive reasonable satisfaction of the probable materiality of the evidence asked for and refused, and of its relation to the pending controversy; but the information to be required must depend on the nature of the case.

Criminal cases, it is true, are not provided for; but courts will always apply the rules of evidence to criminal prosecutions so as to treat the defence with as much liberality and tenderness as the case will admit. The prosecutor is the representative of the government, and the government acts as a party through the agency of the attorney, who directs and manages the prosecution on behalf of government. If there be a paper in the possession of the executive, which is not of an official nature, he must stand, as respects that paper, in nearly the same situation with any other individual who possesses a paper which might be required for the defence. If the executive possess a paper which is really believed by the accused to be material to his defence, ought it to be withheld? The question will recur, is it really material to his defence? The only evidence that can be received on this point is from the party himself, and he has made his affidavit to its materiality. But that is said to be insufficient; and why? Because the averment is, that the letter 'may be material' in the defence. Until the course of the prosecution shall be fully developed, it may not be in the power of the accused to make a more positive averment. The importance of the letter to the defence, may depend on the testimony adduced by the prosecutor. But there were two indictments: the one for treason and the other for a misdemeanor, and the allegation of materiality made in the affidavit may, it is said, refer to either indictment. But the prosecution for treason is terminated, and was terminated before the affidavit was made. Consequently it can relate only to the indictment for a misdemeanor. It is objected that the particular passages of the letter which are required are not pointed out. But how can this be done while the letter itself is withheld? Or how can their applicability be shown without requiring the accused prematurely to disclose his defence?

Let it be supposed that the letter may not contain anything respecting the person now before the court. Still it may respect a witness material in the case, and become important by bearing on his testimony. Different representations may have been made by that witness, or his conduct may have been such as to affect his testimony. In various modes a paper may bear upon the case, although before the case be opened its particular application cannot be perceived by the judge. That the president of the United States may be subpoenaed, and examined as a witness, and required to produce any paper in his possession, is not controverted. I cannot, however, on this point, go the whole length for which counsel have contended. The president, although subject to the general rules which apply to others, may have sufficient motives for declining to produce a particular paper, and those motives may be such as to restrain the court from enforcing its production. I do not think precisely with the gentlemen on either side. I can readily conceive that the president might receive a letter which it would be improper to exhibit *192 in public, because of the manifest inconvenience of its exposure. The occasion for demanding it ought, in such a case, to be very strong, and to be fully shown to the court before its production could be insisted on. I admit, that in such a case, much reliance must be placed on the declaration of the president; and I do think that a privilege does exist to withhold private letters of a certain description. The reason is this: Letters to the president in his private character, are often written to him in consequence of his public character, and may relate to public concerns. Such a letter, though it be a private one, seems to partake of the character of an official paper, and to be such as ought not on light ground to be forced into public view.

Yet it is a very serious thing, if such letter should contain any information material to the defence, to withhold from the accused the power of making use of it. It is a very serious thing to proceed to trial under such circumstances. I cannot precisely lay down any general rule for such a case. Perhaps the court ought to consider the reasons which would induce the president to refuse to exhibit such a letter as conclusive on it, unless such letter could be shown to be absolutely necessary in the defence. The president may himself state the particular reasons which may have induced him to withhold a paper, and the court would unquestionably allow their full force to those reasons. At the same time, the court could not refuse to pay proper attention to the affidavit of the accused. But on objections being made by the president to the production of a paper, the court would not proceed further in the case without such an affidavit as would clearly shew the paper to be essential to the justice of the case. On the present occasion the court would willingly hear further testimony on the materiality of the paper required, but that is not offered.

In no case of this kind would a court be required to proceed against the president as against an ordinary individual. The objections to such a course are so strong and so obvious, that all must acknowledge them. But to induce the court to take any definite and decisive step with respect to the prosecution, founded on the refusal of the president to exhibit a paper, for reasons stated by himself, the materiality of that paper ought to be shown. In this case, however, the president has assigned no reason whatever for withholding the paper called for. The propriety of withholding it must be decided by himself, not by another for him. Of the weight of the reasons for and against producing it, he is himself the judge. It is their operation on his mind, not on the mind of others, which must be respected by the court. They must therefore be approved by himself, and not be the mere suggestions of another for him. It does not even appear to the court that the president does object to the production of any part of this letter. The objection, and the reasons in support of the objection, proceed from the attorney himself, and are not understood to emanate from the president. He submits it to the discretion of the attorney. Of course, it is to be understood that he has no objections to the production of the whole, if the attorney has not. Had the president, when he transmitted it, subjected it to certain restrictions, and stated that in his judgment the public interest required certain parts of it to be kept secret, and had accordingly made a reservation of them, all proper respect would have been paid to it; but he has made no such reservation. As to the use to be made of the letter, it is impossible that either the court or the attorney can know in what manner it is intended to be used. The declarations therefore made upon that subject can have no weight. Neither can any argument on its materiality or immateriality drawn from the supposed contents of the parts in question. The only ground laid for the court to act upon is the affidavit of the accused; and from that the court is induced to order that the paper be produced, or the cause be continued. In regard to the secrecy of these parts which it is stated are improper to give out to the world, the court will take any order that may be necessary. I do not think that the accused ought to be prohibited from seeing the letter; but, if it should be thought proper, I will order that no copy of it be taken for public exhibition, and that no use shall be made of it but what is necessarily attached to the case. After the accused has seen it, it will yet be a question whether it shall go to the jury or not. That question cannot be decided now, because the court cannot say whether those particular passages are of the nature which are specified. All that the court can do is to order that no copy shall be taken; and if it is necessary to debate it in public, those who take notes may be directed not to insert any part of the arguments on that subject. I believe, myself, that a great deal of the suspicion which has been excited will be diminished by the exhibition of this paper. [FN5]

FN5 From 2 Robertson's Report of the Trial of Aaron Burr, 533.

Mr. Hay said he would consult Gen. Wilkinson, and if he consented, he would produce the letter under the restrictions suggested by the court--preferring that to a continuance of the cause.

On Saturday, the 5th of September, Mr. Hay stated to the court that he would immediately send an express to Monticello (where the president then was) for instructions in relation to producing the letter, and that he would probably get a return by Tuesday evening.

On Wednesday, the 9th of September, a 193 jury was empanneled and sworn, just one week having been consumed in the preliminary proceedings hereinbefore briefly noticed.

On the same day, Mr. Hay presented a certificate from the president, annexed to a copy of Gen. Wilkinson's letter, excepting such parts as he deemed he ought not to permit to be made public.

The clerk read the indictment, consisting of seven counts, all charging the defendant in slightly variant forms, with beginning, setting on foot, or providing the means of a military expedition against the dominions or territory of the king of Spain.

In all the counts the offence was charged to have been committed at Blennerhassett's Island, in the county of Wood, and district of Virginia.

The trial then proceeded, and in the course of it the counsel for the prosecution offered in evidence declarations of Blennerhassett tending to implicate Colonel Burr, and endeavored to support it by alleging: 1st, a conspiracy between these two and others; and that the declarations of one conspirator were evidence against the others; or, 2d, that they were accomplices. They also offered in evidence acts of the nature laid in the indictment, committed by the defendant in Ohio and Kentucky, all of which was objected to.

The argument on the admissibility of the testimony lasted several days, at the close of which

[FN6]MARSHALL, Chief Justice, delivered the following opinion:

FN6 From 3 Carpenter's Report of Burr's Trial, 93.

The present motion is particularly directed against the admission of the testimony of Neale, who is offered for the purpose of proving certain conversations between himself and Herman Blannerhasset. It is objected that the declarations of Herman Blannerhasset are at this time inadmissible on this indictment. The rule of evidence which rejects mere hearsay testimony, which excludes from trials of a criminal or civil nature the declarations of any other individual than of him against whom the proceedings are instituted, has been generally deemed all essential to the correct administration of justice. I know not why a declaration in court should be unavailing, unless made upon oath, if a declaration out of court was to criminate others than him who made it; nor why a man should have a constitutional claim to be confronted with the witnesses against him, if mere verbal declarations, made in his absence, may be evidence against him. I know of no principle in the preservation of which all are more concerned. I know none, by undermining which, life, liberty and property, might be more endangered. It is therefore incumbent on courts to be watchful of every inroad on a principle so truly important. This rule as a general rule is permitted to stand, but some exceptions to it have been introduced, concerning the extent of which a difference of opinion prevails, and that difference produces the present question.

The first exception is, that in cases of conspiracy, the acts, and it is said by some, the declarations of all the conspirators, may be given in evidence on the trial of any one of them, for the purpose of proving the conspiracy, and this case it is alleged, comes within the exception. With regard to this exception, a distinction is taken in the books between the admissibility and operation of testimony, which is clear in point of law, but not at all times easy to practice in fact. It is, that although this testimony be admitted, it is not to operate against the accused, unless brought home to him by testimony drawn from his own declarations or his own conduct. But the question to be considered is, does the exception comprehend this case? Is this a case of conspiracy according to the well-established law meaning of the term? Cases of conspiracy may be of two descriptions. 1st. Where the conspiracy is the crime, in which case the crime is complete although the act should never be performed, and in such cases if several be indicted, and all except one be acquitted, that one cannot, say the books, be convicted, because he cannot conspire alone. 2d. Where the crime consists in the intention, and is proved by a conspiracy, so that the conviction of the accused may take place upon evidence, that he has conspired to do an act which manifests the wicked intention. In both these cases an act is not essential to the completion of the crime, and a conspiracy is charged in the indictment as the ground of accusation. If the conspiracy be the sole charge, as it may be, the question to be decided, is, not whether the accused has committed any particular fact, but whether he has conspired to commit it. Evidence of conspiracy in such a case goes directly to support the issue. It has therefore been determined that the nature of the conspiracy may be proved by the transactions of any of the conspirators in furtherance of the common design; the degree of guilt, however, of the particular conspirator upon trial, must still depend on his own particular conduct.

In the case at bar, the crime consists not in intention but in acts. The act of congress does not extend to the secret design, if not carried into open deed, nor to any conspiracy, however, extensive, if it do not amount to a beginning or setting on foot a military expedition. The indictment contains no allusion to a conspiracy, and of consequence the issue to be tried by the jury is not whether the conspiracy has taken place, but whether the particular facts charged in the indictment have been committed. I do not mean to admit, that by any course which might 194 have been given to the prosecution, that could have been converted into a case of conspiracy; but most assuredly if it was intended to prove a conspiracy, and to let in that kind of testimony which is admissible only in such a case, the indictment ought to have charged it. I have not been able to find in the books a single decision, or a solitary dictum which would countenance the attempt that is now made to introduce as testimony the declarations of third persons, made in the absence of the person on trial, under the idea of a conspiracy, where no conspiracy is alleged in the indictment. The researches of the counsel for the prosecution have not been more successful. But they suppose this case, though not within the letter, to come clearly within the reasoning of those cases where this testimony has been allowed. It has been said, that wherever the crime may be committed by a single individual, although in point of fact more than one should be concerned in it, as in all cases of felony, the prosecution must be conducted in the usual mode, and the declarations of third persons cannot be introduced at a trial; but whenever the crime requires more than one person, where from its nature it cannot be committed by a single individual, although it shall consist, not in conspiracy, but in open deed, yet it is in the nature of a conspiracy, and evidence of the declarations and acts of third persons connected with the accused may be received whether the indictment covers such testimony or not. I must confess that I do not feel the force of this distinction. I cannot conceive why, when numbers do in truth conspire to commit an act, as murder or robbery, the rule should be, that the declaration of one of them is no evidence against another, and yet, if the act should require more than one for its commission, that the declarations of one person engaged in the plot would immediately become evidence against another. I cannot perceive the reason of this distinction; but, admitting its solidity, I know not on what ground to dispense with charging in the indictment the combination intended to be proved. If this combination may be proved by the acts or declarations of third persons made in the absence of the accused, because he is connected with those persons; if in consequence of this connection the ordinary rules of evidence are to be prostrated, it would seem to me that the indictment ought to give some notice of this connection. When the terms used in the indictment necessarily imply a combination, it will be admitted that a combination is charged and may be proved. And where A., B., and C. are indicted for murdering D., yet in such a case the declarations of one of the parties made in the absence of the others have never been admitted as evidence against the others. If then this indictment should even imply that the fact charged was committed by more than one person, I cannot conceive that the declarations of a particeps criminis would become admissible on the trial of a person not present when they were made, unless those declarations form a part of the very transaction charged in the indictment.

If in all this I should be mistaken, yet it remains to be proved that the offence charged may not be committed by a single individual. This may, in some measure depend on the exposition of the terms of the act; and it is to be observed that this exposition must be fixed. It cannot vary with the varying aspect of the prosecution at its different stages. If, as has been said, a military expedition is begun or set on foot when a single soldier is enlisted for the purpose, then unless it be begun as well by the soldier who enlists, as by the officer who enlists him, a military expedition may be begun by a single individual. So if those who engage in the enterprize follow their leader from their confidence in him, without any knowledge of the real object, there is no conspiracy, and the criminal act is the act of an individual. So, too, if the means are any means, the crime may unquestionably be committed by any individual. Should the term be even so construed as to imply that all the means must be provided before the offence can be committed, still all the means may, in many cases, be provided by a single individual. The rule then laid down by the counsel for the prosecution, if correct in itself, would not comprehend this case.

Secondly, there are also cases in the books where acts are in their nature joint, and where the law attaches the guilt to all concerned in their commission, so that the act of one is in truth the act of others, where the conduct of one person in the commission of the fact constitutes the crime of another person; but this is distinct from conspiracy. If many persons combine to commit a murder, and all assist in it, and are actually or constructively present, the act of one is the act of all, and is sufficient for the conviction of all. So in acts of levying war, as in the Cases of Damane and Purchase, the acts of the mob were the acts of all in the mob whose conduct showed a concurrence in those acts, and in the general design, which the mob were carrying into execution. But these decisions turn on a distinct principle from conspiracy. The crime is a joint crime, and all those who are present aiding in the commission of it participate in each other's actions, and in the guilt attached to those actions. The conduct of each contributes to shew the nature of this joint crime; and declarations made during the transaction are explanatory of that transaction; but I cannot conceive that in either case declarations unconnected with the transaction would have been evidence against any other than the person who made them, or persons in whose presence they were made. If, for example, one of several men who had united in committing 195 a murder should have said, that he with others contemplated the fact which was afterwards committed, I know of no case which would warrant the admission of this testimony upon the trial of a person who was not present when the words were spoken. So if Damane had previously declared that he had entered into a confederacy for the purpose of pulling down all meeting houses, I cannot believe that this testimony would have been admissible against a person having no knowledge of the declaration and giving no assent to it. In felony the guilt of the principal attaches to the accessory, and therefore the guilt of the principal is proved on the trial of the accessory. In treason, all are principals, and the guilt of him who has actually committed the treason does, in England, attach to him who has advised, aided or assisted that treason. Consequently the conduct of the person who has perpetrated the fact must be examined on the trial of him who has advised or procured it. But in misdemeanors by statute, where the commission of a particular fact constitutes the only crime punished by the law, I believe there is no case where the declaration of a particeps criminis can affect any but himself.

Thirdly. The admission of the declarations of Mr.

Blannerhasset may be insisted upon under the idea he was the agent of Col. B. How far the acts of one man may affect another criminally, is a subject for distinct consideration, but I believe there is no case where the words of an agent can be evidence against his principal on a criminal prosecution. Could such testimony be admissible, the agency must be first clearly established, not by the words of the agent, but by the acts of the principal, and the word must be within the power previously shown to have been given.

The opinions of the circuit court of New York in trials of Smith and Ogden have been frequently mentioned. [Case No. 16,342.] Although I have not the honor to know the judge who gave those decisions, I consider them as the determination of a court of the United States, and I shall not be lightly induced to disregard them, or unnecessarily to treat them with disrespect. I do not, however, in the opinions of Judge Talmadge, perceive any expression indicating that the declarations of third persons could be received as testimony against any individual who was prosecuted under this act. If he has given that opinion, it has certainly escaped my notice, and has not been suggested to me by counsel. He unquestionably says in page 113 of the trial 'that the reference which was made to the doctrine of conspiracy did not apply in that case.' The reference alluded to was the observation of Mr. Emmet, who had said 'that, if the object was to charge Col. Smith with the acts of Capt. Lewis, they ought to have laid the indictment for a conspiracy.' The opinion of the judge that the doctrine of conspiracy had no application to the case, appears to me to be perfectly correct.

I feel, therefore, no difficulty in deciding, that the testimony of Mr. Neale, unless he can go further than merely stating the declarations made to him by Blannerhasset, is at present inadmissible. But the argument has taken a much wider range. The points made, comprehend the exclusion of their testimony suggested by the attorney for the United States, and the opinion of the court upon the operation of testimony. As these subjects are entirely distinct, and as the object of the motion is the exclusion of testimony supposed to be illegal, I shall confine my observations to that part of the argument which respects the admissibility of evidence of the description of that proposed by the attorney for the United States. The indictment charges the accused in separate counts with beginning, with setting on foot, with preparing, and with providing the means for a military expedition to be carried on against a nation at peace with the United States. Any legal testimony which applies to any one of these counts is relevant. That which applies to none of them must be irrelevant. The expedition, the character and object of that expedition, that the defendant began it, that he set it on foot, that he provided and prepared the means for carrying it on, are all charged in the indictment, and consequently these charges may be all supported by any legal testimony. But that a military expedition was begun and set on foot by others, or that the means were prepared or provided by others, is not charged in this indictment, is not a crime which is or can be alleged against the defendant, and testimony to that effect is therefore not relevant. All testimony which serves to show the expedition to have been military in its character, as, for instance, testimony respecting their arms and provisions, no matter by whom purchased, their conduct, no matter by whom directed, or who was present, all legal testimony which serves to show the object of the expedition, as would be either actually marching against Mexico, any public declarations made among themselves stating Mexico as their object, any manifesto to this effect, any agreement entered into by them for such an expedition, these or similar acts would be received to show the object of the expedition.

In trials of Smith and Ogden they were received. Whether the particular acts of the accused on which his guilt or innocence depends, must precede this species of testimony or may be preceded by it, is a question which merely respects the order of evidence. There can be no doubt but that at some stage of the prosecution, either before or after the particular part performed by the accused has been shown, the character and object of the expedition may be shown, and that by any legal testimony calculated to develope that character and object. Whether this testimony is admissible before the proof which particularly applies to the part performed by the accused, or ought to be introduced by first proving that 196 part, is a question which is not made in this case, and which was not made in the case of Smith and Ogden. In that case it was certainly entirely unimportant, and it is probably not less so in this. It has been also contended that the acts no more than the declarations of third persons can be given in evidence on this indictment. It has been already said that those acts of equipment which go to show the character of the expedition may be given in evidence. If, for example, Blannerhasset, Tyler, Smith, or any other persons, provided arms, ammunition or provisions which were applied to the armament, this would be evidence, because it would show the character of the expedition. This was done in the case of Smith and Ogden, without enquiring who provided the arms, for they belonged to the expedition. Captain Lewis, for instance, purchased several military equipments. It was not deemed necessary to show that Smith was connected with Lewis, for these purchases were made for the expedition, and Smith was not charged with providing them. He was charged with providing other means; and the means provided by Lewis served to show the character of the expedition. But although the acts of all persons providing means applied to the expedition may be given in evidence upon the same principle that the state of the expedition may be shown, it does not follow that other acts of third persons may be given in evidence. It has also been contended that no transactions out of the district are testimony. This position is correct to a considerable extent, but not to the extent in which it is laid down. A declaration of Mr. Burr, for example, made in Kentucky or elsewhere, that he did not set on foot a military expedition on Blannerhasset's Island to be carried on against the dominions of the king of Spain while the United States were at peace with that power, would I think be evidence. So would the actual marching of the troops proved to be raised by him against the province of Mexico. Testimony which goes directly to prove the indictment may, I think, be drawn from any place. But I do not understand this to be the point really in contest. I understand the counsel of the United States to insist that providing means in Kentucky, that enlisting men in Kentucky, that joining the expedition in Kentucky, may be given in evidence to show that the accused did begin and set on foot the expedition in Blannerhasset's Island, or did provide the means at that place as charged in the indictment. This I understand to be the great question which divides the prosecution and defence.

It is I believe a general rule in criminal prosecutions that a distinct crime for which a prosecution may be instituted cannot be given in evidence in order to render it more probable that the particular crime charged in the indictment was committed. If gentlemen think me wrong in this, I will certainly hear them upon the point, but I believe the position to be correct. Now providing the means for a military expedition in Kentucky to be carried on against the dominions of a prince with whom the United States are at peace, is certainly in itself a distinct offence, upon which an indictment may be as well supported as it can be for providing means for the same or a similar expedition in Virginia. According to the rule laid down then, this testimony cannot be received unless it goes to prove directly the charges contained in the indictment. But how can it go directly to prove those charges? Does it follow that the man who has provided the means in Kentucky has also provided the means in Virginia? Certainly it does not follow; and consequently the acts alleged in Kentucky do not prove the charges contained in the indictment. They would prove the defendant to have been connected in the enterprize, and gentlemen argue as if they thought this sufficient for their purpose. I shall be excused if I employ a few moments in stating my reasons for thinking it not sufficient. I have already said, and surely no man will deny, that two distinct persons may at different places furnish different means for the same enterprize. It will, I presume, not be contended that one of them may be indicted for the means provided by the other. So, too, if the same man shall provide means for the enterprize at different places, as in Virginia and Kentucky. I do not imagine that an indictment for providing arms in Virginia could be supported by proving that he provided ammunition in Kentucky. They are distinct offences, for either of which he may be punished, and the commission of one may render more probable, but does not prove, the commission of the other. How do gentlemen mean to make this testimony more relevant? It is by making the acts of Blannerhasset, Tyler and Smith, the acts of Burr, by insisting that their acts show an unlawful expedition to have been begun by him in Virginia, or that the means for that expedition were provided by him in Virginia. This being accomplished, his acts in Kentucky may be adduced to corroborate or confirm the testimony which discloses his conduct in Virginia. As preliminary then to this testimony, such proof of the specific charges contained in the indictment must be given, as may be left to the consideration of the jury. This proof relates to place as well as to fact. 'Of whatsoever nature an offence indicted may be,' says Hawkins (2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 35), 'whether local or transitory, as seditious words or battery, &c., it seems to be agreed that if, upon not guilty pleaded, it shall appear that it was committed in a country different from that in which the indictment was found, the defendant shall be acquitted.' This rule is the stronger in the United States, where it is affirmed by the constitution itself, and where the jurisdiction of the court is limited to offences within the district. Its obligation therefore is complete. If there be any direct testimony that an expedition was begun, or set on foot, or that the 197 means were provided or prepared in Virginia, that testimony has not yet been heard, so far as I recollect. If there be such testimony it must also be shown that the expedition was begun, or that the means were prepared by the accused. No single act of his in Virginia has been offered in evidence. He made a contract in the state of Ohio for boats and provisions, which may have been intended as a part of the expedition, but no contract appears to have been made in Virginia, nor were the boats constructed or provisions procured in Virginia. How then is it to appear that he begun or set on foot a military expedition in Virginia, or that he provided or prepared the means for such an expedition? It is said, that if he gave orders from Kentucky or elsewhere, and in consequence of those orders the means were provided in Virginia, the accused is within the letter of the act, as well as its spirit, and has himself provided the means in Virginia. If these orders were in proof, the court as well as the counsel would be enabled to view the subject with more accuracy, and to treat it with more precision. Since those orders are not adduced, nor accurately stated, and the question has been argued without them, the court must decline giving any opinion, or consider the orders as offered, and say what orders would be admissible and what inadmissible. The latter course may save the bar the trouble of another argument. To whom are orders supposed to have been given, and who are supposed to have executed them? They must have been given to accomplices or to those who had no share in the expedition.

The accomplices, under the direction of Col. Burr, have provided the means. Can their liability to the penalties of the law be doubted? I presume not. If persons engaged in the expedition have provided the means for carrying it on, it will, I presume, be admitted that they are within the letter and the spirit of the act. Each man has himself provided and prepared those particular means which he has furnished. If Col. Burr, as was the case with Col. Smith, has supplied money for the expedition, then money may be charged as the means provided by him; but, if that money was advanced to an accomplice, its investment in means for the expedition is the act of the accomplice, for which, being a free agent, he is himself responsible. The accomplice has committed the very act which the law punishes. Has the accused, by suggesting or procuring that act, also committed it? I will not say how far the rule, that penal laws must be construed strictly, may be carried without incurring the censure of disregarding the sense of the legislature. It may, however, be safely affirmed that the offence must come clearly within the description of the law according to the common understanding of the terms employed, or it is not punishable under the law. Now, to do an act, or to advise or procure an act, or to be connected or leagued with one who does that act, are not the same in either law, language, or in common parlance; and, if they are not the same, a penalty affixed to the one is not necessarily affixed to the other. The penalty affixed to the act of providing the means for a military expedition is not affixed to the act of advising or procuring those means to be provided, or of being associated with the man who has provided them. The distinction made by the law between these persons is well settled, and has been too frequently urged to require further explanation. The one is a principal, the other an accessory. In all misdemeanors punishable only by a statute which describes as the sole offender the person who commits the prohibited act, the one is within and the other not within the statute. In passing the act under consideration, congress obviously contemplated this distinction. I presume that in a prosecution under the 3d section, for fitting out a privateer, it would not be alleged that a person who was concerned with the man who actually fitted out the privateer, but who performed no act himself, could be convicted on an indictment, not for being concerned in fitting out the privateer, but for actually fitting her out. These are stated in that section as separate offences. This distinction taken in the law is well understood, and cannot be considered as overlooked by those who frame penal acts. They cannot be considered as intending to describe one offender when they describe another, and, if experience suggests defects in the Penal Code, the legislature exclusively judges how far those defects are to be remedied. While expounding the terms of the act, it may not be improper to notice an argument advanced by the attorney for the United States which was stopped by my observing that he had not correctly understood the opinion delivered in the case of treason. He understood that opinion as approving the doctrine laid down by Keeling and Hale, that an accessory before the fact might plead, in bar of an indictment as accessory, that he had been acquitted as principal, whence it was inferred that, on an indictment for doing an act, evidence of advising or producing that act might be received. I was certainly very far from approving this doctrine. On the contrary, I declared it to contradict every idea I had ever formed on the subject. But, if it were correct, I endeavored to show that it could not affect that case. My disapprobation of the doctrine induced me to look further into it, and my persuasion that it is not law is confirmed. 2 Hale, P. C. p. 292, says: 'If A. and B. be indicted of the murder of C., upon their evidence it appears that A. committed the fact and B. was not present but was accessory before the fact by commanding it, B. shall be discharged.' In 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 85, § 11, Hawkins discusses the subject, shows in a note the contradiction in those authorities which maintain the doctrine, cites the opposing authorities, and obviously approves the opinion which is here given. It is apparent, then, that the law never considers the 198 commission and the procurement of an act, even where both are criminal, as the same act.

I cannot, therefore, consider means provided by those who are his accomplices in the expedition, as means provided by Col. Burr. If the means were provided by order of the accused, by persons not accomplices and not guilty under the act, the law may be otherwise. I shall not exclude such testimony. There is, however, some doubt whether the place of trial should be where the orders were given, or where they were executed. At common law, if an act was procured or advised at one place, and executed at another, it was doubted whether the procurer could be tried at either place, because the offence was not complete at either. This difficulty was removed by a statute made in the reign of Edward VI. If there be testimony showing, by orders from the accused, means were provided in Virginia by a person not an accomplice, it may be received, and the question respecting the scene of trial put in way for a final decision. The question whether all the means must be provided before the offence described in the statute has been committed, relates to the effect rather than to the exclusion of the testimony. I shall certainly not reject any evidence which shows that any means were provided by the accused in the place charged in the indictment. Upon the subject of beginning and setting on foot a military expedition or enterprize, it would be unnecessary at this time to say anything, were it not on the account of the question respecting the introduction of testimony of the district. What is an expedition? What is an enterprize? An expedition, if we consult Johnson, is 'a march or voyage with martial intentions.' In this sense, it does not mean the body which marches, but the march itself. The term is, however, sometimes employed to designate the armament itself, as well as the movement of that armament. An enterprize is 'an undertaking of hazard, an arduous attempt.' The proper meaning of this word also describes the general undertaking, and not the armament with which that undertaking is to be accomplished.

The first count in the indictment charges that Burr began the expedition in 'Blannerhassett's Island; the second and third, that he set on foot the enterprize on Blannerhassett's Island. If the term expedition is to be taken in its common and direct sense,--that is, to mean a march or voyage with martial intentions,--it began where that march or voyage begun; and it must have been begun by the accused to bring him within the act. If the term be taken in its figurative sense to designate the armament instead of the movement of the armament, then I cannot readily conceive an act which begins an expedition, unless the same act may also be said to provide the means of an expedition. The formation of the plan in the mind is not the commencement of the expedition, within the act. Our laws punish no mental crimes not brought into open deed. The disclosure of that plan does not begin it. If it did, the first disclosure would be the beginning. I find a difficulty in conceiving any act which amounts to providing the means for an expedition. However, if there can be such an act, and it has been committed in Virginia, it may certainly be given in evidence. The same observations apply to setting on foot an enterprize. These remarks are made to show what it will be necessary to prove in order to let in corroborative proof.

It is then the opinion of the court, that the declarations of third persons not forming a part of the transaction, and not made in the presence of the accused, cannot be received in evidence in this case.

That the acts of accomplices, except so far as they prove the character or object of the expedition, cannot be given in evidence. That the acts of the accused, in a different district, which constitute in themselves substantive causes for a prosecution, cannot be given in evidence unless they go directly to prove the charges laid in the indictment. That any legal testimony which shows the expedition to be military, or to have been designed against the dominions of Spain, may be received. Gentlemen well know how to apply these principles. Should any difficulty occur in applying them, the particular case will be brought before the court and decided.

After the opinion was delivered, Mr. Hay requested a copy of it, and made some observations as to its effect upon the future progress of the trial. He considered that the man who had the supreme command and direction of this military enterprize (which they could prove it to be) did provide the means and set it on foot. This was a question he thought proper for the consideration of the jury, and this idea would be strengthened by evidence which could be produced, if permitted.

Mr. Wirt. The fact is, that Mr. Belknap can prove (as well as others) that he sent orders and did other acts showing that he was at the head and command of the whole.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. But suppose the connection was proved (which I have no doubt could be), and suppose the enterprize originated with Col. Burr (which is very probably the case), others might have provided the means, from what could be made to appear. He is not indicted for being connected with the enterprize, but for providing certain specific means. If the party under Tyler is to be considered as of a military nature, and that an expedition began at Beaver, or where not, if the movement is to be considered as an enlistment of men, then, wherever the first movement was made, there the expedition began. I do not think that his taking the command at Cumberland can be considered as a count in the indictment; it might go to render it more probable (if 199 there was any doubt as to the transaction) that what was done was under his control; but the act itself must be proved on Blannerhasset's Island; and there the intention with which that act was done would come in by proving that he took the command afterwards. But how can he be charged with beginning there, if it should appear that he began in Pennsylvania? The question of 'beginning' I do not mean to take from the jury; of the place of beginning and of the acts themselves, they must decide. An abstract, independent question will arise, however, which is, whether the witnesses proved the indictment or not? Now I do not think that they did prove the indictment. What might be done is a future question.

Mr. Wirt. Am I to understand, sir, that the acts of accomplices, out of the district, tending to prove the acts laid in the indictment, may be given in evidence?

The CHIEF JUSTICE. Any act which shows the character of the transaction itself, in my opinion, may be given.

Mr. Wickham. I understand the opinion of the court to be that we cannot be liable for the acts of others, though done within the district; no auxiliary acts can be given against us, and they are not entitled to go out of the district to show acts done elsewhere, against us?

Mr. M'Rae. If we shall offer evidence that will be proper to submit to a jury, to prove where he did commence this enterprize, at any period whatever, it is not necessary that we should show that he remained on Blannerhasset's Island all the time. But seeing the enterprize was actually commenced, we shall be able to satisfy a jury that, when Burr was on the island, he did there actually project it, and did agree with Blannerhasset as to its progress, which was afterwards carried on, we ought certainly then to be at liberty to go out of the district to show that he was the principal person concerned in it. I do not suppose it necessary for us to show that all the means were provided by him.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. There is no doubt which I had at the commencement of this case (which I do not now suggest to make a question of) it relates to the indictment, and consequently to a particular part of the evidence, particularly to the words of the statute 'beginning and setting on foot an expedition.' I do doubt whether it is not necessary to show in the indictment how the expedition was begun. I do not know that it is necessary to set forth the principal means in the indictment. It is in itself, an extremely vague term, but if it is a necessary one, surely the particular manner of beginning must be showed. I think, however, it ought to be laid in the indictment, and if so, that is a strong reason why it ought to be shown by evidence.

The counsel on both sides were ordered to be furnished with copies of the opinion, and the court adjourned to Tuesday, ten o'clock.

Tuesday, September 15.

Mr. Hay said, that the counsel for the prosecution had agreed to go on as well as they could, for that they had drawn such a construction from the opinion as to excite them to suppose that they had sufficient evidence yet remaining to produce a conviction of the person accused, without interfering with the opinion of the court. He was stating some of the points laid down by the court, as far as we were able to hear him (which was extremely difficult), when Mr. Botts interfered to explain what were the limits set by the court, upon which he dwelt at some length, and repeated most of the arguments before used, as to the absence of Mr. Burr, and the evidence offered respecting conversations held between him and others. Indeed, he took a brief review of the whole opinion, and concluded, upon the whole, that the absence of Mr. Burr rendered all evidence which it appeared could be produced irrelevant; none had been offered, and he defied the prosecution to offer a particle,--for, from the whole review of the opinion, it was not within the compass of the heart of man to produce a conviction.

Mr. Martin offered a few observations favorable to the production of any evidence which the prosecution could produce: if they exceeded the bounds which the court had justly prescribed, it would then be due time to make objections, on which the court would determine.

Much desultory conversation ensued, when Richard Neale was again called, and asked whether he was on the island on the night of Blannerhasset's departure. 'A. I was not. I left the country in October, and know nothing of it.'

James McDowell was then called and sworn.

Mr. Burr stated that this witness was introduced for the purpose of proving an interview between him and the accused at the mouth of Cumberland river, where the accused stated to him the object of the expedition. The witness commenced his evidence by saying that he should begin up at Wheeling and proceed downwards to Cumberland where he first saw Col. Burr, when Col. Burr interrupted him by observing that he understood that this was offered as corroborative or auxiliary testimony, but auxiliary to what? They ought first to demonstrate acts done at the island, before they attempt to prove what was done, or (what is worse) said, out of the district.

Mr. Wirt went into a review of the opinion to support the propriety of offering this species of evidence, and contended that, before they could come to the substantive charge, they ought to be permitted to show the parts so nearly attached as this was. On this ground was General Eaton's testimony admitted, because it bore direct on the charge laid in the indictment, and equally intimate 200 were the acts at Cumberland. Under the act of congress, the charge is, providing means, &c. Now, was not the assumption of the command of those engaged in this expedition a material article in the means provided or providing? Here was the right to command acknowledged. It is not our meaning to say that there he began the expedition; he provided most of his means elsewhere, but there he met with his men, and there he headed them (he referred to Vaughan's case.) The mouth of Cumberland transaction was one link in the great chain; it commenced perhaps with what occurred between him and General Eaton, and proceeded by degrees till men, arms, &c., were procured, but the superintendence of Burr was discoverable everywhere; he projected and hastened on the scheme, as will appear. The transactions at Cumberland cannot be abstracted more than others of equal importance. Such corroborative testimony as that now offered, he contended, was even let in in capital cases, and could not be excluded without manifest injustice to the prosecution, because of its very intimate connection with the whole. There was a wide difference between a mere connection, and a man having the sovereign command of a criminal transaction (as was now attempted to be proved). The beginning was with General Eaton,--the consummation was to be somewhere else. It would be proved that Burr not only began, but brought the thing about so far as it went; he was the life and prime mover of the whole. Mr. Wirt went into some reasoning and elucidation of the propriety of this evidence; though it was no positive proof of his guilt under the indictment, yet he insisted it was strong circumstantial evidence that these means were his means, and that the evidence was within the meaning of the court, as far as he understood the opinion.

Mr. Botts expressed his extreme surprise at the light in which the gentlemen had represented the opinion of the court: he made some strong strictures on Mr. Wirt's representations of it, and admired the judge's patience to sit there and hear it. He then quoted some parts of the opinion, and made some strong eulogistic remarks upon it, after which he compared it with the point in dispute; as to Burr's presence, &c. (which has so often been the topic). It was stated to be one continued act. Be it so; let it be supposed to be an act of unanimity and continuity, and how would it then stand? A distinct offence was charged to have been committed by Col. Burr on the island, but, instead of its being done by him, on the island, it appeared to have been done by others, and evidence of words used elsewhere were brought as corroborative, to prove what was done where he was not! By what kind of ingenuity could anything done in Cumberland be transported to Blannerhasset's Island, when the act, though laid there, was already disproved.

MARSHALL, Chief Justice. I certainly should not have sat so patiently to hear the elaborate arguments which were offered, if I had not had a hope that the opinion which was afterwards delivered would have settled the point; an opinion which I thought was given so clear as to render it unnecessary to give another opinion upon the same point. It appears to me now that it would be unnecessary were it not for the vaguity of the law, and different understandings of gentlemen as to the terms 'beginning and setting on foot' an expedition. They vary in opinions amazingly on those terms. Now, what is 'beginning'? There must be some definite meaning affixed to the word, or I do not know how a court is to act upon the law. It means something, or else it is too vague for a court to punish those who have committed the act, or are the subjects of prosecution. As I before stated, an 'expedition' must mean one of two things; it must indicate the march of a military force or army from one place to another, or it must be considered as a military armament substantively. Now, its natural and direct meaning must be the movement of a military armament, and not the armament itself. Now, when this movement takes place the expedition is said to begin; the march is said to have commenced. But the word also means an armament that moves, rather than the movement of that armament. However, I did not undertake to decide this question of the meaning, because I wished not to fix a positive meaning to terms when they relate to a law that may possibly undergo a revision, particularly when I had no precedent nor assistance in it. But if it be the movement of an armament itself, when that armament existed as such, then as I said before I could not distinguish between providing the means of that armament and the beginning of it. I cannot conceive what it is, nor can I conceive any fact that will amount to a 'beginning' this armament, unless it is in the provision of the means, or of some means. Furnishing money or enlisting men may be considered as providing means. This, then, must be beginning the expedition. It must either mean this, or it must mean the march. If it means the march, then the expedition was brought down by Mr. Tyler from Beaver, where they first assembled, and afterwards rested at Blannerhasset's Island, whence they proceeded lower down. If it be expedition, and the meaning of the word is the march of the armament, then the proof is positive that it did not begin at Blannerhasset's Island. If the meaning is the provision of the armament, then the beginning of the expedition is the place where the first means were provided. Taking then, the word in one or the other meaning, it certainly appears to me that the testimony produced by the attorney of the United States disproves his own charge, for that it was not begun on Blannerhasset's Island, where the charge is 201 laid in the indictment. The beginning, then, is out of the question.

The question then is whether the means were provided or not on Blannerhasset's Island. If there be any testimony that goes to prove this, I certainly am not at liberty to refuse it. But gentlemen will consider whether they are not wasting the time and money of the United States, and of all those persons who are forced to attend here, whilst they are producing such a mass of testimony which does not bear upon the cause. Any arguments on the principle which was stated, that the testimony respecting means provided elsewhere, supporting this charge, I am willing to hear. If the opinion of the court before given can be proved to be erroneous, I shall be very happy to hear it pointed out, because I wish to be as correct as possible; but, if these principles are not erroneous, why do gentlemen bring witnesses forward in direct opposition to them? I can ascribe no other reason to it, than because the law does not give definite ideas on the subject of its own provisions. The truth is, the words of the law must be taken to retrospect to the origination of the plan. For instance, General Eaton states that in Washington the accused laid before him a certain plan, when he said that he had sufficient means, &c. Now, if those means could be discovered, it certainly shows that the beginning of this expedition was in Washington, but the indictment states it to be on Blannerhasset's Island. Now, unless the fact itself shall be proved, how can there be evidence given of motives, yet undiscovered? [FN7]

FN7 From 3 Carpenter's Report of Burr's Trial, 93.

It is, then, the opinion of the court that the declarations of third persons not forming a part of the transaction, and not made in the presence of the accused, cannot be received in evidence in this case. That the acts of accomplices, except so far as they prove the character or object of the expedition, cannot be given in evidence. That the acts of the accused, in a different district, which constitute in themselves substantive causes for a prosecution, cannot be given in evidence, unless they go directly to prove the charges laid in the indictment. That any legal testimony which shows the expedition to be military, or to have been designed against the dominions of Spain, may be received.

THE COURT.

The attorney of the district finding in the progress of the cause that this decision excluded almost the whole of his testimony, on the 15th of September moved the court to discharge the jury. This was objected to by the defendant, who insisted upon a verdict. THE COURT being of opinion that the jury could not, in this stage of the case, be discharged without mutual consent, and that they must give a verdict, they accordingly retired, and not long after returned with a verdict of 'Not guilty.'

END OF DOCUMENT

54TH STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

The Associated Press

December 5, 1979, Wednesday, AM cycle

SECTION: Washington Dateline

LENGTH: 476 words

BYLINE: By JAMES H. RUBIN, Associated Press Writer

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:

President Carter is expected to submit videotape testimony rather than appear in person before a federal grand jury investigating alleged White House influence-buying involving fugitive financier Robert L. Vesco.

Sources familiar with the investigation said Wednesday that no date has been set for Carter's testimony and some details remain to be worked out.

The sources, who asked not to be identified, said some members of the grand jury wanted to be able to submit follow-up questions to Carter personally, but were outvoted by other grand jury members who agreed to the videotape arrangement.

The sources said the minority grand jurors contended the president could be afforded special security precautions if he agreed to be questioned in person, and that the special videotape treatment was uncalled for.

Under the arrangement, Carter will be interviewed by government lawyers outside the presence of the grand jury.

The grand jury is investigating charges that shortly after Carter took office in January 1977, attempts were made on Vesco's behalf to quash extradition proceedings against the financier. Vesco fled the country while under indictment for stock fraud and is believed to be living in the Bahamas.

The Carter administration has denied taking part in any effort to quash extradition.

But a White House aide, Richard M. Harden, was approached in February 1977 by W. Spencer Lee IV, a Georgia lawyer allegedly acting in Vesco's behalf.

Both Lee and Harden have said Harden talked the lawyer out of pursuing the matter.

But Harden said he went to Carter after meeting with Lee, and that the president sent a note to then-Attorney General Griffin B. Bell which said "please see Spencer Lee from Albany (Ga.) when he requests an appointment."

Justice Department officials said the memo was placed in a file folder for potential job-seekers, and Lee never appeared for an appointment.

R.L. Herring, an Albany, Ga., businessman who was convicted last year on unrelated federal fraud and racketeering charges, has said he hired Lee for $10,000 to plead Vesco's case with the Carter administration.

The Justice Department refused all comment Wednesday on the proposed arrangement for taking Carter's testimony.

If Carter videotapes answers for the grand jury, the department believes it would be the first time a president has answered grand jury questions in this manner.

Carter was interviewed for four hours on Sept. 5 by Paul J. Curran, the special counsel who investigated the Carter family's peanut business in Georgia. Curran concluded there was no evidence of any criminal wrongdoing in that case.

Also, in April 1978, the president provided 51 minutes of videotape testimony in a federal court in Macon, Ga., at the trial of Georgia state Sen. Culver Kidd, who was acquitted of gambling and conspiracy charges.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

4TH STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

The Washington Post

January 1, 1989, Sunday, Final Edition

SECTION: FIRST SECTION; PAGE A7

LENGTH: 893 words

HEADLINE: Subpoenaing the President: Not Without Precedent;
In 1807, Jefferson Refused to Appear, but the Issue Has Never Been Clearly Decided

BYLINE: Ruth Marcus, Washington Post Staff Writer

BODY:

When Aaron Burr stood trial for treason in 1807, he employed an unprecedented tactic: subpoenaing the president of the United States, Thomas Jefferson, under whom Burr had served four years as vice president.

Burr sought to have Jefferson appear in court and testify about a letter written to the president by one of Burr's alleged coconspirators. Chief Justice John Marshall, presiding over the trial, declared that the president, unlike a king, was subject to the law. Eventually, Jefferson finessed the matter. He refused to appear but provided a certified copy of the letter, with sensitive parts deleted, and insisted he was doing so voluntarily.

Now, lawyers for former White House aide Oliver L. North are employing a similar tactic. On Friday, they served on the Justice Department subpoenas seeking the testimony of President Reagan and President-elect George Bush at North's trial, scheduled to start Jan. 31.

The administration is expected to contest the subpoenas. Administration lawyers -- citing the Jefferson example -- have argued that no sitting president has ever testified in court in a criminal trial. "Jefferson made it very clear that he thought it was improper to bring presidents into a trial proceeding, and that precedent has been followed in every other case that I know of," said one Justice Department official.

Between 1807 and now, however, the issue has never been squarely decided.

In 1974, the Supreme Court, in the Watergate tapes case, ruled 8 to 0 that President Richard M. Nixon had to comply with the special prosecutor's subpoena to turn over the White House tapes.

In an opinion by then-Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, the court rejected Nixon's claim that the doctrine of separation of powers and the need for confidential government communications gave him absolute privilege to refuse to release the tapes. The court ruled that the need for the evidence in the Watergate case outweighed the "presumptive privilege" protecting disclosure of presidential communications.

"The generalized assertion of privilege must yield to the demonstrated, specific need for evidence in a pending criminal trial," the court said.

The tapes case, however, did not involve a subpoena seeking the president's appearance in court.

In 1975, President Gerald R. Ford gave a videotaped deposition as a defense witness -- later played in court -- in the trial of Lynette (Squeaky) Fromme, who was convicted of attempting to assassinate Ford. Administration lawyers lost a bid to have the court accept a written statement by the president.

Likewise, President Jimmy Carter, while in office, twice gave videotaped testimony, once as a government witness in the perjury and gambling trial of a Georgia state senator, and a second time before a federal grand jury investigating allegations that fugitive financier Robert Vesco sought to bribe members of the Carter administration.

Nixon, after leaving office, was scheduled to testify at the 1974 Watergate cover-up trial of his former aides, but was suffering from phlebitis and the trial proceeded without him. Six years later, Nixon voluntarily complied with a subpoena to testify at the conspiracy trial of two former FBI agents.

In the current case, legal experts said there will be a heavy burden on North's lawyers to show why they need the testimony.

In the Watergate tapes case, said R. Stan Mortenson, one of Nixon's lawyers, "what the court clearly said was, if the president has relevant evidence, then the criminal justice system and the need for evidence in criminal cases will overcome any privilege . . . but that it's not something to be lightly undertaken . . . . "

Justice Department officials have argued that Bush, who will have been sworn in as president by the time the North trial begins, cannot be hauled into court, away from his presidential duties. They said that Reagan, although he will be out of office by then, will still have knowledge of sensitive national security information and the right to assert executive privilege.

The Watergate tapes case, in which the court emphasized that it was not dealing with a claim of privilege based on national security grounds, offers "a fairly strong precedent" for fighting the subpoenas, one department official said.

As to Reagan, the official said, "I think the claim for this former president in light of the timing [so close to his departure from office] is still very powerful and so the distinction between a President Bush and former president Reagan is not going to be, in my judgment, constitutionally significant," the official said.

But other legal experts said that, particularly with regard to Reagan, if North can show a need to question the former president -- who has already answered written questions submitted by independent counsel Lawrence E. Walsh -- the subpoena could be upheld.

The president, "like any other witness, can refuse to divulge national security information unless ordered by the court," said Alan B. Morrison of Public Citizen Litigation Group.

But Morrison said, "My tentative view is that [claim of privilege] would be overruled. Looking at U.S. v. Nixon [the tapes case] and the 6th Amendment right to call witnesses in your behalf, assuming that conversations were material to the defense, I think it would be very hard to keep that out."

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

The Washington Post

January 1, 1989, Sunday, Final Edition

SECTION: FIRST SECTION; PAGE A7

LENGTH: 893 words

HEADLINE: Subpoenaing the President: Not Without Precedent;
In 1807, Jefferson Refused to Appear, but the Issue Has Never Been Clearly Decided

BYLINE: Ruth Marcus, Washington Post Staff Writer

BODY:

When Aaron Burr stood trial for treason in 1807, he employed an unprecedented tactic: subpoenaing the president of the United States, Thomas Jefferson, under whom Burr had served four years as vice president.

Burr sought to have Jefferson appear in court and testify about a letter written to the president by one of Burr's alleged coconspirators. Chief Justice John Marshall, presiding over the trial, declared that the president, unlike a king, was subject to the law. Eventually, Jefferson finessed the matter. He refused to appear but provided a certified copy of the letter, with sensitive parts deleted, and insisted he was doing so voluntarily.

Now, lawyers for former White House aide Oliver L. North are employing a similar tactic. On Friday, they served on the Justice Department subpoenas seeking the testimony of President Reagan and President-elect George Bush at North's trial, scheduled to start Jan. 31.

The administration is expected to contest the subpoenas. Administration lawyers -- citing the Jefferson example -- have argued that no sitting president has ever testified in court in a criminal trial. "Jefferson made it very clear that he thought it was improper to bring presidents into a trial proceeding, and that precedent has been followed in every other case that I know of," said one Justice Department official.

Between 1807 and now, however, the issue has never been squarely decided.

In 1974, the Supreme Court, in the Watergate tapes case, ruled 8 to 0 that President Richard M. Nixon had to comply with the special prosecutor's subpoena to turn over the White House tapes.

In an opinion by then-Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, the court rejected Nixon's claim that the doctrine of separation of powers and the need for confidential government communications gave him absolute privilege to refuse to release the tapes. The court ruled that the need for the evidence in the Watergate case outweighed the "presumptive privilege" protecting disclosure of presidential communications.

"The generalized assertion of privilege must yield to the demonstrated, specific need for evidence in a pending criminal trial," the court said.

The tapes case, however, did not involve a subpoena seeking the president's appearance in court.

In 1975, President Gerald R. Ford gave a videotaped deposition as a defense witness -- later played in court -- in the trial of Lynette (Squeaky) Fromme, who was convicted of attempting to assassinate Ford. Administration lawyers lost a bid to have the court accept a written statement by the president.

Likewise, President Jimmy Carter, while in office, twice gave videotaped testimony, once as a government witness in the perjury and gambling trial of a Georgia state senator, and a second time before a federal grand jury investigating allegations that fugitive financier Robert Vesco sought to bribe members of the Carter administration.

Nixon, after leaving office, was scheduled to testify at the 1974 Watergate cover-up trial of his former aides, but was suffering from phlebitis and the trial proceeded without him. Six years later, Nixon voluntarily complied with a subpoena to testify at the conspiracy trial of two former FBI agents.

In the current case, legal experts said there will be a heavy burden on North's lawyers to show why they need the testimony.

In the Watergate tapes case, said R. Stan Mortenson, one of Nixon's lawyers, "what the court clearly said was, if the president has relevant evidence, then the criminal justice system and the need for evidence in criminal cases will overcome any privilege . . . but that it's not something to be lightly undertaken . . . . "

Justice Department officials have argued that Bush, who will have been sworn in as president by the time the North trial begins, cannot be hauled into court, away from his presidential duties. They said that Reagan, although he will be out of office by then, will still have knowledge of sensitive national security information and the right to assert executive privilege.

The Watergate tapes case, in which the court emphasized that it was not dealing with a claim of privilege based on national security grounds, offers "a fairly strong precedent" for fighting the subpoenas, one department official said.

As to Reagan, the official said, "I think the claim for this former president in light of the timing [so close to his departure from office] is still very powerful and so the distinction between a President Bush and former president Reagan is not going to be, in my judgment, constitutionally significant," the official said.

But other legal experts said that, particularly with regard to Reagan, if North can show a need to question the former president -- who has already answered written questions submitted by independent counsel Lawrence E. Walsh -- the subpoena could be upheld.

The president, "like any other witness, can refuse to divulge national security information unless ordered by the court," said Alan B. Morrison of Public Citizen Litigation Group.

But Morrison said, "My tentative view is that [claim of privilege] would be overruled. Looking at U.S. v. Nixon [the tapes case] and the 6th Amendment right to call witnesses in your behalf, assuming that conversations were material to the defense, I think it would be very hard to keep that out."

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

63RD STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

The Associated Press

August 17, 1979, Friday, BC cycle

SECTION: Domestic News

LENGTH: 221 words

DATELINE: ATLANTA

BODY:

A federal investigation into the operation of President Carter's peanut warehouse in Plains, Ga., is close to completion, according to the probe's special counsel.

"We've completed a good part of it and we hope to finish soon," Special Counsel Paul Curran said Thursday.

He indicated that the bulk of the data for the investigation has been gathered, but he added: "We've got a lot of analyzing and a lot of reviewing to do and some decisions to make."

Curran said he has set no deadline for completion of the work.

Curran was appointed last March by then-Attorney General Griffin Bell to investigate allegations concerning the warehouse, including one that loans to the business may have been diverted to Carter's 1976 presidential campaign.

Curran would not say whether he plans to seek indictments in the case. He has the option of seeking indictments and prosecuting them himself or turning any indictments in the case over to the Justice Department for prosecution.

Whether or not there are indictments, Curran said he expects to make public a report of his findings.

A special grand jury has heard testimony from several witnesses in the case, including Billy Carter, the president's brother, who managed the warehouse until 1977.

The warehouse is owned by the president, his brother and their mother.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

57TH STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

The Associated Press

October 15, 1979, Monday, PM cycle

SECTION: Domestic News

LENGTH: 241 words

BYLINE: By CHARLES CAMPBELL, Associated Press Writer

DATELINE: ATLANTA

BODY:
Paul J. Curran, the special counsel appointed in March to investigate loans to President Carter's peanut warehouse, said today he would hold a news conference Tuesday in Washington.

Curran refused to specify the purpose of the news conference. He said several weeks ago, however, that he expected to wind up his investigation in October.

There was no immediate White House comment on Curran's announcement.

The federal grand jury that convened in Atlanta under Curran's direction has taken testimony from a number of witnesses, including President Carter's brother Billy Carter, part owner of the warehouse.

While there has been some published speculation about Curran seeking testimony from the president, it was not known whether Curran attempted to talk directly to President Carter or whether the grand jurors heard testimony from the president.

Curran has steadfastly said he would not comment on the probe until it was complete. He has not called a news conference since he selected his staff, shortly after his appointment by then-Attorney General Griffin Bell.

The grand jury has not filed presentments or issued any indictments during the eight-month probe, which grew out of the investigation into the banking practices of former federal budget director Bert Lance.

Curran's probe has centered on loans to the warehouse from the National Bank of Georgia during the time that Lance was president of that Atlanta bank.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

56TH STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

Newsweek

October 29, 1979, UNITED STATES EDITION

SECTION: NATIONAL AFFAIRS; Pg. 35

LENGTH: 445 words

HEADLINE: THE PEANUT PROBE: CASE CLOSED

BYLINE: ALLAN J. MAYER with ELAINE SHANNON in Washington

BODY:

Did Jimmy Carter's peanut business in Plains, Ga., illegally funnel millions of dollars into his 1976 Presidential campaign? Last week, Justice Department special counsel Paul Curran delivered what should be the final answer: no. After an intensive six-month investigation -- including four hours of testimony from the President himself -- Curran issued a 239-page report that exonerates the Carter family. "No evidence whatsoever was discovered that any moneys were diverted from the warehouse into the campaign," Curran said. "Based on all the evidence and the applicable law, no indictment can or should be brought against anyone."

The investigation grew out of a Federal probe last year of the National Bank of Georgia, which once was headed by Carter's friend and former budget chief Bert Lance. Last March, after an FBI report questioned NBG's dealings with the Carter business, the then Attorney General Griffin Bell appointed Curran to investigate how the Carter warehouse handled nearly $9.9 million in loans from NBG between 1975 and 1977. Curran, a Republican lawyer and former Federal prosecutor, reported that he had traced "every nickel and every peanut into and out of the warehouse" and found that "no funds were unlawfully diverted."

OVERDUE: Curran said that an NBG loan to Carter media adviser Jerry Rafshoon had not been illegally used to float the campaign through a spring 1975 cash crisis. When Federal matching funds were briefly shut off, Rafshoon's ad agency let nearly $700,000 in overdue campaign bills pile up. NEWSWEEK has learned that a separate Justice inquiry -- to determine whether this practice violated the ban on corporate loans -- has been closed with no charges recommended.

But though the family business was cleared of any criminal wrongdoing, Curran criticized it for sloppy business practices during the time it was run by the President's brother, Billy. According to Curran, the Carter warehouse was continually strapped for cash -- and NBG repeatedly allowed Billy to repay the bank loans with checks drawn on insufficient funds. Instead of depositing the rubber checks, the bank held them until the Carter account was large enough to cover the amount due. The bank also permitted the warehouse to release the peanuts that had been pledged as collateral for one of the loans -- a direct violation of the loan agreement.

Finally, Curran's accountants concluded that the peanut business understated its net income in 1977 and overstated it in 1975 and 1976. The net result, he said, is that the business may owe more Federal income taxes. Apart from that, the case now appears to be closed.

GRAPHIC: Picture 1, Billy and Jimmy in 1976, Ron Sherman -- Nancy Palmer; Picture 2, prober Curran: Tracing every nickel and peanut, AP

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

53RD STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

The Associated Press

December 7, 1979, Friday, AM cycle

SECTION: Washington Dateline

LENGTH: 683 words

BYLINE: By JAMES H. RUBIN, Associated Press Writer

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:

Attorney General Benjamin R. Civiletti disclosed Friday he has removed himself from any role in the government's investigation into allegations of White House influence-buying on behalf of fugitive financier Robert L. Vesco.

At the same time, Civiletti told an impromptu news conference he believes it is proper that President Carter be allowed to give videotaped testimony to a grand jury. Carter plans to give the testimony to a federal grand jury that has been investigating the Vesco case for more than a year.

Civiletti said he is taking no part in the investigation because of his role in the Carter administration's decision in 1977 to abandon efforts to extradite Vesco in favor of using diplomatic channels to have him deported.

There has been no evidence the decision was made to benefit Vesco, who is believed to be living in the Bahamas.

Civiletti said, nonetheless, it would be "inappropriate for me" to take part in the investigation "since I was involved in contemporaneous actions" relating to extradition proceedings against Vesco.

Civiletti said he was not consulted about the plans disclosed this week for Carter to testify by videotape rather in person before the grand jury.

The attorney general said he learned of the plans unofficially. "I may have heard about it second or third hand," he said.

According to sources close to the investigation, some grand jurors complained that the videotaping procedure would prevent them from asking follow-up questions.

Asked if a president should be given special treatment when called to testify, Civiletti said, "Certainly. Only in the most compelling circumstances should a president have to provide information directly to a court or investigation."

He said that if high public officials were forced to appear in court every time someone subpoenaed them, in civil as well as criminal cases, "you'd have nothing but (the officials) sitting around courtrooms all day."

Civiletti said he regards the videotaping procedure as direct testimony. He said he had not considered what conditions would ever require a president to appear in person before a grand jury.

A District of Columbia grand jury is investigating allegations that shortly after Carter took office in January 1977, an attempt was made to pay off high administration officials to quash extradition proceedings against Vesco, who fled the country nearly 10 years ago after his indictment on stock fraud charges.

R.L. Herring, a Georgia businessman who has been convicted on unrelated federal fraud and racketeering charges, has said he paid $10,000 to a Georgia attorney, W. Spencer Lee IV, to act in Vesco's behalf.

Lee has said he met with a White House aide, Richard M. Harden, in February 1977, and was persuaded by Harden not to pursue the matter further.

Harden subsequently met with Carter, who sent a note to then-Attorney General Griffin B. Bell which said, "Please see Spencer Lee from Albany (Ga.) when he requests an appointment."

The Justice Department said the memo was placed in a file folder for potential job-seekers, adding that Lee never appeared for an appointment.

It is believed that Carter's videotaped answers for the grand jury in the Vesco case would mark the first time a president has answered grand jury questions in this manner. Carter has provided testimony in different forms at least twice before criminal investigations since he became president.

On another subject, Civiletti said he wasn't aware of any tension between himself and the White House that has developed from his decision to recommend a special prosecutor investigate allegations that White House Chief of Staff Hamilton Jordan used cocaine.

On Civiletti's recommendation, a special three-judge federal appeals court appointed a New York lawyer, Arthur Christy, to investigate the case.

Asked if his decision had caused strained relations with the White House, Civiletti said, "Not to my knowledge."

Civiletti said he met this week with Christy for about 15 or 20 minutes to offer Justice Department office space and staff for the investigation.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

52ND STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

Facts on File World News Digest

December 14, 1979

SECTION: U.S. AFFAIRS; Vesco Case

PAGE: Pg. 943 C2

LENGTH: 494 words

HEADLINE: Carter to Tape Testimony

BODY:
President Carter was to videotape testimony for a federal grand jury investigating an alleged plan to fix legal problems of fugitive financier Robert Vesco, government sources told the Associated Press Dec. 5. [See p. 725F2-E3]

Several members of the grand jury reportedly objected to the proposed arrangement for questioning Carter on the ground that they would be unable to submit follow-up questions to the President.

The grand jury was investigating allegations that in 1977 there was an attempt to quash extradition proceedings against Vesco, who fled the country after being indicted on stock fraud charges, through White House influence-buying.

The questions for Carter were likely to center on a Feb. 15, 1977 meeting Carter had with a White House aide, Richard M. Harden.

A Georgia lawyer, W. Spencer Lee 4th, who allegedly acted as an intermediary in Vesco's behalf, had contacted Harden with a bribe offer. [See p. 725A3]

Harden and Lee had both said Harden talked the lawyer out of pursuing the Vesco matter.

The New York Times reported Dec. 4 that after President Carter met with Harden, he sent a note to then Attorney General Griffin B. Bell urging him to see Lee. Justice Department officials had said that Bell never received the note and never met with Lee.

Bell Testifies -- Former Attorney General Griffin B. Bell Dec. 4 testified for some 90 minutes before a Washington, D.C. federal grand jury investigating possible White House influence-buying attempts by fugitive financier Robert L. Vesco. [See above]

Based on the questions he encountered, Bell told the New York Times Dec 5, he felt the government lawyers and members of the grand jury appeared to be "wrapping up loose ends" in their probe.

Bell said of Vesco and his intermediary, convicted businessman R. L. Herring: "This was just a group of con artists working each other. That goes on every day. But the question is, did they ever get to the government? The answer to that is emphatically no."

Bell said he did not know what had happened to a note sent to him by President Carter in 1977 urging him to see W. Spencer Lee 4th, a Georgia lawyer representing Vesco. Bell said he never received the note and did not meet with Lee.

Civiletti Withdraws from Probe -- Attorney General Benjamin R. Civiletti Dec. 7 said he had removed himself from any role in the government investigation of Vesco.

Civiletti cited as a reason his role in the Carter Administration's 1977 decision to end efforts to extradite Vesco to the U.S. in favor of using diplomatic channels to have him deported from countries in which he sought refuge.

Civiletti said that while there had been no evidence that the decision was made to benefit Vesco, he believed it would be "inappropriate" for him to take part in the probe. Civiletti also said he was "involved in contemperaneous actions" relating to extradition proceedings against Vesco.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

22ND STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

The Associated Press

March 26, 1989, Sunday, AM cycle

SECTION: Washington Dateline

LENGTH: 900 words

HEADLINE: Last President Subpoenaed Less Than 15 Years Ago

BYLINE: By HARRY F. ROSENTHAL, Associated Press Writer

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:
History is repeating itself rather quickly in the demand by Oliver North that former President Reagan come from his home in California to testify for North at his criminal trial.

There was a gap of 167 years between the time Thomas Jefferson was subpoenaed and the 1974 summons to Richard Nixon, by then an ex-president. Less than 15 years passed before the subpoena for Reagan.

During the 1974 Watergate cover-up trial, former aide John D. Ehrlichman almost succeeded in his request for Nixon's appearance. It would have happened, too, had the former president not fallen critically ill following surgery.

"I would have loved to have Nixon in court, I had a few questions I wanted to ask him myself," U.S. District Judge John J. Sirica wrote in his memoirs.

But at the time, a team of court-appointed doctors determined that Nixon would be in no condition to travel for some time, which would have delayed the trial. "I ruled reluctantly," Sirica remembered of his decision that the former president would not have to appear. "I did feel that no matter how anxious many of us were to see Nixon face the lawyers and testify under oath, having him in court was not really critical to Ehrlichman's defense."

Had he gone on the witness stand, Nixon would have been the first ex-president to do so under subpoena. That dubious distinction will fall to Reagan if U.S. District Judge Gerhard Gesell accedes to North's request.

The debate whether a president must obey subpoenas and other court orders dates to the beginning of the republic, and it is just as volatile today as it was then.

President Thomas Jefferson received a subpoena in 1807 demanding that he turn over a letter sought by defense lawyers in the treason case against Aaron Burr, Jefferson's first vice president.

Burr wanted Jefferson to appear in court and testify about the letter written to the president by one of Burr's alleged co-conspirators. Chief Justice John Marshall, presiding over the trial, declared that the president unlike a king was subject to law.

Jefferson cited the independence of the executive branch of government from the judicial branch and refused, at first, to release the letter. Eventually, he turned it over but made clear that his decision was voluntary and not in response to the subpoena.

From then until Watergate, the concept of executive privilege was never tested. No sitting president ever has testified in court in a criminal trial, although several have provided testimony or what might be considered an equivalent.

It is not difficult to see why North's lawyers want Reagan to testify. Defense attorney Brendan Sullivan has attempted to show, in his cross examination of prosecution witnesses, that Reagan was much more involved in the secret aid to the Contra rebels than was known publicly before.

The jury heard that Reagan personally approved an NSC-recommended deal in 1985 to give Honduras $$110 million in covert economic and military aid as an inducement to support the Contras.

The jury also heard that Reagan apparently approved a plan from North and others in the government to airdrop intelligence data and recoilless rifles to the Contras for the purpose of destroying ships carrying arms to the Nicaraguan government.

Those actions all were at a time when Congress had banned U.S. military aid to the Contras.

The closest the Supreme Court has come to ruling on so-called executive privilege was in the Watergate tapes case of 1974. The special prosecutor had subpoenaed the White House for tapes of 64 conversation and Nixon didn't want to give them up.

In the case called Nixon v. U.S. the court ruled unanimously that Nixon had to comply with the subpoena. The specific need for evidence in a criminal case, the court said, outweighed the president's rights in the matter.

In 1975, President Gerald Ford gave a videotaped deposition as a defense witness in the trial of Lynette (Squeaky) Fromme who was convicted of attempting to assassinate Ford. Lawyers for the administration tried unsuccessfully to have the court accept a written statement by the president. The videotape was played in court.

Jimmy Carter, too, as president, gave videotaped testimony - twice. Once was as a government witness in the perjury and gambling trial of a Georgia state senator. The second time he taped testimony for a federal grand jury that was investigating allegations that fugitive financier Robert Vesco sought to bribe members of the Carter administration.

Reagan was served with the subpoena while he was still president, along with then-Vice President Bush. Both men sought to quash the subpoenas.

Attorney General Dick Thornburgh argued in a Jan. 13 court filing that the summonses "raise profound constitutional concerns ... regarding the authority of the courts to compel appearances by a former or sitting president."

He added that "The spectacle of a former or sitting president being subjected to peremptory judicial process may chill foreign governments in the way they deal with the president now and in the future."

On the day before the North trial started, Gesell ruled the defendant had not shown that Bush had "relevant and material" testimony to give and squashed the subpoena against the new president.

But Gesell left the decision on Reagan open. He'll probably make it this week when the defense starts presentation of its case.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

19TH STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

The Washington Times

February 6, 1990, Tuesday, Final Edition

SECTION: Part F; COMMENTARY; Pg. F1

LENGTH: 1037 words

HEADLINE: Skewed to the plebian

BYLINE: Bruce Fein

BODY:

Last Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene commanded former President Reagan to deliver more than a score of personal diary entries made during his presidency to the indicted former National Security Adviser John M. Poindexter. Judge Greene found that Mr. Reagan's entries "contain information of significance" to Adm. Poindexter's defense to five charges of misleading Congress and obstructing its probe of the Iran-Contra affair.

The defense seems to rest on these strained linkages:

* That Reagan knew of and authorized Adm. Poindexter's activities on behalf of the Nicaraguan resistance, the Contras.

* That such knowledge and authorization is shown by Mr. Reagan's abbreviated and elliptical diary references to a Poindexter trip to Central America in 1985 on behalf of the Contras,

* A discussion of Iranian arms sales.

* Mr. Reagan's intervention with Honduras to obtain release of a shipment of arms to the Contras that was seized by the Honduran military.

* U.S. military assistance to a Central American nation arguably to assist the military arm of the Contras or to oppose the Sandinistas.

* That Mr. Reagan's knowledge and authorization of these pro-Contra activities led Adm. Poindexter to believe all of his actions to bolster the Contras militarily were legal; that Adm. Poindexter thus lacked any self-interested motive to deceive Congress in its Iran-Contra investigation; and, that any actions or communications by Adm. Poindexter that misled Congress thus were committed without criminal intent.

Judge Greene's order will probably be opposed by Mr. Reagan on the grounds of executive privilege. But even if that opposition prevails, Judge Greene's embroilment of a former president in litigation on behalf of Adm. Poindexter's contrived and attenuated theory of defense is dismaying. The judicial order culminates the rapid emergence of the plebeian presidency and the stunning fall of the imperial presidency that began with the 1974 Supreme Court decision in United States vs. Nixon, ordering disclosure of presidential tapes to assist prosecution of the Watergate cover-up defendants.

Until the Nixon case, an unbroken political custom of almost two centuries ordinarily shielded presidents from the coercion of either Congress or the judiciary. In 1796, President George Washington refused a House request for correspondence related to the controversial Jay Treaty with Great Britain. In 1843, President John Tyler withheld from Congress portions of reports regarding alleged Indian frauds that would have interfered with executive-branch discretion, disclosed confidential sources or exposed officials to malicious publicity. In 1948, President Harry Truman refused a congressional demand for the loyalty file of the director of the Bureau of Standards. President Dwight Eisenhower, in 1954, forbade testimony during the Army-McCarthy hearings regarding a meeting between Attorney General Herbert Brownwell and Army counsel John Adams.

Judges treated presidential claims of privilege with exceptional deference until the onset of the plebeian presidency. President Thomas Jefferson was subpoenaed to provide documents to aid the defense in the treason trial of Aaron Burr. But Jefferson's delivery of material to the trial court was expressly voluntary, and he redacted portions of a letter that he believed should be kept secret. Moreover, Burr then dropped his demand for the materials. President James Monroe volunteered to answer interrogatories for use in a court-martial. Until the Nixon tapes case, no other presidents had been entangled by the courts in criminal prosecutions or private civil litigation.

After that landmark ruling, former President Nixon was required to appear and be deposed in several civil cases and was subpoenaed to testify in the Watergate criminal trial (but was excused because of ill health). President Ford testified by videotape in the Squeaky Fromm criminal trial. President Carter provided videotaped testimony as a prosecution witness in a federal trial and a videotaped deposition to a grand jury investigating alleged White House efforts to quash extradition proceedings against an international fugitive.

Prior to the Poindexter case, former National Security Council aide Oliver North had abortively sought the testimony of President Reagan to develop a defense. Panama's former strongman, Gen. Manuel Antonio Noreiga, predictably will seek President Bush's testimony or records in his impending criminal trial.

The torrent of judicial orders directed to the plebeian presidency is improvident. If the incumbent or a former president legitimately invokes executive privileges, an appearance of a cover-up is generated and unjustified cynicism of the office is promoted. If a privilege claim is denied, instant appeals endlessly delay already lead-footed justice.

To defend executive privilege, former presidents must incur hefty legal fees; and, if the defense is overruled, the appearance of a president or presidential papers at trial creates a circus atmosphere fostered by the media that disturbs the sobriety indispensable to legal fairness.

In addition, the perception abroad of hemorraging presidential confidentiality will confound full and forthright presidential communications with foreign leaders pivotal to charting enlightened United States policies. And presidents will resist personal diaries - a treasure trove for students of politics and political practitioners - because of a pervasive fear that premature and embarrassing disclosures may be demanded by court order.

A president uniquely makes momentous and knotty decisions affecting countless people and frequently arousing strong antagonisms. Lawsuits generated because of the ripple effects of presidential action are legion. If a president must expect routine entanglement with such litigation, irresolution, timidity and flaccidity will become permanent fixtures of the Oval Office.

The nation needs a presidency that sits midway between the plebeian and the imperial. At present, it is skewed toward the plebeian.

Bruce Fein is a lawyer and free-lance writer specializing in legal issues.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

12TH STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

Los Angeles Times

February 17, 1990, Saturday, Home Edition

SECTION: Part A; Page 1; Column 2; National Desk

LENGTH: 1346 words

HEADLINE: REAGAN TAPES TESTIMONY FOR POINDEXTER CASE

BYLINE: By NORMAN KEMPSTER, TIMES STAFF WRITER

BODY:

Former President Ronald Reagan testified behind closed doors for about six hours here Friday, facing some of the most detailed questions he has ever had to answer about his role in the Iran-Contra affair that rocked the closing years of his second term.

Called as a defense witness by former White House National Security Adviser John M. Poindexter, Reagan's appearance was videotaped so his testimony can be scrubbed clean of any diplomatic and military secrets that may have been mentioned. The tape will then be made public, perhaps as early as next week.

U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene, scheduled to preside over Poindexter's trial in Washington, starting March 5, brought his court -- lawyers, clerks and others -- to Los Angeles to make it as convenient as possible for Reagan to appear. Poindexter's lawyers plan to play the videotape for the jury once the prosecution completes its case, making Reagan the star witness for the defense of his former aide.

Reagan spent six hours and 40 minutes in Courtroom 8 on the second floor of the Federal C Courthouse in the Civic Center, answering the initial batch of the 154 specific questions that Greene earlier authorized Poindexter's lawyers to ask. The 79-year-old former President is scheduled to return this morning for more questioning.

Reporters were kept more than 100 yards from the courtroom, which was guarded by a contingent of U.S. marshals, when Reagan, accompanied by lawyers and Secret Service bodyguards, walked across the hall from a stairwell to the court in the morning and back in the afternoon. He gave a somewhat tentative wave each time but said nothing.

There were no such restrictions when Greene, Poindexter, lawyers and other participants departed for the day. But they provided little information about the extraordinary session.

Greene said the hearing would resume at 9:45 a.m. today. When asked how many of the 154 questions were asked Friday, the judge would say only that the taping will conclude today, apparently indicating that much of the ground had been covered.

Poindexter's only comment as he left the courtroom was: "You'll have to ask someone else."

Facing five felony counts of obstruction of Congress, making false statements and conspiracy, Poindexter sought Reagan's testimony to bolster his contention that his activities were authorized by the former President. Greene ruled that the retired rear admiral could not get a fair trial unless he was allowed to call Reagan as a witness.

Richard W. Beckler, Poindexter's lawyer, originally submitted a list of 183 questions that he hoped to ask. Greene threw out 29 of them because he said they had no relevancy to the case or touched too closely on military or diplomatic secrets. However, he said that Beckler could ask the others, following up if necessary but introducing no new subjects.

Dan K. Webb, the chief prosecutor for Iran-Contra independent counsel Lawrence E. Walsh, cross-examined Reagan.

The hearing posed something of a tactical dilemma for Webb. In the context of the Poindexter case, his chief objective is to discredit the suggestion that Reagan authorized the activities of his national security adviser. But from a larger standpoint, the hearing provides the independent counsel's office with the best chance it may ever get to assess Reagan's role in the affair, which involved the sale of arms to Iran and the diversion of profits to the Contras in Nicaragua.

Although the judge did not make public the precise questions, he said they fell into several broad categories, such as the extent of Reagan's knowledge of the shipment of missiles to Iran and the former President's understanding of legislation which for a time barred U.S. assistance to the Contras.

Reagan originally asked to be excused from testifying on the grounds that a subpoenaed court appearance would diminish the dignity of the office of the presidency. But Greene ruled earlier this month that Reagan would have to testify unless he invoked the doctrine of executive privilege, something the former President declined to do.

"Although (Poindexter) might not have a valid defense based directly on the claim that his illegal activities, if any, were known to the President, the fact of the President's knowledge of, and apparent acquiescence in, such activities -- if that is what occurred -- would be material evidence, for it would bear on (Poindexter's) specific intent to commit various offenses," Greene said in ordering Reagan to provide the taped testimony.

Reagan and some other participants had lunch brought to the courtroom that is usually presided over by Manuel L. Real, chief judge of the Central District of California. However, Poindexter and a few others left the courtroom for lunch, delaying the taping by about an hour.

With no matters of substance leaking out of the courtroom, a swarm of reporters interviewed whomever they could. When Steve Preoteasa, a Romanian immigrant who runs the International Deli in the Los Angeles Mall across the street from the courthouse, arrived with a tray of turkey, ham, roast beef and chicken salad sandwiches, he briefly became the center of attention.

Preoteasa, an outspoken anti-Communist, said he wanted to tell Reagan that he was a longtime admirer. But the marshals would not let him into the courtroom, choosing instead to carry in the sandwiches and an order of Chinese food that arrived shortly after.

The Reagan drama was played out in one of several large courtrooms on the second floor of the 17-story 1930s-era building. It is frequently referred to as "the ceremonial courtroom" because many of the court's most formal functions take place there.

The walls are decorated with 14 large oil paintings of the men who have been the chief judge of the central district.

Three cameras were used to tape the hearing, one trained on Reagan, one on the judge and one on the lawyer asking the questions.

Security in the courthouse is usually very heavy with metal detectors regularly used to screen all visitors. Samuel Cicchino, chief deputy U.S. marshal, said his agents sealed off Courtroom 8, permitting entry only to authorized people. He said everyone who goes into the courtroom is photographed.

"Everything is going rather smoothly," he told reporters a few hours after the hearing began.

Staff writer Henry Weinstein contributed to this story.

PRESIDENTIAL COURT TESTIMONY

Former President Ronald Reagan waived his right of executive privilege to give videotaped evidence Friday that will be used in the defense of former National Security Adviser John M. Poindexter. Poindexter faces criminal charges arising from the Iran-Contra scandal. Reagan is not the first to provide court testimony:

1807: President Thomas Jefferson provided a sworn statement for the treason trial of Aaron Burr, who was accused of trying to foment a rebellion in part of the newly acquired Louisiana Purchase. Supreme Court Chief Justice John Marshall originally ruled that Jefferson could be compelled to appear in court but agreed on the precedent-setting compromise allowing the statement alone.

1870s: President Ulysses S. Grant gave a deposition in the criminal trial of his confidential secretary.

1975: President Gerald R. Ford presented testimony on videotape at the trial of his would-be assassin Lynette (Squeaky) Fromme.

1978: President Jimmy Carter provided on videotape testimony at a criminal trial in Georgia in which two state officials were charged with conspiracy to protect gambling interests. Carter had been Georgia's governor.

1980: President Jimmy Carter also presented videotape testimony for a grand jury investigating Robert Vesco, the fugitive financier.

1980: Former President Richard M. Nixon, after leaving office, appeared voluntarily as a witness at the trial of two ex-FBI agents, who were found guilty of authorizing illegal break-ins in search of fugitive members of the radical Weather Underground. Nixon also provided depositions in some Watergate-related trials.

Compiled by Times Researcher Aleta Embrey

GRAPHIC: Photo, COLOR, Former President Ronald Reagan leaves Los Angeles federal courthouse after first day of testimony. KEN LUBAS / Los Angeles Times

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

11TH STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

Chicago Tribune

February 23, 1990, Friday, NORTH SPORTS FINAL EDITION

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1; ZONE: C

LENGTH: 1407 words

HEADLINE: Reagan hazy on Iran-contra
Knowledge of diversion is denied

BYLINE: By Janet Cawley and Linda P. Campbell, Chicago Tribune

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:

Former President Ronald Reagan, in testimony made public Thursday, said he had no recollection of ever being told that profits from Iran weapons sales were diverted to the Nicaraguan contras, and that he "never had any inkling" White House aide Oliver North was secretly helping the guerrillas.

Reagan, who was subpoenaed by the defense in the upcoming trial of his onetime national security adviser, John Poindexter, neither clearly exonerated Poindexter nor critically undermined his defense. Nor did his videotaped testimony do much to answer questions about who authorized the diversion at a time when such aid to the contras was illegal.

But his deposition did reveal startling gaps in the memory of the 79-year-old former president. In all, Reagan said "I don't recall" or "I can't remember" 88 times in the eight hours of testimony taken Feb. 16-17 in Los Angeles.

At one point, Reagan said he could not identify Gen. John Vessey, who served for more than three years as his chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. At other times, he said he could not identify a picture of contra leader Adolfo Calero, could not recall a shipment of Hawk missiles to Iran in November 1985, had no memory of signing one presidential finding relating to the shipment of weapons to Iran and had only the slightest recollection of signing a second such finding.

He also appeared hazy on the identity of Eugene Hasenfus, an American whose shooting down over Nicaragua helped precipitate the unraveling of the then-secret Iran-contra operation. And Reagan seemed totally unable to recall what the Tower Commission - a panel he appointed in December 1986 to investigate the affair - said in its report three months later.

Despite concerns that some material would have to be withheld from the public because of national security considerations, the judge released the entire transcript of the deposition once the Bush administration said it saw no need for deletions.

In defense of his sporadic recollections, Reagan said that he had been told by statisticians that he met on the average with about 80 people a day for eight years and that 50 million pieces of paper accumulated during his presidency.

Reagan was clear and emphatic, however, on his dedication to the anti-communist contras, explaining his belief that the Soviet Union planned to "take Eastern Europe . . . organize the hordes of Asia and . . . move on to Latin America. And once having taken that . . . the United States would fall into their outstretched hand like overripe fruit."

The deposition was the former president's first testimony under oath about his knowledge of the Iran-contra affair.

The testimony also represents the first time a U.S. president has testified about his own conduct in office in connection with a criminal trial. President Gerald Ford provided videotaped testimony in the trial of Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme, who tried to assassinate him, and President Jimmy Carter gave videotaped depositions in two criminal trials and a grand jury investigation.

Wearing a dark suit with white shirt and dark tie, Reagan looked much like his presidential days, his hair grown back from minor brain surgery last year but showing a gray patch near the right temple.

Reagan was sworn in and, like any other witness, spelled his last name for the court reporter. He looked mildly nervous when U.S. District Judge Harold Greene thanked him for appearing despite the inconvenience, but seemed to relax when he recounted his background as a former president, California governor and actor.

"Prior to working in the movie business, I was a sports announcer in radio," he said.

Despite the objections of all parties in the case, Greene ordered the release of a 293-page transcript of the deposition and allowed reporters and members of the public to view a videoptape of it before the trial. But the judge said news organizations could not have copies of the videotapes until after they were played at the trial, because premature widespread showing could jeopardize Poindexter's right to a fair and impartial jury.

Poindexter, who testified during the 1987 Iran-contra congressional hearings that he never told Reagan about the diversion scheme to allow the president "plausible deniability," sat in the courtroom during Reagan's deposition.

Poindexter, who is charged with lying to Congress, obstruction of Congress and conspiracy, is scheduled to go on trial March 5. His defense appears to rest on the theory that Reagan either approved of or knew about his aides' secret activities on the contras' behalf.

Reagan denied any knowledge of the diversion. But he also emphasized that he repeatedly told his staff he wanted to help the contras in any way possible as long as no one broke the law.

There was a certain deference throughout the deposition proceedings, with Greene and the lawyers addressing Reagan as "Mr. President." Richard Beckler, Poindexter's lead attorney, who can be combative in court, was generally low-key in his questioning.

But Dan Webb, the former U.S. attorney in Chicago who is prosecuting the case for the independent counsel's office, sparred with Reagan several times over whether he knew about or approved the diversion of funds to the contras or the destruction of government records about the scheme.

At one point, a clearly agitated Reagan said, "for heaven's sake, no!" when Webb asked if he had approved or authorized a diversion of funds in violation of a law banning any such aid. But, he added, "no one has proven to me that there was a diversion."

He also said Poindexter should have told him about any diversion "if he knew about it . . . unless maybe he thought he was protecting me from something."

Reagan said he did not recall the Tower Commission's reporting that North and the National Security Council were providing military aid to the contras, who were waging war against Nicaragua's Sandinista government. When asked whether the panel ever explained how the U.S. received more than $12.2 million it was owed for a shipment of TOW anti-tank missiles to Iran, and how excess profits might have been diverted, he said he didn't think it was explained.

When Webb said the answer was "completely unresponsive," Reagan shot back, "I don't think it is unresponsive to state what I appointed the commission to do and what I tried to get from them, and they could not supply that information until this day."

Reagan said prosecutors for the first time were bringing to his attention the Tower Commission's reference to a diversion.

"This is the first time I have ever seen that," Reagan said.

President Bush's national security adviser, Brent Scowcroft, who also was a member of the Tower Commission, said Thursday that Reagan had been briefed on the report at the time. White House reporters recalled that when the report was released in February 1987, Reagan held a copy aloft and said he planned to take it to Camp David to study.

As for North's participating in the illegal scheme to aid the contras, Reagan said, "I never had any inkling" such a thing was going on.

He also said he and North "did not meet frequently or anything of that kind, nor do I remember ever having a single meeting with him, as has been hinted at times by others."

In trying to explain his faulty memory, Reagan said at one point that his administration was concerned with more than "this Iranian issue."

"That was just one of many things that were going on," he said. "The government was involved in things of great import, not only having to do with domestic problems, but with the Cold War and things of that kind, and trying to arrive at treaties with regard to nuclear weapons and so forth."

Perhaps the most startling lapse in Reagan's memory involved Vessey, who was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from 1982 to 1985.

His name arose when Beckler referred to a Central American trip made by Vessey and then asked Reagan to explain who Vessey was.

"Oh, dear," the former president said. "I could ask for help here. The name I know is very familiar . . ."

At Vessey's retirement in 1985, Reagan said to the army general, "A career like yours, combining as it does heroism, patriotism, competence, wisdom and kindness, doesn't need elaboration from commanders in chief or presidents. It speaks enough all by itself, and today I'll let history be your valedictorian, not me."

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

IC investigation of Carter peanut business – transcripts given to GJ

4TH STORY of Focus printed in FULL format.

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC

June 14, 1994 Tuesday, Final Chaser

SECTION: FRONT; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 577 words

HEADLINE: CLINTON WHITEWATER TESTIMONY IS MORE GRIST FOR SCHOLARS TO MILL

BYLINE: By Ann McFeatters, Scripps Howard

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:

President Clinton's testimony under oath before the Whitewater prosecutor Sunday was not unprecedented, but it is one more issue added to a legal pad full of presidential legal problems that have stirred debate among constitutional scholars.

For a presidency that is only 18 months old, the list of constitutional issues is surprisingly long.

No specifics were released Monday of what Clinton provided independent counsel Robert Fiske about Whitewater, the suicide of White House legal aide Vincent Foster, or a possible White House cover-up of Whitewater.

The session in the White House residence lasted 90 minutes, and a stenographer took notes.

Hillary Clinton had a separate hourlong interview.

The very act of their testifying has raised questions.

Can a president perjure himself if he lies under oath administered by a court reporter? The answer is decisively yes, constitutional lawyers say.

Less certain is whether a president can be indicted for something he says under oath or fails to say.

Some legal scholars say he can, but others say that is what the impeachment process is all about. The uproar over President Gerald Ford's pardon of his predecessor, Richard Nixon, was all about allowing the former president to escape a possible indictment.

Special White House counsel Lloyd Cutler issued a statement Monday saying that the Clintons voluntarily decided to give their testimony under oath to Fiske because they want to cooperate fully.

It would have been a messy predicament for everyone if the Clintons had refused. They have steadfastly said they would not invoke executive privilege, as Nixon did during Watergate.

Jimmy Carter was the first sitting president to provide sworn testimony in a criminal investigation. He testified under oath for four hours at the White House to independent counsel Paul Curran, who was investigating the handling of loans to Carter's family peanut business. Curran handed the testimony over to a federal grand jury in Atlanta, and his final report found unequivocally no illegality.

Ronald Reagan testified to the Tower Commission about the Iran-contra scandal, and so did his vice president, George Bush. There were strong hints by Iran-contra independent counsel Lawrence Walsh in his final report that he believed that both Reagan and Bush had lied about the extent of their knowledge about the sale of arms to Iran and the diversion of funds to the Nicaraguan contras and the subsequent cover-up.

No personal legal action was ever brought against either man. Bush also testified under oath as president, denying a plot for an "October surprise" to free 52 Americans held hostage in Iran as an election-year benefit for Reagan.

Another unresolved question is whether the Clintons will pay the entire legal bill they will owe when the Whitewater issue is finally resolved. Just the appearance of their Whitewater lawyer, David Kendall, at the White House residence Sunday will result in a bill of about $1,000, let alone his preparation time. Also present Sunday was Cutler, who is temporarily serving as White House lawyer without pay.

Eventually, according to Mrs. Clinton, the Clintons could owe hundreds of thousands of dollars in legal fees.

The White House has floated a trial balloon of setting up a legal-defense fund to raise money through private channels. That has made many people uneasy because of the potential for conflicts of interest.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 1994

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

The New York Times

April 1, 1989, Saturday, Late City Final Edition

SECTION: Section 1; Page 1, Column 1; National Desk

LENGTH: 1023 words

HEADLINE: JUDGE WON'T ORDER REAGAN TESTIMONY ✓

BYLINE: By DAVID JOHNSTON, Special to the New York Times

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, March 31

BODY:

The judge in the trial of Oliver L. North today emphatically rejected an attempt to force Ronald Reagan to appear as a witness, declaring that no written evidence had yet been found to suggest that Mr. Reagan authorized the illegal acts Mr. North is accused of committing.

The ruling by Federal District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell dealt a blow to Mr. North, whose attorneys wanted the former President summoned as their first witness when the defense began its case Monday.

''There has been no showing that President Reagan's appearance is necessary to assure Lieutenant Colonel North a fair trial,'' the order read. ''Accordingly, the subpoena is quashed.''

Mr. Reagan, in response to the judge's order, told a California television station that he would have resisted efforts to force his appearance.

''I made up my mind I wasn't going,'' the former President told KESQ-TV, an ABC affiliate in Palm Springs. ''I think it would have set a precedent that the next President doesn't have a right to impose on other Presidents. No President has ever been subpoenaed.'' While no President has been ordered to testify about decisions he made in office, subpoenas have been issued in criminal cases to chief executives.

Judge Gesell also turned down a defense motion to dismiss all 12 criminal charges against the former aide to the National Security Council. The charges include making false statements to Congress and obstructing an Attorney General's investigation into the Iran-contra affair.

In announcing his decision, the judge said sufficient evidence had been produced by the prosecution to warrant submitting all the charges to the jury. He said his determination was based on his belief that there was sufficient evidence for a jury to decide whether ''the defendant is guilty on all of the counts.'' The jury was not in the courtroom at the time.

No 'Generalized Inquiry'

As the judge uttered the word ''guilty,'' Mr. North's resolutely impassive countenance seemed to crack. He looked up, his face creased as if in pain, and slowly shook his head. After a few seconds, he assumed the same grave demeanor he has displayed throughout the trial, staring toward a far wall and slowly tapping a felt tip pen on a pad.

Without Mr. Reagan, it is not clear whom Mr. North's lawyers will present in his defense. The chief defense lawyer, Brendan V. Sullivan Jr., has said he would ask the judge to show the jury a four-hour videotape of John M. Poindexter's testimony before the Iran-contra Congressional committees. Mr. Poindexter, the former national security adviser, testified that he had approved some of Mr. North's activities.

The order waiving Mr. Reagan's appearance appeared to foreclose the possibility that he would soon be asked under oath to clarify his role in the Iran-contra affair, the central unanswered question.

The judge acknowledged a widespread desire to know more about Mr. Reagan's actions, but he rejected public interest as a reason to compel Mr. Reagan's appearance. ''While there is understandable public interest in what a President may have known or may have done, the focus of North's trial does not involve any necessity for such a generalized inquiry,'' the judge said.

The former President has emerged in the trial as the central offstage character in the drama. Defense lawyers have said repeatedly that he was the ultimate inspiration and authority for Mr. North's actions.

But the judge concluded that there was no written evidence to suggest that Mr. Reagan authorized any of the activities that are the subject of the charges against Mr. North.

''The written record has been exhausted in this regard,'' the judge said, in material presented so far in the trial, in the secret documents furnished to the court in any public records, in an extensive written statement given by Mr. Reagan in late 1987 in response to questions from Government prosecutors or in portions of Mr. Reagan's personal diary obtained by prosecutors.

The judge said, however, that Mr. Reagan's approval of the broad policies under which Mr. North operated was clear from the former President's public statements, previous investigations and the trial record.

Mr. Reagan encouraged his subordinates to support the Nicaraguan rebels in spite of a Congressional ban on Government assistance from 1984 to 1986 and in Janurary 1986 authorized covert arms sales to Iran, the proceeds of which were diverted to aid the rebels.

The specific charges against Mr. North stem in large part from his efforts to conceal his activities in the arms sales and in behalf of the contras.

Judge Gesell said his decision was rooted squarely in the failure of the defense to show that Mr. Reagan's testimony was needed, rather than on legal theories that contend former Presidents are immune from appearing at criminal trials.

Jefferson Subpoenaed

No sitting President has ever testified in court in a criminal trial, although a few Presidents and former Presidents have provided testimony or its equivalent in criminal trials and grand jury proceedings.

Thomas Jefferson received a subpoena in 1807 demanding that he turn over a letter sought by defense lawyers in the treason case against Aaron Burr, Mr. Jefferson's first Vice President.

Chief Justice John Marshall, who presided over the trial, declared that the President was subject to law. After first resisting, Mr. Jefferson submitted the letter, making clear that his decision was voluntary.

During the 1974 trial in the cover-up of the Watergate affair, John D. Ehrlichman, a domestic policy adviser at the Nixon White House, sought Mr. Nixon's appearance. But the President was too ill to appear.

In 1975, Gerald R. Ford consented to a videotaped interview for use in the trial of Lynette Fromme, who was convicted of attempting to assassinate him. In 1980, Jimmy Carter answered questions on a videotape in a grand jury investigation of Robert L. Vesco, the fugitive financier.

In 1980, Mr. Nixon appeared as a witness in the trial of two former officials of the Federal Bureau of Investigation who had been accused of conducting illegal break-ins.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

March 31, 1989, Friday, AM cycle

LENGTH: 473 words

HEADLINE: ALLOWING PRESIDENT'S TESTIMONY WOULD BREAK U.S. PRECEDENT

BYLINE: By Deborah Zabarenko

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, March 31

BODY:
Friday's ruling by a judge against forcing Ronald Reagan to testify in Oliver North's defense is in line with two centuries of U.S. history.

No president or former president has ever been compelled to testify in open court, according to the Justice Department.

The issue of executive privilege -- the privilege of chief executives to refuse to testify -- was first raised by Thomas Jefferson, who received a subpoena in 1807 demanding that he turn over a letter sought by defense lawyers in the treason case against Aaron Burr, Jefferson's first vice president.

Jefferson cited the independence of the executive branch from the judicial branch and refused, at first, to release the letter. Eventually, he turned it over, but made it clear his decision was voluntary and not in response to the subpoena.

President James Monroe was served with a subpoena to testify at a criminal trial, but based on his attorney general's advice, he declined, saying his presidential duties were paramount.

He said he would submit to a deposition -- in which attorneys would interview him outside court -- but the court instead submitted written questions to him, called interrogatories, which he answered.

Reagan has already answered interrogatories submitted to the grand jury that ultimately returned the indictment against fired White House aide North. Judge Gerhard Gesell ruled Friday that Reagan need not testify to guarantee North a fair trial.

Abraham Lincoln voluntarily appeared before a congressional committee.

Ulysses S. Grant at first volunteered to testify at a criminal trial, but after consulting with his staff chose to give a deposition instead.

Richard Nixon, the only president to resign, was ordered to produce the Watergate tapes in response to a subpoena after the tapes were shown to be necessary to the fair administration of justice.

Gerald Ford gave a deposition for the trial of Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme, who attempted to assassinate him, but his statement concerned only his eyewitness account of the attempt on his life, not the way he carried out his presidential duties.

Reuters, March 31, 1989

Former presidents John Tyler and John Quincy Adams appeared before congressional committees in response to subpoenas in the investigation of whether their Secretary of State Daniel Webster improperly disbursed funds from a confidential fund.

And Nixon gave several depositions after he resigned.

The Justice Department claims that in the case of presidents and former presidents, a "high threshhold of relevance" is required to compel testimony. That is, litigants must make absolutely clear that the president's testimony or deposition is essential to assure a fair trial.

When Nixon claimed executive privilege, the court denied it only because of "the demonstrated, specific need for evidence in a pending criminal trial."

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

Los Angeles Times

March 25, 1989, Saturday, Home Edition

SECTION: Part 1; Page 14; Column 1; National Desk

LENGTH: 976 words

HEADLINE: NORTH LAWYERS RENEW BID FOR REAGAN TO TESTIFY; JUDGE DECLINES TO RULE BUT LEGAL SOURCES SAY EX-PRESIDENT MAY HAVE TO APPEAR

BYLINE: By ROBERT L. JACKSON, Times Staff Writer

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:
Attorneys for Oliver L. North renewed their request Friday to compel former President Ronald Reagan to testify at the fired White House aide's trial, amid growing indications that the former President eventually will have to take the witness stand in the Iran-Contra case.

U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell declined to make an immediate ruling on the brief motion by North's defense but legal sources close to both sides of the case said that they expect Reagan will be required to appear at some point.

The six weeks of testimony in the trial have provided more substantial grounds for questioning the former President about his instructions to subordinates on aid for the Nicaragua's Contra rebels at a time when it was banned by Congress, the sources said.

Defense Given Latitude

During the trial, Gesell has shown his willingness to give North's lawyers broad latitude in questioning witnesses.

Brendan V. Sullivan Jr., North's principal attorney, said in his motion that "the importance of Mr. Reagan's testimony to the defense of this case is clear."

A spokesman for independent counsel Lawrence E. Walsh's office, which is prosecuting the case, said that prosecutors probably will remain neutral on the issue, but a Justice Department spokesman said that the agency "will pursue" its pending court motion to block an earlier defense subpoena for Reagan.

Theodore B. Olson, a Washington attorney who is representing Reagan, declined immediate comment.

In January, Gesell quashed North's subpoena for the testimony of President Bush but refused to quash a similar subpoena for Reagan. The judge hinted that he might order Reagan's appearance later if testimony at the trial showed it to be necessary.

May Call Hearing

One lawyer in the case, who asked to remain anonymous, predicted that Gesell would call a hearing next week before reaching a decision. The lawyer said he doubts, in any event, that Reagan will have to appear as early as March 31 as requested in Sullivan's latest motion.

In presenting the government's case, prosecutor John W. Keker has elicited extensive testimony that the retired Marine officer and former National Security Council aide made false statements to Congress and obstructed congressional inquiries into his secret efforts to support the Contras. Those are the principal allegations among 12 felony counts on which North is being tried.

But in cross-examination of key prosecution witnesses, Sullivan has attempted to show that North had top-level authorization for his efforts to aid the rebels and that Reagan had a greater role than previously known.

Trial testimony has shown that the former President, for example, passed instructions to his subordinates that they should, in the words of former National Security Adviser Robert C. McFarlane, "keep the Freedom Fighters (Contras) together, body and soul," after Congress cut off military aid in 1984.

Not to Share Information

McFarlane, who testified for five days, also said that Reagan approved soliciting funds from U.S. allies to make up for the lost funding and warned that the existence of this effort was "not to be shared" with Congress.

Reagan underscored this admonition by telling his top aides that "we'll all be hanging by our thumbs in front of the White House" if Congress found out that his Administration was seeking Contra funds from other nations, according to McFarlane and official minutes of a June 25, 1984, meeting.

Witnesses have suggested that Reagan thought Congress would refuse ever to resume aid if it learned of this unofficial substitute assistance.

No testimony or evidence introduced to date has countered the allegation that North deliberately misled Congress. But Sullivan hopes to convince the jury that the retired Marine lieutenant colonel, following the directions of his commander-in-chief, had "no criminal intent" in his actions and that this should be considered a key mitigating factor, legal sources said. To that end, they said, direct testimony from Reagan seems highly relevant.

Deference to Presidents

Legal precedent protects a sitting President from being compelled to testify at a trial in all but the most extreme circumstances, attorneys say. But such deference may no longer shield him after he leaves office, they said.

During the Watergate scandal, U.S. District Judge John J. Sirica agreed with a request of former White House aide John D. Ehrlichman that former President Richard M. Nixon should be called to testify as a defense witness.

Nixon, suffering from phlebitis at his home in San Clemente, objected that he was too ill to travel to Washington. Sirica, however, was so insistent that he sent a panel of court-appointed doctors to examine the former President and only relented after the doctors reported that Nixon was seriously ill.

If Reagan is compelled to testify in the trial's remaining two months, the former President likely would be pressed about his instructions to his staff and the extent of his knowledge of their activities.

Statements by Reagan

In his statements on the Iran-Contra scandal, Reagan has said that he did not know North was directly advising and assisting the Contras and that he did not approve or direct any illegal actions.

Asked by Keker if Reagan ever recommended lying to Congress, McFarlane simply answered in the negative. He did not say that Reagan counseled against lying, however, and other prosecution witnesses suggested that North is not the kind of person who would understand the subtle difference between lying and not sharing information.

North has been portrayed by these witnesses, called by the prosecution, as a deeply religious, dedicated, high-energy military officer with a "can do" attitude toward any order given him by a superior officer, especially his commander-in-chief.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

4TH STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

The Associated Press

January 4, 1989, Wednesday, PM cycle

SECTION: Washington Dateline

LENGTH: 577 words

HEADLINE: North Tactic Revives Old Debate: Can A President Be Forced To Testify?

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:

The effort by Oliver North to compel President Reagan and President-elect Bush to testify at his Iran-Contra trial has renewed a debate, almost as old as the Union, over "executive privilege."

Can a president, or a former one, be forced to testify in a legal case? Courts have provided little guidance, but constitutional experts said Tuesday that North's legal tactic may succeed.

No sitting president ever has testified in court in a criminal trial, but several have provided testimony or what might be considered the equivalent.

The personal stakes are high for North. The former White House aide is charged with theft, conspiracy to defraud the government and several other felonies in the case involving the support of Nicaraguan rebels with money from the sale of U.S. weapons to Iran.

His trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 31 - just 11 days after Bush is to succeed Reagan. Besides Reagan and Bush, subpoenas also have been issued for other key figures in the Reagan administration, including Secretary of State George P. Shultz and four other State Department officials.

The man who first tried to force a president to testify was Aaron Burr, a former vice president who stood trial in 1807 on charges of treason.

Burr sought to force Thomas Jefferson, the president under whom he had served, to testify at the trial.

Jefferson resisted. But Chief Justice John Marshall, presiding over the trial, ruled against Jefferson. The president eventually avoided having to appear by releasing some information Burr had sought.

The closest the Supreme Court has come to ruling on the issue presented by North's subpoena came in the Watergate tapes decision of 1974, in a case called Nixon vs. U.S.

The court then ruled, 8-0, that President Richard M. Nixon had to comply with a special prosecutor's subpoena seeking the surrender of White House tape recordings.

"The general assertion of privilege must yield to the demonstrated, specific need for evidence in a pending criminal trial," the high court ruled 15 years ago.

Jerome Barron, a law professor at George Washington University here, said Tuesday the 1974 decision is a strong precedent for North.

"Whether Mr. Reagan or Mr. Bush can be subpoenaed was resolved in Nixon vs. U.S., and the answer is yes," Barron said.

"If the evidence (sought by North) is material, I think Reagan and Bush can be required to appear," Barron said.

On the other hand, unnamed Justice Department sources were quoted by The Washington Post as saying that Nixon vs. U.S. offers support for fighting subpoenas of Reagan and Bush. They said the Supreme Court emphasized that its Watergate-tapes decision did not deal with a claim of privilege based on national security grounds.

Justice Department and White House officials have said they will try to have the subpoenas thrown out.

Stanley Brand, a Washington lawyer who once served as general counsel to the House of Representatives, said North may succeed.

"My sense is North has a good claim. The president was involved in the process, and one of North's defenses is that he was serving the president by following orders," Brand said.

In 1975, then-President Gerald R. Ford gave a videotaped deposition in the trial of Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme, who was convicted of trying to assassinate Ford. The videotape was played for jurors at Fromme's trial.

While in office, President Jimmy Carter provided videotaped testimony in two criminal prosecutions.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

The Associated Press

August 25, 1982, Wednesday, AM cycle

SECTION: Domestic News

LENGTH: 366 words

HEADLINE: Lawyer Says Can't Get Past Door to Serve Nixon With Subpoena

BYLINE: By BOB SPRINGER, Associated Press Writer

DATELINE: SPRINGFIELD, Ill.

BODY:
Process servers have been unable to get past U.S. Secret Service agents to serve former President Richard M. Nixon with a subpoena seeking written testimony, the lawyer for an Illinois couple suing Ford Motor Co. said Wednesday.

Nixon's written deposition is sought along with ones from Henry Ford II and Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca in a $4.5 million damage suit brought by Donald and Peggy Sweet of rural Mechanicsburg.

The couple contends the three men met in the White House in 1971 and discussed relaxation of federal regulations on fuel tank safety. Ford was chairman of the No. 2 U.S. automaker, and Iacocca was president of Ford at the time.

Mrs. Sweet suffered third-degree burns over most of her body, and the couple's child also was injured, when the gas tank of their 1969 Ford station wagon exploded after the vehicle was hit in the rear by a truck near Litchfield, Ill., about 35 miles south of Springfield.

Thomas Tobin of Chicago, attorney for Ford Motor Co., has called the depositions a "fishing expedition." He said last week that the Sweets don't know if the alleged conversation between the former president and the two auto company officials took place or, if it did, the date and time of such a meeting.

Thomas Londrigan, the Sweets' attorney, said in an interview Wednesday that private process servers have been blocked so far from delivering the subpoena on Nixon. He said the former president either has been away from his New Jersey home or New York City office, or Secret Service agents have blocked the servers' path to his door.

Londrigan said he may ask a federal judge in New York to use U.S. marshals to deliver the subpoena if the private servers' efforts continue to be unsuccessful.

Londrigan spoke after a hearing in which U.S. District Judge Harold Baker denied a request by lawyers for Henry Ford that the deposition not be required of him.

Baker upheld last Friday's denial by a U.S. magistrate of an identical request to quash the subpoena for Ford, and set Sept. 7 for taking written testimony from him.

A federal judge in Detroit has not ruled on a request by Iacocca's lawyers that the subpoeana for his deposition be quashed.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

2ND STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

January 30, 1989, Monday, Late Final Edition

SECTION: Part 1; Page 1; Column 6; Late Final Desk

LENGTH: 502 words

HEADLINE: BUSH EXCUSED FROM NORTH TRIAL; REAGAN PUT ON CALL; PRESIDENT'S SUBPOENA QUASHED

BYLINE: From Times Wire Services

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:
The federal judge in the Iran-Contra case threw out Oliver L. North's subpoena of President Bush but ruled today that former President Ronald Reagan can be compelled to testify in the case against his former aide.

U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell, clearing one of the last obstacles to the scheduled start of North's trial Tuesday, ruled that the former White House aide had made no showing that Bush "has any specific information relevant and material" to the charges against North.

Gesell said Reagan "shall remain subject to call" to testify in the case but said in his three-page order that there would be further proceedings if it is found necessary to summon the former President as a witness.

Gesell also quashed, with "one narrow exception," North's subpoena for Reagan's personal diary.

The judge said portions of the diary might become part of the trial "if at some point" North's defense team "supports a claim that President Reagan ordered, directed, requested or, with advance knowledge, condoned any of North's" alleged criminal activities in the diversion of Iranian arm-sales profits to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

'Production Procedure'

In that event, Gesell said, "an appropriate production procedure" must be developed for reviewing the former President's diary and determining whether any of the entries support North's assertions.

North contended in testimony at the congressional Iran-Contra hearings in 1987 that all of his activities were authorized by superiors in the Reagan Administration and that he reported to former national security advisers Robert C. McFarlane and John M. Poindexter.

Government lawyers had challenged the subpoena for testimony by Reagan and Bush as unprecedented.

They argued on constitutional grounds that Reagan and Bush enjoyed executive privilege and could not be forced to testify on sensitive national security issues.

Gesell's order implemented a tactic he had indicated at a hearing Friday that he would use with regard to Reagan's testimony. Gesell said then that circumstances may change as evidence is introduced at the trial and that testimony of certain individuals may become relevant.

The 12 counts against North include obstruction of Congress, destruction of documents and acceptance of illegal gifts.

2 Counts Thrown Out

The two key counts returned against North March 16 -- conspiracy to defraud the government and theft of government property -- were thrown out earlier this month. An interagency committee of intelligence experts feared that trial on those two charges could expose so much classified information that the national security would be jeopardized.

If convicted on all counts, North faces a maximum 60 years in prison and $3 million in fines.

Independent prosecutor Lawrence E. Walsh has turned over trial duties to his chief deputy, John Keker.

Jury selection is expected to take about two weeks, and lawyers for both sides have predicted that the trial will take about five months.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

June 16, 1989, Friday, AM cycle

LENGTH: 496 words

HEADLINE: BUSH, REAGAN TO BE SUBPOENAED AT POINDEXTER IRAN-CONTRA TRIAL

BYLINE: By James Vicini

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 16

BODY:

Attorneys for former White House aide John Poindexter said on Friday they plan to subpoena President George Bush and former President Ronald Reagan at his Iran-Contra trial.

But prosecutors announced that they would move to drop the must serious charges against Poindexter, just as they had been forced to do in the case against his onetime White House aide, Oliver North. They said they were concerned that national security secrets might be revealed.

If the charges are dropped, it may not be necessary to subpoena Bush and Reagan, the prosecutors said.

The charges go to the heart of the Iran-Contra scandal, alleging wrongdoing in the secret scheme to sell weapons to Iran and divert millions of dollars in profits to the Nicaraguan Contra rebels in 1985-86, when Congress had banned military aid to them.

The disclosure of the subpoenas at a pre-trial hearing raised the prospect of new problems for Bush and Reagan, both of whom have been trying to put the Iran-Contra scandal behind them.

"My client had substantial contact with both individuals during the events outlined in the indictment," defence attorney Richard Beckler said.

Poindexter, the White House national security adviser under Reagan, has taken responsibility for authorising the covert activities conducted during the Iran-Contra affair. Bush was vice president at the time.

Both Reagan and Bush received defence subpoenas at North's Iran-Contra trial, but the judge in that case ruled that their testimony was not necessary or relevant.

During the North trial, there was damaging evidence and testimony showing that Bush and Reagan had been actively involved in the efforts to support the Nicaraguan Contra rebels.

Independent special prosecutor Lawrence Walsh said he plans to seek next week the dismissal of the two most serious charges involving theft of government property and fraud and the narrowing of the conspiracy charge against Poindexter.

Reuters; June 16, 1989

He said the defence was seeking documents of the "utmost sensitivity."

The same conspiracy and theft charges had to be dropped against North after the Bush administration in January refused to make publicly available at the trial classified documents demanded by the defence.

The prosecutors previously had hoped to salvage the three charges against Poindexter, arguing that the North trial showed that the case could go forward without jeopardising national security.

The four other charges against Poindexter allege obstruction of Congress and making false statements about the scandal. No trial date has been set.

North, who was an aide to Poindexter, is scheduled to be sentenced on June 23 after being found guilty of helping to obstruct Congress in its efforts to learn about the scandal in 1986, shredding secret documents and accepting an illegal gratuity in the form of a 14,000-dollar home security fence.

North, who was acquitted on nine other counts, faces up to 10 years in prison and 750,000 dollars in fines.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

LOAD-DATE: 061689

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

The Associated Press

February 6, 1990, Tuesday, AM cycle

SECTION: Washington Dateline

LENGTH: 627 words

HEADLINE: Appeals Judge Questions Why Reagan Didn't Testify for North

BYLINE: By PETE YOST, Associated Press Writer

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:
A federal appeals judge hearing Oliver North's Iran-Contra case Tuesday questioned why North wasn't allowed to call former President Reagan as a defense witness at his trial.

During nearly 2 hours of arguments, U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Laurence Silberman noted that Reagan's written answers to questions in the Iran-Contra affair were submitted to a grand jury, but were never provided to North's lawyers.

Silberman, one of three judges who will rule on North's appeal of his conviction on three felony counts, asked why, "as a matter of basic fairness" Reagan's written answers weren't turned over to the defendant.

Government attorney Gerard Lynch said the judgment was made that Reagan's written answers would not have been "helpful" to North and so weren't turned over.

"But our system ... is based on" giving someone accused of a crime wide latitude in obtaining information for his defense, responded Silberman.

The appeals court panel consists of Silberman and David Sentelle, both Reagan administration appointees, and Carter administration appointee Patricia Wald, chief judge of the appeals court.

Indicating that Reagan's written answers in the Iran-Contra inquiry may have been more general than specific, Silberman said that "what troubles me is we don't have a very good idea" of what Reagan might have said as a defense witness for North.

If North had worked in the State Department and Reagan had been secretary of state, there would have been no question that he would have been called to testify, said Silberman.

North, who was convicted of aiding and abetting an obstruction of Congress, altering and destroying National Security Council documents and accepting an illegal gratuity, argued that all his activities were approved by his superiors, national security adviser John Poindexter and Reagan.

Silberman also questioned whether Poindexter's videotaped testimony on Capitol Hill should have been admitted as evidence at the North trial.

"Only two people were north of North ... the president and Admiral Poindexter," said Silberman.

Lynch emphasized that "North's own testimony" was that he never met alone with Reagan, and that North "never said the president told him to do anything."

Silberman said that even if Reagan didn't specifically authorize the actions for which North was convicted of crimes, the ex-president's testimony might have been helpful to North.

"Suppose the ex-president says that 'I never gave specific authorization' (but) 'I did indicate that I didn't wish this information to be revealed," said Silberman.

Defense attorney Barry Simon said Reagan should have been called to confirm that he authorized keeping secret from Congress the U.S. connection to a November 1985 shipment of Hawk missiles from Israel to Iran.

Lynch conceded that North may have gotten the "impression" from Poindexter that the U.S. role was to be kept secret. But Lynch argued that North knew he was committing a wrongful act when he obstructed Congress from learning of the issue.

"We're not talking about keeping secrets from enemies of the United States" or "even the public," said Lynch.

At North's trial, U.S. District Court Judge Gerhard Gesell quashed a subpoena for Reagan's appearance. The judge ruled there was no evidence in the record to suggest that the former president authorized any illegal activities by North.

Gesell also rejected a request to admit as evidence portions of Poindexter's congressional testimony on videotaped segments which were prepared by North's trial team.

Gesell on July 5 placed North on probation for two years, fined him $$150,000 and sentenced him to 1,200 hours of community service. North is performing the community service while appealing the convictions and fine.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

1ST ITEM of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

58 U.S.L.W. 1126

February 20, 1990

LENGTH: 360 words

SECTION: SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS.

TITLE: Former President Reagan Must Give Taped Testimony In Iran-Contra Trial.

TEXT:

The great majority of some 183 questions Iran-Contra defendant John Poindexter proposes to ask former President Reagan are material to his defense, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held Feb. 5 as it ordered Reagan to give testimony via videotaped deposition for use at the defendant's trial. Historical practice and precedent from the Watergate era led the court to reject the argument that a president can never be compelled to testify in a criminal proceeding; however, concerns about national security and trial administration supported the videotape procedure, the court said. (U.S. v. Poindexter, DC DC, No. 88-0080-01 (HHG), 2/5/90)

As of this decision, the former president had not yet asserted executive privilege in opposition to the defendant's subpoena. Nevertheless, the court said, Reagan's testimony should be required only if it meets a "meticulous standard" of materiality and is "necessary" in the sense of being a more logical and persuasive source of evidence than available alternatives.

Most of the questions proposed by the defendant--dealing with private conversations between Reagan and the defendant, Reagan's understanding of the "Boland Amendment," which barred intelligence agencies from providing support to the Contras, and courses of action discussed in the event Congress restricted military aid to the Contras--satisfy this heightened standard, the court said, since they go to the heart of the defendant's contention that he lacked the specific intent to engage in criminal conduct.

There is no precedent for compelled in-court testimony by a former president, the court noted; on the other hand, written answers to interrogatories cannot fulfill the essence of the defendant's Sixth Amendment right. However, taking Reagan's testimony by videotape has the virtue of permitting him to fully exercise his right to claim executive privilege, if he so chooses, while at the same time eliminating the inevitable disruptions repeated claims of privilege would cause at trial. Moreover, the court said, national security concerns argue in favor of taking Reagan's testimony in a private setting.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

February 26, 1990

SECTION: THE POINDEXTER TRIAL; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 1673 words

HEADLINE: Reagan Testimony Takes Center Stage

BYLINE: BY FRED STRASSER, National Law Journal Staff Reporter; An NLJ News Analysis

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:

It began as a clash among the branches of government over control of foreign policy. And five years after the events that bloomed into the Iran-Contra affair occurred, the tumultuous constitutional battle continues as former national security adviser John M. Poindexter prepares to go on trial next month.

Legally, the case is a knot of fascinating issues, but the questions of fact are fairly unexciting. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh saw to that last year when he pressured prosecutors not to use classified information needed to support the central conspiracy charges of the original indictment.

So what's left is largely the same question jurors faced with Mr. Poindexter's far more subordinate, Oliver L. North. Did Mr. Poindexter, the president's right-hand man, intentionally lie to Congress about arms sales to Iran and deceive Capitol Hill about the administration's militant support of Nicaraguan Contras at a time Congress had banned military aid? And did he conspire with others to carry out the deception and destroy documents to derail efforts to uncover it?

The answers will include some replay of Mr. North's case. What has breathed new energy into this fading political scandal, however, is defense witness Ronald Reagan, who, for the first time in the Iran-Contra affair, is being forced to testify under oath and whose personal diaries -- if surrendered -- could become important evidence for the defense.

There is every indication from the defense attorneys' moves that Mr. Poindexter, who good-soldiered for his boss during immunized testimony before Congress in 1987, is now ready to point upward to the last rung in the Iran-Contra affair and argue that Mr. Reagan had the final responsibility for Mr. Poindexter's acts.

The Role Mr. Reagan will play in the case, however, remains in doubt. Indeed, his failure to play a significant one could lead to dismissal of the charges altogether, observers say.

Softened Stance

In the ongoing battle of the branches, Mr. Reagan dropped his relatively weak claim of executive privilege with respect to any appearance as a witness and agreed to give a videotaped deposition. But he has offered no assurances about what he will say in response to the 154 questions approved by U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene, or whether he will assert the executive privilege claim of presidential privacy on key questions. It would then be up to the judge to rule on each item as to whether Mr. Reagan's interest in the privilege outweighed Mr. Poindexter's need for the information to obtain a fair trial.

In addition, the Bush administration has not taken a final position on Mr. Reagan's executive privilege claims yet -- a decision that could be critical. As Judge Greene has made clear, the sitting president represents the institution of the presidency and presumably knows better than the former president what impact a breach of customary confidentiality would have. President Bush, therefore, is entitled to assert executive privilege over Mr. Reagan's testimony or diaries on the grounds of protecting state secrets or serving foreign policy goals.

With the ghost of Richard Nixon and Watergate hanging over even the term "executive privilege," Mr. Reagan's lawyers demurred on its use until Judge Greene demanded it. The administration presumably is no more inclined toward pursuing the claim and could simply argue the information Mr. Poindexter wants from the former president is classified and cannot be used -- a decision the attorney general has the power to make.

Then, if Judge Greene decides Mr. Poindexter cannot get a fair trial without it, the charges would be dismissed, as happened in federal court in Alexandria, Va., last November with the indictment of Joseph Fernandez, the former CIA station chief in Costa Rica who assisted Mr. North's resupply operation.

With respect to the 33 diary entries that Judge Greene ordered turned over to the defense and for which Mr. Reagan asserted executive privilege, the judge seems to be less intent on demanding compliance now that Mr. Reagan has agreed to testify. At a hearing Feb. 13, the judge pressed the defense attorneys, led by Richard W. Beckler of the Washington office of Houston's Fulbright & Jaworski, on why the diaries were necessary when Mr. Reagan himself would testify. Mr. Beckler responded that they were important to help prepare for Mr. Reagan's interrogation.

And problems with classified information are not confined to the evidence Mr. Poindexter is seeking from the former president. Although the trial had been scheduled for Feb. 20, Judge Greene changed the date to March 5 after it was disclosed publicly for the first time during the same hearing that prosecutors and defense lawyers are locked in dispute over the handling of more than 150 classified documents proposed for use as evidence. Again, if Judge Greene finds they are necessary to Mr. Poindexter's defense and the attorney general refuses to make them available -- or summaries or redacted versions are not sufficient -- some or all of the charges could be dismissed.

If the prosecution clears the remaining hurdles, it appears likely Mr. Poindexter will build his defense by showing Mr. Reagan was active and involved in setting and executing policy rather than being the aloof, distant figure he described during immunized testimony before the congressional Iran-Contra Investigating committee in July 1987.

In that testimony, Mr. Poindexter portrayed his commander in chief as someone who was not "a man for great detail." As a result, Mr. Reagan knew nothing whatsoever about the diversion of proceeds from the Iranian arms sales and understood only in the most general terms the Contra support efforts of his National Security Council aides, Mr. Poindexter said.

But now, Mr. Poindexter has changed his tune. Instead, court papers show, , he will argue he routinely received private direction from the president on both the arms sales and the secret Contra support operation.

In changing the tune, however, Mr. Poindexter must stick at least to the theme. While he received immunity for his congressional testimony, he is not immune to perjury charges if he contradicts it too sharply. But most observers think the military bureaucrat covered himself adequately by speaking in generalities.

'Spirit and Letter'

As Mr. Beckler struggled to make clear at pretrial hearings, the ex-admiral does not claim that President Reagan authorized him to break the law. Rather, they argue, Mr. Reagan authorized certain actions -- and as a result, Mr. Poindexter assumed they were not a legal problem.

For example, it appears Mr. Poindexter will argue that he did not intend to lie on Congress when he assured three congressional committees during July 1986 that the administration was in compliance with the "spirit and letter" of the Boland Amendment banning military aid to the Contras. He may well contend that his sincere belief -- and thus lack of criminal intent -- was based on the president's assurance that the restrictions did not apply to the NSC staff.

Mr. Reagan's testimony could help because the then-president publicly stated he shared that belief.

Whatever Mr. Reagan says -- or doesn't say -- is likely to be the political, legal and historic highlight of the case.

"This will be the first time a president has been compelled to appear in a court proceeding for adversarial questioning on his own conduct in office," notes Prof. Paul. F. Rothstein of the Georgetown University Law Center, a criminal law expert who was closely followed the Iran-Contra proceedings. "It is really quite an event."

And in terms of the type of conduct and the claim of executive privilege, experts say it is hard to picture a tougher case.

In U.S. v. Nixon, the U.S. Supreme Court held that a president may use his office as a shield against subpoena for documents or testimony but the claim is limited and can be overcome. There, the stakes were the truth of the Watergate scandal and a bid to make the president a prosecution witness. In the case of Mr. Poindexter "the interest of the defense is arguably of greater weight," observed Prof. Peter M. Shane of the University of Iowa College of Law, an authority on separation of powers. "Mr. Poindexter has a due process right at work to demonstrate a lack of criminal culpability."

But limitations on the claim depends on circumstances. The privilege is virtually absolute when a sitting president can legitimately claim privilege with respect to foreign affairs or military matters, said Professor Shane. It is perhaps weakest when, as in Mr. Reagan's case, a former president asserts "presidential privacy," a claim based on the rationale that if presidents are discouraged from keeping accurate, personal memorandums it will impede effective decision-making.

But if the current administration joins Mr. Reagan's claim, the balance would shift again, said Prof. Peter L. Strauss, Columbia University School of Law, another separation-of-power authority. "Here, you are talking about the national security adviser discussing military and foreign affairs with the president," he said.

So while the importance of the Iran-Contra affair's political dimension has abated, the waves of constitutional contention have not. First it was the extent to which Congress can use appropriations to limit presidential action in foreign affairs. Later, the extent to which congressional overseers were entitled to pry into White House communications. Later still, the constitutionality of independent counsel was challenged; and then the struggle moved to a battle between the independent counsel and the attorney general over use of classified information.

Now the trial of the former rear admiral has stripped the Iran-Contra affair down to its long-avoided essence, the role President Ronald Reagan played in the actions of his subordinates -- passive observed or active instigator?

GRAPHIC: Photo, BETTER DAYS: President Reagan confers with Chief of Staff Donald Regan and security adviser John M. Poindexter in Reykjavik, Iceland, during talks with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. AP/Wide World Photos

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

The Washington Times

January 24, 1990, Wednesday, Final Edition

SECTION: Part A; NATION; Pg. A4

LENGTH: 432 words

HEADLINE: Poindexter lawyers must put questions to Reagan in writing

BYLINE: Jay Mallin; THE WASHINGTON TIMES

BODY:

A federal judge ordered attorneys yesterday to write out the questions they would ask former President Reagan should he be required to testify at retired Rear Adm. John Poindexter's trial.

U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene issued his ruling after a hearing in which Adm. Poindexter's attorneys asked the judge to allow them to subpoena Mr. Reagan for the trial, set to begin Feb. 20. Attorneys for Mr. Reagan and the Justice Department opposed the request.

"The only thing Mr. Reagan is concerned about is not having to take the stand himself and tell what he knows" about the Iran-contra affair, charged Frederick Robinson, one of Adm. Poindexter's attorneys.

Adm. Poindexter, a former national security adviser, faces trial on five felony counts: one count of conspiracy to obstruct Congress, two counts of actual obstruction of Congress and two counts of lying to Congress. The charges stem from statements he made to Congress during its investigation of the Iran-contra affair, a scheme to sell arms to Iran and divert the proceeds to assist the Nicaraguan resistance when Congress had banned such assistance.

Adm. Poindexter's attorneys have sought testimony and documents from Mr. Reagan in order to bolster their defense that Adm. Poindexter acted at least partly under direction of the president.

Courts going back to the early 1800s have ruled that presidents may be forced to testify in a criminal case. However, no president or former president actually has been forced to testify under subpoena.

"Everybody says it [can be done] but nobody has done it," remarked Judge Greene during yesterday's hearing.

"That just means that your honor gets the first opportunity," replied Mr. Robinson.

Theodore B. Olson, a former assistant attorney general who is representing Mr. Reagan, agreed yesterday that a former president theoretically could be forced to testify. But he argued that Mr. Reagan can be subpoenaed only if Adm. Poindexter's attorneys prove the testimony would be central to their defense and that there is no other way to present the information.

The Washington Times, January 24, 1990

The defense attorneys had already listed for Judge Greene 67 categories of information they may need Mr. Reagan's testimony on. Judge Greene called the list "far too opaque," and ordered the lawyers to submit specific questions.

The judge said copies of those questions would be given to Mr. Reagan's attorney and the Justice Department, but not to the special prosecutors handling the case in order to avoid tipping them off to Adm. Poindexter's defense strategy.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

1ST STORY of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

The Washington Times

January 24, 1990, Wednesday, Final Edition

SECTION: Part A; NATION; Pg. A4

LENGTH: 432 words

HEADLINE: Poindexter lawyers must put questions to Reagan in writing

BYLINE: Jay Mallin; THE WASHINGTON TIMES

BODY:
A federal judge ordered attorneys yesterday to write out the questions they would ask former President Reagan should he be required to testify at retired Rear Adm. John Poindexter's trial.

U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene issued his ruling after a hearing in which Adm. Poindexter's attorneys asked the judge to allow them to subpoena Mr. Reagan for the trial, set to begin Feb. 20. Attorneys for Mr. Reagan and the Justice Department opposed the request.

"The only thing Mr. Reagan is concerned about is not having to take the stand himself and tell what he knows" about the Iran-contra affair, charged Frederick Robinson, one of Adm. Poindexter's attorneys.

Adm. Poindexter, a former national security adviser, faces trial on five felony counts: one count of conspiracy to obstruct Congress, two counts of actual obstruction of Congress and two counts of lying to Congress. The charges stem from statements he made to Congress during its investigation of the Iran-contra affair, a scheme to sell arms to Iran and divert the proceeds to assist the Nicaraguan resistance when Congress had banned such assistance.

Adm. Poindexter's attorneys have sought testimony and documents from Mr. Reagan in order to bolster their defense that Adm. Poindexter acted at least partly under direction of the president.

Courts going back to the early 1800s have ruled that presidents may be forced to testify in a criminal case. However, no president or former president actually has been forced to testify under subpoena.

"Everybody says it [can be done] but nobody has done it," remarked Judge Greene during yesterday's hearing.

"That just means that your honor gets the first opportunity," replied Mr. Robinson.

Theodore B. Olson, a former assistant attorney general who is representing Mr. Reagan, agreed yesterday that a former president theoretically could be forced to testify. But he argued that Mr. Reagan can be subpoenaed only if Adm. Poindexter's attorneys prove the testimony would be central to their defense and that there is no other way to present the information.

The Washington Times, January 24, 1990

The defense attorneys had already listed for Judge Greene 67 categories of information they may need Mr. Reagan's testimony on. Judge Greene called the list "far too opaque," and ordered the lawyers to submit specific questions.

The judge said copies of those questions would be given to Mr. Reagan's attorney and the Justice Department, but not to the special prosecutors handling the case in order to avoid tipping them off to Adm. Poindexter's defense strategy.

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Harvard Law Review

January, 1995

Commentaries

*701 EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES: THE NIXON AND CLINTON CASES

Akhil Reed Amar [FNa1]
Neal Kumar Katyal [FNaa1]

In 1978, Ernest Fitzgerald sued Richard Nixon, and in 1994, Paula Jones sued Bill Clinton. In a landmark but closely divided 1982 opinion, Nixon v. Fitzgerald, the Supreme Court sided with Nixon and against Fitzgerald. [FN1] What does this mean for Jones and Clinton today? [FN2] Ed Meese speaks for many when he insists that Nixon protects Presidents only for presidential conduct and that extending immunity to Clinton's pre-presidential conduct would be a huge and unprincipled stretch that would place Bill Clinton above the law. [FN3] Other commentators aren't so sure that Nixon itself was rightly decided but are sure that Clinton's claim is much weaker. Terry Eastland has argued *702 that, if you reject Nixon's immunity claim, you presumably must reject Clinton's a fortiori. [FN4]

We will show that all of this is dead wrong. Bill Clinton's claim for immunity is actually much stronger than Richard Nixon's -- supported by crisper arguments from constitutional text and structure, by more historical evidence from the Founding and early Republic, and by better modern-day policy arguments. Nixon sought absolute and permanent immunity from a civil damage action after he left office; Clinton seeks only temporary immunity from litigating a civil damage suit while he serves as President. We will show that the Arrest Clause of Article I, Section 6 and the democratic structural principles underlying this Clause cast light on Article II, and provide a sturdy constitutional basis for temporary presidential immunity. In the process of elaborating the best argument for Clinton, we will also show how all nine Justices in Nixon missed the point and in particular misread a key quote from the great Justice Joseph Story. We will outline a new theory of limited executive immunity that protects a sitting President and (most importantly) the American people he serves, yet does not put the President above the law, as Nixon did, despite the Court's protestations to the contrary.

I. UNTANGLING IMMUNITY

The Constitution nowhere explicitly describes what litigation immunity, if any, the President merits by dint of his unique constitutional role. The document does, however, explicitly describe certain governmental immunities. Article I, Section 6 provides that:

> The Senators and Representatives . . . shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place. [FN5]

A. Expressio Unius?

At first glance, this Clause seems to be powerful ammunition for the presidential immunity skeptics. After all, no such explicit provision exists for the President. Didn't our Founders clearly mean to say, by expressio unius, [FN6] that the President is not entitled to immunity?

703 But this expressio unius argument is far weaker than it looks. In light of the explicit reference to "Speech or Debate" in Article I, let's look at the Constitution's other free speech clause: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech." [FN7] By similar expressio unius logic, shall we say that the First Amendment limits only Congress--that the President may propound censorship edicts and the federal courts may issue gag rules without regard to First Amendment principles? Or shall we say under expressio unius that, in the absence of the First Amendment, only Senators and Representatives, but not ordinary citizens, would enjoy constitutional freedom of speech or debate?

Surely not. Even if the First Amendment did not exist, the Constitution's overall structure and its commitment to democratic self-government would require a broad freedom of speech and debate for citizens on issues of public concern. [FN8] Article I, Section 6 had its roots in England, where Parliament was sovereign, and, as a self-governing body, needed wide freedom to debate public issues. [FN9] (The very word Parliament -- from the French parler, to speak -- emphasizes the central role of speech and debate.) But in America, "We the People" are sovereign and must enjoy an analogous (though not necessarily identical) freedom of speech and debate on public, political issues. [FN10] So, if the First Amendment had never been adopted, we clearly would not read Article I, Section 6, by expressio unius, to say that Senators and Representatives enjoy freedom of speech, but citizens do not. Even if the scope of freedom were only analogous and not identical, [FN11] it would be odd to say that Section 6 meant that no other immunities for speech existed; that such immunities were unconstitutional or extra-constitutional; or that to recognize such immunities in the teeth of the words inside Section 6 and the silence outside it would be to "make things up."

So too with the words of the First Amendment explicitly prohibiting only congressional censorship. The general theory of popular sovereignty frowns on all suppressions of citizens' free speech, whether by 704 congressional law, presidential edict, or judicial decree. [FN12] If the President and federal courts cannot censor citizens with a congressional law, it would be odd to think they can do so without such a law. As with Section 6, the First Amendment is best read not to bar, by expressio unius, citizen freedoms against courts and executives, but rather to invite, by analogy, these unenumerated freedoms implicit in constitutional structure.

It might be argued that the structural reasoning outlined thus far should go no further. Ordinary citizens, the people, may well enjoy unenumerated rights, especially if collective self-government is at stake -- this principle is the heart of the Ninth Amendment's affirmation of the people's unenumerated rights. [FN13] But, it might be said, unenumerated rights and immunities for governmental officials qua officials are a very different kettle of fish.

Are they really? Always? Consider a federal judge who, in the course of her published judicial opinion, criticizes some person who then brings a libel suit. Our judge is not a Senator or Representative; nor is she speaking "in either House." Must we read Section 6 by expressio unius to imply that our judge enjoys no analogous immunity in performing her public function and doing the people's business? Must we reject even a "constitutional common law" immunity that might be modifiable at the margins by statute? [FN14] Surely expressio unius does not require this rigidity; and we should note that, since our nation's Founding, courtroom litigants have enjoyed absolute common law immunity from libel -- an immunity arguably constitutionalized in the First Amendment Petition Clause. [FN15] Should a judge have less freedom of speech than a litigant? [FN16] In a working democracy under law, judges -- like Senators, Representatives, and ordinary citizens § 705 must have a wide zone of freedom to speak and print. Though the idea is not textually specified in Article I, Section 6, or in Article III, federal judges need absolute or near absolute freedom "of Speech [and] Debate." The very notion of jurisdiction is the power to speak the law, [FN17] the power, in John Marshall's immortal phrase, "to say what the law is." [FN18] To do their job, and to serve the people, judges must be free to enter declaratory judgments of law and fact, judgments that may criticize and anger powerful people. Libel suits against judges interfere with these judicial functions and thus offend our basic constitutional structure. [FN19] Regardless of the specific words of Section 6, its deep structural logic applies to judges as well as legislators.

Now consider a presidential speech (say, on health care legislation pending in Congress) criticizing some group (say, pharmaceutical companies). Is it sensible to argue that, because of expressio unius, the President has no absolute immunity from libel suits? [FN20] Even if this immunity is merely a matter of constitutional common law, a la Justice Jackson's Youngstown Category Two? [FN21] To perform his role in a constitutional democracy, the President --like Senators, Representatives, judges, and ordinary citizens -- must be free to speak out on issues of public concern. Indeed, the Constitution explicitly invites the President to make State of the Union speeches, to recommend legislation 706 to Congress, and to give a statement of reasons for any veto he hands down. [FN22] In performing his high constitutional duties of democratic deliberation, the President may need to speak in ways that criticize and anger powerful people. In this situation too, libel suits would offend the basic structure of the Constitution -- for precisely the same reasons as would libel suits against Senators, Representatives, and judges. [FN23] It would be downright silly to argue by expressio unius that the President lacks absolute immunity from libel merely because the clauses governing State of the Union messages, recommendations, and vetoes are less explicit than Article I, Section 6; so too, it would be obtuse to recognize absolute immunity for these and only these three communications (under expressio unius) while muzzling the President the rest of the time under penalty of libel lawsuits.

This examination of the Speech or Debate Clause suggests that it is best read not to bar analogous immunities of coordinate branches but rather, if anything, to invite them. And the same holds true, we shall argue, for its companion, the Article I, Section 6 Arrest Clause. If Representatives and Senators should not be impeded ("arrested") by certain private litigation while performing the people's business (while "at session"), this Arrest Clause immunity should not bar, and if anything might invite, analogous immunities for members of coordinate branches while performing the people's business. [FN24]

707 Nor does any of this analysis violate the language or history of Section 6 or even the formal rule of expressio unius, properly understood. Section 6 nowhere explicitly rejects coordinate immunities -- statutory, common law, or constitutional. The Framers simply provided more details about the legislature in their prolix Article I than about coordinate branches; so more must be left to sensible structural inference when dealing with the sparser Articles II and III. Textual specification of legislative immunities might have been especially important to some Framers because the practical protection of these immunities would be committed to the other two branches in enforcing and adjudicating concrete cases. Whatever implicit immunities were appropriate for those other branches, it might have been thought, were effectively self-executing -- effected by the President's refusal to enforce certain processes against himself, and judges' refusal to entertain certain suits against judges -- and so perhaps needed less textual emphasis. [FN25] And even under a stringent expressio unius theory, Section 6 could be read merely to set out those governmental immunities that Congress cannot in any way qualify by statute.

Supreme Court case law also emphatically rejects the notion that Section 6 precludes implied immunities for coordinate branches. The Court, for example, has held judges and prosecutors immune for their official duties. [FN26] These immunities, it can be argued, do not violate the central tenet of Marbury v. Madison, and of Anglo-American law more generally, that "every right . . . must have a remedy." [FN27] Rather, the notion of judicial and prosecutorial immunity may be that one's 708 remedy for intra-litigation wrongs occurs within the lawsuit itself--by appeal--rather than by a collateral damage action. [FN28]

B. Separating the Two Tiers of Immunity

In a lengthy and important footnote, the Nixon v. Fitzgerald majority properly rejected a wooden expressio unius reading of Article I, Section 6, arguing that "a specific textual basis has not been considered a prerequisite to the recognition of immunity." [FN29] But the Court's desire to find a quick answer to Nixon's problem blinded it to the architecture of Section 6. To see this, we must carefully pull apart the two types of immunity mentioned in Article I. One type is "Immunity From Arrest": legislators' temporary immunity from litigating even private lawsuits while "at the Session" of Congress as public officers. The other type is "Immunity For Speech or Debate": permanent immunity from liability in lawsuits that arise out of the performance of public duties of democratic deliberation. This latter form is what all nine Justices in Nixon conceptualized as "immunity." [FN30]

I. Permanent Immunity. -- The Court's application of permanent immunity in Nixon was hard to justify by analogy to the Speech or Debate Clause or by other basic structural principles of constitutional law. Richard Nixon did not speak out against Ernest Fitzgerald in public debate; Nixon fired Fitzgerald from a civil service position. Worse still, Fitzgerald alleged that Nixon fired him because of Fitzgerald's speech activities -- whistleblowing testimony before the Congress. A broad commitment to the constitutional ideals of democratic self-government and citizen speech argued against Nixon's immunity, not for it. According to Fitzgerald's complaint, Richard Nixon violated the Constitution itself (the First Amendment no less), [FN31] and yet the Court shielded Nixon with permanent immunity.

709 The five-Justice majority in Nixon prominently relied on an important quotation from Justice Joseph Story's classic Commentaries on the Constitution and, less prominently, on the words of Thomas Jefferson and John Adams. [FN32] But as we shall show, all of these sources were badly misread in Nixon. [FN33] The Nixon five also dismissed, too quickly, the concern that permanent immunity for Richard Nixon would leave Ernest Fitzgerald with a constitutional right without an adequate legal remedy. [FN34] The Court pointed to longstanding judicial immunities, [FN35] but as we suggested earlier, these immunities do not necessarily violate Marbury's bedrock teaching that every right must have a remedy. [FN36]

The Nixon five also trotted out various newfangled executive immunities to blunt the message of Marbury. [FN35] But the Framers would have been shocked by the notion that, as a general matter, executive officials could violate the Constitution and yet be held permanently immune. The modern judicial proliferation of various qualified immunities for constitutional torts is a twentieth century betrayal of founding principles. These immunities should be sources of concern -- things to be minimized or, ideally, eliminated -- rather than springboards for further violations of Marbury. The Nixon five's complacent apologetics here are embarrassing, at least to those who value the Framers' first principles. [FN38]

The only real argument left in Nixon was the claim that Ernest Fitzgerald had alternative remedies -- remedies against the government itself rather than Nixon personally -- that would fully vindicate his constitutional rights. [FN39] If true, this would indeed satisfy Marbury, for the government may limit a plaintiff's choice of constitutional remedies as long as those remaining suitably vindicate the right at stake. [FN40] Marbury and the rule of law demanded constitutional justice for Fitzgerald [FN41] but not necessarily a pound of flesh from Nixon himself. The 710 government, after all, could have directly indemnified Nixon for any judgment that he owed to Fitzgerald, and a Fitzgerald suit against the government itself would simply accomplish this result more directly. But the Nixon dissenters denied the adequacy of alternative remedies, [FN42] and the Nixon majority spent little time defending its claim of adequate alternatives.

2. Temporary Immunity. -- The other half of immunity, temporary immunity akin to Article I immunity from arrest, went wholly unnoticed by Nixon's nine Justices. As Article I makes clear, members of Congress are privileged from arrest while Congress is in session. The Framers intended "Arrest" in this Clause to mean civil arrest, not criminal arrest. The Arrest Clause explicitly exempts cases of "Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace"; and both the clear language of Blackstone's Commentaries and English debates well known to the Framers stressed that this exempting phrase was a term of art encompassing all crimes. [FN43]

711 The real question is whether civil arrest should be understood strictly and formally, or more functionally. Technical civil arrest -- commencing a lawsuit by seizing the civil defendant's person -- is all but dead today, and so the Arrest Clause, when strictly construed, shrinks to a virtual nullity. But "Arrest" may also be understood more functionally as extending to various civil cases that interfere with -- that arrest -- a person's performance of her duties in public office. [FN44] 712 This functional immunity avoids undemocratic results: functional civil arrests of members of Congress while it is in session might skew votes in Congress and penalize innocent third parties, namely, the American people. As Joseph Story put the point in his Commentaries, explicitly building on Thomas Jefferson's famous Congressional Manual:

> When a representative is withdrawn from his seat by a summons, the people, whom he represents, lose their > voice in debate and vote . . . . When a senator is withdrawn by summons, his state loses half its voice in debate and vote . . . . The enormous disparity of the evil admits of no comparison. [FN45]

But Article I prohibits civil arrests only while Congress is in session; it implicitly permits the arrests when Congress is not in session. (And here we see a less wooden and more proper application of the expressio unius maxim.) Arrest Clause immunity is thus temporary immunity -- 713 stopping the clock on a lawsuit until litigation can occur without disruption of the defendant's public duties. [FN46]

Though a strict expressio unius reading might limit the Arrest Clause to "Senators and Representatives," structural considerations tug the other way. Consider, for example, the Vice President. Surely he is not a "Senator or Representative," strictly speaking, [FN47] and yet under the Constitution, he is empowered to preside over the Senate and cast a tie-breaking vote. [FN48] If he were subject to civil arrest while Congress was in session, he could be wrenched away from these weighty constitutional duties of democratic deliberation by a single private plaintiff, in clear violation of the spirit and logic -- but not the letter -- of the Arrest Clause.

The structural constitutional logic undergirding temporary immunity applies with even greater force to the President. Unlike federal lawmakers and judges, the President is at "Session" twenty-four hours a day, every day. Constitutionally speaking, the President never sleeps. The President must be ready, at a moment's notice, to do whatever it takes to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the American people: prosecute wars, command armed forces (and nuclear weapons), protect Americans abroad, negotiate with heads of state, and take care that all the laws are faithfully executed. We should hesitate before arming each citizen with a kind of legal assault weapon enabling him or her to commandeer the President's time, drag him from the White House, and haul him before any judge in America.

What's more, the President is the only person for whom the entire nation -- We the People of the United States -- votes. There are over 500 federal lawmakers -- the House and Senate can function if one member is absent, as the quorum rules of Article I, Section 5 make clear [FN49] -- but there is only one President, in whom all executive power is vested by Article II. [FN50] Thus, the democratic skew that can result if civil suits impede -- arrest --the President is far more dramatic 714 than for a typical Representative or Senator. To be sure, the Vice President always remains at hand, ready to step in for the President in emergency situations, but the elaborate provisions of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment and past practice indicate that these emergencies should be the exception, not the rule. [FN51] Yet they could well become the rule if a handful of citizens -- acting independently or in concert [FN52] --could functionally arrest the President in his performance of the people's business and trigger his temporary inability "to discharge the Powers and Duties of . . . Office" under Article II and the Twenty-Fifth Amendment.

This approach does not mean that the President is above the law. It simply means that, in cases seeking compensation for past wrongs, a President should be able to request temporary immunity to avoid interference with his duties. [FN53] Whereas Nixon eliminated all remedies against the President, at least for constitutional torts committed qua President, arrest immunity would only "toll" -- stop the clock on -- a lawsuit and would preserve the plaintiff's ultimate remedy and vindicate the ideal of Marbury. [FN54] Because of the Twenty-Second Amendment, 715 the Constitution itself assures that plaintiffs will not have to wait more than eight years. [FN55]

But eight years is a long time -- much longer than any "Session" of Congress under Article I, Section 6 -- and so perhaps the Section 6 analogy breaks down at precisely that point. On the other hand, eight years is a lot shorter than eternity, which is how long the Nixon Court said Ernest Fitzgerald had to wait. On this point, at least, it may be politically awkward for the Court to distinguish Nixon: aren't Democratic Presidents entitled to the same solicitude as Republican Presidents? (And on the facts of the Jones case, one may well ask if Paula Jones can equitably complain about delay after she waited three years to file her complaint.) [FN56]

If sensible structural inferences lead us to think that a President, under the logic of Article II, merits an immunity akin to Section 6 "Arrest" immunity, it becomes important to refine further the functional concept of civil arrest. Our legal order has long distinguished between damage suits for past, discrete wrongs, and injunctive suits to end ongoing harm. In effect, we should distinguish between civil damage arrests and ongoing harm injunctions. In arrest scenarios, plaintiffs may be obliged to wait, but interest payments presumably can make up for lost time. Civil actions arising out of ongoing harms -- continuing possession of a steel mill in Youngstown, [FN57] or a hypothetical divorce or child custody suit involving a sitting President -- are quite different. [FN58] Putting the point more textually, perhaps one could say that an ongoing harm is functionally one kind of "Breach of the Peace" and thus lies outside the proper scope of arrest immunity. [FN59]

C. Nixon Revisited

Not only does temporary immunity from "civil arrest" make good sense from the perspective of constitutional structure and policy, but it also makes the most sense of the historical evidence offered up by the 716 Nixon majority. The best evidence that the Nixon five had for their position, Justice White's dissent conceded, was from Justice Story. But now that we have tipped our hand and identified two types of immunity, listen to Story's words with fresh ears:

> There are . . . incidental powers, belonging to the executive department, which are necessarily implied from the nature of the functions, which are confided to it. Among these, must necessarily be included the power to perform them, without any obstruction or impediment whatsoever. The president cannot, therefore, be liable to arrest, imprisonment, or detention, while he is in the discharge of the duties of his office; and for this purpose his person must be deemed, in civil cases at least, to possess an official inviolability. [FN60]

Let us note carefully Story's moves. First, Story believes that Section 6 does not exclude immunities for coordinate federal branches. In particular there are "incidental" presidential powers, not textually spelled out but "necessarily implied" by the spare words of Article II. Next, Story hints that these immunities should be understood functionally, not formally -- they are deducible from the nature of presidential "functions." Third, Story articulates presidential immunity as an immunity from "arrest" -- obviously conjuring up an analogy to the Arrest Clause of Article I, rather than the Speech or Debate Clause. [FN61] Fourth, this immunity is explicitly temporary, once again in keeping with arrest immunity rather than speech or debate immunity. It is immunity "while he is in the discharge of the duties of his office" -- while he is in "Session," in the analogous language of Section 6. Fifth, it is immunity even for certain lawsuits based on a President's private conduct -- immunity for his "person." Once again, this tracks arrest immunity rather than speech or debate immunity. Finally, Story carefully limits this immunity to "civil cases" -- just as the Arrest Clause (but not the Speech or Debate Clause) is limited to civil cases.

This quote from Story could be challenged, or narrowly construed, were we writing on a clean slate. Perhaps Story is referring only to technical civil arrests, rather than to broader litigation impediments. In any event, Story is not speaking in his judicial capacity, but only as a commentator on the Constitution (though perhaps its most distinguished commentator), and is writing almost fifty years after the document's ratification.

Today, however, we do not write on a clean slate. We write in the wake of Nixon. A very broad reading of Story is inscribed in the United States Reports -- it is the rock on which Nixon is built. If 717 Story was enough to win for Nixon, why not for Clinton? (Nixon was a Republican, and Clinton is a Democrat, but of course this should make no difference.) [FN62] Indeed, as should be clear by now, a careful reading of Story does not support the result in Nixon, [FN63] contrary to Justice White's glib concession in dissent. [FN64] But a close reading of Story does support Clinton and our Arrest Clause methodology today.

The Nixon majority had a couple of other high cards up its sleeve, a pair of quotations from Thomas Jefferson and John Adams featured in a long and important footnote that addressed the Article I, Section 6 expressio unius argument. Here are Jefferson's words:

> 718 But would the executive be independent of the judiciary, if he were subject to the commands of the latter, & to imprisonment for disobedience; if the several courts could bandy him from pillar to post, keep him constantly trudging from north to south & east to west, and withdraw him entirely from his constitutional duties? [FN65]

And here are the thoughts attributed to Adams and Senator Oliver Ellsworth: "[T]he President, personally, was not the subject to any process whatever . . . . For [that] would . . . put it in the power of a common justice to exercise any authority over him and stop the whole machine of Government." [FN66]

As with the Story quote, these passages support Clinton far more than Nixon. Jefferson is clearly concerned about litigation that would "withdraw" a President from his current "constitutional duties" -- a concern inapplicable to Nixon in 1982 but very much relevant to Clinton today. As Jefferson put the point three days earlier in words that obviously apply only to sitting Presidents: "To comply with such calls would leave the nation without an executive branch, whose agency, nevertheless, is understood to be so constantly necessary, that it is the sole branch which the constitution requires to be always in function." [FN67] Note also how Jefferson's later reference to "imprisonment for disobedience" conjures up arrest, not speech or debate.

As Adams and Ellsworth's last six words suggest, they too are referring to a sitting President, not a former one: only suits against a sitting President would "stop the whole machine of Government." Significantly, Adams and Ellsworth's language goes beyond technical civil arrest and defines temporary immunity functionally to subsume "any process whatever." Their sweeping quote thus encompasses both civil and criminal prosecutions, yet surely they are not claiming, in light of the Article I, Section 3 Impeachment Clause, [FN68] that a former President may not be criminally punished for offenses in office. Indeed, in language that all of the Nixon opinions overlooked, Adams and Ellsworth explicitly concede as much moments later and thus make clear that 719 they are not talking about suits against ex-Presidents. [FN69] So here too, the Court badly misread the historical evidence. [FN70]

The stunning part of Nixon is not only the majority's hands-off attitude towards an ex-President, but also the fact that none of the nine Justices seemed to understand what Story, Jefferson, and Adams were really saying. [FN71] We can now understand why Eastland and others might question the Court's view that "[t]he best historical evidence clearly supports the Presidential immunity we [the Court] have upheld." [FN72] But the fact that the evidence fails to support Nixon 720 doesn't mean that the same goes for Clinton. On the contrary, even if Nixon is a twisted stretch of history and text, the historical evidence does provide sturdy support for temporary immunity from arrest. [FN73] 721 Despite what the pundits are saying, Clinton has a far stronger case than Nixon had.

II. POSSIBLE PRIVILEGES

The concept of a President's immunity from functional "Arrest" while in "Session" is a modest one -- waivable, temporary, and perhaps subject to congressional modification. Yet from another perspective, arrest immunity is absolute and categorical -- it does not balance or weigh the unique features of a given case. It does not distinguish between a case likely to arrest the President in litigation for two hours, and one likely to arrest him for two months. It does not focus on the equities of a particular plaintiff or her special need for speedy adjudication. It does not reflect the fact that some claims are more difficult than others to revive and to adjudicate after a long delay.

For some, the bright-line quality of arrest immunity -- supported by a textual analogy to the bright-line rule of Article I, Section 6, [FN74] by the categorical language of Story, Jefferson, and Adams, [FN75] and by the prospect that political pressure can be trusted to induce presidential waiver in appropriate cases -- will count as a juridical virtue. For others, the medicine of absolute arrest immunity will taste too strong. For those in this second group -- scholars, lawyers, and judges -- we shall briefly provide a catalogue of weaker prescriptions: presidential privileges attentive to the structural arguments and historical evidence presented above but packaged in lower dosages and blended with other general legal principles.

A. Equitable Tolling

In some situations, arrest immunity may work a grave injustice against a worthy and diligent plaintiff. Imagine a pedestrian crushed by a transition team bus (with Clinton at the wheel) one week before the Clinton inauguration. Obviously there is no time to file suit, conduct discovery, litigate the case, and pursue an appeal before Inauguration Day. This plaintiff might have to pay huge out-of-pocket hospital bills and yet, under absolute arrest immunity, may be forced to wait eight years to be made whole.

A more flexible, "equitable" version of presidential immunity would distinguish between cases in which a plaintiff could have brought suit before Inauguration Day and cases in which a plaintiff could not. The structural logic here is the same one that drives arrest immunity: a suit against a sitting President in effect impleads innocent third parties -- the American people --whose democratically chosen leader is obstructed in discharging his unique and awesome constitutional duties. 722 But the application in this situation is more flexible and equitable. [FN76] Only those cases in which plaintiffs themselves choose to sue while the President is in session are automatically tolled. Other cases (like our hypothetical pedestrian's) could be selectively tolled, depending on factors such as the likely amount of intrusion on a President's time, the practical freezability of a case, and the extent of out-of-pocket losses that call for quick recoupment.

With this rule in place, plaintiffs who have claims against would-be Presidents would have strong incentives to bring suit well before Inauguration Day. [FN77] Pre-inaugural suits are exactly what constitutional structure and history counsel. The constitutional evil to be avoided is distracting --arresting -- litigation while the President is at session. Litigation after --or before -- a President's term is just fine. A bonus of equitable tolling is that pre-presidential litigation may bring information to light for the American people, as well as the courts, before We the People make our momentous choice on Election Day.

Under a regime of equitable tolling, Paula Jones's case looks rather different from our hypothetical pedestrian's. Jones saw the metaphoric Inauguration Bus coming; she was not blindsided. She did not suddenly wake up one day and discover -- mirabile dictu -- that Bill Clinton had become President. Why then, did Jones not bring suit much earlier, when the American people would not have been involuntarily dragged into litigation as de facto third party defendants and when litigation would not have disrupted constitutional government? Unless she can answer this question persuasively, an equitable tolling approach would put her lawsuit on hold. [FN78]

B. Equitable Dismissal

An equally flexible but more emphatic approach would dismiss Jones's suit with prejudice, unless she can persuasively explain why she sat on her claims until after Inauguration. Like tolling, dismissal would of course create strong incentives for future plaintiffs like Jones to bring suit before presidential elections rather than after them. Like tolling, dismissal is more flexible and less categorical than arrest immunity: dismissal would be case-specific, and could, for example, distinguish between Jones's suit and our hypothetical pedestrian's.

The idea here is that litigation delay -- temporary immunity or tolling -- at times hurts defendants and not just plaintiffs. A President's 723 memory of the facts of any one case will no doubt fade over eight years, while she is preoccupied by many and weighty matters of state, whereas a single-minded plaintiff may be able to rehearse his story over the years. This concern can vividly arise in a case turning on facts more than on law, especially if testimonial credibility is a key issue. By strategically manipulating the timing of a lawsuit -- delaying without good reason until after Inauguration --a plaintiff may place a President who deserves to win the suit in a cruel trilemma: drop vital affairs of state to litigate now and prevail (the "betray the people/waiver" option), or pay off unmeritorious claims (the "nuisance value/extortion floodgates" option), or wait until out of office and defend at a disadvantage (the "can't remember/look like a liar or a dope" option). To discourage precisely this kind of strategic manipulation, Anglo-American law has long recognized the general doctrine of laches. [FN79]

Laches is a defense that allows a case to be dismissed if the plaintiff cannot explain why he sat on his claims and if his delay substantially prejudices the defendant. [FN80] For example, the Supreme Court held over a century ago that a plaintiff alleging fraud could not needlessly delay a suit until after the alleged defrauder's death and thereby prevail more easily against the alleged defrauder's successors in interest. [FN81] This logic could easily be blended with arguments from constitutional 724 structure to impose an analogous duty on plaintiffs today to litigate (if possible) before a person's "death" as an ordinary citizen and "birth" as a President.

Historically, as an "equity" doctrine, laches did not apply to cases "at law" governed by explicit statutes of limitation. After the historic merger of law and equity in 1938, however, those old distinctions should matter little here. [FN82] Other formerly "equitable" defenses, such as estoppel and fraud, have long been allowed to defeat actions "at law"; [FN83] and the Federal Circuit, at least, has squarely held en banc that laches may be invoked to prevent strategic manipulation in a "law" case even if an explicit statute of limitation applies and has not run. [FN84] In any event, even if the technical equitable doctrine of laches is unavailable, its underlying logic can apply when understood in light of the dictates of constitutional structure and packaged as a matter of constitutional common law. [FN85]

C. The Venue Variant

Even if constitutional structure and history are not strong enough to freeze a civil suit against a sitting President, they might be strong enough to influence where and how the suit unfolds. Disruption of the President's duties should be minimized. A good argument can thus be made that, if a sitting President may be sued for damages, suit should 725 lie only in Washington D.C.: no other court should have personal jurisdiction or venue against an unconsenting [FN86] sitting President.

Several things point this way. First, the language of Article III and of the Judiciary Act of 1789 provided that suits against foreign Ambassadors be tried in the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, which would of course sit in the nation's capital. [FN87] The underlying logic here was geographic: ambassadors would operate out of the nation's capital, and suit in that city would minimize disruption of their duties. [FN88] If foreign dignitaries enjoy this litigation privilege, should not the President a fortiori (at least in the absence of an express congressional statute to the contrary)?

Of course, our old friend expressio unius might argue that, if the Framers had meant for the President to enjoy an analogous venue privilege, they would have explicitly so provided in Article III alongside the Ambassador Clause. But perhaps the Framers were simply not thinking about the unusual case of a civil damage action against a sitting President. When they did think about suits against the President, they explicitly provided that impeachment trials would take place in the Senate, again in the nation's capital. The Federalist Papers explicitly emphasized the geographic logic that underlay this choice. [FN89]

Recall also Jefferson's obviously geographic concern that litigation in "the several courts" (note the plural) would "bandy [the President] from pillar to post, keep him constantly trudging from north to south & east to west, and withdraw him" from the district and thus from "his constitutional duties." [FN90] Few at the Founding would have thought that any court on the continent could use newfangled longarm statutes to reach out and grab the President of the United States. [FN91] Jefferson summed it up nicely, in words that also sum up nicely much of our overall argument:

> As to our personal attendance in Richmond [at the Burr trial], I am persuaded the Court is sensible, that paramount duties to the nation at large control the obligation of compliance with their summons in this case; as 726 they would, should we receive a similar one, to attend the trials of Blennerhasset and others, in the Mississippi territory, those instituted at St. Louis and other places on the western waters, or at any place, other than the seat of government. To comply with such calls would leave the nation without an executive branch, whose agency, nevertheless, is understood to be so constantly necessary, that it is the sole branch which the constitution requires to be always in function. It could not then mean that it should be withdrawn from its station by any co-ordinate authority. [FN92]

III. CONCLUSION

In the end, we suggest that temporary immunity from arrest is the constitutionally preferable reading of executive immunity in many situations. This immunity, which essentially tolls cases against a sitting President, avoids the twin dangers of making all Americans pay for the President's sins and of putting Presidents above the law. Our "arresting" conclusion is that a proper judicial holding in Clinton's favor could limit rather than extend the mischief of Nixon.

FNa1. Southmayd Professor, Yale Law School.

FNaa1. Student, Yale Law School. At the time this Commentary was written, Mr. Katyal was working in the Office of the Solicitor General, United States Department of Justice. He had no involvement with the brief filed by the Solicitor General in the Paula Corbin Jones litigation.

An earlier version of this Commentary was presented on September 22, 1994 as the Hardy Cross Dillard Lecture at the University of Virginia School of Law; on October 19, 1994 as part of the Scholar-in-Residence Program at Hofstra University School of Law; and on October 26, 1994 as part of the Edward L. Barrett, Jr. Lecture Program at the University of California at Davis School of Law. For helpful comments on earlier drafts, we thank Bruce Ackerman, Vik Amar, Ian Ayres, Jack Balkin, Susan Low Bloch, Steve Calabresi, Betsy Cavendish, Owen Fiss, Joseph Goldstein, Harold Koh, John Langbein, Burke Marshall, Vinita Parkash, Mike Paulsen, Jeff Rosen, Jed Rubenfeld, Peter Swire, Laurence tribe, and Eugene Volokh.

FN1. 457 U.S. 731 (1982). The suit alleged that Nixon had unlawfully fired Fitzgerald in retaliation for his testimony before Congress about military aircraft cost overruns.

FN2. Jones's suit raises four claims. She asserts violations of 42 U.S.C. §§ 1983 and 1985 that stem from Clinton's alleged conduct while Governor of Arkansas, a state law intentional infliction of emotional distress claim that arises from the same alleged action, and a state law claim alleging that Clinton and his aides defamed her while he was President. See Jones v. Clinton, Complaint, Civ. No. LR-C-94-290 (E.D. Ark. May 6, 1994).

Editors' Note: As this Commentary went to press, the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas ruled that no trial should occur until after the end of President Clinton's tenure, but that pretrial discovery could proceed now. This ruling may be appealed. See Jones v. Clinton, 1994 WL 721905 at *7-*8 (E.D. Ark. Dec. 28, 1994).

FN3. Nightline: Presidential Immunity (ABC television broadcast, June 13, 1994) (transcript on file with the Harvard Law School Library); Crossfire: Justice Delayed for the President? (CNN television broadcast, May 25, 1994) (transcript on file with the Harvard Law School Library); Morning Edition: Sexual Harassment Suit Questions Presidential Immunity (National Public Radio broadcast, June 15, 1994) (transcript on file with the Harvard Law School Library).

FN4. See Terry Eastland, No Immunity for Clinton from Paula Jones's Charges, WALL ST. J., June 8, 1994, at A17.

FN5. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 6.

FN6. The legal maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius means that the expression of one thing (here, congressional arrest and speech or debate immunities) by implication excludes other things (here, presidential or judicial immunities, or other congressional immunities). The maxim is in many contexts sound, but as we shall show, must not be applied clumsily or mechanically.

FN7. U.S. CONST. amend. I. On the connection between these two clauses, see Akhil Reed Amar, The Bill of Rights as a Constitution, 100 YALE L.J. 1131, 1151 (1991) [hereinafter Bill of Rights]; Akhil Reed Amar, The Case of the Missing Amendments: R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 106 HARV. L. REV. 124, 141 (1992); Alexander Meiklejohn, The First Amendment Is an Absolute, 1961 SUP. CT. REV. 245, 255-56.

FN8. See CHARLES L. BLACK, JR., STRUCTURE AND RELATIONSHIP IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 35-50 (1969); ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN, POLITICAL FREEDOM: THE CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS OF THE PEOPLE 101-24 (1960).

FN9. See Akhil Reed Amar, The Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment, 101 YALE L.J. 1193, 1267 (1992) [hereinafter Fourteenth Amendment].

FN10. See id. The citizen's freedom of speech might be only analogous rather than identical in that it might be, say, less absolute than the legislator's freedom.

FN11. See, e.g., New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269-80 (1964) (recognizing broad, though not absolute, freedom of speech for citizens on issues of public concern).

FN12. See Fourteenth Amendment, supra note 9, at 1273-74.

FN13. "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." U.S. CONST. amend. IX. For discussion of the connection between this amendment and collective self-government, see Bill of Rights, cited above in note 7, at 1200.

FN14. "Constitutional common law" here refers to judicially recognized principles that are deducible from the Constitution and designed to implement the Constitution's structure and fill in its gaps but that may nevertheless be subject to statutory modification. We are indebted here to Professor Henry Monaghan. See Henry P. Monaghan, The Supreme Court, 1974 Term -- Foreword: Constitutional Common Law, 89 HARV. L. REV. 1, 10-17 (1975).

FN15. "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging . . . the right of the people . . . to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." U.S. CONST. amend. I. For an excellent analysis of the protection the Clause was designed to afford litigants, see Eric Schnapper, "Libelous" Petitions for Redress of Grievances -- Bad Historiography Makes Worse Law, 74 IOWA L. REV. 303, 343-47 (1989).

FN16. See Spalding v. Vilas, 161 U.S. 483, 497 (1896) ("The authorities . . . are clear, uniform and conclusive, that no action of libel or slander lies, whether against judges, counsel, witnesses or parties, for words written or spoken in the ordinary course of any proceeding before any court or tribunal recognized by law.") (quoting Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, 8 Q.B. 255, 263 (1873)) (internal quotation marks omitted).

FN17. See THE FEDERALIST No. 81, at 489 n.* (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).

FN18. Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (I Cranch) 137, 177 (1803) (emphasis added).

FN19. Our reasoning on this point tracks the Court's:

> [A] series of decisions, uniformly to the same effect, extending from the time of Lord Coke to the present time, established the general proposition that no action will lie against a judge for any acts done or words spoken in his judicial capacity in a court of justice . . . . "This provision of the law is not for the protection or benefit of a malicious or corrupt judge, but for the benefit of the public, whose interest it is that the judges should be at liberty to exercise their functions with independence and without fear of consequences. . . ."
>
> Spalding, 161 U.S. at 495 (quoting Scott v. Stansfield, 3 L.R.-Ex. 220, 223 (1868)).

FN20. Consider the following Supreme Court passage:

> The law of privilege as a defense by officers of government to civil damage suits for defamation and kindred torts has in large part been of judicial making, although the Constitution itself gives an absolute privilege to members of both Houses of Congress in respect to any speech, debate, vote, report, or action done in session. This Court early held that judges of courts of superior or general authority are absolutely privileged as respects civil suits to recover for actions taken by them in the exercise of their judicial functions, irrespective of the motives with which those acts are alleged to have been performed, Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. 335, and that a like immunity extends to other officers of government whose duties are related to the judicial process. Yaselli v. Goff, 12 F.2d 396, aff'd per curiam, 275 U.S. 503, involving a Special Assistant to the Attorney General. Nor has the privilege been confined to officers of the legislative and judicial branches of the Government and executive officers of the kind involved in Yaselli.
>
> Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564, 569-70 (1959) (footnotes omitted).

FN21. In his famous Youngstown concurrence, Justice Jackson outlined three categories of presidential power under the Constitution. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 635-38 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring). Category Two is the functional equivalent of constitutional common law --powers enjoyed by the President under the Constitution that are subject to modification and diminution by congressional statute.

FN22. See U.S. CONST. art. II, § 3; art. I, § 7.

FN23. Once again, our logic tracks the Court's:

> [T]he same general considerations of public policy and convenience which demand for judges of courts of superior jurisdiction immunity from civil suits for damages arising from acts done by them in the course of the performance of their judicial functions, apply to a large extent to official communications made by heads of Executive Departments when engaged in the discharge of duties imposed upon them by law.
>
> Spalding, 161 U.S. at 498. Consider also the words of Framer James Wilson:
>
> In order to enable and encourage a representative of the publick to discharge his publick trust with firmness and success, it is indispensably necessary, that he should enjoy the fullest liberty of speech, and that he should be protected from the resentment of every one, however powerful, to whom the exercise of that liberty may occasion offence.
>
> JAMES WILSON, Of the Constitutions of the United States and of Pennsylvania --of the Legislative Department, in I THE WORKS OF JAMES WILSON 399, 421 (Robert G. McCloskey ed., 1967). Wilson saw members of all three branches as representatives of the public. See GORDON S. WOOD, THE CREATION OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC, 1776-1787, at 597 (1969).

FN24. We do not here address what, if any, immunities might be appropriate for state officials under the federal Constitution. These immunities raise different issues, because unlike the President and federal judiciary, state officials are not coordinate to Congress.

We also bracket the issue whether state governors should enjoy immunity under state constitutions from state law suits. Although many state constitutions feature clauses for state legislators analogous to Article I, § 6, these constitutions differ from the federal template in two key respects. First, most have historically lacked a strongly unitary executive analogous to the one created by Article II. See Steven G. Calabresi, Some Normative Arguments for the Unitary Executive, 47 ARK.L.REV. (forthcoming 1994); Lawrence Lessig & Cass R. Sunstein, The President and the Administration, 94 COLUM.L.REV. I, 49-50 (1994). Second, in no state does the governor enjoy foreign affairs duties akin to the President's. As will become clear below, the unitary language of Article II and the centrality of the President's foreign affairs duties are key features of our structural analysis of the federal Constitution.

Finally, we do not analyze the issue of what, if any, Arrest Clause-like immunity should be enjoyed by federal judges. Compared with Presidents, see infra pp. 713-14, and members of Congress, see infra pp. 711-12, judges may be more fungible from the perspective of democratic representation and democratic skew. Unlike a President, a judge is not always in session, twenty-four hours a day, every day; and unlike Congress, judges can reschedule their hearings and sessions with relative ease.

FN25. In the absence of Article I, § 6, legislators could have tried to enact similar statutory immunity, but an unpopular legislative minority might have been at the mercy of a partisan majority. The President might have vetoed such a law, and until such a law passed, members of the First Congress would have been vulnerable. Partisanship was seen as much less likely among a cadre of professional judges. See THE FEDERALIST No. 78, at 470 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961); Akhil Reed Amar, A Neo-Federalist View of Article III: Separating the Two Tiers of Federal Jurisdiction, 65 B.U. L. REV. 205, 224-28 (1985) [hereinafter Two Tiers].

On the self-protective powers of executive and judicial branches, see THE FEDERALIST No. 51, at 320-23 (James Madison) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961); 3 THE DEBATES, RESOLUTIONS, AND OTHER PROCEEDINGS IN CONVENTION, ON THE ADOPTION ON THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION 245-46 (Jonathan Elliot ed., 1830) (remarks of James Wilson at Pennsylvania Ratifying Convention); and Bill of Rights, supra note 7, at 1194.

FN26. See Butz v. Economou, 438 U.S. 478, 511-12 (1978); supra note 20.

FN27. 5 U.S. (I Cranch) 137, 163 (1803) (quoting 3 WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES *109).

FN28. See Akhil Reed Amar, Fourth Amendment First Principles, 107 HARV. L. REV. 757, 781 (1994) [hereinafter Fourth Amendment].

FN29. 457 U.S. 731, 750 n.31 (1982); see also United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 705 n.16 (1974) ("Nixon tapes case") (rejecting explicitly an expressio unius reading of the Speech or Debate Clause and embracing the notion of implicit presidential privileges).

FN30. The opinions in the case are rife with references to the Speech or Debate Clause as a benchmark for assessing presidential immunity. See, e.g., Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731, 750 n.31 (1982); id. at 759 (Burger, C.J., concurring); id. at 771 (White, J., dissenting). Justice White's dissent alone refers no less than six times to the Speech or Debate Clause. See id. at 765, 769, 771 & n.6, 777 n.22, 781.

FN31. See Nixon, 457 U.S. at 740. Note that our commonplace description of Nixon as a "First Amendment case" is based on the idea, taken for granted by virtually the entire legal community, that mere presidential action can violate the First Amendment notwithstanding the Amendment's reference to "Congress" and the expressio unius maxim. See supra Part I.A. In New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), a case involving unilateral presidential attempts to suppress publication of the so-called Pentagon Papers, no Justice argued that the absence of a congressional law meant that the First Amendment was inapplicable or irrelevant.

FN32. See Nixon, 457 U.S. at 749, 751 n.31.

FN33. See infra Part I.C.

FN34. See Nixon, 457 U.S. at 754 n.37, 758 n.41.

FN35. See id. at 745-46.

FN36. The idea here may be that, in order to bring the outside world under the rule of law, courts must exist and function; but in order to function, they must adopt special rules for in-court wrongs. One can also argue that a judicial action, even if egregiously wrong, is not "unconstitutional" so long as the erring judge has "jurisdiction." Jurisdiction is the right to decide --either way -- and thus, in effect, the right to be "wrong."

FN37. See, e.g., Nixon, 457 U.S. at 745-47 (relying on "good faith" immunity cases).

FN38. For a very different view of immunity and Marbury than Nixon's, see Akhil Reed Amar, Of Sovereignty and Federalism, 96 YALE L.J. 1425, 1484-92 (1987) [hereinafter Of Sovereignty].

FN39. See Nixon, 457 U.S. at 736-39 & n.17, 754 n.37.

FN40. See Henry M. Hart, Jr., The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic, 66 HARV. L. REV. 1362, 1366-70 (1953).

FN41. Impeachment provided a remedy against Nixon but not one for Fitzgerald --not one that fully compensated him for the deprivation of his personal constitutional rights. The Nixon majority's emphasis on impeachment, see 457 U.S. at 757, 758 n.41, was thus unresponsive to the guiding principle of Marbury. Contrary to the Nixon five's intimations, see id. at 754 n.37, the Marbury Court did give William Marbury a remedy rather akin to the commission he sought: the Court's opinion was itself, like a commission, an official government document that declared that Marbury was indeed a justice of the peace. In addition, the Court's opinion on the merits supporting Marbury could serve as guidance to any other court in which Marbury might choose to refile. Marbury in word and deed upheld a plaintiff's right to a judicial remedy; Nixon did not.

FN42. See id. at 797 (White, J., dissenting).

FN43. For an excellent discussion, see Williamson v. United States, 207 U.S. 425, 436-46 (1908). See also Gravel v. United States, 408 U.S. 606, 614 (1972) ("History reveals, and prior cases so hold, that this part of the Clause exempts Members from arrest in civil cases only."); United States v. Brewster, 408 U.S. 501, 521 (1972) (arguing that treason, felony, and breach of the peace encompass all crimes); Long v. Ansell, 293 U.S. 76, 83 (1934) ("When the Constitution was adopted, arrests in civil suits were still common in America. It is only to such arrests that the provision applies." (footnote omitted)); 2 JOSEPH STORY, COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES § 862 (Boston, Hilliard, Gary & Co. 1833) ("Now, as all crimes are offences against the peace, the phrase 'breach of the peace' would seem to extend to all indictable offenses . . . .").

Williamson relied in part on Blackstone:

> It is to be observed that there is no precedent of any such writ of privilege, but only in civil suits . . . . And therefore the claim of privilege hath been usually guarded with an exception as to the case of indictable crimes; or, as it has been frequently expressed, of treason, felony and breach (or surety) of the peace. Whereby it seems to have been understood that no privilege was allowable to the members, their families or servants, in any crime whatsoever, for all crimes are treated by the law as being contra pacem domini regis.

Williamson, 207 U.S. at 439-40 (quoting I WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES * 166). Despite Williamson's correct use of Blackstone, the Court elsewhere quoted language that first appeared in the 1773 fifth edition and was refined in the 1783 ninth edition, not in 1765, as the Court claimed. Compare I WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND 165 (4th ed. 1770) (Oxford, Clarendon Press 1765) (omitting key sentence) with I WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND 165 (5th ed. 1773) (Oxford, Clarendon Press 1765) (adding key sentence) and I WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND 165 (8th ed. 1778) (Oxford, Clarendon Press 1765) (reprinting key sentence from fifth edition) and I WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION OF ENGLAND 165 (Richard Burn ed., 9th ed. 1783) (Oxford, Clarendon Press 1765) (revising key sentence).

FN44. Despite a narrow interpretation of this Clause in Justice Brandeis's short opinion in Long, 293 U.S. at 82-83, a broader reading may square better with the understanding of the Clause at the Founding. In Geyer's Lessee v. Irwin, 4 U.S. (4 Dall.) 107, 197 (Pa. 1790), the Pennsylvania Supreme Court decided that a member of the Philadelphia General Assembly was "undoubtedly, privileged from arrest, summons, citation, or other civil process, during his attendance on the public business confided to him. . . . [H]is suits cannot be forced to a trial and decision, while the session of the legislature continues." Id. at 107. In Bolton v. Martin, I U.S. (I Dall.) 296 (C.P. Phila. 1788), a delegate to the Philadelphia Constitutional Convention was served with a summons. He pled privilege, and the plaintiff's counsel responded by arguing that "the protection of a member of the House of Parliament, extended only to the case of arrests, or personal restraint, and not to the service of a Summons." Id. at 297 (citations omitted). The court disagreed in language that is clear support for temporary immunity:

> [M]embers of Parliament were privileged from arrests, and from being served with any process out of the Courts of law . . . during the sitting of Parliament . . . . The act further directs, that where any plaintiff shall by reason of privilege of Parliament be stayed from prosecuting any suit commenced, such plaintiff shall not be barred by the statute of limitations, or nonsuited, dismissed, or his suit discontinued for want of prosecution, but shall, upon the rising of Parliament, be at liberty to proceed.
>
> . . . . We cannot but consider our Members of Assembly, as they have always considered themselves, intitled by law to the same privileges. They ought not to be diverted from the public business by law suits, brought against them during the sitting of the House; which, though not attended with the arrest of their persons, might yet oblige them to attend to those law suits. . . .
>
> The Defendant, therefore, must be discharged from the action.

Id. at 303-05. Functional reasons led this court to stretch immunity along another axis -- by protecting members of the Philadelphia Convention, who had no explicit textual provision to protect them: "The members of Convention, elected by the people, and assembled for a great national purpose, ought to be considered in reason, and from the nature, as well as dignity, of their office, as invested with the same or equal immunities with the members of General Assembly . . . ." Id. at 303. Fifty years later, another court agreed with the idea of temporary immunity from all civil process:

> For, antecedent to this statute, [sitting] members of parliament were not only privileged from arrest, but also from being served with any process out of the courts of law . . . . [The statute provides] what may be a just construction of the rule in this country -- "that the plaintiff is not to be barred by the statute of limitations" in the time consumed by the privilege, but is at liberty to proceed de novo after the cessation of privilege, which, being a public right, enjoyed for the benefit of the public, only so far interferes with private right as to secure the public good, on the termination of which the private right re-commences, unimpaired by the time of privilege, the statute of limitations ceasing to run when privilege commenced. . . .
>
> . . . [The privilege] is consistent with, nay, necessary to the universal equality established in a republic. It is inseparably connected with the fundamental maxim in all free governments, that where the public exigency renders it necessary, for common preservation, private right shall yield to public good.
>
> . . . . The privilege . . . protects them, while in attendance upon their public duties from arrest, summons, or any other civil process.

Lyell v. Goodwin, 15 F. Cas. 1126, 1127-30 (C.C.D. Mich. 1845) (No. 8,616). Lyell explicitly supported the temporary immunity idea, noting that the plaintiff could bring suit when the defendant had ceased his public duties:

> For the time being, while engaged in the public service, he is divested of self and of private concernment, and, as it were, dedicated in time and mind to the public service. Nor need there be private injury as a necessary consequence. There may be a time, when the privilege of these functionaries ceases, -- when the special duty, that > sets them apart to the public service has been performed, and their return to private life is clear and unquestioned, when the public interest no longer demands their protection, and the private right to their attention can commence, and they be held answerable as any other citizen.

>
> Id. at 1131.

The Wisconsin Supreme Court put a similar gloss on Article I, § 6:

> In order to render this provision available to the extent of its necessity, it will not do to construe the words privilege from arrest in a confined or literal sense. A liberal construction must be given to these words upon principle and reason. It is just as necessary for the protection of the rights of the people that their representative should be relieved from absenting himself from his public duties during the session of congress, for the purpose of defending his private suits in court, as to be exempt from imprisonment on execution. If the people elect an indebted person to represent them, this construction of the constitution must also be made to protect his rights and interests, although it may operate to the prejudice of his creditors; but the claims of the people upon his personal attendance are paramount to those of individuals, and they must submit.
>
> Doty v. Strong, I Pin. 84, 87 - 88 (Wis. 1840). Doty, in the spirit of Bolton, stretched Article I's immunity to cover delegates to Congress from territories. See id. at 88; see also Juneau Bank v. McSpedan, 14 F. Cas. 51, 52 (C.C.D. Wis. 1860) (No. 7,582) ("In England, the privilege from arrest has always been construed to include the service of a summons. So in this country from a very early period."); Nones v. Edsall, 18 F. Cas. 296, 297 (C.C.D.N.J. 1848) (No. 10,290) (Grier, Cir. J.) ("Members of congress are privileged from arrest both on judicial and mesne process, and from the service of a summons or other civil process while in attendance on their public duties."); Anderson v. Rountree, I Pin. 115, 117, 124 (Wis. 1841) (following Doty).

Later courts, in decisions such as Long v. Ansell, rejected this early broad reading of arrest. Long properly noted that the court in Bolton had quoted language from an early edition of Blackstone that had been changed in post-1773 editions. See Long, 293 U.S. at 82 n.3. But Long simply sidestepped the broader functional vision underlying all the early cases rooted in the democratic public interest served by the privilege.

FN45. 2 STORY, supra note 43, § 857 (footnote omitted). Note that Story explicitly extended the functional logic of the Arrest Clause beyond arrests to various "summons[es]," see id., as did Jefferson's Manual. See THOMAS JEFFERSON, A MANUAL OF PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE 15-22 (New York, Clark & Maynard 1873).

FN46. For many explicit expressions of this point, see note 44 above.

FN47. See Richard D. Friedman, Some Modest Proposals on the Vice-Presidency, 86 MICH.L.REV. 1703, 1720-21 (1988).

FN48. See U.S. CONST. art. I, § 3, cl. 4.

FN49. See id. art. I, § 5, cl. 1 ("[A] Majority of each [House] shall constitute a Quorum to do Business").

FN50. See id. art. II, § 1, cl. 1 ("The executive Power shall be vested in a President") (emphasis added). On the importance of the vesting mandate and the unitary executive it creates, see Two Tiers, cited above in note 25, at 231-32 & n.92, 251-52 & n.151 (1985); and Steven G. Calabresi & Kevin H. Rhodes, The Structural Constitution: Unitary Executive, Plural Judiciary, 105 HARV. L. REV. 1153, 1175-79 (1992). See also Memorandum For the United States Concerning the Vice President's Claim of Constitutional Immunity, In Re Proceedings of the Grand Jury Impaneled December 5, 1972, at 18 (Civ. No. 73-965) (Brief filed by Solicitor General Robert Bork in Maryland District Court) ("[T]he President is the only officer whose temporary disability while in office incapacitates an entire branch of government.").

FN51. Because of the common practice of "balancing" a ticket with presidential and vice-presidential candidates from different "wings" of a party, a shift of presidential power from President to Vice President can cause a serious democratic skew. For historical examples and discussion, see Akhil Reed Amar & Vik Amar, President Quayle?, 78 VA.L.REV. 913, 938-39 & n.76 (1992). For a general discussion of succession issues and the Twenty-Fifth Amendment, see Akhil Reed Amar, Presidents, Vice Presidents, and Death: Closing the Constitution's Succession Gap, 47 ARK.L.REV. (forthcoming 1994).

FN52. The issue raised by the Jones suit thus radiates far beyond Jones herself. The issue is one of precedents and slippery slopes: we must ask not merely what would happen if Jones's suit goes forth but what would happen if suits like hers can go forth and multiply.

FN53. This immunity is of course waivable. Surely the President in whatever spare time he has should be allowed to litigate civil damage actions -- or to watch basketball for that matter -- but he should not be legally obliged to do either. As a practical matter, politics may sometimes create strong pressure to litigate now -- or, again, to watch a basketball game -- but political pressure should not be confused with legal obligation. In a civil damage action in the early 1960s, then-President John Kennedy asserted litigation immunity under a statute. When that failed, he settled the case instead of asserting presidential immunity -- a choice wholly consistent with our analysis. See Memorandum in Support of President Clinton's Motion to Dismiss on Grounds of Presidential Immunity at 29 n.19, Jones v. Clinton (E.D. Ark. July 21, 1994) (No. LR-C-94-290).

FN54. Beyond Marbury's vision that the ideal of "a government of laws, and not of men" entails that "the laws furnish [a] remedy for the violation of a vested legal right[,]" 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 135, 163 (1803), there is perhaps another basic element of the rule of law: the idea of no "special treatment" based on status. But temporary immunity for a sitting President comports with this norm too: Bill Clinton can toll a suit not because of who he is, but because of what he does -- what he is now doing for the American people in serving them as their elected President. (Richard Nixon, by contrast, sought a lifetime pass from legal accountability even when he was serving no one but himself.) Presidential arrest immunity simply applies a general functional principle to the unique circumstances of a sitting President preoccupied with weighty affairs of state. Temporary tolling occurs in many other contexts in which similar hardship would be created by immediate litigation -- for example, cases involving military officers on duty, persons temporarily beyond the jurisdiction, and persons with temporary illnesses. See, e.g., Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, 50 U.S.C. app. §§ 501-525 (1988 & Supp.1994).

FN55. U.S. CONST. amend. XXII, § 1 ("No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice . . . ."). In rare cases, the Amendment would allow a person to serve as President for ten years. See id.

FN56. See infra Part II.

FN57. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 585 (1952).

FN58. The circle of potential plaintiffs in a divorce or child custody case is, of course, much smaller than the circle of potential plaintiffs who might seek damages for any past act, public or private. Injunctive suits arising out of a sitting President's private business concerns are also imaginable -- consider, for example, a tort injunction to abate an alleged nuisance on land owned by the President. But if a sitting President deemed such nuisance suits a nuisance, he might well be able to place his business affairs in a blind trust and thereby free himself from distraction. This is not a realistic option for damage suits that arise out of past discrete acts rather than alleged ongoing harms.

FN59. See supra p. 710 (discussing the breach of the peace language of the Arrest Clause). Obviously, mere refusal to pay damages for a past discrete harm during the tolling of a suit should not be seen as an "ongoing harm."

FN60. 3 STORY, supra note 43, § 1563.

FN61. In light of the rather precise parallels of language and logic between Justice Story's discussion of the Arrest Clause in §§ 856-62 and his discussion here in § 1563 of implicit presidential immunities, it is hard to see the parallels as wholly unconscious or coincidental. The same structural vision informs both passages. See 2 id. §§ 856-62; 3 id. 1563.

FN62. Nixon recognized presidential immunity in the absence of an express congressional statute to the contrary. See Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731, 748 & n.27 (1982). So too, we today propose only a Category Two arrest immunity. See supra note 21. Like the Nixon Court, we do not reach the question of the precise scope of congressional power to restrict this immunity.

FN63. The Nixon Court should have been aware of the real argument in the Story quote. Fitzgerald's brief declared:

> Mr. Nixon's countervailing citation from the 1830's, like his other authorities, concerns the amenability of an incumbent President to process in a civil suit. The "official inviolability" that Justice Story referred to in his Commentaries was, by its own terms, limited to acts -- arrest, imprisonment, and detention -- that would obstruct or impede the President "while he is in the discharge of his duties of his office." Neither Story nor any other source cited by Mr. Nixon supports the proposition that a former President, when out of office, is immune from civil liability for his acts while President.
>
> The distinction between an incumbent and a former President is important. It was recognized at the time the Constitution was ratified. And it was strenuously argued to this Court in 1867. Attorney General Stanbery then asserted on behalf of President Andrew Johnson that the President "is above the process of any court to bring him to account as President." But Stanbery acknowledged that this immunity ended with the President's removal from office. When "he no longer stands as the representative of the government," Stanbery said, > > then for any wrong he has done to any individual, for any murder or any crime of any sort which he has committed as President, then and not till then can he be subjected to the jurisdiction of the courts. Then it is the individual they deal with, not the representative of the people.
>
> >
> > Brief for Respondent at 19, Nixon (Nos. 79-1738 and 80-945) (footnotes omitted). Fitzgerald's brief acknowledged that a suit against an incumbent President would be altogether different:
>
> Nixon's arguments obscure a crucial fact about the lawsuit at issue in this case. It was not brought against an incumbent President. Mr. Nixon was named as a defendant in July, 1978, nearly four years after he resigned as President. Whatever drain on his time and resources the suit has caused occurred long after he left office; it had no effect on his performance of public duties.
>
> Id. at 26.

Indeed, Fitzgerald's brief conceded tolling: "The burdens of litigation are not as onerous for the President or a former President as petitioner claims. With respect to the incumbent, the district court can stay all proceedings until he leaves office." Id. at 28; see also Memorandum of Justice Powell, 6th Draft at 22 n.27, Kissinger v. Halperin, 452 U.S. 713 (1981) (No. 79-880), April 6, 1981 (unpublished draft opinion in pre-Fitzgerald case from Thurgood Marshall Papers, Library of Congress, Box 268, folder 2) (acknowledging in a footnote discussing Story, Ellsworth, Adams, and Jefferson that "[t]he statements quoted here concerning a President's amenability to process apply only to sitting Presidents").

FN64. See Nixon, 457 U.S. at 776 (White, J., dissenting) (conceding that the Story passage "clearly supports [Nixon's] position but it is of such a late date that it contributes little to understanding the original intent").

FN65. Nixon, 457 U.S. at 750 n.31 (quoting letter from Thomas Jefferson to George Hay (June 20, 1807), in I0 THE WORKS OF THOMAS JEFFERSON 404 (Paul L. Ford ed., 1905)).

FN66. Id. (quoting WILLIAM MACLAY, THE JOURNAL OF WILLIAM MACLAY, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA, 1789-1791 167 (Edgar S. Maclay ed., 1890)).

FN67. Letter from Thomas Jefferson to George Hay (June 17, 1807), in II THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS JEFFERSON 232 (Andrew A. Lipscomb ed., 1905).

FN68. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 3, cl. 6 ("[B]ut the Party convicted [in an impeachment court] shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.").

FN69. In response to Maclay's statement that, "altho, President he was not above the laws," Ellsworth and Adams "declared You could only impeach him. [sic] and no other process Whatever lay against him." THE DIARY OF WILLIAM MACLAY AND OTHER NOTES ON SENATE DEBATES 168 (Kenneth R. Bowling & Helen E. Vett eds., 1972). Maclay then "put the Case suppose the President commits Murder in Streets. . . . But You can only remove him from Office on impeachment." Id. Listen carefully to Adams and Ellsworth's response: "Why When he is no longer President, You can indict him." Id. (emphasis added).

As with the Story quote, the Nixon Court ignored Fitzgerald's admonition about the applicability of the quote from Adams and Ellsworth:

> The statements made in the course of framing and ratifying the Constitution do not support Nixon's position. Nor do the observations of John Adams and Oliver Ellsworth . . . . These observations . . . addressed a question that is not before the Court in this case: namely, whether an incumbent President is amenable to process in a civil suit.
>
> Brief for Respondent at 18, Nixon (Nos. 79-1738 and 80-945).

FN70. See Nixon, 457 U.S. at 751 n.31. The Court introduced the Adams/Ellsworth quote with the -- embarrassingly untrue -- claim that Adams had served as a delegate at the Philadelphia Convention. See MAX FARRAND, THE FRAMING OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES 14-41 (1913) (discussing the delegates); id at 39 (noting that John Adams was in London).

FN71. In essence, all three were arguing for litigation immunity rather than substantive immunity for sitting Presidents -- immunity from claims made while President rather than for conduct occurring while President. (As Ian Ayres has pointed out to us, the distinction is akin to the claims-made/occurrence distinction in modern insurance policies.) Litigation immunity protects a worthy plaintiff (because it merely postpones suit), whereas substantive immunity does not (because it bars suit). Litigation immunity deters conduct while in office -- but conduct that is by hypothesis unconstitutional and should be deterred by the prospect of a later damage suit. Substantive immunity does not chill this conduct; instead it immunizes even clearly unconstitutional actions -- and that is why the Founders rejected it. See Of Sovereignty, supra note 38, at 1484-92 .

If we are concerned that mere litigation immunity will lead to a flood of frivolous lawsuits (or even nonfrivolous but ultimately unworthy ones) against ex-Presidents, we should not recognize a substantive immunity that bars worthy and unworthy claims alike. Instead we should provide for fee-shifting, which discourages plaintiffs with weak claims and yet fully preserves remedies for plaintiffs with winning claims. See id. at 1514 n.346. If Congress fears that the threat of liability for good faith mistakes will overdeter and paralyze Presidents (or other officials, for that matter), Congress need only provide for indemnification for good faith mistakes, for which government is in effect the better risk bearer than its employees in a Coasean world. See id. at 1515; Fourth Amendment, supra note 28, at 812.

In light of this analysis the real timing difference between Nixon and Clinton is not Eastland's and Meese's occurrence-based difference that favors Nixon, see supra pp. 701-02, but a claims-made difference that favors Clinton.

FN72. Nixon, 457 U.S. at 752 n.31. It is also worth noting that Justice White's dissent argued that United States v.

Burr, 25 F. Cas. 30 (C.C.D. Va. 1807) (No. 14,692), demonstrates that the President is "subject to judicial process." Nixon, 457 U.S. at 781 (White, J. dissenting). The majority did not disagree with this conclusion. See Nixon, 457 U.S. at 753-54. These Nixon opinions overlooked the fact that Burr was not an unavoidable intrusion on the President, for the President had the power to dismiss the prosecution at any time if he considered Burr's request for exculpatory material too onerous. Put another way, by continuing to hold Burr in detention, Jefferson voluntarily incurred certain duties, the disregard of which would be a kind of ongoing breach of the peace as long as Jefferson insisted on holding Burr in jail for trial. Any subpoena against Jefferson would have been a true negative injunction -- provide evidence in your possession or let Burr go -- that could have been enforced, Marbury-like, without an awkward coercive order against Jefferson. Chief Justice Marshall could simply quash the indictment and let Burr free, much as he simply refused to take jurisdiction in Marbury itself.

Nor does the Nixon tapes case, United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), preclude temporary immunity. As in Burr, the President could have avoided any court-ordered mandate merely by ending the ongoing prosecutions, via a Caspar Weinberger-like pardon or by formally rescinding via the Attorney General an executive regulation and dismissing both the special prosecutor and the underlying prosecutions, as the Nixon tapes Court explicitly allowed. See id. at 694-96. (Of course, these actions might have created a huge political backlash, but so might insisting on arrest immunity rather than waiving it; once again, we must distinguish between legal obligation and political pressure. See supra note 53.) The Nixon tapes case is also of course distinguishable from the Jones litigation because the former involved allegations of presidential criminal wrongdoing, Nixon, 418 U.S. at 687, which would overcome any arrest immunity deducible by analogy to the § 6 Arrest Clause, see supra p. 710. Thus, the Nixon tapes case is an awkward springboard for any assault on implicit presidential arrest immunity. See also supra note 29 (noting that the Nixon tapes case explicitly an rejects expressio unius reading of Article I, § 6 and affirms implicit presidential immunity).

The Nixon tapes case does contain some loose language, but all this must now be read in light of the later decision in Nixon v. Fitzgerald. Frankly, some of the loose language simply cannot be taken at face value today. See, e.g., Nixon, 418 U.S. at 694-96 & n.8 (1974) (treating as having "the force of law" a regulation that gave a kind of legislative veto to certain key congressional officials -- a regulation that, as a binding law, rather than a political promise, would plainly violate basic constitutional principles acknowledged a few pages later, id. at 704, and resoundingly affirmed a few years later in I.N.S. v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 945-46 (1983)); Nixon, 418 U.S. at 709-13 (glossing over key differences between case at hand, in which the prosecutor was seeking to pierce presidential privilege to find inculpatory evidence and Burr-like cases in which defendant with due process rights sought exculpatory evidence). In the end, the Nixon tapes Court acquiesced in an untidy opinion by Chief Justice Burger that, on the facts of the case, reached the obviously right result. Richard Nixon was the head of an ongoing conspiracy to obstruct justice and was using the Oval Office itself as the hub of that conspiracy; and the Court had evidence under seal that made all this clear. See Nixon, 418 U.S. at 687 & n.4, 689, 700. The Court's occasionally strained readings of the Constitution, case law, and regulations must be analyzed in light of what the Court delicately described as the "unique setting" and "unique facts of this case." Nixon, 418 U.S. at 691, 697; see also id. at 700 (stressing material under seal as the basis for the Court's conclusion); Id. at 687-88, 701 (relying subtly on Nixon's status as an unindicted co-conspirator); id. at 712 n.20 (invoking by analogy a case in which the strong presumptive privilege of jury deliberation proceedings yielded in the face of credible claims of criminal misconduct).

FN73. To put the point slightly differently, we are suggesting that President Clinton's immunity should not turn on whether his alleged conduct towards Jones was an "official" duty or not (a holdover of viewing immunity through the prism of the Speech or Debate Clause), but rather should turn on whether the Jones suit and others like it, see supra note 52, could functionally "Arrest" the President while at "Session."

FN74. See supra p. 702.

FN75. See supra Part I.C.

FN76. One reason for a more flexible application of presidential arrest immunity stems from the greater potential hardship on plaintiffs than in the Article I context, since presidential "sessions" run much longer than congressional ones. See supra pp. 714-15.

FN77. "Well before" allows the case to be tried before Inauguration. Aware of the significance of Inauguration, the parties and the judges would probably expedite judicial proceedings.

FN78. Jones's case does not appear to be one of a repressed memory; her complaint claims that she told others about the alleged encounter with then-Governor Clinton within days of its occurrence. See Jones v. Clinton, Complaint, Civ. No. LR-C-94-290 (E.D. Ark. May 6, 1994).

FN79. See JOSEPH STORY, COMMENTARIES ON EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE §1520 (4th ed. 1846) (Boston, Hilliard, Gray & Co. 1836) ("Courts of Equity . . . sometimes act upon their own inherent doctrine of discouraging, for the peace of society, antiquated demands by refusing to interfere, where there has been gross laches in prosecuting rights . . . .").

FN80. The doctrine is used to "aid[] the vigilant and not those who slumber on their rights." NAACP v. NAACP Legal Defense & Educ. Fund, Inc., 753 F.2d 131, 137 (D.C. Cir.1985), cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1021 (1985). To prove laches, President Clinton would have to show that Jones delayed in asserting her claims, that the delay was not excusable, and that her delay unduly prejudiced Clinton. See AmBrit, Inc. v. Kraft, Inc., 812 F.2d 1531, 1545 (11th Cir.1986), cert. denied, 481 U.S. 1041 (1987). Laches is not based "merely on time. Rather, laches is based upon changes of conditions or relationships involved with the claim." Farries v. Stanadyne/Chicago Div., 832 F.2d 374, 378 (7th Cir.1987) (citations omitted). The laches period begins to run when the plaintiff discovers the facts that create her cause of action. See Coleman v. Corning Glass Works, 619 F.Supp. 950, 953 (W.D.N.Y. 1985), aff'd, 818 F.2d 874 (Fed. Cir.1987); see also Grant Airmass Corp. v. Gaymar Indus., 645 F.Supp. 1507, 1515 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) (explaining that courts consider whether a plaintiff had actual or constructive knowledge of the relevant facts in determining whether a claim is barred from laches).

President Clinton's laches claim is buttressed by the lack of an explicit federal statute of limitations for Jones's civil rights claims; rather, federal law provides that state statutes and the common law should govern. See 42 U.S.C. § 1988 (Supp. V 1993); cf. Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731, 748 & n.27 (1982) (distinguishing Nixon's case from one in which "Congress expressly had created a damages action against the President of the United States").

FN81. In Mackall v. Casilear, 137 U.S. 556 (1890), the Court opined:

> The doctrine of laches is based upon grounds of public policy, which requires for the peace of society the discouragement of stale demands. And where the difficulty of doing entire justice by reason of the death of the principal witness or witnesses, or from the original transactions having become obscured by time, is attributable to gross negligence or deliberate delay, a court of equity will not aid a party whose application is thus destitute of conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence.
>
> The time for this son to have attacked his father on the ground of fraud was prior to that father's death . . . .
>
> Id. at 566 (citations omitted).

FN82. See FLEMING JAMES, JR., GEOFFREY C. HAZARD, JR. & JOHN LEUBSDORF, CIVIL PROCEDURE 430-31 (4th ed. 1992) ("[A]n equitable defense or counterclaim may be interposed to an action presenting only legal issues or vice versa.").

FN83. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(c) explicitly recognizes the affirmative defenses of estoppel and fraud, as well as of laches. FED. R. CIV. P. 8(c).

FN84. In A.C. Aukerman Co. v. R.L. Chaides Constr. Co., 960 F.2d 1020 (Fed. Cir.1992) (en banc), the court stated:

> [Plaintiff] is in error in its position that, where an express statute of limitations applies against a claim, laches cannot apply within the limitation period. In other areas of our jurisdiction, laches is routinely applied within the prescribed statute of limitations period for bringing the claim.
>
> . . . . . .[W]e are unpersuaded that the technical distinction between application of laches against legal damages and an equitable accounting which [plaintiff] asks us to draw should be made.
>
> Id. at 1030-31 (citations and emphasis omitted); see also Technitrol Inc. v. NCR Corp., 513 F.2d 1130, 1130 (7th Cir.1975) (adopting the district court opinion in Technitrol Inc. v. Memorex Co., 376 F.Supp. 828, 831 (N.D. Ill. 1974), which applied laches to damage suits).

FN85. Once again, we need go no further than to recognize a Category Two presidential privilege that Congress may perhaps have power to modify. See supra p. 705.

FN86. Venue and personal jurisdiction defenses are of course waivable. See FED. R. CIV. P. 12(h)(I).

FN87. See U.S. CONST. art. III, § 2, cl. 2 ("In all Cases affecting Ambassadors . . . the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction"); Judiciary Act of 1789, § 13, 1 Stat. 73, 80 (1789) (declaring that the Supreme Court "shall have exclusively all . . . jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors, or other public ministers").

FN88. See Akhil Reed Amar, Marbury, Section 13, and the Original Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, 56 U. CHI. L. REV. 443, 469-78 (1989); Akhil Reed Amar, The Two-Tiered Structure of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 138 U. PA. L. REV. 1499, 1560 n.222 (1990).

FN89. See THE FEDERALIST NO. 65, at 400 (Alexander Hamilton) (Clinton Rossiter ed., 1961).

FN90. See supra p. 718

FN91. Until the appearance of the 1945 "minimum contacts" language of International Shoe v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 320 (1945), suits against D.C. officials were hard to bring because longarm jurisdiction did not exist. See Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714, 722 (1878).

FN92. Letter from Thomas Jefferson to George Hay, supra note 67, at 232. To be sure, improved transportation technology facilitates travel and makes long distance litigation infinitely more feasible than at the Founding; but why should the presidential mountain be obliged to come to plaintiff Muhammad rather than vice versa? Until Congress speaks clearly to the contrary, should not litigation against a sitting President accommodate his unique need to operate from the nation's capital, supervising the government, and attending to the people's business -- at least if a plaintiff is responsible for the timing of a lawsuit and purposefully chooses to sue a President in session?

If the suit were brought in D.C., Jones's case may be dismissed. District of Columbia courts in such cases apply the District's statute of limitations, even if the underlying cause of action occurred elsewhere. See Steorts v. American Airlines, 647 F.2d 194, 197 (D.C. Cir.1981). However, Jones could argue that a transfer of venue motion will allow her to carry the Arkansas statute of limitations with her to Washington. If the reason for transfer of venue is based on forum non conveniens and 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), she may be successful. See Van Dusen v. Barrack, 376 U.S. 612, 639 (1964). But if President Clinton phrases the argument in terms of personal jurisdiction and venue (as we suggest), the D.C. statute of limitations may be used: an Arkansas transferor court lacking personal jurisdiction and venue could not support transfer under Van Dusen, and transferee law would apply. See PAUL M. BATOR, DANIEL J. MELTZER, PAUL T. MISHKIN & DAVID L. SHAPIRO, HART & WECHSLER'S THE FEDERAL COURTS AND THE FEDERAL SYSTEM 1744-45 (3d ed. 1988); 15 CHARLES A. WRIGHT, ARTHUR R. MILLER & EDWARD H. COOPER, FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE § 3827, at 261-67 (2d ed. 1986). The D.C. statute of limitations for intentional torts in violation of § 1983, such as assault, is one year. See D.C. CODE ANN. § 12-301 (4) (1993); Hobson v. Wilson, 737 F.2d 1, 32 (D.C. Cir.1984) (distinguishing assault cases, which have a one-year statute of limitations, from First Amendment claims, which have a three-year limitations period), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1084 (1985); Williams v. District of Columbia, 676 F.Supp. 329, 332 (D.D.C. 1987). The one-year limitation also includes actions for "libel." See D.C. CODE ANN. § 12-301 (4) (1993).

END OF DOCUMENT

gave sufficient evidence of a special contract by which payment for her services was postponed until the death of the decedent, James Pollock. The services for which she claimed to be paid were rendered to him before 1861, when she left his house. Of course, if there was no such special contract as alleged her demand was clearly barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Claims of this character against the estates of decedents, resting on mere oral testimony of declarations or admissions, are very dangerous, and ought certainly not to be favored by the courts. "The danger attendant upon the assertion of such claims requires, as was said by Chief Justice GIBSON, in reference to a somewhat similar contract, that a tight rein should be held over them, by making the quality, if not the sum of the proof, a subject of inspection and governance by the court, and by holding juries strictly to the rule prescribed." Per STRONG, J., in Graham v. Graham's Ex'rs, 10 Casey 481.

We think that both the quality and sum of the evidence in this case were entirely insufficient. The question ought not to have been submitted to the jury. All the declarations proved were only indicative of an intention to leave the plaintiff a legacy—to provide for her by will. Mrs. Gordon testified that Pollock said: "We intend to do as well by her as we do by our own child." He said, "if she lived after him he would do well by her at his death." Mrs. Ayers testified: "He said he intended to leave her and do as well by her as his own." "He said he intended to do well by her, and at his death he would make her as good as an heir. He said he would will it; did not use the word 'will' or 'heir;' he said he would do as well by her as his own; that is what he said. He just said he intended to leave her and do as well by her as his own." "I heard Esquire Pollock say he would do well by her, or he would pay her wages."

If the declarations had been to the effect that if the plaintiff would remain with him until his death he would then do well by her or pay her wages, there would be some plausibility in the contention that there was a mutual contract; she to serve him until his death, and he either to provide for her by will or pay her wages. It might possibly have been sustained under the case of Thompson v. Stevens, 21 P. F. Smith 161. This was not, however, pretended to have been the contract. Had she remained until his death it might perhaps have been implied. But in point of fact she left his service ten years before his death. There was no engagement on her part to remain a day. She might have left immediately and her case would have stood as strong on the evidence as it is now. There is not a scintilla of proof that she assented and agreed to postpone her claim until his death. Had she commenced an action in 1861, for wages then claimed to be due, it would scarcely be contended that the evidence given upon this trial would have prevented her immediate recovery.

There was manifest error in the admission of the evidence as to the amount of the estate of the decedent, and in that part of the charge in which the court instructed the jury, "if he promised to do as well by her as by his own child, his meaning might be that he designed to put her on an equality with his son, Nathaniel. In this view we have received evidence of the value of the decedent's property and leave it to you to say what plaintiff should have, regarding what Nathaniel might have received as the only heir of his father if he had survived him." As Mr. Justice STRONG has said, in Graham v. Graham's Ex'rs, 10 Casey 475, "what less is the result than the establishment of a parol will?" "It is a palpable error to say that the damages are to be regarded as a debt or liability of the estate. They are a distributive share and are claimed and recovered as an equivalent for an inherited portion or a legacy. If they are the fruit of a legal liability of the decedent, then the rule which the plaintiff invokes leads to a still greater absurdity than even a parol will; for under the contract which she sets up, she is only entitled to a share of what remains after all legal liabilities are discharged, and if those liabilities absorb the whole estate, she is entitled to nothing. The extent of her right varies with the residuum of the estate and is incapable of measurement until the residuum be ascertained; there is no possible meter for it." It is clear that if the plaintiff had succeeded in making out a clear and positive contract between her and the decedent that the payment of her claim should be postponed until his death, all that she could have recovered would have been what she was entitled to on a quantum meruit when she left his service.

Judgment reversed.

Appeal of John F. Hartranft, Governor of the Commonwealth, et al.

1. The Governor is the absolute judge of what official communications, to himself or his department, may or may not be revealed, and is the sole judge not only of what his official duties are but also of the time when they should be performed.
2. The Governor is exempt from the process of the courts whenever engaged in any duty pertaining to his office, and his immunity extends to his subordinates and agents when acting in their official capacity.
3. The powers and duties of grand juries and the essentials of a subpœna ad testificandum discussed.

November 1st 1877. Before AGNEW, C. J., SHARSWOOD, MERCUR, GORDON, PAXSON, WOODWARD and STERRETT, JJ.

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

Certiorari sur appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions of Allegheny county: Of October and November Term 1878, No. 14.

This was the appeal of John F. Hartranft, Governor of the Commonwealth; M. S. Quay, Secretary of the Commonwealth; James W. Latta, Adjutant-General of the Commonwealth; General R. M. Brinton, and Major A. Wilson Norris, from the order of the Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace of Allegheny county, allowing and directing attachments to issue against them in the matter of the investigation of the grand jury into the riots at Pittsburgh, of July 21st and 22d 1877.

The riots of July 1877 were inaugurated by a strike of the train-men in the employ of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, who proceeded to take possession of the trains of the company, and to stop all traffic over the road. Portions of the "National Guard" of the state were sent, under the charge of their regular officers, to open the road, and a collision took place between them and a mob led by the strikers, in which a number of persons were killed and wounded. Shortly thereafter large accessions were made to the mob, and a great riot ensued, in which all the buildings of the railroad company were burned, and thousands of cars, with their contents, were pillaged and destroyed. During the progress of this riot, a number of persons and several soldiers were killed and wounded.

At the next term of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Allegheny county, the court, Kirkpatrick, J., in charging the grand jury in relation to their duties, inter alia, said:—

"Secondly, you are 'diligently to inquire and true presentment make, * * * as well of those things which you know of your own knowledge.' By this is meant, that if of your own knowledge as a grand jury, or of the knowledge of either of you individually, or from the examination of witnesses in other cases, or if, from any source, offences and crimes are discovered by you, or any other matter by you deemed worthy of investigation, touching which no formal complaint has been made or indictment submitted to you, it is your duty to advise the court thereof, in writing, together with your wishes in the premises. This paper is called a presentment, and if, upon its submission and consideration, the court should be of opinion that your wishes should be complied with, they will direct a bill of indictment to be prepared accordingly and submitted to you, and it will be disposed of by you as if it had come before you in the usual and ordinary way. In the submission of your presentment * * * it is sufficient if it indicate your wishes and the substantial grounds on which they are predicated."

On the 1st of October 1877, the grand jury of Allegheny county presented a petition to the Court of Quarter Sessions, setting forth "that the citizens of said county are greatly concerned in having a careful investigation made of the riots of July 21st and 22d 1877, and all facts and particulars incident and relative thereto and connected therewith, and the grand jury do respectfully pray your Honor to give the said matter in charge to them to inquire concerning, and to furnish them compulsory process to secure the attendance of such witnesses as they may consider necessary to examine."

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

Upon this application was endorsed, "And now, 1st October 1877, the within presentment considered, approved, and ordered to be filed. Per curiam."

On the same day a subpœna issued to several witnesses, and among them the parties to this writ. The subpœna was as follows: "We command you, that laying aside all business and excuses whatsoever, you and each of you be and appear in your proper persons before our grand jury, at Pittsburgh, at our Court of Oyer and Terminer and Quarter Sessions, there to be held for the county aforesaid, forthwith, to testify all and singular those things which you shall know touching a certain investigation now being had on formal presentment by and before the said grand jury, relating to the late riots of July last in our said county, in our said court depending, and then and there to be tried, between the Commonwealth and ——, defendant, on the part of the ——. And hereof fail not, under penalty of one hundred pounds."

On October 12th 1877, after service of the above subpœna, the grand jury presented a petition to the court, stating that the witnesses had failed to appear after due notice, and praying the court "to adjudge the said parties and witnesses in contempt, and that further and compulsory process be awarded to said grand jury for the purpose of bringing the said recalcitrant witnesses to testify."

The court appointed the 15th of October to hear an argument on the application for an attachment, and at that time the following answer was filed:

"And now, October 15th 1877, George Lear, Attorney-General of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, comes into court, representing the said Commonwealth, and says, that the Governor, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the state, Adjutant-General Latta, General R. M. Brinton, and Major A. Wilson Norris, against whom attachments have been applied for to compel their obedience to a subpœna to appear and testify before said grand jury, have no knowledge of the late riots in Allegheny county, except that which they learned in their military and official capacities, and which are privileged communications; and that he has learned this by an examination of their knowledge of the subject made personally of each of them on behalf of the Commonwealth; that, in their capacity of civil and military officers, they declare to him that, in the exercise of their official discretion, an examination into their acts in connection with said riots would be detrimental to the public service and injurious to the interests of the Commonwealth; that they disavow any disrespect to the court or its process, and absent themselves on the ground that such matters as they could testify to are privileged communications, and not the subject of inquiry before a grand jury; that John F. Hartranft, Governer of the Commonwealth, and James W. Latta, Adjutant-General, are in constant correspondence with the army in the field in the disorderly and riotous regions of the state, and in daily expectation of being required at the front, and to be called to a distant county would endanger the interests of the public service; that all of said witnesses reside in counties remote from Allegheny, and not within the jurisdiction of process to answer, except in a matter or cause depending before the court. And the said Attorney-General further avers, that in the interest of public justice, and on behalf of the Commonwealth, he has, as the chief law officer of the state, examined the nature of the inquiry and the value of the testimony which these witnesses could give, and he is of the opinion that the interests of the state will be best subserved by their absence, and, therefore, he respectfully withdraws the application for attachment on behalf of the Commonwealth."

After the argument on the application for attachments, the court made the following order:—

"And now, 20th October 1877, after argument and upon consideration, the application is allowed, and attachments are hereby directed to be issued for and against the following named persons, being the same indicated by the grand inquest as in default, to wit: His Excellency John F. Hartranft, Governor of the Commonwealth; the Honorable M. S. Quay, Secretary of the Commonwealth; General James W. Latta, Adjutant-General of the Commonwealth; General R. M. Brinton, and Major A. Wilson Norris."

A writ of certiorari was thereupon taken in behalf of all against whom attachments were directed to be issued, and the following errors were assigned:—

1. The court erred in issuing a subpœna for witnesses beyond the limits of the county of Allegheny, to appear before the grand jury and not before the court, and in a matter not depending before the court.

2. In issuing a subpœna for witnesses to appear before the grand jury and testify in a matter touching a certain investigation now being had on formal presentment, by and before the said grand jury, relating to the late riots of July last, in our said county.

3. In allowing the attachments and directing them to be issued for and against the persons named by the grand jury, as in default upon a matter not depending before the court, or legally given in charge to the grand jury.

4. In issuing attachments against the Governor of the Commonwealth, Secretary of the Commonwealth, Adjutant-General, and other military officers of the state, in their official capacities, to testify before the grand jury in an investigation touching riots which had occurred prior to the investigation, and in which no prosecution was pending before the court or grand jury.

5. In issuing an attachment against the chief executive of the Commonwealth.

Thomas M. Marshall, Lyman D. Gilbert, Deputy-Attorney-General, and George Lear, Attorney-General, for appellants.—This was not a matter or cause depending before the judges or any of them, but an investigation before the grand jury. The subpœna commands the witnesses to appear before the grand jury. But the record shows that it was not on formal presentment, and that it was not depending in court.

There is no allegation, in the paper presented to the court, that the grand jury possesses any personal knowledge on the subject, nor averment against any parties as being identified with the riots. The investigation was at the instance of the citizens, and not under the direction of the court. The paper was approved and ordered to be filed, but there was no direction or order for process to bring witnesses before the court, to be sworn, and sent before the grand jury, which would have been the regular mode, if the court had power to institute a prosecution in that manner, which is not admitted. The prayer of the petition is not for such witnesses as the court may designate, but for such as the grand jury "may consider necessary to examine."

In this state the better opinion is that the grand jury can act only upon and present offences of public notoriety, and such as are within their own knowledge; such as are given to them in charge by the court, and such as are sent up to them by the district-attorney; and in no other cases can they indict without a previous prosecution before a magistrate, according to the terms of the Bill of Rights: 1 Whart. Cr. Law, ed. 1868, § 458, and note.

If the object of this proceeding is to establish crime and to punish criminals, it is irregular, for the following reasons: There has been no arrest, and there is no prosecution returned to court to which the subpœna is applicable. The grand jury cannot inculpate in such cases by presentment. They cannot subpœna witnesses to appear before them in any case, but the witnesses must be required to appear in court, and be sent before the grand jury: Respublica v. Shaffer, 1 Dall. 236.

The proceeding by which a court of its own motion gives a matter in charge to a grand jury is to be resorted to only in extraordinary cases, and to existing evils, those in progress, in which the evil is to be corrected by preventive, rather than punitive justice: Lloyd v. Carpenter, 3 Clark 188; Citizens' Association, 8 Phila. Rep. 478; Grand Jury v. Public Press, 4 Brewster 313.

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

The Governor and other officials are subpœnaed not as citizens, but by their official titles. Under these circumstances they cannot be compelled to testify.

The legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the government are distinct and independent, and each one should protect itself from the encroachments of the others: De Chastellux v. Fairchild, 3 Harris 18; Greenough v. Greenough, 1 Jones 489; Ervine's Appeal, 4 Harris 256; Burns v. Clarion County, 12 P. F. Smith 422; Richards v. Rote, 18 Id. 248; Commonwealth ex rel. Johnson v. Halloway, 6 Wright 446; Bagg's Appeal, 7 Id. 512.

Every department of the government has its secrets of state, or privileged comunications, which it is not only the right of the officers to refuse to disclose, but his duty to withhold; 1 Greenl. on Evidence, § 250, 251. The official transactions between the heads of the departments of state and their subordinate officers are in general treated as privileged communications. Thus, communications between a provincial governor and his attorney-general on the state of the colony, or the conduct of its officers; or between the governor and a military officer under his authority; the report of a military commission of inquiry, made to the commander-in-chief, and the correspondence between an agent of the government and a secretary of state, are confidential and privileged matters, which the interests of the state will not permit to be disclosed. The president of the United States, and the governors of the several states, are not bound to produce papers or disclose information communicated to them when, in their own judgment, the disclosure would, on public considerations, be inexpedient;" Gray v. Pentland, 2 S. & R. 23; Yoter v. Sanno, 6 Watts 156.

And the officers are themselves the judges of the question whether such disclosure would be prejudicial to the public interests: 1 Burr's Trial 186; Gray v. Pentland, 2 S. & R. 23; Cooper's Case, 1 Wharton St. Tr. 662; Beatson v. Skene, 5 Hurlst. & N. Rep. 837. It is not a question for the court, but for the officers themselves to determine; and the officers in this case having been subpœnaed by their official titles, it is to be presumed they are to testify in that capacity. The nature of the inquiry having been disclosed in the subpœna, the presumption is that the testimony required is concerning official action in reference thereto, and, in their answer filed for them, they say that such testimony would be prejudicial to the public service. They being the judges, that was a complete answer to the application for the attachment. Whenever the law vests any person with a power to do an act, and constitutes him a judge of the evidence on which the act may be done, and, at the same time, contemplates that the act is to be carried into effect, through the instrumentality of agents, the person thus clothed with power is invested with discretion, and is, quoad hoc, a judge. His mandates to his legal agents, on his declaring the event to have happened, will be a protection to his agents; and it is not their duty or business to investigate the facts thus referred to their superior, and to rejudge his determination. In a military point of view, the contrary doctrine would be subversive of all discipline; and as it regards the safety and security of the United States and its citizens, the consequences would be deplorable and fatal: Vanderheyden v. Young, 11 Johns. 150, 158.

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

The courts cannot compel the Governor to perform any duties appertaining to his office; nor can they interfere with his discharge of them, nor control him in any matter of executive discretion: State of Louisiana, ex. rel. v. Warmouth, Governor et. al., 22 La. Ann. Rep. 1; Mauran, Adjutant-General, v. Smith, Governor, 8 R. I. Rep. 192; The People, ex. rel. v. Bissell, Governor, 19 Illinois 229; The State, ex. rel. v. Towns, Governor, 8 Georgia 360; Hawkins v. The Governor, 1 Arkansas 570. Mott, et. al. v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., et. al., 6 Casey 33.

In the case of Thompson v. The German Valley Railroad Company, 22 New Jersey Eq. 111, the chancellor said: "An order to testify is an unusual, if not unheard of practice. Such order ought not to be made against the executive of the state, because it might bring the executive in conflict with the judiciary. If the executive thinks he ought to testify in compliance with the opinion of the court, he will do it without an order; if he thinks it to be his official duty in protecting the right and dignity of his office, he will not comply even if directed by an order. And in his case, the court would hardly entertain proceedings to compel him by adjudging him in contempt. It will be presumed that the chief magistrate intends no contempt, but that his action is in accordance with his views of his official duty. And in the present case, that presumption amounts to a certainty. Chief Justice Marshall, on the trial of Burr, vol. 2, p. 536, remarks: 'In no case of this kind would a court be required to proceed against the President, as an ordinary individual. The objections to such a course are so strong and so obvious that all must acknowledge them.'"

The Governor can be punished in but one way for an abuse or misuse of his power, and that is by impeachment. If he can be subpœnæd into any Court of Quarter Sessions or before any grand jury to testify in behalf of the Commonwealth, and in his discretion, under the advice of the legal department of the state, concludes that the interests of the state in the administration of the criminal law, will not be subserved by answering, and especially where he is summoned to appear as Governor of the Commonwealth, and, if for his default he can be attached for contempt, then the barriers between the executive and judiciary are broken down, and one department will be shorn of its independence of the others.

If the executive can be called into one county, he can be called into them all; and, unlike the other departments, his is continually in session, and he is always on duty. If he can be called into any county as Governor, not to testify to what occurred in the county, but in the executive chamber, which no court or grand jury can inquire into, it will be greatly to the detriment of the public service. If he can be arrested, fined, and imprisoned for not obeying a subpœna in this case, it will be a great scandal on republican institutions, and will shake public confidence in the permanency of our government.

E. A. Montooth, District-Attorney, Morton Hunter, Assistant District-Attorney, S. A. McClung, and George Shiras, Jr., contra.—Judge Kirkpatrick, in his charge to the grand jury, gave them this matter in charge; but, if not, the riot was undoubtedly within their personal knowledge, and hence, under their oaths, they were bound to present it. This they did in accordance with the instructions of the court, and asked for special power to investigate it. That the grand jury meant this as their own official act, and not merely that of individual citizens, is clearly shown by the beginning and conclusion of the presentment itself. They wished, as a grand jury, to obtain additional facts, for the purpose of presenting the offenders for indictment. Thus is this case clearly distinguished from that of the memorial of the citizens' association (8 Phila. 478), cited by the other side.

The endorsement of the court upon their presentment, taken in connection with the other circumstances of this case, was certainly sufficient to empower the grand jury to make the investigations.

But this question is immaterial, for, as the subpœna was in the proper form and regularly issued under the seal of the court, and as the appellants were duly served therewith, they cannot answer it by questioning the proceedings of the grand jury.

Are the Governor and the other appellants subject to subpœna? Chief Justice Marshall says, that "it is not known ever to be doubted, but that the chief magistrate of a state might be served with a subpœna ad testificandum:" 1 Burr's Trial 177, et seq.; 2 Id. 535.

That the others are subject to subpœna will scarcely be doubted. It became their duty, therefore, when subpœnaed, to make a proper response; and, as the law makes no exception in their favor, they should have responded in person. Instead of this, however, the Attorney-General filed an answer in their behalf. If such answer be permissible in any case, it should, at least, be made by the person subpœnaed and verified by affidavit.

In this answer, and in the argument before this court, it is assumed that the appellants were subpœnaed in their official character. This nowhere appears. The title follows the name and may be regarded merely as designatio personæ. It is also assumed that it was intended to examine them wholly in regard to their official acts, and upon privileged matters. This assumption is likewise gratuitous; but even if it were true, the answer is still insufficient. It was due to the dignity of the judiciary that they appear in person, and if any such question had been asked them, they could have availed themselves of their privilege in the ordinary way.

But are official communications in regard to this riot privileged? The only ground upon which such matters can be privileged is that of public policy, and it seems scarcely reasonable to suppose that the public interest would be injuriously affected by their disclosure several months after the riot occurred.

If, then, the appellants have failed to make a proper response to the subpœna, the right to attach them would seem to follow; and even if the Governor should be excused on account of his official duties, the others should certainly be required to appear in person, and submit themselves fully to the process of the court.

It is not intended to reflect upon the official conduct of the Governor or the other appellants, but if any question should be asked which might be made the basis of impeachment or prosecution, they could, of course, refuse to answer it.

On November 12th 1877, the chief justice announced that it was the judgment of the majority of the court that the order of the court below, granting the attachments, should be reversed. Opinion to be filed thereafter.

Mr. Justice GORDON delivered the opinion of the court, January 7th 1878.

Grand juries have the power to make presentment, not only of such criminal offences as may be laid before them by the district-attorney, in the form of bills of indictment, and of such as may come within the personal knowledge of individual members thereof, but, also, of all such matters as may be given them in charge by the court. Neither is there any doubt about the power of the court to direct that body to make inquiry concerning affairs which directly affect the public peace and society; among which affairs may be instanced great riots, such as those which recently disturbed the well-disposed citizens of Pittsburgh and its vicinity. Matters of this kind may properly be referred to the consideration of the grand inquest in order that the instigators thereof and the participants therein may be brought to justice; and this is the more necessary, because, in times of public tumult and alarm, private prosecutors may be overawed through fear of personal violence.

Doubtless the proceedings in the case before us are very irregular, since there seems to be a total inversion of the proper order of things. It was the duty of the court, not of the grand jury, first to move in the matter. In a subject of so much importance, and one requiring the exercise of so much care and discretion, the court should have instructed this jury as to what it was to investigate, and in what manner the investigation was to be conducted. Nothing of the kind, however, was done; but the court, having approved its petition, suffered it to proceed to the adoption of its own subjects, after its own methods, and, by this sufferance, it allowed an important public investigation to pass from its own control to that of a body of men, which, as it was governed by no regular instructions, resembled more a committee for the general investigation of public affairs, than a lawful constituent of the Court of Quarter Sessions. This, however, is really of small importance to the matter in hand; neither can the appellants call in question the regularity of the proceedings as between the court and its grand jury; for if they have been properly subpœnaed, and can present no lawful excuse for their want of obedience to the mandate of the Quarter Sessions, they must stand convicted of a contempt, and we cannot help them. The subpœna is the process of the Commonwealth, and there is no doubt about the court's power to issue that process in proper cases.

Our inquiry, then, is limited to two propositions: Were the subpœnas regular, such as an ordinary citizen would be bound to obey? If so, were the appellants liable to attachment for disobedience to this process? The subpœna we have before us, like the other proceedings in this case, is very irregular. It is, indeed, but a general mandate of the court, ordering the appellants to appear, "to testify, all and singular, those things which they may know touching a certain investigation being had, on formal presentment, by and before the grand jury, relating to the late riots of July last, in said county, in said court depending." It sets forth no case, present or prospective, nor does it state for whom, or at whose instance, the defendants were to be subpœnaed. As this writ is a very arbitrary one, obliging the citizen to leave his home and abandon his business, however important it may be, and give his attendance at court, wherever that may be sitting, it is very important to know what parties are entitled to it; for if it be issued at the suit of one having no right thereto, it is no contempt to disobey it. The Commonwealth may have this process in any proceeding where its interest is apparent, whether as a suitor or a prosecutor, and so may parties in courts, either civil or criminal; but we have yet to learn that any such right exists in a court, in its mere character as a court, separated from the case which it has in hand. So this, as well as every other compulsory process, must show upon its face that it was issued for some person or party having a right thereto, otherwise it is nugatory and void, and disobedience to its mandate involves no penalty whatever. In the case before us, there was the use of the writ of subpœna, as a mere order of the court, without statement of party or case, commanding the defendants to appear before the grand jury, for the purpose of giving their testimony touching the late riots. If there is any law authorizing such process, we have not been informed of it.

No doubt the court might have directed a subpœna to have issued for the Commonwealth, in any case where the Commonwealth was a party, or where it was apparent it was in some way interested in some case or transaction then depending. So might it have directed a warrant to have issued for the arrest of some one guilty of a crime or misdemeanor, but in such case, no one would contend, that the mere blank warrant of the court would, in itself be sufficient to detain a citizen for one moment; the authority for such warrant must appear upon its face or it is worthless. But the courts' subpœna is no more respectable than its warrant; if the subpœna exhibit no authority it may be disobeyed with impunity. Now, in the case before us, the Commonwealth was not a party in interest, or, if so, it is not now apparent. It seems, from the petition of the grand jury, that the citizens of the county of Allegheny "were greatly concerned in having a careful investigation of the late riots," but whether they were concerned in bringing the rioters to justice or not, is not stated, though this was the only matter in which the Commonwealth could be concerned. Moreover, as the grand jury was acting under no instruction, it was not possible, even for the court, to know what that jury was doing or intended to do, but, of this, the court should have been informed, before it undertook to interfere with the personal liberty of the citizen by its summary process of attachment, for, as the matter now stands, it is apparent that the subpœna was issued for no tangible cause or party and for no properly defined legal purpose; hence, no one was bound to obey it.

For the purposes of this case, however, we may admit the regularity of this subpœna and that, upon an ordinary citizen, it would have been binding and obligatory, for we regard the question of the liability of the appellants to attachment, in any event, as the prime one of this case. In order to resolve this, we must first understand who the persons are, against whom the court has directed its attachment and for what purpose they have been subpœnaed. They are the Governor of Pennsylvania, the Secretary of the Commonwealth, the Adjutant-General, chief officers of the Executive Department of the state government, and two officers of the National Guard; the latter subordinates acting under the orders of the former. The purpose, for which these officers are subpœnaed, is, that the grand jury may be put into possession of any information they may be possessed of, or that may be within the power of their several departments, concerning the military or other means used by them in the suppression of the late riots in the city of Pittsburgh. It will be observed that these persons are subpœnaed for the purpose of compelling a revelation of such things as have come to their knowledge in their official capacities, and which strictly belong to their several departments as officers of the Commonwealth. This is clearly set out in the answer, by the Attorney-General, to the application for the attachment, and there has been no denial thereof upon the argument before us. In order to simplify matters, we may treat this case just as though the process, first and last, were against the Governor alone; for if he is exempt from attachment because of his privilege, his immunity protects his subordinates and agents. The general principle is, that whenever the law vests any person with the power to do an act, at the same time constituting him a judge of the evidence on which the act may be done, and contemplating the employment of agents through whom the act is to be accomplished, such person is clothed with discretionary powers, and is quoad hoc a judge. His mandates to his legal agents, on his declaring the event to have happened, will be a protection to those agents: Vanderheyden v. Young, 11 Johns. 158, per Spencer J.

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

It follows, if the Governor, as supreme executive, and as commander in chief of the army of the Commonwealth, is charged with the duty of suppressing domestic insurrections, he must be the judge of the necessity requiring the exercise of the powers with which he is clothed, and his subordinates, who are employed to render these powers efficient and to produce the legitimate results of their exercise, can be accountable to none but him. In like manner, if he is constituted the judge of what things, knowledge or information, coming into his department through himself personally or from his subordinates, may or may not be revealed, then such subordinates, without his permission, cannot be compelled to disclose, in court, any such matters or information.

What, then, are the duties, powers and privileges of the Governor? In the language of the constitution, art. 4, sect. 2, "The supreme executive power shall be vested in the Governor, who shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Also, same article, sect. 7, "The Governor shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the Commonwealth, and of the militia, except when they shall be called into the actual service of the United States." He is, also, invested with the appointing and pardoning powers; the power to convene the legislature in cases of emergency and to approve, or veto, bills submitted to him by the General Assembly. It is scarcely conceivable that a man could be more completely invested with the supreme power and dignity of a free people. Observe, the supreme executive power is vested in the Governor and he is charged with the faithful execution of the laws, and for the accomplishment of this purpose he is made commander-in-chief of the army, navy and militia of the state. Who then shall assume the power of the people and call this magistrate to an account for that which he has done in discharge of his constitutional duties? If he is not the judge of when and how these duties are to be performed, who is? Where does the Court of Quarter Sessions, or any other court, get the power to call this man before it, and compel him to answer for the manner in which he has discharged his constitutional functions as executor of the laws and commander-in-chief of the militia of the Commonwealth? For it certainly is a logical sequence that if the Governor can be compelled to reveal the means used to accomplish a given act, he can also be compelled to answer for the manner of accomplishing such act. If the Court of Quarter Sessions of Allegheny county can shut him up in prison for refusing to appear before it and reveal the methods and means used by him to execute the laws and suppress domestic violence, why may it not commit him for a breach of the peace, or for homicide, resulting from the discharge of his duties as commander-in-chief? And if the courts can compel him to answer, why can they not compel him to act? All these things, we know, may be done in the case of private individuals; such an one may be compelled to answer, to account and to act. In other words if, from such analogy, we once begin to shift the supreme executive power, from him upon whom the constitution has conferred it, to the judiciary, we may as well do the work thoroughly and constitute the courts the absolute guardians and directors of all governmental functions whatever. If, however, this cannot be done, we had better not take the first step in that direction. We had better at the outstart recognise the fact, that the executive department is a co-ordinate branch of the government, with power to judge what should or should not be done, within its own department, and what of its own doings and communications should or should not be kept secret, and that with it, in the exercise of these constitutional powers, the courts have no more right to interfere, than has the executive, under like conditions, to interfere with the courts. In the case of Oliver v. Warmouth, 22 La. 1, it was held (per Taliafero, J.), that, under the division of powers, as laid down in the federal and state constitutions, the judiciary department has no jurisdiction over or right to interfere with, the independent action of the chief executive, in the functions of his office, even though the act he is required to perform be purely ministerial. This is putting the matter on very high grounds, for, in such case, no other officer would be exempt from the mandatory power of the judiciary. No case could more forcibly exhibit the extreme reluctance of courts to interfere with the functions of the supreme executive, for the hypothesis put is the refusal of the Governor to perform a duty, cast upon him by law, of a character strictly ministerial. We think, however, that the ground upon which this decision stands, is substantial; for, as the learned justice well argues, the difficulty arises in the attempt to establish a distinction between ministerial and discretionary acts as applied to the Governor, and then to conclude that the former may be enforced by judicial decree; it is objected, however, that the doctrine is unsound in this, that it gives to the judiciary the large discretion of determining the character of all acts to be performed by the chief executive; that this would infringe his right to use his own discretion in determining the very same question; that he must, necessarily, have the unconditional power of deciding what acts his duties require him to perform, otherwise, his functions are trammelled and the executive branch of the government is made subservient to the judiciary. The principle, enunciated, in the above stated case, applies with greater force to that we now have under consideration; for if the Governor's discretion may not be interfered with, in a matter purely ministerial, much more may that discretion not be interfered with in a case which pertains to his office and duties as commander-in-chief, in the discharge of which, the constitution makes that discretion his peculiar and absolute prerogative.

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

Again, the Governor, having a proper regard for the dignity and welfare of the people of the Commonwealth, is not likely to submit himself to imprisonment, on the decree of the Court of Quarter Sessions, or to permit his officers and coadjutors to be thus imprisoned. Were we, then, to permit the attempt to enforce this attachment, an unseemly conflict must result between the executive and judicial departments of the government. We need not say that prudence would dictate the avoidance of a catastrophe such as here indicated. On this point, the case of Thompson v. The German Valley Railroad Co., 22 N. J. Eq. R. 111, furnishes us with a precedent well worthy of our consideration. In that case a subpœna duces tecum had been served on the Governor of New Jersey, commanding him, by his individual name, to appear and testify before an examiner of the Court of Chancery, and bring with him an engrossed copy of a private statute which had been passed by the legislature, and had been sent to him, as Governor, for his approval. He refused to obey the subpœna, informing the court, at the same time, that he did not refuse out of any disrespect to the court or to the law, but because he thought his duty required him not to appear or produce the paper required, or to submit his official acts, as Governor, to the scrutiny of any court. It will be seen that the case thus presented is quite as strong as that under discussion; for the Governor, upon his own opinion of duty, which, as it will appear, did not accord with that of the court, not only refused to appear or produce the required paper, but to submit any of his official acts to the scrutiny of the court. An order was granted on the Governor, to show cause why he should not appear and testify. After argument, Zabriskie, Chancellor, said: "The Governor cannot be examined as to his reasons for not signing the bill, nor as to his action, in any respect, regarding it. But there is no reason why he should not be called upon to testify as to the time it was delivered to him. That is a bare fact that includes no action on his part. To this extent, at least, I am of opinion that he is bound to appear and testify. But I will make no order on him for that purpose. Such order ought not to be made against the executive of the state, because it might bring the executive in conflict with the judiciary. If the executive thinks he ought to testify, in compliance with the opinion of the court, he will do so without order; if he thinks it to be his official duty, in protecting the rights and dignity of his office, he will not comply, even if directed by an order. And, in his case, the court would hardly entertain proceedings to compel him by adjudging him in contempt. It will be presumed the chief magistrate intends no contempt, but that his action is in accordance with his official duty." If we adopt this opinion as a sound exposition of the law, the case before us is determined; for the matter is left to rest solely on the opinion of the executive, although his opinion be clearly contrary to that of the court. We are inclined to think the conclusion thus reached is wise and discreet; and it is supported by the best text writers of our times. These state the law to be, that the President of the United States, the governors of the several states and their cabinet officers, are not bound to produce papers or disclose information committed to them, in a judicial inquiry, when, in their own judgment, the disclosure would, on public grounds, be inexpedient: 1 Greenf. on Ev., § 251; 1 Whart. Law of Ev., § 604. Thus, the question of the expediency or inexpediency of the production of the required evidence is referred, not to the judgment of the court before which the action is trying, but of the officer who has that evidence in his possession. The doctrine that the officer must appear and submit the required information or papers to the court, for its judgment as to whether they are, or are not, proper matters for revelation, is successfully met and settled in the case of Beaton v. Skene, 5 Hurlst. & N. 838, per Pollock, C. B. It was there held, that if the production of a state paper would be injurious to the public interest, the public welfare must be preferred to that of the private suitor. The question then arose, how was this to be determined? It must be determined either by the judge or by the responsible crown officer who has the paper. But the judge could come to no conclusion without ascertaining what the document was or why its publication would be injurious to the public service. Just here, however, occurred this difficulty, that, as judicial inquiry must always be public, the preliminary examination must give to the document that very publicity which it might be important to prevent. The conclusion reached was, that from necessity, if for no other reason, the question must be left to the judgment of the officer.

A like case is that of Gray v. Pentland, 2 S. & R. 23. A subpœna, had been issued from the court below and served upon Governor Snyder and Secretary Boileau, with a duces tecum; a rule was also entered for the purpose of taking their depositions in Harrisburg. They declined to appear in answer to the subpœna, or to permit their depositions to be taken under the rule, and refused to produce the paper or deliver it to the plaintiff. This paper was of very great importance, inasmuch as its production was necessary for the maintenance of the suit pending, the Supreme Court holding that, though it was beyond the plaintiff's power, parol evidence of its contents was not admissible. A motion was then made, on the part of the plaintiff, for a special subpœna duces tecum to compel the production of the paper, but this was refused. On argument in the superior court this action of the court below in refusing compulsory process against the Governor and Secretary of the Commonwealth does not seem to have been questioned; on the other hand, it was approved in opinions delivered by TILGHMAN, C. J., and BRACKENRIDGE, J. The latter was, as he said, inclined to think that the Governor could not be compelled to produce the paper transmitted to him; that it was within his own discretion to furnish or refuse it; and this on the ground of public policy. The chief justice observed, inter alia, that the Governor, who best knew the circumstances under which the charge had been exhibited to him, and could best judge the motives of the accuser, must exercise his own judgment with respect to the propriety of producing the writing. Thus the matter is treated as quite beyond the power of the court, and the judgment of the executive is regarded as absolute and final.

We next refer to the celebrated trial of Aaron Burr. Here is the case of one charged with treason; one who, by the express terms of the constitution, was entitled to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor. The judge before whom the examination was conducted was John Marshall, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court; a man renowned, not only for his legal learning, but also for his judgment and sagacity as a statesman; and the President was Thomas Jefferson, one not likely unduly to exalt executive prerogative or to refuse to the judiciary its just tribute of respect. We may, therefore, presume that whatever was done by the principal actors in the remarkable judicial drama then in progress, was well done. At the request of the defence a subpœna duces tecum was awarded and directed to the President requiring him to appear, and bring with him a certain letter from General Wilkinson to himself. He refused either to appear or produce the paper required. On discussion of the question, not whether compulsory process should be awarded against the President, for that was not so much as proposed, but whether the attorney-general should permit the defence to have the examination of a copy of the required letter which had been put into his possession, the chief justice said (as we find it set down in vol. 3, p. 37, Burr's Trial, as published by Westcott & Co., Washington City, 1807): "I suppose it will not be alleged in this case that the President ought to be considered as having offered a contempt to the court in consequence of his not having attended, notwithstanding the subpœna was awarded agreeably to the demand of the defendant; the court would, indeed, not be asked to proceed as in the case of an ordinary individual." We find, also, in vol. 2, p. 536, of the same trial, published by Hopkins & Earle, Philadelphia 1808, the following recorded as the utterance of the chief justice: "In no case of this kind would the court be required to proceed against the President as against an ordinary individual. The objections to such a course are so strong and obvious that all must acknowledge them. * * * In this case, however, the President has assigned no reason whatever for withholding the paper called for. The propriety of withholding it must be decided by himself, not by another for him. Of the weight of the reasons for and against producing it he himself is the judge."

Influenced by this and the other precedents we have cited, as well as by reason and necessity, we are in like manner disposed to conclude that the propriety of withholding the information required by the grand jury, must be determined by the Governor himself: and the weight of the reasons influencing him in the conclusion at which he has arrived, is for himself and not for the court to consider.

Furthermore, as the Governor is the chief executive of the Commonwealth, and as such embodies the power of the people, for the conservation of the peace and the protection of the rights and property of the citizens of the state, as he is also part of the legislative branch of the government, it must be obvious to every one that there are times when he must be excused from the ordinary process of the courts. We presume it will not be contended that he would be obliged to obey the mandate of a subpœna during the sessions of the legislature, when his presence at the capitol is constantly required, or whilst engaged in the suppression of an insurrection. These, however, do not embrace all his duties as Governor; we must, therefore, go one step further, and concede that he is exempt from such process whenever engaged in any duty pertaining to his office. Granting that there may be times when he is not so engaged, and when he might be free to answer to a subpœna, who is to be the judge of his engagements or disengagements? May he be compelled to appear before a court and submit himself to the judgment thereof as to whether his duties, just then, require him to be in his office at Harrisburg, or at the head of the army in the field, or whether he may not have a few days of leisure, during which he may await the will and pleasure of a grand jury? It will be conceded that in all ordinary cases, he must himself judge as to what things he must do and what things he must leave undone, and that this is a duty imposed upon him by the constitution. But how then shall a court at any time, step in and assume the power of judging for him? This cannot be done except by an unwarrantable assumption of executive prerogative. The same reasoning which brings us to the conclusion that the Governor is the absolute judge of what official communications to himself or his department, may or may not be revealed, in like manner leads us to conclude that he must be the sole judge, not only of what his official duties are but also of the time when they should be attended to. The Governor, disavowing any disrespect to the court or its process, has answered that, in consequence of his constant communication with the state forces, now in the field, in the disorderly and riotous districts, his time is fully occupied in the discharge of the duties of his office, and that to leave his post would endanger the interests of the public service. This brings us face to face with the question, whether the executive, or the courts for him, are to determine the character of his official duties and the order in which they may be performed. For instance, is obedience to a subpoena one of his duties, and if so, shall he discharge that duty in preference to that which rests upon him as commander-in-chief? The answer to this question is easy, for if the courts can in any one instance or at any one time, control or direct the executive in the performance of his duties, they may do so in every instance and at all times. We need not waste time in the attempt to prove that this proposition is not allowable; that the Governor cannot thus be placed under the guardianship and tutelage of the courts. To the people, under the methods prescribed by law, not to to the courts is he answerable for his doings or misdoings. It is his duty from time to time, "to give to the General Assembly information of the state of the Commonwealth," but it is not his duty to render such an account to the grand jury of Allegheny or any other county. Whilst, therefore, the motives of the Court of Quarter Sessions in granting the process before us, are not to be lightly impugned, yet we have no doubt it exceeded its jurisdiction in attempting to interfere with the executive prerogative.

Let the attachment be set aside.

Chief Justice AGNEW and Mr. Justice STERRETT dissented, the chief justice filing the following opinion.

The question before us belongs to the enduring theme of civil liberty, and not to ephemeral interest, passion or feeling. It falls within the emphatic words of the Declaration of Rights that "all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their safety, peace, and happiness:" Sec. 2. The question is, whether any citizen, private or official, is above the process of that law, which protects and enforces these essential rights of the people—rights "excepted out of the general powers of government" in order to "guard against transgressions of the high powers delegated" to the mere organs of government: Sect. 26.

It is therefore a misfortune that this question has been marred by false issues. The course of the railroad company, or its men; the behavior of the troops, near or remote; the action of the citizens of Pittsburgh, and the conduct of the Governor and his officers, have nothing to do with the question we must consider—a question belonging solely to the realm of law, and only obscured when false issues intervene. Like the glass of the astronomer, cleared of all distorting and prismatic rays, the judicial mind should be free from every divergent influence and discoloring bias.

The 21st and 22d of July last were days of great alarm in this city, and a series of fearful riots bore terror to the hearts of its inhabitants. In the midst of the tumultuous mass an armed military appeared. Pistols and muskets were fired, many were wounded, and more than twenty lives of citizens and soldiers were taken. Two millions or more of property were destroyed. A hundred locomotives were ruined, the roundhouse, and other railroad buildings, the great hotel, the grain elevator, and many hundred cars were burned. Vast amounts of merchandise of distant owners were consumed or stolen, and for nearly a mile the railroad tracks were covered with car-wheels, bars, bolts, and iron machinery of every kind.

A monstrous crime was committed. Blood ran in streams. Was this murder, manslaughter, or excusable or justifiable homicide? Property was despoiled. Was this arson, robbery or theft? Whose was the crime? Wrongheaded men united to remedy grievances by conspiracy and violence. A military force intervened. Death and spoil ensued. Were they called thither by lawful authority; or did they come at private bidding? Did the military attack, or were they attacked? Did they fire at command or by individual will? These were the fearful questions to be answered by some competent lawful authority. The state and distant communities are involved in the answer. The laws of the state have been violated, the "peace" of the people broken, and their "safety and happiness" endangered. To whom is inquiry given to obtain the facts, and present the guilty for trial and punishment? Not to the legislature. It has no judicial power. Not to the Governor. His duty is to "take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed." He can neither try nor punish crime. Even a coroner's inquest, super visum corporis, is totally inadequate to determine the full scope, character and purpose of a riot of this immense magnitude, and the various parts played by all the actors. No individual pursuit can suffice, for private prosecutors have neither the interest, the inclination, nor the ability to reach the breadth and scope of such a scene of bloodshed and ruin.

To the judiciary alone belongs this power and duty; to it only is the means given to summon juries and witnesses for both inquiry and trial. Under the constitution and laws of the land, it [illegible] the Act of 16th June 1836, "relating to the jurisdiction and powers of the courts," and embracing all courts, commits to the Oyer and Terminer authority "to inquire by the oaths and affirmations of good and lawful men of the county of all crimes committed or triable in such county," and also "to hear, determine, and punish the same:" Sect. 14. To the Court of Quarter Sessions is given "the jurisdiction and power" "to inquire by the oaths or affirmations of good and lawful men of the county, of all crimes, misdemeanors, and offences whatever, against the laws of this Commonwealth, which shall be triable in the respective county:" Sect. 16. It is then empowered to certify into the Oyer and Terminer all offences cognizable there, and to try those over which it has jurisdiction. After the distribution of powers to the several courts—Common Pleas, Quarter Sessions, Oyer and Terminer and Orphans' Court—the act then gives to all alike certain powers, viz.: to levy and recover fines, forfeitures, &c.: Sect. 20. To make rules of practice, &c.: Sect. 21. The 23d section proceeds: "Each of said courts is empowered to issue writs of subpœna under their official seal into any county of this Commonwealth, to summon and bring before the respective court any person to give testimony in any cause or matter depending before them, under the penalties hitherto appointed and allowed, in any such case by the laws of this Commonwealth." The Act of 14th April 1834, "relating to the organization of the courts of justice," makes the grand, as well as the petit jury, a lawful part or arm of the court for the administration of justice. The power to compel witnesses to come before the grand jury is, therefore, precisely on the same footing, as to require them to appear before the petit. Both are derived from the same law, and stand on the same power, the act being careful to command any person to appear to testify in any matter as well as any cause. And if the law had not been so precise, the power would necessarily flow from the "jurisdiction and power" conferred to "inquire by the oaths and affirmations of good and lawful men of the county, of all crimes, misdemeanors, and offences whatever against the laws of this Commonwealth." There is common-law authority also. Says Hawkins, in his Pleas of the Crown (vol. i., ch. 6, p. 65): "It is also a high crime to disobey the king's lawful command or prohibition, as for refusing to give evidence to a grand jury concerning a crime, for which the court may impose an immediate fine." This was decided by Lord Holt in The King v. Lord Preston, committed by the Court of Quarter Sessions for refusing to give evidence to the grand jury: 1 Salk. 27–8. The same law is stated by Mr. Chitty, vol. i., Cr. Law 320. Another evidence that the source of this power arises in the jurisdiction of the court acting by means of its grand jury arm, is the fact that the court will, in delicate cases, direct the evidence to be heard in the court, so that the grand jury may be better assisted in the performance of their duties: 1 Chitty Cr. Law 312, 313.

An immense riot, involving high crimes, and a multitude of persons whose identity, names, participation and guilt or innocence must be ascertained, in order to proceed to trial and punishment, can be brought to legal knowledge only by a grand jury charged with this duty. A riot is one of those great public offences which is conceded by the authorities to be the special subject of inquiry in this mode. If, then, the court can charge the grand jury as its legally appointed means, expressly given by the Act of Assembly, to make inquiry, it follows, as a necessary logical consequence, that the inquiry must be made per testes brought before them by due process of law; for the scope, and all parties to such a riot, cannot be a matter of personal knowledge.

This much said upon the grand jury as a constituent in the administration of criminal jurisprudence ought to be sufficient. But its powers have been denied, rendering something more necessary. It is one of the boasted bulwarks of English liberty handed down to us, and protected by the Declaration of Rights. No man can be tried for a crime except upon a bill of indictment duly found by a grand jury. Hence, the accused may challenge the array or individual jurors: Brown v. Commonwealth, 23 P. F. Smith 321; Id., 26 Id. 319; Lynch v. Commonwealth, 27 Id. 205. "Our laws (says a well-known writer) have therefore wisely and mercifully placed the strong twofold barrier of a presentment and a trial by jury between the liberties of the people and the prerogative of the crown:" 2 Tomlin's Law Dict. 307. Therefore the constitution declares: "The trial by jury shall be as heretofore, and the right thereof remain inviolate." Sect. 6. "Heretofore" means according to the course of the common law: Van Swartow v. Commonwealth, 12 Harris 131. The oath of the grand jury is, "diligently to inquire, and a true presentment make, as well of all such matters as shall be given them in charge as of those things which they may know of their own knowledge." "Grand juries (says Judge Addison) inquire only into crimes, but they inquire of all crimes." "No criminal charge can be brought into a court of justice in this state unless it have acquired the sanction of a grand jury:" App. 36. "To the grand jury (he says) is committed the preservation of the peace of the county, the care of bringing to light for examination, trial and punishment, all violence, outrage, indecency and terror, everything that may occasion danger, disturbance or dismay to the citizens. Grand juries are watchmen stationed by the laws to survey the conduct of their follow-citizens, and inquire where and by whom public authority has been violated, or our constitution and laws infringed:" App. Speaking of the judicial branch of the government, he says: "This branch consists of two superior parts, a court and jury." * * * "Juries selected from the people by an officer of their own election are so numerous and so frequently changed, that they may well be considered as the people themselves exercising this branch of the administration:" App. 55.

A charge to a grand jury to inquire of a matter is either oral by the court, or in writing by the district-attorney in the form of a bill. The oral charge is where criminal courts (says Judge King) "of their own motion call the attention of grand jurors to, and direct the investigation of matters of general import, which from their nature and operation in the entire community justify such investigation." "Such (he says) as great riots that shake the social fabric, carrying terror and dismay among the citizens:" 1 Whart. Cr. Law, sect. 458, note.

Thus the constitutional power of the grand jury to inquire into the riots of July 21st and 22d being fully established, the inquiry implies evidence, evidence implies witnesses, and witnesses the process to bring them. Here I must notice two technical objections, one that the subpœna commands attendance before the grand jury itself. This is wholly unsubstantial. According to ancient practice the grand jury having no power to administer oaths, the witnesses came into open court, were sworn there, and then orally commanded to go before the grand jury: 1 Chit. Cr. Law 312, 313. This is noticed in the note to 7th Smith's Laws 686, and the practice of other states recommended to be adopted, of sending the witnesses at once before the grand jury, and saving the time of the court. Accordingly long ago a law was passed (now incorporated into the Criminal Procedure Act of 1860) authorizing the foreman to administer the oath. The witnesses are now sent immediately up. The subpœna, therefore, under the seal of the court, tested by the judge and signed by the clerk, was strictly correct in commanding the witnesses to appear before the grand jury. It is the written, instead of oral, order of the court.

Another objection is that it states no parties. This is made without adverting to the fact that it is process awarded upon an inquiry, and before parties are known. The very purpose of the inquiry is to ascertain the parties to be presented for indictment. It is strictly proper and fully to the purpose, viz: "To testify all and singular those things you shall know touching a certain investigation now being had on formal presentment by and before the said grand jury, relating to the late riot in July last in our said county." This is sufficient for the purpose of inquiry. The remainder of the printed form used by the clerk was necessarily left a blank, there being no parties to be named in it. It was necessarily on the part of the Commonwealth, for a defendant cannot appear with witnesses before the grand jury. It was asserted in argument that the grand jury had no special charge to ground the inquiry. This is wholly incorrect. I have read the able charge of Judge Kirkpatrick, and find it direct and pointed upon these very riots, and very full of instruction upon the entire subject of riots, routs, and unlawful assemblies. But if it were not so clear and pointed, it was followed by a special written request of the grand jury, "to give the said matters (these riots) in charge to them, and to furnish them compulsory process to secure the attendance of such witnesses as they may consider necessary to examine." This paper was endorsed by the judge himself, "considered, approved, and ordered to be filed." Here then was a direct committal to the grand jury, and the process was issued accordingly.

Much space has been devoted to a vindication of the jurisdiction of the court and the province of a grand jury. But the lustre of this great common-law heritage for the protection and security of the people, aud the light it has borrowed from our own legislation, have been so dimmed by denial and obscured by doubt, it has seemed to be necessary. The labor, moreover, is not vain, for all this bears directly on the great question to be considered, to wit: the constitutional power of the court to require the Governor of the state to appear for examination before this arm of its jurisdiction.

We come now to this immediate question, and the first point to be noticed is the argument that he is exempt from a subpœna because he is a co-ordinate branch of the state government. What is co-ordination or equality of rank, under the constitution? It is not the absolute independence of each. If it were, the end would be disorder, conflict, and finally disorganization. It is not absolute superiority each over the others, for then they would not co-exist in unity, as essential parts of the same common whole. The constitution is the written will of the people, in its entirety, and all its parts must necessarily cohere without jarring, in order to effectuate that will. Equality of rank implies no superiority, except in the exercise of the particular function confided to that rank. Co-ordination is merely the vesting of the separate functions of making, determining and executing laws, in different persons, that thereby the union of all in one person or body may not work injury to the public welfare. The Assembly cannot try causes or execute process, the Governor cannot legislate or decide judicial controversies, and the Judges cannot make and execute laws. This is the general distribution of the powers of the government, yet the constitution itself does not strictly adhere to it. Thus the legislature may make certain inquiries, and try certain cases, e. g., the election and qualification of members, contempts, expulsions. The Governor approves or vetoes bills, and the courts superintend and enforce the execution of process. But from the very nature of co-ordination in one and the same government, and the distribution to each branch of its appropriate functions, each is necessarily supreme in its own department, for neither can freely exercise its proper functions if obstructed by the other. For example, the judiciary cannot control or interfere with the discretion of the Governor in the exercise of an executive function. And for the same reason the legislative and executive branches cannot control the appropriate functions of the judicial. If the legislative or executive can oppose or obstruct the exercise of an appropriate judicial power the purpose of separation is defeated; a practical union takes place in them, and the surrender by the judiciary is effected. One of the appropriate and exclusive functions of the judiciary is the detection, trial and punishment of offenders against the law. On the true principles of constitutional co-ordination, therefore, the Governor cannot obstruct this function, and must yield obedience to the judicial branch in this respect as the appropriate and superior repository of the power conferred by the people themselves. When arguments are properly drawn from the distribution of the powers of government among co-ordinate branches their force must be conceded. But when their use is inconsistent with the rights of the people who have made this distribution for their own benefit, the argument is fallacious. Then it flies in the face of the Declaration of Rights (sect. 2, already quoted), "that all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety and happiness." This right being reserved by the 26th section out of the powers conferred in the constitution, it follows no use can be made of the distribution of powers prejudicial to their "peace, safety and happiness." The appropriate function of the judiciary being the detection, trial and punishment of offenders, and the inquiry for this purpose by witnesses being the constitutional and legal mode of procedure, it is equally clear the Governor, just as any other citizen, being subordinate to the judicial power in this respect, must yield his obedience to the process necessary for the exercise of this judicial function. Good government and the welfare of the people demand this.

This superior function of the judiciary is to be seen in another aspect. There never was a time when it has not been engaged in passing upon the acts of both the other branches, in resolving the constitutionality and interpretation of laws, and the regularity of executive acts. This needs no citation of authority. "It is idle," says C. J. GIBSON, "to say the authority of each branch is defined and limited in the constitution, if there be not an independent power able and willing to enforce its limitation." "From its very position it is apparent that the conservative power is lodged with the judiciary, which, in the exercise of its undoubted right, is bound to meet every emergency." "It has become," he adds, "the duty of the court to temporize no longer, but to resist, temperately, though firmly, any invasion of its province, whether great or small:" De Chastellux v. Fairchild, 3 Harris 18. How futile would be the judicial power to punish crime, or vindicate innocence, if the Governor, having exclusive knowledge of facts bearing upon either, could defy the process of the law at pleasure. To argue that his official character is a ground of denial of obedience, is to rob the people, whose servant he is, of their undeniable right to the due administration of justice, through that department of the government to which they have committed the right of judgment. To say he may be liable in an action for damages, is no response. If not bound to appear, no right of action can exist, for he is under no duty to the party. If it be a criminal prosecution, there is no party to whom he could respond. So impeachment cannot reach him, for that is no impeachable offence which is no violation of duty. An obligation to answer the subpœna is the postulate in either case. To say he must appear upon an indictment, and need not upon a legal inquiry, is equally unsound. For the inquiry of a grand jury is, as we have seen, the constitutional exercise of the power of the court, in order to try and punish offenders. To discriminate between inquiry and trial, as a question of power, is to emasculate judicial rights, and dethrone those of the people.

And now we may crave aid from other sections of the Declaration of Rights. "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused hath a right inter alia to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and in prosecutions by indictment or information, a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage:" Sect. 9. "All courts shall be open, and every man for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation shall have remedy by due course of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial, or delay:" Sect. 11. These may be taken in connection with the 6th sect.: "that trial by jury shall be as heretofore, and the right thereof remain inviolate." Trial as heretofore, we have seen, implies inquiry and indictment. Now, the private rights of individuals, as thus enforced, are manifestly not superior to the administration of public justice for the welfare of the people as set forth in the 2d sect. already quoted. Indeed, public rights are in many respects superior to individual rights, and the enforcement of the private right of a speedy trial implies the public duty, as well as right, to prosecute offenders, and consequently the means of doing so. Thus in every aspect the constitution, as the supreme law, commands the presence of every person, in private or official life, when his testimony is necessary for the due administration of justice. If, then, he be liable to process, and bound to appear, it is a necessary corollary, that he is liable to attachment for his disobedience to the command of the law.

The argument ab inconveniente, that it is necessary the Governor should always be at the seat of government, is preposterous, in view of frequent visits elsewhere, of business, courtesy, and pleasure. The absence of the Governor in the Rocky Mountains, on his way to California, at the time of these riots, is an apposite example

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

When his presence is needed elsewhere, no court in the state would soil its ermine by a rude assault on his person. In all governments, composed of co-ordinate organs, there will be some friction; but right-minded men, mindful of their just powers, and their own dignity, are ever ready to pour oil on the points of contact.

Coming now to the practical test of the question, let us return to the facts. There were fearful crimes committed on the 21st and 22d of July. These are the undoubted subjects of judicial inquiry in the mode prescribed by law; to wit, through a grand jury. In that unknown and vast multitude of citizens and soldiers, who were guilty? Who were innocent? By the 22d section of the Declaration of Rights, it is declared that the "military shall in all cases, and at all times, be in strict subordination to the civil power." The military took many lives—the multitude some. Did the military act under the authority of the civil power? This is one of the first points of inquiry by a grand jury, for it involves the question, whether their acts were murder, manslaughter, excusable or justifiable homicide. Thus the evidence of civil authority becomes essential to the inquiry. Did the Governor, as commander-in-chief, command their presence, and aid in quelling the violence of the mob? Or was his authority assumed by unauthorized persons? These are questions which the Governor alone, as a witness, might be able to answer satisfactorily, by competent testimony in a common law proceeding. They are not state secrets, but acts of authority in their very nature public, and cannot be concealed from the inquiry of the law. The right of life and public safety are too sacred to be subordinated to any right to conceal the authority by which they are destroyed or jeoparded. If the executive authority was duly given, he neither can nor ought to withhold the knowledge which acquits of crime the military acting under his own orders. Indeed, from the character of our excellent Governor, he would not for a moment refuse to come to their rescue, if he believed his duty demanded it. On the other hand, if his authority was unlawfully assumed, or was simulated, or was exercised at the bidding of persons without right—an inference which his absence in California very naturally raises—and the military have been involved in an unlawful act, his duty and the rights of the people demand his testimony, that the parties who have thus misled them may be reached. This is no state secret as to them, but its concealment is a crime against society, which no one who knows the Governor would attribute to him, if aware of his duty.

At this point the case of Gray v. Pentland, 2 S. & R. 23, may be noticed. There the deposition sent to the Governor affecting Pentland's character was a privileged communication, and protected by the Governor's discretion, for otherwise he might be deprived of necessary information in the performance of official duty. Hence the court in an exercise of sound discretion would not compel its production. But, here, the authority of the Governor to call out the troops to aid in suppressing a riot is in its nature a public act, and his testimony is necessary to vindicate their rights, or to reach others if unauthorized by him. In every aspect of personal and official duty, the state has a right to the disclosure. A contrary doctrine strikes at the essential and fundamental principles of a free government as set forth in the Declaration of Rights.

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

Analogies also prove the truth of the general doctrine, that no officer, high or low, is above the demands of justice, or above the process of the law. For example, if the Governor's pardon, or other official acts be forged, or stolen, or procured by fraud or duress, is it possible he is not liable to be summoned before a jury, grand or petit, inquiring into the fact? His deposition cannot be taken in a criminal prosecution. Indeed there is no difference between a civil and a criminal issue, for the power to subpœna him to give his deposition is just as essential. So he is called to perform many acts of statutory duty. Is he exempt from subpœna when any of these acts become the subject of judicial inquiry? And if by courtesy he be permitted to be excused, on what principle does this apply to his chief officers of state? The cases in Pennsylvania abundantly prove that a mandamus will lie to them to compel the performance of ministerial duties: Griffith v. Cochran, 5 Binn. 87; Commonwealth v. Cochran, 6 Id. 456; Commonwealth v. Cochran, 1 S. & R. 473. So the court will restrain by injunction: Mott v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 5 Casey 33, 41. Doubtless this court cannot interfere with the discretion of the Governor in the performance of any proper executive function, for in that his province is superior. Argument is not needed to prove this, yet it is the great work of the opposite opinion, while no labor is bestowed to vindicate the power of the Governor to obstruct the punishment of crime, by a refusal to testify. A subpœna to testify is not an interference with that discretion. It has the force of a summons or notice, not an arrest. This has been decided in two cases: United States v. Cooper, 4 Dall. 341, and Respublica v. Duane, 4 Yeates 347. In the former, Judge Chase said he knew of no privilege to exempt members of Congress from the service of a subpœna, though by the constitution they are exempt from arrest in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace. In the latter case, Judge Yeates, citing a similar provision in the constitution of the state, held that the service of a subpœna is not an arrest, and that the court may grant an attachment or not according to the existing circumstances. These decisions bear directly on the question before us, for as to members of the assembly there is an express provision against arrest in all cases except treason, felony, breach and surety of the peace, and violation of their oath of office. Now the constitution makes no exemption whatever of the Governor, and he is brought directly within the maxim expressio vel designatio personæ est exclusio alterius: Co. Litt. 210, a. The decision in Respublica v. Duane, supra, is, therefore, strongly in point. But a case exactly in point, decided by that great judge and statesman, Chief Justice Marshall, is found in the trial of Aaron Burr for high treason: vol. 1, pp. 177 to 188. The following points were adjudged: 1. That a subpœna to the President of the United States can be issued. 2. That it can go with a clause of duces tecum to bring a letter in the possession of the President. 3. That it can be issued before indictment found. 4. That the refusal of the President is a subject for the exercise of the sound discretion of the court. On page 181 the chief justice, after stating that he is not aware of any decision that a subpœna cannot issue to the President, says that "it is not known ever to be doubted, that the chief magistrate of a state might be served with a subpœna ad testificandum." A prominent feature of that case was that Col. Burr was prosecuted with intense earnestness, I might say bitterness, by the most eminent counsel in the United States (friends also of President Jefferson), who conceded the power to issue the subpœna. The same question arose again on the subsequent trial for a misdemeanor, and the same decision was made. Said Chief Justice Marshall: "That the President of the United States may be subpœnaed and examined as a witness, and required to produce any paper in his possession is not controverted:" Burr's Trial, vol. 2, 535. He then discusses the question of the propriety of compelling the production of the letter of General Wilkinson, stating some reasons very similar to those in our case of Gray v. Pentland, supra, for which a court would refuse compulsory process.

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

But assuming a case where the court would decline to compel the production of a paper or an answer to an oral question, it does not dispense with the Governor's attendance for examination, unless no other ground were alleged. But how does the governor know in advance what will be the subject of his examination? Non constat that any question will be asked on a privileged matter. If such be asked, he can decline answering and refer the privilege to the court, which will decide it, just as it will the privilege of counsel, without requiring disclosure of the matter itself. Its nature is all the court need know.

Another point may be noticed. It is said the imprisonment of the Governor under the attachment would leave the state without a head. The case is hardly supposable, for when the Governor knows it is his duty to obey he will do so. Certainly Governor Hartranft is not a gentleman who would be guilty of a voluntary contempt. If voluntarily guilty, he would deserve attachment for the dereliction of the law, which his own oath requires him to see faithfully executed. Impeachment, which has been insisted upon, is a harsher remedy; for the undeniable fact of his refusal to obey the process, would be the inevitable ground of removal from office. If, however, his disobedience be involuntary in consequence of pressing official duties, a court which would disallow his excuse would be visited with the highest censure. But assuming a voluntary contempt and imprisonment still the position is untrue. The state is not without a head, for the 13th sect. of the 4th art. of the constitution provides: "in case of the death, conviction on impeachment, failure to qualify, resignation, or other disability of the Governor, the power, duties and emoluments of the office for the remainder of the term or until the disability be removed, shall devolve upon the Lieutenant-Governor." The 14th section provides for the disability of the Lieutenant-Governor, and devolves these duties on the Speaker of the Senate. It is said imprisonment is no disability, which is as much as to say the Governor may be in prison in Allegheny county and at the same time, at the seat of government, signing or vetoing bills or performing other duties. If no disability, then the state retains its head. But if the Governor be disabled from being in two places at the same time, then the disability brings the 13th sect. into play, and the state is provided with a constitutional substitute. Quacunque via data, there is a chief executive.

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

It is said the Governor is the representative of the people, and therefore not responsible. This is true of executive duties, for therein the constitution, the adopted will of the people, is his warrant of authority; but it is untrue of judicial powers, for therein the judiciary represents the people, by the same warrant of authority; and if he violate the law, which it is the province of the judiciary to enforce by their authority, he is liable to the law. In a government of law instituted by a free people for their own benefit, there is no royal prerogative to do nothing wrong; and therefore there can be no representation of their dignity such as can strike down their law and prevent its administration by its appropriate functionary.

On no ground of the constitution, law, public justice, state policy, or sound reason, can I discover any exemption of any officer in the state, high or low, from the common duty all citizens owe to the due administration of justice. With these views, I cannot consent to rob the judiciary of its constitutional powers, and exalt the executive above the demands of justice and the safety and welfare of the people. I cannot abnegate a power intrusted to me by the people, and will return to them a commission, soon to expire, unsullied by any dereliction of duty, or obeisance at the shrine of unwarranted power.[1]

[1] Note.

C. J. Agnew.—In my opinion I corrected the error of statement of counsel that there was no special charge to the grand jury committing to them the subject of the riots. Finding that the opinion of the court has followed the erroneous statement, I append hereto several paragraphs exhibiting the careful instruction of his Honor Judge Kirkpatrick, whose MSS. charge I have read, filling, on this particular subject, more than two columns of a newspaper closely printed in fine type, and containing the most special instructions on the subjects of strikes, conspiracy, arson, riotous arson, riot and riotous homicide. It is but sheer justice to the judiciary and grand jury of Allegheny county that no such error should be perpetuated against them.

[Appeal of Hartranft et al.]

EXTRACTS.

"A class of cases and offences, however, to which as yet I have made no allusion, compel themselves upon our attention, and which very recent events would seem to indicate, will of necessity have to be passed upon and considered by you. I allude, of course, to such cases as have their origin in and grow out of the recent riots and disturbances with which we are all, unfortunately, too painfully familiar. It is a matter of most unenviable notoriety that, on the occasion referred to, our always heretofore peaceable and law-abiding community was shocked and startled as by 'a fire bell at night,' by the fact that upon the streets of this peaceful and peace-loving city a great riot was in full progress, which, in the numbers of its participants, the wide-spread extent of their operations, and in the absolutely appalling nature and character of its apparent results, was calculated to strike terror into the very heart of our community. It seemed, indeed, for a time at least, on that not soon to be forgotten mid-summer Sabbath day, as if the very rankest communism of Paris had been let loose in our midst, and that the bloused petroleuse of the faubourg San Antoine and the heights of Mont-Martre were at their work, and plying their terrible vocation in the very streets of Pittsburgh. Surely there are no terms and no forms of speech or expression too broad by which to speak of and denominate such crimes, and no punishment too severe which can possibly await their clearly proven guilty perpetrators."

* * * * * * * * *

"Let me now call your attention to a still darker page in the history of this 'reign of terror,' and some of the crimes and consequences which followed from its brief existence. I allude to the events transpiring about the Union depot, the round-houses, Twenty-eighth street and their adjacent neighborhood. In so calling it a 'reign of terror,' I speak advisedly and upon deliberation, for so to all who witnessed it, it certainly was. For if we had not with us in the flesh that triumvirate of infamy, Danton and Robespierre and Marat, we at least had them with us in spirit, brooding and hovering over our saturnalia of crime, and directing their most legitimate and bloody successors, whomsoever you may discover them to be, to destroy property, to commit pillage and riot, to light the incendiary's torch, and to cause (as did they in the highways and byways of Paris) the blood of innocent men and women, aye, and of children, too, to stain the stones and streets of this quiet and law-loving city."

* * * * * * * * *

"'This general duty, this universal obligation,' continues the same learned Judge King, from whom we have already quoted, 'extends to the citizen soldiers, who, in common with all other members of the community, are required to be assistant in the maintenance of the public peace on the call of the civil magistrate. They are subject to the same penalties in case of neglect or refusal to appear as any other citizen summoned by the sheriff. They do not on such occasions act in their technical character as military. When assembled, they are but a part of the sheriff's posse, and act in subordination to and in aid of that officer, who is the true and responsible chief of all forces summoned under his authority. If the soldiers act in any manner not authorized by law they are amenable for such acts, not to the military but the civil law. In brief, as to all rights and authorities they stand on the same footing with other citizens summoned by the sheriff, and compose, with them, his posse."

Appeal of C. G. Christie and R. P. Scott.

1. C. was the owner of a leasehold property of five acres with an oil-well and machinery, &c., on it, and leased it to D. for ten months, with conditions for a sale. D. paid two hundred dollars in cash, and agreed to pay the balance of the purchase-money in several payments, and when all were made C. agreed to make a bill of sale of the property to D. If D. failed to make the payments at the times specified his rights to the premises were to cease and determine and the payments made prior to such default were to be treated as liquidated damages. D. went into possession and made but one payment. The property at the suit of M. was levied upon and sold by the sheriff as the property of D. Held, that the agreement was a lease, with a condition for a sale at the end of the term, provided that the payments were made at the times specified, and a failure so to make them resulted in a forfeiture of D.'s rights and a reinvestment of the same in C., and that the sheriff's vendee took no title under the levy and sale as the property of D.

2. This case is distinguished from Martin v. Mathiot, 14 S. & R. 214, as the property in that case consisted of personal chattels and in this of chattels real.

November 13th 1877. Before AGNEW, C. J., SHARSWOOD, MERCUR, GORDON, PAXSON, WOODWARD and STERRETT, JJ.

Appeal from the decree of the Court of Common Pleas of Butler county: Of October and November Term 1876, No. 226.

After the bill in equity and answer were filed in this case it was agreed to submit the whole case, as stated in the bill, and the title to the property, to the court, without the intervention of a jury, with the right of either party to take testimony. The bill was filed by Edward Bailey against the appellants, and averred that, on February 17th 1876, plaintiff purchased from one R. L. Carlin a certain leasehold, containing about five acres of land, situate in Butler county, together with machinery, &c., and an oil-well, known as "the Emery & Caldwell" well, for $1900 in cash, and received on that day from the vendor possession of the property so purchased; that on February 18th 1876, plaintiff was arrested at the instance of defendant, Christie, for forcible entry and detainer, and at the time of the arrest defendant, Scott, took possession of the property; that on February 2d 1876, defendant, Christie, purchased at a sheriff's sale, for $50, all the right and title of one Cranmer of, in, and to the said property; that all the right that he (Cranmer) had was under certain articles of agreement, dated December 10th 1875, in which said Carlin, in consideration of one dollar, leased for ten months to said Cranmer the said five acres, well and fixtures, &c.; $200 were to be paid at the time of the execution of the lease, $500 in two months from its date, $500 in four months, $500 in six months, $500 in eight months, and $175 in ten months. Upon the payment of the aggregate of said sums of money Carlin agreed to execute to Cranmer a bill of sale of said property. It was agreed that, upon a failure to pay at the times specified, all the right of Cranmer in the property should cease and determine, and that all payments previously made should be con-

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS

Law Forum

VOLUME 1975

COLLEGE OF LAW — UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS

PRESIDENTS AND EX-PRESIDENTS AS WITNESSES: A BRIEF HISTORICAL FOOTNOTE

*Ronald D. Rotunda

WHEN Richard Nixon resigned the Presidency, it was clear that his legal problems were only beginning. Although he has now been granted immunity from federal prosecution by President Ford's surprise pardon, Mr. Nixon remains subject to civil liability and state prosecution for past acts. He has already been subpoenaed to testify in a civil deposition. Assuming that his appearance is not excused because of ill health, he may well be called in other civil and criminal trials, as well as future grand jury or congressional investigations, although he was not a witness in the main Watergate trial.[1]

On the eve of Mr. Nixon's resignation, some political leaders urged that he be spared these legal obligations.[2] Even now, many people believe that subjecting Mr. Nixon to the burden of testifying before various judicial or congressional bodies would be vindictive, and demeaning both to him and to the institution of the Presidency. Such beliefs are groundless when placed in historical perspective. Several American Presidents and former Presidents have given testimony under oath in judicial or quasi-judicial settings. In the past, both former Presidents and sitting Presidents have submitted, either voluntarily or pursuant to subpoena, to questions under oath. In so doing they implicitly recognized the common law rule that

> . . . [t]he public (in the words of Lord Hardwicke) has a right to every man's evidence. Is there any reason why this right should suffer an exception when the desired knowledge is in the possession of a person occupying at the moment the office of chief executive of a state?

* Assistant Professor of Law, University of Illinois. B.A. 1967, J.D. 1970, Harvard University. The author was assistant counsel to Samuel Dash, Chief Counsel for the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities, and much of the research for this article was done while with the Committee. The opinions expressed in this article do not necessarily reflect the views of the Committee, any of its members, or any other member of the staff.

1. United States v. Mitchell, Crim. No. 74-110 (D.D.C., filed May 20, 1974). In addition to Watergate-related matters, Mr. Nixon may be summoned for other investigations. Senator Baker has hinted Mr. Nixon may be called to testify in the probe of CIA domestic surveillance. Wash. Post, Jan. 28, 1975, at A11, col. 1.
2. See, e.g., Wash. Post, Aug. 9, 1974, at A7, cols. 4-5, A23, col. 1.

There is no reason at all. His temporary duties as an official cannot overcome his permanent and fundamental duty as a citizen and as a debtor to justice.[3]

This article does not set out all the circumstances under which a former or sitting President may legally be compelled to give evidence before a congressional or judicial body. Rather the purpose is only to make some historical observations that should prove helpful to the debate. A collection of these historical examples,[4] many of which have heretofore been lost in the dust of the National Archives, should also serve to demythologize the Presidency. It is to this history that we now turn.

Several Presidents have appeared voluntarily as witnesses in a variety of contexts. One of the most interesting appearances before a congressional body occurred in the midst of the Civil War, when President Lincoln made a surprise visit to the House Judiciary Committee.

President Abraham Lincoln. Prior to delivery, one of Lincoln's messages to Congress was leaked to the New York Herald and promptly published. It was immediately alleged that Mrs. Lincoln, often suspected of being a Southern sympathizer, had given the speech to one Henry Wycoff, who telegraphed it to the Herald.[5] In an investigation conducted by the House Judiciary Committee, Wycoff admitted that he had sent part of the speech to the Herald, but refused to reveal his source. Then Lincoln, to still the rumors and protect his wife, appeared before the Committee. A newspaper of the day reported:

> Mr. Henri Wikof yesterday (Feb. 13, 1862) went before the Judiciary Committee, the President having previously been with the same Committee, and answered the question as to the person who surreptitiously furnished him with an advance copy of the President's Message. Though it is not certainly known what the answer was, it is understood that the White House gardener, Watt, was the delinquent.[6]

Unfortunately, the original hearings, which have never been published, are ambiguous on the question of Lincoln's presence.[7] Nevertheless, several other contemporary newspapers refer to the same incident, and this corroboration should suffice to establish its authenticity.[8] After Lincoln's appearance and Wycoff's accusation of the gardener, the matter was dropped.[9]

President Ulysses S. Grant. President Ulysses S. Grant once eagerly submitted to a criminal deposition to aid his confidential secretary and close friend, General Orville E. Babcock. In 1875, Grant's Secretary of the Treasury, Benjamin Bristow, uncovered extensive distillery rings that had been defrauding the federal government of millions of dollars. Two of Grant's closest friends, General John McDonald and General Babcock, were indicted as a result of these disclosures. McDonald was eventually convicted for his role in the so-called Whiskey Fraud Cases; but the President, perhaps out of misguided loyalty, was determined to aid Babcock. Grant announced to his Cabinet that he planned to go to St. Louis to testify on behalf of Babcock. Dissuaded of this plan, he gave a three hour deposition attended by the Chief Justice, the Attorney General, and Treasury Secretary Bristow. Grant testified that Babcock never talked to him about the Whiskey Frauds and that he knew of nothing connecting Babcock with the frauds.[10] Babcock was acquitted.

President Theodore Roosevelt. Theodore Roosevelt, quoted several times by the departing Nixon, twice testified before congressional committees investigating events that occurred during his Presidency. He testified in 1911 before a special House committee about a questionable acquisition by United States Steel, which he had allowed while he was President. In 1912 he testified before a Senate subcommittee about the propriety of certain corporate contributions to his 1902 presidential cam-

3. 8 WIGMORE, EVIDENCE § 2370(c) (McNaughton ed. 1961) (emphasis in original).

4. Excluded from this historical analysis are those instances in which selected Congressmen have met with the President at the White House or a similar place such as Camp David. In those instances, of which there are many, Congress is meeting at the call of the President; the President is not meeting at the call of the Congress. Similarly excluded are appearances by the President before Congress to deliver a formal address and appearances not intended to give evidence about factual matters. The most obvious example is the State of the Union Address. A less well-known incident is President Washington's only appearance before the full Senate in August 1789 for its advice and consent to some propositions respecting a treaty with the Southern Indians. See THE JOURNAL OF WILLIAM MACLAY, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA 1789-1791, at 124-30 (1965); W. HOLT, TREATIES DEFEATED BY THE SENATE 28-33 (1933). Washington was displeased that the Senate did not approve the treaty forthwith, and aside from his reappearance the following Monday, "no President of the United States has since that day ever darkened the doors of the Senate for the purpose of personal consultation with it concerning the advisability of a desired negotiation." E. CORWIN, THE PRESIDENT: OFFICE AND POWERS 1787-1957, at 56-57 (3d rev. ed. 1948).

5. J. TURNER & L. TURNER, MARY TODD LINCOLN: HER LIFE AND LETTERS 97-98 (1972).

6. N.Y. Tribune, Feb. 14, 1862, at 4, col. 2.

7. See The Manuscript Hearings of the Judiciary Committee, National Archives Bldg., Record Group 233.

8. N.Y. Times, Feb. 14, 1862, at 8, col. 1; Philadelphia Inquirer, Feb. 14, 1862, at 1; N.Y. Herald, Feb. 14, 1862, at 1, col. 2; Boston Morning J., Feb. 18, 1862, at 4.

9. Popular history refers to other supposed appearances by Lincoln, but these have never been authenticated. President Ford's recent personal appearance before a House subcommittee to answer questions that had been raised concerning his pardon of Mr. Nixon should, like Lincoln's appearance, serve to allay the fears of those who believe a stigma attaches to a President or former President who assumes the role of an ordinary witness. Ford's appearance may thus serve to demythologize the Presidency.

10. See N.Y. Times, Feb. 13, 1876, at 1, col. 4; id., Feb. 14, 1876, at 1, col. 7.

paign.[11] During the United State Steel hearings, he said that "an ex-President is merely a citizen of the United States, like any other citizen, and it is his plain duty to try to help this committee or respond to its invitation."[12] For a former President to testify voluntarily about the circumstances surrounding a questionable corporate acquisition or campaign contribution is hardly without precedent.

In several instances, the appearance or production of evidence by a President or former President has been involuntary. Nonetheless, compliance with the subpoena was effected without noticeable damage to the Office of the Presidency.

President Thomas Jefferson. Prior to the recent decision in United States v. Nixon,[13] perhaps the most famous case in which a President was required to give evidence was United States v. Burr.[14] In Burr, Chief Justice Marshall, sitting on circuit during the treason trial of Aaron Burr, held the President was subject to subpoena.[15] The treason trial of the former Vice President was in its third week when Burr announced that he intended to "issue a subpoena to the President of the United States, with a clause requiring him to produce certain papers; or in other words to issue the subpoena duces tecum."[16] Burr intended to obtain a letter from General James Wilkinson to President Jefferson on October 21, 1806, as well as documents containing instructions to the army and navy "to destroy" the "person and property" of Burr.[17] After argument and several days of debate in court,[18] Marshall firmly rejected the notion that President Jefferson en-11. See House Special Comm. Hearings on the Investigation of the United States Steel Corporation, 62d Cong., 1st Sess. 1369-92 (1911); Subcomm. of Senate Comm. on Privileges and Elections, Campaign Contributions, Hearings pursuant to S. Res. 79 and S. Res. 386, 62d Cong., 2d Sess. 177-96; 469-527 (1912).

12. House Special Committee on the Investigation of the United States Steel Corporation, 62d Cong., 1st Sess., at 1392.

13. 418 U.S. 683 (1974). See generally Freund, The Supreme Court 1973 Term, Foreward: On Presidential Privilege, 88 HARV. L. REV. 13 (1974).

14. 25 F. Cas. 30 (No. 14,692) (C.C. Va. 1807). See generally T. CARPENTER, THE TRIAL OF COLONEL AARON BURR ON AN INDICTMENT FOR TREASON BEFORE THE CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, HELD IN RICHMOND, MAY TERM 1807: INCLUDING THE ARGUMENTS AND DECISIONS ON ALL MOTIONS AND TRIAL, AND ON THE MOTIONS FOR AN ATTACHMENT AGAINST GENERAL WILKINSON (1808).

15. United States v. Bu r, 25 F. Cas. 30, 34-35 (No. 14,692) (C.C. Va. 1807). In 1800 Justice Chase had refused to subpoena President Adams in the Cooper libel trial on the grounds that truth of the libel may not be proved by compelling the victim's testimony. Chase denied that Adams was immune from subpoena simply by virtue of his office. Compare United States v. Cooper, 25 F. Cas. 631, 632-33 (No. 14,865) (C.C.D. Pa. 1800) with T. COOPER, AN ACCOUNT OF THE TRIAL OF THOMAS COOPER, OF NORTHUMBERLAND; ON A CHARGE OF LIBEL AGAINST THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES 10 (1800).

16. D. ROBERTSON, REPORT OF THE TRIALS OF COLONEL AARON BURR FOR TREASON AND FOR A MISDEMEANOR 113-14 (1808).

17. Id. at 114.

18. After Burr's announcement, Marshall explained, "I am not prepared to give an opinion on this point." Id. at 118.

joyed the prerogatives of a monarch, who may be absolutely immune from judicial process or judicially compelled disclosure. The Chief Justice did recognize, however, that a subpoena to the President should not be issued lightly and that the President's official schedule and obligations must be taken into account.[19] The final decision on the validity of any claim of privilege was to be made by the court, not the Executive. If a sitting President can be compelled by subpoena, a former President should be entitled to little protection by virtue of the respect due his former office or the press of his unofficial schedule.

President James Monroe. A virtually unknown case of a judicially upheld subpoena against a President involved President James Monroe. On January 3, 1818, Monroe became the second President of the United States to be served a subpoena while in office.[20] He was summoned as a witness in behalf of the defendant in the court-martial case of Dr. William C. Barton. On two occasions, Dr. Barton had pressed President Monroe for a position at the Philadelphia naval hospital. Barton eventually received this appointment, leading one Dr. Thomas Harris, whom Barton replaced, to bring charges of "intrigue and misconduct" against Barton. Because Barton's meetings with the President were cited as contributing factors in the accusation, a summons was issued to the President. Secretary of State John Quincy Adams, on behalf of President Monroe, solicited Attorney General Wirt's legal opinion on the matter.[21] An unpublished, previously undiscovered, handwritten opinion of the Attorney General concluded that a subpena ad testificandum[22] could properly be issued to the President. He advised Monroe:

> A subpoena ad testificandum may I think be properly awarded to the President of the U.S. My reasons for this

19. Id. at 181-82; See also T. ABERNATHY, THE BURR CONSPIRACY 238 (1968); FAULKNER, JOHN MARSHALL AND THE BURR TRIAL, 53 J. AM. HIST. 247, 257 (1966).

20. A copy of the summons to President Monroe is found in Attorney General's Papers: Letters Received from State Department, National Archives Bldg., Record Group 60. See also Letter from Richard Bush to the President [Monroe], Nov. 6, 1817, Records of the Office of Judge Advocate General (Navy), National Archives Bldg., Record Group 125 (Records of General Courts Martial and Courts of Inquiry, Microcopy M-272, case 282); P.L. Pleadwell, William Paul Crillon Barton (1786-1856), Surgeon, United States Navy—A Pioneer in American Naval Medicine, 46 THE MILITARY SURGEON 260-62 (1920). The Senate Watergate Committee relied upon the Monroe subpoena in its amicus brief in Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F.2d 700 (D.C. Cir. 1973). The court cited the relevant documents. Id. at 710 n.42.

21. I uncovered the Wirt letter with the assistance of Stephen Stathis, an analyst in American History and American National Government with the Library of Congress. After we had unsuccessfully tracked down the opinion letter to a missing microfilm, we finally found the original manuscript by Wirt.

22. A subpoena ad testificandum is different from a subpoena duces tecum. The latter requires the witness to bring with him documents, papers, or other material that may be in his possession, custody, or control. Compare Catty v. Brochelbank, 124 N.J. Law 360, 362-63, 12 A.2d 128, 129 (1940), with Ex parte Hart, 240 Ala. 642, 645, 200 So. 783, 785 (1941).

opinion are stated by the Chief Justice of the U.S. in the case of Aaron Burr . . . . But if the presence of the chief magistrate be required at the seat of government by his official duties, I think those duties paramount to any claim which an individual can have upon him, and that his personal attendance on the court from which the summons proceeds ought to be, and must, of necessity, be dispensed with . . . .

The return, however, which I would advise is this: if the process has been executed on the President in the usual form, by an officer or an individual, let the person serving it be instructed to make an endorsement like this—"January 1818, executed on the President of the U.S. who stated that his official duties would not admit of his absence from the seat of government, but that he would hold himself ready, at all times, to state, in the form of a deposition, and facts, relevant to the prosecution, which were within his knowledge, and which might be called for by the court or the party." I would farther recommend, ere abundanti cautela [with extreme or abundant caution], that this return should be accompanied by a respectful letter from the President to the Judge Advocate, taking the grounds presented by Mr. Jefferson, in the letter to which I have already referred you.—If the process has not been served on the President in the usual form, but sent to him as a letter, I would recommend that he should endorse on it an admission of its service annexing to that admission a similar statement with that which I have before recommended in the case of it having been served; and enclosing the process, thus endorsed in such a letter as I have advised.

It is clearly inferable from the argument of the Chief Justice, that he would require the excuse for non-attendance to be on oath, but I can scarcely think this necessary when the excuse is written on the face of the Constitution and founded on the fact that Mr. Monroe is the President of the U.S. and that Congress is now holding one of its regular sessions, during which his presence is so peculiarly necessary at the seat of government.[25]

Monroe indicated on the back of the summons that because of official duties and his inability to leave "the seat of government" he would hold himself ready to give his testimony in the form of a deposition. Monroe subsequently submitted answers to interrogatories forwarded by the court. This procedure was apparently satisfactory to all parties, though his answers did not arrive until after the court had already dismissed the case.[24]

23. The original handwritten manuscript of the Opinion of Attorney General Wirt, dated January 13, 1818, may be found in the Records of the Judge Advocate General (Navy), Record Group 125, National Archives Building. Wirt's Opinion Letter is important evidence of the law because it was issued in the early days of the Republic. See Stuart v. Laird, 5 U.S. (1 Cr.) 299, 308 (1803).

24. The delay in the arrival of the deposition underscores the poor transportation

Presidents John Quincy Adams and John Tyler. Aside from the Jefferson and Monroe episodes, history furnishes several other instances of compelled presidential disclosures. In 1846, Representative Ingersoll accused Daniel Webster of making improper disbursements from a secret service fund while Secretary of State. The charges led to subpoenas against former Presidents John Tyler and John Quincy Adams. The confidential "contingent fund" was to be used by the President for clandestine operations relating to foreign affairs. Disbursements were approved by certificates signed by the President. Ingersoll, who was Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, wanted the certificates dating from Webster's first term as Secretary of State. Some congressmen thought that the certificates were confidential.[25] On April 20, President Polk sent to the House a list of the amounts in the contingent fund for the relevant time period, which was prior to his term, but he refused to furnish documentation of the uses that had been made of the money. He grounded his refusal on the statute creating the fund, which provided for confidentiality, and on the theory that a sitting President should not publicly reveal confidences of his predecessors.[26]

One week later Congress established two Select Committees to investigate the charges against Webster.[27] Polk's refusal to provide information about his predecessors' actions was quickly mooted. The House, through its investigating committees, subpoenaed the previous Presidents allegedly implicated in the charges of corruption. Both Select Committees questioned former President Tyler, who had been President and keeper of the contingent fund during the period relevant to the Ingersoll accusations.[28] Former President John Quincy Adams filed a deposition with one of the Select Committees and provided information about the uses of the contingent fund during his Presidency.[29] President Polk's Secretary of State, James Buchanan, was also subpoenaed and testified.[30] The House, having conducted the thorough investigation Polk had unsuccessfully sought to prevent, apparently concluded that Webster was innocent of wrongdoing and of that period. In light of the transportation difficulties, President Monroe's fear of leaving the seat of government for any length of time was well-founded. Cf. Hantraft's Appeal, 85 Pa. 433, 449 (1877), in which the governor of Pennsylvania was held immune from grand jury subpoena, in part because the court was reluctant to force him to leave the seat of government. See generally Comment, Executive Privilege at the State Level, 1975 U. ILL. L.F. 631.

25. CONG. GLOBE, Apr. 9, 1846, at 636-38.

26. Id., Apr. 20, 1846, at 698.

27. Id., Apr. 27, 1846, at 733-35.

28. H.R. REP. No. 684, 29th Cong., 1st Sess. 8-11 (1846); H.R. REP. No. 686, 29th Cong., 1st Sess. 22-25 (1846).

29. H.R. REP. No. 686, 29th Cong., 1st Sess. 22-25 (1846).

30. Id. at 4-7. Buchanan's compliance with the Congressional subpoena could hardly have been fatal to his political career; he was later elected President.

that nothing further need be done.[31]

History shows that assuming the role of a witness is not demeaning or unprecedented for a President or former President. This does not mean, however, that a President or former President is at the beck of any person or group that has access to a subpoena. The reaction of former President Truman to a subpoena by the House Un-American Activities Committee illustrates this distinction.

President Harry S. Truman. In July of 1973, when President Nixon refused to appear before the Senate Watergate Committee (a refusal which occurred before he was ever invited to appear), he relied on a letter President Truman had written to the Chairman of the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) on November 12, 1953. President Nixon wrote Senator Ervin:

> I have concluded that if I were to testify before the Committee irreparable damage would be done to the Constitutional principle of separation of powers. My position in this regard is supported by ample precedents . . . . It is appropriate, however, to refer to one particular occasion on which this issue was raised.
>
> In 1953 a committee of the House of Representatives sought to subpoena former President Truman to inquire about matters of which he had personal knowledge while he had served as President. As you may recall, President Truman declined to comply with the subpoena on the ground that the separation of powers forbade his appearance . . . .[32]

Unfortunately, Mr. Nixon did not elaborate on the circumstances surrounding the subpoena issued to former President Truman. The subpoena was prompted by charges made by Attorney General Herbert Brownell in a speech on November 6, 1953. Brownell charged that at the time Truman's nomination of former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Harry Dexter White to a post with the International Monetary Fund was confirmed, Truman knew that White was a "Russian spy." Truman denied the charges the same day. On November 10, the Republican majority of HUAC subpoenaed Truman; his former attorney general, then Justice Tom Clark; and his former Secretary of State, James F. Byrnes, then Governor of South Carolina. The next day, President Eisenhower said that he would not have subpoenaed Truman or Justice Clark, and the ranking Democrat on HUAC protested the slur on Truman's patriotism. On November 12, Truman sent the letter relied on by Mr. Nixon, in which Truman refused to comply with the subpoena because of the separation of powers doctrine. On November 16, Truman spoke in his defense on national television and radio, explained White's appointment and resignation, 31. See 2 G. TICHNOR, LIFE OF DANIEL WEBSTER 283 (1870).

32. Letter frim Richard Nixon to Senator Sam Ervin, July 6, 1973.

charged that the Eisenhower Administration was embracing McCarthyism, and accused Brownell of lying. HUAC never pressed for Truman's appearance, and neither Governor Byrnes nor Justice Clark ever appeared.[33]

Truman's refusal to testify is troublesome and not entirely defensible. He was apparently not concerned about executive privilege or national security; after all, he spoke about the White appointment and defended himself in a nationwide speech. Because he was willing to give the speech, perhaps he should have testified before the congressional committee. Truman's desire to choose a favorable forum for his defense hardly rises to the level of an evidentiary privilege. This argument, however, overlooks the unique circumstances under which the refusal to testify took place. Although the doctrine of separation of powers would not have suffered if Truman had appeared, he was probably concerned about dignifying not only the charges but also the tribunal, thus aiding McCarthyism by giving added prestige to HUAC. One may agree that normally Presidents and ex-Presidents should err on the side of providing testimony, yet defend Truman's refusal to testify given the special circumstances with which he was presented.

The Truman episode does not mean that Presidents are immune from giving testimony about presidential activities. Blanket immunity should not be inferred from the occasional refusal of Presidents or former Presidents to testify, or from the failure of those seeking the testimony to press the matter to contempt. Rather, the historical examples presented here indicate that such testimony is normally given when two conditions exist. First, the President must have possible knowledge relating to charges of criminal wrongdoing and corruption in the executive branch. Second, these charges must be supported by credible, reasonable evidence. Cases in which the President or former President refuses to comply with a request for information based on unsupported[34] charges of presidential complicity are distinguishable. President Truman's refusal to appear before HUAC in the hysterical atmosphere of 1953, probably falls into this category and may be justified, if at all, on that ground, not on the basis of a broad doctrine of separation of powers.

The historical evidence shows that voluntary or involuntary submission to interrogation by a former President will not offend the

33. On Nov. 11, 1953, Byrnes wired his rejection, stating that he could not "as chief executive of a State admit your right to command a governor to leave his state and remain in Washington until granted leave." Justice Clark, on the 13th, explained his refusal on the ground that the Judiciary was independent of the Legislature. Congress and the Nation: 1945-1964: A Review of Government and Politics in the Postwar Years, CONG. QUARTERLY SERV. 715 (1965). See also N.Y. Times, Nov. 11, at 1, col. 8; id., Nov. 15 at 1, col. 1; id., Nov. 16, at 1, col. 8; id., Nov. 17, at 1 (1953).
34. For a description of how unsupported the charges were see H. MESSICK, JOHN EDGAR HOOVER 141-42 (1972). In fact White had been cleared in 1948 by a grand jury that indicted scores of people as Communist leaders. Id.

separation of powers doctrine nor do lasting damage to the Office of the Presidency—even if the ex-President undergoes vigorous or hostile cross-examination by a government attorney, an attorney of one of his former colleagues in a criminal case, a private lawyer in a civil suit, or a congressman or staff attorney in a congressional hearing. When a President or ex-President had knowledge relating to colorable charges of executive misconduct, he has made his testimony available.

These historical examples do not of themselves establish a President's legal duty to testify; that has not been the purpose of this piece. These examples do show that any legal argument asserting that compelled testimony from a President or former President will cause the downfall of the body politic, is groundless. The weight of history is otherwise, and fully supports Lord Hardwicke's dictum that the public has a right to every man's evidence.[35]

35. Cf. C. ANDERSON, OUTSIDER IN THE SENATE 83-84 (1970). Even royalty has been called upon to testify. King Edward VII of England, when he was Prince of Wales, once was summoned and testified in a civil case about the plaintiff's possible cheating at cards. A commoner from the jury was allowed to ask a question. 8 J. WIGMORE, EVIDENCE § 2371, at 749, quoting NOTABLE BRITISH TRIAL SERIES, THE BACCARAT CASE 3, 75 (Shore ed. 1932). See also R. ABINGER, FORTY YEARS AT THE BAR 84, 85 (1930). The Prime Minister is also liable to subpoena. Rex v. Baines, 1 K.B. 258, 261-62 (1909).

THE RIGHT TO A SPEEDY TRIAL: BARKER v. WINGO IN THE LOWER COURTS

*David Stewart Rudstein

I. THE RIGHT TO A SPEEDY TRIAL, BARKER, AND THE BALANCING PROCESS

THE SIXTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution provides in part that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial." The history of this guarantee can be traced from the 12th century to Magna Carta, through the common law of England, and into American law.[1] The speedy trial clause was designed to prevent undue pretrial incarceration, minimize anxiety accompanying public accusation, and limit the possibility that long delay will impair the accused's ability to defend himself.[2] The clause is intended to protect not only the accused, but also society. As Mr. Justice Brennan has stated:

> The public is concerned with the effective prosecution of criminal cases, both to restrain those guilty of crime and to deter those contemplating it. Just as delay may impair the ability of the accused to defend himself, so it may reduce the capacity of the government to prove its case . . . . Moreover, while awaiting trial, an accused who is at large may become a fugitive from justice or commit other criminal acts. And the greater the lapse of time between commis-

* Assistant Professor of Law, Chicago-Kent College of Law, Illinois Institute of Technology. B.S. 1968, University of Illinois; J.D. 1971, Northwestern University; LL.M. 1975, University of Illinois.

 Since this article was written, Congress passed, and President Ford signed, the Speedy Trial Act, Pub. L. No. 93-619, Jan. 3, 1975. The act sets specific times within which an accused must be brought to trial if the action arises in the federal courts. Of course this does not affect the constitutional issues in any way, but hopefully the problems discussed herein will arise with less frequency, especially as the states begin to follow the lead of the federal government, and of the states cited in note 9 infra.

1. Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213, 223-26 (1967); United States v. Provoo, 17 F.R.D. 183, 196-97 (D. Md.), aff'd mem., 350 U.S. 857 (1955). See generally F. HELLER, THE SIXTH AMENDMENT (1951).
2. United States v. Ewell, 383 U.S. 116, 120 (1966).

TELECOPY COVER SHEET

OFFICE OF THE INDEPENDENT COUNSEL
1001 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Suite 490N
Washington, D.C. 20004
telephone (202) 514-8688 facsimile (202) 514-8802

Date: _____

TO: ERIC JASO

Company Name: OIC

Fax Number: 501-221-8707 Telephone Number: _____

FROM: RAJEEV DUGGAL

Number of Pages: 8 (including this cover sheet)

Message: I JUST LOCATED THIS ARTICLE THAT YOU HAD MENTIONED IN YOUR FAX. IT SEEMS TO ME TO BE PRETTY COMPREHENSIVE, SUBSTANTIVELY, UP THROUGH NIXON.

c:\faxform rdb

EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE: A CONSTITUTIONAL MYTH

RAOUL BERGER

Harvard University Press Cambridge, Massachusetts 1974

issue was whether the Supreme Court could require an official to answer, but the doctrine is equally applicable to the case of an investigation by a congressional committee."[136] Even within judicial compass, as we have seen, this reads Marbury much too broadly. In truth, Marbury is utterly irrelevant to congressional inquiry. That was a suit by a private individual, and Marshall stated that the "province of the court . . . is not to inquire how the executive or executive officers perform duties in which they have a discretion."[137] Precisely that function, however, does lie within the province of the legislature, as parliamentary history makes clear, and as Montesquieu and James Wilson perceived. President Washington, it will be recalled, welcomed an investigation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and he turned over all documents in the investigation of General St. Clair. The congressional power to investigate into the executive branch was confirmed by the Supreme Court in McGrain v. Daugherty.[138] No comparable judicial power exists, as Marshall justly remarked. The claim that communications and advice to the President by his advisers are shielded from congressional inquiry is without constitutional warrant. Whether Congress should respect such advice as a matter of comity, as it has done from time to time, is something else again.

G. The Trial of Aaron Burr

1. Production of Documents

Secretary of State Rogers, testifying before a Senate Committee in 1971, alluded to "President Jefferson's refusal to comply with Chief Justice Marshall's subpoena in the trial of Aaron Burr."[139] Apparently this was patterned after Corwin's statement that Jefferson "refus[ed] to respond to Chief Justice Marshall's subpoena in Aaron Burr's Trial for Treason."[140] This is demonstrably wrong.

Preliminarily it needs once more to be emphasized that in any event judicial power over the President is not the measure of con-

136. Corwin, President 138.
137. 5 U.S. at 168–170; emphasis added.
138. 273 U.S. 135 (1927).
139. Ervin Hearings 473.
140. Corwin, President 139. At another point Corwin alludes to "Jefferson's defiance of the subpoena duces tecum, which Chief Justice Marshall issued during the trial of Aaron Burr for treason ordering the President to produce certain documents in court"; ibid. 383. For additional discussion of Burr, see infra, Epilogue at nn. 49–73.

gressional power. The judicial power in question was the general power to compel testimony, and Marshall held that the President was not exempted from that authority.[141] The source of congressional power is the inquisitorial function and the fact that the President was made subject to impeachment. Iredell exulted in the provision that made the President triable.[142] Congress, said Corwin, "has power to investigate his every official act."[143] President Andrew Jackson "cheerfully conceded" the constitutional right of Congress to "inquire or decide upon the conduct of the President."[144] No British minister was exempt from inquiry, and inquiry without a power to compel testimony would be enfeebled.[145]

Notwithstanding that Burr is thus irrelevant to congressional investigation, consideration of the case will point up Rogers' inveterate tendency to distort the cases. According to his memorandum, Marshall ruled that the President "was free to keep from view such portions of the letter which the President deemed confidential in the public interest."[146] At the outset it is necessary to separate what Jefferson wrote to his counsel[147] from what he did. In fact Jefferson went a long way toward full compliance.[148]

The argument had revolved almost entirely about a letter to Jefferson from General Wilkinson; and it had been argued for Jefferson that it was 141. See infra, text accompanying nn. 154–156.

142. 4 Elliot 109.

143. Corwin, President 365; cf. supra, Ch. 2.

144. Quoted supra, text accompanying n. 112.

145. "Without the power to investigate—including of course the authority to compel testimony . . . Congress could be seriously handicapped in its efforts to exercise its constitutional functions"; Quinn v. United States, 349 U.S. 155, 160–161 (1955).

146. Rogers memo 35.

147. See 9 Jefferson, Writings 55–62 n. 1, for his correspondence concerning the subpoena.

148. Jefferson, on June 12, 1807, wrote George Hay, the United States District Attorney, that he had delivered the papers to the Attorney General, and instructed the War and Navy Departments to review their files with a view to compliance. 1 David Robertson, The Trial of Aaron Burr 210–211 (Philadelphia, 1808). On June 17, 1807, Jefferson wrote Hay that "the receipt of these papers [by Hay] has, I presume, so far anticipated, and others this day forwarded will have substantially fulfilled the object of a subpoena from the District Court of Richmond"; ibid. 254.

When Jefferson learned that the Attorney General did not have the Wilkinson letter that Burr had subpoenaed, he wrote Hay on June 23, 1807, "No researches shall be spared to recover this letter, & if recovered, it shall immediately be sent on to you"; 9 Jefferson, Writings 61. Hay advised the court that "When we receive General Wilkinson's letter, the return will be complete"; 1 Robertson 256. Jefferson also stated that if Burr should "suppose there are any facts within the knowledge of the heads of the departments or of myself . . . we shall be ready to give him the benefit of it, by way of deposition"; 1 Jefferson, Writings 57. Notwithstanding Jefferson's attempts to comply with the subpoena, Rogers states that Jefferson "paid no attention to the subpoena"; Rogers memo 35.

improper to call upon the president to produce the letter of Gen. Wilkinson, because it was a private letter, and contained confidential communications, which the president ought not and could not be compelled to disclose. It might contain state secrets, which could not be divulged without endangering national safety.[149]

Mark that this was not so much a claim for "confidentiality" per se as against disclosure of "state secrets" which might endanger the "national safety," a much narrower ground. Jefferson left it to his counsel, George Hay, "to withhold communication of any parts of the letter which are not directly material for the purposes of justice."[150] Hay emphasized that he was willing to disclose the entire letter to the court, and to leave it to the court to suppress so much of the letter as was not material to the case.[151] This was reemphasized on his return to the subpoena duces tecum wherein he supplied a copy of the letter excepting such parts thereof as are, in my opinion, not material for the purposes of justice, for the defense of the accused, or pertinent to the issue now about to be joined. . . . The accuracy of this opinion I am willing to refer to the judgment of the court, by submitting the original letter to its inspection.[152]

149. United States v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas. 30, 31 (No. 14692d) (C.C. Va. 1807); emphasis added.

150. 1 Robertson, supra, n. 148 at 210; emphasis added.

Because Jefferson had thus devolved on Hay the exercise of "discretion" to withhold nonmaterial parts of the letter, United States v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas. 55, 65 (No. 14693) (C.C. Va. 1807), Chief Justice Marshall said: "the president has assigned no reason whatever for withholding the paper called for. The propriety of withholding must be decided by himself, not by another for him. Of the weight of the reasons for and against producing it, he is himself the judge. It is their operation on his mind, not on the mind of others, which must be respected by the court"; United States v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas. 187, 192 (No. 14694) (C.C. Va. 1807); emphasis added. In other words, the initial judgment of need to withhold must be made by the President, not left to a subordinate.

151. Thus, Hay said: "The application made by the defendant is that testimony which concerns himself should be adduced; that what tends to his own just defense and exculpation may be brought forward. Is it right that he should have more? Is it proper, fair or right that he should have the liberty of going through the whole letter, as well those parts which do not relate to him as those which do, for the purpose of making unfavorable impressions on the public mind . . . making public confidential communications respecting private characters, and thereby producing controversies and violent quarrels? I wish the court to look at the letter and see whether it does not contain what ought not to be submitted to public inspection"; 2 Robertson, supra, n. 148 at 509; emphasis added.

152. 25 Fed. Cas. 187, 190 (No. 14694) (C.C. Va. 1807); emphasis added. Marshall said, "I do not think that the accused ought to be prohibited from seeing the letter"; ibid. 192. Rogers himself states that "Judge [sic] Marshall made it clear that if a letter in the possession of the President material to the trial contains matter —'which it would be imprudent to disclose, which it is not the wish of the executive to disclose; such matter, if it be not immediately and essentially applicable to the Far from asserting a claim of absolute privilege, therefore, counsel for Jefferson was perfectly willing to leave it to the court to determine whether portions of the letter were in fact not material. He insisted only that the portions so adjudged should be withheld from the defendant. To this the defendant objected that the court could not judge whether the confidential portions were relevant to the defense until that defense was fully disclosed, and that defendants were not required to make such disclosure until they had put in their case.[153]

It was on this state of facts that Chief Justice Marshall ruled that the president of the United States may be subpoenaed and examined as a witness, and required to produce any paper in his possession, is not controverted . . . The president, although subject to the general rules which apply to others, may have sufficient motives for declining to produce a particular paper, and those motives may be such as to restrain the court from enforcing its production . . . I can readily conceive that the president might receive a letter which would be improper to exhibit in public, because of the manifest inconvenience of its exposure. The occasion for demanding it ought, in such a case, be very strong, and to be fully shown to the court before its production could be insisted on.[154]

And, referring to private letters sent to the President respecting matters of public concern, Marshall stated that they "ought not on light ground to be forced into public view."

Yet it is a very serious thing, if such letter should contain any information material to the defense, to withhold from the accused the power of making use of it . . . I cannot precisely lay down any general rule for such a case. Perhaps the court ought to consider the reasons, which would induce the president to refuse to exhibit such letter as conclusive on it, unless such letter could be shown to be absolutely necessary in the defense. The president may himself state the particular reasons which may have induced him to withhold a paper, and the court would unquestionably allow their full force to those reasons. At the same time, the court could not refuse to pay proper attention to the affidavit of the accused. But on objections being made by the president to the pro-point, will, of course, be suppressed' "; Rogers memo 36; emphasis added. In short, Marshall would exclude only irrelevant or immaterial matter, not the entire letter. Whether the adversary should inspect the entire letter is hereinafter discussed.

153. 2 Robertson, supra, n. 148 at 516. Note also Luther Martin's statement on behalf of Burr that "the personal attendance of the president was dispensed with only on the condition that the [Wilkinson] letter should be produced"; ibid. at 514.

154. United States v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas. 187, 191–192 (No. 14694) (C.C. Va. 1807); emphasis added.

duction of a paper, the court would not proceed further in the case without such an affidavit as would clearly shew the paper to be essential to the justice of the case . . . [T]o induce the court to take any definite and decisive step with respect to the prosecution, founded on the refusal of the president to exhibit a paper, for reasons stated by himself, the materiality of that paper ought to be shown."[155]

Materiality to the defense, in short, would overcome presidential refusal to disclose. And Marshall concluded that "I do not think that the accused ought to be prohibited from seeing the letter."[156]

Plainly this contradicts Rogers' statement that Marshall "ruled that the President was free to keep from view such portions of the letter which the President deemed confidential in the public interest. The President alone was judge of what was confidential."[157] For Marshall asserted judicial power to decide whether a presidential claim of privilege had merit, and that a claim of secrecy in the "public interest" would have to yield to the necessities of the accused. Rogers' statement that "the President may in his own discretion withhold documents from a court"[158] is further discredited by the all but universal rule in private litigation that whether disclosure must be made by the executive branch cannot be left to the caprice of executive officers.[159]

2. Personal Attendance by the President

As the Rogers memorandum states, Marshall claimed for the courts "the right to issue a subpoena against the President"; and 155. Ibid. 192; emphasis added.

156. Ibid. Lest it be thought that the rule in civil cases may be narrower, note Marshall's statement that "if this might be likened to a civil case, the law is express on the subject. It is that either party may require the other to produce books or writings in their possession or power which contain evidence pertinent to the issue"; ibid. 191. We need look no further than United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 9–10 (1953), for confirmation that "judicial control over evidence in a case cannot be abdicated to the caprice of executive officers."

157. Rogers memo 35. After Marshall delivered the foregoing opinion, Jefferson sent a copy of the Wilkinson letter, "excepting such parts as he deemed he ought not permit to be made public," United States v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas. 187, 193 (No. 14694) (C.C. Va. 1807), thereby complying with Marshall's preliminary requirement that the President himself must decide the propriety of withholding. But Burr no longer pressed the matter. Beveridge says, "Perhaps the favorable progress of the case relieved Burr's anxiety. It is possible that the 'truce' [with Marshall] so earnestly desired by Jefferson was arranged." 3 Albert J. Beveridge, Life of John Marshall 522 (Boston, 1919). The Marshall opinion, however, stands and speaks for itself; it announced the paramount power of the court to decide the claim of privilege for itself.

158. William P. Rogers, "Constitutional Law: The Papers of the Executive Branch," 44 A.B.A.J. 941, 1012 (1958).

159. See infra, Ch. 7.

the subpoena that issued required the President "to personally attend."[160] Jefferson objected that personal attendance would disrupt performance of his executive functions, for he could be haled to far-off St. Louis, to one court after another.[161] But he offered to testify by deposition, stating that if Burr should "suppose there are any facts within the knowledge of the heads of the departments or of myself . . . we shall be ready to give him the benefit of it, by way of deposition."[162] This was a plea of serious administrative inconvenience, not a claim of absolute immunity from judicial process. No such claim was made by his counsel; to the contrary, as Marshall stated, the "attorney for the United States avowed his opinion that a general subpoena might issue to the president."[163] Not satisfied to rest on concession, Marshall left no doubts on this score: "In the provisions of the constitution, and of the statutes, which give the accused the right to compulsory process of the courts, there is no exception whatever."[164] He rejected the reservation in the law of evidence for the King—which was based on the ground that it was "incompatible with his dignity to appear under the process of the court"—because the "principle of the English constitution that the king can do no wrong" was inapplicable to our government whereunder "the president . . . may be impeached and removed from office." And, Marshall added, "it is not known ever to have been doubted, but that the chief may be served with a subpoena ad testificandum."[165] Fully alive to the

160. Rogers memo 36, 35.

161. United States v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas. 55, 69 (No. 14693) (C.C. Va. 1807).

162. Ibid.

163. 1 Robertson, supra, n. 148 at 180. Jefferson's counsel, Alexander McRae, conceded that "a subpoena may issue against him [the President] as well as against any other man"; ibid. 181.

164. Ibid. This reflected James Wilson's statement in the Pennsylvania Ratification Convention: "not a single privilege is annexed to his character; far from being above the laws, he is amenable to them in his private character as a citizen, and in his public character by impeachment"; 2 Elliot 480. Another Framer, Charles Pinckney, speaking in the Senate on March 5, 1800, of the express congressional privilege from arrest, stated:

> it was never intended to give Congress, or either branch, any but specified, and those very limited, privileges. They [the Framers] well knew how oppressively the power of undefined privileges had been exercised in Great Britain, and were determined no such authority should ever be exercised here . . . Let us inquire why the Constitution should have been so attentive to each branch of Congress . . . and have shewn so little to the President . . . in this respect . . . No privilege of this kind was intended for your Executive, nor any except that which I have mentioned for your Legislature. 3 Farrand 385.

165. United States v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas. 30, 34 (No. 14,692d) (C.C. Va. 1807). The Supreme Court stated in 1972 that in Burr, "Chief Justice Marshall, sitting on Circuit, gravity of the issue, Marshall was at pains to put beyond doubt that a subpoena could reach the President. His subpoena, far from offending the mores of the time, responded to contemporary egalitarianism and met with approval, even from the Republicans.[166] As the foremost apostle of a democratic society, Jefferson could not very well publicly put the President above the law.

In weighing Marshall's judgment it needs to be kept in mind that he knew the problems of government at first hand: he had been a member of the Virginia Assembly and had taken vigorous part in obtaining ratification of the Constitution in Virginia; he had been a member of Congress, defended the Jay Treaty, been a member of the "XYZ mission to France," and had served as Secretary of State under John Adams.[167] As Charles Beard stated, Marshall "had better opportunities than any student of history or law today to discover the intention of the framers of the federal Constitution."[168] Greater light was not given to a present-day President.

What of the defiance threatened by Jefferson in his letters to the district attorney: the court had no "controul over the executive"; force was given by the Constitution to him, not the courts; the executive had the superior means to "protect itself from enterprises of force" attempted by the other departments. This was part and parcel of his total rejection of Marbury v. Madison and the doctrine of judicial review, which he denounced as "not law."[169] opined that in proper circumstances a subpoena could be issued to the President"; Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 689 n. 26.

---

Rejection of royal immunity had been underlined in the North Carolina Ratification Convention by James Iredell. 4 Elliot 109, quoted supra, Ch. 2, n. 126.

166. "For the first time, most Republicans approved of the opinion of John Marshall. In the fanatical politics of the time there was enough of honest adherence to the American ideal that all men are equal in the eyes of the law, to justify the calling of a President, even Thomas Jefferson, before a court of justice"; 3 Beveridge, supra, n. 157 at 450.

Writing in 1803, before the Burr trial, St. George Tucker, the prominent Republican editor of Blackstone, and later judge of the Virginia Court of Appeals, stated: "In the trial of Mr. Thomas Cooper [before Justice Chase] . . . for a libel against the President . . . under the sedition law, it is said that Mr. Cooper applied to the court for a subpoena to summon the president as a witness on his behalf, and that the court refused to grant one. Upon what principle the application was refused (notwithstanding this article [for compulsory process]) I have never been able to obtain satisfactory information"; Tucker's Blackstone, supra, n. 12 at App. 358. For Chase's high-handed conduct of such trials, see Berger, Impeachment 224–251.

167. 12 Dictionary of American Biography 315.

168. Charles Beard, The Supreme Court and the Constitution 108 (Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1962).

169. 9 Jefferson, Writings 55–62; 3 Henry S. Randall, Life of Jefferson 211–212 (New York, 1858). Randall states that "Jefferson in no way publicly challenged [the court's] authority"; ibid. 218.

But, as with Stalin's cynical query, "How many battalions has the Pope?," the respect due to Marshall's opinion cannot be measured by his lack of battalions to enforce a judicial decree. Command of the armed forces was not given the President in order that he might resist judicial decrees but rather to enforce them. The effect of Marshall's opinion as law is not a whit diminished by Jefferson's private threats of resistance. Jefferson's view was not that of the Founders; history confirms Marshall: the final word as to the "law" was given to the courts, the "ultimate interpreter" of the Constitution.

H. Executive Shielding of Subordinates

Not the least of Rogers' misreadings of law and history is his assertion that "heads of departments may not be compelled to attend a trial," and that they "are subject . . . to the direction of the Presidents of the United States. They are not subject to any other directions." Given a subpoena, he maintains, "The President may intervene and direct the Cabinet officer or department not to appear; the person subpoenaed would then advise the court of the President's order and abstain from appearing altogether."[170] As long ago as 1838 Kendall v. United States rejected an analogous claim. The Postmaster General, acting on presidential instructions, refused to pay moneys owed by the United States for carriage of mails. Congress then passed a law directing payment, and when this was refused by the Postmaster General, mandamus was brought against him to compel payment. Although the executive power is vested in the President, the Supreme Court declared:

> it by no means follows that every officer in every branch of that department is under the exclusive direction of the President . . . it would be an alarming doctrine, that Congress cannot impose upon any executive officer any duty they may think proper, which is not repugnant to any rights secured and protected by the constitution.

The contrary principle, said the Court, would clothe "the President with a power entirely to control the legislation of congress, and paralyze the administration of justice."[171] Whether the rights asserted by a department head are "protected by the Constitution" was not of course left for final decision by the President, but committed to the "ultimate interpreter" of the Constitution, the judiciary.

170. Rogers memo 38, 2.
171. 37 U.S. (12 Pet.) 524, 610, 613 (1838).

NYT 12/5/79

By WARREN WEAVER Jr.
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — The legislative logjam holding up President Carter's plan to tax "windfall" oil profits broke today and the Senate promptly began strengthening the measure along lines suggested by the White House.

After a week of stalemate, senators favoring a lower tax on the oil industry gave up their threat of a filibuster in return for assurances that a series of their amendments would receive full consideration on the floor, among them a multibillion-dollar income tax cut, effective in 1981.

To settle Federal complaints of overcharges, the Getty Oil Company agreed to give $25 million to a new fund to help the poor buy heating oil. Page D1.

After 15 minutes of debate, the Senate voted by 58 to 35 to increase the tax on one category of oil by $22.5 billion. The amendment would increase from 60 percent to 75 percent the rate on production from wells discovered from 1973 through 1978, so-called "new oil."

Sponsored by Moynihan

Later the Senate approved by a 68-to-26 vote an amendment sponsored by Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, Democrat of New York, that would delay an automatic phase-out of the tax by several years and thus increase total Government revenue.

Senator Moynihan estimated that his amendment would increase total revenue collectible under the Senate bill from $145 billion to $214 billion by postponing the termination of the tax about six years. The $214 billion figure is for the period 1980-90; all other revenue estimates are for 1980-90.

In another energy development, Carter Administration officials are scheduled to make public this week a program to force the states to conserve energy, as well as a proposal for a standby rationing program for gasoline. The plans are expected to revive regional controversies over supply allotments. [Page D5.]

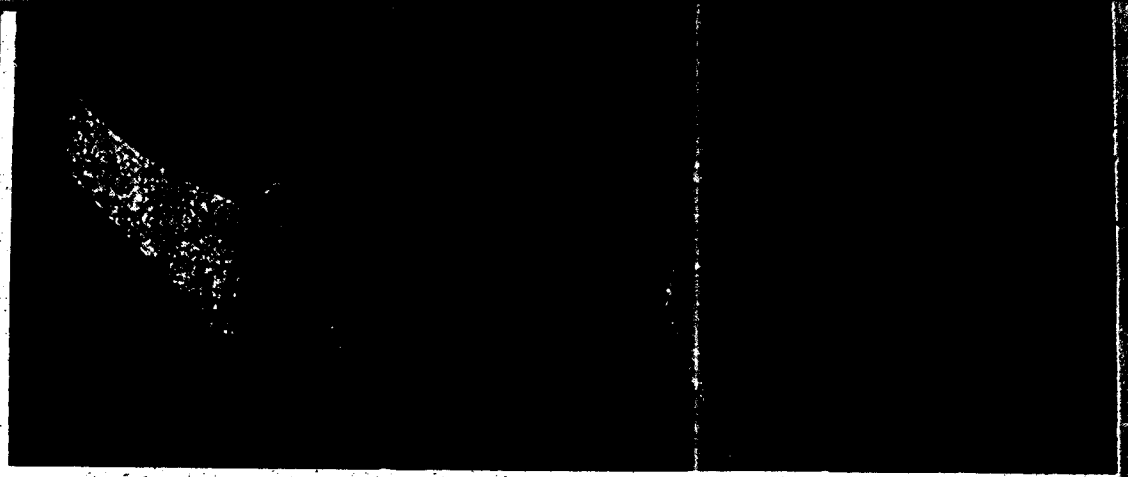
Far Less Than House Version

Advocates of a higher oil tax, mostly but not all Democrats, now anticipate that they can increase the 11-year revenue total for the legislation to about $185 billion, far more than the original Senate version, although far less than the $276 billion in the version the House of Representatives approved last summer.

If this Senate strategy succeeds, and the conference committee reconciling the two bills splits the difference, the final legislation going to President Carter could provide about $230 billion over the 1980-90 period.

If the conference committee adopts the

Continued on Page D5, Column 4



The New York Times/Tyrone Hendrix

President Carter with Vice President Mondale at the White House after announcing candidacy for a second term

GASOLINE USE DROPS SHARPLY IN CITY AREA

Price Rise, Supply Cuts and Public Awareness in 3 States Cited

By PETER KIHSS

Public awareness of the need for conservation, along with high prices and shorter supplies, has resulted in sharp decreases in the use of gasoline in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, officials of the three states said yesterday.

All warned that gasoline supplies would continue to be tight. According to forecasts, 8 percent less gas will be delivered in New York State this month than in December 1978.

According to the officials, New York motorists used 14.6 percent less gasoline in September — the latest month with available data — than in September of last year. It was the sixth consecutive month of decline, with an overall decrease of 6.1 percent for the year's first nine months.

16.1% Drop in New Jersey

New Jersey data for September, still subject to revision, showed a decline of 16.1 percent in gasoline use from a year ago. The decrease over nine months in the state was 3.9 percent.

Connecticut reported 10.3 percent less gasoline used in September than last year and a 3.6 percent decline for the year.

James L. Larocca, New York Commissioner of Energy, said the state's drop in

Continued on Page D22, Column 1

Carter, Without Fanfare, Declares He Is Candidate for a Second Term

By TERENCE SMITH
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — President Carter, still grappling with the Iranian crisis, today officially declared his candidacy for a second term in a subdued, nine-minute ceremony shorn of the usual political fanfare.

Surrounded by his family and with his running mate, Vice President Mondale, at his side, Mr. Carter told an audience of Administration officials and White House staff members gathered in the East Room that he would "continue to talk sense to the American people in the campaign."

"As President and as a candidate, I will continue to ask you to join me in looking squarely at the truth," he said. "Only by facing up to the world as it is can we lift ourselves towards a better future."

Mr. Carter also called for the renomination of Mr. Mondale, whom he referred to as "the most effective Vice President in American history."

Strauss Voices Confidence

After the ceremony, Robert S. Strauss, the President's campaign manager, predicted that Mr. Carter would become the front-runner in the race for the Democratic nomination within 60 to 90 days. He conceded that Senator Edward M. Kennedy was still ahead in the polls but said the Massachusetts Democrat was "declining steadily, while the President is climbing, slowly but steadily."

Mr. Carter canceled a scheduled appearance at a $1,000-per-couple fund-raising party at the Washington Hilton tonight. His press secretary, Jody Powell, said that the President "simply feels his presence there would not be appropriate."

Continued on Page A26, Column 1

President Negotiating To Give Vesco Inquiry Answers by Videotape

By ROBERT PEAR
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — President Carter is negotiating an agreement to answer questions by videotape for a Federal grand jury investigating allegations that Robert L. Vesco attempted to have his legal problems "fixed" in the Carter Administration.

Sources familiar with the grand jury inquiry said today that several members of the panel considered the videotape arrangement unsatisfactory because the jurors would not be able to ask the President follow-up questions. However, a majority of the jurors voted to accept the arrangement rather than insist on his personal appearance, the sources said.

No Jurors at Questioning

Under the proposed arrangement, said to have been approved by Chief Judge William B. Bryant of the Federal District Court here, questions would be put to the President by Government lawyers, and no grand jurors would be present. Lawyers for the White House and for the United States Attorney here have been negotiating details of the interview.

If Mr. Carter gives his answers in this manner, it would be the first time that a President answered questions for a grand jury by videotape. No incumbent President has testified in person before a

Continued on Page A17, Column 6

Cincinnati Officials Order Inquiry Into Concert Crush That Killed 11

By REGINALD STUART
Special to The New York Times

CINCINNATI, Dec. 4 — City officials today ordered an investigation into the sequence of events that led to the deaths of 11 youths crushed by other rock fans rushing to get unreserved seats at a concert last night.

This river city was shocked and saddened by the deaths of the young rock fans and the injuries to at least eight others caught in the frenzied stampede to get first-come, first-served general admission seats at the concert by the Who.

The accident at Riverfront Coliseum also raised concern that the conditions that led to the deaths — thousands of excited youths rushing through doors in a race for good seats — existed at hundreds of other concert halls around the nation.

'Hard to Believe'

"It is hard to believe that people would run over other people," said 31-year-old Mayor John Kenneth Blackwell, sworn into office only four days ago.

Mr. Blackwell, who ordered the city's investigation, was among those who decided last night that the concert should proceed despite the incident. The 18,000 fans who watched the performance were unaware of what had happened at the gates of the coliseum, and officials were worried that the abrupt cancellation of the concert would produce an unruly reaction from the young audience.

"My reaction, when I was first advised of the incident, was one of total disbelief," said Mr. Blackwell, pausing in an interview in his office this afternoon to look toward the ceiling, his eyes showing fatigue.

Mr. Blackwell's views were echoed by others, including members of the Who, a British group. An older sister of Jacqueline Eckerle, a 15-year-old girl who was

Continued on Page D21, Column 4

Associated Press

TRIAL SUSPENDED IN KOREA: Kim Jae Kyu, charged in murder of President Park. Court's jurisdiction was challenged. Page A4.

INSIDE

Koch Plans Hospital Shifts

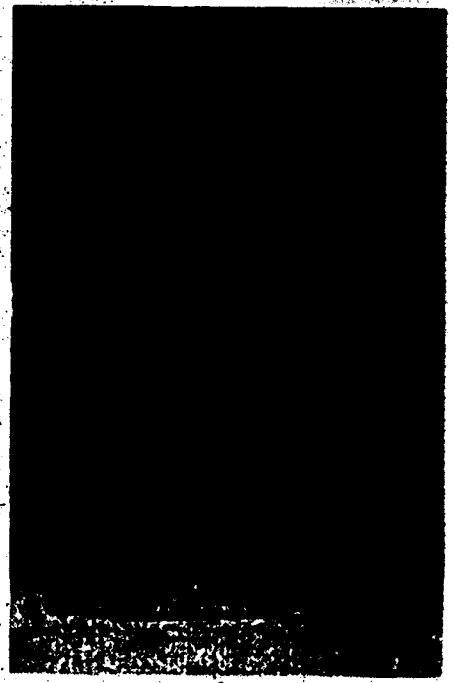
Mayor Koch plans to shift the leadership structure of the Health and Hospitals Corporation in an apparent effort to weaken its president. Page B1.

Few Leads in Navy Ambush

There were few leads in the attack in Puerto Rico in which two sailors died. The ambush renewed turmoil over independence for the island. Page A24.

Around Nation	A34	Music	C23-24, C27
Books	C28	Notes on People	B6
Bridge	C27	Obituaries	D23
Business Day	D1-21	Op-Ed	A31
Chess	C27	Real Estate	D30
Crossword	C27	Shipping	D22
Dance	C24, C27	Sports	B8-12
Editorials	A30	Theaters	C23, C27
Going Out Guide	C22	TV/Radio	C29, C31
Letters	A30	U.N. Events	A3
Living Section	C1-21	Weather	D22

News Summary and Index, Page F1



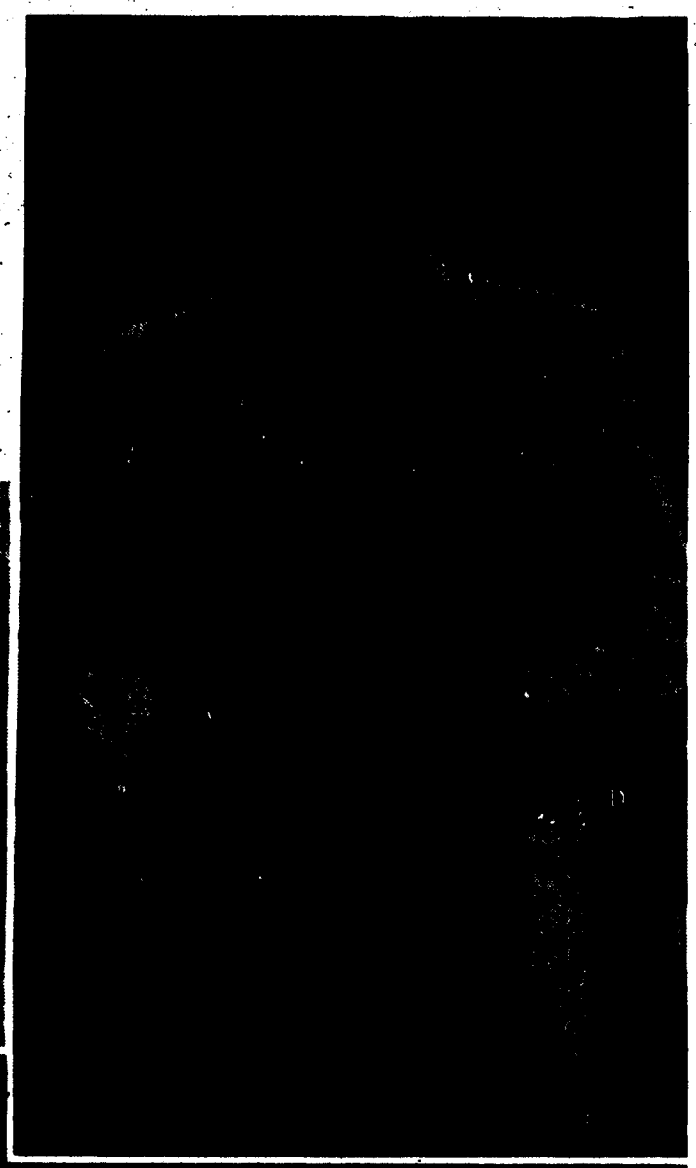
Members of the United Nations Security Co... on resolution yesterday demanding release ... captured during the takeover of the United ...

Iranians Say Record...

By JEFF GERTH
Special to The New York Times

TEHERAN, Iran, Dec. 4 — Iranian officials charge that documents uncovered in an investigation into the finances of the deposed Shah of Iran show that over $1 billion in identifiable funds was diverted or misappropriated by the Shah and his family from Iranian banks and other institutions.

Officials at the central bank here presented documents for examination by The New York Times that they said supported their charges that the Shah had ... used a ... and in ... phon... final ... 'writte... The Ir... had re... trients ... 'make ... The ... throug... In file ... record ... and his ...



CARTER NEGOTIATING IN INQUIRY ON VESCO

Continued From Page A1

grand jury, Justice Department officials said.

It was not known whether a date for the interview with Mr. Carter had been selected.

Lloyd N. Cutler, the White House counsel, declined to comment on the grand jury proceedings. But he did say, "This President will give evidence in an appropriate forum to any proper investigative body."

President Carter has given court testimony at least twice before. Paul J. Curran, the special counsel who investigated the Carter family's peanut business in Georgia, took a four-hour, sworn deposition in the White House on Sept. 5. Mr. Curran concluded his inquiry with the finding that there was "no evidence whatsoever" that money from the business was used in the 1976 Presidential campaign.

In April 1978, a 51-minute videotape of the President's testimony was presented in Federal District Court in Macon, Ga., at the trial of a Georgia State Senator, Culver Kidd, on gambling and conspiracy charges. Mr. Kidd was acquitted.

The grand jury here has for more than a year been investigating allegations that representatives of Mr. Vesco, the financier who is accused of swindling investors, made improper contacts with high-ranking officials of the Carter Administration in 1977 in hopes of halting extradition proceedings against him.

The grand jury foreman, Ralph E. Ulmer, tried to resign last August, charging that the Justice Department had directed a "cover-up" to protect the Administration, but Judge Bryant rejected the resignation.

Philip B. Heymann, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the criminal division of the Justice Department, and Jody Powell, the White House press secretary, have denied Mr. Ulmer's charges, saying there was no political interference with the investigation.

Likely Focus of Questions

The jury's questions for Mr. Carter are likely to focus on a Feb. 15, 1977, meeting at the White House between the President and Richard M. Harden, an aide who had met a week earlier with W. Spencer Lee 4th, a lawyer from Albany, Ga., who was representing Mr. Vesco's interests.

After conferring with Mr. Harden, the President sent a note to Griffin B. Bell, then Attorney General, urging him to see Mr. Lee. Justice Department officials have said that Mr. Bell never received the note and never met with Mr. Lee.

Sources in the department said last summer that Mr. Harden was under investigation for possible perjury in his account to the grand jury of conversations with Mr. Carter and Mr. Lee. Thus, the grand jury might seek Mr. Carter's account of the February 1977 meeting with Mr. Harden in an effort to determine whether the President's account corroborates or contradicts Mr. Harden's testimony.

The grand jury might also ask the President why he sent Mr. Bell a handwritten note saying, "Please see Spencer Lee from Albany when he requests an appointment."

Apparent Efforts by Vesco

Mr. Vesco evidently hoped to use Mr. Lee's contacts at the White House to arrange a settlement of charges pending against him. Mr. Vesco, wanted on felony charges of looting millions of dollars from investors in mutual funds, fled the United States for Costa Rica in the early 1970's. He is believed to be living in the Bahamas.

President Ford was the first incumbent President to submit to interrogation by lawyers concerning a criminal case. A film of his testimony was shown in 1975 at the trial of Lynnette Alice Fromme, who was later convicted of attempting to assassinate Mr. Ford in Sacramento, Calif.

The procedure for taking President Carter's testimony is being negotiated in an exchange of letters between Mr. Cutler and Carl S. Rauh, the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia.

Two well-placed sources said that several of the 23 grand jurors would have preferred for Mr. Carter to deliver his testimony in person. However, Justice Department lawyers said there was no precedent for demanding a personal appearance by Mr. Carter. The grand jury could have attempted to subpoena the President had it thought such action necessary.

Neither Mr. Rauh nor the White House nor Mr. Heymann would confirm or discuss plans for taking the President's testimony.

Baby Found in Manger At a Scene of Nativity

LONGVIEW, Tex., Dec. 4 (AP) — The Rev. Charles Holland walked by

NYT 12/8/79

Calls Himself 'a Possibility'

Mr. Dole, who was President Ford's running mate in 1976, is, he admits, a long shot in the crowded Republican field, but he continues to regard himself as "a possibility" in the year ahead.

"Maybe I'm dreaming," he said in an interview off the Senate floor, "but I can see Connally and Reagan knocking each other off and Bush and Baker doing the same thing, and there I'd be all alone."

The Senator was referring to his chief competitors, Ronald Reagan of California, John B. Connally of Texas, George Bush, and Howard H. Baker Jr. of Tennessee, the Senate minority leader.

Mr. Dole said that his campaign was not in debt, except for a disputed claim of $100,000 by a political consulting concern. His organization has spent virtually all the $800,000 it has raised but expects to receive $400,000 or more in Federal matching funds early next year.

"We're all right financially," the Senator said.

Any Presidential candidate who drops out of the competition before 1980 will not be eligible for the Federal subsidy payments.

Connally Hires New Aide

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP) — John B. Connally has hired a new senior campaign aide and is making sharp cuts in the size of his staff as part of an effort to inject new life into his drive for the 1980 Republican Presidential nomination.

The new aide is Charles Keating, a former Arizona businessman, who will take over as chief administrative official of the campaign.

A campaign spokesman, Hugh O'Neill, said today that 20 of Mr. Connally's 160 staff members in campaign headquarters had been dropped. He added that there would soon be more dismissals, mainly among middle-level campaign workers.

Meanwhile, he said, the new appointment will give Eddie Mahe, the campaign manager, time to plan political strategy as the primary election season draws near. He said that the change was not a demotion for Mr. Mahe.

Civiletti Says He Is Withdrawing From Role in Vesco Investigation

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 (AP) — Attorney General Benjamin R. Civiletti said today that he had removed himself from any role in the Government's investigation into allegations of White House influence-buying in behalf of Robert L. Vesco, the fugitive financier.

At the same time, the Attorney General said at an impromptu news conference that he believed it was proper that President Carter be allowed to give videotaped testimony to a grand jury. The President plans to give the testimony to a Federal grand jury that has been investigating the Vesco case for more than a year.

Mr. Civiletti said he was taking no part in the investigation because of his role in the Administration's 1977 decision to abandon efforts to extradite Mr. Vesco in favor of using diplomatic channels to have him deported.

There has been no evidence that the decision was made to benefit Mr. Vesco. Nonetheless, Mr. Civiletti said it would be "inappropriate" for him to take part in the investigation because he was "involved in contemporaneous actions" relating to extradition proceedings against Mr. Vesco.

Living in the Bahamas

Mr. Vesco, who fled the country in 1970, is wanted in the United States on charges of misappropriating $224 million from the Investors Overseas Service, a Swiss-based mutual fund, and with making an illegal $200,000 contribution to President Nixon's re-election campaign. He is now believed living in the Bahamas.

Mr. Civiletti said today that he was not consulted about the plans disclosed this week for the President to testify by videotape rather than in person before the grand jury.

Mr. Carter's videotaped answers in the Vesco case would mark the first time a President has answered grand jury questions in this manner, but Mr. Carter has provided testimony in different forms at least twice before criminal investigations since January 1977, when he became President.

Sources close to the investigation said that some grand jurors had complained that the videotaping procedure would prevent them from asking follow-up questions. Asked if a President should be given special treatment when called to testify, the Attorney General replied: "Certainly. Only in the most compelling circumstances should a President have to provide information directly to a court or investigation."

Georgia Businessman Involved

A District of Columbia grand jury is investigating allegations that, shortly after Mr. Carter took office, an attempt was made to pay off high officials in the Administration to quash extradition proceedings against Mr. Vesco.

R.L. Herring, a Georgia businessman who has been convicted on unrelated fraud and racketeering charges, has said he paid $10,000 to a lawyer, W. Spencer Lee 4th of Albany, Ga., to act in Mr. Vesco's behalf.

Mr. Lee has said he met with Richard M. Harden, a White House aide, in February 1977 and was persuaded by Mr. Harden not to pursue the matter further. Mr. Harden subsequently met with the President, who sent a note to Griffin B. Bell, then Attorney General, that said, "Please see Spencer Lee from Albany when he requests an appointment."

The Justice Department said the note was placed in a file folder for potential job-seekers but that Mr. Lee never appeared for an appointment.

Carter Defeats Kennedy 84 to 14% in Tennessee

NASHVILLE, Dec. 8 (UPI) — President Carter, hailed for his handling of the Iranian crisis, won an overwhelming victory last night in a Presidential straw poll of Tennessee Democrats attending fund-raising dinners in 10 cities.

Mr. Carter, who made an obvious reference to Senator Edward M. Kennedy's criticism of the Shah in a telephone speech to the meetings, rolled up 84.5 percent of the total, or 1,425 votes, to 14.1 percent, or 236 votes, for Mr. Kennedy and 1.4 percent, or 24 votes, for Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. of California.

NYT 3/2/80

JURY IN VESCO CASE SEES CARTER ON TAPE

His Testimony to the Panel Is Said to Focus on Alleged Attempt to 'Fix' Legal Problems

By EDWARD POUND
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 1 — President Carter spent more than an hour answering questions on videotape last month for a Federal grand jury investigating allegations that Robert L. Vesco, the fugitive financier, attempted to have his legal problems "fixed" in the Carter Administration.

Sources familiar with the interview said that Mr. Carter offered no major new information about the case when he was questioned at the White House by three Federal prosecutors. His videotaped interview was shown to the grand jury on Feb. 21, the sources said.

They declined to comment on Mr. Carter's testimony other than to say that it was not damaging to anyone in his Administration, including an aide who is under investigation for possible perjury. The President, the sources said, often responded by saying that he could not recall matters about which the Government lawyers were inquiring.

Mr. Carter's videotaped answers marked the first time that a President had answered grand jury questions in that manner, though he has provided testimony in different forms at least twice before in criminal investigations.

Carter Aide Is Reticent

Lloyd N. Cutler, the White House counsel, declined to confirm that the President had been questioned. But he said, "The President always cooperates with the proper law enforcement investigation. He has and he will cooperate with this investigation."

Government lawyers who questioned Mr. Carter refused to discuss the session. However, they were known to have focused their questioning on a meeting Mr. Carter held in the White House on Feb. 15, 1977, with Richard M. Harden, a special assistant.

The lawyers wanted the President's account of the meeting to determine whether it corroborated or contradicted Mr. Harden's testimony before the grand jury in December 1978. Sources in the Justice Department said last summer that Mr. Harden was under investigation for possible perjury in his account of his conversation with Mr. Carter and an earlier one with W. Spencer Lee 4th, a lawyer from Albany, Ga., who was representing Mr. Vesco's interests and who is a close friend of Mr. Harden.

Mr. Harden reportedly told the grand jury that he talked Mr. Lee out of continuing to represent Mr. Vesco's interests when they met on Feb. 8, 1977. He was also reported to have testified that he briefed Mr. Carter on the Vesco situation a week later and informed him that Mr. Lee was withdrawing from the deal.

Some Jurors Dissatisfied

Sources close to the grand jury investigation said that jurors submitted some of the questions that were put to the President by Government lawyers. No jurors were present for the interview and, the sources said, several jurors were dissatisfied with the procedure because it prevented them from asking followup questions. They were also reportedly displeased because they believed the President should have testified in person.

Evidence in the case is being presented to the grand jury by the office of the United States Attorney here. Government lawyers have not indicated whether the investigation will continue after the grand jury's 18-month term expires in early April.

At one point, Ralph E. Ulmer, the grand jury's foreman, tried to resign, charging the Justice Department with directing a "cover-up" to protect the Carter Administration. His charges were denied by Mr. Carter's spokesmen and the Justice Department.

John T. Kotelly, deputy chief of the fraud division in the United States Attorney's office, declined to comment on the investigation.

Origin of Inquiry

The investigation began after R. L. Herring, a businessman in Albany, Ga., charged that Mr. Vesco wanted to bribe Carter Administration officials to resolve his legal problems. Mr. Vesco fled the United states nearly a decade ago after he was charged with defrauding stockholders of millions of dollars in an international swindle.

Mr. Herring, who was convicted on unrelated fraud and racketeering charges and is in a Federal prison in Miami, has said that he retained Mr. Lee, the Albany lawyer, to act in Mr. Vesco's behalf.

In a telephone interview yesterday, Mr. Herring said that he was scheduled to take a polygraph (lie detector) test on March 6 and that he planned to release the test results to the press.

Goldwater Tells G.O.P.

WSJ 10/17/79

Independent Prosecutor Clears Carters In Peanut Warehouse Loan Investigation

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—An independent prosecutor's investigation into the finances of the Carter family peanut warehouse cleared President Carter and his brother, Billy, of any criminal wrongdoing.

Paul Curran, special counsel appointed in March to investigate loan transactions between the warehouse and a Georgia bank headed by Bert Lance, former federal Budget Director, yesterday closed out his inquiry with reports to Congress and the Attorney General.

Mr. Curran told reporters his six-month investigation hadn't turned up any evidence President Carter "committed any crimes." He added that "based on all the evidence and the applicable law," he wouldn't seek any indictments in the case.

No Room for Doubt

The investigation was triggered, in part, by speculative press reports suggesting the warehouse loans had been diverted to the Carter presidential campaign during 1976. Mr. Curran said his "audits and examinations of the books and records" don't leave any "room for doubt" this allegation was false.

"Every nickel and every peanut have been traced into and out of the warehouse," and there wasn't any unlawful diversion of funds "in either direction," Mr. Curran said.

Jody Powell, presidential press secretary, said Mr. Curran's findings ended a "witch hunt" in which investigators "didn't find any witches." The White House later issued a more formal statement expressing pleasure at Mr. Curran's decision.

The President, asked about the report at a Democratic Party reception in Harvey, Ill., said, "I'm glad they have completed their investigation and turned their attention to crime control." Later, at the White House, he added, "The truth finally came out."

Carter Made Deposition

President Carter testified under oath to Mr. Curran in a four-hour deposition taken at the White House early last month. Mr. Curran said yesterday he thought this was the first time a sitting U.S. President had been examined under oath in a criminal investigation. He added that President Carter had "cooperated totally."

Billy Carter, the President's brother and manager of the warehouse until mid-1977, said in a telephone interview yesterday the Curran investigation had been "a complete waste of the taxpayers' money." He blamed the long inquiry on "idiot reporters" and the fact that "Jimmy is President."

Despite Mr. Curran's finding that indictments shouldn't be sought, his 179-page public report outlines some irregularities in the loan relationship between the Carter warehouse and the National Bank of Georgia. The bank, which Mr. Lance headed at the time of the loans, lent the warehouse nearly $10 million from 1975 through 1977.

Loan Violated Collateral Terms

In one instance, a 1975 loan to finance inventories of peanuts was "out of bond," or in violation of the collateral provisions of the loan agreement, "almost from its inception to its termination on Aug. 31, 1976," Mr. Curran found. He said that during the spring of 1976, when the warehouse owed the bank more than $1 million, there weren't any bonded peanuts in the warehouse to meet the loan's collateral terms.

Mr. Curran also found that because of repeated overdrafts in the warehouse account, the National Bank of Georgia simply held checks from Billy Carter until there were sufficient funds in the account.

The toughest task Mr. Curran faced was deciding whether that loose bookkeeping constituted technical violations of federal banking laws that warranted indictment of Billy Carter, and perhaps others.

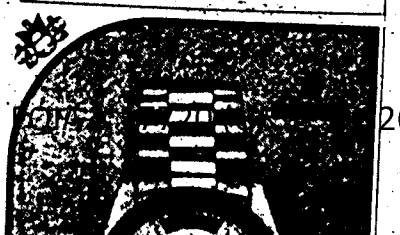
Mr. Curran decided any technical violations that might exist didn't amount to willful criminal acts. He did so after analyzing numerous bank-law cases that raise similar issues. But this detailed analysis of the evidence, and its relation to past cases, was made only in Mr. Curran's 239-page report to the Attorney General and wasn't made available to Congress or reporters.

Mr. Curran's report draws a devastating picture of Billy Carter as a manager. The report describes the warehouse books as "disorganized" and notes that by August 1977 the warehouse was in such "financial difficulty" its current liabilities exceeded its current assets by about $400,000.

To bail out his foundering family business, President Carter provided the warehouse, through his trustee, Charles Kirbo, $440,000 during 1977 and 1978, Mr. Curran found. To finance these loans to the warehouse, Carter Farms Inc., a business owned entirely by President Carter and his children, borrowed $480,000 from Trust Co. Bank in Atlanta. The balance of these loans was $275,000 as of July 1978, Mr. Curran notes.

The Carter warehouse may also owe the government some income tax. Mr. Curran's audit discovered what he said were "a number of errors related to the recording of sales and purchases" that "may have material income-tax consequences."

For example, $260,000 of peanuts bought in 1975 weren't recorded until 1976. Mr. Curran said such errors affect the net profit reported by the warehouse for 1975 through 1977. The special counsel added that these audit findings will be reported to the Internal Revenue Service.



NYT 10/17/79

Times

LATE CITY EDITION

Weather: Cloudy with showers today, tonight. Variably cloudy tomorrow. Temperature range: today 51-65; yesterday 47-66. Details on page D22.

17, 1979 — 30 cents beyond 50-mile zone from New York City. Higher in air delivery cities. — 25 CENTS

BELS SAY NG TALKS RKED OUT

S. and Others Seized From w Regime

RDERS

rk Times

The Zimbabwe rs, trying to re- es in the peace further modified constitution that the country.

ing obstacle to Britian's insist- ompensated for any new govern- stacle could be e United States reed to pay the on. The United in earlier negoti- ar, then that it underwrite the en is not on our ject to those na- ith and kin, the Eddison Zvobgo, uerrilla alliance Front. "If the and others can hat point, then I to the conference illing to help with cannot pay them eported this eve- hours American ferring with the Front about com- ns were reported gness to shoulder igh they warned oval might be dif-

Reported

h had been in re- all sides sought a , resumed today nts: Britain and t that was elected hey began a pre- ive discussion of eral ultimatums, , said yesterday

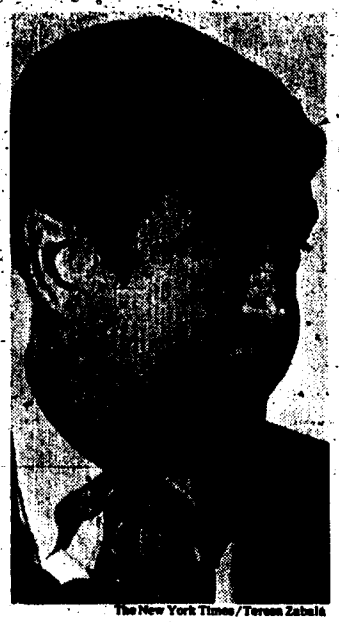
A12, Column 3



The New York Times/Teresa Zabala

Paul J. Curran at news conference

CARTER'S BUSINESS CLEARED IN INQUIRY ON CAMPAIGN FUNDS

INDICTMENTS ARE RULED OUT

Investigator Finds No Evidence of Diversion of Warehouse Profit to '76 Presidential Race

By EDWARD T. POUND
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 — Paul J. Curran, a special Federal investigator, said today that an exhaustive inquiry into loans to President Carter's family peanut business by the National Bank of Georgia had turned up "no evidence whatsoever" that proceeds had been diverted to Mr. Carter's 1976 Presidential campaign.

Mr. Curran, who spent nearly seven months investigating $9.8 million in loans to Carter's Warehouse, the President's family business in Plains, Ga., said: "Our audits and examinations of the books and records leave no room for doubt on this score. Every nickel and every peanut have been tracked into and out of the warehouse, and no funds were unlawfully diverted."

"There is no evidence to establish that President Jimmy Carter committed any crimes," Mr. Curran said. "Further, my overall conclusion . . . is that based on all the evidence and the applicable law, no indictment can or should be brought against anyone. None will be filed."

Excerpts from statement, page A21.

Insufficient Loan Collateral

But Mr. Curran's report said the investigation found that the Carter warehouse loans had insufficient collateral for long periods in 1975 and 1976; that the warehouse had major overdrafts of its bank account in late 1975 and that the bank often held checks because the account had insufficient funds.

Mr. Curran said that there had been some "record-keeping violations by a fairly low-level bank person." He did not identify the bank employee but said that the employee had been granted immunity to testify before the grand jury and would not have been prosecuted in any event "on the facts in this case."

Mr. Curran, a Republican who is a New York lawyer, was appointed as the Justice Department's special counsel in the warehouse inquiry on March 20 by Griffin B. Bell, then the Attorney General. He was given Watergate-style prosecution powers, meaning that he had the authority to seek indictments without clearance from anyone in the Justice Department.

Loan Diversion Alleged

He was appointed after repeated allegations had been made that proceeds from the National Bank of Georgia loans to the Carter business may have been diverted to Mr. Carter's Presidential campaign.

In 1975 and 1976, when Mr. Carter ran for the Presidency and when the bulk of the National Bank of Georgia loans were made, the warehouse business was managed by his brother, Billy Carter. The National Bank of Georgia, which is based in Atlanta, was controlled by Bert Lance, a close friend of the President.

Mr. Lance, who was Mr. Carter's first director of the Office of Management and

Continued on Page A20, Column 1

Sindona Enters A Hospital Here With a Wound

By JOSEPH B. TREASTER

Michele Sindona, the Italian financier who disappeared two and a half months ago while awaiting trial on fraud charges in connection with the collapse of the Franklin National Bank, was admitted to Doctors Hospital yesterday with a possible bullet wound in the leg, Federal authorities said.

The United States Attorney's office said that Mr. Sindona had been immediately arrested, but the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the financier's lawyers said that Federal marshals were on hand only for his protection.

Mr. Sindona's family said in a statement that the 59-year-old businessman had been released by his kidnappers. However, the F.B.I. said it had no information on that point.

Since late on the evening of Aug. 2 when Mr. Sindona was reportedly last seen walking alone on Fifth Avenue near his apartment at the Pierre Hotel, law-enforcement officials had been divided on whether the millionaire had been kidnapped or had fled to avoid the upcoming trial.

In late September, Mr. Sindona's law-

Continued on Page B3, Column 1

adoran Junta Promises s and a General Amnesty

By ALAN RIDING
Special to The New York Times

ct. 16 — El Salva- junta today an- economic and so- easing this coun- isis.

ho led yesterday's t Carlos Humberto ly fled the country, iselves to calling a reasonable peri- political prisoners ity, and to respect-violence that has r the last two years at least six persons ween soldiers and Mejicanos district also moved against had occupied three h was burned down further leftist un- declared a state of constitutional guar- d imposed a 10 P.M. l meetings of more re prohibited.

ing a "wait-and-see" attitude toward the new junta, which is expected to be expanded to include three civilians and today began describing itself as the "revolutionary Government." Antonio Morales Erlich, leader of the Christian Democratic Party, noted that the junta was echoing the sentiments of most Salvadorans but stressed that "it is absolutely necessary to implement the promise as soon as possible."

The new rulers received cautious sup-

Continued on Page A10, Column 3

OCT 17 1979

Carter Business Cleared in Inquiry on Bank Loans and Campaign Funds

Continued From Page A1

Budget, resigned in September 1977 after a Senate inquiry into his banking practices. He was indicted last May 22 on criminal counts of illegal banking manipulations and conspiracy matters unrelated to the Carter warehouse inquiry.

Mr. Curran declined today to say whether he had questioned Mr. Lance, but he emphasized, "We found no violations of law committed by President Jimmy Carter, by Billy Carter, by Mr. Lance."

Mr. Curran, perhaps reflecting a prosecutor's caution, said in response to a question: "I'm not exonerating anyone. Our investigation covered all the transactions involving Carter's Warehouse and the National Bank of Georgia . . . and my statement stands that there is no evidence to warrant the bringing of criminal charges against anyone."

President Carter, who was in the Chicago area today holding a "town meeting," was clearly pleased by Mr. Curran's findings. He told reporters, "I'm glad they have completed their investigation and turned their attention to crime control." He said he knew "all the time" that he had not engaged in wrongdoing.

Billy Carter's lawyer, Pierre Howard of Decatur, Ga., said today, "This is the result we have anticipated from the beginning. We're glad that it's over."

Mr. Curran completed his assignment today by delivering a 239-page report to Benjamin R. Civiletti, who succeeded Mr. Bell as Attorney General. Mr. Curran also delivered an abridged report to Congress and provided copies of that document to reporters during a late morning news conference at the Justice Department. He said that his report to Congress was "incomplete" because he was prohibited by law from releasing testimony given before a Federal grand jury in Atlanta.

Mr. Curran emphasized today at his news conference that his investigation had been "thorough." He said that he and his team of lawyers and accountants, with assistance from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, had reviewed more than 80,000 documents and interviewed numerous witnesses, among them President Carter.

He said that he had taken Mr. Carter's deposition during a four-hour meeting at the White House on Sept. 5. He said the deposition had been submitted to the grand jury and that the President, in response to a subpoena last May, had "promised all documents sought and more. He has cooperated totally in this investigation," Mr. Curran said.

Errors in the Records

The White House said late this afternoon that Mr. Carter's deposition would not be made public because the President had been advised by his lawyers that "it would be inappropriate in this case" to release the document.

Mr. Curran said that he and his investigators had found numerous errors in the warehouse records relating to the sales and purchases of peanuts; failure by the National Bank of Georgia to obtain, at all times, sufficient collateral, and numerous overdrafts on a warehouse checking account by Billy Carter.

Mr. Curran said he also conducted "a limited examination" of the records of Gerald Rafshoon Advertising Inc. to determine whether the Atlanta-based agency had obtained money from any outside sources that enabled it to extend credit to Mr. Carter's primary campaign. The agency was owned at the time by Gerald Rafshoon, who is Mr. Carter's media adviser, but it was sold this year.

Mr. Curran said that his inquiry showed that the Rafshoon agency had had no access to unexplained cash while handling Mr. Carter's primary campaign and that the agency had at no point spent more than it had received from Mr. Carter's campaign committee.

Mr. Curran said that he and his staff had audited all peanut sales and purchases by the warehouse and had turned up "a number of errors related to the recording of sales and purchases" from 1975 through 1977. He said the errors his staff had discovered had had "a material impact on each year's reported net profits, although in the aggregate, the three-year 1975-1977 profits and losses remain unchanged."

He said, however, that the errors related to net income and loss for each year and "they may have material income tax consequences" for the partners — the President, Billy Carter and Lillian Carter, their mother.

The bank loans examined by Mr. Curran were made from 1975 through 1977. They were made in the following categories: $1,101,813 to purchase a peanut sheller and construct a new warehouse for peanut storage and $8,775,181 in two commodity loans.

Mr. Curran said he believed that none of the proceeds of those loans had been diverted to the Presidential campaign. "We traced every advance and every repayment into and out of the warehouse accounts and found them all properly accounted for," he said.

There is no evidence that Billy Carter ever pledged the same collateral more than once or that there was a major delay in payments between March and May 1976.

History of Loans Traced

In a summary statement released with the report he gave to reporters, Mr. Curran traced the history of the loans. The commodity loans were to be secured by peanuts at the warehouse, Mr. Curran explained, and at one point — from March 23 through May 13, 1976 — there was "no security" on the initial commodity loan. At the time, the warehouse owed the National Bank of Georgia $1,150,000 on the loan, Mr. Curran said.

Moreover, Mr. Curran said, "The repayment checks issued by the warehouse to N.B.G. to accompany the warehouse releases were not processed by N.B.G., except for the first five checks totaling $250,000 written in October 1975. Every other repayment check issued with releases during the life of the loan was held by the bank and not processed. Instead, the bank adopted the procedure of reducing the loan by debit memos debiting the warehouse account as monies were deposited in the account by the warehouse. The checks were not processed by N.B.G. due to insufficient funds in the warehouse account." The releases referred to were the collateral — peanuts.

Mr. Curran said that overdrafts "appeared very frequently in the warehouse account in 1975," reaching a peak of $369,415 in October. But they were eliminated in large part after that time, Mr. Curran said, when the bank adopted the procedure of not processing the loan repayment checks.

The first commodity loan, he said, was to be repaid on Aug. 31, 1976. However, the balance of $520,936 was not repaid; rather, he said, it was "rolled over" into the 1976 commodity loan, meaning that the warehouse commenced its 1976 peanut buying season with a heavy debt on its hands.

Mr. Curran said that his inquiry showed that some repayment checks from the warehouse continued to be held by the bank during the life of the second commodity loan. This was a result, he said, of "insufficient funds" and the fact that the checks were processed when the warehouse account had sufficient funds to cover them.

By Aug. 31, 1977, the warehouse was still in financial difficulty and was unable to pay its current debts. Consequently, Mr. Carter said, Carter Farms, a corporation in which President Carter has a 91 per cent interest, and Mr. Carter personally lent $440,000 to the warehouse to "bail out" the business.

Associated Press

A forklift operator storing bags of peanuts at Carter Warehouse in Plains, Ga.

Brown Off for Talks in Seoul

WASHINGTON, Oct. 16 (Reuters) — Defense Secretary Harold Brown left today for consultations on security in South Korea and Japan. He will attend the annual military meetings of the United States and South Korea in Seoul tomorrow through Friday. He then goes to Japan where he will confer with military officials and visit Japanese air and ground military installations before returning home next Monday.

TELECOPY COVER SHEET

OFFICE OF THE INDEPENDENT COUNSEL
1001 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Suite 490N
Washington, D.C. 20004
telephone (202) 514-8688 facsimile (202) 514-8802

Date: 6/28/95

TO: ERIK JASO

Company Name:

Fax Number: 501-221-8707 Telephone Number:

FROM: RAJEEV DUGGAL

Number of Pages: 2 (including this cover sheet)

Message: HERE IS THE ARTICLE FROM THE POST FYI.

Vesco Jury Agrees to Take Taped Testimony From Carter

Associated Press

A federal grand jury investigating a case of alleged White House influence-buying involving fugitive financier Robert L. Vesco has agreed to accept videotape testimony from President Carter, government sources said yesterday.

The sources, who asked not to be identified, said several members of the grand jury objected to the proposed arrangement for questioning Carter on the grounds that they would be unable to submit follow-up questions to the president.

The minority of the grand jurors contended that the president should not be afforded special treatment and that if security was a problem special precautions could be taken, the sources said.

The grand jury is investigating allegations that there was an attempt shortly after Carter took office in January 1977 to quash extradition proceedings against Vesco, who fled the country after his indictment on stock fraud charges. He is believed to be living in the Bahamas.

Under the arrangement for questioning Carter, the president would be interviewed by government lawyers without grand jurors present, sources said. They said negotiations between the White House and the U.S. attorney's office are incomplete and that no date has been set for the videotape interview.

The questions for the president are likely to center on a Feb. 15, 1977, meeting between Carter and an aide, Richard M. Harden.

F. Spencer Lee IV, a Georgia lawyer who allegedly acted as an intermediary in Vesco's behalf, met with Harden in February 1977.

Lee and Harden have said that Harden talked the lawyer out of pursuing the matter.

Activities Today in Senate, House

House

Meets at 10 a.m.

Committees:

Agriculture—10:30 a.m. Open. Cont. mark-up Forestry Loan Act, Food Stamp Act amends. 1301 Longworth House Office Bldg.

Armed Services—10 a.m. Open. Res. & Develop. Subcomte. on reprogramming requests. 2212 Rayburn House Office Bldg.

District of Columbia—9:30 a.m. Open. Pending business, H-128 Capitol.

Education & Labor—9:30 a.m. Open. Elem., secondary & Voc. Edu. Subcomte. Oversight hrngs. on innovative school lunch programs. 2175 RHOB.

Education & Labor—10 a.m. Open. Labor-Manage. Relations Subcomte. Oversight hrngs. on pressure in today's workplace. 2261 RHOB.

Education & Labor — 9:30 a.m. Open. Labor Standards Subcmte. Oversight hrngs. on Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Comp. Act. 2257 RHOB.

Interior & Insular Affairs—9:45 a.m. Open. Mines & Mining Subcomte. Mark-up geothermal legis. 310 Cannon House Office Bldg.

Interior & Insular Affairs—9:45 a.m. Open. Public Lands Subcomte. Cont. on pending wilderness legis. 1324 LHOB.

Interstate & Foreign Commerce—10 a.m. Open. Cont. mark-up Natl. Energy Conserv. Initiatives Act, 2123 RHOB.

Judiciary—9:30 a.m. Open. Civil & Constit. Rights Subcomte. Cont. hrngs. on FBI charter. 2226 RHOB.

Judiciary—2 p.m. Open. Criminal Justice Subcomte. Cont. mark-up Criminal Code revision. B-352 RHOB.

Merchant Marine & Fisheries—9:30 a.m. Open. Maritime Edu. & Training Subcomte. On Maritime Edu. & Training Act. 1334 LHOB.

Merchant Marine & Fisheries—9:30 a.m. Open. Coast Guard & Navigation Subcomte. Hrng. on compensation for losses resulting from Mexican oil spill. 1302 RHOB.

Public Works & Transportation—10 a.m. Open. Aviation Subcomte. Hrng. on air traffic control system. 2167 RHOB.

Ways & Means—10 a.m. Open Trade Subcomte. Mark-up oil import legis. 1100 LHOB.

Select Comte. on Committees—9:30 a.m. Open. Cont. hrngs. on energy jurisdiction. 2337 RHOB.

Senate

Meets at 9:30 a.m.

Committees:

Appropriations Subcomte on the District of Columbia—8 a.m. Open. Hearing on D.C. 1979 summer youth program. 1114 Dirksen Office Bldg.

Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs—11 a.m. Open. Hearing on procedures for allocation of mass transportation funds. Followed by hearing on nomination of Theodore Lutz to be administrator of the Urban Mass Transportation Admin. 5302 DOB.

Commerce, Science and Transportation—9:30 a.m. Open. Business meeting. 235 Russell Office Bldg.

Energy and Natural Resources—10 a.m. Open. Business meeting to consider nuclear waste policy and other pending calendar business. 3110 DOB.

Finance—10 a.m. Open. Business meeting to consider U.S. trade status with People's Republic of China; nom. of Michael Smith to be dep. special rep for trade negotiations, and other pending business. 2221 DOB.

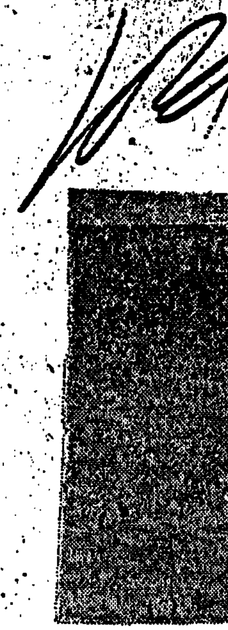
Foreign Relations—10 a.m. Open. Hearing on Special Central American and Caribbean Security Assistance Act, 1979. 4221 DOB.

Foreign Relations—2 p.m. Closed. Subcomte on Near Eastern & South Asian Affairs to hold hearing on current situation in Yemen including military buildup. S-116 Capitol.

Governmental Affairs Subcomte—9 a.m. Open. Energy, Non-proliferation and Federal ...

President's Appointments

The president's appointment's today:



404(b) & 608(b)
Research
ERIC JASO
ATTORNEY WORK PRODUCT

404(b) Research
608(b)

Memorandum Office of the Independent Counsel

To : S. M. Colloton Date 7/12/95

From : E. H. Jaso

Subject: U.S. v. Tucker: Required Disclosure under Rule 404(b)

A 1991 amendment to Fed. Rule Crim. P. 404(b) requires that:

> "upon request by the accused, the prosecution . . . shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any [Rule 404(b)] evidence it intends to introduce at trial."

The Committee Note explains that both the request and the response should properly be submitted "in a reasonable and timely fashion." The Rule requires "no specific form of notice"; the Note reports that the Committee "considered and rejected a requirement that the notice satisfy the particularity requirements normally required of language used in a charging instrument." The Government must "apprise the defense of the general nature of the evidence"; the requirement does not "supercede [sic] other rules of admissibility or disclosure, such as the Jencks Act, nor require the prosecution to disclose the names and addresses of witnesses." The Rule does not include any specific sanction for failure to provide the required notice. See also 22 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure sec. 5249 (Rule 404) (1994 Supp.).

Required Specificity of Government Response[1]

Most courts to address the subject have not read Rule 404(b) to require pretrial disclosure of specific facts regarding 404(b) evidence to be introduced at trial, following the Committee Note's admonition that "no specific form of notice" is required. For example, in United States v. Kern, 12 F.3d 122, 124 (8th Cir. 1993), a bank robbery case, the court held that the Government had provided sufficient notice of its intention to introduce evidence of a subsequent robbery allegedly carried out by defendants by informing the defense at a pretrial hearing that it "might use some evidence from some local robberies" and by later (one week prior to trial) providing the defense with copies of the state authorities' reports of the robberies, once they were obtained.

Along the same lines, the Eighth Circuit affirmed another bank robbery/firearms conviction, holding that two days advance notice of 404(b) evidence of illegal drug use by defendant was permissible where the Government did not obtain the evidence until a Friday five days before the trial and disclosed

---

[1] Courts have held that the defense request for disclosure under 404(b) must be timely and reasonably specific, preferably mentioning the provision itself. See, e.g., United States v. Tuesta-Toro, 29 F.3d 771, 774-75 (1st Cir. 1994) ("at a minimum the defense must present a timely request sufficiently clear and particular, in an objective sense, to fairly alert the prosecution that the defense is invoking its specific right to pretrial notification [under 404(b)]"). The defense has met that requirement here. One court has noted that the Rule requires defendant merely to make a request of the Government; a motion before the court is unnecessary. United States v. Goldberg, 855 F. Supp. 725, 731 (M.D. Pa. 1994).

it to the defense on the following Monday. United States v. Sutton, 41 F.3d 1257, 1258-59 (8th Cir. 1994) cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 1712 (1995). The court noted that the Government had previously turned over a witness statement implicating the defendant in an illegal drug buy on the day of the robbery, so that in any event the defense had notice that the Government might raise the issue of defendant's illegal drug use at trial. Id.[2]

In a case decided shortly after the notice amendment became effective, a Federal judge in Illinois rejected as overbroad a defense motion for disclosure under 404(b) nearly identical to the ones made by Tucker and Marks. United States v. Sims, 808 F. Supp. 607, 610 (N.D. Ill. 1992). Defendants sought production of "the dates, times, places and persons involved in the specific crimes or acts; the statements of each participant; the documents which contain such evidence; and a statement of issues to which the government believes such evidence may be relevant." Id. at 611. Noting that the Committee specifically considered and rejected a requirement that the pretrial notice "satisfy the particularity requirements normally required of language used in a charging document," the court held that neither the Rule nor the accompanying Committee Note entitles the defense to such specific pretrial discovery. Id. The notice requirement, the court observed, is intended to prevent surprise; it "is not a tool for open ended discovery." Id. at 610. Accord United States v. Damico, 1995 WL 221883 (N.D. Ill. April 10, 1995); United States v. Agunloye, 1995 WL 340760 (N.D. Ill. June 1, 1995); United States v. Jackson, 850 F. Supp. 1481, 1493 (D. Kan. 1994); United States v. Washington, 819 F. Supp. 358, 367-68 (D. Vt. 1993) (rejecting similar requests); see also United States v. Williams, 792 F. Supp. 1120, 1134 (S.D. Ind. 1992) ("the purpose of the . . . notice provision, to prevent surprise during trial, does not support providing a defendant with the materials which the Government possesses and plans to offer at trial"), followed in United States v. Richardson, 837 F. Supp. 570, 575-76 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (notice of "general nature" of 404(b) evidence is "all that is required" by the Rule and is "sufficient to allow the defendant to adequately prepare for trial").

---

[2] The court went on to hold that the evidence of defendant's drug use, which was offered as evidence of motive for the robbery, was inadmissible as unduly prejudicial, but the court ultimately held the error harmless. 41 F.3d at 1259-60.

However, at least two circuits' decisions (and those of several district courts) suggest that the notice required under 404(b) must contain more than a general description of the extrinsic conduct to be introduced at trial. Citing the need for the trial court eventually to make a determination as to the admissibility for 404(b) evidence, these courts have seemingly imported into 404(b)'s pretrial notice requirement a requirement that the Government provide the defense and/or the trial court with certain details regarding the evidence, as well as a specific articulation of the purpose for which the 404(b) evidence is to be used at trial. The Sixth Circuit, surveying several other courts' treatment of 404(b), held that "the government's notice must characterize the prior conduct to a degree that fairly apprises the defendant of its general nature." However, the court also declared that the notice "must be sufficiently clear so as 'to permit pretrial resolution of the issue of its admissibility.'" United States v. Barnes, 49 F.3d 1144, 1148-49 (6th Cir. 1995).[3] A case from the Tenth Circuit may also be read to require the Government's 404(b) notice to describe precisely each piece of evidence and "articulate with precision [its] evidentiary purpose." See United States v. Birch, 39 F.3d 1089, 1093 (10th Cir. 1994).[4]

---

[3] Barnes also declares that a request for disclosure under 404(b) triggers a continuing duty on the part of the Government to disclose newly revealed evidence. 49 F.3d at 1148. But see United States v. Tuesta-Toro, 29 F.3d 771, 775 n.1 (1st Cir. 1994) (rule as read suggests that Government need only give notice of 404(b) evidence it intends to use as of the time the defendant's request is made).

[4] Birch, at least, may be distinguishable. The appellant there did not raise the specific issue of insufficient notice, but challenged generally the admissibility of the 404(b) evidence introduced at trial; the court found that the prerequisite articulation of evidentiary purpose was absent both from the Government's submitted pretrial notice and from the record of the Government's submission of the evidence at trial. See id. However, United States v. Kendall, 766 F.2d 1426, 1436 (10th Cir. 1985) cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1081 (1986), cited by the Birch court, held that such articulation was required at the time the evidence is offered for admission, to aid the trial court in making its determination and to make a record in case of appeal. Id. at 1436-37. Kendall obviously was decided well before 404(b) was amended to include a notice requirement; further, as several courts have noted (see infra), the purposes of the notice requirement differ greatly from those underlying the provisions of Rule 404 governing admissibility at trial. Thus, the most that Birch bears on the proper content of the Government's pretrial notice is that if the notice includes a precise articulation of the intended purposes of the 404(b) evidence to be used, the Government need not make another such articulation

The Committee Note to the 1991 Amendment does state that one of the Amendment's purposes was to "promote early resolution on the issue of admissibility." However, the Note plainly distinguishes between the requisite pretrial notice, of which "no specific form . . . is required" and the ultimate issue of admissibility, which is typically determined at trial; the Note specifically anticipates pretrial in limine rulings on the admissibility of 404(b) evidence, for which the court may require the Government "to disclose to [the court] the specifics of such evidence which the court must consider in determining admissibility." The court in United States v. Melendez, 1992 WL 96327 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 24, 1992) recognized this distinction, noting that while the Rule requires only disclosure of the "general nature" of 404(b) evidence, "the Advisory Committee does not appear to contemplate that [the] notice need include 'the specifics of such evidence which the court must consider in determining admissibility,' since it refers to such specifics as something the Court may require to be disclosed in ruling in limine, a step to follow upon the notice." Id. at *1. The court nonetheless held that proper notice did require the government to identify "each crime, wrong or act by its specific nature" including dates, places, and type of wrong committed. Id. See also, e.g., United States v. Johnson, 1994 WL 805243 *5 (W.D.N.Y. Aug. 9, 1994) (requiring pretrial disclosure by Government "in sufficient detail to permit defense counsel to prepare and file appropriate motions in limine on the issue of admissibility"); United States v. Altimari, 1994 WL 116086 *8 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 25, 1994) (ordering Government to give notice "in writing and in an understandable manner, of the specific prior act evidence it intends to offer"); but see Damico, 1995 WL 221883 *4 (rejecting defense request for specific disclosure of 404(b) evidence as overbroad, but citing the Committee Note in observing that "[t]his court may require the government to disclose to it [in camera] the specifics of such evidentiary detail which the court must consider in determining admissibility"); see also United States v. Williams, 1993 WL 270504 (D. Kan. June 16, 1993) (finding sufficient Government's pretrial notice containing "descriptions of the general nature" of 404(b) evidence to be introduced at trial, but ordering Government to disclose to defense, at least one day prior to introducing evidence at trial, specific evidence, including identification of the purpose for which evidence will be offered).

---

prior to submitting the evidence for admission at trial.

The court in United States v. Long, 814 F. Supp. 72 (D. Kan. 1993) held insufficient as notice a letter sent by the U.S. Attorney to defense stating that 404(b) evidence would be introduced, and noting that a particular witness would testify "consistent with his prior statement," which statement the Government had already produced to the defense. Id. at 73. The court denied the defense motion to prohibit introduction of the evidence, and instead ordered the Government to amend its notice to "describe the nature of the defendant's prior conduct the government intends to introduce" via the witness's testimony. Id. at 74. Defendant's request did not seek "unduly detailed information . . . [r]ather, the defendant simply seeks notice of the general nature of such evidence to permit pretrial resolution of the issue of its admissibility." Id. The court apparently did not believe that the admissibility determination would require detailed information, although it did suggest that the Government include in its amended notice "the specific purpose, among those listed in [Rule 404(b)], for which the evidence is intended to be introduced at trial." Id. The court cited with approval Van Pelt, 1992 WL 371640 (D. Kan. Dec. 1, 1992), where the court held that the prosecution's notice providing "fairly detailed descriptions" of the 404(b) evidence was sufficient; nonetheless the court also quoted the Committee Note's admonition that the Rule did not intend to impose "the particularity requirements [of] a charging document" upon 404(b) pretrial notice. 814 F. Supp. at 74.

The Second Circuit has affirmed the intention expressed in the Committee Note to the 1991 Amendment that the Rule does not require the Government to disclose "either directly or indirectly" the identity of witnesses in advance of trial. United States v. Matthews, 20 F.3d 538, 551 (2d Cir. 1994). In Matthews, appellant objected that he had not received notice that the Government intended to introduce extrinsic evidence of his having attacked a woman with an icepick. The court held that where the testimony constituting 404(b) evidence itself would reveal the identity of the witness (in this case, defendant had apparently ever attacked only one person with an icepick), the evidence itself need not be disclosed, either generally or specifically. Id.

The Eleventh Circuit has crafted a three-element test, analogizing the 404(b) notice requirement to other, more specific discovery notice requirements (e.g., Rules 609(b), 803(24), 805(b)(5)), to determine whether notice was sufficient in retrospect in a particular circumstance. United States v. Perez-Tosta, 36 F.3d 1552, 1560-63 (11th Cir. 1994). Pretrial notice under 404(b) is reasonable depending on:

> (1) When the Government, through timely preparation for trial, could have learned of the availability of the witness;
> (2) The extent of prejudice to the opponent of the evidence from a lack of time to prepare; and
> (3) How significant the evidence is to the prosecution's case.

Id. at 1562. Citing the Committee Note to the 1991 Amendment, the court observed that the determination must be made case-by-case, and that the decision with regard to admissibility of 404(b) evidence remains within the discretion of the trial court and is reviewed accordingly on appeal. Id. at 1561.

Additional Factors

Prior crimes and bad acts which are directly relevant to the criminal acts charged need not be disclosed. "Where the evidence of an act and the evidence of a crime charged are inextricably intertwined, the act is not extrinsic and Rule 404(b) is not implicated." United States v. DeLuna, 763 F.2d 897, 913 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 980 (1985), quoted in United States v. Severe, 29 F.3d 444, 447 (8th Cir. 1994) (in context of admissibility challenge based on lack of notice under 1991 amendment to Rule 404(b)) cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 763 (1995). Accord United States v. Oakie, 12 F.3d 1436, 1441-42 (8th Cir. 1993) reh'g en banc denied, Jan. 28, 1994.

Where the Government intends to use extrinsic 404(b) evidence solely for the purpose of impeaching the defendant when he testifies as provided under Rule 608(b), notice of such intended use need not be given. United States v. Tomblin, 46 F.3d 1369, 1388 n.51 (5th Cir. 1995). But see United States v. Matthews, 20 F.3d 538, 551 (2d Cir. 1994) (the notice provision "applies whether the government wishes to use the other-act evidence in its direct case, on rebuttal, or as impeachment") (citing Fed. R. Evid. 404(b) Advisory Committee Note); accord United States v. Jackson, 850 F. Supp. 1481, 1494 (D. Kan. 1994).

Where the defense is already aware of the Government's possession of and intention to introduce 404(b) evidence at trial, the Government's failure to provide formal notice in response to a motion for disclosure is of no moment, and will not affect the evidence's admissibility. See United States v. Adediran, 26 F.3d 61, 64 (8th Cir. 1994).

Timing of Government Response

The length of time in advance of trial required for adequate notice generally depends on circumstances, and is within the court's discretion to determine. For example, in United States v. Kern, 12 F.3d 122, 124 (8th Cir. 1993), the magistrate judge had ordered the Government to make its 404(b) disclosures at least two weeks prior to the trial. Where the Government had informed the defense orally at a pretrial conference of its intention to use 404(b) evidence pertaining to the later commission by defendant of a similar crime as the one charged, the appeals court held that the Government had provided sufficient notice by later (one week prior to trial) providing the defense with specific reports of such crimes once they were obtained from state authorities.

In United States v. Sutton, 41 F.3d 1257, 1258-59 (8th Cir. 1994) cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 1712 (1995), the court held that two days advance notice that the Government intended to introduce evidence of illegal drug use by defendant was permissible where the Government did not obtain the evidence until a Friday five days before the trial and disclosed it to the defense on the following Monday, despite the trial court's order that the Government was required to give notice of all such evidence at least four days before trial.

In United States v. Williams, 1993 WL 270504 (D. Kan. June 16, 1993), the court ordered the Government to disclose to the defense, at least one day prior to introducing 404(b) evidence at trial, specific details regarding such evidence, including identifying the purpose for which evidence would be offered.

Other examples of advance notice deemed "reasonable" are United States v. Johnson, 1994 WL 805243 *5 (W.D.N.Y. Aug. 9, 1994) (thirty days before trial, or prior to a scheduled pretrial conference); United States v. Messino, 855 F. Supp. 955, 965 (N.D. Ill. 1994) (thirty days prior to trial); United States v. Altimari, 1994 WL 116086 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 25, 1994) (fifteen days before trial); United States v. Richardson, 837 F. Supp. 570, 576 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (ten days prior to trial); United States v. Evangelista, 813 F. Supp. 294, 302 (D.N.J. 1993) (ten business days prior to trial "because alleged incidents occurred more than five years ago [and thus] defendants' preparation to respond to [the evidence] may require more effort than if the incidents had occurred more recently"); United States v. Williams, 792 F. Supp. 1120, 1133-34 (S.D. Ind. 1992) (ten days prior to trial); United States v. Green, 144 F.R.D. 631, 645 (W.D.N.Y. 1992) (thirty days prior to jury selection due to "the complexity and volume of the evidence") and United States v. Melendez, 1992 WL 96327 *1 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 24, 1992) (fourteen days prior to trial).

At least one court has considered, and rejected, a defendant's argument that Rule 404(b) requires that the court set a pretrial deadline by which the Government must either disclose all "bad acts" evidence it intends to introduce, or be precluded from further such disclosure and/or introduction. United States v. Van Pelt, 1992 WL 371640 *14 (D. Kan. Dec. 1, 1992).

22 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 404
(TREATISE MAIN VOLUME)
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

Federal Practice and Procedure
Federal Rules of Evidence
Charles Alan Wright
Kenneth W. Graham, Jr.

Chapter 5 Relevancy and Its Limits

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct: Exceptions: Other Crimes

TEXT OF RULE 404 (a) Character evidence generally. Evidence of a person's character or a trait of his character is not admissible for the purpose of proving that he acted in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except: (1) Character of accused. Evidence of a pertinent trait of his character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same; (2) Character of victim. Evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the victim was the first aggressor; (3) Character of witness. Evidence of the character of a witness, as provided in Rules 607, 608, and 609. (b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident.

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). This subdivision deals with the basic question whether character evidence should be admitted. Once the admissibility of character evidence in some form is established under this rule, reference must then be made to Rule 405, which follows, in order to determine the appropriate method of proof. If the character is that of a witness, see Rules 608 and 610 for methods of proof. Character questions arise in two fundamentally different ways. (1) Character may itself be an element of a crime, claim, or defense. A situation of this kind is commonly referred to as "character in issue." Illustrations are: the chastity of the victim under a statute specifying her chastity as an element of the crime of seduction, or the competency of the driver in an action for negligently entrusting a motor vehicle to an incompetent driver. No problem of the general relevancy of character evidence is involved, and the present rule therefore has no provision on the subject. The only question relates to allowable methods of proof, as to which see Rule 405, immediately following. (2) Character evidence is susceptible of being used for the purpose of suggesting an inference that the person acted on the occasion in question consistently with his character. This use of character is often described as "circumstantial." Illustrations are: evidence of a violent disposition to prove that the person was the aggressor in an affray, or evidence of honesty in disproof of a charge of theft. This circumstantial use of character evidence raises questions of relevancy as well as questions of allowable methods of proof. In most jurisdictions today, the circumstantial use of character is rejected but with important exceptions: (1) an accused may introduce pertinent evidence of good character (often misleadingly described as "putting his character in issue"), in which event the prosecution may rebut with evidence of bad character; (2) an accused may introduce pertinent evidence of the character of the victim, as in support of a claim of self-defense to a charge of homicide or consent in a case of rape, and the prosecution may introduce similar evidence in rebuttal of the character evidence, or, in a homicide case, to rebut a claim that deceased was the first aggressor, however proved; and (3) the character of a witness may be gone into as bearing on his credibility. McCormick ss 155-161. This pattern is incorporated in the rule. While its basis lies more in history and experience than in logic an underlying justification can fairly be found in terms of the relative presence and absence of prejudice in the various situations. Falknor, Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility, 10 Rutgers

22 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 404
(TREATISE SUPPLEMENT)
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

Federal Practice and Procedure
Federal Rules of Evidence
Charles Alan Wright
Kenneth W. Graham, Jr.

1994 Supplement

Chapter 5 Relevancy and Its Limits

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct: Exceptions: Other Crimes

TEXT OF RULE 404

1991 Amendments

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

Committee Note to 1991 Amendments

Rule 404(b) has emerged as one of the most cited Rules in the Rules of Evidence. And in many criminal cases evidence of an accused's extrinsic acts is viewed as an important asset in the prosecution's case against an accused. Although there are a few reported decisions on use of such evidence by the defense, see, e.g., United States v. McClure, 546 F.2d 670 (5th Cir.1990) (acts of informant offered in entrapment defense), the overwhelming number of cases involve introduction of that evidence by the prosecution. The amendment to Rule 404(b) adds a pretrial notice requirement in criminal cases and is intended to reduce surprise and promote early resolution on the issue of admissibility. The notice requirement thus places Rule 404(b) in the mainstream with notice and disclosure provisions in other rules of evidence. See, e.g., Rule 412 (written motion of intent to offer evidence under rule), Rule 609 (written notice of intent to offer conviction older than 10 years), Rule 803(24) and 804(b)(5) (notice of intent to use residual hearsay exceptions). The Rule expects that counsel for both the defense and the prosecution will submit the necessary request and information in a reasonable and timely fashion. Other than requiring pretrial notice, no specific time limits are stated in recognition that what constitutes a reasonable request or disclosure will depend largely on the circumstances of each case. Compare Fla.Stat.Ann. s 90.404(2)(b) (notice must be given at least 10 days before trial) with Tex.R.Evid. 404(b) (no time limit). Likewise, no specific form of notice is required. The Committee considered and rejected a requirement that the notice satisfy the particularity requirements normally required of language used in a charging instrument. Cf. Fla.Stat.Ann. s 90.404(2)(b) (written disclosure must describe uncharged misconduct with particularity required of an indictment or information). Instead, the Committee opted for a generalized notice provision which requires the prosecution to apprise the defense of the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts. The Committee does not intend that the amendment will supercede other rules of admissibility or disclosure, such as the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. s 3500, et seq. nor require the prosecution to disclose the names and addresses of its witnesses, something it is currently not required to do under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16. The amendment requires the prosecution to provide notice, regardless of how it intends to use the extrinsic act evidence at trial, i.e., during its case-in-chief, for impeachment, or for possible rebuttal. The court in its discretion may, under the facts, decide that the particular request or notice was not reasonable, either because of the lack of timeliness or completeness. Although the amendment does not address specifically the issue of sanctions for failure to provide notice, the Court in its discretion may enter appropriate orders. The amendment is not intended to redefine what evidence would otherwise be admissible under Rule 404(b). Nor is it intended to affect the role of the court and the jury in considering such evidence. See United States v. Huddleston, ___ U.S. ___, 108 S.Ct. 1496 (1988).

1987 Amendments

(a) Character evidence generally. Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except: (1) Character of accused. Evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same;

* * * * * (b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident.

Committee Note to 1987 Amendments

The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended. [FNa] [FNa]But see s 5231.1, this supplement.

FPP R 404

END OF DOCUMENT

Federal Practice and Procedure
Federal Rules of Evidence
Charles Alan Wright
Kenneth W. Graham, Jr.

1994 Supplement

Chapter 5 Relevancy and Its Limits

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct: Exceptions: Other Crimes

s 5249. OTHER CRIMES, WRONGS, OR ACTS--PROCEDURE

The same double standard that seems to mar the substantive application of Rule 404(b), [FN2.1] now appears to be creeping into the procedure for implementing the Rule. [FN2.2]

In 1991 the Supreme Court adopted a notice provision for Rule 404(b). [FN9.1] Under the amended Rule, the prosecution must give notice if the defense requests such notice. However, the rule provides no sanction for failure to give notice, the notice must only be of the "general nature" of the evidence, and can be delayed until the time of trial if the court finds "good cause" for such delay. This was apparently as much notice as the Justice Department was willing to tolerate; it remains to be seen if it will be of much use to criminal defendants.

One recent case suggests that the trial judge has no duty to engage in the balancing of probative worth and prejudice if the defendant does not request this. [FN19.1] If this means that the defendant must object and request balancing if the objection is overruled, it is clearly wrong. Both the Advisory Committee's Note and the better-reasoned cases make it clear that the balancing process is an essential part of the decision to admit other crimes evidence, and an objection suffices to trigger the duty to balance. [FN19.2]

One court has applied the Luce doctrine to other crimes evidence, holding that if the trial court rules on a motion in limine that evidence of other crimes will be admissible if the defense counsel makes a particular form of argument, the issue is not preserved for appeal unless counsel makes the argument and the other crimes evidence is admitted against the defendant. [FN20.1]

Even in the absence of an objection, admission of evidence of other crimes may be reviewable on appeal as plain error. [FN22.1]

In Huddleston v. United States [FN25.1] the Supreme Court rejected the argument made in the main volume and most of the caselaw on the proof of preliminary facts in the use of other crimes evidence. In an opinion by the Chief Justice, a unanimous Court held that proof of the preliminary facts was governed by Rule 104(b), rather than Rule 104(a). [FN25.2] Huddleston involved the use of other sales of stolen property to prove that the defendant knew that the goods he was charged with selling were stolen property. [FN25.3] The preliminary fact to be proved was whether the defendant had known the property involved in the uncharged crimes had been stolen and the Court held that the trial court need find only that a reasonable jury could find the preliminary fact by a preponderance of the evidence. [FN25.4] As with other questions of conditional relevance, the Court held that the other crimes evidence could be admitted subject to later proof of the preliminary fact. [FN25.5] In making its determination, the opinion suggests that the trial judge can consider not only the evidence with respect to the uncharged crime, but also with respect to the charged crime; that is, in determining whether the defendant was guilty of the uncharged crime, the court can take into account evidence that suggests that he was guilty of the charged crime. [FN25.6] Although the opinion does not mention this, the trial court must instruct the jury to disregard the uncharged crime if they do not find the preliminary fact to have been proved by a preponderance of the evidence. [FN25.7]

Admissibility of evidence under Rule 404(b) is not required to be resolved at a pretrial hearing to avoid prejudicing trier of fact in a court trial. [FN28.1]

It is important for the court to distinguish between evidence of other acts offered under Rule 404(b) and those offered under Rule 608(b) because the requirements for admissibility are substantially different under each rule. [FN29.1]

In other cases the issues may be clear from the arguments of counsel or the tenor of cross-examination of prosecution witnesses. [FN38.1]

One court has held that before the defendant can be asked about any other crimes, the prosecutor must show a good faith basis for the questions. [FN46.1]

All of the prior federal caselaw on the standard for proof of other crimes has been swept away by a Supreme Court decision that such evidence is admissible merely on a showing that a reasonable jury could find the defendant committed the prior crime by a preponderance of the evidence. [FN47.1] It remains to be seen whether or not the state courts will take the same view.

In 1991 the Supreme Court adopted a notice provision for Rule 404(b). [FN9.1] Under the amended Rule, the prosecution must give notice if the defense requests such notice. However, the rule provides no sanction for failure to give notice, the notice must only be of the "general nature" of the evidence, and can be delayed until the time of trial if the court finds "good cause" for such delay. This was apparently as much notice as the Justice Department was willing to tolerate; it remains to be seen if if will be of much use to criminal defendants.

The Louisiana Evidence Code specifically provides that the enactment of Rule 404(b) and 104(a) does not alter the pre-existing caselaw that requires other crimes to be proved by clear and convincing evidence, but allows the courts to change these rules. [FN57.1]

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, sitting en banc, has said that Rule 404(b) does not incorporate the pre-existing caselaw governing the use of evidence of other crimes. [FN61.1] The court adopts a two-step analysis suggested by a student writer. [FN61.2] To be admissible under this scheme, evidence of other crimes must do no more than satisfy the minimal standard of relevance in Rule 401; [FN61.3] then the judge must apply the balancing test of Rule 403. [FN61.4] Although the court seems to read back some of the pre-existing caselaw into the trial judge's balancing under Rule 403, [FN61.5] the thrust of the opinion is that hereafter trial courts should admit evidence of other crimes more freely than has been done in the past. [FN61.6]

The court flatly rejects the notice that prior crimes must be proved by "clear and convincing evidence," holding that the proper standard is to be found in Rule 104(b). [FN61.7] The court does not specify what "preliminary fact" it thinks is involved in the proof of other crimes. [FN61.8] Moreover, the implicit ruling that the admissibility of character evidence is a question for the jury rather than the trial judge seems highly questionable. [FN61.9] It will be interesting to see if the court will apply Rule 104(b) to the determination of the admissibility of evidence under Rules 406-411 as well.

In Oklahoma, it has been suggested that where the prosecution uses proof of crime as other crimes evidence, it cannot thereafter be the basis of another prosecution against the defendant. [FN80.1] This would certainly tend to discourage the strategy of holding back stronger cases until they have been used as other crimes evidence in prosecutions where the evidence against the defendant is weaker.

Some courts have begun to emphasize the importance of the trial judge making an adequate record of his decision, including the purpose for which the evidence was admitted and the reasons therefor. [FN92.1]

A ruling that evidence of extrinsic offenses is inadmissible must be honored by the proponent; a deliberate attempt to prove the other crime by circumstantial evidence is egregious misconduct and grounds for a mistrial or a reversal on appeal. [FN96.1]

Perhaps for these reasons, the trial judge is under no duty to give a cautionary instruction sua sponte; it must be requested by counsel. [FN2.1]

Another procedural device used in the control of evidence of other crimes is the mistrial. [FN8.1]

There are a number of recent opinions that do offer guidance to trial judges in distinguishing the legitimate uses of this form of proof from the ersatz justifications sometimes offered by counsel. [FN11.1]

FN2.1 Double standard See s 5248, note 31, this supplement.

FN2.2 Creeping into See, e.g., U.S. v. Acosta-Cazares, C.A.6th, 1989, 878 F.2d 945, 949-950, certiorari denied 110 S.Ct. 255, 493 U.S. 899, 107 L.Ed.2d 204 (prosecutor's lying about intent to use other crimes evidence excused on grounds of ignorance; defense denied review of 403 balancing because counsel did not utter magic words in colloquy on admissibility at trial despite pretrial objections to use).

FN9.1 Rule 404(b) notice The text of the amended rule and the Advisory Committee's Note thereto appear in this supplement immediately before the supplementary materials for s 5231.

FN19.1 No duty without request State v. Gollon, App.1983, 340 N.W.2d 912, 918, 115 Wis.2d 592.

FN19.2 Balancing essential See, for example, the two-step process for admission prescribed in the leading case of U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1978, 582 F.2d 898 (described in s 5249 of this supplement). The correct view is also explained in the able dissenting opinion of Abrahamson, J., in State v. Rutchik, Sup.Ct., 1984, 341 N.W.2d 639, 650 n. 1, 116 Wis.2d 61.

FN20.1 Luce doctrine U.S. v. Ortiz, C.A.2d, 1988, 857 F.2d 900, 906. For a nice contrast to the Luce doctrine, see U.S. v. Sullivan, C.A.7th, 1990, 911 F.2d 2, 8 (defendant's failure to object to co-defendant's introduction of evidence of bribe by X allows government, which also did not object, to introduce evidence that X said that defendant had accepted a similar bribe--evidence totally irrelevant to rebut evidence admitted without objection). Motion in limine was not sufficient to preserve error in admission of other crimes evidence where the trial judge declined to rule until evidence was offered at trial and no objection was made at that time. Doty v. Sewall, C.A.1st, 1990, 908 F.2d 1053, 1056.

FN22.1 Plain error Improper admission of evidence of a prior crime or conviction, even in the face of other evidence amply supporting the verdict, constitutes plain error impinging upon the fundamental fairness of the trial itself. U.S. v. Parker, C.A.10th, 1979, 604 F.2d 1327, 1329.

FN25.1 Huddleston decision 1988, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 485 U.S. 681, 99 L.Ed.2d 771. For a good illustration of synergistic effect of reducing the standard of proof of other crimes, see U.S. v. Rodriguez, C.A.6th, 1989, 882 F.2d 1059, 1064 (evidence of another drug transaction by a person who visited defendant at about the same time admissible to show that defendant was in possession of drugs for sale). Testimony of police officer that defendant had sold him cocaine on prior occasion was admissible under Rule 404(b) without any other evidence that substance was in fact cocaine. U.S. v. Gibbs, C.A.D.C.1990, 904 F.2d 52, 56.

FN25.2 Governed by 104(b) 108 S.Ct. at 1500-1501, 485 U.S. at 687-688.

FN25.3 Knew stolen 108 S.Ct. at 1498, 485 U.S. at ___ . Although the court does not discuss this, the relevance of the evidence was based on the "doctrine of chances"; that is, how likely is it that a person could sell so much stolen property without learning that it was not of legitimate origin?

FN25.4 Could find preponderance 108 S.Ct. at 1501, 485 U.S. at 689. Huddleston holds that trial court need not make any preliminary finding that the prosecution has proved another crime by even a preponderance of the evidence before submitting the evidence to a jury. U.S. v. Manso-Portes, C.A.7th, 1989, 867 F.2d 422, 425.

FN25.5 Later determination 108 S.Ct. at 1501 n. 7, 485 U.S. at 690. Since the Court cites this Treatise and points out that Rules do not alter the trial judge's discretion with respect to the order of proof, it seems safe to assume that the Court would accept the caveat in vol. 21, pp. 271 about prior determination of the preliminary fact where the proffered evidence is highly prejudicial.

FN25.6 Guilt of charged crime This is defensible in Huddleston where the relevance of the evidence of both the charged and uncharged crimes rests on the "doctrine of chances", see note 25.3 above, because the use of the evidence does not require any inference as to character or resort to circular reasoning. The Court's suggestion, however, could be read as an invitation to find that since there is evidence that the defendant was guilty of the charged crime, this can be used to support an inference that he was also guilty of the uncharged crime so that crime can be used to prove he was guilty of the charged crime, thus adding up two cases of proof by preponderance to one case of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. This seems to violate the policy of Rule 404(b), particularly where the inference from the proof of the charged crime to the uncharged crime is that the defendant has a criminal character and must, therefore, have committed the uncharged crime. Consider, for example, the common case where the defendant is charged with a sex crime as to which the jury could find guilt by a preponderance but not beyond a reasonable doubt and the prosecution wants the victim to testify the defendant did the same thing on five other occasions where there is no other proof of guilt on those occasions. It does not seem logical to say that the addition of these other uncorroborated accusations adds anything to the prosecution's case, but if the corroboration as to the charged crime allows the jury to infer that the defendant is a sex maniac who must be guilty of the others as well, the jury is likely to do just that.

FN25.7 Must instruct See vol. 21, pp. 271-272. Since most of the current instructions on the use of other crimes evidence are so poor, one shudders to think what such instructions will look like.

FN28.1 Court trial State v. Sirek, Minn.App.1985, 374 N.W.2d 481, 484.

FN29.1 Distinguish Rule 608(b) State v. Morgan, 1986, 340 S.E.2d 84, 91, 315 N.C. 626 (suggesting that because this is not easy to determine, that trial court indicate on the record the purpose for which the evidence is being admitted).

FN38.1 Arguments or cross-examination Mere reliance on mistaken identity defense did not remove issues of knowledge and intent from drug case where this was not clear when evidence was offered, defendant made no clear offer to stipulate, and argued "mere presence" in car where drugs were found was not sufficient to convict. U.S. v. Ferrer-Cruz, C.A.1st, 1990, 899 F.2d 135, 139. Trial court properly ruled that if defense counsel planned to argue that amount of heroin was as consistent with personal use as with intent to distribute that this would put intent in issue and open the door to use of other crimes to prove intent. U.S. v. Ortiz, C.A.2d, 1988, 857 F.2d 900, 904. Cross-examination of prosecution witness that suggested defendant had no knowledge of charged conspiracy opened door to proof of other bad acts on this issue. U.S. v. Walker, C.A.5th, 1983, 710 F.2d 1062, 1067. Evidence of other crimes offered to prove his opportunity to commit crime was admissible even though he did not "dispute" the issue in the ordinary sense of the term where defense theory of the case brought the issue into prominence as a practical matter. U.S. v. DeJohn, C.A.7th, 1981, 638 F.2d 1048, 1052 n. 4. In prosecution for misapplying tribal funds, cross-examination by defense counsel of witnesses concerning possible authorization of defendant's conduct placed in issue the defendant's wilfulness and it was therefor proper to permit use of other crimes on the issue of intent. U.S. v. Foote, C.A.8th, 1980, 635 F.2d 671, 673. Where defense counsel emphasized in his opening statement that knowledge that property was stolen was an essential element of the government's prima facie case, the issue was in dispute and could be proved by prior crimes. U.S. v. Berkwitt, C.A.7th, 1980, 619 F.2d 649, 655. When the prosecution offers evidence of other crimes on an issue, counsel must express a decision not to dispute the issue with sufficient clarity to justify the judge in excluding any evidence or jury argument that raises that issue and in charging the jury that they need not find that element of the crime because it is not disputed; this can be done by a formal stipulation, but a stipulation is not necessary to remove the issue. U.S. v. Figueroa, C.A.2d 1980, 618 F.2d 934, 942. Defendant raised issue of entrapment by motion for directed verdict thus making admissible evidence of prior crime to rebut. Jackson v. State, 1984, 677 S.W.2d 866, 869, 12 Ark.App. 378. Where at the time evidence of other crimes was offered on the issue of intent, defendant had not conceded intent, did not state that identity was the only issue, and did not offer to stipulate to intent, prosecution was properly allowed to introduce evidence. People v. Johnson, 1981, 176 Cal.Rptr. 390, 123 Cal.App.3d 106. If the defense attempts to show that the complaining witness is mistaken in her identification of the defendant, identity is in issue and state may then introduce evidence of other crimes on this issue. State v. Harris, App.1985, 365 N.W.2d 922, 926, 123 Wis.2d 231.

FN46.1 Show good faith State v. Flannigan, 1985, 338 S.E.2d 109, 110, 78 N.C.App. 629 (holding confused hearsay statement of abused child was not sufficient). One wonders if the court has not, perhaps, creatively confused Rule 404(b) with Rule 405(a). See s 5268, p. 622 in the main volume.

FN47.1 Merely preponderance Huddleson v. U.S., 1988, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 485 U.S. 681, 99 L.Ed.2d 771. Evidence of prior entrapment by DEA agents offered to support defense of entrapment failed to meet the Huddleston standard for admission because no reasonable jury could conclude prior incident was entrapment. U.S. v. Rodriguez, C.A.11th, 1990, 917 F.2d 1286, 1290, vacated in part on another point, on rehearing 1991, 935 F.2d 194. Under Huddleston, evidence of prior injuries to child was admissible in murder case without any proof that defendant caused these injuries beyond what could be inferred by his access to child at time of injury. U.S. v. Boise, C.A.9th, 1990, 916 F.2d 497, 501. After Huddleston, evidence of other crimes comes in even though the sole witness to them was an admitted liar whose uncorroborated testimony was given to avoid prosecution for his own crimes. U.S. v. Newton, C.A.8th, 1990, 912 F.2d 212, 213. Evidence that identifying marks had been obliterated from historical documents that defendant had offered for sale and from others found in his possession was sufficient to support conclusion that defendant had obliterated them. U.S. v. Mount, C.A.1st, 1990, 896 F.2d 612, 622. Huddleston standard for admission of other crimes was not met where defendant denied any knowledge of act, there was no evidence he was knowledgeable about prostitution ring, and he had been told he was not a target of grand jury investigation of ring. U.S. v. DeGerratto, C.A.7th, 1989, 876 F.2d 576, 585. Huddleston sweeps away all prior procedures for admissibility of other crimes and substitutes a "four-step framework" that requires a proper purpose, relevance thereto, balancing under Rule 403, and a limiting instruction under Rule 105. U.S. v. Record, C.A.10th, 1989, 873 F.2d 1363, 1374. An early call for Supreme Court clarification of the issue appeared in A.B.A. Section of Litigation, Emerging Problems Under The Federal Rules of Evidence, Joseph ed. 1983, p. 66 (seeming to lean toward the view adopted in Huddleston).

FN57.1 Louisiana La.Evid.Code Art. 1103: "Article 404(B) and 104(A) neither codifies nor affects the law of other crimes evidence, as set forth in State v. Prieur, 277 So.2d 126 (La.1973), State v. Davis, and State v. Moore and their progeny, as regards the notice requirement and the clear and convincing evidence standard in regard to other crimes evidence. Those cases are law and apply to Article 404(B) and 104(A), unless modified by subsequent state jurisprudential development."

FN61.1 Does not incorporate U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1978, 582 F.2d 898. For a clear statement of the "demanding standards" applied prior to Beechum, see U.S. v. Herzberg, C.A.5th, 1977, 558 F.2d 1219, 1224. Requirement of clear and convincing evidence does not apply to evidence that bullet proof vest was found in same search that turned up charged drugs. U.S. v. McDowell, C.A.D.C., 1985, 762 F.2d 1072, 1075 n. 3. Court would follow Fifth Circuit in holding that Rule 404(b) repealed requirement that other crimes be proved by "clear and convincing" evidence. U.S. v. Martin, C.A.4th, 1985, 773 F.2d 579, 582. Court rejects Beechum holding because it believes that requirement of clear and convincing evidence of other crimes serves a legitimate function. U.S. v. Byrd, C.A.7th, 1985, 771 F.2d 215, 222. Evidence of other crime did not meet the Beechum standards where witness could not identify the defendant as the perpetrator. U.S. v. Vitrano, C.A.11th, 1984, 746 F.2d 766, 770. Under Beechum, it is enough that the jury could reasonably find the other crimes took place. U.S. v. Walker, C.A.5th, 1983, 710 F.2d 1062, 1066. Testimony of eye-witness to prior crime was sufficient to satisfy Beechum standard for admission of such evidence. U.S. v. Mortazavi, C.A.5th, 1983, 702 F.2d 526. Eleventh Circuit follows decision in Beechum in determining the propriety of admission of evidence of other crimes. U.S. v. Mitchell, C.A.11th, 1982, 666 F.2d 1385, 1389. Rule 404(b) requires a two-step analysis for admissibility of other crimes evidence: (1) it must be relevant to an issue other than the defendant's character; (2) probative value must not be outweighed by the countervailing factors in Rule 403. U.S. v. Dothard, C.A.11th, 1982, 666 F.2d 498, 501. Prior procedural restrictions on the use of other crimes evidence are still of assistance in interpreting Rule 404(b) but it would be contrary to the intended operation of the rule to use them as a rigid checklist in every case. U.S. v. Czarnecki, C.A.6th, 1977, 552 F.2d 698, 702. Proof of prior crime must only be sufficient to convince jury of probability of defendant's action. People v. Alexander, 1985, 370 N.W.2d 8, 10, 142 Mich.App. 231. Beechum is discussed with apparent approval in Survey, Federal Rules of Evidence, 1979, 11 Texas Tech.L.Rev. 485, 486-489. Beechum is found wanting by the author of Comment, The Jurisprudence of Similar Acts Evidence in the Eighth Circuit, 1980, 48 U.M.K.C.L.Rev. 342, 431. The Beechum holding is applauded in Note, Extrinsic Evidence at Trial under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b)--The Need for a Uniform Standard, 1979, 25 Wayne L.Rev. 1343.

But see Procedural requirement for use of other crimes evidence that were recognized prior to the adoption of the Evidence Rules remain valid now. U.S. v. Two Eagle, C.A.8th, 1980, 633 F.2d 93, 96 n. 5. The Eighth Circuit has held that the pre-existing requirements for proof of other crimes, including that the evidence be relevant to a disputed issue and that the evidence be clear and convincing, are still valid after the effective date of the Evidence Rules. U.S. v. Robbins, C.A.8th, 1979, 613 F.2d 688, 693. The Eighth Circuit has held that the requirements for the admissibility of other crimes evidence set forth in U.S. v. Clemons, C.A.8th, 1974, 503 F.2d 486, are unchanged by the enactment of Rule 404(b) but that the balancing test of Rule 403 supplants the one laid down in that opinion. U.S. v. Frederickson, C.A.8th, 1979, 601 F.2d 1358, 1365 n. 9.

FN61.2 Two-step analysis Id. at 911. The student work is Note, Rule 404(b) Other Crimes Evidence: The Need for a Two-Step Analysis, 1976, 71 Nw.U.L.Rev. 636.

FN61.3 Minimal standard Id. at 913. The way in which the court applies the standard to the facts of the instant case is instructive. The defendant was charged with having possessed a silver dollar that he knew had been stolen from the mail. The defendant denied that he wrongfully possessed the coin, claiming that he had found it loose in the mail and intended to turn it over to his supervisor. To prove intent, the government was permitted to introduce evidence that at the time of his arrest he was in possession of two unsigned credit cards issued to other persons which had been mailed to two addresses on routes that the defendant had serviced on some occasions in his capacity as a substitute letter carrier. The cards had been mailed some ten months prior to the date of the defendant's arrest. During his interrogation by postal inspectors the defendant refused to explain his possession of the credit cards. The majority opinion finds the credit card evidence relevant to prove intent, stating that "If [the defendant] wrongfully possessed these cards, the plausibility of his story about the crime is appreciably diminished." Id. at 907. But the balance of the court's opinion overlooks the "if" in the statement. Two pages later the court refers to the defendant's possession of the coin and two credit cards "none of which belonged to him." Id. at 9091. But the government did not prove this; all the evidence showed was that the cards carried the names of other persons and had been mailed to them. Yet the court suggests that the defendant had "possessed the cards for some time, perhaps ten months, prior to his arrest." Ibid. But so far as the evidence shows, the defendant might have picked up the cards on the street the day before. The court solves this gap in the government's case by shifting to the defendant the burden of proof on the other crime. "The obvious question is why would [defendant] give up the silver dollar if he kept the credit cards? In this case, the government was entitled to an answer." Ibid. With all due respect, the government is entitled to no such thing. The burden is on the government to prove the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt of the crime with which he is charged. It is totally alien to the spirit of the Fifth Amendment to suggest that the defendant can be found to have a criminal intent because he has failed to prove himself innocent of another crime imputed to him by innuendo but never proved by the government. Later the opinion explains the relevance of the credit card evidence to the issue of intent: "The reasoning is that because the defendant had unlawful intent in the extrinsic offense, it is less likely he had lawful intent in the present offense." Id. at 911. But by this time most readers will have forgotten that the government never proved that the defendant had "unlawful intent in the extrinsic offense," unless the refusal of the defendant to answer questions concerning the credit cards on Fifth Amendment grounds is to be taken as proof that his possession of them was wrongful.

FN61.4 Balancing test Id. at 916-918.

FN61.5 Read back in E.g., the requirement that the issue on which the evidence is offered be in dispute. Id. at 914 n. 19, 916. Beechum holding is not inconsistent with rule that defendant's plea of not guilty in conspiracy case puts intent in issue unless defendant stipulates that if he did the charged acts, he had the requisite intent. U.S. v. Kopituk, C.A.11th, 1982, 690 F.2d 1289, 1335. Factors to be considered under the second prong of Beechum include the strength of government's case on issue the other crime is offered to prove, similarity and temporal relationship between charged and uncharged crime, and whether it appeared at outset that defendant was contesting the issue to be proved by the other crime. U.S. v. Mitchell, C.A.11th, 1982, 666 F.2d 1385, 1390.

FN61.6 Admit more freely The court argues that this was the intent of the Congressional amendment of Rule 404(b), discussed in the main volume at pp. 331-333. See id. at 910 n. 13.

FN61.7 Found in 104(b) Id. at 913. Since the opinion cites this Treatise for the requisite standard of proof, it seems justifiable to point out that the court overlooks our argument that Rule 104(b) does not apply to the determination of the admissibility of evidence under Rule 404(b). See vol. 21, s 5053, pp. 256-257. The same point is made in the main volume at pp. 534-535, but this volume may not have been available when the opinion was prepared. Proof of prior act need be only sufficient to support a finding that it occurred even where issue is whether or not act was done with particular intent. U.S. v. Moree, C.A.5th, 1990, 897 F.2d 1329, 1335. Defendant's own admissions would justify jury finding that he committed extrinsic offenses and thus satisfy this branch of Beechum. U.S. v. Edwards, C.A.11th, 1983, 696 F.2d 1277, 1280. Uncontroverted testimony of single witness was sufficient to meet Beechum standard for proof of uncharged crime. U.S. v. Terebecki, C.A.11th, 1982, 692 F.2d 1345, 1349. Prior conviction is sufficient proof of other crime to satisfy Beechum standard. U.S. v. Lippner, C.A.11th, 1982, 676 F.2d 456, 461. Evidence of other crime is only admissible if the jury could reasonably find that the defendant actually committed it; defendant's admission of crime satisfies this test. U.S. v. Tunsil, C.A.11th, 1982, 672 F.2d 879, 881. As a predicate to the admission of evidence of another crime, the prosecution must prove that the defendant committed it, but whether or not the preliminary fact has been adequately proved is to be determined by the jury under Rule 104(b). U.S. v. Dothard, C.A.11th, 1982, 666 F.2d 498, 502. It was error to admit evidence of other crime where the prosecution had failed to prove the defendant had committed the crime by evidence from which a reasonable jury could find this preliminary fact. U.S. v. Dothard, C.A.11th, 1982, 666 F.2d 498, 504. In civil action on insurance policy, evidence of alleged prior acts of arson by insured must be proved by proof sufficient to permit a reasonable jury to find the insured participated; evidence was inadmissible where there was no showing the insured had anything to do with prior fires. Garcia v. Aetna Casualty and Surety Co., C.A.5th, 1981, 657 F.2d 652, 655.

FN61.8 What "preliminary fact" Normally the writers distinguish between the "proffered evidence" and the "preliminary fact" that must be proved to make it admissible. It would seem that in a Rule 404(b) issue, the "proffered evidence" is that the defendant has committed some extrinsic offense and that the only question involved is one of law; i.e., does the proffered evidence meet the requirements of the rule? Apparently the majority in Beechum is distinguishing between the other offense and proof that the defendant committed it, the latter being the "preliminary fact" to be proved by the lesser standard of Rule 104(b) so that the former is admissible. But this is nonsense. The government is not trying to prove that another crime was committed by some unidentified person and offering defendant's guilt only to make that evidence admissible. It wants to prove that the defendant committed the other crime and would be thrown into a fit of consternation if the defendant were to offer to stipulate to the admissibility of the proof that someone had committed the offense in order to prevent the prosecution from proving the "preliminary fact." Moreover, this notion that the issue of the defendant's guilt of the extrinsic offense is a preliminary fact is fraught with mischief. Does the court intend that the evidence of the other crime must first be heard out of the presence of the jury and that the defendant is free to mount an attack on his guilt of the other offense without being subject to cross-examination on the instant offense--the reverse of its holding in Beechum?

FN61.9 Questionable Is the defendant entitled to have the jury instructed that if it finds that he did not commit the other offense it must ignore the evidence? And if the jury is to determine his guilt, must they not also be instructed about the elements of the other offense when it is not the same as the charged offense?

FN80.1 Cannot be prosecuted Mayan v. State, Okla.Crim.1985, 696 P.2d 1044, 1045 (dictum).

FN92.1 Record important While the trial court made no on-the-record findings of Rule 403 balancing, this does not matter where the admissibility of the evidence was discussed at length, the judge relied on a case that mentioned Rule 403, and even if the judge had done the balancing the evidence would have been admitted. U.S. v. Santagata, C.A.1st, 1991, 924 F.2d 391, 394. Requirement that 403 balancing must be "on the record" does not require any explanation by trial judge of how the balance was struck; all it means is that the appellate court must be able to deduce from the record that the trial judge actually considered Rule 403. U.S. v. Ono, C.A.9th, 1990, 918 F.2d 1462, 1465 (deducing trial court must have considered the Rule from the fact that defense invoked it). For the results of allowing trial courts to get away with sloppy procedures that do not document grounds for admissibility, see U.S. v. Doran, C.A.10th, 1989, 882 F.2d 1511, 1524 (court forced to allow trial court to get away with a laundry list limiting instruction previously condemned on ground that defendant, who was never told why evidence was admitted, failed to object to the instruction). While judge should state his reasons for admitting evidence under Rule 404(b), this is not necessary where reasons are obvious. U.S. v. Nolan, C.A.7th, 1990, 910 F.2d 1553, 1561. Court's failure to specify grounds for admissibility at time of admission was cured by the giving of a smorgasbord instruction on the proper use of the evidence. U.S. v. Binkley, C.A.7th, 1990, 903 F.2d 1130, 1136. It was not reversible error for trial court to fail to articulate grounds for admission of other crimes where prosecutors made some noises about why they were offering the evidence. U.S. v. Porter, C.A.10th, 1989, 881 F.2d 878, 885. It was error for court to admit evidence of other crimes without any identification or analysis of the purpose for which it was thought admissible. U.S. v. DeGeratto, C.A.7th, 1989, 876 F.2d 576, 585. Huddleston does not displace the requirement that the prosecution and the trial judge articulate precisely the basis on which other crimes are to be admitted. U.S. v. Record, C.A.10th, 1989, 873 F.2d 1363, 1375 n. 7 (but holding failure to do was harmless where purpose was apparent from the record). Before admitting evidence of other crime, court must specify the purpose for which it is being admitted; it is not enough to recite the language of Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Orr, C.A.10th, 1988, 864 F.2d 1505, 1510 (but holding error harmless). Reversal was not required when trial court failed to state reasons for admission of other crimes evidence where no objection on grounds of relevance was made and no request for on-the-record findings was made. U.S. v. Prati, C.A.5th, 1988, 861 F.2d 82, 86. Trial court criticized for holding a five-page hearing on admission of highly prejudicial other crimes evidence, then reciting that it was admissible for all the purposes in Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Fortenberry, C.A.5th, 1988, 860 F.2d 628, 634. Without a complete analysis on the record, an appellate court cannot determine whether a trial court's exercise of discretion was based upon careful and thoughtful consideration of the issue. State v. Smith, 1986, 725 P.2d 951, 953, 106 Wash.2d 772. A judge who records his reasons for admitting other crimes evidence is less likely to err because the process of weighing the evidence and stating specific reasons insures a thoughtful decision. State v. Jackson, 1984, 689 P.2d 76, 79, 102 Wn.2d 689.

FN96.1 Ruled inadmissible Where the trial court ruled that evidence of an allegedly forged commitment letter used by the defendant in an unrelated transaction was not admissible, it was an abuse of discretion not to grant a mistrial or new trial when the government attempted to get the forged letter introduced in evidence and to cross-examine the defendant about it. U.S. v. Westbo, C.A.10th, 1978, 576 F.2d 285.

FN2.1 Must be requested Where evidence of other crimes was admitted with a promise that the jury would be instructed on the proper use of the evidence, failure to give such an instruction was reversible error. U.S. v. Yopp, C.A.6th, 1978, 577 F.2d 362, 366.

FN8.1 Mistrial Defendant cannot complain on appeal that mistrial should have been granted when witness referred to defendant's escape from custody where the reference was in response to a question by defense counsel. U.S. v. Allen, C.A.11th, 1985, 772 F.2d 1555. Compare the Oklahoma doctrine of "evidentiary harpoons", described below. In prosecution for peonage, mistrial was not required at testimony that bones of migrant workers had been found in streams in the area of defendant's private Gulag. U.S. v. Warren, C.A.11th, 1985, 772 F.2d 827, 838. Mistrial was not required when prosecutor violated prophylactic motion in limine by eliciting evidence of other crimes without giving the court and opposing counsel an opportunity to consider its admissibility. U.S. v. Kendall, C.A.10th, 1985, 766 F.2d 1426, 1437. Mistrial was not required where prosecutor elicited proof of prior crime in violation of pretrial ruling where judge promptly struck the testimony and ordered jury to disregard it. U.S. v. Krevsky, C.A.8th, 1984, 741 F.2d 1090, 1093. Mistrial was not required to cure prosecution witness' reference to fact that defendant had served time in a South American jail where the court promptly (i.e., the next morning) admonished the jury to disregard the evidence. U.S. v. Steele, C.A.6th, 1984, 727 F.2d 580, 587. In prosecution of prisoners for possession of homemade knives, mistrial was not required by mention that weapons were used as part of an escape attempt. U.S. v. Dennis, C.A.7th, 1984, 737 F.2d 617, 619. Trial court did not err in denying a mistrial when witness made reference to the fact that defendant had just been released from prison three months before the crime where a curative instruction was given and the evidence against the defendant was strong. U.S. v. Morrow, C.A.4th, 1984, 731 F.2d 233, 235 n. 4. Striking of evidence that co-defendant had served time and clear and positive instruction to jury to disregard it cures error and obviates need for mistrial. U.S. v. Steele, C.A.6th, 1984, 727 F.2d 580, 588. In prosecution for importation of tons of marijuana, evidence that a vial of cocaine was found in cargo plane was not so prejudicial as to require mistrial. U.S. v. Snowden, C.A.11th, 1984, 735 F.2d 1310, 1314. Where there was no evidence that government had elicited reference to defendant's alleged Mafia connections in bad faith, single reference that was immediately stricken did not require a mistrial. U.S. v. Reed, C.A.8th, 1984, 724 F.2d 677, 679. Prompt cautionary instruction was sufficient to cure error in mention of prior crime so that reversal was not required. U.S. v. Jordan, C.A.7th, 1983, 722 F.2d 353, 357. Prompt instruction to disregard was sufficient to cure error in mention of criminal record of RICO defendant where reference was ambiguous, did not mention a crime or defendant's last name, and took only moments in a 24 day trial. U.S. v. Kimble, C.A.5th, 1983, 719 F.2d 1253, 1257. Mistrial was not required at introduction of evidence that drug dealer said "we are not used to flashing it in public" where no objection was made at time and implication of prior dealings was slight. U.S. v. McCown, C.A.9th, 1983, 711 F.2d 1441, 1453. Mistrial was required where government elicited evidence that defendant charged with robbery had previously been incarcerated in state penitentiary. U.S. v. Sostarich, C.A.8th, 1982, 684 F.2d 606, 608. Instruction to disregard statement of witness that defendant was a hippy who took drugs was adequate remedy. U.S. v. Mangiameli, C.A.10th, 1982, 668 F.2d 1172, 1176. Trial court did not err in murder prosecution in failing to strike testimony of government witness that defendant had once pulled a gun on him where government was not responsible for testimony. U.S. v. Skinner, C.A.9th, 1982, 667 F.2d 1306, 1310. Mistrial was not required by reference to handing down of superseding indictment where jury could not possibly have thought this referred to another crime. U.S. v. Jackson, C.A.3d, 1981, 649 F.2d 967, 977. It was error not to grant a mistrial in a personal injury case after the plaintiff played a tape for the jury that contained references to the defendant's indictment for sexual offenses against young girls, his fugitive status, and alleged responsibility for murder of young girl. White v. Cohen, C.A.9th, 1981, 635 F.2d 761. Mistrial was not required in trial for firearms violations after the court granted motion to dismiss charge of obstruction of justice based on defendant's murder of girl friend's cat in reprisal for her (the friend, not the cat) finking on him. U.S. v. Bagley, C.A.9th, 1981, 641 F.2d 1235, 1240. Judge's decision that evidence of other crime was to be excluded under Rule 403 did not require that a mistrial be declared when the jury heard the evidence. U.S. v. Escalante, C.A.9th, 1980, 637 F.2d 1197, 1204. Where experienced government agent gave a nonresponsive answer revealing that defendant had been incarcerated for armed robbery, the resulting mistrial was not deliberately provoked by the prosecution so as to prevent retrial of defendant. U.S. v. Green, C.A.4th, 1980, 636 F.2d 925. Where evidence of loansharking and fixing horse races was irrelevant for any purpose but came in after questions designed to elicit other information, these unsolicited references were not so inflammatory that they could not be cured by instructions given by trial judge. U.S. v. Provenzano, C.A.3d, 1980, 620 F.2d 985, 994. It was not error to grant a mistrial when F.B.I. agent, in reading from defendant's confession, interpolated the fact that the defendant's education had been completed under the auspices of the Texas Department of Corrections. U.S. v. Doby, C.A.8th, 1979, 598 F.2d 1137, 1141. In determining whether a curative instruction was sufficient to cure error in admission of evidence of uncharged crime, court must weigh the forcefulness of the instruction and the conviction with which it was given against the degree of prejudice of the evidence. U.S. v. Johnson, C.A.9th, 1980, 618 F.2d 60, 62. It was not error to deny mistrial where judge promptly sustained objection to question insinuating that defendant was involved in another crime and instructed jury to disregard remark. U.S. v. Pappas, C.A.1st, 1979, 611 F.2d 399, 406. Where evidence of defendant's participation in uncharged crime was elicited by a co-defendant, it was not error to refuse to declare a mistrial where trial court gave a prompt and thorough admonition to the jury. U.S. v. Johnson, C.A.4th, 1979, 610 F.2d 194, 197. Sustaining of objection and instructing the jury to disregard statement about other crimes was sufficient to protect defendant and it was not error to deny motion for mistrial. U.S. v. John Bernard Industries, Inc., C.A.8th, 1979, 589 F.2d 1353, 1359.

State cases Mistrial was not required when sister of rape victim testified that victim was concerned about getting defendant in trouble because his sister was her friend and she knew defendant had been involved in prior offenses. Hines v. State, Alaska 1985, 703 P.2d 1175, 1178. General rule that evidence of serious unrelated bad acts not otherwise admissible merits a mistrial does not apply to an unelaborated statement that defendant had previous involvement in criminal justice system. State v. Grijalva, App.1983, 667 P.2d 1336, 137 Ariz. 10. Mistrial was not required when witness unexpectedly explained recollection of particular day by mentioning defendant's arrest for another crime on that day. State v. Adamson, Sup.Ct., 1983, 665 P.2d 972, 136 Ariz. 250. Mistrial was not required when, upon being asked what sort of people were depicted in the photo spread from which he had selected the defendant's picture, the witness answered "criminals"; if defense felt prejudiced, it should have objected, moved to strike, and asked for an instruction to the jury. People v. Abbott, Colo.1984, 690 P.2d 1263, 1269. Trial court was not required to grant a mistrial when prosecutorial questions on cross-examination suggested vaguely that defendant had committed other wrongs. State v. Stellwagen, 1983, 659 P.2d 167, 232 Kan. 744. Mistrial was not required when prosecution elicited evidence of prior instance of similar conduct from pederasty victim. State v. Nichols, Me.1985, 495 A.2d 328. In rape prosecution based on uncorroborated testimony of victim which had been impeached by testimony of others that she had admitted it was false, mistrial was required where the prosecutor did not caution his witnesses not to mention charges involving another daughter and such evidence came before the jury. State v. Goodrich, Me.1981, 432 A.2d 413, 417. Mistrial was not required because of inadvertent reference during cross-examination of defendant's brother to defendant's time in prison. People v. McKeever, 1983, 332 N.W.2d 596, 123 Mich.App. 533. In view of the other sordid evidence in the record, mistrial was not required when a police witness let slip the fact that the defendant had told someone he did not want them "narking" on him because of his dope dealing. State v. Blanchard, Minn.1982, 315 N.W.2d 427, 432. Mistrial was not required when rape victim "blurted out" statement that defendant had smoked a marijuana cigarette during the crime. State v. Liddell, 1984, 685 P.2d 918, 925, 211 Mont. 180. While prosecution failure to admonish its witnesses not to mention defendant's parole status in violation of court order was inexcusable, two passing references to parole did not warrant the granting of a mistrial. State v. Gray, 1983, 673 P.2d 1262, 1266, 207 Mont. 261. Where it was clear from other evidence that the defendant had been the object of a manhunt and had been jailed, inadvertent reference to the crime that he was wanted for did not require a mistrial. State v. Gilbert, Sup.Ct., 1982, 657 P.2d 1165, 1167, 99 N.M. 316. Trial judge did not err in refusing to declare a mistrial when witness mentioned fact that the defendant had been in prison with him where this was not deliberately elicited by the prosecutor and the defense declined to have the court give an admonition that would have dissipated much of the prejudice. State v. Vialpando, C.A., 1979, 599 P.2d 1086, 1093, 93 N.M. 289. No mistrial was required where trial judge concluded that reference to another murder for which defendant was under investigation was an innocent response to a direct question by defense counsel. Wilkie v. State, 1982, 644 P.2d 508, 98 Nev. 192. In prosecution of college official for embezzlement, mistrial was not required where trial court promptly admonished jury to ignore reference in testimony to another scam involving defendant. Allison v. State, Okl.Crim.1983, 675 P.2d 142, 150. Mistrial was not required in homicide trial where witness inadvertently made reference to prior rape committed by defendant. King v. State, Okl.Crim.1983, 667 P.2d 474, 477. Mistrial not required even where prosecutor deliberately brings up subsequent crime in violation of court order made on motion in limine. State v. Beel, 1982, 648 P.2d 443, 32 Wash.App. 437.

FN11.1 Offer guidance For an example of such an opinion, see U.S. v. Emery, C.A.5th, 1982, 682 F.2d 493. For an example of a thoughtful opinion, see U.S. v. Dolliole, C.A.7th, 1979, 597 F.2d 102. In murder prosecution in which there was a serious question as to whether the death of the wife was an accident or a homicide, it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that two weeks before her death, husband dragged wife into yard and sprayed her with a garden hose during a marital dispute. People v. Deeney, 1983, 193 Cal.Rptr. 608, 145 Cal.App.3d 647. For an opinion that is a model, despite the fact that it drew a dissent, see People v. Goree, 1984, 349 N.W.2d 220, 228, 132 Mich.App. 693. For one of the best opinions in recent years, see People v. Golochowicz, 1982, 319 N.W.2d 518, 413 Mich. 298. For a careful sketch of the procedural requirements to admissibility under Wash.R.Ev. 404(b), see State v. Saltarelli, 1982, 655 P.2d 697, 98 Wash.2d 358. For a well-done state court opinion, see State v. Pharr, 1983, 340 N.W.2d 498, 115 Wis.2d 334.

Supplement to Notes in Main Volume

FN2. Procedure important Seventh Circuit employs a four part test: (1) relevant to an issue other than propensity; (2) similarity and temporal recency; (3) evidence sufficient to support a finding act was done; and (4) probative value not outweighed by prejudice. U.S. v. Penson, C.A.7th, 1990, 896 F.2d 1087, 1091. Admission of prior crimes requires trial court to find that it is offered for a purpose that does not require an inference to character, that probative value outweighs 403 factors, and the giving of a limiting instruction. U.S. v. Colon, C.A.2d, 1989, 880 F.2d 650, 656. See Slough, Other Vices, Other Crimes: Kansas Statutes Annotated Section 60-455 Revisited, 1978, 26 U.Kan.L.Rev. 161, 164-166. One opinion claims that the Tenth Circuit has imposed at least ten procedural controls on the admission of other crimes evidence, but rejoices that Huddleston has put the court back on the right path. U.S. v. Record, C.A.10th, 1989, 873 F.2d 1363, 1373. Admission of other crimes requires a two-step process; court must find evidence relevant to issue without resort to inference of propensity to prove conduct, then perform balancing under Rule 403. U.S. v. DiGeronimo, C.A.2d, 1979, 598 F.2d 746, 753. Before proof of other crime can be admitted under Rule 404(b), there must be clear and convincing evidence of defendant's commission of it, it must not be too remote in time from the charged crime, it must be similar to charged offense, and it must be offered to prove a material element of charged offense. U.S. v. Bailleaux, C.A.9th, 1982, 685 F.2d 1105, 1110. To be admissible, evidence of bad act must be relevant to material issue, similar in kind and reasonably close to charged crime, must be clear and convincing, and probative worth must not be outweighed by prejudice. U.S. v. Marshall, C.A.8th, 1982, 683 F.2d 1212, 1215. In Ninth Circuit, other crimes evidence must meet three part test of admissibility; prior act must be similar and close enough in time to be relevant, evidence of prior act must be clear and convincing, and probative worth must outweigh potential prejudice. U.S. v. Hooten, C.A.9th, 1981, 662 F.2d 628, 635. Standards for admission of other crimes evidence in Eighth Circuit are quite familiar: (1) a material issue to which evidence is relevant must be raised; (2) proffered evidence is relevant; (3) evidence must be clear and convincing; (4) other crime must be similar in kind and reasonably close in time to the charged offense; (5) evidence must not be excludible under Rule 403. U.S. v. Burchinal, C.A.8th, 1981, 657 F.2d 985, 993. Evidence that defendant went behind desk at YMCA to obtain checks he later cashed with forged endorsements were identical to acts offered to show opportunity and were close in time, testimony of two eyewitnesses was clear and convincing evidence of other acts, and evidence was so highly probative that it outweighed prejudice to defendant. U.S. v. DeJohn, C.A.7th, 1981, 638 F.2d 1048, 1052 n. 4. Before evidence of other crimes can be admitted under Rule 404(b) four prerequisites must be met: (1) a material issue has been raised; (2) the evidence must be relevant to that issue; (3) the evidence must be clear and convincing; and (4) the other crime must be similar in kind and reasonably close in time to the charge at trial. U.S. v. Farber, C.A.8th, 1980, 630 F.2d 569. The Clemons-Conley standards were reiterated in U.S. v. Young, C.A.8th, 1980, 618 F.2d 1281, 1289. For a masterful treatment of the procedural issues, see U.S. v. Figueroa, C.A.2d 1980, 618 F.2d 934 (per Newman, J.). Under Rule 404(b), evidence of other wrongdoing is admissible only if the trial court finds that (1) a material issue is raised on a subject for which such evidence is admissible; (2) the proffered evidence is relevant to that issue; (3) the wrongdoing is similar in kind and reasonably close in time to the offense charged; (4) the evidence is clear and convincing; and (5) the probative value of the evidence outweighs its prejudicial possibilities. U.S. v. Drury, C.A.8th, 1978, 582 F.2d 1181, 1184. The Drury requirements were reiterated in U.S. v. Vik, C.A.8th, 1981, 655 F.2d 878, 881. It has been held that the prerequisites to admission are less stringent when the evidence offered consists of other acts of the defendant rather than other crimes. U.S. v. Greenfield, C.A.5th, 1977, 554 F.2d 179, 185. Evidence of other crimes is admissible only if the issue is disputed, the crime is relevant to that issue, the evidence of the crime is clear and convincing, and probative worth outweighs probable prejudicial impact. U.S. v. McMillian, C.A.8th, 1976, 535 F.2d 1035, 1038. Before evidence of other crimes can be admitted it must be shown that (1) an issue on which the evidence can be received has been raised, (2) that the evidence is relevant to that issue, (3) that the evidence is clear and convincing, (4) and that the probative worth outweighs its prejudicial effect. U.S. v. Conley, C.A.8th, 1975, 523 F.2d 650, 653-654. Colorado courts require the prosecutor to advise the court of the purpose for which evidence of other crimes is offered and the court to then and at the conclusion of the trial to instruct the jury as to the proper use of the evidence using neutral terms such as "other acts" instead of such loaded phrases as "similar crimes." Callis v. People, Colo.1984, 692 P.2d 1045, 1051. For evidence of other crimes to be admissible, there must be a valid purpose for which it is offered, it must be relevant to a material issue, and probative value must outweigh prejudice to defendant. People v. Casper, Colo.1982, 641 P.2d 274. Before evidence of other crimes is admissible, it must be offered for a valid purpose, be relevant to a material issue in the case, and probative worth must not be outweighed by prejudice. People v. Ray, Colo.1981, 626 P.2d 167. An interesting set of procedural restrictions, though limited to sex cases, appears in Colo.Rev.Stats. s 16-10-301(2)-(4): "(2) If the prosecution intends to introduce evidence of similar acts or transactions as provided in subsection (1) of this section, the prosecutor shall advise the trial court of the purpose for which evidence of similar acts or transactions is offered. The burden shall be on the prosecution to show the relevancy of evidence if objection to introduction of said evidence has been made. The trial court shall determine whether or not the evidence offered is relevant and, if relevant, whether or not the prejudice which would result to the defendant by the introduction of the evidence outweighs the evidentiary value of the evidence. "(3) The trial court shall, at the time of the reception into evidence of similar acts or transactions and again in the general charge to the jury, direct the jury as to the limited purpose for which the evidence is admitted and for which the jury may consider it. The court in instructing the jury, and the parties when making statements in the presence of the jury, shall use the words 'similar act or transaction' and shall at no time refer to 'similar offenses'. 'Similar crimes', or other terms which have the same connotations. "(4) Before admitting evidence of similar acts or transactions, the court must find that the people have introduced sufficient evidence against the defendant to constitute a prima facie case, warranting submission of the case to the jury on the evidence presented other than that of similar acts or transactions." In admitting evidence of other crimes under Kans.Stat.Anns. s 60-445 the court, out of the presence of the jury, must determine that it is relevant to prove one of facts listed in the statute, that the fact is disputed, and that prejudice does not outweigh probative worth. State v. Breazeale, 1986, 714 P.2d 1356, 1360, 238 Kan. 714. In ruling on admissibility of evidence under K.S.A. s 60-455, court must determine if evidence is relevant to prove one of facts specified in the statute, that the fact is a disputed material fact, and balance probative value against prejudice. State v. Gowler, 1982, 644 P.2d 473, 7 Kan.App.2d 485. Before evidence of other crimes may be admitted, there must be substantial evidence that the defendant perpetrated it, there must be some special circumstance tending to show guilt of charged crime, it must be offered on material issue, and probative worth must not be outweighed by prejudice. People v. Betancourt, 1982, 327 N.W.2d 390, 120 Mich.App. 58. Under the Michigan similar acts statute, three things must be shown for admissibility; there must be substantial evidence that the defendant perpetrated the bad act, the act must be probative of motive, etc., in connection with the charged offense, and motive, etc., must be material to determination of guilt of charged offense. People v. Worden, 1979, 284 N.W.2d 159, 91 Mich.App. 666. Evidence of other crimes is admissible if the proof of defendant's participation is clear and convincing, the evidence is relevant and material, and probative worth outweighs prejudice. Ture v. State, Minn.1984, 353 N.W.2d 518, 521. In applying Minn.R.Ev. 404(a), court should first determine relevance and materiality, then see if proof of other crime is clear and convincing, and finally balance prejudice and probative worth. State v. Filippi, Minn.1983, 335 N.W.2d 739, 743. Key tests in determining admissibility of other crimes proof is whether there is clear and convincing proof of defendant's participation, the relevance and materiality of the evidence, and whether prejudice substantially outweighs probative worth. State v. Woelm, Minn.1982, 317 N.W.2d 717. Requirements for admission of other crimes are (1) similarity to charged crime, (2) nearness in time to charged crime, (3) tendency to show a common plan, scheme, or system, and (4) a determination that probative worth outweighs prejudice. State v. Stroud, 1984, 683 P.2d 459, 465, 210 Mont. 58. The procedures to be followed in Montana are spelled out in State v. Just, 1979, 602 P.2d 957, 184 Mont. 262. Before evidence of other crimes can be admitted to prove a requisite mental state, there must be proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the act charged. State v. Ohnstad, No.Dak.1984, 359 N.W.2d 827, 837. Trial court did not follow correct procedure in failing to specify purpose for which other crimes evidence was being admitted and not providing a reasoned explanation of why probative worth outweighed prejudice. State v. Shillcutt, App.1983, 341 N.W.2d 716, 719, 116 Wis.2d 227. To be admissible, proof of other crimes must be plain, clear and convincing, the crimes must not be too remote and offered for purpose sanctioned by Rule 404(b), the issue to be proved must be a material one in the case, and there must be a substantial need for the evidence. Bishop v. State, Wyo.1984, 687 P.2d 242, 246. For a discussion of recent Seventh Circuit decisions on these procedural issues, see Crowley, Modernizing and Liberalizing the Law of Evidence, 1981, 57 Chi.-Kent L.Rev. 191, 192-194. For description of a four-step procedure for determining admissibility that seems better than the two-step process embraced by some federal courts, see Roth, Understanding Admissibility of Prior Bad Acts. A Diagrammatic Approach, 1982, 9 Pepp.L.Rev. 297, 312. For a thoughtful set of suggested procedures, see Comment, Other Crimes Evidence: Relevance Reexamined, 1983, 16 J.Marsh.L.Rev. 371, 390.

FN3. Minnesota decisions Evidence of other crime was improperly admitted where state did not give notice of intent to use such evidence. State v. Doughman, Minn.1986, 384 N.W.2d 450, 455. Notice of intent to use other crimes evidence was not required where defense counsel was aware of other crimes through discovery and should have known the evidence would be offered to put the charged crimes in context. State v. Cermak, Minn.1985, 365 N.W.2d 238. Where defendant was properly charged with multiple offenses occurring over a period of time, she was not entitled to notice of these as "other crimes" since they were part of the episode for which she was being tried so that pleadings and discovery provided adequate notice. State v. Becker, Minn.1984, 351 N.W.2d 923, 927. Where the defendant had actual notice that the prosecution intended to offer proof of a prior robbery, failure to give formal notice in advance was not prejudicial even if error. State v. Johnson, Minn.1982, 322 N.W.2d 220. Montana requirement of notice and dual set of cautionary instructions were crafted from similar procedural requirements in Minnesota. State v. Stroud, Mont.1984, 683 P.2d 459, 465.

FN5. Louisiana followed See also, La.Code Cr.Proc. Art. 720: "Upon motion of the defendant, the court shall order the district attorney to inform the defendant of the state's intent to offer evidence of the commission of any other crime admissible under the authority of Louisiana Code of Evidence Article 404. Provided however, that such order shall not require the district attorney to inform the defendant of the state's intent to offer evidence of offenses which relates to conduct that constitutes an integral part of the act or transaction that is the subject of the present proceeding or other crimes for which the accused was previously convicted."

FN7. Other states Written notice to defense counsel of names of four rebuttal witnesses and that testimony they would give would include defendant's willingness to engage in other crimes was adequate to comply with Ariz.R.Cr.P. 15.1(f). State v. Linden, App.1983, 664 P.2d 673, 136 Ariz. 129. Claim that absence of notice of intent to use evidence of another crime was a denial of due process could not be maintained where record showed that counsel was aware of intent to offer evidence the day before and there was no request for a continuance to prepare to meet the evidence. People v. Ott, 1978, 148 Cal.Rptr. 479, 84 Cal.App.3d 118. Trial court did not err in refusing to instruct jury that it could not use other crimes evidence to show defendant's propensity to commit crimes. State v. Sanford, 1985, 699 P.2d 506, 509, 237 Kan. 312 (holding pattern jury instruction on proper use suffices; debatable ruling). It was reversible error to admit evidence of a prior sexual assault where prosecution had failed to give notice of intent to use the evidence. State v. Berg, 1985, 697 P.2d 1365, 1367, 215 Mont. 431. It was a denial of due process for trial court to reverse ruling excluding evidence of prior crimes after defendant had relied on ruling in planning and presentation of case by, for example, to conducting voir dire on this issue. State v. Doll, 1985, 692 P.2d 473, 476, 214 Mont. 390. It was error to admit evidence of other crimes where defendant did not get ten-day notice ordered by court on motion in limine. State v. Brown, 1984, 680 P.2d 582, 209 Mont. 502. It was not error to admit evidence of other crime where required notice was only delivered on the morning of trial where the defense was granted a two day continuance to investigate and had indicated it needed no more time. State v. Azure, 1984, 676 P.2d 785, 208 Mont. 233. State must provide defendant with written notice of intent to use evidence of other crimes before case is called to trial; notice must include a statement of purpose for which evidence will be offered. State v. Gray, 1982, 643 P.2d 233, 197 Mont. 348. Montana now requires that the prosecutor give the defendant notice of intent to use evidence of other crimes that must include specification of the purpose for which the evidence will be used. State v. Just, 1979, 602 P.2d 957, 184 Mont. 262. Evidence of offenses that are part of the entire transaction of the offense charged need not be noticed to the defense. Melvin v. State, Okla.Crim.1985, 706 P.2d 163, 164. Notice of intent to use other crimes evidence that was given five weeks before trial was timely and adequate. Mayhan v. State, Okla.Crim.1985, 696 P.2d 1044, 1045. State cannot be required to give notice of intent to use evidence of other crimes in rebuttal because it cannot be known in advance of trial what evidence will be relevant to rebuttal. Freeman v. State, Okl.Crim.1984, 681 P.2d 84. Where the prosecution did not learn of testimony concerning other crimes until the day before it was presented and promptly notified the defense, notice requirement was not violated. Seegars v. State, Okl.Crim.1982, 655 P.2d 563. Normally the state has a duty to give notice of intent to prove other crimes but this does not apply to testimony that when defendant was arrested a few moments after attempted burglary he was carrying a concealed weapon. Scott v. State, Okl.Crim.1983, 663 P.2d 17, 19. State complied with requirement for use of evidence of other crimes when it gave the defendant ten days notice of intent to use evidence, the court found evidence probative, and proof was clear and convincing. Odum v. State, Okl.Crim.1982, 651 P.2d 703. Notice to the defendant on the morning of trial of intent to use evidence of other crime was a breach of state's statutory duty to make a prompt disclosure of such material. State v. Harshman, 1983, 658 P.2d 1173, 61 Or.App. 711. The Comment to Del.R.Ev. 404 urges an amendment of the Superior Court Criminal Rules to require the prosecution to give notice of intent to offer other crimes evidence. Tex.R.Cr.Ev. 404(b) requires notice upon request by the defendant. See s 5231 n. 39. The Vermont drafters amended that state's rules of criminal procedure to require notice of intent to use evidence of other crimes. Reporter's Notes, Vt.R.Ev. 404.

FN9. Declined to add The New York Law Revision Commission refused to add a provision requiring the prosecution to give notice of intent to use other crimes evidence, suggesting that Rule 403 might be used to exclude the evidence when lack of notice resulted in unfairness to the defendant. Comment, Prop.N.Y.Evid.Code s 404(b).

FN10. Notice not required Prosecution was not required to give notice of intent to use evidence of other crimes. U.S. v. Fitterer, C.A.8th, 1983, 710 F.2d 1328, 1332. Where after government notice of intent to use evidence of other crimes, defense motion in limine to exclude evidence during government's case-in-chief was granted, it was not error to rule that evidence might be admissible on cross-examination of defendant. U.S. v. Kovic, C.A.7th, 1982, 684 F.2d 512, 515. It is apparently the practice of some prosecutors to give notice of intent to use other crimes evidence, even though this is not required. See, e.g., U.S. v. Herrera-Medina, C.A.9th, 1979, 609 F.2d 376, 378; U.S. v. Capo, C.A.5th, 1979, 595 F.2d 1086, 1094 n. 8; U.S. v. Powell, C.A.9th, 1978, 587 F.2d 443, 447. Notice is constitutionally required to forewarn a defendant of acts for which he may ultimately be convicted and sentenced; evidence of proof of an extraneous crime was no more required to be described in the indictment than any other piece of relevant, inculpatory evidence. U.S. v. Barrett, C.A.1st, 1976, 539 F.2d 244, 249. In U.S. v. Solomon, D.C.Ga., 1980, 490 F.Supp. 373, the prosecution gave notice of intent to use other crimes evidence under Criminal Rule 12(d)(1).

But see Court suggests that in future cases the prosecution should exercise the discretion given it by Criminal Rule 12(d)(1) and notify the defense before trial of its intention to introduce any evidence of prior bad acts. U.S. v. Foskey, C.A., 1980, 636 F.2d 517, 526 n. 8, 204 U.S.App.D.C. 245. Notice would be required under Report of the Eastern District of New York Criminal Procedure Committee on Case Management and A Uniform Pretrial Order, 1986, 111 F.R.D. 311, 315.

FN12. Denial of discovery It was not a denial of due process not to order the prosecution to reveal its other crimes evidence to the defendant in advance of trial. U.S. v. Kendall, C.A.10th, 1985, 766 F.2d 1426, 1440. Prosecution had no duty to reveal evidence of other crimes to defense and trial court did not err in not granting defendant a continuance so he could prepare to meet the evidence. U.S. v. Carr, C.A.8th, 1985, 764 F.2d 496, 499. In loansharking prosecution, trial court did not abuse discretion in admitting evidence that two defendants had engaged in drug deals with a third defendant. U.S. v. DiPasquale, C.A.3d, 1984, 740 F.2d 1282, 1295. Evidence of other crimes offered to rebut an entrapment defense did not fall within discovery order directed at evidence to be offered under Rule 404(b) and failure of government to disclose did not preclude admission of evidence. U.S. v. Sonntag, C.A.11th, 1982, 684 F.2d 781, 787. Trial court did not abuse discretion in allowing prosecution to use evidence of other crime despite failure to make pretrial disclosure of intent to do so as required by pretrial order. U.S. v. Roe, C.A.11th, 1982, 670 F.2d 956, 965. No unfair surprise resulted when the government informed defense counsel of intent to call witness to testify concerning other crimes as soon as it became aware that the witness could testify. U.S. v. Wixom, C.A.8th, 1976, 529 F.2d 217, 220. Failure to comply with discovery rule was not prejudicial to defendant and prior crimes were properly admitted. U.S. v. Kimbrough, C.A.7th, 1976, 528 F.2d 1242, 1249. One trial judge, after denying the defendant's motion to discover evidence of other crimes so that he could make a motion in limine, then begged the prosecution to turn the evidence over to the defendant as a favor to the judge so as to expedite the trial. U.S. v. Kilroy, D.C.Wis.1981, 523 F.Supp. 206, 216.

FN13. Without good reason Denial of discovery of other crime which prevented defendant from adequately preparing his defense may deny the defendant a fundamentally fair trial and be grounds for federal habeas corpus relief. Williams v. Owens, C.A.7th, 1983, 731 F.2d 391.

FN14. Notice of change Federal court was not required to follow state rulings on admissibility of evidence of other alleged arson in a diversity action on a fire insurance policy. Warner v. Transamerica Ins. Co., C.A.8th, 1984, 739 F.2d 1347, 1351. Where the prosecution agreed in Omnibus hearing that it would not offer evidence of other crimes "unless subsequent developments disclosed", it was error for the trial court to admit substantial evidence of other crimes in the middle of the trial without inquiring as to whether the defendant had reasonable notice of intent to use such proof and without balancing the probative worth of evidence against prejudice to defendant. U.S. v. Jackson, C.A.5th, 1980, 621 F.2d 216. Defendant could not claim surprise in testimony concerning uncharged crime where the prosecution informed the defense of intent to use the evidence as soon as it learned of the evidence. U.S. v. Murray, C.A.2d, 1980, 618 F.2d 892, 901. Fact that introduction of evidence of other crimes was a violation of prosecution's pretrial agreement not to use such evidence would not be considered by the appellate court where this was not called to the attention of the trial judge. U.S. v. Witt, C.A.5th, 1980, 618 F.2d 283, 286. It was an abuse of discretion and reversible error for trial judge to reverse his ruling excluding evidence of other crimes three days into the trial. State v.

Doll, 1985, 692 P.2d 473, 476, 214 Mont. 390.

FN17. Prejudice to defendant In considering prejudice to defendant from use of other crimes, court notes that prosecutor gave defense advance notice of intent to use evidence and did not make careless references to it in opening statements. U.S. v. Lavelle, C.A.D.C.1985, 751 F.2d 1266, 1278.

FN18. Discretion to admit Court did not consider this possibility in case where defendant requested a continuance to meet pharmacist's "sudden recall" that defendant had used two other forged prescriptions. State v. Barringer, 1982, 650 P.2d 1129, 32 Wash.App. 882.

FN19. Motion in limine Rule 404(b) does not require an advance hearing into evidence of other crimes that might have prevented the testimony about prejudicial detail of crime. U.S. v. Mickens, C.A.2d, 1991, 926 F.2d 1323, 1329. One court has ruled that when the prosecution makes a motion in limine to have other crimes evidence admitted and the motion is granted, the defendant cannot raise the propriety of the ruling on appeal if he has subsequently abandoned the issue on which the evidence was to have been admitted. U.S. v. Johnson, C.A.8th, 1985, 767 F.2d 1259, 1270. Where trial court never ruled on motion in limine to exclude prior crimes and defendant did not renew the motion at trial, no issue was preserved for appellate review. U.S. v. Wagoner, C.A.8th, 1983, 713 F.2d 1371, 1374. One advantage of the pretrial motion is that exclusion of the evidence may be the subject of an interlocutory appeal by the government. U.S. v. Margiotta, C.A.2d, 1981, 662 F.2d 131, 141. Where government gave notice of intent to use evidence of other crime well before trial and a hearing was had on motion in which trial court ruled evidence admissible, trial court's ruling should be given great deference. U.S. v. Longoria, C.A.9th, 1980, 624 F.2d 66, 68. For an illustration of the problems that can arise when the issue is postponed, see Grimaldi v. U.S., C.A.1st, 1979, 606 F.2d 332, 339 (after overruling objections to reference to evidence of other crimes in opening statement, court found the evidence inadmissible). If the motion in limine only suppresses certain evidence of the prior crime, an objection may still be necessary at trial if the prosecution attempts to get evidence in by some other means. State v. Patton, 1979, 600 P.2d 194, 183 Mont. 417. Slough, Other Vices, Other Crimes: Kansas Statutes Annotated Section 60-455 Revisited, 1978, 26 U.Kan.L.Rev. 161, 166. One danger in the use of the motion by the defendant is that if it is denied and the objection is not renewed when the evidence is offered at trial, the appellate court will only consider the evidence available to the trial judge at the time of the motion in reviewing the ruling. U.S. v. Cobb, C.A.8th, 1978, 588 F.2d 607, 610-611. It was not error for the court to refuse to rule on the admissibility of evidence of other crimes prior to the trial where the court did give the defense an opportunity to object and have the question of admissibility determined out of the presence of the jury at trial. U.S. v. Moore, C.A.9th, 1978, 580 F.2d 360, 363. One of the hazards of such preliminary rulings is that the defendant may claim prejudice when his own conduct requires an alteration of the ruling. See People v. Vidaurri, 1980, 163 Cal.Rptr. 57, 103 Cal.App.3d 450. Defendant was not prejudiced by timing of court's pretrial ruling concerning admissibility of other crimes evidence since this made it possible to make an informed decision as to whether or not to testify. State v. Brant, Minn.1984, 345 N.W.2d 248. On writ of prohibition following denial of motion in limine to exclude evidence of other crimes, court would not pass on merits of ruling but only on whether there was an abuse of discretion. State v. Hagen, Minn.App.1984, 342 N.W.2d 160. Where on motion in limine court ordered that defendant be given ten days notice of intent to use evidence of other crimes, error was adequately preserved for appeal even though no objection was made when evidence was introduced at trial. State v. Brown, 1984, 680 P.2d 582, 209 Mont. 502. An unsuccessful motion in limine does not suffice to preserve the issue of admissibility of other crimes evidence for appeal; defendant must object again when the evidence is offered at trial. State v. Harper, 1983, 340 N.W.2d 391, 215 Neb. 686. Ruling on motion in limine is not binding on trial court; in order to preserve objection it must be raised again during trial. Odum v. State, Okl.Crim.1982, 651 P.2d 703, 706. Trial judge could not rule on admissibility of other crimes evidence as rebuttal in response to a motion in limine because it had no way of knowing whether there would be anything to rebut; hence, it was not error to refuse to rule on the motion. Simpson v. State, Okl.Crim.1982, 642 P.2d 272. In most cases, only proffered evidence of other crimes that is unusually prejudicial should be ruled on before trial. State v. Browder, 1984, 687 P.2d 168, 170, 69 Or.App. 564. Where the trial court has granted a motion in limine admitting evidence to impeach experts, defendant did not have to call experts and have them impeached at trial in order to preserve issue for appeal. State v. Cochrun, S.D.1983, 328 N.W.2d 271 (holding unclear). Where motion in limine did not specify the particular evidence complained of on appeal, objection at trial is required to preserve issue. State v. Shaffer, Utah 1986, 725 P.2d 1301, 1308. When prosecution disclaimed any intent to use evidence of bad acts, trial court was justified in declining to rule on motion in limine and waiting till issue arose at trial. State v. Bissonette, 1985, 488 A.2d 1231, 1237, 145 Vt. 381. Pretrial order precluding state from using other crimes evidence is appealable as of right as an order suppressing evidence. State v. Harris, App.1985, 365 N.W.2d 922, 924, 123 Wis.2d 231. Where defendant pleads guilty following a decision on a motion in limine that admits evidence of other crimes, he waives his right to appeal the ruling. State v. Nelson, 1982, 324 N.W.2d 292, 108 Wis.2d 698.

FN20. Objection Where tape had been furnished to defendant months in advance of trial, timely objection to other crimes should have been made before the tape was played. U.S. v. Castiello, C.A.1st, 1990, 915 F.2d 1, 4 n. 4. In absence of objection, it was not plain error to admit evidence of prior robberies to prove defendant committed charged robbery for thrills, not because insane. U.S. v. Medved, C.A.6th, 1990, 905 F.2d 935, 939. Where judge refused to rule on motion in limine, objection at time of trial was required to preserve issue of admissibility of other crimes evidence. U.S. v. Westbrook, C.A.8th, 1990, 896 F.2d 330, 334. Court would not consider error in use of the plaintiff's prior drug use in civil case where there was no objection or request for limiting instruction. Pinkham v. Maine Central R. Co., C.A.1st, 1989, 874 F.2d 875, 880. If no objection was made to other crimes evidence in trial court, defendant must show plain error on appeal; that is, that but for the admission of the evidence he would have been acquitted. U.S. v. Snyder, C.A.7th, 1989, 872 F.2d 1351, 1357. Objection on lack of proper foundation and lack of specificity was not sufficient to raise the propriety of the admission of other crimes under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Mascio, C.A.7th, 1985, 774 F.2d 219, 223. Of course, the fact that the defendant does not cite Rule 404(b) and did not object on that ground below does not bar the appellate court from applying that Rule to his argument in order to shoot it down. U.S. v. Wolfe, C.A.11th, 1985, 766 F.2d 1525, 1528. Defendant's failure to object at trial to evidence of other crime operates as a waiver of that objection unless admission constituted plain error. U.S. v. Gironda, C.A.7th, 1985, 758 F.2d 1201, 1219. Where defendant did not object to evidence of his threats to kill under Rule 404(b), he waived the issue on appeal. U.S. v. Medina, C.A.7th, 1985, 755 F.2d 1269, 1277. Where defendant made no objection to other crimes evidence at trial, review was by plain error standard. U.S. v. Darby, C.A.11th, 1984, 744 F.2d 1508, 1523. In prosecution for income tax evasion, objections to testimony that defendant was a pimp who lived off the income of hookers were too general to preserve issue. Clinkscale v. U.S., C.A.8th, 1984, 729 F.2d 940. Failure to object at trial waived contention in loansharking prosecution that evidence of other crimes should not have been admitted. U.S. v. Gigante, C.A.2d, 1984, 729 F.2d 78, 84. Where no objection was made to the admission of other crimes evidence at trial, issue was not preserved for appeal. U.S. v. Vitale, C.A.8th, 1984, 728 F.2d 1090, 1092. It was not plain error in prosecution for fraud to introduce evidence of sale of truck by the defendant to show his use of a front man to hide his interest in certain transactions. U.S. v. Murphy, C.A.5th, 1983, 703 F.2d 1335. Objection that evidence was inadmissible proof of other crimes was waived when it was not raised at trial. U.S. v. Carson, C.A.2d, 1983, 702 F.2d 351, 369. It was not plain error to admit evidence of other incidents of check forging before the period charged in the indictment; in the absence of objection issue was not reviewable. U.S. v. Simmons, C.A.3d, 1982, 679 F.2d 1042, 1050. Where no objection was made at trial to the introduction of evidence that an associate of the conspirators was murdered on eve of his appearance, review was limited to whether this was plain error. U.S. v. Howton, C.A.5th, 1982, 688 F.2d 272, 278. Where defense counsel objected on hearsay grounds to use of client's prior record and there was no showing that he intended to sandbag the prosecution, evidence of other crimes admitted without justification and without limiting instruction was plain error. U.S. v. Escobar, C.A.5th, 1982, 674 F.2d 469, 475. If defense counsel believes ruling admitting evidence of other crimes was error, he should have objected or moved to strike; failure to do so is a waiver of the objection. U.S. v. Allain, C.A.7th, 1982, 671 F.2d 248, 252. Given the complexity of a decision to admit or exclude evidence under Rule 404(b), neither court nor counsel should rely upon a continuing objection as a method of dealing with issue. U.S. v. Mangiameli, C.A.10th, 1982, 668 F.2d 1172, 1177. Where defendant did not object to use of other crimes evidence at trial, standard of review was that of plain error. U.S. v. Gonzalez, C.A.5th, 1981, 661 F.2d 488, 493. Where the defendant did not object to hints he was keeping company with loose women on grounds it was character evidence, appellate court did not need to consider admissibility under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Bruner, C.A.1981, 657 F.2d 1278, 1292, 212 U.S.App.D.C. 36. One court has based the obligation to object on Criminal Rule 51 rather than Evidence Rule 103. U.S. v. Foote, C.A.8th, 1980, 635 F.2d 671, 672. Where both defendant and his counsel said they had no objection to exhibit offered to show that defendant was in custody of Attorney General at time of charged escape, it was not error to admit it with statement that the defendant had been convicted of first degree murder underlined in red ink. U.S. v. Caldwell, C.A.7th, 1980, 625 F.2d 144, 148. In absence of objection at trial, receipt of evidence of other crimes could only be reviewed on appeal under plain error standard. U.S. v. Licavoli, C.A.9th, 1979, 604 F.2d 613, 623. Where objection that evidence was proof of "other crimes" was not raised below, this ground was not available on appeal. U.S. v. Viserto, C.A.2d, 1979, 596 F.2d 531, 537. Defendant must object to the sufficiency of the government's foundation for admissibility in order to raise the issue on appeal. U.S. v. Cobb, C.A.8th, 1978, 588 F.2d 607, 611. Where the defendant charged with firearms offenses did not object at trial to evidence that he had been dealing in drugs, reversal was not required where admission did not amount to plain error. U.S. v. Garrett, C.A.5th, 1978, 583 F.2d 1381, 1386. Where defense counsel made no objection to the admission into evidence of mug shots, even though specifically asked by the trial judge if he had any objections, review on appeal was limited by the plain error rule. U.S. v. Bohr, C.A.8th, 1978, 581 F.2d 1294, 1299. Defendant waived objection to admission of evidence of prior crimes when he failed to make a timely objection on this specific ground in the trial court. U.S. v. Cepeda Penes, C.A.1st, 1978, 577 F.2d 754, 760. Objections to evidence of other crimes as being overly prejudicial, irrelevant, and lacking sufficient probative worth was enough to preserve for appeal the question of admissibility under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Gubelman, C.A.2d, 1978, 571 F.2d 1252, 1256 n. 13. If the evidence comes in as part of a non-responsive answer, the trial court may grant a motion to strike rather than declare a mistrial. U.S. v. Aaron, C.A.8th, 1977, 553 F.2d 43, 45. Where the trial court referred to the proffered evidence as "evidence of prior bad acts," the objection was "apparent from the context" within the meaning of Rule 103(a)(1) and the defendant's failure to make a specific objection did not bar appellate review. U.S. v. Barrett, C.A.1st, 1976, 539 F.2d 244, 247 n. 5. Objection to evidence that defendants in a prostitution case offered a Lincoln Continental to a witness as a bribe could not be raised on appeal where no objection was made below. Garibay v. State, Alaska App.1983, 658 P.2d 1350, 1357. Where no objection was made to evidence of other crimes and defense counsel even consented to its admission, there was no error in admission of evidence. State v. Jahns, App.1982, 653 P.2d 19, 133 Ariz. 562. It was enough that defendant objected first time other crime was mentioned; he did not need to object to every subsequent mention of incident to save point for appeal. State v. Featherman, C.A.1982, 651 P.2d 868, 133 Ariz. 340. Claim that trial should have excluded details of other crimes could not be asserted on appeal where no objection on this ground was made at trial. People v. Allen, 1986, 232 Cal.Rptr. 849, 869, 42 Cal.3d 1222, 729 P.2d 115. Where objection to other crimes was generic, appellate court would not consider whether narrower objection to specific parts of the testimony might have been sound. People v. Barney, 1983, 192 Cal.Rptr. 172, 143 Cal.App.3d 490. Failure to object to evidence of other crime waived any error in admitting evidence. Nelson v. Gaunt, 1981, 178 Cal.Rptr. 167, 125 Cal.App.3d 623. In prosecution of pickets for making false report to police officer, failure to object to evidence that pickets struck a delivery truck with their signs was a waiver of the objection. People v. Lawson, 1979, 161 Cal.Rptr. 7, 100 Cal.App.3d 60. Defendant waived objection to use of other crimes evidence by failure to object when it was offered. People v. Jackson, 1978, 151 Cal.Rptr. 688, 88 Cal.App.3d 490. Generally Admissibility of evidence of other crimes will not be reviewed on appeal without a timely objection at trial urging the grounds to be used on appeal. People v. Crume, 1976, 132 Cal.Rptr. 577, 61 Cal.App.3d 803. In absence of a timely objection under Kan.Stats.Ann. s 60-404, defendant could not raise admissibility of evidence of other crimes on appeal. State v. Whitehead, 1979, 602 P.2d 1263, 226 Kan. 719. Where defendant made a motion in limine to exclude evidence of other crimes that was overruled, objection made in chambers after evidence was admitted was sufficient to preserve issue; it was not necessary to object in presence of jury and thus emphasize the evidence. People v. Hernandez, 1985, 377 N.W.2d 729 n. 1, 736 n. 3, 423 Mich. 340. Appellate review of admission of other crimes evidence was precluded where the defendant failed to object. People v. Duenaz, 1986, 384 N.W.2d 79, 82, 148 Mich.App. 60. Where defendant did not move to strike testimony that defendant and companion were passing bad checks, issue of propriety of this evidence was not preserved for appeal. People v. Chappelle, 1982, 319 N.W.2d 584, 114 Mich.App. 364. Where defendant did not object to evidence of other crimes in trial court, he forfeited his right to have issue considered on appeal. State v. Stutelberg, Minn.1983, 328 N.W.2d 735. Where there was no objection and no plain error, defendant was not entitled to raise claim of error in admission of other crimes evidence on appeal. State v. Brown, Minn.1984, 348 N.W.2d 743, 746. Failure to object to prosecutor's questions about defendant's prior possession of gun similar to that used to commit charged robbery precluded raising this issue on appeal. State v. Marquetti, Minn.1982, 322 N.W.2d 316. Where defendant failed to object to other crimes evidence at trial, he could not do so on appeal. State v. Weinberger, 1983, 204 Mont. 278, 665 P.2d 202, 210. Review on appeal was foreclosed where there was no evidence of crime admitted, no objection was made, and insinuation of crime in question was not plain error. State v. Warnick, Mont.1982, 656 P.2d 190. Objection under N.M.R.Ev. 404(b) could not be entertained on appeal where it was not raised below; objection under Rule 609 was not sufficient. State v. Doe, App.1981, 639 P.2d 72, 97 N.M. 263. Where no objection was made at trial, motion in limine did suffice to preserve objection to evidence of other insurance claims filed by the plaintiff. Caserta v. Allstate Insurance Co., 1983, 470 N.E.2d 430, 436, 14 Ohio App.3d 167. Even if testimony that defendant was

"pilfering more or less" was an accusation of another crime, defendant failed to object and thus cannot complain. Peters v. State, Okla.Crim., 1986, 727 P.2d 1386. Where trial judge sustained objection to questions about other crimes, issue was not preserved for appeal where no request that jury be admonished was made. Ross v. State, Okla.Crim.1986, 717 P.2d 117, 121. Error in admission of other crimes was not preserved for appeal where no objection was made at trial. Thompson v. State, Okla.Crim.1985, 705 P.2d 188, 191. Objection to evidence of possession of stolen gun under Rule 404(b) was waived where no objection on this ground was made at trial. Jones v. State, Okla.Crim.1985, 695 P.2d 13, 15. Defendant waived any error in the admission of other crimes evidence when he failed to object to its admission at trial. Huddleston v. State, Okla.Crim.1985, 695 P.2d 8, 10. Issue of introduction of other crimes evidence was not properly before the appellate court for review where no objection was made below. Pegg v. State, Okl.Crim.1983, 659 P.2d 370, 373. Since no proper objection was made at trial, issue of admissibility of other crimes was not preserved for review. Hack v. State, Okl.Crim.1982, 654 P.2d 629. In absence of objection, admission of evidence of other crimes could not be raised as error on appeal. Miller v. State, Okl.Crim.1982, 642 P.2d 276. Claimed error in admission of other crimes was waived when defendant failed to object below. King v. State, Okl.Cr.1982, 640 P.2d 983. Where objection to other crime was not made till conference in chambers after it was admitted, objection would not preserve error. State v. Dirk, S.D.1985, 364 N.W.2d 117, 123. Where defense failed to object to proof of other crime, reversal was possible only if admission was plain error. State v. Sonnenberg, 1984, 344 N.W.2d 95, 103, 117 Wis.2d 159. Failure to interpose a timely objection to evidence of other crimes constitutes a waiver unless evidence is so flagrant as to be plain error. Hopkinson v. State, Wyo.1981, 632 P.2d 79, 124.

But see Improper admission of evidence of a prior crime constitutes plain error impinging upon the fundamental fairness of the trial itself. U.S. v. Biswell, C.A.10th, 1983, 700 F.2d 1310, 1319.

FN21. Irrelevant Objection that evidence was "completely inadmissible" did not suffice to raise issue of Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Penson, C.A.7th, 1990, 896 F.2d 1087, 1092. Objection that evidence of other crime was "not relevant" and "highly prejudicial" was sufficient where judge treated it as an objection under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Nolan, C.A.7th, 1990, 910 F.2d 1553, 1559. Objection that evidence was irrelevant was sufficient to preserve objection to admission of other crimes evidence. U.S. v. Afjehei, C.A.2d, 1989, 869 F.2d 670, 673. "I object" is not sufficient to raise objection under Rule 404(b) but appellate court would assume that the ground of objection was apparent from the context. U.S. v. Gilmore, C.A.8th, 1984, 730 F.2d 550, 554 n. 1. Where defendant made no objection to proof of other crime on grounds of hearsay or opinion, these objections could only be reviewed for plain error. U.S. v. Wormick, C.A.7th, 1983, 709 F.2d 454, 460. Objection that evidence was "an effort to prove that defendants did something by showing that they did the same alleged activities to someone else" was sufficient to raise objection under Rule 404(b). Jay Edwards, Inc. v. New England Toyota Distributor, C.A.1st, 1983, 708 F.2d 814, 824 n. 7. Hearsay objection to statement concerning other crime of defendant was not sufficient to preserve issue of admissibility under Rule 404. U.S. v. Montemayor, C.A.5th, 1982, 684 F.2d 1118, 1121. Where counsel's objection to admissibility of other crimes was limited to Rule 403, the objection did not adequately raise issue of compliance with Rule 404(b) and issue could only be raised if it was plain error. U.S. v. Kloock, C.A.5th, 1981, 652 F.2d 492, 494. The Evidence Rules require that an objection to evidence of other crimes be specific; this requirement was not satisfied by the statement: "This is objected to. That is not a proper place in this trial." U.S. v. Long, C.A.3d, 1978, 574 F.2d 761, 765. Objection that evidence was "collateral" did not suffice to preserve claim that its admission violated Rule 404(b). State v. Bissonette, 1985, 488 A.2d 1231, 1237, 145 Vt. 381. Objection to other crimes evidence under Wis.Stats.Ann. s 904.04(2) was sufficient despite fact it did not cite the section where defense counsel argued to trial judge that if the evidence that circumstantially showed drunk driving were admissible, so would a conviction for that offense. State v. Draize, 1979, 276 N.W.2d 784, 88 Wis.2d 445.

But see Courts hold that relevance objection does not suffice to preserve Rule 404(b) objection, either alone or in conjunction with assertion of Rule 403. U.S. v. Chaidez, C.A.7th, 1990, 919 F.2d 1193, 1202-1203; U.S. v. Harris, C.A.10th, 1990, 903 F.2d 770, 776-777; U.S. v. Diaz, C.A.2d, 1989, 878 F.2d 608, 616; U.S. v. Carroll, C.A.7th, 1989, 871 F.2d 689, 691; U.S. v. Laughlin, C.A.7th, 1985, 772 F.2d 1382, 1391; Bryant v. Consolidated Rail Corp., C.A.1st, 1982, 672 F.2d 217, 220; U.S. v. Singh, C.A.2d, 1980, 628 F.2d 758, 762; State v. Casteneda, App.1982, 642 P.2d 1129, 1133, 97 N.M. 670; State v. Fredrick, 1986, 729 P.2d 56, 60 n. 3, 45 Wn.App. 916; State v. Platz, 1982, 655 P.2d 710, 33 Wn.App. 345.

FN22. Invoking discretion An objection on grounds of relevance is sufficient to also raise claim that evidence should have been excluded under Rule 403, given the close relationship between the two rules. U.S. v. Afjehei, C.A.2d, 1989, 869 F.2d 670, 673. Court rejects argument that because the balancing test of Rule 403 is virtually subsumed in Rule 404(b) via the Advisory Committee's Note, an objection under Rule 404(b) is sufficient to trigger duty to balance under Rule 403. U.S. v. Manso-Portes, C.A.7th, 1989, 867 F.2d 422, 426. This is especially important in the Third Circuit where one decision can be read as requiring the objector to add an invocation of Rule 403 to his objection if he intends to attack the court's exercise of discretion on appeal. U.S. v. Long, C.A.3d, 1978, 574 F.2d 761, 766. However, in that case the defendant failed to make an adequate objection and it is possible that the court's holding is limited to that situation. Defendant could not raise error in admission of evidence of other crimes where he neither objected under Cal.Evid.Code s 1101 nor invoked the court's discretion to exclude under Cal.Evid.Code s 352 and there was nothing in the record to suggest that judge understood that objection was being made on these grounds. People v. Salinas, 1982, 182 Cal.Rptr. 683, 131 Cal.App.3d 925. Objection that evidence of gang membership was so prejudicial as to outweigh any probative value was sufficient to invoke the discretion of the trial court under Cal.Evid.Code s 352. People v. Perez, 1981, 170 Cal.Rptr. 619, 114 Cal.App.3d 470. Objection of lack of foundation was not adequate to raise objections as to prejudicial effect of mug shots. State v. McCardell, Utah, 1982, 652 P.2d 942. Defendant cannot complain of trial judge's failure to balance prejudice against probative worth where he did not object or move to strike the evidence of a prior brawl. State v. Stawicki, 1979, 286 N.W.2d 612, 93 Wis.2d 63.

FN23. Must show relevance Trial court's failure to follow "rigorous criteria for admitting evidence of other crimes" by not showing an evidentiary hypothesis to justify admissibility is harmless error if the appellate court can construct one on its own. U.S. v. Doran, C.A.10th, 1989, 882 F.2d 1511, 1523-1524. "In the Rule 404(b) context, similar act evidence is relevant only if the jury can reasonably conclude that the act occurred and that the defendant was the actor." Huddleston v. U.S., 1988, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 1501, 485 U.S. 681, 99 L.Ed.2d 771. In drug prosecution, evidence of murder of pilot to whom money was owed for past smuggling and who was withholding the use of plane needed for future smuggling was relevant to prove intent to continue the conspiracy. U.S. v. Meester C.A.11th, 1985, 762 F.2d 867, 874. Evidence of other crimes must meet the standard of relevancy set forth in Rule 401; this is a function of the similarity between the charged and uncharged crimes. U.S. v. Dothard, C.A.11th, 1982, 666 F.2d 498, 502. Caution and judgment are called for in receiving evidence of other crimes; trial judge should require the prosecution to explain why the evidence is relevant and necessary. U.S. v. Reed, C.A.6th, 1981, 647 F.2d 678, 687. Unless the relevance of proof of prior crime to some issue in criminal trial can be shown, it must be excluded. U.S. v. Foskey, C.A., 1980, 636 F.2d 517, 523, 204 U.S.App.D.C. 245. As a predicate to the determination that the extrinsic offense is relevant, the prosecution must offer proof demonstrating that the defendant committed the offense. U.S. v. Brown, C.A.5th, 1979, 608 F.2d 551, 555. There is no presumption that other crimes evidence is relevant. U.S. v. Mohel, C.A.2d, 1979, 604 F.2d 748, 751. There is no presumption that other crimes evidence is relevant. U.S. v. Manafzadeh, C.A.2d, 1979, 592 F.2d 81, 86. Government has the burden of showing that evidence offered under Rule 404(b) is relevant to prove one of the excepted facts and that it is more probative than prejudicial to the defendant. U.S. v. Hernandez-Miranda, C.A.9th, 1979, 601 F.2d 1104, 1108. A trial judge faced with an other-crimes evidence problem should require the government to explain why such evidence is relevant and necessary. U.S. v. DeVaughn, C.A.2d, 1979, 601 F.2d 42, 45. Evidence that defendant was in company of a man who was arrested in airport with cocaine in his suitcase was not relevant to show that he hired woman to travel with him with cocaine in her girdle. U.S. v. Mann, C.A.1st, 1978, 590 F.2d 361, 370. Evidence of subsequent rape was not relevant to prove charged rape. U.S. v. Aims Back, C.A.9th, 1979, 588 F.2d 1283, 1286. Relevancy of evidence of other crimes must be examined with care and if connection with the crime charged is not clearly perceived, doubts should be resolved in favor of the accused. People v. Guerrero, 1976, 129 Cal.Rptr. 166, 16 Cal.3d 719, 548 P.2d 366. Evidence of co-defendant's prior trademark infringements had no relevance against defendant in prosecution for passing fraudulent traveler's checks. People v. Jones, 1983, 336 N.W.2d 889, 126 Mich.App. 191. Evidence that four days before handgun robbery of a drug store the defendant pulled a knife on a clerk who tried to apprehend him for stealing a bottle of perfume was relevant to show defendant was in area at the time of the charged crime, that he had a mustache, and was willing to use weapon. State v. Kumpula, Minn.1984, 355 N.W.2d 697, 703. The first two facts could have been proved without showing the crime; the last looks like an inference as to character. For a case in which the court does not state the grounds for supposing the evidence to be relevant and relevance is not obvious, see State v. Thomas, Minn.App.1985, 360 N.W.2d 458 (in rape-burglary where defendant had first attempted to seduce victim by claiming to be football star, evidence of similar seduction attempt was admissible). In prosecution for arson, evidence that the defendant had taken money from purse of victim a year earlier was irrelevant. Dorsey v. State, 1980, 620 P.2d 1261, 96 Nev. 951. In order to gain admission of evidence of other crime, counsel must identify the consequential fact and articulate precisely the evidential hypothesis by which it may be inferred from the commission of the other crime. State v. Ohnstad, No.Dak.1984, 359 N.W.2d 827, 838. Court should not jump into listed categories, but should begin by considering the basic relevancy of other crimes evidence. State v. Johns, 1986, 725 P.2d 312, 320, 301 Or. 535. Evidence offered under Rule 404(b) must also satisfy Rule 401 and be relevant to prove some controverted fact other than propensity to commit crime. State v. Morgan, 1986, 340 S.E.2d 84, 91, 315 N.C. 626. The admissibility of evidence of other crimes under Utah R.Ev. 55 turns on whether it is relevant to prove some material fact. State v. Forsyth, Utah 1982, 641 P.2d 1172, 1175. In deciding whether or not to admit evidence of other crimes, trial judge must first decide if it is relevant to issue on which it is offered, then balance probative worth against prejudice. State v. Saltarelli, 1982, 655 P.2d 697, 98 Wash.2d 358. Krivosha, Langsworth & Pirsch, Relevancy: The Necessary Element in Using Evidence of Other Crimes, Wrongs or Bad Acts to Convict, 1981, 60 Neb.L.Rev. 657.

But see It is defendant's burden to show that other crimes evidence was irrelevant. U.S. v. Culver, C.A.8th, 1991, 929 F.2d 389, 391 (but possible to read this as meaning this is a burden on appeal when evidence has been admitted at trial).

FN24. Burden of proof Evidence that defendant had once flown a plane to Colombia was not admissible to prove his intent in possessing cocaine where there was not a shred of evidence of his intent in making the Colombia flight. U.S. v. Chilcote, C.A.11th, 1984, 724 F.2d 1498, 1503. Rule 404(b) does not require proof that defendant was aware of acts offered to show his motivation as jury could reject his contrary testimony and infer knowledge from acts proved. Bohannon v. Pegelow, C.A.7th, 1981, 652 F.2d 729, 733. It is the government's burden to show that other crimes evidence is relevant and that is more probative than prejudicial. U.S. Herrera-Medina, C.A.9th, 1979, 609 F.2d 376, 379.

FN25. Jury determines The Supreme Court so held in Huddleston v. U.S., 1988, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 485 U.S. 681, 99 L.Ed.2d 771, discussed at footnote 25.1 in this supplement. Evidence that defendant made large investments in real estate was relevant to prove narcotics transactions under Rule 404(b) because jury could infer that defendant was laundering proceeds of crime. U.S. v. Towers, C.A.7th, 1985, 775 F.2d 184, 187. While Fifth and Eleventh Circuits believe that preliminary facts in proof of other crimes is for the jury, Seventh Circuit believes this is a function of the judge under Rule 104(b). U.S. v. Byrd, C.A.7th, 1985, 771 F.2d 215, 222 n. 4.

FN27. Determined by judge This view was emphatically rejected by the Supreme Court in Huddleston v. U.S., 1988, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 1500, 485 U.S. 681, 99 L.Ed.2d 771. Policy of Rule 404(b) would not be served by giving the jury the function of determining the preliminary facts in the admission of the evidence of other crimes. U.S. v. Byrd, C.A.7th, 1985, 771 F.2d 215, 222 n.4. It was not necessary for judge to charge jury that it must find that other crimes were committed by "clear and convincing evidence"; preliminary fact could be decided against proponent under Rule 104(b) by judge only if jury could not reasonably find defendant committed crime. U.S. v. Pepe, C.A.11th, 1984, 747 F.2d 632, 670 n. 74. Determination of preliminary facts which are needed to make other crimes evidence admissible is to be made by the trial judge. U.S. v. Day, C.A.1979, 591 F.2d 861, 878, 192 U.S.App.D.C. 252. The contrary view is taken in U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1978, 582 F.2d 898, 913. In determining whether prior crime has been proved by clear and convincing evidence, court can consider evidence of yet another uncharged crime that was not admitted in evidence. State v. Luna, Minn.1982, 320 N.W.2d 87. The question of whether the proof of a prior crime meets the "clear and convincing" standard is for the trial judge under Minn.R.Ev. 104(a), not the jury under Rule 104(b). State v. Matteson, Minn.1979, 287 N.W.2d 408. The Comment to Prop.N.Y.Evid.Code s 404(b) says that preliminary facts regarding the admission of other crimes evidence are to be determined by the judge under the New York equivalent of F.R.Ev. 104(a). Evidence of other crimes was properly admitted after extensive pretrial hearing in which nine witnesses testified and trial judge made findings of fact and conclusions of law. State v. Wedemann, S.D.1983, 339 N.W.2d 112, 115. For a contrary opinion, see Kuhns, The Propensity to Misunderstand The Character of Specific Acts Evidence, 1981, 66 Iowa L.Rev. 777, 800.

FN28. Offer of proof Trial court is not required to hold hearing on admissibility of other crimes evidence; all that is required is that the judge be satisfied that there is enough evidence so that a jury could decide that defendant committed the act. U.S. v. Carter, C.A.11th, 1985, 760 F.2d 1568, 1579. Rule 103 bars appellate reversal for exclusion of evidence of other crimes offered to support coercion defense where no adequate offer of proof was made in trial court. U.S. v. Morlan, C.A.9th, 1985, 756 F.2d 1442, 1447. Court was not required to hold hearing outside presence of jury on admissibility of other crimes evidence where adequate offer of proof was made, evidence was fully explained in the prosecutor's brief, and explained again at a bench conference at trial. U.S. v. Lavelle, C.A.D.C.1985, 751 F.2d 1266, 1279 n. 17. For a case enforcing a severe requirement for offers of proof by defendant seeking to prove other crimes of government witness, see U.S. v. Cutler, C.A.9th, 1982, 676 F.2d 1245, 1250. Where evidence of other crimes is offered, Rule 104(c) and prior decisions require that the trial judge hold a hearing out of the presence of the jury concerning its admissibility. U.S. v. Benton, C.A.5th, 1981, 637 F.2d 1052, 1055. The trial court was commended for hearing evidence of prior bad acts in camera before permitting them to be introduced into evidence before the jury in U.S. v. McPartlin, C.A.7th, 1979, 595 F.2d 1321, 1345. The failure of the trial court to conduct a preliminary hearing into the admissibility of other crimes evidence is not reversible error. U.S. v. Black, C.A.5th, 1979, 595 F.2d 1116, 1117. For a case in which the prosecutor made an offer of proof to avoid jeopardizing his case if the court thought the evidence inadmissible, a sort of "reverse motion in limine," see U.S. v. McFadyen-Snider, C.A.6th, 1977, 552 F.2d 1178, 1181. This procedure was employed in U.S. v. Brunson, C.A.5th, 1977, 549 F.2d 348, 358. Questions as to the admissibility of other crimes evidence must be determined out of the presence or hearing of the jury. People v. Campbell, 1976, 133 Cal.Rptr. 815, 63 Cal.App.3d 599. Witnesses need not testify at hearing on the admissibility of other crimes evidence; it is enough that prosecutor state the substance of the expected evidence. State v. Breazeale, 1986, 714 P.2d 1356, 1360, 238 Kan. 714. Trial court properly determined admissibility of other crimes evidence out of the presence of the jury. State v. Shepherd, 1983, 657 P.2d 1112, 232 Kan. 614. While it would be preferable for the prosecutor to make an offer of proof showing details of other offense, this was not required where the defense did not insist on one and evidence was never offered because defense to which it was relevant was not made. People v. Johnson, 1983, 333 N.W.2d 585, 124 Mich.App. 80. In ruling on admissibility of evidence of other crimes, trial court can rely on avowal of prosecutor as offer of proof without requiring a question-and-answer offer from witness. State v. McAdoo, Minn.1983, 330 N.W.2d 104. Trial judge followed correct procedure in requiring state to make case for admission of evidence of prior crime in a hearing outside presence of jury in which judge was apprised of quantum and quality of proof that defendant had committed the crime and then balanced probative value and prejudice. Petrocelli v. State, Nev.1985, 692 P.2d 503, 507. Better practice is for proponent of evidence of other crimes to obtain a ruling on the admissibility of the evidence out of the presence of the jury before offering it in evidence. State v. Morgan, 1986, 340 S.E.2d 84, 92, 315 N.C. 626. When other crimes evidence is tendered, it is desirable for the court to require a proffer out of the presence of the jury and make a record of its finding under Rule 403. Elliot v. State, Wyo.1979, 600 P.2d 1044, 1049 n. 1.

FN29. Must specify issue Prosecution must show why other crimes evidence is relevant and necessary to prove a specific element of the charged crime. U.S. v. Yeagin, C.A.5th, 1991, 927 F.2d 798, 803; U.S. v. Porter, C.A.10th, 1989, 881 F.2d 878, 884; U.S. v. Kendall, C.A.10th, 1985, 766 F.2d 1426, 1436; U.S. v. Shackleford, C.A.7th, 1984, 738 F.2d 776, 780; U.S. v. Biswell, C.A.10th, 1983, 700 F.2d 1310, 1317; U.S. v. Figueroa, C.A.2d, 1980, 618 F.2d 934, 939 n. 2. Judge who admits evidence of other crimes must specify under which provision of Rule 404(b) it is being admitted. U.S. v. Westbrook, C.A.8th, 1990, 896 F.2d 330, 334. Failure of prosecution to specify the purpose of introduction of other crimes evidence and attempt to justify this on all the grounds listed in 404(b) warrants inference that purpose was simply to prejudice defendant rather than prove some specific element of the charged crime. U.S. v. Fortenberry, C.A.5th, 1988, 860 F.2d 628, 633. Where instructions limited use of other crimes evidence to one purpose, court could not justify its admissibility on some other ground. U.S. v. Rappaport, Ct.Mil.App.1986, 22 M.J. 445, 447. Testimony of other crimes should not have been admitted where offeror stated baldly that the purpose was to show penchant for violence. Lataille v. Ponte, C.A.1st, 1985, 754 F.2d 33, 36. One court, while criticizing prosecution for refusal to do this either at trial or on appeal, went on to justify admissibility on concededly weak grounds. U.S. v. Mehrmanesh, C.A.9th, 1982, 689 F.2d 822, 831. Evidence of other crimes was not admissible when the prosecution stated that the purpose of the evidence was to show the defendant's propensity to lie and thus show guilt of the charge of making false statement to enlistment officer. U.S. v. Dothard, C.A.11th, 1982, 666 F.2d 498, 504. On appeal, decision admitting evidence of other crimes will be upheld if it is admissible on any ground; it is not necessary that the ground relied upon have been specified in the trial court. U.S. v. Green, C.A.9th, 1981, 648 F.2d 587, 592. Although preferred procedure would have been for defendant to invoke Rule 404(b) instead of Rule 609(a), he is not barred from asserting error in excluding evidence of violent acts of victim to show his fear in support of claim of self-defense where his theory of admissibility was clearly outlined to the trial court. Government of Virgin Islands v. Carino, C.A.3d, 1980, 631 F.2d 226, 230. Although the prosecution did not attempt to justify introduction of evidence of other crimes under Rule 404(b) and the trial court did not give any reasons for admitting the evidence, no such specification is necessary as long as the evidence was in fact admissible under the rule. U.S. v. Provenzano, C.A.3d, 1980, 620 F.2d 985, 993. Although evidence of other crimes might have been relevant to prove state of mind of defendants, appellate court could not use that theory to salvage case where evidence was admitted on an erroneous theory and under erroneous instructions; potential unfairness of permitting the assertion of new theory on appeal is substantial. U.S. v. Pantone, C.A.3d, 1979, 609 F.2d 675, 681. One appellate court has thought it proper to justify the admission of the evidence on other grounds despite the fact that the trial judge admitted it on the issue of "intent", because the instruction given at the end of the trial listed all of the other grounds in Rule 104(b). U.S. v. Albert, C.A.5th, 1979, 595 F.2d 283, 288 n. 11. When evidence of other crimes is offered, the prosecutor's first duty is to identify with specificity the purpose for which the evidence is admissible; this duty is not satisfied by reciting litany of all the purposes listed in Rule 404. People v. Golochowicz, 1982, 319 N.W.2d 518, 413 Mich. 298. In determining relevance of evidence of other crimes, trial court must first identify the purpose for which the evidence is offered. State v. Saltarelli, 1982, 655 P.2d 697, 98 Wash.2d 358.

FN30. Point to element Defendant's plea of not guilty puts in issue every element of crime charged. U.S. v. Mothershed, C.A.8th, 1988, 859 F.2d 585, 589. The Ninth Circuit has accused other circuits of accepting the view that a plea of not guilty puts in issue all of the elements of the offense and justifies use of other crimes without any inquiry into what issues were actively contested at trial. U.S. v. McKoy, C.A.9th, 1985, 771 F.2d 1207, 1214 n. 4. By pleading not guilty, the defendant puts in issue all elements of the charged crime; the prosecution is not required to wait until the defense puts in evidence asserting a lack of one of the elements but may prove other crimes in anticipation of defense. U.S. v. Gilmore, C.A.8th, 1984, 730 F.2d 550, 554. Since plea of not guilty placed in issue the defendant's membership in charged conspiracy, it was not necessary for prosecution to wait for defense case before introducing other crimes on this issue. U.S. v. Wagoner, C.A.8th 1983, 713 F.2d 1371, 1375. In conspiracy case in 11th Circuit, the mere entry of plea of not guilty puts issue of intent in issue even though defendant denies commission of acts. U.S. v. Kopituk, C.A.11th, 1982, 690 F.2d 1289, 1334.

FN31. "Fancy defenses" The Thompson argument was adopted by the court in State v. Harris, App.1985, 365 N.W.2d 922, 926, 123 Wis.2d 231. For an example of an appellate court engaged in just this sort of game, see U.S. v. Lewis, C.A.1983, 701 F.2d 972, 226 U.S.App.D.C. 236 (after prosecution elicited on cross-examination that car in which he was riding had a valid sticker, it was proper to permit prosecution to prove that defendant had been arrested on outstanding assault warrant to rebut possible inference that arrest which turned up blackjack defendant was charged with possessing was illegal and high-handed even though defense counsel indicated he had no intent to raise any such claim; no attempt to explore possible alternatives to the introduction of evidence suggesting that defendant was of assaultive character and thus likely to use blackjack for violent purposes).

FN33. Read into codes Where co-defendants did not dispute that they were together at time of charged crime and the only issue was which was the triggerman, there was no disputed issue to which evidence that they had committed five prior robberies together was relevant. People v. Holt, 1984, 208 Cal.Rptr. 547, 555, 37 Cal.3d 436, 690 P.2d 1207. Evidence of other crimes must be relevant to an ultimate fact actually in dispute. People v. Dellinger, 1984, 209 Cal.Rptr. 503, 511, 163 Cal.App.3d 284. Evidence of other crimes must be offered upon an issue which will ultimately prove to be material to the prosecution's case. People v. Gerrero, 1976, 129 Cal.Rptr. 166, 16 Cal.3d 719, 548 P.2d 366. Before receiving evidence of other crimes, the court should require a showing of materiality and necessity. People v. Eastmon, 1976, 132 Cal.Rptr. 510, 61 Cal.App.3d 646. Under Wis.Stats.Ann. s 904.01, evidence is not relevant unless it proves a material fact; it was therefore error to admit evidence of a prior rape where the defense in charged rape was consent because such evidence is not relevant to the issue of consent. State v. Alsteen, 1982, 324 N.W.2d 426, 108 Wis.2d 723.

FN34. "Nearly every court" Defendant placed identity in issue by denying any participation in charged robbery. U.S. v. Connelly, C.A.7th, 1989, 874 F.2d 412, 418. It was error to admit other crime to prove motive and opportunity where defense conceded both of these. U.S. v. Fortenberry, C.A.5th, 1988, 860 F.2d 628, 634. Before evidence of other crimes is admissible, the trial court must find that it is relevant to some material issue. U.S. v. McKoy, C.A.9th, 1985, 771 F.2d 1207, 1214. Evidence of other crimes may not be admitted unless relevant to an actual issue in the case. U.S. v. Hodges, C.A.9th, 1985, 770 F.2d 1475, 1479. Where trial court instructed jury that identity was "the most important issue in the case", it is obvious that identity is in issue. U.S. v. DiGeronimo, C.A.2d, 1979, 598 F.2d 746, 753. Evidence of other crime was not admissible to show identity where defendant was admittedly the person present in auto in which drugs were found and the disputed issue was his possession of drugs; prior crimes evidence may not be introduced on issues that are not contested. U.S. v. Foskey, C.A., 1980, 636 F.2d 517, 524, 204 U.S.App.D.C. 245. Other crimes evidence is never admissible unless it is necessary to prove a material fact such as those listed in Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Shelton, C.A.1980, 628 F.2d 54, 56, 202 U.S.App.D.C. 54. To be admissible under F.R.Ev. 404(b), evidence of other crimes must be relevant to some disputed issue in the trial and its probative value must not be substantially outweighed by the rise of unfair prejudice. U.S. v. Figueroa, C.A.2d, 1980, 618 F.2d 934, 939. The Seventh Circuit appears to be retreating from Frierson though without overruling it. In U.S. v. Miroff, C.A.7th, 1979, 606 F.2d 777, 780, the court said that the government could introduce evidence of other crimes to show the defendant's knowledge that certain property was stolen even without any contention by the defense that such knowledge was lacking inasmuch as knowledge was an element of the crime. Evidence of other crimes must be relevant to an actual issue in the case in order to be admissible under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Mohel, C.A.2d, 1979, 604 F.2d 748, 751. If defendant concedes the issue to which other crimes evidence is relevant, the evidence may be inadmissible not only under Rule 403 but also Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Danzey, C.A.2d, 1979, 594 F.2d 905, 914 n. 9. Under Rule 404(b), an issue on which the other crimes evidence is admissible must be raised at trial before the evidence can be introduced. U.S. v. Peltier, C.A.8th, 1978, 585 F.2d 314, 321. In prosecution for distribution of heroin, the government is required to prove that the distribution was intentional; defendant's general denial of acts did not remove issue of intent from the case and the government was entitled to anticipate defense of lack of intent. U.S. v. Jardan, C.A.8th, 1977, 552 F.2d 216, 219. Evidence of prior extortionate transactions was admissible to prove intent where intent was in issue in the trial. U.S. v. Largent, C.A.6th, 1976, 545 F.2d 1039, 1043. Where the government concedes that no mental element was in issue, evidence of other crimes is not admissible to show motive, intent, or the like. U.S. v. Park, C.A.5th, 1976, 525 F.2d 1279, 1284 n. 6. Evidence of other crimes is inadmissible if the issue to which it is relevant is not expressly in dispute. People v. Alcala, 1984, 205 Cal.Rptr. 775, 790, 36 Cal.3d 604, 685 P.2d 1126. Where neither identity or intent was in issue, evidence was inadmissible because all other crimes could prove was the defendant's disposition to act in the way he was accused of acting. People v. Gordon, 1985, 212 Cal.Rptr. 174, 189, 165 Cal.App.3d 839. Where defense was that charged rape of daughter did not take place, there was no issue of intent or identity on which evidence of rape of other daughter would be admissible. State v. Goodrich, Me.1981, 432 A.2d 413, 417. Materiality requires that there must be a genuine controversy about the fact that other crimes evidence is offered to prove; where the defendant denied delivering anything to informant, there was no issue concerning her knowledge of the nature of cocaine. People v. Rosen, 1984, 358 N.W.2d 584, 136 Mich.App. 745. Where defense was that acts were never committed, intent was not in issue and it was error to admit evidence of other crimes to prove it. People v. Key, 1982, 328 N.W.2d 609, 121 Mich.App. 168. Evidence of other crimes under Mich.R.Ev. 404(b) must be offered on a factor that is material to the determination of defendant's guilt of charged offense. People v. Golochowicz, 1982, 319 N.W.2d 518, 413 Mich. 298. Before evidence can be admitted under Mich.R.Ev. 404(b) it must be offered for some "material" purpose; issue is material when defendant disputes it in opening argument, by cross-examination of prosecution witnesses, or presenting affirmative evidence. People v. Hawley, 1982, 317 N.W.2d 564, 112 Mich.App. 784, judgment reversed on other grounds 332 N.W.2d 398, 417 Mich. 975. In order to be admissible under Mich.R.Ev. 404(b), evidence must not only be directed at one of the specified purposes but that purpose must be one that is "in issue" in the case. People v. Major, 1979, 285 N.W.2d 660, 407 Mich. 394. Since motive for soliciting act of prosecution is obvious, it was not a material issue in case and prior acts of prostitution were not admissible to prove motive. State v. Matthews, 1984, 471 N.E.2d 849, 14 Ohio App.3d 440. If the fact for which evidence of other crimes is offered is of no consequence to the outcome of the action, the evidence should be excluded. State v. Saltarelli, 1982, 655 P.2d 697, 98 Wash.2d 358. Evidence is not admissible under Rule 404(b) even if it fits within an exception thereto if the point it is offered to prove is not at issue. State v. Harris, App.1985, 365 N.W.2d 922, 925, 123 Wis.2d 231. Where the defendant denied that he had touched the child, his intent to molest was not an issue in the case. State v. Sonnenberg, 1984, 344 N.W.2d 95, 101, 117 Wis.2d 159.

FN35. Contrary opinions Seventh Circuit does not permit defendant to remove issue of specific intent from case by relying on some defense that does not contest the issue of intent. U.S. v. Chaimson, C.A.7th, 1985, 760 F.2d 798,

808. In every conspiracy case, a not guilty plea renders the defendant's intent a material issue and other crimes evidence is admissible unless the defendant affirmatively takes the issue of intent out of the case. U.S. v. Roberts, C.A.5th, 1980, 619 F.2d 379, 383. Whether a mere plea of not guilty justifies the prosecution in introducing extrinsic evidence in its case in chief is an open question in this circuit. U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1978, 582 F.2d 898, 915. For the sorry state of the precedents in California, see the scholarly opinion of Kaus, J., for the court in People v. Tassell, 1984, 201 Cal.Rptr. 567, 36 Cal.3d 77, 679 P.2d 1. Conlon & O'Connor, Evidence: Recent Developments in the Seventh Circuit, 1982, 58 Chi.-Kent L.Rev. 417, 428.

FN36. Deleted provision Because Rule 401 makes evidence relevant even when offered on an uncontested issue, evidence of other crimes is admissible to prove intent even when the issue of intent is not contested. U.S. v. Roberts, C.A.5th, 1980, 619 F.2d 379, 382 n. 1. The Fifth Circuit has read this deletion as having repealed the requirement that the issue be in dispute except in cases in which intent is not an element of the crime. U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1978, 582 F.2d 898, 914 n. 19. However, the court reads the requirement back into the balancing test. See s 5250 n. 29.

FN37. Consider under Rule 403 Where the defendant does not contest intent, evidence of other crimes offered on that issue is inadmissible because the incremental probative value of the evidence is inconsequential when compared to its prejudice. U.S. v. Roberts, C.A.5th, 1980, 619 F.2d 379, 382. Comment, Federal Rules of Evidence--Rule 404(b) Limits The Admission Of Other Crimes Evidence, Under An Inclusionary Approach, To Cases Where It Is Relevant To An Issue In Dispute, 1980, 55 Notre Dame L. 574, 586-587.

FN38. Stipulation If the defense had conceded intent, court would have been obliged to remove issue from case and foreclose the use of other crimes evidence to prove it. U.S. v. Ortiz, C.A.2d, 1988, 857 F.2d 900, 905. The court ducked the issue in U.S. v. Dynalectric Co., C.A.11th, 1988, 859 F.2d 1559, 1581 n. 31. But other courts have accepted the controlling effect of an offer to stipulate: U.S. v. Yeagin, C.A.5th, 1991, 927 F.2d 798, 801 (offer to stipulate to intent to distribute drugs and to prior felony on weapons count); Wierstak v. Heffernan, C.A.1st, 1986, 789 F.2d 968, 972 (stipulation to probable cause bars evidence of crime plaintiff was accused of committing); U.S. v. McDowell, C.A.D.C., 1985, 762 F.2d 1072, 1076 n. 4 (offer to stipulate to intent will exclude other acts under Rule 403); U.S. v. Franklin, C.A.10th, 1983, 704 F.2d 1183 (refusal to stipulate to racial intent justifies admission of other racial crimes); U.S. v. Reed, C.A.2d, 1981, 639 F.2d 896, 906 (refusal to stipulate to knowledge and intent justifies use of other crimes to prove); U.S. v. DeJohn, C.A.7th, 1981, 638 F.2d 1048, 1053 (prosecution refusal to stipulate to be taken into account in Rule 403 balancing); U.S. v. Mohel, C.A.2d, 1979, 604 F.2d 748, 753 (unequivocal offer to stipulate removes issues in drug prosecution); U.S. v. DeVaughn, C.A.2d, 1979, 601 F.2d 42, 46 (evidence of identity inadmissible where prosecution refused to accept stipulation of identity). The principle seems to be accepted by cases that find the stipulation inadequate to justify exclusion: U.S. v. Davis, C.A.5th, 1986, 792 F.2d 1299, 1305 (stipulation to fact A does not exclude when relevant to fact B); U.S. v. Martin, C.A.4th, 1985, 773 F.2d 579, 583 (stipulation of amount of unreported income did not bar evidence of crimes to show source); U.S. v. Sliker, C.A.2d, 1984, 751 F.2d 477, 487 (offer to stipulate lacked sufficient clarity to remove issue); U.S. v. Pedroza, C.A.2d, 1984, 750 F.2d 187, 201 (offer to stipulate drugs were ransom demand did not suffice to show motive for kidnapping this particular victim and thus intent); U.S. v. Rubio, C.A.9th, 1983, 727 F.2d 786, 797 (stipulation of conviction did not bar proof of details thereof); U.S. v. Wilkes, C.A.5th, 1982, 685 F.2d 135, 137 (stipulation of intent that denied intent did not bar proof of intent); U.S. v. Provenzano, C.A.3d, 1980, 620 F.2d 985, 1004 (offer to stipulate to mediate fact that imprisonment was relevant to prove did not bar evidence where it left ultimate fact in dispute). District court properly refused to accept defense stipulation of intent that was inconsistent with proffered defense but it erred in not doing so after defense altered theory to make it consistent with stipulation. U.S. v. Colon, C.A.2d, 1989, 880 F.2d 650, 658-659.

State cases The better course would be to require acceptance of defense stipulation that would have avoided any necessity to show that defendant was a suspect in another case in order to authenticate a mug shot. Braaten v. State, Alaska App.1985, 705 P.2d 1311, 1317. If a defendant offers to admit the existence of an element of the crime, the prosecutor must accept that offer and refrain from introducing evidence of other crimes to prove that element. People v. Hall, 1980, 167 Cal.Rptr. 844, 28 Cal.3d 143, 616 P.2d 826. Although knowledge of nature of narcotic is an essential element of crime of selling drugs, this element may be established by stipulation to avoid prejudice to accused by use of prior conviction to prove knowledge; where it is possible to meet issue by stipulation, it is error to refuse to do so. People v. Washington, 1979, 157 Cal.Rptr. 58, 95 Cal.App.3d 488. Where the defense offered to stipulate to elements of charged crime and this would not unjustly impair the prosecution's case, it was error to permit the prosecution to prove prejudicial details of other crime. People v. Perry, 1985, 212 Cal.Rptr. 793, 798, 166 Cal.App.3d 924. In prosecution for being a felon in possession of weapon, defendant should be permitted to stipulate to felon status in cases where prior conviction is not relevant to other issues in the case. State v. Davidson, Minn.1984, 351 N.W.2d 8, 11. So long as defendant does not stipulate to identity, it is an issue that can be proved by other crimes. State v. Shaffer, Utah 1986, 725 P.2d 1301, 1308.

But see Prosecution need not accept defense stipulation but can insist on proving fact by other crimes evidence despite offer to stipulate. U.S. v. Zalman, C.A.6th, 1989, 870 F.2d 1047, 1056; U.S. v. Booker, C.A.8th, 1983, 706 F.2d 860, 862; U.S. v. Campbell, C.A.9th, 1985, 774 F.2d 354, 356.

FN39. Control order of proof A similar view is taken in A.B.A. Section of Litigation, Emerging Problems Under The Federal Rules of Evidence, 1983, pp. 66-67. If the court does not do this, it may have to give the jury a futile instruction to the jury to disregard the evidence when it later turns out the evidence should be excluded. See, e.g., U.S. v. Curcio, C.A.2d, 1985, 759 F.2d 237, 240. The safer course in offering similar act evidence is for the prosecution to rest, reserving out of the presence of the jury the right to reopen to present such evidence in the event the defendant rests without introducing evidence. U.S. v. Figueroa, C.A.2d, 1980, 618 F.2d 934, 939 n. 1. While the cases suggest that it is wise for the government to wait to see how the case develops before offering other crimes evidence so that it can show need, at least where prejudice is substantial and probative worth slight, there is no rule prohibiting the use of such evidence during the prosecution's case-in-chief. U.S. v. Herrera-Medina, C.A.9th, 1979, 609 F.2d 376, 379 n. 1. Where the defendant relied on defense of duress and other crime was relevant to that defense, it was proper to permit the prosecution to prove the other crime during its case-in-chief. U.S. v. Hearst, C.A.9th, 1978, 573 F.2d 579. Trial judge properly deferred ruling on admission of evidence that defendant possessed a gun similar to one used in bank robbery until all of the other proof had been introduced so that he better weigh probative worth against prejudice. U.S. v. Robinson, C.A.2d, 1977, 560 F.2d 507, 515.

FN40. Other evidence first While it is usually better for judge to wait to admit other crimes evidence until rebuttal, when it was clear that the defendant would rely on intent as defense, it was proper to admit the evidence during the prosecution's case-in-chief. U.S. v. Lavelle, C.A.D.C.1985, 751 F.2d 1266, 1278 n. 16. Where defendant never did affirmatively take his intent out of the case, it was not error to permit the prosecution to prove other crimes as part of its case-in-chief. U.S. v. Mergist, C.A.5th, 1984, 738 F.2d 645, 650. It was eminently reasonable for trial judge to exclude evidence of other crimes until the close of the prosecution's case. U.S. v. Hadaway, C.A.4th, 1982, 681 F.2d 214, 217. Where it was abundantly obvious before case began that identity of robbers would be the only major issue, it was proper to permit proof of 15 other robberies during the prosecution's case since otherwise there might be no evidence on crucial issue. U.S. v. Danzey, C.A.2d, 1979, 594 F.2d 905, 912. Trial court properly exercised his discretion by waiting until the close of the government's case to permit the introduction of evidence of a prior conviction on the issue of intent. U.S. v. Williams, C.A.2d, 1978, 577 F.2d 188, 193. Ordinarily it is preferable to wait until the end of the defense case to decide upon the admissibility of other crimes evidence because at that time the court is in a better position to see what are the issues in the case and the need for the evidence; but where government could reasonably anticipate defense as a result of confession of defendant, it was not error to admit evidence during case-in-chief. U.S. v. Brunson, C.A.5th, 1977, 549 F.2d 348, 361 n. 20. Where intent had been in dispute in prior trial, prosecution was justified in introducing evidence of prior crimes on that issue as part of its case-in-chief. U.S. v. Adderly, C.A.5th, 1976, 529 F.2d 1178, 1182. Before evidence of other crimes can be admitted, there must be proof of the commission of the charged crime. State v. Ohnstad, No.Dak.1984, 359 N.W.2d 827, 837.

FN41. Rebuttal Trial court should have excluded evidence of other crimes until after the defense case to see if intent would be an admission; if the defense puts on no defense, the prosecution should then be allowed to reopen to introduce the evidence if it is then admissible. U.S. v. Colon, C.A.2d, 1989, 880 F.2d 650, 660 n. 2. One court, for reasons that are obscure, thought it was better for the government to offer the evidence during its case in chief rather than on rebuttal. U.S. v. Smith Grading and Paving, Inc., C.A.4th, 1985, 760 F.2d 527, 531. Though it is preferable to delay the admission of 404(b) evidence until after the defense rests so the court can see what issues are in dispute, where defense is made clear at outset of trial and defense did not object to timing, it was not error to admit evidence earlier. U.S. v. Estabrook, C.A.8th, 1985, 774 F.2d 284, 289. Judge did not err in not deferring ruling on the admissibility of evidence of other crimes until after defense case where no request for this was made and key government witness was an accomplice with a blemished record. U.S. v. Wagoner, C.A.8th, 1983, 713 F.2d 1371, 1376. Trial court has discretion to admit evidence of other crimes that would have been admissible in case-in-chief during prosecution's rebuttal. U.S. v. Bulman, C.A.11th, 1982, 667 F.2d 1374, 1382 n. 12. Although normally the government may not introduce evidence of defendant's propensity to engage in crime as part of its case-in-chief, it may do so once a defendant submits some evidence which raises the possibility that he was induced to commit the crime. U.S. v. Salisbury, C.A.5th, 1981, 662 F.2d 738, 740. Where it was obvious from defendant's refusal to accept a stipulation that intent was going to be disputed, policy reasons for postponing admissibility of other crimes evidence until after the defense has presented its case did not apply and it was proper to permit the government to put in the evidence during its case in chief. U.S. v. Reed, C.A.2d, 1981, 639 F.2d 896, 907. Normally evidence of prior crime offered to show knowledge or intent of defendant should not be admitted until the conclusion of the defendant's case since the judge is in a better position to engage in required balancing under Rule 403 at that time; however, it was not reversible error to admit it at the conclusion of the government case when no objection to time of admission was made. U.S. v. Alessi, C.A.2d, 1980, 638 F.2d 466, 477. Where evidence of another crime is offered to show that defendant did the act charged, it is admissible as part of the prosecution's case-in-chief, but when offered to show knowledge or intent it should not be admitted until the conclusion of the defendant's case; this enables the trial judge to determine if intent is really disputed. U.S. v. Figueroa, C.A.2d 1980, 618 F.2d 934, 939. The admission of other crimes evidence should normally await the conclusion of the defendant's case; the court will then be in the best position to balance the probative worth of, and the government's need for, such evidence against the prejudice to the defendant. U.S. v. Benedetto, C.A.2d, 1978, 571 F.2d 1246, 1249. Government should wait until issue is sharpened by defense evidence before introducing evidence of other crimes on rebuttal. U.S. v. Feinberg, C.A.7th, 1976, 535 F.2d 1004, 1010. It would have been wiser for the trial judge to have excluded evidence of other crime until the conclusion of the defendant's case when there would have been a better opportunity to appraise the prosecution's need for it. U.S. v. Leonard, C.A.2d, 1975, 524 F.2d 1076, 1092. To avoid bringing in other crimes evidence to prove an issue that will not be disputed, the trial judge should instruct the prosecutor not to refer to such evidence until judge rules it admissible in rebuttal. People v. Perkins, 1984, 205 Cal.Rptr. 625, 628-629, 159 Cal.App.3d 646. Trial court did not err in not ruling on defense motion to exclude evidence of prior conviction for child abuse until after defense testimony; until that time, the judge had no assurance that the defense would not raise accident or some other issue to which the evidence could be relevant on rebuttal. State v. Chapman, Me.1985, 496 A.2d 297, 303. Prosecutor can prove evidence of other crimes in rebuttal because he cannot use the evidence until the matter it tends to disprove, repel, or contradict is in issue. People v. Johnson, 1983, 333 N.W.2d 585, 124 Mich.App. 80. Court cites with approval the view of some courts that admission of other crimes evidence should be restricted to rebuttal where the availability of other proof and the disputed issues are clearer. State v. Harris, App.1985, 365 N.W.2d 922, 926, 123 Wis.2d 231. It was error to admit other crimes evidence to rebut testimony of the defendant during the prosecution's case-in-chief when defendant had not yet testified and, had evidence not been introduced, might well have chosen not to give testimony supposed to be rebutted by the evidence. State v. Holder, Utah 1984, 694 P.2d 583, 584.

FN43. Must satisfy other rules Without any explanation, the Fifth Circuit has held that the best evidence rule is inapplicable to the proof of other crimes. U.S. v. Byers, CA.5th, 1979, 600 F.2d 1130, 1132. Adoption of the inclusionary form of the rule does not mean that the government can use any means it chooses to prove the other crime. U.S. v. Lyles, C.A.2d, 1979, 593 F.2d 182, 195. Rule 404(b) does not make evidence of other crimes admissible when the evidence is barred by the hearsay rule. People v. Raffaelli, Colo.App.1985, 701 P.2d 881, 885. Witness to other crime must have personal knowledge of that crime and cannot relay hearsay accounts of modus operandi. State v. Jones, Utah 1982, 656 P.2d 1012.

FN44. Proof by conviction Fact that prior conviction was on a plea of nolo contendere does not affect its admissibility as proof of prior crimes. U.S. v. Frederickson, C.A.8th, 1979, 601 F.2d 1358, 1365 n. 10. U.S. v. Sigal, C.A.9th, 1978, 572 F.2d 1320, 1323. Proof of other crime need not be a constitutionally valid criminal conviction; hence, proof of a conviction in a foreign court is admissible for this purpose. U.S. v. Nolan, C.A.10th, 1977, 551 F.2d 266, 270. Conviction of defendant who testifies as a witness may be used both for impeachment and as substantive evidence if requirements of Rule 404(b) are met. U.S. v. Wilkerson, C.A., 1976, 548 F.2d 970, 179 U.S.App.D.C. 15. There may, however, be hearsay problems if the other crime is one not punishable by death or more than a year in prison. See Rule 803(22).

FN47. "Beyond reasonable doubt" In a case in which an uncharged bribe was used to show motive for accumulation of slush fund, court seems to think that fact that bribe was paid from slush fund must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. U.S. v. Siegel, C.A.2d, 1983, 717 F.2d 9, 17. The lower standard of proof has been advanced as a justification for admission of evidence of other acts which have been the subject of a previous acquittal. U.S. v. Etley, C.A.5th, 1978, 574 F.2d 850, 853. Cf. Smith v. Wainwright, C.A.5th, 1978, 568 F.2d 362, 364 (holding that subsequent acquittal of other crime does not invalidate conviction based upon it on grounds that this would be tantamount to requiring that proof of other crime be beyond a reasonable doubt). Testimony in record sufficed to provide clear evidence of defendant's participation in prior murder offered to show cover-up motive for the charged crime. State v. Williams, Iowa 1985, 360 N.W.2d 782, 786. Proof of prior crimes need not be beyond a reasonable doubt but must convince the jury of the probability that defendant did the act; the testimony of three witnesses was sufficient for this purpose. People v. Worden, 1979, 284 N.W.2d 159, 91 Mich.App. 666.

FN48. Admissibility generally For a case which conveniently overlooks this, see U.S. v. Murphy, C.A.7th, 1985, 768 F.2d 1518, 1535 (invoking Rule 404(b) in bribery case to permit testimony by witness that he had paid numerous bribes to judge over a five year period but could not remember names or details of cases). Undisputed testimony of witnesses was sufficient to permit jury to conclude that corporation had committed prior crime. U.S. v. Bi-Co Pavers, Inc., C.A.5th, 1984, 741 F.2d 730, 737. One court has found a hearsay statement to be sufficient proof of another crime offered to show knowledge of illicit drugs. U.S. v. Pirolli, C.A.11th, 1982, 673 F.2d 1200, 1203. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts that is vague and speculative is not admissible under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Peltier, C.A.8th, 1978, 585 F.2d 314, 321. Evidence of bad act requires showing of sufficient indicia of reliability; it was sufficient that hearsay accusations of murder victim were corroborated by physical evidence of assaults committed on her. State v. Jeffers, Sup.Ct.1983, 661 P.2d 1105, 135 Ariz. 404. In child abuse prosecution, evidence that victim had suffered a spiral fracture of leg two weeks earlier was improperly admitted where there was no evidence that defendant was responsible for the injury. People v. Dellinger, 1984, 209 Cal.Rptr. 503, 512, 163 Cal.App.3d 284. It is not enough to prove commission of other crimes by plain, clear, and convincing evidence if there is not at least a prima facie case that the defendant was the perpetrator. Bishop v. State, Wyo.1984, 687 P.2d 242, 246. Boyce, Evidence of Other Crimes or Wrongdoing, 1977, 5 Utah B.J. 31, 60 (reporting little consideration of issues in Utah cases). One writer has proposed a variable standard. See Sharpe, Two-Step Balancing and the Admissibility of Other Crimes Evidence: A Sliding Scale of Proof, 1984, 59 Notre Dame L.Rev. 556.

But see The Second Circuit has, however, rejected this view as based on a "misconception," holding that the prosecution need prove the other crime only by a preponderance of the evidence so long as the entire record supports finding of guilt of charged crime beyond a reasonable doubt. U.S. v. Leonard, C.A.2d, 1975, 524 F.2d 1076, 1090-1091. Evidence of other crimes need only be proved by a preponderance of the evidence. U.S. v. Kahan, C.A.2d, 1978, 572 F.2d 923, 932. Prima facie proof of an uncharged offense is all that is required. People v. DeRango, 1981, 171 Cal.Rptr. 429, 115 Cal.App.3d 583. For California cases holding that the prior crime need only be proved by a preponderance of the evidence, see Roth, Understanding Admissibility of Prior Bad Acts: A Diagrammatic Approach, 1982, 9 Pepp.L.Rev. 297, 310 n. 48.

FN49. "Substantial evidence" Defendant's confession of crime was substantial evidence sufficient to justify its use as other crime evidence. People v. Doyle, 1983, 342 N.W.2d 560, 563, 129 Mich.App. 145. Before evidence of bad acts can be admitted, there must substantial evidence that the defendant actually committed the acts. People v. Jones, 1983, 336 N.W.2d 889, 126 Mich.App. 191. Before evidence of other crime can be admitted under Mich.R.Ev. 404(b), there must be substantial evidence that defendant was the perpetrator of the crime. People v. Golochowicz, 1982, 319 N.W.2d 518, 413 Mich. 298. Fact the defendant's palmprint was found at site of burglary was sufficient proof of his participation to permit it to be used to identify him as perpetrator of charged burglary. Pedford v. State, Tex.App.1986, 720 S.W.2d 267, 268.

FN51. "Satisfactory proof" Fact that witness could not recall details of the defendant's boasts about his pedophile conquests did not violate rule requiring "clear proof" of other crimes. State v. Spargo, Iowa 1985, 364 N.W.2d 203, 209.

FN52. "Clear and convincing" Evidence of other crime is admissible only if there is clear and convincing evidence that the defendant committed the other crime. State v. Doughman, Minn.1986, 384 N.W.2d 450, 454. Evidence of other crimes satisfied requirement that defendant's commission of those crimes be proved by clear and convincing evidence. State v. Halverson, Minn.App.1986, 381 N.W.2d 40, 43. Circumstantial evidence of bid-rigging satisfied requirement of proof that was clear and convincing. State v. Rupp, Minn.App.1986, 393 N.W.2d 496, 499. A consent decree signed by defendant is clear and convincing evidence that he committed the violations alleged. State v. Stagg, Minn.1984, 342 N.W.2d 124, 127. Fact that witness was not able to make a positive identification of defendant as perpetrator of other crime and charges based thereon had been dismissed by the state did not mean that the evidence could not meet the clear and convincing standard. State v. McAdoo, Minn.1983, 330 N.W.2d 104. Testimony of accomplice and victim of robbery who had identified defendant from a photo display was clear and convincing evidence of other crime. State v. Johnson, Minn.1982, 322 N.W.2d 220. Positive nature of victim's testimony satisfied the clear and convincing evidence test; fact that other crime is against the same victim as the charged crime does not make it inadmissible. State v. Luna, Minn.1982, 320 N.W.2d 87, 89. In prosecution for complicity in murder of witness against the defendant's paramour, evidence that she had attempted to bail out a person who was involved in another attempt by the paramour to murder a witness should have been excluded under Minn.R.Ev. 404(b) as it did not show her participation prior crime by clear and convincing evidence. State v. Link, Minn.1979, 289 N.W.2d 102.

FN54. "Plain, clear, and conclusive" Before state can introduce evidence of a prior act, it must be shown by plain, clear and convincing evidence that the defendant committed it. Petrocelli v. State, Nev.1985, 692 P.2d 503, 508. Fact that proof of crime was plain, clear and convincing did not make it admissible where the crime was offered to show identity and there was not a prima facie case that defendant was the perpetrator. Bishop v. State, Wyo.1984, 687 P.2d 242, 246.

FN55. Continue to apply The Supreme Court has rendered obsolete all the federal caselaw previously appearing in this and adjacent footnotes by holding that Rule 104(b) applies and only requires proof by a mere preponderance. Huddleston v. U.S., 1988, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 485 U.S. 681, 99 L.Ed.2d 771. In discarding these obsolete precedents, we have preserved those that either show the prior federal common law or those that hold that the higher standard was satisfied. The latter remain useful since evidence that satisfies the higher standard should suffice as proof by a preponderance. Where evidence of offer to fix traffic ticket was recorded on tape, it was clear and convincing evidence of the crime. U.S. v. Tuchow, C.A.7th, 1985, 768 F.2d 855, 863. Testimony concerning hearsay statement of defendant admitting it is clear and convincing evidence of other crime. U.S. v. Nabors, C.A.8th, 1985, 761 F.2d 465, 471. Where defendant's admission concerning bribes had been admitted, it was reasonable and clear and convincing evidence that what was in envelope delivered for defendant was bribe money. U.S. v. Chaimson, C.A.7th, 1985, 760 F.2d 798, 807. In civil action, prior crime need not be proved by clear and convincing evidence. Bowden v. McKenna, C.A.1st, 1979, 600 F.2d 282, 284. Where defendant was demoted for filing false report after a police investigation of the charge was clear and convincing evidence of the crime. U.S. v. Wormick, C.A.7th, 1983, 709 F.2d 454. The Reporter for the Advisory Committee has criticized this practice as contrary to the intent of the rule and as defeating the desired uniformity in application of the rules. Cleary, Preliminary Notes on Reading the Rules of Evidence, 1978, 57 Neb.L.Rev. 908, 917. Testimony of two witnesses to defendant's admissions of other crime that were corroborated by other evidence satisfied the clear and convincing evidence standard. U.S. v. Engleman, C.A.8th, 1981, 648 F.2d 473, 479. Pre-existing requirements for the use of other crimes have survived the adoption of the Evidence Rules even though not expressly incorporated into Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Bowman, C.A.8th, 1979, 602 F.2d 160, 163 n. 3 (collecting similar holdings). Defendant's own admission on prior crime was proof on sufficient clarity and certainty to permit the use of the evidence under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Cobb, C.A.8th, 1978, 588 F.2d 607, 611. In Arizona it is not necessary to prove other crime beyond reasonable doubt, but evidence of guilt must be sufficient to take it to jury; i.e., there must be evidence substantial enough to warrant a conviction. State v. LaGrand, App.1983, 674 P.2d 338, 138 Ariz. 275. Evidence of other crimes could meet clear and convincing standard despite fact that the identifications of defendant were somewhat uncertain and one was initially in error. State v. Coleman, Minn.1985, 373 N.W.2d 777, 781. Defendant's own admission is clear and convincing evidence of prior act. State v. Ohnstad, No.Dak.1984, 359 N.W.2d 827, 837. Note, Proof of Prior Act Evidence, 1980, 49 U.Cinci.L.Rev. 613.

FN57. South Dakota Other crimes evidence must be clear and convincing. State v. Micko, N.D.1986, 393 N.W.2d 741.

FN58. Repeals restrictions Standard of proof of preliminary fact that the defendant committed uncharged crime is relatively low; court can find against the prosecutor only where the jury could not reasonably find the preliminary fact to exist. U.S. v. Guerrero, C.A.5th, 1981, 650 F.2d 728, 734. Standard of proof for admissibility of other crimes evidence permits exclusion only where the jury could not reasonably find that the defendant committed other crime. U.S. v. Guerrero, C.A.5th, 1981, 650 F.2d 728, 734. Under Rule 404(b), prior crimes need not be proved by evidence that is clear and convincing or beyond a reasonable doubt so long as probative worth outweighs prejudice. U.S. v. Ricardo, C.A.5th, 1980, 619 F.2d 1124, 1131. Under Rule 404(b), the government need only produce proof that the defendant committed the extrinsic offense sufficient to withstand a directed verdict on that offense. U.S. v. Jimenez, C.A.5th, 1980, 613 F.2d 1373, 1376. This possibility was again adverted to in U.S. v. Aaron, C.A.8th, 1977, 553 F.2d 43, 46. Iwinkelried, The Need to Amend Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b): The Threat to the Future of the Federal Rules of Evidence, 1985, 30 Vill.L.Rev. 1465 (urging amendment to restore the old rules).

FN59. Force into Rule 403 Introduction of vague innuendo concerning the criminal defendant was prejudicial because it could not be met by specific denial but would require defendant to put on evidence of a general good character. U.S. v. Biswell, C.A.10th, 1983, 700 F.2d 1310, 1318. If other act is of doubtful similarity to event in issue and there is substantial doubt as to whether the defendant was the perpetrator, probative value will necessarily be diminished in application of Rule 403 balancing. Smith v. State Farm Fire and Casualty Co., C.A.5th, 1980, 633 F.2d 401, 403. The requirement that other crimes evidence must be clear and convincing is not an independent rule but a principle crystallized from repeated applications of the doctrine in Rule 403 that probative worth must outweigh prejudice. U.S. v. Dolliole, C.A.7th, 1979, 597 F.2d 102, 107.

FN61. Prior standards intact Admission of defendant contained in reports of government agent are clear and convincing evidence of prior violations. U.S. v. Marshall, C.A.8th, 1982, 683 F.2d 1212, 1215. Under Rule 404(b), evidence of a prior crime is admissible to prove intent if it is similar and close enough in time to be relevant, it is proved by clear and convincing evidence, and the trial court determines that probative worth outweighs prejudice. U.S. v. Ford, C.A.9th, 1980, 632 F.2d 1354, 1375. The requirement that other crimes must be proved by "clear and convincing" evidence continues to apply under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Frederickson, C.A.8th, 1979, 601 F.2d 1358, 1365. The position of the panel dissenter was adopted by the majority of the Fifth Circuit in an en banc rehearing. U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1978, 582 F.2d 898, 913.

FN62. Who applies In U.S. v. Dolliole, C.A.7th, 1979, 597 F.2d 102, 107, without indicating that this was required, noted that the trial judge first found that proof of other crimes was clear and convincing and then instructed the jury that they could not use the evidence unless they also found the evidence to be clear and convincing. The reasoning in Wingate v. Wainwright was approved by the Second Circuit in holding that where the defendant had previously been acquitted on a charge of possession of cocaine, evidence of that possession could not be used to convict the defendant of conspiracy to distribute cocaine. U.S. v. Mespoulede, C.A.2d, 1979, 597 F.2d 329. The issue appears to have been left to the jury in State v. Hudson, Minn.1979, 281 N.W.2d 870.

FN63. Preliminary question In a dictum, it is seemingly suggested that the existence of a plan is a preliminary fact with respect to evidence of other crime that is to be determined by the jury, not the judge. State v. Hoffman, 1982, 316 N.W.2d 143, 106 Wis.2d 185.

FN64. Jury determines Before admitting evidence of other crime, judge must be satisfied that reasonable jury could find defendant committed it; evidence that defendant had same name as person convicted of prior crime and had told undercover agent he was on probation at time of offense sufficed for this. U.S. v. Hernandez, C.A.11th, 1990, 896 F.2d 513, 521. It has now been decided that the jury is to determine the preliminary facts by a preponderance of the evidence. Huddleston v. U.S., 1988, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 485 U.S. 681, 99 L.Ed.2d 771. Whether defendant committed other crime is a jury question unless the judge is convinced that no reasonable jury could so find. U.S. v. Wyatt, C.A.11th, 1985, 762 F.2d 908, 910. For a case which seems to assume that a preliminary fact necessary to the relevance of proof of an uncharged bribe is to be decided by the jury, see U.S. v. Siegel, C.A.2d, 1983, 717 F.2d 9, 17. Whether or not the defendant committed an uncharged crime offered under Rule 404(b) is a 104(b) preliminary fact and can be decided against the prosecution only if a jury could not reasonably find that the defendant committed the uncharged crime. U.S. v. Mitchell, C.A.11th, 1982, 666 F.2d 1385, 1389. For a decision apparently approving the submission of this issue to the jury, see U.S. v. Testa, C.A.9th, 1977, 548 F.2d 847, 851 n. 1. Evidence of other crime need not be beyond a reasonable doubt; it is sufficient if it convinces the trier of fact of the probability of defendant's actions. People v. Sorscher, 1986, 391 N.W.2d 365, 371, 151 Mich.App. 122.

FN65. Cases and commentators The Supreme Court has rejected the views of these cases and commentators. See Huddleston v. U.S., 1988, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 1500, 485 U.S. 681, 687, 99 L.Ed.2d 771. Clear and convincing evidence standard for proof of prior crimes is to be applied by the judge under Rule 104(a), not by the jury. U.S. v. Byrd, C.A.7th, 1985, 771 F.2d 215, 222. One writer endorses the view that determination of the relevance of other crimes evidence is a question for the jury under Rule 104(b), a view he erroneously attributes to this Treatise as well. Sharpe, Two-Step Balancing and The Admissibility of Other Crimes Evidence: A Sliding Scale of Proof, 1984, 59 Notre Dame L.Rev. 556, 568.

FN67. How much Where other crimes are offered to show intent, it is enough if the government proves that the intent was similar in both crimes. U.S. v. Oshatz, C.A.2d, 1990, 912 F.2d 534, 541. In Hobbs Act prosecution, cross-examination concerning acts of violence directed at others who had used competitors gambling machines was admissible without any evidence that defendants were responsible for those acts. U.S. v. Curcio, C.A.2d 1985, 759 F.2d 237, 241. For a case in which the court seems to have inferred that the defendant committed the uncharged crime from proof that he committed the charged crime, see U.S. v. Harris, C.A.10th, 1981, 661 F.2d 138, 142. One court, perhaps inadvertently, seems to have applied the "clear and convincing" standard to proof of the charged crime rather than crime offered under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Two Eagle, C.A.8th, 1980, 633 F.2d 93, 96. See U.S. v. Jones, C.A.8th, 1978, 570 F.2d 765, 768 (apparently holding that in prosecution for dispensing drugs without a legitimate medical purpose, proof that other similar prescriptions were also without legitimate purpose must be clear and convincing). Where evidence of defendant's presence at two other raids on PCP laboratories was offered to show her knowledge of nature of operation at charged lab, it was not necessary that the evidence of the uncharged crimes be sufficient to show her guilty of some crime. People v. Goodall, 1982, 182 Cal.Rptr. 243, 131 Cal.App.3d 129.

FN68. "Physical elements" The panel decision in Beechum was reversed by an en banc decision. U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1978, 582 F.2d 898, 910.

FN72. Effect of acquittal For a case which raises but does not seem to answer the intriguing question of whether in a multiple offense trial, the judge can acquit the defendant of some crimes but use the evidence of those crimes as evidence of guilt on remaining counts, see U.S. v. Green, C.A.7th, 1984, 735 F.2d 1018, 1027. Double jeopardy does not invalidate a state conviction based in part upon evidence of another crime when the defendant is subsequently acquitted of the other crime. Smith v. Wainwright, C.A.5th, 1978, 568 F.2d 362. Boyce, Evidence of Other Crimes or Wrongdoing, 1977, 5 Utah B.J. 31, 59. One student argues that an acquittal, at least where it appears to be based on failure of proof, ought to bar use of proof of the crime but not necessarily some part of the crime that was not the basis of the acquittal. Comment, Other Crimes: Relevance Reexamined, 1983, 16 J.Marsh.L.Rev. 371, 386. Note, Evidentiary Use of Prior Acquitted Crimes: The "Relative Burdens of Proof" Rationale, 1986, 64 Wash.U.L.Q. 189. Note, Collateral Estoppel Effect of Prior Acquittals, 1980, 46 Brook.L.Rev. 781. Note, Admissibility of Evidence of Other Crimes--Emphasis on Use In Prosecution of Sex Crimes--For Which Defendant Had Been Acquitted under Similar Crimes Rules, at Subsequent Trial, 1980, 7 North Ky.L.Rev. 133. Annot., Admissibility of Evidence As To Other Offense As Affected By Defendant's Acquittal of That Offense, 1983, 25 A.L.R.4th 934.

FN73. Contrary authority Evidence of other offense for which defendant was subsequently acquitted would be admissible in trial for another offense that was held prior to the acquittal. U.S. v. Wyatt, C.A.11th, 1985, 762 F.2d 908, 911 (dictum). It is a violation of collateral estoppel aspect of double jeopardy for a state to use evidence of a crime of which defendant has been acquitted as evidence of other crimes in a later prosecution. Albert v. Montgomery, C.A.11th, 1984, 732 F.2d 865, 869 (collecting other similar decisions). Case would be remanded to give defendants an opportunity to show that in using acts of which they had previously been acquitted under Rule 404(b), government was attempting to relitigate an issue that should be barred by collateral estoppel. U.S. v. Johnson, C.A.6th, 1983, 697

F.2d 735, 741. It was not error to admit evidence of prior crime in trial that preceded defendant's acquittal of that crime. State v. Johnson, Minn.1982, 322 N.W.2d 220, 222 n. 1. It was reversible error to permit prosecution to introduce evidence of other charges of which defendant had been acquitted. State v. Reich, 1984, 676 P.2d 363, 66 Or.App. 862. Under no circumstances is evidence of a crime other than that for which the defendant is on trial admissible when the defendant has been acquitted of that other offense. State v. Wakefield, Minn.1979, 278 N.W.2d 307. The Florida Supreme Court has adopted the Wingate doctrine, excluding evidence of prior crimes that result in acquittals, as the law in that state. State v. Perkins, Fla.1977, 349 So.2d 161, noted, 1978, 9 Cum.L.Rev. 299. Note, Criminal Law--Excluding Evidence of Prior Crimes When Trial Resulted in Acquittal, 1980, 6 Wm.Mitch.L.Rev. 455, 456, n. 12.

FN74. Double jeopardy Collateral estoppel prevents use of crimes of which defendant has previously been acquitted as other crimes evidence. U.S. v. Day, C.A.1979, 591 F.2d 861, 869, 192 U.S.App.D.C. 252. Where defendant raised claim of entrapment by a government agent, evidence of other sales to the same agent could not be used to show his predisposition where he had been acquitted of those sales on grounds of entrapment as such use is barred by the doctrine of collateral estoppel. U.S. v. Keller, C.A.3d, 1980, 624 F.2d 1154, 1157. For a collection of conflicting federal cases, see U.S. v. Keller, C.A.3d, 1980, 624 F.2d 1154, 1157 n. 3. State was not collaterally estopped from using prior assault because case had been dismissed with prejudice. People v. Hampton, Colo.App.1986, 728 P.2d 345, 349. Better reasoned cases are those that hold that doctrine of collateral estoppel prevents the prosecution from using as other crimes evidence acts of which the defendant has been found to be not guilty. People v. Arrington, Colo.App.1983, 682 P.2d 490, 492 (adopting this rule). Comment, Extension of Collateral Estoppel To Evidence From Prior Acquitted Crime, 1984, 35 Mercer L.Rev. 1419. Note, The Double Jeopardy Clause As a Bar to Reintroducing Evidence, 1980, 89 Yale L.J. 962. Note, Expanding Double Jeopardy: Collateral Estoppel and the Evidentiary Use of Prior Crimes of Which Defendant Has Been Acquitted, 1974, 2 Fla.St.U.L.Rev. 511.

FN75. State courts Evidence of other crimes is admissible despite the fact that defendant has previously been acquitted of the charges. People v. Coy, 1981, 173 Cal.Rptr. 889, 119 Cal.App.3d 254 (collecting other California cases). For a collection of cases pro and con, see People v. Arrington, Colo.App.1983, 682 P.2d 490, 491. Note, Criminal Law--Excluding Evidence of Prior Crimes When Trial Resulted in Acquittal, 1980, 6 Wm.Mitch.L.Rev. 455, 456.

FN76. Federal cases U.S. v. DeVincent, C.A.1st, 1980, 632 F.2d 147; Crooker v. U.S., C.A.1st, 1980, 620 F.2d 313; Pacelli v. U.S., C.A.2d, 1978, 588 F.2d 360, 367 (dictum); King v. Brewer, C.A.8th, 1978, 577 F.2d 435, 441; U.S. v. Riley, C.A.8th 1982, 684 F.2d 542, 546; U.S. v. Moore, C.A.9th, 1975, 522 F.2d 1068, 1078-1079; U.S. v. Gutierrez, C.A.10th, 1982, 696 F.2d 753, 755 n. 2; U.S. v. Van Cleave, C.A.10th, 1979, 599 F.2d 954, 957; U.S. v. Hicks, Ct.Mil.App.1987, 24 M.J. 3, 7-9. Evidence of prior offense of which plaintiff was acquitted was admissible in civil rights action to show her bias against defendant who had been involved in prior prosecution. Pittsley v. Warish, C.A.1st, 1991, 927 F.2d 3, 9. Since jurors could have concluded that the defendant was innocent of prior rape charges because women consented, collateral estoppel did not bar proof of those rapes to prove issues other than consent in present rape trial. Oliphant v. Koehler, C.A.6th, 1979, 594 F.2d 547, 555. The fact that a co-conspirator has been found not guilty of attempting to pass a counterfeit bill does not make that act inadmissible as an overt act of the charged conspiracy; even if the evidence was of a "prior crime" the determination of innocence would be irrelevant. U.S. v. Etley, C.A.5th, 1978, 574 F.2d 850, 853.

FN77. Dismissal After judge has dismissed counts of an indictment the prosecution can use evidence of crimes in those counts under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Billups, C.A.4th, 1982, 692 F.2d 320, 328. One court has gone so far as to hold that the use of other crimes is not barred when a prosecution for those crimes was dismissed because delays in bringing defendant to trial had prejudiced her ability to defend against the charges. U.S. v. Birney, C.A.2d, 1982, 686 F.2d 102, 106. But see, U.S. v. Taglione, C.A.5th, 1977, 546 F.2d 194, 199 (improper to admit evidence of prior charges of theft that were subsequently dismissed as this requires the jury to try the defendant for two crimes, for one of which he was never indicted). It was reversible error to admit proof of crime when charges had been dismissed and so proof had little probative value and much prejudice. Evans v. State, 1985, 697 S.W.2d 879, 882, 287 Ark. 136. Other crime may be proved despite fact that same evidence was held insufficient to hold the defendant to answer for the crime; court may have dismissed the action for failure to show some element of the offense that was not needed to make offense relevant to prove charged crime. People v. James, 1976, 132 Cal.Rptr. 888, 62 Cal.App.3d 399. Fact that charges had been dismissed in Wisconsin did not bar use of crime as evidence of charged crime in Minnesota. State v. Lande, Minn.1984, 350 N.W.2d 355, 358.

FN79. Discretionary exclusion In a case rife with prosecutorial misconduct, court did not abuse discretion in excluding evidence of prior crimes that had been subject of mistrial and acquittal. U.S. v. Martinez, C.A.10th, 1984, 744 F.2d 76.

FN80. Prove acquittal Where prosecution was permitted to produce proof of prior sex crime in rape prosecution, it was error to reject defense evidence that the defendant had been acquitted of that charge in a prior trial. State v. Evans, 1982, 323 N.W.2d 106, 212 Neb. 476.

FN81. Not applicable Rule 410 does not bar use of other crime to which defendant pleaded nolo contendere as proof of charged crime if otherwise admissible under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Wyatt, C.A.11th, 1985, 762 F.2d 908, 911. In suit for misappropriation of trade secrets, evidence of events or transactions barred by the statute of limitations are admissible to show nature of transactions in issue. Whittaker Corp. v. Execuair Corp., C.A.9th, 1984, 736 F.2d 1341, 1347. In prosecution for failure to file income tax returns, evidence of failure to file in seven earlier years was admissible to prove intent even though prosecution for those years was barred by the statute of limitations. U.S. v. Ming, C.A.7th, 1972, 466 F.2d 1000, 1008-1009. Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule does not apply when illegally seized marijuana is used under Rule 404(b) as an uncharged crime to prove knowledge. U.S. v. Lopez-Martinez, C.A.9th, 1984, 725 F.2d 471, 476. Acts and transactions barred by the statute of limitations are admissible under Rule 404(b) to prove preparation and plan. U.S. v. DeFiore, C.A.2d, 1983, 720 F.2d 757, 764. In prosecution for political bribes and kickbacks, court properly admitted evidence of acts beyond the statute of limitations as proof of plan under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Primrose, C.A.10th, 1983, 718 F.2d 1484, 1487 n. 2. In conspiracy case, evidence of acts beyond the statute of limitations is admissible to establish a continuing course of conduct or to cast light on the character of an existing conspiracy. Reid Bros. Logging Co. v. Ketchikan Pulp Co., C.A.9th, 1983, 699 F.2d 1292, 1305. Statute of limitations does not apply to the use of other crimes evidence. U.S. v. Means, C.A.5th, 1983, 695 F.2d 811, 816. Fact that incidents took place prior to the limitations period does not bar their use to show intent. U.S. v. Scott, C.A.8th, 1981, 668 F.2d 384, 387. Statute of limitations did not bar use of evidence of prior instances of police abuse in a civil rights action. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Porter, C.A.3d, 1981, 659 F.2d 306, 320. One court has hinted that the rule excluding evidence procured by an illegal search does not apply when the evidence is offered to prove an uncharged crime under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Batts, C.A.9th, 1978, 573 F.2d 599, 602 n. 7. Where indictment charged a continuous conspiracy to accept bribes, it was proper to permit the government to prove bribes that were beyond the statute of limitations to show the nature and continuity of the conspiracy. U.S. v. Seuss, C.A.1st, 1973, 474 F.2d 385, 391. Fact that prosecution of prior crimes was barred by statute of limitations did not make evidence inadmissible. People v. Creighton, 1976, 129 Cal.Rptr. 249, 57 Cal.App.3d 314. Requirement that testimony of accomplice must be corroborated did not apply to proof of other crimes. State v. Sanford, 1985, 699 P.2d 506, 509, 237 Kan. 312. In libel action, evidence of defamatory statements made beyond the statute of limitations was properly admitted on the issue of punitive damages. Advanced Training Systems v. Caswell Equipment Co., Minn.1984, 352 N.W.2d 1, 10. Proof of other crime was not barred by the fact that conviction had been expunged following a successful completion of probation. Driskell v. State, Okl.Crim.1983, 659 P.2d 343, 349.

But see A few courts have assumed that illegally seized evidence cannot be used as other crimes evidence. U.S. v. Hill, C.A.7th, 1990, 898 F.2d 72, 74; U.S. v. Espinoza, C.A.9th, 1978, 578 F.2d 224, 228.

FN88. Labeling In admitting evidence of other crimes, the trial court must specifically identify the purpose for which it is to be used; it is enough to make a broad statement invoking or restating Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Kendall, C.A.10th, 1985, 766 F.2d 1426, 1436.

FN89. Appellate opinions

But see The Fifth Circuit has attempted to lay down a per se rule governing application of Rule 403 when the government offers evidence of the good faith of officers accused of entrapping the defendant. U.S. v. Webster, C.A.5th, 1981, 649 F.2d 346, 351. For examples of federal courts looking to the precedents rather than analysis of the present case in determining admissibility of other crimes, see U.S. v. Rubio-Estrada, C.A.1st, 1988, 857 F.2d 845, 848; Warner v. Transamerica Ins. Co., C.A.8th, 1984, 739 F.2d 1347, 1351; U.S. v. Miller, C.A.7th, 1978, 573 F.2d 388, 393. See also, U.S. v. Webster, C.A.5th, 1981, 649 F.2d 346, 351 (attempting to create a per se rule to be followed in other cases). Some states have made the same error. See, e.g., State v. Nelson, Minn.1982, 326 N.W.2d 917; State v. Keithley, 1984, 358 N.W.2d 761, 218 Neb. 707 (court so preoccupied with precedent it fails to note fact evidence was offered to prove was not in issue); State v. Thomas, S.D.1986, 381 N.W.2d 232, 236 (relying on cases from states that had not yet adopted Rule 404(b)); State v. LeFever, 1984, 690 P.2d 574, 577, 102 Wn.2d 77; State v. Rutchik, 1984, 341 N.W.2d 639, 643, 116 Wis.2d 61; Sanville v. State, Wyo.1979, 593 P.2d 1340, 1345.

FN90. Discretion to admit Court rejects claim that Rule 404(b) requires judge to balance prejudice against probative worth as asserted in the Advisory Committee's Note and holds that there is no duty to consider Rule 403 unless this has been explicitly requested. U.S. v. Manso-Portes, C.A.7th, 1989, 867 F.2d 422, 427. For an illustration of a less than optimum expression of this balancing, see U.S. v. Long, C.A.9th, 1983, 706 F.2d 1044, 1052 n. 5. Where it is clear from the record that the trial court performed the necessary balancing of probative worth and prejudice, failure to use "magic words" in reaching decision is not reversible error. U.S. v. Evans, C.A.8th, 1983, 697 F.2d 240, 249. One court has said that "the practice of entering a finding as to this balance should definitely be encouraged"; but the failure to do so is not a ground for reversal. U.S. v. Dolliole, C.A.7th, 1979, 597 F.2d 102, 106. Admissibility of evidence of other crimes is a two-step process; first, relevance must be determined under Rule 404(b) and, second, the court must apply the balancing test in Rule 403. U.S. v. Williams, C.A.5th, 1979, 596 F.2d 44, 50. Even though the trial judge did not explicitly state that probative worth outweighed prejudice of evidence of other crimes, appellate court would infer that he performed the required balancing from his awareness of the rule and the arguments made to him. U.S. v. Sangrey, C.A.9th, 1978, 586 F.2d 1312, 1315. Task of determining admissibility of other crimes evidence does not end with determination that requirements of Rule 404(b) are met; court must apply the balancing test in Rule 403 as well. U.S. v. Bohr, C.A.8th, 1978, 581 F.2d 1294, 1298. Under Rule 404(b), the trial judge must first find that evidence of other crimes is relevant to some issue at trial other than to show that the defendant is a bad man; he must then determine that the probative worth and need for the evidence is not substantially outweighed by prejudice to the defendant. U.S. v. Williams, C.A.2d, 1978, 577 F.2d 188, 191. An opinion in the Third Circuit takes the wholly erroneous view that unless Rule 403 is invoked with sufficient specificity to satisfy Rule 103, the trial judge is not required to balance the probative worth of the evidence against its prejudicial qualities. U.S. v. Long, C.A.3d, 1978, 574 F.2d 761, 766. This is directly contrary to the last two sentences of the Advisory Committee's Note and to the overwhelming weight of authority. It is possible that the language of the opinion was meant only to apply to the case before the courts; i.e., a case in which no adequate objection was made under Rule 404(b). The inclusionary approach to other crimes evidence does not mean that other crimes evidence is automatically admissible; the judge must first determine that the evidence is relevant for some purpose other than proof of disposition, then weigh the probative value of the evidence against its harmful consequences. U.S. v. Benedetto, C.A.2d, 1978, 571 F.2d 1246, 1248. Judge is not required to rule on prejudice of other crimes if no objection is made on the basis of Rule 403. State v. Cannon, 1985, 713 P.2d 273, 277, 148 Ariz. 72. Where record did not disclose that trial judge had engaged in the required balancing and that such balancing would have excluded evidence of prior crime as too prejudicial, appellate court would reverse. People v. De La Cruz, 1983, 192 Cal.Rptr. 701, 144 Cal.App.3d 497. It is not enough that evidence of other crimes satisfy the statutory requirements for admission; trial court must balance probative worth against prejudice and may admit only if the former predominates. People v. Worden, 1979, 284 N.W.2d 159, 91 Mich.App. 666. It was error, though harmless, for court to admit evidence of other crime without balancing probative worth and prejudice on the record. State v. Monk, 1985, 711 P.2d 365, 367, 42 Wash.App. 320.

FN93. Limit use In U.S. v. King, C.A.4th, 1985, 768 F.2d 586, the trial judge barred reference to the other crime in the opening statements, excluded evidence of the details of the criminal conduct, and gave clear instructions on the use to which the evidence could be put. Note, Evidence--A Limit to Limiting Instructions Concerning Other Crimes Evidence in Joint Trials--Multiple Juries as a Viable Alternative, 1981, 47 Brook.L.Rev. 1021.

FN94. Only relevant details Minute details of criminal investigation of murder defendant's drug dealing, including the name of the drug-sniffing dog used to apprehend him, were irrelevant but also not prejudicial. U.S. v. Chaverra-Cardona, C.A.7th, 1989, 879 F.2d 1551, 1554. Admitting evidence that defendant dealt in stolen chickens to prove that defendant had unreported income did not prejudice where the trial court excluded any evidence that the chickens had been stolen. U.S. v. Martin, C.A.4th, 1985, 773 F.2d 579, 583. For an example of a case in which a state trial court admitted gory details of an assault on a robbery victim that had not the slightest relevance to proof of the issue on which the evidence was supposedly offered, see Porter v. Estelle, C.A.5th, 1983, 709 F.2d 944, 954-955. This was overlooked by court that held that evidence that defendant had boasted to prostitutes about his fraud was admissible to show knowledge of fraudulent scheme; obviously one could prove the boasts without any need to prove the occupation of the recipients. U.S. v. Mangiameli, C.A.10th, 1982, 668 F.2d 1172, 1177. Trial court properly limited evidence that defendant failed to return to halfway house after robbery to details relevant to show flight; there was no evidence that the house was a place only inhabited by persons with criminal records. U.S. v. Sims, C.A.9th, 1980, 617 F.2d 1371, 1378. In commending the trial court for the way in which proof of a prior crime was handled, the appellate court noted that the prosecution was cautioned not to go into details of prior crime not necessary for the purpose for which the evidence was admitted and this admonition was honored. U.S. v. Carleo, C.A.8th, 1978, 576 F.2d 846, 850. Prejudice arising from the use of letters from the defendant's homosexual lover to show motive for murder was reduced when the letters were not introduced into evidence, the jury was only told how the letters had been signed, and the letters were not used by the jury in deliberations. U.S. v. Free, C.A.5th, 1978, 574 F.2d 1221, 1223. For an egregious violation of this principle, see Carter v. U.S., C.A.8th, 1977, 549 F.2d 77 (prosecution of a convicted felon for possession of firearm; witness who saw the defendant drop the gun over a fence in the course of a chase permitted to testify that the chase began when defendant attempted to use a forged drug prescription). In prosecution for murder, evidence of a subsequent kidnapping was properly admitted to show relationship between defendant and kidnap victim so as to make meaningful certain admissions made to victim where court carefully limited the proof of the kidnapping to those details that were essential for this purpose. U.S. v. Kaiser, C.A.5th, 1977, 545 F.2d 467, 475-476. Where evidence of prior robbery was offered to impeach defendant's statement that he had not seen accomplice for years, trial court did not err in not restricting witness to testimony that she had seen the two together since the fact that this observation was made in course of being robbed was relevant to accuracy of identification of parties. People v. Benson, 1982, 180 Cal.Rptr. 921, 130 Cal.App.3d 1000. Where evidence that defendant was being held for prior crime would suffice to show motive for murder of witness, it was flagrant departure from order in limine for prosecution to attempt to prove guilt of prior crime. State v. Williams, Iowa 1985, 360 N.W.2d 782, 786. Evidence that the defendant had swapped a battery for the weapon used in a robbery would be relevant, but evidence that he had stolen the battery was not. State v. Boyd, Me.1979, 401 A.2d 157. It was not an abuse of discretion for court to exclude papers showing defendant was guilty of AWOL from collection of papers offered to prove defendant was living in home in which stolen property was found. State v. Zgodava, Minn.App.1986, 384 N.W.2d 522, 524. Trial judge properly excluded details of prior burglary, such as fact that one of the victims was sexually fondled. State v. Kennedy, Minn.App.1985, 363 N.W.2d 863, 866. In prosecution for arson and theft, it was not error to show that prior theft was committed shortly before someone burned down building as prosecution was entitled to prove all the facts surrounding prior crime even though it might lead jury to infer that defendant set other fire. State v. Richardson, Minn.App.1985, 363 N.W.2d 793, 797. Trial court did not err in excluding details of murder committed by prosecution witness. State v. Phelps, Minn.1982, 328 N.W.2d 136, 139. It was error, but harmless on the facts of the case, to permit witnesses to relate details of other crimes that were not relevant to the purpose for which the evidence was supposedly introduced. State v. Forsyth, Utah 1982, 641 P.2d 1172, 1177.

FN95. Impermissible argument For an illustration of a prosecutor getting evidence admitted on a non-character theory, then using it as a basis for character arguments to the jury, see U.S. v. Rodriguez-Cardona, C.A.1st, 1991, 924 F.2d 1148, 1153. Error in admission of other crimes evidence was not harmless where it was compounded by the prosecutor's improper argument that the defendant committed the crime because he was a thrill-killer. U.S. v. Brown, C.A.9th, 1989, 880 F.2d 1012, 1016. Where evidence is admitted under Rule 404(b) on a non-character theory, trial court should not have permitted prosecutor to argue that it showed defendant's bad character. U.S. v. Fakhoury, C.A.7th, 1987, 819 F.2d 1415, 1423. It was error to admit evidence of other crimes where prosecution's use of evidence in closing argument shows that it was intended to prove the defendant's bad character to prove that he acted in conformity with that character; this is forbidden by Rule 405(b). U.S. v. Dothard, C.A.11th, 1982, 666 F.2d 498, 505. A careful reading of the entire text of the prosecutor's argument shows that it was designed to use other crimes evidence to provide a motive for the charged crime and not for the purpose of establishing that the defendants were "bad men" with a propensity to engage in crime. U.S. v. Greene, C.A.5th, 1978, 578 F.2d 648, 653. Error in admitting evidence of other crime was compounded by failure to give a limiting instruction and by the prosecutor's argument which invited the jury to use evidence for impermissible purposes. People v. St. Andrew, 1980, 161 Cal.Rptr. 634, 101 Cal.App.3d 450. This was overlooked by court that approved the argument that repeatedly referred to the defendant as a "rapist" or "experienced rapist" or (sarcastically) "a reformed rapist" on the ground that argument was based on evidence showing that defendant had committed three prior rapes. State v. Hanks, 1985, 694 P.2d 407, 414, 236 Kan. 524. It was not improper for prosecutor to argue that evidence of other crime showed that the defendant was "accustomed to dealing in stolen property." State v. Richardson, Minn.App.1985, 363 N.W.2d 793, 797 Where evidence of other crimes was offered on issue of intent, it was error to permit the prosecutor to argue that it showed the defendant's depravity. Templin v. State, Tex.Crim.App.1986, 711 S.W.2d 30, 34.

FN96. Suggest other uses Appellate court frowns on prosecutor who got evidence of prior gun offense admitted on theory that it showed defendant was aware that it was unlawful to carry concealed weapon, then argues to jury that prior offense involved an attempted bank robbery. U.S. v. Gomez, C.A.11th, 1991, 927 F.2d 1530, 1534 n. 4. Reversal was compelled where evidence of other crimes tended to suggest that defendants should be convicted because they were bad men and prosecutor enhanced this effect by closing argument that defendants were dangerous, ruthless people who should not be left loose on the streets. U.S. v. Weir, C.A.8th, 1978, 575 F.2d 668, 671.

FN97. Principal device One court has erroneously supposed that the giving of a limiting instruction cures any error in the admission of other crimes evidence. U.S. v. Sanders, C.A.10th, 1991, 928 F.2d 940, 942. Since the defendant is entitled to a limiting instruction when the evidence is properly admitted, it cannot cure the improper admission of evidence. Failure to give a limiting instruction compounded error in admitting evidence of defendant's drug use that was irrelevant to prove intent. U.S. v. Monzon, C.A.7th, 1989, 869 F.2d 338, 344. Court's refusal to instruct on proper use of evidence of other crimes was harmless error. U.S. v. Davis, C.A.5th, 1986, 792 F.2d 1299, 1306. Failure of judge to give limiting instruction is a relevant factor in deciding if error in admitting evidence of other crimes was harmless. U.S. v. Green, C.A.9th, 1981, 648 F.2d 587, 593. A judge should carefully give instructions limiting use of extrinsic offense evidence wherever there is a possibility of prejudice, U.S. v. Jimenez, C.A.5th, 1980, 613 F.2d 1373, 1377. Where evidence of prior criminal conduct is admitted for a limited purpose, it must be accompanied by a limiting instruction if the defendant so requests. U.S. v. Washington, C.A.2d, 1979, 592 F.2d 680, 681. It has been suggested by way of dictum that erroneous admission of other crimes evidence can be cured by a limiting instruction. U.S. v. Evans, C.A.5th, 1978, 572 F.2d 455, 484. This seems to confuse an admonition to disregard inadmissible evidence with a limiting instruction. If the evidence is inadmissible for a limited purpose, the fact that a proper limiting instruction was given would seem to be irrelevant. Failure to give a requested limiting instruction concerning the use of evidence of other crimes admitted for impeachment purposes was reversible error. U.S. v. Whiteus, C.A.6th, 1978, 570 F.2d 616, 617. Defendant is not entitled to limiting instruction on use of other crimes evidence when both crimes are joined in single trial. People v. Thornton, 1979, 152 Cal.Rptr. 77, 88 Ca App.3d 795. Erroneous admission of other crimes evidence is not harmless because it would have been properly admitted for some other purpose that was not the subject of a jury instruction. State v. Perrigo, 1985, 708 P.2d 987, 989, 10 Kan.App.2d 651. Jury should be instructed that it must find that defendant committed charged crime before it can make use of evidence of other crimes. State v. Micko, N.D.1986, 393 N.W.2d 741 (holding unclear). Defendant could not complain of instruction on use of other crimes evidence where his objection at trial did not specify defect in the one proposed and no alternative instruction was tendered. State v. Reutter, So.Dak. 1985, 374 N.W.2d 617, 625. It was error, but not reversible error, for the trial judge to fail to give requested instruction on use of other crimes evidence at the time the evidence was admitted. State v. Smith, Utah 1985, 700 P.2d 1106, 1110.

FN98. Skeptical For a limiting instruction that may demonstrate why there is skepticism about their effectiveness, see People v. Carter, 1982, 330 N.W.2d 314, 334, 415 Mich. 558.

FN99. Prefer not to emphasize For a case that apparently holds that it is proper to give a cautionary instruction even over the objection of the defendant if there is such evidence in the record, see U.S. v. Mora, C.A.10th, 1985, 768 F.2d 1197. Counsel was not ineffective for failing to object to two bits of other crimes evidence where the objection might have highlighted the evidence and caused more harm than letting it quietly slip by. U.S. v. Brown, C.A.7th, 1984, 739 F.2d 1136, 1146. In assessing prejudice in admission of other crimes evidence, court would take into account prejudice that could have been eliminated by a limiting instruction where the judge did not give one only because defense counsel exercised their right to block it. U.S. v. Moore, C.A.1984, 732 F.2d 983, 990, 235

U.S.App.D.C. 381. Trial judge was not required to give a limiting instruction sua sponte where the prosecution conceded that it would be proper but defense counsel chose to stand or fall on issue of admissibility; though limiting instruction is desirable, the court is not required to override the wishes of defense counsel. U.S. v. Price, C.A.7th, 1980, 617 F.2d 455, 460. Where there was no request for a limiting instruction and the chief effect of an instruction would be to highlight evidence of other crimes, it was not plain error to fail to give an instruction. U.S. v. Childs, C.A.1979, 598 F.2d 169, 176, 194 U.S.App.D.C. 250. Counsel may refrain from requesting a limiting instruction on other crimes in order not to emphasize potentially damaging evidence or for other strategic reasons; trial court need not second guess this decision and instruct sua sponte. U.S. v. Barnes, C.A.5th, 1978, 586 F.2d 1052, 1059. Defendant's refusal of proffered limiting instruction forecloses raising on appeal the issue of whether admission without such instructions was error under Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Levy, C.A.2d, 1978, 578 F.2d 896, 900. It was not error for trial judge to fail to give a limiting instruction on use of other crimes evidence where defense counsel had withdrawn a proposed instruction on the subject. State v. Reed, 1979, 604 P.2d 1330, 25 Wash.App. 46. Where defense counsel did not want an instruction because it might highlight the prior act, the trial judge was under no duty to give a limiting instruction without a request. Goodman v. State, Wyo.1979, 601 P.2d 178, 184.

FN2. No duty It was error to admit other crimes evidence against F.B.I. agent without an instruction that limited it to its proper purpose. U.S. v. Miller, C.A.9th, 1989, 874 F.2d 1255, 1270 (no mention of whether such instruction was requested). Huddleston does not require the trial judge to give a limiting instruction in the absence of a request by counsel. U.S. v. Record, C.A.10th, 1989, 873 F.2d 1363, 1376. It is well-settled that where no limiting instruction on use of other crimes is requested, the failure to give one sua sponte is not reversible error. U.S. v. Multi-Management, Inc., C.A.9th, 1984, 743 F.2d 1359, 1364. Under Rule 105, burden of requesting a limiting instruction on use of other crimes evidence is on the defendant; without such a request, he cannot complain on appeal that no such instruction was given. U.S. v. Gilmore, C.A.8th, 1984, 730 F.2d 550, 555. It was not plain error for judge to fail to give a limiting instruction on the use of other crimes evidence where there was no request for such instruction. U.S. v. Vincent, C.A.6th, 1982, 681 F.2d 462, 465. Trial court is not under duty to give a limiting instruction sua sponte at time evidence of other crimes is admitted where the evidence has no potential for substantially prejudicing defendant. U.S. v. Lewis, C.A.1982, 693 F.2d 189, 196-197, 224 U.S.App.D.C. 74. Where evidence of character was admissible and not unfairly prejudicial, the trial court was not obliged to give a limiting instruction sua sponte. U.S. v. Murzyn, C.A.7th, 1980, 631 F.2d 525, 531. If the defendant does not request a limiting instruction on the use of evidence of other crimes, it is not reversible error to fail to give one. U.S. v. Potter, C.A.9th, 1979, 616 F.2d 384, 389. Where the only issue in the case actually in dispute was the defendant's intent, it was not plain error to fail to give an instruction limiting other crimes evidence to the issue of intent since there was not other issue on which the jury could have used the evidence. U.S. v. Childs, C.A.1979, 598 F.2d 169, 175, 194 U.S.App.D.C. 250. It is not plain error for the trial court to fail to give an instruction sua sponte limiting the use of evidence of other crimes. U.S. v. Barnes, C.A.5th, 1978, 586 F.2d 1052, 1058. Ordinarily defense counsel must request a limiting instruction on the use of other crimes evidence; if he does not, the error can be considered on appeal only if it is plain error. U.S. v. Bridwell, C.A.10th, 1978, 583 F.2d 1135, 1140. Although it would have been better practice for the trial judge to sua sponte give a cautionary instruction limiting the use of other crimes evidence, it was not plain error for him to fail to do so on facts of instant case, though it might be in a case where conduct is more egregious and its relevance is less. U.S. v. Cooper, C.A.6th, 1978, 577 F.2d 1079, 1087-1089. Though it would have been preferable to give an instruction which carefully limited the jury's use of evidence of other crimes, failure to give such instruction sua sponte was not an abuse of discretion where counsel did not request such an instruction. U.S. v. Walls, C.A.9th, 1978, 577 F.2d 690, 697. The giving of a limiting instruction is simply one factor in determining whether there has been an abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of other crimes. U.S. v. Brown, C.A.9th, 1977, 562 F.2d 1144, 1148. Where after the court charged the jury, the defendant did not object to the omission of the single limiting objection which he requested, nor ask for any others, he waived any objection he might have had to the failure of the trial judge to give a limiting instruction on the use of other crimes evidence. U.S. v. Barrett, C.A.1st, 1976, 539 F.2d 244, 249. Where defense counsel objected to introduction of other crimes evidence but did not request a limiting instruction, failure to give an instruction could not be considered on appeal unless it was plain error. U.S. v. Semak, C.A.6th, 1976, 536 F.2d 1142, 1145. Failure to give limiting instruction in absence of request could meet requirements for plain error. U.S. v. Cox, C.A.5th, 1976, 536 F.2d 65, 69 n. 9. In the absence of a specific defense request, no limiting instruction is required here other crimes evidence is relevant to an issue in the case. U.S. v. Conley, C.A.8th, 1975, 523 F.2d 650, 654 n. 6. It has been argued that adoption of Rule 105 has repealed prior caselaw requiring a sua sponte instruction. Green, The Military Rules of Evidence and The Military Judge, May 1980, Army Lawyer 47. Although judge has no duty to give an instruction on use of other crimes sua sponte, if he does give one it should correctly state the precise issues to which the evidence is relevant. People v. Key, 1984, 203 Cal.Rptr. 144, 153 Cal.App.3d 888. Where past offenses were not a dominate part of the evidence and were not highly prejudicial court had no duty to give sua sponte limiting instruction. People v. Tucciarone, 1982, 187 Cal.Rptr. 159, 137 Cal.App.3d 701. Trial court was under no obligation to sua sponte modify instructions on use of other crimes to include charge that jury must find other crimes by a preponderance of the evidence. People v. Goodall, 1982, 182 Cal.Rptr. 243, 131 Cal.App.3d 129. Although there may be exceptional cases in which evidence of other crimes is so dominant a part of the case against the accused that a sua sponte limiting instruction is required, the usual rule is that the trial judge has no duty to give such an instruction without a request. People v. Collie, 1981, 177 Cal.Rptr. 458, 30 Cal.3d 43, 634 P.2d 534. In the absence of a request, a court is not required to give a limiting instruction on the use of evidence of other crimes. People v. Marshall, 1981, 175 Cal.Rptr. 497, 121 Cal.App.3d 627. Trial court has no duty to instruct sua sponte on proper use of other crimes evidence. People v. Morrisson, 1979, 155 Cal.Rptr. 152, 92 Cal.App.3d 787. It is better practice, though not plain error, for the trial court to sua sponte give a limiting instruction on the use of other crimes evidence. People v. White, Colo.App.1984, 680 P.2d 1318, 1321. Failure to request a limiting instruction on use of other crimes evidence precludes raising failure to give instruction as error on appeal. People v. Freeman, 1985, 385 N.W.2d 617, 619, 149 Mich.App. 119. Trial judge was not required sua sponte to give a limiting instruction on the use of other crimes evidence. People v. Armentero, 1986, 384 N.W.2d 98, 105, 148 Mich.App. 120. Trial court has no duty to give sua sponte instruction on use of other crimes evidence. People v. Morris, 1984, 362 N.W.2d 830, 833, 139 Mich.App. 550. Trial judge has no duty to give a limiting instruction sua sponte when evidence of other crimes is admitted. People v. Flynn, 1979, 287 N.W.2d 329, 93 Mich.App. 713. Failure to request instruction on use of other crimes forfeits right to raise issue on appeal. State v. Starnes, Minn.App.1986, 396 N.W.2d 676, 681. Defendant waived objection to failure to give a limiting instruction on the use of other crimes evidence when he failed to object to instructions given. Thompson v. State, Okla.Crim.1985, 705 P.2d 188, 191. Statements of defendant to arresting officers that he had grown instant marijuana himself in his bedroom and that he could direct officers to a place where they could purchase an additional 15 pounds were such subtle references to other crimes that there was no duty to give a limiting instruction sua sponte. Cole v. State, Okl.Crim.1982, 645 P.2d 1025, 1027. The state need not request a limiting instruction when it introduces evidence of other crimes; it is up to the defendant to request the instruction. State v. Amundson, 1975, 230 N.W.2d 775, 69 Wis.2d 554. It was not error to fail to give a limiting instruction on use of other crimes evidence where no such instruction was requested. Evans v. State, Wyo.1982, 655 P.2d 1214.

But see Where evidence of other crimes is admitted for a limited purpose under Kan.Stats. Ann. s 60-455, the trial judge must give a limiting instruction even though there was no request for the instruction and no objection to the admission of the evidence. State v. Whitehead, 1979, 602 P.2d 1263, 226 Kan. 719.

FN3. Give twice Double shot of instructions approved as proof that issue was handled "with consummate care." U.S. v. Hadfield, C.A.1st, 1990, 918 F.2d 987, 995. It was not error to refuse to give limiting instruction at time that other crimes evidence was admitted where proper instruction was given as part of final instructions. U.S. v. Evans, C.A.4th, 1990, 917 F.2d 800, 809. Prejudice from evidence of other crimes is lessened when judge gives limiting instruction both at the time the evidence is introduced and at the close of the trial. U.S. v. Hernandez, C.A.11th, 1990, 896 F.2d 513, 523. Such a double warning was applauded in U.S. v. Harrod, C.A.7th, 1988, 856 F.2d 996, 998. One reason it is wise to give the instruction at the time the evidence is introduced is that the court may forget to give the instruction at the conclusion of the case. See, e.g., U.S. v. Yopp, C.A.6th, 1978, 577 F.2d 362, 366. See U.S. v. Brunson, C.A.5th, 1977, 549 F.2d 348, 359 n. 15 (apparently endorsing practice). In one case the jury was given three instructions on the limited purpose for which other crimes evidence was admitted. Carter v. U.S., C.A.8th, 1977, 549 F.2d 77, 78. Trial court properly gave limiting instruction both before admitting evidence of other crimes and at the close of the trial. U.S. v. Davis, C.A.5th, 1977, 546 F.2d 617, 619. Trial judge properly gave limiting instruction prior to introduction of other crimes evidence. State v. Breazeale, 1986, 714 P.2d 1356, 1360, 238 Kan. 714. Where trial judge gave admonition before first witness testified to other crime and when case was submitted to jury, it was not error not to give cautionary instructions at each intervening introduction of other crimes. State v. Tecca, 1986, 714 P.2d 136, 140, 220 Mont. 168. While court upon admitting evidence of other crimes should give an immediate cautionary instruction, failure to give one is not reversible error in the absence of request for one. State v. Stroud, 1984, 683 P.2d 459, 465, 210 Mont. 58. At the time evidence of other crimes is admitted, trial judge must explain to the jury the purpose of the evidence and admonish the jury to use it only for those purposes and give another limiting instruction at the time of its final charge. State v. Gray, 1982, 643 P.2d 233, 197 Mont. 348. When evidence of other crimes is admitted under Mont.R.Ev. 404(b), it is the duty of the trial judge to give an instruction at the time the evidence is admitted and again in the final charge admonishing the jury of the limited purposes for which the evidence may be used. State v. Just, 1979, 602 P.2d 957, 184 Mont. 262.

But see A number of courts have held that a single instruction is all that is required: U.S. v. Longbehn, C.A.8th, 1990, 898 F.2d 635, 639; U.S. v. Sliker, C.A.2d, 1984, 751 F.2d 477, 487; U.S. v. Soulard, C.A.9th, 1984, 730 F.2d 1292, 1303; Murray v. Superintendent, C.A.6th, 1981, 651 F.2d 451, 454; People v. Hawley, 1982, 317 N.W.2d 564, 112 Mich.App. 784, reversed on other grounds, 1983, 332 N.W.2d 398, 417 Mich. 975.

FN4. Criticisms For some evidence that bad instructions are the product of sloppy thinking about the admissibility of the evidence, see U.S. v. Rodriguez-Cardona, C.A.1st, 1991, 924 F.2d 1148, 1151. Instruction that was simply a laundry list of permitted uses under Rule 404(b) was insufficient to limit evidence to proper uses. U.S. v. Cortijo-Diaz, C.A.1st, 1989, 875 F.2d 13, 15. Although instruction given by judge sua sponte on the use of evidence of defendant's sexual relations with his patients might have been more carefully drawn to indicate exactly how the evidence might be used by the jury, it was not so defective as to be plain error. U.S. v. Potter, C.A.9th, 1979, 616 F.2d 384, 390. Trial judge did not err in refusing to give a requested instruction on the use of other crimes evidence because it was internally inconsistent and misleading. U.S. v. Albert, C.A.5th, 1979, 595 F.2d 283, 289.

FN5. Little advice For a folksy, midtrial instruction judged good enough, see U.S. v. Cordell, C.A.5th, 1990, 912 F.2d 769, 775. Court seemingly approves smorgasbord instruction that simply paraphrases language of Rule 404(b) without indicating why evidence might be relevant in instant case. U.S. v. Watford, C.A.4th, 1990, 894 F.2d 665, 671. For a limiting instruction that the appellate court seems to think is just fine, though it must have been incomprehensible to the jurors, see U.S. v. Serian, C.A.8th, 1990, 895 F.2d 432, 434 n. 2. Use of smorgasbord instruction on use of other crimes was not a denial of due process. Hopkinson v. Shillinger, C.A.10th, 1989, 866 F.2d 1185, 1199 n. 8. One court has approved an instruction in a multi-defendant conspiracy case despite the fact that it fails to state for what purposes the evidence may be used or which of the defendants it can be used against. U.S. v. Astling, C.A.11th, 1984, 733 F.2d 1446, 1457. For a fairly typical example of judicial handwringing over this issue, see U.S. v. Bradshaw, C.A.9th, 1982, 690 F.2d 704, 710 (court would have preferred a more carefully drafted instruction but apparently has no idea of how this might be done). Prejudice to defendant was reduced when trial court, sua sponte, eliminated the word "crime" from a jury instruction on the use of other crimes, wrongs, or acts. U.S. v. Mucci, C.A.10th, 1980, 630 F.2d 737, 743. Some appellate courts have endorsed instructions that seem woefully inadequate by any standard. See, e.g., U.S. v. Knowles, C.A.10th, 1979, 572 F.2d 267, 270. The trial judge should limit the use of other crimes evidence by specifying in his instructions just which issues the evidence has been admitted to prove. Slough, Other Vices, Other Crimes: Kansas Statutes Annotated Section 60-455 Revisited, 1978, 26 U.Kan.L.Rev. 161, 166. For a set of limiting instruction on the use of evidence of other crimes on the issue of intent judged to be adequate by the appellate court, see U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1978, 582 F.2d 898, 917 n. 23. Judge properly instructed the jury that they could not consider a prior conviction offered on the issue of intent until they first found beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had actually done the acts charged in the indictment. U.S. v. Williams, C.A.2d, 1978, 577 F.2d, 188, 193. In U.S. v. Carleo, C.A.8th, 1978, 576 F.2d 846, 849, the jury was instructed at the time the evidence was admitted that: "Testimony is being received for the very limited purpose of shedding what light it may, if any, on the motive and intent of the defendant in your consideration of the charges made against him in this case." This seems somewhat less than adequate. One court, criticizing the instruction given by the trial judge as well as a pattern jury instruction, has suggested that it would be better to instruct the jury in the language of Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Miller, C.A.7th, 1978, 573 F.2d 388, 393-394. It is unlikely that such an instruction, while perhaps more accurate than those given, would be very helpful to the jurors. It was proper to instruct the jury that evidence of other crimes could not be used to prove the commission of the act charged in the indictment, but that if the jury found beyond a reasonable doubt that the charged act was committed it could, but was not required to, consider the other crimes as evidence of intent or state of mind. U.S. v. Evans, C.A.5th, 1978, 572 F.2d 455, 485. For a pattern jury instruction on the use of other crimes to show common scheme that is employed in the District of Columbia, see U.S. v. Wilkerson, C.A., 548 F.2d 970, 179 U.S.App.D.C. 15. In U.S. v. Testa, C.A.9th, 1977, 548 F.2d 847, 851 n. 1, the court approved instructions in which the jury was told that they could not use evidence of other crime unless they were first satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did the act charged and only if the other crime were proved by clear and convincing evidence. For a good instruction requiring jury to first determine whether or not the defendant did the acts charged in the indictment before considering other crimes evidence offered to prove intent, see U.S. v. Davis, C.A.5th, 1977, 546 F.2d 617, 619. For an especially curt limiting instruction, see U.S. v. McMillian, C.A.8th, 1976, 535 F.2d 1035, 1038-1039. Where evidence of other crimes were offered on the issue of intent, trial court properly charged the jury that could consider the evidence only after they found that the defendant did the act charged in the indictment. U.S. v. Snow, C.A.9th, 1976, 529 F.2d 224, 225. For a vague and abstract limiting instruction given at the time of the admission of evidence, see U.S. v. Alejandro, C.A.5th, 1976, 527 F.2d 423, 429. Where evidence of other crimes is admitted, the court should give a limiting instruction, informing the jury of the narrow purpose for which it has been admitted. U.S. v. Calvert, C.A.8th, 1975, 523 F.2d 895, 907. Where evidence of other crimes was only relevant for a narrowly limited purpose, court should not have given the jury a boiler-plate instruction that listed all of the possible reasons why evidence might be admissible under statute. People v. Deeney, 1983, 193 Cal.Rptr. 608, 145 Cal.App.3d 647. Instructions on use of other crimes should refer to them as "transactions" or "acts", rather than "offenses." People v. Mason, Colo.1982, 643 P.2d 745. It is improper to give an instruction on other crimes evidence that simply includes all of the permissible reasons in Rule 404(b); instruction should state the specific reasons for which the evidence has been admitted. State v. Fitzgerald, 1985, 694 P.2d 1117, 1124, 39 Wn.App. 652. Court approves instruction on use of other crimes evidence that is lucid but somewhat terse in State v. Brittain, 1984, 689 P.2d 1095, 1099 n. 4, 38 Wn.App. 740. For an elaborate instruction on the use of other crimes evidence which succeeds only in missing the point, see Federal Judicial Center Committee to Study Criminal Jury Instructions, Pattern Criminal Jury Instructions, 1982, p. 60. CALJIC 2.50 has at least been amended so as to discourage the smorgasbord form that simply invites the jury to pick whatever purpose they like for the evidence. L.A.Super.Ct., California Jury Instructions--Criminal, CALJIC 2.50 (1984 Revision). For a perfect example of an instruction so abstract as to be useless, see L.A.Super.Ct., California Jury Instructions--Criminal, 1977, CALJIC 2.27.

FN6. State proper purpose For a good instruction where evidence was admitted on issue of intent, see U.S. v. Scott, C.A.9th, 1985, 767 F.2d 1308, 1310. For a collection of mid-trial admonitions on the use of other crimes evidence that are of higher than average quality, see U.S. v. Bloom, C.A.5th, 1976, 538 F.2d 704, 705-707. For an instruction that is one of the better ones, see State v. Johns, 1986, 725 P.2d 312, 326, 301 Or. 535. It was error for court to give instruction that implied jury could use evidence of other crimes for improper purposes. People v. Key, 1984, 203 Cal.Rptr. 144, 153 Cal.App.3d 888. It was error to instruct jury that evidence of other crimes could be used to show common plan or scheme where the evidence was not admissible for that purpose, though it was admissible to show intent. People v. Garcia, 1981, 171 Cal.Rptr. 169, 115 Cal.App.3d 85. For a particularly slovenly set of instructions, see People v. Girtman, Colo.App.1984, 695 P.2d 759, 760 (court concerned because transcript suggests judge told jury that evidence could be used to prove guilt; more serious problem is that instruction did not tell jury what the evidence was offered to prove but only listed all the permissible elements in Rule 404(b)). Limiting instruction which permitted evidence to be used for purposes for which it was irrelevant could not cure error in admitting proof of other crime. State v. Matthews, 1984, 471 N.E.2d 849, 14 Ohio App.3d 440. Where trial court properly admits evidence for several purposes, failure to instruct jury on use for one of those purposes does not preclude reliance on that purpose to uphold decision on appeal. State v. Johnson, S.D.1982, 316 N.W.2d 652.

FN7. Invite forbidden inference It was error, but harmless, to instruct the jury that they could use evidence of other crimes to infer the defendant's predisposition to commit crimes since this is the very inference that Rule 404(b) prohibits. U.S. v. Nolan, C.A.7th, 1990, 910 F.2d 1553, 1562. For an instruction somewhat better than the usual, see State v. Tecca, 1986, 714 P.2d 136, 139-140, 220 Mont. 168. It was harmless error to instruct jurors that other crimes evidence could be used to prove the defendant's predisposition. U.S. v. Zapata, C.A.7th, 1989, 871 F.2d 616, 621. One court has seemingly approved a limiting instruction that simply listed all of the permissible grounds of admissibility in Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Federbush, C.A.9th, 1980, 625 F.2d 246, 249, 254. Instruction that jury could use evidence of other crime for what it was worth was not adequate because it permitted the jury to infer that if defendant committed uncharged rape he must have committed the rape charged. U.S. v. Aims Back, C.A.9th 1979, 588 F.2d 1283, 1286. Instruction that act of defendant in using false name in filing lost baggage report was "circumstantial evidence of guilt" was erroneous because it misstates the relevance of an act whose ambiguity was for the jury to resolve. U.S. v. Morales, C.A.2d, 1978, 577 F.2d 769, 773. The court's description of the instruction given in U.S. v. Jacobson, C.A.10th, 1978, 578 F.2d 863, 866, does not inspire confidence that it conveyed any understanding of the rule to the jury. For an example of an instruction that makes it plain what is forbidden, see Government of Virgin Islands v. Felix, C.A.3d, 1978, 569 F.2d 1274, 1281 n. 18. Court gave jury instruction that evidence of other crimes could be used only for all of the purposes listed in Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Nolan, C.A.10th 1977, 551 F.2d 266, 271. Although statements in instructions concerning effect of evidence of other crimes in causing the jury to believe that the defendant was "inclined to deal in heroin" and his "willingness to deal in drugs generally" may have suggested inference to propensity, instructions as a whole made clear the proper uses to which the evidence could be put. U.S. v. Bloom, C.A.5th, 1976, 538 F.2d 704, 710. It was reversible error to give instructions on the use of other crimes evidence that failed to specify the proper purposes for which the evidence had been admitted and did not forbid the jury to infer that because the defendant had a propensity to commit such crimes, he must have committed this one. People v. Holder, Colo.App.1984, 687 P.2d 462, 463. For a case in which the court gave an instruction that simply rattled off all of the permissible uses listed in Rule 404(b) but omitted the one for which the evidence had been supposedly admitted, see State v. Fitzgerald, 1985, 694 P.2d 1117, 1124, 39 Wn.App. 652.

FN8. Too refined One court seems to have approved an instruction to the jury that allowed evidence to be used on an entirely different theory from that which the appellate court used to justify its admission. U.S. v. Penson, C.A.7th, 1990, 896 F.2d 1087, 1093.

FN9. Role of discretion A trial court's ruling on the admissibility of evidence of other crimes, following a conscientious assessment of the Rule 403 factors, will not be overturned on appeal absent a clear showing of abuse of discretion. U.S. v. Martino, C.A.2d, 1985, 759 F.2d 998, 1005. Caselaw overwhelmingly affords the trial judge a broad discretion in the admission of evidence of other crimes. U.S. v. Vincent, C.A.6th, 1982, 681 F.2d 462, 465. In reviewing discretionary decision to admit evidence of other crimes under Rule 403, great deference is due the trial judge who saw and heard the evidence. U.S. v. Brown, C.A.8th, 1979, 605 F.2d 389, 394. Balancing of probative worth of other crimes evidence against its possible prejudice is generally a matter of discretion for the trial court and reversal is not required where that discretion is not abused. U.S. v. Young, C.A.9th, 1978, 573 F.2d 1137, 1140. Question of whether other crimes were sufficiently similar to constitute a plan was within the discretion of the trial court. Fazio v. Brotman, Iowa App.1985, 371 N.W.2d 842, 846. What the court really did in this case was to approve a sloppy definition of the word "plan" under the guise of honoring a discretion concerning facts. While generally a decision to admit evidence of other crimes is within discretion of trial court, trial court had no discretion to decide that the evidence was inadmissible as needless and prejudicial on a pre-trial motion. State v. Browder, 1984, 687 P.2d 168, 170, 69 Or.App. 564.

FN10. Only abuse of discretion The abuse of discretion standard has been endorsed by most federal courts. Second Circuit: U.S. v. Rucker, C.A.2d, 1978, 586 F.2d 899, 903 (reversal only if trial judge is "arbitrary or irrational"): U.S. v. Leonard, C.A.2d, 1975, 524 F.2d 1076, 1092 (explains rationale). Third Circuit: U.S. v. Long, C.A.3d, 1978, 574 F.2d 761, 767 (thoughtful but somewhat extravagant description of trial court discretion). Fifth Circuit: U.S. v. Robinson, C.A.5th, 1983, 713 F.2d 110. Sixth Circuit: U.S. v. Acosta-Cazeres, C.A.6th, 1989, 878 F.2d 945, 948; U.S. v. Hamilton, C.A.6th, 1982, 684 F.2d 380, 384. Seventh Circuit: U.S. v. Baskes, C.A.7th, 1980, 649 F.2d 471, 481. Eighth Circuit: U.S. v. Bohr, C.A.8th, 1978, 581 F.2d 1294, 1299; U.S. v. Conley, C.A.8th, 1975, 523 F.2d 650, 654. Ninth Circuit: Coursen v. A.H. Robins Co., Inc., C.A.9th, 1985, 764 F.2d 1329, 1335; U.S. v. Martin, C.A.9th, 1979, 599 F.2d 880, 889; U.S. v. Herrell, C.A.9th, 1978, 588 F.2d 711, 714; U.S. v. Sangrey, C.A.9th, 1978, 586 F.2d 1312, 1314; U.S. v. Espinoza, C.A.9th, 1978, 578 F.2d 224, 228. Tenth Circuit: U.S. v. Jacobson, C.A.10th, 1978, 578 F.2d 863, 867. Eleventh Circuit: U.S. v. Reed, C.A.11th, 1983, 700 F.2d 638, 646.

But see Courts, however, have found it easy to ignore the supposed rule in some cases: U.S. v. Green, C.A.9th, 1981, 648 F.2d 587, 593 (where no evidence trial judge performed Rule 403 balancing); U.S. v. Bejar-Matrecios, C.A.9th, 1980, 618 F.2d 81, 84; U.S. v. Bettencourt, C.A.9th, 1980, 614 F.2d 214, 218 (trial judge reversed for having "incorrectly struck [the] balance" under Rule 403).

State cases It was an abuse of discretion to admit all of the evidence of other crimes tendered by the prosecution without balancing probative worth and prejudice. People v. Carner, 1982, 324 N.W.2d 78, 117 Mich.App. 560. In murder prosecution, evidence of other murder supposedly committed by defendant was so prejudicial that its admission denied the defendant a fair trial. People v. Golochowicz, 1982, 319 N.W.2d 518, 527, 413 Mich. 298. Admission of prior acts will be overturned as an abuse of discretion only when it is overtly inflammatory in comparison to alternative modes of proof. State v. Bouchard, 1982, 639 P.2d 761, 31 Wash.App. 381. Review of trial court's ruling admitting other crimes evidence is limited to whether the court exercised its discretion in accordance with the law and on the facts of record. State v. Harris, App.1985, 365 N.W.2d 922, 925, 123 Wis.2d 231.

FN11. Determining relevance For a case in which the court affirms convictions despite egregious prosecutorial abuse, but fires a warning shot across the bow, see U.S. v. Rodriguez-Cardona, C.A.1st, 1991, 924 F.2d 1148, 1153. One court seems to have resurrected the doctrine of "precedential relevance," see s 5162, stating that in light of prior decisions it could not hold that the trial court had abused its discretion in the instant case. U.S. v. Herrera-Medina, C.A.9th, 1979, 609 F.2d 376, 380. The court in U.S. v. Wilson, C.A.5th, 1978, 578 F.2d 67, 71-72, chastises the prosecutor for introducing in evidence unnecessary evidence of other crimes. Unfortunately the balance of the opinion appears to put the prosecutor in a "can't lose" situation; if the evidence was unnecessary, the prosecution's case was so strong that the error was harmless. And presumably, if the error was harmful, the evidence was not unnecessary. The court's rhetoric seems misdirected. Whatever the ethical obligations of the prosecutor, Rule 404(b) puts the duty of determining the admissibility of evidence of other crimes evidence on the trial judge. No amount of exhortation of the prosecutor can do much to assist the trial judge in exercising his authority. Evidence of prior narcotics transaction that was close in time and similar in kind to those charged in the indictment was relevant to prove intent. U.S. v. Jardan, C.A.8th, 1977, 552 F.2d 216, 219. Where trial court's decision to admit evidence of prior acts of sex offender was based on a single ground, appellate court would limit its review to propriety of use of evidence for that purpose. People v. Thompson, 1979, 159 Cal.Rptr. 615, 98 Cal.App.3d 467. Where 1962 murder conviction was erroneously admitted at trial for purposes of impeachment, it could not be argued on appeal that the conviction was admissible as other crimes evidence under N.M.R.Ev. 404(b). Casaus v. State, 1980, 607 P.2d 596, 94 N.M. 58.

FN12. Not appropriate Without the slightest effort to engage in the balancing required by Rule 403, court holds that massive evidence of prior sexual abuse of students was admissible to prove intent despite fact that intent was obvious and defendant offered to stipulate that if he did the act he had the requisite intent. U.S. v. Hadley, C.A.9th, 1990, 918 F.2d 848, 852. Prejudice that arose from evidence that defendant was a cocaine user with lots of money was not unfair because it proved that he was a participant in the charged conspiracy to distribute drugs. U.S. v. Hargrove, C.A.7th, 1991, 929 F.2d 316, 320. For an incomprehensible opinion, see U.S. v. Auerbach, C.A.8th, 1982, 682 F.2d 735, 738. Evidence that black defendant was having relations with two white women was properly admitted to show that one of the women so trusted him that she could be used as part of charged insurance fraud, despite fact that this woman had testified in court that she trusted defendant. U.S. v. Boykin, C.A.8th, 1982, 679 F.2d 1240, 1244. For an almost incomprehensible opinion explaining why it was not error in prosecution for sale and transportation of stolen antique silver tea service to admit evidence that defendants were also ready to sell 500 pounds of marijuana, see U.S. v. Tisdale, C.A.10th, 1981, 647 F.2d 91. Does this mean "Tea for Two" will now be banned from airwaves as a surreptitious drug song? "District court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the probative value, on the issue of appellant's knowledge and intent, of evidence that appellant had committed two similar robberies within a month prior to the offense charged outweighed any improper prejudicial effect of this evidence." U.S. v. Casanova, C.A.9th, 1981, 642 F.2d 300, 301. In U.S. v. Williams, C.A.5th, 1979, 596 F.2d 44, 51, the court warned prosecutors that they might jeopardize convictions by putting in evidence of other crimes "when the question of admissibility, as here, is a close one." However, the court neglects to explain why the issue was "a close one." For a diabolical application of the Catch 22 principle, see U.S. v. Underwood, C.A.5th, 1979, 588 F.2d 1073, 1076 (defendant's argument that the prosecution had so much other evidence that it had no need to use evidence of other crimes used to support a conclusion by the appellate court that the error was harmless). For a case in which the appellate court approves the admission of evidence of other crimes without describing the evidence or the purpose for which it was thought admissible, see U.S. v. Griffin, C.A.8th, 1978, 579 F.2d 1104, 1109. For a case which seems to treat the admissibility of evidence of other crimes to be a matter of comparing precedents, see U.S. v. Espinoza, C.A.9th, 1978, 578 F.2d 224, 227-228. For a particularly egregious example of appellate cynicism, see U.S. v. Weidman, C.A.7th, 1978, 572 F.2d 1199, 1201-1203 (court approves admission of other crimes to prove intent and plan, though the latter ground was never raised in the trial court and the jury was explicitly instructed that the evidence could not be used to prove intent). One does not know what to say about an opinion that admits evidence that defendant had raped one woman with a butcher knife to identify him as the person who murdered another woman with a similar knife, then approves action of trial court in admitting conviction alone without any of the details supposed to make it relevant. State v. Churchill, 1982, 646 P.2d 1049, 231 Kan. 408. For a case in which the court gives no reasons at all for conclusion that trial court properly admitted evidence of prior instance of "contempt of cop" in prosecution for shooting in a nightclub brawl involving civilians, see State v. Taylor, Minn.App.1985, 369 N.W.2d 30, 31. In prosecution for terroristic threats against a Cuban immigrant, trial court did not abuse discretion in admitting evidence of gesture in court where defendant drew index finger across throat or similar gesture two years earlier made with knife; court offers no explanation of relevance of the evidence. State v. Lavastida, Minn.App.1985, 366 N.W.2d 677, 679. For an opinion so written as to make it all but impossible to know what the court has decided, see State v. Coles, Minn.1983, 328 N.W.2d 157 (statement of facts so skimpy that it is impossible to say what evidence was).

FN14. Erie doctrine In diversity action, Federal Rules of Evidence govern the admissibility of evidence of other crimes. Garcia v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., C.A.5th, 1981, 657 F.2d 652, 654. In suit for common law fraud in tampering with odometers on automobiles, evidence of prior odometer rollbacks was admissible under Oklahoma law to show intent. Edgar v. Fred Jones Lincoln-Mercury, C.A.10th, 1975, 524 F.2d 162, 167. Court assumes without discussion that admissibility of other acts in a libel case is governed by state law. Sharon v. Time, Inc., D.C.N.Y.1984, 103 F.R.D. 86, 91.

FPP s 5249 (R 404)

END OF DOCUMENT

22 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure s 5249 (Rule 404)
(TREATISE MAIN VOLUME)
(Publication page references are not available for this document.)

Federal Practice and Procedure
Federal Rules of Evidence
Charles Alan Wright
Kenneth W. Graham, Jr.

Chapter 5 Relevancy and Its Limits

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct: Exceptions: Other Crimes

s 5249. ---- PROCEDURE

Rule 404(b) recognizes the legitimate probative worth that evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts may have when offered to prove some fact other than the propensity of the accused to engage in criminal conduct. But the popularity of this form of proof with prosecutors is probably due as much to the tactical advantages it affords as to its probative worth. [FN1] Given its capacity for prejudice and abuse, the defense ought to have a reasonable opportunity to limit such proof to its legitimate probative impact. This means that the procedure for adjudicating admissibility is as important as the rules of admission and exclusion. [FN2] However, Rule 404(b) makes no attempt to spell out such procedures. It is therefore the duty of the trial judge, with such aid as may be gleaned from appellate opinions, to devise appropriate techniques to prevent abuse.

The major tactical advantage accruing to the prosecution is surprise since there is no requirement that the other crime be alleged in the pleadings and often the existence of such evidence cannot be determined through the limited discovery available in criminal cases. The Minnesota Supreme Court, in an important pair of decisions, has required the prosecutor to give advance notice of intent to use other crimes evidence, [FN3] a procedure now covered by court rule in that state. [FN4] Louisiana followed suit shortly thereafter. [FN5] The Louisiana procedure has now been incorporated in the Florida Evidence Code, [FN6] but few other states have seen fit to adopt similar reforms. [FN7]

Although urged to do so, [FN8] Congress declined to add a notice requirement to Rule 404(b). [FN9] Federal courts have held that notice of intent to use evidence of other crimes is not required, [FN10] explicitly refusing to adopt the Minnesota procedure. [FN11] Worse yet, some opinions seem to approve the denial of discovery designed to elicit evidence of other crimes. [FN12] However, some recent decisions may indicate a contrary trend. It has been held error to refuse discovery of other crimes evidence without good reason. [FN13] Another opinion suggests that notice is required where the prosecutor changes his mind after stating at an omnibus hearing that evidence of other crimes will not be offered. [FN14] Finally, a notice requirement has been imposed in cases in which the prosecutor intends to call the defendant's probation officer as a witness. [FN15]

Of course, even the precedents declining to require notice do not suggest that it is beyond the power of the trial judge to require disclosure of the intent to use evidence of other crimes at a pretrial conference, [FN16] or otherwise. Moreover, the absence of notice can be taken into account when the trial judge is determining prejudice to the defendant [FN17] as part of the exercise of his discretion to admit or exclude such evidence. [FN18]

If counsel knows or suspects that evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts may be offered against his client, the issue may be raised prior to a trial by a motion in limine. [FN19] Otherwise the issue is properly raised by a timely objection when the evidence is sought to be introduced. [FN20] Although the proper objection is that the evidence is irrelevant, [FN21] it is probably wise for counsel to add that even if the evidence is relevant he wishes to invoke the trial judge's discretion to exclude it nonetheless under Rule 403. [FN22]

Once the issue of admissibility has been properly raised it is up to the offeror to show that the evidence of other crimes is relevant. [FN23] He has the burden of proof with respect to any preliminary questions of fact. [FN24] Although relevance is generally a preliminary fact to be determined by the jury under Rule 104(b), [FN25] the importance of the trial judge's discretion [FN26] in the decision to admit or exclude under Rule 404(b) suggests that preliminary questions concerning the admissibility of other crimes evidence should be determined by the trial judge under Rule 104(a). [FN27] It has been argued that the best procedure is to require the prosecution to make an offer of proof out of the presence of the jury. [FN28]

The offeror must specify the issue proposed to be proved by the evidence of other crimes. [FN29] Some federal courts have taken the position that since the plea of not guilty puts in issue every element of the offense, it is enough that the prosecution be able to point to some element of the crime as to which the evidence is relevant. [FN30] The contrary opinion was well put in the House of Lords over fifty years ago: Before an issue can be said to be raised, which would permit the introduction of evidence so obviously prejudicial to the accused, it must have been raised in substance if not in so many words * * *. The mere theory that a plea of not guilty puts everything material in issue is not enough for this purpose. The prosecution cannot credit the accused with fancy defenses in order to rebut them at the outset with some damning piece of prejudice. [FN31] This position has been applauded by most of the writers [FN32] and it has been read into some of the state codes. [FN33]

Although the requirement that other crimes evidence be offered on an issue that is actually in dispute has been said to have been "espoused by nearly every court of appeals," [FN34] there are enough contrary opinions to put the issue in doubt. [FN35] The Advisory Committee added to the confusion when it deleted a provision from prior codifications that would have made evidence irrelevant unless directed at a disputed issue. [FN36] Despite these contrary indications, it would seem that the trial court must consider whether the issue is actually disputed in exercising its discretion under Rule 403; [FN37] if the defendant does not contest the point, there is little need for the proof and its probative worth is therefore outweighed by the countervailing factors.

Since the pleadings in a criminal case are not designed to frame issues, it is not always easy to see what issues are disputed. Clearly if the defense is willing to enter into an adequate stipulation as to the fact or issue, there is nothing in dispute. [FN38] In other cases the issues may be clear from the arguments of counsel or the tenor of cross-examination of prosecution witnesses. One way for the trial court to get a clearer picture is through an exercise of its power to control the order of proof. [FN39] It has been suggested that the prosecution be required to put on all of its other evidence first [FN40] so that the court can accurately measure the need for other crimes evidence. Another method is to postpone the admissibility of such evidence until rebuttal [FN41] or the conclusion of the case. [FN42]

After the offeror designates the disputed issue it is designed to prove, he must then reveal the evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts he wishes to introduce. Such evidence must, of course, satisfy other rules of evidence; e.g., the hearsay rule. [FN43] A prior conviction [FN44] is obviously the most efficient method of proof since presumably under general principles of collateral estoppel the defendant would be precluded from disputing the ultimate facts necessary to the conviction. [FN45] Sometimes, however, the conviction will not reveal the facts concerning the prior crime that are relevant in the instant case; e.g., modus operandi when needed to identify the defendant. In such cases, and in cases in which the prior crime has not been the subject of prosecution, it may be proved by witnesses and other fact and the defendant is free to disprove it if she can. [FN46]

If the government undertakes to prove the other crime, wrong, or act by the introduction of evidence, an important question is the standard by which the sufficiency of that proof is to be measured. It is generally agreed that the other crime need not be proved "beyond a reasonable doubt." [FN47] But most courts have attempted to impose a somewhat higher standard than that imposed for the admissibility of evidence generally. [FN48] It has been said that there must be "substantial evidence," [FN49] "substantial proof" [FN50] or "satisfactory proof." [FN51] Some courts require that the evidence be "clear and convincing;" [FN52] this is the standard that appears to have been applied by most federal courts prior to the adoption of Rule 404(b), [FN53] though the Fifth Circuit favored a requirement that the evidence be "plain, clear, and conclusive." [FN54]

Rule 404(b) does not explicitly deal with this issue. As a result, many courts have continued to apply pre-existing standards for the sufficiency of proof of other crimes. [FN55] The Florida [FN56] and South Dakota [FN57] codifiers have read Rule 404(b) as incorporating, or at least not inconsistent with, a higher standard for proof of other crimes. However, at least one court has speculated that Rule 404(b) may have been intended to repeal procedural restrictions on the use of other crimes evidence developed by the prior case law, including the requirement that other crimes be proved by a higher standard than that provided in Rule 104(b). [FN58] That court seems to argue that exclusion is justified only if the proof of the other crime is so uncertain that probative worth is outweighed by one or more of the countervailing factors in Rule 403. While it is possible to incorporate all of the pre-existing procedural safeguards into the formula of Rule 403, [FN59] one can also argue that Rule 403 is designed to deal with the strength of the inference from the other crime to the ultimate issue it is offered to prove, and thus assumes that the other crime has been proved; hence, the sufficiency of the proof of the other crime is an entirely different question. [FN60] The first opinion to deal explicitly with this issue holds, albeit over a strong dissent, that Rule 404(b) leaves intact the prior standard for proof of other crimes. [FN61]

Whatever the standard of proof, there is also the question of who is to apply it. [FN62] If proof of the other crime were to be regarded as a preliminary fact involving relevance, [FN63] Rule 104(b) would suggest that the judge should admit the proof on a mere showing of sufficiency to support a finding of the commission of the other crime and instruct the jury that they cannot use it as evidence unless they find that it was proved by "clear and convincing evidence," or whatever the standard is to be. [FN64] But the cases and commentators [FN65] all appear to assume that the higher standard of proof is to be applied by the judge in determining the admissibility of the evidence. Given the important role assigned the trial judge in the Advisory Committee's Note, [FN66] it seems very doubtful that they intended the admissibility of other crimes evidence to be determined by the jury under Rule 104(b).

A related question is how much of the prior offense must be proved by the more exacting standard. [FN67] One case suggests that only "the congruent physical elements of the prior offense" need be shown. [FN68] However, that was a case in which the evidence was offered to prove intent on a theory of probability. [FN69] Under that theory there is, of course, no requirement that mental element of the prior offense be proved at all, much less by the higher standard. It would seem that the question in each case must turn on the underlying theory of relevance; for example, a prior arrest for possession of marijuana can prove the defendant's subsequent knowledge of the nature of the substance even if it is assumed the prior possession was innocent. Hence, the prosecution need not prove all of the elements of the prior crime by "clear and convincing proof" but only those elements that are essential under its theory of relevance.

The reasonable doubt standard is not the only rule of sufficiency that is inapplicable when a prior crime is being used for evidentiary purposes. It has been held that the two-witness rule does not apply to proof of an act of perjury not charged in the indictment. [FN70] By analogy, it would seem that other rules dealing with the sufficiency of evidence, such as those requiring corroboration of certain kinds of testimony, should be held to apply only when the defendant is charged with the crime and not when the crime is being used as evidence under Rule 404(b). [FN71]

Is the use of a prior crime as evidence barred when the defendant has previously been prosecuted for that crime and acquitted? [FN72] Although there is contrary authority [FN73] and some commentators have argued that such use violates the doctrine of collateral estoppel and the prohibition against double jeopardy, [FN74] most state [FN75] and federal courts [FN76] have rejected these claims and held the evidence admissible. A fortiori, dismissal of the charges prior to trial is no bar. [FN77] Similar results have been reached under Rule 404(b). [FN78] Some cases have suggested that the trial judge may take the fact of acquittal into account in balancing probative worth and prejudice for purposes of discretionary exclusion. [FN79] It can also be argued that an acquittal conclusively establishes that the higher standard for proof of other crimes has not been met. If the evidence is admitted, the defendant should be allowed to prove the acquittal as going to the weight of the evidence. [FN80]

It seems to be generally assumed that most of the rules that govern the prosecution of a crime are not applicable when it is used under Rule 404(b); [FN81] i.e., statutes of limitation, grand jury indictment, etc. For example, in a recent case it was held that an agreement not to prosecute an extradited person for certain crimes did not preclude the introduction of evidence of those crimes in a trial of different charges. [FN82] But in some cases the evidentiary use of the prior crime seems unfair; e.g., proving a crime where charges based on that crime were dismissed because government delay made it impossible to obtain defense evidence. [FN83] One court has held that evidence of another crime obtained under a grant of immunity to the defendant cannot be used against him. [FN84] It would seem appropriate for a court to consider these matters in assessing the prejudice to the defendant in the use of the other crime. [FN85]

Once the material issue has been identified and the other crimes evidence has been presented out of the presence of the jury, [FN86] the trial judge is in a position to rule on its admissibility. As will be explained in the next section, [FN87] this decision is not to be made simply by labeling the evidence [FN88] or by comparing it with evidence held properly admitted in appellate opinions; [FN89] rather the trial judge must consider both the probative worth of the evidence and its prejudice to the defendant in exercising a discretion to admit or exclude. [FN90] If there is no jury, the standard for admission is said to be less stringent, [FN91] partially because the judge will have necessarily heard the evidence in making his ruling and partially because the judge is assumed to be capable of ignoring the prejudicial aspects and giving the evidence no more than its proper probative value. [FN92]

If the court's decision is to admit the evidence, steps must be taken to insure that the evidence is only used for the purpose or purposes for which it was admitted. [FN93] One such step is to admit only those details of the prior crime that are relevant to legitimate use of the evidence. [FN94] For example, if the other crime is to be offered to show defendant's knowledge of karate techniques in order to identify him as the attacker of the present victim, there is no need to show the injuries to the victim of the prior crime. In addition, the court must prohibit counsel from arguing impermissible inferences from the evidence [FN95] and must not suggest to the jury that the evidence can be used for purposes beyond those for which it was admitted. [FN96]

The principal device for controlling the use of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is the limiting instruction. [FN97] Critics have been skeptical regarding the utility of instructions [FN98] and attorneys often prefer not to have the evidence emphasized by such futile exhortations. [FN99] Perhaps for these reasons, [FN1] the trial judge is under no duty to give a cautionary instruction sua sponte; [FN2] it must be requested by counsel. If instructions are to be given, it would be wise to give them twice; [FN3] once when the evidence is about to be heard and again when the case is submitted to the jury. As to the form of the instructions, trial judges will find criticisms of those usually given, [FN4] but little advice on how to improve them from either the writers or the appellate courts. [FN5] A good instruction should explain to the jury the proper use of the evidence [FN6] in terms that are not so vague as to invite the forbidden inference to propensity [FN7] and not so refined that they cannot be applied. [FN8]

Appellate review of decisions admitting evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is an important, but sometimes misunderstood, part of the procedure for administering Rule 404(b). A few opinions seem to suggest that because of the role of discretion in the trial court, [FN9] appellate review is confined to cases involving abuses of discretion. [FN10] But the trial judge's discretion does not arise unless the evidence is relevant for some purpose other than to prove the defendant's propensity to commit crimes. The appellate court has an important role to play in developing standards for the relevance of other crimes evidence that go beyond the collection of labels in Rule 404(b). [FN11] There are a number of recent opinions that do offer guidance to trial judges in distinguishing the legitimate uses of this form of proof from the ersatz justifications sometimes offered by counsel. But some appellate opinions do not provide an appropriate model for trial judges to follow in the conscientious application of the rule. [FN12]

Federal courts are not required to follow state rulings on the use of other crimes evidence in criminal cases. [FN13] Since other crimes evidence has seldom been offered in civil cases, the application of the Erie doctrine when such evidence is offered in diversity cases is not clear. [FN14] It can be argued that a state rule admitting or excluding such evidence is so intertwined with the state substantive law that a federal court would be bound to follow it. [FN15] Now that Rule 404(b) expands the rule to include other acts and wrongs [FN16] the possibility for conflict with state law is increased and some more definitive rulings may soon appear. Of course, rulings construing state versions of Rule 404(b) can be quite helpful in applying the rule even though not binding precedents.

FN1. Tactical advantages As noted below, the principal advantage is that of surprise. The defendant may be unprepared to meet evidence offered during the case-in-chief or may be dramatically destroyed by evidence of other crimes offered in rebuttal of a defense that might not have been made had the existence of the evidence been known. Even with notice, the defense may lack the resources to defend against several crimes. Moreover, the defense may be placed in the dilemma of choosing between fighting the other crimes evidence, and thus enhancing its importance in the eyes of the jury, or disparaging its probative worth, thus seeming to concede the truth of the charges.

FN2. Procedure important Lacy, Admissibility of Evidence of Crimes Not Charged in the Indictment, 1952, 31 Ore.L.Rev. 267, 284; Note, Developments in Evidence of Other Crimes, 1974, 7 U.Mich.J.L.Ref. 535, 546.

FN3. Minnesota decisions State v. Billstrom, 1967, 149 N.W.2d 281, 276 Minn. 174; State v. Spreigl, 1965, 139 N.W.2d 167, 272 Minn. 488.

FN4. Court rule See Minn.R.Crim.P. 7.02.

FN5. Louisiana followed State v. Prieur, La.1973, 277 So.2d 126. See generally, Comment, Other Crimes Evidence in Louisiana--To Show Knowledge, Intent, System, Etc. in the Case in Chief, 1973, 33 La.L.Rev. 614, 628.

FN6. Florida incorporation See Fla.Evid.Code s 90.404(2)(b), quoted in s 5231 n. 39. See also, Ehrhardt, Florida Evidence, 1977, s 404.12.

FN7. Other states Note, Development in Evidence of Other Crimes, 1974, 7 U.Mich.J.L.Ref. 535, 550.

FN8. Urged to do so 2 House Hearings, p. 203.

FN9. Declined to add It may be that Congress thought such a procedural regulation was out of place in the Evidence Rules. But cf. F.R.Ev. 803(24), 804(5) imposing a requirement of notice of intent to use wildcard exceptions to hearsay rule.

FN10. Notice not required U.S. v. Miller, C.A.9th, 1975, 520 F.2d 1208, 1211. The Government is under no obligation to tell defendant's attorney that it plans to introduce evidence of prior crime that took place 16 years ago. U.S. v. Corey, C.A.2d, 1977, 566 F.2d 429, 431 n. 5.

FN11. Refuse to adopt McConkey v. U.S., C.A.8th, 1971, 444 F.2d 788 (stating such rule should be imposed only as part of rulemaking process).

FN12. Denial of discovery U.S. v. Nakaladski, C.A.5th, 1973, 481 F.2d 289, 297 n. 5. It is not clear whether uncharged prior crimes are discoverable as part of the defendant's "prior criminal record" under Criminal Rule 16(a)(1)(B), added in 1975. See vol. 1, s 253.

FN13. Without good reason It was reversible error for prosecution to refuse to disclose the identity of a witness to prior crimes so as to enable the defense to prepare to meet his testimony where the witness was in custody and was hoping to receive sentence considerations for his testimony; advance disclosure presented no danger to witness and there were no valid considerations to justify concealment. U.S. v. Baum, C.A.2d, 1973, 482 F.2d 1325, 1331-1332.

FN14. Notice of change U.S. v. Scanland, C.A.5th, 1974, 495 F.2d 1104.

FN15. Probation officer notice U.S. v. Pavon, C.A.9th, 1977, 561 F.2d 799, 802.

FN16. Pretrial conference See vol. 1, s 292.

FN17. Prejudice to defendant Cf. U.S. v. Scanland, C.A.5th, 1974, 495 F.2d 1104, 1106.

FN18. Discretion to admit See s 5250.

FN19. Motion in limine The desirability of an advance ruling has been recognized by some commentators. See 2 Weinstein & Berger, Weinstein's Evidence, 1975, p. 404-29; Ehrhardt, Florida Evidence, 1977, p. 78. For cases in which the procedure has been invoked, see U.S. v. Wiggins, C.A.1975, 509 F.2d 454, 166 U.S.App.D.C. 121; U.S. v. Leon, C.A.5th, 1975, 441 F.2d 175, 178 (advance ruling at behest of prosecutor). For general discussion of the motion in limine, see vol. 21, s 5037. For example of use of motion in limine to suppress other crimes evidence, see U.S. v. Stover, C.A.8th, 1977, 565 F.2d 1010.

FN20. Objection The requirements for making an objection are set out in Rule 103. See generally vol. 21, ss 5036-5038. Defendant must object in trial court to use of other crimes evidence; the issue cannot be raised for the first time on appeal and admission of tape recording in which defendant made reference to a prior prosecution for similar offense was not plain error. U.S. v. Rowe, C.A.10th, 1977, 565 F.2d 635. It was not error for the trial judge to admit evidence of other acts where the objection made to such evidence was too vague to permit an informed decision to be made on the legal issue involved. U.S. v. Greenfield, C.A.5th, 1977, 554 F.2d 179, 186. Objection that evidence "serves no purpose whatsoever in this case" and "is not admissible as original evidence" is too loosely formulated and imprecise to preserve for appeal improper admission of other crimes evidence. U.S. v. Arteaga-Limones, C.A.5th, 1976, 529 F.2d 1183, 1190. General objection was insufficient to preserve for appeal failure of trial court to exclude inflammatory details not necessary for purpose for which other crime was admitted. Holmes v. State, 1977, 251 N.W.2d 56, 76 Wis.2d 259.

FN21. Irrelevant Ehrhardt, Florida Evidence, 1977, p. 72.

FN22. Invoking discretion See s 5224.

FN23. Must show relevance Ehrhardt, Florida Evidence, 1977, p. 72; Lacy, Admissibility of Evidence of Crimes Not Charged in the Indictment, 1952, 31 Ore.L.Rev. 267, 284; Comment, Other Crimes Evidence in Louisiana--To Show Knowledge, Intent, System, Etc. in the Case in Chief, 1973, 33 La.L.Rev. 614, 628. It was not reversible error in bank robbery prosecution to admit evidence that defendant and accomplice robbed another business during the prior week using the same gun as in the charged robbery since appellate court could not say that the evidence has no bearing on the issues. U.S. v. McMillian, C.A.8th, 1976, 535 F.2d 1035, 1038-39.

FN24. Burden of proof Ehrhardt, Florida Evidence, 1977, p. 72. In prosecution of a tax preparer for counselling filing of false returns, testimony that an audit of 160 returns prepared by the defendant showed that 90-95% contained overstated deductions should not have been admitted without evidence showing why deductions were thought to be overstated; such evidence insinuated other crimes by the defendant without any proof of them. U.S. v. Brown, C.A.5th, 1977, 548 F.2d 1194, 1206.

FN25. Jury determines See vol. 21, s 5054.

FN26. Judge's discretion See s 5250.

FN27. Determined by judge In addition, the standard for proof of other crimes, discussed below at notes 47-54, is inconsistent with the standard for proof of preliminary facts established in Rule 104(b) for jury determined facts. It was not error for the trial court to refuse to hold a preliminary inquiry into the admissibility of other crimes evidence, though it would have been wise to have done so since such a hearing would have revealed that the evidence was redundant and remote. U.S. v. DeVincent, C.A.1st, 1976, 546 F.2d 452, 457.

FN28. Offer of proof Comment, A Proposed Analytical Method for the Determination of the Admissibility of Evidence of Other Offenses in California, 1960, 7 U.C.L.A.L.Rev. 463, 483.

FN29. Must specify issue Comment, A Proposed Analytical Method for the Determination of the Admissibility of Other Offenses in California, 1960, 7 U.C.L.A.L.Rev. 463, 483.

FN30. Point to element U.S. v. DiZenzo, C.A.4th, 1974, 500 F.2d 263, 265. But see discussion in s 5242 at notes 20-25.

FN31. "Fancy defenses" Thompson v. The King, H.L., [1918] A.C. 221, 232 (Lord Sumner).

FN32. Writers Herbert & Mount, Ohio's "Similar Acts Statute": Its Uses and Abuses, 1975, 9 Akron L.Rev. 301, 307, 308, 326; Slough, Other Vices, Other Crimes: An Evidentiary Dilemma, 1972, 20 U.Kans.L.Rev. 411, 430; Comment, The Admissibility of Other Crimes in Texas, 1972, 50 Texas L.Rev. 1409, 1411-1412; Comment, Other Crimes Evidence at Trial: Of Balancing and Other Matters, 1961, 70 Yale L.J. 763, 770; Note, Admissibility in Criminal Prosecutions of Proof of Other Offenses As Substantive Evidence, 1950, 3 Vand.L.Rev. 779, 783.

FN33. Read into codes N.J.Sup.Ct., Committee on Evidence, Report, 1963, p. 103; People v. Swearington, 1977, 140 Cal.Rptr. 5, 71 Cal.App.3d 935; People v. Reyes, 1976, 132 Cal.Rptr. 848, 62 Cal.App.3d 53. See also, Judicial Council Committee's Note, Wisc.R.Ev. 904.04: "Evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts which tend to prove motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, is not automatically admissible. It should be excluded if motive, opportunity, intent, etc. is not substantially disputed. * * *"

FN34. "Nearly every court" U.S. v. James, C.A.1977, 555 F.2d 992, 1000 n. 46, 181 U.S.App.D.C. 55 (citing many cases). In order for evidence of other crimes to be admissible on the issue of intent, it is essential that intent be more than a formal issue as a result of defendant's plea of not guilty; where the defendant denied having done the act but made no contention that it was not done with the requisite intent, it was reversible error to permit the government to introduce evidence that the defendant engaged in a similar act on a prior occasion. U.S. v. Frierson, C.A.7th, 1969, 419 F.2d 1020. See also, U.S. v. Myers, C.A.5th, 1977, 550 F.2d 1036, 1044 (element sought to be proved must be "a material issue in the case"); U.S. v. McCord, C.A.7th, 1975, 509 F.2d 891, 895 (other crimes evidence should not be admitted on entrapment theory until defense "demonstrates clearly that the entrapment defense will ultimately be raised"); U.S. v. Miller, C.A.7th, 1974, 508 F.2d 444, 450 (evidence of other crimes not admissible on issue of intent until defendant "affirmatively contested" intent); U.S. v. Goodwin, C.A.5th, 1974, 492 F.2d 1141, 1152 (error to admit evidence on issue of intent where "that issue was never seriously disputed at trial").

FN35. Contrary opinions U.S. v. Adcock, C.A.8th, 1977, 558 F.2d 397, 402; U.S. v. Brettholz, C.A.2d, 1973, 485 F.2d 483, 487; U.S. v. Castro, C.A.9th, 1973, 476 F.2d 750, 753 (explicitly rejecting Frierson, note 34 above.)

FN36. Deleted provision See s 5164.

FN37. Consider under Rule 403 See ss 5214, 5220, 5222.

FN38. Stipulation Where the defendant was willing to stipulate to substance of probation officer's testimony, it was error to permit the officer to testify as a witness. U.S. v. Pavon, C.A.9th, 1977, 561 F.2d 799. "Furthermore, it stands to reason that the other torts or crimes evidence must be offered as bearing on a fact that is actually in issue * * *. If the defendant concedes a fact, or an issue to which it relates, the prosecutor should not be permitted to prove the fact by the use of 'other crimes' evidence." N.J.Sup.Ct., Committee on Evidence, Report, 1963, p. 103. See also, Lacy, Admissibility of Evidence of Other Crimes Not Charged in the Indictment, 1952, 31 Ore.L.Rev. 267, 275-277 (arguing that there would be greater use of stipulations in criminal cases if courts would bar other crimes evidence on stipulated facts). On the effect of stipulations generally, see s 5194 and 9 Wigmore, 3d ed. 1940, s 2591.

FN39. Control order of proof See Rule 611(a). Where other crimes evidence is offered on the issue of identity, it is proper to admit evidence during Government's case-in-chief because identity is unquestionably in issue unless the defendant admits to commission of the act but denies the requisite intent. U.S. v. Baldarrama, C.A.5th, 1978, 566 F.2d 560, 568 n. 9. In first degree murder prosecution it was error for prosecutor to state in his opening statement that when the defendant was arrested three days after the crime he was driving a stolen car. Theriault v. State, 1976, 547 P.2d 668, ___ Nev. ___ .

FN40. Other evidence first Comment, Other Crimes Evidence at Trial: Of Balancing and Other Matters, 1961, 70 Yale L.J. 763, 773. But see, U.S. v. Austin, C.A.10th, 1972, 462 F.2d 724, 734-735 (trial court could permit prosecution to prove uncharged offenses before evidence of charged crime was introduced). Before evidence of prior crimes can be used, there must be proof of the commission of the charged crime. State v. Stevens, N.D.1975, 238 N.W.2d 251.

FN41. Rebuttal E.g., U.S. v. Chrzanowski, C.A.3d, 1974, 502 F.2d 573, 576. Although the better practice would be to wait to admit evidence of other crimes offered to show intent until the end of the defense case, it was not plain error to admit the evidence during the government's case-in-chief when the issue of intent was foreshadowed by the defendant's confession. U.S. v. Brunson, C.A.5th, 1977, 549 F.2d 348, 361 n. 20.

FN42. Conclusion E.g., U.S. v. Dossey, C.A.8th, 1977, 558 F.2d 1336, 1338.

FN43. Must satisfy other rules See s 5192; Herbert & Mount, Ohio's "Similar Acts Statute": Its Uses and Abuses, 1975, 9 Akron L.Rev. 301, 320.

FN44. Proof by conviction E.g., U.S. v. Payne, C.A.9th, 1973, 474 F.2d 603; U.S. v. Clayton, C.A.10th, 459 F.2d 572.

FN45. Most efficient The defendant could, of course, attack the validity of the conviction on grounds normally available on collateral attack, but otherwise it is presumed valid. U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1977, 555 F.2d 487, 498.

FN46. Proof by other means See vol. 2, s 410, p. 133.

FN47. "Beyond reasonable doubt" U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1977, 555 F.2d 487, 498; Cunha v. Brewer, C.A.8th, 1975, 511 F.2d 894, 901. See also, McCormick, Evidence, Cleary ed. 1972, s 190, p. 451; Herbert & Mount, Ohio's "Similar Acts Statute": Its Uses and Abuses, 1975, 9 Akron L.Rev. 301, 327; Payne, The Law Whose Life is Not Logic: Evidence of Other Crimes in Criminal Cases, 1968, 3 U.Rich.L.Rev. 62, 78; Note, Admissibility in Criminal Prosecutions of Proof of Other Offenses as Substantive Evidence, 1950, 3 Vand.L.Rev. 779, 788.

FN48. Admissibility generally If other crimes evidence is treated as an aspect of relevance, the standard would be that it was "sufficient to support a finding" that the crime was committed by the defendant. See Rule 104(b). Trial court properly admitted evidence of defendant's escape from nearby prison to prove motive for theft of car where evidence of escape was clear and convincing, testimony was limited to bare fact of incarceration, and no details of prior conviction or escape were put before the jury; probative value substantially outweighed danger of unfair prejudice. U.S. v. Stover, C.A.8th, 1977, 565 F.2d 1010.

FN49. "Substantial evidence" Comment, Other Crimes Evidence in Louisiana--To Show Knowledge, Intent, System, Etc. in the Case in Chief, 1973, 33 La.L.Rev. 614, 620 (collecting cases).

FN50. "Substantial proof" Note, Evidence of Criminal History in Ohio Criminal Prosecutions, 1964, 15 West.Res.L.Rev. 772, 778.

FN51. "Satisfactory proof" Cunha v. Brewer, C.A.8th, 1975, 511 F.2d 894, 901 (applying Iowa law).

FN52. "Clear and convincing" McCormick, Evidence, Cleary ed. 1972, s 190 p. 452; Comment, Admissibility of Prior Criminal Acts as Substantive Evidence in Criminal Prosecutions, 1969, 36 Tenn.L.Rev. 515, 516. Uncorroborated testimony of accomplice was sufficient to constitute "clear and convincing" evidence of other crime. U.S. v. Trevino, C.A.5th, 1978, 565 F.2d 1317, 1319. The defendant's own confession of a prior crime is clear and convincing evidence of the crime. U.S. v. Davis, C.A.8th, 1977, 551 F.2d 233. There must be substantial evidence of prior acts, what some courts call "clear and convincing evidence." State v. Stevens, N.D.1975, 238 N.W.2d 251.

FN53. Federal courts E.g., U.S. v. Cummings, C.A.8th, 1974, 507 F.2d 324, 331; U.S. v. Clemons, C.A.8th, 1974, 503 F.2d 486, 489; U.S. v. Ostrowsky, C.A.7th, 1974, 501 F.2d 318, 321.

FN54. "Plain, clear, and conclusive" E.g., U.S. v. Pollard, C.A.5th, 1975, 509 F.2d 601, 604; U.S. v. Shadletsky, C.A.5th, 1974, 491 F.2d 677, 678; U.S. v. Broadway, C.A.5th, 1973, 477 F.2d 991, 995.

FN55. Continue to apply E.g., U.S. v. Scholle, C.A.8th, 1977, 553 F.2d 1109, 1121 ("clear and convincing" standard); U.S. v. Cyphers, C.A.7th, 1977, 553 F.2d 1064, 1070 (same); U.S. v. Myers, C.A.5th, 1977, 550 F.2d 1036, 1044 ("plain, clear, and convincing" proof required).

FN56. Florida Ehrhardt, Florida Evidence, 1977, p. 72.

FN57. South Dakota The Commentary to No.Dak.R.Ev. 404(b) says that the opinion of the North Dakota Supreme Court in State v. Stevens, N.D.1975, 238 N.W.2d 251, 257, set forth "criteria that should be considered whenever section (b) of this rule is invoked" noting that that opinion requires "clear and convincing" evidence of the other crime.

FN58. Repeals restrictions U.S. v. Maestas, C.A.8th, 1977, 554 F.2d 834, 836 n. 2, 837-838.

FN59. Force into Rule 403 See, e.g., U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1977, 555 F.2d 487, 507-508.

FN60. Different question Courts in setting out the procedural prerequisites to the use of other crimes evidence have generally treated the balancing required by Rule 403 as separate from the issue of the sufficiency of the proof of the other crime. See, e.g., U.S. v. Ostrowsky, C.A.7th, 1974, 501 F.2d 318, 321. McCormick also treats the two as distinct questions. McCormick, Evidence, Cleary ed., 1972, s 190, pp. 451-453.

FN61. Prior standards intact U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1977, 555 F.2d 487, 504-507.

FN62. Who applies It is, of course, possible that both the judge and the jury are to apply the higher standard of proof. Nothing in the caselaw suggests this, but some pattern jury instructions suggest that trial courts may be handling the issue this way. See 1 Devitt & Blackmar, Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, 3d ed. 1977, s 14.15.

FN63. Preliminary question See vol. 21, s 5052.

FN64. Jury determines See vol. 21 s 5054.

FN65. Cases and commentators "Before evidence of a prior offense is given to the jury, the trial judge should conduct an independent examination of the proffered evidence to determine whether it satisfies this standard." U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1977, 555 F.2d 487, 497. See also, U.S. v. Scholle, C.A.8th, 1977, 553 F.2d 1109, 1121 (trial judge "will base his decision" to admit or exclude evidence of other crimes on, inter alia, clear and convincing proof that the acts were committed). McCormick, Evidence, Cleary ed. 1972, s 190, p. 452 ("before the evidence is admitted * * * the substantial or unconvincing quality of the proof should be weighed. * * *"); Ehrhardt, Florida Evidence, 1977, s 404.5, p. 72 ("the court must consider whether there is clear and convincing proof").

FN66. Trial judge role Advisory Committee's Note, F.R.Ev. 404(b).

FN67. How much Another question that does not appear to have been considered extensively in the literature is whether the higher standard applies to prior wrongs or acts that do not amount to a crime. The answer to this question would seem to turn on the policy basis for the higher standard of proof; but that policy is seldom enunciated. Since the higher standard is often spoken of as a substitute for proof "beyond a reasonable doubt," one might infer that the purpose is to insure that if the defendant is to be convicted of a crime not charged in the indictment, at least the jury should be held to something higher than the civil standard. On this theory, the higher standard should not be applied to other acts not amounting to a crime. Strict requirements for proof of other crimes do not apply to proof of other acts not amounting to a crime. U.S. v. Greenfield, C.A.5th, 1977, 554 F.2d 179, 185. Strict standards of proof of other crimes are applicable to the government; they do not apply when the defendant offers evidence of other wrongs of government agent. U.S. v. McClure, C.A.5th, 1977, 546 F.2d 670, 676.

FN68. "Physical elements" U.S. v. Beechum, C.A.5th, 1977, 555 F.2d 487, 497.

FN69. Probability theory See s 5242.

FN70. Two-witness rule U.S. v. Freedman, C.A.2d, 1971, 445 F.2d 1220, 1224.

FN71. Corroboration, sufficiency See 7 Wigmore, Evidence, 3d ed. 1940, ss 2032-2075.

FN72. Effect of acquittal 2 Wigmore, Evidence, 3d ed. 1940, s 317; Note, Evidence of Defendant's Other Crimes: Admissibility in Minnesota, 1953, 37 Minn.L.Rev. 608, 613.

FN73. Contrary authority It is a violation of defendant's right to be free from double jeopardy for a state to use evidence of prior crimes for which defendant has been previously acquitted in a subsequent trial for a similar offense; the doctrine of collateral estoppel prevents the state from relitigating an issue that has once been determined adversely to the state. Wingate v. Wainwright, C.A.5th, 1972, 464 F.2d 209. Where the defendant has been previously tried and acquitted of a crime, the subsequent evidentiary use of that crime is an abuse of discretion because the fact of acquittal diminishes the probative worth of the evidence and increases the prejudice to the defendant to such a degree that it is inadmissible as a matter of law. State v. Little, 1960, 350 P.2d 756, 87 Ariz. 295.

FN74. Double jeopardy Bray, Evidence of Prior Uncharged Offenses and the Growth of Constitutional Restrictions, 1974, 28 U.Miami L.Rev. 489, 506; Comment, Exclusion of Prior Acquittals: An Attack on the "Prosecutor's Delight", 1974, 21 U.C.L.A.L.Rev. 892, 914, 921 n. 148. In the early case of U.S. v. Randenbush, 1834, 8 Pet. (33 U.S.) 288, 8 L.Ed. 948, the Court held it was not a violation of the prohibition against double jeopardy to admit evidence of another crime for which defendant had never been prosecuted but which had been used as evidence in a prior prosecution in which defendant had been acquitted. The nature of the double jeopardy argument under the Court's recent cases is illustrated by the dissent in U.S. v. Castro-Castro, C.A.9th, 1972, 464 F.2d 336, note 76 below. However, in that case it can be argued that the evidentiary use of the prior incident is perfectly consistent with the jury's finding of innocence in the prior case; i.e., that even an innocent defendant should have been suspicious when placed in the role of a dupe the second time and that even if defendant did not realize that he was transporting contraband the first time, the prior trial makes it unlikely that he could have been ignorant of what was happening in the second incident.

FN75. State courts E.g., People v. Griffin, 1967, 426 P.2d 507, 66 Cal.2d 459, 58 Cal.Rptr. 107 (collecting cases); State v. Darling, 1966, 419 P.2d 836, 197 Kan. 471 (under provisions of K.S.A. 60-455).

FN76. Federal courts The fact that the defendant was previously acquitted of charge of illegal importation of marijuana on testimony that he was unaware that contraband was concealed in vehicles does not make evidence of that incident inadmissible in subsequent prosecution for same offense in which the marijuana was also concealed in vehicle and defendant disclaimed knowledge of its presence. U.S. v. Castro-Castro, C.A.9th, 1972, 464 F.2d 336. Evidence of prior crime of which defendant was acquitted in state court was admissible in federal prosecution since the federal government was not a party or a privy to the state action and collateral estoppel is therefore not applicable. U.S. v. Smith, C.A.4th, 1971, 446 F.2d 200. The fact that in trial for prior crime a verdict was directed in favor of the defendant does not bar the use of evidence of that crime in a subsequent trial for another offense. Holt v. U.S., C.A.10th, 1968, 404 F.2d 914, 920. Doctrine of res judicata does not make inadmissible evidence of a prior offense of which defendant has been acquitted and which is offered to prove knowledge that heroin was concealed in his vehicle where general verdict makes it impossible to determine basis of decision in prior case. Hernandez v. U.S., C.A.9th, 1966, 370 F.2d 171. Prior acquittal does not bar evidentiary use of other crime. Himmelfarb v. U.S., C.A.9th, 1945, 175 F.2d 924, 941.

FN77. Dismissal Evidence of another narcotics transaction is admissible despite the fact that charges based on that transaction had been dismissed because the unjustified delay and neglect of the government had prejudiced the defendant's ability to defend himself. U.S. v. Jones, C.A.1973, 476 F.2d 533, 155 U.S.App.D.C. 88.

FN78. Similar results U.S. v. Juarez, C.A.7th, 1977, 561 F.2d 65 (dismissal); U.S. v. Rocha, C.A.9th, 1977, 553 F.2d 614 (acquittal). The Florida codifiers seem to suggest that their version of Rule 404(b) leaves the question open. Sponsors' Note, Fla.Evid.Code s 90.404.

FN79. Discretionary exclusion U.S. v. Smith, C.A.4th, 1971, 446 F.2d 200, 204. See generally, Comment, Exclusion of Prior Acquittals: An Attack on the "Prosecutor's Delight", 1974, 21 U.C.L.A.L.Rev. 892, 903-905.

FN80. Prove acquittal People v. Griffin, 1967, 426 P.2d 507, 66 Cal.2d 459, 58 Cal.Rptr. 107.

FN81. Not applicable In many cases these other restrictions are, by their own terms, applicable only to prosecution for the crime. Often, however, it is difficult to see why the underlying policy is not equally applicable to the evidentiary use of the crime.

FN82. Extradition restriction U.S. v. Flores, C.A.2d, 1976, 538 F.2d 939.

FN83. Unfair U.S. v. Jones, C.A.1973, 476 F.2d 533, 155 U.S.App.D.C. 88.

FN84. Immunity U.S. v. Hockenberry, C.A.3d, 1973, 474 F.2d 247.

FN85. Prejudice See s 5250.

FN86. Out of presence U.S. v. Bailey, C.A.1974, 505 F.2d 417, 420, 164 U.S.App.D.C. 310; U.S. v. Demetre, C.A.8th, 1972, 464 F.2d 1105, 1108.

FN87. Explained See s 5250.

FN88. Labeling "But the mere labeling of such evidence does not automatically bring admission." Committee Commentary, No.Dak.R.Ev. 404(b).

FN89. Appellate opinions Slough, Other Vices, Other Crimes: An Evidentiary Dilemma, 1972, 20 U.Kan.L.Rev. 411, 417; Stone, The Rule of Exclusion of Similar Fact Evidence: America, 1938, 51 Harv.L.Rev. 988, 1020.

FN90. Discretion to admit McCormick, Evidence, Cleary ed., 1972, s 190, p. 453.

FN91. Less stringent U.S. v. McCarthy, C.A.6th, 1972, 470 F.2d 222, 224; U.S. v. Turner C.A.4th, 1971, 441 F.2d 1161.

FN92. Capable of ignoring Havelock v. U.S., C.A.10th, 1970, 427 F.2d 987, 991.

FN93. Limit use See vol. 21, s 5067.

FN94. Only relevant details U.S. v. Ostrowsky, C.A.7th, 1974, 501 F.2d 318, 323 (abuse of discretion to admit gory details of murder in auto theft case); U.S. v. Ferrone, C.A.3d, 1971, 438 F.2d 381, 386 (need not show details of defendant's gambling operations to prove that agents he interfered with were engaged in official duties while searching defendant's home). Prejudice from proof of prior crime was reduced when trial judge excluded details of prior crime. U.S. v. Dansker, C.A.3d, 1976, 537 F.2d 40, 58. In prosecution for receiving stolen property, evidence of possession of other stolen property was admissible but trial court should have excluded evidence that property was taken in burglary. State v. Spraggin, 1976, 239 N.W.2d 297, 71 Wis.2d 604.

FN95. Impermissible argument E.g., Bellows v. Dainack, C.A.2d, 1977, 555 F.2d 1105, 1107.

FN96. Suggest other uses U.S. v. Araujo, C.A.2d, 1976, 539 F.2d 287, 290.

FN97. Principal device One writer has suggested that use of the judge's power to comment on the evidence could be a more effective method of explaining the proper use of other crimes. Lacy, Admissibility of Evidence of Crimes Not Charged in the Indictment, 1952, 31 Ore.L.Rev. 267, 285. Instruction that evidence of other crime could be considered to show that defendant was inclined to deal in heroin violated Rule 404(b). U.S. v. Bloom, C.A.5th, 1976, 538 F.2d 704. Error in admission of other crimes evidence was not cured by an instruction to jury to disregard it. U.S. v. Wiley, C.A.6th, 1976, 534 F.2d 659.

FN98. Skeptical E.g., Note, Rule 404(b) Other Crimes Evidence: The Need for a Two-Step Analysis, 1977, 71 Nw.U.L.Rev. 635, 643; Comment, Exclusion of Prior Acquittals: An Attack on the "Prosecutor's Delight", 1974, 21 U.C.L.A.L.Rev. 892, 907-909.

FN99. Prefer not to emphasize See, e.g., U.S. v. Hayes, C.A.2d, 1977, 553 F.2d 824, 829; U.S. v. Tramaglino, C.A.2d, 1952, 197 F.2d 928, 932.

FN1. Reasons U.S. v. Bobbitt, C.A.1971, 450 F.2d 685, 689, 146 U.S.App.D.C. 224, 228.

FN2. No duty U.S. v. Davis, C.A.8th, 1977, 557 F.2d 1239, 1247; U.S. v. Drebin, C.A.9th, 1977, 557 F.2d 1316, 1325; U.S. v. Blount, C.A.6th, 1973, 479 F.2d 650, 651; U.S. v. Van Poyck, C.A.5th, 1972, 464 F.2d 575. See also, Note, Evidence of Criminal History in Ohio Criminal Prosecutions, 1964, 15 West.Res.L.Rev. 772, 779.

FN3. Give twice This is required, on request, by Fla.Evid.Code s 90.404(2)(b)(2), quoted above, s 5231 n. 39. See also, Comment, Other Crimes Evidence in Louisiana--To Show Knowledge, Intent, System, Etc. in the Case in Chief, 1973, 33 La.L.Rev. 614, 628. For a sample cautionary instruction given at the time of introduction of other crimes evidence, see U.S. v. Weaver, C.A.8th, 1977, 565 F.2d 129, 134.

FN4. Criticisms Slough, Other Vices, Other Crimes: An Evidentiary Dilemma, 1972, 20 U.Kan.L.Rev. 411, 428.

FN5. Little advice The pattern jury instructions offer few guides. See 1 Devitt & Blackmar, Federal Jury Practice and Instructions, 3d ed. 1977, ss 14.14, 14.15. For samples of instructions given, see U.S. v. Hayes, C.A.2d, 1977, 553 F.2d 824, 829 n. 11; U.S. v. Hampton, C.A.10th, 1972, 452 F.2d 29, 30.

FN6. State proper purpose U.S. v. Ridley, C.A.6th, 1975, 519 F.2d 791, 793. Appellate court could affirm the admission of evidence of other crimes to prove identity even though the trial court did not instruct the jury that it could be used for this purpose. U.S. v. Baldarrama, C.A.5th, 1978, 566 F.2d 560, 567.

FN7. Invite forbidden inference People v. Hunt, 1977, 72 Cal.App.3d 190, 139 Cal.Rptr. 675.

FN8. Too refined U.S. v. Bobbitt, C.A.1971, 450 F.2d 685, 690, 146 U.S.App.D.C. 224.

FN9. Role of discretion See s 5250.

FN10. Only abuse of discretion In prosecution for falsely stating that he had never been convicted of a felony in order to purchase a firearm where the defense was that the defendant did not understand the question, it was an abuse of discretion to permit the government to introduce into evidence the defendant's rap sheet that showed two felony convictions, numerous arrests, and items of unfavorable personal history. U.S. v. Bledsoe, C.A.8th, 1976, 531 F.2d 888, 891.

FN11. Determining relevance See s 5166.

FN12. Not appropriate Though many could be cited, two recent cases are at hand to illustrate the point. In U.S. v. Tibbets, C.A.4th, 1977, 565 F.2d 867 the per curiam opinion says the evidence of a prior bomb threat was admissible in a prosecution for a subsequent threat. Since the defendant was observed in the act of making the charged threat, which was monitored by the phone company, there does not seem to be any question of identification and the court does not mention any issue of intent as to which the evidence would be relevant. It simply says that under Rule 404(b) evidence is admissible for other purposes, without specifying what those purposes might be. The trial court apparently admitted the evidence to show how the defendant came to be under surveillance when he made the charged threat but the relevance of that is difficult to discern. In U.S. v. Herbst, C.A.10th, 1977, 565 F.2d 638, 641, the defendant raised a number of arguments against the admissibility of other crimes evidence. The opinion disposes of these by simply listing all of the potential grounds for admissibility, then stating that admissibility was "consistent with our prior opinions."

FN13. Criminal cases U.S. v. Hines, C.A.3d, 1972, 470 F.2d 225, 227-228.

FN14. Erie doctrine See s 5201.

FN15. Intertwined Wellborn, The Federal Rules of Evidence and the Application of State Law in Federal Courts, 1977, 55 Texas L.Rev. 371, 410-411.

FN16. Expands See s 5239.

FPP s 5249 (R 404)

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation | Rank(R) | Page(P) | Database | Mode
20 F.3d 538 | R 6 OF 12 | P 1 OF 88 | CTA | Page
40 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 690
(Cite as: 20 F.3d 538)

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Michael Lee MATTHEWS and Robert G. Prater, Defendants-Appellants.
Nos. 509, 228, Dockets 93-1158, 93-1172.
United States Court of Appeals,
Second Circuit.
Argued Dec. 1, 1993.
Decided March 30, 1994.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of New York, Howard G. Munson, J., of bank robbery and conspiracy to commit bank robbery, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Kearse, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) first defendant's rights under confrontation clause were not violated by admission of second defendant's out-of-court inculpatory statement; (2) in-court identifications of first defendant did not violate due process; (3) evidence was sufficient to support second defendant's conviction; (4) prosecution had obligation to disclose letter written by second defendant, but late disclosure was not so prejudicial as to require reversal; (5) evidence that second defendant tried to stab girlfriend was admissible, and did not violate notice requirement for other-crimes evidence; that he would have nothing to do with her because she wouldn't give up her prostitution. You asked her that. She wouldn't give up her drug habit; you asked her that. She wouldn't give up her alcoholism; you asked her that, and because she didn't treat her children in the manner in which your client thought they ought to be treated.

(Tr. 746-47.)

On redirect examination, the government asked Dunbar what had happened on Christmas 551 Day to cause her to call the police. Over the objection of Prater's attorney stating, "we are getting into things that may be characterized as 404(B) material," Dunbar was allowed to testify that during the Christmas Day argument, Prater had threatened Dunbar and the father of her children with an ice pick. Prater contends that this testimony was inadmissible under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) because it was introduced in order to show Prater's propensity for violence and because Prater was not given advance notice that the government would introduce such testimony. We disagree.

Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence provides as follows:

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

Notwithstanding the language of the provision for notice, which applies whether the government wishes to use the other-act evidence in its direct case, on rebuttal, or as impeachment, see Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) Advisory Committee Note, the notice requirement was "not intend[ed to] ... require the prosecution to disclose directly or indirectly the names and addresses of its witnesses," id. We are unpersuaded that either the substantive reach or the notice provision of the Rule was violated.

First, it does not appear that the ice-pick testimony was offered or admitted to show that Prater committed any other act "in conformity [ ]with" this threat of violence. Given the "rather strenuous[ ]" attack on Dunbar's character during Prater's cross-examination, which sought to show that Dunbar had created a fiction in a fit of jealous anger, the government sought to provide a more objective reason for Dunbar's decision to pass on to the police Prater's statement that he had committed bank robbery. Plainly Rule 404(b) permitted the use of testimony that Prater attempted to stab Dunbar and the father of her children to show Dunbar's motive for turning Prater in to the police.

[28] We note that it would have been appropriate for the trial court to give the jury a cautionary instruction that the ice-pick evidence was admitted only for this limited purpose. However, given the degree to which Prater's cross-examination of Dunbar had attacked her motives, we think it highly improbable that the jury would have used the evidence for any other purpose. In any event, Prater did not request such an instruction and cannot now complain that none was delivered.

[29] Second, we are unpersuaded that the Rule required the government to give notice in advance of trial that Dunbar would testify about the ice-pick attack. Dunbar was designated as a confidential informant and the court denied Prater's pretrial motion for disclosure of her identity. Since the notice provision of Rule 404(b) was not intended to require the government to disclose the identity of its witnesses, either directly or indirectly, and it is difficult to believe that even general notice of an ice-pick attack would not have indicated that the informant was Dunbar, we conclude that the government did not violate the notice requirement by not notifying Prater that it might use evidence that he had attacked someone with an ice pick.

4. The Prosecutor's Summation

[30] Prater also contends that comments by the AUSA during summation denied him a fair trial. He focuses principally on the following reference to a polygraph test:

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Abdul-Rahma ADEDIRAN, also known as Adediran Babatumte, also known as Francis Machante, also known as David K. Bolade, Appellant.

No. 93-3821.

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit.

Submitted April 12, 1994.

Decided June 8, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, George F. Gunn, Jr., J., of falsely misrepresenting social security account number (SSAN). Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Henley, Senior Circuit Judge, held that: (1) other wrongs evidence was admissible, and (2) defendant's failure to appear for state court proceedings warranted two-level enhancement for obstruction of justice.

Affirmed.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
Preponderance of the evidence linked defendant to other similar wrongs admitted to show intent in prosecution for falsely misrepresenting social security account number (SSAN), even though no witness could identify defendant as being involved in the other wrongs; both schemes involved person opening checking accounts with minimal cash and fictitious Wisconsin identification, false SSANs at different banks all began with same five digits, defendant fit description of person posing as customer in connection with the other wrongs, and handwriting samples connected to both schemes were similar. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 371(3)
110k371(3)
Danger of unfair prejudice from other wrongs evidence that defendant opened checking accounts with minimal cash amounts and fictitious Wisconsin identification did not outweigh probative value to show intent in prosecution for falsely misrepresenting social security account number (SSAN) in connection with similar scheme.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 338(7)
110k338(7)
Balancing of probative value and danger of unfair prejudice from evidence is peculiarly within discretion of district court and should not be disturbed absent clear showing of abuse.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 1153(1)
110k1153(1)
Balancing of probative value and danger of unfair prejudice from evidence is peculiarly within discretion of district court and should not be disturbed absent clear showing of abuse.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 629.5(8)
110k629.5(8)
Government's failure to respond directly to defendant's motion requesting information regarding prior bad acts was not fatal in light of defense counsel's admission that the evidence had been fully disclosed and that he was aware of government's intention to present it. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[5] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 1253
110k1253
Defendant's failure to appear for state court proceedings warranted two-level enhancement for obstruction of justice in connected federal prosecution for falsely misrepresenting social security account number (SSAN); misrepresentation of SSAN was intimate part of conduct for which local police had arrested defendant. U.S.S.G. § 3C1.1, 18 U.S.C.A.App.

62 Allen I. Harris, St. Louis, MO, argued, for appellant.

Jonathan I. Goldstein, St. Louis, MO, argued (Edward L. Dowd, Jr. and Jonathan I. Goldstein), on the brief for appellee.

Before RICHARD S. ARNOLD, Chief Judge, HENLEY, Senior Circuit Judge, and MAGILL, Circuit Judge.

HENLEY, Senior Circuit Judge.

Abdul-Rahma Adediran appeals his conviction and sentence for falsely misrepresenting his Social Security Account Number (SSAN), with the intent to deceive and for the purpose of obtaining something of value, in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 408(a)(7)(B) (1991). We affirm.

I.

In late October 1991, Adediran, posing as Francis Machante and using false SSANs, opened accounts with Mail Boxes, Etc. and Answer St. Louis, a telephone answering service. In December 1991, Adediran opened checking accounts at five banks in the St. Louis area. At each bank he posed as Francis Machante, providing a false Wisconsin identification in that name. His initial deposits ranged from $100.00 to $130.00, and he used different SSANs, all of which were false, at each bank.

One of the account representatives who dealt with Adediran became suspicious when she recognized the address he gave as belonging to Mail Boxes, Etc. She alerted the local police, who, after further investigation, apprehended Adediran. Adediran was held for several days until he posted bond. He was then released with instructions to appear for arraignment on January 15, 1992. On that date, Adediran failed to appear as ordered.

On December 23, 1991, a person using the name David Bolade opened three accounts at banks in Rockford, Illinois. All of the accounts were opened with $100.00 deposits and with different SSANs, all of which were false. A fictitious Wisconsin identification was provided to each institution. In January 1992, the Rockford banks began receiving deposits for the Bolade accounts. Included in these deposits were several checks originally issued to Adediran by one of the St. 63 Louis banks. These checks were never paid, but while the balances on the Bolade accounts remained inflated, over $10,000.00 was withdrawn from the Rockford banks. Adediran was eventually arrested in Chicago, Illinois, in April 1993.

In a seven-count indictment Adediran was charged with violating 42 U.S.C. § 408(a)(7)(B). Each count related to one of the St. Louis institutions at which he had presented a false SSAN. At trial the government presented evidence concerning events in both St. Louis and Rockford. Adediran objected to admission of the Rockford evidence, claiming the government had failed to establish that he was the person responsible for those incidents. The district court [FN1] overruled the objection and admitted the evidence under Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

FN1. The Honorable George F. Gunn, Jr., United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Missouri.

The jury eventually found Adediran guilty on all seven counts. The district court then imposed sentence based in part on the financial losses suffered by the Rockford institutions. In addition, the court increased Adediran's base offense level for obstruction of justice.

II.

[1] On appeal, Adediran claims the district court abused its discretion in admitting the Rockford evidence pursuant to Rule 404(b). The government argues in response that the evidence was not subject to Rule 404(b)'s requirements because it was proof of the crime charged. Alternatively, the government contends the evidence was properly admitted under that rule. Though this may well be a case where the other crime is so "inextricably intertwined" with the charged crime that Rule 404(b) is not implicated, United States v. DeLuna, 763 F.2d 897 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 980, 106 S.Ct. 382, 88 L.Ed.2d 336 (1985), we will apply that rule's more rigorous requirements. This decision does not affect our ultimate conclusion.

Rule 404(b) prohibits admission of evidence of other crimes for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith but allows admission for other purposes, such as proof of intent. This court has held that other crimes are admissible if (1) relevant to a material issue, (2) established by a preponderance of the evidence, [FN2] (3) more probative than prejudicial, and (4) similar in kind and close in time to the events at issue. King v. Ahrens, 16 F.3d 265, 268 (8th Cir.1994); United States v. Aranda, 963 F.2d 211, 215 (8th Cir.1992).

FN2. Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 99 L.Ed.2d 771 (1987), establishes that a preponderance standard is appropriate. See United States v. Aranda, 963 F.2d 211, 215 n. 5 (8th Cir.1992); United States v. Mothershed, 859 F.2d 585, 588 n. 2 (8th Cir.1988).

[2] Adediran does not contest either that the Rockford evidence was relevant to intent or that it was similar in kind and close in time to the acts for which he was prosecuted. Instead, he asserts that there was insufficient proof of his involvement in Rockford and that the evidence was more prejudicial than probative. We reject both contentions. First, we believe a preponderance of the evidence linked Adediran to Rockford. Most important in this regard was the deposit in Rockford of the very checks issued to Adediran by a St. Louis bank. Moreover, the schemes in St. Louis and Rockford were similar in several respects. In both cities, the person opening checking accounts did so with minimal cash amounts and a fictitious Wisconsin identification. False SSANs were used at different banks, but at all banks the numbers began with the same five digits. Though Adediran relies primarily on the fact that no Rockford witness could identify him at his trial, which took place some eighteen months after the Bolade accounts were opened, both testimony and photographs indicated that the person posing as David Bolade was a tall, thin, African-American male. Adediran fits this description. Finally, handwriting samples of both Francis Machante and David Bolade were submitted for the jury to compare. Similarities between the two signatures are evident.

64 [3] As to Adediran's argument that the unfair prejudice resulting from the Rockford evidence outweighed its probative value, we note that the district court made an explicit finding to the contrary. Such balancing is peculiarly within the discretion of the district court and should not be disturbed absent a clear showing of abuse. United States v. Brown, 956 F.2d 782, 786 (8th Cir.1992). Considering the substantial probative value of the Rockford evidence, we can find no clear abuse in this case.

[4] Adediran also contends he received insufficient notice of the government's intent to introduce "other crimes" evidence. In particular, he notes that before trial he filed a motion requesting information regarding prior bad acts. The government's response failed to indicate any intention to introduce the Rockford incidents.

Rule 404(b) provides that "upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." Though the government failed to indicate its intention to introduce the Rockford events in its direct response to Adediran's motion, defense counsel admitted before trial that the Rockford evidence had been fully disclosed and that he was aware of the government's intention to present it. In light of these admissions, the failure to respond directly to Adediran's motion was not fatal.

III.

Adediran contests the sufficiency of the evidence, but his argument is conditioned on a ruling that the Rockford evidence is inadmissible. Because we have ruled adversely to Adediran on the evidentiary issue, we need not reach the sufficiency claim. Nevertheless, after careful review, we hold that, with or without the Rockford evidence, the record sufficiently supports the jury's verdict.

IV.

Adediran challenges two aspects of his sentence. First, he argues that the district court erred in considering in its calculations the losses suffered by the Rockford banks. This argument is without merit, for it is based solely on the already rejected contention that there was insufficient evidence linking Adediran to Rockford. Because we have held that a preponderance of the evidence supports a conclusion that Adediran opened the Bolade accounts, the district court did not clearly err by making that finding.

[5] Adediran next contends the district court erred in imposing a two-point enhancement for obstruction of justice. This enhancement, imposed pursuant to U.S.S.G. § 3C1.1, was based on three factors: Adediran's failure to provide his true identity to police, his momentary refusal to submit to fingerprinting, and his failure to appear for state court proceedings in January 1992. Adediran claims that none of these factors justifies the enhancement. He argues that his momentary refusal to be fingerprinted was of such short duration that it caused no hindrance, that his failure to properly identify himself did not actually cause a significant hindrance to the investigation, and that his failure to appear is excused because it involved a state rather than a federal court. Because it is dispositive, we consider only Adediran's failure to appear.

> Section 3C1.1 provides as follows:
> If the defendant willfully obstructed or impeded, or attempted to obstruct or impede, the administration of justice during the investigation, prosecution, or sentencing of the instant offense, increase the offense level by 2 levels.

Application note 3(e) provides that "willfully failing to appear, as ordered, for a judicial proceeding" warrants an obstruction enhancement. Without a doubt, if Adediran had failed to appear for a federal court date, the enhancement would have been proper. We must therefore decide whether the mere fortuity of being charged in state court should excuse Adediran's blatant attempt to avoid the administration of justice.

65 We note first that the Guidelines make no distinction between state and federal authorities or proceedings. Section 3C1.1 itself requires only that the obstruction occur "during the investigation, prosecution, or sentencing of the instant offense." This of course requires some connection between the obstructed state proceedings and the investigation of the federal offense. However, this requirement is easily satisfied here, for Adediran's misrepresentation of his SSAN was an intimate part of the conduct for which local police arrested him.

Few courts have explicitly dealt with the federal-state distinction in this context. However, in United States v. Lato, 934 F.2d 1080 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 271, 116 L.Ed.2d 224 (1991), the Ninth Circuit rejected the argument that Adediran now proposes. That court reasoned as follows:

> The actions of Lato were certainly designed to obstruct the investigation of the offense he committed, that is to prevent the successful uncovering of his scheme to defraud insurance companies. That fraud violated federal as well as state law, and we are satisfied that Lato made no rarefied distinction between them when he sought to cover up his crime. Nor should we. Indeed, it is not likely that, absent the Guidelines, any sentencing judge would fail to consider Lato's activities when it became time to pronounce sentence. There is no reason to think that the Guidelines were intended to change that sensible approach to Lato's culpability.

Lato, 934 F.2d at 1083; see also United States v. Emery, 991 F.2d 907 (1st Cir.1993) ("[S]o long as some official investigation is underway at the time of the obstructive conduct, the absence of a federal investigation is not an absolute bar to the imposition of a section 3C1.1 enhancement.").

Moreover, several Eighth Circuit opinions have upheld enhancements even when the obstruction involved state authorities. See, e.g., United States v. Ball, 999 F.2d 339, 340 (8th Cir.1993) (because defendant was facing federal drug charges at the time, his attempt to escape from county jail following his arrest on a state assault charge constituted obstruction of federal investigation); United States v. Dortch, 923 F.2d 629, 632 (8th Cir.1991) (throwing bag of cocaine out of car during traffic stop by local police supported obstruction enhancement in federal prosecution); United States v. Paige, 923 F.2d 112, 114 (8th Cir.1991) (engaging in high speed chase with state highway patrol and throwing evidence out window supported enhancement). We conclude that this circuit does not prohibit obstruction enhancements in federal prosecutions merely because state entities were involved. Furthermore, we find the reasoning of the Lato court persuasive. Consequently, we hold that the district court did not err by imposing the two-level enhancement for obstruction of justice. [FN3]

> FN3. Adediran's failure to properly identify himself also may have justified the enhancement, for authorities were forced to run his prints through several services before discovering his true identity. Nevertheless, Adediran argues that such checks are routine and that the police therefore did nothing more than what they would have done had he properly identified himself. Consequently, he claims the evidence does not support a finding that his conduct "actually resulted in a significant hindrance," as is now required by U.S.S.G. § 3C1.1, comment. (n. 4). Because we hold that the failure to appear warrants imposition of the enhancement, we need not decide whether this argument has merit.

Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation | Rank(R) | Page(P) | Database | Mode
46 F.3d 1369 | R 2 OF 12 | P 1 OF 124 | CTA | Page
(Cite as: 46 F.3d 1369)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Darrell A. TOMBLIN, Defendant-Appellant.
No. 93-8679.
United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.
Feb. 24, 1995.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas, H.F. Garcia, J., of bribery, extortion and related offenses, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Emilio M. Garza, J., held that: (1) any deficiencies in affidavits in support of wiretap authorization did not require suppression; (2) bribery instruction was adequate; (3) evidence was sufficient to support bribery conviction; (4) extortion instruction was adequate; (5) because defendant was not a public official, his conviction for extortion had to be reversed; (6) introduction of evidence of defendant's character did not require reversal; (7) prosecutor was not required to give notice of intent to use other-acts evidence; and (8) upward departure in base offense level for bribery was warranted.

Affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded.

46 F.3d 1369 R 2 OF 12 P 112 OF 124 CTA Page
(Cite as: 46 F.3d 1369, *1388)

FN49. We note that, had we addressed Tomblin's Rule 608(b) good faith argument, we would have reached the same conclusion.

2

[37][38] Tomblin also argues that, because the prosecutor did not provide advance notice, the introduction of evidence of other bad acts when cross-examining Tomblin violated Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b). [FN50] The government contends that the other-acts evidence was proper under Rule 608(b) because it was introduced only to impeach Tomblin and was not offered in the prosecutor's case in chief. [FN51] Whether Rule 404(b) or Rule 608(b) applies to the admissibility of other-act evidence depends on the purpose for which the prosecutor introduced the other-acts evidence. United States v. Schwab, 886 F.2d 509, 511 (2d Cir.1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1080, 110 S.Ct. 1136, 107 L.Ed.2d 1041 (1990). Rule 404(b) applies when other-acts evidence is offered as relevant to an issue in the case, such as identity or intent. Id. Rule 608(b) applies when other-acts evidence is offered to impeach a witness, "to show the character of the witness for untruthfulness," or to show bias. Id. The prosecutor contends that his cross-examination questions were probative of Tomblin's character for truthfulness.

FN50. Rule 404(b) requires the prosecution in a criminal case to provide notice in advance of trial of its intent to use other acts evidence. Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) advisory committee notes (stating that the purpose of the notice requirement is to reduce surprise and promote early resolution of admissibility issues).

FN51. Rule 608(b) states that: "Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' credibility ... may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness ...." Fed.R.Evid. 608(b). Unlike Rule 404(b), however, Rule 608(b) does not require advance notice of the prosecutor's intent to use specific instances of defendant's conduct to impeach the defendant when he testifies. United States v. Baskes, 649 F.2d 471, 477 (7th Cir.1980) ("No rule or rationale guarantees the defense advance knowledge of legitimate impeachment before it calls a witness."), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1000, 101 S.Ct. 1706, 68 L.Ed.2d 201 (1981).

[39][40] A defendant makes his character an issue when he testifies. Waldrip, 981 F.2d at 803; United States v. Blake, 941 F.2d

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Hernan Francisco PEREZ-TOSTA, Gustavo Javier Correa-Patino, Erasmo Perez-Aguilera, Luis Guillermo Rojas-Valdez, Defendants-Appellants.

No. 92-4781.

United States Court of Appeals, Eleventh Circuit.

Nov. 8, 1994.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, No. 90-6120-CR-KMM, K. Michael Moore, J., of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and two defendants also were convicted of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. Appeals were taken. The Court of Appeals, Cox, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence supported findings that two defendants voluntarily and knowingly participated in cocaine conspiracy, but did not support finding that another defendant voluntarily and knowingly participated; (2) evidence supported conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute; (3) notice only minutes before voir dire was reasonable pretrial notice of intent to offer testimony on prior bad acts; and (4) ambiguous presentencing report (PSI) on amount of cocaine attributable to defendant required remand for factual finding to support calculation of offense level for conspiracy conviction.

Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and vacated and remanded in part.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 788
110k788
District court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to give missing witness instruction concerning witness whose testimony was likely to be unfavorable to defendant.

[2] WITNESSES ⇐ 9
410k9
District court did not abuse its discretion in refusing untimely request on afternoon of last day of trial seeking issuance of subpoena to compel appearance of witness.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 1139
110k1139
Denial of motion for acquittal is reviewed de novo.

[4] CONSPIRACY ⇐ 40.3
91k40.3
To convict defendant for conspiracy, evidence must show that conspiracy existed, that defendant knew of conspiracy, and that defendant, with knowledge, voluntarily joined conspiracy.

[5] CONSPIRACY ⇐ 40.1
91k40.1
Defendant may be guilty of conspiracy even if defendant plays only minor role and does not know all details of conspiracy.

[6] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 552(3)
110k552(3)
Reasonable inferences from circumstantial evidence, rather than mere speculation, must support jury's verdict.

[7] CONSPIRACY ⇐ 44.2
91k44.2
Inference of participation from presence and association with conspirators alone does not suffice to convict for conspiracy, but such inference is permissible in evaluating totality of circumstances.

[8] CONSPIRACY ⇐ 47(12)
91k47(12)
Evidence supported finding that defendant voluntarily and knowingly participated in cocaine conspiracy; defendant engaged in evasive driving countersurveillance measures which led government agents away from trail of coconspirator, documents found in coconspirator's house indicated relationship between defendant and coconspirator, and informant testified to defendant's prior acts in support of coconspirator's organization.

[9] CONSPIRACY ⇐ 47(12)
91k47(12)
Evidence did not support finding that defendant knowingly and voluntarily participated in conspiracy to distribute cocaine; although defendant was runner of keys and registration papers for truck containing concealed compartments and defendant rode in countersurveillance vehicle near site of cocaine transfer, it was possible that defendant was merely unwitting dupe.

[10] CONSPIRACY ⚿ 47(12)
91k47(12)
Circumstantial evidence supported finding that defendant voluntarily and knowingly participated in cocaine conspiracy; defendant drove cocaine-laden truck into garage at coconspirator's house, 70 kilogram-sized packages of cocaine were removed from truck and placed in bedroom during 25-minute period that defendant and truck remained inside garage, and defendant implausibly testified that he left truck outside garage and merely sat alone in living room until coconspirator asked him to leave.

[11] DRUGS AND NARCOTICS ⚿ 73.1
138k73.1
To convict for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, government must show both knowing possession and intent to distribute, but constructive possession is sufficient and intent to distribute may be inferred from quantity of cocaine involved.

[11] DRUGS AND NARCOTICS ⚿ 107
138k107
To convict for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, government must show both knowing possession and intent to distribute, but constructive possession is sufficient and intent to distribute may be inferred from quantity of cocaine involved.

[12] DRUGS AND NARCOTICS ⚿ 123.2
138k123.2
Evidence supported conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute; defendant drove truck containing cocaine to house occupied only by defendant and coconspirator, and 70 one-kilogram packages of cocaine were moved from truck to bedroom in 25-minute period.

[13] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1153(1)
110k1153(1)
District court rulings on admissibility of evidence are reviewed under abuse of discretion standard.

[14] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 374
110k374
Factors to consider in determining reasonableness of government's pretrial notice of intent to introduce evidence of prior bad acts include time when government could have learned of availability of evidence through timely preparation for trial, extent of prejudice to defendant from lack of time to prepare, and how significant evidence is to government's case. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[15] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 374
110k374
Government gave reasonable pretrial notice of intent to offer testimony on prior bad acts by defendant concerning cocaine-related work for coconspirator, even though notice was given only minutes before voir dire; reasonable trial preparation would not have revealed testimony to prosecutor any earlier, defense counsel did not indicate additional measures that could have been taken to rebut testimony if more notice had been given, and testimony was significant to government's case on issue of defendant's awareness of and participation in charged conspiracy. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[16] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 662.7
110k662.7
Defendant's confrontation clause rights were not violated by district court's admonishment to defense counsel to avoid cross-examination on sentencing issues, in light of defense counsel's effective impeachment of witness' credibility by exposing witness' expectation that he would receive sentencing reduction in return for testifying for government. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 6.

[17] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1134(3)
110k1134(3)
Claim of ineffective assistance of counsel could not be considered for first time on direct appeal, in light of defendant's failure to raise claim as ground for new trial motion and insufficient development of record to allow Court of Appeals to evaluate merits of claim. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 6.

[18] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1181.5(8)
110k1181.5(8)
Presentencing report (PSI) was ambiguous on amount of cocaine attributable to defendant under Sentencing Guidelines and thus, required remand for factual finding to support calculation of offense level for cocaine conspiracy conviction; PSI stated that total amount of cocaine involved in conspiracy was 700 kilograms, but also stated that it was doubtful defendant realized quantity of cocaine transported. U.S.S.G. §§ 1B1.3(a)(1), 2D1.1(c)(2), 18

U.S.C.A.App.

[19] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 822(1)
110k822(1)
District court has broad discretion in formulating jury charge as long as charge as whole is correct statement of law.

[20] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1172.1(1)
110k1172.1(1)
Jury instruction will not support reversal of conviction unless issues of law were presented inaccurately or charge improperly guided jury in substantial enough manner to violate due process. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 5, 14.

[21] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 772(5)
110k772(5)
Evidence did not support deliberate ignorance instruction in light of evidence of defendant's actual knowledge of cocaine hidden in truck rather than deliberate avoidance of suspicions about presence of cocaine.

[21] DRUGS AND NARCOTICS ⚿ 128
138k128
Evidence did not support deliberate ignorance instruction in light of evidence of defendant's actual knowledge of cocaine hidden in truck rather than deliberate avoidance of suspicions about presence of cocaine.

[22] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1173.2(2)
110k1173.2(2)
Erroneous instruction on deliberate ignorance concerning presence of cocaine in truck driven by defendant was harmless error in light of strong circumstantial evidence that defendant had actual knowledge of cocaine hidden in truck.

1554 Benjamin S. Waxman, Weiner, Robbins, Tunkey, Ross, Amsel & Raben, P.A., Miami, FL, for Perez-Tosta.

Oscar Arroyave, Miami, FL, for Correa-Patino.

Peter Raben, Coconut Grove, FL, for Perez-Aguilera.

William D. Matthewman, Miami, FL, for Rojas-Valdez.

Mary V. King, Asst. U.S. Atty., Miami, FL, for appellee.

Appeals from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida.

Before TJOFLAT, Chief Judge, COX, Circuit Judge, and YOUNG [FN*], Senior District Judge.

FN* Honorable George C. Young, Senior U.S. District Judge for the Middle District of Florida, sitting by designation.

COX, Circuit Judge:

Defendants Hernan Perez-Tosta (Tosta), Gustavo Correa-Patino (Correa), Erasmo Perez-Aguilera (Aguilera), and Luis Rojas-Valdez (Rojas) appeal convictions for conspiracy to distribute cocaine in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 846 and, in Rojas's and Correa's cases, possession of cocaine with intent to distribute in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1). Because the prosecutor gave only a few minutes' pretrial notice, Aguilera challenges the district court's admission of prior bad acts evidence under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). In addition, Aguilera, Tosta, and Rojas contend that the evidence was insufficient to support their convictions. All the appellants also raise other issues.

I. BACKGROUND

For over a year before the arrests in this case, the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) conducted an undercover investigation targeting a suspected cocaine trafficker, Fernando Loaiza-Alzate (Loaiza). As part of the probe, DEA agent Joseph Giuffre offered Loaiza his services as a smuggler of shipments of Colombian cocaine from the Bahamas into South Florida. For one of these shipments, Giuffre was put in touch with Adelsis Grieco. Grieco and Giuffre planned for Grieco to have the cocaine flown from northern Colombia to the southeastern Bahamas, where the cocaine would be dropped for Giuffre's men to retrieve. After Giuffre had smuggled the cocaine into South Florida, the cocaine would be transferred to Grieco's men.

One of these transfers in Florida was to take place on July 20, 1990. Grieco's organization owned two pickup trucks equipped with concealed cargo compartments under the truckbed. Grieco was to turn the trucks over to Giuffre, who was to have the concealed compartments filled with cocaine. Giuffre would then have his people park the trucks at two southwest Miami locations that Grieco would code into Guiffre's beeper.

On July 18, 1990, Giuffre and Grieco met in a Kendall, Florida restaurant for the initial transfer of the trucks. Grieco explained the pickups' hidden compartments to Giuffre as the two of them circled the parking lot in Giuffre's car. After Grieco had told Giuffre where the trucks were, Giuffre stopped the car, and Grieco rolled down his window and whistled. Tosta appeared with an envelope containing one of the trucks' keys, registration, and insurance papers. Tosta and 1555 Grieco exchanged a few words in Spanish and left together in Grieco's car.

On July 20, 1990, the day planned for the transfer, Tosta and Aguilera arrived at Grieco's house at 10:20 a.m. in a LeBaron rented in Aguilera's name. Grieco took the wheel, and for the next hour and a half to two hours, he drove erratically around the neighborhood and up and down U.S. 1, pulling into driveways and pulling directly out again, making U-turns, and even coming to a full stop in moving traffic on U.S. 1. Agents identified this erratic driving as countersurveillance, a ploy for Grieco to determine if he was being followed. Meanwhile, around 11:00, DEA agents parked the pickups, each carrying seventy kilograms of cocaine, in two designated shopping center parking lots on U.S. 1. Grieco's erratic route took him repeatedly past the lots where the trucks were parked.

A few minutes after DEA agents had put the cocaine-laden trucks in the lots, Rojas and Victor Manuel Estrada-Correa [FN1] arrived to drive the trucks to Grieco's storage sites. Rojas was led by a small brown car to Correa's house. The testimony is in conflict as to what happened at Correa's house. DEA agents testified that Rojas drove the truck into the garage and closed the garage door, only to emerge a little while later, driving the same truck without the load of cocaine. Rojas testified that he never parked the truck in the garage, and that he was directed by a man to sit in Correa's living room. He did so until Correa (whom Rojas had never met) appeared, wet from the shower, and told Rojas to get out of the house. Rojas then left in the pickup he had arrived in.

> FN1. Estrada-Correa is not a party to this appeal. He was tried with the other defendants and found not guilty of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. The jury could not reach a verdict on the conspiracy to distribute charge against him.

As Rojas left, the DEA agents stopped the truck and arrested him. The agents immediately discovered that the cocaine was missing from the hidden compartments, and they returned to Correa's house. One agent discovered Correa with his body half out a window in the rear of the house. Correa went back in, and before agents could ram Correa's door in, Correa emerged from the open garage door in an attempt to flee. He was arrested. Agents then entered the house and discovered the cocaine in a bedroom.

Meanwhile, Grieco had observed the DEA agents' unmarked cars following the LeBaron's erratic maneuvers, and he got out of the car at a gas station on U.S. 1. Aguilera took the wheel and continued the erratic driving for another half hour to forty-five minutes, when agents stopped the car and arrested both Aguilera and Tosta.

After the arrests, Grieco and Giuffre remained in contact for a few more weeks, but Grieco was never arrested and remained a fugitive at the time of trial.

Aguilera, Tosta, Correa, Rojas, Grieco, and Estrada-Correa were all charged with one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 846 and one count of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1). At trial, most of the law enforcement personnel who surveilled the defendants testified as to what they saw on July 20. However, the Government did not call Agent John Shepard, the one agent who had direct visual contact with Correa's house while Rojas and Correa were inside.

In addition to the agents and officers, the Government called Luis Zaldivar, who was not a subject of this investigation, to testify that he had seen Aguilera on at least two prior occasions working for Grieco's organization. Only a few minutes before voir dire, the Government notified Aguilera's counsel that it intended to present this evidence under Fed.R.Crim.Evid. 404(b). Aguilera's counsel objected to the admission of the evidence with such short notice. At the hearing on the issue during trial, the district court concluded that because six days had elapsed between voir dire and the day the Government planned to call Zaldivar, the notice was in fact reasonable and the testimony therefore admissible.

The jury convicted Correa, Aguilera, Tosta, and Rojas of conspiracy to distribute cocaine. Correa and Rojas were also convicted of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. 1556 All defendants moved for judgments of acquittal both at the close of the Government's evidence and at the close of all the evidence. At the close of the Government's evidence, the district court denied Rojas's and Correa's motions and reserved ruling on the others. At the close of all the evidence, the district judge denied all the motions.

At the sentencing hearings, the district court ruled that the defendants would be held liable for all seven hundred kilograms of cocaine that Grieco had planned to import through Giuffre. After adjustments, the court sentenced all four defendants to 235 months' imprisonment and five years' supervised release.

II. ISSUES ON APPEAL

[1][2] Each of the four appellants raises a number of issues on appeal, and some of the issues are common to more than one appellant: [FN2]

> FN2. In addition to the issues listed in the text, Correa contends that the district court erred in refusing to give a "missing witness" instruction to the jury. Correa's argument concerns Agent John Shepard, whom the Government did not call and who was the only agent with a direct view of Correa's house. We hold that the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to give such an instruction. Testimony at trial from agents in radio contact with Shepard showed that Shepard's testimony was likely to be unfavorable to Correa. In this circumstance, the "missing witness" instruction is inappropriate. See United States v. Link, 921 F.2d 1523, 1529 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 500 U.S. 958, 111 S.Ct. 2273, 114 L.Ed.2d 724 (1991). Correa also asserts that the district court violated his constitutional right to compulsory process by refusing to subpoena Agent Shepard. On the afternoon of the last day of trial, Correa requested a subpoena be issued to compel Shepard's appearance. The issuance of subpoenas under Fed.R.Crim.P. 17 is within the trial court's discretion, and timeliness is one of the factors the trial court may consider. United States v. Rinchack, 820 F.2d 1557, 1566 (11th Cir.1987). The district court was well within its discretion in refusing so untimely a request.

(1) Aguilera, Rojas, and Tosta all challenge the district court's denial of their motions for acquittal, contending that the Government's evidence did not suffice to show they voluntarily participated in the conspiracy, or, in Rojas's case, to show that he knowingly possessed cocaine.

(2) Aguilera contends that the district court erred in admitting 404(b) evidence when Aguilera received notice of the Government's intent to offer the evidence only a few minutes before trial.

(3) Aguilera contends that the district court erroneously forbade him from cross-examining the Government's 404(b) witness on his knowledge of the sentencing guidelines.

(4) Rojas contends that he was denied effective assistance of counsel.

(5) Tosta and Rojas take issue with the district court's attribution of 700 kilograms of cocaine to them for sentencing purposes.

(6) Rojas argues that the district court erred in giving the jury a "deliberate ignorance" instruction.

III. DISCUSSION

A. Sufficiency of the Evidence

Three defendants, Tosta, Aguilera, and Rojas, contend that the district court improperly denied their motions for acquittal because the Government's evidence was insufficient to convict them. We find the evidence sufficient as to Aguilera and Rojas, but we hold that the evidence was insufficient to convict Tosta. After reviewing the relevant principles of law, we discuss each defendant in turn.

1. Standard of Review

[3] We review the denial of a defendant's motion for acquittal de novo. United States v. Mieres-Borges, 919 F.2d 652, 656 (11th Cir.1990), cert. denied, 499 U.S. 980, 111 S.Ct. 1633, 113 L.Ed.2d 728 (1991); United States v. Kelly, 888 F.2d 732, 739 (11th Cir.1989). In considering the sufficiency of the evidence, we draw all reasonable inferences in the Government's favor. Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 80, 62 S.Ct. 457, 469, 86 L.Ed. 680 (1942); United States v. Keller, 916 F.2d 628, 632 (11th Cir.1990), cert. denied, 499 U.S. 978, 111 S.Ct. 1628, 113 L.Ed.2d 724 (1991). For the evidence to support a conviction, it need not "exclude every reasonable hypothesis of innocence or 1557 be wholly inconsistent with every conclusion except that of guilt, provided a reasonable trier of fact could find that the evidence establishes guilt beyond a reasonable doubt." United States v. Bell, 678 F.2d 547, 549 (5th Cir. Unit B 1982) (en banc), aff'd on other grounds, 462 U.S. 356, 103 S.Ct. 2398, 76 L.Ed.2d 638 (1983).

2. Law and Analysis

[4][5] To convict a defendant for conspiracy under 21 U.S.C. § 846, the evidence must show (1) that a conspiracy existed, (2) that the defendant knew of it, and (3) that the defendant, with knowledge, voluntarily joined it. E.g., United States v. Sullivan, 763 F.2d 1215, 1218 (11th Cir.1985). "Participation in a criminal conspiracy need not be proved by direct evidence; a common purpose and plan may be inferred from a 'development and collocation of circumstances.' " Glasser, 315 U.S. at 80, 62 S.Ct. at 469 (quoting U.S. v. Manton, 107 F.2d 834, 839 (2d Cir.1939)); see also United States v. Badolato, 701 F.2d 915, 920 (11th Cir.1983). Guilt may exist even when the defendant plays only a minor role and does not know all the details of the conspiracy. Id.

[6][7] The Government's case against Aguilera, Tosta, and Rojas was circumstantial. Thus, reasonable inferences, and not mere speculation, must support the jury's verdict. United States v. Villegas, 911 F.2d 623, 628 (11th Cir.1990), cert. denied, 499 U.S. 977, 111 S.Ct. 1625, 113 L.Ed.2d 722 (1991). The inference of participation from presence and association with conspirators alone does not suffice to convict. United States v. Bell, 833 F.2d 272, 275 (11th Cir.1987), cert. denied, 486 U.S. 1013, 108 S.Ct. 1747, 100 L.Ed.2d 210 (1988). However, such an inference is permissible in evaluating the totality of the circumstances. Id.

a. Aguilera

[8] Aguilera argues that the Government failed to show that Aguilera voluntarily participated in the conspiracy. The Government's case, according to Aguilera, showed mere association and flight. Aguilera understates the Government's evidence. The Government's case against Aguilera included testimony by law enforcement agents concerning the events on the day of his arrest, testimony by an informant about Aguilera's prior work for Grieco's organization, and documentary evidence associated with Aguilera that agents found in a search of Grieco's house.

The law enforcement agents testified for the Government that on the day of Aguilera's arrest, Aguilera arrived at Grieco's house at 10:20 a.m. in a car rented in Aguilera's name. Aguilera then rode with Grieco for nearly two hours of erratic driving that the agents considered to be countersurveillance. After Grieco observed that he was being followed and left the car, Aguilera continued to drive in the same erratic fashion until he was arrested.

The Government informant, Luis Zaldivar, testified that he had seen Aguilera performing menial tasks for Grieco's organization on at least two prior occasions. [FN3] In June or July of 1988, Zaldivar met Aguilera when Aguilera showed up at Zaldivar's boat to pick up a load of cocaine for Grieco. Zaldivar also transferred cocaine to Aguilera on another occasion in late 1988 or early 1989.

> FN3. At trial, the jury heard that Zaldivar was a former cocaine addict and a drug trafficker serving a sentence that he could reduce only by providing substantial assistance to the Government under Fed.R.Crim.P. 35. (Tr. at 1044, 1045, 1057.) Nonetheless, in reviewing the sufficiency of the Government's evidence, we must resolve all credibility issues in favor of the Government and assume that the jury believed Zaldivar. See United States v. Morales, 868 F.2d 1562, 1574 (11th Cir.1989).

Finally, the Government introduced several documents associated with Aguilera that agents found in a filing cabinet in Grieco's house. The documents included a photocopy of Aguilera's driver's license, registration papers for a boat trailer in Aguilera's name, receipts from major purchases by Aguilera, certificates of title for a pair of jetskis owned by Aguilera, a boat registration and insurance papers showing Grieco and Aguilera as co-owners, business records for GPV International, a partnership in which Aguilera and Grieco were both partners, and a check written 1558 by Aguilera to a marina where Grieco and Aguilera's boat was docked.

This evidence supports a finding that Aguilera voluntarily participated in the conspiracy. The jury could reasonably have inferred from Aguilera's evasive driving after Grieco's exit that Aguilera was both aware of and voluntarily assisting the conspiracy. See United States v. Morales, 868 F.2d 1562, 1574 (11th Cir.1989) (including evasive driving by the defendant in a list of evidence showing involvement and active participation in a drug conspiracy). In particular, the fact that Aguilera's countersurveillance effectively led law enforcement agents astray from Grieco's trail could have supported an inference that Aguilera intentionally assisted Grieco in furthering the conspiracy. The jury could also have legitimately taken into account Aguilera's relationship with Grieco, as evidenced by the presence of documents associated with Aguilera in Grieco's house, to find that a conspiracy existed between them. Cf. United States v. Cole, 704 F.2d 554, 557 (11th Cir.1983) (alleged coconspirators' status as members of an "insular" motorcycle club a factor in finding a conspiracy). Finally, evidence of Aguilera's prior acts in support of Grieco's organization could legitimately have reinforced the jury's findings that Aguilera was not merely a bystander, but a knowing and voluntary participant in Grieco's organization. Cf. United States v. Adams, 799 F.2d 665, 672 (11th Cir.1986) (mere presence under suspicious circumstances coupled with a defendant's prior presence under similar circumstances enough to support conviction), cert. denied sub nom. Morrell v. United States, 481 U.S. 1070, 107 S.Ct. 2464, 95 L.Ed.2d 873 (1987). Thus, we affirm Agilera's conviction.

b. Tosta

[9] Tosta also challenges the district court's denial of his motion for acquittal. Tosta argues that the Government's case would not support a finding beyond a reasonable doubt that Tosta knew of and voluntarily participated in the conspiracy. We agree.

The Government's evidence showed Tosta's involvement in two events. The first was on July 18, 1990, when Grieco and Giuffre met to discuss the details of the July 20 cocaine transfer and for Grieco to turn over the trucks with concealed compartments. On July 18, Tosta appeared in response to Grieco's whistle and produced an open envelope containing the keys, registration, and insurance binder for one of the trucks. After handing over the envelope, Tosta and Grieco exchanged a few words in Spanish. [FN4] After Grieco and Giuffre concluded their meeting, Tosta and Grieco left together.

FN4. The content of their conversation is not known because Agent Giuffre speaks no Spanish.

The second event was Grieco and Aguilera's countersurveillance on July 20, 1990, the day of Tosta's arrest. On that day, Tosta was present in the car with Grieco and Aguilera, and later just Aguilera, as Grieco and then Aguilera drove erratically over a course that took them back and forth past the sites where the cocaine-laden trucks were to be parked. Agents finally stopped the car and arrested Tosta and Aguilera. When one of the agents mentioned Tosta's actions on July 18, Tosta responded, "So, what's wrong with that?"

This case is very close, but the Government's case fatally lacks evidence that would support a finding beyond a reasonable doubt that Tosta voluntarily participated in the conspiracy. The sum of the inferences from the evidence is tantamount to that presented against Evasio Garcia in United States v. Kelly, 749 F.2d 1541 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1029, 105 S.Ct. 3506, 87 L.Ed.2d 636 (1985). In Kelly, the Government showed that Garcia had inspected a shrimpboat that was later used to import marijuana. Id. at 1548. The Government also showed that Garcia had been present at a meeting of key conspirators, and that Garcia had been sitting in a parked car near the house where the offloading crew had been preparing to go meet the shrimpboat with its load of contraband. Id. The Kelly court concluded that "all the record shows is that [Garcia] was an acquaintance of [a key conspirator]." Id.

Tosta's case is very similar to Garcia's. Like Garcia, Tosta performed a facially innocent act that furthered the conspiracy's use 1559 of one of its instrumentalities. Garcia inspected the shrimpboat, and Tosta was a runner for the keys and registration papers of a truck with concealed compartments. Furthermore, Tosta, like Garcia, was present in very suspicious circumstances. Garcia was sitting in a parked car where the smugglers were preparing to offload the marijuana; Tosta was riding in a countersurveillance vehicle near the site of a cocaine transfer.

The Kelly court concluded that "[a] reasonable jury could not conclude that Evasio Garcia was a co-conspirator in the importation and distribution schemes." Id. at 1549. Likewise, a reasonable jury could not ignore the doubts raised by the possibility that Tosta was an unwitting dupe in his sole action that furthered the conspiracy. See United States v. Littrell, 574 F.2d 828, 833 (5th Cir.1978). Furthermore, in the absence of any evidence that Tosta himself was on the lookout, a reasonable jury could not infer from Tosta's mere presence in Aguilera's rental car that Tosta was knowingly engaged in countersurveillance in furtherance of the conspiracy. Cf. United States v. Villegas, 911 F.2d 623, 628 (11th Cir.1990) (holding that the defendant's looking left and right in the vicinity of the defendant's brother's cocaine deal was not sufficient to show participation in the conspiracy).

Thus, we conclude that the Government's evidence was insufficient to convict Tosta of conspiracy to distribute cocaine. We therefore reverse Tosta's conviction.

c. Rojas

Rojas also challenges the district court's denial of his motion for acquittal on both the conspiracy and possession counts. Rojas argues that the evidence failed to show that he knowingly participated in the conspiracy and that he knowingly possessed cocaine. We disagree. We address the conspiracy conviction first, under the rules of law discussed above.

i. Conspiracy

[10] In Rojas's case, the evidence was ample to show Rojas's knowing and voluntary participation in the conspiracy. The Government showed that Rojas picked up the truck with the contraband and drove the truck to Correa's house, following a small brown car. Government agents testified that Rojas drove the truck into Correa's garage and closed the garage door. A little while later, Rojas emerged from the garage in the truck emptied of its load of cocaine. While Rojas was in the house, no one entered or left. Government agents testified that shortly after Rojas left they discovered the cocaine in a bedroom of Correa's house.

Rojas testified in his defense that he never drove the truck into the garage, which was occupied by the car of a man whose name he did not know. He was told to stay in Correa's living room. He sat there alone for twenty-five or thirty minutes. Then Correa, whom Rojas did not know, came out of the shower and told him to leave. He never saw anyone else in the house except Correa.

Circumstantial evidence suffices to show participation in a conspiracy, see Glasser, 315 U.S. at 80, 62 S.Ct. at 469, and the evidence here clearly supports reasonable inferences of guilt, see Villegas, 911 F.2d at 628. A jury could reasonably have inferred from Rojas's collection of the cocaine-laden truck and following of the little brown car to Correa's house that Rojas was voluntarily performing the task for the conspiracy. The jury could also reasonably have inferred that the movement of seventy one-kilogram packages of cocaine from the truck to a bedroom in twenty-five minutes occurred with Rojas's knowing cooperation and assistance. Moreover, Rojas's implausible testimony itself could legitimately support an inference of guilt. See United States v. Eley, 723 F.2d 1522, 1525 (11th Cir.1984). Thus, we conclude that a reasonable jury could have found Rojas guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

ii. Possession

[11][12] To convict Rojas for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the Government must show both knowing possession and an intent to distribute. United States v. Gardiner, 955 F.2d 1492, 1495 (11th Cir.1992). Constructive possession is sufficient, and intent to distribute is inferable from the quantity of cocaine. Id. The evidence was 1560 also ample to convict Rojas on this charge. The Government showed that in twenty-five minutes seventy kilograms of cocaine moved from the truck that Rojas had driven to a bedroom in a house occupied only by Rojas and Correa. The jury could reasonably have inferred that Rojas was in possession of the cocaine during that twenty-five minutes. Moreover, the jury could have inferred an intent to distribute from the large quantity of cocaine. Thus, we conclude that the district court properly denied Rojas's motion for acquittal.

B. 404(b) Reasonable Notice

1. Standard of Review

[13] We review district court rulings on the admissibility of evidence under an abuse of discretion standard. United States v. Cardenas, 895 F.2d 1338, 1342 (11th Cir.1990).

2. Discussion

Because the prosecutor failed to provide notice of the testimony until immediately before jury voir dire, Aguilera asserts that the district court abused its discretion in admitting prior bad acts testimony under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b). A few minutes before jury selection on May 26, the prosecutor notified Aguilera's counsel that she intended to call two witnesses, Fernando Loaiza-Alzate and Luis Zaldivar, to testify about Aguilera's role in Grieco's earlier drug deals. Aguilera's counsel objected to the late notice. The district court did not immediately rule on its admissibility, asking instead for memoranda from the parties.

On June 1, Aguilera's counsel again raised the issue, and after a hearing the district court found that the prosecutor had not known of the potential 404(b) testimony until Friday, May 22, and that the prosecutor had notified the defense the next business day, May 26. [FN5] Because the prosecutor did not plan to call the witnesses until June 1, the court found that the defense had in fact had six days' notice. The court concluded that six days' notice was reasonable under the rule, and that the prosecution had therefore satisfied the requirement.

FN5. Monday, May 25, 1992 was Memorial Day.

At the hearing, Aguilera called the DEA case agent, Joseph Giuffre, who testified that he had known of Loaiza's potential 404(b) testimony against Aguilera as early as the fall of 1990. However, Giuffre had not known of Zaldivar, or of Zaldivar's dealings with Grieco's organization, until the week before the trial, when the prosecutor learned of it. Ultimately, the prosecution did not call Loaiza, but did call Zaldivar. It is the admission of Zaldivar's testimony that Aguilera challenges.

Rule 404(b) was amended in 1991 to require the prosecution to provide reasonable notice in advance of trial of its intention to present 404(b) evidence, if the accused has requested the notice. [FN6] In this case, counsel for Aguilera had requested notice by adopting codefendant Tosta's motion for disclosure of extrinsic evidence, which the magistrate judge granted in September, 1990. Thus, the 404(b) testimony was admissible against Aguilera only if the prosecution's notice a few minutes before voir dire constituted "reasonable notice in advance of trial." [FN7] The construction of 404(b)'s reasonable notice requirement 1561 is a question of first impression in this circuit.

FN6. The rule now reads: (b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial. Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) (emphasis added).

FN7. Our analysis here does not concern whether the Government has shown the "good cause" that 404(b) requires for admission of 404(b) evidence during trial. See Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). The Government did give pretrial notice, however brief, and thus our inquiry is limited to whether this pretrial notice was reasonable. See id.

In the particular circumstances of this case, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that the prosecution had provided "reasonable notice" of Zaldivar's testimony. The policy behind 404(b) is "to reduce surprise and promote early resolution on the issue of admissibility." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) Judiciary Committee note. The rule imposes no specific time limits beyond requiring reasonable pretrial notice, and the Committee notes explain that "what constitutes a reasonable ... disclosure will depend largely on the circumstances of each case." Id.

The Committee notes are silent as to what circumstances are relevant. To fill this gap, we analogize to other evidentiary notice provisions, such as those in the residual hearsay exceptions (Fed.R.Evid. 803(24) and 804(b)(5)), and to notice requirements imposed by discovery orders. We are mindful that the analogies cannot be taken too far, since the language of other notice requirements in the Federal Rules of Evidence is more specific than the "reasonable notice" required by 404(b). See Fed.R.Evid. 609(b), 803(24), 805(b)(5). Furthermore, discovery order notice requirements are not exactly parallel because the trial judge has more discretion in fashioning a remedy for discovery violations than for failure to give notice under 404(b). See United States v. Hartley, 678 F.2d 961, 977 (11th Cir.1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1170, 103 S.Ct. 815, 74 L.Ed.2d 1014 (1983); compare Fed.R.Crim.P. 16(d)(2) with Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). Despite these differences, we find that three circumstances appearing in the analogous caselaw comport with the language and purpose of 404(b).

First, in evaluating the sufficiency of evidentiary notice, courts have considered the motivations and circumstances of the party presenting the evidence. See, e.g., United States v. Euceda-Hernandez, 768 F.2d 1307, 1313 (11th Cir.1985) (reversing a district court's suppression of evidence not disclosed by the prosecution under a discovery order, noting among other things that the prosecution's failure to notify was unintentional); United States v. Bailey, 581 F.2d 341, 348 (3d Cir.1978) (affirming admission of hearsay despite a lack of notice under 804(b)(5) because the declarant became unavailable only after trial began, thus making it impossible for the proponent to give earlier notice); United States v. Iaconetti, 540 F.2d 574, 578 (2d Cir.1976) (admitting hearsay under 803(24) despite a lack of notice when the hearsay unexpectedly became necessary for effective rebuttal), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1041, 97 S.Ct. 739, 50 L.Ed.2d 752 (1977). "Reasonable notice" under 404(b) should also take into account the circumstances of the prosecution's own discovery of the evidence. However, the notice requirement's purpose of "reduc[ing] surprise" is not served by allowing mere negligence to excuse a prosecutor's failure to give notice. To protect defendants from "trial by ambush," the Government should be charged with the knowledge of 404(b) evidence that a timely and reasonable preparation for trial would have revealed.

Second, courts have focused upon the prejudice suffered by the defendant because of the lack of notice. See, e.g., United States v. Parker, 749 F.2d 628, 633 (11th Cir.1984) (affirming the admission of hearsay under 803(24) despite a lack of notice because the opponent of the evidence had not shown he was harmed); United States v. Leslie, 542 F.2d 285, 291 (5th Cir.1976) (affirming the admission of hearsay under 803(24) although the record showed no notice, because the defendant was not harmed by the lack of notice); United States v. Doe, 860 F.2d 488, 492 (1st Cir.1988) (affirming admission of hearsay under 803(24) when defendants did not appear to be prejudiced by the lack of notice), cert. denied sub nom. Andrades-Salinas v. United States, 490 U.S. 1049, 109 S.Ct. 1961, 104 L.Ed.2d 430 (1989). Since the policy of 404(b)'s notice provision is to protect the defendant by reducing surprise, see Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) Judiciary Committee note, the possibility of prejudice to the defendant from a lack of opportunity to prepare should weigh heavily in the court's consideration.

Finally, a few courts have considered the importance of the evidence to the proponent's 1562 case. See, e.g., Euceda-Hernandez, 768 F.2d at 1313 (reversing an order to suppress evidence not disclosed by the prosecutor under a discovery order, noting among other things that the suppressed evidence was "extremely important to the Government's case"); United States v. Burkhalter, 735 F.2d 1327, 1329 (11th Cir.1984) (reversing as too extreme a sanction an order effectively suppressing evidence not disclosed under a discovery order). As in the discovery cases, the court should take into account the significance of the evidence to the prosecution's case. The second sentence of rule 404(b) is a rule of inclusion, and 404(b) evidence, like other relevant evidence, should not lightly be excluded when it is central to the prosecution's case.

[14] Thus, by analogy to other notice provisions, we can discern three factors the court should consider in determining the reasonableness of pretrial notice under 404(b):

(1) When the Government, through timely preparation for trial, could have learned of the availability of the witness;

(2) The extent of prejudice to the opponent of the evidence from a lack of time to prepare; and

(3) How significant the evidence is to the prosecution's case.

We now apply these factors to the circumstances of this case.

[15] First, the district court found that the prosecutor did not know of Zaldivar's potential testimony until the Friday before trial began. [FN8] The case agent testified that he did not know of Zaldivar before the prosecutor did. Although the Government's failure to timely prepare for a trial would not excuse the lack of notice, it is clear from the record that a reasonably timely preparation for trial would not have revealed Zaldivar's possible testimony before that time. Although Zaldivar had made a statement to the DEA as early as January 1992, Zaldivar was not part of the conspiracy in which the defendants were involved and that Agent Giuffre was investigating. Thus, it is not apparent how Giuffre would have learned that Zaldivar had made statements concerning Aguilera. In fact, Zaldivar's testimony came to the attention of the prosecutor only when Zaldivar himself telephoned her.

FN8. The trial began the following Tuesday.

Second, Aguilera's counsel has been vague, both during trial and in this appeal, as to what measures he might have taken, given more time, to meet the evidence. At the district court hearing on the 404(b) evidence's admissibility six days after the prosecution had notified the defense of the 404(b) evidence, Aguilera's counsel proposed only to send out his investigator to check Zaldivar's stories. If even after six days Aguilera could point to no specific actions he might take given more preparation time, it was within the district court's discretion to conclude that Aguilera would not be prejudiced by having only six days' notice. [FN9]

FN9. In cross-examination of Zaldivar, Aguilera's lawyer in fact brought out that Zaldivar was a cocaine and marijuana smuggler, that Zaldivar had lied to a Customs inspector, that he did not pay taxes on his drug profits, that his testimony was part of an effort to get out of prison sooner, that he had been granted use immunity, that Zaldivar had not mentioned Aguilera during his initial debriefing, that Zaldivar was a cocaine addict, that he tested positive for marijuana when he was first incarcerated, that at the time of his arrest three state arrest warrants had been issued for him, that he had been arrested for burglary, and that Zaldivar could not remember who his last employer was. Thus, it seems likely that even if the district court erred in admitting the 404(b) evidence on such short notice, the error was harmless.

Finally, the evidence was significant to the Government's case against Aguilera. The Government's other evidence was merely that Aguilera was present in the countersurveillance car, that Aguilera later drove the car, and that papers associated with Aguilera were in Grieco's house. Zaldivar's testimony to Aguilera's prior cocaine-related work for Grieco lent strong support to a finding that Aguilera was aware of and voluntarily participated in the conspiracy. Along with the other factors, this circumstance weighs in the Government's favor.

On the record in this case, all three considerations thus weigh somewhat in favor of finding that the Government's pretrial notice was reasonable. We therefore hold that the 1563 district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence.

C. Other Issues

1. Exclusion of Sentencing Cross-Examination

[16] Aguilera contends that the district court's violation of his Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause rights entitles him to a new trial. During cross-examination of Zaldivar, the Government's 404(b) witness, Aguilera's counsel attempted to elicit Zaldivar's understanding of the sentencing benefits he would earn by testifying for the Government. [FN10] On the Government's objection, the court admonished Aguilera's counsel to "stay away from anything having to do with any sentencing." (Tr. at 1075.)

> FN10. The relevant transcript passage reads: Q. Your initial sentence was reduced from 17.7 years to nine years, is that correct? A. That is correct. Q. And by testifying here today your [sic] hoping with this story to get another sentence reduction, isn't that correct? MS. KING [prosecutor]: Objection form of the objection [sic]. THE COURT: Overruled. THE WITNESS: Yes, that is correct.
>
> . . . . .
>
> Q. How much of a reduction, sir, do you think you're going to get out of this case? A. I don't know, sir.
>
> . . . . .
>
> Q. Sir, in federal court you serve about eighty-five percent of your sentence, do you not? MS. KING: Objection, your Honor.
>
> . . . . .
>
> Q. So you're familiar with the guidelines? THE COURT: Sustained.
>
> . . . . .
>
> Q. Are you familiar with the Sentencing Guidelines? MS. KING: Objection, your Honor. A. Yes, I am. Q. Do you have an opinion as to how much--MS. KING: Objection, your Honor. THE COURT: Counsel, stay away from anything having to do with any sentencing. (Tr. at 1073-75.)

Aguilera argues that he was unable to expose Zaldivar's motive for testifying. He was thus effectively rendered unable to attack Zaldivar's credibility, in violation of his Sixth Amendment rights. See Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 315-16, 94 S.Ct. 1105, 1110, 39 L.Ed.2d 347 (1974). We disagree. Our reading of the transcript convinces us that Aguilera not only effectively impeached Zaldivar's credibility, but also impeached it repeatedly on the very issue of sentence reduction. (Tr. at 1065, 1074, 1078-79.) Aguilera's contention is thus meritless.

2. Ineffective Assistance of Counsel

[17] Rojas challenges his conviction on the ground that he was denied effective assistance of counsel in violation of his Sixth Amendment rights. It is settled law in this circuit that a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel cannot be considered on direct appeal if the claims were not first raised before the district court and if there has been no opportunity to develop a record of evidence relevant to the merits of the claim. See United States v. Hilliard, 752 F.2d 578, 580 (11th Cir.1985); United States v. Lopez, 728 F.2d 1359, 1363 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 828, 105 S.Ct. 112, 83 L.Ed.2d 56 (1984); United States v. Griffin, 699 F.2d 1102, 1107 (11th Cir.1983). Rojas did not raise ineffective assistance of counsel as a ground for his motion for new trial, and the record is not sufficiently developed to evaluate the merits of the claim. Hence, the claim is more appropriately raised in a proceeding under 28 U.S.C. § 2255. See id.

3. Sentencing

[18] Rojas also challenges his sentence. [FN11] In calculating Rojas's offense level, the district court attributed to Rojas 700 kilograms of cocaine, the total amount of the importation Grieco and Giuffre planned. See U.S.S.G. § 1B1.3(a)(1) (1991); id. § 2D1.1(c)(2). Rojas contends that seventy kilograms, the quantity hidden in the truck Rojas drove, was the appropriate amount.

> FN11. Tosta makes a similar challenge, but our reversal of his conviction makes it unnecessary to address his contentions.

The Guidelines provide that a member of the conspiracy is liable for all conduct of others in furtherance of the conspiracy that is reasonably foreseeable by the defendant. Id. § 1B1.3(a)(1). At Rojas's sentencing 1564 hearing, Rojas did not request an individualized finding of fact as to what quantity would have been reasonably foreseeable to him, and the district court did not make one. Under these circumstances, the district court is entitled to rely upon the factual statements in the presentencing report (PSI) without making an individualized finding. See Fed.R.Crim.P. 32(c)(3)(D). But Rojas's PSI is at best ambiguous. It conclusorily states that "the amount of cocaine involved in this offense is approximately 700 kilograms." On that basis, the PSI fixes the offense level at 40 because the offense involves at least 500, but less than 1500 kilograms. See U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1(a)(3), (c)(2) (1991). The PSI also states, however, that Rojas served as a "hired hand" and that it "is doubtful that the defendant realized the quantity of contraband he was transporting...." It is unclear whether this latter statement refers to the contraband on Rojas's truck or to the contraband involved in the overall conspiracy. However construed, the statement casts doubt on the propriety of attributing 700 kilograms to Rojas.

Because we find the PSI ambiguous, we conclude that no factual finding supports the quantity of cocaine attributable to Rojas under the guidelines. We therefore vacate Rojas's sentence and remand for resentencing following a finding relative to the quantity of cocaine attributable to Rojas. [FN12]

> FN12. The Government does not argue that there is a finding relative to the quantity of cocaine attributable to Rojas or that Rojas waived the objection by failing to object after sentencing. The Government's argument is rather that we should uphold the sentence because the record would support a finding attributing 700 kilograms to Rojas. We prefer that the district court resolve this factual dispute.

4. Jury Instructions

a. Standard of Review

[19][20] The district court has broad discretion in formulating a jury charge as long as the charge as a whole is a correct statement of the law. United States v. Bent, 707 F.2d 1190, 1195 (11th Cir.1983), cert. denied, 466 U.S. 960, 104 S.Ct. 2174, 80 L.Ed.2d 557 (1984). We will not reverse a conviction unless we find that issues of law were presented inaccurately or the charge improperly guided the jury in such a substantial way as to violate due process. United States v. Turner, 871 F.2d 1574, 1578 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 997, 110 S.Ct. 552, 107 L.Ed.2d 548 (1989).

b. Discussion

Rojas contends that the district court improperly gave the jury a "deliberate ignorance" instruction. [FN13] We agree. However, we find that the error was harmless. A "deliberate ignorance" instruction is appropriate when "the facts ... support the inference that the defendant was aware of a high probability of the existence of the fact in question and purposely contrived to avoid learning all of the facts in order to have a defense in the event of a subsequent prosecution." United States v. Rivera, 944 F.2d 1563, 1571 (11th Cir.1991) (quoting United States v. Alvarado, 838 F.2d 311, 314 (9th Cir.1987)). "[A] district court should not instruct the jury on 'deliberate ignorance' 1565 when the relevant evidence points only to actual knowledge, rather than deliberate avoidance." Id. (emphasis in original).

> FN13. The court instructed the jury: When knowledge of the existence of a particular fact is an essential part of an offense, such knowledge may be established if a defendant is aware of a high probability of its existence unless he actually believes that it does not exist. So with respect to the issue of defendants Estrada and Rojas's knowledge in this case, if you find from all evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that a defendant believed that he possessed cocaine and deliberately and consciously tried to avoid learning that there was cocaine and deliberately and consciously tried to avoid learning of its presence in order to be able to say, if he should be apprehended, that he did not know cocaine was on or about his person, you may treat such deliberate avoidance, if so found, of positive knowledge as the equivalent of knowledge. In other words, you may find that a defendant acted knowingly if you find beyond a reasonable doubt either that the defendant actually knew that he possessed cocaine or, two, that he deliberately closed his eyes to what he had every reason to believe was the fact. I must emphasize, however, that the requisite proof of knowledge on the part of the defendant cannot be established by merely demonstrating that he was negligent, careless or foolish. (Tr. at 1774-75.)

In Rivera, the defendants were arrested while attempting to bring three false-bottomed suitcases into the country with cocaine in the false bottoms. Id. at 1565. In its analysis of the appropriateness of the instruction, the court pointed out that the defendants had not indicated in any way their awareness of the unusual construction of their suitcases and their avoidance of positive knowledge of the contents. Id. at 1572. Nor was there any evidence that the defendants had acquired their suitcases under suspicious circumstances, but that the defendants deliberately avoided confirming their suspicions. Id. Thus, to contend that the instruction was appropriate because the defendants should have known they were carrying cocaine "skate[d] dangerously close to [urging] a negligence standard." Id.

[21] In Rojas's case, the evidence likewise pointed to actual knowledge rather than deliberate avoidance. The relevant evidence was that Rojas drove one of the cocaine-laden trucks to Correa's house and was present while seventy kilograms of cocaine were taken off the truck and placed in a bedroom of the house. The inference of knowledge based on this evidence is that Rojas, being present during such a large movement of cocaine, had to have been aware of it. No evidence suggests that Rojas strongly suspected cocaine but "purposely contrived" not to learn about it. See id. at 1572. Hence, giving the instruction was error.

[22] However, as in Rivera, we find that the error was harmless. Id. at 1572-73. The Government's evidence, though circumstantial, very strongly supported a finding that Rojas knew of the cocaine. The jury could easily have based its verdict on a finding of actual knowledge, rather than deliberate ignorance. We therefore affirm Rojas's convictions.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we AFFIRM the convictions of Correa, Rojas, and Aguilera. However, we REVERSE Tosta's conviction, and we VACATE Rojas's sentence and REMAND for resentencing.

AFFIRMED in part; REVERSED in part; VACATED and REMANDED in part.

END OF DOCUMENT

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Garry D. KERN, Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Troy P. REEVES, Appellant.

Nos. 93-1524, 93-1566.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Oct. 13, 1993.

Decided Dec. 17, 1993.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Nebraska, Lyle E. Strom, Chief Judge, of bank robbery, conspiracy to commit bank robbery, and carrying of firearm during and in relation to crime of violence. Defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, Magill, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) other acts evidence was admissible on issue of intent to conspire; (2) motion for new trial on basis of newly discovered evidence was properly denied; and (3) state's knowledge of its police report potentially exonerating defendants could not be imputed to federal prosecutor on issue whether prosecutor withheld evidence and thereby violated Brady.

Affirmed.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
Government gave "reasonable notice" of general nature of bad act evidence to be used, when government informed defendants in hearing before magistrate judge that it might use evidence from some local robberies and when it provided the reports one week later, a week before trial. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 369.2(8)
110k369.2(8)
Victim's testimony identifying defendants as participants in hotel robbery was relevant to issue of defendants' intent to conspire to rob bank 17 days earlier and was admissible; both robberies were committed by three stocking-masked males, in both robberies larger male carried black short-barreled shotgun, and smaller robber in both robberies vaulted over relatively high obstacle. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 371, 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 371(8)
110k371(8)
Victim's testimony identifying defendants as participants in hotel robbery was relevant to issue of defendants' intent to conspire to rob bank 17 days earlier and was admissible; both robberies were committed by three stocking-masked males, in both robberies larger male carried black short-barreled shotgun, and smaller robber in both robberies vaulted over relatively high obstacle. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 371, 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 945(2)
110k945(2)
Police report indicating confession to hotel robbery and refusal to name accomplices would not exonerate defendants in bank robbery prosecution using evidence of defendants' involvement in the hotel robbery, and, thus, report did not entitle defendants to new trial; if the evidence had been presented to jury, it could reasonably have believed that hotel robber was merely protecting defendants, and although jury could also have inferred that hotel robbery victim improperly identified defendants, evidence of guilt warranted denial of new trial motion. Fed.Rules Cr.Proc.Rule 33, 18 U.S.C.A.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 700(6)
110k700(6)
State's knowledge of its police report potentially exonerating defendants could not be imputed to federal prosecutor on issue whether prosecutor withheld evidence and thereby violated Brady. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 5, 14.

123 Mark W. Bubak, Omaha, NE, argued, for appellants.

Michael P. Norris, Asst. U.S. Atty., Omaha, NE, argued, for appellee.

Before McMILLIAN, BOWMAN, and MAGILL,

Circuit Judges.

MAGILL, Circuit Judge.

Troy B. Reeves (Reeves) and Garry D. Kern (Kern) appeal the judgment entered by the district court [FN1] following a jury's finding of guilt on three bank-robbery-related counts. Specifically, Reeves and Kern (the defendants) contend the trial court erred when it admitted evidence of another subsequent robbery, when it refused to grant a new trial after the discovery of new evidence, and when it found as a matter of law that conspiracy to commit bank robbery is a crime of violence. For the reasons addressed below, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

FN1. The Honorable Lyle E. Strom, Chief Judge, United States District Court for the District of Nebraska.

I. BACKGROUND

On June 12, 1992, an Omaha branch office of the First Federal Savings and Loan Association of Lincoln (First Federal) was robbed of approximately $12,700 by two stocking-masked males who differed significantly in height and weight. The smaller robber entered the bank first and the larger robber followed carrying a black short-barreled shotgun. The robbers left the bank and entered a recently-stolen white Buick driven by a third male. Immediately after the robbery, a stocking mask with a few human hairs was found outside the bank.

Kern's girlfriend at the time, Andrea Fraire (Fraire), testified at trial that Kern had related a plan to her to rob a jewelry store and bank in Omaha. According to Fraire, the planned robberies were to take place on June 12, 1992, and involved the use of stolen getaway cars. Fraire further testified that on the evening of June 12, 1992, Kern arrived home with $4000 to $4500 in cash.

Jack Parrott, a security guard for the shopping center in which the bank was located, testified at trial that he observed a rusted gold Oldsmobile Cutlass (Cutlass) occupied by four males in the shopping center parking lot on June 11, 1992. The next day, June 12, the same car was observed again by Parrott, again occupied by four males. Later that same morning, Parrott observed the Cutlass in a church parking lot parked beside a white Buick. The white Buick was now occupied by three of the males and the Cutlass held the fourth individual. After observing the Buick for a short time, Parrott noticed a shotgun being passed to a backseat passenger. Parrott subsequently identified Reeves from a photograph array as the frontseat passenger. Although Parrott was unable to identify Kern from a police lineup, he did identify Kern at trial as the backseat passenger.

The bank employees were unable to identify Reeves or Kern from lineups or at trial. Reeves and Kern both had alibi witnesses testify that they were elsewhere at the time of the robbery. The human hairs in the mask, however, were identified by an FBI hair and fiber expert as matching samples taken from Kern.

At trial, testimony was introduced by the government regarding the defendants' alleged participation in a hotel robbery that occurred seventeen days after the bank robbery. Kern was charged in state court with commission of this robbery. The testimony was prefaced by a limiting instruction prohibiting the jury from using this testimony to establish "bad" character and, accordingly, conformity with that character. The testimony was then introduced pursuant to Federal 124 Rule of Evidence 404(b). The hotel robbery victim, Ashford, testified he was robbed by three armed masked males, and he identified both Reeves and Kern as two of the individuals who robbed him.

Following a jury trial, the defendants were convicted of all three counts against them. Count I charged the defendants with conspiracy to commit bank robbery in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371. Count II charged them with the June 12, 1992 bank robbery of First Federal in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2113(a), (d). Count III charged Reeves with carrying a firearm during and in relation to a crime of violence in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1), and Kern was charged as Reeves' co-conspirator on that count.

After the jury convicted Reeves and Kern for the First Federal robbery, the government received from the Omaha police a supplementary report related to the hotel robbery. An individual named Stacey Lue (Lue) confessed to participating with two accomplices in the hotel robbery. Lue was specifically asked if Reeves and Kern were his accomplices, but he denied any participation on their part. Lue, however, refused to name his two accomplices. Upon receipt, the government immediately disclosed this information to the defendants' attorneys. Following the disclosure of the Lue confession, Reeves and Kern moved for a new trial. In state court, Kern pleaded nolo contendere to the hotel robbery charge and was convicted.

II. DISCUSSION

The defendants contend that three errors of the trial court mandate reversal and a new trial: admission of Ashford's testimony, Brady [FN2] evidence and/or newly discovered evidence, and the district court's finding as a matter of law that conspiracy to commit bank robbery is a crime of violence as defined by 18 U.S.C. § 16. We find that the district court committed no reversible error, and we affirm the court's judgment.

FN2. Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963).

A. The Hotel Robbery Evidence

The defendants object to the admission into evidence of Ashford's testimony regarding the hotel robbery because they claim the government gave insufficient notice that it planned on using this evidence and it was not properly admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) (Rule 404(b)). The district court, however, has broad discretion to admit such evidence and its decision will not be overturned unless it is clear that the evidence has no bearing on the case. United States v. Sykes, 977 F.2d 1242, 1246 (8th Cir.1992).

[1] The government gave the defendants adequate notice that it planned on using Rule 404(b) evidence. The rule states the prosecution must "provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial ... on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). The magistrate judge specifically ordered that any "bad act" evidence be disclosed at least fourteen days prior to trial. The government complied by informing the defendants in a hearing before the magistrate judge that the government might use evidence from some local robberies. See Tr. at 335. At that time, the government did not yet have the state reports concerning these robberies. Approximately one week before trial, when the government obtained the reports, the defendants were likewise provided with these reports. Id. We find that the government's notice satisfies the requirements of Rule 404(b); the district court did not abuse its discretion in finding that this notice was reasonable.

Rule 404(b) prohibits the admission of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" to prove the character of a person, and hence, conformity with that character; that is, it prohibits propensity evidence. See id. The rule, nonetheless, specifically recognizes that evidence of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" could be admissible for other purposes, such as to prove motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake. Id.

To properly admit Rule 404(b) evidence for purposes other than to prove propensity, it must (1) be relevant to a material issue raised at trial, (2) be similar in kind and close 125 in time to the crime charged, (3) be supported by sufficient evidence to support a finding by a jury that the defendant committed the other act, and (4) not have a prejudicial value that substantially outweighs its probative value. Sykes, 977 F.2d at 1246; United States v. Johnson, 934 F.2d 936, 939 (8th Cir.1991). The district court warned the jury in an instruction prior to Ashford's testimony that "the mere fact that these defendants may have committed a similar act in the past is not evidence that they committed the acts charged in this case." Tr. at 365. The district court repeated essentially the same warning in Jury Instruction No. 10. The permissible purposes enumerated by the district court for which this testimony could be considered included proof of identity, knowledge, plan, motive, and intent to conspire.

[2] We find that the hotel robbery evidence was properly admitted to prove that Reeves and Kern intended to enter into an agreement or understanding to commit robbery and that they understood the purpose of this agreement. [FN3] The court instructed the jury that in order to find the defendants guilty of conspiracy to commit bank robbery, it had to find four elements: (1) two or more persons reached an agreement to commit the crime, (2) the defendant voluntarily and intentionally joined in the agreement, (3) at the time the defendant joined in the agreement, he knew the purpose of the agreement, and (4) that while the agreement was in effect, one or more of the persons who had joined in the agreement did an overt act in order to carry out the agreement. Thus, the hotel robbery evidence was relevant to a material fact: intent to conspire. See Cheek v. United States, 858 F.2d 1330, 1336-37 (8th Cir.1988); United States v. Scholle, 553 F.2d 1109, 1121 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 940, 98 S.Ct. 432, 54 L.Ed.2d 300 (1977); United States v. Carlson, 547 F.2d 1346, 1354 & n. 5 (8th Cir.1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 914, 97 S.Ct. 2174, 53 L.Ed.2d 224 (1977).

> FN3. We do not decide whether the hotel robbery evidence could otherwise have been admissible as evidence of identity, plan, or motive, because we find the district court did not abuse its discretion in allowing its admission into evidence and the limiting instruction properly warned the jury not to impermissibly use this evidence as proof of propensity. However, we do not countenance the district court's use of this virtual laundry list of permissible Rule 404(b) purposes. See United States v. Mothershed, 859 F.2d 585, 589 (8th Cir.1988). Such an action, nevertheless, in itself is not a basis for reversal. See id.

As required by Sykes and Johnson, the hotel robbery evidence was similar in kind and close in time to the crime charged. The hotel robbery occurred only seventeen days after the bank robbery. Both robberies were committed by three stocking-masked males. In both robberies, the larger male carried a black short-barreled shotgun. Moreover, the smaller masked robber in both robberies vaulted over a relatively high obstacle: the teller's counter in the bank robbery and the desk in the hotel robbery.

Ashford's testimony regarding the hotel robbery was sufficient for a jury to have found that Reeves and Kern committed the hotel robbery. Ashford not only made a positive identification of the defendants at trial, but he also identified Reeves from an array of photographs soon after the hotel robbery.

Moreover, the court's limiting instruction to the jury was sufficient to prevent undue prejudice from the admission of this evidence. Therefore, because the hotel robbery evidence was admissible to prove that the defendants intended to enter into a conspiracy to rob, we find that the district court did not abuse its discretion when it allowed Ashford to testify.

B. The Supplementary Omaha Police Division Report

[3] After the defendants received the Omaha police division supplementary report (the report) indicating that Lue had confessed to the hotel robbery and refused to name his accomplices, the defendants moved for a new trial. Reeves and Kern claim that the report "exonerated" them and hence a new trial should have been granted pursuant to Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 33 (Rule 33). Furthermore, they claim that Brady mandates a new trial because the knowledge 126 of the Omaha police regarding this report should be imputed to the federal prosecutor. We do not agree that the new evidence exonerated the defendants or that the prosecutor withheld evidence from the defendants.

Rule 33 allows a court to grant a motion for a new trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence if the evidence is, in fact, discovered since trial; the court may infer the movant has been diligent; the evidence is not merely cumulative or impeaching; the evidence is material; and the newly discovered evidence would probably produce an acquittal. United States v. Gustafson, 728 F.2d 1078, 1084 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 979, 105 S.Ct. 380, 83 L.Ed.2d 315 (1984); see also United States v. Wang, 964 F.2d 811, 813 (8th Cir.1992) (new trial may be granted if the defendant's substantial rights are affected). The defendants' argument fails because the report did not exonerate them; that is, it would not have been likely to have produced an acquittal. As stated by the district court, the report [FN4] would merely have "given the jury some additional information to evaluate in determining whether or not Mr. Ashford had indeed properly identified the two defendants as being participants." Tr. at 766. Had this evidence been presented to the jury, the jury could reasonably have believed that Reeves and Kern were Lue's accomplices and that Lue was merely protecting them by denying their participation in the hotel robbery. The jury could also have inferred that Ashford improperly identified Reeves and Kern as participants in the hotel robbery. The district court, however, found that this latter possibility did not warrant a new trial. Particularly in light of the amount of evidence presented to the jury on the issue of the defendants' guilt, the district court did not abuse its discretion by denying the defendants' motion for a new trial. See Gustafson, 728 F.2d at 1084.

> FN4. The report states, in relevant part: [Lue] had committed that robbery with two other individuals. Previously arrested in connection with this robbery was a Garry KERN, and a Troy REEVES had also been identified as a suspect in this robbery also. I, Officer MAHONEY, asked Stacy LUE if these other two suspects were with him when this robbery occurred, and LUE stated that they were not; however, he would not name the other two suspects out of fear.

[4] Nor does Brady mandate a new trial in this case. See Brady, 373 U.S. at 87-88, 83 S.Ct. at 1196-97. A defendant's due process rights are violated under Brady if a prosecutor "withholds evidence on demand of an accused which, if made available, would tend to exculpate him or reduce the penalty." Id. In order to establish such a claim, the prosecutor must have suppressed or withheld evidence that was both favorable and material to the defense. Moore v. Illinois, 408 U.S. 786, 794, 92 S.Ct. 2562, 2568, 33 L.Ed.2d 706 (1972). Nothing in this record indicates that this prosecutor withheld evidence from the defendants. Here, the prosecutor simply did not have the report until the trial was over. Such a case is fundamentally different than when information is in the prosecutor's files. See State v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 110, 96 S.Ct. 2392, 2400, 49 L.Ed.2d 342 (1976). We do not accept the defendants' proposal that we impute the knowledge of the State of Nebraska to a federal prosecutor. See United States v. Walker, 720 F.2d 1527, 1535 (11th Cir.1983) (refusing to impute the knowledge of state officials to a federal prosecutor), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1108, 104 S.Ct. 1614, 80 L.Ed.2d 143 (1984). Consequently, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion when it refused to grant a new trial.

Finally, we find wholly without merit Kern's contention that conspiracy to commit bank robbery is not a crime of violence as defined by 18 U.S.C. § 16, and we reaffirm our previous holding to that effect. See United States v. Johnson, 962 F.2d 1308, 1311 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 358, 121 L.Ed.2d 271 (1992), and cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 1418, 122 L.Ed.2d 788 (1993).

III. CONCLUSION

Accordingly, we find that the district court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted the hotel robbery evidence and denied the defendants' motion for a new trial. Moreover, the district court properly found that conspiracy to commit bank robbery is a 127 crime of violence. Therefore, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

END OF DOCUMENT

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Eugene Lamar SUTTON, Appellant.

No. 94-2597.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Oct. 11, 1994.

Decided Dec. 7, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Paul A. Magnuson, Chief Judge, of bank robbery, use of firearm in course of violent crime, and being felon in possession of firearm. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, McKay, Senior Circuit Judge, sitting by designation, held that: (1) district court did not abuse its discretion in excusing the government's failure to timely notify defendant that it intended to introduce evidence of defendant's prior narcotics use; (2) evidence of defendant's prior drug use was not material; (3) prejudicial impact of evidence substantially outweighed its probative effect; (4) admission of evidence of defendant's prior drug use was harmless error; (5) district court did not abuse its discretion in precluding defendant from calling witness who would have testified to inconsistent statements made by prosecution witness; and (6) conviction was supported by sufficient evidence.

Affirmed.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
District court did not abuse its discretion in excusing the government's failure to notify defendant at least four days prior to trial, pursuant to district court orders, that it intended to introduce evidence of defendant's prior narcotics use in trial for bank robbery; the government discovered the evidence only five days before trial on a Friday and notified defendant on the following Monday, and defendant was on notice that his involvement with drugs would be an issue at trial. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 371(12)
110k371(12)
In bank robbery prosecution, evidence of defendant's prior drug use was not material, where government simply asked the jury to draw a raw inference about defendant's motive from the fact that he used drugs. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 371(12)
110k371(12)
In bank robbery prosecution, even if motive was material issue and evidence of defendant's prior drug use was probative of motive, prejudicial impact of evidence substantially outweighed its probative effect; slight probative value of knowing one possible motive for defendant to commit robbery did not outweigh likely prejudicial effect on jury of being told that defendant was crack- cocaine user. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rules 403, 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 1169.2(3)
110k1169.2(3)
In bank robbery prosecution, admission of evidence of defendant's prior drug use was harmless error, where defendant's bad character was established by admissible evidence; defendant claimed that large amounts of cash in his possession after bank robbery were result of defendant's act of breaking into cocaine dealer's home and stealing cash, and evidence that defendant purchased large amounts of cocaine was introduced into evidence to establish a recent acquisition of wealth. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[5] WITNESSES ⇐ 389
410k389
District court did not abuse its discretion in precluding defendant from calling witness who would have testified to inconsistent statements made by one of key prosecution witnesses, where defendant failed to give prosecution witness the opportunity to explain or deny having made a prior inconsistent statement while he was on the stand; Barrett rule allowing such evidence so long as witness is available to be recalled to explain inconsistent statements had not been adopted in circuit, and thus was optional procedure, not mandatory. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 613(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[6] ROBBERY ⚿ 2
342k2
Conviction of bank robbery was supported by evidence of bank surveillance photographs of robber, testimony from defendant's aunt and police officer who knew defendant well identifying defendant as man in photographs, testimony that defendant possessed large amounts of cash later on same day as robbery, and testimony of two admitted accomplices implicating defendant in crime, despite fact that accomplices had made plea bargains, and existence of minor inconsistencies in accomplices' and eyewitnesses' testimony, which were easily explained by rapidity and stress of events. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d).

[7] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1144.13(3)
110k1144.13(3)
In examining challenge to sufficiency of evidence, Court of Appeals views evidence in light most favorable to government and resolves all evidentiary conflicts in favor of the government.

1258 Glenn P. Bruder, Minneapolis, MN, argued, for appellant.

David L. Lillehaug, U.S. Atty., Minneapolis, MN, argued (Jon M. Hopeman, on the brief), for appellee.

Before McMILLIAN, Circuit Judge, McKAY, [FN*] Senior Circuit Judge, and BOWMAN, Circuit Judge.

FN* The HONORABLE MONROE G. McKAY, Senior Circuit Judge, United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit, sitting by designation.

McKAY, Circuit Judge.

Eugene Lamar Sutton appeals from a final judgment entered in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota finding him guilty upon a jury verdict of bank robbery, use of a firearm in the course of a violent crime, and being a felon in possession of a firearm, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2113(a)(d), 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1) and (2), and 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1), respectively. Mr. Sutton presents three issues on appeal: (1) he challenges the admission of certain evidence; (2) he challenges the exclusion of certain evidence; and (3) he challenges the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole. We affirm the judgment of the district court.

[1] Mr. Sutton contends that the district court improperly admitted evidence of his prior narcotic use under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). In support of this claim, he has demonstrated that he was provided notice of this evidence only two days before trial, despite the fact that the district court explicitly ordered the government to notify the defendant at least four days prior to trial of any 404(b) evidence it planned to use. The district court excused this breach for two reasons. First, the government discovered the evidence only five days prior to trial, on a Friday, and they notified the defendant on the following Monday. Second, the government had provided the defendant with a copy of the statement of another one of its witnesses over a month before the trial. This statement related to a drug buy the day of the robbery. Thus, the defendant was on notice that his involvement with drugs would be an issue at the trial and had adequate time to prepare for this type of evidence. The district court did not abuse its discretion in excusing the government's late 1259 notification of Mr. Sutton under these circumstances.

[2] Mr. Sutton also argues, persuasively, that the evidence of his drug use does not meet our test for admissibility under Rule 404(b).

> In order for the trial court to admit evidence under Rule 404(b), the evidence must satisfy the following conditions:
> 1. The evidence of the bad act or other crime is relevant to a material issue raised at trial;
> 2. The bad act or crime is similar in kind and reasonably close in time to the crime charged;
> 3. There is sufficient evidence to support a finding by the jury that the defendant committed the other act or crime; and
> 4. The potential prejudice of the evidence does not substantially outweigh its probative value.

United States v. DeAngelo, 13 F.3d 1228, 1231 (8th Cir.) (citing United States v. Johnson, 934 F.2d 936, 939 (8th Cir.1991)), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 114 S.Ct. 2717, 129 L.Ed.2d 842 (1994).

Mr. Sutton contends that his prior drug use does not meet either the first or last part of this test. We agree, but find the error to be harmless.

The first part of our test under Rule 404(b) allows evidence of prior bad acts where it is used for purposes "such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident." The government argues that the evidence of Mr. Sutton's drug use showed a motive for the bank robbery. In other words, the government was attempting to show that he stole the money to support his drug habit. Although other circuits have allowed evidence of drug use to demonstrate motive to commit a bank robbery (see, e.g., United States v. Miranda, 986 F.2d 1283, 1285 (9th Cir.) (citing cases), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 2393, 124 L.Ed.2d 295 (1993)), we have never decided this precise issue.

This court has allowed evidence of other prior bad acts to show motive in a robbery case. United States v. Mays, 822 F.2d 793, 797 (8th Cir.1987). However, that case is readily distinguishable from the present case. First, in Mays we held that motive was a material issue in that case, although we did not explain why. Furthermore, the facts that were admitted as evidence of motive were also clearly relevant to the issue of identity, which is indisputably a material issue in a robbery case. [FN1] Id. at 797. Another distinction between this case and Mays is that in Mays the evidence of motive ("to secure enough funds to start a new life together") was offered as direct testimony by a co-conspirator. In this case, motive was not a material issue; the defendant did not put his motive in issue; there was no testimony by his co-conspirators about his motive; and the facts which the government used to show motive were not also relevant to identity. The government simply asked the jury to draw a raw inference about the defendant's motive from the fact that he used drugs. We decline to approve such a tenuous link.

> FN1. The evidence related to a previous bank robbery committed by defendant that was "similar enough to establish some identity between the robberies. Both banks were located in an isolated rural area; before both robberies a four-wheel drive vehicle was stolen and later abandoned; and in both robberies a .45 caliber automatic pistol was used." Id.

[3] Even if motive were a material issue in this robbery case and drug use were probative of it, the evidence would still fail the fourth part of our test, which is derived from the general requirement of Rule 403 that the prejudicial impact of the evidence should not substantially outweigh its probative value. The admission of evidence of prior wrongful acts creates a danger that the jury will convict the accused on the basis of bad character; thus, it is normally excluded under Rule 404. We cannot say that the slight probative value of knowing one possible motive for Mr. Sutton to commit a robbery outweighs the likely prejudicial effect on the jury of being told that the defendant was a crack-cocaine user. [FN2] In any event, it could hardly come as 1260 a surprise to the jury that Mr. Sutton was robbing a bank because he needed money for some reason. [FN3]

> FN2. There is a substantial split among the cases about whether this type of evidence should be admissible. See generally, Debra T. Landes, Annotation, Admissibility of Evidence of Accused's Drug Addiction or Use to Show Motive for Theft of Property Other Than Drugs, 2 A.L.R. 4th 1298 (1980). We think the better-reasoned cases exclude such evidence. See State v. LeFever, 102 Wash.2d 777, 690 P.2d 574 (1984) (Evidence of defendant's addiction to heroin, offered by prosecution to show motive for robbery, is inadmissible in that resulting prejudice overwhelmed any possible relevance or probativeness.); People v. Holt, 37 Cal.3d 436, 208 Cal.Rptr. 547, 554, 690 P.2d 1207, 1214 (1984) (Whatever probative value defendant's drug use might have had to show motive for robbery was outweighed by prejudicial value.).

> FN3. This brings to mind the story of a more famous bank robber with the same surname. When asked why he robbed banks, Willie Sutton replied, "That's where the money is."

[4] Although we believe that the admission of Mr. Sutton's prior drug use was erroneous, we nevertheless find the error to be harmless, because when viewed in the context of all the evidence presented at Mr. Sutton's trial, any possible prejudice that Mr. Sutton suffered was de minimis. For example, in Mr. Sutton's opening statement, his counsel referred to his association with drug dealers and how he broke into a cocaine dealer's home and stole $10,000. (Tr. [FN4] 35-36) This information was a crucial part of Mr. Sutton's defense, as it provided an alternative explanation for how Mr. Sutton came to have large amounts of cash just after the time of the bank robbery. However, these statements also gave the government the prerogative to explore on cross-examination the basis for his knowledge that there would be large amounts of cash in the drug dealer's house and the nature of his relationship with the drug dealer. Furthermore, testimony was presented that Mr. Sutton purchased large amounts of cocaine the day of the robbery. This evidence was properly admitted because it tended to establish a recent acquisition of wealth. We think Mr. Sutton's bad character was so thoroughly established by admissible evidence (including his own) that there is no likelihood that this additional bad character evidence would have influenced the outcome in this case.

FN4. Trial Transcript.

[5] Mr. Sutton also contends that the district court improperly precluded him from presenting a witness who would have testified to inconsistent statements made by one of the key prosecution witnesses, Mr. Smith. This testimony was not allowed because Mr. Smith was not given the opportunity to explain or deny having made a prior inconsistent statement while he was on the stand, which is normally the proper foundation for impeachment under Fed.R.Evid. 613(b). Mr. Sutton points out that the First Circuit has relaxed this requirement, requiring only that a witness be available to be recalled to explain inconsistent statements. United States v. Barrett, 539 F.2d 244, 254-56 (1st Cir.1976); United States v. Hudson, 970 F.2d 948, 955 (1st Cir.1992). However, this procedure is not mandatory, but is optional at the trial judge's discretion. Id. at 956 & n. 2. More to the point, since this circuit has never adopted the rule in Barrett, we cannot say that the district court abused its discretion in not applying it.

[6][7] Mr. Sutton has also challenged the sufficiency of the evidence. Accordingly, we must examine whether a rational trier of fact could have found the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. United States v. Fetlow, 21 F.3d 243, 247 (8th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom., Ferguson v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 115 S.Ct. 456, 130 L.Ed.2d 365 (1994). In examining such a claim, we view the evidence in the light most favorable to the government and resolve all evidentiary conflicts in favor of the government. United States v. Nelson, 984 F.2d 894, 899 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 2945, 124 L.Ed.2d 693 (1993).

The evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution, indicates that a man matching the description of Mr. Sutton robbed the Chisago City Bank. (Tr. 46). There were photographs taken by bank surveillance cameras which the jury viewed and compared to Mr. Sutton. There was also testimony that his Aunt and a police officer who knew him well identified him as the man in the photos. (Tr. 145, 158).

Further testimony demonstrated that Mr. Sutton had in his possession large quantities 1261 of cash later on the same day of the robbery. He used this money to purchase a car for $2500 in cash (Tr. 42) and $2400 worth of cocaine. (Tr. 261, 263, 265). Mr. Sutton provided conflicting and unsubstantiated claims for the origins of the money (Tr. 351, 378-79), but it is undisputed that he did not earn the money through legal gainful employment.

Furthermore, two admitted accomplices of Mr. Sutton implicated him in the crime and provided sufficient detail that the jury might rationally have found them credible. Although the accomplices had made plea bargains, the jury was properly instructed by the trial judge on this point. The inconsistencies in the accomplices' and eyewitnesses' testimony are minor and are easily explained by the rapidity and stress of the events. The bank tellers' inability to pick Mr. Sutton's photo out of a lineup may also be explained by the speed and stress of the event, plus the fact that the robber was wearing a hat and sunglasses. This weakness in the evidence was overcome by the independent identification by Mr. Sutton's aunt and the police officer.

After carefully reviewing the evidence presented in the light most favorable to the government, we conclude that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict.

Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation Rank(R) Page(P) Database Mode
12 F.3d 1436 R 10 OF 23 P 1 OF 41 CTA8 Page
(Cite as: 12 F.3d 1436)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Delano Romanus OAKIE, Defendant-Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Kirk Morin OAKIE, Defendant-Appellant.
Nos. 92-3268, 92-3622.
United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.
Submitted May 11, 1993.
Decided Dec. 17, 1993.
Rehearing and Suggestion for Rehearing
En Banc Denied Jan. 27, 1994 in No. 92-3622 and
Jan. 28, 1994 in No. 92-3268.

Two defendants were convicted in the United States District Court, District of South Dakota, Donald J. Porter, J., of assault with dangerous weapon, use of firearm during crime of violence, and assaulting federal officer with dangerous weapon, and one of the defendants was also convicted for being felon in possession of firearm. Defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, Loken, 920 (8th Cir.) (internal quotation omitted), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 980, 106 S.Ct. 382, 88 L.Ed.2d 336 (1985). In light of the other trial evidence and the impeachment evidence available to the government, we agree with the district court that the proffered testimony of Kirk Oakie did not meet this standard.

[12] Delano next contends that he was entitled to a severance because he and Kirk presented antagonistic defenses: Kirk Oakie's cross examination of Wallace Rooks characterized Kirk and Shane Oakie as "prisoners in that car," whereas Delano's defense was that he believed he was being chased by an enemy, rather than the police, and did not know his passengers were shooting at the pursuing vehicle. To warrant severance on this ground, the co-defendants' defenses must be more than inconsistent, they must be "actually irreconcilable." United States v. Mason, 982 F.2d 325, 328 (8th Cir.1993). Kirk and Delano presented different defenses, but they were not irreconcilable or even antagonistic.

The district court did not abuse its discretion in denying Delano Oakie's motion to sever.

[13][14] B. Prior Acts Evidence. Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence permits evidence of a defendant's "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" only for limited purposes and, if the defendant requests, only after reasonable notice of the general nature of any such evidence the prosecution intends to use. Delano requested such notice, and the government responded that it did not intend to introduce any Rule 404(b) evidence. During the government's case-in-chief, Wallace Rooks testified that he believed Delano drove away from the Avery residence because Delano "had some old warrants on him." In addition, the government impeached Shane Oakie with his statement to the grand jury that, "Delano said he had a warrant out for him and didn't want to get caught."

Delano argues that this was Rule 404(b) evidence that should have been excluded because of the government's failure to notify him of its intent to use it. We disagree.

Evidence which is probative of the crime charged ... is not "other crimes" evidence. Further, where the evidence of an act and the evidence of the crime charged are inextricably 1442 intertwined, the act is not extrinsic and Rule 404(b) is not implicated.

DeLuna, 763 F.2d at 913 (citations omitted). See also United States v. Bettelyoun, 892 F.2d 744, 746 (8th Cir.1989). In this case, evidence regarding why Delano turned the car around and fled explained the circumstances of the charged offense and was not Rule 404(b) evidence. Because this testimony was very brief and revealed no details concerning the outstanding warrants, it was not unduly prejudicial, and the district court did not abuse its discretion by admitting it.

V. Jury Instruction Issues.

404(b) notice not reqd where acts are "inextricably intertwined" with charged offenses.

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Michael Anthony SEVERE, Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Don Edward WITHERS, Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
James E. HOWARD, Jr., also known as Terence Terell Washington, Appellant.

Nos. 93-3744, 93-3746 and 93-3933.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted May 12, 1994.

Decided July 13, 1994.
Rehearing Denied
Aug. 17, 1994 in No. 93-3746.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, David S. Doty, J., of drug charges and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, Magill, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence sustained finding that defendants consented voluntarily to search of motel room, and (2) evidence sustained conviction.

Affirmed.

[1] SEARCHES AND SEIZURES ⇐ 194
349k194
To justify consensual search, government has burden of proving that individual voluntarily gave consent to search; issue of consent is question of fact that requires consideration of totality of circumstances.

[1] SEARCHES AND SEIZURES ⇐ 201
349k201
To justify consensual search, government has burden of proving that individual voluntarily gave consent to search; issue of consent is question of fact that requires consideration of totality of circumstances.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 1158(4)
110k1158(4)
District court's determination that defendant voluntarily gave consent to search is reviewed under clearly erroneous standard.

[3] SEARCHES AND SEIZURES ⇐ 183
349k183
Finding that defendant consented to search of motel room was supported by evidence that officers knocked on the door of the room and identified themselves as law enforcement officers, that they did not use force to enter the room, that they were invited into the room, that defendant and companion were not put under arrest and were informed that they could refuse consent and were free to leave, and that both defendant and companion read, considered, and signed written consent form, even though officers told defendant that search warrant would be obtained if defendant and his companion did not consent to search.

[3] SEARCHES AND SEIZURES ⇐ 184
349k184
Finding that defendant consented to search of motel room was supported by evidence that officers knocked on the door of the room and identified themselves as law enforcement officers, that they did not use force to enter the room, that they were invited into the room, that defendant and companion were not put under arrest and were informed that they could refuse consent and were free to leave, and that both defendant and companion read, considered, and signed written consent form, even though officers told defendant that search warrant would be obtained if defendant and his companion did not consent to search.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 1245(1)
110k1245(1)
District court could properly consider prior uncounseled misdemeanor convictions in determining defendant's criminal history score.

[5] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 369.2(3.1)
110k369.2(3.1)
Testimony by witness that defendants had delivered a kilogram of crack cocaine to her duplex on March 16 was not prior bad acts testimony requiring notice but, rather, was testimony concerning acts intertwined with the conspiracy charged in indictment which alleged that the conspiracy continued until on or about March 17. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[6] INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION

⊜ 87(7)
210k87(7)
Indictment was not impermissibly vague with respect to its allegations of dates even though testimony of coconspirator included events which occurred two weeks prior to the "on or about" date listed in the indictment, where defendant had notice that government would present evidence of earlier delivery of cocaine base.

[7] CONSPIRACY ⊜ 28(3)
91k28(3)
To establish conspiracy to distribute narcotics, government need not establish overt act but simply must prove that defendant entered into an agreement to distribute narcotics. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, § 406, 21 U.S.C.A. § 846.

[8] CONSPIRACY ⊜ 47(12)
91k47(12)
Defendant's conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base was supported by evidence that he and another person brought a kilogram of cocaine to duplex, that he and the other person broke the cocaine base into one ounce quantities using an electronic scale, and that his companion was then given over $10,000 in cash. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, § 406, 21 U.S.C.A. § 846.

[9] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 1026.10(4)
110k1026.10(4)
Defendant who entered into plea agreement acknowledging a minimum penalty of ten years' imprisonment and who had certain charges against him dropped waived right to challenge sentence on grounds that mandatory minimum sentence violated due process and equal protection. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 5.

445 Thomas J. O'Connor, Chaska, MN, argued, for appellant, Severe, Lee R. Johnson, Minneapolis, MN, argued, for appellant Withers, Patrick R. Townley, Minneapolis, MN, argued, for appellant Howard (Craig E. Cascarano, on the brief).

Jon M. Hopeman, Minneapolis, MN, argued (B. Todd Jones, on the brief), for appellee.

Before MAGILL, Circuit Judge, FLOYD R. GIBSON and JOHN R. GIBSON, Senior Circuit Judges.

MAGILL, Circuit Judge.

Michael Severe challenges his conviction and sentence for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base in violation of 21 U.S.C. §§ 841(a)(1) and 846 (1988), and aiding and abetting the distribution of cocaine base in violation of 21 U.S.C. §§ 841(a)(1) and 841(b)(1)(A). James Howard, Jr., challenges his conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base in violation of 21 U.S.C. §§ 841(a)(1) and 846. Don Edward Withers appeals the sentence imposed by the district court [FN1] after he pleaded guilty to possession with intent to distribute more than fifty grams of cocaine base in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1). We affirm.

FN1. The Honorable David S. Doty, United States District Judge for the District of Minnesota.

I. BACKGROUND

On March 16, 1993, Minneapolis police officers made arrangements to purchase two ounces of cocaine base through a confidential informant. In arranging this transaction, a call was placed to a duplex on North 6th Street (6th Street Duplex) in Minneapolis. Surveillance officers observed Craig Cage and Charles Nichols arrive by car at the 6th Street Duplex. Minutes later, Cage and Nichols met with the officers' confidential informant to complete the transaction.

The officers arrested Cage and Nichols and recovered a pager from Cage that continued to activate. The officers determined that the telephone number coming into the pager originated from Room 216 of the Budgetel Motel. The officers proceeded to the motel and found that Severe and Howard were the registered occupants of Room 216. The officers asked if they could search the room. Both Severe and Howard consented to the search and signed consent-to-search forms. The officers discovered over $10,000 cash, army fatigues, and a plane ticket to Los Angeles. Based on the call from Cage's pager and the items recovered from Room 216, the officers arrested Severe and Howard.

446 On March 17, 1993, officers executed a search warrant at an apartment located at 625 East 18th Street in Minneapolis. Avis Smith and Withers lived in this apartment. The officers recovered cash, a gun with ammunition, several pagers, and a small quantity of cocaine base. Later that day, the officers executed another search warrant at the 6th Street Duplex and recovered 800 grams of cocaine base. The officers later arrested Carlena Wilson, who was the resident of the 6th Street Duplex.

Prior to trial, Withers pleaded guilty to a single count of possession with intent to distribute more than fifty grams of cocaine base. Severe's and Howard's consolidated jury trials commenced in August 1993. Wilson testified on behalf of the government regarding her relationship with Severe and Howard. In particular, Wilson testified that on March 16, 1993, Severe and Howard delivered a kilogram of "crack cocaine" that the officers later recovered during their March 17 search of her 6th Street Duplex. Wilson also testified that Severe and Howard had delivered another kilogram of cocaine base to her 6th Street Duplex about two weeks before the March 16 delivery.

Cage corroborated Wilson's testimony that Severe and Howard had brought the kilogram of cocaine base to the 6th Street Duplex on March 16, 1993. Cage testified that Severe and Howard broke down the cocaine base into ounce quantities using a digital scale. Cage testified that Nichols gave Howard over $10,000 cash. Finally, Nichols, a defense witness, testified on cross-examination that Severe and Howard had brought the cocaine base to Wilson's 6th Street Duplex.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty against Severe and Howard. The district court sentenced Severe to 292 months' imprisonment, Howard to 188 months' imprisonment, and Withers to 120 months' imprisonment. Severe, Howard, and Withers appealed.

II. DISCUSSION

Severe argues that the district court improperly (1) determined that Severe and Howard voluntarily consented to the search of Room 216 of the Budgetel Motel, and (2) used prior uncounseled misdemeanors in calculating his criminal history score. Howard challenges (1) the district court's admission of Wilson's testimony based on Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) (Rule 404(b)), and (2) the sufficiency of the evidence to support the jury's verdict. Finally, Withers challenges his sentence based on the constitutionality of the 100 to 1 disparity between the sentences for cocaine base and cocaine. We address these claims in turn.

A. Severe's Conviction and Sentence

[1][2] To justify a consensual search, the government has the burden of proving that an individual voluntarily gave consent to search. United States v. Larson, 978 F.2d 1021, 1023 (8th Cir.1992). The issue of consent is a question of fact that requires consideration of the totality of the circumstances. United States v. Cortez, 935 F.2d 135, 142 (8th Cir.1991), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 945, 117 L.Ed.2d 114 (1992). We review a district court's determination that a defendant voluntarily gave consent to search under the clearly erroneous standard. Id.

[3] Examining the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that the district court's determination that Severe voluntarily consented to the search of Room 216 was not clearly erroneous. Severe relies heavily on the fact that the officers informed him that if he and Howard refused consent, the officers would obtain a search warrant. Hearing Tr. at 117. That, however, is only one factor in the totality of the circumstances inquiry. See Larson, 978 F.2d at 1023 ("When a person consents to a search after officers state they will attempt to obtain a warrant if the person does not consent, the consent is not necessarily coerced."). The totality of the circumstances supports the district court's determination that Severe voluntarily gave consent.

First, the officers knocked on the door of Room 216 and identified themselves as law enforcement officials. Hearing Tr. at 96-97. The officers did not use force to enter Room 216; rather, they were invited into the room. 447 Id. at 114. Severe and Howard were not put under arrest and were informed that they could refuse consent and were free to leave. Id. at 26, 97-98. Finally, Severe and Howard both read, considered, and signed a written consent form. Id. at 13, 99. We conclude that the district court's determination that Severe voluntarily consented to the search of Room 216 was not clearly erroneous. See Cortez, 935 F.2d at 142.

[4] Severe also claims that the district court erred when it considered three prior uncounseled misdemeanor convictions when it determined his criminal history score. At sentencing, Severe also sought to attack collaterally those misdemeanor convictions. In Nichols v. United States, the Supreme Court held that a district court properly could consider prior uncounseled misdemeanors in determining a defendant's criminal history score. --- U.S. ----, ----, 114 S.Ct. 1921, 1928, 128 L.Ed.2d 745 (1994); accord United States v. Thomas, 20 F.3d 817, 823 (8th Cir.1994) (en banc). Further, in United States v. Hewitt, this court held that a district court should include a defendant's prior convictions in his criminal history score unless the defendant demonstrates that the prior convictions were "previously ruled constitutionally invalid." 942 F.2d 1270, 1276 (8th Cir.1991). Nichols and Hewitt foreclose Severe's claim.

B. Howard's Conviction

Howard argues that the district court improperly admitted Wilson's testimony in violation of the notice requirements of Rule 404(b). We review a district court's decision to admit evidence for an abuse of discretion. United States v. Davis, 882 F.2d 1334, 1343 (8th Cir.1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1027, 110 S.Ct. 1472, 108 L.Ed.2d 610 (1990). Rule 404(b) allows admission of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or bad acts for purposes "such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) (emphasis added). However, "[w]here the evidence of an act and the evidence of a crime charged are inextricably intertwined, the act is not extrinsic and Rule 404(b) is not implicated." United States v. DeLuna, 763 F.2d 897, 913 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 980, 106 S.Ct. 382, 88 L.Ed.2d 336 (1985); see also United States v. Rankin, 902 F.2d 1344, 1346 (8th Cir.1990).

[5][6] We conclude that the district court properly admitted Wilson's testimony because that testimony concerned not prior acts, but acts intertwined with the conspiracy charged. The indictment charged Howard with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine base "continuing to on or about the 17th day of March, 1993." Severe's App. at 1. [FN2] Wilson, who was named as a coconspirator, testified that Howard and Severe delivered a kilogram of cocaine base to her residence in the beginning of March 1993. That evidence did not implicate Rule 404(b) because it tends to prove whether a conspiracy to distribute cocaine existed, and therefore is inextricably intertwined with the conspiracy charged. See DeLuna, 763 F.2d at 913; see also Rankin, 902 F.2d at 1346. Thus, we reject Howard's Rule 404(b) claim.

FN2. We have considered Howard's claim made at oral argument that the indictment was impermissibly vague because Wilson's testimony included events that occurred two weeks prior to the date listed in the indictment, and we conclude that it lacks merit. See United States v. Turner, 975 F.2d 490, 494 (8th Cir.1992), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 1053, 122 L.Ed.2d 360 (1993); see also United States v. Hallock, 941 F.2d 36, 40-41 (1st Cir.1991) (holding that absence of a statement of precise dates of a conspiracy does not necessarily render indictment impermissibly vague). Howard had notice that the government would present evidence of the earlier delivery of the cocaine base. Thus, any variance did not affect Howard's substantial rights or cause him actual prejudice. See United States v. Valentine, 984 F.2d 906, 911 (8th Cir.1993).

[7] Next, Howard argues that there was insufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict. In reviewing a jury verdict for sufficiency, we view the evidence in the light most favorable to the jury verdict; we accept all reasonable inferences supporting the conviction; and we must affirm the jury's verdict if substantial evidence supports it. United 448 States v. Gaines, 969 F.2d 692, 696 (8th Cir.1992). To establish a conspiracy to distribute narcotics, the government need not establish an overt act, but simply must prove that the defendants entered into an agreement to distribute narcotics. Id.

[8] Applying this deferential standard, we conclude that substantial evidence supports the jury's verdict. At trial, Cage testified that (1) Howard and Severe brought a kilogram of cocaine base to the 6th Street Duplex; (2) Howard and Severe broke the cocaine base into one-ounce quantities using an electronic scale; and (3) Nichols then gave Howard over $10,000 cash. The pager recovered from Cage led police to Room 216 of the Budgetel Motel. Howard and Severe, the residents of that room, consented to a search, and the officers discovered over $10,000 cash. On cross-examination, Nichols, a defense witness, admitted that Howard and Severe had delivered the cocaine base that was found in the 6th Street Duplex. We conclude that substantial evidence supports the jury's verdict.

C. Withers' Sentence

Finally, Withers challenges his mandatory minimum sentence for violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1) because the 100 to 1 disparity between violations involving cocaine base and cocaine violates due process and denies him equal protection.

[9] Withers, however, entered into a plea agreement in which he pleaded guilty to possession with intent to distribute in excess of fifty grams of cocaine base in violation of 21 U.S.C. §§ 841(a)(1) and 841(b)(1)(A). Plea Agreement at 2. Withers acknowledged in the plea agreement that the charge to which he had pleaded guilty had a minimum penalty of ten years' imprisonment. Id. In return, the government dropped the charges against Withers for (1) conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute more than one kilogram of cocaine base, and (2) using and carrying a firearm in relation to a drug trafficking crime. Id. " '[A] defendant who explicitly and voluntarily exposes himself to a specific sentence may not challenge that punishment on appeal.' " United States v. Durham, 963 F.2d 185, 187 (8th Cir.) (quoting United States v. Fritsch, 891 F.2d 667, 668 (8th Cir.1989)), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 662, 121 L.Ed.2d 587 (1992); accord United States v. Livingston, 1 F.3d 723, 725 (8th Cir.1993). Therefore, we conclude that Withers has waived the right to challenge his sentence.

III. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the judgments and sentences of the district court.

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation | Page(P) | Database | Mode
766 F.2d 1426 FOUND DOCUMENT | P 1 OF 67 | CTA | Page
18 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 1355
(Cite as: 766 F.2d 1426)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Graham Lee KENDALL, Defendant-Appellant.
No. 83-1908.
United States Court of Appeals,
Tenth Circuit.
July 3, 1985.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma, Ralph G. Thompson, J., of conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute and one count of violating the Traffic Act, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Seymour, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence supported convictions; (2) other acts evidence was admissible; and (3) pretrial disclosure by the government of the other acts evidence was not required.

Affirmed.

much larger conspiracy to fix horse races. The defendant had no other connection with any members of the conspiracy and was acquitted of the conspiracy charge. The court, in refusing to characterize this conduct as engaging in an illegal business enterprise, emphasized the one bet and the absence of any other participation by the defendant. Clearly, such conduct is more accurately described as casual, or sporadic, and thus not within the scope of the Travel Act.

IV.
Evidence of Other Wrongs

Kendall next argues that the trial court erred in admitting evidence of his alleged 1436 earlier crimes, wrongs, or acts. He contends that such evidence was not admissible to prove his character and did not come within any purpose permissible under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b); that even if relevant, the value of such evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, citing Fed.R.Evid. 403; and that the admission of such prejudicial evidence was an abuse of discretion requiring a new trial. Because the evidence was crucial to the Government's case against Kendall and because this claim raises serious evidentiary issues, we review the evidence and the actions of the trial court in detail.

[12][13] Rule 404(b) provides that "[e]vidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith." [FN5] Such evidence may be admitted for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident. Id.; United States v. Biswell, 700 F.2d 1310, 1317 (10th Cir.1983); United States v. Nolan, 551 F.2d 266, 270 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 904, 98 S.Ct. 302, 54 L.Ed.2d 191 (1977); United States v. Freeman, 514 F.2d 1184, 1189-90 (10th Cir.1975); United States v. Parker, 469 F.2d 884, 889 (10th Cir.1972). In Nolan, we enumerated some guidelines to test whether evidence of such crimes or acts should be admitted. The evidence (1) must tend to establish intent, knowledge, motive, identity, or absence of mistake or accident; (2) must also be so related to the charged offense that it serves to establish intent, knowledge, motive, identity, or absence of mistake or accident; and (3) must have real probative value, not just possible worth. 551 F.2d at 271. The uncharged crime or act must also be close in time to the crime charged. Id. at 272. See also United States v. Burkhart, 458 F.2d 201, 204 (10th Cir.1972) (en banc). This court has previously stated:

FN5. To fall within the scope of 404(b), an act need not be criminal, so long as it tends to impugn a defendant's character. United States v. Terebecki, 692 F.2d 1345, 1348 n. 2 (11th Cir.1982); United States v.

Beechum, 582 F.2d 898, 902 n. 1 (5th Cir.1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 920, 99 S.Ct. 1244, 59 L.Ed.2d 472 (1979); United States v. Cooper, 577 F.2d 1079, 1087-88 (6th Cir.1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 868, 99 S.Ct. 196, 58 L.Ed.2d 179 (1978).

"[E]ven relevant evidence should be excluded under Rule 403 'if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.' While trial courts have discretion in striking the balance between probative value and unfair prejudice, ... they must be particularly sensitive to the potential prejudice that is always inherent in evidence of an accused's prior uncharged crimes or wrongs.... Although Rule 403 provides broad umbrella protection from unfair or undue prejudice, the specific provision in Rule 404(a) prohibiting evidence of uncharged crimes to show bad character or tendencies toward criminality not only reflects the special danger of other crimes evidence but should alert trial courts to be particularly careful in admitting such evidence."
United States v. Carleo, 576 F.2d 846, 849 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 850, 99 S.Ct. 153, 58 L.Ed.2d 152 (1978) (citations omitted).
[14][15] In Biswell, we reviewed the problems associated with Rule 404(b) evidence and the standards governing its use. In an effort to ensure that such evidence is not used in an unfair or impermissible manner, we held that where evidence is offered under Rule 404(b), the Government bears the burden of showing how the proffered evidence is relevant to one or more issues in the case. 700 F.2d at 1317. The Biswell standard is clear. The Government must articulate precisely the evidentiary hypothesis by which a fact of consequence may be inferred from the evidence of other acts. In addition, the trial court must specifically identify the purpose for which such evidence is offered and a broad statement merely invoking or restating Rule 404(b) will not suffice. A specific articulation of the relevant purpose and specific inferences to be drawn from each proffer of evidence of other acts will enable the trial 1437 court to more accurately make an informed decision and weigh the probative value of such evidence against the risks of prejudice specified in Rule 403. This requirement is an attempt to ensure that a decision to admit or exclude be made only after issues and reasons are exposed and clearly stated. See id. at 1317 n. 5. In addition, specific and clear reasoning and findings in the trial record will greatly aid an appellate court in its review of these evidentiary issues.

Before trial, Kendall sought discovery of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or bad acts which the Government intended to present as evidence at trial. The trial court denied Kendall's request that the Government be ordered to produce such evidence before trial. The court, however, did enter a pretrial order prohibiting the Government from offering such evidence without prior court approval. The order stated, in pertinent part:

"The evidence here in dispute is governed by the provisions of Rule 404, Federal Rules of Evidence. While the government states that it does not know whether it will use such evidence, it is clear that the potential for prejudice by the improper admission of such evidence is sufficient to require the Court to carefully consider the reasons for which the evidence would be offered.

Accordingly, counsel for the government is prohibited from offering any evidence of prior or subsequent crimes, wrongs or bad acts, not charged in the indictment, without first informing the Court and counsel for the defense of the specific evidence to be offered so that the Court may consider the arguments of counsel, outside the presence of the jury, regarding the admissibility of said evidence."

Rec., vol. II, at 356.

[16] Kendall claims the first error occurred when, in direct contravention of the pretrial order, the Government elicited testimony concerning an earlier sale by Kendall of an airplane subsequently used in drug smuggling. On direct examination, Geittmann was asked about his involvement in a prior marijuana smuggling venture that resulted in his conviction in 1975. When asked the identity of the pilot and the source of the airplane used in that venture, Geittmann responded that he had financed the purchase through the pilot, and that the pilot had purchased the airplane from Kendall. Defense counsel promptly objected and moved for a mistrial. This motion was denied, but the trial court admonished the Government and, at the request of defense counsel, instructed the jury to disregard the testimony. The court agreed that the Government had violated the pretrial order, but concluded that the violation was an oversight that under the circumstances did not require a mistrial. Any potential prejudicial effect was minimized by the court's proper and timely admonition that the jurors disregard the testimony. There is no evidence that the Government's actions were more than an oversight and Kendall does not allege that the Government acted in bad faith. Reviewing the record as a whole, we conclude that the trial court correctly refused to declare a mistrial.

Kendall next argues that the court erred in admitting evidence of prior airplane sales by Kendall to Geittmann. Later in Geittmann's direct examination, after the Government complied with the pretrial order, Geittmann testified about two aircraft that he purchased from Kendall in 1982. Over defense objection, he testified that during the sale of the first aircraft, Kendall showed Geittmann that the aircraft had been "plumbed" to accommodate extra fuel, and that Kendall had personally demonstrated the plane and this special fuel feature to him. Finally, he testified that two weeks after this first sale he traded in the plane for a second identical model because "[it] was a little better outfitted ... it had 350 gallons of fuel built into it which would enable me to go just about anyplace I wanted to go in Central, South America." Rec., vol. X, at 584.

[17] Kendall argues that this is not Rule 404(b) evidence. At trial, the Government 1438 contended that the evidence of these sales and the manner in which the special fuel system was presented by Kendall was relevant to show that Kendall had dealt with Geittmann before meeting Callihan; that Kendall knew Geittmann and the nature of his business; and that the plane had been prepared and could be used for smuggling purposes. The trial court concluded that these reasons justified admission of the evidence under Rule 404(b). We agree that the evidence is within the scope of Rule 404(b) and that the Government made a sufficient showing of the purpose for, and inferences to be drawn from, the evidence. The sales were close in time to Kendall's introduction of Callihan to Geittmann, and the testimony concerning the two sales had real probative value. The evidence is relevant to whether Kendall knew of Geittmann's activities and needs, from which a jury could infer the critical element of Kendall's intent and knowledge in introducing Callihan to Geittmann. It thus meets the requirements for Rule 404(b) evidence set forth in Nolan. In addition, the Government's explanation and the trial court's findings in the record were sufficiently explicit and clear within the meaning of Biswell. The trial court did not err in admitting this evidence.

Kendall next argues that the court erred in admitting evidence of Kendall's request that Geittmann check the status of Callihan's plane in Mexico. Over defense counsel's objection, Geittmann testified that in July or August 1982, Kendall asked him to check the airplane's tail registration numbers in Mexico. Geittmann stated that "[h]e told me the aircraft had been fired upon on one of the beaches south of Mazatlan. They were down there to pick up some marijuana. And he wanted to know if the plane was hot, if the Mexican police had gotten the numbers off the tail and if they were looking for it." Rec., vol. X, at 606. The Government complied with the pretrial order and offered its reasons for admission prior to the testimony. The Government claimed that "it shows knowledge, aiding and assisting by Mr. Kendall of Mr. Callihan in this particular venture, and that if this plane was hot, then it could not fly into Cancun for this particular venture". Rec., vol. X, at 603. The trial court agreed that the evidence was within Rule 404(b), and while acknowledging that the evidence might be damaging to Kendall, nevertheless found that it was not sufficiently prejudicial to require exclusion. The court also gave an appropriate limiting instruction to the jury.

[18] On appeal, Kendall argues that this evidence did not meet the Rule 404(b) foundation requirements and that any probative value was outweighed by the risk of substantial prejudice. We disagree. The conversation took place shortly before Kendall introduced Callihan to Geittmann. The evidence is relevant to prove that Kendall knew about Callihan's and Carr's smuggling activities and plans; that Kendall aided and assisted them in preparing for and furthering these plans; that Kendall knew how they were using their airplane; and that Kendall knew of both Geittmann's influence in Mexico and his involvement in smuggling activities. This proof is relevant to the issue of Kendall's knowledge of, and participation in, the conspiracies charged. The evidence meets the requirements of Nolan. The Government's explanation and the trial court's findings and actions were sufficiently explicit and clear to comply with Biswell.

[19] Kendall next claims that error occurred when the Government asked Geittmann about a conversation with Kendall concerning an aircraft that Kendall owned and that had been seized in Mexico. Kendall argues that this evidence of prior acts is impermissible character evidence, does not fall within Rule 404(b), and was substantially prejudicial. We are not persuaded. Earlier, on direct examination, Geittmann had testified about a prior business relationship with Kendall, in which Geittmann had assisted Kendall in trying to recover a C-46 aircraft from Mexico. This testimony occurred at a point in the trial when the prosecution was attempting to establish the extent of prior dealings between 1439 Kendall and Geittmann. In describing his efforts to free the plane, Geittmann stated, "I'm sure it's still down there where it had been seized or where it had been taken to after it was seized." Rec., vol. X, at 607. Defense counsel did not object to this testimony.

On redirect examination, Geittmann elaborated on the details of this seizure, and testified that Kendall told him the plane had been seized because it was carrying contraband electronics from the United States to Mexico. Although Kendall now challenges this testimony, he did not object at trial. Furthermore, Kendall's defense counsel, on recross-examination of Geittmann, persisted in discussing and explaining the events surrounding the seizure, stressing that the activities, while illegal in Mexico, were not illegal in the United States. Later, on direct examination, Kendall himself testified that the plane had violated Mexican law and had been confiscated, and that he tried to use Geittmann to recover it. On cross-examination of Kendall, the Government, over objection, attempted to inquire further into the events surrounding the aircraft's seizure. Kendall admitted that he knew that the aircraft was being used for illegal purposes, that he and Geittmann had attempted to recover the plane by bribing certain officials, and that he had relied on Geittmann to make the bribe payments.

Kendall's own testimony about the seizure on direct and cross-examination does not pose a Rule 404(b) problem. Through his counsel, Kendall raised the issue of his own knowledge of, and participation in, the events surrounding the contraband seizure of the plane. Having thus raised this issue, he cannot complain now about the Government's cross-examination in this area.

The question is whether Geittmann's direct examination testimony concerning these events is admissible under Rule 404(b). The trial court concluded that this evidence qualified under Rule 404(b) as relevant to show Kendall's motive and lack of mistake or accident. The events surrounding the aircraft seizure occurred shortly before Kendall introduced Callihan to Geittmann. This evidence showed that Kendall, faced with the loss of a plane for carrying contraband, chose to enlist the aid of Geittmann. There was evidence introduced to show Geittmann's influential contacts with certain Mexican officials and his ability to engage in illicit activities in Mexico. This ability and influence was crucial to Geittmann's success as a drug smuggler. The extent to which Kendall knew of and relied on Geittmann's illicit influence is relevant to the issues of Kendall's knowledge of Geittmann's activities, Kendall's motives for dealing with and later assisting Geittmann, and the lack of mistake or accident by Kendall when he introduced Callihan to Geittmann. As we stated earlier, these issues were central to the conspiracy charges against Kendall. The requirements of Nolan and Biswell were met.

There was also no abuse of discretion when the trial court concluded that the evidence was not so prejudicial as to bar its admission under Rule 403. While Geittmann's testimony was certainly damaging to Kendall, its probative value sufficiently outweighed any potential prejudicial impact. Kendall's defense counsel chose to pursue the inquiry and focus attention on the seizure while examining both Geittmann and Kendall, and Kendall was acquitted on the charge of conspiring to import marijuana. We are not persuaded that Geittmann's initial testimony was so prejudicial that its admission constitutes reversible error. The evidence was properly admitted.

[20] Finally, Kendall claims that the prosecution committed reversible error in its closing argument when it referred to the aircraft seizure in Mexico as being related to "smuggling." Rec., vol. XII, at 955. The trial court overruled defense counsel's objection that the term "smuggling" had no foundation in the record. On appeal, Kendall argues that this comment caused incurable damage and was highly prejudicial. We disagree. While Geittmann and Kendall never used the term 1440 "smuggling" when describing the aircraft seizure in Mexico, there was ample testimony by both that the plane was carrying contraband into Mexico illegally. The prosecution's use of the term "smuggling" was thus based on a sufficient evidentiary foundation in the record. See United States v. Perez, 493 F.2d 1339, 1343 (10th Cir.1974); cf. Marks v. United States, 260 F.2d 377, 383 (10th Cir.1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 929, 79 S.Ct. 315, 3 L.Ed.2d 302 (1959).

[21] Moreover, not all improper comments require a new trial or reversal on appeal. It is only when a remark could have influenced the jury's verdict and the trial court failed to take appropriate steps to remove it from the jury's consideration that there is reversible error. Devine v. United States, 403 F.2d 93, 96 (10th Cir.1968), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 1003, 89 S.Ct. 1599, 22

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff, Appellee,
v.
Hector H. TUESTA-TORO, Defendant, Appellant.

No. 93-2182.

United States Court of Appeals,
First Circuit.

Heard June 7, 1994.

Decided July 25, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, Hector M. Laffitte, J., of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, carrying firearm during drug trafficking offense, and using communication facility to facilitate drug trafficking scheme. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Cyr, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) defendant's omnibus pretrial motion was not sufficient to trigger government's responsibility to disclose "other wrongful acts" evidence as precondition to its use at trial; (2) admission of defendant's prior drug dealing was not plain error; (3) evidence supported conviction on use of communication facility counts; (4) admission of hearsay testimony was harmless error; and (5) evidence supported sentence enhancement for managerial role in offense.

Affirmed.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 374
110k374
In order to trigger government's responsibility to disclose "other wrongful acts" evidence as precondition to its use at trial, defendant's pretrial request, at minimum, must be sufficiently clear and particular, in objective sense, to alert prosecution that defense is invoking its specific right to pretrial notification of general nature of "other wrongful acts" evidence government intends to introduce. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 374
110k374
Defendant's omnibus pretrial motion seeking "confessions, admissions and statements" that "in any way exculpate, inculpate or refer to the defendant" was not sufficient to trigger government's responsibility to disclose "other wrongful acts" evidence as precondition to its use at trial; motion made no discernible reference to "other wrongful acts" evidence and did not request mere notification of general nature of any such evidence. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1036.1(8)
110k1036.1(8)
Rulings regarding admissibility of "other wrongful acts" evidence are normally reviewed for abuse of discretion, but, where defendant makes no contemporaneous objection, Court of Appeals reviews for plain error and will reverse only if error seriously affected fundamental fairness and basic integrity of proceedings. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1153(1)
110k1153(1)
Rulings regarding admissibility of "other wrongful acts" evidence are normally reviewed for abuse of discretion, but, where defendant makes no contemporaneous objection, Court of Appeals reviews for plain error and will reverse only if error seriously affected fundamental fairness and basic integrity of proceedings. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1036.1(8)
110k1036.1(8)
Admission of evidence of defendant's prior drug dealings was not plain error; evidence was admitted for limited purpose of refuting defendant's "mere presence" defense, that he was present by mistake at scene of drug transaction giving rise to charges at issue, and district court minimized any potential for prejudice with contemporaneous limiting instruction, which it reiterated in final charge. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[5] TELECOMMUNICATIONS ⚿ 363
372k363
Conviction for two counts of use of communication facility to facilitate felonious drug offense was supported by codefendant's testimony that he telephoned defendant twice to arrange time and place at which cocaine transaction would occur, as well as price and quantity of cocaine. Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, § 403(b), 21 U.S.C.A. § 843(b).

[6] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 419(1.5)
110k419(1.5)
Drug enforcement agent's testimony that during debriefing session confidential informant stated that codefendant acted in behalf of defendant in setting up cocaine deals was hearsay; testimony was offered for sole purpose of proving truth of matter asserted, that is, defendant's role in offense, rather than as background information. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 801, 28 U.S.C.A.

[7] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1169.2(6)
110k1169.2(6)
Error in admitting drug enforcement agent's hearsay testimony that during debriefing session confidential informant stated that codefendant acted in behalf of defendant in setting up cocaine deals was harmless; testimony was cumulative of codefendant's testimony on same matter, and independent admissible evidence confirmed that defendant determined conditions of sale, supplied cocaine, and witnessed cocaine exchange from nearby while in possession of loaded firearm.

[8] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1134(3)
110k1134(3)
Court of Appeals addresses ineffectiveness of counsel claims on direct appeal only if critical facts are not in dispute and sufficiently developed record exists. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 6.

[9] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 997.5
110k997.5
Ordinarily, collateral proceeding to vacate sentence is proper forum for fact-bound ineffective assistance of counsel claims. 28 U.S.C.A. § 2255; U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 6.

[10] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1035(7)
110k1035(7)
Court of Appeals would not consider ineffective assistance of counsel claim raised on direct appeal; defendant's contention that trial counsel inexplicably failed to discover identity of confidential informant was not raised in district court and was sufficiently fact-bound to preclude effective review on present record. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 6.

[10] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1119(1)
110k1119(1)
Court of Appeals would not consider ineffective assistance of counsel claim raised on direct appeal; defendant's contention that trial counsel inexplicably failed to discover identity of confidential informant was not raised in district court and was sufficiently fact-bound to preclude effective review on present record. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 6.

[11] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1037.1(1)
110k1037.1(1)
In absence of contemporaneous objection, Court of Appeals reviews allegations of prosecutorial misconduct for plain error and will overturn jury verdict only if government's closing argument so "poisoned the well" that it is likely that verdict was affected.

[12] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1037.1(2)
110k1037.1(2)
Prosecutor's statement in closing argument that "when a person repents and wants to cooperate, we need to present the testimony to the jury so that the jury has the facts at hand" was not plain error, notwithstanding contention that prosecutor improperly vouched for codefendant's credibility; any vouching which might have occurred was so faint as to be virtually indiscernible even to trained ear, and, thus, there was no likelihood that verdicts were tainted by alleged prosecutorial misconduct.

[13] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1252
110k1252
District court could deny sentence reduction for acceptance of responsibility, notwithstanding contention that court did not afford defendant adequate opportunity to evince remorse; defendant continued to assert his innocence during postconviction interview with probation officer, district court twice invited defendant at sentencing to accept responsibility by pointing out that sentencing hearing would be his last opportunity to do so, and, though defendant asked court for leniency, he said nothing which might be taken to indicate remorse. U.S.S.G. § 3E1.1, 18 U.S.C.A.App.

[14] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1313(2)
110k1313(2)
For sentence enhancement purposes, defendant's role in offense must be established by preponderance of evidence. U.S.S.G. § 3B1.1, 18 U.S.C.A.App.

[15] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1158(1)
110k1158(1)
Sentencing court's factual findings are reviewed only for clear error.

[16] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1251
110k1251
Exercise of decision-making authority, degree of participation in planning or organizing offense, and degree of control and authority defendant exercised over others are among factors to be considered in determining managerial role in offense for sentence enhancement purposes. U.S.S.G. § 3B1.1, 18 U.S.C.A.App.

[17] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1251
110k1251
Finding, for purposes of sentence enhancement, that defendant performed managerial role in drug trafficking offense was supported by evidence that codefendant acted at defendant's direction in setting time and place of transaction and price and quantity of cocaine and by evidence of unusual purity of cocaine, which was 98% pure, which defendant supplied to codefendant. U.S.S.G. § 3B1.1, 18 U.S.C.A.App.

773 Kevin G. Little, Los Angeles, CA, for appellant.

Jose A. Quiles Espinosa, Sr. Litigation Counsel, Hato Rey, PR, with whom Guillermo Gil, U.S. Atty., Washington, DC, and Warren Vazquez, Asst. U.S. Atty., Hato Rey, PR, were on brief, for appellee.

Before SELYA, CYR and BOUDIN, Circuit Judges.

CYR, Circuit Judge.

Following a three-day trial, a jury returned guilty verdicts on four drug-related charges against defendant-appellant Hector H. Tuesta Toro ("Tuesta"), who was sentenced to serve 128 months in prison, and this appeal ensued. Finding no reversible error, we affirm.

I
FACTS

We set out the salient facts in the light most favorable to the verdicts. United States v. Tejeda, 974 F.2d 210, 212 (1st Cir.1992). On September 2, 1992, after receiving information from a confidential informant ("CI") that Tuesta and codefendant Carlos Martinez Diaz ("Martinez") were distributing large quantities of cocaine in the San Juan metropolitan area, the United States Drug Enforcement Administration ("DEA") recorded telephone conversations during which Martinez agreed to sell the CI five kilograms of cocaine at $16,500 per kilogram and identified Tuesta as his source. Martinez in turn spoke with Tuesta by cellular phone in order to establish the price and quantity of the cocaine to be sold to the CI and the site of the drug transaction, but then lost phone contact with Tuesta.

The next day Martinez advised the CI by phone that a one-kilogram transaction (rather than the five-kilogram transaction discussed the day before) would take place that afternoon, but that Tuesta did not wish to be seen by the buyer. Martinez reestablished telephone contact with Tuesta at 2:40 in the afternoon. En route to the scene of the transaction, Martinez noted that Tuesta was carrying a gun and more than one kilogram of cocaine. At Tuesta's instruction, Martinez parked their vehicle so that Tuesta could witness the drug deal without being observed. Martinez then exited the car and delivered the cocaine to the CI, who was accompanied by an undercover DEA agent.

Shortly thereafter, Martinez and Tuesta were arrested and charged with possessing cocaine, with intent to distribute, see 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1), 18 U.S.C. § 2; carrying a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking offense, see id. §§ 942(c)(1), 2; and with two counts of using a communication facility to facilitate a drug trafficking offense, see 21 U.S.C. § 843(b), 18 U.S.C. § 2. Martinez eventually entered into a plea agreement with the government and testified against Tuesta at trial. Following Tuesta's conviction on all counts, he was sentenced to 128 months' imprisonment.

II
DISCUSSION

A. Evidence Rule 404(b)

Prior to trial, Tuesta filed an omnibus motion to compel discovery which included the following request:

> [a]ll confessions, admissions and statements to the United States Attorney, or any law enforcement agent, made by any other person, whether indicted or not, that in any way exculpate, inculpate or refer to the defendant, whether or not such confessions, admissions and statements have been reduced to writing.

(Emphasis added.) The motion made no mention of Rule 404(b) or "other wrongful acts" evidence.

The government responded that it intended to pursue an "open file" discovery policy and that only government agents would be called to testify against Tuesta. Following the government's response, however, Martinez entered into a plea agreement which provided that he would testify against Tuesta. 774 Except as discussed below, Tuesta did not claim surprise.

At trial, the defense objected when the government asked Martinez how he knew Tuesta. The government responded that Martinez would testify to prior drug dealings with Tuesta. Tuesta objected on the ground that he had not been afforded pretrial notification of the government's intention to use Rule 404(b) evidence. The court admitted the evidence for the limited purpose of refuting Tuesta's "mere presence" defense, see United States v. Hernandez, 995 F.2d 307, 314 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 114 S.Ct. 407, 126 L.Ed.2d 354 (1993), after ruling that its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, see Fed.R.Evid. 403. The court, acting sua sponte, gave the jury a contemporaneous limiting instruction.

1. The Notification Requirement of Rule 404(b)

Tuesta first contends that the "other wrongful acts" evidence introduced through codefendant Martinez should have been excluded because the government failed to provide the pretrial notification required by Evidence Rule 404(b) in response to Tuesta's omnibus motion for discovery. The government maintains that Tuesta made no cognizable Rule 404(b) request prior to trial.

[1] The question presented is one of first impression: how particular must a pretrial discovery request be in order to trigger the government's responsibility to disclose Rule 404(b) evidence as a precondition to its use at trial? Rule 404(b), as amended in 1991, provides in relevant part:

> Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial ... of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) (emphasis added). As the rule speaks only of a "request by the accused" and the duty of the prosecution to provide reasonable pretrial notification "of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial," id., we turn elsewhere for guidance.

The advisory committee's notes to the 1991 amendment define the responsibilities of the respective parties in requesting and affording pretrial notification under Rule 404(b): "The amendment to Rule 404(b).... expects that counsel for ... the defense ... will submit the necessary request ... in a reasonable and timely manner." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) advisory committee's notes (1991 amendment) (emphasis added). The advisory committee note simply confirms the requirement implicit in the rule itself--that the defense must submit, "in a reasonable and timely manner," its request for pretrial notification of the general nature of any evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts the government intends to introduce at trial for purposes of proving "motive, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity or absence of mistake or accident," Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). We think it beyond question, therefore, that a "reasonable" request for notification, at a minimum, must be sufficiently clear and particular, in an objective sense, fairly to alert the prosecution that the defense is requesting pretrial notification of the general nature of any Rule 404(b) evidence the prosecution intends to introduce.

[2] An overbroad pretrial request, like the present--for "confessions, admissions and statements ... that in any way exculpate, inculpate or refer to the defendant"--is insufficiently specific at the very least, if not misleading. Cf. United States v. Carrasquillo-Plaza, 873 F.2d 10, 12 (1st Cir.1989) (noting that overbroad discovery requests, absent a specific showing of materiality, do not afford the prosecution proper notice in analogous Rule 16 context); United States v. Hemmer, 729 F.2d 10, 14-15 (1st Cir.) (same), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1218, 104 S.Ct. 2666, 81 L.Ed.2d 371 (1984). The omnibus motion submitted by Tuesta made no discernible reference to anything resembling "other 775 wrongful acts" evidence nor did it request mere notification of the general nature of any such evidence. Rather, it demanded outright pretrial disclosure of statements in any form, referring to the defendant in any way, without regard to their admissibility or the government's intention to introduce them. [FN1] See Fed.R.Evid. 404(b); cf., United States v. Williams, 792 F.Supp. 1120, 1133 (S.D.Ind.1992) (notification required in response to detailed request reciting text of Rule 404(b)); United States v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 728 (N.D.Ill.1992) (similar; request specifically referencing Rule 404(b)).

> FN1. As a further condition precedent to the government's duty, we note that Rule 404(b) seemingly requires pretrial notification only of "other wrongful acts" evidence which the government presently intends, as of the time the government responds to the request, to introduce at trial. The present appeal neither requires that we determine the point nor consider its ramifications.

Accordingly, at a minimum the defense must present a timely request sufficiently clear and particular, in an objective sense, to fairly alert the prosecution that the defense is invoking its specific right to pretrial notification of the general nature of all Rule 404(b) evidence the prosecution intends to introduce at trial. The rule we describe will bring pretrial practice under Rule 404(b) in line with circuit precedent governing the prosecution's duty to provide discovery material under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16. Cf. Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) advisory committee's notes (1991 amendment) (noting that amended rule "places Rule 404(b) in the mainstream with notice and disclosure provisions in other rules of evidence" but was not intended to impose on government a greater disclosure burden than "currently ... required ... under [Fed.R.Crim.P.] 16") (emphasis added). See also supra note 1.

2. Admission of 404(b) Evidence at Trial

[3] Next, Tuesta contends that it was reversible error to admit the Martinez testimony to rebut Tuesta's "mere presence" defense. These evidentiary rulings normally are reviewed for abuse of discretion. United States v. Figueroa, 976 F.2d 1446, 1454 (1st Cir.1992), cert. denied, --- U.S. ---, 113 S.Ct. 1346, 122 L.Ed.2d 728 (1993). As Tuesta made no contemporaneous objection, however, we review for "plain error," id. at 1453, and will reverse only if the error "seriously affect[ed] the fundamental fairness and basic integrity of the proceedings," United States v. Carty, 993 F.2d 1005, 1012 n. 9 (1st Cir.1993).

[4] A Rule 404(b) proffer must undergo a two-step inquiry:

> First, under the "absolute bar" of Rule 404(b), the evidence is inadmissible if relevant solely to show the defendant's character or propensity for criminal conduct; it must have some "special relevance" to a material issue such as motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan or knowledge. Second, under Rule 403, the trial court must satisfy itself that the probative value of the evidence is not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion or undue delay.

Id. at 1011 (citations omitted). The district court admitted the Martinez testimony relating to prior drug deals with Tuesta for the limited purpose of refuting Tuesta's "mere presence" defense that he was at the drug scene by "mistake." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) (evidence admissible to prove, inter alia, knowledge, intent, absence of mistake); Carty, 993 F.2d at 1011 (prior drug-dealing evidence admitted where defendant raised "mere presence" defense); United States v. Agudelo, 988 F.2d 285, 287 (1st Cir.1993) (same). Further, after the district court ruled that the probative value of the evidence outweighed any "danger of unfair prejudice," Fed.R.Evid. 403, it minimized the potential for prejudice with a contemporaneous limiting instruction, which it reiterated in the final charge. See Tejeda, 974 F.2d at 214. We discern no error, plain or otherwise.

B. Use of Communication Facility to Effect Drug Crime

Tuesta challenges the guilty verdicts on counts three and four, on the grounds that the district court misinterpreted 18 U.S.C. § 2 and that there was insufficient evidence that he aided and abetted Martinez in the use of a communication facility to effect the 776 cocaine transaction, see 21 U.S.C. § 843(b). We disagree.

Section 843(b) prohibits use of a communication facility to cause or facilitate a felonious drug offense. See United States v. Cordero, 668 F.2d 32, 43 (1st Cir.1981). Tuesta's challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence requires that "[w]e view the evidence in the light most favorable to the verdict, in order to determine whether a rational trier of fact could have found guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. All reasonable inferences are drawn in favor of the verdict and any credibility determination must be compatible with the judgment of conviction." Tejeda, 974 F.2d at 212 (citations omitted).

[5] The jury was entitled to credit Martinez's testimony that he telephoned Tuesta, on September 2 and 3, 1992, to arrange the time and place at which the cocaine transaction would occur, as well as the price and quantity of cocaine. No more was required. Thus, even if Tuesta had played no part in the two telephone conversations between Martinez and the CI, the jury rationally could have inferred, from the two telephone conversations between Martinez and Tuesta, that Tuesta knowingly used a communication facility to effect the cocaine deal. [FN2]

> FN2. Since the indictment, as well as the jury instruction on the section 843(b) charges, encompassed Tuesta's conduct as a principal and as an aider and abettor, we need not address his contention that he could not be convicted under 18 U.S.C. § 2 because there was no evidence that he instructed Martinez to use a communication device to arrange the cocaine sale.

C. "Background" Hearsay

A DEA agent testified that during a debriefing session the CI stated that Martinez acted in behalf of Tuesta in setting up cocaine deals. Tuesta contends that admission of this hearsay testimony, over timely objection, was error. We agree.

[6][7] As the government conceded at oral argument, the agent's testimony purported to relate an out-of-court statement by the CI offered for the sole purpose of proving the truth of the matter asserted (i.e., Tuesta's role in the instant offenses). See Fed.R.Evid. 801; cf. Figueroa, 976 F.2d at 1458 (noting that so-called "background" hearsay is not hearsay at all unless introduced to prove the truth of the matter asserted). Thus, its admission constituted error. We conclude, however, that the error was harmless. See id.

First, the testimony was cumulative of Martinez's testimony on the same matter. Further, independent admissible evidence confirmed that Tuesta determined the conditions of sale, supplied the cocaine, and witnessed the cocaine exchange from nearby while in possession of a loaded firearm. Thus, "we can say 'with fair assurance, after pondering all that happened without stripping the erroneous action from the whole, that the [jurors'] judgment was not substantially swayed by the error.' " Id. at 1459 (quoting Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 765, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 1248, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1946) ("harmless error" standard)).

D. Ineffective Assistance of Counsel

[8][9][10] Next, Tuesta attempts to present an "ineffective assistance" claim on direct appeal. As a general rule, we address such Sixth Amendment claims on direct appeal only if "the critical facts are not in dispute and a sufficiently developed record exists." United States v. Jadusingh, 12 F.3d 1162, 1169 (1st Cir.1994) (citing United States v. Daniels, 3 F.3d 25, 26-27 (1st Cir.1993)). Ordinarily, a collateral proceeding under 28 U.S.C. § 2255 is the proper forum for fact-bound ineffective assistance claims. See Jadusingh, 12 F.3d at 1170. Tuesta's contention that trial counsel inexplicably failed to discover the identity of the CI was not raised in the district court and is sufficiently fact-bound to preclude effective review on the present record.

E. Prosecutorial Misconduct

[11][12] Tuesta contends that the prosecution improperly vouched for Martinez's testimony during its closing argument. [FN3] In the absence of a contemporaneous objection, we 777 review allegations of prosecutorial misconduct for plain error, and will overturn a jury verdict only "if the government's closing argument 'so poisoned the well' that it is likely that the verdict was affected." United States v. Smith, 982 F.2d 681, 682 (1st Cir.1993) (citing United States v. Mejia-Lozano, 829 F.2d 268, 274 (1st Cir.1987)). Any vouching which may have occurred was so faint as to be virtually indiscernible even to the trained ear. We are confident that there is no likelihood that the verdicts were tainted by the alleged prosecutorial misconduct. Id.

FN3. Tuesta argues that the prosecutor improperly vouched for Martinez's credibility by stating that "when a person repents and wants to cooperate, we need to present the testimony to the jury so that the jury has the facts at hand." Although he states that there was no evidence that Martinez approached the government and offered to testify, Tuesta concedes that evidence was presented that the plea agreement did not require Martinez to testify. Second, Tuesta contends that the prosecutor's reference to "the facts at hand" placed the government's prestige behind Martinez.

F. Cumulative Error

As most assignments of error were baseless, we must also reject Tuesta's final contention that the conviction was tainted by cumulative error. See United States v. Barnett, 989 F.2d 546, 560 (1st Cir.) ("The Constitution entitles a criminal defendant to a fair trial, not a perfect one.") (citing Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 681, 106 S.Ct. 1431, 1436, 89 L.Ed.2d 674 (1986)), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 114 S.Ct. 148, 126 L.Ed.2d 110 (1993).

G. Sentencing Error

1. Acceptance of Responsibility

[13] Tuesta argues that the district court improperly denied a reduction for acceptance of responsibility, see U.S.S.G. § 3E1.1, without affording him an adequate opportunity to evince remorse.

Tuesta distorts the record. He continued to assert his innocence during a post-conviction interview with the probation officer. At sentencing, the district court twice invited him to accept responsibility, by pointing out that the sentencing hearing would be his last opportunity to do so. [FN4] Nonetheless, though Tuesta asked the court for leniency, he said nothing which might be taken to indicate remorse. Thus, he squandered several opportunities to verbalize acceptance of responsibility, leaving the district court little choice but to adopt a presentence report recommendation that no reduction be allowed. There was no error.

FN4. Prior to Tuesta's allocution, the court stated: "I haven't heard any acceptance of responsibility." Moments later, the court said: "Well, you can say some things that may be able to help you; but if you don't say them ... that's up to you."

2. Sentencing Enhancement for Managerial Role

[14][15] Finally, Tuesta challenges the two-level enhancement imposed for his managerial role in the offense, see U.S.S.G. § 3B1.1 (1993), which the district court premised in part upon the unusual purity of the cocaine supplied by Tuesta. A defendant's role in the offense must be established by a preponderance of the evidence, see United States v. Sostre, 967 F.2d 728, 731 (1st Cir.1992), and the sentencing court's factual findings are reviewed only for clear error, Jadusingh, 12 F.3d at 1169.

[16][17] The exercise of decision-making authority, the degree of participation in planning or organizing the offense, and the degree of control and authority the defendant exercised over others are among the factors to be considered in determining managerial role. See U.S.S.G. § 3B1.1, comment (n. 4). The record is replete with evidence that Martinez acted at the direction of Tuesta in setting the time and place of the drug transaction, and the price and quantity of the cocaine. United States v. Cronin, 990 F.2d 663, 665 (1st Cir.1993) (noting that such evidence supports finding of managerial role.) Additionally, the district court properly relied on the unusual purity of the cocaine (98%) Tuesta supplied to Martinez, as a further ground for inferring that Tuesta performed a managerial role. See United States v. Iguaran-Palmar, 926 F.2d 7, 9 (1st Cir.1991). There was no error.

The judgment is affirmed.

END OF DOCUMENT

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Bernard C. BIRCH, Jr., aka Chubby, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 93-3348.

United States Court of Appeals,
Tenth Circuit.

Nov. 3, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Kansas, Patrick F. Kelly, Chief Judge, of assault on federal officer and possession of firearm during violent crime. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, Tacha, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing courtroom demonstration of defendant's version of shooting; (2) district court abused its discretion in allowing prosecution to present evidence of defendant's two previous convictions for battery on law enforcement officer, but error was harmless in light of significant evidence of defendant's guilt; (3) defendant's placement into custody of state secretary of social and rehabilitation services at time defendant was juvenile was "confinement" within meaning of sentencing guideline providing for assessment of criminal history points for juvenile convictions; and (4) orders committing defendant, when juvenile, to such custody were properly considered sentences to confinement of "at least 60 days," for purposes of that guideline.

Affirmed.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 650
110k650
Trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing courtroom demonstration of defendant's version of shooting, in which chairs were placed side-by-side simulating front seat of car and defendant was asked to show how shooting by alleged passenger occurred, which was followed by testimony that bullet fired from gun in position demonstrated by defendant could not have had trajectory of bullet that wounded federal agent; defendant himself participated in demonstration and prosecution met burden of showing substantial similarity between courtroom demonstration and seating in defendant's car.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 1035(10)
110k1035(10)
Defense, having neither requested that court view outside jury's presence demonstrative evidence purporting to reenact events at trial, nor requested that limiting instruction be given, could not allege on appeal that trial court erred in failing to take those steps.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 369.13
110k369.13
District court abused its discretion in allowing prosecution to present evidence of defendant's two previous convictions for battery on law enforcement officer in prosecution for assault on federal officer, as specific purpose for admitting evidence was not apparent; notice of intent to introduce evidence stated only that purpose of evidence was "to prove the defendant's knowledge, identity and absence of mistake or accident," and did not articulate relevant purpose and specific inferences to be drawn from evidence. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 374
110k374
District court abused its discretion in allowing prosecution to present evidence of defendant's two previous convictions for battery on law enforcement officer in prosecution for assault on federal officer, as specific purpose for admitting evidence was not apparent; notice of intent to introduce evidence stated only that purpose of evidence was "to prove the defendant's knowledge, identity and absence of mistake or accident," and did not articulate relevant purpose and specific inferences to be drawn from evidence. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 374
110k374
In order to aid district court's determination of whether evidence of other criminal acts of defendant is offered to prove issue other than character, government must precisely articulate purpose of proffered evidence. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[5] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 369.2(1)

110k369.2(1)
Even absent adherence to Tenth Circuit's requirements for admission of other crimes evidence, mandating that government precisely articulate purpose of proffered evidence and requiring trial court to specifically identify purpose for which evidence is offered, other crimes evidence is nevertheless admissible if decision to admit fulfills requirements of Supreme Court opinion noting that federal rules of evidence contain four sources of protection to prevent introduction of unduly prejudicial other crimes evidence, i.e., that evidence be offered for proper purpose, that it be relevant, that probative value not be outweighed by potential for unfair prejudice, and that jury is instructed on proper purpose for which evidence is to be considered.

[5] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 374
110k374
Even absent adherence to Tenth Circuit's requirements for admission of other crimes evidence, mandating that government precisely articulate purpose of proffered evidence and requiring trial court to specifically identify purpose for which evidence is offered, other crimes evidence is nevertheless admissible if decision to admit fulfills requirements of Supreme Court opinion noting that federal rules of evidence contain four sources of protection to prevent introduction of unduly prejudicial other crimes evidence, i.e., that evidence be offered for proper purpose, that it be relevant, that probative value not be outweighed by potential for unfair prejudice, and that jury is instructed on proper purpose for which evidence is to be considered.

[6] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 1169.1(1)
110k1169.1(1)
District court's erroneous admission of evidence does not require reversal if error was harmless.

[7] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 1139
110k1139
In determining whether trial court's error in admission of evidence was harmless, Court of Appeals reviews entire record de novo.

[8] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 1169.11
110k1169.11
Erroneous admission of defendant's two previous convictions for battery on law enforcement officer was harmless in prosecution for assault on federal officer, in light of significant evidence against defendant; while defendant claimed that passenger in car defendant was driving shot gun and then jumped out during chase, four police officers testified that they saw no one jump from defendant's car during chase, and that car was traveling too fast to allow person to jump out without injury, officer testified that he saw defendant holding gun during chase, two officers testified that defendant made incriminating statements after arrest, and prosecutor was able to discredit much of defendant's version of events through cross-examination and other testimony. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[9] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 1139
110k1139
In defendant's appeal of sentence determined under Sentencing Guidelines, Court of Appeals reviews factual findings by district court for clear error and interpretations of guidelines de novo. U.S.S.G. § 1B1.1 et seq., 18 U.S.C.A.App.

[9] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 1158(1)
110k1158(1)
In defendant's appeal of sentence determined under Sentencing Guidelines, Court of Appeals reviews factual findings by district court for clear error and interpretations of guidelines de novo. U.S.S.G. § 1B1.1 et seq., 18 U.S.C.A.App.

[10] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 1245(4)
110k1245(4)
Defendant's placement into custody of state secretary of social and rehabilitation services at time defendant was juvenile was "confinement" within meaning of Sentencing Guideline providing for assessment of criminal history points for juvenile convictions. U.S.S.G. § 4A1.2(d)(2)(A), 18 U.S.C.A.App.

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

[11] CRIMINAL LAW ⊜ 1245(4)
110k1245(4)
Orders committing defendant, when juvenile, to custody of state secretary of social and rehabilitation services were properly considered sentences to confinement of "at least 60 days," for purposes of Sentencing Guideline providing for assessment of criminal history points for juvenile sentences to confinement of at least 60 days, even though commitment orders lacked release date; defendant actually served more than 60 days and, thus, maximum time he could have been confined exceeded 60 days. U.S.S.G. §§ 4A1.2(d)(2)(A), 4A1.2, comment. (n. 2), 18 U.S.C.A.App.

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

[12] CRIMINAL LAW ⊸ 1245(4)
110k1245(4)
Although actual time served should not be considered "sentence to confinement" for purposes of Sentencing Guideline providing for assessment of criminal history points for juvenile sentences of confinement of at least 60 days, time served is evidence of maximum sentence of imprisonment in cases of indeterminate sentencing. U.S.S.G. §§ 4A1.2(d)(2)(A), 4A1.2, comment. (n. 2), 18 U.S.C.A.App.

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

1091 Cyd Gilman, Asst. Federal Public Defender for the Dist. of Kansas, Wichita, KS, for defendant-appellant.

Kim M. Fowler (Randall K. Rathbun, U.S. Atty., with her on the brief), Asst. U.S. Atty., Dist. of Kansas, Kansas City, KS, for plaintiff-appellee.

Before TACHA, LOGAN, and EBEL, Circuit Judges.

TACHA, Circuit Judge.

Bernard C. Birch, Jr. was convicted by a jury of assault on a federal officer and possession of a firearm during a violent crime. He appeals both his convictions and his sentence. Defendant alleges in his appeal that the district court erred in (1) allowing the prosecution to conduct a demonstration during cross-examination of defendant, (2) admitting evidence of defendant's prior convictions under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b), and (3) assessing two criminal history points for each of two prior juvenile convictions of defendant. This court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and 18 U.S.C. § 3742 and affirms.

I. Background

On April 28, 1993, Special Agent Randy O'Dell of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and Lieutenant Aaron Harrison of the Wichita Police Department were conducting surveillance of a residence occupied by defendant's girlfriend and their two children from Agent O'Dell's unmarked car. The officers observed defendant arrive at and enter the house. Defendant was driven to the house by a friend; several other friends accompanied him as well. After checking on the well-being of the occupants, defendant left the residence. Rather than leave with the friend who had brought him to the house, defendant drove away in his girlfriend's car, which had been parked in the driveway.

Meanwhile, the officers drove by the house, circled the block, and followed defendant's vehicle as he left the house. When defendant noticed he was being followed, he turned his car around and drove back towards the officers' car. As the cars passed one another, a shot was fired from defendant's car, wounding Agent O'Dell.

Defendant fled the scene in the vehicle from which the shot was fired. Agent O'Dell and Lieutenant Harrison gave chase, calling other units in as back-up. Two to three minutes later, defendant lost control of his vehicle and crashed the car into a tree. He fled on foot and was apprehended shortly thereafter.

After his arrest and at trial, defendant claimed that, although he was driving the car at the time of the shooting, there was a passenger in the car who fired the shot that wounded Agent O'Dell. According to defendant, this individual [FN1] leaped from the car during the car chase, leaving his weapon in the car with defendant.

> FN1. Defendant identified this individual as "Mike Bradford." Apparently neither police investigators nor defendant have been able to locate Mr. Bradford.

Defendant testified in his own defense at trial. On cross-examination by the prosecution, and over defense counsel's objection, defendant was asked to demonstrate his version of the shooting. Two courtroom chairs were placed side by side, simulating the front seat of the car, and defendant was asked to show how the shooting occurred. During 1092 this demonstration, the prosecutor asked defendant to show the jury the position of the gun when it was fired. The prosecution then called witnesses who testified that defendant's version of the shooting was impossible. These witnesses testified that a bullet fired from a gun in the position demonstrated by defendant could not possibly have the trajectory of the bullet that wounded Agent O'Dell.

II. Courtroom Demonstration

[1] This court examined the use of demonstrative evidence that purports to reenact events at trial in United States v. Wanoskia, 800 F.2d 235 (10th Cir.1986). In Wanoskia, a defendant on trial for murdering his wife maintained that his wife had shot herself. Id. at 236-37. The prosecution attempted to discredit the defendant's story by showing that it would have been impossible for the victim to shoot herself. The medical examiner testified that, based on the powder burns on the victim, the fatal shot was fired from approximately eighteen inches from the victim. Id. at 237. The prosecution then presented a demonstration to show that the victim could not have shot herself from this distance. Id. at 236.

Recognizing the highly persuasive nature of evidence purporting to reenact actual events, we declared in Wanoskia that the trial court "must take special care to ensure that the demonstration fairly depicts the events at issue." Id. at 238 (citation omitted). To ensure that such care is taken by trial courts, we announced a threshold requirement for the admission of demonstrative evidence, which we adopted from the Jackson v. Fletcher standard for experimental evidence:

> "Where ... an experiment purports to simulate actual events and to show the jury what presumably occurred at the scene ..., the party introducing the evidence has a burden of demonstrating substantial similarity of conditions. They may not be identical but they ought to be sufficiently similar so as to provide a fair comparison."

Wanoskia at 238 (quoting Jackson v. Fletcher, 647 F.2d 1020, 1027 (10th Cir.1981)).

Despite this threshold requirement for admissibility, "a trial court's decision to admit or exclude such evidence will be reversed only if the court abused its discretion." Wanoskia, 800 F.2d at 238 (citation omitted). We therefore review the district court's decision to allow the demonstration with deference.

The purpose of the demonstration in the instant case was to illustrate and clarify testimony already given by defendant on direct examination. Defendant himself participated in the demonstration. Courtroom chairs were used to simulate seating in the car; defendant sat in one chair while an ATF agent sat in the other. Defendant demonstrated his version of the events. Nothing in the record indicates that the jury was led to believe that the chairs represented anything other than the car seats. Moreover, the defense could have conducted a redirect examination to correct any part of the demonstration that was potentially misleading to the jury. Although only a limited foundation was laid by the prosecution, the prosecution nonetheless met its burden of demonstrating substantial similarity between the courtroom demonstration and the seating in defendant's car.

Defendant's argument that the demonstration here is similar to that found improper in Jackson v. Fletcher fails. In Jackson, the evidence at issue was testimony describing the results of an out-of-court reenactment of a vehicle accident. We found this evidence unduly prejudicial because the experiment lacked a substantial similarity of circumstances. Id. at 1026-28. Here, in contrast, the evidence consisted of an in-court demonstration by defendant that was sufficiently similar to actual events to provide a fair comparison.

[2] Defendant argues that the district court's failure to take the protective measures taken by the district court in Wanoskia resulted in unfair prejudice to defendant. In Wanoskia, we noted with approval that the trial court had first viewed the demonstration outside the presence of the jury and that the jury was instructed to disregard the demonstration if it determined that the testimony lacked an adequate foundation. Wanoskia, 1093 800 F.2d at 239. In the instant case, however, the defense neither requested that the court view the demonstration outside the jury's presence nor requested that a limiting instruction be given to the jury. As a result, the defense cannot now allege that the trial court erred in failing to take these steps.

See Robinson v. Audi NSU Auto Union, 739 F.2d 1481, 1485 (10th Cir.1984).

The courtroom demonstration, combined with the testimony regarding the bullet's trajectory, was indeed damaging to the defense. Evidence that is prejudicial to the defense is inadmissible, however, only if its probative value is substantially outweighed by its unfair prejudice to the defendant. See Fed.R.Evid. 403. [FN2] We conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the prosecution to conduct the demonstration using courtroom chairs to represent the front seat of defendant's car.

> FN2. Cf. United States v. Gaskell, 985 F.2d 1056, 1061 (11th Cir.1993) (probative value of demonstration in which adult male witness repeatedly shook a representation of an infant was substantially outweighed by unfair prejudicial effect to defendant on trial for involuntary manslaughter of his infant daughter).

III. Rule 404(b) Evidence

[3] Defendant also alleges that the district court erred in allowing the prosecution to present evidence of defendant's two previous convictions for battery on a law enforcement officer. Defendant argues that this evidence was inadmissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b). We review the district court's decision to admit evidence under Rule 404(b) for an abuse of discretion. United States v. Record, 873 F.2d 1363, 1373 (10th Cir.1989).

Rule 404(b) governs the admissibility of evidence of other criminal acts of the defendant:

> Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident.

The district court must make a threshold determination that the offered evidence is " 'probative of a material issue other than character' " before admitting evidence under Rule 404(b). United States v. Martinez, 890 F.2d 1088, 1093 (10th Cir.1989) (quoting Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681, 686, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 1499, 99 L.Ed.2d 771 (1988)), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1059, 110 S.Ct. 1532, 108 L.Ed.2d 771 (1990).

[4] In order to aid the district court's determination of whether evidence is offered to prove an issue other than character, the government must precisely articulate the purpose of the proffered evidence. United States v. Kendall, 766 F.2d 1426, 1436 (10th Cir.1985), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1081, 106 S.Ct. 848, 88 L.Ed.2d 889 (1986); see also United States v. Porter, 881 F.2d 878, 884 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 944, 110 S.Ct. 348, 107 L.Ed.2d 336 (1989). Kendall further requires the trial court to "specifically identify the purpose for which such evidence is offered," noting that "a broad statement merely invoking or restating Rule 404(b) will not suffice." Kendall, 766 F.2d at 1436.

In this case, the government failed to articulate with precision the evidentiary purpose of the Rule 404(b) evidence it offered. Although the government filed a pretrial Notice of Intent to Introduce Evidence Pursuant to Rule 404(b), the Notice stated only that the evidence's purpose was "to prove the defendant's knowledge, identity and absence of mistake or accident." The Notice does not articulate "the relevant purpose and specific inferences to be drawn from ... [the] evidence of other acts" offered by the government. Kendall, 766 F.2d at 1436. At trial, evidence of defendant's prior convictions, as well as evidence of the acts that resulted in the convictions, was admitted without a more specific articulation of its purpose. Moreover, the trial court did not identify the specific permissible purpose for which the evidence was admitted.

[5] Our analysis does not end here, however. Even when the requirements of Kendall are not adhered to, the 404(b) evidence 1094 is nevertheless admissible if the decision to admit fulfills the requirements set out by the Supreme Court in Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 99 L.Ed.2d 771 (1988). United States v. Record, 873 F.2d 1363, 1375 n. 7 (10th Cir.1989). In Huddleston, the Supreme Court noted that the Federal Rules of Evidence contain four sources of protection to prevent the introduction of unduly prejudicial evidence under Rule 404(b):

> first, from the requirement of Rule 404(b) that the evidence be offered for a proper purpose; second, > from the relevancy requirement of Rule 402--as enforced through Rule 104(b); third, from the assessment the trial court must make under Rule 403 to determine whether the probative value of the similar acts evidence is substantially outweighed by its potential for unfair prejudice ...; and fourth, from Federal Rule of Evidence 105, which provides that the trial court shall, upon request, instruct the jury that the similar acts evidence is to be considered only for the proper purpose for which it was admitted.

Huddleston, 485 U.S. at 691-92, 108 S.Ct. at 1502. To reconcile the strict requirements of Kendall with Huddleston 's logic, this court noted that if the purpose for allowing the evidence is apparent from the record and the decision to admit the evidence was correct, " 'any failure to adhere to Kendall will necessarily be harmless.' " Record, 873 F.2d at 1375 n. 7 (quoting United States v. Orr, 864 F.2d 1505, 1511 (10th Cir.1988)); see also Porter, 881 F.2d at 885. Thus, we must examine the record to determine if the specific purpose for admitting the evidence is apparent.

We are unable to find an apparent purpose, permissible under Rule 404(b), for the evidence at issue. A review of the record reveals no more specific reasoning than that already mentioned. Admission of the evidence of defendant's prior convictions was, therefore, an abuse of the trial court's discretion.

[6] Although we conclude that the admission of the evidence was error, a district court's erroneous admission of evidence does not require reversal if the error was harmless. United States v. Flanagan, 34 F.3d 949, 954-55 (10th Cir.1994). "A non-constitutional error is harmless unless it had a 'substantial influence' on the outcome or leaves one in 'grave doubt' as to whether it had such effect." United States v. Rivera, 900 F.2d 1462, 1469 (10th Cir.1990) (quoting Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 765, 66 S.Ct. 1239, 1248, 90 L.Ed. 1557 (1946)). Accordingly, the question in this case is whether the admission of evidence of defendant's prior battery convictions had a substantial influence on "the jury's verdict in the context of the entire case against him." United States v. Short, 947 F.2d 1445, 1455 (10th Cir.1991), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 112 S.Ct. 1680, 118 L.Ed.2d 397 (1992).

[7][8] In determining whether a trial court's error was harmless, we review the entire record de novo. United States v. Perdue, 8 F.3d 1455, 1469 (10th Cir.1993). Our review of the record here reveals substantial evidence of defendant's guilt. Defendant claimed that he was driving the car but did not shoot the gun; rather, the shot was fired by a companion in the car who jumped out of the car while it was racing away from the officers. Four police officers involved in the chase testified that they saw no one jump from defendant's car during the three minute car chase which followed the shooting. These officers also testified that defendant's car was travelling too fast to allow a person to jump out without injury. An officer also testified that he saw defendant holding a gun during the car chase. Furthermore, at least two officers testified that defendant made incriminating statements after he was arrested. Finally, when defendant testified in his own defense, the prosecutor was able to discredit much of defendant's version of the events through cross- examination and other testimony.

Because of the significant amount of evidence against defendant in the record, we find that the improperly admitted evidence of defendant's prior convictions did not substantially influence the outcome of the trial. Accordingly, we conclude that the district court's error in admitting evidence of defendant's 1095 prior battery convictions was harmless. [FN3]

> FN3. Defendant also argues that the effect of the improper admission of the rule 404(b) evidence was cumulatively prejudicial to defendant when added to the prejudicial effect of the admission of the courtroom demonstration. Because the courtroom demonstration was properly admitted, there could be no cumulative prejudice in this case.

IV. Sentencing

[9] Defendant appeals his sentence on the basis that the district court erred in assessing two criminal history points for each of defendant's two previous juvenile convictions. He argues that under the United States Sentencing Guidelines (U.S.S.G.), the district court should have assessed only one point for each of these convictions. [FN4] In a defendant's appeal of a sentence determined under the Guidelines, this court reviews factual findings by the district court for clear error and interpretations of the Guidelines de novo. United States v. Miller, 987 F.2d 1462, 1465 (10th Cir.1993).

> FN4. The applicable provision of the Guidelines reads: (d) Offenses Committed Prior to Age Eighteen (1) If the defendant was convicted as an adult and received a sentence of imprisonment exceeding one year and one month, add 3 points under § 4A1.1(a) for each such sentence. (2) In any other case, (A) add 2 points under § 4A1.1(b) for each adult or juvenile sentence to confinement of at least sixty days if the defendant was released from such confinement within five years of his commencement of the instant offense; (B) add 1 point under § 4A.1.1(c) for each adult or juvenile sentence imposed within five years of the defendant's commencement of the instant offense not covered in (A). U.S.S.G. § 4A1.2(d). Defendant contends that his previous juvenile offenses fall under subsection (2)(B) instead of (2)(A) of this provision.

Defendant was placed on probation on December 11, 1990, for two counts of battery of a law enforcement officer. His probation was revoked in March 1991, at which time he was ordered into "the custody of the state secretary of social and rehabilitation services." The secretary ordered defendant transported to the Youth Center at Larned, Kansas, where he was confined until January 10, 1992.

[10] Defendant first argues that placement into the custody of the state secretary of social and rehabilitation services is not a "confinement" within the meaning of U.S.S.G. § 4A1.2(d)(2)(A). Section 4A1.2(d)(2)(A) requires the addition of two points "for each adult or juvenile sentence to confinement of at least sixty days." Although "sentence of confinement" is not defined in the Guidelines, "sentence of imprisonment" is defined as "a sentence of incarceration and refers to the maximum sentence imposed." U.S.S.G. § 4A1.2(b).

While this court has not yet addressed the issue, the Sixth and Eleventh Circuits have held that commitment to the custody of the state's juvenile authority constitutes "confinement" within the meaning of U.S.S.G. § 4A1.2(d)(2)(A). United States v. Fuentes, 991 F.2d 700, 702 (11th Cir.1993); United States v. Kirby, 893 F.2d 867, 868 (6th Cir.1990); United States v. Hanley, 906 F.2d 1116 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 945, 111 S.Ct. 357, 112 L.Ed.2d 321 (1990). In each case, the defendant's criminal history included a juvenile adjudication at which the defendant was committed to the custody of the appropriate state agency. The state agency then placed each defendant in a confinement facility.

Here, defendant's situation is materially indistinguishable from the circumstances in Fuentes and Kirby. Defendant was confined to the Larned Youth Center by order of the secretary, in whose custody he was placed by the court. His confinement was involuntary, so that he was not free to leave the Youth Center. We therefore hold that defendant's placement into the custody of the state secretary of social and rehabilitation services was a "confinement" within the meaning of U.S.S.G. § 4A1.2(d)(2)(A).

[11] Defendant next argues that because the orders committing him to the secretary's custody lacked a release date, they cannot be considered sentences to confinement of "at least sixty days" under U.S.S.G. § 4A1.2(d)(2)(A). Defendant bases this argument on the commentary to section 4A1.2, 1096 which states that the "length of a sentence of imprisonment is the stated maximum.... [C]riminal history points are based on the sentence pronounced, not the length of time actually served." U.S.S.G. § 4A1.2, comment. (n. 2). The application note to section 4A1.2 gives several examples to clarify the meaning of "stated maximum":

> [I]n the case of a determinate sentence of five years, the stated maximum is five years; in the case of an indeterminate sentence of one to five years, the stated maximum is five years; in the case of an indeterminate sentence for a term not to exceed five years, the stated maximum is five years; in the case of an indeterminate sentence for a term not to exceed the defendant's twenty-first birthday, the stated maximum is the amount of time in pretrial detention plus the amount of time between the date of sentence and the defendant's twenty-first birthday.

Id. The application note does not include an example which mirrors the sentence that defendant received. Clearly, the list of examples is meant to be illustrative rather than exclusive.

In defendant's case, the orders placing him into the secretary's custody lacked a maximum sentence.

Under Kansas law, however, a juvenile committed to the custody of the secretary must be released upon reaching twenty-one years of age. Kan.Stat.Ann. § 38-1675 (1993). The maximum sentence was thus for a term not to exceed defendant's twenty-first birthday.

[12] Defendant's reliance on the application note's admonition against using the length of time actually served is misplaced. The Guidelines contemplate offenses for which a defendant is sentenced to more time than is actually served. Although the actual time served should not be considered the "sentence to confinement," the time served is evidence of the maximum sentence of imprisonment in cases of indeterminate sentencing. Here, defendant actually served more than sixty days. Thus, the maximum time defendant could have been confined exceeded sixty days. Cf. Fuentes, 991 F.2d at 702. Consequently, the district court properly adopted the presentence investigation report's finding that defendant received a "sentence to confinement of at least sixty days."

V. Conclusion

For these reasons, the judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED.

END OF DOCUMENT

UNITED STATES of America,
v.
Richard I. JOHNSON, Sr., Richard I. Johnson, Jr., Joseph Rosinski and Joan Chuba, Defendants.
92-CR-39A.
United States District Court, W.D. New York
Aug. 09, 1994.

Patrick H. NeMoyer, U.S. Atty., Martin J. Littlefield, Asst. U.S. Atty., of counsel, Buffalo, NY, for U.S.
Rodney O. Personius, Buffalo, NY, for defendant Johnson, Sr.
Robert L. Boreanaz, Buffalo, NY, for defendant Johnson, Jr.
Mark J. Mahoney, Buffalo, NY, for defendant Rosinski.
David G. Jay, Buffalo, NY, for defendant Chuba.

ORDER

ARCARA, District Judge.

1 This case was referred to Magistrate Judge Leslie G. Foschio, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. s 636(b)(1), on March 11, 1992. Defendants filed motions for pretrial discovery, including further particulars, for severance, to strike

The Government acknowledges its responsibility under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963) and Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972). The court directs that all Brady material, including impeachment material, be disclosed to the defense no later than thirty days prior to the commencement of trial.

(f) Jencks Act material.

The Jencks Act provides that a defendant in a federal criminal trial, after a government witness has testified on direct examination, is entitled to receive, for purposes of cross-examination, any statements of the witness, in the government's possession which relate to the subject matter on which the witness has testified. See 18 U.S.C. s 3500(b). The district court may not, over the government's objection, compel early disclosure of Jencks Act material. See United States v. Percevault, 490 F.2d 126, 131 (2d Cir.1974); United States v. Washington, 819 F.Supp. 358, 367 (D.Vt.1993). In this case, the Government has stated that it will disclose Jencks Act material shortly before trial, and the court cannot order disclosure at an earlier or more definite time. Defendants' motion for early disclosure of Jencks material is DENIED.

(g) Rule 404(b) Evidence.

The Defendants seek disclosure of all evidence that the Government intends to offer pursuant to Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). The Government has stated that it does not intend to offer any such evidence in its direct case, but reserves the right to respond to any defense propounded through cross-examination or by direct evidence. The Defendants regard this response as a Government attempt to evade its disclosure responsibility.

Rule 404(b) requires the prosecution in a criminal case to provide reasonable notice in advance of trial of the general nature of any evidence of other crimes, wrongs, and acts it intends to introduce at trial. The Advisory Committee Notes to the 1991 amendment to the rule state that such notice is required "regardless of how [the Government] intends to use the extrinsic act evidence at trial, i.e., during its case-in-chief, for impeachment, or for possible rebuttal." Accordingly, the court directs the Government to disclose all Rule 404(b) evidence which it intends to offer against the Defendants to the defense no later than thirty days prior to the commencement of trial or no later than the date of the pretrial conference with Judge Arcara whichever is earlier in sufficient detail to permit defense counsel to prepare and file appropriate motions in limine on the issue of admissibility, if counsel is so inclined. To the extent provided above, the motion for disclosure of Rule 404(b) evidence is GRANTED.

2. Severance.

The Government has consented to a severance of the "bankruptcy" counts (Counts XVI-XXI) from the "hazardous waste" counts (Counts I-XV), and will try the two conspiracies separately from this Indictment. Accordingly, the motions for

Citation | Rank(R) | Page(P) | Database | Mode
Not Reported in F.Supp. | R 141 OF 392 | P 1 OF 53 | DCT | P LOCATE
(Cite as: 1992 WL 371640 (D.Kan.))

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Perl Glen VAN PELT, Edith Wacker, aka "Edie", Edith T. Wacker, aka "Louie", John Lee Wacker, Susan Mary Boyle, aka "Van Pelt", Leroy Allen Cooley and Michael L. Lipp, aka "Mike", Defendants.
Nos. 92-40042-01-SAC to 92-40042-07-SAC.
United States District Court, D. Kansas.
Dec. 1, 1992.

Lee Thompson, U.S. Atty., Gregory G. Hough, Asst. U.S. Atty., for U.S.
Wendell Betts, Frieden, Haynes & Forbes, Topeka, Kan., for Perl Glen Van Pelt.
Allan A. Hazlett, Topeka, Kan., for Lewis T. Wacker.
F.G. Manzanares, Topeka, Kan., for John Lee Wacker.
Matthew B. Works, Works, Works & Works, P.A., Topeka, Kan., for Susan Mary Boyle.
Alex Boyle, Lawrence, Kan., Custodian.
James G. Chappas, James G. Chappas, Chtd., Topeka, Kan., for Leroy Allen Cooley.
John J. Ambrosio, John J. Ambrosio, Chtd., Topeka, Kan., for Michael L. Lipp.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

Notwithstanding that ruling, the government is required to disclose all favorable material evidence relevant to the defendant's guilt or punishment. [FN10] The government is reminded of its continuing obligation under Brady. In accordance with that duty, the government shall furnish any favorable material evidence relevant to the guilt or punishment of the defendant, including impeachment evidence (such as evidence of bias or motive) that it possesses as a result of the plea negotiation process.

Motions for disclosure of 404(b) evidence (Dk. 27 and 36):

Leroy Cooley seeks an order requiring the government to disclose whether or not it intends to introduce any 404(b) evidence. Michael Lipp requests that the United States provide all material which will be offered pursuant to Rule 404(b) ten days before trial.

The government indicates that it intends to produce evidence in its case in chief of certain drug offense convictions of the defendants. See Government's brief, page 16. The government has apparently given each defendant a copy of the "rap sheets" of all defendants. The government then specifically lists the prior convictions of Van Pelt, Boyle, Cooley and Lipp that it plans to introduce in its case in chief. In addition, the governments' amended notice (Dk. 92) indicates that it intends to offer certain statements arising from Van Pelt's misdemeanor conviction for possession of marijuana in Jewell County, Kansas, on September 15, 1977. At the time of sentencing, Van Pelt apparently stated that "[i]n the days of prohibition, bootleggers used water to dilute the liquor. In the world of marijuana today, I provide the water."

13 The government otherwise opposes the defendants' motion for pretrial disclosure of 404(b) evidence that it plans to produce at trial. The government contends that the defendants are not entitled to pretrial disclosure of either 404(b) evidence.

Rule 404(b) provides:

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts.

Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial. (As amended Mar. 2, 1987, eff. Oct. 2, 1987; Apr. 30, 1992, eff. Dec. 1, 1991.)

The 1991 Amendment "adds a pretrial notice requirement in criminal cases and is intended to reduce surprise and promote early resolution of the issue of admissibility." 1991 Amendment Advisory Notes. "The Rule expects that counsel for both the defense and the prosecution will submit the necessary request and information in a reasonable and timely fashion." Id.

The government correctly argues that it is not required to fully disclose all 404(b) evidence prior to trial. In United States v. Williams, 792 F.Supp. 1120 (S.D.Ind.1992), the defendants requested that the government provide the specific evidence which it intended to offer under Rule 404(b). The court commented:

In the present case, the Defendants have requested that the Government provide the specific evidence which it intends to offer under Rule 404(b). Again, the Rules of Evidence are not rules of discovery. The purpose of the Rule 404(b) notice provision, to prevent surprise during trial, does not support providing a defendant with materials which the Government possesses and plans to offer at trial. Instead, the Defendants need only receive sufficient notice "to apprise the defense of the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts." Fed.R.Evid. 404 (Notes of Senate Committee on the Judiciary on the 1991 Amendment). Nothing in the rule indicates that the defendant is entitled to receive documents or other evidence from which the Government derives the prior bad act evidence. The Government merely need provide the Defendants with information sufficient to indicate the general nature of the evidence. In this instance, the court was not presented with specific facts from which to determine what reasonable notice might entail. In the absence of such specific circumstances, only these general guidelines come into play.

792 F.Supp. at 1134.

Other courts, relying on the language of the Rule and the advisory comments have also concluded that the Government only need supply the defense with the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts. See United States v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 728 (N.D.Ill.1992) (defendant's demand for specific evidentiary detail including dates, times, places and persons involved is wholly overbroad; Rule 404(b) only requires the government to disclose the general nature of such evidence it intends to introduce at trial); United States v. Sims, No. 92-CR-166, 1992 WL 295672, 1992 U.S.Dist. Lexis 14619, at *2-4 (N.D.Ill. September 28, 1992) (same); United States v. Swano, No. 91-CR-477-02-03, 1992 WL 137588, 1992 U.S.Dist. Lexis 7554, at *16-17 (N.D.Ill. May 29, 1992) (Rule 404(b) not a tool for discovery; defendants' requests for specific dates, times, places, persons, etc ..., well beyond scope of Rule 404(b)); but see United States v. Melendez, No. 92 Crim. 047 (LMM), 1992 WL 96327, 1992 U.S.Dist. LEXIS 5616, at *1 (S.D.New York April 24, 1992) ("Rule 404(b) will be satisfied if the notice to be given by the government identifies each crime, wrong or act by its specific nature (e.g., sale of cocaine), place (e.g., New York City), and approximate date (e.g., July 1986) to the extent known by the government.").

14 The government has apparently supplied the defendants with fairly detailed descriptions of the 404(b) evidence it plans to introduce at trial, thereby satisfying the notice requirements of 404(b). The government is apparently aware of its obligation to provide the defendants general notice of the type of 404(b) evidence it plans to introduce at trial.

During oral argument and in his brief, counsel for Michael Lipp requested that the government be given a day certain by which it would provide notice of 404(b); thereafter the government would be precluded from introducing any new 404(b) evidence not previously disclosed. This request is denied. The defendant correctly notes that late disclosure of 404(b) evidence can potentially hamper the defendant's ability to prepare a defense to that evidence. Rule 404(b) requires the prosecution upon request to "provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown...." Therefore, if the government can demonstrate good cause the court may allow previously undisclosed 404(b) evidence even during trial. In addition, in determining the admissibility of any evidence the court may consider the unfair prejudice to the defendant. See Fed.R.Evid. 403.

The defendants' motions for pretrial disclosure of 404(b) evidence is granted in part and denied in part.

Motions for disclosure of grand jury minutes (Dk. 48 and 24:

Pursuant to Fed.R.Crim.P. 6(e), John Wacker and Leroy Cooley seek a copy of the grand jury minutes in this case. The defendants contend that a copy of the

Also, 606 mentioned.

Citation | Rank(R) | Page(P) | Database | Mode
Not Reported in F.Supp. | R 14 OF 392 | P 1 OF 53 | DCT | P LOCATE
(Cite as: 1995 WL 221883 (N.D.Ill.))

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Marco DAMICO, et al., Defendants.
No. 94 CR 723.
United States District Court, N.D. Illinois, Eastern Division.
April 10, 1995.
MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

MANNING, District Judge.

1 Defendants [FN1] were charged by indictment in the action USA v. Damico et al., 94 CR 723 (N.D.Ill.1994). The 10-count indictment alleges that defendants Marco Damico, Anthony R. Dote, Robert M. Abbinanti, and unknown others were engaged in an enterprise referred to as the "Damico Enterprise." The indictment further alleges that the Enterprise obtained income for the defendants through illegal activities which affected interstate commerce. More specifically, the alleged racketeering activity consisted of:

(a) operation of illegal gambling businesses, in violation of Title 18 U.S.C. s 1955;

(b) Extortion, attempt to commit extortion, and conspiracy to commit agreed to tender all material relating to Mr. Cooley no later than April 17, 1995.

Defendant A. Dote's Motion to Require Notice of Intention of Use (sic) Other Crimes, Wrongs or Acts Evidence.

Defendant M. Damico's Motion For Notice of 404(b) Material Sixty Days in Advance of Trial.

Defendant Anthony Dote requests that the government be required to give notice of its intention to offer evidence at trial under Rule 404(b) Other Crimes Wrongs or Acts which provides the following:

"... (b) Other Crimes, Wrongs, or Acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, ... the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence if it intended to introduce at trial."

4 Fed.R.Evid. 404. The government in its consolidated response replies that during the Rule 2.04 Conference, it offered to give the defendant notice of any 404(b) evidence intended to be used against him two weeks prior to trial, in accordance with the reasonable notice requirements of the rule. However, at the March-9 hearing the government agreed to provide the material by April 24, 1995.

Pursuant to Rule 404(b) the government shall provide reasonable notice ... on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial. The defendant suggests that 404(b) should be extended not only to the general nature of any "other acts" evidence, but also specific evidentiary detail, to include dates, times, locations, participants, etc. The plain language of the rule gives no specific form of notice.

The Advisory Committee considered and rejected a requirement that the notice satisfy the particularity requirements normally required of language used in a charging instrument. Fed.R.Evid. 404(b), Advisory Committee Notes. The Committee opted for a generalized notice provision which requires the prosecution to apprise the defense of the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts. Id. The committee did not intend for the Rule to supersede other rules of admissibility or disclosure such as the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. s 3500, et seq. "nor require the prosecution to disclose directly or indirectly the names and addresses of its witnesses." This court agrees with the government that the plain language of the rule itself, precludes the evidentiary detail the defendant seeks. Furthermore, the government has represented to the defendants and the court that it will provide the Rule 404(b) evidence which it intends to use in its case-in-chief through the submission of its Rule 404(b) proffer by April 24, 1995.

Additionally, this court is not precluded from examining in camera the specific 404(b) evidence which the government intends to offer before it is offered or even mentioned during trial. Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). Senate Judiciary Committee. This court may require the government to disclose to it the specifics of such evidentiary detail which the court must consider in determining admissibility. Id. Hence, this court denies this portion of Dote's request for evidentiary specificity because he is not entitled to such information, and grants the remainder of in part his motion as set forth above, with directions to the government that these materials be provided no later than April 24, 1995. This ruling applies to all defendant's.

Damico also seeks an order from the Court requiring the government to give notice of its intent to offer 404(b) evidence sixty days in advance of trial. The government states that during the Rule 2.04 Conference, it offered to give defendant notice of any 404(b) evidence it intended to use against him two weeks prior to trial, in accordance with the reasonable notice requirements of the rule. As indicated above, the motion is allowed and the government is directed (and has agreed) to provide the material by April 24, 1995.

5 Anthony Dote seeks disclosure of "specific instances of conduct" of any defendant according to Rule 608(b). [FN4] In response, the government argues that under the law no pretrial disclosure is necessary or appropriate. United States v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 728, 728-29 (N.D.Ill.1992). The

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
David A. AGUNLOYE, Defendant.

No. 95 CR 45.

United States District Court, N.D. Illinois.

June 1, 1995.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

ALESIA

1 In this case, the defendant is charged in a five count indictment with various offenses, including conspiracy to launder the proceeds of narcotics trafficking. The defendant has filed four pretrial motions. The court addresses each in turn.

A. Motion to Require the Government to Disclose Whether It Will Rely on Evidence of Similar Crimes, Wrongs or Acts

Defendant moves this court to require the government to provide notice of intention to use other crimes, wrongs or acts as evidence pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b). [FN1] Specifically, the defendant requests production of the following information: the dates, times, places, and persons involved in said other crimes, wrongs, or acts; the statements of each participant; the documents which contain such evidence, including when the documents were prepared, who prepared them, and who has possession of them; and the issue or issues to which the government believes such evidence may be relevant. The government, meanwhile, agrees to comply with the notice requirement no later than two weeks before trial but objects to the specificity of the information sought by the defendant.

The law is clear that Rule 404(b) imposes a duty on the government only to "provide reasonable notice in advance of trial ... of the general nature of any such evidence ..." and is not a tool for open ended discovery. FED. R. EVID. 404(b) (emphasis added); United States v. Sims, 808 F.Supp. 607, 611 (N.D. Ill.1992). As far as the amount of notice that the government must give, the court finds that, in this case, two weeks does constitute reasonable notice. Meanwhile, with respect to the content of the notice, the court holds that Agunloye's demand for specific evidentiary detail is wholly overbroad. Sims, 808 F.Supp. at 611. Therefore, insofar as the government has agreed to abide by the notice requirements of Rule 404(b), the motion is denied as moot. To the extent the defendant requests notice beyond the requirements of 404(b), defendant's motion is denied.

B. Motion to Disclose

In this motion, the defendant seeks to have the government divulge all evidence that the government may attempt to introduce under Federal Rules of Evidence 803 and 804. The defendant cites no authority, however, for this broad-sweeping request. Furthermore, the court is aware of no such authority. See United States v. Russo, 87 CR 501, 1988 WL 58594 (N.D. Ill. June 1, 1988). Therefore, defendant's motion is denied with one exception. The government is directed to comply with the notice provisions of Rules 803(24) and 804(b)(5) by August 18, 1995, in the event it intends to admit such evidence.

C. Motion for Preservation of Agent's Notes

The defendant also moves the court to enter an order directing the government agents, police officers, and all federal or state informants involved in the case to retain and preserve all of their typed or handwritten notes made in relation to the case. The motion is denied as moot given that the government has instructed the agents to preserve their notes. Government's Consolidated Response to Defendant Agunloye's Pretrial Motions, at 3.

D. Motion for Statements of the Defendant

2 In this motion, the defendant seeks the substance of all statements, written, oral, and recorded, that the government will seek to admit under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2). Based on the government's representation that it has already provided the defendant with a full set of transcripts made from undercover tapes, the defendant's motion is denied as moot. See Government's Consolidated Response, at 4.

The defendant also seeks disclosure of any statements made by any co-defendant or alleged coconspirator, co-schemer, or witness to any government agent or any other person, which the government will seek to admit as evidence under any rule or theory of evidence. Again, the defendant cites no authority for such an order and the court cannot find any. Unless these statements are exculpatory or impeaching material under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), they are not discoverable under Rule 16. Accordingly, this portion of the defendant's motion is denied.

CONCLUSION

Defendant's motion to require the government to disclose whether it will rely on evidence of similar crimes, wrongs, or acts is denied in part and denied in part as moot. Defendant's motion to disclose is granted in part and denied in part. Defendant's motion for preservation of agent's notes is denied as moot. Defendant's motion for statements of the defendant is denied in part as moot and denied in part.

FN1. Rule 404(b) provides that "[e]vidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." FED. R. EVID. 404(b).

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation | Rank(R) | Page(P) | Database | Mode
850 F.Supp. 1481 | R 75 OF 392 | P 1 OF 166 | DCT | P LOCATE
(Cite as: 850 F.Supp. 1481)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Mark M. JACKSON, and Robert Martinez, Jr., Defendants.
Nos. 94-40001-01-SAC, 94-40001-02-SAC.
United States District Court,
D. Kansas.
March 30, 1994.

Defendants, who worked for private psychiatric hospital, were charged with conspiring to defraud federal government of the faithful services of Postal Service employee, bribery, aiding and abetting employee's salary supplementation, and obstruction of federal grand jury investigation. Defendants filed various pretrial motions. The District Court, Crow, J., held that: (1) defendants were not entitled to severance of their trials; (2) defendants were entitled to 30 days' notice of intent to use prior bad acts evidence; (3) aiding and abetting salary supplementation was not lesser included offense of bribery; (4) indictment was sufficient to state offenses of aiding and abetting salary supplementation and obstruction of justice; (5) indictment was not multiplicitous; (6) conspiracy could be charged under "defraud" clause of general conspiracy statute; (7) witness tampering could be charged under obstruction of justice clause of statute proscribing influencing attempts to conceal the crime." United States v. Silverstein, 737 F.2d 864, 867 (10th Cir.1984) (citations omitted). The defendant is wrong in assuming that Martinez' statement is inadmissible against him simply because it was made after the last payment to Garcia. A statement made after the original conspiracy ends may still be admissible as a statement made under a separate and distinct conspiracy to obstruct justice. See, e.g., United States v. Townsley, 843 F.2d 1070, 1084, modified on other grounds, 856 F.2d 1189 (8th Cir.1988), cert. dismissed, 499 U.S. 944, 111 S.Ct. 1406, 113 L.Ed.2d 461 (1991). Statements are admissible under 801(d)(2)(E) even when the particular conspiracy is not charged in the indictment. United States v. Beckham, 968 F.2d 47, 51 n. 2 (D.C.Cir.1992); United States v. Coppola, 526 F.2d 764, 770 (10th Cir.1975). " '[C]oncealment is sometimes a necessary part of a conspiracy, so that statements made solely to aid the concealment are in fact made during and in furtherance of the ... [original] conspiracy.' " United States v. Esacove, 943 F.2d 3, 5 (5th Cir.1991). The propriety of admitting this challenged statement against Jackson is not a resolved issue.

850 F.Supp. 1481 | R 75 OF 392 | P 119 OF 166 | DCT | P LOCATE
(Cite as: 850 F.Supp. 1481, *1493)

JOINT MOTION TO COMPEL NOTICE AND DISCLOSURE OF RULE 404(B) EVIDENCE (Dk. 26). The defendants seek an order compelling the United States to provide at least thirty days before trial notice and disclosure of the nature of any evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts it intends to introduce at trial in its case-in-chief, for impeachment, or for possible rebuttal pursuant to Rule 404(b). The government objects to placing itself in "the impossible position of speculating about" possible impeachment or rebuttal evidence. At the hearing, the government represented that the arrangement between Louis Garcia and Bowling Green Hospital is the only evidence the government intends to use that arguably falls under Rule 404(b).

[19][20][21] The pretrial notice requirement was recently added and became effective December 1, 1991. It was "intended to reduce surprise and promote early resolution of the issue of admissibility." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) Advisory Notes to 1991 Amendment. The Notes also indicate that the notice need not take a specific form and need only inform the defendant of the "general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts." Id. The notice "need not provide precise details regarding the date, time, and place of the prior acts," but it must characterize the prior conduct to a degree that fairly apprises the defendant of its general nature. United States v. Long, 814 F.Supp. 72, 74 (D.Kan.1993). The notice requirement "is not a tool for open ended discovery." United States v. Sims, 808 1494 F.Supp. 607, 610-11 (N.D.Ill.1992). Nor does it require the government to produce documents or specific evidence from which the government has learned or will introduce the bad acts. United States v. Williams, 792 F.Supp. 1120, 1134 (S.D.Ind.1992); see United States v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 728 (N.D.Ill.1992) (Defendant's "demand for specific evidentiary detail including dates, times, places and persons involved is wholly overbroad.") Finally, the Advisory Notes make clear that the prosecution must "provide notice, regardless of how it intends to use the extrinsic act evidence at trial, i.e., during its case-in-chief, for impeachment or for possible rebuttal."

[22] If it has not done so already, the government is ordered to comply with the notice requirement of Rule 404(b) as interpreted above. The court grants the defendants' motion for disclosure at least thirty days prior to trial.

JOINT MOTION TO DISMISS (Dk. 28).

Pursuant to Rule 12(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the defendants move to dismiss some or all of the counts on the following grounds:

(1) The charge of supplementing a government employees' salary, 18 U.S.C. s 209, is a lesser included offense of bribing a government employee, 18 U.S.C. s 201(b)(1)(A);

(2) The indictment fails to state an offense of violating 18 U.S.C. s 209;

(3) Count one improperly charges a conspiracy to violate a postal service code of conduct;

(4) Counts one through thirty-one are multiplicitous because they charge defendants with conspiring to bribe a government employee thirty one times;

Citation | Page(P) | Database | Mode
819 F.Supp. 358 FOUND DOCUMENT | P 1 OF 76 | DCT | P LOCATE
(Cite as: 819 F.Supp. 358)

UNITED STATES of America
v.
Jacob P. WASHINGTON, Robert Hickman and Jerome Washington.
Crim. A. Nos. 92-63-01, 92-63-02 and 92-63-05.
United States District Court,
D. Vermont.
March 5, 1993.

Three defendants charged with conspiring to distribute cocaine filed motions to sever and discovery motions. The District Court, Parker, Chief Judge, held that: (1) spillover effect of retaliation charge against one defendant, and related murder, were not so highly prejudicial to codefendants charged with drug and weapons offenses so as to warrant severance; (2) defendant failed to establish antagonistic defense so as to justify severance; (3) procedural devices would prove sufficient and effective in protecting defendant's right to fair trial despite joinder of ex-felon weapons charges against codefendant; and (4) weapon possession offense and witness intimidation offense were part of series of act related to drug trafficking offenses justifying joinder.

Motions granted in part; denied in part.

819 F.Supp. 358 FOUND DOCUMENT P 66 OF 76 DCT P LOCATE
(Cite as: 819 F.Supp. 358, *367)

to the defendants in this case one day before the witness to which the material pertains is scheduled to testify. Under Percevault, this Court does not have authority to compel earlier disclosure.

B. Rule 404(b) Disclosure

[29] Two of the defendants, Robert Hickman and Jacob Washington, have moved this Court to direct the Government to provide notice as contemplated by Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence. Robert Hickman requests an in camera disclosure to the 368 defendant of Rule 404(b) evidence with specific requests for the names, addresses, reports, and statements of witnesses the Government intends to call to offer such evidence. Jacob Washington requests that the Government specify the accusations that will be made and disclose the identity of witnesses it will rely on to offer the Rule 404(b) evidence. In response, the Government simply states that it will comply with the dictates of the rule.

To the extent that the defendants are constructing an alternative means of obtaining witness statements prior to trial, the Court refers them to section II(A) above. Also, no specific time for disclosure was requested by the defendants. The rule provides only that the Government provide "reasonable notice in advance of trial." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). Upon the Government's representation that it intends to comply with the dictates of Rule 404(b), the Court notes that this motion is not ripe and is therefore denied.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Steve E. WILLIAMS, Bobby Lee Williams, Kimberly D. Gray, Timothy Michael Cott, Chad Stang, and Joseph Schwiebinz, aka "Joseph Bentor", Defendants.
Nos. 93-40001-01-SAC to 93-40001-06-SAC.
United States District Court, D. Kansas.
June 16, 1993.

Lee Thompson, U.S. Atty., Thomas G. Luedke, Asst. U.S. Atty., for U.S.
David R. Gilman, Overland Park, KS, J. Richard Lake, Marilyn M. Trubey, Asst. Federal Public Defender, Mark W. Works, Rene M. Netherton, Jeanine Herron, Wendell Betts, John Ambrosio, Topeka, KS, for defendants.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

CROW, District Judge.

1 By the court's count, the defendants have filed thirty-four pretrial motions in this case. Having received the government's response to them and having heard oral argument on them, the court is ready to rule. A summary of the charges provides a necessary context.

On April 22, 1993, a ten-count superseding indictment was filed. Count one detailed discovery of the government's factual proof behind the alleged conspiracy. That the defendants feel hampered by the limited discovery available under Rule 16 and Brady principles does not empower this court to legislate alternative discovery devices. The defendants' arguments go more to the perceived injustices with discovery in all criminal cases rather than any inequitable circumstances unique to this case. The mere desire for more discovery is not a legitimate reason by itself for granting a bill of particulars. The defendants' motions for a bill of particulars are denied.

Motion for 404(b) Disclosure (Dk. 38, 40, 52, and 96).

Steve Williams, Tim Cott, Kim Gray and Joseph Schwiebinz ask for the government to disclose the prior or subsequent convictions, bad acts or criminal conduct which is not charged in the indictment and which the government intends to introduce as evidence at trial.

Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence provides:

> Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the

dx 608(b)

Citation	Rank(R)	Page(P)	Database	Mode
791 F.Supp. 723	R 171 OF 392	P 1 OF 33	DCT	P LOCATE

(Cite as: 791 F.Supp. 723)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Gus ALEX, et al., Defendants.
No. 91 CR 727.
United States District Court, N.D. Illinois, E.D.
April 17, 1992.

Defendant was indicted for RICO conspiracy based upon acts of extortion, intimidation, and arson filed various pretrial motions. The District Court, Alesia, J., held that: (1) defendant was not entitled to production of government witness list; (2) defendant was not entitled to production of government witness statements; (3) government was required to tender all rough notes not previously produced to court for in camera inspection; (4) defendant was entitled to advance notice of other crimes evidence which government intended to use at trial; (5) defendant was entitled to scientific reports produced by government experts; and (6) government was required to provide defendant with Brady and Giglio materials.

So ordered.

See also 788 F.Supp. 359.

(Cite as: 791 F.Supp. 723, *728)

Kendall, 665 F.2d at 135. Against this backdrop, we briefly address each of Alex's requests.

[8] As an initial matter, Alex cites no case law in support of his request for the names of all persons "known" and "unknown" to the grand jury with respect to Count One of the indictment. Equally telling, the government represents that "[t]here are no co-conspirators who were unknown to the grand jury but who have been subsequently discovered by the government." (Government's Response, p. 9.) Accordingly, the court denies Alex's first and second requests.

Similarly, in request number six, Alex demands the names of individuals referred to in paragraphs 21 and 24 of Count One. Once again, Alex cites no case law in support of his request for the names of unindicted co-conspirators. The government has identified unindicted co-conspirator James LaValley. In our view, Alex can adequately prepare for trial without the names of the other co-conspirators. Alex's sixth request is accordingly, denied.

[9] In three of his requests Alex seeks, among other things, detailed information regarding dates, places and parties present when he allegedly received a share of extortion proceeds and street tax proceeds collected by the Lenny Patrick Street Crew. In addition, he requests specific information on all occasions when he and others are alleged to have taken acts in furtherance of the conspiracy. In this court's view, Alex seeks evidentiary details exceeding the proper scope of a bill of particulars. We are satisfied that the indictment provides sufficient factual details to adequately inform Alex of the charges he faces. United States v. McAnderson, 914 F.2d 934, 946 (7th Cir.1990). Alex's third, fourth and fifth requests are denied.

Finally, in his seventh request Alex seeks the names of all the alleged victims of the extortionate acts allegedly committed by Alex and his co-defendants. This portion of Alex's motion is denied as moot because the government has filed a bill of particulars specifically identifying the names and businesses of the alleged victims.

VII. Motion for Pretrial Production of Material Pursuant to the Federal Rules of Evidence

Alex requests that the court order the government to produce a variety of information in advance of trial as required by the Federal Rules of Evidence. The court addresses each category of documents in turn.

A. Motion for Disclosure of "Other Acts" Evidence

Alex filed a motion which seeks notice of the government's intention to use evidence during cross-examination, its case-in-chief and rebuttal, which is admissible at trial pursuant to Federal Rules of Evidence 404(b) and 608(b). See Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 12(d)(2). Alex requests that such notice be provided sixty days prior to trial.

[10] Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) provides, in relevant part, that "upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). By its terms, Rule 404(b) only requires the government to disclose the general nature of such evidence in intends to introduce at trial. Alex's demand for specific evidentiary detail including dates, times, places and persons involved is wholly overbroad.

[11] In its consolidated response, the government represents that it will disclose to the defense no later than seven days before the trial of this case the "other acts" evidence it intends to introduce at trial. The government makes no mention of whether it intends to introduce any evidence under Rule 608(b). We disagree with Alex's assertion that the amendment to Rule 404(b) may be read to require the government to give notice of "specific instances of conduct" evidence under Rule 729 608(b) it intends to offer for impeachment purposes. Accordingly, the government is ordered to inform the defendants and the court of Rule 404(b) evidence, if any, it intends to use at trial on or before April 22, 1992.

B. Data Forming the Basis for Opinion Testimony

[12] Alex requests that the court order the government to provide him with information relating to lay and expert witnesses, including production of

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Clarence E. LONG and Joseph A. LUGO, Defendants.

Crim. A. Nos. 92-40040-01DES, 92-40040-02DES.

United States District Court,
D. Kansas.

March 1, 1993.

Defendant moved to exclude other crimes evidence. The District Court, Saffels, Senior District Judge, held that government's notice of intent to use other crimes evidence was insufficient.

Ordered accordingly.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
"Generalized notice provision" of rule governing admissibility of extrinsic acts evidence requires prosecution to apprise defense of general nature of evidence of extrinsic acts. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
Trial court has discretion to determine whether particular notice that government will introduce extrinsic acts evidence is not reasonable due to incompleteness. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
Requirement that government provide defendant with notice that it will admit extrinsic acts evidence is prerequisite to admissibility of that evidence. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
Government's notice of its intent to use other crimes evidence was insufficient; although notice named witness who would testify against defendant, it did not describe nature of conduct government intended to introduce through witness. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[5] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
Although government's notice of intent to use other crimes evidence did not comply with rule governing admissibility of other crimes evidence, government was not precluded from introducing the evidence at trial; sufficient time remained before trial for government to amend notice to provide defendant with sufficient information regarding intended evidence to enable defendant to file motion in limine to contest its admissibility if he chose to do so. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[6] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
Although rule governing admissibility of extrinsic acts does not require government to do so, it should consider including in its notice specific purpose, among those listed in rule, for which evidence is intended to be introduced at trial. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[7] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
Government seeking to use extrinsic acts evidence has ultimate burden of showing how defendant's past acts are relevant to disputed issue in case. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[8] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
While government seeking to use extrinsic acts evidence need not provide precise details regarding date, time, and place of prior acts it intends to introduce, or source of evidence, it must characterize conduct to sufficient degree to apprise defendant of its general nature. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

73 Lee Thompson, U.S. Atty., Gregory G. Hough, Asst. U.S. Atty., for plaintiff.

Frank Y. Hill, Jr., Boerne, TX, Thomas D. Haney, Topeka, KS, for Clarence E. Long.

William J. Skepnek, Stevens, Brand, Golden, Winter & Skepnek, Lawrence, KS, for Joseph A. Lugo.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

SAFFELS, Senior District Judge.

This matter is before the court on the motion of defendant Lugo to exclude Rule 404(b) evidence (Doc. 70).

On January 8, 1993, Defendant Lugo, through his counsel, sent a written request to the United States Attorney's office, pursuant to Fed.R.Evid. 404(b), seeking reasonable notice of the government's intent to introduce evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts. The government had previously orally advised defendant Lugo's counsel that it might use such evidence on cross-examination of either defendant, or on rebuttal. On February 18, 1993, the Assistant United States Attorney wrote to Lugo's counsel, advising that:

> pursuant to 404(b), the Government will introduce evidence of all of the matters disclosed to you, your client, Mr. Haney and his client during discovery in this matter. Particularly, be advised that Mr. Messineo will testify consistent with his prior statement, a copy of which has been previously provided to you.

The defendant contends that this notice is inadequate because it is overbroad and unduly general. Specifically, he argues that the notice provides him insufficient information on which to base a motion in limine to determine the admissibility of the evidence the government intends to introduce. In addition, he contends that the statement referring to Mr. Messineo fails to describe the acts to which he will testify, or how they might be material to this case. As a remedy, defendant Lugo seeks an order of this court precluding the government from introducing any evidence of prior crimes, wrongs, or acts.

In response, the government contends that Lugo's counsel was previously provided a copy of Messineo's statement. The government argues that it is not required to disclose before trial all evidence it intends to introduce under Rule 404(b). Rather, it need only provide the defense with the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts.

Rule 404(b) was amended effective December 1, 1991, to require the government, upon request by the defendant, to provide > reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

[1][2][3] The purpose of the 1991 amendment is to reduce surprise and promote early resolution of the issue of admissibility. The "generalized notice provision" requires the prosecution to "apprise the defense of the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts." See Advisory Committee Note to 1991 Amendments, reprinted in 22 Charles A. Wright & Kenneth W. Graham, Jr., Federal Practice and Procedure § 5231, at 341-42 (Supp.1992) (hereinafter "Advisory Committee Notes"). The court has the discretion to determine whether a particular notice is not reasonable due to incompleteness. Id. The notice requirement is a prerequisite to admissibility of the Rule 404(b) evidence. Id. Hence the offered evidence is inadmissible if the court determines that the notice requirement has not been met. Id.; see United States v. Williams, 792 F.Supp. 1120, 1134 n. 19 (S.D.Ind.1992). Although the amendment itself does not prescribe sanctions for failure to provide notice, the court in its discretion may enter appropriate orders. See Advisory Committee Notes.

[4] In this case, the court finds that the government's notice is inadequate to comply with the notice prerequisite to the admissibility of Rule 404(b) evidence. The notice does not provide the defendant information concerning the general nature of the evidence the government intends to introduce, as the rule expressly requires. At best, the notice simply forewarns the defendant that the government intends to introduce evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Although the government's notice states the name of a 74 government witness who will testify consistent with his prior statement, the notice itself does not describe the nature of the defendant's prior conduct the government intends to introduce through Mr. Messineo. [FN1]

> FN1. The notice provision does not require the government to disclose the names of its witnesses. See Advisory Committee Notes. The fact that the prosecution did so in this case, however, does not eliminate its obligation to notify the defendant concerning the general nature of the evidence the government intends to introduce pursuant to Rule 404(b).

[5] Although the notice does not comply with Rule 404(b), the court does not agree with the plaintiff's argument that the government should be precluded from introducing Rule 404(b) evidence at trial. The court finds that sufficient time remains before trial for the government to amend its notice to provide the defendant with sufficient information regarding the intended evidence to enable the defendant to file a motion in limine to contest its admissibility if he chooses to do so.

Contrary to the government's arguments, the defendant does not seek unduly detailed information concerning the prior acts the government intends to introduce under Rule 404(b). Compare United States v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 728 (N.D.Ill.1992) (defendant's demand for specific evidentiary detail, including dates, times, places, and persons involved, determined wholly overbroad). Rather, the defendant simply seeks notice of the general nature of such evidence to permit pretrial resolution of the issue of its admissibility. This is exactly what the amended rule requires.

[6][7] The government shall provide information to the defendant regarding the general nature of the evidence it intends to introduce pursuant to Rule 404(b). Although the rule does not require the government to do so, it should consider including in its notice the specific purpose, among those listed in the rule, for which the evidence is intended to be introduced at trial. The government, of course, has the ultimate burden of showing how the defendant's past acts are relevant to a disputed issue in this case. See United States v. Harrison, 942 F.2d 751, 759 (10th Cir.1991).

[8] While the government need not provide precise details regarding the date, time, and place of the prior acts it intends to introduce, or the source of the evidence, it must characterize the conduct to a sufficient degree to apprise the defendant of its general nature. See, e.g., United States v. Van Pelt, Nos. 92-40042-01-SAC to -07-SAC, 1992 WL 371640, at *14 (D.Kan. December 1, 1992) (government provided "fairly detailed descriptions" of the evidence, thereby satisfying the notice requirement); but cf. Advisory Committee Notes (notice need not satisfy the particularity requirements normally required of language used in a charging document). The government must give enough information in the notice to apprise the defendant of the kind of prior conduct the government intends to use in evidence against him at trial.

IT IS BY THE COURT THEREFORE ORDERED that the government shall provide defendant Lugo the notice required by Rule 404(b), as further described in this order, on or before March 8, 1993.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that such notice shall provide sufficient information concerning the nature of the evidence the government intends to introduce pursuant to Rule 404(b) to permit the defendant to prepare a motion in limine to contest its admissibility, if defendant desires to do so.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the defendant's request for an order precluding the government from introducing any evidence of prior crimes, wrongs, or acts (Doc. 70) is hereby denied at this time as premature, with leave to renew if the government fails to comply with this order in every respect.

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation | Page(P) | Database | Mode
808 F.Supp. 607 | FOUND DOCUMENT | P 1 OF 58 | DCT | Page
(Cite as: 808 F.Supp. 607)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Rufus SIMS, et al., Defendants.
No. 92 CR 166.
United States District Court,
N.D. Illinois, E.D.
Sept. 28, 1992.

Defendants charged in indictment with various offenses including conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute heroin and cocaine, "money laundering," criminal racketeering and murder filed various pretrial motions. The District Court, Alesia, J., held that: (1) defendants were not entitled to bill of particulars; (2) defendants were not entitled to list of government witnesses; and (3) defendant charged only with "money laundering" was not entitled to severance.

Motions granted in part, and denied in part.

808 F.Supp. 607 | FOUND DOCUMENT | P 32 OF 58 | DCT | Page
(Cite as: 808 F.Supp. 607, *610)

[hereinafter Government's Consolidated Response], at 5.

C. Motion to Require Notice of Intention to Use Other Crimes, Wrongs or Acts as Evidence

Defendant Delwin Langston moves this court to require the government to provide notice of intention to use other crimes, wrongs or acts as evidence pursuant to 404(b) and 608(b). Insofar as the government has agreed to abide by the notice requirements of Rule 404(b), [FN1] the motion is 611 denied as moot. See Government's Consolidated Response, at 7. Rule 404(b) only requires a statement of the general nature of 404(b) evidence the government will seek to introduce. With respect to requests seeking information more specific than Rule 404(b) requires, Langston's motion is denied as overbroad. The purpose of the disclosure requirement is to "reduce surprise and promote early resolution on the issue of admissibility." FED.R.EVID. 404(b) advisory committee's note. It is not a tool for open ended discovery. United States v. Swano, No. 91 CR 477-02-03, 1992 WL 137588, *6, 1992 U.S.Dist. LEXIS 7554, * 16 (N.D.Ill. June 1, 1992).

FN1. Rule 404(b) provides that "[e]vidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes ... provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." FED.R.EVID. 404(b).

[2] The defendant seeks production of the following information pursuant to Rule 404(b): the dates, times, places and persons involved in the specific crimes or acts; the statements of each participant; the documents which contain such evidence; and a statement of the issues to which the government believes such evidence may be relevant. The government objects to the specificity of the information sought by the defendant. The Senate Judiciary Committee "considered and rejected a requirement that the notice satisfy the particularity requirements normally required of language used in a charging document." FED.R.EVID. 404(b) advisory committee's note. Instead, the Advisory Committee "opted for a generalized notice provision which requires the prosecution to apprise the defense of the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts." Id. No language in the rule or the Committee Notes supports the discovery of the type of specific information Langston seeks. Therefore, to the extent Langston requests notice beyond the requirements of 404(b), Langston's motion is denied.

[3] Defendant Langston also seeks disclosure before trial of the government's intent to use "specific instances of conduct" or Rule 608(b) material. [FN2] Rule 608(b) restricts the use of specific instances of conduct of a witness to the cross-examination of that witness and even then at the discretion of the trial judge. FED.R.EVID. 608(b). Rule 12(d)(2) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure allows the "defendant [to] request notice of the government's intention to use (in its evidence in chief at trial) any evidence which the defendant may be entitled to discover under Rule 16 subject to any relevant limitations in Rule 16." FED.R.CRIM.P. 12(d)(2) (emphasis added). By its terms, Rule 608(b) evidence may not be used by the government in its case-in-chief and therefore such evidence is not discoverable under Rule 12 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. See United States v. Hartmann, 958 F.2d 774, 789 n. 5 (7th Cir.1992) ("defendants are not entitled access to Rule 608(b) materials which are not discoverable under FED.R.CRIM.P. 16"); United States v. Cerro, 775 F.2d 908, 914-15 (7th Cir.1985); United States v. Swano, No. 91 CR 477-02-03, 1992 WL 137588, *6-7, 1992 U.S.Dist. LEXIS 7554, *16-17 (N.D.Ill. June 1, 1992); United States v. Santillanes, 728 F.Supp. 1358, 1360 (N.D.Ill.1990). Therefore, Langston's request for notice of the government's intent to use Rule 608(b) evidence is denied.

FN2. Rule 608(b) provides that "[s]pecific instances of conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting his credibility, other than conviction of crime as provided in Rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning his character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified."

In summary, Langston's motion is denied in part as moot since the government has agreed to provide notice as required under Rule 404(b) and denied in part insofar as Langston requests information more specific than the notice the government is required to provide under Rule 404(b) and 612 specific instances of conduct pursuant to Rule 608(b).

D. Motion for a Bill of Particulars

[4] Defendants Ruby Chambers and Estella Sims have each filed a Motion for a Bill of Particulars pursuant to Rule 7(f) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Chambers requests the dates, times and locations regarding counts of the indictment that relate to her. Estella Sims seeks the names of any witnesses the government intends to call to establish the allegations in the indictment pertaining to Sims along with the time, place, and persons present.

Citation | Page(P) | Database | Mode
792 F.Supp. 1120 FOUND DOCUMENT P 1 OF 67 DCT P LOCATE
(Cite as: 792 F.Supp. 1120)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
GARY D. WILLIAMS, Sheila J. Williams, Defendants.
Nos. IP 91-145-CR-01, IP 91-145-CR-02.
United States District Court,
S.D. Indiana,
Indianapolis Division.
April 9, 1992.

Defendants moved to compel discovery in criminal case. The District Court, Tinder, J., held that: (1) statements by coconspirators or codefendants were not discoverable; (2) defendants were not entitled to pretrial discovery of exculpatory material; and (3) "reasonable notice" of general nature of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts that prosecution intends to introduce at trial is at least ten days prior to start of trial.

Motion granted in part and denied in part.

792 F.Supp. 1120 FOUND DOCUMENT P 58 OF 67 DCT P LOCATE
(Cite as: 792 F.Supp. 1120, *1133)

available for examination or copying, or both, by other parties at reasonable time and place. The court may order that they be produced in court.
Fed.R.Evid. 1006.

Request No. 7

[16] Defendants next ask that this court order the Government to produce:

All evidence of similar crimes, wrongs, or acts, allegedly committed by either defendant, upon which the government intends to rely to prove motive, scheme, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, including all documents relating to any such alleged "similar acts."

To support this request, the Defendants offer Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) which regulates the use of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts. [FN17] The rule, regarding the materials requested by the Defendants, requires the prosecution in a criminal case to "provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pre-trial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). The Government states that should it seek the admission of such evidence, "the defendants will be given reasonable notice of the Government's intent to use said evidence prior to trial." In essence, the dispute concerns the precise meaning of the term "reasonable notice" as used in Rule 404(b).

FN17. This rule, as amended and effective December 1, 1991, states: Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.
Fed.R.Evid. 404(b).

The purpose of the pre-trial notice requirement of Rule 404(b) is "to reduce surprise and promote early resolution on the issue of admissibility." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) (Notes of Senate Committee on the Judiciary on the 1991 Amendment). Further, no specific time limits are stated in the rule and instead "what constitutes a reasonable request or disclosure will depend largely on the circumstances." Id. Rule 404(b) clearly requires that the Government provide notice to the defendant in "advance of trial." Id. This Court could, and in certain circumstances may, undertake to weigh and evaluate each particular situation of 404(b) notice presented to determine the content of "reasonable notice." However, the need of a defendant to have notice that 404(b) evidence will be offered seems somewhat similar regardless of the particular case.

Because of this similarity, when a defendant requests the Government to provide the general nature of any evidence which the Government intends to admit for the purposes outlined in Rule 404(b), the Government shall give such notice to the defendant no later than ten days prior to start of the trial. By receiving notice of the general nature of 404(b) evidence ten days before trial, surprise is avoided and the defendant has an adequate opportunity to challenge the admissibility of the information. However, some cases might present facts which necessitate an earlier disclosure of the use of 404(b) evidence. In such a case, a defendant is free to offer to the Court any reason why a deviation from the presumptive ten-day rule is warranted. [FN18] If the Court finds that "reasonable notice" requires greater than ten days, the Court may order the Government to notify the defendant of the general nature of 404(b) evidence earlier than ten days before trial. Similarly, if the Court finds that less than ten days is sufficient or required by 1134 the circumstances of the case, a downward deviation from the presumptive notice is allowable.

FN18. Likewise, the Government may seek to convince the Court that pre-trial notice should be excused. Under rule 404(b), the Court may excuse pre-trial notice "on good cause shown." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b).

[17] In the present case, the Defendants have requested that the Government provide the specific evidence which it intends to offer under Rule 404(b). Again, the Rules of Evidence are not rules of discovery. The purpose of the Rule 404(b) notice provision, to prevent surprise during trial, does not support providing a defendant with materials which the Government possesses and plans to offer at trial. Instead, the Defendants need only receive sufficient notice "to apprise the defense of the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts." Fed.R.Evid. 404 (Notes of Senate Committee on the Judiciary on the 1991 Amendment). Nothing in the rule indicates that the defendant is entitled to receive documents or other evidence from which the Government derives the prior bad act evidence. The Government merely need provide the Defendants with information sufficient to indicate the general nature of the evidence. [FN19] In this instance, the court was not presented with specific facts from which to determine what reasonable notice might entail. In the absence of such specific circumstances, only these general guidelines come into play.

FN19. The notes of the Senate Judiciary Committee on the 1991 Amendment indicate that reasonable notice is a condition precedent to the admissibility of 404(b) evidence. If it is determined that the Government failed to comply with the notice requirements of rule 404(b), a court would seemingly have the discretion to refuse to admit such evidence.

With these specific limits, the Defendants' Request No. 7 will be GRANTED, and the Government is ordered to provide the Defendants notice, as defined above, of any evidence which they intend to introduce under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) no later than ten days prior to the start of trial.

Request No. 8

[18] In their eighth request, Defendants seek:

A list of the witnesses the government intends to call at trial, with any changes in the list of witnesses to be communicated as they are made. With respect to any expert witnesses the government intends to call, the name, address, qualifications, and subject of testimony of such expert, together with a copy of any report prepared by or for him or her, as well as copies of financial, accounting, scientific, technical, or other documents uses as backup by said expert.

Citation | Page(P) | Database | Mode
855 F.Supp. 725 FOUND DOCUMENT | P 1 OF 44 | DCT | P LOCATE

(Cite as: 855 F.Supp. 725)

UNITED STATES of America,
v.
Ronald J. GOLDBERG, Defendant.
No. 4:CR-94-0039.
United States District Court,
M.D. Pennsylvania.
June 21, 1994.

Defendant was charged with falsifying court order. Defendant's court-appointed attorney moved to withdraw. The District Court, McClure, J., held that motion would be granted without allowing for substitution of counsel. Motion granted.

855 F.Supp. 725 FOUND DOCUMENT P 38 OF 44 DCT P LOCATE

(Cite as: 855 F.Supp. 725, *731)

[13] (10) Motion to review all witnesses' statements even if not used at trial by the government. There is no legal authority for this motion, absent Brady, which requires disclosure only of exculpatory evidence, and does not require disclosure of all evidence for defense review.

[14] (11) Motion to produce employment files of Bureau of Prisons personnel and to produce the government's witness list. The defense is not entitled to the government's list of witnesses. Also, staff employment records are confidential, and Goldberg states no legal reason entitling him to have access to such files.

[15] (12) Motion to dismiss the indictment for an illegally constituted grand jury. The grand jury is selected from the same pool of jurors as are petit juries, see generally 28 U.S.C. ss 1861 et seq., in a manner consistent with 28 U.S.C. s 1863. See Jury Selection Plan for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, adopted March 17, 1989, docketed to Misc. No. 89-069.

(13) Motion to produce materials pursuant to Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). These materials are produced pursuant to request directed to the government, not by motion. Regardless, notice was provided by the government on the record. See United States' Notice of Intention to Use Proof of Other Crimes as Evidence (record document no. 24).

[16][17] (14) Motion to dismiss indictment based upon selective prosecution. In order to establish a claim of selective or discriminatory

UNITED STATES of America,
v.
Frank P. ALTIMARI, a/k/a "Alti," Joseph Dinapoli, a/k/a "Joe D.," Julius Ciancola, a/k/a "Junior," and Cynthia Schott, a/k/a "Cindy," Defendants.
No. 93 Cr. 650 (LMM).
United States District Court, S.D. New York.
March 25, 1994.
MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

McKENNA, District Judge.

I.

1 The indictment in this case, returned on August 4, 1993, charges all defendants with conspiring from January of 1983 through October of 1991 to violate 18 U.S.C. s 893 (financing extortionate extensions of credit) (Count One), and defendants Altimari and DiNapoli with conspiring from March of 1990 through October of 1991 to violate 18 U.S.C. s 894 (collections of extensions of credit by extortionate means) (Count Two).

Defendants have made various motions, which are disposed of as follows.

II.

The property whose return Ms. Schott seeks is the "Disputed Property" also sought by Mr. Altimari. Her motion is granted along with his, for the reasons set forth in Section II.5., above.

VI.

Defendants and counsel will appear on March 31, 1994 at 9:30 A.M. for a conference at which the Court will set a trial date.

SO ORDERED.

FN1. The indictment does, however, allege overt acts--two meetings--in which Mr. Altimari is said to have participated in 1990. P 4(1) and (m).

FN2. He also asks that the government be required to furnish "those acts to be considered as similar act evidence under [Fed.R.Evid. 404(b)]." Id. at 12-13. As to this category of information, Rule 404(b) supplies the answer to his motion: "upon request by the accused [which the Court finds to have been made], the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial ... of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). The government will, not less than 15 days before trial, advise all defendants, in writing and in an understandable manner, of the specific prior act evidence it intends to offer as to each.

Citation | Page(P) | Database | Mode
837 F.Supp. 570 FOUND DOCUMENT P 1 OF 25 DCT P LOCATE

(Cite as: 837 F.Supp. 570)

UNITED STATES of America
v.
Elgin RICHARDSON, a/k/a "David Lee," Defendant.
No. 93 Cr. 717 (CSH).
United States District Court,
S.D. New York.
Nov. 17, 1993.

Defendant was charged with mail theft, armed assault of mail carrier, possession of stolen mail, and use of firearm during and in relation to crime of violence. On motion to suppress, the District Court, Haight, J., held that: (1) evidentiary hearing would be conducted on factual disputes raised in motion to suppress statements; (2) pretrial identification procedure was not unduly suggestive; (3) handwriting exemplars were admissible; and (4) government would not be required to provide defendant with detailed notice of other acts evidence to be introduced at trial.

Ordered accordingly.

837 F.Supp. 570 FOUND DOCUMENT P 23 OF 25 DCT P LOCATE

(Cite as: 837 F.Supp. 570, *575)

connection is the fact that defendant's alleged possession of forged documents led to his arrest on the federal charges.

I conclude that because defendant had not yet been indicted or arraigned on the federal offenses, defendant's right to counsel had not attached at the time of the request for handwriting exemplars notwithstanding defendant's representation by counsel on pending unrelated state charges. Therefore, defendant's right to counsel was not violated by the postal inspectors' request for provision of handwriting exemplars without first notifying his counsel on the state charges. Defendant's motion to suppress the handwriting exemplars is accordingly denied, as is his request for an evidentiary hearing.

Defendant requests that in the event the Court declines to suppress the exemplars, the Court direct the government to provide defendant with any reports concerning his handwriting exemplars. The government does not object to this request. See Government's Memorandum at 10. Accordingly, the government is directed to provide any such reports in a timely fashion.

Rule 404(b) Notice of Introduction of Defendant's Extrinsic Acts

[10] Defendant finally moves this Court to direct the government to provide defendant notice of any prior bad acts of defendant it intends to introduce at trial. The government notes that defendant appears to seek notice under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). Rule 404(b) requires that "upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial ... of the general nature of any [evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts of the accused] it intends to introduce at trial." The government has agreed to comply with the requirements of Rule 404(b) and represents that it will provide defendant with such notice within at least 10 days of trial if it intends to seek the admission of evidence contemplated by that rule. Government's Memorandum at 10. Defendant objects to the government's agreement to provide notice of only the "general nature" of the extrinsic act evidence it intends to admit and requests that the government be directed to provide notice of the "specifics of prior bad acts."

I will not direct that the government provide more than notice of the "general nature" of the extrinsic acts evidence it will seek to admit because that is all that is required by the specific language of Rule 404(b) and it is 576 sufficient to allow the defendant to adequately prepare for trial. See e.g. United States v. Williams, 792 F.Supp 1120, 1134 (S.D.Ind.1992) (Rule 404(b) requires only provision of "information sufficient to indicate the general nature of the evidence.")

Accordingly, since the government does not object to the request, the government is directed to provide any such notice within 10 days of trial, which is a reasonable amount of time. See id.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, defendant's motion is denied in its entirety.

It is SO ORDERED.

END OF DOCUMENT

UNITED STATES of America,
v.
Alvin MELENDEZ, Defendant.

No. 92 CRIM. 047 (LMM).

United States District Court, S.D. New York.

April 24, 1992.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

McKENNA, District Judge.

1 Defendant's pretrial motions are disposed of as follows:

1. The government will advise defendant in writing not later than 14 days before trial of the "general nature" of evidence it intends to offer as to other crimes, wrongs, or acts, whether during the government's direct case, during cross-examination of defendant should he testify, or during the government's rebuttal case. Fed.R.Ev. 404(b) (amended effective December 1, 1991).

Neither Rule 404(b) as amended nor the Advisory Committee note is particularly helpful as to what is meant by "general nature." The parties have not cited case law construing the phrase as used in the amended Rule, nor has research disclosed any. The amendment, according to the Advisory Committee, "is intended to reduce surprise and promote early resolution on the issue of admissibility." At the same time, the Advisory Committee does not appear to contemplate that a Rule 404(b) notice need include "the specifics of such evidence which the court must consider in determining admissibility," since it refers to such specifics as something the Court may require to be disclosed in ruling in limine, a step to follow upon the notice. In the Court's view, Rule 404(b) will be satisfied if the notice to be given by the government identifies each crime, wrong or act by its specific nature (e.g., sale of cocaine), place (e.g., New York City), and approximate date (e.g., July 1986), to the extent known to the government.

2. The government states that, as far as its direct case is concerned, it intends to offer "the January 1990 tapes; evidence of occasions (on or about June 25, 1990, and July 2, 1990) on which the defendant asked the confidential informant to hold or deliver guns for him; and testimony from the informant that he saw guns in the defendant's apartment on or about June 28, 1990." Gov't Letter Brief at 2 (footnote omitted).

It appears to be defendant's position that "the CI was an agent provocateur and that everything he did on July 2, 1990 [the date of the charged offense], including the receipt of money, was done at the behest of the CI and as an accommodation to him." Ostrow Aff. at 6. See also Def's. Mem. at 3. It seems entirely possible that, once raised, such a defense--essentially of lack of intent to possess the weapon--could render admissible under Rule 404(b) the evidence cited in the government's Letter Brief. The Court cannot, however, at this time, determine precisely when and how the issue will be raised, if it is. On the present record, the evidence will not be admitted on the government's direct case, but the Court will discuss the issue with counsel prior to the commencement of trial. Defendant's intended opening is, among other things, relevant to whether the evidence might become admissible on the government's direct case.

3. All applications to exclude evidence during the cross-examination of defendant should he testify, or during the government's rebuttal case, if any, are reserved until the close of the government's direct case, when they can be considered in the context of an actual record.

2 4. The government has agreed to stipulate "without identifying the nature of the felony conviction, that the defendant has been convicted of a felony." Letter brief at 6. In the Court's view, the information contained in the stipulation offered by the government (to which defendant may, if he wishes, add the date of the conviction) must be put to the jury. See Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 313, 105 S.Ct. 1965, 1970 (1988).

SO ORDERED.

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation | Rank(R) | Page(P) | Database | Mode
144 F.R.D. 631 | R 4 OF 4 | P 1 OF 63 | ALLFEDS | Page
(Cite as: 144 F.R.D. 631)

UNITED STATES of America
v.
Donald GREEN, Norman Workman, Clayton Green, Judy Spidell Green, Anita Workman, Mia Ayers, Marilyn Barnes, John Bolden, Clyde Brooks, Lamar Brown, Howard Doran, Robert Felder, Jackie Fuller, Kevin Green, Carlos Herrera, Darryl Johnson, Nesbit E. Lee, Jose Lopez, Joe Mathews, Angelo Martinez, Lisa Medina, Doris Parker, Derwin Rodgers, Harold Smallwood, Terrence Taylor, Patricia Thomas, Defendants.
No. 92-CR-159C.
United States District Court,
W.D. New York.
Oct. 30, 1992.

In prosecution of 26 defendants for various offenses relating to alleged narcotics and racketeering conspiracy, defendants filed joint motion for discovery. The District Court, Heckman, United States Magistrate Judge, held that: (1) counsel for each defendant were entitled to their own set of documents, exceptional circumstances justified order that government bear costs of copying full set of documents, including transcripts, for the defendants who were indigent, and government was to reimburse lead defense counsel for costs of copying tape recordings government intended to use at trial in proportion to Giglio material is of such significance that it must be provided to the defendant well in advance of the trial so as "to allow the defense to use the favorable material effectively in the preparation and presentation of its case." United States v. Pollack, 534 F.2d at 973; see United States v. Bejasa, 904 F.2d at 140-41; Grant v. Alldredge, 498 F.2d at 381-82. Other Brady and Giglio material should be disclosed with the 3500 material, which in the context of this case is at least 30 days prior to jury selection. United States v. Feola, 651 F.Supp. at 1135-36; see also, United States v. Bestway Disposal Corporation, 681 F.Supp. 1027, 1130 (W.D.N.Y.1988).

XII. PRETRIAL DISCLOSURE OF 404(b) EVIDENCE

[23][24] Defendants have moved for pretrial disclosure of any evidence the government intends to use pursuant to Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence. Specifically, defendants seek evidence of "any alleged criminal or immoral conduct on the part of any defendant intended to be used against any defendant on the government's direct or rebuttal case or an examination of any defendant who might testify at trial." The government has agreed to provide this evidence two weeks before commencement of trial and at an earlier date when possible.

Rule 404(b) requires the prosecution in a criminal case to provide "reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial evidence that might be used to impeach Watson. The Assistant U.S. Attorney, however, did not disclose the content of Pate's statements to Watson about the earlier underweight drug shipment.

Later that morning, while Watson was on the witness stand, the prosecutor asked about the conversation with Pate. Watson responded, "We was talking about drugs coming through the UPS and that it was hard to trust people that was far away sending you drugs, and he stated that the last package he'd received was short. It was supposed ..." At that point, the trial judge called counsel to the bench. Defense counsel then objected to the testimony as involving "other crimes or wrongs" evidence about which it had received no prior notice from the government.

The trial judge reprimanded the Assistant U.S. Attorney for attempting to introduce evidence under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b) without giving advance notice to the court in accordance with local practice. The judge questioned, however, whether defense counsel had properly requested notice as required by the Rule. After making various findings, the trial judge ruled that the evidence was "intrinsically related" to the acts charged in the indictment and also that the evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b), although he was troubled by the government's failure to give notice of its intention to introduce Pate's admission to Watson.

Barnes was convicted of possession with intent to distribute methamphetamine in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1) and of carrying a firearm during the commission of a drug trafficking crime in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 924(c). Pate, too, was convicted on the drug charge but was acquitted on the count alleging possession of a firearm during the commission of a drug trafficking offense. However, Pate was convicted on an additional count asserting that he violated 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1) (possession of a firearm by a convicted felon).

Barnes was sentenced to consecutive sentences aggregating 181 months. Because of his prior conviction for a felony narcotics offense, Pate received the mandatory minimum sentence of 240 months on the drug possession charge. Additionally, Pate received a concurrent sentence of 120 months on the count charging firearm possession by a convicted felon.

Both defendants have appealed the trial court's ruling on Watson's testimony. Pate has also appealed his sentence, contending that because the jury acquitted him of possessing a firearm during the commission of the drug offense, he should not have been given a two-level enhancement in calculating his sentence under U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1(b)(1) (1992).

1147 I.

Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b), with certain exceptions, prohibits the admission of evidence of other crimes or wrongs "to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith." In 1991, the Rule was amended to provide that if evidence is admissible for other reasons, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, identity, etc., "upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b).

The Advisory Committee explained that the amendment "is intended to reduce surprise and promote early resolution on the issue of admissibility. The notice requirement thus places Rule 404(b) in the mainstream with notice and disclosure provisions in other rules of evidence." Id. Advisory Committee's note (1991 amendment).

Although it does not call for any specific form of notice, "[t]he Rule expects that counsel for both the defense and the prosecution will submit the necessary request and information in a reasonable and timely fashion." Id. The court has the discretion to determine reasonableness under the circumstances, but the Committee note cautioned that "[b]ecause the notice requirement serves as [a] condition precedent to admissibility of 404(b) evidence, the offered evidence is inadmissible if the court decides that the notice requirement has not been met." Id.

A respected commentary points out that the amendment provides no specific sanction for the failure to give notice, that the notice must be of a "general nature," and that compliance can be delayed until trial if the court finds "good cause." 22 Charles A. Wright & Kenneth W. Graham, Jr.,

Federal Practice & Procedure § 5249, at 580 (Supp.1994). "This was apparently as much notice as the Justice Department was willing to tolerate; it remains to be seen if it will be of much use to criminal defendants." Id. The amendment, but another small step toward improving the discovery process in criminal trials, has not been in effect for very long and, understandably, has received little appellate scrutiny.

In United States v. Tuesta-Toro, 29 F.3d 771 (1st Cir.1994), the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit concluded that a request for notification "must be sufficiently clear and particular, in an objective sense, fairly to alert the prosecution that the defense is requesting pretrial notification...." Id. at 774. In that case, an omnibus defense motion requesting "confessions, admissions and statements ... that in any way exculpate, inculpate or refer to the defendant" was held to be insufficient to comply with Rule 404(b). Id.

In United States v. Matthews, 20 F.3d 538, 551 (2d Cir.1994), the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit concluded that the government was not required to furnish pretrial notice of its intention to introduce testimony about a defendant's prior assault on one of its witnesses. In that case, the evidence was introduced on re-direct examination by the government to bolster the credibility of a witness whose character had been vigorously attacked during cross-examination. However, it is questionable whether Rule 404(b) even applied in that instance.

The Court commented that the witness was a confidential informant and that Rule 404(b) did not require disclosure of her name to the defense. Revealing the "other crimes or wrongs" testimony would have unmistakably identified the witness, and notice before trial, therefore, would have disclosed the name of the informant. In that situation, pretrial disclosure should have been a matter for the trial court's discretion in weighing all the pertinent factors.

Probably because the point was not raised, Matthews did not discuss the applicability of the Rule 404(b) notice requirement after the trial had begun and the confidential informant had already taken the stand. Although the opinion on the notice requirement is vague, it would seem that once the identity of the witness had become known, no further reason would exist to excuse the government's obligation to disclose the "other crimes" evidence.

1148 Rule 404(b) does not discuss at what point, in ordinary circumstances, notice must be given and a response filed. In United States v. Kern, 12 F.3d 122, 124 (8th Cir.1993), the magistrate judge directed the government at a pretrial conference to furnish Rule 404(b) information at least fourteen days before trial. However, because the government was unable to obtain the necessary records until one week before the trial began, the court found that the notification at that point to the defense was reasonable.

In United States v. French, 974 F.2d 687, 694-95 (6th Cir.1992), the government notified the defense one week before trial of its intent to produce "other crimes" evidence. Although the trial apparently had taken place before the adoption of the 1991 amendment to Rule 404(b), we concluded that the district court's approval of a one-week notice to the defense did not amount to an abuse of discretion under the circumstances. See also United States v. Sutton, 41 F.3d 1257, 1258-59 (8th Cir.1994); United States v. Perez-Tosta, 36 F.3d 1552, 1560-63 (11th Cir.1994).

[1][2] Rule 404(b) does not recite whether there is a continuing obligation to disclose "other crimes" evidence that the government discovers after it has initially either provided or denied its intent to use such information. However, Fed.R.Crim.P. 16(c), referring to discovery in criminal cases, has long required a party to disclose additional evidence discovered after a previous request for information has been answered. Although Fed.R.Crim.P. 16(c) refers to evidence or material "subject to discovery or inspection under this rule," we believe that for reasons of efficiency and fairness, a similar continuing obligation to disclose applies to Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). [FN1] A contrary reading would force the defense to make numerous, periodic requests until the trial has been completed--surely a wasteful procedure.

FN1. See also Fed.R.Evid. 102 (rules of evidence should be construed to promote fairness and efficiency); Fed.R.Evid. 412(c)(1) (written notice required 15 days in advance of trial); Fed.R.Evid. 609(b) (written notice required to be given to adverse party with a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence); Fed.R.Evid. 803(24) (advance notice required to give adverse party a fair opportunity to meet the evidence); Fed.R.Evid. 804(b)(5) (same).

In Tuesta-Toro, 29 F.3d at 775 n. 1, the Court speculated in a footnote that Rule 404(b), as drafted, might be read as requiring the government to provide information only as of the time the response was made. The Court, however, expressly did not decide the point.

After due consideration, we conclude that Rule 404(b) does place an initial duty on the defense to request the prosecution to furnish "other crimes" evidence. The request need not be in technical terms, but it must be such as to be, in an objective sense, reasonably understandable. Once made, the request imposes a continuing obligation on the government to comply with the notice requirement of Rule 404(b) whenever it discovers information that meets the previous request.

[3] The trial court must exercise its discretion in determining whether the government is excused from submitting a timely response or whether the circumstances are such that compliance must await further events. Factors for consideration might include a concern about the identification of a confidential informant or a credible belief that the protection of a witness is required.

In the case at hand, we are troubled--as was the trial judge--by the government's failure to disclose the asserted Rule 404(b) evidence before the witness was questioned in front of the jury. Although we credit the government's position that it did not learn of the specific evidence until the trial was already in progress, the defense and the trial court could nevertheless have been notified before Watson took the stand.

There is also difficulty with the defense's contention that it submitted a suitable request under Rule 404(b). Although we do not insist on a request that specifically cites Rule 404(b), cf. United States v. Williams, 792 F.Supp. 1120, 1133-34 (S.D.Ind.1992), United States v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 728-29 (N.D.Ill.1992), we agree with Tuesta-Toro that an overly broad and generalized discovery request does not comply with the Rule.

[4] By the same token, however, the government's notice must characterize the prior 1149 conduct to a degree that fairly apprises the defendant of its general nature. United States v. Birch, 39 F.3d 1089, 1093-94 (10th Cir.1994); United States v. Jackson, 850 F.Supp. 1481, 1493 (D.Kan.1994). Moreover, the notice given to the defense regarding "other crimes" evidence must be sufficiently clear so as "to permit pretrial resolution of the issue of its admissibility." United States v. Long, 814 F.Supp. 72, 74 (D.Kan.1993). See generally Colleen A. O'Leary et al., Project, Eighth Survey of White Collar Crime: Discovery, 30 Am.Crim.L.Rev. 1049, 1075-78 (1993). The notice requirement is now firmly embedded in Rule 404(b), and courts should rebuff efforts to nullify the Rule's aim of enhancing fairness in criminal trials.

In this case, the defense simply asked for a list of witnesses the government intended to call and their anticipated testimony. That request was so broad that it is questionable that it should have fairly alerted the government to supply evidence under Rule 404(b). We do note, however, that the government represented in its pretrial statement that it was "unaware of any specific trial problems which should be anticipated by the Court." Although we might expect Rule 404(b) admissibility to fall into such a category, the lesson that might be gleaned from this case is that it is more prudent for defense counsel to include a reference to Rule 404(b) in the boilerplate request for discovery under Fed.R.Crim.P. 16.

[5][6] Although the defendants have vigorously pressed this case on the basis of the government's failure to supply Rule 404(b) information, we prefer to follow another route--that the disputed testimony was not within the scope of the Rule. In United States v. Torres, 685 F.2d 921, 924 (5th Cir.1982) (per curiam), the Court of Appeals explained that Rule 404(b) does not apply where the challenged evidence is "inextricably intertwined" with evidence of the crime charged in the indictment.

When the other crimes or wrongs occurred at different times and under different circumstances from the offense charged, the deeds are termed "extrinsic." "Intrinsic" acts, on the other hand, are those that are part of a single criminal episode. Rule 404(b) is not implicated when the other crimes or wrongs evidence is part of a continuing pattern of illegal activity. When that circumstance applies, the government has no duty to disclose the other crimes or wrongs evidence.

The 1991 Advisory Committee note to Rule 404(b) is in agreement: "The amendment does not extend to evidence of acts which are 'intrinsic' to the charged offense, see United States v. Williams, 900 F.2d 823 (5th Cir.1990)...." For similar holdings, see United States v. Dozie, 27 F.3d 95, 97 (4th Cir.1994) (per curiam), United States v. Nicholson, 17 F.3d 1294, 1298 (10th Cir.1994), United States v. Sparks, 2 F.3d 574, 581 (5th Cir.1993), and United States v. Lambert, 995 F.2d 1006, 1007-08 (10th Cir.1993).

In this case, there was a direct connection between the earlier "short" drug shipment and the receipt of the one for which defendants were charged. The trial court concluded that the evidence could stand for the proposition that the drugs which were the subject of the indictment were "to make up for a prior shipment which was short." We agree that the challenged testimony was intrinsic to the conduct alleged in the indictment, and consequently, Rule 404(b) was not implicated. We therefore reject the defendants' contention that the introduction of Watson's testimony was erroneous. [FN2]

> FN2. We also find no merit in the defendants' contention that Watson's testimony was inadmissible under Fed.R.Evid. 403.

II.

[7] Defendant Pate has raised an additional issue, a challenge to his sentence. As noted earlier, Pate was acquitted of the charge of using or carrying a firearm during the commission of a drug trafficking offense, 18 U.S.C. § 924(c), but was found guilty of being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm, 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1).

During the sentencing hearing, the trial judge stated that he intended to apply a two-level increase to the Guideline computation 1150 pursuant to U.S.S.G. § 2D1.1(b)(1). The judge pointed out that he was not sentencing under the count on which defendant had been acquitted, but "with the evidence that I have in front of me on this matter, I will find that he did possess this weapon in the commission of this offense ...," and accordingly, the enhancement was proper.

Section 2D1.1(b)(1) provides that "[i]f a dangerous weapon (including a firearm) was possessed [during the commission of a drug offense], increase by 2 levels." In United States v. Duncan, 918 F.2d 647, 652 (6th Cir.1990), a case similar to the one before us, we held that the sentencing judge properly applied the enhancement notwithstanding the fact that the jury had found the defendant not guilty of the charge of violating 18 U.S.C. § 924(c), the same section pertinent here. Hence, it is clear that Duncan controls, and we must reject Pate's attack on his sentence.

[8][9] Even if we were to conclude that Duncan is not dispositive on this issue, we observe that the district court properly sentenced Pate to 240 months imprisonment. When the maximum Guideline sentence is less than the statutorily required mandatory minimum, the latter is the effective sentence. U.S.S.G. § 5G1.1(b) (1992); see also United States v. Goff, 6 F.3d 363, 366-67 (6th Cir.1993). Because Pate had previously been convicted of a felony drug violation and the current offense involved more than one kilogram of a methamphetamine substance, the district court was required to apply the 20-year mandatory minimum in 21 U.S.C. § 841(b)(1)(A)(viii). Even assuming that the enhancement should not have been applied, the applicable Guideline range would have been less than the mandatory minimum, and consequently, even if considered to be an error, adding the enhancement had no effect on Pate's sentence.

Accordingly, the judgments of the district court will be affirmed.

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation 30 AMCRLR 1049 (Cite as: 30 Am. Crim. L. Rev. 1049) FOUND DOCUMENT Page(P) P 1 OF 85 Database AMCRLR Mode P LOCATE

American Criminal Law Review
Spring, 1993

Eighth Survey of White Collar Crime
Procedural Issues

*1049 DISCOVERY

Colleen A. O'Leary
Kelly G. LaPorte
Jacob Schatz

I. CONSTITUTIONAL REQUIREMENTS OF DISCOVERY 1050
A. The Brady Doctrine: Exculpatory Evidence 1050
B. Materiality 1050

of materials the government seeks will produce information relevant to the general subject of the grand jury's investigation." [FN216]

A trial court has wide discretion in deciding whether to grant a motion to quash or modify a Rule 17(c) subpoena, and the court's decision is not immediately appealable. [FN217] Appellate review is limited to whether the trial *1075 court abused its discretion. [FN218]

Along with the Jencks Act and Rules 16 and 26.2 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Rule 17 provides an additional means for the production of evidentiary material in any criminal proceeding. The rule implicates a number of constitutional safeguards which ensure a defendant's access to witnesses and documents and protect a defendant from unreasonable or oppressive government subpoenas.

V. FEDERAL RULE OF EVIDENCE 404(b)

More than a decade after the District of Columbia Court of Appeals suggested "that in future cases the Government exercise the discretion given it by Fed. R. Crim. P. 12(b)(1) and notify the defense before trial of its intention to introduce any evidence of prior bad acts," [FN219] Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) was amended to mandate such pretrial notification, now allowing evidence of other acts "be admissible ..., provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." [FN220]

Because Rule 404(b) is one of the most cited Rules of Evidence, [FN221] the notice requirement adds a crucial step in criminal proceedings with the intent "to reduce surprise and promote early resolution on the issue of admissibility." [FN222] To fulfill this intent, the amended rule requires the accused to first request that notice be given in order to trigger the requirement of notice. [FN223] Failure to make a request may operate as a pre-waiver by the defendant. With the introduction of the amended Rule 404(b) pre-trial notice requirement, the following four issues may arise as to whether the evidence offered under Rule 404(b) is admissible: (1) Was notice given at all? (2) If notice was given in advance of trial, was the notice "reasonable?" (3) If the notice was given during trial, did the court excuse pre-trial notice on "good cause shown?" (4) Did the notice include the "general nature" of the evidence offered at trial?

Other Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 412 (written motion of intent 1076 required to offer evidence under rule), Rule 609(b) (written notice of intent required to offer conviction older than ten years), and Rules 803(24) and 804(b)(5) (notice of intent required to use residual hearsay exceptions) have similar pre-notice requirements which Rule 404(b) may ultimately parallel.

A. Remedial Exclusion

The most contentious issue to arise from the newly amended rule is the admissibility of evidence offered by the prosecution when notice has not been given. Although Rule 404(b) may implicate exclusion, federal courts are split on how rigidly to apply similar notice requirements. The First Circuit took a strict view in United States v. Benavente Gomez, stating "[i]t seems to us clear that, in a criminal case, where no explanation for failing to meet the notice requirement [in Federal Rule of Evidence 803(24)] has been made ... a party may not avoid the requirements of the specific rule ... simply by reading the notice requirement out of existence." [FN224] Other federal appellate courts have taken a similarly literal view of notice requirements, such as the Second Circuit in United States v. Ruffin [FN225] and United States v. Oates [FN226] and the Fifth Circuit in United States v. Davis. [FN227]

On the other hand, several circuits have argued that a flexible approach should be taken in considering whether or not to admit evidence when no required notice was given. This approach has been taken by the First Circuit in United States v. Doe, [FN228] the Second Circuit in United States v. Iaconetti, [FN229] and the Fifth Circuit in United States v. Leslie. [FN230] The courts in these cases have tended to be more flexible in admitting evidence prior to trial.

1077 B. "Reasonable Notice"

The reasonableness of notice given depends upon the timing of the notice and the manner in which notice was given. The Ninth Circuit, in United States v. Brown, held that the required notice for Rule 803(24) must be given "sufficiently in advance of trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to meet it." [FN231] In Mutuelles Unies v. Kroll and Lindstrom, the same court viewed notice given three days prior to trial as adequate. [FN232] For notice given during trial, the First Circuit held in United States v. Panzardi-Lespier that sufficient notice was given after the initiation of proceedings but seven days before the specific evidence was introduced at trial. [FN233]

Though the timing of the notice may be sufficient, the manner of notification given might be unsatisfactory. The Third Circuit held in both United States v. Furst [FN234] and in United States v. Pelullo [FN235] that the notice provision requires "the proponent to give notice of its intention specifically to rely on the rule as grounds for admissibility." [FN236] In Pelullo, the government gave documents to Pelullo months before trial but did not state that the evidence would be introduced under Rule 803(24) as the basis for admissibility; [FN237] the Third Circuit barred admission of the evidence: "Although the Federal Rules of Evidence are to be liberally construed in favor of admissibility, this does not mean that we may ignore requirements of specific provisions ...." [FN238] However, the First Circuit in United States v. Benavente Gomez [FN239] held that notification of the existence of the evidence alone constituted sufficient notification.

C. "Good Cause" Shown for Notice Given During Trial

The standard adopted by the First Circuit in admitting evidence with 1078 notice given during trial is enunciated in United States v. Doe, where the court stated that a "flexible approach is warranted only when pretrial notice is wholly impractical." [FN240]

For notice given during trial, there still must be adequate time for the adverse party to challenge the proposed evidence; in Doe, the First Circuit stated that "even under a flexible approach, evidence should be admitted only when the proponent is not responsible for the delay and the adverse party has an adequate opportunity to examine and respond to the evidence." [FN241]

D. "General Notice" of the Evidence

Another manner in which notice may fail to satisfy the requirements of Rule 404(b) is when the notification is not specific enough to allow the accused to identify the content of the evidence sought to be introduced. In United States v. Chu Kong Yin, the Ninth Circuit held that notice under Rule 803(24) which did not include the identity and the addresses of declarants of the hearsay evidence made the notice unsatisfactory and barred introduction of that evidence. [FN242]

FN1. Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 559 (1977) (noting that the Due Process Clause has little to say regarding the amount of discovery which the parties must be afforded).

FN2. 373 U.S. 83 (1963).

FN3. Id. at 87-88 (suppression by prosecution of evidence favorable to accused violates due process); see also United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 675 (1985) (Blackmun, J.) (prosecutor is required only to disclose evidence that, if suppressed, would deprive defendant of a fair trial).

FN4. 18 U.S.C. s 3500 (1982).

FN5. FED. R. CRIM. P. 16, 17, 26.2

FN6. In addition, the Freedom of Information Act may provide a useful tool for compelling disclosure of federal agency records. 5 U.S.C. s 552 (1988).

FN218. See United States v. Arditti, 955 F.2d 331, 345 (5th Cir. 1991) (trial court did not abuse its discretion in quashing the Rule 17(c) subpoena).

FN219. United States v. Foskey, 636 F.2d 517, 526 n.8 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (evidence of prior arrest for possession of drugs inadmissible in illegal possession of drugs trial).

FN220. FED. R. EVID. 404(b).

FN221. See generally EDWARD IMWINKELRIED, UNCHARGED MISCONDUCT EVIDENCE (1984) (discussing the importance and heavy reliance on Rule 404(b)).

FN222. SENATE COMM. ON JUDICIARY, FED. RULES OF EVIDENCE, S. REP. NO. 1277, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 24 (1974) (committee comment on amended Rule 404(b)).

FN223. A notice request may, therefore, become a standard element of defendants' discovery requests.

FN224. United States v. Benavente Gomez, 921 F.2d 378, 384-85 (1st Cir. 1990) (cocaine conspiracy case where admission into evidence of telephone records under residual hearsay exception was error).

FN225. 575 F.2d 346, 357-58 (2d Cir. 1978) (income tax evasion case where Internal Revenue Service printout was inadmissible hearsay).

FN226. 560 F.2d 45, 72 n.30 (2d Cir. 1977) (possession with intent to distribute heroin case where United States Customs chemist's statement deemed inadmissible hearsay).

FN227. 571 F.2d 1354, 1360 n.11 (5th Cir. 1978) (illegal possession of firearm case where form documents from a government bureau were not admissible within hearsay exception).

FN228. 860 F.2d 488, 491-92 (1st Cir. 1988) (rape shield case which reiterated importance of notice requirement).

FN229. 540 F.2d 574, 578, n.6 (2d Cir. 1976) (bribe solicitation case where a business partner's account of what was said to the company president deemed not inadmissible hearsay), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1041 (1977).

FN230. 542 F.2d 285, 291 (5th Cir. 1976) (transportation of stolen automobile case where statements previously given to the FBI by accomplices were admissible).

FN231. United States v. Brown, 770 F.2d 768, 771 (9th Cir. 1985) (drug offense case where defendant's passports were admissible under the general exception to the hearsay rule).

FN232. Mutuelles Unies v. Kroll and Lindstrom, 957 F.2d 707, 713 (9th Cir. 1992) (French corporation's legal malpractice action against American law firm where unavailable witness's statement deemed admissible).

FN233. United States v. Panzardi-Lespier, 918 F.2d 313 (1st Cir. 1990) (conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute heroin case where tape recordings made by informant held admissible).

FN234. 886 F.2d 558, 574 (3d Cir. 1989) (embezzlement case where evidentiary ruling errors held harmless).

FN235. 964 F.2d 193, 202 (3d Cir. 1992) (wire fraud and racketeering case where documents not admissible under residual hearsay exception).

FN236. Id.

FN237. Id.; see also United States v. Tafollo-Cardenas, 897 F.2d 976, 980 (9th Cir. 1990) (prosecutor must give notice of Rule 803(24) as basis for admissibility).

FN238. United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d at 204.

FN239. 921 F.2d 378, 384 (1st Cir. 1990) (cocaine conspiracy case where error of admitting evidence of phone records did not require reversal).

FN240. United States v. Doe, 860 F.2d 488, 492 n.3 (1st Cir. 1988).

FN241. Id.

FN242. United States v. Chu Kong Yin, 935 F.2d 990, 1000 (9th Cir. 1991) (immigration case where government's introduction of Hong Kong records were inadmissible hearsay).

END OF DOCUMENT

CLIENT IDENTIFIER: EHJ
DATE OF REQUEST: 07/11/95
THE CURRENT DATABASE IS DCT

Citation | Page(P) | Database | Mode
813 F.Supp. 294 FOUND DOCUMENT P 1 OF 37 FED3-ALL Page
36 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 1523
(Cite as: 813 F.Supp. 294)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Mark EVANGELISTA, et al., Defendants.
Crim. No. 92-503.
United States District Court,
D. New Jersey.
Jan. 7, 1993.

Defendants moved for severance and for production of evidence. The District Court, Irenas, J., held that: (1) defendant's confession could be sufficiently redacted to be admissible without violating confrontation rights of codefendants; (2) defendants were not entitled to production of list of government's witnesses; and (3) production of Jencks Act material on the eve of trial was soon enough.

Ordered accordingly.

At oral argument, the government offered to provide defendants with all Jencks Act material on the eve of trial. While the government was clearly under no legal obligation to do so, the court is persuaded that this offer strikes an appropriate balance and will order production of Jencks Act material on Friday, January 8, 1992.

D. Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) Material

[8] Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) was amended effective December 1, 1991 to require the prosecution in a criminal case to "provide reasonable notice in advance of trial" of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial. Cases interpreting the phrase "reasonable notice" are few in number so far.

In U.S. v. Williams, 792 F.Supp 1120, 1133 (S.D.Ind.1992), the court held that ten days prior to trial would be the reasonable period for advance notice required under the amendment. In U.S. v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 729 (N.D.Ill.1992), the court held seven days would be reasonable advance notice.

At oral argument the government offered to provide this information to defendants 7 or 10 days in advance of trial. Because the alleged incidents occurred more than five years ago, defendants' preparation to respond to the government's Rule 404(b) material may require more effort than if the incidents had occurred more recently. The court will order the government to provide this information to defendants and the court on Monday, December 28, 1992 (10 business days prior to trial, excluding weekends but not excluding New Year's Day).

E. Witness List and Tape Recording

[9][10] It is well established that criminal defendants have no right in advance of trial to see a list of witnesses the prosecution will or may call. Government of the Virgin Islands v. Martinez, 847 F.2d 125, 128 (3d Cir.1988) (government is not required to disclose names of witnesses in non-capital cases, but trial court in its discretion may order such discovery); United States v. White, 750 F.2d 726, 728 (8th Cir.1984) (defendants have no right to such pretrial discovery, but in its discretion district court may order it); U.S. v. Zolp, 659 F.Supp 692 (D.N.J.1987); U.S. v. Vastola, 670 F.Supp 1244, 1268 (D.N.J.1987) (witness lists and statements of non-testifying witnesses not required to be disclosed as Brady material). The court will not order the government to disclose its list of prospective witnesses.

The court need not rule on defendant's request for a copy of the tape recording of a consensually recorded conversation between defendant, Mark Evangelista, and one David Pachucki because the government has provided defendants with a copy which defense counsel stated was audible. [FN12]

FN12. Additionally the court instructed counsel that transcripts of any recorded conversations that any party intends to use at trial must be prepared well in advance of trial, and the transcript of the Evangelista and Pachucki recording must be delivered to the court by close of business on December 24, 1992.

The court will enter an appropriate order in conformance with this opinion.

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation | Page(P) | Database | Mode
855 F.Supp. 955 CITING CASE | P 1 OF 68 | FED7-ALL | Page

(Cite as: 855 F.Supp. 955)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Christopher R. MESSINO, Clement A. Messino, Michael Homerding, Donald Southern, William Underwood, Christopher B. Messino, Blaise Messino, Paul Messino, Thomas Hauck, Gary Chrystall, Daniel Shoemaker, and Lawrence Thomas, Defendants.

No. 93 CR 294.

United States District Court,
N.D. Illinois,
Eastern Division.

June 24, 1994.

Defendants charged with drug and money laundering conspiracy filed various pretrial motions. The District Court, Alesia, J., held that: (1) hearing was required on motion to suppress evidence seized and removed from defendant's home pursuant to warrant obtained ex parte pursuant to civil forfeiture proceeding; (2) grand juror's misconduct did not require dismissal of indictment; and (3) defendants were not entitled to severance.

Motions granted in part, denied in part, and referred in part.

855 F.Supp. 955 CITING CASE | P 46 OF 68 | FED7-ALL | Page

(Cite as: 855 F.Supp. 955, *965)

Thereof is granted.

11. Defendant Christopher Richard Messino's Motion for Access to Original Tape-recordings and Physical Evidence

The government has agreed to comply with defendant's request. Accordingly, Defendant Christopher Richard Messino's Motion for Access to Original Tape-recordings and Physical Evidence is denied as moot.

12. Defendant Christopher Richard Messino's Motion to Compel MCC to Make a Tape-recorder Available to Defendant and Counsel

The government represents that the MCC (Metropolitan Correctional Center) is complying with defendant's request. Accordingly, Defendant Christopher Richard Messino's Motion to Compel MCC to Make a Tape-recorder Available to Defendant and Counsel is denied as moot.

13. Motions for Notice of Government's Intention to Introduce Certain Specified Categories of Evidence

Defendant Michael Homerding has moved for an order that the government reveal any intention to introduce Rule 404(b) evidence. Defendants Clement Messino, Donald Southern, Thomas Hauck, and Daniel Shoemaker have filed similar motions, with the added element of seeking evidence under Rule 608. Finally Christopher Richard Messino and William Underwood have filed a motion seeking Rule 404(b) evidence, Rule 608 evidence, and other various categories of evidence.

A. Rule 404(b) Evidence

Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence establishes that "[e]vidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith." FED.R.EVID. 404(b). The rule provides, however, that evidence of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" may be admissible for other specified purposes. But to invoke a Rule 404(b) exception the government must meet the rule's disclosure requirement: "[U]pon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial ... of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." FED.R.EVID. 404(b).

Defendants' motions constitute a "request by the accused." The prosecution is therefore required to provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, an obligation the government acknowledges. (Government's Consolidated Response at 22.) As far as the amount of notice the government will give, it has agreed to provide notice at least 30 days before trial, an amount of time the court views as reasonable. Indeed, that period of time is approximately that requested by one of the defendants. (See Defendant Michael Homerding's Motion for Notice of Intention to Use Evidence of Other Crimes, Acts and Wrongs of Any Defendant at 2 ("[D]efendant requests reasonable notice before trial, and thus requests notice four weeks prior to trial.").)

As far as the content of the notice is concerned, the government is correct in noting that Rule 404(b) only requires that the notice inform defendants of the "general nature" of the evidence. The level of specificity called for by some of the defendants is simply not contemplated by Rule 404(b).

B. Rule 608 Evidence

[11] Defendants Christopher Richard Messino, Clement Messino, Donald Southern, Thomas Hauck, William Underwood, and Daniel Shoemaker also seek notice of intended use of Rule 608(b) evidence, or evidence of specific instances of conduct. This court has previously held that defendants generally are not entitled to special pretrial notice of the introduction of Rule 608(b) evidence, and the court reaffirms that holding for the reasons then given. See United States v. Sims, 808 F.Supp. 607, 611 (N.D.Ill.1992).

C. Data Forming the Basis for Opinion Testimony

Defendants Christopher Richard Messino and William Underwood seek information behind 966 any expert opinion the government intends to offer. The government acknowledges its Rule 16(a)(1)(E) obligations in that regard. Defendants' detailed requests do, as the government argues, exceed those obligations. The court, on the government's representation, assumes that the government's stated intent to follow Rule 16 will be fulfilled. However, the court adds that it is troubled by the following statement by the government: "The United States herein agrees to disclose to defendants prior to trial whether it will rely upon expert testimony, but defendants' request for

Citation | Rank(R) | Page(P) | Database | Mode
46 F.3d 1369 | R 3 OF 148 | P 1 OF 124 | ALLFEDS | P LOCATE
(Cite as: 46 F.3d 1369)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Darrell A. TOMBLIN, Defendant-Appellant.
No. 93-8679.
United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.
Feb. 24, 1995.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas, H.F. Garcia, J., of bribery, extortion and related offenses, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Emilio M. Garza, J., held that: (1) any deficiencies in affidavits in support of wiretap authorization did not require suppression; (2) bribery instruction was adequate; (3) evidence was sufficient to support bribery conviction; (4) extortion instruction was adequate; (5) because defendant was not a public official, his conviction for extortion had to be reversed; (6) introduction of evidence of defendant's character did not require reversal; (7) prosecutor was not required to give notice of intent to use other-acts evidence; and (8) upward departure in base offense level for bribery was warranted.

Affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded.

46 F.3d 1369 | R 3 OF 148 | P 112 OF 124 | ALLFEDS | P LOCATE
(Cite as: 46 F.3d 1369, *1388)

FN49. We note that, had we addressed Tomblin's Rule 608(b) good faith argument, we would have reached the same conclusion.

2

[37][38] Tomblin also argues that, because the prosecutor did not provide advance notice, the introduction of evidence of other bad acts when cross-examining Tomblin violated Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b). [FN50] The government contends that the other-acts evidence was proper under Rule 608(b) because it was introduced only to impeach Tomblin and was not offered in the prosecutor's case in chief. [FN51] Whether Rule 404(b) or Rule 608(b) applies to the admissibility of other-act evidence depends on the purpose for which the prosecutor introduced the other-acts evidence. United States v. Schwab, 886 F.2d 509, 511 (2d Cir.1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1080, 110 S.Ct. 1136, 107 L.Ed.2d 1041 (1990). Rule 404(b) applies when other-acts evidence is offered as relevant to an issue in the case, such as identity or intent. Id. Rule 608(b) applies when other-acts evidence is offered to impeach a witness, "to show the character of the witness for untruthfulness," or to show bias. Id. The prosecutor contends that his cross-examination questions were probative of Tomblin's character for truthfulness.

directed at Tomblin's alleged acts of fraud, bribery, and embezzlement. [FN52] As such, the prosecutor's questions were probative of Tomblin's character for truthfulness and were permissible under Rule 608(b). Accordingly, we conclude that the provision of Rule 404(b) that requires the prosecutor to give notice of his intention to use other-acts evidence does not apply here. [FN53]

FN52. Rule 608(b) does require a good-faith basis for the questions. Tomblin, however, did not raise lack of good faith in a contemporaneous objection. Further, the record shows that the prosecutor gathered his foundation from the wiretaps.

FN53. In a pretrial hearing, Tomblin stated that if the prosecutor intended to introduce Rule 404(b) evidence, Tomblin would seek to limit its use through his motion in limine. The prosecutor responded that he did not intend to introduce Rule 404(b) evidence, but he reserved the right to introduce evidence of other misconduct to impeach Tomblin should Tomblin testify. It is not clear that the judge gave a ruling on this part of the motion. Because we find the evidence permissible under Rule 608(b), we do not address Tomblin's argument that the evidence violated his 404(b) motion.

Citation | Page(P) | Database | Mode
649 F.2d 471 FOUND DOCUMENT P 1 OF 41 CTA Page
80-2 USTC P 9679, 7 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 975
(Cite as: 649 F.2d 471)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Roger S. BASKES, Defendant-Appellant.
No. 77-2178.
United States Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit.
Argued April 28, 1978.
Decided Sept. 18, 1980.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Bernard M. Decker, J., of conspiring with others to defraud the United States by impeding and obstructing the assessment and collection of income and gift taxes and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Fairchild, Chief Judge, held that: (1) defendant lacked standing to suppress documents seized from a third party not before the court; (2) witnesses' hopeful expectation that they could avoid criminal or civil proceedings by disclosing to government attorneys what they knew about the transactions in issue, even when supplemented by evidence that a government attorney used language concerning possibility of granting informal immunity, did not amount to a promise of leniency such that witnesses' denial that they had received [2] In the present case the defendant has not established the required undisclosed agreement of leniency.[FN3] Defendant has not offered any direct evidence of promises of leniency in exchange for testimony. Instead, defendant asks us to infer promises from Schoenberg's hope that his clients could, if necessary, avoid exposure to criminal or civil fraud proceedings by disclosing what they knew of the transactions. Such a hopeful expectation even when supplemented by evidence that a government attorney 477 used language concerning the possibility of granting informal immunity is not sufficient to warrant a new trial under the rationale of Giglio. See United States v. Ramirez, 608 F.2d 1261, 1266-67 (9th Cir. 1979); United States v. Piet, 498 F.2d 178, 182 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1069, 95 S.Ct. 655, 42 L.Ed.2d 664 (1974). The situation is too equivocal to deem the witnesses' answers false and the government under a duty to correct or qualify them.

FN3. In cases in which courts have ordered a new trial based on Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150, 92 S.Ct. 763, 31 L.Ed.2d 104, an undisclosed agreement of leniency between the government and the witness prior to the testimony was clearly established. See Giglio, 405 U.S. at 152-53, 92 S.Ct. at 765; Campbell v. Reed, 594 F.2d 4, 7 (4th Cir. 1979); United States v. Butler, 567 F.2d 885, 888 (9th Cir. 1978); United States v. Harris, 498 F.2d 1164, 1169 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1069, 95 S.Ct. 655, 42 L.Ed.2d 665 (1974); United States v. Gerard, 491 F.2d 1300, 1304 (9th Cir. 1974).

IV. Court's Refusal to Require Disclosure of Intended Cross-Examination

Defendant argues that the district court erred in not compelling the government to disclose the specific instances of defendant's conduct which it intended to use in cross-examination of defense character witnesses, prior to the time they were to testify. As a result, defendant claims he was forced to withhold significant character testimony rather than risk its impeachment by undisclosed and unverified conduct.

We find no rule which mandates such disclosure. This circuit requires the trial judge to consider the truth of the basis for impeaching questions prior to cross-examination of a character witness. United States v. Jordan, 454 F.2d 323, 325 (7th Cir. 1971).[FN4] However, the purpose of the inquiry is to prevent improper questioning which might have a prejudicial impact on the jury and which cannot be adequately cured by instructions. Disclosure is merely ancillary to verification of the conduct to be incorporated in the questions. No rule or rationale guarantees the defense advance knowledge of legitimate impeachment before it calls a witness.

FN4. We note that there is some conflict among the circuits on this issue.

Jordan was decided on the basis of Gross v. United States, 394 F.2d 216, 223 (8th Cir. 1968), on appeal after new trial, 416 F.2d 1205 (8th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 1013, 90 S.Ct. 1245, 25 L.Ed.2d 427 (1970). However, the Eighth Circuit has since drawn into question its holding in Gross. Mullins v. United States, 487 F.2d 581 (8th Cir. 1973). In Mullins the Eighth Circuit found that the propriety of impeaching questions need not be decided "either before trial or before questioning if the matter is satisfactorily resolved during trial." Id. at 588.

The scope of character testimony is generally left to the discretion of the trial court since it is in the best position to consider the context in which it is to be presented.

(C)ourts of last resort have sought to overcome danger that the true issues will be obscured and confused by investing the trial court with discretion to limit the number of (character) witnesses and to control cross-examination. Both propriety and abuse of hearsay reputation testimony, on both sides, depend on numerous and subtle considerations difficult to detect or appraise from a cold record, and therefore rarely and only on clear showing of prejudicial abuse of discretion will Courts of Appeals disturb rulings of trial courts on this subject. (Footnote omitted.)

Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469, 480, 69 S.Ct. 213, 220, 93 L.Ed.

168 (1948). Among these considerations are concerns for fairness and efficiency as they emerge from the conduct of the trial. Normally the judge will be free to exercise his discretion in weighing these concerns and deciding when to rule on a specific issue.

[3] Accordingly, we find no abuse of discretion in the trial court's refusal to rule on the scope of cross-examination without benefit of having heard the direct testimony. While there may be some advantages to deciding the matter before the witnesses take the stand, there are also compelling reasons for waiting to hear them first. "(U)nless the judge has a grasp of how much ground has been . . . traversed by the offering on good character, he cannot define the ground which the cross-examination may cover in attempting to discredit that testimony." United States v. Lewis, 482 F.2d 632, 644 (D.C.Cir.1973). The trial court must decide for itself when it has enough information to make a proper ruling. While the court had much of the information found lacking in Lewis, we cannot find it unreasonable in having required more, particularly in light of the absence of prejudice to defendant's right to prior consideration.

478 The defense asked for a ruling on this issue at the close of the government's case. While the court declined to rule at that time, it made it clear that it would fully consider the matter after a witness had testified and before the cross-examination began. Furthermore, it indicated that this consideration would take place outside the hearing of the jury. Given these precautions, the defendant would have been amply protected from the likelihood of improper questioning of his witnesses. The decision by the defense to withhold character testimony was freely made and based on no greater risk than that inherent in all trial proceedings. The defendant is bound by the consequences of that decision.

V. Restrictions on Cross-Examination

The defendant next claims that the trial court erred in refusing to permit him to ask a question of a key prosecution witness.

Alan Hammerman, an attorney practicing in the same law firm as the defendant, was named in the indictment as a co-conspirator. At the government's request, Hammerman was severed for trial from defendant with the understanding that if Hammerman testified consistently with a prior statement his indictment would be dismissed. Hammerman testified that he worked under defendant's supervision in structuring and implementing the Cavanaugh transaction and he also testified to various aspects of the sales transaction.

On cross-examination defendant's counsel asked Hammerman:

Mr. Hammerman, did you unlawfully, knowingly and wilfully conspire to defraud the United States together with Sam Zell, Roger Baskes and/or Burton Kanter?

Mr. Hammerman, did you unlawfully, knowingly and wilfully combine and agree together with Roger Baskes, Burton Kanter and Sam Zell to defraud the United States of America?

Citation | Rank(R) | Page(P) | Database | Mode
45 F.3d 933 | R 4 OF 148 | P 1 OF 64 | ALLFEDS | P LOCATE

(Cite as: 45 F.3d 933)

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff-Appellee,
v.
Albert G. BUSTAMANTE, Defendant-Appellant.
No. 93-8705.
United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.
Feb. 13, 1995.

Rehearing and Suggestion for Rehearing En Banc Denied April 5, 1995.

Former United States Representative was convicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas, Edward C. Prado, J., of violating Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, W. Eugene Davis, Circuit Judge, held that evidence supported conviction.

Affirmed.

45 F.3d 933 | R 4 OF 148 | P 57 OF 64 | ALLFEDS | P LOCATE

(Cite as: 45 F.3d 933, *945)

B. Improper closing argument

[15] Bustamante argues that, during its closing argument, the government improperly suggested that Jaffe, Garcia and Heard were guilty of criminal conduct and called attention to Bustamante's decision not to call them as witnesses. However, as the government points out, Bustamante's own counsel had already repeatedly highlighted the fact that the government did not call these witnesses. The district court overruled Bustamante's objection to this argument. The district court did not err in permitting the government to respond to Bustamante's own argument suggesting that the jury draw unfavorable inferences from the government's failure to call these witnesses.

C. Improper cross-examination of Bustamante

[16] Bustamante first complains that the government suggested that he had received other uncharged illegal gratuities by asking him twice "You've never gotten anything from Doug Jaffe?" At trial, Bustamante's attorney objected on the ground that the government was trying to introduce evidence of extraneous bad acts prohibited by Federal Rule of Evidence (FRE) 404(b). The government responded that these inquiries were directly relevant to the Falcon bribe, in addition to being fair impeachment questions. The district court apparently agreed, but limited the government's questioning to Jaffe's involvement in the $35,000 payment Bustamante received from Garcia. Bustamante now argues that the question itself was improper because it implied Bustamante had received other gratuities from Jaffe. We disagree. The record leads us to conclude that a reasonable jury would interpret this question as referring to the gratuity with which Bustamante had been charged, a matter which the government was entitled to explore.

[17] Bustamante next complains that the government twice asked questions intimating that Bustamante had done other improper things in his past, then stated in the jury's presence that it had outside evidence to support these questions. Bustamante contends that the government thus gave unsworn testimony about his prior bad acts. However, the record reveals that the government made these statements after Bustamante's attorney suggested in front of the jury that the government asked these questions in bad faith. In this context, the government's statements were not improper. In any event, these statements certainly do not amount to plain error, which is the applicable standard given that Bustamante never objected to them.

[18] Bustamante also complains about two series of questions the government asked regarding two other specific instances of uncharged prior conduct: Bustamante's failure to report or pay taxes on certain income, and Bustamante's solicitation of an unrelated bribe in 1987. At trial, Bustamante objected that the government was introducing FRE 404(b) evidence without first disclosing it to the defense as required by a pretrial order. The government correctly responded that, because it was using this evidence to impeach Bustamante's credibility, FRE 404(b) did not apply. United States v. Tomblin, 42 F.3d 263, 282-83 (5th Cir.1994). The district court allowed both lines of questioning. Bustamante now contends that these questions were highly prejudicial.

Bustamante's argument places the cart before the horse. We assess the prejudicial quality of these questions only if we conclude that they were improper. United States v. MMR Corp., 907 F.2d 489, 501 (5th Cir.1990), cert. denied, 499 U.S. 936, 111 S.Ct. 1388, 113 L.Ed.2d 445 (1991). They were 946 not. FRE 608(b) allows the government to inquire into specific instances of conduct relevant to Bustamante's character for truthfulness. Both the failure to report income and the solicitation of bribes are relevant to the issue of honesty. E.g., Tomblin, 42 F.3d at 282-83. The record reveals that, prior to embarking on each series of questions, the government informed the district court of the factual support for its inquiries, thus establishing a good faith basis for its questions. We conclude that the district court did not err in permitting these questions.

Lastly, Bustamante asserts that the government commented on his assertion of his fifth amendment rights before the grand jury. At the start of his direct examination, Bustamante stated "I've been waiting a long time for this day to come." On cross-examination, the government asked "You were given an opportunity to come in and tell the government your version [of the facts], weren't you?" and "I sent your attorney a letter inviting you to come in to the grand jury and tell your story under oath, at that time, didn't I?" The district court sustained Bustamante's objections to both questions.

[19] [20] On appeal, the government argues that these questions were properly designed to impeach Bustamante's earlier testimony. We disagree. The rule is well established that a witness generally may not be cross-examined about her choice to invoke the fifth amendment privilege in grand jury proceedings. United States v. Robichaux, 995 F.2d 565, 568 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 114 S.Ct. 322, 126 L.Ed.2d 268 (1993). We need not consider the relationship between this rule and the government's right to impeach a witness, because in Bustamante's case the government was not fairly impeaching his earlier statement. Bustamante's general introductory remark that he had been waiting a long time for his trial date to arrive cannot be interpreted as a complaint that he had never before had a chance to speak to the government or the grand jury. The government's remarks were thus improper.

This, however, is not the end of the inquiry. We will only find reversible error if the government's improper comments cast serious doubt on the jury's verdict. United States v. Rocha, 916 F.2d 219, 234 (5th Cir.1990), cert. denied, 500 U.S. 934, 111 S.Ct. 2057, 114 L.Ed.2d 462 (1991). In making this evaluation, we consider (1) the likelihood and degree that the jury was prejudiced by the remarks; (2) the effectiveness of any

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Philip SCHWAB, Defendant-Appellant.

No. 1360, Docket 89-1048.

United States Court of Appeals,
Second Circuit.

Argued June 1, 1989.

Decided Sept. 28, 1989.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, Eugene H. Nickerson, J., of bribery and offering to bribe a public official, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals, Jon O. Newman, J., held that (1) it was error to permit cross-examination of defendant about prior misconduct which had resulted in acquittal, but (2) error was harmless.

Affirmed.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 369.15
110k369.15
Evidence of misconduct may be relevant to an issue in the case such as identity or intent and, when offered for that purpose, it is governed by rule relating to evidence of prior misconduct. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 371(1)
110k371(1)
Evidence of misconduct may be relevant to an issue in the case such as identity or intent and, when offered for that purpose, it is governed by rule relating to evidence of prior misconduct. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[2] WITNESSES ⇐ 344(2)
410k344(2)
Evidence of misconduct may be relevant to impeachment of a witness, including the defendant, because it tends to show the character of the witness for untruthfulness; when offered for that purpose, prior misconduct is governed by rule which precludes proof by extrinsic evidence and limits the inquiry to cross-examination of the witness. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 608(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[2] WITNESSES ⇐ 352
410k352
Evidence of misconduct may be relevant to impeachment of a witness, including the defendant, because it tends to show the character of the witness for untruthfulness; when offered for that purpose, prior misconduct is governed by rule which precludes proof by extrinsic evidence and limits the inquiry to cross-examination of the witness. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 608(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[3] WITNESSES ⇐ 374(1)
410k374(1)
Evidence of prior misconduct may be relevant to impeachment of a witness on some ground other than character of a witness for truthfulness, such as to show bias of a witness; when offered for that purpose, misconduct is not limited by rule which precludes proof of extrinsic evidence and limits the inquiry to cross-examination of the witnesses. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 608(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[4] WITNESSES ⇐ 337(4)
410k337(4)
Even if fact that defendant has been acquitted on charges of misconduct does not estop the prosecution from eliciting the fact of the prior misconduct to impeach the defendant, it will normally alter the balance between probative force and prejudice for purposes of determining the admissibility of the evidence. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 403, 28 U.S.C.A.

[5] WITNESSES ⇐ 337(4)
410k337(4)
It was error to permit cross-examination of defendant as to whether he had ever engaged in tax evasion where the matter had arisen 18 years prior to trial and defendant had been acquitted. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 608(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[6] WITNESSES ⇐ 337(4)
410k337(4)
It was error for prosecutor to cross-examine defendant about alleged prior misconduct without alerting the court of his intended course, where defendant had been tried and acquitted on the matter.

[7] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 11701/2(6)
110k11701/2(6)

Error in allowing cross-examination of defendant about prior misconduct which had resulted in acquittals was harmless where defendant denied the misconduct, no evidence was introduced to dispute his denials, and the trial judge issued appropriate instructions.

[8] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 671
110k671
It was not error to permit cross-examination of defense witness concerning criminal charges against him, even though it was determined during cross-examination that charges against him had been dropped, where prosecutor had not learned the identity of the witness until trial and had only then been able to initiate an investigation of him.

[8] WITNESSES ⇐ 350
410k350
It was not error to permit cross-examination of defense witness concerning criminal charges against him, even though it was determined during cross-examination that charges against him had been dropped, where prosecutor had not learned the identity of the witness until trial and had only then been able to initiate an investigation of him.

[9] WITNESSES ⇐ 350
410k350
It was not error to permit cross-examination of defense witness about prior charges against him, even though defense counsel informed the court that the charges had resulted in an acquittal, where there was nothing in the record to support that claim and prosecutor had only learned while the witness was testifying that there was a "rap" sheet indicating criminal charges against the witness.

510 Michael Washor, New York, N.Y. (Washor, Greenberg & Washor, New York City, Leonard W. Yelsky, Angelo F. Lonardo, Yelsky & Lonardo Co., Cleveland, Ohio, on the brief), for defendant-appellant.

George B. Daniels, Asst. U.S. Atty. (Andrew J. Maloney, U.S. Atty., John Gleeson, Asst. U.S. Atty., Brooklyn, N.Y., on the brief), for appellee.

Before KAUFMAN, NEWMAN and MINER, Circuit Judges.

JON O. NEWMAN, Circuit Judge:

The principal issue on this appeal is whether a prosecutor may seek to impeach a defendant's credibility by asking the defendant on cross-examination about prior misconduct that the prosecutor knows has been the subject of a trial and an acquittal. The issue arises on an appeal by Philip B. Schwab from a judgment of the District Court for the Eastern District of New York (Eugene H. Nickerson, Judge), convicting him, upon a jury verdict, of bribing and offering to bribe a public official, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 201(b)(1)(A) (Supp. V 1987). We conclude that the cross-examination was improper but harmless error under the circumstances of this case. We therefore affirm.

The evidence overwhelmingly established that Schwab paid $25,000 to a compliance officer of the United States Environmental Protection Agency and offered to pay him an additional $25,000. Schwab paid the money to the EPA officer to overlook the fact that Schwab's demolition company had not complied with regulations governing asbestos removal. The evidence included tape recordings of conversations between Schwab and the EPA officer.

On appeal, Schwab contends that he should receive a new trial because of the prosecutor's cross-examination of himself and two defense witnesses. On cross-examination, the prosecutor asked Schwab: "[I]sn't it a fact that you committed income tax fraud in 1970?" and "Isn't it a fact that you committed perjury in October of 1965?" Schwab answered "No" to both questions. At a sidebar conference after these questions were asked and answered, defense counsel informed Judge Nickerson that the defendant had been tried and acquitted on the tax fraud and perjury charges and moved for a mistrial. Counsel also reported that he had previously informed the prosecutor of the acquittals. The perjury charge in fact had resulted in a dismissal. See People v. Schwab, 62 Misc.2d 786, 310 N.Y.S.2d 436 (Erie County Ct.1970). [FN1] The Government has not denied, 511 either at trial or on appeal, that it had previously been informed that both charges had been resolved favorably to Schwab. The judge then said to the prosecutor, "You never told me that he was acquitted of the income tax fraud." The prosecutor replied that he did not think it was "significant." [FN2] Judge Nickerson denied the mistrial motion, but promptly instructed the jury that, though there had been questions asked about tax fraud and perjury, "[t]here's no evidence in the record of that at all. Please disregard that. Remember the questions aren't evidence."

FN1. In the state court case, Schwab was indicted for three counts of perjury, two concerning allegedly false testimony given in March 1963 in a civil suit and one concerning allegedly false testimony given before a county grand jury in October 1963. The first two counts were dismissed in 1970 because Schwab had unlawfully been required to waive immunity before the grand jury that indicted him. People v. Schwab, supra. The third count was dismissed in 1972 on motion of the district attorney because of the "time lapse and trial history," which included two mistrials. People v. Schwab, No. 30,893 A & B, order dismissing action at 2 (Sup.Ct. Feb. 8, 1972).

FN2. The prosecutor's view that the acquittal lacked significance evidently persists on appeal: In arguing that cross-examination concerning the tax fraud charge was proper, the Government's brief makes no mention of the acquittal. Indeed, the Government does not distinguish itself by stating, "Schwab had a criminal record indicating tax fraud and perjury." Brief for Appellee at 15.

Rule 608(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence provides:

> Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' credibility, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness....

In the Government's view, the prosecutor was entitled to ask the defendant whether he had committed tax fraud and perjury, notwithstanding the acquittal on the first charge and the dismissal of the second. The Government acknowledges that the prosecutor would be bound by the answers in the sense that he could not dispute denials with extrinsic evidence.

[1][2][3] In analyzing the issue, it will be helpful to distinguish among the various purposes for which prior misconduct may have evidentiary value. First, the misconduct may be relevant to an issue in the case, such as intent or identity. When offered for that purpose, prior misconduct is governed by Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). Second, the misconduct may be relevant to impeachment of a witness, including the defendant, because it tends to show the character of the witness for untruthfulness. When offered for that purpose, prior misconduct is governed by Fed.R.Evid. 608(b), which precludes proof by extrinsic evidence and limits the inquiry to cross-examination of the witness. Third, the misconduct may be relevant to impeachment of a witness on some ground other than the character of a witness for untruthfulness. The most typical example is misconduct offered to show bias of the witness. When offered for that purpose, misconduct is not limited by the strictures of Rule 608(b). See United States v. James, 609 F.2d 36, 45-46 (2d Cir.1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 905, 100 S.Ct. 1082, 63 L.Ed.2d 321 (1980). The pending case falls within the second category, but unlike the typical situation where a witness, including a defendant, is cross-examined about uncharged misconduct, Schwab was cross-examined about alleged misconduct--tax fraud--for which he had been charged, tried, and acquitted.

An acquittal establishes that the defendant's perpetration of the charged misconduct has not been proven beyond a reasonable doubt. It is therefore arguable that whether the misconduct occurred may be inquired about within the constraints of Rule 608(b) and Rule 403 since the reasonable doubt standard applies to the jury's ultimate determination of guilt and does not apply to its assessment of each subsidiary fact that may contribute to that determination, such as the credibility of the defendant. See United States v. Viafara-Rodriguez, 729 F.2d 912, 913 (2d Cir.1984); United States v. Valenti, 134 F.2d 362, 364 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 319 U.S. 761, 63 S.Ct. 1317, 87 L.Ed. 1712 (1943). This argument 512 has had a mixed reception in the various contexts in which it has been made.

Where prior misconduct has been offered to prove a fact significant to the establishment of guilt, the cases are divided as to whether a prior acquittal bars the evidence. Compare United States v. Dowling, 855 F.2d 114, 120-22 (3d Cir.1988) (barring evidence but error harmless), cert. granted, --- U.S. ----, 109 S.Ct. 1309, 103 L.Ed.2d 579 (1989);

United States v. Keller, 624 F.2d 1154 (3d Cir.1980) (barring evidence); United States v. Mespoulede, 597 F.2d 329 (2d Cir.1979) (same); United States v. Day, 591 F.2d 861 (D.C.Cir.1979) (same); Wingate v. Wainwright, 464 F.2d 209 (5th Cir.1972) (same); and United States v. Kramer, 289 F.2d 909, 913-18 (2d Cir.1961) (same), with United States v. Van Cleave, 599 F.2d 954, 956-57 (10th Cir.1979) (allowing evidence); Oliphant v. Koehler, 594 F.2d 547, 550-55 (6th Cir.) (same), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 877, 100 S.Ct. 162, 62 L.Ed.2d 105 (1979); United States v. Etley, 574 F.2d 850, 852-53 (5th Cir.) (same), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 967, 99 S.Ct. 458, 58 L.Ed.2d 427 (1978); United States v. Rocha, 553 F.2d 615 (9th Cir.1977) (same); United States v. Kills Plenty, 466 F.2d 240, 243 (8th Cir.1972) (same), cert. denied, 410 U.S. 916, 93 S.Ct. 971, 35 L.Ed.2d 278 (1973); United States v. Castro-Castro, 464 F.2d 336 (9th Cir.1972) (same), cert. denied, 410 U.S. 916, 93 S.Ct. 971, 35 L.Ed.2d 278 (1973); and United States v. Feinberg, 383 F.2d 60, 71-72 (2d Cir.1967) (same), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1044, 88 S.Ct. 788, 19 L.Ed.2d 836 (1968). Cf. Lee v. United States, 368 F.2d 834 (D.C.Cir.1966) (reversing conviction where extrinsic evidence was introduced to impeach defendant's denial of prior misconduct for which he had been tried and acquitted).

Some of the cases do not stand in quite the stark opposition that the above listing might indicate since particular circumstances, rather than a general rule, contributed to the outcomes. See, e.g., United States v. Feinberg, supra (collateral estoppel inapplicable because prosecuting sovereigns were different and uncertainty existed as to whether prior acquittal had conclusively established the fact subsequently sought to be proved). We have cast considerable doubt on the pertinence of the difference in standards of proof in the prior and subsequent proceedings, see United States v. Kramer, 289 F.2d at 913, although the Supreme Court case relied upon, Coffey v. United States, 116 U.S. 427, 6 S.Ct. 432, 29 L.Ed. 681 (1886), was accorded perhaps more weight than was warranted. But see United States v. Etley, 574 F.2d at 853 (allowing evidence of prior crime resulting in acquittal because of difference in standards of proof). It is not entirely clear whether the decisions precluding use of prior acts resulting in an acquittal are grounded on technical application of collateral estoppel, which might limit the preclusion to instances where the same sovereign prosecuted both cases, or rest on more general considerations of fairness, see, e.g., United States v. Mespoulede, 597 F.2d at 335 ("simply ... inequitable"); Wingate v. Wainwright, 464 F.2d at 215 ("fundamentally unfair and totally incongruous with our basic concepts of justice").

In the context of sentencing, where prior misconduct is offered not to prove guilt but solely to determine the extent of punishment, we have ruled that a sentencing judge may take into account evidence of a defendant's prior misconduct established by a preponderance of the evidence, notwithstanding an acquittal. See United States v. Sweig, 454 F.2d 181 (2d Cir.1972). But the sentencing context is entirely different from the context of cross-examination of a defendant during trial. At sentencing, the facts concerning the prior misconduct may be developed by extrinsic evidence, and the judge may take evidence of the misconduct into account if satisfied that it has been established by a preponderance of the evidence, despite the fact that a jury was not persuaded beyond a reasonable doubt. However, when witnesses are cross-examined as to alleged prior misconduct for which they have been tried and acquitted, there is no opportunity to present extrinsic evidence bearing on whether the misconduct occurred.

The trial context, in which prior misconduct is offered to prove a fact relevant to a 513 subsequent prosecution, is more pertinent to the issue in this case than is the sentencing context. Though the prior misconduct was sought to be elicited in this case to impeach the defendant's credibility rather than prove a fact such as intent or knowledge, there is a strong argument that the same considerations that precluded the evidence in Mespoulede should bar it here.

[4] However, we need not rest decision on collateral estoppel nor on more general considerations of fundamental fairness since the evidence is inadmissible under the standards of Rules 608(b) and 403. Rule 608(b) provides that specific instances of misconduct may be inquired into on cross-examination "in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness." Rule 403 obliges the trial judge to exclude relevant evidence "if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice," among other factors. Both rules thus require the exercise of discretion with respect to admission of prior acts of misconduct. Whether or not an acquittal technically estops the prosecution from eliciting the fact of prior misconduct, it will normally alter the balance between probative force and prejudice, which is already a close matter in many cases where prior misconduct of a defendant is offered. See United States v. Phillips, 401 F.2d 301 (7th Cir.1968). Moreover, there is the blunt reality that a witness who has been acquitted will almost certainly deny the misconduct, either because he did no wrong or because he may understandably believe that when asked about it after an acquittal, he is entitled to have the law regard him as innocent. Thus, the only purpose served by permitting the inquiry is to place before the jury the allegation of misconduct contained in the prosecutor's question, an allegation the jury will be instructed has no evidentiary weight. To permit the inquiry risks unfair prejudice, which is not justified by the theoretical possibility that the witness, though acquitted, will admit to the misconduct. When the witness is the defendant, the significance of the prejudice is magnified.

[5] In the pending case, not only had the alleged prior misconduct concerning the tax charge resulted in an acquittal, but the matter had arisen eighteen years prior to the trial at which it was sought to be probed on cross-examination. Moreover, the prosecutor had no information in his possession to indicate that Schwab was guilty of the misconduct. Under these circumstances, cross-examination concerning the tax matter was beyond the discretion confided in the trial judge by Rules 608(b) and 403.

[6] The prosecutor was at fault in this case not only for cross-examining as to matters for which the defendant had been tried and acquitted but also for pursuing the inquiry without alerting the trial court, either by pretrial memorandum or sidebar conference, of his intended course. Since, as far as we can ascertain, no decision has approved cross-examination of this sort, it was extremely imprudent for the prosecutor to preempt the trial judge's opportunity to consider, before any damage might be done, whether to allow such novel questioning. The failure to alert the trial judge is especially serious since the prosecutor had been told about the acquittal and had no contrary information. Had the prosecutor known only of the charges and not the outcome, it would still have been prudent to raise the matter at sidebar so that the trial judge could decide whether to conduct a voir dire inquiry as to the outcome of the charges.

The significance of the prosecutor's omission is compounded still further by the fact that the matters the prosecutor inquired about were charges made twenty-three and eighteen years prior to the trial. If these matters had resulted in convictions, the fact that such convictions would have been more than ten years old would have required the prosecutor to give the defendant notice of his intent to use them, Fed.R.Evid. 609(b), and the trial judge could have admitted them only upon an explicit finding that their probative value substantially outweighed their prejudicial effect, id. Though Rule 608(b) has no ten-year rule comparable to Rule 609, the discretion that 514 trial judges are obliged to use in deciding whether to permit cross-examination concerning ancient misconduct cannot be exercised before the well has been poisoned unless the prosecutor alerts the judge by an offer of proof out of the hearing of the jury. [FN3]

> FN3. In enacting Rule 608(b), Congress deleted the limitation in the rule as submitted by the Supreme Court that the prior misconduct not be "remote in time," and instead left the matter of timeliness to "the discretion of the court." H.R.Rep. No. 650, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. 10 (1973).

[7] Though the cross-examination of the defendant was improper, we are satisfied that the error was harmless. Schwab denied the misconduct, and no evidence was introduced to dispute his denials. Moreover, the trial judge promptly issued appropriate instructions. Most significantly, the evidence of guilt, which included Schwab's recorded incriminating conversations, was overwhelming.

[8] Appellant's objection to the cross-examination of two defense witnesses is not cause for concern. With respect to the first witness, Martin Haitz, the prosecutor, not previously alerted to the identity of the witness, initiated an investigation while Haitz was testifying and learned that criminal charges of fraud and larceny had been brought against him; the investigation did not ascertain the ultimate disposition. The prosecutor alerted the trial judge to his proposed cross-examination and received approval to inquire pursuant to Rule 608(b). Haitz testified that fraud charges based on the issuance of bad checks had been brought against him, but that the charges were dropped after he explained that the checks were issued by a corporation after he had sold it. Though it might have been preferable for the District Judge to have elicited the testimony out of the presence of the jury so that the judge could make the Rule 403 assessment before permitting the cross-examination, we cannot say that it was error not to do so.

[9] With respect to the second witness, Robert Gibbs, the prosecutor also learned, apparently while the witness was testifying, that an FBI "rap" sheet indicated criminal charges, including mail fraud, arising out of Gibbs' alleged embezzlement from a bank. At a sidebar conference, the prosecutor, who had not yet obtained a fax copy of the "rap" sheet, said there "may" be a conviction; defense counsel said there had been an acquittal. Judge Nickerson permitted cross-examination. Gibbs denied embezzling funds from a Florida bank that had employed him, admitted agreeing to a judgment to repay some $253,000 to a different Florida bank, and said that the repayment had nothing to do with his bank employment. He denied committing mail fraud in connection with either bank. On redirect, Gibbs said he had never been convicted of any federal or state crime. Nothing in the record supports defense counsel's claim at sidebar that Gibbs had been tried for a banking crime and found not guilty.

As with the cross-examination of Haitz, we see no error. The prosecutor had a plausible basis for cross-examining as to prior misconduct and did so within the limits of Rule 608(b).

Appellant's remaining contentions, which do not warrant discussion, are without merit.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

END OF DOCUMENT

Citation | Rank(R) | Page(P) | Database | Mode
Not Reported in F.Supp. | R 41 OF 148 | P 1 OF 24 | ALLFEDS | P LOCATE
(Cite as: 1995 WL 12300 (N.D.Ill.))

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Sherman OLLISON, Defendant.
No. 92 CR 365.
United States District Court, N.D. Illinois, Eastern Division.
Jan. 10, 1995.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

LEINENWEBER, District Judge.

1 Defendant requests the court to grant several pretrial motions arising from his detention and the search of his luggage by federal officials in May of 1992. After a brief recitation of the facts, the court will address defendant's motions seriatim.

FACTS

The parties offer competing characterizations of the events leading up to defendant's arrest for narcotics possession in violation of 21 U.S.C. s 841(a)(1) (1988). According to defendant, on May 6, 1992, he was approached by two Drug Enforcement Agency ("DEA") agents as he disembarked from Amtrak Train No. 22, which had just arrived at Chicago's Union Station from Houston, Texas.

at an appropriate time.

IV. Motion to Require Notice of Intention to Use Other Crimes, Wrongs or Acts Evidence

This motion consists of two parts. The first part requests an order requiring the government to provide notice of its intention to introduce at trial evidence of defendant's other crimes or wrongs as those terms are used in Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). The second part asks for the same notice with respect to specific instances of defendant's conduct the government may wish to use to impeach his credibility under Fed.R.Evid. 608(b).

A. Defendant's Rule 404(b) motion.

The court orders the government to produce the Rule 404(b) information it will use no later than 10 business days before trial. In its response, the government argues that "Rules 12(d) and 16, and case law provid[e] that Rule 404(b) evidence need not be disclosed prior to trial." (Gov't. resp. at 10.) From this premise, the government states that it will voluntarily disclose the information requested, but reserves the right to choose when it will disclose the Rule 404(b) information it plans to use. (See id.)

The government's assertion that Rule 404(b) permits it to choose whether or not it will disclose Rule 404(b) information, however, is incorrect. Rule 404(b) was amended in 1991 in order to align it with other evidentiary rules containing notice and disclosure provisions. See Fed.R.Evid. 412; Fed.R.Evid.

609; Fed.R.Evid. 803(24); Fed.R.Evid. 804(b)(5). The rule now contains a pretrial notice provision which states that "upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial ... of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). In choosing to obscure such an elementary, and indeed codified, point, the government has forfeited any discretion it may have had concerning voluntary disclosure. Beyond the specific ruling relating to time for disclosure, defendant's Rule 404(b) motion is moot.

B. Defendant's Rule 608(b) motion.

8 Defendant's Rule 608(b) motion is denied. In contradistinction to Rule 404(b), Rule 608(b) has no self-contained notice provision. Moreover, Rule 12(d)(2) of the Fed.R.Crim.P. limits a defendant's pretrial discovery under Rule 16 to evidence that the government will offer in its case in chief--precisely the situation governed by Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). See Fed.R.Crim.P. 12(d)(2); Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). Rule 608(b), however, is focused on impeachment. Thus, it is well-settled that the "government is not required to disclose evidence of past crimes or misconduct that will be used on cross-examination...." U.S. v. Padilla, 744 F.Supp. 1425, 1427 (N.D.Ill.1990); accord U.S. v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 728-29 (N.D.Ill.1992).

V. Motion to Unseal File No. 92 M 245

The government has agreed to this request and thus defendant's motion is moot.

UNITED STATES of America
v.
Tadeusz ZEGLEN, et al., Defendants.

No. 93 Cr 862.

United States District Court, N.D. Illinois, Eastern Division.

Oct. 18, 1994.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

NORDBERG, District Judge.

1 Before the Court are Defendants Tadeusz Zeglen's, Andrew Walkosz's and Dorothy Walkosz's Pre-trial Motions.

1. Motion for Favorable Evidence/Motion for Disclosure Regarding Emotional Illness Disorders and Drug and Alcohol Abuse

Defendants file their Motion for Favorable Evidence pursuant to Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963) and Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972). Under Brady, the Government is required to disclose all evidence that is both favorable to the accused and material to either guilt or punishment. According to Giglio, exculpatory evidence includes evidence that the defense might use to impeach a government witness by showing bias or interest. As the Government is aware of its obligation under Brady, and has disclosed all exculpatory information of which it is aware, and has agreed to make further disclosures if and when it acquires additional exculpatory evidence, the Defendants' motions are DENIED as moot.

2. Motion for Order Requiring the Government to Give Notice of its Intention to Use Evidence of Other Crimes, Wrongs or Acts Evidence

Defendants request that this Court order the Government to give notice of its intention to use "other crimes, wrongs or acts" evidence as that phrase is used in Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b). The Government acknowledges its obligation under Rule 404(b) and has no objection to compliance therewith. The Government states that at present, it does not have any Rule 404(b) evidence concerning Defendants. However, the Government recognizes its obligation to give notice of its intention to use Rule 404(b) evidence and has agreed to give opposing counsel such notice one month before trial if possible. Accordingly, Defendants' motion is DENIED as moot.

Included in Defendants' motion for an order requiring the Government to give notice of its intention to use "other crimes, wrongs or acts" evidence is a request for an order requiring the Government to give notice of its intention to use evidence of "specific instances of conduct" of the Defendants as that phrase is used in Federal Rule of Evidence 608(b). Rule 608(b) allows inquiry on cross-examination into specific instances of conduct bearing on the credibility of the witness. Unlike Rule 404(b), which explicitly provides for pre-trial discovery of relevant evidence, Rule 608(b) contains no such provision. The Defendants have not directed this Court to any authority for ordering such disclosure. In the absence of such authority, Defendants' motion insofar as it requests pretrial disclosure of Rule 608(b) evidence is DENIED.

3. Motion for Early Disclosure of Witness Statements

The Jencks Act requires the government to provide defendants with prior statements of government witnesses after the witnesses have testified at trial. 18 U.S.C. § 3500. The Jencks Act generally requires production of Jencks material after the government witnesses have testified.

However, according to the Government, virtually all previous statements of likely government witnesses have already been disclosed to the defense. Furthermore, the Government has agreed to turn over any new material on an on-going basis. Consequently, Defendants' Motion for Early Disclosure of Witness Statements is DENIED as moot.

4. Motion for Pre-trial Disclosure of Co-conspirators' Statements/Motion for Disclosure of Names of Co-conspirators

2 The Government notes that its Santiago proffer will be filed thirty days before the trial in this case. See United States v. Santiago, 582 F.2d 1128 (7th Cir.1978). Accordingly, Defendants' Motions for Pre-trial Disclosure of Co-conspirators' statements and for Disclosure of the Names of Co-conspirators are DENIED as moot.

To the extent names of co-conspirators are not revealed in the Government's Santiago proffer, the Court notes that the Government has acknowledged its obligation under Brady and Giglio to disclose information favorable to the Defendants and material to either guilt or punishment.

5. Motion for an In Camera Production of Probation Officers' Presentence Investigation Reports

Defendants have moved for production of the presentence investigation reports of Tadeusz Morawa and Andrew Schechula, both of whom are likely government witnesses in this case.

The Government has agreed to an in camera inspection of the presentence investigation reports of Morawa and Schechula so that the Court can determine whether the reports contain exculpatory information and/or impeachment material useful in cross-examining the Government's witnesses. See U.S. v. Canino, 949 F.2d 928, 942-43 (7th Cir.1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 3058 (1992).

Defendants' Motion for Production of the Presentence Investigation Reports of Morawa and Schechula is DENIED. However, the Court will review the reports in camera to determine if they contain exculpatory information or material useful for impeachment purposes.

6. Motion for List of Government Witnesses Together with Addresses and Phone Numbers

A defendant has no right to a list of government witnesses prior to trial although the court has authority to require the government to provide such a list. See Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 559 (1977); U.S. v. Sims, 808 F.Supp. 607, 613 (N.D.Ill.1992) (citing United States v. Braxton, 877 F.2d 556, 560 (7th Cir.1989); United States v. Naupe, 834 F.2d 1311, 1317 (7th Cir.1987); United States v. Bouye, 688 F.2d 471, 473-74 (7th Cir.1982); United States v. Jackson, 508 F.2d 1001, 1006-1008 (7th Cir.1975), rev'd on other grounds, 474 U.S. 302 (1986)).

However, the parties have agreed that the Government will provide Defendants with a list of government witnesses. The parties have further agreed that, instead of providing Defendants with the home addresses and telephone numbers, the Government will arrange for defense counsel to meet with listed government witnesses, who have not already been located by independent defense investigation, so that defense counsel can request interviews.

Consequently, Defendants' Motion for a List of Government Witnesses is DENIED as moot.

7. Motion for Production of Personnel Files of Law Enforcement Officers for In Camera Inspection

3 Defendants request that this Court order the Government to turn over the personnel files of any testifying agent for in camera inspection so that the Court can determine whether the files contain exculpatory information and/or impeachment material useful in cross-examining the agents. However, Defendants give no support for their contention that the personnel files might contain evidence which is favorable to the Defendants and material to the issue of guilt or punishment.

In United States v. Andrus, 775 F.2d 825, 843 (7th Cir.1985), the Seventh Circuit held that the defendant was not entitled to the personnel files of the law enforcement witnesses where there was not even a hint that impeaching material was contained in the files. The Seventh Circuit relied on a prior opinion in United States v. Navarro, 737 F.2d 625, 631 7th Cir.), cert. denied, Mugercia v. U.S., 469 U.S. 1020 (1984) where it stated, > Mere speculation that a government file may contain Brady material is not sufficient to require a remand for in camera inspection, much less reversal for a new trial. A due process standard which is satisfied by mere speculation would convert Brady into a discovery device and impose an undue burden on the district court.

A defendant's request for Brady material does not entitle him to "embark upon an unwarranted fishing expedition through government files, nor does it mandate a trial judge conduct an in camera inspection of the government's files in every case." U.S. v. Phillips, 854 F.2d 273, 278 (7th Cir.1988). See also, U.S. v. Quintanilla, 760 F.Supp. 687, 696-97 (N.D.Ill.1991), aff'd 2 F.3d 1469 (7th Cir.1993).

As a request by Defendants does not automatically trigger an in camera review of the personnel files of any testifying agent, Defendants' motion is DENIED. To the extent these personnel files contain information favorable to the Defendants and material to the issues of guilt and punishment, the Court notes that the Government has recognized its continuing obligation under Brady and Giglio to disclose such information.

8. Motion to Continue Trial or for Alternate Relief

Defendants request that this Court grant judicial immunity for four defense witnesses who can allegedly exonerate Defendants, but who refuse to testify because of the fear of self-incrimination. Alternatively, Defendants ask the Court to stay the trial date until December 10, 1995 allowing the statute of limitations to run so that the witnesses testimony could not be used to prosecute them. The language of 18 U.S.C. §§ 6002, 6003, which governs a federal prosecutor's right to grant immunity to a witness, provides the government with considerable discretion and does not obligate the government to grant defense witnesses immunity. U.S. v. Hooks, 848 F.2d 785, 798-99 (7th Cir.1988). The trial court does not have the power to direct the government to seek immunity for a defense witness who exercises his fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination. Id. at 799. However, the prosecutor's unfettered discretion to grant immunity is limited by due process considerations. Id. See also, U.S. v. Schweihs, 971 F.2d 1302, 1315 (7th Cir.1992). The prosecutor cannot use his power to grant immunity "to distort the judicial fact-finding process." Hooks, 848 F.2d at 799.

4 The Defendants have not made the requisite substantial evidentiary showing that the Government, by refusing to grant immunity to the four defense witnesses, intended "to distort the judicial fact-finding process." Id. at 802. In fact, the Government has not refused to apply for statutory immunity "in any final sense." Rather, the Government has decided that it simply does not have enough information at this point to determine whether granting these witnesses immunity would be appropriate and in the public interest.

The Defendants' vague and cursory description of the testimony of the four witnesses makes it difficult to determine whether their anticipated testimony is cumulative of that of other witnesses, whether the exclusion of the supposed incriminating statements would prejudice the Defendants and whether the testimony is in fact protected by the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination. Defendants have not presented substantial evidence to show a clear abuse of prosecutorial discretion, and thus a violation of due process rights.

For the foregoing reasons, Defendants' motion is DENIED.

END OF DOCUMENT

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Emery L. GOAD and William R. Wood, Defendants.

CRIM. A. Nos. 89-10062-01, 89-10062-02.

United States District Court, D. Kansas.

June 15, 1990.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

THEIS, District Judge.

*1 This matter is before the court on several pretrial motions filed by one or both defendants. The court held a hearing on March 12, 1990, at the conclusion of which the court announced it would take the motions under advisement. At the request of the defendants, the court held an evidentiary hearing on June 4, 1990. The court has previously granted defendant Goad's motion to sever. Defendants Goad and Wood are charged with possessing, concealing, and storing a stolen pickup truck which had crossed a state boundary after being stolen and for conspiracy to commit the same offense, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2313, 2, and 371.

The indictment charges the existence of a conspiracy from on or about November 22, 1985, and continuing through on or about February 8, 1989. Eight separate overt acts are listed in the indictment and are summarized as follows. On or about November 1, 1985, defendant Goad located a stolen Ford pickup truck in a parking lot at 550 West Central, Wichita, Kansas. On or about November 22, 1985, Goad refused to disclose to the Hanover Insurance Company, Birmingham, Alabama, the location of the stolen pickup truck. On or about December 1, 1985, Goad and Leonard Young towed the stolen pickup truck to the residence of defendant Wood. On or about January 29, 1986, defendant Wood hired Douglas Maib to key the ignition and door locks on the pickup truck. At some point after January 1986, the pickup truck was driven to Wood's lake property in Greenwood County, Kansas. During the spring or summer of 1988, Wood, an attorney, contacted a client of his, George E. Creekmore, requesting that Creekmore obtain a vehicle identification plate from an automobile salvage yard so that the plate in the stolen pickup truck could be switched, thereby allowing Wood to obtain a new title for the stolen pickup truck. At some time during the summer of 1988, Wood arranged for Creekmore to drive the stolen pickup truck from Greenwood County, Kansas, to Creekmore's residence in Sedgwick County, Kansas, to assist Creekmore in switching the vehicle identification plates. On or about October 1, 1988, Creekmore returned the stolen pickup truck to Wood's residence in Sedgwick County, Kansas.

The facts, as summarized by defendant Wood in his motion to dismiss (Doc. 29), are as follows. On September 30, 1984, a pickup truck was discovered missing from Larry Salvage Chevrolet in Huntsville, Alabama. The truck was reported missing and an insurance claim was made. Later that fall, Sedgwick County District Court Judge Nicholas Klein observed an apparently abandoned truck in the parking lot of the apartment complex where he lived. After the truck had remained there for about a year, Judge Klein told Goad, a private investigator, of the vehicle's location. Goad obtained the vehicle identification number, determined the truck was stolen, and contacted the Huntsville Police. Goad thereafter contacted the insurance company which had paid the claim on the vehicle. When the insurance company refused to pay Goad a finder's fee, Goad refused to tell the insurance company of the location of the vehicle. The vehicle was towed to Wood's home. The locks were changed by Douglas Key and Lock Company in January 1986. The truck was taken to Wood's lake house in the summer of 1986. In the summer of 1988, the truck was driven back to Wood's residence. On October 31, 1988, the truck was taken to a barn in Rose Hill, Kansas, where it was stored until it was turned over to the police on or about February 18, 1989.

1. Motion for bill of particulars (Doc. 20-21, filed by Goad)

*2 Goad's motion for a bill of particulars seeks very specific details about the alleged offenses: the place(s), including street address(es), where the conspiracy was initially formed, and where each defendant and each coconspirator joined the conspiracy; the date(s) and time(s) when each defendant and each coconspirator joined the conspiracy; the period(s) of time during which each defendant and each coconspirator remained in the conspiracy; the circumstances under which, and the words or conduct by means of which each defendant and each coconspirator joined the conspiracy; the objects of the conspiracy; what the defendant Goad agreed to do in further of the conspiracy; the specific words or conduct of defendant Goad constituting overt acts in furtherance of the conspiracy; specific information regarding any overt acts not included in the indictment; the names of coconspirators; whether any defendant or coconspirators were acting on behalf of any governmental entity at the time of the conspiracy; and whether any defendant has furnished information to law enforcement authorities with respect to the conspiracy. Doc. 20.

Goad alleges that he needs this information to prepare for trial and to avoid surprise at trial, given the delay in prosecution. Goad merely asserts that the delay has resulted in prejudice to him. The affidavit of Goad's attorney states that: the indictment alleges that the conspiracy to violate 18 U.S.C. § 2313 existed from November 22, 1985 through February 8, 1989; that the indictment fails to state with particularity the locations, dates, and times when the defendants joined the conspiracy and committed the overt acts, and which defendants or coconspirators committed which overt acts; that the indictment fails to allege all the matters requested in the motion for a bill of particulars; and that Goad does not know the theory upon which the government intends to proceed. Doc. 21.

Wood has adopted this motion. Doc. 30.

The government has responded, asking the court to deny the motion for a bill or particulars. Doc. 38. The government argues that the indictment adequately informs the defendants of the charges against them. The government states that it has provided a complete copy of its investigative file to each defendant. All reports or records have been provided to the defendants. Further, the facts are so well known to the defendants that they have entered into a stipulation of facts, filed with defendant Wood's motion to dismiss (Doc. 29).

"The purpose of a bill of particulars is to inform the defendant of the charge against him with sufficient precision to allow him to prepare his defense, to minimize surprise at trial, and to enable him to plead double jeopardy in the event of a later prosecution for the same offense." United States v. Dunn, 841 F.2d 1026, 1029 (10th Cir.1988) (quoting United States v. Cole, 755 F.2d 748, 760 (11th CIr.1985)). "It is not the function of a bill or particulars 'to disclose in detail the evidence upon which the Government will rely at the trial.' " United States v. Barbieri, 614 F.2d 715, 719 (10th Cir.1980) (quoting Cefalu v. United States, 234 F.2d 522, 524 (10th Cir.1956)). An indictment is generally sufficient if it sets forth the offense in the words of the statute, as long as the statute adequately states the elements of the offense. United States v. Salazar, 720 F.2d 1482, 1486 (10th Cir.1983), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1110 (1985). The determination of the sufficiency of the indictment, however, is governed by practical rather than technical considerations. Dunn, 841 F.2d at 1029. Moreover, this determination is left to the sound discretion of the trial court. United States v. Wright, 826 F.2d 938, 942 (10th Cir.1987).

3 Applying these standards, the court finds that the defendants are not entitled to a bill of particulars setting forth the requested matters. The indictment tracks the language of the statute, and is thus specific in terms of the statute. The overt acts listed in the conspiracy count inform the defendants of the charges against them with sufficient precision to allow them to prepare their defense. The defendant's motion is a request for evidentiary detail and impermissible discovery material. Accordingly, the motion for a bill of particulars shall be denied.

2. Motion for disclosure of impeaching information/Motion for discovery (Doc. 24-25, filed by Goad)

Goad requests information regarding: (1) prior felony convictions and juvenile adjudications of all witnesses; (2) all prior misconduct or bad acts of witnesses; (3) all consideration or promises made to witnesses; (4) any threats made to or directed against witnesses; (5) all occasions when the witness has testified before any tribunal about this case; (6) all occasions when any witness who is an informer, accomplice, or coconspirator has ever testified before any tribunal; (7) all personnel files on law enforcement witnesses; (8) any and all records or information which may be impeaching; and (9) the same information with respect to any non-witness whose statements may be offered in evidence.

Wood has adopted this motion. Doc. 27-28.

The government has responded, asking that the motion be denied except as otherwise agreed to. Addressing each category of Goad's request, the government states: (1) it is not aware of any juvenile convictions, but such convictions are confidential and should not be disclosed; (2) it will provide arrest and conviction data of which it is aware; no other information will be provided; (3) all promises or consideration will be disclosed; (4) no threats have been made; (5) prior testimony is Jencks material and will be disclosed at the time required by law; (6) identity of persons who have previously testified is not required to be disclosed pretrial; (7) personnel files are not discoverable; (8) it is unaware of any further information. The government does not address category (9) specifically.

The court will address each category of defendant's motion in turn. (1) The court will grant defendant's motion for discovery of arrest and conviction data for adult offenses. The court agrees with the government that juvenile adjudications, if any witnesses have had such adjudications, should remain confidential. (2) Under Fed.R.Evid. 608(b), cited by the defendant, prior bad acts may not be proven by extrinsic evidence. In the discretion of the court, they may be inquired into on cross examination, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness. The requested discovery is not provided for in the criminal rules. The court will deny the requested discovery. (3) and (4) All promises, consideration, and threats shall be disclosed. (5) Prior testimony and statements come within the provisions of the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500(e), and are not subject to disclosure until after the witness testifies. Id. § 3500(a)-(b). (6) The identity of witnesses is not discoverable under Fed.R.Crim.P. 16. (7) The defendant has not provided the court with any Tenth Circuit authority requiring the disclosure of the personnel files of law enforcement witnesses; consequently, the court will deny the motion. (8) Since the government states that it is unaware of any information fitting within this catch-all category, the requested discovery will be denied. (9) If the government is intending to introduce the statements of non-witnesses, the government shall respond to this requested category of discovery.

3. Motion to dismiss (Doc. 29, filed by Wood)

4 Defendant Wood argues that the indictment charges defendant with possessing a vehicle which had been stolen and then crossed a state line. The indictment does not charge that the vehicle was involved in interstate commerce at the time the vehicle was in the defendants' possession. Wood makes three arguments in his motion to dismiss: (1) Congress has unconstitutionally extended its authority under the commerce clause to matters purely local in nature; (2) the statute is overbroad; and (3) the vehicle had ceased to be a part of interstate commerce.

Prior to its amendment in October 1984, 18 U.S.C. § 2313 provided:

Whoever receives, conceals, stores, barters, sells, or disposes of any motor vehicle or aircraft, moving as, or which is a part of, or which constitutes interstate or foreign commerce, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

18 U.S.C. § 2313 (emphasis added). This statute was in effect at the time the vehicle was reported missing in September 1984. The statute was amended effective October 25, 1984 to read:

Whoever receives, possesses, conceals, stores, barters, sells, or disposes of any motor vehicle or aircraft, which has crossed a State or United States boundary after being stolen, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

18 U.S.C. § 2313 (emphasis added).

Wood argues that prior to the amendment, for a violation of the statute to occur, the vehicle must have been involved in interstate commerce at the time of the defendant's involvement with it. The amended statute, which took effect after the theft of the vehicle, requires only that the vehicle crossed a state line at some point in time. There is no requirement that the vehicle still be involved in interstate commerce. This, Wood argues, is an ex post facto law. Additionally, this involves the federal government in matters of a purely local nature involving stolen property. Defendant argues the statute is overbroad since it makes no exception for police officers and repossessors who knowingly deal with stolen vehicles.

Goad has adopted this motion for the most part, Doc. 26, except for the portion of Wood's brief which states that Goad towed the vehicle to Wood's home. Goad states that one Leonard Young towed the vehicle to Wood's home, where it remained until it was turned over to the police. Doc. 32.

The government has responded to this motion, asking that it be denied. Doc. 39, 52.

The amendment of the statute in 1984 cannot form the basis for an ex post facto challenge, since the defendants' conduct occurred after the effective date of that amendment. The defendants argue that since the theft of the truck occurred before the amendment to the statute, all further charges arising out of that theft must be based on the pre-amendment version of the statute. The date of the theft of the truck is not relevant to the ex post facto inquiry, since the defendants are not charged with stealing the truck. The relevant dates are the dates of the defendants' conduct in possessing, concealing, and storing the truck. "The key ex post facto inquiry is the actual state of the law at the time the defendant perpetrated the offense." Watson v. Estelle, 886 F.2d 1093, 1096 (9th Cir.1989). Since the defendants' conduct occurred well after the 1984 amendment to the statute, no ex post facto problem is presented. Cf. United States v. Gillies, 851 F.2d 492, 495-96 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 147 (1988) (that transportation of firearm in interstate commerce may have occurred prior to enactment of firearm statute, 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1), does not violate ex post facto clause; defendant engaged in possession of firearm seven months after the law's enactment).

5 It is undisputed that Congress may legislate in this area only because interstate commerce is involved. Prior to the 1984 amendment, 18 U.S.C. § 2313 specified "interstate commerce" as an element of the offense. Congress changed the elements of the offense in the 1984 amendment to the statute; however, Congress did not remove the link to interstate commerce. The crossing of state boundaries constitutes interstate commerce.

Wood also argues that the pickup truck was no longer involved in interstate commerce at the time of their involvement with it. Under the old statute, whether the vehicle was still in the stream of commerce when the defendant dealt with it was ordinarily a question of fact for the jury. See United States v. Radtke, 799 F.2d 298, 306 (7th Cir.1986); United States v. Hiscott, 586 F.2d 1271, 1274 (8th Cir.1978). The 1984 amendment to the statute has removed this requirement. The crime of possessing, concealing, and storing a stolen motor vehicle has four essential elements: (1) that the vehicle was stolen; (2) after it was stolen, the vehicle was moved across a state line; (3) after the vehicle had been stolen and moved across a state line, the defendant possessed, concealed, and stored it; and (4) at the time the defendant concealed and stored the vehicle, he knew it had been stolen. See Model Criminal Jury Instructions for the District Courts of the Eighth Circuit § 6.18.2313 (West rev. ed. 1989). The amended statute provides that federal criminal jurisdiction continues over a stolen vehicle once it crosses a state line even after it ceases to be part of interstate commerce. Id. Committee Comments. This is a constitutional exercise of Congress' commerce clause powers. Cf. Scarborough v. United States, 431 U.S. 563 (1977) (the interstate commerce nexus requirement in firearm statute, 18 U.S.C. App. § 1202(a), is satisfied by proof that the firearm had previously travelled in interstate commerce); United States v. Gillies, 851 F.2d 492, 493 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 147 (1988) (words "affecting commerce" in firearm statute, 18 U.S.C. § 922(g), signal Congress' intent to exercise its commerce clause powers broadly, "perhaps as far as the Constitution permits;" statutory language applies to possession of firearm that previously moved in interstate commerce).

Finally, the defendant argues that the statute is overbroad since it makes no exception for those who legitimately deal with stolen vehicles. This argument warrants little discussion. The court is unaware of any criminal statutes which contain specific exceptions for law enforcement personnel. However, a person whose employment requires him or her to deal with contraband would necessarily lack the criminal intent required for a violation of the law to occur.

4. Motion to dismiss for preaccusatory delay (Doc. 18-19, filed by Goad)

Defendant Goad moves to dismiss the indictment on the grounds that there was a delay of 45 months between November 1985, the time of his alleged involvement in the offense, and August 1989, when the indictment was returned. Goad alleges that the delay was attributable solely to the government and that he has suffered substantial actual prejudice thereby. Goad alleges that the Wichita Police and the Kansas Highway Patrol were aware of his involvement with the truck and of the location of the truck in the fall of 1985. Goad alleges prejudice from the inability to locate certain witnesses and the loss or destruction of evidence.

6 Wood has joined in this motion. Doc. 31. The government has filed a response. Doc. 51.

Based on the testimony given and the June 4 hearing, the court makes the following findings of fact. Jerry Dunbar, a private investigator, worked for defendant Goad from approximately late 1985 through the summer of 1987. Dunbar testified that in approximately the fall of 1987, Leonard Young, who contracted with Goad to tow repossessed cars, told Dunbar that Goad had taken a stolen vehicle and given it to defendant Wood following a dispute with an insurance company. Young told Dunbar that he wanted to talk with the authorities.

Dunbar met with Sheriff Mike Hill in October or November 1987. Dunbar told Hill that a local private investigator and a local attorney were allegedly involved with a stolen vehicle which was taken by one and then taken to the other's house. Dunbar related that a witness wanted to talk, but did not know whom to contact. Hill telephoned Dunbar the next day to set up a meeting with United States Attorney Benjamin L. Burgess, Jr. At the meeting with Burgess, Dunbar related the story Young had told him.

Around January 1989, Dunbar was contacted by an agent of the Kansas Bureau of Investigation regarding the truck.

On cross-examination, Dunbar admitted that he did not recall the dates exactly. The meeting with Hill and Burgess may have occurred in October 1986, although Dunbar thought it occurred in October 1987. Dunbar admitted that he had no personal knowledge of the matter, where the truck was located, whether Young was telling the truth, or whether Young had further contact with law enforcement.

Former United States Attorney Benjamin L. Burgess, Jr., submitted an affidavit (Doc. 50). Burgess' affidavit states that he has been informed that Jerry Dunbar claims to have met with him and Sheriff Mike Hill in October 1986 regarding the events giving rise to this criminal prosecution. Burgess states that he cannot remember whether such a meeting occurred. Burgess stated that he did vaguely remember a meeting with representatives of law enforcement agencies in late 1986 or early 1987, at which time there was some discussion about defendant Goad.

According to Kansas Bureau of Investigation reports, shortly after Goad contacted the insurance company regarding the stolen pickup truck, two Wichita Police Department Detectives contacted Goad. Goad advised the police that he did not know the current location of the truck. In October 1986, Dunbar met with Hill and Burgess regarding the truck. Hill and Burgess allegedly asked Dunbar to help them develop information which might lead to the filing of charges against Goad. Dunbar declined to become involved in the investigation. Doc. 53, Exh. 3.

The due process clause of the fifth amendment to the Constitution requires dismissal of an indictment when the defendant is able to demonstrate that delay in charging him with a particular crime "was the product of deliberate action by law enforcement personnel designed to gain a tactical advantage resulting in actual prejudice to the accused, thereby depriving him of his right to a fair trial." United States v. Comosona, 614 F.2d 695, 696 (10th Cir.1980). Several elements must be considered. First, there must be a demonstration of actual prejudice to the defendant resulting from the delay. This prejudice generally takes the form of a loss of witnesses and/or physical evidence. Second, the length of the delay must be considered. Third, the government's reasons for the delay must be carefully considered. Id. Something more than ordinary negligence on the part of the government is required; the government's delay must be intentional and purposeful. Id. at 696 n. 1 (citing United States v. Glist, 594 F.2d 1374 (10th Cir.1979)).

*7 The defendant must make a prima facie showing of fact that the delay in charging him has actually prejudiced his ability to defend, and that the delay was intentionally or purposely designed by the government to gain some tactical advantage over or to harass him. Once the defendant makes a prima facie showing, the burden of going forward with the evidence shifts to the government. Once the government presents evidence showing that the delay was not improperly motivated, the defendant bears the ultimate burden of establishing the government's due process violation by a preponderance of the evidence. Id. at 696-97.

The defendant has failed to make a prima facie showing. The defendant may have shown some prejudice. The evidence presented shows that witnesses' memories have begun to fail, leading to a loss of evidence.

The delay, however, is not so lengthy as to be fatal to the case. The indictment charges a conspiracy, which continues from its inception in November 1985 until February 1989. A conspiracy is by nature a continuing enterprise. The conspiracy charged here begins with the finding of the truck in 1985, continues through the hiding of the truck, and ends with the discovery of the truck in 1989. Charges were brought later that year.

Finally, the defendant has failed to show any improper motive on the part of the government. The evidence presented by the defendant supports at most an inference of negligence--that the United States Attorney was informed about this crime yet failed to investigate promptly. The defendant has presented nothing which would demonstrate an intentional and purposeful delay on the part of the government.

The court shall deny the defendant's motion to dismiss for preaccusatory delay. The issue presented by defendant Goad is a matter of proof for trial. The court would consider the issue again at the close of the government's case or at the close of all the evidence.

IT IS BY THE COURT THEREFORE ORDERED that defendant Goad's motion for a bill of particulars (Doc. 20-21), joined in by defendant Wood (Doc. 30), is hereby denied.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that defendant Goad's motion for disclosure of impeaching information (Doc. 24-25), joined in by defendant Wood (Doc. 27-28), is hereby granted in part and denied in part as specified in this opinion and order.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that defendant Wood's motion to dismiss (Doc. 29), joined in by defendant Goad (Doc. 26, 32), is hereby denied.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that defendant Goad's motion to dismiss for preaccusatory delay (Doc. 18-19), joined in by defendant Wood (Doc. 31), is hereby denied.

END OF DOCUMENT

R 404(b) - immed. disclosure

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
James Richard BERRY, Jr., Lisa Ann Berry, Daniel Wayne Connell and Deana Marie Sandoval, Defendants.
Nos. 92-40043-01-SAC to 92-40043-04-SAC.
United States District Court, D. Kansas.
Nov. 23, 1992.

Lee Thompson, U.S. Atty. for the District of Kansas, Thomas G. Luedke, Asst. U.S. Atty., for U.S.

John J. Ambrosio, John J. Ambrosio, Chartered, Topeka, Kan., for James Richard Berry, Jr.

Marilyn M. Trubey, Federal Public Defender's Office, Topeka, Kan., for Lisa Ann Berry.

Michael M. Jackson, Topeka, Kan., for Daniel Wayne Connell.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

CROW, District Judge.

1 On October 21, 1992, the grand jury returned a four count superseding indictment charging all of the defendants in Count I with one count of Cf.Fla.Stat.Ann s 90.404(2)(b) (written disclosure must describe uncharged misconduct with particularity required of an indictment or information). Instead, the Committee opted for a generalized notice provision which requires the prosecution to apprise the defense of the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts. The Committee does not intend that the amendment will supersede other rules of admissibility or disclosure, such as the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. s 3500, et seq. nor require the prosecution to disclose directly or indirectly the names and addresses of its witnesses, something it is currently not required to do under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16.

3 The amendment requires the prosecution to provide notice, regardless of how it intends to use the extrinsic act evidence at trial, i.e., during its case-in-chief, for impeachment, or for possible rebuttal. The court in its discretion may, under the facts, decide that the particular request or notice was not reasonable, either because of the lack of timeliness or completeness. Because the notice requirement serves as condition precedent to admissibility of 404(b) evidence, the offered evidence is inadmissible if the court decides that the notice requirement has not been met.

Nothing in the amendment precludes the court from requiring the government to provide it with an opportunity to rule in limine on 404(b) evidence before it is offered or even mentioned during trial. When rules in limine, the court may require the government to disclose to it the specifics of such evidence which the court must consider in determining admissibility.

The amendment does not extend to evidence of acts which are "intrinsic" to the charged offense, see United States v. Williams, 900 F.2d 823 (5th Cir.1990) (noting distinction between 404(b) evidence and intrinsic offense evidence). Nor is the amendment intended to redefine what evidence would otherwise be admissible under Rule 404(b).

Id.

During oral argument, the government basically indicated that it did not intend to introduce any evidence that was extrinsic to the crimes charged. Therefore, the notice requirements of Rule 404(b) appear to be satisfied. Upon inquiry, the government gave examples of the type of evidence it believed to be "intrinsic" to the crime charged. As a specific example, the government indicated that an act intrinsic to the alleged conspiracy of growing and distributing of marijuana would include the acquisition of supplies to raise marijuana. The defendants did not directly respond to government's characterization of those acts as intrinsic or extrinsic.

In light of the government's response, the court will briefly discuss the distinction between "extrinsic" and "intrinsic" acts. This discussion is not intended to express any opinion as to whether the evidence offered by the government in this case is "intrinsic" or "extrinsic," but is simply intended to provide a brief overview of this issue.

The distinction between evidence of "intrinsic" acts and evidence of "extrinsic" acts is crucial and sometimes subtle. Rule 404(b) only applies to evidence of acts extrinsic to the charged crime. United States v. Record, 873 F.2d 1163, 1372 n. 5 (10th Cir.1989). Conversely, acts intrinsic to the crimes charged are not excludable under 404(b). An uncharged act may not be extrinsic if:

(1) The act was part of the scheme for which a defendant is being prosecuted; Record, 873 F.2d at 1372 n. 5, or

(2) The act was "inextricably intertwined with the charged crime such that a witness' testimony 'would have been confusing and incomplete without mention of the prior act.' " Record, 873 F.2d at 1372 n. 5 (quoting United States v. Richardson, 764 F.2d 1514, 1521-22 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 952 (1985).

See United States v. Williams, 900 F.2d 823, 825 (5th Cir.1990) (" 'Other act' evidence is 'intrinsic' when the evidence of the other act and the evidence of the crime charged are 'inextricably intertwined' or both acts are part of a 'single criminal episode' or the other acts were 'necessary preliminaries' to the crime charged.") (citations omitted).

4 In the event the government does obtain 404(b) evidence it shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any 404(b) it plans to introduce at trial. See United States v. Williams, 792 F.Supp. 1120, 1134 (S.D.Ind.1992) (Government only need supply the defense with information sufficient to indicate the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts); United States v. Alex, 791 F.Supp. 723, 728 (N.D.Ill.1992) (defendant's demand for specific evidentiary detail including dates, times, places and persons involved is wholly overbroad; Rule 404(b) only requires the government to disclose the general nature of such evidence it intends to introduce at trial); United States v. Sims, No. 92-CR-166, 1992 WL 295672, 1992 U.S.Dist. Lexis 14619, at *2-4 (N.D.Ill. September 28, 1992) (same); United States v. Swano, No. 91-CR-477-02-03, 1992 WL 137588, 1992 U.S.Dist. Lexis 7554, at *16-17 (N.D.Ill. May 29, 1992) (Rule 404(b) not a tool for discovery; defendants' requests for specific dates, times, places, persons, etc. ..., well beyond scope of Rule 404(b)); but see United States v. Melendez, No. 92 Crim. 047 (LMM), 1992 WL 96327, 1992 U.S.Dist. LEXIS 5616, at *1 (S.D. New York April 24, 1992) ("Rule 404(b) will be satisfied if the notice to be given by the government identifies each crime, wrong or act by its specific nature (e.g., sale of cocaine), place (e.g., New York City), and approximate date (e.g., July 1986) to the extent known by the government."). The defendants' motions for 404(b) disclosure is granted. The government is reminded of its continuing obligation to provide notice of the general nature of the 404(b) evidence it intends to use at trial.

INSTA-CITE

CITATION: 1992 WL 372181

Direct History

=> 1 U. S. v. Berry, 1992 WL 372181 (D.Kan., Nov 23, 1992)
(NO. 92-40043-01-SAC, 92-40043-02-SAC, 92-40043-03-SAC, 92-40043-04-SAC)

Related References

2 U.S. v. Sandoval, 812 F.Supp. 1156 (D.Kan., Feb 09, 1993)
(NO. 92-40043-04-SAC)

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Eugene Lamar SUTTON, Appellant.

No. 94-2597.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Oct. 11, 1994.

Decided Dec. 7, 1994.

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Paul A. Magnuson, Chief Judge, of bank robbery, use of firearm in course of violent crime, and being felon in possession of firearm. Defendant appealed. The Court of Appeals, McKay, Senior Circuit Judge, sitting by designation, held that: (1) district court did not abuse its discretion in excusing the government's failure to timely notify defendant that it intended to introduce evidence of defendant's prior narcotics use; (2) evidence of defendant's prior drug use was not material; (3) prejudicial impact of evidence substantially outweighed its probative effect; (4) admission of evidence of defendant's prior drug use was harmless error; (5) district court did not abuse its discretion in precluding defendant from calling witness who would have testified to inconsistent statements made by prosecution witness; and (6) conviction was supported by sufficient evidence.

Affirmed.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
District court did not abuse its discretion in excusing the government's failure to notify defendant at least four days prior to trial, pursuant to district court orders, that it intended to introduce evidence of defendant's prior narcotics use in trial for bank robbery; the government discovered the evidence only five days before trial on a Friday and notified defendant on the following Monday, and defendant was on notice that his involvement with drugs would be an issue at trial. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 371(12)
110k371(12)
In bank robbery prosecution, evidence of defendant's prior drug use was not material, where government simply asked the jury to draw a raw inference about defendant's motive from the fact that he used drugs. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 371(12)
110k371(12)
In bank robbery prosecution, even if motive was material issue and evidence of defendant's prior drug use was probative of motive, prejudicial impact of evidence substantially outweighed its probative effect; slight probative value of knowing one possible motive for defendant to commit robbery did not outweigh likely prejudicial effect on jury of being told that defendant was crack- cocaine user. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rules 403, 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 1169.2(3)
110k1169.2(3)
In bank robbery prosecution, admission of evidence of defendant's prior drug use was harmless error, where defendant's bad character was established by admissible evidence; defendant claimed that large amounts of cash in his possession after bank robbery were result of defendant's act of breaking into cocaine dealer's home and stealing cash, and evidence that defendant purchased large amounts of cocaine was introduced into evidence to establish a recent acquisition of wealth. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[5] WITNESSES ⇐ 389
410k389
District court did not abuse its discretion in precluding defendant from calling witness who would have testified to inconsistent statements made by one of key prosecution witnesses, where defendant failed to give prosecution witness the opportunity to explain or deny having made a prior inconsistent statement while he was on the stand; Barrett rule allowing such evidence so long as witness is available to be recalled to explain inconsistent statements had not been adopted in circuit, and thus was optional procedure, not mandatory. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 613(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[6] ROBBERY ⚿ 2
342k2
Conviction of bank robbery was supported by evidence of bank surveillance photographs of robber, testimony from defendant's aunt and police officer who knew defendant well identifying defendant as man in photographs, testimony that defendant possessed large amounts of cash later on same day as robbery, and testimony of two admitted accomplices implicating defendant in crime, despite fact that accomplices had made plea bargains, and existence of minor inconsistencies in accomplices' and eyewitnesses' testimony, which were easily explained by rapidity and stress of events. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2113(a, d).

[7] CRIMINAL LAW ⚿ 1144.13(3)
110k1144.13(3)
In examining challenge to sufficiency of evidence, Court of Appeals views evidence in light most favorable to government and resolves all evidentiary conflicts in favor of the government.

1258 Glenn P. Bruder, Minneapolis, MN, argued, for appellant.

David L. Lillehaug, U.S. Atty., Minneapolis, MN, argued (Jon M. Hopeman, on the brief), for appellee.

Before McMILLIAN, Circuit Judge, McKAY, [FN*] Senior Circuit Judge, and BOWMAN, Circuit Judge.

FN* The HONORABLE MONROE G. McKAY, Senior Circuit Judge, United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit, sitting by designation.

McKAY, Circuit Judge.

Eugene Lamar Sutton appeals from a final judgment entered in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota finding him guilty upon a jury verdict of bank robbery, use of a firearm in the course of a violent crime, and being a felon in possession of a firearm, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2113(a)(d), 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1) and (2), and 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1), respectively. Mr. Sutton presents three issues on appeal: (1) he challenges the admission of certain evidence; (2) he challenges the exclusion of certain evidence; and (3) he challenges the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole. We affirm the judgment of the district court.

[1] Mr. Sutton contends that the district court improperly admitted evidence of his prior narcotic use under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). In support of this claim, he has demonstrated that he was provided notice of this evidence only two days before trial, despite the fact that the district court explicitly ordered the government to notify the defendant at least four days prior to trial of any 404(b) evidence it planned to use. The district court excused this breach for two reasons. First, the government discovered the evidence only five days prior to trial, on a Friday, and they notified the defendant on the following Monday. Second, the government had provided the defendant with a copy of the statement of another one of its witnesses over a month before the trial. This statement related to a drug buy the day of the robbery. Thus, the defendant was on notice that his involvement with drugs would be an issue at the trial and had adequate time to prepare for this type of evidence. The district court did not abuse its discretion in excusing the government's late 1259 notification of Mr. Sutton under these circumstances.

[2] Mr. Sutton also argues, persuasively, that the evidence of his drug use does not meet our test for admissibility under Rule 404(b).

In order for the trial court to admit evidence under Rule 404(b), the evidence must satisfy the following conditions:

1. The evidence of the bad act or other crime is relevant to a material issue raised at trial;
2. The bad act or crime is similar in kind and reasonably close in time to the crime charged;
3. There is sufficient evidence to support a finding by the jury that the defendant committed the other act or crime; and
4. The potential prejudice of the evidence does not substantially outweigh its probative value.

United States v. DeAngelo, 13 F.3d 1228, 1231 (8th Cir.) (citing United States v. Johnson, 934 F.2d 936, 939 (8th Cir.1991)), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 114 S.Ct. 2717, 129 L.Ed.2d 842 (1994).

Mr. Sutton contends that his prior drug use does not meet either the first or last part of this test. We agree, but find the error to be harmless.

The first part of our test under Rule 404(b) allows evidence of prior bad acts where it is used for purposes "such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident." The government argues that the evidence of Mr. Sutton's drug use showed a motive for the bank robbery. In other words, the government was attempting to show that he stole the money to support his drug habit. Although other circuits have allowed evidence of drug use to demonstrate motive to commit a bank robbery (see, e.g., United States v. Miranda, 986 F.2d 1283, 1285 (9th Cir.) (citing cases), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 2393, 124 L.Ed.2d 295 (1993)), we have never decided this precise issue.

This court has allowed evidence of other prior bad acts to show motive in a robbery case. United States v. Mays, 822 F.2d 793, 797 (8th Cir.1987). However, that case is readily distinguishable from the present case. First, in Mays we held that motive was a material issue in that case, although we did not explain why. Furthermore, the facts that were admitted as evidence of motive were also clearly relevant to the issue of identity, which is indisputably a material issue in a robbery case. [FN1] Id. at 797. Another distinction between this case and Mays is that in Mays the evidence of motive ("to secure enough funds to start a new life together") was offered as direct testimony by a co-conspirator. In this case, motive was not a material issue; the defendant did not put his motive in issue; there was no testimony by his co-conspirators about his motive; and the facts which the government used to show motive were not also relevant to identity. The government simply asked the jury to draw a raw inference about the defendant's motive from the fact that he used drugs. We decline to approve such a tenuous link.

FN1. The evidence related to a previous bank robbery committed by defendant that was "similar enough to establish some identity between the robberies. Both banks were located in an isolated rural area; before both robberies a four-wheel drive vehicle was stolen and later abandoned; and in both robberies a .45 caliber automatic pistol was used." Id.

[3] Even if motive were a material issue in this robbery case and drug use were probative of it, the evidence would still fail the fourth part of our test, which is derived from the general requirement of Rule 403 that the prejudicial impact of the evidence should not substantially outweigh its probative value. The admission of evidence of prior wrongful acts creates a danger that the jury will convict the accused on the basis of bad character; thus, it is normally excluded under Rule 404. We cannot say that the slight probative value of knowing one possible motive for Mr. Sutton to commit a robbery outweighs the likely prejudicial effect on the jury of being told that the defendant was a crack-cocaine user. [FN2] In any event, it could hardly come as *1260 a surprise to the jury that Mr. Sutton was robbing a bank because he needed money for some reason. [FN3]

FN2. There is a substantial split among the cases about whether this type of evidence should be admissible. See generally, Debra T. Landes, Annotation, Admissibility of Evidence of Accused's Drug Addiction or Use to Show Motive for Theft of Property Other Than Drugs, 2 A.L.R. 4th 1298 (1980). We think the better-reasoned cases exclude such evidence. See State v. LeFever, 102 Wash.2d 777, 690 P.2d 574 (1984) (Evidence of defendant's addiction to heroin, offered by prosecution to show motive for robbery, is inadmissible in that resulting prejudice overwhelmed any possible relevance or probativeness.); People v. Holt, 37 Cal.3d 436, 208 Cal.Rptr. 547, 554, 690 P.2d 1207, 1214 (1984) (Whatever probative value defendant's drug use might have had to show motive for robbery was outweighed by prejudicial value.).

FN3. This brings to mind the story of a more famous bank robber with the same surname. When asked why he robbed banks, Willie Sutton replied, "That's where the money is."

[4] Although we believe that the admission of Mr. Sutton's prior drug use was erroneous, we nevertheless find the error to be harmless, because when viewed in the context of all the evidence presented at Mr. Sutton's trial, any possible prejudice that Mr. Sutton suffered was de minimis. For example, in Mr. Sutton's opening statement, his counsel referred to his association with drug dealers and how he broke into a cocaine dealer's home and stole $10,000. (Tr. [FN4] 35-36) This information was a crucial part of Mr. Sutton's defense, as it provided an alternative explanation for how Mr. Sutton came to have large amounts of cash just after the time of the bank robbery. However, these statements also gave the government the prerogative to explore on cross-examination the basis for his knowledge that there would be large amounts of cash in the drug dealer's house and the nature of his relationship with the drug dealer. Furthermore, testimony was presented that Mr. Sutton purchased large amounts of cocaine the day of the robbery. This evidence was properly admitted because it tended to establish a recent acquisition of wealth. We think Mr. Sutton's bad character was so thoroughly established by admissible evidence (including his own) that there is no likelihood that this additional bad character evidence would have influenced the outcome in this case.

FN4. Trial Transcript.

[5] Mr. Sutton also contends that the district court improperly precluded him from presenting a witness who would have testified to inconsistent statements made by one of the key prosecution witnesses, Mr. Smith. This testimony was not allowed because Mr. Smith was not given the opportunity to explain or deny having made a prior inconsistent statement while he was on the stand, which is normally the proper foundation for impeachment under Fed.R.Evid. 613(b). Mr. Sutton points out that the First Circuit has relaxed this requirement, requiring only that a witness be available to be recalled to explain inconsistent statements. United States v. Barrett, 539 F.2d 244, 254-56 (1st Cir.1976); United States v. Hudson, 970 F.2d 948, 955 (1st Cir.1992). However, this procedure is not mandatory, but is optional at the trial judge's discretion. Id. at 956 & n. 2. More to the point, since this circuit has never adopted the rule in Barrett, we cannot say that the district court abused its discretion in not applying it.

[6][7] Mr. Sutton has also challenged the sufficiency of the evidence. Accordingly, we must examine whether a rational trier of fact could have found the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. United States v. Fetlow, 21 F.3d 243, 247 (8th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom., Ferguson v. United States, --- U.S. ----, 115 S.Ct. 456, 130 L.Ed.2d 365 (1994). In examining such a claim, we view the evidence in the light most favorable to the government and resolve all evidentiary conflicts in favor of the government. United States v. Nelson, 984 F.2d 894, 899 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 2945, 124 L.Ed.2d 693 (1993).

The evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution, indicates that a man matching the description of Mr. Sutton robbed the Chisago City Bank. (Tr. 46). There were photographs taken by bank surveillance cameras which the jury viewed and compared to Mr. Sutton. There was also testimony that his Aunt and a police officer who knew him well identified him as the man in the photos. (Tr. 145, 158).

Further testimony demonstrated that Mr. Sutton had in his possession large quantities *1261 of cash later on the same day of the robbery. He used this money to purchase a car for $2500 in cash (Tr. 42) and $2400 worth of cocaine. (Tr. 261, 263, 265). Mr. Sutton provided conflicting and unsubstantiated claims for the origins of the money (Tr. 351, 378-79), but it is undisputed that he did not earn the money through legal gainful employment.

Furthermore, two admitted accomplices of Mr. Sutton implicated him in the crime and provided sufficient detail that the jury might rationally have found them credible. Although the accomplices had made plea bargains, the jury was properly instructed by the trial judge on this point. The inconsistencies in the accomplices' and eyewitnesses' testimony are minor and are easily explained by the rapidity and stress of the events. The bank tellers' inability to pick Mr. Sutton's photo out of a lineup may also be explained by the speed and stress of the event, plus the fact that the robber was wearing a hat and sunglasses. This weakness in the evidence was overcome by the independent identification by Mr. Sutton's aunt and the police officer.

After carefully reviewing the evidence presented in the light most favorable to the government, we conclude that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict.

Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

END OF DOCUMENT

INSTA-CITE

CITATION: 41 F.3d 1257

Direct History

=> 1 U.S. v. Sutton, 41 F.3d 1257, 41 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 708 (8th Cir.(Minn.), Dec 07, 1994) (NO. 94-2597)
Certiorari Denied by
2 Sutton v. U.S., 115 S.Ct. 1712, 131 L.Ed.2d 572, 63 USLW 3754 (U.S., Apr 17, 1995) (NO. 94-8309)

UNITED STATES of America
v.
Rafael CRUZ, a/k/a "Esa," Defendant.

No. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH).

United States District Court, S.D. New York.

Oct. 20, 1995.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

HAIGHT, District Judge:

*1 In Counts Fifty-Three and Seventy-Seven of the 78-count superseding indictment in this case, defendant Rafael Cruz is charged with conspiracy to distribute and to possess with the intent to distribute heroin in violation of 21 U.S.C. §§ 812, 841(a)(1), 841(b)(1)(A), and 846 and 18 U.S.C. § 2, and using a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking crime in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 924(c) and 2. By Notice of Motion dated September 29, 1995 Cruz requests the following relief: (1) provision of a bill of particulars; (2) an order striking any prejudicial surplusage from the indictment; (3) an order allowing defendant to inspect the minutes of the Grand Jury proceeding with regard to evidence supporting County Fifty-Three of the indictment; (4) an order granting defendant discovery under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16; (5) a Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) order directing the government to provide advance notice of any evidence of prior bad acts or criminal convictions of the defendant the government intends to introduce at trial; (6) an order requiring the government to disclose before trial all prior conduct by which the government would seek to impeach defendant; (7) an order compelling the government to comply with its obligations under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963). For the reasons stated below, defendant's applications are denied with the exception of his motion concerning superfluous counts in the indictment, his motion for discovery of surveillance photographs, and his motion for Rule 404(b) evidence and impeachment evidence.

DISCUSSION

1. Bill of Particulars

Cruz seeks an order directing the government to provide a bill of particulars pursuant to Fed. R. Crim. P. 7(f). He asks for provision of the date, time, and location of the occurrence of any overt acts the government intends to prove at trial as well as the names and addresses of any unindicted co-conspirators and the dates on which they joined the alleged conspiracy.

The decision whether to require the government to provide a bill of particulars rests within the sound discretion of the district court. See United States v. Cephas, 937 F.2d 816, 823 (2d Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 1037 (1992); United States v. Bortnovsky, 820 F.2d 572, 574 (2d Cir. 1987) (per curiam). Its function is to "'provide defendant with information about the details of the charge against him if this is necessary to the preparation of his defense, and to avoid prejudicial surprise at the trial."' United States v. Torres, 901 F.2d 205, 234 (2d Cir. 1990), quoting 1 C. Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure § 129, at 434-35 (2d ed. 1982), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 906 (1990). A bill of particulars is required "'only where the charges of the indictment are so general that they do not advise the defendant of the specific acts of which he is accused."' Id. at 234, quoting United States v. Feola, 651 F. Supp. 1068, 1132 (S.D.N.Y. 1987), aff'd, 875 F.2d 857 (2d Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 834 (1989); see also Bortnovsky, 820 F.2d at 574 (per curiam) (bill of particulars only appropriate when necessary to "prevent surprise").

*2 "The test is not whether the particulars sought would be useful to the defense. Rather, a more appropriate inquiry is whether the information in question is necessary to the defense." United States v. Guerrerio, 670 F. Supp. 1215, 1224 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) (emphasis in original) (citation omitted). "Generally if the information sought by defendant is provided in the indictment or in some acceptable alternate form, no bill of particulars is required." Bortnovsky, 820 F.2d at 574; see also Feola, 651 F. Supp. at 1133 ("In deciding whether the bill of particulars is needed, the court must determine whether the information sought has been provided elsewhere, such as in other items provided by discovery.... and the indictment itself.").

Applying these precepts, Cruz has not demonstrated the necessity of a bill of particulars. The superseding indictment specifies the approximate beginning and end dates of the narcotics conspiracy and the corresponding time frame of the defendant's possession and use of a firearm. It also supplies the general vicinity and mechanics of the operation of the narcotics conspiracy of which he is alleged to have been a member. The government has also provided the defendant with abundant discovery materials, and the defendant has available to him the transcript of the earlier trial of a member of the conspiracy to which he is allegedly party. In the aggregate, this information satisfies the need a bill of particulars is designed to fulfill: it enables Cruz to adequately prepare his defense and prevents the possibility of unfair surprise at trial.

Although this information does not expose every detail of the crimes alleged to have been committed, the government is not obligated to particularize all of its evidence before trial. Details concerning the date on which the conspiracy was formed and the date and means by which Cruz entered into it need not be revealed before trial. [FN1] See United States v. Persico, 621 F. Supp. 842, 868 (S.D.N.Y. 1985). Nor is the government required to set forth the location of each predicate act or details concerning meetings at which the defendant was present. United States v. Wilson, 565 F.Supp. 1416, 1438-39 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) (Weinfeld, J.). Cruz's request for the names of unindicted co-conspirators also fails. The indictment names thirteen of defendant's alleged co-conspirators in the conspiracy with which he is charged. A more "exhaustive list" of the participants is not necessary. United States v. Benevento, 649 F. Supp. 1379, 1388 (S.D.N.Y. 1986) (Weinfeld, J.), partially vacated on other grounds, 836 F.2d 60 (2d Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 486 U.S. 1043 (1988); see also United States v. Santobello, 1994 WL 525053, * 6 (S.D.N.Y. September 23, 1994) (where indictment named twelve individuals involved in conspiracies, government was not required to provide names and addresses of all unindicted accomplices through bill of particulars).

3 Since the indictment and the other information provided to the defendant adequately apprise him of the nature of the crimes with which he is charged so as to prevent the risk of double jeopardy and undue surprise at trial, Cruz's request for a bill of particulars is unwarranted.

2. Striking Surplusage In The Indictment

Defendant moves to strike certain of the superseding indictment's allegations he deems "surplusage," in particular, what he deems to be superfluous counts and superfluous references to aliases. Defendant argues first that he is named in a seventy-eight count indictment which alleges acts of murder, kidnapping, extortion and assault by the C&C enterprise, but that he himself is not alleged to have been a member of that enterprise. Defendant is accused of aiding, abetting, and conspiring with that organization, not of having been a member of it nor a co-conspirator in the RICO charge of the indictment.

The government, in its memorandum, concedes that the information deemed surplusage by the defendant "is not necessarily relevant to prove the elements of Counts Fifty-Three and Seventy-Seven." Govt's Mem. at 4. The government then states that it is willing to confer with defense counsel and the Court in an effort to reach agreement about removal of "surplusage" from the indictment. Id. Given that the parties share common ground on this issue, the Court orders them to confer on this issue and inform the Court of their decisions concerning any surplusage in the indictment and the appropriate changes that will be made. The parties may request Court participation in this process if they are unable to reach an agreement.

Defendant also objects to the use of an alias in the indictment, arguing that the alias will raise prejudicial suspicion in jurors' minds, and has no probative value on the question of his identity in this case. The government responds that defendant was known to his alleged co-conspirators as "Esa," not as "Rafael Cruz," and that the alias is therefore necessary to establish defendant's identity.

The Court is convinced that preservation of the alias "Esa" in the indictment will not unfairly prejudice jurors against the defendant. The Second Circuit explicitly allows the use of aliases at trial if the alias is necessary to prove defendant's identity. United States v. Miller, 381 F.2d 529, 536 (2d Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 392 U.S. 929 (1968), reh'g denied, 393 U.S. 902 (1968). This case presents just such a situation: since the government's witnesses know defendant only by the name of "Esa" and not as "Rafael Cruz," their accurate identification of defendant depends upon allowing the government to elicit testimony from them using the name "Esa."

Furthermore, this case is easily differentiated from United States v. Williams, 739 F.2d 297 (7th Cir. 1984), in which the alias "Fast Eddie" was stricken from the indictment on the grounds of undue prejudice to the defendant. Defendant proffers no evidence that the alias "Esa" carries the same negative connotations as the alias in Williams, and the Court sees no reason to so assume. Defendant's request to strike his alias from the indictment is denied.

3. Disclosure of Grand Jury Minutes

*4 Defendant requests that the Court order the disclosure of the portion of the Grand Jury minutes relating to the narcotics charge against him, or, in the alternative, allow him to inspect the minutes in camera.

Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(3)(C)(ii) allows such disclosure "upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury." "Grand Jury proceedings carry a 'presumption of regularity."' Torres, 901 F.2d at 232, quoting Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 139 n.23 (1974). The Supreme Court has "consistently construed the Rule ... to require a strong showing of particularized need for grand jury materials before any disclosure will be permitted." United States v. Sells Engineering, Inc., 463 U.S. 418, 443 (1983). See also Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. United States, 360 U.S. 395, 400 (1959). In this context, "a review of grand jury minutes is rarely permitted without specific factual allegations of government misconduct." Torres, 901 F.2d at 233.

Defendant argues that the evidence upon which the government relies is insufficient to sustain an indictment unless the government misrepresented the evidence. This assertion does not provide the kind of specific allegation needed to justify opening Grand Jury minutes, and is insufficient to convince the Court to take the unusual step of opening the Grand Jury minutes to scrutiny by defendant. Defendant's motion on this point is denied.

4. Discovery Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 16

a. Reports, Logs, Photographs, Videotapes

Defendant requests that the government produce all reports, logs, photographs, and videotapes to him before trial. The government states that it has no such evidence that include the defendant, but that the government is in possession of surveillance photographs of members of the C&C gang and associates of the gang and of defendant, and that it has no objection to making these surveillance photographs available to defendant. The Court orders the government to do so at a time convenient for both the government and defendant.

b. Grand Jury Dates, Adjournments, Instructions, Voting Records, and Court Transcripts of Returned Indictment

The Court rejects defendant's further requests to gain information about the grand jury proceedings. Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16 does not require the government to disclose such information, except as permitted under Fed. R. Crim. Pro. 6. As discussed above, Rule 6(3)(C)(ii) allows such disclosure "upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury." Because defendant has not made any such showing, his motion is denied.

c. Government's Witness List

With respect to defendant's request for a government witness list, Rule 16 "does not require the Government to furnish the names and addresses of its witnesses in general." United States v. Bejasa, 904 F.2d 137, 139 (2d Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 921 (1990); see also United States v. Victor Teicher & Co., L.P., 726 F. Supp. 1424, 1443 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (Haight, J.). Although this Court has the authority to require the government to disclose the identity of its witnesses, such an order will only be granted if the defendants make "a specific showing that disclosure was both material to the preparation of [the] defense and reasonable in light of the circumstances surrounding [the] case." Bejasa, 904 F.2d at 140 (quoting United States v. Cannone, 528 F.2d 296, 300 (2d Cir. 1975)) (emphasis and alterations in Bejasa). "Especially in narcotics cases, where the dangers of witness intimidation, subornation of perjury or actual injury to witnesses are great, the defendant's request for a witness list should not be granted absent a particularized showing of need." United States v.

Taylor, 707 F. Supp. 696, 703 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (citation omitted). "[A]n abstract, conclusory claim that such disclosure [is] necessary," is not adequate to make the requisite showing. Cannone, 528 F.2d at 301-02.

*5 Defendant represents that the identities of the government's witnesses are generally unknown to the defendants and that without this knowledge and the opportunity to interview the witnesses, the defense will be unprepared to meet the government's evidence at trial. While there is some force to this contention, the generalized need Cruz professes is not sufficient under Second Circuit authority. In addition, the availability in this case of the transcript from the prior trial of a conspirator further diminishes defendant's professed need. Having failed to make a particularized showing of need for the government's witness list the request must be denied.

5. Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) Evidence

Cruz requests an order directing the government to provide advance notice, 14 days prior to trial, of any evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts committed by him it intends to introduce at trial pursuant to Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence ("Fed. R. Evid."). The Rule itself requires the government to provide "reasonable notice" of such evidence in advance of trial, but does not define "reasonable." It is therefore left to the Court to give meaning to that term in each particular case. This Court has generally required such notification ten days before trial. [FN2]

The government represents that it has not yet finalized its decisions concerning what evidence it will seek to introduce at trial. The government is nevertheless ordered to furnish notification ten calendar days in advance of trial, failing which the evidence will be precluded. To the extent the government determines after that point that it intends to introduce such evidence, the government must seek a ruling as to its admissibility and show good cause for its failure to provide notice within the appointed time frame.

6. Impeachment Material

Cruz also requests an order from the Court pursuant to Rule 404(b) requiring the government to advise him prior to trial of any evidence of his prior criminal conduct or immoral acts it plans to use for the purpose of impeaching him on cross-examination with such evidence. The government agrees to provide reasonable notice of impeachment material. The Court orders the government to produce this material ten days before trial.

7. Brady Material

Cruz seeks an order directing the government to produce material favorable to the defense pursuant to Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963).

The government represents that it is cognizant of its obligations under Brady and is currently unaware of any material falling under its mandate. In light of this representation, an order directing the production of such material is unnecessary at the present time. Of course, I expect the government to honor its commitment to disclose forthwith any Brady material of which it subsequently becomes aware.

CONCLUSION

Defendant's applications are denied with the exception of his motion concerning superfluous counts in the indictment, his motion for discovery of surveillance photographs, and his motion for Rule 404(b) evidence and impeachment evidence.

*6 It is SO ORDERED.

FN1. Defendant's request for particulars concerning every overt act the government intends to prove at trial is misguided. The government is not required to prove the commission of an overt act to establish the existence of the narcotics conspiracy charged. See United States v. Shabani, 115 S.Ct. 382, 385 (1994). Thus, defendant cannot show a need for this information sufficient to justify a bill of particulars.

FN2. Consistent with Rule 404(b), the Court also allows the government to provide such notice during trial if pre-trial notice can be excused for good cause.

END OF DOCUMENT

INSTA-CITE

CITATION: 1995 WL 617220

Direct History

=> 1 U.S. v. Cruz, 1995 WL 617220 (S.D.N.Y., Oct 20, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

Related References

2 U.S. v. Padilla, 1994 WL 681812 (S.D.N.Y., Dec 05, 1994)
(NO. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

3 U.S. v. Padilla, 1995 WL 5920 (S.D.N.Y., Jan 05, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

4 U.S. v. Cherry, 1995 WL 66595 (S.D.N.Y., Feb 15, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

5 U.S. v. Cherry, 876 F.Supp. 547, 63 USLW 2566 (D.N.Y., Feb 17, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR.313 (CSH))

6 U.S. v. Cherry, 1995 WL 77719 (S.D.N.Y., Feb 23, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

7 U.S. v. Boggio, 1995 WL 77722 (S.D.N.Y., Feb 23, 1995)
(NO. S7 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

8 U.S. v. Padilla, 1995 WL 105280 (S.D.N.Y., Mar 13, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

9 U.S. v. Padilla, 1995 WL 261513 (S.D.N.Y., May 03, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH))
On Reconsideration

10 U.S. v. Padilla, 1995 WL 301348 (S.D.N.Y., May 16, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

11 U.S. v. Jones, 57 F.3d 1071 (6th Cir.(Ohio), Jun 09, 1995)
(TABLE, TEXT IN WESTLAW, NO. 94-3092)

12 U.S. v. Cruz, 1995 WL 463107 (S.D.N.Y., Aug 04, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

13 U.S. v. Cruz, 1995 WL 640546 (S.D.N.Y., Oct 31, 1995)
(NO. S1 94 CR.313CSH)

14 U.S. v. Cruz, 907 F.Supp. 87 (D.N.Y., Dec 04, 1995)
(NO. S11 94 CR. 313 (CSH))

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Garry D. KERN, Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Troy P. REEVES, Appellant.

Nos. 93-1524, 93-1566.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.

Submitted Oct. 13, 1993.

Decided Dec. 17, 1993.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Nebraska, Lyle E. Strom, Chief Judge, of bank robbery, conspiracy to commit bank robbery, and carrying of firearm during and in relation to crime of violence. Defendants appealed. The Court of Appeals, Magill, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) other acts evidence was admissible on issue of intent to conspire; (2) motion for new trial on basis of newly discovered evidence was properly denied; and (3) state's knowledge of its police report potentially exonerating defendants could not be imputed to federal prosecutor on issue whether prosecutor withheld evidence and thereby violated Brady.

Affirmed.

[1] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 374
110k374
Government gave "reasonable notice" of general nature of bad act evidence to be used, when government informed defendants in hearing before magistrate judge that it might use evidence from some local robberies and when it provided the reports one week later, a week before trial. Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 369.2(8)
110k369.2(8)
Victim's testimony identifying defendants as participants in hotel robbery was relevant to issue of defendants' intent to conspire to rob bank 17 days earlier and was admissible; both robberies were committed by three stocking-masked males, in both robberies larger male carried black short-barreled shotgun, and smaller robber in both robberies vaulted over relatively high obstacle. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 371, 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[2] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 371(8)
110k371(8)
Victim's testimony identifying defendants as participants in hotel robbery was relevant to issue of defendants' intent to conspire to rob bank 17 days earlier and was admissible; both robberies were committed by three stocking-masked males, in both robberies larger male carried black short-barreled shotgun, and smaller robber in both robberies vaulted over relatively high obstacle. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 371, 2113(a, d); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 404(b), 28 U.S.C.A.

[3] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 945(2)
110k945(2)
Police report indicating confession to hotel robbery and refusal to name accomplices would not exonerate defendants in bank robbery prosecution using evidence of defendants' involvement in the hotel robbery, and, thus, report did not entitle defendants to new trial; if the evidence had been presented to jury, it could reasonably have believed that hotel robber was merely protecting defendants, and although jury could also have inferred that hotel robbery victim improperly identified defendants, evidence of guilt warranted denial of new trial motion. Fed.Rules Cr.Proc.Rule 33, 18 U.S.C.A.

[4] CRIMINAL LAW ⇐ 700(6)
110k700(6)
State's knowledge of its police report potentially exonerating defendants could not be imputed to federal prosecutor on issue whether prosecutor withheld evidence and thereby violated Brady. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 5, 14.

123 Mark W. Bubak, Omaha, NE, argued, for appellants.

Michael P. Norris, Asst. U.S. Atty., Omaha, NE, argued, for appellee.

Before McMILLIAN, BOWMAN, and MAGILL,

Circuit Judges.

MAGILL, Circuit Judge.

Troy B. Reeves (Reeves) and Garry D. Kern (Kern) appeal the judgment entered by the district court [FN1] following a jury's finding of guilt on three bank-robbery-related counts. Specifically, Reeves and Kern (the defendants) contend the trial court erred when it admitted evidence of another subsequent robbery, when it refused to grant a new trial after the discovery of new evidence, and when it found as a matter of law that conspiracy to commit bank robbery is a crime of violence. For the reasons addressed below, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

FN1. The Honorable Lyle E. Strom, Chief Judge, United States District Court for the District of Nebraska.

I. BACKGROUND

On June 12, 1992, an Omaha branch office of the First Federal Savings and Loan Association of Lincoln (First Federal) was robbed of approximately $12,700 by two stocking-masked males who differed significantly in height and weight. The smaller robber entered the bank first and the larger robber followed carrying a black short-barreled shotgun. The robbers left the bank and entered a recently-stolen white Buick driven by a third male. Immediately after the robbery, a stocking mask with a few human hairs was found outside the bank.

Kern's girlfriend at the time, Andrea Fraire (Fraire), testified at trial that Kern had related a plan to her to rob a jewelry store and bank in Omaha. According to Fraire, the planned robberies were to take place on June 12, 1992, and involved the use of stolen getaway cars. Fraire further testified that on the evening of June 12, 1992, Kern arrived home with $4000 to $4500 in cash.

Jack Parrott, a security guard for the shopping center in which the bank was located, testified at trial that he observed a rusted gold Oldsmobile Cutlass (Cutlass) occupied by four males in the shopping center parking lot on June 11, 1992. The next day, June 12, the same car was observed again by Parrott, again occupied by four males. Later that same morning, Parrott observed the Cutlass in a church parking lot parked beside a white Buick. The white Buick was now occupied by three of the males and the Cutlass held the fourth individual. After observing the Buick for a short time, Parrott noticed a shotgun being passed to a backseat passenger. Parrott subsequently identified Reeves from a photograph array as the frontseat passenger. Although Parrott was unable to identify Kern from a police lineup, he did identify Kern at trial as the backseat passenger.

The bank employees were unable to identify Reeves or Kern from lineups or at trial. Reeves and Kern both had alibi witnesses testify that they were elsewhere at the time of the robbery. The human hairs in the mask, however, were identified by an FBI hair and fiber expert as matching samples taken from Kern.

At trial, testimony was introduced by the government regarding the defendants' alleged participation in a hotel robbery that occurred seventeen days after the bank robbery. Kern was charged in state court with commission of this robbery. The testimony was prefaced by a limiting instruction prohibiting the jury from using this testimony to establish "bad" character and, accordingly, conformity with that character. The testimony was then introduced pursuant to Federal 124 Rule of Evidence 404(b). The hotel robbery victim, Ashford, testified he was robbed by three armed masked males, and he identified both Reeves and Kern as two of the individuals who robbed him.

Following a jury trial, the defendants were convicted of all three counts against them. Count I charged the defendants with conspiracy to commit bank robbery in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371. Count II charged them with the June 12, 1992 bank robbery of First Federal in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2113(a), (d). Count III charged Reeves with carrying a firearm during and in relation to a crime of violence in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1), and Kern was charged as Reeves' co-conspirator on that count.

After the jury convicted Reeves and Kern for the First Federal robbery, the government received from the Omaha police a supplementary report related to the hotel robbery. An individual named Stacey Lue (Lue) confessed to participating with two accomplices in the hotel robbery. Lue was specifically asked if Reeves and Kern were his accomplices, but he denied any participation on their part. Lue, however, refused to name his two accomplices. Upon receipt, the government immediately disclosed this information to the defendants' attorneys. Following the disclosure of the Lue confession, Reeves and Kern moved for a new trial. In state court, Kern pleaded nolo contendere to the hotel robbery charge and was convicted.

II. DISCUSSION

The defendants contend that three errors of the trial court mandate reversal and a new trial: admission of Ashford's testimony, Brady [FN2] evidence and/or newly discovered evidence, and the district court's finding as a matter of law that conspiracy to commit bank robbery is a crime of violence as defined by 18 U.S.C. § 16. We find that the district court committed no reversible error, and we affirm the court's judgment.

FN2. Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963).

A. The Hotel Robbery Evidence

The defendants object to the admission into evidence of Ashford's testimony regarding the hotel robbery because they claim the government gave insufficient notice that it planned on using this evidence and it was not properly admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) (Rule 404(b)). The district court, however, has broad discretion to admit such evidence and its decision will not be overturned unless it is clear that the evidence has no bearing on the case. United States v. Sykes, 977 F.2d 1242, 1246 (8th Cir.1992).

[1] The government gave the defendants adequate notice that it planned on using Rule 404(b) evidence. The rule states the prosecution must "provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial ... on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence." Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). The magistrate judge specifically ordered that any "bad act" evidence be disclosed at least fourteen days prior to trial. The government complied by informing the defendants in a hearing before the magistrate judge that the government might use evidence from some local robberies. See Tr. at 335. At that time, the government did not yet have the state reports concerning these robberies. Approximately one week before trial, when the government obtained the reports, the defendants were likewise provided with these reports. Id. We find that the government's notice satisfies the requirements of Rule 404(b); the district court did not abuse its discretion in finding that this notice was reasonable.

Rule 404(b) prohibits the admission of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" to prove the character of a person, and hence, conformity with that character; that is, it prohibits propensity evidence. See id. The rule, nonetheless, specifically recognizes that evidence of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" could be admissible for other purposes, such as to prove motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake. Id.

To properly admit Rule 404(b) evidence for purposes other than to prove propensity, it must (1) be relevant to a material issue raised at trial, (2) be similar in kind and close 125 in time to the crime charged, (3) be supported by sufficient evidence to support a finding by a jury that the defendant committed the other act; and (4) not have a prejudicial value that substantially outweighs its probative value. Sykes, 977 F.2d at 1246; United States v. Johnson, 934 F.2d 936, 939 (8th Cir.1991). The district court warned the jury in an instruction prior to Ashford's testimony that "the mere fact that these defendants may have committed a similar act in the past is not evidence that they committed the acts charged in this case." Tr. at 365. The district court repeated essentially the same warning in Jury Instruction No. 10. The permissible purposes enumerated by the district court for which this testimony could be considered included proof of identity, knowledge, plan, motive, and intent to conspire.

[2] We find that the hotel robbery evidence was properly admitted to prove that Reeves and Kern intended to enter into an agreement or understanding to commit robbery and that they understood the purpose of this agreement. [FN3] The court instructed the jury that in order to find the defendants guilty of conspiracy to commit bank robbery, it had to find four elements: (1) two or more persons reached an agreement to commit the crime, (2) the defendant voluntarily and intentionally joined in the agreement, (3) at the time the defendant joined in the agreement, he knew the purpose of the agreement, and (4) that while the agreement was in effect, one or more of the persons who had joined in the agreement did an overt act in order to carry out the agreement. Thus, the hotel robbery evidence was relevant to a material fact: intent to conspire. See Cheek v. United States, 858 F.2d 1330, 1336-37 (8th Cir.1988); United States v. Scholle, 553 F.2d 1109, 1121 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 940, 98 S.Ct. 432, 54 L.Ed.2d 300 (1977); United States v. Carlson, 547 F.2d 1346, 1354 & n. 5 (8th Cir.1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 914, 97 S.Ct. 2174, 53 L.Ed.2d 224 (1977).

FN3. We do not decide whether the hotel robbery evidence could otherwise have been admissible as evidence of identity, plan, or motive, because we find the district court did not abuse its discretion in allowing its admission into evidence and the limiting instruction properly warned the jury not to impermissibly use this evidence as proof of propensity. However, we do not countenance the district court's use of this virtual laundry list of permissible Rule 404(b) purposes. See United States v. Mothershed, 859 F.2d 585, 589 (8th Cir.1988). Such an action, nevertheless, in itself is not a basis for reversal. See id.

As required by Sykes and Johnson, the hotel robbery evidence was similar in kind and close in time to the crime charged. The hotel robbery occurred only seventeen days after the bank robbery. Both robberies were committed by three stocking-masked males. In both robberies, the larger male carried a black short-barreled shotgun. Moreover, the smaller masked robber in both robberies vaulted over a relatively high obstacle: the teller's counter in the bank robbery and the desk in the hotel robbery.

Ashford's testimony regarding the hotel robbery was sufficient for a jury to have found that Reeves and Kern committed the hotel robbery. Ashford not only made a positive identification of the defendants at trial, but he also identified Reeves from an array of photographs soon after the hotel robbery.

Moreover, the court's limiting instruction to the jury was sufficient to prevent undue prejudice from the admission of this evidence. Therefore, because the hotel robbery evidence was admissible to prove that the defendants intended to enter into a conspiracy to rob, we find that the district court did not abuse its discretion when it allowed Ashford to testify.

B. The Supplementary Omaha Police Division Report

[3] After the defendants received the Omaha police division supplementary report (the report) indicating that Lue had confessed to the hotel robbery and refused to name his accomplices, the defendants moved for a new trial. Reeves and Kern claim that the report "exonerated" them and hence a new trial should have been granted pursuant to Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 33 (Rule 33). Furthermore, they claim that Brady mandates a new trial because the knowledge 126 of the Omaha police regarding this report should be imputed to the federal prosecutor. We do not agree that the new evidence exonerated the defendants or that the prosecutor withheld evidence from the defendants.

Rule 33 allows a court to grant a motion for a new trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence if the evidence is, in fact, discovered since trial; the court may infer the movant has been diligent; the evidence is not merely cumulative or impeaching; the evidence is material; and the newly discovered evidence would probably produce an acquittal. United States v. Gustafson, 728 F.2d 1078, 1084 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 979, 105 S.Ct. 380, 83 L.Ed.2d 315 (1984); see also United States v. Wang, 964 F.2d 811, 813 (8th Cir.1992) (new trial may be granted if the defendant's substantial rights are affected). The defendants' argument fails because the report did not exonerate them; that is, it would not have been likely to have produced an acquittal. As stated by the district court, the report [FN4] would merely have "given the jury some additional information to evaluate in determining whether or not Mr. Ashford had indeed properly identified the two defendants as being participants." Tr. at 766. Had this evidence been presented to the jury, the jury could reasonably have believed that Reeves and Kern were Lue's accomplices and that Lue was merely protecting them by denying their participation in the hotel robbery. The jury could also have inferred that Ashford improperly identified Reeves and Kern as participants in the hotel robbery. The district court, however, found that this latter possibility did not warrant a new trial. Particularly in light of the amount of evidence presented to the jury on the issue of the defendants' guilt, the district court did not abuse its discretion by denying the defendants' motion for a new trial. See Gustafson, 728 F.2d at 1084.

> FN4. The report states, in relevant part: [Lue] had committed that robbery with two other individuals. Previously arrested in connection with this robbery was a Garry KERN, and a Troy REEVES had also been identified as a suspect in this robbery also. I, Officer MAHONEY, asked Stacy LUE if these other two suspects were with him when this robbery occurred, and LUE stated that they were not; however, he would not name the other two suspects out of fear.

[4] Nor does Brady mandate a new trial in this case. See Brady, 373 U.S. at 87-88, 83 S.Ct. at 1196-97. A defendant's due process rights are violated under Brady if a prosecutor "withholds evidence on demand of an accused which, if made available, would tend to exculpate him or reduce the penalty." Id. In order to establish such a claim, the prosecutor must have suppressed or withheld evidence that was both favorable and material to the defense. Moore v. Illinois, 408 U.S. 786, 794, 92 S.Ct. 2562, 2568, 33 L.Ed.2d 706 (1972). Nothing in this record indicates that this prosecutor withheld evidence from the defendants. Here, the prosecutor simply did not have the report until the trial was over. Such a case is fundamentally different than when information is in the prosecutor's files. See State v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 110, 96 S.Ct. 2392, 2400, 49 L.Ed.2d 342 (1976). We do not accept the defendants' proposal that we impute the knowledge of the State of Nebraska to a federal prosecutor. See United States v. Walker, 720 F.2d 1527, 1535 (11th Cir.1983) (refusing to impute the knowledge of state officials to a federal prosecutor), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1108, 104 S.Ct. 1614, 80 L.Ed.2d 143 (1984). Consequently, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion when it refused to grant a new trial.

Finally, we find wholly without merit Kern's contention that conspiracy to commit bank robbery is not a crime of violence as defined by 18 U.S.C. § 16, and we reaffirm our previous holding to that effect. See United States v. Johnson, 962 F.2d 1308, 1311 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 358, 121 L.Ed.2d 271 (1992), and cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 113 S.Ct. 1418, 122 L.Ed.2d 788 (1993).

III. CONCLUSION

Accordingly, we find that the district court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted the hotel robbery evidence and denied the defendants' motion for a new trial. Moreover, the district court properly found that conspiracy to commit bank robbery is a *127 crime of violence. Therefore, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

END OF DOCUMENT

INSTA-CITE

CITATION: 12 F.3d 122
=> 1 U.S. v. Kern, 12 F.3d 122, 39 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 1428 (8th Cir.(Neb.), Dec 17, 1993) (NO. 93-1524, 93-1566)

Citation Rank(R) Page(P) Database Mode
763 F.2d 897 R 16 OF 19 P 1 OF 182 CTA8 P LOCATE
18 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 465
(Cite as: 763 F.2d 897)

UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Carl Angelo DeLUNA, Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Carl James CIVELLA, Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Charles David MORETINA, Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Carl Wesley THOMAS, Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Anthony CHIAVOLA, Sr., Appellant.
UNITED STATES of America, Appellee,
v.
Carl James CIVELLA, Appellant.
Nos. 83-2408 to 83-2411, 83-2462 and 84-1047.

Tropicana in 1978. Agosto testified that he met with Nick Civella in a light projection room of the Tropicana to discuss this interest. Following instructions from Chicago and the Civellas, Agosto paid the Bakers $375,000 of his own money in order to buy out this interest. Agosto testified that this was in keeping with the agreements with the Civellas that the Civellas would eliminate the Bakers as rivals to Agosto's control of the Tropicana and would protect Agosto from other people who might attempt to assert interests at the Tropicana.

915 The government argues that the evidence does not indicate criminal activity by any appellant. The government further argues that the evidence is highly probative of the conspiracy charged, that is, that appellants had a hidden interest in the Tropicana and exercised management and control over the Tropicana. We agree with the government's position and hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence.

Misconduct of Carl Thomas

[26] The government was permitted to present recorded conversations of Carl Thomas (Marlo tape, Ex. 199), wherein he stated that he had been involved in skimming at many casinos in Las Vegas for many years. This conversation occurred during a meeting wherein appellants discussed various methods of skimming and Thomas related his experience with skimming and recommended ways of skimming.

Appellants argue that the evidence was highly prejudicial and should have been excluded under Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). The government argues that the evidence was not other crimes evidence because the references were inextricably intertwined in the offense charged and because the evidence established Thomas' role in the conspiracy. Alternately, the government argues that the evidence is admissible under Fed.R.Evid. 404 as proof of intent.

[27] We hold that the evidence was admissible. "The rule limiting admissibility of uncharged misconduct does not shield an accused from the reception of evidence that he boasted of his past experience in crime in order to reassure a prospective vender or co-worker of his skill and reliability." United States v. Stokes, 12 M.J. 229, 10 Mil.L.Rep. (Pub.L.Educ.Inst.) 2185, 2190 (C.M.A.1982). Moreover, Thomas' statements, to the extent they prove bad character and Rule 404(b) is implicated, are admissible to prove Thomas' intent to engage in the charged conspiracy because Thomas had consistently taken the position that he had no intent to join a conspiracy.

List of Excluded Persons (Black Book)

[28] The government was permitted to introduce evidence that Carl and Nick Civella appeared in the List of Excluded Persons (commonly referred to as the Black Book). The Black Book is a list of people who must be excluded from Nevada casinos by a gaming licensee. The Black Book is issued by the State Gaming Control Board and adopted and promulgated by the Nevada Gaming

Citation | Rank(R) | Database | Mode
763 F.2d 897 | R 16 OF 19 | CTA8 | P LOCATE
(Cite as: 763 F.2d 897)

United States Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit.
Submitted Sept. 10, 1984.
Decided May 10, 1985.

Rehearing Denied July 9, 1985 in Nos. 83-2408 to 83-2410, 83-2462 and 84-1047.
Rehearing and Rehearing En Banc Denied July 12, 1985 in No. 83-2411.

Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri, Joseph E. Stevens, Jr., J., on charges arising out of a casino skimming conspiracy, and they appealed. The Court of Appeals, McMillian, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) Travel Act convictions were properly predicated upon violations of Nevada state law resulting from the conduct of gambling operations without the necessary licenses and the indirect receipt of gambling monies without the necessary licenses; (2) coconspirator's statements contained sufficient "indicia of reliability," and therefore admission of such statements did not violate confrontation clause rights of codefendants; (3) there was no variance between indictment and the evidence, which established a single conspiracy to skim money from casino and transport it to persons in other states who had a hidden interest in the casino, rather than establishing multiple conspiracies; and (4) trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendants' motions for severance on grounds of any "spillover effect."

Affirmed.

INSTA-CITE

CITATION: 763 F.2d 897

Direct History

=> 1 U.S. v. DeLuna, 763 F.2d 897, 18 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 465
(8th Cir.(Mo.), May 10, 1985) (NO. 83-2408, 83-2409, 83-2410, 83-2411, 83-2462, 84-1047)
Certiorari Denied by
2 Thomas v. United States, 474 U.S. 980, 106 S.Ct. 382, 88 L.Ed.2d 336
(U.S.Mo., Nov 12, 1985) (NO. 85-423)

Negative Indirect History

Declined to Follow by
3 Government of Virgin Islands v. Joseph, 964 F.2d 1380,
35 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 877
(3rd Cir.(Virgin Islands), Jun 01, 1992) (NO. 91-3424)

Secondary Sources

Corpus Juris Secundum (C.J.S.) References
15 C.J.S. Commerce Sec.132 Note 19.10 (Pocket Part)
22A C.J.S. Criminal Law Sec.611 Note 23
22A C.J.S. Criminal Law Sec.621 Note 66
23 C.J.S. Criminal Law Sec.825 Note 60
23 C.J.S. Criminal Law Sec.1059 Note 88
23 C.J.S. Criminal Law Sec.1063 Note 39
23 C.J.S. Criminal Law Sec.1128 Note 23
79 C.J.S. Searches and Seizures Sec.183 Note 66

ERIC JASO – LEGAL RESEARCH – REDIRECT/404(b) – CODEFENDENTS

ATTORNEY WORK PRODUCT

Redirect – 404(b) – codefendants

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
EASTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS
WESTERN DIVISION

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA	)
v.	)	No. LR-CR-95-173
JAMES B. MCDOUGAL, JIM GUY TUCKER, and SUSAN H. MCDOUGAL	)

MEMORANDUM OF THE UNITED STATES IN SUPPORT OF ADMISSIBILITY OF TESTIMONY REGARDING PRIOR CONSPIRACY

